HOUSING CONVENIENCES ON THE FARM

House on the farm—the backbone of the Canadian economy—today differs in many respects from what it was 50 years ago. Mechanical power has become a part of the background to the work of tilling the soil and harvesting the crops. In the home, home electric power is removing much of the drudgery from many daily tasks that must be performed by the farm family. The changes are there, too, in many rural homes which lack many of the facilities which tend to bridge the region of rural living.

The 1941 census provided much valuable statistical data on the extent to which the farm scene changed in the period preceding the Dominion-wide survey of that year. In June next, when the 1951 Dominion census gets underway, farmers will find as well as city dwellers will ask whether or not their homes are served with electricity, whether or not they have a radio, telephone, refrigeration facilities, plumbing facilities, an automobile, and a few other questions relating to domestic conveniences. Since these questions were also asked in 1941, the tabulations will be of great value in measuring the changes which have taken place in the past ten years.

The 1941 survey showed that the typical Canadian farm household averaged 4.7 persons living in dwellings with an average of 5.8 rooms. About one-third of these dwellings are pumphouses or other sources of water outside the home, and about two-thirds have electricity. The farmers have a marked rise in the number of automobiles owned by the farm family. As many as 72 per cent of the farmers were using private ice houses or springs in which feed co
