

to seek safety on this side of the boundary line. This country has done its best to bring about a more satisfactory state of affairs in regard to the handling over of the fugitive offenders, and a draft treaty now lies in the hands of the U. S. Secretary of State, but our neighbors do not seem anxious to remedy the evil of which they so loudly complain. Canada has refused enough of her own without importing them from the United States, and to do our neighbors justice the United States has doubtless refused them of its own without importing them from Canada. There is some difficulty in taking a fugitive offender from Canada to the States than in taking such an one from one province to another. The presumption is that a man who leaves his own country as a fugitive offender does so because he desires to escape justice. The proper place for him to be tried is in the courts of the land in which the offence was committed, and that with as little delay as possible. The whole subject of extradition should be taken up by our neighbors.

Some time ago the Attorney-General published a notice that all newspapers publishing lottery advertisements would be proceeded against under the Act for the Suppression of Lotteries. The intimation was received with approval by the public, as it was assumed that the object was to put a stop to an immoral practice, which is unfortunately spreading rather than decreasing in this province. One of our French contemporaries, probably seeing that other lotteries were being advertised with the sanction of the Attorney-General, continued to advertise the announcement of that Louisiana, for which it is to be pursued in the courts. So far this is well. But the Attorney-General should not make his name a name of another. What about Father Labelle's lottery? If it is to be suppressed, the same objections which are urged against the lottery business under the pretence of suppressing it. Father Labelle is one of Mr. Mercier's right hand men and a deputy minister. If it is wrong for Le Monde to advertise the Louisiana lottery it cannot be right and proper for our own paper to carry on a lottery of his own. Father Labelle has the sanction of the law, which gives him an exceptional privilege, representing the church. An immoral act—so immoral that newspapers can be punished for advertising it—does not become moral when done in the interests of religion.

AMERICAN POLITICIANS ARE CALCULATING upon the chances of the presidential election. Both parties have already won the contest—by computation. The "doubtful States" are a very important factor in the calculation. These are New York, Connecticut, New Jersey and Indiana. They were carried by the Democrats in 1884 by comparatively small majorities. A slight change of opinion will, it is contended, give these States to the Republicans. The number of electoral votes is 40. The candidate, therefore, for whom 20 of the electors cast their votes is elected. Mr. Blaine's support is 182. The Republicans consider that they will give the States that voted in favor of Blaine in 1884, all that is required to make the Republican candidate President is nineteen votes. Fifteen of these, they assert, were secured when Harrison from Indiana was nominated. If Connecticut goes over to the Republicans on the protection issue, which they regard as almost certain, they will have more votes than they need to elect their candidates. The Democrats on the other hand can see no reason why any state that voted for Cleveland in 1884 should reject him in 1888. It is evident that the Mugwumps, who played so influential a part in the last Presidential election, intend to reveal in the tariff issue, which they believe will give them many States, and they expect that the temperance people, who are outraged at the prospect of whiskey being made free if the Republicans are successful, will do their best to prevent the return of their candidate, so that after examining the whole field carefully through the democratic bias glass, Mr. Cleveland's supporters come to the conclusion that they will have very little trouble in electing their man. The Democratic spectator and the unbiased calculator consider that both sets of partisans are much too sanguine. They believe that the contest will be close and they prudently refrain from predicting what the issue will be.
