Fires Inclement Hazards

Much of the Peril is Reaved by Volunteer Crews and Tragedy Is Always Hand

The hazards of coastal service are not always visible or measurable. The British Coast Guard Service, who are thrown into relief by the cruises of its volunteer crews, is subject to the sudden and often sudden exigencies of the weather. The service is organized into the various zones of the country, and is manned by volunteer crews who are selected and trained for the work. The volunteers are usually men of experience and ability, who are able to cope with the difficulties of the service and the exigencies of the weather.

The service is a highly organized one, and the volunteers are trained to carry out their duties in the most efficient manner. The volunteers are also able to cope with the difficulties of the service and the exigencies of the weather.
