How to Use This Internet Book

I'm very happy that companies like Googlebooks allow me to publish this which allows me to deliver my compilations to anyone who wants to improve their knowledge. You are encouraged to use Google Chrome or Firefox to view this since with Internet Explorer the pages may not render properly.

Also, you're encouraged to use the hypertext embedded Table of Contents immediately following rather than Google's generated Table since it is far more accurate.

Publishing on-line also allows easy use of the product since you're able to much more quickly jump back and forth through the product with your browser buttons. You are also able to search within with the lower left hand search field. And, with Googlebooks, you can always enlarge the print with the magnify button, which may make reading easier than if you had a hard-copy. And lastly, it's always there – you don't even have to go to the proverbial other room to haul a hard-copy off the shelf.

For Kimberley Edith who worked for and earned New York and Washington DC and set this cog-in-history in motion in 1987 with her conclusively high dignity, professionalism, honesty and hard work (once a star, always a star)...

"Larry" ,"the Institution", of Concordia U. who spoke of the best databases in Canada and that the fact that even 'rock stars' don't have much music to perform, if CRA has seized their equipment on-stage for tax non-payment...

...and for Provincial Crowns who can only properly convict unfortunately oh so few tax evaders (and Federal Crowns for other tax-realization methods) and under-manned CRA officials who amass cases against them.

The Canada Income Tax Act Enforcement, Collection, Prosecution
A Case Compilation, 6th Ed.

Foreword

"What have the Romans ever done for Us!!?" isn't much of a parody of the actual sentiment that perhaps too many real people have towards their government's care for them.[2] Mr. J. Cleese asking it as a principal rebellious character in the classic movie "The Life of Brian" quickly understands that he chose the wrong question to ask. In my opinion, the more relevant, safer question should be "What did the Romans not do for Us!!?"[3]

This may be my last research on income tax law. And I caution you, it's the sixth edition. In some ways it was my first. It is about satisfying your inherent financial obligations to, in this case, the Canadian State, as a result of you being allowed to experience the 4 pillars of its laws that allow you to exist here, flawed as you think they may be sometimes. And rather than delve into the application of what some see as a complex all-encompassing Act (though surprisingly rudimentary if you actually look at it) to the infinitesimally complex world of "Canada", this commentary speaks only of how it is enforced and, how ITA tax is collected in the face of adverse remitters and instances prosecuted and sentenced in the cases of purer contempt of our ITA regarding evasion.

This compilation of existing case law is broken down by principal applications of the ITA:

- Voluntary disclosure practice and fairness application,
- Requests for information,
- Enforcement functions such as collection mechanics including, requirements to pay, jeopardy orders, garnishments, certificates and writs of seizure,
- Section 160 targeted transfers of wealth in effort to evade collection attempts,
- Directors liability and trust imposition on deduction at source and other monies to be withheld/collected for the government,
- Pure evasion under section 238/239,
- Confidentiality mechanics and access to CRA "taxpayer information" for non-Act purposes.

This also reproduces 10 Canada Revenue Agency Internal Operations Manuals on Particular aspects of the ITA, which can be viewed in any TSO Public Reading Room. I've included them as image pages that are non-searchable. (I have also included them for completeness, to be off value to anyone interested in entering the employ of CRA who would like to understand exactly how things are done.) The 10 I chose relate to:

- Fairness (3)
- Section 160 Transfers
- Certificates
- Jeopardy Collections
- Requirements to Pay
- Requests for Information
- Deemed Trusts
- Directors Liability

and they are current circa July 2012. (You are certainly encouraged to visit a TSO Reading Room if you have issues of timeliness.)

The ITA is, in my opinion, the best example of how those supposed "inept politicians up there in Ottawa, living on the taxpayers' dime" prove that they don't, since what started out as the IWTA (the McGill CDH/Nahum Gelber Library faithfully has maintained copies all the way to its beginning) evolved extensively. But surprisingly, as recently as 2003, because its adaptors did not conclusively monitor all collection aspects of public debt our Supreme Court had to attend to Markevich concerning simple statutory prescription that led to immediate amendment. Mistakes happen, you can't cover all the possible angles as other statute / jurisprudence evolves, and, for that one case, the Act is strengthened. But don't ever forget that every one of those other syllables in it resulted from more "behind the scenes" concern than the route that SCC case took to decide (and many like it). In the instance of penal attributes Jarvis, another case at the SCC (and subsequent lower courts on extent of improperly obtained evidence), has given us detailed dicta on when a mere audit can lead to incarceration in light of Charter principles which allows taxpayers to understand the balance of their Charter rights vs. state prerogative. On the issue of Crown discretion to proceed by way of summary or indictment proceedings in evasion cases we also have Smythe, another SCC case in the face of equality under the Bill of Rights (and effectively under the Charter). And for the amount of case involved, the issues are surprisingly broad and this is an area of law that is very refined.

And, in these cases, and it's not done lightly, the least you can do is respect its objective. As was said by Judge Sexton in Her Majesty The Queen v. Jean Livingston[4]

> The power to tax means little without the power to collect. As a result, the Income Tax Act R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "Act") provides for a myriad of powers to collect taxes owed that would otherwise not be obtainable when taxpayers attempt to evade their creditors. These powers must be interpreted in light of their intended purpose and within the contexts of the factual situations to which they are applied.

While in MNR v. Sung Young Park[5] it was provided by our Federal Court that:

> Based on the disclosure of one's income and its sources which does not constitute a self-imposed affliction but constitutes a legal imperative, the paying of taxes, thereby, does not arise of choice, but derives from a legal obligation.

As an educated mere bookkeeper, a mere Accountancy B. Comm who worked his way through, with an unadulterated love for the poetry of case and statute law – where a simple World "makes sense" - as some who know me, I choose not to further any public accounting practice since I have simply seen too too many not want to pay income tax using "sleigh-of-hand" bizarre interpretations of what they think they can pester a poor TCJ or senior to accept, if it leads there, let alone, simply falsifying the data. The standard phrase I often hear that sets my alarm off is "I have paid my share." to which I immediately think, as the individual is justifying her version of her law when in reality it is the country's version of our law, "Have you actually read the ITA, let alone, all the cases about it and understood them?". But, is not the payment of income tax a personal debt prescribed by only a law, part of the very fabric of your society, that creates it all around you, to your society that is not in any way related to what the entirety of the rest of it do? If "that other guy doesn't pay" does that thus increase "your share"? The ITA "applies to all" – with all its intricate peculiarities, and it applies "equally", with the entire history of literally generations of legal and practical public-conscience minds behind its evolution so we should be ever so sensitive to those who qualify the payment of an arbitrarily determined amount of tax to being "their share", when they don't know how much tax has to be collected out of the population, how much actually is, nor, how it is calculated to begin with. They're a few syllables that reveal something enormous since the phrase should be "I paid my income taxes [or recognized them]", not "I paid my share."

Because this is where it can lead. In our case, all 35,000,000+ Canadians are due the benefit, individually, of 1 35,000,000th of every dollar the law, your and their law, obliges you to pay. So both practically and theoretically, when you've clandestinely refused to recognize a simply calculated financial obligation (let alone take advantage of a flaw unforeseen in the minds of the legislators) you yourself have "ripped off" literally every other citizen in Canada. And sadly, far too many have no problem being unethical, or, law- breakers, (that is what you call yourself when you break a law) of that magnitude. And it's extremely dangerous because if you're willing to unethically or illegally disenfranchise only 35,000,000, just imagine what you can and may do to just one, if you get that ball rolling. But, those who value "their share" will forever blame it on those fat-cat politicians. But then again, according to Ben Franklin, "Democracy will never work without an educated population."[6] If you "chip away at an institution", you might end up as well taking it all down. And then what do you have in its place? In an instance where a bankrupt further didn't bother to pay his taxes we should all take Bice (Re), 2007 ABQB 708 where it was opined:

> [1] This is the bankrupt's third bankruptcy. All bankruptcies have been tax driven leaving large amounts owing for taxes. The bankrupt also admits to drug and alcohol abuse.
> [2] An especially aggravating factor in this bankruptcy is the conviction of the bankrupt for tax evasion on January 24, 2000. The personal bankrupt failed to pay tax on reported income of $350,720.05 and remit GST in the amount of $72,212.36. The bankrupt was fined almost $100,000.00 and is paying back those amounts at $300.00/month.
> [3] The second bankruptcy and this bankruptcy were filed subsequent to the tax evasion charges and each involved substantial tax liabilities.
> [4] Tax debts which are sought to be eliminated through the bankruptcy process should reflect the court's moral indignation.
> [5] Registrar Funduk expressed that moral indignation in Re Trueman 25 CBR (4th) p. 124:
> > The bankrupt enjoys the considerable benefits of being a Canadian citizen and an Alberta resident. Those benefits are not cost free. Taxpayers who do not pay their proper amount of tax are pickpockets. They pick the pockets of those taxpayers who do pay their taxes. What is so special about the bankrupt that paying taxpayers must bear a greater tax burden so he does not have to pay his proper tax liability? Canada has a substantial accumulated debt and each year pays substantial interest on that debt. Why should the bankrupt have a free ride, not once but twice. The trustee says that the bankrupt is slotted for a heart transplant. Will the bankrupt pay for that, or will the cost be borne by health care which is funded from public funds, which includes income tax? Why should paying taxpayers pay for the bankrupt's heart transplant when he has twice now picked their pockets?

while, further, with respect to pure evasion, it was opined in R. v. Kresanowski[7],

> … The effect of false returns is visited upon all taxpayers in Canada. To put it bluntly, a person who is instrumental in reducing the income tax of one person is simply not only being unfair to his fellow Canadians, because he is not acting honestly, but he is making those other Canadians, perhaps his neighbours and friends, pay more than their fair share. Certainly tax evasion is to be punished to an extent that it will deter others from acting likewise.

It is in my view almost a certainty that tax evasion will be visited by a term of prison. Perhaps the only matter that is really to be decided is how long that prison term will be.

Further, on the issue of mere economics, without regard to the law, nor the ethics of the legality of the law, and I`m reminded of a favourite late friend of Vancouver, John Turner, one of the favourite phrases of whom was "All of this: And Heaven Too!": you get a pretty good "bang for the buck" when you "send Caesar" part of your earnings don`t you? I mean, all of "this", that completely engulfs you[8]. Wouldn`t youwant to pay a bit more for such "a deal"…? You hardly miss it, and look where it goes. Instead, unfortunately in Canada there is a small percentage of people who look at their government as alien to them and not in their own interest to deal honestly with. We have the stereotypical 'hard-nosed CRA tax collector' who is to be looked upon with unfounded deep-rooted contempt since she stands for something that will take away only a sliver of wealth from her party, even if, legally compelled to do so and the author is ever-so thankful for the role they play and the fact that they can carry-on doing it since an exception to the rule of law, if allowed to continue, will result in more exceptions and thereby lower public funding of government expenditure which only works for us all.[9]

And really, our "government" is us and we do elect people to ensure that our money is applied effectively.

And, "do you need it all"? For those who like our bumpy roads that do get us there, our overwhelmed doctors who do find the time, our overworked police when no one is standing at our door with a firearm, our overloaded justice system where we do assert our grievances, our lengthy check-in process at airports where planes don't blow up, et cetera, and all of our municipal/provincial/federal law that works to our benefit in all its aspects, are you so unappreciative of that which allowed you to realize on it financially: "do you need it all"? Again, such a "bang", for "the buck": best deal in the country actually. Everyone else above does their job: is there a reason why you don't do yours?[10]

What exactly would you do with that squandered chance in the form of a legally compelled payment to the country, where they could focus it, learnedly, that would make you, permanently, a better person?[10][11]]

As a family member would sometimes advise me: "What did they ever do to you that would cause you to [rip off as a tax cheat everyone else]?" When you're buying your Chicken Salad Sandwich

[8] "The Romans have it covered": try and think of an instance where ITA-raised funding does not benefit you.

[9] Again, care to pay for the spousal surgery, or your infant's birth, yourself? Would you know how to manage your own money enough to know how? In old Quebec during the reign of 'the seigniors' they used to have to shovel the snow off their section of the road in the winter to make it passable: can you see yourself doing that? That's how and why we evolved out of the 'dark ages', by paying income and other taxes. If you'd like to inform yourself with the studies and studies and studies done on income tax enforcement/collection/evasion you're encouraged to log into the SSRN database.

[10] There are thousands of people who work just so that that is what is accomplished, and that's why they call it, "in the public service".

[11] To tell you the truth, for some of the cases I've seen and/or read about, there are more sociopaths in society than anyone can guess. Sadly, only less than 300 cases are referred by CRA Special Investigations to Crown for prosecution per year, out of a population of 35,000,000. (They seem to have the same limitations as the SEC in the US if these numbers are reflective of resources.)

at Tim Hortons on the corner, were ALL of the other people ahead of you ALWAYS obnoxious to you? Did everyone who you met, in the entirety of your life, irritate you exhaustively? What did a whole country called "Canada" do to you that prompted you to falsify some info. to get back a few/many farthings/thousands of dollars that you were not entitled to, when they should have went to someone else or their benefit? [Thankfully not everyone leads such a miserable life, carrying on private wars, as you if such is the case...

With respect to the seemingly comic overtones in the above opening paragraph, for those church / synagogue / mosque attendees, would you hypocritically disenfranchise your fellow of, actually, the mechanics of their faith, when that's exactly what you're doing equivalently under the ITA when you purposefully do same?

And a simple story about a Quebec car accident. In 1999 I was working for a reputable firm with Judy, Craig, Gerald, Mr. I. and Mr. S., Sue, Cheryl, Mary, Anita and yes Ann and a radio news-spot came on that a day- care worker had hoped to take her charges out for a trip. The problem was that while she had no culpability in how she drove, she hit an icy patch on the Quebec highway and the van ended up in a field and 4-5 toddlers were killed. Probably happens all the time since unless you look into accident statistics you wouldn't know what 'the government' 'sees'. But, the accident happened since there was no salt/sand on that stretch of the road. How much does road salt/sand cost, pennies? So if it's so cheap, where was it? Well, it seems that municipalities have to work within their budgets for road protection and while they do receive revenue from various sources, the province can only give so much, since that's what the province has 'in the budget' for that municipality. The province, of course, has various streams of revenue coming in, in Quebec, pursuant to its own Taxation Act, but also the Federal government for transfer payments. But, that government too has 'its budget' with revenue coming from various sources as well. The long of the short of it is, we elect people to ensure that 'our money' is best applied and while exceptions do pop- up, generally it is but when people even begin to think that they don't have to contribute to, what is, their World around them then we should be ever-so-thankful for the information-collection, tax debt certification/realization, trust collection, jeopardy enforcement, s. 160 wealth-shifting mechanics and especially prosecution mechanics since even though the above happened, (and Sue McG was distraught wanting desperately to have someone charged, as one bookkeeper was thinking "ya, the tax-cheat"), day- care workers continue rightfully to make outings in winter.

As a consequence, even if I were an LLB or LLM, I'd find it unethical to advise a client on the enclosed aspects, at "$250/hour", without reflecting on "the Canadian academic system" that allowed me to excel to the point where my advice would be of assistance to a tax-cheat. I'd probably be thinking, as the client laments: "You enjoyed all the privileges experiencing the aspects of and in amassing your wealth in the Canadian State, and not paying tax on it, now pay your bill." But that's just me. And, as was said by the blonde to the back-country reptile-expert in the movie "Crocodile Dundee", with respect to those New York hot-dogs (charging those "$250/hr"), "Well, you can eat [money], but it tastes like ..."

Consequently this volume does not speak of "strategies" to either defer or enhance collection or acquit or convict offences: it is indifferent, but merely attempts to state the existing statutory provisions and some of the authoritative cases that have dealt with them. I would certainly not want to assist in instances of the former and there are far more competent persons than I who can attend to the latter. This is an introductory to the issues and better reflection will probably occur on the individual level via your differing investigation of case and other material.You "get out of it what you put into it": I have sometimes only briefly touched on some of the issues and you are encouraged to look up further case if you're desirous. I have also extensively reproduced case for two reasons: firstly, Judges say it best without regurgitation by an author (you can read what she said yourself and I have tried to underline/highlight particularly important aspects of the case), secondly, if you are sincerely interested in this sport, you had better learn how to consume case[12], or forever take someone else's word for it (and reading the provisions in the Act are merely part of it: cases describe how it is to apply).

Some would say it's a very narrow field to be spending so much time on, given that in this country, it seems not to have been done before for internet consumption. I say that it is the most important of all the scheme of the Act since once an arbitrary specifically defined amount has been determined (no matter how it is derived), of the infinite number of possibilities the Act creates the end objective is its realization into the General Revenue Fund through the Receiver General. And, that's, how, Horton, hears, a, Who..., to pay for, amongst other things, the hospital laundry detergent that your Mom used so many years ago in her episode with, you, the ambulance that took you there, on a road, to a physician whose expertise was academically developed in a university, whose professional ethics were forged in a court-house, as administrators of various sorts advised the whole affair to best accommodate. As another "Dr.", who knew of "a Horton", would probably say, "All for you, before you were two."

The author has to make an equal comment about so-called "philanthropists" who purportedly "give back to their community". In some instances, they are of this sentiment: they have conducted themselves legally, making their earnings within the norms of law (and good taste) and realize on their legitimately developed and properly cultivated potential. They're "the saints". Others, on the exact other hand, suffer from the internal cold-hearted taint that compels them as thugs and disguised barbarians to always give "their spin" on their purported benevolent dealings. They're the "robber-barons". The difference is that one has no problem recognizing and paying their taxes, amongst other things, while the latter is forever reveling in "the game" of not doing so, bragging that they don't have to. One takes from the environment, only, the other truly desperately does "give back". True "philanthropists" honour the dealings of their government in all their aspects as allowing them the environment to thrive: the false ones are forever looking for other governments who will turn a blind-eye to what they are actually about. True philanthropy, not that generated by false hype nor their ego nor megalomania, is almost always anonymous – they don't "sell sizzle" but "give away steak" - without need for public gratification or especially financial reward. Some run 'cons', some don't. Some link their own wealth, indirectly but hideously direct enough, to how much they can harness popular general sentiment "doing it for the children": the other, legitimate, don't make a dime from it and don't have multiple 'flashy' web-sites for example. And finally, true philanthropy operates on the individual level: not surrounded by those 'conned' to ignorantly, without knowing who they are exactly dealing with or what they are endorsing, as they are used to further 'the cause'. That's why our ITA does recognize proper charities, screened, while there are hordes of the 'unclean' out there. And true philanthropists can take it to the point of donating to their government, at their own expense, what their government needs[18], which includes cutting a cheque to them, yes, believe it or not, thus ensuring that properly qualified, educated, warm hearted and low-salaried people focus the money, where 'only the population' has decided, through their studied representation, it will best be used, without profit-taking on the side and as primary motive, nor ego, nor walls of the "best picture-capture" in the world. The 'robber- barons' are frauds, in some instances a multitude of times, speaking legally too: the others do have a proven ground history and record. Care to be your own "philanthropist": let some token interest accrue on your nominal tax debt and let them make money on the spread, 'bank' your income tax refund by not filing for 3 years allowing the cash-flow in the government's hands[13], send a money order to CRA as a gift without trace, pay for a legal publisher's sale to them, etc. and laugh at and financially starve those that try and pass themselves off as such? Recognizing a true definition anyone can be one and you can be one yourself don't you know? (...and you don't have to sell the World's unsuspecting destitute health problems such as rampant flatulence, literally, 'putting the spins in place', to try to qualify, because there are people who will try to pass themselves off as such, and you should try and make up for it!).

This is posted on Google Books with the objective of providing as much condensed compilation as possible to educate and perhaps lead towards less tax collection litigation. It's a start on the subject: legal environments are always more complex but you'll get a sense from this. As a book by David Franklin Ad. B.C.L., "International Commercial Debt Collection" starts, "so acquaint yourself with the law, and conduct yourself lawfully". That way, a judge may just sometime simply start a trend and say to a party: "This is on the internet, and pay costs for wasting our time." It will be updated frequently.

And as we already meander through what I consider the secular "promised land", becoming professionals at everything under the sun and being "Doctors of Suesses", "looking on the bright side of life", we should always reflect very favourably on what "the Romans actually do for us."

For all those unsung people who, desperately, want to handle simple cases of people not wanting to pay taxes as best described in Jules Fafard v. Her Majesty the Queen[14].

Hope you like.

The Voluntary Disclosures Program (VDP)

CRA offers the VDP to allow taxpayers to satisfy their tax filing obligations as fully as possible by allowing them to find out anonymously if they should file more complete information. It allows taxpayers to come forward in an effort to satisfy their obligations, voluntarily, so as to possibly avoid penalties/fines if they are eventually found out.

REASONS FOR ORDER

STRAYER D.J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] These two applications brought by an individual and his wholly-owned corporation involve the same facts and were argued together. They seek judicial review to set aside a decision contained in a letter of August 19, 2004 from the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) on behalf of the respondent Minister in which the CCRA confirmed that the applicants did not qualify for the Voluntary Disclosures Program (VDP). That letter was simply confirming the decision already conveyed to the applicants in a letter of February 18, 2004.

[2] Subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th sup.) authorizes the Minister to waive or cancel all or any portions of a penalty or of interest otherwise payable under that Act. Section 281.1 of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 makes similar provision for the waiving of penalties and interest with respect to the Goods and Services Tax. This discretionary power is exercised in part by a Voluntary Disclosures Program which was described, at the time in question, by Information Circular 00-1R dated September, 2002. It states the purpose of the program to be to promote voluntary compliance with reporting and payment of taxes and "encourages clients to come forward and correct deficiencies to comply with their legal obligations". The Information Circular in question deals with clients who have deliberately omitted to report and pay. (There are other programs for those who have inadvertently omitted reporting or who have been unable to comply due to circumstances beyond their control). The incentive for making voluntary disclosures of past omissions under this program is that if full disclosure is made to the satisfaction of the CCRA then the discretion of the Minister may be exercised so as to waive all or part of the penalties that otherwise could be imposed.

The disclosure must be voluntary. The client has to initiate the voluntary disclosure. A disclosure may not qualify as a voluntary disclosure under the above policy if it is found to have been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action that has been initiated by the CCRA, or other authorities or administrations with which the CCRA has information exchange agreements.

Subparagraph (b) requires that the disclosure be complete. Subparagraph (c) requires that the disclosure must involve at least one penalty in order to qualify for this program and subparagraph (d) requires that the information disclosed must be either at least one year past due or not initiated simply to avoid late filing or instalment penalties. It is subparagraph (a) which is the most pertinent to this case. It is common ground that the Information Circular is made available to the public and that the applicants and their legal representative proceeded in their disclosures on the basis of the information provided in this circular.

FACTS

[4] On September 17, 2003 the Peel Regional Police executed search warrants on the residence and business of the applicants in connection with a fraud investigation. On the same day the Investigations Division of CCRA had requested the tax returns of these applicants for study. On September 18, 2003 the Peel Regional Police referred certain information from their search to the Investigations Division of CCRA. On October 14, 2003 the applicants' counsel had a telephone conversation with an officer of CCRA concerning the VDP and pursuant to that conversation he wrote to CCRA on October 17, 2003 on a "no-name basis". He advised that according to his information his clients had received credit card payments and deposited them in bank accounts without reporting them as income. He noted that it was possible that some of these amounts had been received on account of Goods and Service Tax that had not been remitted. He also reported his understanding that the individual client had earned some interest income in respect of funds deposited offshore which had not been reported. He advised that his unnamed individual client had been charged by an unnamed police force "with a minor fraud" and that an investigating officer had mentioned to his client that the police might notify CCRA that he had failed to report income tax. The police officer had not made it clear whether such notification would actually occur or when, and to the best of the knowledge of the client and his counsel it had not yet occurred. He stated that because the police were holding his client's records they were not in a position to ascertain the quantum of unreported income. He concluded his letter with this paragraph:

Based on our telephone discussion, I understand that under the circumstances described above the CCRA will view the disclosure to be made by our clients as voluntary, for the purposes of the Voluntary Disclosure Program. Please confirm that understanding by signing below and returning to my attention a copy of this letter.

CCRA did not confirm this "understanding" by signing the letter. However on October 21 CCRA sent a letter to the applicants' counsel which included this paragraph:

Based on the circumstances described we consider that the disclosure would be valid as presented. However our determination has been made based on the facts as presented and could change if any new details come to light during the handling of the actual full disclosure. Therefore, a full determination of whether we can accept the voluntary disclosure as valid cannot be confirmed until after the names of your clients are given and all facts are verified. In this regard at the time of the full disclosure the information provided should meet the following four conditions to be valid. . . .

There then followed the quotation of the four conditions set out in the Information Circular, in subparagraphs 6(a), (b), (c) and (d) as referred to above. As a result the applicants' counsel sent a letter to CCRA on January 19, 2004 disclosing the names of the individual client and his company, together with the individual's address and social insurance number and other identifying information in respect of the company. This was the only new information disclosed but the letter noted that "we are preparing the necessary details of their voluntary disclosure and will send them to you in due course". CCRA replied by writing a letter to the individual taxpayer on February 18, 2004 to advise him "of our decision concerning your request for the waiver of penalties under the Voluntary Disclosure Program. . . ." It went on to say:

The circumstances of your case have been carefully considered and I regret to inform you that your request cannot be granted. Four conditions must be satisfied to qualify for the benefits of the VDP. Unfortunately, the disclosure was not considered to be voluntary since it was initiated based on the knowledge of current enforcement activities.

[5] The individual taxpayer through his counsel sought an administrative review of this decision. He was advised by CCRA in a letter of August 19, 2004 that a review had taken place and the decision would not be changed. In seeking judicial review of the August 19, 2004 decision the applicants are really seeking a review of the decision conveyed to them on February 18, 2004 which was simply confirmed in the later letter.

[6] It will be noted that in the letter of February 18, 2004 the reason for finding the applicants disqualified for the VDP was that "the disclosure was not considered to be voluntary since it was initiated based on the knowledge of current enforcement activities". The CCRA takes the position that this is based on subparagraph 6(a) of the Information Circular which says that a disclosure is not voluntary if it is made by a taxpayer with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, etc. already initiated by the CCRA or other authorities "with which the CCRA has information exchange agreements". In his initial contact with CCRA counsel for the applicants raised the question as to whether, due to the fact that the police officer had said they might report information to the CCRA, would CCRA still consider a disclosure to be voluntary. According to the notes made by the CCRA Officer who spoke with counsel, he

[e]xplained that we may as it sound [sic] like the client was not aware of any compliance action by CCRA but would need to have the details in writing before we could formally make that type of decision.

There is nothing in the record to indicate that the applicants had knowledge that the Peel Regional Police constituted an authority "with which the CCRA has information exchange agreements" as required in subparagraph 6(a) of the Information Circular. Further there is no documentary evidence of any such agreement existing. Internal discussions within CCRA, as described in their records, indicate that some officers believed there to be such an agreement. However when counsel for the applicants, in preparation for the hearing of this matter, quite properly requested a copy of such agreement from the Department of Justice representing the respondent, he received a letter of November 29, 2004 which stated in part as follows:

I have been advised that there is no written agreement. It is merely an informal relationship that exists between the CCRA office in Toronto West, the Investigation Division and Fraud Bureau of the Peel Regional Police.

This information was not provided on a "Without Prejudice" basis and I regard it as an admission properly made by counsel.

ANALYSIS

[7] It is common ground that the Information Circular and the Guidelines concerning the VDP are not delegated legislation and have no force of law as such.

[8] The applicants contend, however, that the terms of the Information Circular, particularly paragraph 6 thereof, create procedural entitlements and constraints which prevent the Minister's discretion being exercised as it was in the letters of February 18 and August 19, 2004. They argue that either the respondent acted without jurisdiction because it had already determined by the letter of October 21, 2003 that the applicants' disclosure would be considered voluntary; or that the applicants had a legitimate expectation that the respondent's later disclosure would not be considered involuntary because of the commitment made in the letter of October 21; or that the respondent is estopped from denying that the disclosure is voluntary having led the applicants to believe by the letter of October 21, 2003 that it would be treated as voluntary; or that the respondent's decision of February 18, 2004, as confirmed by the letter of August 19, 2004 was patently unreasonable.

[9] I believe the matter can be determined on the basis of the last two submissions combined. First, I believe that the requirements of promissory estoppel exist here. Those requirements are that there must be a promise that the promisor will conduct himself in a certain way in certain circumstances. There must be reliance on that promise by the promisee, and to the detriment of the promisee. In such circumstances the promisor will not be allowed to exercise his discretion in a manner inconsistent with the promise, if he otherwise has lawful authority to fulfill that promise. See e.g. Aurchem Exploration Ltd. v. The Queen (1992), 91 D.L.R.(4th) 710 (F.C.T.D.); W & R Plumbing and Heating Ltd. v. The Queen, [1986] 2 F.C. 195 (F.C.T.D.). Here the promise exists in the form of the Information Circular which says in effect, in subparagraph 6(a) that a disclosure will be treated as voluntary if the client initiates it, subject to it being considered involuntary if the client initiates the disclosure with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, etc. by the CCRA or "authorities or administrations with which the CCRA has information exchange agreements". After counsel for the applicants had specifically advised CCRA that they had been the target of a police search by an unidentified police force and that a police officer had said his force might report information to the CCRA, CCRA wrote the letter of October 21, 2003 to counsel saying that "based on the circumstances described we consider that the disclosure would be valid as presented". There was of course the usual warning that this would have to be confirmed after full disclosure was made "and all facts are verified". Read together with the Information Circular, this was an invitation to proceed with disclosure on the basis of the facts as disclosed so far, and the applicants were entitled to assume that unless there were undisclosed facts which were pertinent to the question of whether they had knowledge of an investigation already under way they could assume that further disclosures would be regarded as voluntary. They acted to their detriment. In the letter from their counsel of January 19, 2004 they revealed their identity. While the bare fact of giving their identity may not of itself have been to their detriment, when combined with the information which their counsel had already provided on a "No-name" basis in the letter of October 17, 2003 they had disclosed to CCRA that they had received undisclosed monies which they owed for income tax and GST. Further the individual client by the combination of these letters had disclosed that he had earned interest on income from funds deposited offshore.

[10] I am therefore of the view that the respondent was estopped from deciding this matter on a basis other than as specified in subparagraph 6(a) of the Information Circular. The applicants were entitled to rely on that as the manner in which their disclosure would be dealt with. In determining whether the respondent complied with the language of the Information Circular, I believe the appropriate standard of review is that of reasonableness simpliciter. It involves in part the interpretation of the language of the Information Circular which in my view is the governing instrument, and its application to these facts. I believe the Court has as much expertise as the Officers of CCRA in interpreting this language. The matter is therefore analogous to a mixed question of law and fact and I believe the appropriate standard is reasonableness. I might add however that if I am wrong in this, and greater deference is owed, I would still consider that the decision of the respondent was patently unreasonable.

[11] It is clear to me that the respondent never addressed the question of whether the applicants had made their disclosure with the knowledge of an audit or investigation by an authority or administration with which the CCRA had an information exchange agreement as required in subparagraph 6(a) of the Information Circular. It is clear from an internal document of CCRA that they accepted that the applicants were not aware of the CCRA investigation which had been initiated in September, 2003:(see applicants' record volume 1, page 69). Internal records of CCRA which show what information the CCRA had before it in making its decision that disclosure was involuntary, indicate that officers only focussed on whether the Peel Regional Police had an exchange of information agreement with CCRA but not whether the applicants had knowledge of it. CCRA did not know the identity of the police force in question until after the applicants made their disclosures by counsel of January 19, 2004 providing their names. As a result CCRA was able to trace through their names the fact that a CCRA investigation of the applicants was already under way and that the Peel Regional Police Force was the force involved with these parties, having already provided information to CCRA in September, 2003 (see applicants' record volume 1, page 70). Once CCRA officers learned, or believed that they had learned, that there was an "agreement with" the Peel Regional Police, that was apparently considered determinative of the matter. But there is nothing to indicate, and clearly CCRA did not concern itself about the matter, that these applicants would have had knowledge that the Peel Regional Police Force had an agreement with the CCRA. Counsel for the respondent seemed to argue that it was sufficient if the applicants ought to have known of such an agreement or ought to have found out if there was such an agreement: in other words knowledge in paragraph 6(a) includes constructive knowledge. I am unable to interpret the language of the Information Circular in that way. If CCRA wishes to administer a program on that basis it should modify the Information Circular accordingly. If it does so, however, it should also provide some anonymous means for taxpayers learning with which agencies or authorities it has such agreements, perhaps through a website or publication in the Canada Gazette.

[12] Although this disposes of the matter I would also add that I have great difficulty in accepting that the CCRA had proper information before it as to the existence of an "information exchange agreement" between the CCRA and the Peel Regional Police Force. While the internal report made by the relevant appeals officer states that such an agreement existed, when their counsel was asked for a copy of it he advised that there was no "written agreement" but only an "informal relationship". An "informal relationship" does not meet the requirement of "an information exchange agreement" in the Information Circular, nor I suggest does it meet basic requirements of transparency to allow a taxpayer to know in advance whether some agency investigating his affairs has an agreement with CCRA. Among other things, we have no idea when this "arrangement" came into effect nor whether the information here was within the scope of that agreement. It is surprising that when CCRA was informed on October 17 by the

"No-name" disclosure of the fact of a search by an unnamed police force and of the conversation between a police officer and the taxpayer suggesting that the police might report information to CCRA, the CCRA in its letter of October 21 to counsel made no mention of the possible difficulty if the unnamed police force turned out to have an agreement with CCRA. Instead they advised that "based on the circumstances described we consider that the disclosure would be valid as presented", subject of course to "any new details" which might come to light and which could change this determination. By not warning the applicants of this problem whose parameters were knowable by CCRA at that time, and by taking the position later that once such an "agreement" had been found the disclosure would be considered involuntary without need for proof of the taxpayer's knowledge of the existence of that agreement, the CCRA left the applicants with a false sense of security.

[13] I will therefore set aside the decision of August 19, 2004 (confirming the decision of February 18, 2004) on the basis that it is unreasonable, and I will refer the matter back to the respondent with the direction that the disclosures of the applicants be treated as voluntary and assessed in the Voluntary Disclosures Program on that basis.

Citation: 2006 FC 1133
Ottawa, Ontario, September 26, 2006
PRESENT: The Honourable Madam Justice Dawson

BETWEEN:
334156 ALBERTA LTD.
Applicant
and
MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE
Respondent
REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] Subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (Act) is one of the "fairness provisions" of the Act that vests discretion in the respondent Minister to waive or cancel some or all of a penalty or interest otherwise payable under the Act. Encompassed within that discretion is the Voluntary Disclosure Program (VDP). Information Circular 00-1R (Information Circular) describes the VDP in the following terms:

> The VDP encourages clients to come forward and correct deficiencies to comply with their legal obligations. It is a fairness program that is aimed at providing clients with an opportunity to correct past omissions, thus rendering themselves compliant. By offering this opportunity for clients to self-correct, the program provides a greater level of fairness to all clients and stakeholders.

[2] The Information Circular also explains that a valid voluntary disclosure is defined by four conditions, only one of which is relevant to this proceeding. That condition is that the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) must determine the disclosure to be voluntary. In the words of the Information Circular:

> The disclosure must be voluntary. The client has to initiate the voluntary disclosure. A disclosure may not qualify as a voluntary disclosure under the above policy if it is found to have been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action that has been initiated by the [CRA], or other authorities or administrations with which the [CRA] has information exchange agreements.

[3] In the present case, the applicant failed to file on a timely basis tax returns required under the Act for the taxation years from 1998 to, and including, 2003. On February 2, 2004, the applicant filed tax returns for the outstanding years and penalties for late filing applied. The applicant's accountant submitted that the returns for the 2000, 2001, and 2002 taxation years were voluntarily disclosed and the applicant sought relief from penalties under the VDP.

[4] This request was denied on the ground that the disclosure was not voluntary because "information available to the Agency indicates that enforcement actions were taken on the account for these years prior to the disclosure". The applicant's request that the Minister reconsider his decision was treated as a second level request. A Voluntary Disclosure Officer (officer) prepared a report that recommended that the CRA not accept that the disclosure had been voluntary because enforcement actions by the Non-Filer Unit of the CRA were ongoing right up to the date of disclosure. The Chief of Appeals at the Calgary Tax Services office reviewed the file and the officer's recommendation and decided to deny the second level request. He wrote:

> The circumstances of your case have been carefully considered and I regret to inform you that your request cannot be granted. Under the VDP Policy, a disclosure must be considered voluntary in order to be considered as a valid voluntary disclosure. A disclosure is considered voluntary if a client has wholly initiated the disclosure in order to ensure his or her tax records are complete. Information available to the Agency indicates that enforcement was taken on the account prior to the disclosure.

[5] This is an application for judicial review of that negative decision.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

[6] The parties agree that the standard of review to be applied to that discretionary decision is reasonableness simpliciter. In my view that is correct, as reflected in the pragmatic and functional analysis of the Federal Court of Appeal in Lanno v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 153.

[7] Review on this standard requires the Court to ask after a "somewhat probing examination" whether the reasons given for the decision, when taken as a whole, support the decision. The reviewing court is not to ask what the correct decision would have been. Rather, "[a]pplying the standard of reasonableness gives effect to the legislative intention that a specialized body will have the primary responsibility of deciding the issue according to its own process and for its own reasons. The standard of reasonableness does not imply that a decision-maker is merely afforded a margin of error around what the court believes is the correct result". See: Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247 at paragraphs 47 and 50.

APPLICATION OF THE STANDARD OF REVIEW TO THE DECISION

[8] The applicant admits that at the time of the voluntary disclosure there was audit, investigative or other enforcement action initiated by the CRA in respect of the 1998 and 1999 taxation years. It is argued, however, that knowledge of enforcement activity must necessarily be considered in respect of specific taxation years. It is said that there is no evidence of any inquiry concerning the 2000-2002 tax returns so the ongoing inquiries concerning 1998 and 1999 should not prevent the returns for the 2000, 2001 and 2002 taxation years from being considered to be voluntary for the purposes of the VDP policy.

[9] In my view, it is not correct for the applicant to argue that there was no evidence before the decision-maker of any inquiries being made by the CRA concerning the taxation years from 2000 through 2002. The report prepared by the officer as a result of the second level request referenced entries in the SUDS diary. The SUDS diary is the computer diary system used by the Non-Filer Unit of the CRA. Employees working in that unit are required to record in the SUDS diary system their conversations with taxpayers and their representatives. Pertinent entries contained in the SUDS diary system related to the applicant's account and relied upon by the officer were:

> 1. An entry dated February 11, 2003 which stated:
> Spoke to director Arthur Wenngatz @ [...] regarding o/s T2's for yrs 98-2001. States he thought they had been done, but asked me to call his accountant Diane Olsen @ [...] re o/s returns & to call him back if I needed to. LM for Diane Olsen @ [...] @ 3:50 p.m.
> 2. An entry dated April 14, 2003 which stated:
> Spoke to accountant Diane Olsen. States she has most of the information for the 98 to 2001 years & expects to have them done by the end of April 03. Advised her where they have to come to & to call me if there is a problem with getting them in by then.

[10] This is evidence of inquiry with respect to the 2000 and 2001 tax years.

[11] On this application for judicial review the applicant relies upon the affidavits of Mr. Arthur Wenngatz and Ms. Diane Olsen where, respectively, they swear that "I have never communicated with representatives of the Respondent about the Applicant's tax matters. Furthermore, I am not even authorized to discuss the Applicant's tax matters with the Respondent" and "[w]hile on February 17, 2003 a representative of the Respondent contacted me about the outstanding 1998 and 1999 tax returns of the Applicant, at no time during this communication did we discuss the Applicant's outstanding 2000 and 2001 tax returns". These affidavits were not before the decision-maker and therefore cannot be relied upon on this application for judicial review. Parenthetically, I do note that Mr. Wenngatz' position that he did not have any conversation with a CRA employee with regard to the late filed returns and Ms. Olsen's position that her records only reflected CRA enforcement activity with respect to the 1998 and 1999 taxation years were before the officer. As discussed below, the officer dealt with those assertions.

> I specifically considered the Applicant's submission that Mr. Wenngatz maintained that he did not have a conversation with a CRA employee with regard to the Applicant and that Applicant's accountant stated that her records indicated that CRA had only initiated enforcement on the 1998 and 1999 tax returns, but not on any subsequent tax years. However, based on my review, I concluded that various employees from the CRA Non-Filer Unit had issued a TX14 to the Applicant on May 18, 1999 for the Applicant's 1998 taxation year and a TX14 on January 27, 2000 for the Applicant's 1999 taxation year. The TX14 is a computer-generated letter from the CRA which requests that a taxpayer file its tax returns, and I considered that the mailing of the TX14s were enforcement actions by the CRA. I also noted that, after the TX14s were sent, the Non-Filer Unit had contacted, by telephone, both Arthur Wenngatz and the Applicant's accountant as far back as 2000 requesting the Applicant's late returns. The Non-Filer Unit continued to make numerous and ongoing verbal requests for the Applicant's unfiled returns, as they came due, from May of 2000 until the time of disclosure.

[13] The officer referred to relevant SUDS diary entries to conclude that they provided "evidence of continued contact by the non-filer section right up to the date of the disclosure". This was a reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the entries. The officer's decision that the disclosure was not voluntary because of the ongoing activities of the Non-Filer Unit was tenable for the reasons given and it withstands a somewhat probing analysis.

[14] With respect to the February 11, 2003 and April 14, 2003 SUDS diary entries that record communications between the CRA and Arthur Wenngatz and Diane Olsen, the applicant argues that even if such communications did occur, neither Arthur Wenngatz and Diane Olsen was a director, officer or authorized representative of the applicant. As such, it is submitted, their knowledge cannot be imputed to the applicant because such communication was unauthorized and contrary to the Act.

[15] In my respectful view, this argument cannot succeed for the following important reason.

[16] This argument was not put before the decision-maker on either the initial or the second level request. The jurisprudence of the Court is well-established that on judicial review a decision cannot be impugned on the basis of an issue not raised before the decision-maker, unless the new issue is a jurisdictional issue (which, in the present case, it is not). See, for example, Toussaint v. Canada (Labor Relations Board), [1993] F.C.J. No. 616 (C.A.) at paragraph 5; Chen v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2000] F.C.J. No. 1954 (T.D.) at paragraphs 9 through 12; Nametco Holdings Ltd. v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue-M.N.R.), 2002 FCA 149 at paragraph 2; and Armstrong v. Canada (Attorney General), 2006 F.C. 505 (F.C.) at paragraph 26.

CONCLUSION

Digitized by Google

[17] To conclude, the impugned decision that the applicant's disclosure was not voluntary because enforcement was taken on the account prior to the disclosure was supported by evidence before the decision-maker and the reasons given for the decision withstand a somewhat probing examination.

[18] The applicant cannot raise for the first time on judicial review the new issue of an alleged absence of authority for CRA representatives to speak to Arthur Wenngatz or Diane Olsen. The Court cannot, in the circumstances now before it, decide an issue not raised before the decision-maker.

COSTS

[19] I see no reason why costs should not follow the event.

[20] The Minister seeks costs fixed in the amount of $2000.00. In my view, those costs are reasonable and in oral argument the applicant did not make any submission that the amount was unreasonable. The applicant shall, therefore, forthwith pay to the Minister costs fixed in the amount of $2000.00.

JUDGMENT

THIS COURT ORDERS AND ADJUDGES THAT:

1. The application for judicial review is dismissed.
2. The applicant shall forthwith pay to the respondent costs, fixed in the amount of $2000.00, inclusive of disbursements.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT
(Delivered from the Bench at Calgary, Alberta, on June 25, 2008)
EVANS J.A.

[2] Upholding a decision made at the first level review, the Chief of Appeals concluded that the appellant was not eligible for relief from penalties under the Voluntary Disclosure Program ("VDP"). The appellant's disclosure was not voluntary for the purpose of the VDP because it had "been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action" initiated by the Canada Revenue Agency ("CFRA"). The Chief of Appeals reached this conclusion by relying on a contemporaneous computer diary system entry by a CRA official of telephone conversations. The first was on February 11, 2003, with Mr Arthur Wenngatz, a 50% shareholder in the appellant. The second was on April 14, 2003, with Diane Olsen, the appellant's accountant. The Non-Filer Unit of the CRA used the computer diary system, "SUDS", in which these entries were made

[3] The entry of the first call stated that the officer spoke to "director Arthur Wenngatz … regarding o/s T2s for yrs. 98-2001", who referred him, "re o/s returns", to "his accountant, Diane Olsen". The entry of the call to Ms Olsen stated that she had told him that she had "most of the information for the 98 to 2001 years" and expected to file the returns at the end of April.

Digitized by Google

[4] The appellant challenged the Chief of Appeals' decision on the basis of statements by Mr Wenngatz and Ms Olsen which were before the Chief of Appeals when he made his decision. Mr Wenngatz denied speaking to a CRA officer about the late filed returns, while Ms Olsen stated that her records only indicated enforcement activity with respect to the years 1998 and 1999. Accordingly, the appellant argued, there was no evidence on which the Chief of Appeals could have based his negative decision. It was conceded that there was knowledge of enforcement activity respecting the years 1998 and 1999; only 2000 and 2001 were in dispute.

[5] After conducting a pragmatic and functional analysis, Justice Dawson held that unreasonableness simpliciter was the standard of review applicable to the Chief of Appeals' discretionary decision to deny the appellant "fairness relief" under the VDP, promulgated pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act. Applying this standard, she concluded that the Chief of Appeals had drawn a reasonable inference from the computer entries about ongoing enforcement for the years 2000 and 2001 prior to the disclosure in February 2004, when the appellant filed the late returns.

[6] The appellant also argued that, even if the conversations with Mr Wenngatz and Ms Olsen occurred as the Chief Officer found, their knowledge of enforcement activity could not be attributed to the appellant because only Irene Wenngatz, a 50% shareholder and sole director and officer of the appellant, was authorized to speak to the CRA about its tax affairs. Justice Dawson refused to consider this argument because it was being advanced by the appellant for the first time on judicial review, and had not been put to the Chief of Appeals.

[7] Substantially for the reasons given by Justice Dawson, we see no reviewable error in the Chief of Appeals' decision. In view of the considerable deference given to administrative fact-finding, it cannot be said to have been unreasonable for the Chief of Appeals to have preferred the evidence provided by the computer entries to the subsequent statements of Mr Wenngatz and Ms Olsen.

[8] It was not necessary on the simple facts of this informal proceeding for the Chief of Appeals to have stated expressly that he had considered the statements of Mr Wenngatz and Ms Olsen and to have explained why he preferred the evidence provided by the SUDS' entries.

[9] We would only add this. It is now no longer appropriate for a court to review an administrative decision on a standard of unreasonableness simpliciter. However, to the extent that there is a difference between unreasonableness simpliciter and the standard of reasonableness articulated in Dunsmuir v, New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, it is not material on the facts of this case.

[10] For these reasons, the appeal will be dismissed with costs.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] This is a consolidated application under subsection 18.1(1) of the Federal Courts Act,

Digitized by Google

RSC 1985, c F-7 for judicial review of the second level review decisions by an assistant director of enforcement of the Minister of National Revenue (the officer), made between October 22, 2010 and November 17, 2010, refusing to waive the penalties and interest owed by the applicants as a result of the late filing of their tax returns. The decisions not to exercise the discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) to reduce the penalties and interest were based on the officer's finding that the applicants' disclosures were not voluntary as they were prompted by enforcement action against a related company.

[2] The applicants request that the decisions be set aside and sent back for reconsideration with directions that this Court deems appropriate.

Introduction to Voluntary Disclosure Program

Taxpayer Relief Provision

[3] Taxpayers that file late tax returns generally incur penalties and interest on the payments. However, subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act grants the Minister the discretion to cancel or waive all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under the Act. This taxpayer relief provision was introduced in 1991 as part of what was called a fairness package (see Bozzer v Canada (Minister of National Revenue), 2011 FCA 186, [2011] FCJ No 842 at paragraph 22). The purpose of this provision was articulated by Mr. Justice Paul Rouleau in Kaiser v Canada (Minister of National Revenue), 93 FTR 66, [1995] FCJ No 349 (at paragraph 8):

The purpose of this legislative provision is to allow Revenue Canada, Taxation, to administer the tax system more fairly, by allowing for the application of common sense in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, are unable to meet deadlines or comply with rules under the tax system [...]

[4] Granting of relief under this provision is discretionary. It is not available as of right (see Lanno v Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 153, [2005] FCJ No 714 at paragraph 6).

Voluntary Disclosure Program

[5] The exercise of the discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act is integral to the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA)'s voluntary disclosure program (VDP). The VDP allows taxpayers to make disclosures to correct inaccurate or incomplete information, or to disclose information not previously reported. This program is intended to promote voluntary compliance. Therefore, when a valid disclosure has been made, the Minister may exercise its discretion under subsection 220(3.1) to cancel or waive associated penalties and interest.

Applicable CRA Policies

[6] The CRA has published policy documents to assist the Minister and its delegates with the exercise of its discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act. At the time of the applicants' disclosures in 2005, the following documents pertinent to this exercise of discretion and the VDP were in effect:

CRA Information Circular IC00-1R, effective from September 30, 2002 to October 21, 2007 (the IC00-1R); and VDP Processing Guidelines (the Guidelines).

[7] The Guidelines are an internal CRA document intended to assist VDP officers in exercising their functions.

Conditions for Valid VDP Disclosures

[8] IC00-1R outlines four conditions for a disclosure to be deemed valid (at paragraph 6) –it must:

Be voluntary – meaning it must be initiated by the taxpayer and must not "have been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action that has been initiated by the [CRA], or other authorities or administrations with which the [CRA] has information exchange agreements";

Digitized by Google

Be complete – meaning it must include "full and accurate reporting of all previously inaccurate, incomplete, or unreported information";
Involve a penalty –meaning if no penalties apply to the information being disclosed, the taxpayer does not need to seek penalty relief under the VDP; and Meet timing conditions –meaning it must: include information that is at least one year past due; or if the information is not one year past due, the disclosure must not be initiated simply to avoid late filing or installment penalties.

Determining Voluntariness

[9] Guidance for a VDP officer's determination of whether a disclosure is voluntary is provided under section
8.3 of the Guidelines. Subsection 8.3.1 states in part:
A disclosure is considered voluntary if a [taxpayer] has wholly initiated the disclosure in order to ensure his or her tax records are completed. A disclosure must meet this definition of voluntary in order to be considered as a valid voluntary disclosure. The following suggestions for research are guidelines only. […]
[10] The relevant date to the question of voluntary disclosure is the "effective date of disclosure". This is the "date the taxpayer identifies himself or the date the taxpayer or his representative signs the client agreement form, whichever of the two is earliest" (see Brown v Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FC 1639, [2005] FCJ No 2087 at paragraph 16; affirmed in 2007 FCA 26, [2007] FCJ No 141).

Enforcement Action Questions

[11] When a VDP officer discovers that enforcement actions have commenced, section 8.3.5 of the Guidelines recommends that the officer answer the following set of questions (the enforcement action questions):
Was any direct contact made with the [taxpayer] or is the [taxpayer] likely to have been aware of the enforcement action?
Is it likely that the CRA would have uncovered the information disclosed based on the enforcement action? [12] In assessing these questions, the Guidelines explicitly state that taxpayers should be given the benefit of the doubt (section 8.3.5).

Background

[13] Graham Worsfold is the principal applicant and a computer science engineer. In 2001, he moved to Canada from the United Kingdom (UK) under a temporary work permit. After renewing this permit on at least one occasion, the principal applicant and his family were granted permanent residency status in January 2005.
[14] The additional applicants in this case are: Lyn Worsfold – the principal applicant's wife; Stoneridge Management Services Inc. (Stoneridge Management)– a company incorporated on December 16, 2003 in the British Virgin Islands that provides management consulting services on international computer development. The principal applicant is the sole director and shareholder, and has been employed by the company since 2004; and The GR and LS Worsfold Life Interest Settlement Trust (Worsfold Trust) – a personal family trust located in the UK and established in 1997 by the principal applicant. The trustees are the principal applicant, his wife and Jonathan Coles (a UK based lawyer).

[15] As of October 3, 2005, the applicants had not filed tax returns in Canada.
[16] This application also concerns Stoneridge Inc. (Stoneridge). Stoneridge is a real estate development company that was incorporated on August 1, 2002. The principal applicant does not receive employment income from Stoneridge. However, as of October 3, 2005, the principal applicant was a director, held all of the preferred shares of Stoneridge and held one third of the common shares of GLD Holdings Inc. which owns all the common shares of Stoneridge. Larry Burton and David Turk held equal parts of the remaining common shares of GLD Holdings Inc.

Timeline of Events

[17] On September 6, 2005, the principal applicant completed a tax amnesty form on the DioGuardi and Company LLP (DioGuardi) website. This entailed the provision of personal and financial information on the principal applicant's worldwide income and immigration status. By completing this form, a request was also made for an assessment and legal opinion on his need and eligibility for a voluntary disclosure (tax amnesty).
[18] On September 21, 2005, DioGuardi sent the principal applicant an email stating they believed he needed to file tax returns and was eligible for a voluntary disclosure. The principal applicant was asked to contact their office.
[19] On September 23, 2005, the principal applicant called DioGuardi's office. During this call, it became evident that an in-depth meeting was required. As the principal applicant was out of the country during the week of September 25 to 29, the meeting was scheduled for Wednesday, October 5, 2005.
[20] At 7:30 a.m. on Monday, October 3, 2005, CRA auditor Joanne Adey (the auditor) from the East Central Ontario (Peterborough) tax service office called Larry Burton, Stoneridge's secretary and listed contact, to inform him that the CRA was planning to audit Stoneridge's 2003 and 2004 tax returns. The purpose of the audit was to review property transactions, conduct a general review and review associated T2 corporation tax returns. The Stoneridge audit had been assigned to the auditor in the preceding week. Prior to speaking with Larry Burton, the auditor had left two voice messages to Larry Burton's attention with her name and contact information. She had also spoken to his wife, with whom she also left her name and contact information.
[21] During the call on October 3, 2005, Larry Burton informed the auditor that the other two shareholders, the principal applicant and David Turk, ran Stoneridge. Larry Burton and the principal applicant work in the same building. Later the same morning, at 10:07 a.m., the principal applicant made a short call to DioGuardi. The principal applicant states that this call was to confirm the October 5th meeting. Conversely, the respondent suggests that this call was to schedule a meeting with DioGuardi in response to being informed by Larry Burton of the pending Stoneridge audit.
[22] On October 5, 2005, the principal applicant met with Paul DioGuardi at DioGuardi'sOttawa office. Paul DioGuardi indicated that at this meeting, they discussed the tax implications of the principal applicant's immigration status and his sources of income. From this discussion, Paul DioGuardi determined that a voluntary disclosure was necessary for the 2001 tax year onwards. The Stoneridge audit was allegedly not discussed at this meeting and the principal applicant maintains that at that time he still had no knowledge of the planned audit.
[23] In the same afternoon, at 3:25 p.m., the auditor faxed the initial audit letter to Brad Huggins, the corporate accountant for Stoneridge, requesting that specific books and records be ready for her to review at the beginning of the audit, scheduled for October 27, 2005. The end of this letter stated:
Please be advised that as the audit progresses, we may request additional records

related to the associated companies and all respective shareholders. [emphasis added]

[24] Later the same day, at 4:25 p.m., Paul DioGuardi sent a fax to the CRA initiating a no-name voluntary disclosure for the 2001 to 2004 taxation years. This disclosure stated that it was on behalf of a male taxpayer, born in 1956 and resident of Canada since 2001. The disclosure was for unreported income and capital gains for the taxation years 2001 to 2004, and possibly GST.

[25] On November 17, 2005, Brad Huggins told the auditor that the principal applicant"was being investigated by Ottawa on international issues". This investigation pertained to a letter from CRA London requesting information on a clearance certificate request for DigiPos shares disposed of by the principal applicant. As no information was submitted, this request was denied.

[26] On November 30, 2005, DioGuardi informed the CRA that the principal applicant was the individual behind the no-name disclosure made on October 5, 2005. DioGuardi also provided CRA with a memorandum from its accounting firm detailing additional research and returns to be filed for the principal applicant's spouse, overseas trusts and various companies potentially deemed resident of Canada based on the principal applicant's residency status.

[27] On August 31, 2006, after several extensions of time, the principal applicant's tax returns and foreign information forms, along with tax returns for the other applicants, were filed with the CRA.

[28] On September 19, 2006, the applicants' files were referred to the auditor for review to determine if the information was accurate and met the complete criterion under the VDP.

[29] In a memorandum dated April 26, 2007, the auditor recommended to Mark Loftus, VDP officer in Ottawa, that adjustments be made to the principal applicant's income for the 2002 and 2003 taxation years. The auditor also found that the principal applicant had appropriated $315,451 from Stoneridge in 2004. The documents that the auditor used to support these adjustments were provided to her during her audit of Stoneridge.

First Level Review Decisions

[30] In letters dated September 25, 2007, the applicants were informed that all their VDP applications had been denied (the first level review decisions). The following issues were raised with their disclosures: Principal applicant:

Not voluntary – CRA had initiated enforcement actions against a related taxpayer prior to the date of voluntary disclosure;

Not complete – material amounts of taxable income had not been properly included in the T1 returns; and Timing– included information that was not one year past due.

Principal applicant's wife:

Not voluntary – CRA had initiated enforcement actions against a related taxpayer prior to the date of voluntary disclosure; and

No penalty – included a year that did not involve a penalty. Stoneridge Management:

Not voluntary – CRA had initiated enforcement actions against a related taxpayer prior to the date of voluntary disclosure;

No penalty – did not involve a penalty for some years; and Timing– included information that was not one year past due. Worsfold Trust:

Not voluntary – CRA had initiated enforcement actions against a related taxpayer prior to the date of voluntary disclosure; and

No penalty – did not involve a penalty for some of the years.

[31] Between April 25 and 28, 2008, all the applicants filed separate requests for second level reviews. The principal applicant's request included a receipt dated September 6,

Digitized by Google

2005 from DioGuardi acknowledging a payment of $45 to cover an assessment and legal opinion fee.

Additional Submissions

[32] In letters dated October 5, 2009, July 30, 2010 and September 9, 2010, applicants'counsel made additional submissions in support of their voluntary disclosures.

[33] The first letter (October 5, 2009) provided clarification on alleged inaccuracies, namely that:

The disclosure was not made as a reaction to the audit;

The principal applicant fully intended to make the disclosure;

The disclosure was materially complete; and

The audit did not sufficiently constitute an enforcement action on which to deem the disclosure involuntary. [34] In the letter dated July 30, 2010, applicants' counsel reviewed provisions in the Guidelines and applied them to the facts of this case. The voluntary aspect of disclosure, the completeness of the disclosure and the exercise of discretion were discussed. The following points were also included in this submission:

Email dated September 21, 2005 and apparently from Philippe DioGuardi to the principal applicant stating that "our opinion of your current tax situation" is that "you are eligible for a tax amnesty";

Letter dated September 29, 2008 to the principal applicant from Dean McIntosh, investigator of the Enforcement Division of CRA. The letter proposes an adjustment of $132,606 to the principal applicant's 2004 T1 general income tax and benefit return. The letter also states that penalties will be applied to this adjustment and sets out the basis for which the CRA proposed that charges be laid against the principal applicant under section 239 of the Income Tax Act; and

Notice of Reassessment from CRA dated November 12, 2008.

[35] Finally, the following documents were included in the letter dated September 9, 2010: 1. Letter from Brad Huggins, the corporate accountant for Stoneridge, to Dean McIntosh (dated August 5, 2008) with attachments:

CRA question sheet indicated that Brad Huggins likely had a call regarding the audit with Larry Burton on October 3, 2005, and had a conversation with the principal applicant on either October 3 or 4, 2005; and

Brad Huggins'timesheet (for October 4 and 5, 2005) indicating that Brad Huggins had a call with Dave Turk on October 4, 2005: "Two hours, audit prep, call Dave T.";

Bell print-outs of the principal applicant's personal communications showing that he placed calls on September 23, 2005 and October 3, 2005 to DioGuardi Tax Law; and

Information to obtain production order which included:

References to the principal applicant's journal in which an entry labeled "Brad" (from Stoneridge's accounting firm) precedes an entry for DioGuardi (allegedly suggesting that the principal applicant communicated with Stoneridge's accountant before touching base with DioGuardi).

Statement that Paul DioGuardi provided an affidavit claiming that he met with the principal applicant at 1:30 p.m. on October 5, 2005, at which time the principal applicant signed an agreement. No information was provided as to when the date of this meeting was set or whether it was arranged through the internet or a phone conversation.

Officer's Decisions

[36] In response to the applicants' requests for second level reviews, their files were transferred to a separate CRA office in St. Catharines. The officer tasked with these reviews stated that the IC00-1R were applied and the Guidelines were considered. To maintain independence and impartiality, the officer also stated that this review was kept separate from the first level review.

[37] Separate decisions were issued for each applicant. Each decision consisted of a letter and a report with more detailed explanations of the underlying reasons. All the decisions included: a summary of the sequence of events leading up to the principal applicant's disclosure and the audit of Stoneridge; a description of the share structures for Stoneridge and its associated companies (GLD Holdings Inc., Burton Custom Homes Inc. and Lighthouse Developments Inc.) with an acknowledgment that all of these companies were mentioned in the initial audit letter; and an observation that the principal applicant owned shares in Stoneridge and one or more of the associated companies.

[39] In a letter dated October 22, 2010, the officer denied the principal applicant's second level review request on his personal T1 tax returns. The officer observed that the effective date of disclosure was October 5, 2005, at which time CRA had already commenced an enforcement action against Stoneridge, a related party. Based on the timeline of events, the officer deemed it reasonable to expect that on being made aware of CRA's intention to audit Stoneridge, Larry Burton and Brad Huggins would have been in immediate contact with all of the corporation's directors and/or shareholders. Therefore, the officer concluded that the principal applicant's disclosure was made with knowledge of an enforcement action against Stoneridge.

[40] In the report dated November 9, 2010, the officer noted that the principal applicant's communications with DioGuardi in September 2005 had occurred before both the audit notification and the subsequent disclosure. This, coupled with the fact that the principal applicant had not filed any tax returns or reported income to the CRA since coming to Canada, rendered it reasonable that the CRA would have uncovered the income disclosed by the principal applicant. As the disclosure was deemed non-voluntary, the officer did not consider the remaining three conditions outlined in the IC00-1R.

[41] In a letter dated November 10, 2010, the officer also denied the principal applicant's second level review request on his foreign information returns. Similar reasons were provided as those set out above for his personal T1 tax returns.

Lyn Worsfold

[42] In the decision letter dated November 17, 2010, the officer observed that Lyn Worsfold and the principal applicant are the settlors and trustees of the Worsfold Trust. In addition, the officer noted that the second level review had determined that title to a property being reviewed in the Stoneridge audit had been registered in Lyn Worsfold's name. Therefore, although the audit had not been commenced against Lyn Worsfold, the officer concluded that it was reasonable to believe that the information disclosed by Lyn Worsfold would have been uncovered during the course of the audit. On this basis, the officer found that the disclosure by applicant Lyn Worsfold was not voluntary and her second level review request was denied.

[43] In the report dated November 12, 2010, the officer again noted that Lyn Worsfold and her husband (the principal applicant) were settlors, trustees and primary beneficiaries of the Worsfold Trust. The officer stated that the timeline of events made it reasonable to expect that the principal applicant would have informed his wife that the audit was underway. The officer also acknowledged that the effective date of the initial disclosure was October 5, 2005, although the request to include Lyn Worsfold's 2001 T1 personal tax return and T1135 foreign income verification statement for 2001 to 2005 was not made until August 31, 2006. Based on the review of the documentation on file, the officer believed that there was sufficient information to conclude that CRA would have uncovered the information disclosed by the principal applicant's spouse by way of the Stoneridge audit.

Stoneridge Management

[44] In a letter dated November 10, 2010, the officer concluded that Stoneridge Management's disclosure was not voluntary because it was prompted by the principal applicant's disclosure. The officer found that through the Stoneridge audit, it was reasonable to believe that CRA would have uncovered the income disclosed by the principal applicant, including the T4 earnings from Stoneridge Management. It was also reasonable to believe that the unfilled T4 supplementaries and summaries, T2 returns and T1135 foreign income information returns for Stoneridge Management would have been addressed through the audit process. As Stoneridge Management did not meet the voluntary requirement, the officer did not consider the other three factors and Stoneridge Management's second level review request was denied.

[45] In the report dated November 9, 2010, the officer noted that the principal applicant, the sole shareholder of Stoneridge Management, received a T4 slip from Stoneridge Management in 2004 and in future years. The years 2003 and 2004 were initially slated for review in the Stoneridge audit. The officer acknowledged that the effective date of the initial disclosure by Stoneridge Management was August 2006, when its returns were first filed. However, for the sake of consistency, the VDP officer (for the first level review) accepted October 5, 2005 as the effective date of disclosure. Based on the circumstances, the officer found that through the Stoneridge audit, it was reasonable to believe that the CRA would have uncovered the income being disclosed by the principal applicant, a shareholder of one or more of the associated companies. This discovery would have led to the discovery of Stoneridge Management's unfiled returns.

Worsfold Trust

[46] In a letter dated November 17, 2010, the officer found that Worsfold Trust's disclosure was not voluntary and its second level review request was therefore denied.

[47] In the report dated November 10, 2010, the officer acknowledged that the principal applicant and his wife were settlors, trustees and primary beneficiaries of the Worsfold Trust. The officer noted that although the effective date of disclosure was October 5, 2005, a request to include information on the trust in the disclosure was not received until August 30, 2006. Nevertheless, whether the effective date of disclosure was in fact October 5, 2005 or August 30, 2006, the officer found that the auditor had made direct contact with Stoneridge prior to both of these dates.

[48] The officer highlighted that the principal applicant, his wife and the Worsfold Trust had not filed any tax returns since their arrival in Canada in 2001 The officer noted that the principal applicant's no-name disclosure was filed on the same day as Stoneridge's accountant received the audit letter for Stoneridge, a related party. Therefore, based on the officer's review of the documentation on file, the officer believed that there was sufficient information to conclude that CRA would have uncovered the unfiled returns and unreported income of the Worsfold Trust from the Stoneridge audit. As the Worsfold Trust's application was deemed non-voluntary, the officer did not evaluate the remaining three requirements and the second level review request was denied.

Penalties

T1 tax returns $175,000

Foreign information returns $ 47,500 Lyn Worsfold: $ 12,500

Digitized by Google

Stoneridge Management: $ 8,000 Worsfold Trust: $ 14,000
The total late filing penalty for all the applicants was $257,000.
[50] In response to these decisions, the applicants filed five separate notices of application. By order of this Court dated February 11, 2011, these applications were consolidated into the present application.

Issues
[51] The applicants submit the following points at issue:
Did the respondent err in law in its interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) of the *Income Tax Act*and the IC00-1R and Guidelines regarding the voluntary criteria?
Were the respondent's decisions based on reasonable findings of fact rationally supported by the material before it?
Did the respondent observe the principles of natural justice and procedural fairness in making the decisions?
Did the respondent act in bad faith in the decision making process? [52] I would rephrase the issues as follows:
What is the appropriate standard of review?
Did the officer err in the finding that the applicants' disclosures were prompted by the audit of Stoneridge?
Did the officer base the decisions on any findings of fact that were made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard to the material on the record?
Did the officer breach principles of natural justice or procedural fairness?

Applicants' Written Submissions
Standard of Review
[53] The applicants submit that the appropriate standard of review for decisions involving the exercise of discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act is reasonableness. Similarly, a reasonableness standard should be applied to the findings of fact made in these decisions. Questions of procedural fairness are reviewable on a standard of correctness.

Relation of Enforcement Action to the Applicants
[54] The applicants refer to subsection 6(a) of IC00-1R which states in part:
A disclosure may not qualify as a voluntary disclosure under the above policy if it is found to have been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action that has been initiated by the [CRA], or other authorities or administrations with which the [CRA] has information exchange agreements. [emphasis added]
[55] The applicants submit that in L'Heureux v Canada (Attorney General), 2006 FC 1180, [2006] FCJ No 1479, this Court held that the words "audit, investigation, or other enforcement action" in the above provision should not be interpreted as being limited to activities initiated against the individual making the disclosure (at paragraph 24). The applicants submit that in this case there were no enforcement actions initiated against any of the them. Rather, the relevant enforcement action pertained to the audit of Stoneridge, a third party. [56] The applicants highlight the CRA policy on enforcement actions against third parties, as provided in section 8.3.3 of the Guidelines:
In some cases, it may also be appropriate to determine whether or not there has been enforcement activity on related program lines, partners of the client or corporations related to the client. In all cases, discretion should be applied in determining whether these activities should invalidate a disclosure based on how closely those activities relate to the disclosure.

[57] Turning to the enforcement action questions outlined in section 8.3.5 of the Guidelines, the applicants submit that they provide that not all enforcement actions invalidate a disclosure. Further, it is a reviewable error for the second of the two questions not to be expressly considered in the reasons for a VDP decision (see Poon v Canada, 2009 FC 432, [2009] FCJ No 1713 at paragraph 26). This second question focuses on finding a link between the enforcement action and the information being disclosed; not a link between any particular parties. The applicants submit that support for this position is provided in both L'Heureux above and Amour International Mines d'Or Ltée v Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 1070, [2010] FCJ No 1325. [58] The applicants submit that in the decisions, the officer erred by only focusing on whether they were related to Stoneridge and not whether the information they disclosed was related to the scope of the corporate audit. The applicants highlight the officer's acknowledgement that although the principal applicant's returns were not reviewed to determine the source of income, the officer was aware that none of the applicants reported income from Stoneridge. In addition, the officer did not review Stoneridge's T2 returns to consider whether there was a link between the information on the corporate tax returns and the information disclosed by each of the applicants.
[59] The applicants submit that by limiting the review to the relationships between the entities involved and not examining what was disclosed and audited, the officer blatantly disregarded the enforcement action questions. In so doing, the officer erred in law. The decisions should therefore be quashed and referred back for redetermination.
Findings of Fact
[60] The applicants also submit that the officer's findings that the disclosures were not voluntary were based on two unreasonable findings of fact that were not rationally supported by the material:
The principal applicant had knowledge of the audit of Stoneridge, which triggered the disclosure for all the applicants; and
Each applicant was related to Stoneridge and the audit of Stoneridge would have uncovered the information disclosed by each applicant.
[61] On the first finding of fact, the applicants submit that the decisions infer that they all had knowledge of the audit from either Larry Burton or Brad Huggins prior to the October 5, 2005 disclosure; knowledge which prompted their disclosures. However, the applicants submit that suspicion of such prior knowledge cannot alone form the basis of a reasonable decision. The decision must be based on a full objective evaluation of the facts.
[62] The applicants submit that there is independent evidence of another reason that explains the timing of their disclosure. This reason was described by both the principal applicant and Paul DioGuardi in their provision of details on the events preceding the filing of the principal applicant's formal disclosure. Records (receipts, emails and phone logs) were filed to substantiate these claims. This evidence must be considered when weighing whether the disclosures were made as a result of knowledge of a pending audit. In addition, in preferring one version of events over the other, the officer erred in not providing an explanation for the preference chosen.
[63] Theapplicants also submit that the officer's testimony on cross-examination indicates that the officer ignored the correspondence and actions prior to the date that the auditor first attempted to contact Larry Burton. However, this information was relevant as it supported the alternative explanation of the timing of the applicants' disclosure. Had it been considered, any suspicions that the principal applicant only came forward in response to knowledge of the audit would have been eliminated. The applicants submit that this refusal to consider relevant evidence is a breach of procedural fairness and also renders the decisions unreasonable. [64] The applicants highlight the officer's failure to contact any of the parties to evaluate the credibility of their statements. Rather, the officer made the decisions purely on the basis of a paper exercise and little deference is therefore owed. By failing to articulate a rationale for the officer's suspicions and by failing to ask further questions of the parties, the decisions are unsupported and the applicants are deprived of the right to know or respond to the allegations.

[65] Further, the applicants submit that the officer's conclusion that the principal applicant actively ran Stoneridge was based on a misapprehension of the facts and was not supported by the evidence. In support, the applicants note Larry Burton's: signature on the Stoneridge tax returns; repeated involvement in the audits; and position as the listed contact for Stoneridge. In addition, the applicants highlight the principal applicant's: constant absence from Canada due to overseas travel for business; external employment and significant income from his computer development business; lack of income from Stoneridge; statement to the auditor that Larry Burton and David Turk were responsible for day to day operations as he was too busy with his other companies; and statement to the auditor that the only time the principal applicant got involved pertained to a loss of right-of-way that affected two of the properties purchased by Stoneridge.

[66] Similarly, the officer's finding that an authorized contact of a company would immediately inform all directors and shareholders of an audit was purely speculative without any evidentiary basis.

[67] The applicants also highlight the officer's limited analysis in the decisions as to how the applicants (other than the principal applicant) would have been made aware of the Stoneridge audit.

[68] For these reasons, the applicants submit that they were not properly accorded the benefit of doubt required in evaluations of the voluntariness of disclosures under section 8.3.5 of the Guidelines. The officer did not establish a reasonable basis in the evidence that supported a causal link between the notification of a third party of the planned audit and the applicants'disclosures. The applicants submit that this rendered the officer's decisions unreasonable.

[69] On the second finding of fact, the applicants submit that the officer erred in the shareholding analysis to determine whether the applicants were related to Stoneridge as defined under section 251 of the Income Tax Act. Nevertheless, none of the applicants could be considered related to Stoneridge as the principal applicant only had a non-controlling one third indirect interest in the company and none of the other applicants owned any shares in it. In addition, submissions were provided throughout the second review that outlined the lack of relationship between the applicants and Stoneridge. It did not appear that the officer considered these submissions.

[70] The applicants further submit that the decision for the principal applicant did not include a statement that the officer believed the audit of Stoneridge would have uncovered the income that the principal applicant disclosed. As such, the officer did not address the second of the two enforcement action questions. As per *Poon*above, the decision should therefore be overturned.

[71] The applicants also criticize the officer's speculative domino effects approach to the Stoneridge audit. According to the officer's affidavit, the Stoneridge audit would have uncovered the fact that the applicants had not filed tax returns. However, the applicants submit that this approach disregards the CRA policies that expressly focus on the relationship between the information being audited and that being disclosed. In addition, the applicants submit that the officer's belief that more information would be uncovered was purely speculative and not supported by the evidence. In fact, the narrow scope of the Stoneridge audit would not have uncovered the actual information disclosed by the applicants in their voluntary disclosures.

[72] Finally, the applicants submit that the statement in the October 5, 2005 letter that "as the audit progresses, we may request additional records related to the associated companies and all respective shareholders" is a standard sentence used in audit notifications. Drawing similarities to the facts in Amour Mines above, the applicants submit that the mere possibility that an auditor could have asked for additional records was insufficient to demonstrate that the enforcement action would have triggered an in-depth audit and uncovered the information filed by them. There was also nothing in the screener's comments, auditor's notes or audit plan to suggest that CRA intended to pursue or did pursue any audit of the applicants.

[73] The applicants submit that the officer did not observe the principles of natural justice and procedural fairness in making the decisions. The applicants submit that when exercising its discretion, the CRA is both required and expected to operate reasonably and by its own guidelines (see Montréal (City) v Montreal Port Authority, 2010 SCC 14, [2010] 1 SCR 427 at paragraph 33).

[74] As discussed above, the applicants submit that there were several procedural errors in the officer's decision, specifically:

Failure to follow the criteria set out in the Guidelines;
Failure to give the applicants the benefit of doubt;
Failure to provide adequate reasons;
Reliance on conjecture and speculation to support the findings of fact;
Considerations of irrelevant evidence of the relationship between parties; and Ignoring relevant submissions and evidence.

[75] The applicants criticize the officer's failure to obtain the full audit and investigation file for the second level reviews. Rather, the officer relied on incomplete evidence and the opinion and summaries of others, which perpetuated the prejudices and errors identified at the first level reviews.

[76] The applicants further submit that the length of time that it took to process the second reviews, over two and a half years, was unacceptable and invalidated the subsequent decision.

[77] As such, the decisions were not made in accordance with the principles of natural justice and they lacked procedural fairness.

[78] In summary, the applicants submit that the decisions were not made in accordance with the Guidelines and inadequate and unsupportable reasons were provided. These were based on conjecture and cannot withstand probing examination. The decisions should therefore be set aside and the applicants' VDP requests reconsidered.

Respondent's Written Submissions

Standard of Review

[79] The respondent submits that the question of whether the officer failed to observe a principal of natural justice or procedural fairness is reviewable on a correctness standard. Conversely, the question of whether the officer based the decisions on erroneous findings of fact made in a perverse or capricious manner or without regard to the material is reviewable on a reasonableness standard. Even if this Court finds the answer to these questions is in the affirmative, the respondent submits that this Court must consider the outcome of the officer's exercise of discretion in making the final decision.

[80] The respondent also submits that the standard of review of decisions made under the VDP is reasonableness. The respondent highlights the unstructured nature of the Minister's extraordinary statutory discretion and submits that this militates against a Court subjecting the decision process to close scrutiny.

Digitized by Google

Relation of Enforcement Action to the Applicants

[81] The respondent refers to the conditions for a valid VDP, as provided in IC00-1R. It submits that the application before this Court pertains to the first of these conditions; namely, that the VDP must be voluntary to be valid. The respondent submits that the enforcement action does not need to be against the taxpayer who made the disclosure (see L'Heureux above, at paragraph 24). To come to a determination on this issue, all relevant facts must be considered. If the officer finds that the disclosure was prompted by knowledge of an enforcement action, the respondent submits that this is a sufficient ground on which to deny the disclosure as it evidences that the taxpayer did not come forward voluntarily.

[82] With regards to the Guidelines, the respondent submits that it does not articulate strict tests that must be followed in determining whether a VDP application is valid.

[83] Although a direct link between the enforcement action and information disclosed can serve as proof that the disclosure was not voluntary, the respondent submits that an officer is not limited to relying on a direct link. An officer can also examine indirect links or other factors. This includes a finding that the taxpayer would not have come forward were it not for an enforcement action against a related party or the disclosure by a related party that was prompted by an enforcement action.

[84] The respondent submits that Amour Mines above, is not applicable to this case. The respondent distinguishes Amour Mines above, as pertaining to an enforcement action against an indirect shareholder. Conversely, in this case, the enforcement action is against an operating corporation. The respondent further notes that there was a clear sense that the disclosure was not prompted by an enforcement action by the CRA in Amour Mines above.

[85] The respondent also submits that the definition of the word "related" as used in the Guidelines, is not restricted to the definition set out in section 251 of the Income Tax Act. It is notable that the Guidelines do not refer to this provision of the Income Tax Act and the VDP itself is not limited to the Income Tax Act but applies to many legislative schemes. Therefore, rather than being used in a technical sense, the respondent submits that the term "related" refers to a relationship between two or more persons of a somewhat close nature.

Findings of Fact

[86] The respondent submits that the officer's findings of fact were reasonable and justified based on the evidence. In support, the respondent provides submissions on the following:

Voluntariness of principal applicant's disclosure;
Voluntariness of principal applicant's wife's disclosure;
Voluntariness of Stoneridge Management's disclosure;
Voluntariness of Worsfold Trust's disclosure;
Officer's obligation to gather additional information; and Deference owed to the officer's findings of fact.

[87] On the first point, the respondent submits that the officer's finding that the principal applicant's disclosure was prompted by the enforcement action against Stoneridge was reasonable and justified. The respondent highlights:

Ties to Stoneridge: The principal applicant was a director and major shareholder of Stoneridge.

Property transactions: The principal applicant was involved in property transactions with

Digitized by Google

Stoneridge that were reported in the company's books and records.
Chain of events: The chain of events, particularly the notification of the audit and the subsequent filing of the disclosures that occurred between October 3 and 5, 2005.
Scope of audit: The scope of the Stoneridge audit (including property transactions and T2 returns of associated corporations) rendered it a reasonable finding that the principal applicant would have known that the audit would lead to him.
Jennings property: The involvement of Larry Burton and the principal applicant in the Jennings property scheme rendered it likely that Larry Burton would have informed the principal applicant about the audit.
Lack of evidence: The lack of concrete evidence submitted by the applicants to show that the principal applicant's disclosure was not prompted by the enforcement action – particularly the lack of documentary evidence on the substance or purpose of the communications between the principal applicant and DioGuardi.
[88] The respondent also highlights the applicants' previous requests that the officer not communicate with those involved in the principal applicant's audit and investigation, followed by their subsequent critique of the officer abiding to these requests. Further, although some information was inaccurate in the VDP file, the respondent submits that while the applicants had the opportunity to do so, they did not address these errors or show that they would have made a difference in the officer's decisions.
[89] The respondent distinguishes this case from Livaditis v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010 FC 950, [2010] FCJ No 1184. Rather than preferring the account of a fellow CRA officer over that of a taxpayer, the officer in this case put more weight on the concrete evidence than on the principal applicant's allegations. It was within the officer's purview to weigh the evidence in this manner.
[90] In addition, the respondent submits that the officer did not limit the review to the relationship between the parties, but considered all the evidence as well as the relationship between the information at issue. Based on this review, the officer reasonably concluded that the audit of Stoneridge, a closely-held company, would have led to the principal applicant.
[91] Finally, the respondent submits that neither the principal applicant's reasons for making the disclosure or the fact that he consulted with DioGuardi automatically renders his disclosure voluntary. Considering the idea of disclosure is not sufficient and a taxpayer that delays in coming forward does so at his own risk. Concrete action must be taken.
[92] The respondent submits that the officer's decision on the disclosure of the principal applicant's wife was also reasonable. An auditor reviewing the principal applicant's case would also have reasonably considered that of his wife. Further, the principal applicant's wife was not only related to Stoneridge through her husband, but also through her previous property transaction with the company.
[93] The respondent submits that the officer's decision on Stoneridge Management's disclosure was also reasonable. This company was closely associated with the principal applicant, who was its sole director and shareholder and who received substantial income therefrom.
[94] The Worsfold Trust is closely related to both the principal applicant and his wife. The couple act as trustees of the trust and it was set up for their benefit and that of their children. Further, as the principal applicant reported income from a trust, this would have led to an inquiry on whether there were other trusts from which he received an income. Finally, the couple would also have been required to submit foreign income verification statements with their tax returns.
[95] The respondent submits that the officer was not obliged to gather more information. In this case, the applicants made submissions and the officer considered them. The officer's decision to disagree with the applicants' submissions was well within the officer's discretionary power.

[96] Finally, the respondent submits that the applicants' submissions are, in essence, objections to the officer's weighing of the evidence. Weighing of the evidence lies at the heart of the officer's exercise of discretion and it is not the reviewing court's role to consider alternative assessments of the evidence. The Court must instead consider whether the officer's interpretation was reasonable.

[98] First, the respondent submits that the officer acted impartially in the second level review of the applicants' disclosures. The officer's consideration of whether the disclosures were voluntary revolved around the facts that took place in 2005 and were not impacted by subsequent events. In addition to preserve independence, the officer avoided discussing the case with the individuals previously involved with it.

[99] Second, the respondent submits that while IC00-1R is the governing instrument on VDP requirements and policy, the Guidelines are merely an internal document that is intended to assist VDP officers in the exercise of their function. The Guidelines do not grant legal rights to applicants. There are no tests outlined in the Guidelines for determining the validity of disclosures, nor are there legitimate expectations that the CRA will strictly follow them or be bound by them. Further, the respondent submits that the Guidelines are not meant to provide an exhaustive list of factors that a VDP officer needs to follow, nor constrain the respondent's exercise of discretion in any way. In fact, an officer's strict application of the Guidelines, without exercising its own judgment in considering the merits of a particular case, would be a fettering of its discretion.

[100] The respondent also submits that the doctrine of legitimate expectation only creates procedural rights, not substantive rights. Therefore, to allege that the Guidelines must be strictly followed would incorrectly elevate them from an internal document to the status of law.

[101] The respondent submits that Poon above, is not applicable to this case. It is incompatible with the VDP officer's discretion that a test suggested in internal guidelines be mandatory in reviewing a file.

[102] Finally, the respondent submits that the officer's reasons were adequate to support the decisions. The respondent highlights the officer's reasons addressing the circumstances pertaining to the principal applicant's decision to come forward. In addition, the respondent submits that the officer did address the connection between the enforcement action against Stoneridge and the information disclosed by the applicants.

What is the appropriate standard of review?

Where previous jurisprudence has determined the standard of review applicable to a particular issue before the court, the reviewing court may adopt that standard (see Dunsmuir v New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 SCR 190 at paragraph 57).

[104] The jurisprudence has clearly established that the appropriate standard of review for discretionary decisions made in relation to the VDP is reasonableness (see Charky v Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 1327, [2010] FCJ No 1641 at paragraphs 20 and 21; L'Heureux above, at paragraph 15; and Palonek v Canada (Minister of National Revenue), 2006 FC 494, [2006] FCJ No 619 at paragraphs 72 and 73). This standard of review requires the Court to consider whether the decision-making process is transparent and intelligible and whether the decision is rationally justified. Both the ultimate result and the manner in which the result is achieved must fall within a "range of possible, acceptable outcomes" (see Dunsmuir above, at paragraph 47; and Livaditis above, at paragraph 25).

[105] Findings of fact made by the officer in making the decisions are also afforded a considerable degree of deference (see Spence v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010 FC 52, [2010] FCJ No 51 at paragraph 18).

[106] Conversely, issues of procedural fairness and natural justice are reviewable on a standard of correctness.Decision-makers are not entitled to any deference by the Court on these issues (see Canada (Attorney General) v Sketchley, 2005 FCA 404, [2006] 3 FCR 392 at paragraphs 52 to 54; and Poon above, at paragraph 17).

Did the officer err in the finding that the applicants' disclosures were prompted by the audit of Stoneridge?

In this case, the officer's decisions ultimately rest on the finding that the applicants' disclosures were prompted by the audit of Stoneridge; thereby rendering their disclosures non-voluntary.

[108] To determine whether the officer's findings in relation to the voluntariness of the disclosure were reasonable, the underlying facts must be carefully considered. As a starting point, it is not in dispute that the principal applicant first made contact with Paul DioGuardi, a tax amnesty lawyer, on or about September 6, 2006. On September 21, 2009, Philippe DioGuardi, Paul DioGuardi's son, sent the following email to the principal applicant:

Taxamnesty.ca Communication Backup From: support@taxamnesty.ca
Sent: September 21, 2005 6:37:25 PM To: GWORSFOLD61@HOTMAIL.COM
Here is our opinion of your current tax situation:
Based on the information you have provided, you are eligible for a tax amnesty. Given the total of undeclared income and/or gain and subject to considering your residency status, you may be committing criminal tax evasion under section 239 of the Income Tax Act. Prosecution could result in a prison sentence as well as criminal and civil penalties and fines that could be as much as %250 of the amount of the tax owing. A tax amnesty will resolve your situation.
Here are your next steps:
Contact me during the course of this week to represent you in this matter. I can be reached by telephone at 613-237-2222, 416-657-4408 or 1-866-758- 9030. When we speak I will explain to you our services. In pursuing a tax amnesty for you, I will endeavor to negotiate a settlement with the authorities on the following terms:
No charges for tax evasion.
Complete waiver of all penalties.
A limit to the interest owing or a limit on the number of years on which you must pay tax.
At all times your identity will be protected by the confidentiality of lawyer- client privilege. Your name will only be revealed after a settlement has been agreed by you.
It is extremely important that you file for a tax amnesty before the Canada Revenue Agency becomes aware of your tax evasion. I urge you to retain our services to begin your tax amnesty immediately.
I look forward to speaking with you by telephone ASAP. Yours sincerely, [109] The principal applicant's phone records show that he made a telephone call to the DioGuardi law office on September 21, 2009 at which time a meeting between the DioGuardi law firm and the principal applicant was set up. The meeting was subsequently held and it was determined that a voluntary disclosure should be made. There was no evidence that the Stoneridge audit was discussed at the meeting.

[110] On October 3, 2005, the CRA auditor first spoke with Larry Burton, a director of Stoneridge, to inform him of the audit. Two days later, in the afternoon of October 5, 2005, the auditor faxed the initial audit letter to Brad Huggins, the corporate accountant of Stoneridge. Mr. Huggins was not the principal applicant's accountant and there was no clear evidence of contact between Mr. Huggins and the principal applicant. The principal applicant's disclosure was filed an hour after the auditor faxed the initial audit letter to Mr. Huggins. [111] In the report on the second level request, the officer made frequent use of the word "alleged" to describe certain factual statements made by the principal applicant and his tax advisors. The officer ultimately found that the facts indicated that the applicants' disclosures were not voluntary.
Conditions for a valid disclosure
A valid voluntary disclosure is defined by the following four conditions:
(a) The CCRA determines that the disclosure is voluntary.
The disclosure must be voluntary. The client has to initiate the voluntary disclosure. A disclosure may not qualify as a voluntary disclosure under the above policy if it is found to have been made with the knowledge of an audit, investigation, or other enforcement action that has been initiated by the CCRA, or other authorities or administrations with which the CCRA has information exchange agreements.
This is the only condition for a valid disclosure that is at issue in this case.
[113] The effective date of the disclosure is the date on which CRA receives the disclosure; in this case that date was October 5, 2005.
[114] It is my view that there is no evidence before me that would lead to the conclusion that any of the applicants knew of the existence of an audit of Stoneridge by CRA. In fact, the evidence points the opposite way. The respondent has accepted that there is no clear evidence that Stoneridge's accountant, Mr. Huggins, spoke with any of the applicants. The letters from DioGuardi to the CRA made no mention of an audit of Stoneridge.
[115] In addition, the facts of the case establish that the principal applicant took the first step in a process that ultimately led to the voluntary disclosures on October 5, 2005. Although the voluntary disclosure is not effective until the date received by CRA, the chain of events shows that the voluntary disclosure process which was initiated by the principal applicant on September 6, 2005 was not triggered by the audit of Stoneridge.
[116] The respondent simply relies on the inference that after the call with the auditor on October 3, 2005, the director Larry Burton would have been in immediate contact with all of the directors and shareholders, including the principal applicant who was also a director. The respondent submits that this alleged contact then caused the principal applicant to file the voluntary disclosure. I do not accept this conclusion as there is insufficient factual basis for this conclusion. It is mere conjecture.
[117] I would also note that the officer did not deal with the facts submitted by Mr. DioGuardi and the principal applicant. The reason for the officer's preference of conjecture over the other facts is not clear from the officer's decisions. Concurrently, it is important to consider the closing words of section 8.3.5 of the Guidelines:

Digitized by Google

If the answer to either of these question is "NO", the disclosure may be considered voluntary. Clients should be given the benefit of the doubt.[emphasis added]

In light of the lack of evidence in this case, it would appear that none of the applicants were granted the "benefit of the doubt".

[118] I conclude that the applicants had no knowledge of the audit when they filed their disclosures.

[119] In further support, I also note section 8.3.5 of the Guidelines which outlines the two enforcement action questions:

8.3.5 Impact of Enforcement Activity on Determination

Not all enforcement action is automatic cause to invalidate a disclosure. If any of the above research suggests that the CCRA or a related administration has taken enforcement action against a disclosing client, partner, or related corporation, the VDP officer will need to consider whether the disclosure can still be considered voluntary. For example:

a source deduction audit may have no relation at all to a GST disclosure that is being made; the CCRA may have established an audit protocol with a large file client and the client may have disclosed a matter unrelated to the audit.

Therefore, when a VDP officer discovers that enforcement actions have begun against a client, the following judgments should be made:

Was any direct contact made with the client or is the client likely to have been aware of the enforcement action?

Is it likely that the CCRA would have uncovered the information being disclosed based on this enforcement action?

If the answer to either of these questions is "NO", the disclosure may be considered voluntary. Clients should be given the benefit of the doubt.

[120] To begin, it is important to note that no audit was being done on any of the applicants. The audit or enforcement action was being done on Stoneridge; an unrelated company. The only connection seems to be that the principal applicant was a director of Stoneridge.

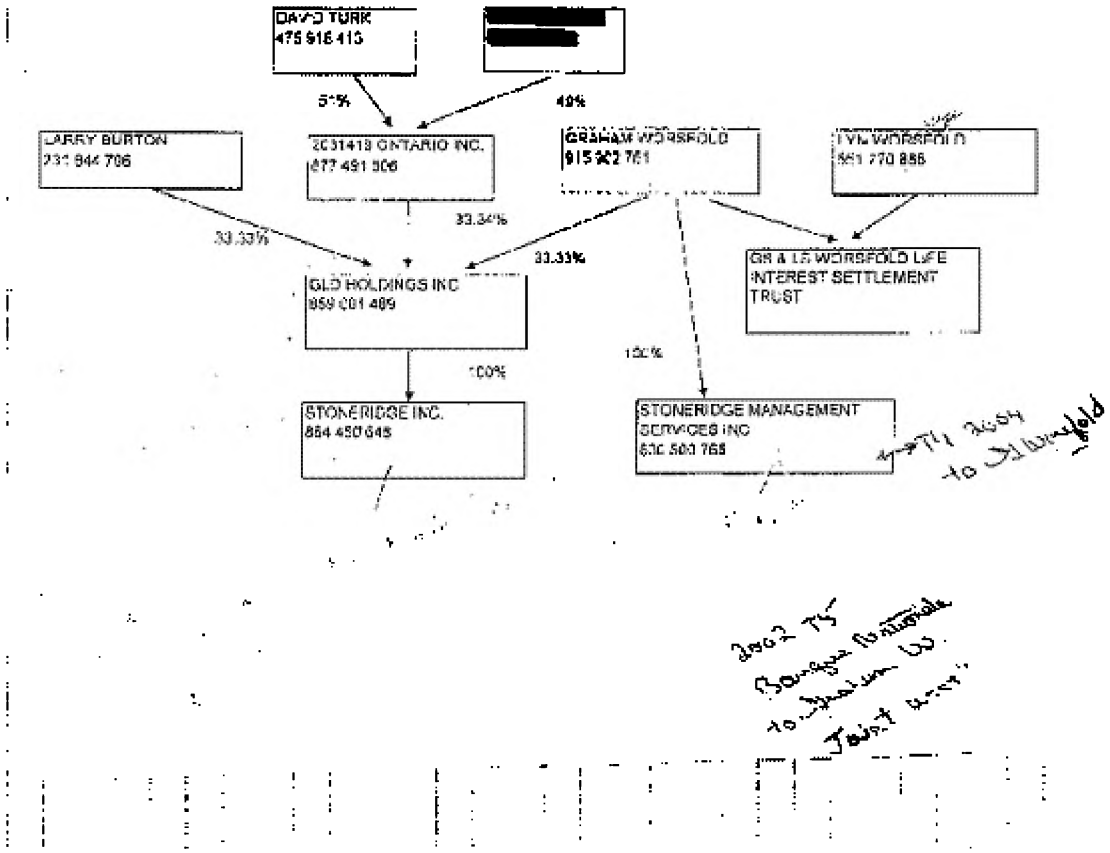
Was any direct contact made with the client or is the client likely to have been aware of the enforcement action?

[121] I have already dealt with the facts as they relate to the principal applicant under this first question. As I concluded that there was insufficient evidence that the principal applicant had knowledge of the audit of Stoneridge when he made his voluntary disclosure on October 5, 2005, this first question must be answered in the negative. The same is also true for the other applicants as there is no evidence that any of them were contacted or were aware of the enforcement action relating to Stoneridge.

Is it likely that the CRA would have uncovered the information being disclosed based on the enforcement action?

[122] It may be helpful at this point to look at a chart prepared by an official at CRA which shows the various entities involved.

Digitized by Google



[123] With respect to the principal applicant, the officer must decide whether it was likely that the audit of Stoneridge would have uncovered the information contained in his voluntary disclosure. I have reviewed the decision of the officer and I am of the view that this question was not addressed by the officer. The most that could be said is that the officer looked at the relationship between some of the parties.

[124] There is no doubt that the officers were aware that this question should have been answered as the following e-mail was sent to George Deszpoth, the first level review officer by Harold Howard C.G.A.:

Third issue – related party enforcement action. Review the attached case – it may shed some light on the situation.
Questions to ask – Is the income on the T1 related to the corp. audit? If so there is a link.

[125] In the applicants' oral submissions, Mr. Howard is referred to as the CRA's expert on voluntary disclosure matters. As of the time of the audit, the principal applicant had not shown any income from Stoneridge. Consequently, the disclosed T1 income has no connection or link with the audit.
[126] In addition, had the officer assessed the submissions made by Paul DioGuardi with respect to this question, the officer may well have found that the CRA would not, as a result of the audit of Stoneridge, have uncovered the information being disclosed by the principal applicant. There was simply no connection between the T1 income from Stoneridge Management and any audit findings from enforcement action against Stoneridge. The same can be said for the other applicants.
[127] In Poon above, Madam Justice Sandra Simpson of this Court stated at paragraphs 21 to 26: 21 The question is whether, having indicated in the Decision that he was applying the Guidelines, the Director was required to address section 8.3.5 thereof. It indicates that "Not all enforcement action is automatic cause to invalidate a disclosure".
As stated above, the Guidelines suggest, in part, that:
[...] when a VDP officer discovers thatenforcement actions have begin against a client, the following judgments should be made:
[Question 1] Was any direct contact made with the client or is the client likely to have been aware of the enforcement action?

[Question 2] It is likely that the CRA would have uncovered the information being disclosed based on this enforcement action?
If the answer to either of these questions is "NO", the disclosure may be considered voluntary. Clients should be given the benefit of the doubt.
The Decision refers to the Guidelines and provides fairly detailed reasons for explaining, in answer to the first question, why the Director concluded that the Applicant was aware of CRA's enforcement action against APS.
What is missing is any mention in the Decision of the Director's reasoning and conclusion about the second question.
The Applicant said, with regard to the second question, that any enforcement action CRA took against APS would not have revealed all the personal sources of income described in the Personal Disclosure. In particular, he referred to investment income, rental income and income from employers other than APS.
The Director's failure to deal with the second question in the Decision means that he has not adequately explained why he exercised his discretion to reject the Applicant's Personal Disclosure.
[128] In my view, the same situation arises in the present case. The second question that the officer must pass judgment on was simply not addressed. A review of the material in the record does not assist in this respect. The officer's decision is therefore unreasonable and must be set aside on that basis.
[129] Also, with respect to the knowledge of the applicants in relation to the enforcement action against Stoneridge, the officer's treatment of the evidence provided by the principal applicant, and his lawyer Paul DioGuardi was unreasonable. Why was it not accepted? No analysis or reason was provided. It was simply referred to as being "alleged".

[130] In my view, the same reasoning applies to all of the other applicants and the decisions with respect to them are therefore also unreasonable.
[131] Because of my finding on this issue, I need not deal with the remaining issues.
[132] The application for judicial review is allowed and the applicants' request for penalty and interest relief under the VDP are to be reconsidered by the Minister.
[133] The applicants shall have their costs of the application.
[134] A copy of these reasons for judgment and judgment are to be placed on files T-2049-10, T-2050-10, T- 2077-10 and T-2078-10.

JUDGMENT
THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that:
The application for judicial review is allowed and the applicants' request for penalty and interest relief under the voluntary disclosures program are to be reconsidered by the Minister.
The applicants shall have their costs of the application.

Edward Palonek v. The Minister of National Revenue, 2007 FCA 281, VDP means Complete Disclosure while CRA is Not Responsible for Advising/Stating Results in Advance REASONS FOR JUDGMENT LÉTOURNEAU J.A.

[1] This is an appeal from a decision of Mactavish J. of the Federal Court of Canada (judge) rendered on April 18, 2006. She dismissed Mr. Palonek's (the appellant's) application for judicial review of the decision made by the Minister of National Revenue's delegate to deny the appellant access to the Voluntary
[2] This appeal cannot succeed. There is no need to relate all the facts in details. The following summary will be sufficient to understand the issues at play before this Court and this Court's brief reasons for dismissing the appellant's allegations. I hasten to add that counsel on appeal had to struggle gallantly with a record created by the appellant in the Federal Court where he elected to be self-represented.

FACTS
[3] The appellant, who lives in the Republic of Panama, did not file Canadian income tax and Goods and Services tax returns for the 1993-2001 taxation years. In June 2002, his counsel contacted Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), which at the time was the Canadian Customs and Revenue Agency, in order to make a voluntary disclosure under the VDP. The VDP is a program which allows the CRA to provide relief from penalties, interests and possible prosecution to individuals who make a disclosure to correct inaccurate or incomplete information or to disclose information not previously reported. Neither the appellant nor his counsel were presented with or asked to sign a "Client Agreement Form" before disclosing any relevant information.

[4] At the request of the appellant's counsel, a CRA's agent asserted a few days later that the appellant was not under CRA's investigation by saying that "everything was fine" and asked the appellant to prepare documentation for submission. The appellant then produced his T-1 income tax and GST returns for the years in question.

[5] During the process, CRA's audit department advised the CRA's agent in charge of the appellant's file that the appellant was potentially involved with two or three companies, as well as with a "T3 Trust". CRA's audit department had located a website which indicated that the appellant had been very successful in a business venture known as "Found Money". Found Money Inc. and Found Money International were noted as associated companies.

[6] After being advised and asked to provide additional information concerning these entities and his source of income, the appellant asked for extensions of time due to his responsibilities outside Canada. He later declined to present further submissions other than the fact that he had disposed of his Found Money Inc. shares five or six years ago. According to the respondent, no capital gain or loss had been declared on any of the appellant's tax returns filed under the VDP.

[7] CRA's agents conducted three level of administrative review regarding the appellant's admissibility to the VDP. The last review confirmed the two earlier decisions which denied the appellant access to the VDP because of an incomplete disclosure by him. The third-level decision was rendered on November 15, 2004. This is the decision that was challenged by way of judicial review before the Federal Court.

THE ISSUES ON APPEAL

The respondent's failure to warn the appellant of the consequences of an incomplete disclosure

[8] First, the appellant complains that the Minister of National Revenue (Minister) failed to inform him of the possible consequences of making a disclosure under the VDP. That failure also consisted in not requesting the appellant to sign a "client agreement form". These failures, according to the appellant, constituted a violation of administrative law obligations of fairness as well as an infringement of his rights under sections 7 and 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[9] The short answer to this contention is, as the judge found, that the appellant was represented by knowledgeable counsel in the field of taxation, who, on behalf of his client, initiated the process of voluntary disclosure. In his initial contact with CRA, counsel for the appellant made a specific reference to the Information Circular describing the VDP in a way, as the judge found, that indicated "a familiarity with the VDP process": see reasons for judgment, at paragraphs 101 and 102 and counsel's letter at pages 312 and 313 of Appeal Book, volume 2.

[10] I agree with the learned judge that "in these circumstances, it was entirely reasonable for the Agency to presume that the appellant would have had the benefit of legal advice regarding the parameters of the program": see reasons for judgment at paragraph 101. There is no evidence at all on the record that appellant's counsel was incompetent.

[11] The appellant contends that the respondent had a specific duty to inform him individually of the consequences of an incomplete disclosure. This duty, he submitted, exists despite the fact that he was represented by counsel. Apart from the fact that it would have been unethical for the respondent or respondent's counsel to contact the appellant directly, the duty that the appellant faced here is not different from the duty that any taxpayer has with respect to income tax returns, i.e. full disclosure of all income from all sources.

[12] Nor are the consequences of a failure to disclose different for the appellant, as he contends, from those that a taxpayer would suffer if he failed to disclose income. Both would be subject to interests, penalties and a possible prosecution.

[13] The appellant submits that his situation is different because he is making voluntary disclosure. I do not agree. A taxpayer is in the same situation as the appellant when, at the end of the fiscal year, he files an income tax return: he voluntarily discloses his income. The only difference here is that the appellant has hidden his income for nine years when he should have declared it annually. Surely, he cannot be put in a better position than another taxpayer would be if he fails to make a complete and truthful disclosure.

The alleged unfair treatment by the judge in the judicial review proceedings

[14] As previously mentioned, the appellant elected to represent himself in the judicial review proceedings. On appeal, he was represented by two experienced counsel. He now complains that the judge should have counselled and helped him throughout the process. The fact is that she did to the extent permissible. The appellant's complaint is not supported by the record as a whole.

[15] The appellant is a sophisticated businessman. He sought to obtain in his favour a summary judgment on his application for judicial review which certainly showed some knowledge of the procedure.

[16] Counsel for the appellant drew our attention to selected excerpts of this Court's decision in Wagg v. Canada, 2003 FCA 303, page 206 where Pelletier J.A., properly so, reasserted the need to maintain fairness in the proceedings when a person is self-represented. However, he also sounded the following warning at paragraphs 23, 24 and 25 of his reasons for judgment:

[23] Litigants represent themselves for a variety of reasons. If they come to realize before the commencement of trial that they have underestimated the complexity of the task before them, it is in their interest and the Court's to allow them to obtain representation. But once a trial is underway, I do not think it unfair to hold appellants to their choice to represent themselves, and to be guided by their own judgment.

[24] The decision to represent oneself is not irrevocable, nor is it trivial. Persons who undertake to represent themselves in matters of the complexity of the Income Tax Act [R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1] or the Excise Tax Act must assume the responsibility of being ready to proceed when their appeal is called. If they embark upon the hearing of their appeal, they are representing to the Court that they understand the subject matter sufficiently to be able to proceed. …

[25] Putting the matter another way, litigants who choose to represent themselves must accept the consequences of their choice (Lieb v. Smith et al. (1994), 120 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 201 (S.C.T.D.), at paragraph 16):

Thus, while the court will take into account the lack of experience and training of the litigant, that litigant must also realize that, implicit in the decision to act as his or her own counsel is the willingness to accept the consequences that may flow from such lack of experience or training.

[Emphasis added]

This is also true in judicial review proceedings challenging decisions made under or in relation to the Income Tax Act or the Excise Tax Act. The rationale in paragraphs 23 to 25 of the Wagg decision has also been applied in a number of decisions of this Court: see Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development) v. Hogervorst, 2007 FCA 41; Bérubé v. Canada, 2006 FCA 166; and Dionne v. Canada, 2003 FCA 451.

Whether the decision made by the third level of review was fatally flawed

[17] The appellant argues that the decision made by the third level of review was fatally flawed because the person who undertook the review did not have before her the tax returns filed by the appellant on August 12, 2002 for the taxation years 1993 to 2001.

[18] It should be recalled that this third review was a review of the appellant's file pursuant to the first and second level decisions made respectively on October 21, 2003 and August 19, 2004 which concluded that the appellant had not fully disclosed his income in his August 12, 2002 disclosure made in his tax returns. The date at which completeness of disclosure is to be assessed is August 12, 2002.

[19] The evidence on the record shows that, after August 12, 2002 the appellant was informed by CRA agents that they had discovered new sources of income and additional income. He was given ample opportunity to explain his position in this respect. He sought, and was granted over a 7-month period, numerous extensions of time to make submissions or provide explanations. He acknowledged that he had sold his shares in Found Money Inc., but he never provided additional information nor did he make further representations: see Appeal Book, volume 2, pages 337-338.

[20] The appellant also admitted, after having filed his tax returns, that he received income from Found Money International Ltd. as far back at least as year 2000 and possibly before.

[21] The decision makers at the first and second level of review examined the 2002 tax returns filed by the appellant. They found that no capital disposition of the shares were reported in these tax returns. Nor was the income from Found Money International Inc. declared.

[22] I should add that they found that the accuracy of some of the information disclosed by the appellant in his tax returns was dubious. According to the separation agreement signed with his wife, the maximum annual amount that he had to pay was $30,000. Yet he claimed payments of $70,769, $126,053,

[23] This now brings me to a consideration of the material upon which the third review decision was made. [24] Mrs. Charlton was the Director of the Hamilton Tax Services Office. She is the person who made the decision at the third review level.

[25] In his argument, counsel for the respondent conceded that the appellant's 2002 tax returns were not before Mrs. Charlton when she conducted the review: see Appeal Book, volume 3, at page 618. However, she consulted the record of events and information prepared by CRA agents with respect to the appellant's voluntary disclosure, especially a substantial and detailed Voluntary Disclosure Report, dated July 28, 2004 prepared for the second level review: see Appeal Book, volume 2, pages 336 to 344. The Report is signed by three experienced officials: an Appeals Officer, the Team Leader, Appeals Division and the Chief of Appeals. No evidence was adduced by the appellant that the information regarding the appellant's 2002 tax returns was not properly summarized in that report considered by Mrs. Charlton. Nor is there any evidence filed with the CRA or the Federal Court on the judicial review proceedings which casts doubts on the accuracy of the information and on the facts set out in the report regarding these tax returns.

[26] In her decision, Mrs. Charlton informed the appellant that she based her decision on the "evaluation of the information provided by you during the Voluntary Disclosure review".

At page 178 of the Appeal Book, volume 2, she provided the following as an example of incomplete disclosure:

However, no evidence has been provided by you to establish the type of income i.e. management fees or capital dispositions arising from your involvement to be reported for tax purposes. Nor has any detailed breakdown been provided to confirm that the total of all source(s) of income have been included in your disclosure.

[27] Furthermore, in her decision and her affidavit, she referred to the appellant's omission to disclose his ownership of 30,000 shares in Rothwell Corporation and to provide appropriate information regarding child support and alimony payments. At pages 179 and 303 of the Appeal Book, volume 2, she wrote:

I would also like to address the concern in your September 14, 2004 letter regarding documentation related to your child support and alimony payments having been either lost or misplaced by the Agency. Our records indicate that at no time were the requested receipts, cancelled cheques, bank transfers or other documentation provided by you to substantiate the deductions claimed. Your lawyer (Mr. Pister) indicated in December 2002 that he never received instructions from you in the making of further representations concerning this issue. Furthermore, the September 1993 separation agreement makes reference to ownership of 30,000 shares in Rothwell Corporation. Our records indicate that during the course of the voluntary disclosure process neither ownership nor involvement in this corporation by you was communicated. This omission confirms the incompleteness of the information provided by you.

In the Third-Level Decision, I noted that a September 1993 separation agreement between the Applicant and his former spouse makes reference to his owning 30,000 shares in Rothwell Corporation and that CRA records indicated that during the course of the VDP process neither ownership nor involvement in this corporation was communicated by the Applicant. Attached hereto as Exhibit "Q" is a copy of the separation agreement.

[Emphasis added]

[28] Finally, the record in the proceedings before the Federal Court and this Court indicates that the appellant made substantial amendments to his 2002 income tax and GST returns, some in relation to sources of income that he had not originally declared in 2002, but that he acknowledged after being confronted with the fact.

[29] The following is a summary of the amendments brought on February 7, 2005:

[30] At paragraphs 29 and 30 of her affidavit, Appeal Book, volume 2, pages 304 and 305, Mrs. Charlton stated the following with respect to some of these amendments:

I have reviewed the affidavit sworn by the Applicant on March 14, 2005 and filed in the within proceeding (the "Affidavit"). I note that Exhibit "35" to the Affidavit consists of "Notices of Amendment" dated February 7, 2005 sent by the Applicant to the Chief of Appeals of the CRA's International TSO in Ottawa in respect of his 1994 through 2001 taxation years. In each Notice of Amendment, the Applicant requests that the CRA reduce his previously filed gross professional income and increase employment income received from Found Money Inc. By my calculation, the Applicant now claims he received a total of $866,415 in employment income from Found Money Inc. In the T1 returns filed on August 12, 2002, as described in paragraph 5 above, the Applicant claimed no employment income from Found Money Inc. or from any other source.

In the Notice of Amendment dated February 7, 2005 for the 1994 taxation year found at Exhibit "35" to the Affidavit, the Applicant acknowledges the sale of 12,125 shares of Rothwell Corporation Class A common stock, where no such sale had been acknowledged in his T1 return filed for 1994 on August 12, 2002. In the Notice of Amendment dated February 7, 2005 for the 1995 taxation year found at Exhibit "35" to the Affidavit, the Applicant acknowledges the sale of his beneficial interest in the Trust that owns Found Money Inc. resulting in a capital gain of $449,700 for that year, where no such sale or gain had been acknowledged in his T1 return filed for 1995 on August 12, 2002.
[31] In assessing the reasonableness of the third level decision, the judge did not consider the amendments brought by the appellant because they occurred after the third level decision and, therefore, were not part of the CRA's record at that time. I think she made the right decision in this respect.
[32] However, I am now referring to them for two reasons. First, to show the amount of undeclared income received by the appellant from Found Money Inc. and the Trust that owned Found Money Inc. and to show how material these omissions to declare were. Second, to point out that, even if we were to accept the appellant's argument that the third level decision is flawed and order a new revision on the completeness of the appellant's disclosure in his 2002 income tax and GST returns, this new decision would be the same as those rendered by the three levels of review. To use professor Wade's words in Administrative Law (6th ed. 1988) at page 535, "the demerits of the claim are such that it would in any case be hopeless" if the matter were returned for a new review: see for example Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. v. Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 202, at page 228; Vezina v. Attorney General of Canada, 2003 FCA 67, at paragraph 7; Uniboard Surfaces Inc. v. Kronotex Fussboden GmbH, 2006 FCA 398; Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development v. Hogervorst, supra; Yassine v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1994] F.C.J. No. 949 (FCA), at paragraph 9; and Cartier v. Procureur general du Canada (Ministre du Revenu national), 2003 FCA 67, at paragraph 7.
[33] The issue of the extent of the appellant's actual disclosure involved a question of fact. The judge found that the third level decision was not only reasonable, but was also correct on the record before the decision maker: see reasons for judgment, at paragraphs 122 and 130. I see no overriding and palpable error in the judge's finding.
[34] Finally, on more than one occasion, the judge found the appellant not credible and inconsistent in his assertions regarding the extent of his disclosure in his 2002 income tax and GST returns: see for example paragraphs 83, 84, 85, 127 and 128. In these last two paragraphs she wrote:
[127] During the hearing, Mr. Palonek was insistent that all of his sources of income were fully disclosed to the Agency in the tax returns that he filed in August of 2002. According to Mr. Palonek, the only debate was as to whether he should be claiming as an employee or as an independent contractor.
[128] First of all, the evidence before this Court does not support Mr. Palonek's submissions in this regard. In addition, it is difficult to understand how Mr. Palonek can assert that all income was properly disclosed to the Agency in August of 2002, given his equally emphatic insistence that he had not prepared the tax returns in question, never signed them, and had no knowledge as to their contents.
[Emphasis added]
She had the benefit of seeing and hearing the appellant. She made a credibility assessment that this Court is not in a position to second guess.

Digitized by Google

CONCLUSION
[35] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Peter Livaditis v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2012 FCA 55, Appeal of Judicial Review of Refusal of VDP Acceptance

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT
(Delivered from the Bench at Calgary, Alberta, on February 15, 2012)

TRUDEL J.A.

[1] Mr. Livaditis (the appellant) unsuccessfully applied to the Minister of National Revenue (or the Minister's Delegate) for relief under the Voluntary Disclosures Program (VDP) seeking relief from penalty and interest with respect to a previously undisclosed capital gain for the 2006 taxation year. His request was denied at the second level by the Minister's Delegate because "enforcement was taken on the account prior to the disclosure" (decision of the Minister's Delegate, appeal book at page 107).

[2] The appellant's ensuing application for judicial review was dismissed by the Federal Court (2010 FC 950).

[3] In his reasons, the Federal Court Judge (the Applications Judge) reviewed the impugned administrative decision in light of the two following questions addressed by the Minister's Delegate (VDP Second Review Report, appeal book at page 153) :

> 1) Was any direct contact by a CRA employee, other authority or administration, for any reason relating to non-compliance (e.g. unfiled returns, audit, collection issues) made with the taxpayer or is the taxpayer likely to have been aware of the enforcement action?
> 2) Was any enforcement action initiated against a person associated with, or related to, the taxpayer or a third party, where the enforcement action is sufficiently related to the present disclosure and is likely to have uncovered the information being disclosed?

[4] These questions stem from Circular IC00-1R2 with respect to the VDP and the VDP Guidelines 2008-06, June 2008, which lists the four conditions to be met for a disclosure to be qualified as valid, the first one being that it must be voluntary in the sense that both questions above must be answered in the negative. Whether the disclosure was voluntary is the sole issue surrounding the disclosure made by the appellant.

[5] To dispose of this appeal, few facts are needed. Suffice to know that the appellant was the President of LaCaille Fifth Avenue Inc. (LaCaille), a company whose business included a new residential condominium project (Five West). In 2003, before construction began, the appellant and four of his family members personally acquired condominium units in the Five West project. In 2006, prior to the completion of the project, they resold these units for a gain. The appellant realized a capital gain that went unreported.

Digitized by Google

[6] On August 26, 2008, the Minister of National Revenue sought from the Federal Court an Order ex parte in order to impose on LaCaille a Requirement to Provide Information and Documents (the Requirement) pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) and subsection 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 relating to a group of unnamed persons. The purpose of this Requirement was to verify tax compliance by purchasers of units in the Five West project.

[8] Meanwhile, on October 28, 2008, the appellant received a phone call from a representative of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA). As the appellant recollects it, the conversation was "very brief and general" and served to inform him that the CRA sought a meeting to gather "information pertaining to purchasers who may have acquired condominium units in the Five West project" (appellant's affidavit, appeal book at page 28). The respondent's recollection of the same conversation is said to be somewhat inconsistent but could reasonably be considered only to be more detailed (see VDP Second Review Report, appeal book at pages 150 and f.).

[9] In an event, the telephone conversation between the CRA's representative and the appellant was followed on October 31 by a no-name disclosure for income tax purposes for the 2006 taxation year wherein the unnamed person, later identified as being the appellant, stated that he was "not aware of any audit or enforcement measure being conducted on matters specifically involving the disposition at the time of this letter". Therefore, the appellant asserted that the disclosure was voluntary.

[10] As already stated, the Minister's Delegate disagreed. So did the Applications Judge who partially agreed with the Minister's Delegate.

[11] The Minister's Delegate answered favourably both questions mentioned above. On the first one, he concluded that as a result of the October 28, 2008 telephone conversation, the appellant was fully aware of the information sought by the CRA and how "it would uncover that [the appellant] and members of his family did not report any income resulting from the sales of condos in [the Five West project]" (VDP Second Level Report, appeal book at page 153).

[12] The Applications Judge held that this finding was unreasonable because the Minister's Delegate had failed to provide a rationale for accepting the CRA representative's account of the telephone conversation rather than that of the appellant (Applications Judge's reasons at paragraphs 29 and 32). We respectfully disagree with the Applications Judge for reasons given later.

[13] On the second question, the Applications Judge found that it was reasonable for the Minister's Delegate to have found that the Requirement constituted an enforcement action as this second ground for finding the disclosure not voluntary did not require that the appellant be aware of the existence of an enforcement action. The appellant strongly opposes this conclusion. However, we need not comment on this statement to dispose of this appeal and decline to do so.

[14] We are all of the view that the evidence on record supported the conclusion of the Minister's Delegate as to the appellant's awareness on October 28 of an enforcement action set to be conducted by the CRA with respect to the information being disclosed. There existed a reasonable basis upon which the Minister's Delegate could have decided as he did and this Court will not interfere (Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. Alberta Teachers' Association, 2011 SCC 61).

[15] In conclusion, we agree with the judgment under appeal. Therefore, the appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Application

¶ 1. This information circular cancels and replaces Information Circular 00-1R, Voluntary Disclosures Program, dated September 30, 2002.

¶ 2. In this information circular, the term "taxpayer" includes an individual, an employer, a corporation, a partnership, a trust, a Goods and Services Tax/Harmonized Sales Tax (GST/HST) registrant/claimant or a registered exporter of softwood lumber products.

¶ 3. Unless otherwise specified, all legislative references in this information circular refer to the Income Tax Act (ITA), the Excise Tax Act (ETA), the Excise Act, 2001 (EA, 2001), the Air Travellers Security Charge Act (ATSCA), or the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 (SLPECA), and any other acts administered by the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA).

Digitized by Google

Introduction

¶ 4. The purpose of this information circular is to provide information about the CRA's Voluntary Disclosures Program (VDP). Taxpayers can make disclosures to correct inaccurate or incomplete information, or to disclose information not previously reported. For example, taxpayers may not have met their tax obligations if they claimed ineligible expenses, failed to remit source deductions or the GST/HST, or did not file an information return.

¶ 5. This information circular provides information on the discretionary authority of the Minister of National Revenue (Minister) under the ITA, the ETA, the EA, 2001, as well as the ATSCA and the SLPECA to grant relief to taxpayers in accordance with specific legislative provisions. It also explains how a taxpayer may make a disclosure, including the proper information and documentation needed to support such a disclosure. In addition, it outlines the administrative guidelines the CRA will follow in making a decision whether to accept the disclosure as valid.

¶ 6. The VDP applies to disclosures for income tax, excise tax, excise duties under the EA, 2001, source deductions, GST/HST, as well as charges under the ATSCA and SLPECA.

¶ 7. The information provided on the VDP process is only a guideline, is not intended to be exhaustive, and is not meant to restrict the spirit or intent of the legislation.

Principles of the VDP

¶ 8. The VDP promotes compliance with Canada's tax laws by encouraging taxpayers to voluntarily come forward and correct previous omissions in their dealings with the CRA. Taxpayers who make a valid disclosure will have to pay the taxes or charges plus interest, without penalty or prosecution that the taxpayer would otherwise be subject to under the acts noted above.

¶ 9. The VDP is not intended to serve as a vehicle for taxpayers to intentionally avoid their legal obligations under the acts administered by the CRA.

Legislation

¶ 10. The CRA has the legislative authority to provide relief for valid disclosures in accordance with the following legislative provisions:

subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA, section 88 and section 281.1 of the ETA, section 173 and section 255.1 of the EA, 2001, section 30 and section 55 of the ATSCA, and section 37 of the SLPECA.

Relief Provided Under the VDP

Penalty Relief

¶ 11. If the CRA accepts a disclosure as having met the conditions set out in this policy, it will be considered a valid disclosure and the taxpayer will not be charged penalties or prosecuted with respect to the disclosure.

Interest Relief

¶ 12. In addition to penalty relief, if a disclosure is accepted as valid by the CRA, the Minister may grant partial relief in the application of interest against a taxpayer in respect of assessments for years or reporting periods preceding the three most recent years of returns required to be filed.

Limitation Period on Discretion for Relief of Penalties and Interest

¶ 13. For income tax submissions made on or after January 1, 2005, the Minister's ability to grant relief is limited to any taxation year (or fiscal period in the case of a partnership) that ended within the previous 10 years before the calendar year in which the submission is filed. For example: in an income tax submission made on May 1, 2007, the limitation would apply so that relief would only be available for the 1997 and subsequent taxation years.

¶ 14. Unless a submission was filed before the 10-year limitation rule coming into effect on January 1, 2005, submissions filed for the 1985 to 1994 tax years will not be accepted.

¶ 15. For GST/HST, excise tax and the SLPECA, the limitation pertains to submissions made on or after April 1, 2007 and is for reporting periods that ended within the previous 10-year period.

Digitized by Google

Similarly, for duties under the EA, 2001, the limitation applies to submissions made on or after April 1, 2007 and is for fiscal months that ended within the previous 10-year period.

¶ 16. For submissions under the ATSCA, the Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the fiscal month of a person, waive or reduce interest, or waive or cancel penalties, payable by the person.

¶ 17. The Minister does not have to grant relief under the VDP provisions. Each request will be reviewed and decided on it's own merit. If relief is denied or partly granted, the CRA will provide the taxpayer with an explanation of the reasons and factors for the decision.

Circumstances Under Which VDP Relief May be Granted

¶ 18. Relief from penalty and prosecution, as provided for under the VDP, may be considered if a taxpayer:

failed to fulfill their obligations under the applicable act, failed to report any taxable income they received, claimed ineligible expenses on a tax return, failed to remit source deductions of their employees, failed to report an amount of GST/HST, (which may include undisclosed liabilities or improperly claimed refunds or rebates, unpaid tax or net tax from a previous reporting period), failed to file information returns, and failed to report foreign sourced income that is taxable in Canada.

Circumstances Under Which VDP Relief Will Not be Considered

¶ 19. The following, lists examples of circumstances that would not be considered under the VDP policy:

income tax returns with no taxes owing or with refunds expected; these would be handled using normal processing procedures.

"elections"; there are provisions within the various acts administered by the CRA which entitle taxpayers to choose or "elect" specific treatment of certain tax transactions, e.g. section 216 returns under the ITA.

"advance pricing arrangement"; this is an agreement between the Minister of National Revenue and a taxpayer that covers certain tax transactions between the taxpayer and a non-resident entity. The agreement confirms an appropriate transfer pricing methodology, in advance, and its application to specific transactions for a specified time frame using certain terms and conditions. See IC 94-4, International Transfer Pricing: Advance Pricing Arrangements (APAs) for further information.

"rollover provisions"; as election provisions, these allow a taxpayer to defer income amounts that would otherwise arise on the transfer of property to a taxable Canadian corporation. See IC 76-19, Transfer of Property to a Corporation Under Section 85 for further information.

"bankruptcy returns"; these returns are required to be filed by the taxpayer in the year of bankruptcy.

post-assessment requests for penalty and interest relief: these requests will be considered as retroactive tax planning.

¶ 20. If the VDP is not applicable to a taxpayer's particular tax situation, relief may be requested in accordance with the taxpayer relief provisions as described in IC 07-1, Taxpayer Relief Provisions.

¶ 21. For information on requesting relief from penalty and interest with respect to GST/HST see GST/HST Memorandum G500-3-2-1, Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest. Each of the above-referenced documents is available from any Tax Services Office (TSO) and from the CRA website at www.cra-arc.gc.ca.

Disclosure Methods

¶ 22. Disclosures may be submitted to a TSO using either of the two methods described below (Named or No-Name). Each method includes the same consideration and review of all relevant information, however it is the timing of the identification of the taxpayer that differs in these two methods.

Digitized by Google

¶ 23. A submission must be made in writing, and may be mailed or faxed to the TSO that has jurisdiction over the area where the taxpayer resides. For businesses, this would be based on their operating address. Information as described in paragraphs ¶ 43 to ¶ 45 must be included in the submission. See also "Where to Make a Disclosure".

¶ 24. There may be circumstances where the taxpayer cannot immediately submit all of the information or documentation for the disclosure. In these circumstances the CRA may allow the taxpayer a period of time to submit such information in order to complete the disclosure submission. Normally this period of time is no more than 90 days from the effective date of disclosure (EDD) (paragraphs ¶ 50 to ¶ 54).

"Named" Disclosure Method

¶ 25. A "named" disclosure is a disclosure in which the identification of the taxpayer is stated on the initial disclosure submission.

"No-Name" Disclosure Method

¶ 26. Taxpayers who are unsure they want to proceed with a disclosure are given an opportunity to participate in preliminary discussions about their situation on a "no-name" basis. These discussions with a VDP officer are informal, non-binding, and general in nature and are done before the identity of the taxpayer is revealed. They are for the benefit of the taxpayer and are intended to provide insight into the VDP process, a better understanding of the risks involved in remaining non-compliant, and the relief available under the VDP.

¶ 27. Based on the preliminary information provided by the taxpayer as described in paragraph ¶ 44, the VDP officer may confirm that there is nothing set out in the information provided that may immediately disqualify the taxpayer from further consideration under the VDP. If all the required information for a complete disclosure, except for the identity of the taxpayer, has been submitted, the CRA can also review, upon request, this preliminary information and advise, without prejudice, on the possible tax implications of the disclosure. This advice is based on the facts as submitted on a no-name basis. If there is any discrepancy between the information that is provided and the information that is verified once the taxpayer is identified, this preliminary advice may be invalidated.

¶ 28. The CRA can undertake to provide a final and determinative decision on a no-name disclosure only after the identity of the taxpayer is known and all facts of the disclosure, in respect to the four validity conditions (paragraphs ¶ 31to ¶ 42), have been verified. In these circumstances, the identity of the taxpayer must be provided within 90 days of the EDD (paragraphs ¶ 50 to 54). There will be no extensions to the timeframe for providing the identity of the taxpayer.

¶ 29. In the event a taxpayer had previously put forward a no-name disclosure, a subsequent no-name disclosure for the same information and taxpayer, will not be considered. In order for the taxpayer to then make use of the VDP, they must identify themselves.

¶ 30. The taxpayer may decide not to proceed with the no-name disclosure. They would then, however, remain at risk of the CRA finding the omission and assessing the applicable tax or charge, penalty and interest, in addition to possible criminal investigation and prosecution.

Conditions of a Valid Disclosure

¶ 31. A disclosure must meet the following four conditions in order to qualify as a valid disclosure:

i) Voluntary

¶ 32. A disclosure will not qualify as a valid disclosure, subject to the exceptions in paragraph 34, under the "voluntary" condition if the CRA determines:

the taxpayer was aware of, or had knowledge of an audit, investigation or other enforcement action set to be conducted by the CRA or any other authority or administration, with respect to the information being disclosed to the CRA, or enforcement action relating to the disclosure was initiated by the CRA or any other authority or administration on the taxpayer, or on a person associated with, or related to the taxpayer (this includes, but is not restricted to, corporations, shareholders, spouses and partners), or on a third party, where the purpose and impact of the enforcement action against the third party is sufficiently related to the present disclosure, and the enforcement action is likely to have uncovered the information being disclosed.

¶ 33. For purposes of the VDP, an “enforcement action” may include, but is not limited to:
requests, demands or requirements issued by the CRA, relating to unfiled returns, unremitted taxes/ instalments, deductions required at source or non-registrants; (although the aforementioned actions may only pertain to one specific year or reporting period, the procedure will be considered to be an enforcement action, for purposes of the VDP, for all taxation years or reporting periods).
For example: a taxpayer has not complied with their filing requirement for the 2002 through 2005 taxation years. Upon determining that the taxpayer was required to file tax returns, the CRA issued a “request-to-file” (Form TX11). The CRA request, requiring the taxpayer to file the 2003 tax return, is mailed to the taxpayer on July 20, 2006. On August 15, 2006, the taxpayer makes a disclosure and submits all of the tax returns (2002-2005), correctly prepared with all supporting documentation, etc. The CRA request-to-file is an enforcement action relating to all unfiled returns for that taxpayer. Although the request-to-file was for the 2003 taxation year, the disclosure would be denied because the taxpayer did not voluntarily come forward to file the other returns before the CRA undertook enforcement action; requests, demands or requirements which have been issued with reference to other tax accounts of the taxpayer, partners of the taxpayer or corporations associated with or related to the taxpayer; direct contact by a CRA employee for any reason relating to non-compliance (e.g. unfiled returns, audit, collection issues); and/or an audit, investigation or other enforcement action by another authority or administration, such as, but not limited to, a police force, securities commission or provincial authority.
¶ 34. Not all CRA initiated enforcement action may be cause for a disclosure to be denied by the CRA. Examples of this include: a recent audit of a taxpayer was related to a source deductions (payroll) issue. The same taxpayer is submitting a disclosure for an amount of GST/HST, which was collected but not remitted to the CRA as required. There may be no correlation between these two taxation issues and as such, the enforcement action on the payroll account may not be cause to deny the GST/HST disclosure, or a large corporation may be under CRA audit but the information being disclosed is not part of the audit protocol.

ii) Complete

¶ 35. The taxpayer must provide full and accurate facts and documentation for all taxation years or reporting periods where there was previously inaccurate, incomplete or unreported information relating to any and all tax accounts with which the taxpayer is associated. While the disclosure is being evaluated by the CRA, the VDP officer may request additional specific documentation in order to verify certain details such as revenue amounts being disclosed, tax credits being applied for, or expenses being claimed. The taxpayer must comply with such requests within the stipulated timeframes (see paragraphs ¶ 50 to ¶ 54), and provide sufficient detail to allow all of the facts of the case to be verified. Additional information on requirements for maintaining books and records can be found in the current version of IC 78-10, Books and Records Retention/ Destruction, for Income Tax, and for GST/HST, in GST/HST Memorandum 15-1, General Requirements for Books and Records (Revised June 2005), for Excise Duties, in Excise Duties Memorandum 9.1.1, General Requirements for Books and Records, and for Excise Taxes, in Excise Taxes and Special Levies Memorandum X6-1 - Books and Records.
¶ 36. Due to the nature of a particular disclosure, referrals to other programs within the CRA may be considered necessary in order to fully analyze the disclosure.
¶ 37. While the information provided in a disclosure must be complete, the disclosure may not be disqualified simply because it contains minor errors or omissions. Each submission will be reviewed on it's own merits.

iii) Penalty

¶ 38. A disclosure must involve the application, or potential application of a penalty. The penalty type may be a late filing penalty, a failure to remit penalty, an instalment penalty, or a discretionary penalty, such as an omission penalty or a gross negligence penalty. In the event a penalty does not apply, the taxpayer cannot seek relief through the VDP. However, the disclosed information should still be submitted and it will be handled through the CRA's normal processing procedures.

iv) One Year Past Due

¶ 39. The disclosure must include information that is:

(i) at least one year past due, or

(ii) less than one year past due where the disclosure is to correct a previously filed return or where the disclosure contains information that also meets the condition of subparagraph (i) above.

¶ 40. For example, a taxpayer had not filed tax returns for the years 2000 to 2004. On November 10, 2005, the taxpayer submitted all of the tax returns requesting they be considered under the VDP. Although the 2004 tax return is less than one year past due (filing deadline of April 30, 2005) the CRA will consider the 2004 return as part of this disclosure, provided that all other conditions have been met.

¶ 41. In contrast, the 2004 tax return would not be considered for VDP treatment if it were the only return being filed. In that case, the 2004 return would be handled through the CRA's normal processing procedures.

¶ 42. The intent of sub-paragraph 39(ii) noted above, is to allow the timely correction of previously filed returns and to allow the inclusion of unfiled returns (less than one year past due) only when they are part of a disclosure submission that includes information or unfiled returns that meet the condition in sub-paragraph ¶ 39(i).

Making a Disclosure – Information/Documentation Required

¶ 43. Taxpayers must send in a written submission to make a disclosure. Form RC199, Taxpayer Agreement should be used to initiate the disclosure. A copy of this form is available on the CRA's website at: www.cra-arc.gc.ca. Failure to use Form RC199 or to provide similar information as per Form RC199, may delay the review of the disclosure.

¶ 44. In order to support a disclosure submission, the following information pertaining to the taxpayer's situation must be submitted:

the name, address, telephone number, social insurance number, partnership number, trust account number, business number, license number, GST/HST registration number or any other identification tax number assigned by the CRA to the taxpayer, if a no-name disclosure, this information would not be required;

the taxpayer's postal code,

if a no-name disclosure, only include the first three characters of the taxpayer's postal code (used to determine the TSO that will be responsible for the file);

the address of the taxpayer's authorized representative, including telephone and fax numbers (if applicable);

gender and age (if an individual and involves a no-name disclosure);

the taxation year(s), reporting period(s) or fiscal period(s) involved in the disclosure; amount of the disclosure (where applicable);

type of information return(s) and/or slip(s) involved (e.g. T3, T4, T1134, T1135) (if applicable); type of omission (business income, unremitted GST/HST, investment income, pension income, capital gain, etc.);

reason for the omission; primary business activity, and an explanation of how the taxpayer considers that each of the four validity conditions (paragraphs ¶ 31 to ¶ 42) have been met.

Digitized by Google

¶ 45. Each disclosure submission must include enough detail to allow for verification of the facts. Taxpayers and/or their authorized representatives are expected to make all documents, records, and books of account, as well as any other required information, available upon request.

A Second Disclosure by the Same Taxpayer

¶ 46. Taxpayers are expected to remain compliant after using the VDP. Under normal circumstances, a taxpayer is entitled to utilize the benefits of the VDP only one time. A second disclosure for the same taxpayer may be considered by the CRA if the circumstances surrounding the second disclosure are beyond the taxpayer's control. At the time of making a second disclosure, a taxpayer must provide their name and specify that they had previously made a disclosure. If it is discovered during the course of the disclosure review that the taxpayer had previously made a disclosure and the taxpayer has not disclosed this fact, the CRA may deem the disclosure to be invalid for VDP purposes. If the second disclosure is for the same issue that was previously denied as incomplete due to information not being received by the stipulated date, then the second disclosure will be denied.

Authorization of a Taxpayer's Representative

¶ 47. The taxpayer's authorized representative can make the disclosure. The taxpayer must grant proper authorization to the representative by submitting a signed copy of the appropriate authorization form.

For individuals (income tax matters), submit form T1013, Authorizing or Cancelling a Representative.

For all business entities (all busines program accounts), submit form RC59, Business Consent Form.

For matters pertaining to Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance disclosures, submit form CPT139, CPP/EI - Authorizing or Cancelling a Representative.

¶ 48. The CRA cannot discuss any confidential information with a representative prior to receiving the appropriate authorization.

¶ 49. When a taxpayer's authorized representative makes a disclosure, the written authorization should be attached to that submission. In the case of a no-name disclosure, the authorization should be presented at the same time the identification of the taxpayer is provided.

The Effective Date of a Disclosure (EDD)

¶ 50. The EDD is the earlier of:

the date the CRA receives a completed and signed form RC199, Taxpayer Agreement, or the date a letter, signed by the taxpayer or the taxpayer's authorized representative and containing similar information (see paragraphs ¶ 43 to ¶ 45) to Form RC199, is received by the CRA.

¶ 51. From this date, provided that the disclosure meets the four validity conditions, the taxpayer is granted protection against penalties and possible prosecution, regarding the amounts included in the disclosure.

¶ 52. If necessary, the taxpayer may have up to 90 days from the EDD for the submission of additional relevant information and/or documentation that may be required to complete the disclosure.

¶ 53. If this time frame is not sufficient due to the complexity of the disclosure or other extraordinary circumstances, the Assistant Director, Enforcement Division of the TSO, may authorize an extension of this period, upon receipt of a written request from the taxpayer. The additional information must be provided within the stipulated time frame. However, an extension will not be granted to the 90-day time frame to provide the taxpayer's identity under the no-name disclosure method.

¶ 54. If the additional information and/or documentation is not received within the stipulated time frame:

in the case of a named disclosure, the CRA may commence enforcement action wherein penalties and interest are applicable and prosecution may be initiated, or in the case of a no-name disclosure, the file will be closed. The taxpayer could then be subject to full penalties, interest and possible prosecution.

Where to Make a Disclosure

¶ 55. The detailed disclosure submission should be forwarded to the Assistant Director, Enforcement Division of the TSO that has jurisdiction over the area where the taxpayer resides. For businesses, this would be based on their operating address. To locate your TSO, please click on the following link, TSO, or consult the CRA website at: www.cra-arc.gc.ca. Under limited circumstances, a taxpayer may request to transfer a disclosure to another TSO. This type of request must be adequately justified in writing, and the decision on where the disclosure is reviewed will be at the discretion of the CRA.

Denial of a Disclosure Submission

¶ 56. If it is determined, after the VDP officer has completed evaluating the disclosure submission, that any of the four validity conditions have not been met; the taxpayer would then be advised in writing that:

the disclosure is being denied, the disclosed information may be referred to another CRA program area,
the disclosed information may result in an assessment or reassessment, penalties and interest may be levied, and in certain circumstances, an investigation and prosecution may be initiated.

Right of Redress for the Taxpayer

Second Administrative Review

¶ 57. There is no right of objection under the Acts mentioned in paragraph 3 of this information circular, for a taxpayer to dispute a discretionary decision that denied relief, or allowed only partial relief. However, if the taxpayer believes that the Minister has not exercised discretion in a fair and reasonable manner, the taxpayer may request in writing, that the Director of the TSO where the original decision was issued, review and reconsider the original decision. The taxpayer has the opportunity at that time to make additional representations for the CRA to consider. The CRA will not consider a request for a second review if a disclosure was denied because the information was not previously submitted within the stipulated time frame.

¶ 58. The Director may designate a delegated authority, not involved in the previous review and decision, to carry out the second administrative review on their behalf.

Judicial Review

¶ 59. Where a taxpayer does not believe the Minister exercised discretion in a fair and reasonable manner, the taxpayer may make an application to the Federal Court for a judicial review of the Minister's discretionary decision, pursuant to section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, within 30 days from the date the notification of the decision was communicated to the taxpayer.

¶ 60. To request a judicial review, the taxpayer must send a completed Form 301, Notice of Application, with the appropriate filing fee, to the registrar of the Federal Court. For more information on how to file an application for judicial review or other general enquiries, contact the Courts Administration Service at 613-992-4238, or access their website at www.cas-satj.gc.ca.

¶ 61. If the Federal Court is of the view that the Minister's discretion was not properly exercised, the Court will generally not substitute the Minister's decision but rather, will refer the request back to the CRA for reconsideration.

¶ 62. As a general rule, taxpayers should request a second administrative review from the CRA before filing an application for a judicial review with the Federal Court.

Notice of Objection

¶ 63. In the event the taxpayer's disclosure resulted in an assessment or reassessment to which the taxpayer disagrees, the taxpayer is entitled to file a Notice of Objection to the assessment or reassessment. The Notice should be addressed to the Chief of Appeals in the taxpayer's TSO.

Fairness Applications

If you fail to perform your obligations under the ITA that result in a penalty or interest charged on any balance you owe you may be entitled to request a Fairness Application whereby CRA officials will evaluate your circumstances to see if they can grant you relief. The Act requires application of the penalties/interest, statutorily, there is no discretion, but, equally, within finely described circumstances, our fiscal legislators do recognize that not everyone can actually abide by the ITA and thus the introduction and use of the fairness provisions therein. It should be noted that Sec. 220(2) applies only to interest and penalties and NOT the underlying tax that is payable.

The basic criteria in order for the provisions to apply must include at least one of the following:

- natural or man-made disasters such as, flood or fire;
- civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike;
- a serious illness or accident; or
- serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family,
- actions of the CRA
- inability to pay or financial hardship.

The Minister's representative can only make a valid determination on whether a taxpayer's file requires a favourable exercise if there has been sufficient evidence placed before them to make it. In other words, one would definitely want to make sure that all of the facts are properly evidenced and submitted to the relevant CRA party along with form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief find following at the time of request. There have been numerous cases where the Fed. Ct. on a review held that there was insufficiency of evidence in the Minister's hands that warranted them coming to conclusion that they did.

(3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

Late, amended or revoked elections

(3.2) The Minister may extend the time for making an election or grant permission to amend or revoke an election if

> (a) the election was otherwise required to be made by a taxpayer or by a partnership, under a prescribed provision, on or before a day in a taxation year of the taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership); and
> (b) the taxpayer or the partnership applies, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the taxation year or the fiscal period, to the Minister for that extension or permission.

Date of late election, amended election or revocation

(3.3) Where, under subsection 220(3.2), the Minister has extended the time for making an election or granted permission to amend or revoke an election,

> (a) the election or the amended election, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have been made on the day on or before which the election was otherwise required to be made and in the manner in which the election was otherwise required to be made, and, in the case of an amendment to an election, that election shall be deemed, otherwise than for the purposes of this section, never to have been made; and (b) the election that was revoked shall be deemed, otherwise than for the purposes of this section, never to have been made.

The below Information Circular details CRA's position on how they apply the rules.

Unfortunately, taxpayers can sometimes think that they are entitled to their version of the Act and there has been substantial litigation, via Federal Court Rule 18.1 review of an administrative decision, of when they were disenfranchised from relief. I have broken them down by basis by which they were contested and I observe that there was a small chance of success in the Court's eyes, in all cases so far.

A Discretionary Decision Only, The Law Otherwise Applies

The Fairness Decision is only discretionary, it allows the Minister to all "an out" in very extra-ordinary circumstances listed in the Information Circular below. In all cases, the rest of the Act in its entirty applies to arbitrarily determine the results. This was fully pronounced In Sandeep Kapil V Canada Revenue Agency And Attorney General Of Canada[16] where the Trial Ct. held:

> [20] As a matter of law, this Court does not have the jurisdiction to order the Minister to waive taxes, penalties, and arrears interest. The jurisdiction of the Court is limited to ordering the Minister to substantively reconsider his decisions not to waive the taxes and related interest and penalties. The applicant must understand, therefore, that even if this Court had found in his favour, he would not automatically be entitled to a waiver and refund of his money. This Court's review is confined to an analysis of whether the Minister's exercise of discretion in refusing the waiver requests was lawful, not to substitute its decision for that of the Minister: Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 SCR 339.
> [21] In order succeed in this application for judicial review it is necessary for the applicant to demonstrate that the Minister, when exercising his discretion, committed a reviewable error when he refused the applicant's application for a waiver of (a) tax; and (b) late-filing penalties and arrears interest. The applicant advances three arguments in support of setting aside the decisions; first, that he made reasonable errors; second, he acted with due diligence and took steps to remove the excess contributions; and third, that he relied on CRA advice.
> [32] The scope of the discretion accorded the Minister was considered in Jenkins v Canada (Revenue), 2007 FC 295, Justice Pierre Blais held at para 13:
> …it is important to keep in mind that the power of the Minister, as set out in subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, is a discretionary power and as such, there is no obligation on the part of the Minister to reach any given conclusion. Furthermore, the liability of a taxpayer to pay penalties and interests for the late filing of income tax returns results from the application of the Act itself, not from any discretionary decision of the Minister to impose such penalties and interests. Therefore, the discretionary power of the Minister is limited to providing exceptional relief from the operation of the Act, where the Minister believes such relief to be warranted.

[16] 2011 FC 1373

Digitized by Google

[33] The penalty and arrears interest were imposed as a matter of law, by operation of the ITA. Moreover, the nature of the relief itself is limited to exceptional situations in which the Minister believes is warranted." Thus, even though the Manual states that a reasonable error may be the product of incorrect information provided to the taxpayer; Gagné, the Minister is not obligated to make such a finding. In any event, I have not found a reasonable error to have been made.

Inability to Pay or Financial Hardship

In Sam Goldmaker v. MNR[17], on a review, the Federal Trial Court held:

[5] In Kaiser v. The Minister of National Revenue (1995), 95 D.T.C. 5187 (F.C.T.D.), Mr. Justice Rouleau of this Court commented on the purpose of section 220(3.1) at page 5188 as follows:

The purpose of this legislative provision is to allow Revenue Canada, Taxation, to administer the tax system more fairly, by allowing for the application of common sense in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, are unable to meet deadlines or comply with rules under the tax system. The language used in the section bestows a wide discretion on the Minister to waive or cancel interest at any time. To assist in the exercise of that discretion, policy guidelines have been formulated and are set out Information Circular 92-2.

[8] The scope of judicial review in relation to a Ministerial decision, made in the exercise of discretion, is limited to reviewing whether the Minister has properly exercised his discretion, with regard for relevant considerations and without regard to extraneous factors. The standard of review of discretionary decisions in the context of section 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act was addressed by Mr. Justice Rouleau in Kaiser v. Minister of National Revenue, supra, as follows:

The jurisprudence has established the standard to be employed by the courts when called upon to review the exercise of a discretionary power such as the one in question here. In Re Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. and Government of Canada et al (1982), 137 D.L.R. (3d) 558 (S.C.C.), McIntyre, J. stated at p. 562:

In construing statutes such as those under consideration in this appeal, which provide for far-reaching and frequently complicated administrative schemes, the judicial approach should be to endeavour within the scope of the legislation to give effect to its provisions so that the administrative agencies created may function effectively, as the legislation intended. In my view, in dealing with legislation of this nature, the courts should, wherever possible, avoid a narrow, technical construction, and endeavour to make effective the legislative intent as applied to the administrative scheme involved*. It is, as well, a clearly-established rule that courts should not interfere with the exercise of a discretion by a statutory authority merely because the court might have exercised the discretion in a different manner had it been charged with that responsibility. Where the statutory discretion has been exercised in good faith and, where required, in*accordance with the principles of natural justice, and where reliance has not been placed upon considerations irrelevant or extraneous to the statutory purpose, the courts should not interfere.

[9] I am unable to conclude, based on the facts presented, that the Minister improperly exercised his discretion in the present case. The applicant"s contention that he was not given an opportunity to present his case is not substantiated on the evidence. On the contrary, the record shows that the applicant was given full opportunity to present evidence concerning his present financial situation, including his income, expenses, assets and liabilities. The applicant was given the opportunity to make representations as to why the interest should be waived and he argued before both the Minister and this court that he did not have the money to pay the interest. As an explanation for his inability to pay, Mr. Goldmaker offered a history of some unfortunate professional difficulties and problems in collecting accounts receivable. This history is set out in the affidavit filed as part of the applicant"s record.

Digitized by Google

[11] In the course of his submissions, the applicant submitted that he had understated his expenses. I note that upon a hearing in a judicial review proceeding, it is not open to an applicant to introduce unsworn evidence. In any event, the submissions of the applicant in this case do not change my view that the Minister had given consideration to relevant matters, that is, the information presented by the applicant upon his initial request to the Minister for waiver of the outstanding interest. In my opinion, there was sufficient information before the Minister to justify the conclusion which was reached.

[12] I refer again to the decision of Mr. Justice Rouleau in Kaiser v. Minister of National Revenue, supra, where he says:

Absent bad faith on the part of the Minister, a breach of the principles of natural justice or consideration of extraneous or irrelevant factors, there is nothing to warrant the Court"s interference with the exercise of his discretion.

Necessities of Life and Financial Hardship

In Don And Linda Getson v. Attorney General Of Canada[18] the Fed. Ct. gave credence to a norm in evaluating whether a taxpayer was suffering from financial hardship to the extent of being deprived of basic necessities of life with a reference to the Minister's response:

Undue hardship for an individual person means causing the person unnecessary or oppressive suffering or privation, that is, not being able to meet basic family needs. It is apparent from the information that you provided, that you could rearrange your financial obligations in order to liquidate the debt in full.

The Ct. then went on to note, on $6,519.06 in taxes and $3,365.61 in arrears interest that:

[10] In Her Majesty the Queen v. Barbara L. Barron et al. (1997), 97 D.T.C. 5121 (F.C.A.), Pratte J.A. stated the applicable principles governing the review of the exercise of discretionary powers when he was dealing with an analogous provision of the Act concerned with the reopening of statute-barred taxation years; I consider these principles as applicable to the exercise of ministerial power under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. Justice Pratte said this at page 5122:

. . . it may be useful to recall that subsection 152(4.2) of the Income Tax Act confers a discretion on the Minister and that, when an application for judicial review is directed against a decision made in the exercise of a discretion, the reviewing court is not called upon to exercise the discretion conferred on the person who made the decision. The court may intervene and set aside the discretionary decision under review only if that decision was made in bad faith, if its author clearly ignored some relevant facts or took into consideration irrelevant facts or if the decision is contrary to law. [emphasis mine]

[11] In this case, the decision-maker examined Mr. & Mrs. Getson's average family income between 1995 and 1999 stating it to be $51,578 recognizing, however, that for them, 1998 was a poor year with total family income of $23,469. The decision-maker noted Mr. Getson, in 1999, received a Workers' Compensation Board payment of some $30,000 which was not taxable bringing his total net income for that year to $41,537. The applicants explained to me that this W.C.B. payment was a lump sum payment of a non-recurring nature. The decision-maker also noted Mrs. Getson's contributions to an R.R.S.P. between 1995 through 1999 including a contribution of $5,516 in 1999.

See also Charles Desjarins v. MNR[19] for a clear case of abuse under the Fairness application provision when the taxpayer had allowed a very large balance to accrue, never took concrete steps to pay it down while continuing to enjoy a higher income and was flatly denied a rewarding judicial review.

Célyne Laflamme v. Minister of National Revenue, 2008 FC 1403, An Instance Where the Taxpayer Did Suffer a Catastrophe

BETWEEN:
CÉLYNE LAFLAMME
Applicant
and
MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] This application for judicial review was filed by the applicant against a decision made on January 28, 2008 by Lucie Bergevin, Director of the Ottawa Tax Services Office of the Canada Revenue Agency. By that decision, the respondent refused to cancel the penalties and interest assessed against the applicant as a result of the late filing of the applicant's income tax returns for the years 2003, 2004 and 2005.

Factual Context

[2] The applicant was a nurse and was married with children. She lived with her husband in St. Albert, Ontario.

[3] At the time, by agreement between the spouses, the applicant looked after the house and children while her husband worked outside the home and handled household business, banking and tax returns.

[4] In 2002, a series of catastrophic events occurred. First, the applicant's husband died suddenly; her mother and father-in-law died the same year. The couple's youngest son became depressed and suicidal. The accountant who had handled their previous tax returns fell ill and died of cancer in 2005.

[5] In 2003, the basement of the couple's house was flooded and infested with rodents that made their way in. After 2002, with no income to live on, the applicant had to find a job, and had to change jobs three times between 2002 and 2005. All of those events and misfortunes caused the applicant to fall into a deep depression, and since 2002 she has been under the care of a psychiatrist and needs to take medication.

[6] The applicant's depression and inability to make the necessary decisions, and the loss of her accountant, prevented her from filing her 2003, 2004 and 2005 tax returns. In addition, she believed that because she had not earned taxable income she was not required to file tax returns.

[7] After the death of her husband, at the urging of the executor of her husband's estate, and with his assistance, she was able to have the tax returns for the years 1999 to 2002 prepared.

[8] It was not until 2007, when her sister France Laflamme came to help her, that she was able to collect the necessary documents and, with the help of a new accountant, was able to file the tax returns for the years 2003 to 2006 and pay the amounts owing, which came to $33,000 at that time. She then received an assessment totalling $13,005.02 in penalties and interest on arrears.

[19] 2011 FC 1490

[9] Since November 2007 she has been collecting employment insurance benefits for illness, given her psychological condition and inability to work outside the home.

[10] She applied for relief from that assessment based on these extraordinary circumstances and her deeply depressed condition. In support of her application for relief from the assessment, she cited the Canada Revenue Agency's "Taxpayer Relief Provisions". In brief, that circular provides that if a taxpayer falls victim to exceptional circumstances that prevent the taxpayer from satisfying his or her tax obligations, the Minister may grant relief. In spite of the applicant's letters explaining her health problems and requesting relief, Lucie Bergevin, acting on behalf of the Minister, denied the application, in her decision dated January 28, 2008, which reads as follows:

> [TRANSLATION] ... I have reviewed your application and I have determined that you failed to act quickly to remedy the delay and failed to meet your tax obligations in the past. As well, there was no error or delay on our part, nor were there circumstances beyond your control that might have prevented you from doing your accounting on time and as required. The penalty for late filing and interest on arrears are therefore upheld.

[11] The applicant is challenging that decision.

Standard of Review

[12] Ministerial discretion under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act), in relation to penalties and interest on arrears, is subject to the reasonableness standard when the issue is a question of fact or of mixed law and fact (see, inter alia, Lanno v. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, 2005 FCA 153, 334 N.R. 348; Kreklewich v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2007 FC 892, [2007] 5 C.T.C. 145; Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190).

Applicable Legislation

220. (3.1) The Minister may at any time waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by a taxpayer or partnership and, notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to 152(5), such assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made as is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.	220. (3.1) Le ministre peut, à tout moment, renoncer à tout ou partie de quelque pénalité ou intérêt payable par ailleurs par un contribuable ou une société de personne en application de la présente loi ou l'annuler en tout ou en partie. Malgré les paragraphes 152(4) à (5), le ministre établit les cotisations voulues concernant les intérêts et pénalités payables par le contribuable ou la société de personnes pour tenir compte de pareille annulation.

[14] The Canada Revenue Agency has adopted and published an information circular entitled "Taxpayer Relief Provisions", No. IC07-1, dated May 31, 2007. Sections 23 to 34 of that circular set out the circumstances in which an application may be made and the factors used in making a decision. The relevant sections are as follows:

> ¶23. The Minister may grant relief from the application of penalty and interest where the following types of situations exist and justify a taxpayer's inability to satisfy a tax obligation or requirement at issue:

(a) extraordinary circumstances;
(b) actions of the CRA;
(c) inability to pay or financial hardship.
¶24. The Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within the situations stated in ¶ 23.
¶25. Penalties and interest may be waived or cancelled in whole or in part where they result from circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control. Extraordinary circumstances that may have prevented a taxpayer from making a payment when due, filing a return on time, or otherwise complying with an obligation under the Act include, but are not limited to, the following examples:
(a) natural or man-made disasters such as, flood or fire;
(b) civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike;
(c) a serious illness or accident; or
(d) serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.
¶34. When an extraordinary event (e.g., natural disaster) has prevented a large number of taxpayers from meeting their tax obligations, the Minister may issue a news release to announce that special consideration will be given to providing relief, such as a waiver or cancellation of penalty and interest charges on late tax remittances or late filing of a return. In such cases, taxpayers need to make a request to get relief. CRA news releases on extraordinary events that qualify for relief can be found at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/newsroom/releases/menu-e.html.

[15] Section 23 provides that exceptional circumstances are the basis on which the Minister must exercise his discretion. Section 25 lists the situations that are considered to be exceptional circumstances, such as natural disasters (a flood), serious illness and serious emotional or mental distress (such as a death in the immediate family). Section 34 elaborates on the concept of an extraordinary event (for example, a natural disaster).

Analysis

[16] The facts established by the applicant were not disputed. They were also corroborated in the letter from Dr. Francine Pagé, psychiatrist, dated September 19, 2007, under whose care the applicant has been since 2002. She says that the applicant has experienced exceptional circumstances, both family-related and other, since 2002, that were beyond her control: the loss of people very close to her and the major stressful events that were added to that between 2002 and 2007.

[17] The directives set out in the circular are not part of the Act and are not necessarily binding on the Department (Lee v. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, 2005 FC 413). However, they are published by the Department to guide the Minister or his delegates. They were developed by the Department to guide it in the exercise of its discretion and enable it to manage the tax system more fairly, by allowing room for common sense to benefit taxpayers who have been victims of misfortune or circumstances beyond their control. Taxpayers in that situation are entitled to the benefit of those directives (Kaiser v. Minister of National Revenue (1995), 93 F.T.R. 66; Jim's Pizza (1980) Ltd. v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2007 FC 782, [2007] 5 C.T.C. 43; *Construction & Rénovation M. Dubeau Inc. v.

Canada Customs and Revenue Agency*, 2001 FCT 1139, 213 F.T.R. 94 [Dubeau]).

[18] The applicant submits that she is entitled to the benefit of the tax relief provisions quoted supra under both the Act and the principles of fairness, and the rights set out in the Charter of Taxpayer Rights. She argues that she was not in a normal psychological state, capable of making appropriate and timely decisions, having regard to the major depression she suffered as a result of a series of exceptional circumstances. Those multiple circumstances include three deaths of close family members, the depression and suicidal tendencies of her son, income problems and the damage to her house caused by flooding.

[19] The respondent argues that his decision was sound and reasonable because:

- the applicant failed to act quickly to remedy any delay;
- the applicant failed to meet all her tax obligations in the past;
- there were no circumstances beyond the applicant's control that might have prevented her from doing her accounting in a timely manner.

[20] The applicant replies:

- in the past, it was her husband who looked after filing tax returns;
- she could not have done anything before she had assistance from her sister, having regard to her deep depression;
- the circumstances explained earlier, which were not disputed, constitute exceptional circumstances under the Department's own directives, and she should have been given the benefit of those directives.

[21] The fundamental question to be answered here is whether the decision made is reasonable in the circumstances of this case. Does it fall within the range of decisions that could reasonably be justified by the factual evidence (see Dunsmuir, supra)?

[22] To solve this dilemma, I believe it is useful to adopt the reasoning followed by Pinard J. in a case that raised the same kind of problems: Dubeau, supra. At paragraph 14 of that decision, Pinard J. wrote that in interpreting sections 220 and 227 of the Act, departmental directives or policies regarding cancellation of penalties and interest had to be considered, along with the following factors:

(a) Relationship of parties involved.
(b) Date of death.
(c) Date(s) and nature of illness or accident.
(d) Explanation as to how the event prevented compliance.
(e) Explanation as to whether other business obligations were impaired.

[23] Also in that paragraph, Pinard J. added, with respect to departmental policy,

> . . . examples of cases where the cancellation of penalties and interest could be justified are provided, including "a serious emotional or mental distress such as, death in the immediate family."

[24] In Dubeau, supra, the taxpayer cited lengthy absences from work because of his illness and the subsequent death of his son and illness of his own wife. Pinard J. dismissed the application for judicial review because, under the standard of review that applied at that time (i.e. in 2001), which was the patent unreasonableness standard, he could not have intervened. He wrote:

> [21] In all of this context, despite all of the sympathy aroused by the misfortunes of Marc Dubeau and his family, the strict standard of judicial review that was confirmed in

Baker v. Canada (M.C.I.)*, [1999] 2 R.C.S. 817, prevents me from intervening. . . .

[25] I am inclined to think, even speculate, that if the reasonableness standard that has applied since Dunsmuir had been the standard to be applied, the decision might not have been the same.

[26] In Case v. Attorney General, 2004 FC 825, [2004] 4 C.T.C. 71, the application for judicial review of a negative decision by the Minister regarding interest and penalties was dismissed because the applicant had not discharged her burden of proof in that she had been unable to show, in medical terms, that she could not have filed her tax return in a timely manner.

[27] An application for judicial review was dismissed in Grundy v. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, 2005 FC 1312, [2005] D.T.C. 5574, because the failure to file the tax return in question did not result from an event beyond the applicant's control.

[28] In PPSC Entreprises Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 2007 FC 784, [2007] 5 C.T.C. 79, the judge dismissed the application for judicial review because the error by the applicant did not result from circumstances beyond its control.

[29] In Laframboise v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2008 FC 196, [2008] D.T.C. 6178, Judith Snider J. allowed the application for judicial review of a negative departmental decision because the delay in filing a tax return had been caused by the destruction of the taxpayer's home by a fire, in which all of the necessary documents had been destroyed.

[30] In Nixon v. Minister of National Revenue, 2008 FC 917, [2008] F.C.J. No. 1146 (T.D..) (QL), Douglas R. Campbell J. allowed the application for judicial review because the decision-maker had failed to have regard to the fact that the failures to report additional income had been involuntary.

[31] In this case, the uncontradicted evidence is that the applicant was the victim of numerous distressing events between 2002 and 2007: her husband died suddenly in 2002, and her mother and father-in-law died the same year. The applicant's son was depressed to the point that he attempted suicide. The applicant's home was flooded. The accountant who had looked after her affairs and earlier tax returns died of cancer.

[32] All of these catastrophic events left the applicant in a state of deep depression, accentuated by the fact that she was obliged to seek paid employment and that she then had to change jobs three times. According to the applicant and her psychiatrist, she still suffers the effects of that depression today. The consequence was that the applicant was unable to manage her affairs properly and to make the necessary decisions in relation to her tax obligations in a timely manner.

[33] In my opinion, the combination of these events and circumstances, and the applicant's psychological condition, amply constitute the exceptional circumstances to which the guidelines refer and justify the delay that prevented her from filing her annual tax returns between 2002 and 2005.

[34] This situation falls squarely within the exceptional circumstances beyond the applicant's control referred to in sections 23, 24 and 25 of the provisions quoted supra.

> (a) natural or man-made disasters such as, flood or fire;
> (b) civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike;
> (c) a serious illness or accident; or;
> (d) serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.
> (Emphasis added.)

[36] Section 34 adds special consideration because of exceptional events.

[37] In my opinion, the applicant's situation fits precisely within all those considerations. The only negative factor cited by the decision-maker is that she had previously filed necessary returns late and that she had managed to file them only to settle her husband's estate. That situation was highly exceptional in that it was the executor of the estate who urged or required the applicant to do those returns and who motivated the applicant even though she was still in a state of deep depression. I find that this should not have been relied on against the applicant.

[38] With deference to the person who made the decision of January 28, 2008, that decision is unreasonable in the exceptional circumstances that occurred and having regard to the applicant's psychological condition.

[39] An analysis of the case law cited supra shows that if ever there was a situation that merited tax relief, it is the applicant's in this case, in accordance with the very criteria formulated by the Department of National Revenue.

[40] I must therefore find that the applicant's application is well founded in fact and in law. The application for judicial review will therefore be allowed.

JUDGMENT

The application for judicial review is allowed and the decision made by Lucie Bergevin on January 28, 2008, is set aside.

The application is referred back to another authorized representative of the Minister of National Revenue for consideration in accordance with the reasons set out in this judgment.

The parties will bear their own costs.

CANADA REVENUE AGENCY

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] The Applicant failed to pay her income taxes on the time for the taxation years 1995, 1996, 1998, and 1999, resulting in interest accrual.

[2] In 2003, the Applicant applied to the Minister of Finance (the Minister) pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act), for waiver of interest and penalties with respect to the period from January 1, 1995 to December 31, 2002, on the following three grounds: (i) waiver of penalties; (ii) waiver of interest on grounds of extraordinary circumstances; and (iii) waiver of interest on grounds of financial hardship. The Applicant's request was particularly based on emotional health issues and ongoing financial hardship.

[3] Each of the above-noted three grounds of the Applicant's initial request for waiver of interest and penalties (Fairness Request) was considered by a separate officer of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA).

Digitized by Google

[4] On October 7, 2003, the Minister decided to waive the late filing penalties for both the 1998 and 1999 taxation years.

[5] A CRA officer reviewed the Applicant's request for the waiver of interest on grounds of extraordinary circumstances. He found there were no circumstances to warrant a waiver of interest and that, in spite of the Applicant's claims of stress in her personal life, she was able to maintain both regular and business income during the time in question and should have been able to meet her tax obligations.

[6] Another CRA officer reviewed the request for the waiver of interest on grounds of financial circumstances. He reported that he found no financial hardship to warrant the waiver of interest.

[7] On June 21, 2004, the Minister notified the Applicant of his decision to deny the waiver of interest on the grounds of either (i) extraordinary circumstances or (ii) financial hardship for the 1995, 1996, 1998 and 1999 taxation years. In response to that decision, the Applicant provided additional information for the Minister to review. The Minister treated this additional information as a new first level Fairness Request for the waiver of interest on the grounds of extraordinary circumstances and financial hardship.

[8] Another CRA officer reviewed this second first level Fairness Request and recommended, after considering the additional information, that there were no grounds to warrant the waiver of interest. This decision was confirmed by a CRA team leader and was communicated to the Applicant on April 12, 2005.

[9] On December 27, 2005, the Applicant sent the Minister a letter requesting further consideration, which the Minister treated as a request for second-level review. The Applicant provided a letter from her psychiatrist stating that the Applicant was being treated, since May 31, 2005, for chronic anxiety and has developed a specific phobia related to financial transactions.

[10] The second-level review was conducted by a CRA officer who reviewed this new information. The officer reviewed all of the information on the file, conducted further research into the Applicant's financial circumstances and considered the Applicant's health issues. The officer found that the psychiatrist's letter was not relevant for the period in issue for the fairness relief and recommended that the request be denied. The officer's recommendation was reviewed by a CRA manager and the Assistant Director of Revenue Collections and they decided to deny the Applicant's Fairness Request. In his February 28, 2006 letter informing the Applicant of the negative decision, the Assistant Director, Revenue Collections, wrote the following:

> We have examined all the submitted evidence related to your ongoing anxiety issues and surgery to remove a chest tumour. Although we can empathise [sic] the difficulties you no doubt encountered in dealing with and recovering from these experiences, we cannot agree that there is evidence that the circumstances were so extraordinary as to prevent you from paying your taxes on time. It is apparent from our review that you were able to maintain your employment and earn additional income from business activities during this time, which enabled you to keep your commitments to other creditors over that of your tax obligations.

[11] On April 5, 2006, the Applicant filed the within application for judicial review of the Minister's decision.

I. Issue

[12] Did the Minister discharge his duty to act fairly in exercising his discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act to deny fairness relief to the Applicant?

Digitized by Google

II. Standard of Review

[13] The applicable standard of review of a fairness decision of the Minister has been settled by the Federal Court of Appeal in Lanno v. Canada (Customs & Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 153, at paragraphs 6-7. In that case, the Court conducted a pragmatic and functional analysis and determined the applicable standard to be reasonableness simpliciter. I will apply the reasonableness standard in reviewing the Minister's decision in this case.

III. Analysis

[15] The Applicant argues that her health condition was not considered in the decision by the Minister. She states that, in the decision, the CRA focuses on finances and does not adequately address physical and emotional health. She contends that her letters clearly stated that she was unable to function as a bookkeeper for her husband's business, and therefore she was unable to file income tax returns in a timely fashion.

[16] She further contends that she does not believe the officers who reviewed the file had taken into account the emotional distress she and her family were under. The Applicant submits that the CRA officers are not qualified to produce opinions about physical and emotional health and are consequently not qualified to conclude reasonably with respect to her inability to pay her taxes. The Applicant argues that the Minister should have consulted a health care professional about her case. She contends that a medical professional would have been able to explain, contrary to the CRA's determination, how it is possible for someone to be able to meet certain obligations while not maintaining others in a time of stress.

[17] On this point, I agree with the Respondent. There is no obligation on the Minister to consult with a health care professional in making a fairness decision. It was reasonable for the Minister to determine that the impugned December 27, 2005 letter from the Applicant's psychiatrist was not relevant to the period in issue. In the circumstances, the Minister acted fairly and in accordance with the rules of procedural fairness as developed in administrative law.

[18] The Applicant cites three decisions in support of her claim: Ross v. Canada (CCRA), 2006 FC 294; Dick v. Canada (CCRA), 2005 FC 560; and Bilida v. Revenue Canada, 51 D.T.C. 5041, 124 F.T.R. 172. In all three cases, the Minister's decision to deny a waiver of penalties and interest was set aside by the Federal Court. I have reviewed these cases and find that they can be distinguished.

[19] In Ross, the Minister significantly overstated the annual surplus of the taxpayer' income, and therefore the Court found the Minister's conclusions regarding the ability to pay back the tax to be unreasonable. In Dick, the Minister failed to take into consideration that the taxpayer was a 72-year-old chronic alcoholic, and given his retirement income, unable to ever repay the amounts owed. Further, the taxpayer's liabilities were equal to his assets and the penalties and interest assessed against him far exceeded the taxes owing. In Bilida, the taxpayer was a 76-year-old widow living on an old age pension who was unable to pay the tax owed. The Court held that Revenue Canada's delay in assessing the taxpayer's returns contributed to the arrears and penalties.

[20] The circumstances of the taxpayers in the above cited cases are certainly not those of the Applicant. The Applicant was able to maintain employment and to earn additional income from her business activities, enabling her to meet her commitments to other creditors. It was not unreasonable for the Minister to conclude, in these circumstances, that the Applicant was simply showing preference to other creditors over the CRA. Further, the evidence indicates that the Applicant's net worth shared with her spouse is estimated at $500,000.00, an amount she does not dispute. Relative to her net worth, the outstanding interest owing in the amount of $12, 632.63 is relatively small.

[21] On the record before me, I am satisfied that the Minister exercised his statutory discretion in good faith and in accordance with the principles of natural justice. I am satisfied that Minister properly considered the evidence before him and that the decision was not based on considerations irrelevant or extraneous to the statutory purpose. (Maple Lodge Farms v. Government of Canada, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2, at page 8.)

[22] For the above reasons, the application for judicial review of the Minister's February 28 2006, fairness decision will be dismissed.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that the application for judicial review of the Minister's February 28, 2006, fairness decision is dismissed.

Julie Deborah Surtherland v. Canada Customs & Revenue Agency, 2006 FC 154, Bi-polar Disorder and Uncontrolled Financial Responsibility

BETWEEN:
JULIE DEBORAH SURTHERLAND
Applicant
- and -
CANADA CUSTOMS & REVENUE AGENCY
Respondent

REASONS FOR ORDER

PINARD J.:

[1] This is an application for judicial review of the July 30, 2004 second level Fairness decision, made by Roger A. Ouellette, on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue, denying the applicant relief from interest and penalties with respect to the 1994 to 2001 taxation years.

* * * * * * * *

[2] Julie Deborah Sutherland (the "applicant") had been assessed by Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") interest and penalties related to her income tax returns for the years 1994 to 2001 arising from her late payment of income taxes on her disability pension from 1994 to 2000, as well as her late filing of returns for 1999 and 2000.

[4] In 2003, the applicant applied to the Minister pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th supp.) (the "Act") for waiver of interest and penalties ("Fairness") with respect to the 1994 to 2001 taxation years. The basis of the applicant's Fairness request was that she suffers from bipolar affective disorder as well as a number of other health problems.

[5] On October 27, 2003, the Minister notified the applicant of his decision to waive only the applicant's late filing penalty for the 2000 taxation year because the applicant was in the hospital at the time that her 2000 tax return was due. The Minister found no other extraordinary circumstances nor sufficient financial hardship to warrant the waiver of interest or penalties.

[6] On January 28, 2004, the Minister received a letter from the applicant that the Minister treated as a request for a second level of Fairness review. In that letter, the applicant emphasized the effects of her bipolar affective disorder on her ability to manage her tax affairs.

[7] The Fairness committee found that the applicant knew that no tax was being deducted from her pension income for at least six years before she took steps to rectify the situation by arranging for source deductions in 2000. The committee also recognized that the applicant had severe medical problems but it was of the opinion that the applicant should have been able to take action to prevent the accrual of interest before six years had elapsed.

[8] The Fairness committee concluded that the applicant should be denied relief from interest and penalties. The committee prepared a memorandum with its findings and recommendation to Roger Ouellette, the Assistant Director of the Revenue Collections Division, who reviewed the material and approved the committee's recommendation.

[9] On July 30, 2004, the Minister's second level Fairness decision to deny relief was sent to the applicant. In this letter, Mr. Ouellette noted that the applicant had been reminded annually since 1994 to arrange for source deductions from her disability pension, yet did not do so until September 2000. He also reiterated the Fairness committee's point that the applicant's disability should not have prevented her from making those arrangements.

[10] Like counsel for the respondent, it is my understanding that this last decision does not affect the previous relief granted in the first level Fairness decision, waiving the late filing penalty for the year 2000, in the amount of $712, as the applicant was in the hospital at the time the return was due.

* * * * * * * *

220. . . .

(2.01) The Minister may authorize an officer or a class of officers to exercise powers or perform duties of the Minister under this Act.

(3.1) The Minister may at any time waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by a taxpayer or partnership and, notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to 152(5), such assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made as is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

220. . . .

(2.01) Le ministre peut autoriser un fonctionnaire ou une catégorie de fonctionnaires à exercer les pouvoirs et fonctions qui lui sont conférés en vertu de la présente loi.

* * * * * * * *

[12] The applicant submits that the Fairness committee erred in finding her ineligible for waiver of interest and penalties, as there was adequate information before the committee to find her eligible for cancellation and waiver of interest and penalties for the years 1994 through 2001.

Digitized by Google

[13] The applicant submits that she suffers from an acute form of bipolar affective disorder. Her children also suffer from psychiatric disorder, while her mentally ill brother had recently committed suicide at the time of her first level request. This information was before the Fairness committee.

[14] Additionally, the applicant submits that the Fairness committee made the following errors:

- adjudicated her first level request on financial hardship grounds rather than on medical grounds;

- made an incorrect assumption when it concluded that she and her spouse purchased a home from monies saved during their cohabitation, when her RRSPs were instead accumulated in the year 2000 only and were quickly eradicated due to the loss of judgment attributable to her mental illness; and

- ignored section 12 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, which states that "[e]very enactment shall be construed as being remedial, and shall be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects."

[15] Subsection 220(3.1) of the Act allows the Minister to waive interest and penalties otherwise payable in respect of 1985 and subsequent taxation years. Subsection 220(2.01) of the Act permits the Minister to delegate the discretion granted under subsection 220(3.1).

[16] The Minister's discretion is broad in the context of Fairness decisions. The Act and its regulations are silent as to what criteria are to be used by the Minister in exercising his discretion. In these circumstances, the Minister may use any criteria he chooses, as long as he abides by a general duty to act fairly in accordance with the rules of procedural fairness as developed in administrative law (The Estate of the Late Henry H. Floyd v. The Minister of National Revenue (1993), 93 D.T.C. 5499 at 5501 (F.C.T.D.) and Kaiser v. The Minister of National Revenue (1995), 95 D.T.C. 5187 at 5188 (F.C.T.D.)).

[17] To facilitate the exercise of his discretion, the Minister has created guidelines in the form of Information Circular 92-2. However, although the Minister can formulate these general policy guidelines, he cannot fetter his discretion by treating the guidelines as binding and excluding all other relevant reasons for exercising his discretion (Maple Lodge Farms Limited v. Government of Canada, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2 at pages 6 and 7).

[18] In Lanno v. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, 2005 D.T.C. 5245, the Federal Court of Appeal determined that the standard of review applicable to discretionary Fairness decisions made by the Minister is reasonableness simpliciter.

[19] The grounds upon which the decision of the Minister may be reviewed are set out in section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, which reads:

18.1 (1) An application for judicial review may be made by the Attorney General of Canada or by anyone directly affected by the matter in respect of which relief is sought.

(2) An application for judicial review in respect of a decision or an order of a federal board, commission or other tribunal shall be made within 30 days after the time the decision or order was first communicated by the federal board, commission or other tribunal to the office of the Deputy Attorney General of Canada or to the party directly affected by it, or within any further time that a

18.1 (1) Une demande de contrôle judiciaire peut être présentée par le procureur général du Canada ou par quiconque est directement touché par l'objet de la demande.

(2) Les demandes de contrôle judiciaire sont à présenter dans les trente jours qui suivent la première communication, par l'office fédéral, de sa décision ou de son ordonnance au bureau du sous-procureur général du Canada ou à la partie concernée, ou dans le délai supplémentaire qu'un juge de la Cour fédérale peut, judge of the Federal Court may fix or allow before or after the end of those 30 days.

(3) On an application for judicial review, the Federal Court may

(a) order a federal board, commission or other tribunal to do any act or thing it has unlawfully failed or refused to do or has unreasonably delayed in doing; or

(b) declare invalid or unlawful, or quash, set aside or set aside and refer back for determination in accordance with such directions as it considers to be appropriate, prohibit or restrain, a decision, order, act or proceeding of a federal board, commission or other tribunal.

(4) The Federal Court may grant relief under subsection (3) if it is satisfied that the federal board, commission or other tribunal

(a) acted without jurisdiction, acted beyond its jurisdiction or refused to exercise its jurisdiction;

(b) failed to observe a principle of natural justice, procedural fairness or other procedure that it was required by law to observe;

(c) erred in law in making a decision or an order, whether or not the error appears on the face of the record;

du vice et donner effet à celle-ci selon les modalités de temps et autres qu'elle estime indiquées.

[20] This Court is not called upon to exercise the discretion conferred on the Minister or to substitute its own decision for that of the Minister. This Court should not conclude that the Minister is wrong merely because the Court would have exercised the discretion differently. The review is instead limited to the manner in which the Minister exercised his discretion (Maple Lodge Farms Limited, supra).

[21] It is my opinion that, in the present case, it was reasonable for the Minister to conclude that despite the applicant's documented medical problems, she had allowed an extraordinary period of time to elapse before taking steps to rectify her tax situation and that she should therefore not qualify for Fairness relief.

[22] For the period under review, the applicant was able to file her returns on time in all years except 1999 and 2000, which were each filed approximately six months late. It was only the taxes associated with those returns which were not paid until 2002.

[23] Additionally, the applicant had been reminded annually since 1994 that she should arrange for source deductions to be taken from her disability pension. It is not unreasonable for the Minister to conclude that the fact that she did not take action until September 2000 was a delay which cannot reasonably be explained by the applicant's circumstances.

[24] Before the commencement of the annual reminders from the Minister to arrange for source deductions, the applicant was also lectured about fiscal responsibility by the Master in chambers at the discharge hearing in her second bankruptcy in 1993. In my opinion, it was reasonable for the Minister to conclude that Fairness relief is not appropriate in these circumstances.

[25] In response to the applicant's submission that the Minister erred in referencing her income, RRSPs and ability to purchase a home, I disagree. On my reading of the paragraph, contrary to the applicant's submission, there is no assumption made that the applicant's home was purchased with RRSP monies. These facts, whether right or wrong, were put forth as evidence of the applicant's financial position. Regardless, the Minister's July 30, 2004 decision letter clearly shows that the applicant's inordinate delay was the reason for the Minister's refusal to grant Fairness relief at the second level.

[26] Regarding the applicant's submission that the first level request was adjudicated on the basis of financial hardship rather than on medical grounds, I do not think this issue is determinative, as the second level Fairness information (the same information as was submitted with the first level request) clearly referenced her medical issues, and therefore cured any deficiency (had there been any) in the process to that point-in-time.

[27] I am unable to conclude, based on the facts before me, that the Minister improperly exercised his discretion in the present case. The applicant was afforded the opportunity to make representations as to why the interest should be waived and the Minister had before him all the relevant facts necessary on which to base a reasoned and objective decision. Absent bad faith on the part of the Minister, a breach of the principles of natural justice or consideration of extraneous or irrelevant factors, there is nothing to warrant the Court's interference with the exercise of his discretion. I am not satisfied that any of these exist in the present case.

[28] As it is my opinion that the Minister discharged his duty to act fairly in exercising his discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act to deny Fairness relief to the applicant and as I find that the decision is reasonable, this application for judicial review is dismissed, without costs.

Financial Restructuring though No New Equity

In Frank G. Robertson v. MNR[20] the taxpayer had merely consolidated his credit-card balances into a bank loan to reduce interest and while being late on filing some years the Director of the Tax Office had denied fairness. When reviewed by the Trial Court it held:

> The issue is whether the Minister has properly exercised his discretion with regard to relevant considerations and without regard to erroneous factors. See: GoldMaker v.Canada,(Minister of National Revenue) (2000), 2 C.T.C. 149 (F.C.T.D.) The standard of review is patent unreasonableness: Chan v. Her Majesty The Queen (2001), D.T.C. 5575 (F.C.A.)and Sharma v. Minister of National Revenue(2001)D.T.C. 5360 (F.C.T.D.)
> As stated earlier, the letter of refusal provides reasons for the refusal. The Director, in his affidavit sworn September 20th, 2001, deposes at paragraph 7 that he considered the following factors: (a) the request made by the applicant and the reasons therefore; (b) the fact that the applicant did not indicate he was prevented from filing his income tax returns on time; (c) the applicant has accumulated additional consumer debt in December, 2000; (d) the financial hardship was not such that warranted the cancellation of penalties and interest, and (e) the guidelines established in Information Circular 92-2 and Internal Directive ARD 9201 dated April 16th, 1992 were not met in these circumstances.
> Regarding paragraph(b),the use of the word "prevented", at first blush, would appear to mean circumstances outside the applicant's control. However, when viewed in conjunction with the Director's report dated June 12th, 2001, the meaning to be attributed to "prevented" is not so clear. In the second paragraph of his report the Director states:
> "The client filed both his 1998 and 1999 returns on May 18th, 2000. No reasons have been given for filing late." The applicant, in fact, provided detailed reasons for the failure to file his returns in his correspondence to CCRA dated October 29th, 2000. It may well be that the Director did not consider these reasons to be sufficient. However, in the face of his statement that no reasons were given, I cannot say that the reasons were considered, let alone found to be insufficient.
> With respect to paragraph(c), additional consumer debt, the refusal letter specifically states:
> "In addition, our records indicate that you had accumulated additional consumer debt in December, 2000. In such situations, the cancellation of interest charges is not usually granted."
> This finding of fact is erroneous. The record clearly indicates that there was not additional debt, but a debt consolidation. The applicant provided all of the supporting documentation regarding the loan consolidation in correspondence to CCRA dated February 20th, 2001. Indeed, the Director in his report dated June 12th, 2001, refers specifically to the payouts made by the applicant. The comments contained in the Director's report fly in the face of his affidavit and the reason delineated in his refusal letter and are contradictory.
> There is an additional statement in the Director's report indicating a reported expense of $100.00 for recreation on the applicant's income and expense statement. Although nothing turns on this, it, too, is an erroneous finding because the applicant allocated $50.00 per month for recreation, not $100.00.

Attached to the Director's affidavit are the notations of CCRA officers containing recommendations not to apply discretion in favour of the applicant. One such notation on June 5th states:

"Interest is not the reason for the hardship. Taxpayer made decisions not to borrow and pay tax arrears, paying other creditors while ignoring tax obligations."

The evidence indicates that the applicant did attempt to borrow the money to pay the tax arrears. A second notation on June 5th, 2001 contains the following statement:

"Agree with above comments, large unsecured credit balances, Visa, etc. are the cause of any hardship."

In fact, the applicant had consolidated his loans in December, 2000. There were no unsecured credit balances as of the date of the notation. There was merely the one consolidated loan with Canada Trust that has been referred to previously.

With respect to the Director's finding that financial hardship was not such that warranted the cancellation of penalties and interest, the applicant argues that the CCRA erred in its finding that he had $1,100.00 surplus monthly income. The Director found that the applicant was not suffering financial hardship and that he had a surplus of monthly income. In his report, he states:

"The client repeatedly mentions in his correspondence that his net monthly income for a family of six is below the poverty line. However, based on the client's income for 2000 on DD.3 and his expenses, the client has a monthly surplus of $800.00 after his monthly payment of $300.00 to CCRA."

The applicant calculates his surplus at $80.96 per month. The document relied upon by the Director is contained in the record but there is nothing to indicate how the calculations were completed. The Director was not, on cross-examination, able to enlighten the applicant in this regard, nor could counsel provide assistance at the hearing. In my view, the applicant is entitled to know where the calculations came from or how they were arrived at.

I am mindful of the comments of my colleague, Rouleau,J. in Kaiser v. The Minister of National Revenue, (1995), 93 F.T.R. 66 and I quote those comments for the benefit of the Director in this case:

"The purpose of this legislative provision is to allow Revenue Canada Taxation to administer the tax system more fairly by allowing for the application of common sense in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, are unable to meet deadlines or comply with rules under the tax system.

The language used in the section bestows a wide discretion on the Minister to waive or cancel interest at any time. To assist in the exercise of that discretion, policy guidelines have been formulated and are set out in Information Circular 92-2."

I refer to that primarily because, and I don't mean to imply that the Director has acted in bad faith or anything of that nature, but I do refer to paragraph 7(e) of his affidavit, and it would appear to me that, certainly on its face, it appears that the Director has attempted to place the applicant into pigeon-holed criteria cited in the guidelines and the directive, notwithstanding that it is specifically stated that they are not intended to be exhaustive. The comments of Justice Rouleau are enlightening in that regard. In any event, and not withstanding those comments, I am also mindful that the Court is not to substitute its findings or its opinion for those of the ministerial delegate and, while that is so, neither is it the Court's function to speculate on what the Director's ultimate decision might have been but for the erroneous findings of fact.

Here, the Director made erroneous findings of fact that, in my view, taint the decision. The reasons, particularly those that relate to the late filing of the returns, do not adequately explain the Director's position. In the circumstances, this decision is patently unreasonable.

Segregation of 1st and 2nd Fairness Reviews Important.

One of the tenets of the Fairness Procedure that CRA has set up is that the applicant will be allowed an appeal to a second level of decision making which must be independent of the first. The independence of the 2 levels maintains and fosters a fuller environment for the fairness request. In John Herbert Rocke Robertson v. MNR[21] at issue, amongst other incidentals in a simple Fairness judicial review, was whether the taxpayer had obtained that independent 2nd appeal from the 1st decision. The Trial court pointed out:

> ISSUE
> [10] Did the respondent discharge his duty to act fairly in declining to exercise his discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act?
> THE FAIRNESS PROCESS
> [11] The affidavit submitted with the respondent's record outlines the decision-making process with respect to a Fairness Request. The relevant passages of the affidavit are as follows:
> After receiving the CCRA's decision, the taxpayer may make a written "second level" Fairness request if he or she disagrees with the CCRA's decision at the first level.
> The file is then assigned to a Collections Officer who was not involved at the "first level", whose role it to conduct a complete review of the file to date, including the taxpayer's request for Fairness relief. This officer prepares a further summary of the file, accompanied by his or her recommendation as to whether or not to approve or deny the taxpayer's Fairness request. The file and summary with recommendation are forwarded to a Fairness Committee comprised of a Collections Manager who was not involved at the "first level" and the Assistant Director, Revenue Collections, for a decision. [emphasis mine]
> [12] It is acknowledged by the respondent that at the first level Mr. Robertson's waiver application was reviewed by a Collections Officer whose recommendation was concurred in by a Fairness Committee consisting of two Collections Managers: Diane Readman and Stan Thompson.
> [13] At the second level, the summary and recommendations were forwarded to a Fairness Committee comprised of Mr. Vondette who was a Collections Manager and Stan Thompson who was Acting Assistant Director, Revenue Collections, both of whom concurred with the recommendation that the second level appeal should be denied.
> LEGISLATION
> [14] The relevant legislative provision is as follows:
> (3.1) Waiver of penalty or interest
> The Minister may at any time waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by a taxpayer or partnership and, notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), such assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made as is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.
> DISCUSSION
> [15] In Getson v. Canada (Attorney General), 2001 F.C.T. 550, I found the principles governing the exercise of ministerial power under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act were articulated by Pratte J.A. in Her Majesty the Queen v. Barbara L. Barron et al. (1997), 97 D.T.C. 5121 (F.C.A.) as follows:

... it may be useful to recall that subsection 152 (4.2) of the Income Tax Act confers a discretion on the Minister and that, when an application for judicial review is directed against a decision made in the exercise of a discretion, reviewing court is not called upon to exercise the discretion conferred on the person who made the decision. The court may intervene and set aside the discretionary decision under review only if that decision was made in bad faith, if its author clearly ignored some relevant facts or took into consideration irrelevant facts or if the decision is contrary to law.

[17] It is my view, however, that the respondent breached the duty of fairness when it broke its own internal rules as to the composition of the second level appeal panel.

[18] The respondent contends that although Mr. Thompson was by circumstance in the position of acting Assistant Director, Revenue Collections, by the "second level" review, the independence of the review process was not nullified given that the request was considered by two Collections Officers and two other Managers in the course of the ordinary fairness review process.

[19] This argument cannot withstand scrutiny. The respondent has established specific procedures for assessing a Fairness Request. It is apparent that this procedure was designed to ensure that the same decision maker is not involved at both the first and the second level reviews. Notwithstanding this procedure, the respondent allowed Mr. Thompson to participate not only at the first level but also at the second level. Though Mr. Thompson held the position of "Acting" Assistant Director, rather than his substantive position of Collections Manager, I am satisfied that the respondent has not respected its own procedure. In Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817, Madam Justice L'Heureux-Dubé, in her analysis of criteria that enable a Court to determine whether procedures followed respected the duty of fairness, stated:

[T]he analysis of what procedures the duty of fairness requires should also take into account and respect the choices of procedure made by the agency itself, particularly when the statute leaves to the decision-maker the ability to choose its own procedures, or when the agency has an expertise in determining what procedures are appropriate in the circumstances: Brown and Evans, supra, at pp. 7-66 to 7-70. While this, of course, is not determinative, important weight must be given to the choice of procedures made by the agency itself and its institutional constraints: IWA v. Consolidated-Bathurst Packaging Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 282, per Gonthier J.

[20] In deciding whether to allow this judicial review application on this limited ground, I was influenced by the apparent purpose of the internal rule and the values which that rule was designed to convey to the public.

[21] The internal rule that was breached sought to assure the taxpayer that the appeal process was genuine and effective in that a person who had decided the waiver application at the first level could not sit on appeal from his/her decision.

[22] In addition, by setting up this procedure, while not quite meeting the requirements for the application of the doctrine of legitimate expectations, the respondent intended it be followed in order to promote its fairness policy.

[23] In terms of the relief sought, the applicant requested that if I allowed the judicial review application, I should direct the respondent to cancel penalties and interest or that I keep jurisdiction by requiring the respondent to report back to the Court after reconsideration was completed. I agree with the respondent that I do not have the ability to give the applicant this kind of relief.

Latent Establishment of Interest/Penalty and Discoverability

What happens when a taxpayer is purportedly unaware of his tax liability and due to CRA's latent establishment of interest and penalties a Fairness application is filed? Are there grounds to state that a waiver should occur when there are disputes as to amounts and timing? This was the case in Pavage St- Eustache Ltée v. Attorney General Of Canada[22].

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

Overview

[1] This is an application for judicial review filed by the applicant Pavage St-Eustache Ltée (Pavage), a member of the Mathers Group, of the decision rendered on February 2, 2010, by the Canada Revenue Agency, Montréal Tax Services Office (the Agency) dismissing a request for relief dated September 3, 2009, from Pavage under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act (the Act).

Waiver of penalty or interest

Renonciation aux pénalités et aux intérêts

(3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

Malgré les paragraphes 152(4) à (5), le ministre établit les cotisations voulues concernant les intérêts et pénalités payables par le contribuable ou la société de personnes pour tenir compte de pareille annulation.

[3] The reassessment issued by the Agency on May 26, 2004, for Pavage's fiscal year ending December 31, 1996, is the central issue between the parties. This reassessment formally disallowed the deduction of $1,128,454 for a farm loss (the farm loss) claimed by Pavage for the 1996 taxation year that the Agency had provisionally allowed.

[4] The reassessment of May 26, 2004, increased Pavage's payable taxes by $341,805 on its business income for 1996 plus interest on arrears of $299,565 and interest on a reimbursement of $10,080.77 for a total of $651,450.77.

[5] The issuance of this reassessment was provided under the terms of a civil and penal settlement agreement (the agreement) entered into on November 25, 2002, between the Mathers Group companies and the Agency following an investigation by the Agency begun in 1998. Article 8 of the agreement covers Pavage. It confirms the Agency's reassessment of February 14, 2002, which, for the first time, disallowed the farm loss claimed by Pavage.

The request for relief dated September 3, 2009

[6] This request for relief is part of a proposal made by Mr. Paci, counsel for Pavage, in his letter of September 3, 2009, to Claudine Vinette of the Agency's Montréal office. He stated the following: [TRANSLATION]

Following our recent discussions relating to the matter of ending this imbroglio, please note that we have received instructions to propose to you a full and final settlement that would consist in paying the total assessment amount of May 26, 2004, or of $341,805 without penality or interest, less the amounts withheld by the CRA.

[Emphasis added.]

[7] Mr. Paci pointed out that [TRANSLATION] "this statement is made in the context of a fairness request justified by the extraordinary circumstances surrounding this file, in particular:

The death of the lawyer representing the company originally, Bruno J. Pateras, Q.C., on April 13, 2002;

The prolonged absence of the investigator in charge of the file, Marcel Kessiby, due to health problems;

The issuance of a notice of assessment May 26, 2004, 18 months after the date of the original settlement;

The fact that the said notice of assessment was never delivered to our client, Pavage St-Eustache Ltd, or to our office, or to the investigator in charge of the file, Marcel Kessiby, who was supposed to be aware of any notice of reassessment in the Mathers Group file;

In addition, the table summarizing all notices of assessment issued since December 31, 1996, to December 31, 2006, which was attached to the CRA's letter of September 25, 2007 (see tab 5), making no reference to the notice of reassessment issued in May 2004. The above-noted table had been previously sent by the Shawinigan Collections Branch and it had been received at the Enforcement Division in Laval on September 13, 2007, all at the request of Mr. Kessiby;

Given the circumstances, our client could not have guessed that such a notice of reassessment, which had not even been recorded in CRA's receivables, existed;

The receipt of a reconciliation from Mr. Kessiby dated September 25, 2007, and the immediate payment of final amounts due by our client according to this document, are evidence that the said notice of reassessment of May 26, 2004, did not exist at that moment for neither for our client nor for Mr. Kessiby;

The many undue delays caused by CRA in tracking down a copy of the notice of reassessment dated May 2004, locating the missing explanatory document and informing the undersigned that these documents existed, caused our client serious prejudice;
Furthermore, if the CRA taken due care in issuing the notice of reassessment, there would not have been any undue delays, therefore no interest nor penalties to add to the reassessment;
The lack of co-operation of certain individuals from CRA identified to replace Marcel Kessiby during his illness, specifically Réal Barbeau."

The Agency's decision

[8] On February 2, 2010, Francine Laporte, Team Leader, Revenue Collections, in Montréal, rejected Pavage's proposal of September 3, 2009, on three grounds stated in its letter addressed to counsel for Pavage:
Pavage's request for relief is time-barred. Ms. Laporte writes: [TRANSLATION]
Under the proposed amendments, announced in the March 2004 Federal Budget and legislated on May 13, 2005, the Minister's discretionary power in a request for relief only applies to the applications filed for a taxation year ending during the previous ten calendar years. For example, as of January 1, 2010, a request filed in 2010 would be accepted only for taxation years 2000 and following. However, your application concerns the 1996 taxation year.

Pavage knew that the reassessment of May 26, 2004, had been issued. Her view is the following
[TRANSLATION]
Furthermore, the review of the file confirms that several statements of account subsequent to the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, were sent to your client, such as the statement of interest assessed on May 26, 2004, and a statement of arrears on September 30, 2004, that showed the total arrears claimed for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1996. In this regard, no mail was returned.

According to the provisions of the agreement of November 25, 2002, Pavage had waived a fairness claim. She stated the following:
[TRANSLATION]
Finally, we draw your attention to point 18 of the civil and penal settlement proposal dated November 25, 2002, which states that withdrawal of a right of appeal and the waiver of a fairness claim should accompany it.
[9] Considering its importance, I reproduce article 18 of the November 25, 2002, agreement: [TRANSLATION]
18. A waiver of the right of appeal and a waiver of a fairness claim must accompany the final proposed settlement. The withdrawal of the right of appeal and waiver of fairness should be applied in its entirety to all "CCRA" Tax Services offices, without reservation. In the event of failure to comply with the withdrawal of right of appeal and waiver of fairness by the natural or legal persons involved in the final proposed settlement, the reassessments will be cancelled and renewed according to the notices of assessment issued between March 2000 and February 2002, all in compliance with the results of the "CCRA".

The impact of Bozzer v. Her Majesty et al.

Digitized by Google

[10] Bozzer v. Her Majesty The Queen in Right of Canada, Canada Revenue Agency and The Attorney General of Canada, 2011 FCA 186 (Bozzer), was rendered by the Federal Court of Appeal on June 2, 2011, during my deliberation.

[11] Counsel for the Agency thinks that Bozzer [TRANSLATION] "has the effect of changing the state of the law as to the issue of presumption." He is of the view that [TRANSLATION]

Indeed, the Court of Appeal found that an applicant may apply for relief for a period of 10 years prior to filing the application, regardless of the tax year in question. Thus, the right of an applicant to file such an application, for all practical purposes, cannot be time-barred.
However, as the decision of the Minister of National Revenue was not based solely on the limitation period, but also on Pavage's waiver from requesting relief, it is our view that a determination can still be rendered in our case. [Emphasis added.]

[12] The following day, counsel for Pavage advised this Court as follows: [TRANSLATION]
Further to the letter of July 4, 2011, from our colleague, Louis Sébastien, this is to share with the Honourable Mr. Justice Lemieux that the respondent cannot invoke the "waiver" contained in the parties' agreement since he has not himself complied with the exceptio non adimpleti contractus. [Emphasis added.]

[13] In Bozzer, the issue was how the 10-year limitation in section 220(3.1) of the Act must be calculated. The Federal Court of Appeal's reasons were written by Justice Stratas and at this the time are only available in English.

[14] On December 6, 2005, Mr. Bozzer filed a request for relief of interest accrued on unpaid taxes for the 1989 and 1990 taxation years. The Agency had denied the request because it had been filed late, that is, more than 10 years after his 1989 and 1990 taxation years. According to the Agency, under section 220(3.1), the Minister, in such circumstances, had no discretion to cancel or waive interest.

[16] The application for judicial review in Bozzer was dismissed by a Federal Court judge for the reason that the 10 year period is calculated after the relevant taxation year, i.e. the assessment year (in our case, 1996). Justice Stratas was of the view that "the ten year period in subsection 220(3.1) does not start in the year of assessment". According to Justice Stratas, subsection 220(3.1) permits the Minister to exercise his discretion to waive interest accrued in any taxation year ending within 10 years before the taxpayer's request for relief, regardless of when the underlying tax debt arose.

[17] In this case, Justice Stratas' interpretation means that the Agency had the discretion to waive the interest accrued between January 1, 1999, and December 31, 2009, after the tax debt arose for Pavage's 1996 taxation year by the May 26, 2004, reassessment.

[18] In the circumstances, I find that counsel for the Agency was right to conclude that Bozzer meant that the manner in which the Agency applied the limitation period for Pavage's application was wrong. The discretion given to the Agency to grant tax relief to Pavage had not expired.

[19] Consequently, I find it unnecessary to address the debate on limitation as described by the parties in their arguments. The sole issue to be discussed is whether the Agency could rely on the waiver in paragraph 18 of the agreement.

Digitized by Google

However, I find the issue of whether and when Pavage was unaware that the May 26, 2004, reassessment existed is still relevant if my finding on waiver is not correct because this issue is attached to the discoverability principle or the impossibility of acting principle (see Novak v. Bond, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 808; and Location Robert Ltée v. Canada 2010 FCA 31). In other words, the discoverability principle could possibly push the relief request date from September 13, 2009, to a later date.

The parties' arguments

Pavage

Pavage's awareness of the existence of the May 26, 2004, notice of assessment

[20] Pavage claims that there is no evidence in the file demonstrating that Pavage or its representatives had received this notice of assessment. Pavage stated that the investigator in charge of the file, Marcel Kessiby, was not aware of its existence and processed the files without taking into account this notice of reassessment, which is confirmed by the fact that no enforcement measures were taken before December 31, 2006.

[21] Pavage called the Agency's reasoning erroneous for having refused relief based on the fact that the applicant had allegedly received account statements subsequent to the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, since it neglected to mention that none of the statements of account received by Pavage referred to this notice of assessment and that there was no way for Pavage to know since it had never received the notice of May 26, 2004.

[22] In addition, Pavage had advised Marcel Kessiby of the existence of statements of account and he should have informed Pavage that the necessary adjustments would be corrected in compliance with the agreement.

The agreement

[23] Pavage also qualified the Agency's reasoning as erroneous for because it refused Pavage's relief request based on article 18 of the agreement.

[24] According to Pavage, this reasoning is faulty because its claim (the request for relief) is based on the fact that the Agency did not comply with the terms of the agreement (amended on November 28, 2002) since article 8 of the agreement was subject to paragraphs 10(a), 23 and 24 of the agreement and its amendment of November 28, 2002.

[25] Furthermore, according to Pavage;

the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, is not justified because the taxes claimed by this notice were to be calculated in the total amount mentioned in paragraph 11(a) of the agreement and that the remedies mentioned in paragraph 8 are already part of the agreement of November 25, 2002, modified on November 28, 2002;

Paragraph 23 of the agreement mentions that there is no interest on the companies mentioned, including Pavage, and, consequently, the notice of May 26, 2004, could not charge interest; and

Paragraph 24 of the agreement assigns any discrepancies arising from the reassessments to the Agency [26] To support its judicial review, Pavage filed affidavits by Mr. Paci and Marcel Kessiby. They were cross-examined.

[27] In his affidavit, Mr. Paci stated that

On September 25, 2007, he received from Marcel Kessiby a summary reconciliation of Pavage's accounts, indicating that the final amount due from Pavage on September 12, 2007, was $21,502 and that on October 2, 2007, Pavage paid the amount claimed;

On February 14, 2008, he wrote to the Assistant Director of the Agency's Enforcement Division in which he mentioned the payment of $21,502 but that despite that,

[TRANSLATION] “our client continued to receive monthly statements of arrears”;
Following this correspondence, Ms. Vinette was reassigned to the file and [TRANSLATION] “after several months of exhaustive searching in the file” Ms. Vinette [TRANSLATION] “finally traced the origin of the aforementioned statement of arrears” and that, on November 14, 2008, she sent him a copy of the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, which was incomplete because the additional explanations were not included in the notice; he received them on December 19, 2008; and Since April 30, 2007, the Agency deducted, as compensation from amounts due to Pavage, the amount of $650,233.
[28] In his affidavit, Marcel Kessiby swore to (1) the start of his employment at the Agency in 1981 and his retirement on September 28, 2007; and (2) his responsibility as investigator in the family’s and the Mathers Group’s concerns.
[29] He filed the agreement of November 25, 2002, amended on November 28, 2002, and on March 30, 2003 (applicant’s record, pages 24 and 26).
[30] In paragraph 15 of his affidavit, Marcel Kessiby acknowledged that article 8 of the agreement upholding a decision previously made by the Agency rejecting the farm loss of $1,128,454 and at the following paragraph states that [TRANSLATION] “ in accordance with this article [article 8] of the agreement, a notice of reassessment was issued by the Agency dated May 26, 2004.” However, he states that he was unaware of the existence of this notice of reassessment (paragraph 17) and [TRANSLATION] “therefore, I continued to process the file without taking into account this new notice of assessment” (paragraph 18).
[31] Marcel Kessiby concluded his affidavit stating that the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, did not meet the terms of the agreement. At paragraph 43 of his affidavit, he supported Mr. Paci’s conclusions, reproduced in paragraph 25 of these reasons.

The Agency
Awareness of the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004

[32] The Agency relies on the provisions of subsections 244(14) and (15) of the Act that, according to it, set out presumptions that the notice of May 26, 2004, was sent on that day to Pavage. The provisions read as follows:
Mailing or sending date
For the purposes of this Act, where ... any notice of assessment or determination is mailed, ... it shall be presumed to be mailed or sent, as the case may be, on the date of that notice or notification.

Date when assessment made
Where any notice of assessment or determination has been sent by the Minister as required by this Act, the assessment or determination is deemed to have been made on the day of mailing of the notice of the assessment or determination. [Emphasis added.]
[33] The Agency argued that the discoverability or impossibility of acting principles were not established by Pavage since the predominant evidence in the record is that Pavage was aware of the notice of reassessment of May 24, 2004, and in any case, Pavage was aware that the Agency would have to reject the farm loss.
[34] The Agency added that the purpose of the agreement is the final penal and civil settlement of the Agency’s numerous assessments as part of its investigation into the Mathers Group’s actions, including the issue of farm loss claimed by Pavage for its 1996 taxation year.

Compliance with the agreement

Digitized by Google

[35] On the issue raised by Pavage that the reassessment of May 24, 2004, did not comply with the agreement, the Agency argued the opposite and added that, in any event, this has no relevance in determining the two issues, i.e. limitation and waiver of filing a fairness application within this agreement. The Agency also claims that Mr. Kessiby acknowledged in his affidavit that the assessment was issued in compliance with the agreement.

[36] To support its claims, the Agency filed the affidavit by Guy Léonard, the investigator and acting team leader at the Agency, on which he was not cross-examined. He stated that he consulted documents regarding the companies in the Mathers Group from approximately 77 boxes at the Agency. I will summarize the essential points of his affidavit.

[37] The Agency also filed an affidavit by Francine Laporte on May 4, 2010, which she was also not cross-examined upon.

[38] Guy Léonard listed and explained that all the notices of reassessment issued by the Agency against Pavage for the 1996 taxation year, and in particular:

The notice of February 14, 2002, which disallowed for the first time, among other things, the farm loss claimed by Pavage; and

The notice of February 19, 2003, which cancels that of February 14, 2002. According to Guy Léonard:

[TRANSLATION]

The purpose of this was to re-establish the adjustments as assessed by the March 7, 2001, assessment, i.e. at the time when the farm loss had not been disallowed, contrary to what paragraph 8 of the agreement of November 25, 2002, as it appears from the agreement in Exhibit A of the affidavit by Marcel Kessiby dated March 18, 2010. [Emphasis added.]

The notice of May 26, 2004, in which [TRANSLATION] "the Agency disallowed again the farm loss as it appears in report T99A prepared by Paul-André Drolet, the auditor who issued the assessment of May 26, 2004.

[39] As to the participation of Marcel Kessiby in the issuance of the notice of reassessment of May 26, 2004, Guy Léonard wrote:

[TRANSLATION]

As of December 2003, Marcel Kessiby was working on issuing a reassessment for the 1996 taxation year, a notice of reassessment that was eventually issued on May 26, 2004, since he prepared, on January 14, 2004, an audit report (called T-20) for this purpose. This report states that the farm loss would be disallowed in compliance with the agreement of November 25, 2002, as it appears in the report I attached as Exhibit "7" of my affidavit. [Emphasis added.]

[40] In paragraph 6 of his affidavit, Guy Léonard stated that the notice of reassessment of May 26, 2004, complied with the November 25, 2002, agreement in that (1) the parties have always agreed that the farm loss would be rejected; (2) the amount of $2,502,324 established at the end of the agreement of November 25, 2002, did not include the adjustment of the future assessment of May 26, 2004, according to a chart prepared by Marcel Kessiby on or around March 17, 2003 (see his Exhibit 11); (3) from November 25, 2002, to March 10, 2003, the Agency did not charge interest on Pavage's debt in compliance with the agreement of November 25, 2002, and a first amendment of November 28, 2002. However, On March 11, 2003, the Agency chose to assess the interests of Pavage and the other companies in the Mathers Group on the unpaid balance in accordance with a new amendment of March 20, 2003, since Pavage had not yet paid the amounts required.

[41] Guy Léonard ended his affidavit by noting that the conciliation of September 12, 2007, to which Marcel Kessiby refers at paragraph 31 of his affidavit of March 28, 2010, was incomplete because it only constituted the last two pages of the 13-page e-mail sent by André Ruoette of the Shawinigan Tax Centre and who, on page two of his e-mail referred specifically to the assessment issued on May 26, 2004 (see Exhibit 13 of Guy Léonard's affidavit).

Analysis

Standard of review

[42] Relying on the Federal Court of Appeal in Lanno v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 153, Pavage argued that the standard of review on the discretionary decisions rendered under the Act's fairness provisions is that of reasonableness and that, in the circumstances of this case, the February 2, 2010, decision was not reasonable for the following reasons:

The decision-maker did not consider all the circumstances beyond Pavage's control, resulting in it not being aware of the May 26, 2004, notice of assessment before the limitation period.

The decision-maker did not consider that the Agency had not exercised a reasonable amount of care in the circumstances and, specifically, that it was because of the Agency that Pavage believed that it had fulfilled all his obligations following the November 2002 agreement.

The decision-maker did not apply the applicable guidelines citing Cole v. Canada (Auditor General), 2005 FC 1445.

[43] The Agency submits that that the applicable standard of review is correctness because the issue of review centres on a question of law, that is, the interpretation of the Act. The Agency recognizes that, normally, exercising discretion is reviewed on a reasonableness standard, except if it is an issue of legislative interpretation.

[44] The Supreme Court of Canada in Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, changed the law with respect to the standard of judicial review. I find that this decision established the following principles:

Pure questions of law are reviewable on a correctness standard.

The issue of whether a court exercised its discretion appropriately in law is reviewable on a standard of reasonableness.

A decision based on a question of fact is reviewable on the standard of reasonableness with the qualification made by the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339 on the significance of section 18.1(4)(d) of the Federal Courts Act.

[45] In this case, I find that:

The issue of limitation is moot because of Bozzer.

The issue of whether the Agency complied with the agreement is a mixed question of fact and law reviewable on the standard of reasonableness.

The issue of whether the discoverability principle is applicable is a question of fact reviewable on the standard of reasonableness.

Findings

[46] I have two issues to determine: (1) Did the Agency comply with the agreement, and; (2) was the discoverability principle established?

[47] I think that the first issue is relevant to Pavage's request for relief and I find that the evidence filed by the Agency clearly demonstrates that the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, complies with the agreement. I list this evidence:

The purpose of the notice of assessment of May 26, 2004, was to disallow the farm loss. The agreement is clear on this point.

Marcel Kessiby acknowledges that the reassessment of May 24, 2004, had to be issued and that the effect of it was to create a debt of $341,805 payable by Pavage and also that interests could be payable (see his cross-examination cited by the Agency in the respondent's record, at paragraph 28(e), page 243).

The Agency did not charge interest to Pavage's debt in compliance with the agreement of November 25, 2002, and its first amendment, but nevertheless, on March 11, 2003, it chose to assess the interest of Pavage and the other companies of the Mathers Group on the unpaid balance in compliance with the amendment of March 20, 2003 (affidavit of Guy Léonard, at paragraph 6).
The amount of $2,502,324 established for the purposes of the November 25, 2002, agreement on the Mathers Group debt did not include the future assessment of May 26, 2004, as appears in a chart prepared by Marcel Kessiby on or around March 17, 2003 (affidavit of Guy Léonard, respondents' record, page 26, at paragraph e).
[48] As to whether the discoverability principle could benefit Pavage, I agree with the counsel for the Agency that Pavage was sufficiently aware that the notice of reassessment of May 26, 2004, had been issued to enable it to act by requesting relief subject to the issue of the waiver. This awareness results from the numerous documents that the Agency sent to Pavage, always at the same address at 400 Hector Lanthier Street, St. Eustache, Quebec. Pavage did not deny that the documents were received.
[50] For these reasons, the judicial review must be dismissed.

Reliance on Erroneous 3rd Party Advice Not "Extra-Ordinary Circumstances"
When a taxpayer obtains an opinion from either a lawyer or an accountant on her tax affairs, and it turns out to be wrong, what happens on a Fairness Application when interest and penalties are applied on assessment? This was the case in Toastmaster Inc. v The Minister Of National Revenue As Represented By The Attorney General Of Canada[23] where a taxpayer had a permanent residence in Canada but was advised by its first tax accountants that it did not have one thus no need to file T2s. When subsequent proper advice proved otherwise considerable interest and penalties were applied and the Trial Ct. had to consider whether the 1st tax advice qualified as extra-ordinary circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control. It held:

> An outstanding balance had been allowed to exist and accrue interest, because tax became payable in June 2001 but was not remitted to the CRA until March 2008;

[23] 2011 FC 1309

Digitized by Google

Toastmaster had not exercised reasonable care, nor had it acted quickly to remedy any delays or omissions, given that:
The requirement to file a T2 return for a corporation is not dependent on having a PE in Canada, pursuant to s 150 of the ITA;
Toastmaster did not demonstrate that it had exercised a reasonable amount of care under the self-assessment system; and
- There was no demonstration of extenuating circumstances to justify waiving the arrears interest assessed, because taxpayers are generally liable for errors made by third parties.

[21] Toastmaster submits that the wording of s 220(3.1) discloses no requirement to demonstrate "extraordinary circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control", contrary to paragraph 25(a) of the Guidelines. Toastmaster relies on Nixon v Minister of National Revenue, 2008 FC 917 at para 5, [Nixon], where the Court noted that s 220(3.1) gives the Minister broad, open-ended discretion, and that the Guidelines themselves are non-binding. Toastmaster also notes that the jurisprudence has held that the Guidelines "are not intended to be exhaustive or to restrict the spirit or intent of the legislation": Lalonde c Canada (Agence du revenu), 2008 CF 183 at para 9; Nixon, above at para 6; Spence v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010 FC 52 at paras 25-26, [Spence]. Toastmaster notes that in Spence, above at paras 30-31, Justice John O'Keefe determined that it is for the Minister to look beyond the Guidelines and apply the broad discretion he is afforded by the ITA. Toastmaster says that the Minister's delegates failed to consider its particular circumstances, failed to apply the broad discretion given under s 220(3.1), and allowed reliance on the Guidelines to impede the exercise of that discretion.

[26] First, Toastmaster submits that the Minister's delegates failed to take into account the errors made by third parties acting on behalf of the taxpayer. While third party errors are generally not grounds for relief, the Minister's Guidelines at para 35 refer to the possibility of taking these errors into account in "exceptional situations".

[27] Second, Toastmaster says that the Minister's delegate failed to take into account the fact that it acted quickly to remedy its situation, and voluntarily brought the matter to the attention of the CRA by making submissions under the VDP.

[32] The Minister's delegates were well aware of Toastmaster's submissions with respect to the third party errors they claim were made by Deloitte & Touche. However, in an exercise of their discretion afforded to them under the ITA, they concluded that Toastmaster had not adequately explained why its T2 returns had never been filed. Information that was publicly available at the time indicated that even if a corporation did not have a PE, it would still be required to file T2 returns. This failure indicated that reasonable care had not been exercised, especially in the absence of any obviously extenuating circumstances.

[33] It is true that Toastmaster voluntarily brought its situation to the CRA's attention through the VDP. However, it is arguable whether it did so "quickly". In one sense, it acted quickly once it discovered its problems, sometime between 2004 and 2006. On the other hand, with reasonable care, the problem would have been discovered many years earlier.

Taxpayer's Right to Review Decision Before It is Made and Demands for Specific Foundation(s) of Decision

Whether or not a taxpayer is allowed the discretion of a waiver depends on the details of the request by which the Minister's official evaluates and HOW they are evaluated in granting it. It is in the taxpayer's interest to provide as much evidence as possible that authenticates the reasons why she feels she is entitled to a waiver. When full disclosure is provided and the taxpayer still disagrees is she entitled to have her interpretation of the details rank and gain an understanding, through disclosure, of how the CRA arrived at theirs? This was the case in Dolores Sherry v The Minister of National Revenue[24] where the court considered whether a financial hardship based request and there was disagreement on its denial. It held:

> THE ISSUES
> [8] The Applicant has raised the following issues:
> 1. Are the reasons adequate?
> 2. Should she have been given an opportunity to comment on CRA's conclusions before the Decision was made?
> 3. Is CRA entitled to rely on the affidavit of James McNamara sworn on September 2, 2010 [the Affidavit] to supplement its reasons and is the material it exhibits unintelligible?
> 4. Did the Minister err in the exercise of his discretion?
> THE STANDARD OF REVIEW
> [9] In my view, the first three issues involve questions of procedural fairness. "Correctness" is the standard of review for such issues. The correctness standard was applied (i) to review the adequacy of reasons rendered under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, see Hi-Tech Seals Inc. v Canada (Minister of National Revenue), 2009 FC 901, at para. 13, (ii) to determine whether claimaints should have the opportunity to comment on CRA's conclusions, see Costabile v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2008 FC 943, at para. 25 and (iii) to review CRA's attempt to supplement its reasons with affidavit material, see Adams v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2009 DTC 5174, at paras. 2 and 11-12.
> [10] The last issue is to be reviewed using the reasonableness standard. The Federal Court of Appeal has confirmed that reasonableness is the appropriate standard of review to apply to a discretionary decision of the Minister under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, see Telfer v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2009 FCA 23, at para. 24-27 and Slau Ltd. v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2009 FCA 270, at para. 27.
> 1. The Adequacy of the Reasons
> [11] The Applicant submits that the Decision fails to provide adequate reasons because she has not been told what facts CRA relied on, what methods it used in its calculations and what assumptions it made.
> [12] The Respondent acknowledges that CRA's Taxpayer Bill of Rights promises reasons but its position is that comprehensive detailed reasons are not required. The Respondent says that, because the Decision is highly discretionary, there is a low threshold for the adequacy of reasons which is met by the Decision in this case. The Decision shows that, because of positive cash flow in eight of eleven years and because of significant equity in real estate properties, CRA found no financial hardship.
> [13] In my view, the real question is whether the Applicant needs further information to make the reasons intelligible. The Respondent suggests that because the Decision is largely based on information supplied by the Applicant, she has no need of further material.
> [14] However, I am not persuaded by this submission. While it is true that the Applicant provided her income and expenses in 2001, CRA extrapolated those figures to generate a cash flow summary for the years 1989 to 2005. As well, when it considered whether she had equity in her real estate holdings, CRA relied, in part, on its own appraised values of the Applicant's properties.
> [15] I have concluded that the Decision does not provide adequate reasons. However, a twelve page document entitled Taxpayer Relief Report signed on October 29 and 30, 2009 and informally called a "Fairness Report" gives the Applicant the information she needs. It was filed as part of the Applicant's record on November 22, 2010 and counsel for CRA has advised the Court that there is no reason why it could not have accompanied the Decision. Had it done so, the reasons would have been sufficient.

[24] 2011 FC 1208

2. A Right to Comment

[16] The Applicant also submits that she should have had an opportunity to comment on CRA's conclusions before the Decision was made.

[17] In Costabile v Canada (Revenue Agency), above at para. 9, the applicant took issue with the fact that he was afforded no opportunity to discuss the review or the outcome of his request for reassessment under subsection 152(4.2) of the Act. Mr. Justice Russell noted at para. 37 that, while the CRA must exercise its discretion under both subsections 152(4.2) and 220(3.1) fairly, no specific rules of procedural fairness governing that discretion are set out in the Act. The applicant in Costabile was given an opportunity to submit relevant information and documents when he submitted his request for review to CRA. The Court therefore rejected his argument that CRA was required to seek further information, documents or submissions prior to exercising its discretion to deny his request.

[18] I draw the same conclusion here. The Applicant was afforded ample opportunity to provide all necessary information to CRA when she submitted her request for review. The rules of procedural fairness did not entitle her to further comment before the Decision was made.

3. CRA'S Affidavit

[19] I have determined that the Affidavit was not filed to supplement the Reasons as the Applicant alleges. The Decision alone has been considered on the issue of the adequacy of the reasons and has been found wanting.

[20] In my view, the Affidavit was properly filed to respond to the Applicant's allegation that the Decision is unreasonable. Further, I should observe that I do not agree with the suggestion in the Applicant's Supplementary Memorandum that the exhibits to the Affidavit are unintelligible and I note that no oral submissions were made to that effect.

4. Reasonableness

[21] The Applicant challenged the reasonableness of the Decision and asked for an order that it be reconsidered. However, no written or oral submissions were made to demonstrate that the Decision was unreasonable. No evidence was adduced about the state of the real estate market which might have suggested that CRA's finding that the Applicant had equity in her properties was unreasonable. It appears that the Applicant's apparent inability to sell her properties was caused by her decision to set very high listing prices.

[22] Further, with regard to the cash flow statements, no material was filed by the Applicant to suggest that CRA's conclusions were unjustified.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

STRATAS J.A.

Introduction

[1] Before this Court are six appeals from six judgments of the Federal Court (per Justice Mandamin): 2010 FC 892, 2010 FC 893, 2010 FC 894, 2010 FC 895, 2010 FC 897, 2010 FC 898. In each, the Federal

Digitized by Google

Court dismissed an application for judicial review brought by the taxpayer concerning a decision by the Minister of National Revenue. In each, for identical reasons, the Minister refused the taxpayer relief from penalties and interest under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.).

[2] Since the facts and the law are substantially the same in each matter, this Court consolidated the appeals, the appeal in file A-376-10 being designated as the lead appeal. A copy of these reasons for judgment will be filed in each of files A-374-10, A-375-10, A-376-10, A-377-10, A-378-10 and A-382-10, and shall serve as this Court's reasons for judgment in each appeal. Given the identical nature of the appellant's submissions, the Minister's decision for each appellant, and the Federal Court's decision, these reasons will speak of one decision, one decision letter and one Federal Court decision.

[3] In my view, for the reasons set out below, the Minister's decision falls outside the range of defensibility and acceptability and, thus, is unreasonable. However, the relief is discretionary. In these particular circumstances, no practical end would be accomplished by setting aside the Minister's decision and returning the matter back to him for redetermination: the Minister could not reasonably grant relief on these facts. Therefore, I would dismiss the appeals.

The basic facts

Background information

[4] The Act requires persons to file certain forms in certain circumstances. These forms convey information to the Canada Revenue Agency. The Canada Revenue Agency uses this information to discharge its responsibilities under the Act.

[5] Form T1135 is one such form. This form must be filed by taxpayers who own specified foreign property, the total cost amount of which is over $100,000: subsection 233.3(3) of the Act.

[6] The appellants were obligated to file this form for each of the 2000 to 2003 taxation years. They did so, but were late. Due to their lateness, the Minister assessed penalties and interest against the appellants.

[7] The appellants sought relief from the penalties and interest from the Minister. The Minister can grant such relief under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. Broadly speaking, the appellants alleged that they had made an innocent mistake and that it would be unfair to levy penalties and interest in the amounts assessed.

How the late filings happened

[8] The appellants employed a common financial representative to make all tax filings on their behalf.

[9] For the 1998 and 1999 taxation years, the appellants' representative filed the appellants' Forms T1135 on time. However, for the 2000 to 2003 taxation years, the appellants' representative formed the view, contrary to the wording of subsection 233.3(3) of the Act, that it was unnecessary to file the forms. The appellants' representative felt that the Canada Revenue Agency was getting all the information it needed from other filings made by the appellants' Canadian investment managers.

[10] Specifically, the appellants' representative believed that Form T1135 did not need to be filed where a foreign investment portfolio was managed by a Canadian investment manager subject to Canadian tax reporting requirements. In his view, that was the case with each of the appellants. However, as the appellants' representative conceded in a letter dated June 2, 2005, that logic did not apply to the appellant Canwest Communications Corporation, which had U.S. investments administered by U.S. fund managers.

[11] Somewhat later, the Canada Revenue Agency alerted the appellants to the fact that they had not filed their forms for some time. The appellants complied, filing their forms late and explaining their misunderstanding.

The appellants' request for relief from interest and penalties and the first level administrative decision

[12] The appellants' financial representative wrote on behalf of the appellants to the Fairness Committee of the Canada Revenue Agency, requesting relief under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act against the penalties and interest assessed against the appellants for their late filings of the forms. The representative conceded that the delay in filing was "a conscious decision" but was done in the mistaken belief, described above, that the forms did not need to be filed. The representative explained that it was guilty of "administrative oversight."

[13] In its first level administrative decision, the Canada Revenue Agency denied the appellants' request for relief. It found that the appellants did not fall within one of the three specific scenarios set out in Information Circular (IC) 07-01 ("Taxpayer Relief Provisions"), a policy statement issued by the Minister. These three specific scenarios are extraordinary circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control, actions of the Canada Revenue Agency, and inability to pay. The Canada Revenue Agency also denied the appellants' request for relief under a "one chance policy" that existed at the time. The appellants failed to qualify under that policy because they filed the forms only as a result of an inquiry made by the Canada Revenue Agency.

The appellants' further request for relief from interest and penalties and the Minister's decision

[14] Dissatisfied, the appellants made a second level request for relief to a delegate of the Minister (hereafter, the "Minister"). They explained that their representative had engaged in an "administrative oversight." They enclosed their previous correspondence that explained that the representative believed that the forms did not need to be filed because the Canada Revenue Agency was getting information about the appellants' foreign holdings from other filings. They suggested that the delay of the Canada Revenue Agency should result in some relaxation in the interest charges. Finally, they also argued that there was an "error of omission common to all entities" and so the penalty, levied for each of the six appellants, should be substantially reduced.

[15] The Minister set out his reasons in a decision letter. In his decision letter, the Minister partly granted the appellants' request for relief. He was prepared to reduce the interest charged during six months due to the Canada Revenue Agency's delay in replying to the appellants. The Minister denied the remainder of the appellants' request for relief.

The applications to the Federal Court for judicial review

[16] The appellants applied to the Federal Court for judicial review of the Minister's denial of relief.

[17] In the Federal Court, and also in this Court, the appellants focused on the reasons set out in the Minister's decision letter. They submitted that the Minister improperly narrowed the scope of discretion permitted to him under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. In their view, the Minister had regard only to the three scenarios of relief specifically set out in the Information Circular rather than the general concept of fairness under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. In other words, the Minister improperly fettered his discretion.

[18] The appellants also submitted that the Minister's refusals of relief on the facts of this case could not be sustained under the standard of review of reasonableness.

The Federal Court's decision

Digitized by Google

[19] The Federal Court rejected the appellants' submissions. It found that the Minister had not fettered his discretion. Instead, he was aware of the full extent of his discretion and decided against granting relief. The Federal Court based this conclusion on the fact that the Minister had before him an array of material that went beyond the three scenarios set out in the Information Circular, such as the submissions of the appellant and a wide-ranging Taxpayer Relief Report. The Federal Court also found that the Minister fully addressed the appellants' requests for relief and reached a conclusion that passed muster under the standard of review of reasonableness.

Analysis

The standard of review to be applied

[20] The Federal Court held that the standard of review of the Minister's decision is reasonableness. In this Court, the parties accept this. This Court can interfere only if the Minister reached an outcome that is indefensible and unacceptable on the facts and the law: Canada Revenue Agency v. Telfer, 2009 FCA 23 at paragraphs 24-28; Canada Revenue Agency v. Slau Ltd., 2009 FCA 270 at paragraph 27; Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 at paragraph 47, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190.

[21] The appellants' submissions, while based on reasonableness, seem to articulate "fettering of discretion" outside of the Dunsmuir reasonableness analysis. They seem to suggest that "fettering of discretion" is an automatic ground for setting aside administrative decisions and we need not engage in a Dunsmuir-type reasonableness review.

[22] On this, there is authority on the appellants' side. For many decades now, "fettering of discretion" has been an automatic or nominate ground for setting aside administrative decision-making: see, for example, Maple Lodge Farms Ltd. v. Government of Canada, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 2 at page 6. The reasoning goes like this. Decision-makers must follow the law. If the law gives them discretion of a certain scope, they cannot, in a binding way, cut down that scope. To allow that is to allow them to rewrite the law. Only Parliament or its validly authorized delegates can write or rewrite law.

[23] This sits uncomfortably with Dunsmuir, in which the Supreme Court's stated aim was to simplify judicial review of the substance of decision-making by encouraging courts to conduct one, single methodology of review using only two standards of review, correctness and reasonableness. In Dunsmuir, the Supreme Court did not discuss how automatic or nominate grounds for setting aside the substance of decision-making, such as "fettering of discretion," fit into the scheme of things. Might the automatic or nominate grounds now be subsumed within the rubric of reasonableness review? On this question, this Court recently had a difference of opinion: Kane v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 FCA 19. But, in my view, this debate is of no moment where we are dealing with decisions that are the product of "fettered discretions." The result is the same.

[24] Dunsmuir reaffirms a longstanding, cardinal principle: "all exercises of public authority must find their source in law" (paragraphs 27-28). Any decision that draws upon something other than the law – for example a decision based solely upon an informal policy statement without regard or cognizance of law, cannot fall within the range of what is acceptable and defensible and, thus, be reasonable as that is defined in Dunsmuir at paragraph 47. A decision that is the product of a fettered discretion must per se be unreasonable. [25] In the circumstances of this case, if the Minister did not draw upon the law that was the source of his authority, namely subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, and instead fettered his discretion by having regard only to the three specific scenarios set out in the Information Circular, his decisions cannot be regarded as reasonable under Dunsmuir.

Subsection 220(3.1) of the Act

[26] Subsection 220(3.1) of the Act provides that if an application for relief is made in time, the Minister has discretion to grant relief against penalties and interest. Subsection 220(3.1) reads as follows:

220. (3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

[27] The scope of the Minister's discretion under this subsection is determined, like any other matters of statutory interpretation, by examining the statutory words setting out the discretion (here unqualified), the other sections of the Act which may provide context, and the purposes underlying the section and the Act itself. When that examination is conducted, it is fair to say that the scope of the Minister's discretion is broader than the three specific scenarios set out in the Information Circular.

Does the Minister's decision pass muster under the standard of review of reasonableness?

[28] In my view, the Minister fettered his discretion, and thereby made an unreasonable decision. He did not draw upon subsection 220(3.1) of the Act to guide his discretion. He looked exclusively to the Information Circular. This is seen from the Minister's reasons for decision.

The Minister's reasons for decision, as evidenced by his decision letter

[29] In his decision letter, the Minister sets out reasons for his decision. At the beginning of the decision letter, the Minister mentions that his decision falls under "Taxpayer Relief Legislation." He explains that this legislation "gives the Minister the discretion to waive or cancel all or part of any penalty or interest payable." At this point, he says nothing about the scope of his discretion under this legislation. He never does.

[30] In the next sentence in his decision letter, the Minister defines the scope of his discretion, limiting it somewhat. He does this by reference to the Information Circular, not subsection 220(3.1). Specifically, he states that his discretion is to be guided by "whether the penalty or interest resulted from extraordinary circumstances, is due mainly to actions of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), or…[is due to an] inability to pay." As we have seen in paragraph 13 above, these are the three specific scenarios set out in the Information Circular for the granting of relief. These words show that the Minister was limiting his consideration to the three circumstances set out in the Information Circular, and was not considering the broad terms of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act.

[31] Alone, reference to a policy statement, such as the Information Circular, is not necessarily a cause for concern. Often administrative decision-makers use policy statements to guide their decision-making. As I mention at the end of these reasons, such use is acceptable and helpful, within limits. But many administrative decision-makers are careful to note those limits – policy statements can only be a guide, and, in the end, it is the governing law that must be interpreted and applied. In his decision letter, however, the Minister did not note any limits on his use of the Information Circular.

[32] In the next portion of his decision letter, the Minister stated that the appellants sought relief on the basis of "administrative oversight." This was incomplete: as mentioned in paragraph 14, above, the appellants offered other explanations and justifications. The Minister never addressed these in his decision letter. The Minister responded to the appellants' explanation of "administrative oversight" by reminding them about their responsibility to determine and follow the deadlines set out in the Act.

[33] Next, the Minister turned to the appellants' request for interest relief due to the Canada Revenue Agency's delay. Here, as mentioned in paragraph 15 above, he granted limited relief. In granting that relief, the Minister did not refer to the Information Circular. However, delay by the Canada Revenue Agency does fit within the second scenario set out in the Information Circular for the granting of relief, namely conduct by the Agency.

[34] At the end of his decision letter, the Minister refused the rest of the relief sought by the appellants. In support of this, he offered the following explanation:

While I can sympathize with your position, the Taxpayer Relief Provisions do not allow for cancellation of penalties and interest when a Taxpayer, or their representative, lacks knowledge or fails to meet filing deadlines. I trust this explains the Agency's position in this matter.

[35] This passage offers further evidence that the Minister was restricting his consideration to the three scenarios set out in the Information Circular and was not drawing upon subsection 220(3.1) of the Act as the source of his decision-making power. This is seen from the Minister's reference to the "Taxpayer Relief Provisions" – the title of the Information Circular – as the source of his decision-making power, not subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. On a fair reading of this passage, the Minister denied the appellants relief because their claims for relief did not fit within the scenarios set out in the Information Circular.

Does the record before the Minister shed any further light on the Minister's decision?

[36] The respondent urges us to go beyond the stated reasons in the Minister's decision letter. It points to the record that was placed before the Minister, and an affidavit filed with the Federal Court. The respondent submits that these materials demonstrate that the Minister drew upon more than the Information Circular as the source of his authority.

[37] I agree that the reasons in a decision letter should not be examined in isolation. Reasons can sometimes be understood by appreciating the record that was placed before the administrative decision-maker: Vancouver International Airport Authority v. Public Service Alliance of Canada, 2010 FCA 158 at paragraph 17.

[38] But sometimes the record is of no assistance. That is the case here. While the Minister had a broad record before him, his decision letter shows no awareness that he could go beyond the Information Circular. To the contrary, his decision letter shows an understanding – faulty – that he was governed exclusively by the Information Circular. Further, as explained in paragraph 32, above, the Minister did not seem to have full and accurate regard to key portions of the record before him, namely the explanations and justifications in letters sent by the appellants. In such circumstances, resort to the record to explain why the Minister decided in the way that he did is not possible.

[39] The Federal Court was willing to assume that the Minister considered the record before him. In my view, that assumption was not open to it given the reasons in the preceding paragraph.

Does an affidavit filed in the Federal Court shed any further light on the Minister's decision?

[40] During argument of this appeal, the respondent referred us to an affidavit that was filed with the Federal Court. The affidavit is from the delegate of the Minister who made the decision that is the subject of judicial review in these proceedings. In that affidavit, and also in cross-examination on that affidavit, the delegate testified that he relied on other matters when he made his decision, including "the relevant sections of the Income Tax Act." The respondent points to this affidavit as evidence that the Minister had regard to the full extent of his discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act and drew upon that section as the source of his authority.

[41] The Federal Court appears to have placed no weight on this evidence. I also place no weight on it. This sort of evidence is not admissible on judicial review: Keeprite Workers' Independent Workers Union et al. and Keeprite Products Ltd. (1980), 114 D.L.R. (3d) 162 (Ont. C.A.). The decision-maker had made his decision and he was functus: Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848. After that time, he had no right, especially after a judicial review challenging his decision had been brought, to file an affidavit that supplements the bases for decision set out in the decision letter. His affidavit smacks of an after-the-fact attempt to bootstrap his decision, something that is not permitted: United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America v. Bransen Construction Ltd., 2002 NBCA 27 at paragraph 33. As a matter of common sense, any new reasons offered by a decision-maker after a challenge to a decision has been launched must be viewed with deep suspicion: R. v. Teskey, 2007 SCC 25, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 267.

[42] In this case, the Minister was obligated to disclose the full and true bases for his decision at the time of decision. The decision letter, viewed alongside the proper record of the case, is where the bases for decision must be found. In this case, the proper record sheds no light on the bases for the Minister's decision, and so the bases set out in the Minister's decision letter must speak for themselves.

Conclusion: the Minister's decision was unreasonable

[43] I conclude that in making his decision the Minister did not draw upon the law that was the source of his authority, namely subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. Instead, he drew upon the Information Circular, and nothing else. His decision thereby became unreasonable.

Should the decision be set aside and the matter returned to the Minister for redetermination?

[44] Just because a decision is unreasonable does not mean that it must automatically be set aside and returned to the decision-maker for redetermination. Relief on an application for judicial review is discretionary.

[45] In particular, this Court may decline to grant relief for an unreasonable decision where, for example, there is no substantial miscarriage of justice or the granting of relief would serve no practical end: MiningWatch Canada v. Canada (Fisheries and Oceans), 2010 SCC 2, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 6; Community Panel of the Adams Lake Indian Band v. Adams

Lake Band, 2011 FCA 37.

[46] In this case, there would be no practical end served in setting aside the Minister's decision and returning the matter to him for redetermination. The excuses and justifications offered by the appellants for the delay in filing and the grounds offered in support of relief have no merit. The Minister could not reasonably accept them and grant relief under subsection 230(3.1) of the Act. Returning the matter back to the Minister would be an exercise in futility.

[47] The appellants say that their financial representative had a reasonable but mistaken belief that filing the form was not obligatory. This is belied by the fact that it did file the forms for the 1998 and 1999 taxation years. It knew that the Act required that the forms be filed and filed them.

[48] After the 1999 taxation year, the appellants' representative consciously chose not to comply with the Act. It did so on the basis that the Canada Revenue Agency was getting information from other sources, such as the appellants' Canadian money managers. As it turned out, this basis did not apply to the appellant Canwest Communications Corporation.

[49] Even if the Canada Revenue Agency was getting the information from other sources, this cannot be an acceptable excuse or mitigating factor for non-compliance in the circumstances of this case, especially where we are dealing with the appellants' representative, a professional firm that deals with tax matters. It is notorious that in various provisions of the Act, the Canada Revenue Agency is allowed to obtain the same type of information from different sources. This allows it to verify compliance with the Act. For example, an employer is obligated to file T-4 slips reporting the income it has paid to its employees. At the same time, the employees disclose their income from employment. The employers' and employees' figures should match. What if the employer, after filing T-4 forms for a period of years, consciously declined to file the T-4 slips and then argued that it should avoid penalties because the Canada Revenue Agency would get information about the employees' income from the employees? In those circumstances, would there be any case for relief? Of course not.

[50] In this case, compliance was fully within the appellants' control. Compliance happened in the 1998 and 1999 taxation years and there were no new extenuating circumstances that might explain the later non- compliance. These facts fall outside of what this Court has identified as being a focus of subsection 220(3.1), namely the granting of relief where there are extenuating circumstances beyond the control of the person seeking relief: Bozzer v. Canada, 2011 FCA 186 at paragraph 22.

[51] The appellants also argued that it is unfair for the Minister to levy six separate, sizeable penalties against the six appellants when there was really only one mistake made by their one common representative. The appellants contended that the penalties should be substantially reduced for that reason. This argument, smacking of a plea for a "volume discount," has no merit. Each of the appellants is a separate legal entity and a separate taxpayer, potentially subject to penalties and interest for its own non-compliance. Each is capable of independent decision-making concerning the forms that are to be filed. Each, accepting the risk, chose instead to have a representative look after the filings. That risk materialized: their representative made a conscious decision not to file the forms, a decision made without reasonable excuse or justification, as explained above. Granting relief under subsection 220(3.1) on the basis of this argument would be an unreasonable exercise of discretion.

[52] I accept that the normal remedy for an unreasonable decision is to set it aside and return the matter back to the decision-maker for redetermination. I also accept that this

Court should be reluctant to wade into the merits of administrative decision-making. But there are cases, perhaps rare, where no practical end would be served by returning the matter back to the decision-maker. This is just such a case.

[53] In these circumstances, the appellants' explanations and justifications are entirely without merit. The appellants could not succeed on them if we returned the matter to the Minister for redetermination. Similar to what happened in MiningWatch Canada, supra, the Minister made an unreasonable decision but no practical end would be served in returning the matter back to him for redetermination. Therefore, in this case, I would decline to do so.

Postscript

[54] So that these reasons provide proper guidance and are not misunderstood and misapplied in future cases, I wish to make three brief observations.

I

[55] Portions of the language used in the decision letter in this case are identical to that used in other decision letters: see, for example, Spence v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2010 FC 52. In itself, there is nothing wrong with using form letters or stock language taken from other decision letters. The reasons offered in one case can be appropriate for other cases, and the repeat use of those reasons is efficient. However, as this case shows, a blind use of form letters or stock language can sometimes lead to trouble.

[56] Whether the reasons are cut and pasted from a previous letter, are slightly modified from a previous letter or have to be drafted from scratch, the final product issued to the applicant for relief under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act should show an awareness of the scope of the available discretion under the Act, offer brief reasons why relief could or could not be given in the particular circumstances, and meaningfully address the arguments made that have a chance of success. If the reasons do not deal with one or more of these matters – something that can happen through careless or unthinking use of a form letter or stock language – the decision may not pass muster under the standard of review of reasonableness.

II -

[57] The foregoing comment and these reasons should not be taken to impose onerous new reasons- giving requirements upon the Minister. In this case, all that was required was perhaps a few additional lines in a letter that was just 33 lines long: Vancouver International Airport Authority, supra at paragraphs 16 and 17.

III -

[58] Finally, these reasons should not be taken to cast any doubt on the ability of administrative decision-makers, such as the Minister, to use policy statements, such as the Information Circular in this case, as an aid or guide to their decision-making.

[59] Policy statements play a useful and important role in administration: Thamotharem v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 FCA 198, [2008] 1 F.C.R. 385. For example, by encouraging the application of consistent principle in decisions, policy statements allow those subject to administrative decision-making to understand how discretions are likely to be exercised. With that understanding, they can better plan their affairs.

administrative policy is not law. It cannot cut down the discretion that the law gives to a decision-maker. It cannot amend the legislator's law. A policy can aid or guide the exercise of discretion under a law, but it cannot dictate in a binding way how that discretion is to be exercised.

[61] In this case, the Minister ran afoul of these principles. Fortunately for him, however, he reached the only reasonable outcome on these facts.

Proposed disposition

[62] For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeals. However, in light of the unreasonableness of the Minister's decisions, I would not award the respondent in each appeal its costs of the appeal.

(as represented by the Minister of National Revenue in his capacity as Minister responsible for the Income Tax Act), CANADA REVENUE AGENCY and THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA
Respondents

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT STRATAS J.A.

[1] Subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) allows the Minister to waive or cancel any portion of interest or penalties owing under the Act. It prescribes a ten year limitation period. But how is that ten year period to be determined? The answer to that question, a question of statutory interpretation, will determine the outcome of this appeal.

[2] The Federal Court judge agreed with the Minister's view of how the ten year period is to be determined under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act: 2010 FC 139 (CanLII), 2010 FC 139. The appellant, Mr. Bozzer, disagrees and, in this Court, proposes an interpretation that is more generous to taxpayers.

[3] As this is a legal issue concerning the proper interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, the standard of review of the decision of the Federal Court judge is correctness: Redeemer Foundation v. M.N.R., 2006 FCA 325 (CanLII), 2006 FCA 325 at paragraph 24 (affirmed, without comment on this point, at 2008 SCC 46 (CanLII), [2008] 2 S.C.R. 643, 2008 SCC 46).

[4] For the reasons below, I am of the view that Mr. Bozzer's interpretation ofsubsection 220(3.1) is the correct one.

Digitized by Google

[5] Subsection 220(3.1) provides as follows:

220. (3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest. [emphasis added]

The basic facts

[6] On December 6, 2005, at a time when Mr. Bozzer had tax debts that arose in his 1989 and 1990 taxation years, Mr. Bozzer applied to the Minister under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act for a waiver of interest accrued on the tax debt.

[7] The Minister denied the application for the following reasons:

As of January 1, 2005, the Agency's policy with regards to fairness requests was amended to exclude debts over 10 years of age from the date of submission. The ten years expired on December 31, 1999 for the 1989 taxation year and December 31, 2000 for the 1990 taxation year. For this reason we are unable to consider your request for departmental delay or error and have concluded it would not be appropriate to cancel or waive the interest.

[8] Mr. Bozzer applied to the Minister for a second-level review. The Minister denied that application as well, for the following reasons:

The above legislation [subsection 220(3.1)] is applicable because you applied for interest cancellation on December 6, 2005. Therefore the Minister has no discretion under subsection 220(3.1) to waive or cancel any interest otherwise payable under the Act in respect of your 1989 and 1990 taxation years. This is because it has been more than ten calendar years since the ends of your 1989 and 1990 taxation years. In addition, you applied after 2004, which is more than ten calendar years after the ends of your 1989 and 1990 taxation years.

[9] Mr. Bozzer applied to the Federal Court for judicial review of the Minister's decision. The Federal Court judge dismissed the application, finding (at paragraph 51 of his reasons for judgment) that "the time limit in subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA is for the ten calendar years after the relevant taxation year, namely the year of assessment." In my view, this interpretation cannot stand, as the ten year period in subsection 220(3.1) of the Act does not start in the year of assessment. Nowhere does subsection 220(3.1) mention the year of assessment as a relevant consideration.

The parties' competing interpretations of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act and how they apply to the facts of this case

[10] Before this Court, the parties presented competing interpretations of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. These competing interpretations result in drastically different results on the facts of this case.

[11] The parties' competing interpretations of subsection 220(3.1) concern only a portion of it and relate particularly to the phrase "interest payable in respect of [a] taxation year" (« d'intérêts payable pour [une] année d'miposition »):

220. (3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer…waive or cancel all or any portion of any …interest…payable…by the taxpayer…in respect of that taxation year…. [emphasis added]

Mr. Bozzer's interpretation

[12] Mr. Bozzer submits that "interest…payable…in respect of [a] taxation year" means any interest accrued in that taxation year on a tax debt. On his view of the matter, subsection 220(3.1) permits the Minister to exercise his discretion to cancel interest accrued in any taxation year ending within ten years before the taxpayer's application for relief, regardless of when the underlying tax debt arose.
[13] Under this interpretation, Mr. Bozzer analyzes the facts of this case as follows. He had tax debts that arose in the 1989 and 1990 taxation years. Interest accrued on those debts in every subsequent taxation year. On December 6, 2005, he applied to the Minister for a cancellation of interest. On his view of the matter, subsection 220(3.1) permits the Minister to cancel any interest that accrued in the ten taxation years preceding his application, that is, from January 1, 1995 to December 31, 2004. On this analysis, the fact that the tax debt arose in 1989 and 1990 is irrelevant.

The Minister's interpretation
[14] The Minister disagrees. The Minister submits that"interest…payable…in respect of [a] taxation year" means any interest accrued on a tax debt that arose in that taxation year. Therefore, the Minister may exercise his discretion to waive interest otherwise payable under the Act only if a taxpayer applies within ten calendar years of the end of the taxation year in which the underlying tax debt arose.
[15] In Mr. Bozzer's case, the underlying tax debt arose in 1989 and 1990. On the Minister's view of the matter, Mr. Bozzer had to apply for a waiver of interest on his 1989 tax debt by December 31, 1999 and his 1990 tax debt by December 31, 2000.
[16] Therefore, the Minister says that he has no statutory authority to consider Mr. Bozzer's application for a waiver of interest in this case. Mr. Bozzer's application was on December 6, 2005. On the Minister's view of the matter, that was nearly five years too late.

The proper approach to interpreting provisions in taxation legislation
[17] In*Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada*, 2005 SCC 54 (CanLII), [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601, 2005 SCC 54 at paragraph 10, the Supreme Court of Canada set out the proper approach for interpreting taxation statutes:
The interpretation of a statutory provision must be made according to a textual, contextual and purposive analysis to find a meaning that is harmonious with the Act as a whole. When the words of a provision are precise and unequivocal, the ordinary meaning of the words plays a dominant role in the interpretive process. On the other hand, where the words can support more than one reasonable meaning, the ordinary meaning of the words plays a lesser role. The relative effects of ordinary meaning, context and purpose on the interpretive process may vary, but in all cases the court must seek to read the provisions of an Act as a harmonious whole.
The Supreme Court went on to observe (at paragraph 13) that the Act "remains an instrument dominated by explicit provisions dictating specific consequences, inviting a largely textual interpretation." But where the text is equivocal, "greater recourse to the context and purpose of the Act may be necessary": Placer Dome Canada Ltd.
v. Ontario (Minister of Finance),2006 SCC 20 (CanLII), [2006] 1 S.C.R. 715 at paragraph 22.

The interpretation of the text of subsection 220(3.1)
[18] The parties' submissions on how the text of subsection 220(3.1) should be interpreted, summarized above, persuade me that the text is ambiguous. The words "interest…payable…in respect of a taxation year," examined in isolation, are conceivably capable of bearing either of the meanings suggested by the parties.
[19] As part of its submissions on how the text of subsection 220(3.1) should be interpreted, the Minister submits that an earlier decision of this Court is directly on point: Montgomery v.

Digitized by Google

M.N.R., 95 D.T.C. 5032; reflex, [1995] 1
C.T.C. 196.
[20] In my view, Montgomery is distinguishable. In Montgomery, this Court did not interpret the text of subsection 220(3.1) that is in issue in this appeal. Rather, this Court interpreted a transitional provision concerningsubsection 220(3.1): S.C. 1993, c. 24, subsection 127(5). That transitional provision limited the application of subsection 220(3.1) to the "1985 and subsequent taxation years." This Court simply held (at paragraph 11) that the Minister's discretion was limited to the waiving of interest otherwise payable under the Act for a taxation year that is either the 1985 taxation year or any later taxation year. Montgomery offers no guidance on the interpretation issue before us in this appeal.
[21] Since the text in this case is equivocal, in accordance with Placer Dome, supra at paragraph 22, it will be necessary for us to have"greater recourse" to the purpose of subsection 220(3.1) and the context surrounding it.

The purpose of subsection 220(3.1)
What is the purpose?
[22] Subsection 220(3.1) is one of several taxpayer relief provisions in the Act. It was introduced in 1991 as part of what was called a "fairness package." The Minister has explained the purpose behind these provisions as follows:
The legislation gives the CRA the ability to administer the income tax system fairly and reasonably by helping taxpayers to resolve issues that arise through no fault of their own, and to allow for a common- sense approach in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, could not comply with a statutory requirement for income tax purposes.
See Information Circular 07-1,"Taxpayer Relief Provisions," May 31, 2007, at paragraph 8.
[23] In law, the Information Circulars of the Canada Revenue Agency are nothing more than administrative policy statements. They are not finally determinative of the meaning of a provision of the Act.
[24] However, in this case, the plain words of subsection 220(3.1)support the description of purpose in the above passage, and there is nothing in the history behind subsection 220(3.1) or in related sections that would cast doubt on it. Indeed, in 2004 the Department of Finance confirmed it. It stated that subsection 220(3.1) permits the Minister to waive or cancel interest or penalties "in situations where factors beyond the taxpayer's control, such as illness or a natural disaster, prevented a tax return from being filed on time": Canada, Department of Finance, 2004 Budget, Budget Plan, March 23, 2004, annex 9, at page 347.
[25] Therefore, I am prepared to accept the description of purpose in the above passage as the purpose that subsection 220(3.1) is meant to further.

Testing the parties' competing interpretations against the purpose of subsection 220(3.1) [26] One method of testing the parties' competing interpretations is to imagine factual scenarios in which subsection 220(3.1) might be applied, applysubsection 220(3.1) to those scenarios, examine the results, and then compare those results with the purpose that subsection 220(3.1) is meant to further.
[27] For this purpose, I shall examine two scenarios.
Scenario A
[28] Suppose that a taxpayer is obliged to remit income tax instalments during taxation year X but fails to do so. He files his income tax return for taxation year X on time, but fails to pay the resulting tax debt.
[29] At some point in year X+1, the Minister assesses the tax payable for taxation year X, with accrued interest, including interest on the unpaid instalments for taxation year X. Later, the taxpayer decides to apply for a cancellation of the interest accrued on the unpaid instalments for taxation year X.

[30] In this scenario, both the Minister's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) and Mr. Bozzer's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) will lead to the conclusion that the taxpayer must submit his application within ten years of the end of taxation year X.

Scenario B

[31] Suppose that this same taxpayer is about to file his income tax return for taxation year X on time. As in scenario A, the taxpayer was obliged to remit tax instalments during taxation year X but did not do so.

[32] However, in January of taxation year X+1, just before preparing the income tax return for taxation year X, the taxpayer is seriously injured in a car accident. In taxation year X+11 – after going through a coma, enduring many operations, recovering slowly, dealing with physical and mental challenges, and going through years of rehabilitation and retraining – the taxpayer finally gets around to filing his tax return for taxation year X.

[33] In taxation year X+12, the Minister assesses the tax payable for taxation year X, with accrued interest, including interest on the unpaid instalments for taxation year X. Again, the taxpayer decides to apply for a cancellation of the interest accrued on the unpaid instalments for taxation year X.

[34] On the Minister's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1), the taxpayer would be barred from asking for any waiver of interest. The tax debt on which interest accrued was eleven years ago, past the ten year limitation period.

[35] On Mr. Bozzer's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1), the taxpayer could apply for a waiver of interest that accrued during the ten taxation years preceding his application.

Assessment of the scenarios

[36] Scenario B shows that the Minister's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) leads to a harsh result that is contrary to the purpose of subsection 220(3.1): to allow taxpayers to ask for relief against penalties and interest and to allow the Minister to grant such relief where, in his view of the overall fairness of the situation, it is appropriate to do so. In the words of the Information Circular, subsection 220(3.1) is one of several that are supposed to give the Minister an ability "to administer the income tax system fairly and reasonably" by "helping taxpayers to resolve issues that arise through no fault of their own." In particular, according to the Information Circular, this subsection is one of several designed "to allow for a common-sense approach in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, could not comply with a statutory requirement for income tax purposes."

[37] Admittedly, scenario B will not be a commonly-occurring circumstance. But it does show that the Minister's interpretation can prevent him from addressing, in a fair and reasonable way, taxpayers' problems that were caused by personal misfortune or circumstances during the statutory ten year period that were beyond the taxpayers' control, contrary to the purpose ofsubsection 220(3.1).

[38] As scenario B demonstrates, Mr. Bozzer's interpretation is fairer and, thus, more consistent with the purpose of subsection 220(3.1). Mr. Bozzer's interpretation gives the Minister a greater ability to address a taxpayer's misfortune or circumstances within the statutory ten year period that were beyond the taxpayer's control.

Subsection 220(3.1), viewed contextually

The legislative history of subsection 220(3.1)

[39] Before 2004, there was no ten year limitation period in subsection 220(3.1). At any time, a taxpayer could ask the Minister to waive interest that accrued since 1985. The pre-2004 version of subsection 220(3.1) is as follows:

Digitized by Google

220. (3.1) The Minister may at any time waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership and, notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), such assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made as is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

[40] In 2004, subsection 220(3.1) was amended to include a ten year limitation period:S.C. 2005, c. 19, subsections 48(1) and (2). This resulted in the version ofsubsection 220(3.1) in issue in this case, which is reproduced here with the amendment emphasized:

220. (3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest. [emphasis added]

[41] The 2004 amendment represents a restriction of a right previously enjoyed by the taxpayer. In my view, in this particular situation, it was incumbent on Parliament to be clear in its language imposing the restriction and any doubt should be resolved in favour of the taxpayer. I note the following passage from the judgment of Estey J. in Morguard Properties Ltd. v. City of Winnipeg,1983 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1983] 2 S.C.R. 493 at page 509:

…[T]he courts require that, in order to adversely affect a citizen's right, whether as a taxpayer or otherwise, the legislature must do so expressly. Truncation of such rights may be legislatively unintended or even accidental, but the courts must look for express language in the statute before concluding that these rights have been reduced.

[42] The words chosen by Parliament are ambiguous. In my view, in this particular situation, this ambiguity should be resolved in favour of the taxpayer.

The Minister's Technical Notes

[43] The Minister submitted that certain Technical Notes published at the time of the 2004 amendment to subsection 220(3.1) are relevant to the interpretation of the subsection. The Minister submitted that the Technical Notes reveal that the ten year limitation period was introduced in 2004 because of a concern that"administrative problems would arise if the Minister were required to verify claims going back as far as 1985" (Minister's memorandum of fact and law, paragraph 44).

[44] The Minister says that if Mr. Bozzer's interpretation is adopted, the Minister might have to verify details relevant to any past taxation year, even years before 1985, as long as the interest in question had accrued within the past ten years.

[45] I do not accept this as a plausible explanation for the ten year limitation period in the case of subsection 220(3.1).

[46] It might be an explanation for other provisions that were amended to include a ten year limitation period. For example, a taxpayer might try to use subsection 152(4.2) to claim a deduction for a business expense incurred 15 years ago. In that context, the addition of a ten year limitation period to that subsection does eliminate "administrative problems." Similarly, a taxpayer might try to use subsection 220(3.2) to file an election that he or she should have filed 15 years ago. The election goes back so many years that one might anticipate"administrative problems" for the Minister.

[47] But the ten year limitation period in subsection 220(3.1) is not needed to eliminate

"administrative problems." Under subsection 220(3.1), both before and after 2004, the Minister, in considering whether to grant relief, would only have to know the amount of the original tax debt upon which interest accrued, and what payments have been made and when. From there, the interest is determined by a mathematical calculation. There is no evidence that this poses an "administrative problem," and the record discloses no basis upon which the existence of any such problem can be inferred.

[48] I would also note that, based on Montgomery, supra the Minister can never be obliged to look to years prior to 1985 when considering an application under subsection 220(3.1).

The Minister's Voluntary Disclosures Program

[49] Mr. Bozzer pointed to the Minister's Voluntary Disclosures Program as another reason why its interpretation should be accepted by this Court.

[50] The Voluntary Disclosures Program is a policy (Information Circular IC00-1R2) of the Canada Revenue Agency, not law. Under this policy, taxpayers can make disclosures to correct inaccurate or incomplete information, or to disclose information not previously reported. If the Canada Revenue Agency accepts a taxpayer's disclosure as having met the terms of the policy, it will not charge the taxpayer penalties or prosecute the taxpayer regarding the matters disclosed.

[51] Mr. Bozzer submits that the Minister's statutory authority to relieve the taxpayer of penalties in such a case is found in subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, and nowhere else. Then he points to paragraph 13 of the policy, which describes exactly what penalties can be waived under this policy:

[13] For income tax submissions made on or after January 1, 2005, the Minister's ability to grant relief is limited to any taxation year in which the submission is filed. For example: in an income tax submission made on May 1, 2007, the limitation would apply so that relief would only be available for the 1997 and subsequent taxation years.

Mr. Bozzer notes that this is consistent with his interpretation and not the Minister's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1).

[52] But policy statements are not determinative of what statutory provisions mean in law. I do not consider Mr. Bozzer's submissions on the Voluntary DisclosuresProgram to be helpful on the legal issue of how subsection 220(3.1) of the Act is properly interpreted.

Parliament's ability to draft sections in the Act that achieve the effects it wants [53] The Minister would like subsection 220(3.1) to have a forward looking effect, so that the ten year period runs forward from the year in which the tax debt occurred.

[54] As I have stated above, subsection 220(3.1) does not use language that clearly suggests that it should have a forward looking effect.

[55] But Parliament certainly knows how to draft sections that have a forward looking effect. For example, Parliament has drafted another subsection in section 220, namely subsection 220(3.201), using language that clearly causes a "forward looking effect":

220. (3.201) On application by a taxpayer, the Minister may extend the time for making an election, or grant permission to amend or revoke an election, under section 60.03 if the application is made on or before the day that is three calendar years after the taxpayer's filing- due date for the taxation year to which the election applies; and the taxpayer is resident in Canada

if the taxpayer is deceased at the time of the application, at the time that is immediately before the taxpayer's death, or in any other case, at the time of the application.

[56] If Parliament meant subsection 220(3.1) to have a forward looking effect, it certainly knew how to draft it. It did not do so. This is another consideration in support of Mr. Bozzer's interpretation of the subsection.

Effects on other sections of the Act or the administration of the Act
[57] If this Court were to adopt Mr. Bozzer's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1), would there be an unintended or unwelcome effect on other sections in the Act or in the administration of the Act? If there were, that might be a clue as to Parliament's intentions concerning subsection 220(3.1). However, in his written or oral submissions, the Minister did not identify any such effects.

Conclusion
[58] For the foregoing reasons, I agree with Mr. Bozzer's interpretation of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act.
[59] Accordingly, the Minister has the statutory authority to cancel interest on Mr. Bozzer's 1989 and 1990 tax debts, to the extent that it accrued during the ten taxation years preceding his application to the Minister for interest relief under subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. Mr. Bozzer's application was made on December 6, 2005. [60] Therefore, on the facts of this case, the interest that is the subject of Mr. Bozzer's application is the interest accrued under the Act from January 1, 1995 to December 31, 2004.
Proposed disposition
[61] Therefore, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Federal Court, allow Mr. Bozzer's application for judicial review, and refer his application for interest relief back to the Minister for reconsideration in accordance with these reasons, all with costs to Mr. Bozzer both in this Court and in the Federal Court.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

SEXTON J.A.

[1] This is an appeal from an order of the Trial Division dismissing the appellant's application for judicial review of a decision of an officer of Revenue Canada to not cancel or waive interest and penalties assessed against him. The appellant had alleged undue delay upon the part of the Minister of National Revenue in finally reassessing him.

Facts

[2] In the fall of 1993 Revenue Canada commenced an audit of the appellant's income tax returns for the years 1989 to 1992. The audit turned up evidence of previously unreported income. As a result, reassessments for those taxation years were issued on April 28, 1995. The appellant was also assessed penalties and interest in respect of each of the audited years. On June 29, 1995, the appellant filed notices of objection with respect to the reassessments. The matter was assigned to the Appeals Division of Revenue Canada in St. John's, Newfoundland. On October 31, 1995, the appellant forwarded certain requested information to Revenue Canada. As a result of staff changes and reassignments, however, it was January 23, 1998, almost 31 months after the notices were filed, before a thorough review of the objections was commenced. The review was completed on July 31, 1998.

[3] On August 27, 1998, notices of reassessment for the 1990, 1991, 1992 taxation years were issued. The amount of total income that had been assessed as a result of the 1993-1995 audit was reduced, although not to the point of eliminating the appellant's additional tax liability. The 1995 reassessment with respect to the 1989 taxation year was confirmed.

[4] On November 23, 1998, the appellant requested, pursuant to subs. 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act, that the Minister waive or cancel the penalties and interest assessed against him for the 1989 through 1992 taxation years. The appellant alleged that Revenue Canada had extended the process of dealing with his notices of objection "for an unreasonable and excessive period of time."

[5] By letter dated June 4, 1999, the Chief of Appeals, Newfoundland and Labrador Tax Services Office, denied the appellant's request. The letter stated, in part:

A detailed review of the audit process indicates that there were no undue delays during the audit as there were ongoing discussions between your representatives and the Audit Division officials throughout this period.

At the time you received your Notices of Reassessment, you became aware of the balance outstanding. You chose not to pay the amount owing and exercised your right under the Income Tax Act and filed a Notice of Objection. While this action was in progress arrears interest continued to accrue on the outstanding balance. Although the Department did not enforce payment of this balance, because of the Notice of Objection you filed, the option remained to pay the tax balance outstanding, pending the outcome of the Notice of Objection, to avoid further accumulation of interest.

It should be noted that the amount of the penalties assessed each year was not affected by the period of time it took to process the Notice of Objection. Accordingly, cancelling or waiving of the penalties would not be appropriate in the circumstances.

[6] As a result of Ministerial inquiry, a second review of the request was undertaken by the Director, Newfoundland and Labrador Tax Services office. He too denied the request, informing the appellant by letter dated July 16, 1999:

We have reviewed the facts of this case and considered the issues raised by your Representative's letter of November 23, 1998. As there is no indication that such circumstances existed in your case, I must confirm that the interest and penalties charged to you were properly assessed. Our review indicated that there were no undue delays which occurred during the audit process. With respect to the period of time this case was outstanding at the Objection stage, the Department's position is that once a Notice of Reassessment has been issued, an individual becomes aware of any balances outstanding and has the option, after a Notice of [O]bjection has been filed, to pay the outstanding balances and avoid any further accumulation of interest. At this point, payments of these balances is within the control of the individual.

[7] On judicial review of the Director's decision, the Motions Judge held that the time taken to complete the audit and initial reassessment (from the fall of 1993 to the spring of 1995) was not unreasonable.

[8] The Motions Judge went on to review the Director's denial of the appellant's request for waiver or cancellation of penalties and interest, a request made on the basis of undue delay in dealing with the notices of objection. He pointed out that the appellant had been aware in May, 1995 of the amount of taxes and interest that were payable, subject to any adjustment resulting from the notices of objection and could, in his view, have paid the taxes and interest at that time. The Motions Judge reviewed the process and factors considered by the Director in making his decision. He concluded that the decision was a reasonable one, that there was no indication of bad faith on the part of the Minister or his delegate, the Director, that there was no breach of natural justice and that there was no reliance placed on considerations extraneous to the statutory provisions.

Issues

[9] The parties agreed before us that because the penalties assessed against the appellant were related to unreported income amounts that were not altered by the 1998 reassessment, there was no need for the Court to consider whether they should be waived or cancelled. As a result, the remainder of these reasons will focus only the decision to not waive or cancel interest amounts owed by the appellant. I propose to consider the following issues:

1. Did the Minster and his delegates act "with all due dispatch" in considering the appellant' tax liability for the years 1989-1992?
2. Does the fairness provision contained in subs. 220(3.1) apply to interest accrued as a result of delays in dealing with the appellant's notices of objection?
3. Did the Minister's delegate take into account all relevant considerations in deciding whether to apply the provisions of the fairness provisions of the Income Tax Act?

Relevant Legislation

Analysis

Did the Minister and his Delegates Act "With All Due Dispatch"

[11] The appellant's original request for waiver or cancellation of interest was based only upon an allegation of delay in dealing with his notices of objection. Nevertheless, the Motions Judge considered the time taken to conduct the audit and initial reassessment. Given all of the circumstances, I agree with him that there was no undue delay on the part of the respondent during that period of time.

[12] I turn, therefore, to the period between the time of filing of the notice of objection and the final reassessment. Subsection 165(3) of the Income Tax Act requires the Minister to act "with all due dispatch" upon receipt of a notice of objection.

[13] The meaning of the phrase "with all due dispatch" has been considered by both the Tax Court of Canada and this Court. In J. Stollar Construction Ltd. v. The Minister of National Revenue, 89 D.T.C 134, Bonner, J.T.C.C. held, at 136, that the purpose of the requirement that the Minster act "with all due dispatch" is "primarily to protect the individual taxpayer by bringing certainty to his financial affairs at the earliest reasonably possible time." With respect to what constituted a reasonable period of time, the learned judge had this to say:

The words "with all due dispatch" and the words "avec toute la diligence possible" express a clear intention on the part of the legislature to require the Minister to act within a reasonable period, the length of which will vary in accordance with the circumstances of each case. The statutory language does not permit the formulation of a rigid time limit.

In the circumstances of the case before him (a six year delay in processing a tax return), he found it significant that the Minister had failed to adduce evidence to explain a delay which, on its face, was inordinate. He concluded:

It is neither desirable nor possible to identify the last day of the period reasonably required to assess in the circumstances of this case. It is sufficient to say that if the words "with all due dispatch" are not to be deprived of all meaning, the period allowed by those words must be found to have expired long before the assessment under appeal was made.

[14] A similar approach was adopted by Christie A.C.J.T.C.C. in Ginsberg v. The Queen, 94 D.T.C. 1430 at 1437:

I believe that if there is a delay that prima facie indicates a failure to examine and assess a return with all due dispatch as required under subsection 152(1) of the Act there is an onus on the respondent to establish by evidence pertaining to the manner in which that return was dealt with that the delay was not unreasonable. ...

In the case at hand the lapse of time between the receipt of the returns and the assessments was one and one-half years. It strikes me that on the face of it this is a failure to meet the requirements of subsection 152(1) that returns of income shall be examined and assessed with all due dispatch. If there were evidence of some special circumstance relating to the appellant's returns which established that a delay of 18 months was reasonable then the requirements of the law would have been met. But there is no such evidence before the Court on this appeal.
This Court, while allowing an appeal with respect to the effect of the Minister's failure to act with all due dispatch, nonetheless agreed with the Tax Court Judge's approach to determining whether the Minister had so acted. See R. v.Ginsberg, 96 D.T.C. 6372 at para. 7.

[15] While the above quoted cases related to the use of the phrase "with all due dispatch" in section 152, I am of the view that the Court's reasoning applies equally to the use of the same phrase in subs. 165(3).

[16] Turning to the case at bar, then, I am of the view that once the review of the appellant's file was commenced in the January, 1998, it was completed in a reasonable period of time. Thus, the focus of my inquiry is upon the 31 month delay before the commencement of any complete review of the appellant's file. For 27 of those months, there was no contact between Revenue Canada and the appellant.

[17] In my opinion, this amount of delay is, on its face, inordinate, particularly in light of the fact that once a review of the objections was commenced, it was completed in little more than 6 months. The Minister's only explanation for the delay is that there were staff changes in his office. In my opinion, this is insufficient to meet the onus upon him to show that the delay was not unreasonable. Therefore, I conclude that the Minister, by allowing an unreasonable length of time to elapse prior to reassessing the appellant and informing him of the results, failed to act with the dispatch required by the Act.

[18] The Minister's delay caused the accrual of significant additional interest charges against the appellant. I turn now to the appropriateness of the remedy that he sought.

Does Subsection 220 (3.1) Allow the Minister to Waive or Cancel Interest Accrued While Dealing With the Appellant's Notices of Objection

[19] During oral argument, the respondent submitted that the fairness provisions of section 220 only apply to remedy unfairnesses encountered during the period up to the time the taxpayer is first assessed under section 152 of the Act. It was argued that if the taxpayer is unhappy with that assessment and does not want to pay, his remedy is an appeal to the Tax Court.

[20] In my opinion, this cannot be so. To begin with, there is no express indication that Parliament intended subs. 220 (3.1) to apply only to actions taken under s. 152. Although the fairness provision does make reference to two subsections of s. 152, this is done in the context of explicitly applying the provision notwithstanding those subsections. More importantly, to accept the respondent's position would be to deprive the taxpayer of any remedy in the event that his notice of objection is not considered in a reasonable time. The objection procedure is, in effect, a mechanism to settle disputes between the taxpayer and Revenue Canada. In my view, this Court must be reluctant to deprive taxpayers of the benefits of this settlement process, which is the result if subs. 220 (3.1) is held to be inapplicable during the objection stage.

[21] I turn, finally, to the question of whether the Director's decision to deny the appellant a remedy was reasonable.

Did the Minister's Delegate Take into Account All Relevant Considerations

Digitized by Google

[22] The Motions Judge recited the factors taken into account by the decision-maker in his decision:

The decision maker, ... considered the following in making his decision:

a) the request made by the applicant and the reasons therefor;

b) the applicant is a major shareholder in Hillier's Trades Limited and Northern Home Products Limited;

c) in filing his income tax return for the 1989 taxation year, the applicant did not include income in the amount of $37,836 in his computation of total income;

d)in filing his income tax return for the 1990 taxation year, the applicant did not include income in the amount of $34,632 in his computation of total income;

e) in filing his income tax return for the 1991 taxation year, the applicant did not include income in the amount of $40,386 in his computation of total income;

f) in filing his income tax return for the 1992 taxation year, the applicant did not include income in the amount of $17,615 in his computation of total income;

g) the applicant does not dispute his liability;

h) the "self-assessing" system of taxation puts the onus on the taxpayer to properly report income;

i)the guidelines established in Information Circular No. 92-2 and Internal Directive ARD-92-01 dated April 16, 1992 were not met in these circumstances.

[23] In my opinion, this list demonstrates that the Minister's delegate, in making his decision considered irrelevant factors while failing to consider at least one very important and relevant factor. Items (c) through (f) on the list relate to the appellant's failure to report all of his income in each of the taxation years. However, these amounts were discovered in the course of the initial audit and reassessment and penalties and interest were assessed at that time. They cannot have any relevance to the unfairness that was alleged by the appellant - delay in considering his notices of objection.

[24] Item (g) states that "the Applicant does not dispute his liability". In fact, the appellant, by filing notices of objection, did dispute the amount of his liability. Thus, from the time of his notices in June, 1995 until the final reassessment in August, 1998, the appellant did not know what his actual liability was. In the end, his total liability was significantly reduced.

[25] The central error made by the decision-maker, however, was the failure to consider the processing delays which, as I have held above, resulted in the taxpayer not being informed, within a reasonable time, the amount of tax he owed. Revenue Canada itself recognizes that such delays are relevant to the question of waiver or cancellation of interest. Information Circular 92-2, Guidelines for the Cancellation and Waiver of Interest and Penalties, provides guidance to decision-makers dealing with requests for waiver or cancellation of interest amounts. Paragraph 6 provides, in part:

6. Cancelling or waiving interest or penalties may also be appropriate if the interest or penalty arose primarily because of actions of the Department, such as:	6. L'annulation des intérêts ou des pénalités ou la renonciation à ceux-ci peuvent également être justifiées si ces intérêts ou pénalités découlent principalement d'actions attribuables au Ministère comme dans les cas suivants :
(a) processing delays which result in the taxpayer not being informed, within a reasonable time, that an amount was owing; ...	a) des retards de traitement, ce qui a eu pour effet que le contribuable n'a pas été informé, dans un délai raisonnable, de l'existence d'une somme en souffrance; ...

[26] While the Director, in his letter to the appellant, mentioned Departmental delays as a possible reason for waiving interest, there is no indication in the letter that he actually considered whether or not such a delay had occurred. Indeed, in the affidavit he swore for the purposes of the proceeding below, which was quoted by the Motions Judge and at paragraph 22 above, he does not list delay as a factor that he considered. His failure to take into account the delay in making his decision was unreasonable.

Conclusion

[27] I would allow the appeal with costs. The matter is remitted to the Minister of National Revenue for reconsideration of the appellant's request that he waive or cancel interest in light of these reasons.

Wilfrid Comeau v. Canada Customs And Revenue Agency, 2005 FCA 271, While Filing the Objection the Interest Does Accrue and You take Your Chances at Losing Ability – And the Appropriate Measure of Review

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

PELLETIER J.A.

[1] The question raised by this appeal is whether there were unjustified delays in processing a notice of objection which would justify the cancellation of interest accumulated on arrears.

Facts

[2] In 1992, Mr. Comeau invested $50,000 in a tax shelter, namely flow-through shares in a mining exploration venture, Exploration Acabit. According to the advice he received at the time, this investment entitled him to a tax deduction of $45,000 and a rebate of $18,000. The tax deduction represented a proportion of the exploration expenses contracted by Exploration Acabit. In his tax return for the 1992 taxation year, Mr. Comeau claimed the $45,000 tax deduction.

[3] In 1996, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (the Agency) undertook an audit of Exploration Acabit and came to the conclusion that the exploration expenses it was claiming were not such expenses and that accordingly investors were not entitled to the tax deductions they had claimed. In 1997, a reassessment was issued, significantly reducing the tax deduction claimed by Mr. Comeau. He filed a notice of objection against this reassessment. On September 18, 1998, the Agency offered to settle the objection according to the following terms: he would not be entitled to any tax deduction but would be granted a capital loss of $32,000.

[4] The Agency clearly indicated in the letter containing the settlement offer that the case would be put on hold if the settlement offer were not accepted. Mr. Comeau rejected the offer because the Agency made a waiver of the right of objection and right of appeal a term of the settlement. Rightly or wrongly, he believed this would require him to give up the right to rely on equity provisions as to interest. Following the rejection of the settlement offer, the objection file was put on hold. It was not until September 11, 2000, when all the criminal proceedings had been concluded, that the Agency issued a reassessment following the terms of the settlement offered by the Agency in 1998, namely the complete cancellation of the tax deduction and the granting of a $32,000 capital loss.

[5] Mr. Comeau complied with this decision and rendered unto Caesar what was Caesar's. At the same time, he objected to the accrued interest which significantly increased his tax debt. He said he acted at all times in good faith and with the intention of carrying out his obligations. It was not until September 2000 that he finally learned the amount of his tax debt, and he immediately paid it.

Proceedings
[6] Mr. Comeau then exercised the right conferred on him by subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act
(the Act) to file an application to cancel the interest accrued on his tax debt. The Act gives the Minister the power to cancel interest, but the Minister has delegated it to the Agency. The latter rejected the application. At Mr. Comeau's request, the decision was reviewed by another decision-maker in the Agency, who confirmed it. The Agency said it found nothing in the file showing that the interest had accumulated for reasons independent of Mr. Comeau's will.
[7] Mr. Comeau sought judicial review of the Agency's decision (the first decision). Martineau J. of the Federal Court ruled in his favour and referred the matter back to the Agency for a new decision, that was to take [TRANSLATION] "into account the applicant's submissions, the guidelines [of the Agency on interest and penalties], the spirit and intent of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, the content of this order and any other relevant factors". The order contained certain findings by Martineau J., including the following:

. . . a significant part of the interest paid by the applicant resulted from a situation beyond his control and was primarily due to the actions of the Minister or his representatives;

. . . in the circumstances, the seven-year delay between the original assessment in 1993 and the final assessment in 2000 seems unreasonable;

. . . the result of the processing delays and errors attributable to the Minister or the respondent was that the applicant was not informed of the existence of the tax debt actually due within a reasonable time;

. . . the unfavourable decision of November 15, 2001 [the decision approving the first decision which dismissed his application to cancel interest] for which the applicant sought review and the unfavourable decision of October 2, 2001 [the first decision dismissing his application] referred to in the latter decision are patently unreasonable;

. . . the Minister's designated representatives did not exercise the Minister's discretionary power reasonably and fairly and arbitrarily rejected the grounds set out in the applicant's application to reduce interest.

[8] The matter was referred back to the Agency, where a new review was conducted. The Agency divided the period which had elapsed since Mr. Comeau filed his tax return for the 1992 taxation year into three segments:
from the filing of Mr. Comeau's tax return on May 12, 1993 to the commencement of the Exploration Acabit audit on November 24, 1995;

Digitized by Google

from the commencement of the Exploration Acabit audit to June 9, 1997, the date of the assessments; and from June 9, 1997 to the date of payment in October 2000.

[9] The Agency concluded that there was no delay in the processing of Mr. Comeau's file in the first segment. On the other hand, it found that the second segment exceeded the six-month norm which it considered reasonable for carrying out an audit. If the norm had been followed, Mr. Comeau's audit would have been completed on May 24, 1996, instead of June 9, 1997, as it turned out, a discrepancy of 12.5 months.

[10] As to the third segment, the Agency found that Mr. Comeau had been notified of the outstanding amount in his reassessment of 1997 and could have paid it and thus avoided the accumulation of interest. [11] On behalf of the Agency, Mr. St. Denis notified Mr. Comeau of its decision to cancel interest on arrears for the segment from May 24, 1996 to June 9, 1997. Far from being satisfied with this result, Mr. Comeau filed a new application for judicial review alleging that the Agency had taken no account of the judgment of Martineau J.. This new application was examined by Beaudry J., who held that the standard of review was that of the patently unreasonable decision. He then examined each of the three segments analyzed and, for each of them, found nothing patently unreasonable in the reasons and findings of the Agency, except for one point which I will consider below.

[12] The judge reviewed Mr. Comeau's allegation that the Agency's decision was vitiated by bad faith. He noted that the Agency had considered Mr. Comeau's supplementary submissions, as required by the order of Martineau J., and had also considered the spirit and intent of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act. The judge could not find that the Agency had acted in bad faith.

[13] However, in the judge's opinion, there was one point on which his intervention was warranted. He felt that the Agency erred in setting the date for the commencement of the audit as of November 24, 1995 (the date on which the auditor arrived on the scene), instead of November 1, 1995 (the date on which the form T979 authorizing the audit was issued), with the result that the proper date for the termination of the audit would have been May 1, 1996, rather than May 24, 1996. The judge allowed the application for judicial review to give Mr. Comeau these 23 additional days of respite.

Parties' arguments

[14] Before this Court, Mr. Comeau has maintained his claim that the Agency's decision did not in any way comply with the spirit and terms of the order rendered by Martineau J.. He asked how the findings of Martineau J. could be reconciled with the second decision by the Agency granting him a cancellation of interest for barely 13 months, when the period for processing his return extended over 8 years. The Agency, for its part, filed a cross-appeal in which it denied that the judge had jurisdiction to alter the interest cancellation period in any way whatever.

Analysis

Standard of review

[15] In Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19, the Supreme Court of Canada defined the role of an appellate court called on to rule on the judgment of a superior court sitting in review of a decision by an administrative tribunal:

Digitized by Google

[43] . . . The role of the Court of Appeal was to determine whether the reviewing judge had chosen and applied the correct standard of review, and in the event she had not, to assess the administrative body's decision in light of the correct standard of review, reasonableness. At this stage in the analysis, the Court of Appeal is dealing with appellate review of a subordinate court, not judicial review of an administrative decision. As such, the normal rules of appellate review of lower courts as articulated in Housen, supra, apply. The question of the right standard to select and apply is one of law and, therefore, must be answered correctly by a reviewing judge. The Court of Appeal erred by affording deference where none was due.

[16] Therefore, this Court must first determine whether the trial judge applied the standard of review that was appropriate. According to the judge, it was the standard of the patently unreasonable decision which applied. To arrive at this conclusion, he relied on Barron v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue (M.N.R.)) (1997), 209 N.R. 392 (F.C.A.), Cheng v. Canada, 2001 FCTD 1114 (Cheng) and Laviolette v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), [2004] F.C.J. No. 229, 2004 FC 176. Although such was the state of the law at the date of the hearing before the judge, this had changed by the time of this hearing, before this Court: it was held in Lanno v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 153, that it is the standard of the reasonable decision which applies to discretionary decisions pertaining to the equity provisions in the Act. When it so held, this Court disapproved Cheng, on which the judge had relied.

[17] As the trial judge erred on the standard of review, this Court must apply the standard which should have been applied, namely that of the reasonable decision.

Application of standard of review to facts

[18] As to the first segment ending at the beginning of the audit of November 24, 1995, it does not exceed the ordinary duration of the reassessment process, which as the Agency noted [TRANSLATION] "makes it possible to verify, check and maintain this system [of self-assessment]". It is thus not unreasonable to find that there is no basis for cancelling the interest accumulated during this period.

[19] As to the second segment, that of the audit itself, the decision of the Agency to cancel interest for the audit period exceeding the six-month standard cannot be qualified as unreasonable.

[20] As to the third segment, from the assessment of June 1997 to the reassessment of September 11, 2000, the Agency justified its refusal to cancel the interest by the fact that, on June 26, 1997, Mr. Comeau was aware that there was an outstanding amount and that this amount remained unpaid throughout this third segment. Mr. Comeau could have paid the outstanding amount, which would have terminated the accumulation of interest, subject to being reimbursed if his objection succeeded. In other words, a taxpayer may benefit from the suspension of collection proceedings while his objection is being processed and wager on the outcome of his objection by not paying the amounts claimed by the Agency, so that interest accumulates, but if he loses his wager (when his objection is dismissed), he cannot complain that the rules of the game put him at a disadvantage.

There is nothing unreasonable in the Agency's decision.

[21] Finally, Mr. Comeau claimed that the Agency had acted in bad faith by not implementing the judgment of Martineau J., which concluded that the first decision was patently unreasonable. However, if one looks carefully at the judgment of Martineau J., it is apparent that it imposes no findings on the new decision-maker. The only directive given to the latter by Martineau J. is to make a decision [TRANSLATION] "taking into account the applicant's submissions, the guidelines [of the Agency on interest and penalties], the spirit and intent of subsection 220(3.1) of the Act, the content of this order and any other relevant factors". The minutes of the deliberations of the Agency committee indicate that the order by Martineau J. was in fact considered (Appeal Book, at page 99). In view of the Agency's procedure, its reasoning and the cancellation of interest which resulted, it cannot be said that the content of the judgment was not taken into account in arriving at the second decision.

Digitized by Google

Cross-appeal

[23] As to the cross-appeal, when it was objected that Beaudry J. had exceeded his jurisdiction by extending the interest cancellation period by 23 days, I think it should be allowed. In the judge's view, the audit period began when the form T979 was issued. The Agency explained that its calculation for the ordinary six-month period began as of the date the auditor arrived on the scene. By intervening as he did, the judge in effect applied the standard of the correct decision instead of that of the reasonable decision. There is nothing unreasonable in the Agency's original decision that would warrant this Court's intervention. The cross-appeal should be allowed without costs and the part of the judge's order regarding the interest cancellation period reversed.

Denis Lanno v. Canada Customs And Revenue Agency, 2006 FCA 220, Fairness can Extend Time to File Notice of Objection

REASONS FOR ORDER

SHARLOW J.A.

[1] On May 2, 2005, in the decision of Lanno v. Canada (Customs and Revnue Agency), 2005 FCA 153, this Court allowed Mr. Lanno's appeal from a decision of the Federal Court (2004 FC 932) which denied relief from a negative decision of the Minister of National Revenue under subsection 152(4.2) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), in relation to interest.

[2] This Court found that the denial of Mr. Lanno's application for relief was not reasonable in light of the various reasons given by the Minister in letters dated May 29, 2003, July 30, 2003 and November 4, 2003. This Court found three reasons why Mr. Lanno's appeal should be allowed.

[3] First, contrary to the Minister's assertion, the fairness provisions can be used to extend the time limits for the filing of an objection. Information Circular 75-7R3, "Reassessment of a Return of Income" states that a reassessment "ordinarily" will be made at a taxpayer's request, even if the taxpayer has not filed a notice of objection within the prescribed time. Paragraph 4 of Information Circular 75-7R3 provides (my emphasis):

A reassessment to create a refund ordinarily will be made upon receipt of a written request by the taxpayer, even if a notice of objection has not been filed within the prescribed time, provided that

(a) the taxpayer has, within the four-year filling period required by subsection 164(1), filed the return of income;

(b) the department is satisfied that the previous assessment or reassessment was wrong;

(c) the reassessment can be made within the four-year period or the seven year-year period, as the case may be, as referred to in paragraph 1 above or, if that is not possible, the taxpayer has filed a waiver in prescribed form;

(d) the requested decrease in taxable income assessed is not based solely on an increased claim for capital cost allowances or other permissive deductions, where the taxpayer originally claimed less than the maximum allowable; and

(e) the application for refund is not based solely upon a successful appeal to the Courts by a taxpayer.

Sur réception d'une demande écrite du contribuable, le Ministère établit ordinairement une nouvelle cotisation pour donner un remboursement, même si un avis d'opposition a pas été produit dans le délai prescrit, pourvu:

a) que le contribuable ait produit la déclaration de revenu dans le délai de quatre ans mentionné au paragraphe 164(1)

b) que le Ministère soit convaincu que la cotisation ou nouvelle cotisation précédente était inexacte;

c) qu'il soit possible d'établir une nouvelle cotisation dans le délai de quatre ans ou de sept ans, selon le cas, dont il est fait mention au numéro 1 précédent ou, s'il n'est pas possible de remplir cette condition, que le contribuable ait produit une renonciation en la forme prescrite;

d) que la réduction du revenu imposable établi ne résulte pas uniquement d'une majoration des déduction pour amortissement ou d'autre déductions laissant une marge de manoeuvre au contribuable, lorsque ce dernier a demandé au départ une déduction inférieure au maximum déductible; et

e) que la demande de remboursement ne se fonde pas uniquement sur un appel devant les tribunaux d'un autre contribuable ayant eu gain de cause.

[4] Second, Mr. Lanno's application under the fairness package was based on the fact that a number of misunderstandings had resulted in a failure to file timely notices of objection. Contrary to the Minister's assertion, his application was not based solely upon the successful appeal of another taxpayer in the decision of Stewart v. Canada [2002] 2 S.C.R. 645.

Digitized by Google

[5] Finally, the Minister failed to consider the question as to whether or not there was any reason to treat Mr. Lanno differently from the three other individuals who had obtained relief.

[6] This Court set aside the Federal Court's decision and allowed Mr. Lanno's application for judicial review. The matter was referred back to the Minister for reconsideration by a different decision maker.

[7] The Minister, by a different decision maker, reconsidered the application for relief under the fairness provisions. In a letter dated March 24, 2006, the Minister again denied relief under subsection 152(4.2) for these reasons:

In arriving at our decision, we considered each of the three areas, which posed a concern for the Court.

[1] "It is manifestly incorrect to say that the fairness provisions cannot be used to extend the time limits for the filing of a notice of objection."

In making this comment, the Court looked at the preamble in paragraph 4 of IC75-7R3 and notes that "if the exception in paragraph 4(e) of Information Circular 75-7R3 was not applicable, he should have been entitled to the benefit of the opening words of paragraph 4." While this is true, the fact is that paragraph 4(e) exists and the preamble in paragraph 4 cannot be read in isolation. Clearly, the insertion of the word "and" after paragraph 4(d) means that the condition in paragraph 4(e) must be met. It is not discretionary. [...]

[2] "Second, the reference to the July 20, 2003 decision letter, and the statement that the decision in the letter remains unchanged, suggests that Mr. Scarcello may have concluded, as Mr. Coelho had done, that this was a case where relief should be precluded by the fact that Mr. Lanno's application for a refund was "based solely upon a successful appeal to the Courts by a taxpayer" (Stewart)."

[...] while a strong argument can be made that there was intent to file Notices of Objection, the fact remains that none were filed and that the request under [sic] for reassessment under subsection 152(4.2) was not made until after the favourable decision in Stewart.

It is our view that there were no extraordinary circumstances that prevented the client and/or representative from complying.

[3] "Third, Mr. Scarcello failed to address the question as to whether or not there was any reason to treat Mr. Lanno differently from the three other individuals who had obtained relief. It is not possible to determine whether he ignored that submission, whether he thought that there was some relevant distinction, or whether he thought it acceptable to afford different treatment to similarly situated individuals. I must conclude that Mr. Scarcello failed to take into account a relevant consideration."

Due to confidentiality it is not possible to go into detail when discussing the three other individuals referred to by the Court. Suffice to say that every case is decided on the basis of the facts of the case and the applicable laws. We, with respect, believe Mr. Lanno's case was decided corrected [sic] and without any inconsistency in the application of our policies.

[8] Mr. Lanno commenced an application for judicial review in the Federal Court. He also applied to this Court for an Order pursuant to Rule 431(a) of the Federal Courts Rules (SOR/98-106) to enforce this Court's May 2, 2005 judgment.

[9] The Minister submits that the process for enforcing an order is provided in Rule 423:

423. All matters relating to the enforcement of orders shall be brought before the Federal Court.	423. Toute question concernant l'exécution forcée d'une ordonnance relPve de la Cour fédérale.

[10] Mr. Lanno submits that this Court should dispense with compliance with that Rule and permit Mr. Lanno to seek relief based on Rule 55 which provides:

Digitized by Google

55. In special circumstances, in a proceeding, the Court may vary a rule or dispense with compliance with a rule.	55. Dans des circonstances spéciales, la Cour peut, dans une instance, modifier une règle ou exempter une partie ou une personne de son application.

[11] I am not convinced that there are any special circumstances which would justify an order pursuant to Rule 55. If Mr. Lanno is of the view that the Minister has not complied with this Court's May 2, 2005 decision, his remedy should be pursued in the Federal Court.

[12] I would dismiss this motion with costs.

Canada Revenue Agency v. M. Dianne Telfer, 2009 FCA 23, Reasonableness of Decision in Light of Objection in Abeyance, as Interest Continued to Accrue – Again, Take Your Chances if Not Paid subject to Later Refund

EVANS J.A.

A. INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal by the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") from a decision of the Federal Court (2008 FC 218) in which Deputy Judge Frenette allowed an application for judicial review by Ms Dianne Telfer to set aside a decision of the Minister not to waive the interest owed by Ms Telfer on unpaid taxes. The Judge referred the matter back to the Minister for redetermination.

[2] It is common ground that unreasonableness is the standard of review applicable to the exercise of the Minister's discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act. In my view, the Minister's decision not to waive the interest on the facts of this case was not unreasonable, and the Deputy Judge was therefore wrong to have intervened. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the Federal Court's order, and dismiss Ms Telfer's application for judicial review.

B. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[3] The facts relevant to this appeal can be stated quite shortly. Ms Telfer was reassessed by the Minister for her taxation years 1993 to 1999 inclusive (except 1995) and was not allowed to deduct losses from her investment in a limited partnership. She objected to these assessments in Notices of Objection dated July 31, 2000 and May 19, 2001.

[4] The Minister acknowledged receipt of the Notices and advised Ms Telfer that interest would continue to accumulate on any amount of unpaid tax. The Minister added that Ms Telfer could avoid or reduce the interest by paying, in whole or in part, the tax liability that she was disputing.

[5] On January 15, 2002, the Minister wrote to Ms Telfer again, this time to say that she could agree in writing to have her Notices of Objection held in abeyance pending a decision in a test case, Brown v. The Queen, which raised issues directly relevant to Ms Telfer's tax liability. Somewhat curiously, the letter also stated that her objections were being held in abeyance (even though she had not indicated that she consented) pending the determination of Brown.

[6] Ms Telfer neither agreed in writing that her Notices should be held in abeyance, nor expressed any disagreement with this course of action. Further, she did not exercise her right to pursue her appeal to the Tax Court 90 days after filing her Notices of Objection: paragraph 169(1)(b). Collection activity was suspended while the Notices were being held in abeyance.

[7] In the same letter, the Minister reiterated that interest would continue to accumulate if she did not pay the balance and noted that, if she paid, and her objections were ultimately successful, the Minister would repay any overpayments, with interest. The Minister set out and itemized the amounts of tax, and penalties and interest which Ms Telfer then owed.

[8] The Brown litigation was concluded in January 2004 when the Supreme Court of Canada denied the appellant leave to appeal: Brown v. The Queen (2001), D.T.C. 1094 (T.C.C.), aff'd. 2003 FCA 192, leave to appeal to the S.C.C. refused, 29843 (January 22, 2004). Soon after, the Minister made an offer to settle Ms Telfer's tax liability, which, after taking legal advice, she accepted in September 2004, more than three years after filing her Notices of Objection. In accordance with the terms of the settlement, the Minister, on March 21, 2005, confirmed the reassessments for the taxation years 1993 and 1994, and reassessed her for the years 1996 to 1999.

[9] In a letter dated September 22, 2006, Ms Telfer asked the Minister to give her "some relief" on the interest of $10,467 then owing on her unpaid tax debt, because she had no income and it had taken a long time for the department to settle her liability. Her request was refused in a letter dated February 19, 2007, on the ground that there was no evidence of departmental delay. The notes and recommendation on which the decision was based set out the relevant facts.

[11] The decision letter stated that the basis of Ms Telfer's request was departmental delay in resolving the Notices of Objection and that, since there was no evidence of any delay on the part of the department and she had been kept fully informed of the situation, her request would be refused. In particular, it noted that she had been advised that the Notices were being held in abeyance pending the determination of the Brown litigation and that interest would continue to mount on the sum owing if she did not pay it. Ms Telfer was also reminded that, soon after the result of the Brown litigation was known, the Minister made an offer to settle, which she accepted.

[12] The letter also informed Ms Telfer that her request for interest relief on the ground of financial hardship had been transferred to the fairness committee of the CRA's Collections Department in a different office, which had an expertise in determining such matters. The financial hardship aspect of Ms Telfer's request for relief is not relevant for present purposes.

[13] The facts surrounding Ms Telfer's case were set out more fully in the summary prepared within the CRA, on which a recommendation to refuse her request was based. The recommendation explained the departmental view that, pursuant to its guidelines, discretion will normally only be exercised in favour of a taxpayer who has failed to pay a tax debt as a result of "extraordinary circumstances beyond their control". It concluded that this was not the case here. There had been no delay because Ms Telfer had agreed that her Notices of Objection should be held in abeyance and that she had been advised that, meanwhile, she was liable to pay the interest accumulating on her tax debt.

C. LEGISLATIVE FRAMEWORK

[14] The statutory provisions of immediate relevance to this appeal are as follows:

161.(1) Where at any time after a taxpayer's balance-due day for a taxation year

(a) the total of the taxpayer's taxes payable under this Part and Parts I.3, VI and VI.1 for the year exceeds

(b) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount paid at or before that time on account of the taxpayer's tax payable and applied as at that time by the Minister against the taxpayer's liability for an amount payable under this Part or Part I.3, VI or VI.1 for the years, the taxpayer shall pay to the Receiver General interest at the prescribed rate on the excess, computed for the period during which that excess is outstanding.

165.(3) On receipt of a notice of objection under this section, the Minister shall, with all due dispatch, reconsider the assessment and vacate, confirm or vary the assessment or reassess, and shall thereupon notify the taxpayer in writing of the Minister's action.

220.(3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

161.(1) Dans le cas où le total visé à l'alinéa a) excède le total visé à l'alinéa b) à un moment postérieur à la date d'exigibilité du solde qui est applicable à un contribuable pour une année d'imposition, le contribuable est tenu de verser au receveur général des intérêts sur l'excédent, calculés au taux prescrit pour la période au cours de laquelle cet excédent est impayé :

a) le total des impôts payables par le contribuable pour l'année en vertu de la présente partie et des parties I.3, VI et VI.1;

b) le total des montants représentant chacun un montant payé au plus tard à ce moment au titre de l'impôt payable par le contribuable et imputé par le ministre, à compter de ce moment, sur le montant dont le contribuable est redevable pour l'année en vertu de la présente partie ou des parties I.3, VI ou VI.1.

165. (3) Sur réception de l'avis d'opposition, le ministre, avec diligence, examine de nouveau la cotisation et l'annule, la ratifie ou la modifie ou établit une nouvelle cotisation. Dès lors, il avise le contribuable de sa décision par écrit personnes en application de la présente loi pour cette année d'imposition ou cet exercice, ou l'annuler en tout ou en partie. Malgré les paragraphes 152(4) à (5), le ministre établit les cotisations voulues concernant les intérêts et pénalités payables par le contribuable ou la société de personnes pour tenir compte de pareille annulation.

D. ISSUES AND ANALYSIS

[15] While counsel for Ms Telfer raised several points in his memorandum, the oral argument focused primarily on the following question. Was the Minister's refusal to exercise the discretion conferred by subsection 220(3.1) liable to be set aside on an application for judicial review on the ground of unreasonableness because the Minister had failed to take into account, or to give sufficient weight to, the fact that it was in the interests of both parties to hold Ms Telfer's Notices in abeyance pending the determination of the Brown litigation?

(i) Federal Court's decision

[16] The Minister alleges that, while the Applications Judge properly identified unreasonableness as the standard of review, an examination of his reasoning indicates that he did not in fact apply this standard. Rather, counsel said, the Judge substituted his view for that of the Minister on the "fairness" of the decision to deny Ms Telfer interest relief. In other words, the Judge reviewed the Minister's decision on a standard of correctness, not reasonableness. Accordingly, counsel argued, this Court must determine for itself whether the Minister's decision was unreasonable.

[17] Counsel for the Minister may well be right in his analysis of the Judge's decision. It is difficult to extract from the Judge's reasons what error he thought the Minister had committed, other than that the result was unfair. However, in my opinion, it is not necessary for this Court to decide the potentially difficult question of whether the Judge failed to "apply" the appropriate standard of review or applied it incorrectly.

[18] Despite some earlier confusion, there is now ample authority for the proposition that, on an appeal from a decision disposing of an application for judicial review, the question for the appellate court to decide is simply whether the court below identified the appropriate standard of review and applied it correctly. The appellate court is not restricted to asking whether the first-level court committed a palpable and overriding error in its application of the appropriate standard.

[19] The law is stated clearly by Rothstein J.A. (as he then was) in Prairie Acid Rain Coalition v. Canada (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans), [2006] 3 F.C.R. 610, 2006 FCA 31.

> [13] In Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226 at paragraph 43, the Supreme Court dealt with the role of a Court of Appeal reviewing a decision of a subordinate court which itself was conducting a judicial review of a decision of an administrative tribunal. The Supreme Court found that "the normal rules of appellate review of lower courts as articulated in Housen, supra, apply". The Housen approach (Housen v. Nikolaisen, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235) provides that on a question of law the appellate court reviews the subordinate court decision on a standard of correctness (paragraph 8). On all other issues, the standard of review is palpable and overriding error (paragraphs 10, 19 and 28).

[14] However, in more recent cases, the Supreme Court has adopted the view that the appellate court steps into the shoes of the subordinate court in reviewing a tribunal's decision. See for example Zenner v. Prince Edward Island College of Optometrists, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 645, 2005 SCC 77 at paragraphs 29-45 per Major J. See also Alberta (Minister of Municipal Affairs) v. Telus Communications Inc. (2002), 218 D.L.R. (4th) 61 at paragraphs 25-26 per Berger J.A. The appellate court determines the correct standard of review and then decides whether the standard of review was applied correctly: see Zenner at paragraphs 29-30. In practical terms, this means that the appellate court itself reviews the tribunal decision on the correct standard of review.

(ii) ground of review

[20] Counsel for the Minister argued that the Judge failed to identify a ground of review on which the Court was entitled to interfere with the Minister's exercise of discretion under subsection 220(3.1).

[21] At one time, courts regarded ultra vires as the only ground of review available at common law for the exercise of statutory discretion. Administrative action could be held to be ultra vires if the repository of discretion committed one of the errors from the familiar catalogue, such as taking into consideration the irrelevant or ignoring the relevant, exercising the power for an improper purpose, or unlawfully failing to exercise the power by, for example, fettering its exercise. In English law, the various errors for which a discretionary decision may be reviewed have sometimes been generalized as review on the ground of unreasonableness: Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation, [1949] 1 K.B. 223 (Eng. C.A.).

[22] In Canada, the more descriptive "abuse of discretion" seems now to be the preferred formulation of the ground on which courts review the exercise of administrative discretion: see especially, Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), [2001] 2 S.C.R 281, 2001 SCC 41, at paras. 52-54. While the various categories of ultra vires error remain relevant as means of establishing that an abuse of discretion has occurred, reviewing courts are also to take a more holistic approach to review. Thus, in order to reflect the deference due to the decision-maker to whom the legislature has delegated discretion, a court should not necessarily assume that it may substitute its view on, for example, issues of propriety of purpose and the relevance of the factors considered: see Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 S.C.R. 817 at paras. 53 and 56; Dr. Q v. British Columbia (College of Physicians and Surgeons), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19, at paras. 24-25 ("Dr. Q").

[23] The Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, subsection 18.1(4), does not specifically identify the ground on which the Court may grant an application for the judicial review of the exercise of a statutory discretion by a federal board, commission or other tribunal, such as that conferred on the Minister by subsection 220(3.1). However, the grounds of review set out in subsection 18.1(4) are potentially applicable to discretionary administrative action, including error of law (paragraph 18.1(4)(c)) and the residual ground of review in paragraph 18.1(4)(f) ("acted in any other way that was contrary to law").

(iii) standard of review

[24] Unreasonableness is the standard of review normally applicable to the exercise of discretion: Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, 2008 SCC 9, at para. 51 ("Dunsmuir"). Indeed, this Court had previously held in Lanno v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 DTC 5245, 2005 FCA 153, that unreasonableness simpliciter (one of the two deferential standards then applied by the courts) was the standard of review applicable to a decision made under subsection 220(3.1).

Digitized by Google

[25] When reviewing for unreasonableness, a court must examine the decision-making process (including the reasons given for the decision), in order to ensure that it contains a rational "justification" for the decision, and is transparent and intelligible. In addition, a reviewing court must determine whether the decision itself falls "within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and the law": Dunsmuir at para. 47.

[26] In elaborating the concept of judicial deference connoted by the standard of unreasonableness, the Court also said in Dunsmuir (at para. 49):

> In short, deference requires respect for the legislative choices to leave some matters in the hands of administrative decision-makers, for the processes and determinations that draw on particular expertise and experience and for the different roles of the courts and administrative bodies within the Canadian constitutional system.

[27] In the present case, counsel conceded that, on the facts, it might be reasonably open to the Minister to deny Ms Telfer's request for interest relief. Rather, the complaint is that the Minister failed to consider, or to give sufficient weight to, relevant facts, particularly the delay resulting from the CRA's holding her Notices of Objection in abeyance pending a decision in the Brown litigation, a course of action that was the fault of neither party and benefited both as a result of the settlement of Ms Telfer's tax liability in light of the Brown decision.

[28] Nor is Ms Telfer's allegation that the Minister committed an error of law by misinterpreting subsection 220(3.1), as might have been the case if the Minister had stated that holding Notices of Objection in abeyance pending the decision in other litigation could never be the basis for granting relief. Rather, counsel's argument seems to be that, because the reasons for the CRA's decision did not deal expressly with the particular characteristics of the circumstances in which Ms Telfer's Notices were held in abeyance, they lacked the requisite degree of "justification, transparency and intelligibility" demanded by the standard of unreasonableness.

(iv) application of the unreasonableness standard

[29] While the formulation of the standard of unreasonableness as applied to the process for making discretionary decisions is invariable, its application is context-specific: compare Mills v. Ontario (Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal), 2008 ONCA 435 at paras. 21-22, where the Court "contextualized" the application of the unreasonableness standard to a tribunal's findings of fact. In determining whether the decision-making process in this case provided adequate justification, transparency, and intelligibility in order to render the decision reasonable, I have taken into account the following considerations.

[30] First, while referring to the fact that her Notices of Objection were held in abeyance pending the outcome of other litigation, Ms Telfer's request for a second-level administrative review of the initial refusal to grant relief characterized the basis for relief as departmental "delay". I note that Ms Telfer was legally represented in this appeal and had been assisted by different counsel in her dealings with the CRA in connection with her subsection 220(3.1) request. The allegation of departmental delay in Ms Telfer's request (with the implicit suggestion of fault on the part of the CRA) is significantly different from the basis of relief that, counsel alleged, the Minister had unlawfully failed to consider, namely that neither party was at fault and both benefited from the decision to hold the Notices in abeyance pending the result of the Brown case.

[31] When, as in the present case, a consideration is not squarely presented to a decision-maker, it will be difficult to establish on judicial review that a failure to deal with it in the reasons for decision so deprives the process of "justification, transparency and intelligibility" as to render it unreasonable.

[32] Second, it is clear from the decision letter sent to Ms Telfer, and from the internal report and recommendation on which it was based, that the CRA had not overlooked the circumstances that resulted in the lapse of more than three years between the time that Ms Telfer filed her Notices of Objection and the settlement of her tax liability. The background facts are accurately summarized in the supporting documents, including the decision to hold the Notices in abeyance pending the determination of the related Brown litigation. The recommendation, but not the decision letter itself, stated that Ms Telfer had "agreed" that the Notices be held in abeyance. It would have been more accurate to have described Ms Telfer as having acquiesced, but nothing, in my view, turns on this nuance.

[33] In these circumstances, Ms Telfer can hardly say that the Minister overlooked any relevant facts. The most that can be said is that the Minister failed to give sufficient weight to the fact that her tax liability was not settled until Brown was decided. Since deciding what weight to accord to a particular fact is at the heart of exercising discretion, it will normally be difficult to persuade a court that an administrative decision-maker has acted unreasonably in this regard.

[34] Third, the nature of the discretion is another aspect of the context for determining whether an impugned decision is unreasonable. In this case, the refusal to grant relief against accumulated interest did not infringe any right or expectation of Ms Telfer's. On the contrary, she was invoking the Minister's extraordinary statutory discretion to grant her an exemption from a basic principle of the tax system, namely, that taxpayers are liable to pay taxes owing by April of the following year, failing which, they must pay interest, at the prescribed rate, on any amount owing.

[35] Those who, like Ms Telfer, knowingly fail to pay a tax debt pending a decision in a related case normally cannot complain that they should not have to pay interest. If they had promptly paid the sum claimed to be due, and were later found not liable to pay it, the Minister would have had to repay the overpayment, with interest: see Comeau v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 271, 2005 D.T.C. 5489, at para. 20. The relatively high rate of interest charged to the taxpayer is no doubt intended, for the benefit of all taxpayers, to encourage the prompt payment of tax debts.

[36] Information Circular IC07-1 – Taxpayer Relief Provisions, dated May 31, 2007, makes available to the public the guidelines developed by the Minister, within which the statutory discretion under subsection 220(3.1) will normally be exercised. While the guidelines do not purport to be exhaustive of the situations in which relief may be granted, they indicate that discretion will be exercised in favour of the taxpayer "in exceptional circumstances beyond (the taxpayer's) control".

[37] In Cole v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 DTC 5667, 2005 FC 1445, it was said that delay caused by litigation may justify the grant of relief under subsection 220(3.1). However, unlike the situation in Cole, the Minister in the present case took into consideration the whole period of the delay, including the time taken awaiting the decision in Brown.

[38] Counsel argued that the Minister unlawfully fettered his discretion by refusing to exercise it in favour of Ms Telfer, because the facts did not fall within an existing guideline. I disagree. I see no evidence in either the terms of the guidelines or the decision letter to support this suggestion. After all, in basing her request on departmental delay, Ms Telfer was not asking the Minister to consider something not dealt with in the guidelines.

[39] Counsel also argued that it was unfair for the Minister to deal separately with Ms Telfer's allegation that she should be given relief on the ground of financial hardship. I do not agree. It seems to me quite appropriate that the CRA should refer this aspect of requests under subsection 220(3.1) to an office with expertise in considering claims of this kind.

(v) conclusion

Digitized by Google

[40] The above considerations, as well as the unstructured nature of the Minister's statutory power under subsection 220(3.1), militate against a court's subjecting the decision-making process to close scrutiny. Despite the Minister's statutory duty to consider a taxpayer's Notice of Objection "with all due dispatch" (subsection 165(3)), it will require circumstances more compelling than those in the present case to persuade a reviewing court that the Minister acted unreasonably in the course of deciding not to give to a taxpayer what would effectively be an interest-free loan.

[41] In short, I am not persuaded that the Minister's decision lacked the degree of "justification, transparency and intelligibility" required by the unreasonableness standard of review. The precise point relied on by counsel before this Court was not squarely put to the minister; instead, in her letter Ms Telfer simply alleged "delay". In any event, it is clear from both the Minister's letter, and the supporting documents, that he was well aware of all the relevant facts and cannot be said to have excluded them from his consideration.

[42] Finally, the Court in Dunsmuir (at para. 47) noted that, although the primary focus of judicial review for unreasonableness is the "justification, transparency and intelligibility" of the decision-making process, a reviewing court should also consider whether the outcome itself is unreasonable. In light of both the facts of the case and the applicable law, the Minister's decision "falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes defensible in respect of the facts and the law" and is thus not unreasonable.

E. CONCLUSIONS

[43] For all these reasons, I would allow the appeal with costs both here and below, set aside the order of the Federal Court, and dismiss the application for judicial review.

Canada Revenue Agency v. Slau Limited, 2009 FCA 270, Settlement Not Processed Properly Per Taxpayer, Can't Compel Minister to Achieve a Very Particular Result if Discretion

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT RYER J.A.

[1] This is an appeal by the Canada Revenue Agency (the "CRA") from a decision of Kelen J. (the "Application Judge") of the Federal Court (2008 FC 1142) granting an application for judicial review brought by Slau Limited ("Slau") to set aside a decision of the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") refusing to cancel certain interest and penalties that were payable by Slau pursuant to the Income Tax Act, R.S.C.

1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "ITA"), in respect of its 1988 to 1990 taxation years.

[2] The application arose out of a request by Slau pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA. Under that provision, which was introduced in 1991 as part of the so-called "Fairness Package", the Minister has the discretion to cancel penalties and interest payable by a taxpayer. It reads as follows:

Digitized by Google

220(3.1) The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

220(3.1) Le ministre peut, au plus tard le jour qui suit de dix années civiles la fin de l'année d'imposition d'un contribuable ou de l'exercice d'une société de personnes ou sur demande du contribuable ou de la société de personnes faite au plus tard ce jour-là, renoncer à tout ou partie d'un montant de pénalité ou d'intérêts payable par ailleurs par le contribuable ou la société de personnes en application de la présente loi pour cette année d'imposition ou cet exercice, ou l'annuler en tout ou en partie. Malgré les paragraphes 152(4) à (5), le ministre établit les cotisations voulues concernant les intérêts et pénalités payables par le contribuable ou la société de personnes pour tenir compte de pareille annulation.

BACKGROUND

[3] Slau was engaged in the restaurant business in Ottawa in its 1988 to 1990 taxation years. Its income tax returns for those years, which were filed late, indicated that it had no taxable income in any of those years.

[4] As a result of an audit undertaken in 1992, the CRA issued reassessments in which Slau was assessed income tax, interest and a late-filing penalty in respect of each of its 1988 to 1990 taxation years.

[5] Slau objected to the reassessments and in 1996, it reached a settlement with the CRA that led to the execution, on December 16, 1996, of an agreement entitled Disposition of Appeal on Consent (the "Settlement Agreement").

[6] In its income tax returns for its 1991 to 1993 taxation years, which were also late-filed, Slau claimed certain non-capital losses, within the meaning of subsection 111(8) of the ITA (the "Losses"), the validity of which is not in issue in this appeal.

[7] The Settlement Agreement did not deal with the Losses, although the matter of carrying the Losses back to the 1988 to 1990 taxation years may have been discussed in the negotiations that preceded the execution of the Settlement Agreement.

[8] In furtherance of the Settlement Agreement, Slau filed revised financial statements for its 1988 to 1990 taxation years. At that same time, Slau filed documents entitled "Adjustments to 1988 Income Statement", "Adjustments to 1989 Income Statement" and "Adjustments to 1990 Income Statement" in which carrybacks of certain amounts of the Losses (the "Loss Carrybacks") were specified.

[9] On February 12, 1997, the CRA issued notices of reassessment in accordance with the Settlement Agreement but did not implement the Loss Carrybacks. As a consequence, those notices of reassessment stipulated that Slau owed $134,462.44 on account of income tax, interest and penalties in respect of its 1988 to 1990 taxation years. Tangentially, it is noted that the Province of Ontario accepted and implemented Slau's request for a carryback of the losses in the 1991 to 1993 taxation years for Ontario income tax purposes.

[10] Subsequent to the issuance of the February 12, 1997 reassessments, Slau corresponded with the CRA with respect to the Loss Carrybacks and on March 20, 2003, submitted CRA Form T2A(E) requesting the Loss Carrybacks. In that correspondence, Slau reiterated that it had requested the Loss Carrybacks at the time of the implementation of the Settlement Agreement.

[11] On June 6, 2003, the Minister corresponded with Slau, stating:

I am informed that Ms. Aline Landry, Director of the Ottawa Tax Services Office, has accepted your request for a non-capital loss carry-back for the 1991, 1992 and 1993 taxation years. As a result, non-capital losses will be applied to the taxation years 1988, 1989 and 1990. I understand that related penalties and interest will be cancelled from December 1996; therefore the tax debt of Slau Limited will be reduced accordingly.

[12] In the ensuing reassessments, issued January 20, 2004, the Minister implemented the Loss Carrybacks which eliminated any liability for income tax in Slau's 1988 to 1990 taxation years but left it with an unpaid balance comprised of interest and penalties relating to the amounts assessed in respect of those years pursuant to the Settlement Agreement.

[13] By correspondence to the Minister, dated March 3, 2004 and August 17, 2004, Slau requested a waiver of all interest and penalties that had been assessed against it in respect of its 1988 to 1990 taxation years pursuant to the January 20, 2004 reassessments. In that correspondence, Slau indicated that it had anticipated losses in its 1988 to 1990 taxation years, and therefore did not make instalment payments in those years. In addition, Slau argued that the Minister should have implemented the Loss Carrybacks when the Losses arose in its 1991 to 1993 taxation years, rather than in December of 1996.

[14] On October 7, 2004, the Minister denied the request for a complete waiver of all interest and penalties but decided that the amount owing by Slau was the amount owing on December 1, 1996 rather than December 16, 1996. In otherwise denying the request, the Minister stated that the Loss Carrybacks could not be implemented before there was a written request to do so from the taxpayer. In addition, the Minister stated that a waiver of interest and penalties pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA could not be granted on the basis of an error or an incorrect assumption on the part of a taxpayer.

[15] By correspondence dated December 13, 2005, counsel for Slau made a second request for a waiver of the interest and penalties in respect of Slau's 1988 to 1990 taxation years. In that correspondence, counsel argued that because the Loss Carrybacks fully offset the amounts of income taxes owing for those years, it was illogical and unfair that Slau should have to pay any interest and penalties in respect of such income tax. In addition, counsel argued that when Slau filed its 1988 to 1990 tax returns as "nil returns", there was no tax owing because there was no taxable income.

[16] On July 6, 2006, the Minister confirmed the October 7, 2004 decision. The Minister determined that the amount owing on December 1, 1996 represented interest and penalties that had accrued prior to the implementation of the Loss Carrybacks as of that date and that any interest charged after that date was calculated on the amount owing on that date.

[17] An application for judicial review of the July 6, 2006 decision was allowed on consent. On February 7, 2007, Mactavish J. set aside that decision and ordered that the request for a waiver of penalty and interest charges relating to Slau's 1988 to 1990 taxation be referred back to the Minister for a new review by persons not previously involved in the matter.

[18] In compliance with this order and on behalf of the Minister, Ms. Lucie Bergevin, Director of the Ottawa Tax Services Office of the CRA reviewed all of the facts of the case, including an external taxpayer relief report, dated October 11, 2007 (the "New Second Level Review Report") prepared and reviewed by CRA officials, and the submissions made on behalf of Slau. In correspondence dated November 6, 2007, in which Slau's request was once again denied, Ms. Bergevin stated:

Digitized by Google

My review reveals no indication that an error or delay on the CRA's part, or circumstances beyond your control, would have caused additional amounts of interest arrears or penalties to be incurred with respect to the taxation years 1988, 1989 and 1990. Therefore, I have concluded that it would not be appropriate to cancel the penalty and interest charged on your client's account for those years.

Under 161(7)(b) of the Income Tax Act, for the purposes of interest calculation, losses carried back were correctly applied effective December 1, 1996. Any interest arrears that accumulated after December 1, 1996, were due to instalment interest and late filing penalties assessed for each year and interest on the Part I taxes that remained outstanding from the date they were due up to December 1, 1996.

[Emphasis Added]

[19] This decision (the "Decision") was challenged by Slau in an application for judicial review that was filed in the Federal Court on December 7, 2007.

THE DECISION OF THE FEDERAL COURT

[20] The Application Judge determined that the Decision was reviewable on the standard of reasonableness.

[21] The Application Judge rejected Slau's argument that the effect of the Loss Carrybacks was that no taxes were ever owing by it in its 1988 to 1990 taxation years. However, he accepted, at least in part, Slau's additional argument that delay on the part of the CRA in accepting Slau's request for the Loss Carrybacks led to the imposition of some of the interest that was payable by Slau.

[22] The Application Judge found that the record indicated that Slau had requested the Loss Carrybacks as early as December of 1996. He then referred to a portion of the Decision in which the Minister stated that there was no error or delay on the Minister's part that caused Slau to be subject to additional interest or penalties. He went on to find that the CRA did delay the implementation of the Loss Carrybacks, stating in paragraph 42 of his reasons:

> [42] However, the CRA did make the error of initially denying the application of the loss carry-back; or, at least, took six years before it decided that the loss carry-back did apply and this eliminated the applicant's tax liability for 1988-1990.

[23] The Application Judge was satisfied that the amount payable by Slau, as of December 1, 1996, was appropriate. However, he determined that if the request for the Loss Carrybacks had been granted when that request was first made in December of 1996, interest on the amount payable on that date might never have accrued.

[24] After commenting that certain CRA forms and correspondence were confusing and that Slau was not able to easily obtain clarification of the CRA's calculations, the Application Judge reached his conclusion in paragraph 47 of his reasons, which reads as follows:

[47] The Court must conclude that the only reasonable application of fairness and equity by the Fairness Committee in this case would be to apply the CRA rationale of cancelling penalties and interest on the taxes from December 1996 to all interest after this date. According to the information received from the parties following the hearing, this means that the applicant would owe interest and penalties totalling $71,195.44.

ISSUE

[25] The issue in this appeal is whether the Minister erred in denying Slau's request, pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA, for cancellation of all or any portion of the interest and penalties that were payable by Slau as a consequence of the January 20, 2004 reassessments.

[26] In appellate review of a decision of a subordinate court that was engaged in judicial review of a decision of a tribunal, the appellate court is required to determine whether the reviewing court selected the appropriate standard of review and applied it correctly. (See *Canada Revi*ew Agency v. Telfer, 2009 FCA 23 at paragraphs 18 and 19.) Thus, in the circumstances of this appeal, the Court will be free to substitute its judgment for that of the Application Judge where the Court determines either that the wrong standard of review was selected by the Application Judge or that the correct standard of review was incorrectly applied by him. In effect, the Court is required to conduct its own review of the Decision using the correct standard of review.

[27] In Telfer, this Court determined that the correct standard of review of a discretionary decision of the Minister under subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA is reasonableness. Telfer also provides guidance with respect to the approach to the application of the reasonableness standard. At paragraph 25 of that decision, Evans J.A. states:

[25] When reviewing for unreasonableness, a court must examine the decision-making process (including the reasons given for the decision), in order to ensure that it contains a rational "justification" for the decision, and is transparent and intelligible. In addition, a reviewing court must determine whether the decision itself falls "within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and the law": Dunsmuir at para. 47.

ANALYSIS

Introduction

[28] The record indicates that Slau made payments on account of penalties and interest in respect of its 1988 to 1990 taxation years of approximately $159,974. In making the Decision, the Minister denied Slau's request for the cancellation of the entirety of that amount, which may be regarded as consisting of two components: approximately $71,195 of interest and penalties that were owing on December 1, 1996 (the "December 1, 1996 Liability") and approximately $88,779 of interest on that amount from December 1, 1996 to the date of payment (the "Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest").

[29] While the Application Judge stated that he was setting aside the Decision as unreasonable, in effect, he partially upheld it by directing in his order that on redetermination, the Minister should cancel only the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest.

[30] In this appeal, the Crown contends that the Minister's refusal to cancel both the December 1, 1996 Liability and the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest was reasonable and should be reinstated. Slau, on the other hand, accepts the decision of the Application Judge, the effect of which would be that Slau is liable to pay the December 1, 1996 Liability but not the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest.

[31] For my part, I see no reason why the Decision cannot be regarded as a composite decision whereunder the Minister refused to cancel both the December 1, 1996 Liability and the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest. Under this approach, this appeal effectively resolves itself into a question of the reasonableness of the Minister's decision not to cancel the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest, since Slau takes no issue with respect to the reasonableness of the Minister's decision not to cancel the December 1, 1996 Liability.

Selection of the Standard of Review

[32] The Application Judge determined that the standard of review of the Decision is reasonableness. In my view, having regard to Telfer, that determination was correct.

Application of Unreasonableness Standard

[33] In the Decision, the Minister stated that no error or delay on the Minister's part caused Slau to become liable for any interest arrears or penalties with respect to its 1988 to 1990 taxation years. This statement can be taken, correctly in my view, to mean that where an error or delay on the part of the Minister results in a taxpayer becoming liable for interest or penalties, it is appropriate for the Minister to exercise the discretion provided for in subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA and to cancel or waive such interest or penalties to the extent that they are attributable to the Minister's error or delay.

[34] The determination of whether the Minister has made an error or caused a delay for these purposes is largely a factual matter. As previously noted, the Application Judge found that the request for the Loss Carrybacks was made in December of 1996 and the Minister made an error or caused a delay in failing to accept and implement that request at that time. The Crown contends that the Application Judge erred in making these factual findings. With respect, I cannot agree with that contention.

[35] On page 2 of the Decision, the Minister states that the Loss Carrybacks "were correctly applied December 1, 1996". I take that statement to mean that having regard to the materials reviewed as a consequence of the order of Mactavish J. in the first judicial review, the Minister determined that Slau had, in fact, requested the Loss Carrybacks on or before December 1, 1996. This conclusion is consistent with a statement made by a CRA official at page 9 (Appeal Book page 256) of the New Second Level Review Report, one of the documents reviewed by the Minister before the Decision was made, wherein it is stated:

There is no written request prior to Dec 1996 on record. The taxpayer's representative Mr. Au-Yeung acknowledges that the loss carry-back request was only made in Dec 1996 at the time of the settlement. The CRA had no record of such a request till Mar 2003. However, due to some indications in our records that such a request might have been made at the time of the settlement the Agency gave the benefit of the doubt to the taxpayer that a request had been made in Dec 1996 – Dec 1, 1996.

[36] In my view, these statements constitute ample support for the factual findings of the Application Judge that the request for the Loss Carrybacks was made in December of 1996 and the Minister made an error or caused a delay by refusing to accept and implement that request when it was made. Moreover, these statements are inconsistent with the Crown's contention at the hearing that the selection of December 1, 1996 as the effective date for the implementation of the Loss Carrybacks was a consequence of the exercise of Ministerial discretion pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA.

[37] The effect of the Minister's failure to implement Slau's 1996 request for the Loss Carrybacks is clear. That failure resulted in the Post-December 1, 1996 Interest Accrual. That interest would likely not have arisen, or at least it would likely not have arisen to an extent that was anywhere close to the actual amount that was paid by Slau, if the Loss Carryback request had been processed when it was originally made in 1996.

[38] What then is the effect of this failure upon the Minister's decision not to cancel the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest? In substance, the Application Judge found that the decision not to cancel the Post- December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest was unreasonable and therefore set that decision aside. In my view, that conclusion is supportable.

Digitized by Google

[39] In the Decision, the Minister stated that the CRA committed no error and made no delay that would have caused Slau to become liable for any Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest. However, that factual premise, upon which the Decision is based, has been found by the Application Judge to be faulty and, in my view, no basis for interfering with that finding has been made out in this appeal. It is clear to me that a decision based upon such an important factual premise cannot be said to be "justifiable" or "intelligible", as contemplated by Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, 2008 SCC 9, where that factual premise has been found to be false. Accordingly, I am of the view that the decision of the Minister to refuse to cancel the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest was unreasonable and to that extent, I agree with the Application Judge.

The Disposition of the Application Judge

[40] Having found that the Decision was unreasonable, the Application Judge determined that it had to be set aside. To that extent, I agree with his determination. However, the Application Judge, relying upon subsection 18.1(3) of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7 (the "Federal Courts Act"), then proceeded to direct the Minister to exercise the discretion provided in subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA in a very specific manner, holding that there was only one reasonable way in which that discretion could be exercised by the Minister. It is at this point that I must, with respect, disagree with the Application Judge.

[41] In this appeal, the Crown argues that the Application Judge exceeded his jurisdiction under subsection 18.1(3) of the Federal Courts Act by ordering the Minister to do something that was not required to be done under subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA. The Crown contends, correctly in my view, that this provision of the ITA simply requires the Minister to exercise the discretion that is provided thereunder and does not require the Minister to bring about any particular result. Unlike the Application Judge, I am of the view that, in the factual context of this appeal, the exercise of the Minister's discretion under subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA could lead to outcomes other than the one that he stipulated. Accordingly, I conclude that the Application Judge erred by imposing a single mandated outcome upon the Minister in the redetermination of the Decision that he ordered.

Conclusion

[42] Having found that the Application Judge made no error in holding that the portion of the Decision that encompasses the refusal of the Minister to cancel the Post-December 1, 1996 Accrued Interest was unreasonable but that he did err in the resulting order that he made, I am of the opinion that it is sufficient for me to simply set aside that portion of the Decision and to refer that matter to the Minister for redetermination in accordance with these reasons.

DISPOSITION

[43] For the foregoing reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Application Judge and, making the order that the Application Judge should have made, I would allow the application for judicial review, set aside the decision of the Minister, dated November 6, 2007, and refer the matter to Minister for redetermination in accordance with these reasons. Since success in this appeal is essentially divided, I would make no order as to costs.

Application

¶ 1. This information circular consolidates and cancels information circulars IC 92-1, Guidelines for Accepting Late, Amended or Revoked Elections, IC 92-2, Guidelines for the Cancellation and Waiver of Interest and Penalties, and IC 92-3, Guidelines for Refunds Beyond the Normal Three Year Period, all dated March 18, 1992.

¶ 2. In this information circular, the term taxpayer includes an individual, an employer or a payer, a corporation, a partnership, a trust, an estate, and an organization, all of which can request relief from the Minister of National Revenue (Minister) to mitigate the strict application of certain provisions as a result of not satisfying various rules and obligations required under the Income Tax Act.

¶ 4. In this information circular, the terms fairness provisions and fairness legislation commonly used on the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) Web site and in CRA publications have been replaced with the term taxpayer relief provisions.

Introduction

¶ 5. This information circular provides information on the discretionary authority the Minister has under the Act to grant taxpayers relief in accordance with the legislative provisions described in ¶ 9. It also explains how a taxpayer makes a request for relief, including the proper information and documentation needed to support such a request, and outlines the administrative guidelines the CRA will follow in making a discretionary decision whether to grant or deny relief based on a taxpayer's situation.

¶ 6. These are only guidelines. They are not intended to be exhaustive, and are not meant to restrict the spirit or intent of the legislation.

Part I Legislation

Part II Guidelines for the Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest

Part III Guidelines for Accepting Late, Amended, or Revoked Elections

Part IV Guidelines for Refunds or Reduction in Amounts Payable Beyond the Normal Three-Year

Digitized by Google

Period
Part V Rules and Procedures When Relief Is Granted or Denied

Part I
Legislation
¶ 8. The legislation gives the CRA the ability to administer the income tax system fairly and reasonably by helping taxpayers to resolve issues that arise through no fault of their own, and to allow for a common-sense approach in dealing with taxpayers who, because of personal misfortune or circumstances beyond their control, could not comply with a statutory requirement for income tax purposes.

Taxpayer Relief Provisions
¶ 9. A taxpayer can ask for relief in accordance with the provisions of the Act listed in this paragraph. After consideration of the relevant facts and circumstances, a delegated official of the CRA (see ¶ 17) will decide whether it is appropriate to:
(a) waive or cancel penalties and interest under subsection 220(3.1);
(b) extend the filing-due date for making certain elections or grant permission to amend or revoke certain elections under subsection 220(3.2);
(c) authorize a refund to an individual (other than a trust) or a testamentary trust under paragraph 164(1.5)(a), even though an income tax return is filed outside the normal three-year period; or
(d) authorize a reassessment or redetermination for an individual (other than a trust) or a testamentary trust beyond the three-year normal reassessment period under subsection 152(4.2), where the adjustment would result in a refund or a reduction in an amount payable.
¶ 10. While paragraph 164(1.5)(a) and subsection 152(4.2) apply only to individuals (other than a trust) and testamentary trusts, subsections 220(3.1) and (3.2) apply to all taxpayers.
¶ 11. The Minister does not have to grant relief under the taxpayer relief provisions. Each request will be reviewed and decided on its own merit. If relief is denied or partly granted, the CRA will provide the taxpayer with an explanation of the reasons and factors for the decision.

Limitation Period on Exercising Ministerial Discretion and Deadline to Apply for Relief
¶ 12. For requests or income tax returns filed on or after January 1, 2005, the Minister may grant relief for any tax year (or fiscal period in the case of a partnership) that ended within 10 years before the calendar year in which the taxpayer's request or income tax return is filed.
¶ 13. Due to this limitation, a taxpayer has 10 years from the end of the calendar year in which the tax year or fiscal period at issue ended to make a request to the CRA for relief. This limitation applies to each of the legislative provisions described in ¶ 9.
¶ 14. The 10-year limitation period rolls forward every January 1. For requests or income tax returns that are filed in the current calendar year, the Minister has no authority to:
waive or cancel penalties and interest; accept a late, amended, or revoked income tax election; or issue a refund or adjustment beyond the normal three-year period; where the request is for a tax year or fiscal period of the taxpayer that ended more than 10 years before the calendar year in which the request was made.

Examples
An initial request or income tax return filed during the 2007 calendar year must deal with an issue related to a taxpayer's 1997 and later tax years (or fiscal periods) to be eligible for relief.
An initial request or income tax return filed on or after January 1, 2008, related to a taxpayer's 1997 and previous tax years (or fiscal periods) is not eligible for relief, since those tax years (or fiscal periods) are beyond the 10-year period. Only requests or returns filed for the 1998 and later tax years (or fiscal periods) are eligible for relief as of this date.

The Minister has no authority to grant relief for the 1998 tax year (or fiscal period) unless the taxpayer has filed an initial request or income tax return for that year before January 1, 2009.
¶ 15. If an assessment or reassessment for a tax year is issued by the CRA in a later year, or if an objection or appeal filed by a taxpayer may take considerable time to resolve, the taxpayer should send in their request for any potential relief before the 10-year time limit for that tax year expires.
¶ 16. Unless an initial request or income tax return was filed before the 10-year limitation rule coming into effect on January 1, 2005, requests filed for the 1985 to 1994 tax years will not be accepted and refunds beyond the normal three-year period will not be issued. For any active requests made before January 1, 2005, the taxpayer relief provisions in ¶ 9 and the redress process described in ¶ 103 and ¶ 105 continue to apply for the taxpayer's 1985 to 1994 tax years.

Who Is Authorized to Make the Decision?
¶ 17. Subsection 220(2.01) authorizes the Minister to delegate his/her powers and duties conferred in various provisions of the Act to designated officials within the CRA. The officials delegated to exercise the Minister's discretionary authority under the taxpayer relief provisions described in ¶ 9 are authorized through administrative delegation instruments. These instruments are available at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/tax/technical/delegationofpowers/menu-e.html.
¶ 18. These officials are authorized to conduct a review of a taxpayer's request for relief and to make a decision whether to grant, partly grant, or deny, the request. It is a general administrative practice of the CRA for another CRA official, or a committee of CRA officials, to prepare a decision report for the delegated official's consideration, including a recommendation on whether or not granting relief is justified. The final decision and notification of the decision to the taxpayer rests with the delegated official.

Part II
Guidelines for the Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest
¶ 19. The information in Part II of this information circular deals with the Minister's discretion to allow relief from the application of the penalty and interest provisions of the Act. The Minister may also provide relief from interest amounts, and in some cases penalty amounts, if he or she is satisfied that a taxpayer has an inability to pay or suffers from financial hardship related to a debt owed to the CRA.

General
¶ 20. Subsection 220(3.1) gives the Minister the discretionary authority to waive or cancel all or part of any penalty and interest otherwise payable by a taxpayer under the Act. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit described in ¶ 13.
¶ 21. The ability of the CRA to waive or cancel penalties and interest is not to be used by taxpayers as a way to arbitrarily reduce or settle their tax debt.
¶ 22. A waiver refers to penalties and interest otherwise payable by a taxpayer for which relief is granted by the CRA before these amounts are assessed or charged to the taxpayer. A cancellation refers to penalties and interest amounts that were assessed or charged to the taxpayer for which relief is granted by the CRA.

Circumstances Where Relief From Penalty and Interest May Be Warranted
¶ 23. The Minister may grant relief from the application of penalty and interest where the following types of situations exist and justify a taxpayer's inability to satisfy a tax obligation or requirement at issue:
(a) extraordinary circumstances
(b) actions of the CRA

Digitized by Google

(c) inability to pay or financial hardship
¶ 24. The Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within the situations stated in ¶ 23.

Extraordinary Circumstances
¶ 25. Penalties and interest may be waived or cancelled in whole or in part where they result from circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control. Extraordinary circumstances that may have prevented a taxpayer from making a payment when due, filing a return on time, or otherwise complying with an obligation under the Act include, but are not limited to, the following examples:
(a) natural or man-made disasters such as, flood or fire;
(b) civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike;
(c) a serious illness or accident; or
(d) serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.

Actions of the CRA
¶ 26. Penalties and interest may also be waived or cancelled if the penalty and interest arose primarily because of actions of the CRA, such as:
(a) processing delays that result in the taxpayer not being informed, within a reasonable time, that an amount was owing;
(b) errors in material available to the public, which led taxpayers to file returns or make payments based on incorrect information;
(c) incorrect information provided to a taxpayer, such as in the case where the CRA wrongly advises a taxpayer that no instalment payments will be required for the current year;
(d) errors in processing;
(e) delays in providing information, such as when a taxpayer could not make the appropriate instalment or arrears payments because the necessary information was not available; or
(f) undue delays in resolving an objection or an appeal, or in completing an audit.

Inability to Pay or Financial Hardship
¶ 27. It may be appropriate, in circumstances where there is a confirmed inability to pay all amounts owing, to consider waiving or cancelling interest in whole or in part to enable taxpayers to pay their account. For example:
(a) when collection had been suspended due to an inability to pay and substantial interest has accumulated or will accumulate;
(b) when a taxpayer's demonstrated ability to pay requires an extended payment arrangement, consideration may be given to waiving all or part of the interest for the period from when payments start until the amounts owing are paid, as long as the agreed payments are made on time and compliance with the Act is maintained; or
(c) when payment of the accumulated interest would cause a prolonged inability to provide basic necessities (financial hardship) such as food, medical help, transportation, or shelter, consideration may be given to cancelling all or part of the total accumulated interest.
¶ 28. Consideration would not generally be given to cancelling a penalty based on an inability to pay or financial hardship unless an extraordinary circumstance, as described in ¶ 25 has prevented compliance. However, there may be exceptional situations that may give rise to cancelling penalties, in whole or in part. For example, when a business is experiencing extreme financial difficulty, and enforcement of such penalties would jeopardize the continuity of its operations, the jobs of the employees, and the welfare of the community as a whole, consideration may be given to providing relief of the penalties.

Making a Request

Digitized by Google

¶ 29. Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their requests in writing and send them to the tax centre where they file their returns or to the tax services office serving their area. Alternatively, Form RC4288, *Request for Taxpayer Relief, can be used to make a request. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.
¶ 30. Taxpayer requests on the basis of inability to pay or financial hardship should be sent to the taxpayer's tax services office.
¶ 32. Taxpayers should include all the circumstances (as listed in ¶ 23) that they intend to rely on in their initial request. It is important that taxpayers provide the CRA with a complete and accurate description of their circumstances to explain why their situation should merit relief. To support a request, taxpayers should provide all relevant information including the following, where applicable:
(a) the name, address, telephone number, social insurance number, account number, partnership number, trust account number, and business number or any other identification tax number assigned by the CRA to the taxpayer;
(b) the tax year(s) or fiscal period(s) involved;
(c) the facts and reasons supporting that the interest or penalties were either mainly caused by factors beyond the taxpayer's control, or were as a result of actions of the CRA;
(d) an explanation of how the circumstances affected the taxpayer's ability in meeting their tax obligation;
(e) the facts and reasons supporting the taxpayer's inability to pay the interest or penalties levied, or to be levied;
(f) any relevant documentation such as death certificates, doctor's statements, or insurance statements to support the facts and reasons;
(g) in cases involving financial hardship (inability to pay), a meaningful payment arrangement which covers at least the tax and the penalty part, if applicable, and full financial disclosure including a statement of income and expenses, as well as a statement of assets and liabilities;
(h) supporting details of incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers, published information, or other objective evidence;
(i) where incorrect information given by the CRA is of a oral nature, the taxpayer should give all possible details they have documented, such as date, time, name of the CRA official spoken to, and details of the conversation; and
(j) a complete history of events including what measures were taken (e.g., payments and payment arrangements) and when they were taken to resolve the non-compliance.

Factors Used in Arriving at the Decision
¶ 33. Where circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control, actions of the CRA, or inability to pay or financial hardship has prevented the taxpayer from complying with the Act, the following factors will be considered when determining whether or not the CRA will cancel or waive penalties and interest:
(a) whether or not the taxpayer has a history of compliance with tax obligations;
(b) whether or not the taxpayer has knowingly allowed a balance to exist on which arrears interest has accrued;
(c) whether or not the taxpayer has exercised a reasonable amount of care and has not been negligent or careless in conducting their affairs under the self-assessment system; and
(d) whether or not the taxpayer has acted quickly to remedy any delay or omission.

Special Consideration Due to Extraordinary Events
¶ 34. When an extraordinary event (e.g., natural disaster) has prevented a large number of taxpayers from meeting their tax obligations, the Minister may issue a news release to announce that special consideration will be given to providing relief, such as a waiver or cancellation of penalty and interest charges on late tax remittances or late filing of a return. In such cases, taxpayers need to make a request to get relief. CRA news releases on extraordinary events that qualify for relief can be found at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/newsroom/releases/menu-e.html.

Third-Party Actions

¶ 35. Taxpayers are generally considered to be responsible for errors made by third parties acting on their behalf for income tax matters. A third party who receives a fee and gives incorrect advice, or makes arithmetic or accounting errors, is usually regarded as being responsible to their client for any penalty and interest charges that the client has because of the party's action. However, there may be exceptional situations, where it may be appropriate to provide relief to taxpayers because of third-party errors or delays.

¶ 36. It may be appropriate to consider granting relief from penalties and interest, in whole or in part, where an extraordinary circumstance beyond the control of a taxpayer's representative or actions of the CRA (as described in ¶ 25 and ¶ 26) have prevented the taxpayer from complying with an obligation or requirement under the Act.

Gross Negligence Penalties

¶ 37. Relief from a gross negligence penalty assessed under the Act can be considered under subsection 220(3.1). However, since the levy of these penalties indicates a degree of negligence and absence of care and diligence on the part of the taxpayer in the conduct of their tax affairs, the cancellation of a gross negligence penalty may be appropriate only in exceptional circumstances.

¶ 38. Given the nature of a gross negligence penalty, it is more appropriate for a taxpayer to dispute the assessment of such a penalty by filing a notice of objection. For more information on a taxpayer's right of objection, see Pamphlet P148, *Resolving Your Dispute: Objection and Appeal Rights Under the Income Tax Act on the CRA Web site.

Accrual of Arrears Interest

¶ 39. Arrears interest that has accumulated on an outstanding balance during a calendar year that is within the 10 preceding calendar years, but relates to a liability that arose for a tax year or fiscal period beyond the 10-year limit (described in ¶ 12), is not eligible for relief. For example, a request made in the 2007 calendar year for relief from arrears interest that accumulated over the 1997 to 2007 calendar years in regard to a tax amount owed for the 1996 tax year cannot be given consideration.

Administrative Charge on Dishonoured Payments

¶ 40. An administrative charge payable under the Financial Administration Act for a dishonoured payment made to the CRA before April 1, 2007 cannot be cancelled under subsection 220(3.1). However, this charge may be waived or reduced under the Financial Administration Act and Interest and Administrative Charges Regulations where circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control, including an error made by the financial institution resulted in the payment being dishonoured. Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their requests in writing and send them to the tax centre where they file their returns or to the tax services office serving their area.

Employment Insurance Premiums and Canada Pension Plan Contributions

¶ 41. The 10-year limit in ¶ 12 and the guidelines in this part also apply to penalties and interest provided for in the Employment Insurance Act and Canada Pension Plan regarding the collection and payment of premiums and contributions required to be made.

Voluntary Disclosures Program

¶ 42. The Voluntary Disclosures Program is a CRA initiative that gives taxpayers the opportunity to come forward and to correct inaccurate or incomplete information, or to disclose previously unreported information, without penalties or fear of prosecution. Taxpayers who are considered to have made a valid voluntary disclosure will have to pay the taxes owing and arrears interest, and the CRA will waive the penalties that would otherwise be imposed under the Act. Under this program, and on a case-by-case basis, the CRA may provide some relief on the amount of arrears interest outstanding, after it is determined that the taxpayer made a valid voluntary disclosure. For more details, see Information Circular 00-1R2, Voluntary Disclosures Program.

¶ 43. Arrears interest payable on a valid voluntary disclosure may be cancelled or waived under subsection 220(3.1). For more details, see Part II in this information circular called "Guidelines for the Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest."

Goods and Services Tax/Harmonized Sales Tax

¶ 44. Section 281.1 of the Excise Tax Act (ETA) gives the Minister the discretion to waive or cancel penalties and interest payable under section 280 of the ETA, and effective April 1, 2007, the failure-to-file penalty payable under section 280.1. For more details on requesting relief from penalties and interest regarding the goods and services tax/harmonized sales tax (GST/HST), see GST Memorandum G500-3-2-1, *Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest.

Part III

Guidelines for Accepting Late, Amended, or Revoked Elections

¶ 45. The Act and Income Tax Regulations contain many elections that give taxpayers the opportunity to decide on an alternative tax treatment in conducting their financial affairs for income tax purposes. Most elections do not have tax rules that permit a taxpayer to file an election once the prescribed time for making that election expires or that give the taxpayer the ability to modify or cancel an original election filed on time. The information in Part III of this information circular deals with the Minister's discretion to allow a taxpayer the benefit of certain elections even though they missed the due date, and to permit a taxpayer to modify or cancel certain elections already filed.

General

¶ 46. Subsection 220(3.2) gives the Minister the discretionary authority to extend the statutory time for filing certain elections or to permit certain elections to be amended or revoked. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit described in ¶ 13.

Prescribed Elections

¶ 47. A request by a taxpayer to have a late or amended election accepted or to revoke an election is limited to the elective provisions of the Act and Regulations listed in section 600 of the Regulations. For the list of prescribed elections, see Appendix A at the end of this information circular.

¶ 48. A late, amended, or revoked election must be correct in law based on the relevant legislation in place for the applicable tax year to which the election applies.

¶ 49. When accepted by the CRA, a late or amended election will be considered to have been made at the time it was required to be made. For amended and revoked elections, the earlier election will be cancelled. To give effect to acceptance of a late, amended, or revoked election, the CRA will reassess the affected returns for the tax years in question even if the years are beyond the taxpayer's normal reassessment period (i.e., statute-barred years).

¶ 50. Any assessments or reassessments resulting from the CRA's acceptance of the request is subject to the general provisions concerning arrears interest charged on the balance owing.

Penalty for Late, Amended, or Revoked Elections

¶ 51. A taxpayer is liable to a penalty if the CRA accepts a late, amended, or revoked election. The penalty, calculated under subsection 220(3.5), is whichever amount is less:

(a) $8,000; or

(b) $100 for each complete month from the election's original due date to the date the application was made in a form satisfactory to the CRA.

¶ 52. The date on which the request (application) was made in a satisfactory form to the CRA is when the CRA has been provided with complete and accurate information for the election under review. To minimize the amount of penalty, the taxpayer should satisfy the application procedures described in ¶s 58 through 63.

¶ 53. It is CRA policy not to accept late, amended, or revoked elections, or to process the necessary adjustments to give an election effect, unless the amount of the penalty described in ¶ 51 is paid. Taxpayers should remit the penalty amount with their request. The CRA will determine and assess any unpaid balance of the penalty, which the taxpayer must pay at once. Interest will be charged on the unpaid balance of the penalty from the date of the Notice of Assessment to the date of payment.

¶ 54. The penalty described in ¶ 51 is subject to the provisions of subsection 220(3.1). For details on the cancellation or waiver of this penalty, see Part II in this information circular called “Guidelines for the Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest.”

Deemed Prescribed Elections

¶ 55. The rules and guidelines under this part also apply to the following designations and allocations that are considered prescribed elections, under subsection 220(3.21):

(a) Paragraph 80(2)(i) of the Act allows a taxpayer to designate the order in which commercial debt obligations settled at the same time are to be applied for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.

(b) Subsections 80(5) to 80(11) allow a taxpayer who has designated a forgiven amount to apply any remaining part of the forgiven amount in certain circumstances.

(c) Subsection 80.03(7) allows a taxpayer to designate a capital gain that would otherwise arise under subsection 80.03(2) as a forgiven amount for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.

(d) Subsection 132.11(6) allows a mutual fund trust, as well as any electing trust with a December 15 year-end, to choose an amount designated by it for a tax year to be added in computing its income for the year.

Acceptance of a Late, Amended, or Revoked Election

¶ 56. A request may be accepted in the following situations:

(a) There have been tax consequences not intended by the taxpayer, and there is evidence that the taxpayer took reasonable steps to comply with the law. This could include, for example, the situation where the taxpayer obtained a bona fide valuation for a property, but after the CRA's review the valuation was found to be not correct.

(b) The request arises from circumstances that were beyond the taxpayer's control. Such extraordinary circumstances could include natural or man-made disasters such as flood or fire; civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike; a serious illness or accident; or serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.

(c) It is evident that the taxpayer acted on incorrect information given by the CRA. This could include incorrect written replies to queries and errors in CRA publications.

(d) The request results from what is a mechanical error. This could include using the net book value amount when obviously the taxpayer intended to use the undepreciated capital cost or using an incorrect cost.

(e) The later accounting of the transactions by all parties is as if the election had been made, or had been made in a particular manner.

Digitized by Google

(f) The taxpayer can demonstrate that they were not aware of the election provision, even though they took a reasonable amount of care to comply with the law, and took remedial action as quickly as possible.

Denial of a Late, Amended, or Revoked Election
¶ 57. A request will not be accepted in the following instances:
(a) It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer made the request for retroactive tax planning purposes. This could include taking advantage of changes to the law enacted after the due date of the election.
(b) Adequate records do not exist.
(c) It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer had to make the request because he or she was negligent or careless in complying with the law.

Making a Request
¶ 58. Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their requests in writing and send them to the tax centre where they file their returns or to the tax services office serving their area. Alternatively, Form RC4288, *Request for Taxpayer Relief, can be used to make a request. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221. To find the addresses and telephone numbers of CRA offices, see ¶ 31.
¶ 59. To support a request, taxpayers should provide all relevant information including the following, where applicable:
(a) the name, address, telephone number, social insurance number, partnership number, trust account number, and business number or any other identification tax number assigned by the CRA to the taxpayer;
(b) the tax year(s) or fiscal period(s) involved;
(c) the dates and details of the transactions;
(d) the date and details of the original election, including an explanation of why the taxpayer is asking to have an election amended or revoked; and
(e) details of a late election, and an explanation of why it is late.
¶ 60. For a request to accept a late or amended election, the election needs to be made in the appropriate manner required by the specific provisions of the Act concerning that election (e.g., filing the election in prescribed form or in a prescribed manner).
¶ 61. The request should briefly describe the income tax implications of the acceptance or refusal of the request for all the parties involved.
¶ 62. If accepting the request involves changes to continuing tax account balances, taxpayers should submit appropriate revised schedules reflecting these changes. This could include, for example, capital cost allowance schedules, reserve account schedules, and Canadian exploration or development expense account schedules.
¶ 63. When the request involves more than one taxpayer, an agreement, signed by all parties, to the changes requested should be included with the request.

Part IV
Guidelines for Refunds or Reduction in Amounts Payable Beyond the Normal Three-Year Period
¶ 64. The Act sets a three-year limitation period from the end of the tax year of an individual (other than a trust) and testamentary trust to file an income tax return to claim a tax refund and a three-year limitation period from the date of the original Notice of Assessment to ask for an adjustment to an assessment issued for a previous tax year. The information in Part IV of this information circular deals with the Minister's discretion to relieve an individual (other than a trust) and a testamentary trust from the limitation period and, in certain circumstances, to accept late requests to give the individual or testamentary trust a refund or reduction in tax.

General
¶ 65. The relief provided under paragraph 164(1.5)(a) and subsection 152(4.2) applies only to individuals (other than trusts) and testamentary trusts.

Refund Entitlement
¶ 66. Subsection 164(1) restricts the CRA from refunding an overpayment of tax unless:
(a) an income tax return was filed within three years from the end of the tax year; or
(b) the CRA received a request for a refund within three years from the date of the original Notice of Assessment and the related income tax return was filed within three years from the end of the tax year. This is referred to as the normal reassessment period.

Discretion to Allow a Statute-Barred Refund
¶ 67. However, paragraph 164(1.5)(a) gives the Minister the discretionary authority to refund to an individual or a testamentary trust all or any part of an overpayment of tax for a tax year even if the tax return was filed later than three years from the end of the tax year. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit described in ¶ 13.

Reassessment or Redetermination
¶ 68. Subsection 152(4) generally restricts the CRA from reassessing a return of income for a tax year that is beyond three years from the date of the original Notice of Assessment or of an original notification that no tax was payable for the year. When the normal three-year reassessment period for a tax year ends, the return is considered statute-barred.

Discretion to Refund or Reduce Tax Payable for a Statute-Barred Return
¶ 69. However, subsection 152(4.2) gives the Minister the discretionary authority to make a reassessment or a redetermination beyond the normal reassessment period for a statute-barred tax year, when requested by an individual or a testamentary trust in order to determine a refund or to reduce tax payable. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit described in ¶ 13.
¶ 70. An individual or testamentary trust, as the case may be, can ask the CRA to redetermine certain amounts that are considered either as payments on account of tax or overpayment of tax under the Act. Paragraph 152(4.2)(b) refers to the following amounts for which a redetermination could be issued:
(a) refundable Quebec abatement for income earned in Quebec by an individual resident of Quebec under subsection 120(2);
(b) refundable First Nations abatement for individuals who are subject to income tax legislation of certain First Nations under subsection 120(2.2);
(c) goods and services tax/harmonized sales tax (GST/HST) credit available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.5(3);
(d) refundable medical expense supplement available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.51(2);
(e) refundable investment tax credit available to taxpayers under subsection 127.1(1);
(f) the tax credit that a beneficiary of a mining reclamation trust can claim under subsection 127.41(3);
(g) the tax credit that certain beneficiaries can claim under subsection 210.2(3) for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust;
(h) the tax credit a Canadian partnership flows through to its partners for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust under subsection 210.2(4); and
(i) Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) payments available to eligible individuals for qualified dependants under subsection 122.61(1).

Acceptance of a Refund or Adjustment Request

¶ 71. The CRA may issue a refund or reduce the amount owed if it is satisfied that such a refund or reduction would have been made if the return or request had been filed or made on time, and provided that the necessary assessment is correct in law and has not been already allowed.

¶ 72. Individuals and testamentary trusts can make a request if they were not aware of, or missed, claiming a deduction or a non-refundable tax credit that was available for the year, such as child care expenses or the amount for an eligible dependant. Individuals can also ask for refunds or reductions of amounts owing for refundable tax credits such as provincial tax credits that have not been claimed. In addition, payroll deductions may have resulted in an overpayment of taxes for which a refund can be requested.

¶ 73. The purpose for requesting an adjustment under subsection 152(4.2) is not to dispute or disagree on the correctness or validity of a previous assessment. The ability of the CRA to allow an adjustment to amounts for a statute-barred tax year should not be used as a means to have issues reconsidered, such as an audit reassessment, where the individual or testamentary trust chose not to challenge the issues through the normal objection/appeals processes or where the issues were already dealt with under the objection/appeal. For more information on a taxpayer's right of objection, see Pamphlet P148, *Resolving Your Dispute: Objection and Appeal Rights Under the Income Tax Act, on the CRA Web site.

¶ 74. The CRA will generally not accept a request for an adjustment to a statute-barred tax year of an individual where the adjustment would result in the increase of taxes, interest, or penalties to the returns of other individuals that are statute-barred and cannot be reassessed by the CRA.

Making a Request

¶ 75. Individuals and testamentary trusts, or their authorized representatives, can apply for a refund from a statute-barred tax year by filing the income tax return(s) together with documentation or explanations to support their claim(s). If the returns were previously filed, they can make a written request.

¶ 76. To ask for a refund or a reduction of amounts owing under subsection 152(4.2), individuals and testamentary trusts can make their requests in writing and include the following information:

(a) the name, address, telephone number, social insurance number, and trust account number or any other identification tax number assigned by the CRA to the taxpayer;
(b) the tax year(s) involved;
(c) all relevant documents to support any claims being made; and
(d) an explanation for the adjustment they are requesting.

¶ 77. Individuals and testamentary trusts, or their authorized representatives, can send returns, written requests, and supporting documentation to the tax centre where they file their returns or to the tax services office serving their area. Alternatively, Form RC4288, *Request for Taxpayer Relief, can be used to make a request. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221. To find the addresses and telephone numbers of CRA offices, see ¶ 31.

¶ 78. To support a return or a request for an adjustment, individuals and testamentary trusts should provide the following information, if relevant:

(a) official receipts or certified true copies of receipts (e.g., tuition, registered retirement savings plan, or charitable donation receipts);
(b) copies of information slips (e.g., T3, T4, T5);
(c) details or calculations of expenses or deductions being claimed; and
(d) proof of payment, such as cancelled cheques for rental payments or a letter from a landlord.

¶ 79. If T4 information slips are relevant but are not available, individuals should provide a letter from their present or former employer(s), which states their income and deductions for the year. Otherwise, they should provide the full name and address of the present or former employer(s), as well as copies of pay stubs or cancelled cheques.

¶ 80. If other types of information slips are not available, an individual and testamentary trust should provide the name and address of the slip issuer and the amount on the slip.
¶ 81. If it is impossible to get the proper documentation, individuals and testamentary trusts should submit full details and a written explanation for consideration.
¶ 82. The CRA will try to reconstruct and validate the claim or claims by referring to CRA records.
¶ 83. If the CRA cannot validate a claim after referring to its records, a refund will not be issued.

Provincial Benefits or Credits
¶ 84. If there are time limitations to claim certain provincial benefits or credits (which are administered by the CRA for provinces) stipulated in a provincial act, subsection 152(4.2) and paragraph 164(1.5)(a) do not override provincial limitations, unless provincial law allows for it.

Permissive Deductions
¶ 85. The CRA will not process requests for adjustments if the requested decrease in tax is the result of an increased claim for capital cost allowance or other allowable deductions, where the taxpayer originally claimed less than the maximum amount allowed. For more information, see Information Circular 84-1, *Revision of Capital Cost Allowance Claims and Other Permissive Deductions.

Employment Insurance Premiums and Canada Pension Plan Contributions
¶ 86. The relief described in ¶ 67 and ¶ 69 does not affect refunds for overpayments of Employment Insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan contributions. The time limit for refunds remains at three and four years under the Employment Insurance Act and Canada Pension Plan respectively.

Requests Based on a Court Decision or Other Resolution
¶ 87. CRA policy does not allow for the reassessment of a statute-barred return if the request is made as a result of a court decision (for more information, see Information Circular 75-7R3, *Reassessment of a Return of Income). Requests made to reassess a statute-barred return based only on the successful appeal by another taxpayer will not be granted under subsection 152(4.2).
¶ 88. Similarly, knowledge of another taxpayer's negotiated settlement to resolve an objection, or another taxpayer's consent to judgment on an appeal, will not be extended to permit a reassessment of a taxpayer's statute-barred return under subsection 152(4.2), if the taxpayer has chosen not to protect his or her right of objection or appeal.

Part V
Rules and Procedures When Relief is Granted or Denied
¶ 89. Part V of this information circular deals with rules and procedures for interest paid on overpayments, issuing refunds, and the right of objection to an assessment or reassessment issued as a result of a decision made by the CRA to grant relief to a taxpayer. Part V also explains the recourse taxpayers have to ask for a second administrative review from the CRA or to have the Minister's decision reviewed by the Federal Court, when taxpayers do not agree with the Minister's decision for denying relief or partly granting relief.

Reductions in Refunds
¶ 90. Paragraph 164(1.5)(b) gives the Minister the discretion to refund an overpayment of tax that results from a reassessment or redetermination relating to:
(a) an adjustment made beyond the normal reassessment period under subsection 152(4.2);

Digitized by Google

(b) the cancellation of penalties and interest under subsection 220(3.1); or
(c) the application of subsection 220(3.4) for the accepting of a late, amended, or revoked election under subsection 220(3.2).
¶ 91. Under certain circumstances, the CRA may reduce the amount of a refund to which an individual or testamentary trust might otherwise be entitled. For example, this may happen when a requested adjustment for a year beyond the normal reassessment period results in a refund for that particular year, but the adjustment would result in an increase of taxes, interest, or penalties for another year that is statute-barred. Under these circumstances, the CRA will usually grant a refund only if it is more than the taxes, interest, and penalties that would otherwise have been paid if the other year had not been statute-barred.
¶ 92. Similarly, if a redetermination of Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) or goods and services tax/harmonized sales tax (GST/HST) credit requested by an individual results in a refund for the particular year, but would necessitate a redetermination to repay CCTB or GST/HST overpayments received for another year(s) which is statute-barred, the refund may be reduced accordingly.

Refund Interest
¶ 93. For requests received after June 30, 2003, subsection 164(3.2) provides for the payment of interest on a refund arising from a reassessment or redetermination that:
cancels all or part of any penalty and interest previously paid; or reduces the amount of tax previously paid as a result of accepting an adjustment or a late, amended, or revoked election.
¶ 94. Compound daily interest at the prescribed rates will start to accumulate on the 31st day after a written request to waive or cancel penalty and interest, accept a late, amended, or revoked election, or to allow an adjustment beyond the normal three-year limit was received in a manner satisfactory to the CRA.
¶ 95. The date on which the request was received in a manner satisfactory to the CRA is the date when the CRA has been given complete and accurate information about the request under review. In certain circumstances, refund interest may begin later than the day stated in ¶ 94. For example, refund interest may begin on a later date if there was not enough documentation given to support the taxpayer's claim for an adjustment, or a new request is made for penalty and interest relief, which relies on different grounds than the previous request that was denied by the CRA. Taxpayers should satisfy the procedures described in this information circular in the section called “Making a Request.”
¶ 96. Under subsection 164(3) and for the filing of a tax return for a tax year of an individual or testamentary trust that ended after June 30, 2003, refund interest on an overpayment will start to accumulate on the 31st day after the date the return was filed. For tax years that ended on or before June 30, 2003, refund interest will start on the 46th day after the date the return was filed.
¶ 97. There is no interest paid on a refund or part of a refund for GST/HST or CCTB payments made to an individual.

Application of Refund to Other Debts
¶ 98. Under subsection 164(2), the amount of any refund (except for CCTB payments) may be applied against any amount the taxpayer owes or is about to owe.

Refund Withheld Until Outstanding Returns Are Filed
¶ 99. Effective April 1, 2007, under subsection 164(2.01), a refund will not be paid to a taxpayer, applied to other debts, or used to set off amounts under the Act until such time as all outstanding returns that are required to be filed by the taxpayer under the Income Tax Act, the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, the Excise Act, 2001, and the Excise Tax Act have been filed with the CRA.

Right of Objection

¶ 100. If the Minister has waived or cancelled in whole or in part any penalties and interest under subsection 220(3.1) or has issued a Notice of Reassessment beyond the normal reassessment period under subsection 152(4.2), a taxpayer is prohibited under subsection 165(1.2) from filing an objection to dispute the assessment or reassessment.

¶ 101. If the Minister has accepted a late, amended, or revoked election under subsection 220(3.2), a taxpayer can file an objection under subsection 165(1.1) to dispute the assessment or reassessment made under subsection 220(3.4). However, objections are limited to matters that give rise to the assessment.

¶ 102. The normal objection procedures under subsection 165(1) apply to an individual (other than a trust) or testamentary trust for an original Notice of Assessment made to allow a refund from filing an income tax return beyond the normal three-year period. For more information on a taxpayer's right of objection, see Pamphlet P148, *Resolving Your Dispute: Objection and Appeal Rights Under the Income Tax Act.

Redress – Second Administrative Review

¶ 103. If a request was denied or partly granted, there is no right of objection for a taxpayer to dispute a decision under the taxpayer relief provisions. However, if the taxpayer believes that the Minister's discretion has not been properly exercised, the taxpayer can write to ask that the director of the tax services office or the tax centre reconsider the original decision and review the situation again. During the second review, the taxpayer will have the opportunity to make more representations for the CRA's consideration. To find the addresses of CRA offices, see ¶ 31.

¶ 104. CRA officials not involved in the first administrative review and decision would carry out the second administrative review. They would prepare a decision report for the director or another delegated official for his or her consideration, including a recommendation on whether or not granting relief is justified. The final decision and notification of the decision to the taxpayer rests with the director or another delegated official, such as an assistant director.

Redress – Judicial Review

¶ 105. If a taxpayer believes that the Minister's discretion was not properly exercised, the taxpayer can apply for judicial review of that decision to the Federal Court under section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, within 30 days of the date the decision was first received by the taxpayer.

¶ 106. To ask for judicial review, the taxpayer must send a completed Form 301, Notice of Application, with the appropriate filing fee to the registrar of the Federal Court. For more information on how to file an application for judicial review or other general enquiries, contact the Courts Administration Service or see their Web site at http://www.cas-satj.gc.ca.

¶ 107. If it is determined that the Minister's discretion was not properly exercised, the Federal Court cannot substitute its decision for a decision of the CRA but can only refer the decision back to the CRA to be reconsidered by another delegated official.

¶ 108. As a general rule, taxpayers should ask for a second administrative review (described in ¶ 103) from the CRA before filing an application for judicial review with the Federal Court.

Requests Made While an Objection or Appeal Is in Progress

¶ 109. A request to cancel penalty and interest on the grounds of extraordinary circumstances or actions of the CRA for an assessment under objection or appeal may be reviewed and an informal decision may be communicated to the taxpayer. However, a final decision about the taxpayer's request for relief will be held until the objection or appeal is resolved or until all rights of appeal have expired.

¶ 110. A taxpayer's request to cancel penalty and interest on the grounds of inability to pay or financial hardship under subsection 220(3.1), for an adjustment under subsection 152(4.2), or to accept a late, amended, or revoked election under subsection 220(3.2) that relates to an assessment that is under objection or appeal will generally be held in abeyance until the outcome of the objection or appeal process or until all rights of appeal have expired.

Appendix A – List of prescribed elections

Section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations lists the provisions of the Income Tax Act and Income Tax Regulations under which a taxpayer or a partnership can apply under subsection 220(3.2) of the Act to make a late or amended election, or to revoke an election.

The list of eligible elections reflects the amendments to section 600 that were registered in the Canada Gazette, Part II, on August 29, 2006, as SOR/2006-200.

Below is a list of the prescribed provisions, and a brief description of related elections:

Deferral on non-Canadian controlled private corporation employee options

Subsection 7(8) of the Act allows an employee to defer the taxing of an employment benefit realized from a qualifying acquisition of a particular security under an agreement with the employer (or a person not dealing at arm's length with the employer) until the year in which the employee disposes of the security, becomes a non-resident of Canada or dies, whichever occurs first, if the employee elects in accordance with subsection 7(10) to have subsection 7(8) apply.

Deemed outlay or expense

Paragraph 12(2.2)(b) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to reduce the amount of an outlay or expense (other than an outlay or expense which relates to the cost of the property) incurred in the year, the immediately following year or any preceding year, by all or part of any related government assistance received in the year which would otherwise be included in income by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(x).

Interest income accrual rules

Former subsection 12.2(4) of the Act allowed an individual or a trust with individuals as beneficiaries to elect to report accrued interest income annually for certain life insurance policies and annuity contracts last acquired before December 20, 1980, rather than tri-annually under former subsection 12.2(3). Subsection 12.2(4) was repealed, after the introduction of mandatory annual reporting of accrued income on life insurance policies last acquired or materially altered after 1989.

Available-for-use rules on long-term projects

Subsection 13(29) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to include an amount, within limits, as undepreciated capital cost for long-term project depreciable property under the available-for-use provisions of subsections 13(26) to 13(28), before the completion of the project.

Amounts paid for undertaking future obligations

Subsection 20(24) of the Act allows a taxpayer to deduct from income certain payments made to obtain another person's agreement to undertake certain future obligations for which an amount was included in the taxpayer's income under paragraph 12(1)(a), if the taxpayer and the recipient jointly elect under subsection 20(25).

Cost of borrowed money

Digitized by Google

The elections contained in section 21 of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to capitalize, instead of deducting as a current expense, the cost of borrowed money used to acquire depreciable property (subsections 21(1) and 21(3)) or used for exploring, developing, or acquiring a resource property (subsections 21(2) and 21(4)).

Exchanges of property
Subsections 13(4), 14(6), 44(1), and (6) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to defer an income inclusion or the recognition of a capital gain when a replacement property is acquired for a property that was stolen, expropriated, or destroyed, or for a former business property that was sold.

Adjustments to cost base
Subsections 13(7.4) and 53(2.1) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to reduce the capital cost of depreciable property and the adjusted cost base of non-depreciable capital property, respectively, by the amount of any related inducement, refund, reimbursement, contribution, allowance, or other assistance that would otherwise be included in income under paragraph 12(1)(x).

Election where change of use
Subsection 45(2) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to designate a property as his principal residence although there has been a change in use to an income producing property.
Subsection 45(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer a capital gain on the change of use of a property from an income producing property to a principal residence.

Debts established to be bad debts and shares of bankrupt corporation
Subsection 50(1) of the Act applies to debts established to have become bad debts in a tax year and to certain shares, and allows a taxpayer to elect to have a deemed disposition at the end of the year and a reacquisition immediately thereafter at a cost of nil.

Successor rules for resource properties
Paragraphs 66.7(7)(c), (d), and (e), and (8)(c), (d), and (e) of the Act allow a predecessor corporation and a successor corporation to elect to transfer the unused pools of resource expenses from the predecessor to the successor corporation.

Transfers or distributions to a taxpayer's spouse, common-law partner, or spousal/partner trust on the death of the taxpayer
Subsection 70(6.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect to have the rollover rules under subsections 70(6) and 70(6.1) not to apply, thus causing the deemed disposition of assets at fair market value under subsection 70(5) and the deemed payment of amounts in NISA Fund No.2 under subsection 70(5.4).

Transfer of farm property, or family farm corporations and partnerships to a child
Subsection 70(9) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.
Subsection 70(9.1) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.
Subsection 70(9.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.
Subsection 70(9.3) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.

Election by legal representative and transferee re reserves
Subsection 72(2) of the Act lets a legal representative of a deceased taxpayer elect to claim a deduction for certain reserves, as long as the amount so deducted is then included in the income of the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner or a spousal or common-law partner trust.

Inter vivos transfer of property
Subsection 73(1) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have the rollover provisions for an inter vivos transfer of assets to a spouse or common-law partner or certain trusts not to apply, thus causing the assets to be considered to be transferred at fair market value for tax purposes.

Deemed settlement on winding-up
Paragraph 80.01(4)(c) of the Act allows a parent corporation to elect to reduce the amount to which subsection 80(1) (debt forgiveness rules) might otherwise apply in cases where a debt owed between a parent corporation and its subsidiary is settled on the winding up of the subsidiary for less than both the principal amount and the cost amount of the debt.

Expropriation assets acquired as compensation for, or as consideration for sale of, foreign property taken by or sold to a foreign issuer
Subsection 80.1(1) of the Act applies to a Canadian resident taxpayer who has acquired expropriation assets issued or guaranteed by a foreign government as compensation for the expropriated or forced sale of shares of a foreign affiliate, or foreign property used to carry on business in a foreign country. The election establishes the deemed cost of the expropriation assets and the deemed proceeds of disposition of the property that was expropriated or sold.

Dividends received by taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner
Subsection 82(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have a taxable dividend from a taxable Canadian corporation received by the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner included in the taxpayer's income where such an inclusion increases the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner credit under paragraph 118(1)(a).

Capital dividend
Subsection 83(2) of the Act allows a private corporation to elect to have the full amount of a dividend that is payable by it to be treated as a capital dividend, which effectively allows those dividends to be paid on a tax-free basis.

Eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares
Paragraph 86.1(2)(f) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer the tax on eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares.

Election to defer the 21-year deemed disposition date
Subsection 104(5.3) of the Act allowed certain family trusts to elect to defer the 21-year deemed disposition date. This provision was ended with the result that the deferred disposition date is no later than January 1, 1999.

Preferred beneficiary election
Subsection 104(14) of the Act allows a trust and its preferred beneficiaries to elect to have the income of the trust included in the income of the preferred beneficiaries, instead of being taxed in the trust.

No rollover on election by trust
Subsection 107(2.001) of the Act allows a personal trust or prescribed trust resident in Canada at the time of the distribution to elect not to have the rollover in subsection 107(2) applied to a distribution of certain property to a beneficiary to satisfy the beneficiary's capital interest in the trust.

Deemed disposition on emigration
Paragraph 128.1(4)(d) of the Act allows an individual (other than a trust) to elect to treat certain properties that would otherwise be exempt from the deemed disposition that occurs when the individual ceases to be resident in Canada as having been disposed of.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning former resident
Paragraphs 128.1(6)(a) and 128.1(6)(c) of the Act apply to an individual (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, and later returns to reside in Canada. The effect of the election is to unwind the deemed disposition under subsection 128.1(4) for certain properties still held on the individual's return to Canada.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning trust beneficiary
Paragraphs 128.1(7)(d) and 128.1(7)(g) of the Act apply to an individual trust beneficiary (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, receives a distribution of property from the trust while a non-resident, and later returns to reside in Canada while still owning the property. These rules allow the beneficiary and the trust to jointly elect, on the beneficiary's return to Canada, to unwind the deemed disposition under subsection 107(2.1), which was triggered when the trust distributed the property to the non-resident beneficiary.

Post-emigration loss on disposition
Paragraph 128.1(8)(c) of the Act applies to an individual (other than a trust) who disposes of taxable Canadian property, after having ceased to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, for proceeds that are less than the deemed proceeds that arose on the deemed disposition on emigration under paragraph 128.1(4)(b) of the Act. The individual can elect to reduce the deemed proceeds of disposition that arose when the individual emigrated.

Allocation of income by communal organizations
Subsection 143(2) of the Act allows a communal organization to elect to have its taxable income, earned by the deemed trust under subsection 143(1), allocated to members of the organization.

Home Buyers' Plan
Subsection 146.01(7) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative and the surviving spouse or common-law partner to elect not to have the full outstanding balance of the Home Buyers' Plan included on the deceased taxpayer's final return. The practical effect of the election is to put the surviving spouse or common-law partner in the same position as the deceased taxpayer with respect to the balance outstanding.

Disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer
Subsection 164(6) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat certain capital losses or terminal losses of the taxpayer's estate for its first tax year as capital losses or terminal losses of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Digitized by Google

Realization of deceased employees' options
Subsection 164(6.1) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat the amount of the loss realized on the exercise, disposition, or expiration of rights to acquire certain securities within the first tax year of the taxpayer's estate as a loss of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Excess capital dividend
Subsection 184(3) of the Act allows a corporation to elect to have the amount of the elected capital dividend in excess of the balance in the corporation's capital dividend account treated as a separate, taxable dividend, thereby avoiding the tax otherwise payable under Part III.

Date of acquisition of control
Subsection 256(9) of the Act allows a corporation to elect not to have the acquisition of control deemed to occur at the start of the day on which the acquisition took place. If the corporation makes an election, the particular time of day that the acquisition of control took place will be recognized.

Elections to include properties in Class 1
Subsection 1103(1) of the Regulations allows a taxpayer to elect, for capital cost allowance purposes, to include in Class 1 all properties included in Classes 2 to 10 and Classes 11 and 12.

Elections to include properties in Class 2, 4, or 17
Subsection 1103(2) of the Regulations allows a taxpayer to elect, for capital cost allowance purposes, to include in Class 2, 4, or 17, a property acquired before May 26, 1976, that would otherwise be included in another class when the chief depreciable properties of the taxpayer are included in Class 2, 4, or 17.

Elections to make certain transfers
Subsection 1103(2d) of the Regulations allows a taxpayer to elect to defer a capital cost allowance recapture by transferring the property disposed of to a new class of which the taxpayer has property, when the property disposed of would have been a property of the new class if it had been acquired when the property of the new class was acquired.

Earnings of a foreign affiliate
Subsection 5907(2.1) of the Regulations allows that, in calculating the active business earnings of a foreign affiliate, a corporation can make an election for the cost of a foreign resource property or the cost of a capital property.

1. Introduction

The Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) has been emphasizing fairness and fair treatment of taxpayers for many years. The introduction of the taxpayer relief provisions in the early 1990's is a good example of the CRA's commitment to fairness. However, fairness is far broader than our taxpayer relief provisions. It is a concept built around service excellence, a positive way of thinking, and a culture with a taxpayer focus.

The CRA has further defined fairness through seven guiding principles, which are described in the document called Our Fairness Pledge. This pledge can be used by all of us as a guide to the way we interact with taxpayers and internal clients.

The CRA can grant relief to taxpayers through the taxpayer relief provisions contained in various acts it administers. This guide focuses on the taxpayer relief provisions. For information on the broader concept of fairness, visit the Fairness and Taxpayer Rights pages.

1.1. Purpose of this guide

This guide provides updated instructions and policies for CRA employees who apply the taxpayer relief provisions. It is designed to promote consistency and accuracy in decisions we make on taxpayer relief requests.

The guide gives policies and guidelines for processing taxpayer relief requests relating to:

- the cancellation or waiving of penalties and/or interest;
- issuing refunds or reducing amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period; and
- accepting late, amended, and revoked elections

1.2 How this guide is organized

2. Legislation

This section provides the legislative references for the various Acts administered by the CRA that contain taxpayer relief provisions.

2.1 Income Tax Act (ITA)

Before 2005, taxpayer relief requests under the Income Tax Act (ITA) were considered for 1985 and later taxation years. Effective January 1, 2005, a 10-year rolling time limit is imposed due to amendments in the ITA. The 10-year limitation period rolls forward every January 1.

Requests made on or after January 1, 2005, are limited for consideration to any taxation year for individuals (or fiscal period in the case of a partnership) that ended ten years before the calendar year in which the request is made.

Requests made prior to January 1, 2005 are limited for consideration to the 1985 and subsequent taxation years.

2.1.1 Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest

For taxpayers (including employers), subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA permits us to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest payable under that Act.

Subsection 220(3.1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

2.1.2 Refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period

Subsection 152(4.2) of the ITA permits us to process credit reassessments or redeterminations beyond the normal three-year period for individuals and testamentary trusts only.

Subsection 152(4.2) reads as follows:

Notwithstanding subsections (4), (4.1) and (5), for the purpose of determining, at any time after the end of the normal reassessment period of a taxpayer who is an individual (other than a trust) or a testamentary trust in respect of a taxation year, the amount of any refund to which the taxpayer is entitled at that time for the year, or a reduction of an amount payable under this Part by the taxpayer for the year, the Minister may, if the taxpayer makes an application for that determination on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of that taxation year,

a. reassess tax, interest or penalties payable under this Part by the taxpayer in respect of that year; and

b. redetermine the amount, if any, deemed by subsection 120(2) or (2.2), 122.5(3), 122.51(2), 127.1(1), 127.41(3) or 210.2(3) or (4) to be paid on account of the taxpayer's tax payable under this Part for the year or deemed by subsection 122.61(1) to be an overpayment on account of the taxpayer's liability under this Part for the year.

For individuals and testamentary trusts, paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the ITA permits us to refund an overpayment beyond the normal three-year period.

Subsection 164(1.5) reads as follows:

Notwithstanding subsection 164(1), the Minister may, on or after mailing a notice of assessment for a taxation year, refund all or any portion of any overpayment of a taxpayer for the year

a. if the taxpayer is an individual (other than a trust) or is a testamentary trust and the taxpayer's return of income under this Part for the year was filed on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the taxation year; or

b. where an assessment or a redetermination was made under subsection 152(4.2) or 220(3.1) or 220(3.4) in respect of the taxpayer.

2.1.3 Late, amended, or revoked elections

Subsection 220(3.2) of the ITA permits us extend the time for making an election or grant permission to amend or revoke an election. The elections to which the law applies are listed in Section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations, which can be found in the Appendices.

Subsection 220(3.2) reads as follows:

The Minister may extend the time for making an election or grant permission to amend or revoke an election if

a. the election was otherwise required to be made by a taxpayer or by a partnership, under a prescribed provision, on or before a day in a taxation year of the taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership); and

b. the taxpayer or the partnership applies, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the taxation year or the fiscal period, to the Minister for that extension or permission

Subsection 281.1(1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a reporting period of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel interest payable by the person under section 280 on an amount that is required to be remitted or paid by the person under this Part in respect of the reporting period.

Subsection 281.1(2) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a reporting period of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any

a. penalty that became payable by the person under section 280 before April 1, 2007, in respect of the reporting period; and

b. penalty payable by the person under section 280.1 in respect of a return for the reporting period.

2.3 Excise Act, 2001 (EA, 2001)

Effective April 1, 2007, section 255.1 gives the Minister the authority to waive or reduce any penalty payable under section 251.1 (failure to file penalty) in respect of a return for any fiscal month before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the fiscal month.

Section 173 reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the particular day that is 10 calendar years after the day an amount was required to be paid by a person under this Act, or on application by the person on or before the particular day, waive or reduce any interest on the amount payable by the person under section 170.

Requests made prior to April 1, 2007, to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest payable are limited for consideration to any fiscal month of a person that ended on or after April 1, 2002.

Requests made on or after April 1, 2007, to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest payable are limited for consideration to any fiscal month of a person that ended ten years before the calendar year in which the request is made.

Section 30(1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a fiscal month of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or reduce any interest payable by the person under this Act on an amount that is required to be paid by the person under this Act in respect of the fiscal month.

Section 55(1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a fiscal month of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel any penalty payable by the person under section 53 in respect of the fiscal month.

3. Roles and Responsibilities

This section discusses the roles and responsibilities of those involved in the taxpayer relief provisions at the local, regional, and Headquarters functional levels. It concludes with a summary of the process to follow for taxpayer relief referrals.

3.1 Local level

3.1.1 Field office staff

Taxpayer relief provisions requests are handled in TSOs and TCs across Canada.

Field office staff are responsible for processing taxpayer relief requests in an impartial, just and consistent manner. They also are responsible for making sure taxpayer relief requests are accurately recorded on the Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR). The TRR tracks taxpayer relief requests such as the number of penalties and/or interest waived and/or cancelled and refunds beyond the normal three year period. Late, amended or revoked elections are not recorded unless the taxpayer is also requesting CRA to waive/cancel the $100 per month late-filed penalty and/or any applicable interest.

3.1.2 Local taxpayer relief committees

Taxpayer relief committees within local offices can promote the uniform application of the taxpayer relief provisions. Local management determines the makeup and number of taxpayer relief committees, and whether a committee should be established. Not all sections or divisions in a local office will have a taxpayer relief committee.

Local taxpayer relief committees are responsible for reviewing requests and discussing local taxpayer relief-related issues and policies.

Examples of requests that a taxpayer relief committee might review include:

- requests that are complex, precedent-setting, or sensitive; and
- requests for a second review of items that were denied on a first review.

Taxpayer relief committees are involved in reviewing decisions made in their offices to ensure impartiality, accuracy, and consistency in the decision-making process. They can also give guidance to staff involved in taxpayer relief reviews.

See section Using taxpayer relief committees for more information on local committees and how they can promote overall consistency.

3.1.3. Directors of field offices

Digitized by Google

Directors of field offices have overall responsibility for applying the taxpayer relief provisions within their offices. They are responsible for ensuring that operational review processes are in place and are consistent with national taxpayer relief policies and guidelines, as well as functional guidelines.

See section Delegation policies for more information on the responsibilities of directors in the taxpayer relief review process as it relates to delegation issues.

3.2 Headquarters level

3.2.1 Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate of Appeals Branch

The Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) is the Headquarters function that provides cross-functional leadership, policy development and program direction to the Taxpayer Services and Debt Management, Assessment and Benefit Services, Compliance Programs, Legislative Policy and Regulatory Affairs, and Appeals Branches, and to officers servicing taxpayers through TSOs and TCs. This includes functional, operational, system and policy support for taxpayer relief programs.

TRSCD is not responsible for either delivering or funding the taxpayer relief workload in the field.

For more information see the TRSCD's mandate.

How to contact us

If you have questions on the taxpayer relief provisions, please contact us by:

- sending an e-mail to Taxpayer Relief/Allégements pour les contribuables, General Enquiries/Demandes de renseignements généraux, or
- sending a fax to (613) 952-5825 (non-secure).

3.2.2 Other headquarters functions

Headquarters functions from Taxpayer Services and Debt Management, Assessment and Benefit Services, Compliance Programs, Legislative Policy and Regulatory Affairs, and Appeals Branches are responsible for answering field enquiries regarding taxpayer relief provisions that specifically relate to their programs and for providing operational assistance.

These headquarters functions, in conjunction with TRSCD are also responsible for monitoring taxpayer relief operations requests that relate to the program they administer.

As well, these headquarters functions, in conjunction with TRSCD, are responsible for gathering, verifying, validating, and approving amounts to be reported in the Public Accounts. Headquarters functions have identified one or more individuals as taxpayer relief functional contacts who will be available to act as contacts for taxpayer relief issues.

See CRA contact lists for a list of the headquarters taxpayer relief functional representatives.

Welcome to the Taxpayer Relief Procedures Manual

This manual gives you complete and up-to-date guidelines and procedures on how to apply the taxpayer relief provisions. It is an easy-to-use reference that has information you need to process relief requests.

1. Introduction

The Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) has been emphasizing fairness and fair treatment of taxpayers for many years. The introduction of the taxpayer relief provisions in the early 1990's is a good example of the CRA's commitment to fairness. However, fairness is far broader than our taxpayer relief provisions. It is a concept built around service excellence, a positive way of thinking, and a culture with a taxpayer focus.

The CRA has further defined fairness through seven guiding principles, which are described in the document called Our Fairness Pledge. This pledge can be used by all of us as a guide to the way we interact with taxpayers and internal clients.

The CRA can grant relief to taxpayers through the taxpayer relief provisions contained in various acts it administers. This manual focuses on the taxpayer relief provisions. For information on the broader concept of fairness, visit the Fairness and Taxpayer Rights pages.

1.1 Program status

On April 1, 2011, the CRA designated taxpayer relief as a program under the Appeals Branch. This change is part of the taxpayer relief business transformation in response to several external and internal reviews. Program status will improve consistency, reporting, and accountability for the taxpayer relief workload and enhance service to taxpayers.

The taxpayer relief business transformation involved the transfer of some of these workloads to the Appeals Branch using a phased-in approach. In addition, it involved the establishment of Taxpayer Relief Intake Centres (ICs) and Centres of Expertise (CoEs) in various regions across the country. See Contact List for location and contact information. For background information on the taxpayer relief business transformation, see Moving Toward the Taxpayer Relief Program. See also Chapter 3 Roles and Responsibilities for more information.

The scope of the program includes penalty and interest relief requests received from taxpayers. It excludes requests for a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period and requests to accept late, amended or revoked elections. In addition, certain specialized penalty and/or interest workloads, such as requests made by non-residents and requests associated with a voluntary disclosure, remain the responsibility of other sections of the Agency.

See Project Scope for more information on the excluded workloads and 5.4.1 Area of responsibility for details on where taxpayer relief requests are processed.

1.2 Purpose of this manual

This manual provides instructions and policies for CRA employees who apply the taxpayer relief provisions. It contains both general guidelines applicable to all relief requests as well as detailed procedures and links for specific workloads. It is designed to promote consistency and accuracy in decisions we make on these requests.

Its content applies to employees processing taxpayer relief requests in ICs, CoEs, tax services offices (TSOs), tax centres (TCs), regional offices, and at Headquarters.

The manual relates to the following requests:

- the cancellation or waiving of penalties and/or interest;
- the refund or reduction of amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period; and
- the acceptance of late, amended or revoked elections

Note: This manual is not intended for employees handling relief requests under the Voluntary Disclosures Program (VDP). These requests have their own unique set of conditions for relief and are the responsibility of the Enforcement and Disclosures Directorate, Compliance Programs Branch. For more information refer to Voluntary Disclosures Program Guidelines and see 5.4.1 Area of responsibility.

Use this manual in conjunction with the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide (TRRG), the Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures and branch specific resources contained in Functional Guidelines.

This manual is available through the Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate InfoZone site.

1.3 How this manual is organized

This manual is divided into the following chapters:

- Introduction
- Legislation
- Roles and Responsibilities
- Reporting
- Intake and Screening
- General policies and procedures
- Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest
- Inability to pay or financial hardship
- Refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period
- Accepting late, amended, or revoked elections
- Judicial review
- Additional information
- Appendices

This manual contains general guidelines applicable to all business lines, as well as more detailed information and links for specialized workloads. For example, employees at CoEs will refer to Chapter 8 Inability to pay or financial hardship whereas Chapter 10 Accepting late, amended, or revoked elections will be primarily of interest to staff in TCs and Audit who process election requests.

1.4 Updates and revisions

This manual replaces all former versions of the Taxpayer Relief Reference Guide. Significant changes include the addition of Chapter 5, Intake and Screening and Chapter 8, Inability to pay or financial hardship

The Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) in the Appeals Branch is responsible for updating and maintaining this manual.

Updates and revisions are completed on a regular basis and can be found on the manual's home page. A message will also be posted under TRSCD's What's New

2. Legislation

This chapter provides the legislative references for the various Acts administered by the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) that contain taxpayer relief provisions.

2.1 Income Tax Act (ITA)

Before 2005, taxpayer relief requests under the Income Tax Act (ITA) were considered for 1985 and later taxation years. Effective January 1, 2005, a 10-year rolling time limit is imposed due to amendments in the ITA. The 10-year limitation period rolls forward every January 1.

Requests made on or after January 1, 2005, are limited for consideration to any taxation year for individuals (or fiscal period in the case of a partnership) that ended ten years before the calendar year in which the request is made.

The Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) has made a policy change to the administration of the 10-year limitation period under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act for requesting interest relief for a tax year that ended more than 10 years ago (see the CRA news release, Taxpayer relief deadline is December 31, 2011, dated November 21, 2011).

See also IC07-1 Taxpayer Relief Provisions and the revised ATR 2011-14.

2.1.1 Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest

For taxpayers (including employers), subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA permits the CRA to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest payable under that Act.

Subsection 220(3.1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of a taxation year of a taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership) or on application by the taxpayer or partnership on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any penalty or interest otherwise payable under this Act by the taxpayer or partnership in respect of that taxation year or fiscal period, and notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), any assessment of the interest and penalties payable by the taxpayer or partnership shall be made that is necessary to take into account the cancellation of the penalty or interest.

Note: The 10-year period has been modified for interest relief requests. See "Revised 10-year limitation period for interest relief".

2.1.2 Refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period

Subsection 152(4.2) of the ITA permits the CRA to process credit reassessments or redeterminations beyond the normal three-year period for individuals and testamentary trusts only.

000009

Subsection 152(4.2) reads as follows:

Notwithstanding subsections (4), (4.1) and (5), for the purpose of determining, at any time after the end of the normal reassessment period of a taxpayer who is an individual (other than a trust) or a testamentary trust in respect of a taxation year, the amount of any refund to which the taxpayer is entitled at that time for the year, or a reduction of an amount payable under this Part by the taxpayer for the year, the Minister may, if the taxpayer makes an application for that determination on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of that taxation year,

a. reassess tax, interest or penalties payable under this Part by the taxpayer in respect of that year; and

b. redetermine the amount, if any, deemed by subsection 120(2) or (2.2), 122.5(3), 122.51(2), 127.1(1), 127.41(3) or 210.2(3) or (4) to be paid on account of the taxpayer's tax payable under this Part for the year or deemed by subsection 122.61(1) to be an overpayment on account of the taxpayer's liability under this Part for the year.

For individuals and testamentary trusts, paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the ITA permits the CRA to refund an overpayment beyond the normal three-year period.

Subsection 164(1.5) reads as follows:

Notwithstanding subsection 164(1), the Minister may, on or after mailing a notice of assessment for a taxation year, refund all or any portion of any overpayment of a taxpayer for the year

a. if the taxpayer is an individual (other than a trust) or is a testamentary trust and the taxpayer's return of income under this Part for the year was filed on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the taxation year;

b. where an assessment or a redetermination was made under subsection 152(4.2) or 220(3.1) or 220(3.4) in respect of the taxpayer; or

c. to the extent that the overpayment relates to an assessment of another taxpayer under subsection 227(10) or (10.1) (in this paragraph referred to as the "other assessment"), if the taxpayer's return of income under this Part for the taxation year is filed on or before the day that is two years after the date of the other assessment and if the other assessment relates to

    i. in the case of an amount assessed under subsection 227(10), a payment to the taxpayer of a fee, commission or other amount in respect of services rendered in Canada by a non-resident person or partnership, and

    ii. in the case of an amount assessed under subsection 227(10.1), an amount payable under subsection 116(5) or (5.3) in respect of a disposition of property by the taxpayer.

Note: Paragraph 164(1.5)(c) applies to overpayments in respect of applications for refunds made after March 4, 2019.

2.1.3 Late, amended, or revoked elections

Subsection 220(3.2) of the ITA permits the CRA to extend the time for making an election or grant permission to amend or revoke an election. The elections to which the law applies are listed in Section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations, which can be found in the section for Additional Information.

Subsection 220(3.2) reads as follows:

The Minister may extend the time for making an election or grant permission to amend or revoke an election if

a. the election was otherwise required to be made by a taxpayer or by a partnership, under a prescribed provision, on or before a day in a taxation year of the taxpayer (or in the case of a partnership, a fiscal period of the partnership); and

b. the taxpayer or the partnership applies, on or before the day that is ten calendar years after the end of the taxation year or the fiscal period, to the Minister for that extension or permission.

2.2 Excise Tax Act (ETA)

Effective April 1, 2007, taxpayer relief requests made under the ETA are subject to a 10-year rolling time limit and the taxpayer relief provisions were extended to apply to the GST/HST failure to file penalty.

Requests made prior to April 1, 2007, to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest are limited for consideration to reporting periods that ended in 1991 and subsequent years.

Requests made on or after April 1, 2007, to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest are limited for consideration to any reporting period that ended within ten years before the calendar year in which the request is made.

Pursuant to the ETA, "GST/HST registrants must file a return for each reporting period, even where no taxable supplies have been made during a reporting period". A National assessment is not a GST/HST return; it is an assignment of debt. Penalty and interest relief assessed on GST notional assessments cannot be granted.

Note: The 10-year period has been modified for interest relief requests. See "Taxpayer relief deadline is December 31, 2011".

2.2.1 Non GST/HST

Subsection 88(1) of the ETA permits the CRA to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest payable under Parts I to VII (non GST/HST) of this Act.

Subsection 88(1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a reporting period of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel any amount otherwise payable to the Receiver General under this Act that is interest or a penalty on an amount that is required to be paid by the person under this Act in respect of the reporting period

Subsection 281.1(1) of the ETA permits the CRA to cancel or waive interest payable under section 280 of this Act. Subsection 281.1(2) of the ETA permits the CRA to cancel or waive late remitting penalty payable before April 1, 2007, under section 280; and the failure to file penalty payable as of April 1, 2007, under section 280.1 of this Act.

Subsection 281.1(2)(b) permits the CRA to cancel or waive a penalty for failure to file a return electronically charged under section 280.11, and the penalty for failure to report information on a return or misstate amounts on a return under section 284.01 of the ETA

Subsection 281.1(1) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a reporting period of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel interest payable by the person under section 280 on an amount that is required to be remitted or paid by the person under this Part in respect of the reporting period.

Subsection 281.1(2) reads as follows:

The Minister may, on or before the day that is 10 calendar years after the end of a reporting period of a person, or on application by the person on or before that day, waive or cancel all or any portion of any

a. penalty that became payable by the person under section 280 before April 1, 2007, in respect of the reporting period; and

b penalty payable by the person under section 280.1, 280.11 or 284.01 in respect of a return for the reporting period.

3. Roles and Responsibilities

As mentioned in the Introduction to this manual, taxpayer relief received program status effective April 1, 2011

This chapter provides the roles and responsibilities of those involved in the taxpayer relief provisions at the local, regional, and Headquarters functional levels. It concludes with a summary of the process to follow for taxpayer relief referrals

3.1 Local and regional level

All employees involved in processing taxpayer relief requests must do so in an impartial, just and consistent manner.

The majority of requests will be received and screened at taxpayer relief intake centres (IC), however, all staff are responsible for making sure valid requests are accurately recorded on the Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR). The registry is used for requests on cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest, refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period and accepting late, amended or revoked elections. Elections are not recorded unless the taxpayer is also requesting CRA to waive/cancel penalties and/or interest. See the Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR) Guide for more information.

3.1.1 Taxpayer Relief Intake Centres

The primary purpose of intake centres (ICs) is to undertake front-end activities including the receipt of mail, date stamping, sorting and screening of taxpayer relief correspondence and related documentation. IC staff will also determine validity, create a registry entry, ensure completeness and identify complexity for taxpayer requests for penalty and interest relief before scanning and transferring the work-ready files to centres of expertise (CoEs).

Employees will create a registry entry, send acknowledgement letters and redirect mail for all relief requests received at an IC that are not the responsibility of a CoE.

Note that the IC will not determine validity for taxpayer relief requests redirected to another area.

The IC will send any correspondence that is not taxpayer relief request to the appropriate area, no acknowledgement letter will be sent.

Refer to Contact List for intake centre locations and contact information.

3.1.2 Taxpayer Relief Centres of Expertise

Employees at centres of expertise (CoE) are responsible for reviewing the taxpayer requests for relief of penalty and/or interest transferred from the IC. If expertise is needed from another program area, such as Appeals or Audit, it will be requested through consultation and where appropriate, a joint decision will be issued. See 6.7.1 Joint reviews.

Refer to Contact List for centre of expertise locations and contact information.

3.1.3 Other field office staff

Requests for refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period, requests to accept late, amended or revoked elections and proactive relief (initiated by CRA) are handled in TSOs and TCs.. See also 5.4.1 Area of responsibility for additional information, including other specialized workloads.

3.1.4 Local taxpayer relief committees

Local management determines the makeup and number of taxpayer relief committees, and whether a committee should be established.

3.1.5 Chiefs of Appeals and directors of field offices

Chiefs of Appeals of ICs and CoEs and directors of field offices have overall responsibility for applying the taxpayer relief provisions within their offices. They are responsible for ensuring that operational review processes are in place and are consistent with national taxpayer relief policies and guidelines, as well as functional guidelines.

See section 3.5 Delegation of the Minister's power and duties for more information.

3.2 Headquarters level

3.2.1 Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate

The Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) is the Headquarters function that provides cross-functional leadership, policy development and program direction to the Assessment and Benefit Services, Compliance Programs, Legislative Policy and Regulatory Affairs, and Appeals Branches, and to officers servicing taxpayers through TSOs and TCs. This includes functional, operational, system and policy support for taxpayer relief programs.

For more information, see the TRSCD's mandate

How to contact us
If you have questions on the taxpayer relief provisions, please contact us by sending an e-mail to AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux.

3.2.2 Other headquarters functions

Headquarters functions from Compliance Programs, Legislative Policy and Regulatory Affairs, and Appeals Branch (Tax & Charities Appeals Directorate) are responsible for answering field enquiries regarding taxpayer relief provisions that specifically relate to their programs and for providing operational assistance.

In conjunction with TRSCD, these functions are responsible for monitoring taxpayer relief operations that relate to the taxpayer relief requests they administer, and for gathering, verifying, validating, and approving amounts to be reported in the Public Accounts.

Headquarters functions have identified one or more individuals as taxpayer relief functional contacts who will be available to act as contacts for taxpayer relief issues.

See Chapter 12, Additional Information for a list of the Headquarters Taxpayer Relief Functional Representatives.

Digitized by Google

3.3 Regional program advisors

Regional program advisors monitor taxpayer relief operations within their region to ensure consistent application of the taxpayer relief provisions.

See Chapter 12, Additional information for a list of Regional Program Advisors

3.4 Taxpayer Relief Committee (TRC)

The TRC is a cross-functional committee, chaired by the Director General of TRSCD. It was established in December 2005 and meets on an ad hoc basis. It provides a forum where members can discuss new developments and progress in the administration of taxpayer relief

Members of the TRC include directors' general of applicable Headquarters Branches and directors of Regional Programs (alternatively a Regional Champion and/or Regional Program Advisor) as well as the Director General, the director and the managers of TRSCD.

For more information see the Taxpayer Relief Committee section of the TRSCD Intranet site.

3.5 Delegation of the Minister's power and duties

The Minister's powers and duties to exercise his discretion under the taxpayer relief legislation are administratively delegated as specified in the instruments of delegation signed by the Minister.

Positions and acting positions are delegated. People themselves are not delegated authority. The positions they occupy are delegated to perform certain duties.

Each time there is an amendment to a delegation instrument, a separate document is prepared for the approval of the Minister or Commissioner. These instruments are published on the CRA's external Website: Delegation of powers, duties, and functions and Authorization to Exercise Powers Duties of the Minister of National Revenue.

See also 6.2 Administrative reviews and 6.4 Ministerial discretion for more information.

3.5.1 First reviews

Requests for first review are authorized at the team leader level in all CoEs.

For other sections of the Agency, low-risk or routine first review requests are normally authorized at the first level of supervision.

- More sensitive or complex first review requests may, depending on local procedures, be reviewed and authorized by a more senior delegated person or by a taxpayer relief committee (reviewed by the committee and authorized by a member). These requests include complex requests of a sensitive or precedent-setting nature.

The delegated authority level for the first review request approval is usually the team leader/coordinator. An exception to this rule is when you are accepting a request for a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period. If you are approving the taxpayer's request in full, a notice of assessment or notice of reassessment will be issued. These notices are issued under the authority of the Commissioner of Revenue and will suffice as being reviewed by the appropriate delegated authority.

Partial or full denials for a request for refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period require a decision letter signed by the appropriate delegated authority.

If information requested by CRA is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the same persons who solicited the requested information and rendered the decision can be involved in the continuation of the first review.

Chiefs of Appeals, directors and managers should not personally review and make decisions for first review requests, since this could affect impartiality if the taxpayer subsequently requests a second review of the decision.

Digitized by Google

3.5.2 Second reviews

To preserve the impartiality of the review process, second review requests must be made by someone other than the original decision-maker. Requests for second review should be reviewed and authorized by someone who is more senior than the original decision-maker, such as a manager, or a taxpayer relief committee (reviewed by the committee and authorized by a member). Requests previously decided by a taxpayer relief committee should go to someone more senior than the chairing committee member, such as an assistant director.

Second review requests are authorized at the manager level in all CoEs.

If information requested by CRA is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the same persons who solicited the requested information and rendered the decision can be involved in the continuation of the second review. If new information not requested by CRA is provided and the original decision-maker still feels that the request should not be granted, the request should automatically go for review to someone more senior, a taxpayer relief committee, or to a director.

If it is determined that a person or persons who participated in the first review also acted on the second review, that alone can suffice to have the request returned back to CRA by the Federal Court for a new review, as can be seen in the case of Robertson v. Minister of National Revenue.

3.5.3 Requests after second reviews

It is CRA policy that taxpayers are entitled to two administrative reviews within the CRA. Taxpayers also have recourse to judicial review. While CRA policy does not permit a third review, taxpayers sometimes come back to the CRA to ask for a review of a second decision; either before they ask for a judicial review, or because they have no intention to bring the matter to Court.

For requests that are the CoE responsibility:

For third/subsequent reviews not as a result of a judicial review decision, the CRA has discretion whether or not we will even conduct a third review. Normally, the case would only be reopened if the taxpayer is providing new relevant information. See 6.2.3 A third or subsequent review.

To preserve the impartiality of the review process, all third or subsequent review requests must be made by someone other than the previous decision-makers. Requests for third/subsequent review should, in most cases, be reviewed and authorized by someone who is of equal title/position or higher than the previous decision-makers.

If information requested by CRA is submitted after the second or subsequent decision letter has been issued, the same persons who solicited the requested information and rendered the decision can be involved in the continuation of the subsequent review (e.g.: in cases citing financial hardship where the taxpayer did not submit documents). If new information not requested by CRA is provided and the previous decision-maker still feels that the request should not be granted, the request should automatically go for review to someone else.

If the CRA does perform a third or subsequent review, taxpayers must be informed of their right to judicial review even if this right was previously communicated

For third/subsequent reviews as a result of a judicial review decision, the CRA must conduct a new review. Refer to Chapter 11 Judicial review for more information

For requests that are not CoE responsibility:

Requests addressed to the director or regional Assistant Commissioner

Requests for third or subsequent reviews that are outside the taxpayer relief program, but received at an IC, will be forwarded to the party that issued the second decision on a priority basis. See also Appendix 5B Expediting a Request.

For these requests, the director of the office responsible for the second review or the Assistant Commissioner of the region responsible for that office has full discretion over the necessary course of action. Normally, the case would only be reopened if the taxpayer is providing new relevant information.

Digitized by Google

Note: When a delegated official at any office reviews a request because new relevant information has been submitted and the request is denied or partially approved, taxpayers must be informed of their right to judicial review even if this right was previously communicated. This note also applies to sections Requests addressed to the Minister, Commissioner, or Deputy Commissioner and Requests addressed to headquarters functions or another office or region .

Requests addressed to the Minister, Commissioner, or Deputy Commissioner

Ministerial correspondence areas have full discretion over all requests addressed to the Minister, Commissioner, or Deputy Commissioner. Although they have the authority to change a director's decision, they will usually consult with the Chief of Appeals and/or director involved in the previous decision to determine the best course of action.

Requests addressed to headquarters functions or another office or region

Requests should be forwarded to the Chief of Appeals and/or director responsible for the second review, and taxpayers should be informed that their request is being forwarded for review to the office that conducted the second review. If the recipient of the request expresses concerns about the last decision, the matter can be brought informally to the attention of the director responsible for that decision. If necessary, the recipient's Assistant Commissioner can formally refer the matter to the Assistant Commissioner of the Director responsible for the case.

For third/subsequent reviews as a result of a judicial review decision, the CRA must conduct a new review. Refer to Chapter 11 Judicial review for more information

3.6 Referral process

Most taxpayer relief requests are resolved using the guidelines and procedures available to the field. However, some requests may not be easy to resolve because of their complexity, sensitivity, precedent-setting nature, or because they raise cross-functional or policy issues. In addition, there are some circumstances when a Headquarters (HQ) referral is mandatory.

The referral guidelines are as follows:

3.6.1 Tier 1 - Local resolution

All front-line staff needing procedural or technical assistance should contact a local resource officer, senior officer and/or team leader to resolve the question. Staff at an IC may consult with employees at the CoE when additional technical assistance is required, for example, when determining validity of an ambiguous request

3.6.2 Tier 2 - TRSCD general enquiries mailbox

If the resource officer, senior officer or team leader requires assistance with procedural or technical issues send an email to AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux, or * contact your branch directly if your issue is branch specific.
* If the TRSCD requires technical assistance to answer a question, or if the issue is branch specific or of an operational nature that falls under another branches' responsibilities, the TRSCD will refer the enquiry to the applicable branch directly and the TRSCD will ask for a c.c. of the answer.

3.6.3 Tier 3 – Referrals to HQ, TRSCD (IC/CoE workloads only)

For all of the following HQ referrals, after consulting a team leader or manager, send an email to the to AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux. In the subject of the email, indicate "Tier 3 - Referrals to HQ". You may be asked to forward the correspondence and/or supporting documentation to HQ at a later time. In rare circumstances HQ may make the decision that will be communicated by the field.

Situations meeting the following conditions may be referred for guidance or an opinion:

- where, in the opinion of the manager, HQ input would be desirable before a decision is made. These cases could include, but are not limited to situations involving a significant dollar amount, where a community may be impacted or if the media has or may become involved.
- must involve actual cases and not hypothetical situations

3.6.4 Mandatory notifications to HQ, TRSCD (IC/CoE workloads only)

HQ must be advised in the following situations:

- requests which may indicate a systemic[1] problem or issue
- requests where the amount of relief granted exceeds $500,000
- when a new review is required after a judicial review decision and/or when a judicial review application has been withdrawn on condition that a new review be conducted
- requests that are very sensitive in nature, such as cases where a community may be impacted

After having consulted a team leader or a manager, send an email to AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux. In the subject of the email, indicated "Notification to HQ". Please also provide the taxpayer relief registry entry number.

[1] A systemic problem/issue has national or regional impact; affects a segment of the taxpayer population; or has the potential for substantial implications for Canada's self-assessment tax system, or the CRA's strategy or voluntary compliance.

3.6.5 Mandatory notifications to HQ, TRSCD (Agency-wide)

HQ must be advised in the following situation for reporting purposes.

- requests where the amount of relief granted exceeds $500,000

After having consulted a team leader or a manager, send an email to AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux. In the subject of the email, indicated "Notification to HQ". Please also provide the taxpayer relief registry entry number.

4. Reporting

This chapter provides information on financial reporting in the Public Accounts and on internal order numbers and activity types used by intake centres and centres of expertise's staff. For other field office staff, refer to your Headquarters functions instructions.

4.1 Financial reporting

Section 24.2 of the Financial Administration Act requires that forgiveness of a debt or obligation under the Acts the CRA administers is to be reported in the Public Accounts. This legal requirement applies to penalties and interest cancelled and waived under the taxpayer relief legislation. The public can access the Public Accounts of Canada through the Public Works and Government Services Canada Web site.

The ReportNet/Cognos 8 tool produces workload summary reports including inventory reports, intake reports and production reports based on information taken from the taxpayer relief registry. Financial reports are also available with statistics taken from the financial systems that are used to process the taxpayer relief transactions and the automated waivers. Some of the amounts for waivers of penalties and interest will continue to be provided based on estimates provided by the functions.

Each Headquarters function is responsible for gathering, verifying, validating and approving amounts to be reported in the Public Accounts. The Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) is responsible for consolidating this information. The Finance and Administration Branch later incorporates the information provided by TRSCD into the overall CRA financial report that is forwarded to the Public Accounts.

5. Intake and Screening

This chapter of the manual is structured to follow the flow of a piece of correspondence from the time it comes into a taxpayer relief intake centre (IC), to the time the screening process is completed. While the majority of requests will be received at an IC, the information provided is also useful when requests are received by another section of the Agency. See Contact List for IC locations and contact information and 3.1 Local and regional level roles and responsibilities for more information.

5.1 Taxpayer relief correspondence

There are three types of taxpayer relief requests:

1. cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest;
2. refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period (individuals and testamentary trusts only);
3. accepting late, amended, or revoked elections (income tax)

See Chapter 2, Legislation for details of the legislation referred to as the taxpayer relief provisions.

A taxpayer relief request should clearly indicate:

- the type of request;
- the years/periods involved;
- detailed reasons for the request.

Taxpayers may use form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief. Although use of this form should be promoted, it is not mandatory. This form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.

A taxpayer is not required to use the word "taxpayer relief" or "relief". If the intent is clear, treat the correspondence as a request for relief. See 6.3.2. Unclear/ambiguous request for more information.

5.1.1 The screening process

When correspondence is received at an IC, the screener will determine if it is a new taxpayer relief request, a document to be matched with an existing request, or correspondence not intended for the Taxpayer Relief Program.

See Process Map of Intake and Screening for an overview of screening steps followed at an IC.

There are three main screening sorts with related tasks:

Sort 1 all correspondence

- receive and date stamp all correspondence;
- identify and separate misdirected mail (Flow A) from taxpayer relief requests (Flow B);
- forward misdirected mail.

Note: Do not create a registry entry and do not send an acknowledgement letter for misdirected mail.

Digitized by Google

Sort 2: taxpayer relief requests: partial screening for requests processed outside a CoE (redirected mail)

- identify and separate relief requests that are processed outside a CoE (Flow C) from relief requests which are CoE responsibility (Flow D);
- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- acknowledge and forward taxpayer relief requests handled outside a CoE.

Note: Do not determine validity, determine completeness, or complexity for redirected requests. These tasks are the responsibility of the section that will conduct the review.

Sort 3: taxpayer relief requests: full screening for requests that are CoE responsibility

- validate and if applicable, send an invalid letter;
- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- acknowledge, and request additional information, if required.
- assign complexity;
- scan the work-ready file: for files that are about 50 pages and over, put a note at the top of the screening sheet to indicate that (50+ pages request) and that the hard copy is being sent. Scan the screening sheet;
- transfer the registry entry to the CoE.

The screening process will result in five (5) main categories of mail:

- misdirected mail;
- redirected relief requests;
- supporting documentation to support an existing/open relief request;
- invalid relief requests;
- work-ready relief requests.

5.1.2 First in first out (FIFO)

Generally, correspondence is to be processed on a FIFO basis. However, prioritizing certain requests is appropriate. See Appendix 5B Expediting a request for additional information

5.2 Receiving the correspondence

Correspondence received at an IC may have been referred directly by the mailroom, or redirected from another section within the Agency.

Note: If you are not located at an IC or a CoE and you receive a taxpayer relief request that is the sole responsibility of your section (i.e. a request for a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period received at a tax centre) keep the request. Create a registry entry, determine the validity of the request and proceed with the review, recommendation and decision as usual.

5.2.1 Date stamp

The CRA mailroom will date stamp incoming correspondence and other documents with the CRA 'Received' stamp. Incoming mail is processed daily.

Date stamp all correspondence received at the IC whether it is received directly from the mailroom or redirected from another section within the Agency. There is no need to keep the envelopes.

Note: When creating the registry entry use the earliest date for "Date received in CRA". The "Date received in section" is to be completed by the section reviewing the request. See Part 3.1.1 of the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide for more information.

5.2.2 Receiving faxed correspondence

Faxed correspondence is date stamped by the FAX machine with the time and date of receipt. This correspondence is treated in the same fashion as mailed correspondence.

5.3 Sort 1: all correspondence

Where easily identifiable, sort and separate correspondence that has been misdirected (Flow A) from correspondence that is a taxpayer relief request (Flow B).

At this stage, it may also be efficient to separate mail that is intended to support an existing/open relief request (Flow F). See 5.6 Sort 3: Additional documentation or a new request?

5.3.1 Misdirected mail - Flow A

The mailroom conducts a basic, cursory review of mail received by CRA. A correspondence may be identified as a taxpayer relief request because a taxpayer has used a word(s) such as "fairness", "relief", "penalty" or "interest".

Misdirected mail is correspondence that was received at an IC, but is not a taxpayer relief request.

Taxpayer relief workload is for correctly charged penalties and/or interest. If the penalty/interest was charged in error it should not be reviewed under the Taxpayer Relief Provisions, these requests should be sent to the applicable TC.

Sometimes it may be clear, without further research, that mail received in an IC belongs to another section of the Agency. Examples include a Form T2201, Disability Tax Credit Certificate, a request for relief of a bank-charge back or an adjustment request received within the normal three-year period.

Read and examine the correspondence, and if necessary, review system information to determine if the request is a taxpayer relief request. Refer to Appendix 5C System Information for common screens.

If, after reading the correspondence, and verifying system information, doubt about the taxpayer's intent remains, contact the taxpayer or authorized representative for clarification. See 6.3.2 Unclear/ambiguous request.

5.3.1.1 to 5.3.1.6 provide situations where correspondence is not a taxpayer relief request. This list is not exhaustive. If the situation is unclear, contact the taxpayer to clarify

5.3.1.1 Accounting issues

Sometimes a taxpayer writes to enquire about a lost cheque or other accounting issue such as:

- an amount of tax that was withheld at source,
- instalment payments are not credited to the appropriate taxation year;
- a payment that was made but not applied to an account;
- whether a statement of account reflects a proper debit or credit; and
- payments were not applied to the intended period, or taxation year, etc.

When a taxpayer describes one or more accounting problems or issues, forward the mail to the correspondence section (Individual Benefits Services Division and/or Business Returns) of the tax centre (TC) of record for action. If the enquiry was made using a RC4288, you don't have to send a letter to the taxpayer advising that the correspondence has been forwarded.

When a taxpayer describes an accounting problem and also requests relief of the penalty and/or interest, refer to 5.3.3 Accounting issues received with a taxpayer relief request (CoE responsibility only).

5.3.1.2 Waiver of tax payable (excess contributions)

Under Part X.1 of the ITA, a taxpayer may be liable for a 1% monthly tax based on over contributions to an RRSP (T1-OVP). The additional tax payable is designed to discourage taxpayers from making excess contributions in a year. The CRA has the authority to legislatively waive this tax pursuant to subsection 204.1(4) of the ITA.

Similar provisions exist for over contributions made to Registered Education Savings Plans (RESP) (Part X.5 and 204.91(2), Registered Disability Savings Plans (Part XI and 208.4) and additional taxes in respect to Tax-Free Savings Accounts (TFSA) (Part XI.1 and 207.06(1) and (2).

Providing relief of these additional taxes involves Ministerial discretion, however, the subsections are standalone provisions which are separate and apart from the taxpayer relief provisions. For details, see Chapter 2 Legislation.

Other than Tax-Free Savings Account (TFSA), (see below) these types of requests are handled in an Assessing Unit at a TC. However, if the taxpayer is specifically objecting to the assessment of the tax, consult with the Appeals Intake Centre servicing the taxpayer's region to determine the course of action. See 5.3.1.4 Notice of objection for more information.

Note: Generally, when relief of the 1% tax is granted the related penalty and interest are reversed. However, if relief of the 1% tax is denied or partially approved, a review under the taxpayer relief provisions may be required. This may occur when a taxpayer also requests relief based on circumstances including death/illness, financial hardship or inability to pay. The review for relief of the 1% tax (sometimes referred to as "administrative relief") should always be conducted prior to a review under the taxpayer relief provisions

5.3.1.2.1 Tax-Free Savings Account (TFSA)

A TFSA Processing Unit (TPU) has been established in Ottawa and is responsible for performing assessments and reassessments of TFSA tax returns, certain compliance related activities as well as administrative and taxpayer relief reviews

Forward all correspondence involving TFSA to:

TFSA Processing Unit
CR 1280, work section 746
PO Box 9768 Stn T
Ottawa ON K1G 3X9

5.3.1.3 Type 4 Housing rebates – Owner built Forward all requests to extend a filing deadline for a New Housing Rebate to the Summerside Tax Centre, attention Detailed Enquiries and Complex Assessing (DECA).

5.3.1.4 Notice of objection

It is important to distinguish a taxpayer relief request from an objection because the taxpayer's subsequent recourse for a taxpayer relief decision differs from that of an objection.

Taxpayer relief request: Relief sought from correctly charged penalties and/or interest.

Notice of objection: Dispute the correctness of the assessment of penalties and/or interest.

Subsequent recourse

Taxpayer relief request: The taxpayer may request a second administrative review of the decision and if not satisfied may apply for a judicial review to the Federal Court. If the judicial review application is allowed, the Federal Court will not alter CRA's decision, but CRA is directed to conduct a fresh review. See Chapter 11 Judicial Review for more information.

Notice of objection: The taxpayer may appeal to the Tax Court and beyond.

It is not always easy to distinguish between a taxpayer relief request and an objection - judgment is required. When uncertainty remains, contact the taxpayer or consult a senior officer or team leader.

Digitized by Google

Note: A taxpayer or representative may also submit both a request for relief and a notice of objection. See 5.5.3.1 When there is a related notice of objection for information.

The following situations may result in a taxpayer relief request being treated as a notice of objection. See also the Tax & Charities Appeals Directorate (TCAD) Appeals Manual for more information.

5.3.1.4.1 Gross negligence penalties

A request to cancel a gross negligence penalty can be considered under subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA.

However, since these penalties indicate a degree of negligence and absence of care and diligence on the part of the taxpayer, the cancellation of a gross negligence penalty may be appropriate only in exceptional circumstances.

Taxpayers have the right to object to penalties assessed under the provisions of subsection 163(2) of the ITA and Section 285 of the ETA. Given the nature of a gross negligence penalty, it is more appropriate for a taxpayer to dispute the assessment of the penalty by filing a notice of objection. If a taxpayer requests relief of these penalties communicate with the Appeals Intake Centre and determine if the correspondence is actually a valid notice of objection.

E-mail: rc.pac-bfiao@cra-arc.gc.ca
Long distance: 1 800-959-5513 (B)
Local: 604-585-5180 (B)

If the taxpayer is requesting relief due to extraordinary circumstances or financial hardship, or if the time frame for filing an objection has expired, the request will be treated as a relief request.

Note: There are no legislative provisions to allow a taxpayer to request relief for penalties assessed under Section 285 of the ETA. See 5.7.2 Validating the taxpayer relief request for additional instructions for these types of requests.

5.3.1.4.2 Due diligence

A taxpayer may claim that he/she exercised the degree of care that a reasonably prudent person would have exercised in comparable circumstances. If a taxpayer presents a "due diligence" argument, the appropriate recourse mechanism is to file a notice of objection. If the taxpayer raises a due diligence defense, consult with a senior officer, team leader and/or Appeals Intake Centre to determine how to treat the correspondence.

5.3.1.4.3 Due diligence - Late Filing Penalties under the ETA

In situations where the CRA determines that a person has exercised due diligence, the penalty is not eligible and where it has already been charged it will be cancelled. The due diligence defense may apply to the 6% penalties (eliminated effective April 1, 2007) and to late filing penalties under 280.1 but it does not result in cancellation of interest payable under section 280. For additional information, refer to GST/HST Policy Statement P-237 The Acceptance of a Due Diligence Defense.

5.3.1.4.4 Return filed on time/payment made on time

A taxpayer may write stating that a return was filed on time or a payment was made on time.

Generally, if the taxpayer states he/she was not late, the request may be treated as a notice of objection because the taxpayer is in effect saying the penalty and/or interest was levied in error. If the correspondence is received on an RC4288 and/or the taxpayer is specifically requesting relief of penalty and/or interest see 5.3.3 Accounting issues received with a taxpayer relief request (CoE responsibility only). If the taxpayer is not objecting to the assessment and the primary question is whether a return or payment was given the correct received date, forward the correspondence to the applicable section at the TC (Individual Benefits Services Division and/or Business Returns) for verification. See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction) for a sample letter.

* The TC may have identified situations that warrant an adjustment on a proactive basis and/or as an individual taxpayer self-identifies. Examples include incidents of misplaced mail in a certain geographical area; unidentified returns destroyed in a flood; mechanical failure within CRA, etc.

Digitized by Google

Remember: If a taxpayer is stating that the return was filed on time and the penalty and/or interest was assessed incorrectly, the correspondence may also constitute a notice of objection. If there is doubt, contact the taxpayer or consult a senior officer or team leader.

5.3.1.5 Requests to extend the period for filing an application for the Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB)

The ITA limits CCTB eligibility to a maximum of 11 months prior to the filing of an application. However, subsection 122.62(2) gives the Minister the discretion to extend the period for filing an application beyond the normal 11-month period. Refer these requests to the Eligibility Section of the Benefit Programs in the appropriate tax centre.

5.3.1.6 Other requests that are not taxpayer relief requests

A request is not a taxpayer relief request when a taxpayer seeks to:

- receive an explanation of the penalties and/or interest charged;
- reimburse costs (such as phone charges, postage costs);
- cancel Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) administrative charges such as a bank charge back fees.

5.3.1.7 Penalty and/or interest not applicable and/or not assessed

A taxpayer may write requesting relief upon filing a tax return or with an adjustment request. When the relief request is received at the IC:

- If the return and/or the adjustment have not yet been processed, write to the taxpayer to inform him/her to submit a request when he/she will have received the notice of assessment/reassessment showing the charge of penalty and/or interest. Return the correspondence to the taxpayer. See Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction)

- If the return and/or the adjustment have been processed and no penalty nor interest have been charged, write to the taxpayer and attach the correspondence. See Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction).

Note: If the taxpayer is requesting relief based on a voluntary disclosure, refer to Appendix 5A.

5.3.1.7.1 Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC) or Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) overpayments

Interest is not applicable on GSTC and CCTB overpayments.

If a taxpayer submits a request for relief concerning these overpayments, write to the taxpayer to inform him/her that interest does not apply and to call the toll-free number 1-800-465-6933 for account resolution. Forward the request to the Thunder Bay TSO, responsible to collect these overpayments, at the following address:

Thunder Bay TSO
130, South Syndicate Avenue
Thunder Bay On P7E 1C7.

5.3.1.8 Remission - Relief of tax

The taxpayer relief provisions provide for relief of penalties and/or interest but not for the relief of tax. On occasion, a taxpayer or representative may write requesting relief and/or remission of tax. When the balance on the account includes penalties and/or interest, proceed with the screening as usual. If the taxpayer is specifically requesting remission, see 6.12 Remission - Relief of tax (for information only).

5.3.2 Forwarding misdirected correspondence

If the correspondence has been misdirected, attach a routing slip indicating the area of responsibility and forward accordingly. Do not create a registry entry.

Digitized by Google

5.3.3 Accounting issues received with a taxpayer relief request (CoE responsibility only)

When a taxpayer states that a delay was not his/her fault and provides reasons for late-filing/late payment, generally, the request will be treated as a taxpayer relief request because he/she admits being late but would like relief of the penalty and/or interest due to the extenuating circumstances.

If the correspondence deals with both an accounting issue and a taxpayer relief request, the accounting question should be resolved prior to a review of the relief request. In these situations:

- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- send an acknowledgement letter (requesting additional information where applicable);
- attach a round trip memo and referring a copy of the correspondence to the appropriate area at the TC (Individual Benefits Services Division and/or Business Returns).

If after the TC examination is completed:

Penalty and/or interest are fully reversed

- delete the registry entry,
- add an ACSES diary note with details of TC actions, stating a review will not be required if the request was for financial hardship, otherwise put a note in the ELCS Notepad.

OR

Penalty and/or interest remain

- ensure details of the TC actions are documented in the file;
- screen the request as usual.

5.4 Flow B: all taxpayer relief requests

As mentioned in the Introduction, the taxpayer relief workload gained program status effective April 1, 2011. At that time, four centres of expertise (CoE) were established to review the majority of requests for penalty and/or interest relief. However, other sections of the Agency retain responsibility for conducting reviews for other specific taxpayer relief workloads.

Note: The CoE processes relief requests received at its IC, even if requests are not from provinces under the IC's responsibility.

5.4.1 Area of responsibility

Taxpayer relief requests are handled by different sections of the Agency. Certain types of requests are more common than others. Some specialized workloads receive very few requests for relief. The majority of situations are listed below. If you encounter an unusual request, not listed below, consult a senior officer or team leader. See 3.6 Referral process for more information.

5.4.1.1 CoEs, TRSCD, Appeals Branch

Employees at CoEs are responsible for handling:

- taxpayer-initiated requests for penalty and/or interest relief;

including

- all situations requiring a joint review with another section of the Agency. See 5.7.1 Joint reviews for more information.

excluding

- refer to the table in Appendix 5A.

Digitized by Google

5.4.1.2 Taxpayer relief requests handled outside a CoE

In order to know where to forward relief requests handled outside a CoE, refer to Appendix 5A.

When a taxpayer has received a proactive decision and subsequently writes to request additional relief, redirect the correspondence to the office that provided the proactive relief. If the taxpayer requests relief based on a reason that was not previously considered, the subsequent request may require a joint review. In both cases, the taxpayer's request is considered a first request for relief. See also 7.4.1 Proactive taxpayer relief and 8.7.1 Joint reviews.

5.5 Sort 2: begin screening sheet

A screening sheet has been developed to capture particular details of all taxpayer relief requests.

The amount of information recorded depends on whether the request will be processed outside a CoE or at a CoE.

Using the screening sheet will provide efficiencies when performing repetitive tasks such as creating registry entries, generating acknowledgement letters and creating scanned folders.

For requests with more than one period/year, verify that one of them is a valid relief request during screening, for each revenue type. The IC does not have to identify the invalid periods/years on the screening sheet, nor in the acknowledgement letter. The CoE will determine which periods/years are valid or not, modify the registry entry, if applicable, and advise the taxpayer in the decision letter.

See Appendix 5G, Screening Sheet.

5.5.1 Verifying authorization

IC staff will also verify authorization and send an acknowledgement letter for all taxpayer relief requests. Consent form; level 1 authorization allows only for the disclosure of information, while level 2 allows for both the disclosure of information and changes to a taxpayer's account. Therefore, for taxpayer relief requests, level 2 authorization is required.

Note: If the request involves more than one revenue type, you must verify the authorization for each account.

Read the correspondence to determine who has made the request.

- For a T1 account, if the taxpayer relief request is signed by a representative but not by the taxpayer, check the mainframe system. Refer to Appendix 5C to determine whether the representative is authorized to act on the taxpayer's behalf.
- For any other type of account, verify if the person that signed the relief request is an "authorized person". An authorized person, as indicated on the RC59 Business Consent form is: the owner, the partner of a partnership, a director of a corporation, an officer of a non-profit organization, or a trustee of an estate. If the request is signed by a "representative", refer to Appendix 5C to determine whether the representative is authorized to act on the behalf of the authorized person. A request from a contact, showing on RCON (Retrieve Contact (BN)), is acceptable.
- When a new consent form or letter of authority is received with the correspondence, keep a copy with the correspondence and forward the original to the applicable TC for input. (T1013 to the attention of T1 Specialty Services and RC59 to attention of Business Number Services)

Note: A taxpayer or an authorized person may provide consent using a T1013 (T1, T3) or an RC59 (Business Numbers) or a letter of authorization; however, a letter of authorization must include the same information that is provided when a T1013 or an RC59 is used. If the letter of authorization does not include all the required information, contact the taxpayer or an authorized person directly for the missing information and do not send it to the TC. See 5.5.1.1 No authorization below.

When the request is submitted by an authorized representative, send an acknowledgement letter to the representative and a copy to the taxpayer (for a T1 account). For a business, send a copy to the taxpayer/business if the authorized person is a third party (someone not within the business, for example an accountant or a lawyer).

All authorizations on a taxpayer's file become null and void at the moment of death. When a date of death is updated, all representatives are deleted from the system in the overnight sweep. In order to be valid, an authorization has to be entered on the account after the date of death or should have "Executor", "Administrator" or other such title after their name on RAPID option M.1. For more information, see TOM 3968 for T1/T3 accounts.

For sole proprietors, all authorizations on a taxpayer's file become null and void at the moment of death. In order to be valid, an authorization has to be entered on the account after the date of death or should have "Executor", "Administrator" or other such title after their name on RAR (BN System). For more information, see the Reference Guide for Business Enquiries Agents for business accounts.

See also 6.12 Consent forms – Authorizing or cancelling a representative. For more information on confidentiality requirements, see Confidentiality for Taxpayer Services - Individual Programs for T1/T3 in TOM 3960, and, Consent Forms and Letters of Authorization for business accounts.

5.5.1.1 No authorization

If the representative is unauthorized, attempt to make contact by telephone:

- if you reach the representative, and authorization is not readily available, inform the representative that the request will be returned and may be resubmitted when authorized; or
- if you leave a message for the representative, the message should advise you require a return call within 2 business days, or the request will be returned and may be resubmitted when authorized.

See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction) for a sample letter when returning correspondence to an unauthorized representative.

5.5.2 Acknowledgement letters

All taxpayer relief requests must be acknowledged, including requests that are the responsibility of an area outside a CoE. However, the content of an acknowledgement letter will differ for a request that is redirected to another section of the Agency (partial screening) versus a request that is the responsibility of a CoE (full screening).

See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction) for acknowledgement letter templates.

5.5.2.1 Acknowledgement letters: requests handled outside a CoE

The acknowledgement letter will advise that CRA:

- has received the taxpayer's request for relief under the taxpayer relief provisions;
- the request has been forwarded to the applicable section of the Agency; and
- provide the 1-800 number for the applicable revenue type.

Note: In ELCS, under topic DF, use verse 85651.

5.5.2.2 Acknowledgement letters: requests that are CoE responsibility

For requests that are processed at a CoE, the acknowledgement letter will advise that CRA:

- has received the taxpayer's request for relief under the taxpayer relief provisions;
- charges daily compound interest on any outstanding balance;

And, if applicable:

- describe and request additional information required for the review;
- provide a contact name and phone number within the IC
- if an original document (e.g. death certificate, notice of (re)assessment) is included with an enquiry, it should be returned to the taxpayer. Discard funeral director's statement of death and copies of death certificates in classified waste. Scan or photocopy the document prior to returning it.

Digitized by Google

For requests with more than one period/year, verify that one of them is a valid relief request during screening, for each revenue type. The IC does not have to identify the invalid periods/years on the screening sheet, nor in the acknowledgement letter. The CoE will determine which periods/years are valid or not, modify the registry entry, if applicable, and advise the taxpayer in the decision letter.

And, for requests based on financial hardship and/or inability to pay when there is a balance;

Go to page 1 of ACSES and key an "x" beside ACSES info. You will be taken to the next page. Place an X over the ? under User to find the name of the collections officer, if applicable

- When the account is assigned, include the contact information and toll-free number in the acknowledgement letter;

OR

- If the account is unassigned, provide the 1-800-675-6183 toll-free number;

OR

- If the account balance is $2500.00 or less, provide the 1-800-959-2018 toll-free number.

5.5.3 Flow C: redirected mail

Generally, after verifying authorization and sending the acknowledgement letter, the next step is to create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt. An entry is created for requests for the acceptance of late, amended or revoked elections only if the taxpayer has requested the cancellation or waiver of penalties and interest.

IC staff does not determine validity or send invalid letters for requests that are processed outside a CoE. Refer the request directly to the responsible section.

Note: Indicate in Section IV – Info/Delays/Transfer of the fact sheet where the request is being sent and the type of request. Ex.: Audit - Request sent to Ass. director of Compliance, Toronto-North TSO.

See 5.7.1 Taxpayer Relief Registry and 5.7.2 Validating the taxpayer relief request for more information.

5.5.3.1 Appeals/notice of objection

If the request relates to an assessment that is under objection or if the request is received with a notice of objection, follow the next steps:

- select CSAPP, Case Appeals, on SLP;
- enter the account number in the applicable section of the Search screen;
- check to see if there is an existing Case Appeals record.

If the SRCH does not provide a result, it is a new objection:

- verify the authorization;
- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- set the entry as non-workable with code 01 Awaiting the outcome of an objection/court.
- send an acknowledgement letter;
- forward both the request and the notice of objection to the applicable appeals intake centre.
- put the registry entry number on the correspondence.

For taxpayers with a postal code starting with A to P and non-residents forward the correspondence to:

Eastern Intake Centre
Sudbury TSO/TC
1050 Notre-Dame Avenue
Sudbury ON P3A 5C1

Digitized by Google

For taxpayers with a postal code starting with R to Y forward the correspondence to the:

Western Intake Centre
Burnaby-Fraser TSO
9737 King George Highway
P.O. Box 9070, Station Main
Surrey BC V3T 5W6

If there is an existing Case Appeals record:

- and the activity code on the "Case Information" screen is 333 or 338, this is a CPP/EI objection. For CPP/EI, the status will always show "assigned" even if it's finalized. Press F11 to access the "Options Menu" screen, then choose option 1 VSUM. If the case has been finalized you will see the activity "AM/ES Record Decision".

If the Case Appeals record is open:

- verify the authorization;
- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt,
- set the entry as non-workable with code 01 Awaiting the outcome of an objection/court;
- send an acknowledgement letter;
- determine where the notice of objection has been assigned,
- record the Case Appeals Globus number and registry entry number on the correspondence;
- forward the correspondence to the applicable Appeals office.

Note: Appeals is responsible to answer the requests for which there is an open record. If the request relates to several years/periods and there is a notice of objection for one or some of the years/periods involved, the Appeals will review this or these specific years/periods. The other years/periods can be reviewed by the CoE. It's the same if the request relates to more than one revenue type. Appeals will review the request concerning the revenue type for which the record is open. In doubt, consult Appeals.

If the Case Appeals record is closed:

If the request relates to a tax year or period that was under objection, read the taxpayer's correspondence and determine if the taxpayer alleges delays at the objection or appeal stage. If so, the Appeals are responsible to review these requests even if the record is closed. Refer to the above steps. In some circumstances a joint review could be required. See 5.7.1 Joint reviews.

When there is a closed Case Appeals record and the taxpayer is not alleging delays at the objection or appeal stage, screen the request as usual.

See the Appeals Manual of the Tax & Charities Appeals Directorate (TCAD) for more information.

Note: The acknowledgement letter will differ depending on whether the notice of objection is open or closed. Refer to the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction).

5.6 Sort 3: additional documentation or a new request?

Sometimes it may be clear that the correspondence is intended to support an existing/open taxpayer relief request. For example, documents such as banking statements may be addressed to the IC, received by fax at the IC or submitted with a copy of the IC's request for additional information.

5.6.1 Flow F: supporting documentation for an existing/open taxpayer relief request

- separate the correspondence;
- add a note to the ACSES diary for documents intended to support financial hardship;
- remove the non-workable status from the registry entry; and
- scan and/or add the documents to the file

5.6.2 Delayed receipt of supporting documentation

Occasionally, supporting or additional documentation will be received after the request has been redirected to another section of the Agency or the work-ready file has been transferred to a CoE

In either case:

1. add a note to the ACSES diary for documents intended to support financial hardship

   and

2. refer the documentation to the appropriate area by either:

   a. locating a contact and forwarding the correspondence

      OR

   b. scanning the documentation, emailing to the responsible contact or adding to the existing file, if the entry in the registry is still open

      OR

   c. if the entry is closed (might have been closed with the decision denied-incomplete), create a new registry entry with the same level of review as the closed entry, scan the documentation and also indicate the prior registry entry number on the screening sheet

Information available in the registry will also help determine if the request is a duplicate of a previously submitted request or additional information intended to support an existing or closed entry. If uncertainty remains, review details available in the ACSES diary and/or Notepad or BN notes.

Note: Matching additional documentation with an existing open file should be considered a priority because an officer may be in the process of denying a request based on insufficient information

See also Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for more information.

5.7 Flow D: taxpayer relief requests that are CoE responsibility

In addition to the basic steps of verifying authorization and acknowledging the request, IC staff will also determine validity, create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt, determine complexity and request additional information (if applicable), for requests that are the responsibility of a CoE.

Note: If the IC sent a request that is not CoE responsibility (eg. invalid request), the CoE will send the request back to the IC for their action: forward the request to the appropriate area or inform the taxpayer (letter).

5.7.1 Taxpayer Relief Registry

The Taxpayer Relief Registry is a central repository for all taxpayer relief requests. IC staff will create a registry entry, within 4 business days from receipt, for taxpayer relief requests. If the request involved more than one revenue type, a registry entry must be created for each revenue type. In addition, on the create screen, you should indicate the related account numbers and/or the related revenue types. Refer to the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide and the Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for detailed instructions.

Prior to creating a registry entry, it is important to ensure that the taxpayer's intent is clear. For example, a taxpayer may have been assessed both interest and penalties but appears to be requesting relief of penalties only. If there is doubt, contact the taxpayer for clarification. See also 6.3.2. Unclear/ambiguous requests.

When creating a registry entry, the TRR system will alert you if a request has already been entered for that account number.

Note: See 6.11.2 Keeping an audit trail

5.7.1.1 Existing registry entry

A taxpayer may request relief but not mention a previous request and/or decision for the same taxation year or period. Accessing the registry will help determine if the request is about a first, second or subsequent review request.

Compare the information provided in the correspondence against any existing entry(ies). When in doubt, verify other system information, including ELCS (for prior decisions), ELCS Notepad, ACSES diary entries and/or BN notes to determine the nature of the correspondence you are examining. If doubt remains, contact the person who closed entry for clarification.

5.7.1.2 Second or subsequent review request

A previously closed entry may indicate a taxpayer is making a second or subsequent review request. Read the correspondence and verify available system information.

If you determine it is a second review request and the first review request is not a scanned file, the IC will locate the first review file, contact the office to obtain the hard copy of the file and associate it with the second review request. Both requests should be scanned.

If you determine it is a third or subsequent review request, go to section 5.7.2.3.

See also 6.2 Administrative reviews for more information.

5.7.1.3 Open registry entry exists

If there is an open registry entry relating to the correspondence, it may indicate a review is underway

If the request/entry is assigned:

- contact and advise the officer
  and
- scan and add to the scanned folder or forward the document to include in the file.

Digitized by Google

If the request/entry is unassigned:

- scan and add the document to the scanned folder and/or file

In either case, do not assume that the correspondence is an exact duplicate. The officer who conducts the review will determine if the correspondence contains any new details or information

Note: Page 1 of ACSES diary will contain a flag TAXPAYER RELIEF O/S when a registry entry is open and the flag TAXPAYER RELIEF when a registry entry has been closed. In either case, view and compare details in the registry for this taxpayer against the correspondence you are screening.

5.7.2 Validating the taxpayer relief request

Although a taxpayer may be requesting relief of penalty and/or interest, in some cases, the request may be invalid. There are three main reasons that a request may be invalid:

1. The request was received outside the legislated time limitation. See 5.7.2.1
2. There are no provisions (legislation) to permit the Minister to consider the request. See 5.7.2.2
3. The taxpayer is requesting a third or subsequent review of a request for relief. See 5.7.2.3 and also 3.5.3 Requests after second reviews.

A request could also be considered as invalid if you don't have enough details to create the registry entry and you are not able to obtain them.

When you determine that a request is invalid, the request should be sent back to the taxpayer, representative or authorized person, with a letter signed by a delegated authority (team leader level). Note that no retention period is required since the request and the related documents are sent back.

Note: IC staff is not responsible for determining validity of requests that are processed outside a CoE. Refer the request directly to the responsible section of the Agency.

5.7.2.1 Beyond legislated time limitation

A taxpayer relief request will be considered invalid if it is a first review request* (excluding a continuation of a proactive or continuation of an incomplete request)for

- cancellation or waiver of interest for a taxation year/reporting period that ended more than 10 years before the calendar year in which the request is made. See the note below;
- cancellation or waiver of penalty for a taxation year/reporting period that ended more than 10 years before the calendar year in which the request is made;
- refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period for a tax year ending outside of the 10 previous calendar years;
- accepting late, amended or revoked elections for a tax year ending outside of the 10 previous calendar years.

* CRA policy provides for two administrative reviews of a request for relief. Currently there are no legislated or policy time limitations on requesting a second review.

Exception: the late remitting penalty for GST periods ending prior to April 2007 accrued the same way as interest. Therefore requests for these penalties should be considered as valid requests if they pertain to a reporting period that is more than ten years prior to the calendar year in which it was received.

Note: For interest relief requests made on or after June 2, 2011, the Minister has the discretion to cancel interest that accrued during the 10 calendar years preceding the year in which the request for relief is made, regardless of the tax year in which the tax debt arose. For more information, see "Revised 10-year limitation period for interest relief".

See Chapter 2 Legislation for more information on determining the effective date of the 10-year limitation period and Chapter 9 Refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period and Chapter 10 Accepting late, amended or revoked elections.

Evidence that a request has been received in time:
A review will not be conducted if the taxpayer's request is invalid. Therefore, before advising the taxpayer that the time limitation has expired, it is important to verify available information to ensure that the request is not:

- an initial first review request that was lost and/or missing but originally received on time;
  OR
- a second or subsequent review request.

Check the registry and review mainframe/system information, such as the ACSES diary, SUDS diary, ELCS letters, Notepad etc. to determine if either of the two circumstances above applies. For example, the ACSES diary may contain notes that detail the receipt of an original request, but a registry entry was not created.

Accept the request when there is evidence the request was made on time.

If the request was clearly received outside the legislated timeframe, send an invalid letter using Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction).

Note: Exercise judgment when examining the account history. For example, it may be appropriate to accept an application where there is evidence the taxpayer discussed the availability of relief with his/her Collections Officer, but the application was delayed while the parties were negotiating a payment arrangement.

Creating a registry entry
The registry will not allow a date that is beyond the 10 year limitation for first requests. When accepting a request based on evidence it was received on time, use the most recent date possible to create the registry entry.

In Section III of the registry fact sheet, record the following information using sub-section – Other elements of analysis:

- details that support accepting the request
  and
- the date of the correspondence.

If there is doubt as to whether the request was received on time, refer to the senior officer and/or team leader for verification. If discrepancy remains, the IC team leader should consult the CoE team leader who will determine if the request is valid or invalid. Once the CoE makes a determination of validity, proceed accordingly.

5.7.2.2 Requests for which there are no legislative provisions

The taxpayer relief provisions allow taxpayers to apply for relief of penalty and/or interest; request a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period (individuals and testamentary trusts only), or accept, amend, or revoke an election. For a request to be valid there must be a legislative provision that allows the request to be made.

See Chapter 2, Legislation for an overview of the relevant sections which do provide for relief.

Gross negligence penalties – GST/HST
The taxpayer relief provisions contained in the Excise Tax Act do not extend to penalties assessed under section 285. However, a taxpayer who is requesting relief of penalties assessed under section 285, False statements or omissions, may have a right to redress by filing a notice of objection. See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction)

Notional assessment - GST/HST
A Notional assessment is not a GST/HST return; it is an assignment of debt. Penalty and interest relief assessed on GST notional assessments cannot be granted, these relief requests are invalid.

Digitized by Google

To identify a notional assessment, access the ACSES Account Information screen, click on the field OVERDUE PERIOD details. "Yes" under the column NOTL ASSMT for the period is an indication that a notional has been raised for that period.

Late, amended or revoked elections not listed in Regulation 600 of the ITA
A taxpayer may request to file, amend or revoke an election that is not listed in Regulation 600 of the ITA. However, IC staff does not determine validity and do not send an invalid letter for these requests. Determining validity is the responsibility of the section that will handle the request.

Requesting a refund beyond the statute-barred period for a corporation and/or partnership
The provisions to allow for a refund beyond the normal three-year period apply to individuals and testamentary trusts only. A request received from a corporation and/or partnership is invalid. See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction).

Recaptured refund interest
Recaptured refund interest is a reduction in the amount of interest that had previously been paid to the taxpayer. When refund interest is reduced, as per 164(3.1) of the ITA, it becomes an amount payable by the taxpayer, in the same manner that tax is payable. A recaptured refund interest posting on RAPID option N means that the total amount of refund interest previously allowed has been reduced. This overpayment is not interest that can be cancelled under the taxpayer relief provisions. See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction)

Relief of tax
The taxpayer relief provisions provide for relief of penalty and/or interest, but not for relief of tax.

For requests that relate to over contributions such as a T1OVP or a TFSA, see 5.3.1 Misdirected mail - Flow A.

Occasionally, a taxpayer will specifically request relief of tax or may use the word "remission". If the taxpayer is also requesting relief of penalty and interest, screen the correspondence as usual. See 5.12 Remission - Relief of tax (for information only) for more information.

5.7.2.3 Third or subsequent review request

It is CRA policy that taxpayers are entitled to two administrative reviews within the CRA. Each time a second or subsequent decision is made, the taxpayer is advised, in writing, of the option to request a judicial review.

A third or subsequent review request may be:

- a request for a review of a second decision, either before the taxpayer asks for a judicial review or because they have no intention to bring the matter to Court;
- a request for a judicial review/or a judicial review application that has been misdirected to the IC; or
- a judicial review application that has been heard, allowed by the Federal Court and referred back to CRA for an additional review.

If you determine it is a third or subsequent review request:

- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- do not determine validity;
- do not examine the file to determine if additional information is required;
- do not send an acknowledgement letter;
- forward the correspondence on a priority basis.

For requests that are not CoE responsibility: forward the request to the section that issued the last decision.

5.7.2.4 Deceased taxpayer

A relief request made by a taxpayer for their individual account, who passed away after the request was received at IC, is considered as:

- an invalid request if IC does not have all the necessary information to create the registry entry and that no authorization was entered to the taxpayer's file after the date of death, or that there is not the mention of "executor" or "administrator" after the name of the representative to M.1 option. Send an invalid letter to "the estate of the late" and provide the reasons for which the request is considered as invalid.

- a valid request if IC has the necessary information to create the registry entry or, if information is missing, it is possible to ask the information because an authorization was entered to the taxpayer's file after the date of death, or the mention of "executor" or "administrator" is after the name of the representative to M.1 option. If the request is complete (valid) and there is no authorization, send the acknowledgement letter to "the estate of the late" and forward the request as usual.

5.8 Flow H: determining completeness

IC employees are responsible for ensuring that information and supporting documentation required to complete a request is on hand when the review is conducted at a CoE. IC staff will determine completeness for requests that are the responsibility of a CoE only. Ask the taxpayer to provide the supporting documentation at the same time that the request is acknowledged. See 5.5.2 Acknowledgement letters for more information.

What is a complete request?

A taxpayer relief request should clearly indicate:

- the type of request;
- the tax years/periods involved; and
- details of reasons for the request.

Both the taxpayer and CRA staff are responsible for making sure that taxpayer relief requests are properly supported. Taxpayers should give details of any extenuating circumstances and the documentation needed to support and establish the validity of their request. Taxpayers also have to reply in a timely manner when we ask them for more information.

5.8.1 Incomplete request

If the information provided is incomplete or inappropriate, the taxpayer should be given the opportunity to provide more information before we conduct our review and make our decision.

More information can be requested either in writing or by telephone; however, the preferred method is in writing at the time the acknowledgement letter is issued. The letter will specify a time frame or a date for response and inform the taxpayer that after that date, the request will be processed on the basis of the available information.

A request is considered to be incomplete when there is an absence of essential information relevant to the decision-making process. Below are some situations of incomplete requests:

- a statement of income and expenses and/or assets and liabilities has not been provided, and/or returns are not filed in the case of a request for interest relief under financial hardship;

- details such as the dates and description of events are not provided in the case of a request for penalty and/or interest relief under extraordinary circumstances.

When additional information is requested, complete the non-workable field with reason 03 in Section IV-Info/Delays/Transfer. Be sure to remove the non-workable code when the documentation is received and/or after the period has expired, the time frame is 45 days, 30 days for the taxpayer and 15 days for the mailing time . See the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide for more information.

Digitized by Google

Note: You can allow an additional delay if the taxpayer specifies a date or period of time (eg. taxpayer will meet with his doctor in 3 weeks). Do not keep an entry open if the taxpayer cannot give a precise delay to submit the requested information or if you haven't heard from the taxpayer.

5.8.2 Incomplete request – information available internally

A taxpayer is responsible for providing facts and supporting documentation. However, there may be situations where the details described in the request can be readily verified with internal CRA information. See Appendix 5C, System Information for locations.

Common reasons/situations that may be verifiable internally:

- death of a taxpayer, a taxpayer's spouse or child,
- birth of a child;
- information slip was submitted with the return;
- ongoing disability (Disability Tax Credit on file).

5.8.3 Types of information or documentation that may be required

Determining which additional information or supporting documentation is needed requires judgment and tact. Taxpayers may request relief due to any one or a number of reasons and there may also be unique or unusual circumstances. When a relief request involve multiple revenue types it might be necessary to request additional information in two separate letters. See 6.10 Communicating decisions for more information about legal entities.

If after examining the request and/or talking to the taxpayer, doubt remains as to whether to request additional information or supporting documentation, seek the advice of a resource officer or team leader.

Situations where contact by telephone may be more appropriate
If, after reviewing the correspondence and available CRA information, the taxpayer's intent remains unclear, contact the taxpayer or representative for clarification. The nature and reasons for the request are required for the Taxpayer Relief Registry and therefore, in these types of situations, it may best to make contact by telephone, rather than by mail, to ensure the processing of the request is not delayed more than necessary.

Requests based only on financial hardship, inability to pay
The CRA requires current financial information to conduct a thorough review based on financial hardship or inability to pay. However, if the relief request is on a deceased individual's account (T1 estate or T3) or if the taxpayer died since the request was received by CRA, the financial information is not required.

When a taxpayer is requesting relief based only on financial hardship or inability to pay:

- check the ACSES diary to determine if the taxpayer has been communicating with a Collections officer;
- check TP1 and TP2 to determine if current income and expense information is available;

When:

- the account is unassigned,

and/or

- financial details do not exist;

and/or

- the financial information available is more than 3 months old.

In the acknowledgement letter, request the following documentation:

- 3 months worth of current banking statements (from all bank accounts/sources)

Digitized by Google

and

- an Income and Expense/Asset and Liability statement (IEAL) for individuals and partnerships*;
- a current financial statement (for corporations).

See Appendix 5F, Income and Expenses/Assets and Liabilities (IEAL) for the attachment, Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction) and 5.5.2, Acknowledgement letters for more information.

* If a request is received from a partnership, advise that we require a completed IEAL from each partner applying for relief. See Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under construction).

Note: When a taxpayer raises financial hardship as one reason for relief, and the request requires review by a section of the Agency outside a CoE, refer the request to the other section first. See 6.7.1 Joint reviews for additional information.

5.9 Determining complexity

IC staff will determine if a request is routine or complex for requests that are CoE responsibility. In certain situations, complexity may also be assigned or reassigned at the CoE. See Appendix 5B, Expediting a request.

The information found in this section and in Appendix 5D, Complexity Guidelines are applicable only to penalty and/or interest requests that are handled in a CoE. Requests handled in other sections of the Agency have their own complexity guidelines. For a general overview, see 3.5.1 First reviews.

Consider the following when assigning complexity:

- a routine request is any request that is not complex;
- each request should be handled at the lowest possible level;
- a request should not automatically be coded complex because one or more of the indicators are present. For example, although it may be appropriate to expedite a request due to the timeframes present with Ministerial correspondence, the facts of the relief request may be routine;
- apply the complexity guidelines in conjunction with Appendix 5B, Expediting a request;
- use your judgment – if a situation is unique and might be considered complex, discuss with your resource officer or team leader; and
- once assigned, if a case is found to be either more or less complex than originally thought, complexity should be re-coded to properly reflect the circumstances of the case.

Note: Level of complexity (routine or complex) is recorded manually on the screening sheet and electronically when the scanned file is created using the Taxpayer Relief Scanning System (TRSS). See Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for more information.

5.10 Work-ready taxpayer relief requests

Other than expedited requests, a file is ready to forward to a CoE when the:

- request has been acknowledged;
- registry entry have been created;
- supporting documentation has been requested and either;
    - received and included in the scanned folder or file

      OR

    - the deadline* to submit the supporting documentation has expired.

* The deadline is 45 days, 30 days for the taxpayer and 15 days for the mailing time..

When the file is work-ready, scan the documents and create a scanned file. See Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for instructions.

Store the original documentation that was scanned at the IC until the decision has been issued. Refer to 6.11 Keeping taxpayer relief records and to the Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for more information.

6. General policies and procedures

This chapter provides general taxpayer relief policies and procedures that apply to all business lines and all types of taxpayer relief requests.

Use the general information in this chapter in conjunction with guidelines for specific types of relief requests. For example, see Chapter 10 for additional information on accepting late, amended or revoked elections. See Branch Specific Information, Functional Guidelines for additional resources and links.

6.1 Purpose and intent of taxpayer relief provisions

The taxpayer relief provisions permit the CRA to help taxpayers resolve problems that arise through no fault of their own. The provisions allow for a common-sense approach in dealing with those who, because of personal misfortune or other circumstances beyond their control, are unable to comply with a statutory requirement or have failed to pay or remit an amount when due. The taxpayer relief provisions allow the CRA to be flexible and responsive to a taxpayer's circumstances when it would be unreasonable or unfair to penalize the taxpayer.

The types of circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control may be summarized as follows:

- natural or human-made disasters such as flood, heavy storms, or fire;
- civil disturbances or disruptions in services such as strikes or demonstrations;
- serious illness or accident;
- serious emotional or mental distress caused by death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment; or
- actions of the CRA, such as providing incorrect information, processing delays or errors, or delays in providing information

See 7.3 Extraordinary circumstances for more information and guidelines for evaluating them.

There may be other circumstances not listed above. See 7.5 Other circumstances for more information

Consideration is also given to situations where taxpayers suffer from an inability to pay or from financial hardship. See Chapter 8, Inability to pay or financial hardship for more information.

The taxpayer relief provisions were not intended and should not be used as a way to negotiate settlement of a taxpayer's account. In all circumstances, taxpayer relief requests should be reviewed independently.

6.1.1 Applying the taxpayer relief provisions

CRA employees are encouraged to be proactive in communicating and applying the taxpayer relief provisions. This is especially important for front-line employees, since they are the most frequent point of contact with the taxpayers. This section provides the benefits of communicating with taxpayers and how to apply the taxpayer relief provisions.

6.1.2 How to communicate and apply the taxpayer relief provisions

Front-line employees can give information on the taxpayer relief provisions proactively over the telephone or at the counter when a taxpayer's situation warrants. In these circumstances, the information given should be limited to the basic conditions taxpayers have to meet and how to make a request. Employees can also be proactive by identifying unclaimed credits and benefits, as well as overpayments, while performing audits, examining a complaint, or evaluating a taxpayer-requested adjustment.

When front-line employees inform taxpayers, they should refer them to the following documents:

- IC07-1, Taxpayer Relief Provisions
- Memorandum 16-3, Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and/or Interest
- RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief

Employees should understand the relief provisions and how they are applied so they do not raise a taxpayer's hopes and generate unnecessary additional work for the CRA. For example, employees should avoid encouraging taxpayers to submit requests when it is determined that the year(s) for which relief is being sought is past the 10-year limitation.

Although a proactive approach may result in an increase in requests received, there are many benefits to being proactive in communicating and applying the taxpayer relief provisions. Active communication gives the taxpayers information they are entitled to and serves to enhance their confidence in the integrity and fairness of our self-assessment system.

6.2 Administrative reviews

Taxpayers can request two internal administrative reviews. Taxpayers are also entitled to a judicial review by the Federal Court Taxpayers can ask for a second review if they are not satisfied with the outcome of a first review. Requests for second reviews should be addressed to the attention of the manager of the centre of expertise (CoE). First and second reviews are discretionary administrative reviews. As a result, there is no formal right of appeal. However, taxpayers can apply for a judicial review to the Federal Court if they feel that discretion was not properly exercised during a first or second review or if they are not satisfied with a CRA decision.

The scope of the Federal Court review is restricted to the exercise of discretion. The Federal Court will not overturn a CRA decision.

First review requests must be submitted within the 10-year limitation. Second review requests have no time restrictions.

6.2.1 A first review

A taxpayer request for relief will result in a first review if

- this is the first time the taxpayer has made the request;
- the taxpayer has submitted additional information to support a request for relief for which a decision has not yet been rendered;
- the requested information for a first review is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the request will be considered as a continuation of the first review; or
- the taxpayer is denied relief under one legislative provision and a subsequent request is made under a different legislative provision. For example, when a taxpayer is denied relief under one legislative provision (i.e. 220(3.1) penalty and/or interest relief) and a subsequent request is made under a different legislative provision (i.e. 152(4.2) reassessments beyond the normal reassessment period), the request will be considered as a first review.

6.2.2 A second review

A taxpayer request for relief will result in a second review if:

- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and does not provide further information;
- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and provides information that was not included with the first request;
- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and cites a reason/motive (i.e. extraordinary circumstances to financial hardship) that was not raised at the time of the first request;
- the requested information for the second review is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the request will be considered as a continuation of the second review. See 5.6.2, point 2 c).

A taxpayer's second request should include the following:

- the reasons why the taxpayer disagrees with our decision (e.g. not all information was considered);
- facts or details were misinterpreted or not considered in their proper context, the taxpayer simply disagrees; and
- any relevant new documents, new facts, or correspondence.

See 3.5 Delegation of the Minister's power and duties for more information.

6.2.3 A third or subsequent review

A relief request will result in a third/subsequent review if the taxpayer comes back to the CRA to ask for a review of a second decision; either before they ask for a judicial review, or because they have no intention to bring the matter to Court. Normally, the case would only be reopened if the taxpayer is providing new relevant information.

Digitized by Google

The intake centre (IC) forwards these requests on a priority basis. The responsible section of the CRA, including centres of expertise (CoE), should also process them on a priority basis, that is to say:

- determine validity;
- determine whether or not a third review will be conducted.

If a third review is not conducted, the registry entry will be closed with decision "Denied-Incomplete". In this case, only the "Summary of recommendation" and "Decision" fields, in Section V, and Section VII of the fact sheet are mandatory. In Section V, indicate the reason for which we did not conducted the third review. A letter signed by a delegated authority will be sent to the taxpayer.

If a third review is conducted, the section of the Agency responsible for the review, including CoEs, will send the acknowledgement letter and will request additional information if required. The review of these requests can be made on a FIFO basis or on a priority basis.

If the CRA does perform a third or subsequent review, taxpayers must be informed of their right to judicial review even if this right was previously communicated.

Consult 3.5.3 Requests after second reviews for more information.

6.3 Making a taxpayer relief request

Taxpayers or their authorized representative normally have to ask for the cancellation or waiver of a penalty or interest in writing. In a request, taxpayers have to give the reasons why charges should be cancelled or waived, as well as to give enough relevant information and documents to support the validity of their claim

When informing taxpayers how to make a relief request, it should be stressed that it helps to expedite processing when a request is identified as a taxpayer relief request, and whether it is a first or second review request. This will save time screening and help avoid situations where requests are held in the wrong inventories for extended periods of time.

Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their requests by writing to their intake centre (IC). See Contact List for locations and contacts.

Form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief can be used by taxpayers to request relief. Although this is not a prescribed form, employees should promote its use to taxpayers. The CRA will not deny a request simply because the taxpayer did not complete a RC4288. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formepubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.

6.3.1 Requests taken on behalf of taxpayers

As a general rule, CRA employees should not take requests over the telephone or at the counter on behalf of taxpayers for the following reasons.

- requests accepted over the telephone or in person would in all likelihood be incomplete, since they would not give all the information needed to efficiently resolve the request on the first attempt. More contact would be needed, which in turn would cause processing delays;
- taking requests over the phone or in person could jeopardize our impartiality since employees could inadvertently substitute themselves in the role of the taxpayer, which could modify or taint the taxpayer's information.

However, it could happen in cases where previously submitted requests are unactioned or where there is an inability to write or communicate in writing and the taxpayer has no one to help them. In these situations, care must be used to formulate requests on behalf of taxpayers in an impartial way and to try to gather as much detail and information as possible. Taxpayers should be told that more contact might be necessary. Under no circumstances should an opinion be given on whether requests will be approved or denied-this can only be determined after a thorough review.

6.3.2 Unclear/ambiguous request

There may be instances in which requests may be unclear or ambiguous. For example, a taxpayer that has been assessed both late filing penalties and/or omission penalties and interest charges may only seek interest relief. The general rule in such cases is not to make any assumptions and to resolve any unanswered questions prior to review, as taxpayers may not distinguish penalty from interest charges.

Taxpayer contact should be attempted to confirm the details of their request. This can be done easily by telephone. Details of taxpayer contact are to be noted in the file. Proceeding with an unclear/ambiguous request or not asking for more information when needed can create additional unnecessary workload and cause processing delays as well as result in poor taxpayer service.

For example, if a request is denied or partially approved based on lack of information or details, the taxpayer may ask for another review of their file. This situation could have been avoided from the start by gathering all the required information prior to file review. If a second review is requested, the task for the reviewing officer would be much more simplified.

See 6.6.1 When more information is needed.

6.3.3 Request for a deceased taxpayer

A relief request made by a taxpayer for their individual account, who passed away after the request was received at IC, will be reviewed as any other requests. If more information is needed, you must verify if an authorization was entered to the taxpayer's file after the date of death, or that there is the mention of "executor" or "administrator" after the name of the representative to M.1 option. If there is no authorization and that essential information relevant to the decision-making process is missing, the request will be closed with the decision "denied-incomplete". If there is no authorization, the decision letter will be sent to "the estate of the late".

Consult 5.5.1 Verifying authorization and 5.7.2.4 Deceased taxpayer for more information

6.4 Ministerial discretion

Discretion is defined as the freedom to make decisions. This section of the manual sets parameters for exercising proper discretion during taxpayer relief reviews. Topics covered are the use of discretion, impartiality, and how to properly analyze facts.

6.4.1 Using discretion

The taxpayer relief provisions give the Minister of National Revenue discretion to cancel or waive penalties and interest, issue income tax refunds or reduce amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period (income tax only), and accept certain late-filed, amended, or revoked elections (income tax only). The Minister's discretion is outlined in the phrase "the Minister may" that appears in each taxpayer relief provision.

Some CRA officials are delegated the authority to exercise the Minister's powers and duties to allow, partially allow or deny taxpayer relief requests. Positions are delegated, not individuals.

Delegated employees must carefully review the taxpayer's request and any supporting documentation, such as the taxpayer relief fact sheet. Most importantly, they are responsible for making a decision to allow, partially allow, or deny a taxpayer's request.

In using discretion, you must consider CRA policies and guidelines, the circumstances that gave rise to the request, submissions made by the taxpayer, and any other relevant information.

When deliberating on a request it is important that:

- all correspondence and notes of telephone conversations with the taxpayer concerning the request, along with the taxpayer's file or a summary of the facts relating to the request, be made available to and be reviewed by the person exercising the discretion;
- the delegated authority, in exercising their discretion, reads and considers the taxpayer's submission along with the recommendation and summary of the pertinent facts; and
- the officer who prepared the fact sheet be available to answer any questions that might arise concerning the appropriateness of the recommendation.

Digitized by Google

The way in which discretion has been exercised can be questioned during second reviews and judicial reviews.

See 3.5 Delegation of the Minister's power and duties for more information on delegation and who is authorized to exercise Ministerial discretion.

6.4.2 Making impartial decisions

To properly use discretion, it is essential that taxpayer relief employees involved in the review and decision-making process remain impartial. Evidence of non-impartiality could have adverse consequences in court. It could also undermine the CRA's reputation for fairness.

For example, we should not automatically refuse a request to cancel or waive penalties and interest because a taxpayer has a poor compliance history. The circumstances surrounding the situation may have been completely out of the taxpayer's control, which could then lead to a full or partial approval of the request.

Impartiality can best be defined as being just and fair or unprejudiced. The best way to remain impartial when performing a review is to avoid prejudging taxpayers or situations and to not be biased. Equal consideration and treatment must be given to all taxpayers.

Taxpayers deserve to be treated equally, regardless of their:

- age, gender, race, religion, or marital status;
- location (e.g., whether they are from a poor region or an affluent neighbourhood);
- background (e.g., their level of education or social status);
- sophistication (e.g., how well they speak);
- access to tax professionals;
- assertiveness or aggressiveness; or
- employer or business sizes.

The above list is not intended to be exhaustive since other extraneous factors exist.

6.5 Receiving a taxpayer relief request

When correspondence is received at an IC, the screener will determine if it is a new relief request, a document to be matched with an existing taxpayer relief request, or correspondence not intended for the Taxpayer Relief Program.

Staff will verify authorization, open a registry entry and send an acknowledgement letter for all taxpayer relief requests received at an IC.

IC staff will also determine validity, request additional information (when applicable), and assign complexity for requests that are CoE responsibility.

Staff at an IC will not determine validity, completeness or complexity for requests that are processed outside a CoE. These steps will be the responsibility of the section that handles the work. Requests for relief handled in other sections of the Agency will be forwarded by mail. See 6.4.1 Area of responsibility for more information.

Note: If you are not located in an IC or a CoE and you receive a taxpayer relief request that is the sole responsibility of your section (e.g. a request for a refund beyond the normal three-year period received at a tax centre), do not redirect the request to the IC. Create a registry entry, determine validity and proceed with the review, recommendation and decision as per usual.

See Chapter 5, Intake and Screening, for more information and Process Map of CoE for an overview of steps followed at a centre of expertise.

6.5.1 Acknowledgement letter

An acknowledgement letter will be sent for all taxpayer relief requests. If you are located in a CoE and receive a new request, forward it to the IC for screening and acknowledgement.

If you are located outside an IC or CoE and you receive a taxpayer relief request that is the sole responsibility of your section (e.g. a request for a refund beyond the normal three-year period received at a TC), issue the acknowledgement letter accordingly. Do not redirect the request to the IC. See Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under development).

6.6 Supporting requests

Both the taxpayer and CRA employees are responsible for making sure taxpayer relief requests are properly supported. Taxpayers have to make sure they give details of any extenuating circumstances and the documentation needed to support and establish the validity of their request. Taxpayers also have to reply in a timely manner when we ask them for more information.

It is the CRA's responsibility to make sure taxpayers are made aware that their requests have to be complete. Officers evaluating and reviewing relief requests must determine whether taxpayers have provided enough information or if more information should be requested. If more information is needed, staff must try to contact taxpayers to obtain the information before reaching a decision.

Not asking for more information when it is needed can cause processing delays and result in poor taxpayer service.

See below for instructions on how to request more information and 6.8.2 Incomplete request - information available internally for steps taken at an IC.

6.6.1 When more information is needed

All the facts and questions relevant to a case must be gathered, reviewed, and answered. If the information given is incomplete, inappropriate or inconsistent, the taxpayer should be given the opportunity to provide more information or clarification/explanation before we make our decision

When conducting a review, if further information or clarification is required, follow the steps below:

6.6.2 Requesting more information in writing

Give 30 days to the taxpayer to submit the requested information and an additional 15 days for mailing time.

Written requests to the taxpayer should include the following elements or information:

- a precise description of the information requested (e.g., a doctor's letter that would provide the dates and details of an illness);
- a precise description of the receipts/information slips required to support the request for (re)assessment (e.g., child care receipt(s), rent receipt(s) or official donation receipt(s));
- a time frame or a date for the taxpayer to respond;
- an indication that if a reply is not received within the time frame, the request will be reviewed based on the information available and a decision will be made;
- the name of the employee and their direct phone number or extension the taxpayer can contact for more information or ask for an extension of time to reply; and
- an address for reply

If information is requested in writing, complete the non-workable field with reason 03 in Section IV-Info/Delays/Transfer of the TRR fact sheet. Depending on the file, a note could be entered in another system (ACSES diary, ELCS notepad)

See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under development)

6.6.3 Requesting more information over the telephone

Information can also be obtained by phone. Phone requests should include the same elements and information in 6.6.2 Requesting more information in writing. There are advantages to requesting information or clarification over the phone, since it can reduce the time in which the needed information is received. However, there is a chance the taxpayer could misinterpret what information is needed or could forget what information was requested.

Staff has to be prepared not to discuss the possible outcome of the case when talking to a taxpayer on the phone. No opinion should be given as to whether the request will be approved or denied - this can only be determined after a thorough review.

Digitized by Google

If information is requested by telephone, a note must be entered in Section IV - Info/Delays/Transfer of the TRR fact sheet (summary of the conversation, information requested, delay allowed), complete the non-workable field with reason 03. Depending on the file, a note could be entered in another system (ACSES diary, ELCS notepad).

6.6.4 Additional information not received

Where the taxpayer does not provide the requested information within the specified time frame, a taxpayer relief decision report is required to be prepared with a recommendation for the delegated authority's approval. The report (recommendation) should also indicate that the request has been denied due to insufficient information.

A decision letter signed by a delegated authority must be issued to the taxpayer in accordance with 6.10.1 First review letters.

The registry entry will be closed with the decision "Denied-Incomplete".

6.7 Requests involving more than one area

We will receive taxpayer relief requests that require involvement by more than one area. When more information is needed, a reasonable attempt should be made to minimize the number of times we contact the taxpayer.

6.7.1 Joint reviews

A joint review is a request for relief where more than one section or the Agency contributes to and/or has responsibility for the review with recommendation and a single decision is communicated.

It is important to consider the entirety of a taxpayer's circumstances, even when more than one area has contributed to the review. Moreover, the facts may not lead to the same recommendation depending on the requirements and obligations associated with a revenue type. See 6.10 Communicating decisions for more information.

For requests received at the Intake centre (IC):

When the IC determines that a joint review is required, the other area of the CRA will first review the request. The IC must:

- verify the authorization;
- create a registry entry within 4 business days from receipt;
- send the acknowledgement letter;
- forward the correspondence to the other responsible area with a RTM/Memorandum (see the note below);
- scan the request and the RTM/Memorandum (will indicate to the CoE that a response from another area is expected);
- create scanned documents in TRRS;
- indicate in Section IV – Info/Delays/Transfer of the fact sheet where the request has been forwarded;
- transfer the file to the CoE.

Upon receiving the response from the other area, the CoE will process the request as a priority. If a review from the CoE is no longer required, the CoE will ensure that the registry entry has been closed.

Since the relief request may be resolved in full by the other area, we recommend that if additional information is required, it will be requested by the CoE. Thus, we can prevent information from being unnecessarily requested from the taxpayer or that the information will be outdated.

Note: The RTM/Memorandum should indicate to the other area that a response should be sent to the CoE. Here is an example of what might be the RTM/Memorandum:

> The taxpayer relief intake centre has determined that the attached request requires a joint review according to section 6.7.1 Joint reviews of the Taxpayer Relief Procedures Manual
> When you have completed your portion of the exam, please close the registry entry if a joint review with the taxpayer relief centre of expertise (CoE) is no longer required.

000049

Digitized by Google

If a joint review with the CoE is required, please forward the request along with your recommendation to the CoE. The CoE will send the decision letter, including your recommendation.

Provide the CoE coordinates.

For requests received outside the IC:

- transfer the registry entry and the request for the other section to conduct their review first; or
- conduct their portion of the review first and then transfer the registry and file to the other section.

The decision as to which area conducts the first review is driven by efficiency. For example, if a taxpayer invokes extraordinary circumstances and financial hardship, we should review the facts related to extraordinary circumstances first.

A joint review will include, but is not limited to:

- A request where the taxpayer cites more than one reason and responsibility for these reasons rests with more than one section of the agency, for example, a request for a T3 account based on extraordinary circumstances and financial hardship.
- A request where a taxpayer cites more than one revenue type, for example, a T1 account and TFSA.

6.8 Fact sheet

Taxpayer relief fact sheet is mandatory. The fact sheet is used to enter facts and reasons cited by the taxpayer, to review the request; to record the analysis; to recommend a decision and to obtain approval from a delegated authority. See 4.2 Fact sheet in the Taxpayer Relief Registry guide for more information.

In addition, the fact sheet may be used in a second review or a judicial review by the Federal Court of Canada. Taxpayers can also ask for a copy of the fact sheet through Access to Information Act.

When writing a report, remember:

- be impartial, avoid making personal opinions and judgments;
- stick to the facts, leave out irrelevant considerations;
- do not use words that curtail your discretion;
- tone should be neutral – objective;
- motivate your decision - state the facts considered and explain the importance of each fact;
- be clear and concise, avoid jargon; and
- avoid putting words in quotations, in capitals, in bold or italics

Refer to the "Top five rules for good report and decision letter writing".

Note: If an internal report is used, other than the TRR fact sheet, it must contain the same elements.

6.9 Obtain approval

The fact sheet with the recommendation must be reviewed and approved by a team leader, manager or another delegated authority. If the delegated authority does not agree with the recommendation, and changes are required, the fact sheet is returned to the officer for revision.

To approve a decision, the delegated authority should enter his/her userid in Section VII, Delegated Authority, of the taxpayer relief registry fact sheet. Since this step serves as an electronic signature, it is not necessary to print and sign the fact sheet. See 4.2.7 Delegated Authority, of the TRR guide and 3.5 Delegation of the Minister's power and duties for more information.

Team leaders, managers and other delegated authorities, who routinely approve taxpayer relief requests, should ensure they have the proper delegation authority in ORG. To make a request, send the name and userid to Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries.

6.9.1 Post-decision financial transactions

If a financial transaction is required in the taxpayer's account, consult Appendix 8B Post-decision Financial Transactions - CoEs for all requests that are CoE responsibility to find out how to request the processing of the transactions. For other workloads, see Functional Guidelines for more information.

6.10 Communicating decisions

All taxpayer relief decisions must be communicated in writing, except when a taxpayer wishes to withdraw the request. See the Note below.

For requests that are CoE responsibility: Decisions must be communicated by means of a decision letter.

For requests that are not CoE responsibility: Decisions are usually communicated by means of a decision letter. A notice of assessment/reassessment or notice of determination/redetermination can be acceptable in lieu of a decision letter for an approval in full. Note that these notices contain the signature of a delegated authority, the Commissioner.

Note: For decision "Withdrawn", only the "Summary of recommendation" and "Decision" fields, in Section V of the fact sheet, are mandatory.

Decisions letters should include the following:

- type of request;
- period/year involved;
- an indication that the decision was made after considering the request, the facts of the case, and the legislation involved;
- the factors which were considered in the decision;
- the basis or reasons for the partial approval or denial;
- the name, position, and telephone number of the officer who handled the case along with an invitation to contact the officer if the taxpayer wants to discuss the matter; and
- signature of the delegated authority.

Decision letters should not refer to "taxpayer relief committees" since this term is for internal use only. The terms "fairness provisions" and "fairness legislation" have been replaced with the term "taxpayer relief provisions". Letters should reflect this terminology.

Care should be taken to use proper writing style and a current mailing address. Letters should be written in plain language whenever possible. Plain language uses straightforward, familiar words and simple, logical sentences. Letters must have a neutral and objective tone. People reading a letter that is written in plain language should easily understand our decision. Address your reader directly, using the pronoun you. When you refer to the CRA, use we or us. Make your letter more personal by using I or me. Be consistent; otherwise, you will confuse your reader. Consider the document structure and flow and use your judgment. You can find guidelines for writing in plain language on the Public Affairs Branch site. Refer also to the "Top five rules for Good report and Decision Letter Writing".

The letter should clearly indicate why the CRA has decided to partially approve/deny the request. In cases where multiple issues/reasons are involved, for example, if the request involves both extraordinary circumstances and financial hardship, the letter must address those issues to the extent that the taxpayer can acknowledge that all of his arguments have been analyzed and covered. The more detail provided, the more unlikely it will be that a second review will be submitted. Moreover, the decision letter should not state that the request has been denied because the taxpayer relief provisions do not allow to cancel and/or waive penalties and/or interest in X situation. The taxpayer relief provisions, the published and/or internal CRA guidelines should assist officers when exercising discretion. In the past, the Court has criticized our decisions when it finds we have "fettered discretion" by limiting our review to circumstances outlined in our guidelines.

When a request is reviewed by more than one area, it is preferable to issue a single decision letter. Keep in mind that reporting requirements and obligations may be different depending on the revenue type. Consequently the facts may not result in the same recommendation for each area/business line. Clearly indicate the periods under consideration and ensure to provide detailed reasons for each decision. See also 6.7.1 Joint reviews. We want to issue one decision letter for all reasons and revenue types at onetime; this is to avoid having the taxpayer making several applications for judicial review in respect of the same relief request.

Digitized by Google

However, some requests could involve different legal entities. If it's the case, we must send one decision letter for each entity.

Legal entities can be defined as:

- Individual = T1 return (program account RI).
- Proprietorship (sole proprietor) = business owned by one person = PAYDAC (program account RP), GST/HST (program account RT)
- Partnership = business owned by more than one person, not a corporation, each partner is liable for any tax payable = PAYDAC (program account RP), GST/HST (program account RT).
- Corporation: an artificial person or legal entity created by or under the authority of the law. The corporation is liable for any tax payable. The owners (shareholders) are not personally liable. Directors may be held personally liable for the debts on trust accounts (if directors' liability assessments were raised) = T2 return (program account RC), PAYDAC (program account RP - trust account), GST/HST (program account RT - trust account).

If the request is for the individual (T1 return) and the corporation = 2 separate legal entities = 2 separate decision letters (one for the individual and one for the corporation).

If the request is for the individual (T1 return) and the partnership = 2 separate legal entities = 2 separate decision letters (one for the individual and one for the partnership).

If the request is for the individual and the proprietorship = 1 legal entity = one letter as we are dealing with the same individual.

A facsimile signature stamp should not be used under any circumstances for taxpayer relief decision letters, as there could be a perception that the delegated authority did not actually make the decision.
If the delegated authority is in an acting position, the signature field should be the name and acting position. Do not use "FOR" signatures.

See the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder (under development).

Note: For a request that involve more than one legal entity, you can create a letter for one of them and use that letter as a base letter for another entity. To use a letter as a base letter, the status of that letter should be "complete" or "draft". So, if a request involves a T1 account (individual) and a T2 account (corporation), you can prepare the letter with the T1 account number, leave the letter as "complete" or "draft", and use it as a base letter for the T2 account. When you have finished, you can print the letters. See the ELCS manual for more information.

6.10.1 First review letters

When a relief request is allowed in full, a combined response, such as, informing the taxpayer of the decision over the phone, followed by a decision letter or notice, can be done

In cases of a partial approval or denial, letters have to inform taxpayers of their right to a second independent review. If taxpayers do not agree with the decision or feel that the CRA has not exercised its discretion in a fair and reasonable manner, they can ask in writing that the centre of expertise's Chief of Appeals or the director of their local tax services office or tax centre review their request again

Although taxpayers are entitled to apply for a judicial review after the first review, they will only be told of this recourse after a second review.

The delegated authority, who approved and signed the fact sheet, must sign the decision letter as well.

Digitized by Google

6.10.2 Second review letters

Such as a first review, when a second request is allowed in full, a combined response, such as, informing the taxpayer of the decision over the phone, followed by a decision letter or notice, can be done.

In cases of a partial approval or denial, letters have to inform taxpayers of their right to redress through a judicial review. Second review letters have to contain the following paragraph:

> If you feel that discretion was not properly exercised during our review of your request for relief, section 18.1(2) of the Federal Courts Act provides for a judicial review of any discretionary decision made by the federal government. You can apply to the Federal Court for a judicial review within thirty (30) days of the day you received this letter. For more information on the judicial review process and how to apply, phone the Registry of the Federal Court at (phone number). This information is also available at the Federal Court Web site.http://www.fct-cf.gc.ca.

NOTE: If a taxpayer contacts you (by phone or letter) because they have missed the 30-day time limit to apply for judicial review, refer to Chapter 11 Judicial review.

The delegated authority, who approved and signed the fact sheet, must sign the decision letter as well.

6.11 Keeping taxpayer relief records

The Privacy Act requires that documents be kept for a minimum of two years from the date they were last used for administrative purposes. Records can be destroyed after the two-year period has passed. However, local management may choose to extend the retention period, particularly for sensitive cases.

For requests that have been scanned, the original relief request documentation hard-copies must be kept and stored in a manner that it can easily be located until a decision has been made. The documents can then be destroyed as per regional office disposal procedures. It is suggested that the hard-copy of relief requests that have been scanned but the request was not approved in full be retained for a minimum of 3 months following the decision. For approved files, you do not have to retain the hard-copy documents. It is the responsibility of each intake centre (IC) to destroy hard-copies documents that they saved in TRSS. With Cognos, the IC can have reports showing the province of residence, the decision in the registry, etc.

For relief requests that have not been scanned, files that are 50+ pages (only the screening sheet is scanned with a note), a hard-copy must be kept for two (2) years after a decision has been made before disposal.

6.11.1 Complete file

A complete taxpayer relief file includes all:

- documents submitted by the taxpayer and/or representative;
- relevant internal documents and information that is not retained electronically* and/or not filed elsewhere in permanent records

* Do not copy/scan documents or information that is retained electronically. This includes:

- TRR fact sheet;
- taxpayer relief decision letter;
- information found in CRA systems i.e. ACSES diary notes, DO.3 screens, etc

 Other internal documents such a tax return, or Appeals report may be examined during the course of a review. Relevant details and location of the source documents should be recorded in the TRR fact sheet. When there is likelihood that the source documents will be destroyed prior to the taxpayer relief two-year retention period, copy relevant sections of the source documents for inclusion in the taxpayer relief file.

Note: IC staff creates scanned files for work-ready cases to be reviewed at CoEs. Any additional documentation received or considered after a review has begun must be scanned and added to the folder to ensure the file is complete. See Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for more information

See also Chapter 11 Judicial Review for details on preparing certified bundle of documents when a taxpayer makes a request for material under Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules.

6.11.2 Keeping an audit trail

All valid relief requests must be entered in the Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR). The TRR provides information on the date of the request, its location (office/section), its status (open, non-workable or closed) and on the contact person. There is also all the information entered in the fact sheet. The information from the registry is useful in helping answer taxpayer enquiries or requests for which records were destroyed or cannot be located. See the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide for more information.

In some cases, the registry entry may have been deleted because it was created in error (wrong account number, invalid request, etc.). Therefore, no audit trail is available in TRR.

If a registry entry is deleted at the intake centre (IC) before an acknowledgement letter is issued, it causes no problem; therefore no action is required. However, if the error is caught after the acknowledgement letter has been sent, there should be some type of audit trail why the registry entry was deleted. Create a brief note in ELCS Notepad indicating the registry entry number, why it was deleted, along with any action that has been requested on the account, if applicable. This is to ensure officers in CRA can respond to taxpayer's enquiries regarding their requests as well as to provide an audit trail.

In other cases, a closed entry can be deleted by HQ when requested by the responsible officer. Generally, the entry will be deleted and a new one will be created with the correct information. In these cases, it is a good practice to indicate, in the fact sheet (Other elements of analysis), that the new entry replaces the entry xxx because there was erroneous information in it.

6.12 Consent forms – Authorizing or cancelling a representative

6.12.1 Individual, trust and T5 accounts

For individuals (T1 accounts), trusts (T3s) and T5 information returns, form T1013 - Authorizing or Cancelling a Representative, has been revised to include two levels of authorization with expiry dates. Level 1 authorization allows only for the disclosure of information, while level 2 allows for both the disclosure of information and changes to a taxpayer's account.

Therefore, for taxpayer relief requests, level 2 authorization is required. Should you receive requests with either no authorization or level 1 authorization, return the request to the representative advising that you are unable to review the request without level 2 authorization provided on form T1013. A signed letter from the taxpayer, which clearly states that the representative has the authority to request changes to the taxpayer's account, is also acceptable. See 5.5.1 Verifying authorization for more information.

6.12.2 Business accounts

For business accounts (T2, GST/HST, PAYDAC, Import/Export, etc.) RC59 - Business Consent Form or equivalent information is required for authorizing or cancelling a representative. The form has also been revised to include two levels of authorization with expiry dates. Level 1 authorization allows only for the disclosure of information, while level 2 allows for both the disclosure of information and changes to the Business Number account(s). See 5.5.1 Verifying authorization for more information.

6.12.3 Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance Act

CPT139 - Authorization form is used to authorize representatives for matters relating to the Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance Act. There are no differing levels of consent. See 5.5.1 Verifying authorization for more information.

6.13 Undeliverable mail

Undeliverable mail is defined as mail returned to Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) because the taxpayer does not reside at, or no longer resides at the mailing address.

If a letter mailed to a taxpayer is returned by the Post Office, every effort must be made to redirect the correspondence. Search the CRA's systems for the most current address, and/or place a telephone call to the taxpayer in order to obtain the most current mailing address. Follow the procedures below depending on where the relief request will be reviewed.

For requests that are CoE responsibility

If no new address is available and the taxpayer cannot be located, change the status of the letter in ELCS to undeliverable.

For T1 accounts, set the returned mail flag using option L.6. RAPID Option L.6.8 On-Line Help (PF1) provides instructions on setting the returned mail flag.

For business accounts such as payroll, GST and corporations, forward the correspondence to the Business Number Services, of the tax centre of record, to have the returned mail flag updated.

For other accounts, set the returned mail flag following the applicable procedures according to the revenue type. If you don't have access to the required system, forward the letter to the appropriate section that could set the returned mail flag.

Then, perform the following actions.

- If the letter is a letter informing the taxpayer that their request has been forwarded to the applicable section of the CRA: enter a note in ELCS Notepad.
- If the letter is a first review decision letter: enter a note in ELCS Notepad, and in ACSES for financial hardship case.
- If the letter is a second review decision letter:
  - enter a note in ELCS Notepad, and in ACSES for financial hardship case;
  - scan the letter and the envelope that indicates "undeliverable" and attach it to the second request electronic file as proof*.

* Following a second review, it is important to keep proof/record of the returned mail since the taxpayer can apply for judicial review within 30 days of the date the decision letter was first received by the taxpayer. See Chapter 11 Judicial review for more information.

- If the letter is an acknowledgment letter: enter a note in ELCS Notepad, and in ACSES for financial hardship case.
- If the letter is an acknowledgment letter requesting additional information:
  - enter a note in ELCS Notepad, and in ACSES for financial hardship case;
  - remove the registry entry from non-workable in Section IV;
  - scan documentation and transfer the registry entry to the CoE.

When the CoE officer is ready to review the request.

- If the returned mail flag is no longer displayed in the account, the request will be processed as usual. If additional information was requested and is still required, the officer will send a letter to the taxpayer and will attach a duplicate of the returned letter to it.
- If the returned mail flag is still displayed in the account, the officer will do a new search to find the taxpayer's address. If the taxpayer cannot be located, the registry entry will be closed with decision "Denied-Incomplete". In this case, only "Summary of recommendation" and "Decision" fields, in Section V, and Section VII are mandatory. In Section V, indicate that we did not review the request as there is a returned mail flag on the account since xxxx (date).

Note: No decision letter should be issued when there is a returned mail flag on the account to avoid a security incident. For example, when an individual contacts the CRA to report the receipt of information belonging to another person, this is considered "misdirected mail". Misdirected mail is a security incident.

Digitized by Google

For requests that are not CoE responsibility

If no new address is available and the taxpayer cannot be located, change the status of the letter in ELCS to undeliverable and enter a note in ELCS Notepad. For the returned mail flag, follow the procedures indicated in your Taxation Operational Manual (TOM). If a system other than ELCS has been used for the letter, follow your procedures to put a note in the taxpayer file about the undeliverable mail.

- If the letter is a first review decision letter: destroy the ELCS letter (if you set the returned mail flag).
- If the letter is a second review decision letter: attach the letter and the envelope that shows "undeliverable" to the 2nd request file as proof*.
- If the letter is a letter requesting additional information: removed the registry entry from non-workable in Section IV, if applicable, and destroy the ELCS letter (if you set the returned mail flag).

* Following a second review, it is important to keep proof/record of the returned mail since the taxpayer can apply for judicial review within 30 days of the date the decision letter was first received by the taxpayer. See Chapter 11 Judicial review for more information.

When the officer is ready to review the request:

- If the returned mail flag is no longer displayed in the account, the request will be processed as usual. If additional information was requested and is still required, the officer will send a letter to the taxpayer and will attach a duplicate of the returned letter to it.
- If the returned mail flag is still displayed in the account, the officer will do a new search to find the taxpayer's address. If the taxpayer cannot be located, the registry entry will be closed with decision "Denied-Incomplete". In this case, only "Summary of recommendation" and "Decision" fields, in Section V, and Section VII are mandatory. In Section V, indicate that we did not review the request as there is a returned mail flag on the account since xxxx (date).

Note: No decision letter should be issued when there is a returned mail flag on the account to avoid a security incident. For example, when an individual contacts the CRA to report the receipt of information belonging to another person, this is considered "misdirected mail". Misdirected mail is a security incident.

7. Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest

This section provides guidelines that apply to all business lines to evaluate taxpayer relief requests for cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with the General policies and procedures located in Chapter 6 of this manual.

Most Headquarters functions have additional guidelines for their workflows. You can find references and links to these additional guidelines in Functional Guidelines.

The CRA may waive or cancel all or part of any penalty and interest otherwise payable under the taxpayer relief provisions. The ability to waive or cancel penalties and interest is not to be used as a way to arbitrarily reduce or settle tax debt.

See Chapter 2 Legislation for more information.

7.1 Difference between a cancellation and a waiver

The terms cancellation and waiver have two distinct meanings.

Cancellation: A cancellation refers to penalties and interest amounts that were assessed or charged to the taxpayer for which relief is granted by the CRA.

Waiver: A waiver refers to penalties and interest otherwise payable by a taxpayer for which relief is granted by CRA before these amounts are assessed or charged to the taxpayer.

Digitized by Google

7.2 Circumstances in which interest and penalties may be cancelled or waived

Interest and penalties may be cancelled and/or waived in the following types of situations:

- extraordinary circumstances;
- actions of the CRA;
- inability to pay or financial hardship.

The Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within these situations. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit.

7.3 Extraordinary circumstances

This section provides examples of various extraordinary circumstances and guidelines for evaluating them.

The types of circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control that may have prevented a taxpayer from making a payment when due, filing a return on time, or otherwise complying may be summarized, but not limited to, the following examples:

- natural or human-made disasters such as flood, heavy storms, or fire,
- civil disturbances or disruptions in services such as strikes or demonstrations;
- serious illness or accident;
- serious emotional or mental distress caused by death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment.

7.3.1 Natural or human-made disasters

Taxpayers can ask for relief due to natural or human-made disasters such as flood, heavy storms, or fire. Relief can be granted when the event destroyed books and records, or made them inaccessible, or for other obvious reasons compliance was delayed or prevented

Guidelines for evaluating such circumstances include, but are not limited to, the following:

- consider the dates and description of events, and whether they correspond to the period when an obligation or requirement was missed;
- review the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented compliance;
- review the taxpayer's explanation of what other means were explored to comply with requirements,
- review the taxpayer's supporting documentation such as a copy of the police, fire, or insurance report to determine whether the dates and description of damages correspond to the taxpayer's presentation of the facts.

7.3.1.1 Special consideration due to extraordinary events

The Minister may issue a news release to announce that special consideration will be given to providing relief due to an extraordinary event that has prevented a large number of taxpayers from meeting their tax obligations. Generally, taxpayers still need to make a written request to get relief

CRA news releases on extraordinary events that qualify for relief can be found at http://www.cra-arc.gc.ca/nwsrm/rlss/menu-eng.html.

7.3.2 Civil disturbances or disruptions in services

Disruptions in services such as a postal strike, a strike within the government, or civil disturbances may give cause to a request for relief.

Guidelines for determining if such circumstances prevented compliance include, but are not limited to, the following:

- review the dates and description of events, and verify that they correspond to the period when an obligation or requirement was missed;
- consider the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented or delayed compliance corresponds to the facts Consider how long the disruption had been ongoing before the date payments, remittances, income tax, GST/HST, or information returns were due;
- review the taxpayer's explanation of what other means were explored to comply with the requirement. Does the taxpayer have relatively easy access to a CRA office? Does he or she live in an area with reasonably close access to a tax services office or tax centre?;
- review the taxpayer's supporting documentation such as a newspaper clipping that supports the disruption.

7.3.3 Serious illness or accident

Taxpayers can ask for relief if they have suffered from a serious illness or an accident to such an extent that they could not meet an obligation or requirement.

Some guidelines for evaluating such requests include the following:

- review the date(s) and nature of the illness or accident, and how it corresponds to the period for which the relief is requested;
- review the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented compliance. Consider whether the taxpayer could have had someone else take care of his or her obligations.
- consider the taxpayer's explanations of whether other personal or business obligations were impaired;
- review any supporting documentation such as accident reports, insurance reports (accident or health), and medical or hospital reports to make sure they verify the taxpayer's description of events.

For a corporation, estate, or trust, ask if the circumstances involve an individual having sole authority to execute the return, make the deposit, pay the tax, or remit amounts owing to the CRA. If someone else was authorized to meet the obligation, consider the reasons that person did not meet the obligation when evaluating the request. For a business, if only one person was authorized, determine if this was in keeping with reasonable standards of care.

Although it is imperative that these requests be thoroughly verified, they also should be handled with consideration and tact.

7.3.4 Serious emotional or mental distress

Taxpayers can also be granted relief if compliance was delayed or prevented because they suffered serious emotional or mental distress because of a death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment.

To resolve these types of cases in a consistent manner, consider the following factors.

- did the taxpayer work during the period in question or do any type of activity that would be similar in complexity to filing an income tax return?
- was the taxpayer hospitalized during the timeframe in question?
- was the taxpayer under medical care during the timeframe in question?
- is this (non-compliance, late filing, late payment, etc.) an isolated case?
- are the tax returns prepared by the taxpayer or a representative?

Digitized by Google

Guidelines to consider when evaluating such circumstances include those listed in serious illness or accident as well as these additional guidelines:

- consider the relationship of the parties involved;
- review the date of death of the family member, marital breakdown, loss of employment, or other traumatic event and how it relates to the period for which the relief is requested;
- review any supporting documentation to make sure it verifies the taxpayer's description of events.

These types of requests should be handled with consideration and tact.

7.4 Requests that arise due to actions of the CRA

Cancelling or waiving penalties or interest may be appropriate if the penalties or interest resulted mainly because of CRA actions and through no fault of the taxpayer, such as if:

- incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers or published information, or provided in person or over the telephone, led the taxpayer to file returns or make payments or remittances based on incorrect information;
- processing delays resulted in the taxpayer not being informed within a reasonable time that an amount was owing;
- errors occurred in processing;
- delays occurred in providing information necessary to meet an obligation, such as if the taxpayer could not make the appropriate payments/remittances because the necessary publication or return was not available;
- undue delays in resolving an objection, appeal or completing an audit

In cases involving incorrect information provided by the CRA, the following should be assessed:

- determine whether the taxpayer provided the CRA with accurate and complete information. Missing or inaccurate details provided by taxpayer can lead to an incorrect response on the part of the CRA;
- assess the relationship between the taxpayer's situation, the information provided, and the penalty and interest assessed;
- assess the degree of completeness of the details given to support a claim of incorrect verbal information. The more detailed the facts presented, (such as date, time, person spoken to, and details of the conversation), the more it could aid in strengthening the case.

In cases where it is alleged that the CRA was responsible for the delay, a determination should be made whether it was so and the period of delay should be established.

The examples, which follow, should help in identifying what is and what is not a delay caused by the CRA.

Examples

CRA delay
When an income tax return is first assessed, a limited review is done to speed processing. However, to protect the integrity of the tax system, returns are also reviewed in more detail at a later date. Generally, any necessary adjustments will be made to a return within three years of the original date of assessment. Any reassessments within that 3 year window are not considered an undue delay.

Furthermore, if for one reason or another, the CRA took more time than normal to process/complete a file (employee is on sick leave for a long period of time and the files were not reassigned, new priority), we could consider cancelling or waiving a portion of the interest.

Taxpayer delay
Let's take a project where the CRA sends letters to several taxpayers requesting supporting documentation. Some taxpayers comply, provide the requested documentation and have their files reassessed. However, a portion of the taxpayers do not cooperate for unknown reasons, and do not produce the documentation. Six months later, the CRA sends a follow-up letter to obtain the documentation or decides to reassess based on the existing available information. In this type of situation, the CRA should not consider canceling or waving interest because the delays have been due to the taxpayer's lack of action or response

Whenever we review a request to cancel or waive interest and/or penalties, we must take into account the four factors used to arrive at a decision. See 7.15 Factors to consider in arriving at the decision.

Digitized by Google

7.4.1 Proactive taxpayer relief

Approving relief of interest and/or penalties due to the actions of the CRA without a taxpayer relief request is considered proactive taxpayer relief.

Some circumstances where proactive relief from interest and/or penalties may be warranted are undue delays in resolving an objection, an appeal, or in completing an audit.

The decision to recommend a waiver/cancellation of interest and/or penalties will be based on the judgment of the CRA officer/auditor and the delegated authority after considering the facts of the case and the guidelines outlined in IC07-1, Taxpayer Relief Provisions and GST Memorandum Series 16-3 Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and/or Interest.

Documentation to support the waiver of interest and/or penalties should include one or more of the following:

- relevant audit or appeals working papers – the information necessary to determine the appropriateness of any waiver of interest and/or penalties;
- T2020 Memo to File (or similar working paper) – this should include a chronological account of the audit/objection/appeal as well as comments relating to the cause of any delays;
- taxpayer relief report.

An entry should be created in the taxpayer relief registry as soon as a proactive request is initiated. The received date must reflect the date a recommendation of proactive waiver and/or cancellation is considered.

In all cases, the officer or the auditor must complete a fact sheet and forward it for approval, with the decision letter, to the delegated authority or to the taxpayer relief committee. The registry entry is closed once the fact sheet and the decision letter have been approved by a delegated authority.

All taxpayer relief decisions must be communicated in writing. The letter should suit the particular case and is not intended to give the taxpayer a detailed explanation, only some insight as to what is being waived/cancelled. If the taxpayer requests clarification, the officer/auditor is instructed to advise the taxpayer as to how the portion of the interest waived/ cancelled was calculated and the reason(s). See 6.10 Communicating decisions for details.

The delegated authority, who approved and signed the fact sheet, must sign the decision letter as well.

The actual interest waived will be provided on the notice of assessment/reassessment (as applicable).

If the taxpayer disagrees with the interest and/or penalty relief that was proactively allowed by CRA and requests additional interest and/or penalty relief in respect of the same taxation year/audit period, we would consider this as a first request.

REMEMBER, be proactive! Waive interest and penalty if it is appropriate, e.g. if there has been undue delay in completing the review/audit.

7.5 Other circumstances

There may be other circumstances in which it may be appropriate to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest. For example, a taxpayer requests relief due to a specific situation that is not considered to be an "extraordinary" circumstance. In these situations, we must consider the request to be valid and review the request in the same manner as we would for any other request.

When preparing the fact sheet and the decision letter, it is important to indicate why the specific situation presented is denied or partially approved. We cannot base our decision on the fact alone that the circumstance(s) was not considered "extraordinary". Therefore, never indicate that the relief is not granted because the circumstance is not extraordinary.

In the court case, Nixon v. Canada (National Revenue), the judge set aside the decision to deny the request for taxpayer relief. The taxpayer asked for relief due to a specific situation that prevented him from complying with his tax obligations. At the second review process, both the report and the letter indicated that the request was denied because there were no "extraordinary" circumstances. The judge indicated that our own guidelines were not followed as we did not consider other circumstances as indicated in paragraph 24 of IC07-01. Paragraph 24 says that the Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within situations stated in paragraph 23 (extraordinary circumstances, actions of the CRA or inability to pay or financial hardship). In this case, the taxpayer had a circumstance that was not considered extraordinary and the decision to deny should not have been based on that fact alone.

7.6 Disputed assessment or amount charged

Relief should not be considered for a disputed assessment or amount charged. For example, you may have two categories of requests/situations for late filing penalties:

- Taxpayers' admit the return/document is filed late but would like the penalty to be waived/cancelled; or
- Taxpayers may dispute the correctness of the penalty (taxpayers indicate the return/document was filed on time).

The first bullet situations are clearly valid taxpayer relief requests, where you are dealing with correctly charged penalties.

The second bullet situations should not be considered a taxpayer relief request. Taxpayers may dispute the penalty informally by writing/contacting us; they may also formally dispute the penalty by filing a notice of objection.

It is the officer's responsibility to ensure, before recommending relief or referring the correspondence to taxpayer relief, that the law was applied correctly. In other words, the assessment must be valid or the taxpayer must have late-filed a return, otherwise taxpayer relief provisions do not apply.

See 5.3.1.4 Notice of objection and 5.3.1.4.4 Return filed on time/payment made on time.

7.7 Third parties

A third party can be defined as a representative acting on behalf of the taxpayer/employer

Taxpayers are responsible for meeting their obligations under the legislation we administer. As a result, taxpayers are generally considered to be responsible for errors made by third parties. Third parties who receive a fee and give incorrect advice, and make arithmetic or accounting errors should normally be regarded as being responsible to the taxpayer, if the taxpayer has suffered penalty or interest charges because of the party's actions.

In rare situations, relief could be granted to taxpayers because of third-party errors or delays. An extraordinary circumstance beyond the control of a taxpayer's representative, which prevented the taxpayer from complying, can be a reasonable basis for granting relief. For example, it would be proper to grant relief when a taxpayer's representative cannot file a return or an election on time because the representative was just hospitalized.

This is why it is important to review relief requests with care when third-party error is involved. Special care should be taken in granting taxpayer relief in cases of third-party errors so as not to undermine the principles of self-assessment

Following the Ian Spence adverse judicial review decision, the judge properly outlines CRA's guidelines that should be followed. Paragraph 24 of the IC07-1 Taxpayer Relief Provisions indicates that subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA gives the Minister (CRA delegate) broad discretion to waive or cancel any penalty and interest without setting any rigid rules in what situations relief is granted or not granted to a taxpayer. Therefore, a CRA delegate must consider other reason(s), including third party errors, as the taxpayer's circumstances are not limited to the conventional situations listed in paragraph 23 of the IC07-1 (i.e. extraordinary circumstances beyond the taxpayer's control, actions of the CRA and inability to pay or financial hardship).

A taxpayer relief request cannot be refused on the basis that the circumstances of the taxpayer fails to meet a specific criteria set out in the IC07-1

Paragraph 35 of the IC07-1 explains CRA's current taxpayer relief policy relevant to third party error:

> ¶ 35. Taxpayers are generally considered to be responsible for errors made by third parties acting on their behalf for income tax matters. A third party who receives a fee and gives incorrect advice, or makes arithmetic or accounting errors, is usually regarded as being responsible to their client for any penalty and interest charges that the client has because of the party's action. However, there may be exceptional situations, where it may be appropriate to provide relief to taxpayers because of third-party errors or delays.

Digitized by Google

7.8 Bank error

There may be exceptional situations where it may be appropriate to provide relief arising from a bank error or delay, if it has been established that the error occurred from a situation beyond the taxpayer's or employer's control. For example, if the employer makes his payment on time directly at his financial institution, but a delay occurs in the transfer of funds to CRA due to a computer breakdown, then it may be possible to consider cancelling the penalty and interest charges on the remittance, providing the bank can corroborate the situation. In this case, the bank is the third party and has admitted being at fault. This is clearly a situation beyond the employer's control. As a general rule, these types of requests should be approved if the financial institution can substantiate the circumstances.

7.8.1 Employer error

An employer error is different from a third party error as the employer commits the error.

In cases of employer error, officers need to look at each relief request on a case-by case basis. Where the CRA is satisfied that the employee had no knowledge or could not have been expected to know that the amounts on the T4 were incorrect because of an employer error, it would be reasonable to consider waiving or cancelling the interest and/or penalties.

7.9 Ignorance of the law

Generally, ignorance of the law or taxpayer error should not be accepted as a proper basis for granting relief under the taxpayer relief provisions. If the delay in compliance or in making a payment/remittance arose through neglect, carelessness, or lack of awareness on the part of the taxpayer, the penalties or interest should not normally be cancelled or waived, or the election should not normally be accepted. For example, the fact that a taxpayer was not aware of a filing requirement does not constitute by itself an acceptable reason for granting relief.

7.10 Gross negligence penalties

Relief request to cancel a gross negligence penalty can be considered under subsection 220(3.1).

However, since these penalties indicate a degree of negligence and absence of care and diligence on the part of the taxpayer, the cancellation of a gross negligence penalty may be appropriate only in exceptional circumstances.

Given the nature of a gross negligence penalty, it is more appropriate for a taxpayer to dispute the assessment of the penalty by filing a notice of objection.

Note: The taxpayer relief provisions contained in the Excise Tax Act do not extend to penalties assessed under section 285. See 5.3.1.4 Notice of objection and 5.7.2.2 Requests for which there are no legislative provisions for more information.

7.11 Erroneous refunds

Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest may be appropriate if the CRA made an error by issuing a cheque to a taxpayer for a greater amount than the taxpayer is entitled to without justification, foundation, or rationale. An example would be a refund cheque for $1,000 mistakenly issued for $10,000, due to a keystroke error.

The question of whether or not to waive or cancel penalties and/or interest that have accrued on a refund issued to a taxpayer in error would need to be decided based on the facts of each individual case.

The main considerations when reviewing such requests would be:

- whether the taxpayer acted in a timely manner to bring the matter to the CRA's attention: did the taxpayer contact the CRA within a reasonable time?
- whether the taxpayer has taken a reasonable amount of care in trying to resolve the situation: did the taxpayer contact the CRA to question the discrepancy?

Digitized by Google

- whether it would have been clear to the taxpayer that an error had been made and that he or she was not entitled to the funds; was there a discrepancy between the balance or refund calculated by the taxpayer and the amount of the refund received?

Although each case must be evaluated on its own merit, the taxpayer is normally expected to report the occurrence to the CRA within a reasonable time after becoming aware of the error, to qualify for total penalty and interest relief.

7.12 Amounts held in trust

If a taxpayer meets the criteria for taxpayer relief, it should be granted whether or not trust funds (e.g., payroll accounts or GST/HST accounts,) are involved. The fact that amounts are considered to be held in trust should not be the sole basis for denying a request under the taxpayer relief provisions. For example, a waiver or cancellation may be considered in cases of legitimate financial hardship where the continuity of business operations and the continued employment of the firm's employees are unnecessarily jeopardized because of circumstances beyond the control of the taxpayer.

7.13 Reinstating cancelled or waived penalties and/or interest

After penalties and/or interest have been cancelled or waived, they generally cannot be reinstated, since there is no basis in law to allow for reinstatement. Even if penalties or interest could be reinstated, in most cases it would not be fair, expedient, or cost effective to do so after the cancellation or waiver has been granted.

7.14 Inability to pay or financial hardship

A taxpayer may request relief of penalties and/or interest based on inability to pay or financial hardship. This workload is the responsibility of staff located in taxpayer relief centres of expertise (CoE). See exceptions in Appendix 5A for some non-residents accounts. If you are located outside a CoE, and are processing a request and the taxpayer has requested relief based in part on an inability to pay or financial hardship, a joint review may be required. See also 6.7.1 Joint Reviews and Chapter 8 for detailed procedures on requests based on financial hardship or inability to pay. See Contact List for CoE locations and contact information.

7.15 Factors to consider in arriving at the decision

Consider the following factors, refer to IC07-1 when determining whether it is appropriate to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest.

- past compliance;
- has the taxpayer knowingly allowed a balance to exist?;
- reasonable amount of care,
- has the taxpayer acted quickly to remedy any delay or omission?

7.15.1 Assessing reasonable care

The CRA will generally not make a decision in the taxpayer's favour unless the taxpayer took a reasonable amount of care to comply. In a normal situation, efforts should have been made to avoid, or at least minimize, delays in complying, paying, or remitting amounts due. A taxpayer should remedy any delay or omission within a reasonable time after he or she became aware of the delay or omission, or as soon as circumstances permitted.

Reasonable care is best described as whether the action or inaction of a taxpayer reflects what a person might reasonably be expected to do under comparable circumstances.

If the CRA can determine that a delay in payment or compliance arose through neglect or lack of awareness on the part of the taxpayer, relief under the taxpayer relief provisions should not be granted.

Digitized by Google

Here are some guidelines to use in determining whether reasonable care was exercised:

- examine the taxpayer's reasons for failing to comply to determine if the dates and explanations correspond with events on which the penalties or interest are based;
- examine the length of time between the event cited as a reason for the non-compliance and subsequent compliance, as this can indicate whether care was exercised. For example, if the taxpayer claims that he or she was unable to comply due to a fire, the reasonableness of the length of time between the fire and subsequent compliance may serve to support or refute all or part of the event's effect. This could be more difficult to assess if the reasons claimed are illness, accident, or serious emotional or mental distress. We would normally rely on medical or professional documents or proof submitted by taxpayers;
- review whether or not the taxpayer could have anticipated the event that caused the non-compliance and to what extent the non-compliance was within the taxpayer's control;
- determine if the taxpayer or the taxpayer's representative has knowledge that would help in knowing what the requirements or obligations would be and the repercussions in not meeting them.

7.15.2 Assessing past compliance

We should normally review a taxpayer's past compliance (e.g., penalty/interest history) to help determine if reasonable care was used. This is normally achieved by consulting mainframe applications or consulting a taxpayer's past records.

Evaluating a taxpayer's compliance history is particularly relevant in a situation where a taxpayer claims that he or she was not aware of, or informed of, an obligation such as the requirement to make an instalment payment or remittance, but has been assessed late instalment or remittance penalties in the recent past. If the same types of penalty or interest charges are assessed from year to year, this may indicate that a taxpayer is not exercising reasonable care in meeting his or her obligations. How far back we should assess a taxpayer's compliance history depends on the circumstances of each case.

It should be emphasized that a taxpayer's compliance history should not be the sole basis on which a decision is based. It is only one of the factors to consider. The purpose or intent of weighing the compliance history when deliberating on a relief request is to determine the credibility of the taxpayer's description of events and facts.

Assessing a taxpayer's past compliance would be less relevant if circumstances were out of the taxpayer's control and the non-compliance was reasonably remedied.

The fact that a taxpayer has a poor compliance record would not lead to refusing the taxpayer's request if the circumstances of the case show no evidence of negligence. For example, penalties and interest could be cancelled or waived if an electronic transaction or filing was overdue because of the failure of the CRA's systems, even if a taxpayer has a poor compliance history.

7.16 Completing a fact sheet

Taxpayer relief fact sheets are mandatory. For detailed information on what they should include and other essential elements, refer to 6.6 Fact sheet. See also 4.2 Fact sheet, in the Taxpayer Relief Registry guide.

8. Inability to pay or financial hardship

This chapter provides guidelines and procedures for processing taxpayer relief requests based on an inability to pay and financial hardship. These guidelines and procedures should be used in conjunction with Chapter 6 General policies and procedures

Note: On April 1, 2011, the responsibility for taxpayer relief requests based on inability to pay or financial hardship was transferred from Accounts Receivable Directorate (ARD) of the Taxpayer Services and Debt Management Branch to the Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) of the Appeals Branch. See exceptions in Appendix 5A for some non-residents accounts. This chapter contains updated information on the respective roles and responsibilities of TRSCD and ARD. See Appendix 8A for more information.

Staff in the taxpayer relief intake centres (IC) and centres of expertise (CoE) will be responsible for the processing of correspondence from taxpayers requesting relief due to an inability to pay or financial hardship.

It may be appropriate, in circumstances where there is a confirmed inability to pay all amounts owing, to consider waiving or cancelling interest in whole or in part to enable taxpayers to pay their account. For example:

(a) when collection has been suspended due to an inability to pay and substantial interest has accumulated or will accumulate;

(b) when a taxpayer's demonstrated ability to pay requires an extended payment arrangement, consideration may be given to waiving all or part of the interest for the period from when payments start until the amounts owing are paid, as long as the agreed payments are made on time and compliance with the Act is maintained; or

(c) when payment of the accumulated interest would cause a prolonged inability to provide basic necessities (financial hardship) such as food, medical help, transportation, or shelter, consideration may be given to cancelling all or part of the total accumulated interest.

Digitized by Google

The taxpayer relief officer is not responsible for negotiating a payment arrangement but to determine if the taxpayer is eligible for relief of the penalties and/or interest charges due to an inability to pay or financial hardship. Accounts Receivable retains responsibility for all actions taken to collect the taxpayer's debt, both during and after the taxpayer relief review process. Collection Action should continue, when a valid taxpayer relief request has been received. Accounts Receivable will limit new enforcement action on principal amounts only while a taxpayer relief decision is pending. Both parties will promptly inform each other of any change in a taxpayer's financial circumstances while a taxpayer relief decision is pending.

Intake centres officers will scan work-ready files into electronic folders to be assigned to taxpayer relief officers at the CoEs. Any documentation received after a review has begun must also be scanned and added to the electronic file after the final decision has been made to ensure the file is complete. See Taxpayer Relief Scanning Procedures for more information.

To assist you in drafting letters to taxpayers, see the Taxpayer Relief Correspondence Binder. According to the situation, you will find a variety of verses to help you in writing letters.

8.1 Definition of financial hardship

For an individual taxpayer, financial hardship refers to financial suffering or lack of what is needed for basic living requirements such as food, clothing, shelter and reasonable nonessentials. For a business taxpayer, it refers to situations where the continuity of business operations and the continued employment of a firm's employees are jeopardized.

8.1.1 Application to inability to pay/financial hardship situations

Every case must be considered on its own merit; however, it is appropriate to consider the cancellation of interest and penalty charges based on the taxpayer's ability to pay. If there is some confusion after reviewing the documents provided by the taxpayer, a phone call or letter may be appropriate to obtain clarification. Along with the information provided by the taxpayer, review the information that might already be stored in CRA systems: For example ACSES, Rapid, SUDS, ELCS, SA, etc.

When considering a request for the cancellation of penalties and/or interest charges, it is essential that the Ability to Pay guidelines outlined in the "Payment Arrangements" chapter of the Collections Manual be followed, specifically follow the guidelines that relate to determining and confirming the ability to pay. In this regard, when considering a taxpayer relief request, conduct a full and comprehensive review of the taxpayer's current and foreseeable financial situation. This includes a review of all assets and liabilities, as well as current and projected cash inflows and outflows from all sources. In addition, it would be appropriate to consider spousal income, expenses, assets and liabilities when determining the ability to pay.

Taxpayers that are capable of acquiring sufficient funds to pay their arrears are expected to do so and would not be candidates for the waiver or cancellation of penalties and/or interest charges, based on an inability to pay.

Similarly, when the inability to pay is attributable to factors within the taxpayer's control, such as maintaining an opulent lifestyle without sufficient means, preferring other creditors to the detriment of the Agency, or unreasonable discretionary spending not required to maintain a family or a business, requests to cancel or waive penalties and or interest should not be granted. Lavish lifestyle choices do not support an inability to pay.

When considering a taxpayer's ability to pay, it is important that anticipated credits from prior, current and future year returns be taken into consideration; therefore, all outstanding returns should be filed. Note that the forgiveness of interest should not be considered where the interest relief sought can be accomplished through assessing or reassessing action, such as through the application of loss carry backs.

Other examples are claiming unused RRSP contributions and the Disability Tax Credit (if applicable).

Revenue Collections/Debt Management will share supporting documentation regarding a taxpayer's financial circumstances that are not readily available in the CRA systems. Where the information is contradictory and/or unclear, contact the taxpayer or representative for clarification.

Digitized by Google

8.1.1.1 Temporary inability to pay

A temporary inability to pay is when a taxpayer has experienced circumstances beyond their control, such as the unexpected loss of income or employment and the taxpayer is experiencing financial hardship.

This type of situation would typically involve cases where collection action has been or will be suspended or deferred due to a legitimate but temporary inability to pay. Consideration could be given to waiving interest charges, for the period during which temporary financial hardship is experienced. Once the taxpayer's financial situation improves, the cancellation of interest would cease and a payment arrangement to clear the balance owing could be concluded at that time with Revenue Collections/Debt Management.

8.1.1.2 Marginal ability to pay

A marginal ability to pay is when the charging of penalties and/or interest in the context of a long-term payment arrangement would make it difficult for the taxpayer to resolve his/her account over time without creating financial hardship.

8.1.1.3 Permanent inability to pay

There may also be isolated instances where consideration could be given to the cancellation or waiver of penalties and or interest charges where the inability to pay is of a permanent nature. An example would be that the account has been identified as or made uncollectible and there would be a material consequence to not granting relief. See 8.7 Potential write-off process for more information.

8.2 Determining the financial situation of an individual

To determine an individual's ability to pay or borrow, the following must be identified:

- family household income and expenses;
- household assets and liabilities.

8.2.1 Identifying family income

When screening and acknowledging a relief request for financial hardship or inability to pay, the intake centre (IC) will ask for supporting documentation. Along with the acknowledgement letter, the IC will attach the Income and Expense/Assets Liabilities (IEAL) document to be completed, if not already provided by the taxpayer. See Appendix 5F Income and Expenses/Assets and Liabilities (IEAL).

To identify a taxpayer's available disposable family income:

1. Have the taxpayer complete the Income and Expense/Assets and Liability (IEAL) statement;

2. Obtain details of all income sources and amounts, including:
   - employment income (e.g. salary, wages, commissions, self-employed earnings),
   - investment income (e.g. annuities, dividends, interest income);
   - other income (e.g. rental income, pension income, Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB), spousal income);
   - when a taxpayer is self-employed, (sole proprietorship or partnership);
   - when a taxpayer owns a corporation, assessing his company's ability to pay dividends or salary may be required.

3. Obtain details and amounts of essential expenses, including:
   - employment expense (e.g. withholding taxes, union or association due, registered pension plan deductions),
   - household expenses (e.g. accommodation, food, clothing, utilities);
   - other expenses (e.g. transportation, insurance, health insurance, property taxes, loan payments, alimony/child support).

Digitized by Google

In general, a taxpayer is expected to make full disclosure of their financial circumstances when requesting relief based on financial hardship. However, in some circumstances, if specific details are not available, there may be a need to estimate expenses by consulting the Canadian Expenditure Averages. Refer to Estimating Expenses Using the Canadian Expenditure Averages, from the Collections Manual Guide and Guide to Income and Expenditure Accounts, from the Statistics Canada website.

4. Obtain details and amounts used for discretionary expenses, including:

    - recreation,
    - registered retirement savings plan (RRSP) contributions;
    - pension contributions that are not mandatory;
    - loan/credit card payments;
    - savings plan contributions;
    - vacation fund;
    - donations,
    - tuition fees.

Note 1: Although the reason for the initial loan may not have been essential, if the loan has already been negotiated, the payment is an essential expense. The reason for the loan and the date it was negotiated should be taken into account to determine if the taxpayer made discretionary financial arrangements while he had a tax debt, i.e. preference to finance or refinance for purposes other than paying outstanding tax debts.

Note 2: Credit card repayment is allowed but only at the minimum monthly level of repayment.

5. Determine the reasonableness and necessity of expenses claimed using discretion and good judgement. Allowances may be made for expenses and costs, which are reasonable in light of the taxpayer's circumstances. Items that are not considered essential are not given priority over the payment of a tax debt.

6. Determine if there is an income deficit or surplus by subtracting the expenses from income. It should be very clear in the analysis, and in the decision letter to the taxpayer, which expenses were disallowed or adjusted and why.

7. Calculate the available disposable income by subtracting the essential expenses from the income. Income amounts in excess of essential expenses represent the amount available to pay the tax debt or external borrowing. This will determine if the taxpayer is in fact experiencing an inability to pay and therefore whether he is eligible for relief of the interest charges.

8.2.2 Identifying a household's net worth

The taxpayer's ability to borrow or liquidate assets should also be considered. To determine this possibility, the review of a net worth statement will be required. When identifying a family's financial situation, perform a credit bureau search.

Information on the credit bureau search plus information and/or documentation provided by the taxpayer could be sufficient to analyze the family's financial situation.

In exceptional circumstances, if a Property Search is warranted, you should contact the Collections Officer to validate the need.

To identify a family's financial situation:

1. The taxpayer should complete the Income and Expense/Assets and Liability (IEAL) statement. The taxpayer relief officer will:
    - obtain details of the assets, including:
        a. amount or current estimated market value;
        b. descriptions of the assets;
        c. estate, motor vehicles, Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP), other receivables, valuable collectibles types of assets (e.g. cash, term deposits, stocks, real)
    - obtain details of the liabilities, including:
        a. amount of liabilities;
        b. descriptions and terms of encumbrances

Digitized by Google

2. Determine the equity by subtracting the liabilities from the value of the assets.

In addition to reviewing the household assets and liabilities, it will be necessary to consider the business activities of the taxpayer if they are operating a sole proprietorship or partnership. Business and personal expenses may overlap. It may be necessary to request a copy of the Statement of Business Activities to determine reasonable expenses and review the assets and liabilities of the Business.

8.2.3 Conclusion

Income amounts in excess of essential expenses and equity represent the amount available for the tax debt and/or external borrowing. This will determine if the taxpayer is in fact experiencing an inability to pay and whether he is a candidate for relief of the penalties and or interest charges.

Reminder: financial hardship must be considered along with the four factors indicated in IC07-1, paragraph 33.

Note: The criteria for the "Individual" also apply for the "Sole Proprietorship" and the "Partnership" financial situation.

8.3 Determining a corporation's financial situation

The primary difference when dealing with a corporation as opposed to an individual is that expenses or assets for necessities of life are not involved. Therefore, all income, expenses and assets are subject to scrutiny. Nevertheless, it is important to use a reasonable approach and good judgment when obtaining the necessary information in determining a corporation's ability to pay

To determine a corporation's ability to pay, or eligibility for relief, the taxpayer relief officer will identify:

- Corporate earnings,
- Corporate equity

8.3.1 Identifying corporate earnings

In order to identify corporate earnings and estimate cash flow when screening a relief request for financial hardship or inability to pay, the IC will ask for the following supporting documentation:

1. A statement of earnings from the corporation. If this information is not made available by the corporation, review the available financial information obtained from previous tax returns.

2. Details and amounts of income, including:
    - dividends;
    - gross sales;
    - interest;
    - rental income;
    - other income

3. Details and amounts of expenses, including:
    - cost of goods sold;
    - interest expense,
    - operating expenses;
    - other expenses.

The corporate earnings are calculated by subtracting the expenses from the income. The excess amount will be taken into consideration in the analysis to verify if the corporation is a candidate for relief of the penalties and/or interest charges.

8.3.2 Identifying corporate equity

When identifying corporate equity, perform the credit bureau search. The information found following the credit bureau search plus the information/documentation provided by the taxpayer should be sufficient to analyze the corporate equity. In the event that Property Searches might be warranted, you should contact the Collections Officer to validate the need.

To identify corporate equity:

1. Obtain a corporate balance sheet (if not already in the file) from the corporation;

2. Analyze details of the assets, including
   - amount or current estimated market value,
   - description and location of assets;
   - list of accounts receivable;
   - type of asset (e.g. cash, term deposits, stocks, real estate, motor vehicles, other receivable, inventory, investment in other entities, real property).

3. Analyze details of encumbrances, including
   - amount of liabilities (e.g. bank loans, line of credit, mortgages, leases);
   - terms of the contract,
   - shareholder loans and interrelated third party loans

4. Determine the equity by subtracting the encumbrances from the asset's value. The excess amount reflects the equity leverage available to the corporation's considered in the analysis to determine the corporation's ability to pay.

Other information to consider.

5. Dividends paid to shareholders;

6. Capital Cost Allowance (CCA) - This can provide valuable information regarding the ability of the business to purchase new equipment, machinery, vehicles, etc. CCA schedules also show the disposition of property and the funds received for that disposition.

7. Notes to the financial statements provide valuable information.

8.3.3 Conclusion

In the case of an employer remittance account, an analysis of ability to pay must take into consideration the taxpayer's capacity to pay the current remittances, arrears and other obligations necessary to continue operations, such as trade creditors.

Review the balance sheet to determine:

- whether the asset position could facilitate obtaining sufficient funds to pay the debt by borrowing from a financial institution;

- whether assets are available for liquidation without creating additional tax liabilities.

Corporate and business analysis is not simple. Answering the following questions will help to substantiate a decision:

1. Has the corporation incurred expenses to the detriment of its statutory obligations, such as travel expenses, advertising, bad debts, increases in wages and bonuses, capital expenditures?
2. Have dividends been paid out to shareholders, have the dividends resulted in a net loss?
3. Have other liabilities been paid?
4. Has the corporation made loans to other parties?

Reminder: financial hardship must be considered along with the four factors.

8.4 Penalty relief

Consideration would not generally be given to cancelling a penalty based on an inability to pay or financial hardship unless an extraordinary circumstance has prevented compliance. However, there may be exceptional situations that may give rise to cancelling penalties, in whole or in part.

For example, when a business is experiencing extreme financial difficulty, and enforcement of such penalties would jeopardize the continuity of its operations, the jobs of the employees, and the welfare of the community as a whole, consideration may be given to providing relief of the penalties.

8.5 Considerations for reviewing financial hardship

Financial hardship (FH) is considered when a taxpayer has made bona fide efforts to discharge arrears/balance over time but the interest/penalty charges absorb a significant portion of each payment; the interest/penalty arrears balance is so onerous in relation to the amount of payment that the taxpayer has the confirmed ability to pay, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the taxpayer to ever resolve their account.

8.5.1 Decision scenarios

Taxpayer relief officers are responsible for preparing a recommendation to grant full or partial relief or to deny relief all together while Revenue Collections/Debt Management is responsible for negotiating payment arrangements and collecting the account. When a decision is issued but a payment arrangement is not in place, inform Revenue Collections through the ACSES diary of the decision and Revenue Collections will negotiate a payment arrangement with the taxpayer. If a taxpayer makes a subsequent relief request, for the same situation, part of the analysis will consider if the taxpayer has taken all the necessary steps to address and resolve his situation, including negotiating a payment arrangement as directed in the previous relief request.

FH decision scenarios:

1. Decision: full or partial relief

- grant arrears interest to date of decision letter and/or other specific period based on financial circumstances;
- grant or deny penalty based on other circumstances that prevented compliance,
- arrange to have financial transaction(s) processed;
- for partial relief, include offer of second (2nd) review in decision letter.

If a balance remains:

- refer the taxpayer to Accounts Receivable to negotiate a payment arrangement;
- invite the taxpayer to reapply after a year if their circumstances have not changed.

A. Decision: denial of interest based on FH (with or without penalty relief for other circumstances).

- include offer of second (2nd) review in decision letter.

If a balance remains:

- refer the taxpayer to Accounts Receivable to negotiate a payment arrangement

Decisions will be based on a review of the four factors. Generally, when relief in part or full is granted, it is up to the date of the letter (for whichever period or years we decide is appropriate). The financial transaction will be sent for processing when the decision letter is issued. The decision letter will invite the taxpayer to apply for further relief if, after a year, their circumstances have not improved and they believe that they would continue to qualify for relief. This will reduce the need for follow-up actions. If after a year the taxpayer applies for further relief, the relief officer will examine what has transpired since the last decision. If the taxpayer's circumstances have changed, if they've made payments (for reasons of ability to pay), filed returns, etc.

8.6 Additional submission requirements – unfiled returns

Generally, all outstanding returns must be filed up-to-date, including those outstanding returns and remittances for related accounts, either prior to or as part of the taxpayer relief request.
When considering a relief request under financial hardship or inability to pay, the taxpayer should be up to date on all filing requirements. This will ensure the request for relief includes all the taxpayer's debts and that any available credits have been applied to the outstanding debts (full picture).

Exceptions:

1. The taxpayer was not required to file a particular tax year.

2. An arbitrary assessment was raised and there would be no benefit to filing an actual return. It is important to determine if filing the return would benefit the taxpayer in receiving credits that would reduce the debt.

You have to review all requests case by case. Exceptions do apply such as the example of Muriel Maaraman FC.

Here is a case where a return was not filed by the taxpayer but her request for relief was a valid request. The taxpayer, Muriel Maaraman, applied for relief on a tax year (1987) where CRA had raised an arbitrary assessment. She did not file an actual return. Losses from the 1988 tax year eliminated the tax owing on the 1987 tax year.

- The Judge could not conclude that Muriel Maaraman was aware of her tax liabilities and her requirement to file a return. She had never filed a return prior to 1990.
- CRA delay – 5 years from the time the request was made until a decision was made.
- Applicant alleges she never received a notice of assessment. Although CRA assured the court a NOA was sent, CRA no longer had a copy, therefore judge did not see it and it would be difficult at this point for the applicant to challenge a non-existent NOA.
- Judge believed the taxpayer was a victim of circumstances.
- Case sent back to CRA for a new decision based on these reasons.

When a request is denied due to unfiled returns, treat the request as an "incomplete" request. See 5.8.1 Incomplete request.

8.7 Write off

8.7.1 Potential write off process

While reviewing and analyzing the supporting documentation, taxpayer relief officers may identify a taxpayer who may be indigent and/or permanently unable to pay their debt.

When identifying a taxpayer who may have a permanent inability to pay, the taxpayer relief officer will deal with the relief request as any other relief request considering all factors including compliance history. Proceed with the analysis and recommendation to grant or deny relief. Following the issuance of the decision letter, the taxpayer relief officer will record the relief decision in the ACSES diary and indicate the type of hardship:

- Temporary
- Marginal
- Permanent

Revenue Collections/Debt Management will examine the situation and determine if the account should be made uncollectible.

8.7.2 Accounts already written off – recoverable write offs or accounts with Keep Code 4

Review the taxpayer's ability to resolve the entire debt. If the taxpayer is applying for relief on subsequent years and has incurred additional debt, the written off amounts should be included in the review.

8.8 Requests regarding amounts in dispute

Requests received for penalties and or interest relief based on an inability to pay, with respect to amounts and taxation years that are under objection or appeal should, in most cases, be held in abeyance pending the outcome of the appeal process. The taxpayer should be advised that we will consider the request with respect to the amount or tax year in dispute once a final determination of the amounts owing has been made, following the disposal of the objection or appeal by the Appeals Division or the Adjudications Division.

8.9 Financial adjustments

When a request for relief of penalty/interest has been approved in full or in part, the adjustments to the account are made through the applicable host system. How these host systems are informed varies with the system and the account to be adjusted. For example, requests for interest adjustments to a T1 account are processed through the Electronic Revenue Accounting (ERA) system, while interest adjustments to a GST account are done through Standardized Accounting (SA).

When financial transactions are being processed by the various host systems, the system will validate whether or not the registry entry is closed. If the entry has not been closed, a message, indicating that the registry entry is still open, is displayed. However, this will not occur with PAYDAC.

For more information, see 8.9.1 Post-decision financial transactions.

8.10 Application to directors' liability assessments (joint reviews with Revenue Collections/Debt Management)

The taxpayer relief provisions may also be applied to directors' liability assessments raised under section 227.1 and subsection 323(1) of the Income Tax Act (ITA) and Excise Tax Act (ETA) respectively.

Directors' liability assessment renders a director of a corporation jointly and severally liable together with the corporation to pay non-remitted source deductions, including any related interest or penalties. Directors' liability assessments are referred to as memorandum assessments because they are not posted anywhere and simply reflect the joint and several liabilities established. Accordingly, the component parts of an amount assessed against a director are the same as those for the corporation in respect of tax, penalties and interest.

A person assessed under the directors' liability provisions of the legislation we administer may qualify as an individual for post memo assessment interest only. The guidelines for considering a taxpayer relief request from a director based on financial hardship would be essentially the same as those for any other individual.

Where more than one director has been assessed pursuant to the directors' liability provisions of any of the legislation we administer, with respect to the same corporate indebtedness, each of these assessments stands independently. If circumstances apply, a director under the taxpayer relief provisions may have interest cancelled without affecting other memo assessments raised on the account.

Subsections 227.1(7) and 323(8) of the ITA and ETA respectively, provide that a director who has satisfied a claim under s. 227.1 or s. 323(1) is entitled to contribution from the other directors who were liable for the claim. In view of this, if we were to grant relief to one director under the condition of a payment arrangement, his/her right to contribution from the others could not exceed the amount he/she paid. Collections retain the ability to collect to the full amount of the corporate debt from the other directors. Note that their respective memo assessments often differ in amount based on the period(s) where they were actively involved with the corporation as a director.

For these types of relief, please consult with the Revenue Collections Officer on the best approach to be taken

8.11 Non-arm's length transfers (for information purpose only as it is ARD's responsibility)

Given the nature of such assessments, bona fide requests to waive or cancel interest with respect to the transferee's assessment should be rare.

Algoa Trust V Her Majesty the Queen
http://decision.tcc-cci.gc.ca/en/1998/1998tcc961186/1998tcc961186.html

In order for a taxpayer assessed under a S160, to be liable for any accrued interest, a new assessment must be made. It is important to recognize a potential S160 because if a taxpayer has engaged in this type of activity they are not likely a candidate for relief.

You may come across situations where assets (home, boat, motor vehicle, etc.) that could have been used to satisfy the tax liability have been transferred to a spouse in exchange for a token amount.

These transactions are common when people attempt to protect property from creditors, including the Crown. Some tax debtors believe that, once transferred to another person, their property can no longer be seized for payment of their tax debts.
There are legislative provisions to help resolve such situations. The purpose of sections 160 of the Income Tax Act, 325 of the Excise Tax Act, and 97.29 of the Customs Act is to prevent a taxpayer from avoiding his tax liability by simply transferring his assets.

The criteria for recognizing non-arm's length and arm's length transactions are as follows:

Non-arm's length

The parties:

- have mutual economic interests; and
- are related to each other.

Consideration is usually "given" or "paid" at less then the fair market value

Arm's length

The parties bargain:

- in good faith;
- in an objective manner; and
- completely independent of each other.

Consideration is usually fair market value or its equivalent.

If you think that the taxpayer or the corporation has engaged in non-arm's length transaction, consult with Accounts Receivable to determine if further investigation is warranted.

Examples:

1. While reviewing the financial statements for the last three years, you find that there was more than a million dollars in assets in the first year, approximately $500,000 in the second year and less than $100,000 in the third year without justification.

2. While examining a list of a taxpayer's property, you note that the house that was previously on the list is no longer there, indicating that there may have been a transfer.

8.12 Remission – Relief of tax (for information only)

A remission order is a very rare and extraordinary measure that allows the government to provide full or partial relief from a tax or penalty, or other debt, under certain circumstances, when such relief is not otherwise available under the existing laws. It is done through an act of parliament and is a lengthy process.

For information about Remission, refer to the CRA Remission Guide published by the Legislative Policy Directorate.

8.13 Insolvency and taxpayer relief requests

Taxpayer relief requests may be received from taxpayers that have undertaken a formal insolvency proceeding. It is important to note that CRA cannot refuse to consider a relief request based on the fact that the taxpayer has or may benefit from the provisions contained in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA), Farm Debt Mediation Act (FDMA) or Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (CCAA). Systematically dismissing requests from taxpayers who have gone bankrupt, filed a proposal under the BIA, were placed in receivership or sought protection under the CCAA or FDMA is contrary to the Minister's legal obligation to exercise discretion.

If a relief request is received and prior to a decision being issued the taxpayer files for bankruptcy protection under the BIA, CCAA or FDMA, it may be appropriate to contact the taxpayer/trustee/receiver to determine if they still wish to proceed with the relief request

A relief request may not indicate that the taxpayer is insolvent. If the account currently has an insolvency status, the insolvency flag will be displayed on the first page of ACSES. More detailed information on current or past insolvency events can be viewed in RAPID at the following screens.

For T1 accounts select Option E in RAPID (Individual Identification Screen).

- An insolvency indicator will appear on the first page of Option E if insolvency information exists. Key an 'x' next to insolvency to get details.

For corporations insolvency information can be found in the BN system (RAPID Option FF).

- Select Client Registration Menu, Client and Program Account Menu, Retrieve Event.

Insolvency is defined as a financial state in which a person or corporation can no longer pay their bills and other obligations on time. It can also be defined as a person or corporation whose debts are greater than the value of their assets.

The terms insolvency and bankruptcy are commonly confused. Both insolvency and bankruptcy deal with liabilities exceeding assets, but...

- insolvency is a financial state; and
- bankruptcy is a legal standing.

A person can be insolvent but not legally bankrupt. Insolvency can lead to bankruptcy, but the condition may also be temporary and fixable without having to undertake a formal insolvency proceeding.
Insolvency may result in one or more of the following:

Proposal

A proposal is a contract between an insolvent taxpayer and his creditors. It can be a Division I (commercial) proposal or a Division II (consumer) proposal. The former would apply to corporations or individuals, whose debts, less amounts secured by their principal residence, exceed the sum of $250,000.00. The latter would apply to individuals only, if their total debts, less amounts secured by their principal residence, do not exceed the sum of $250,000.00.

The primary goal of a proposal is to allow the debtor an opportunity to offer a settlement to their creditors in an attempt to avoid filing an Assignment in Bankruptcy. If a proposal can be filed, the debtor normally retains most if not all of their assets.

Digitized by Google

Receivership

A receivership arises when a secured creditor enforces his security interest. Such would occur when the insolvent person is unable to meet their financial obligations as they become due or have stopped meeting current financial obligations as they are due, or not have enough value in their assets to satisfy their debts, if they were sold.

Bankruptcy

A bankruptcy arises when an insolvent person has made an assignment or when the court issues a bankruptcy order against him. The former is voluntary, while the latter is involuntary.

The goal of all bankrupt individuals is to receive their discharge from bankruptcy. Once a discharge is granted to an individual, they are no longer liable for a majority of the debts they owed as at the date of bankruptcy.

Generally, corporations that become bankrupt never receive a discharge. When a corporation becomes bankrupt, it is usually the death of the company and operations cease permanently. The CRA cannot refuse to consider a request for Taxpayer Relief based on the fact that the taxpayer has benefited from the provisions contained in the BIA, CCAA or FDMA.

In order to avoid the taxpayer receiving double relief, first by virtue of the ITA and second by virtue of the BIA, CCAA or FDMA, we will examine all relevant information including the four factors:

- whether or not the taxpayer has a history of compliance with tax obligations;
- whether or not the taxpayer has knowingly allowed a balance to remain unpaid on which interest has accrued;
- whether or not the taxpayer has exercised a reasonable amount of care and has not been negligent or careless in conducting their affairs under the self assessment system;
- whether or not the taxpayer has acted quickly to correct any delay or omission.

It is important to base decisions on the facts and take into consideration the arguments the taxpayer presented during the analysis

Generally, all years/periods prior to the insolvency event date are automatically covered by the insolvency event. Sometimes, the year of the proposal (T1 account) can also be included partially in the insolvency event. It should be noted that the taxpayer is not relieved of his debt under the BIA until he is discharged. He must honor certain obligations and conditions before he is discharged. Sometimes the trustee is discharged but the taxpayer is not. In that case, the debt becomes fully collectible again.

Things to note when reviewing a taxpayer relief request pertaining to an account that is in insolvency status include but are not limited to the following:

- the date of the insolvency event;
- has the trustee been discharged;
- has the taxpayer been discharged;
- does the request pertain to the same time period as the bankruptcy;
- was the request received prior to the taxpayer filing for bankruptcy;
- has the taxpayer complied with the conditions of the bankruptcy/proposal;
- it should not be assumed that the taxpayer relief request is based on financial hardship; there may be other reasons that require full consideration.

BIA

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act is the primary insolvency statute in Canada as it governs both bankruptcies and proposals.

Digitized by Google

CCAA

The Companies Creditors Arrangement Act provides corporations an opportunity to file a restructuring plan that is very similar to a proposal under the BIA.

The main differences between filing under the CCAA and a proposal are:

- only corporations may file a CCAA whereas both individuals and corporations can file a proposal under the BIA;
- only corporations with more than $5 million in liabilities are permitted to utilize the CCAA;
- the CCAA is more flexible than the BIA.

FDMA

The Farm Debt Mediation Act provides insolvent farmers and their creditors with mediation services to help them arrive at a mutually satisfactory arrangement for addressing the liabilities of a farmer.

9. Refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period

This section gives guidelines for considering taxpayer relief requests for refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period for individuals and testamentary trusts. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with General policies and procedures.

The Individual Returns Directorate of the Assessment and Benefit Services Branch has developed additional guidelines, which can be found in Functional Guidelines.

The CRA may issue a refund beyond the normal three-year period or reduce an amount owing if it is satisfied that such refund or reduction would have been made if a return or request had been filed or made on time, and as long as the assessment or reassessment is correct in law and has not been previously allowed. This only applies to individuals and testamentary trusts.

The request must be made within the 10-year time limit.

See also Chapter 2 Legislation and 5.7.2 Validating the taxpayer relief request for more information.

9.1 Refunds or reducing tax payable for a statute barred return

An individual or testamentary trust may ask the CRA for a refund or a reduction of tax payable for an income tax return that is beyond the normal three-year period. This may include:

a. a request for a refund of taxes for an income tax return not previously filed;

b. a request for a refund of taxes or a reduction of tax payable due to a deduction/non-refundable tax credit not previously claimed;

c. a request for a refund of taxes or a reduction of tax payable due to a decrease in taxable income; or

d. a request for a refund of taxes due to a refundable credit not previously claimed.

In any situation that a taxpayer or testamentary trust requests a refund beyond the normal three-year period, there may be a recalculation of certain refundable tax credits such as:

A. refundable Quebec abatement for income earned in Quebec by an individual resident of Quebec under subsection 120(2);

B. refundable First Nations abatement for individuals who are subject to income tax legislation of certain First Nations under subsection 120(2.2);

Digitized by Google

C. goods and services tax/harmonized sales tax (GST/HST) credit available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.5(3);

D. refundable medical expense supplement available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.51(2);

E. refundable investment tax credit available to taxpayers under subsection 127.1(1);

F the tax credit that a beneficiary of a mining reclamation trust can claim under subsection 127.41(3);

G. the tax credit that certain beneficiaries can claim under subsection 210.2(3) for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust;

H. the tax credit a Canadian partnership flows through to its partners for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust under subsection 210.2(4); and

I. Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) payments available to eligible individuals for qualified dependents under subsection 122.61(1).

Whenever a request for a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the three-year period is accepted, paragraph 152(4.2)(b) allows for a redetermination of the above refundable credits.

9.2 Accepting a refund or adjustment request

The taxpayer relief provisions allow the CRA to issue a refund or reduce the amount of tax owed if it is satisfied that such a refund or reduction would have been made if the return or request had been filed or made on time.

Individuals and testamentary trusts can make a request if they were unaware of, or missed, claiming a deduction or a non-refundable tax credit that was available for the year. Individuals can also ask for refunds or reduction of amounts owing for refundable tax credits such as provincial tax credits or an overpayment of taxes.

The request may result in a calculation or recalculation of credits such as the Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) and/or the Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC).

There do not need to be circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control to allow these types of requests. The taxpayer needs to provide supporting documentation and the claim must be correct under law and not previously allowed.

Generally, CRA will not accept a request for an adjustment to a statute barred tax year of an individual where the adjustment would result in the increase of taxes, interest, or penalties to the returns of other individuals that are statute-barred and cannot be reassessed by the CRA.

Example 1

A taxpayer files a 2000 T1 income tax return on April 1, 2008. The taxpayer is requesting a refund of a portion of tax paid throughout the year. The return was filed more than three years from the end of the tax year but the request was made within the 10-year time limitation.

The request is accepted and the income tax return is processed. Paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the Income Tax Act (ITA) allows us to refund the overpayment of tax.

Example 2

A taxpayer requests an adjustment to allow a deduction not previously claimed. The taxpayer has submitted an acceptable receipt to support the claim. The return was filed on time but the request was made outside the normal three-year reassessment period. The request was made within the 10-year time limitation. The adjustment will result in a refund of taxes and an increase in the amount of Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC) the individual is entitled to.

The request is accepted and the reassessment processed. Paragraph 152(4.2)(a) of the ITA allows us to reassess the return, paragraph 152(4.2)(b) of the ITA allows for the recalculation of the GSTC and paragraph 164(1.5)(b) us to refund the overpayment of tax.

9.3 Limitations and restrictions

This section provides information on limitations and restrictions regarding taxpayer's request for refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period.

9.3.1 Provincial benefits or credits

Time limitations to claim provincial benefits or credits that are administered by CRA for the provinces are stipulated in the applicable provincial act. Subsection 152(4.2) and paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the ITA do not override provincial limitations, unless provincial law allows for it.

9.3.2 Permissive deductions

CRA will not process a reassessment if the requested credit is the result of an increased claim for capital cost allowance or other allowable deductions, where the taxpayer originally claimed less than the maximum amount allowable.

See IC84-1, Revision of Capital Cost Allowance Claims and Other Permissive Deductions for more information.

9.3.3 Employment Insurance Premiums and Canada Pension Plan

Taxpayer relief provisions to allow a refund beyond the normal three-year period do not affect refunds for overpayments of Employment Insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan contributions.

The time limit for refunds is three years under the Employment Insurance Act and four years under the Canada Pension Plan.

Note: A legislative change to the Canada Pension Plan allows that individuals who are entitled to CPP disability benefits for prior years has 10 years from the end of the year to apply for a refund of excess CPP contributions. The legislation applies to disability pension decisions made on or after September 1, 2010.

9.3.4 Requests based on court decisions or other resolutions

Taxpayer relief requests to reassess a statute barred return will not be allowed if the request is based on another's successful appeal, negotiated settlement or consent to judgment on an appeal if the taxpayer has chosen not to protect their right of objection or appeal.

See IC75-7R3, Reassessment of a Return of Income for more information.

9.4 Requests must be complete

A taxpayer's request for a refund or a reduction of amounts owing should include:

- the taxpayer's name, address, and social insurance number, trust account number or other account number provided by CRA
- the tax year(s) involved;
- all supporting documents; and
- an explanation of the adjustment the taxpayer wants.

To support a request, taxpayers should give the following information:

- official receipts or certified "true" copies of receipts or documents (e.g., for tuition, RRSP contributions, charitable donations, and share certificates);
- copies of information slips (e.g., T3, T4, T5);
- details or calculations of specific expenses or deductions being claimed, such as previous and revised business or rental loss statements or investment income schedules; and
- proof of payment such as cancelled cheques for rental payments or notary contracts.

9.4.1 Requesting additional information

Taxpayers should be encouraged to make their requests as complete as possible. This allows CRA employees to exercise discretion and avoid processing delays. A proper review cannot be conducted if we do not have access to all relevant information.

Employees are encouraged to promote the requirement that taxpayer relief requests be complete when providing guidance or information to taxpayers on the taxpayer relief request process.

See 5.5 Supporting requests for more information.

9.5 Fact sheet

Taxpayer relief fact sheets are mandatory. For refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three year period, there is no need to be circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control to allow these requests. The taxpayer needs to provide receipts, slips, etc., and the claim must be correct under law and not been previously allowed.

For detailed information on what they should include and other essential elements, refer to 6.8 Fact sheet. See also 4.2 Fact sheet, in the Taxpayer Relief Registry guide.

10. Accepting late, amended, or revoked elections

This section gives guidelines for taxpayer relief requests to accept late, amended, or revoked elections. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with Chapter 6 General policies and procedures.

The CRA may extend the filing due date for making certain elections or grant permission to amend or revoke certain election. A late, amended, or revoked election must be correct in law based on the relevant legislation in place for the applicable tax year to which the election applies.

The request must be made within the 10-year time limit

See also Chapter 2 Legislation and 5.7.2 Validating the taxpayer relief request for more information

10.1 Elections covered by the taxpayer relief provisions

The elections for which a request can be made under the taxpayer relief provisions are found in section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations. See Chapter 12 Additional information for a complete list of these elections along with a brief description.

If the request to accept a late, amended or revoked election has been accepted, CRA will consider the late or amended election to have been made at the time it was required. Earlier elections will be cancelled for amended and revoked elections. CRA will reassess the affected returns for the tax years in question even if the years are beyond the taxpayer's normal reassessment period (i.e. statute-barred years).

10.2 Penalty for late filed, amended or revoked elections

Taxpayers that are allowed to late-file, amend, or revoke elections are liable, under subsection 220(3.5) of the Income Tax Act, to a penalty of $100 for each complete month from the due date of the election to the date the taxpayer made a complete application to CRA, to a maximum of $8,000.

The application date is when the taxpayer provided CRA with complete and accurate information for the election under review.

Taxpayers should remit the penalty amount with their request. It is CRA policy not to accept late, amended, or revoked elections, or to process the necessary adjustments unless the penalty is paid. The CRA will determine and assess any unpaid balance of the penalty. Interest will be charged on the unpaid balance of the penalty from the date of the notice of assessment to the date of payment.

This penalty is also subject to the taxpayer relief provisions. If the circumstances that allow for accepting a late-filed, amended, or revoked election are the same as the circumstances we would accept for cancelling or waiving penalties and interest, then we should strongly consider not levying this penalty (i.e. waiving it).

In these cases, a taxpayer relief registry entry must be created. See Chapter 7 Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest for more information.

10.3 Deemed prescribed elections

The rules and guidelines for accepting late, amended or revoked elections also apply to the following designations and allocations that are considered prescribed elections, under subsection 220(3.21):

- Paragraph 80(2)(l) of the Act allows a taxpayer to designate the order in which commercial debt obligations settled at the same time are to be applied for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.
- Subsections 80(5) to 80(11) allow a taxpayer who has designated a forgiven amount to apply any remaining part of the forgiven amount in certain circumstances.
- Subsection 80.03(7) allows a taxpayer to designate a capital gain that would otherwise arise under subsection 80.03(2) as a forgiven amount for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.
- Subsection 132.11(6) allows a mutual fund trust, as well as any electing trust with a December 15 year-end, to choose an amount designated by it for a tax year to be added in computing its income for the year.

10.4 Basis for accepting requests

A request may be accepted in the following situations:

- There have been tax consequences not intended by the taxpayer, and there is evidence that the taxpayer took reasonable steps to comply with the law. This could include, for example, a situation where the taxpayer obtained a bona fide valuation for a property, but after the CRA's review the valuation was found to be incorrect.
- The request arises from circumstances that were beyond the taxpayer's control. Such extraordinary circumstances could include natural or man-made disasters such as flood or fire; civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike; a serious illness or accident, or serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.
- The taxpayer acted on incorrect information given by the CRA. This could include incorrect written replies to queries and errors in CRA publications.
- The request results from what is clearly a mechanical error. This could include using the net book value amount (when obviously the taxpayer intended to use the undepreciated capital cost) or using an incorrect cost.
- The subsequent accounting of the transactions by all parties is as if the election had been made, or had been made in a certain way.
- The taxpayer can demonstrate that he or she was not aware of the election provision, even though the taxpayer took a reasonable amount of care to comply with the law, and undertook remedial action as quickly as possible.

10.5 Basis for denying requests

A request will not be accepted in the following instances:

1. It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer made the request for retroactive tax planning purposes. This could include taking advantage of changes to the law enacted after the due date of the election.
2. Adequate records do not exist to verify whether or not the request can be accepted.
3. It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer had to make the request because he or she was negligent or careless in complying with the law.

10.6 Requests must be complete

Taxpayers should be encouraged to make their relief requests as complete as possible. This allows CRA employees to exercise discretion and avoid processing delays. A proper review cannot be conducted if we do not have access to all relevant information.

Note: Relief requests cannot be processed without a valid CRA account number.

A request to accept a late, amended or revoked election should contain the following elements:

- the names, addresses, social insurance numbers, partnership numbers, and corporation numbers of all the taxpayers involved;
- the dates and details of the transactions;
- the date and details of the original election including an explanation of why the taxpayer is asking to amend or revoke an election;
- details of a late-filed election, and an explanation why it is being filed late;
- the election needs to be made in the appropriate manner required by the specific provisions of the Act (e.g., filing the election in a prescribed form or in a prescribed manner);
- a brief description of the income tax implications of the acceptance or refusal of the request for all the parties involved; and
- appropriate revised schedules reflecting changes, should accepting the request involve changes to continuing tax account balances.

When the request involves more than one taxpayer, an agreement to the changes requested, signed by all parties, should be included with the request.

A request should also contain the following information:

- the type and nature of the extraordinary circumstances that prevented the taxpayer from complying,
- supporting documentation;
- supporting details of incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers or errors in published information, or other objective evidence, and
- the name, address, and telephone number, where the taxpayer may be reached if more information or explanation is needed

See 6.2 Administrative reviews for information on making a taxpayer relief request and details on first and second reviews.

10.7 Taxpayer relief fact sheet

Taxpayer relief fact sheets are mandatory. For elections requests, taxpayers should provide supporting documentation and the claim must be correct under law.

For detailed information on what they should include and other essential elements, refer to 6.8 Fact sheet. See also 4.2 Fact sheet, in the Taxpayer Relief Registry guide.

11. Judicial review

A judicial review of any discretionary decision made by the federal government from which there is no right of appeal, may be applied for pursuant to Section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, within 30 days of the date notification of the discretionary decision is communicated.

In cases where taxpayers are not satisfied with the discretion the CRA exercised in its review of their requests, taxpayers can apply for a judicial review to the Federal Court by following certain steps. Our role is to advise the taxpayer of the option of pursuing the matter to Federal Court; we are not in a position to advise the taxpayer about Federal Court rules and procedures. Officers should be careful not to give the taxpayer an opinion about their chances of success in court. The Court will focus its review only on whether discretion was properly exercised.

NOTE: If a taxpayer contacts you (by phone or letter) because they have missed the 30-day time limit to apply for judicial review, advise the taxpayer, by phone, that they should contact the Registry of the Federal Court of Canada. You should put a note on the ELCS Notepad indicating that the applicant has been informed to contact the Federal Court to request an extension. The local Registry Office telephone numbers and addresses can be found in the Federal Court section of this manual. If the taxpayer cannot be reach by phone, send a letter. Here a suggestion for the verse

> As a courtesy, we have enclosed a copy of the taxpayer relief decision letter dated XXXXX denying (partially approving) your request under subsection 220(3.1) of the Income Tax Act (section 281.1 of the Excise Tax Act).
> If you feel that discretion was not properly exercised during our review of your request for relief, you can apply to the Federal Court for a judicial review. However, as the thirty (30) day time limit has passed, you must apply for an extension to the Federal Court. For more information on extensions under subsection 18.1(2), phone the Registry of the Federal Court of Canada at x-xxx-xxx-xxxx.

During its review, the Court has access to the taxpayer relief records (e.g., taxpayer's request, taxpayer relief report, and correspondence). As well, the officer who made the decision under review may be asked to give an affidavit to the Court.

There are three possible outcomes of a judicial review:

- withdrawn: the applicant decides not to continue to Court. In this case, the CRA will be advised that the application for judicial review has been withdrawn, meaning the case never makes it to the court hearing stage.
- dismissed: the Court finds that CRA acted in good faith and finds no reviewable error to warrant intervention of the Court.
- allowed: when the Federal Court finds concerns or flaws in our review process, the application for judicial review is allowed.

If the Court rules that discretion was not properly exercised, it will refer the matter back to the minister for reconsideration, as can be seen in Gandy v. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. As with any subsequent review, cases referred back from the Federal Court must be handled by a person or persons not previously involved. Considerations, including the Court's direction, will determine if the case is referred back to the same office, or in some situations, to a different office, for a new review and decision.

Judicial review decisions are published on the Federal Court website. Search options include the Applicant's name and the year of decision. The site also allows the search for the Federal Court of Appeals decisions.

11.2 Requests under Rule 317

Some applicants (taxpayers) request copies of all materials from the Respondent (CRA) that were before the Minister's delegate who rendered the taxpayer relief decision, either in their Notice of Application or subsequently - Rule 317.

This section of the manual provides information on Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules and outlines the national standard process to be followed when the Canada Revenue Agency (the "respondent") is notified by the Department of Justice that the taxpayer (the "applicant") has made a Rule 317 request.

The CRA and the Tax Law Services Portfolio from the Department of Justice have come to an agreement about each of their respective roles and responsibilities to ensure requests made under Rule 317 are handled in a consistent, efficient, and timely manner.

11.2.1 Certified copy of material

Under Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules, an applicant is entitled to request a certified copy of material that is relevant to their Notice of Application for judicial review, and in possession of the CRA, but not in the possession of the applicant.

The request for certified documents may be included in the Notice of Application or made separately.

When a Rule 317 request is made, the office that conducted the taxpayer relief review and made the recommendation will:

1. Prepare the certified copy of material, and
2. Forward the taxpayer relief file, certificate (Schedule "A") and bundle of documents to the Department of Justice.

Where a separate Rule 317 request is made, and the relief file was sent to the Litigation Office at the time the Notice of Application was filed, the Litigation Office will forward the relief file to the officer, along with a copy of the judicial review application and the Rule 317 request to prepare the certified copy of material.

11.2.2 Time limit to produce certified copies (Rule 318)

Under Rule 318 of the Federal Courts Rules, the Department of Justice must transmit the certified copy of the requested material to the Federal Court and the applicant within 20 calendar days after the Rule 317 request was received by the Department of Justice. Where the Rule 317 request is made in the Notice of Application, use the Department of Justice received date stamp of service of the Notice of Application by the Federal Court or the Department of Justice received date stamp of service of the Rule 317 request, if it was made after the Notice of Application was filed.

Three certificates (Schedule "A") and three certified bundles of materials, along with the taxpayer relief file must be provided to the Department of Justice by courier or hand-delivered at least 5 working days prior to the 20-day deadline.

The "20 calendar days" excludes the day the request is received by the Department of Justice and includes the last day. If the last day falls on a weekend or a holiday, it is due the following business day.

Note: The "20 calendar days" does not include the court's Christmas recess from December 21 to January 7.
For example, a Rule 317 request served on the Department of Justice:

- September 10, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on September 30.
- September 22, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on October 13 (Thanksgiving is October 12, 2009).
- December 18, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on January 26, 2010.

11.2.3 Rule 317 process

The following summarizes the process when a Rule 317 request is received.

1. The Department of Justice will advise the Litigation Office.

   Upon receipt of a request, the Department of Justice will advise the Litigation Office that a Rule 317 request has been made.

2. The Litigation Office will arrange for the certification of the material.

   Upon receipt, the Litigation Office will

   - Contact the officer involved with the decision and request that the certified documents be prepared, and
   - Provide the officer with a copy of the Notice of Application and request made under Rule 317 through secure transmission.

3. Certification of the material.

   Generally, the officer who conducted the review and prepared the recommendation for the authorized delegate's approval will prepare the certified copy of material.

   The officer will review the taxpayer relief file and identify all relevant documents, including screen prints to be certified. The Justice counsel assigned to the case will be available to advise the officer preparing the certified material and will make the final decision whether documents and/or specific information should be excluded from the certified bundle of material due to:

   - relevancy to the taxpayer relief decision under judicial review;
   - third party confidential information; or
   - solicitor-client privilege.

4. Prepare certificate and certified copy of the material.

   Prepare three original certificates (Schedule "A") and three certified bundles of documents. They must be forwarded along with the entire taxpayer relief file to the Department of Justice at least 5 working days prior to the 20-day deadline.

5. Update the Taxpayer Relief Registry

   Update Section IV – Info/Delays/Transfer of the Taxpayer Relief Registry to record the date of receipt of the Rule 317 request, confirm that the certification of the material has been completed and record the date the material was forwarded to the Department of Justice.

11.2.4 Identify documents for certification

A judicial review applicant making a request for documents under Rule 317 is required to "identify the material requested", but will often make a request for all documents in the CRA's possession that are not in the applicant's possession.

To identify documents for certification, read the Notice of Application and the request for documents to determine whether the applicant is asking for:

- specific documents; or
- all documents in the CRA's possession.

A document must be produced if it is:

- relevant to the judicial review application; and
- not already in the possession of the applicant.

Digitized by Google

The officer involved with the taxpayer relief decision will review the relief file and identify all the documents that must be certified. Consult with Justice Counsel if you are uncertain whether particular documents should be included.

Note: The Department of Justice will decide whether a document should be excluded.

Relevancy
Information reviewed by the officer and the delegated authority prior to the decision being issued is relevant. All documents prepared by them are also relevant. In addition, all supporting documents submitted to the CRA for review in relation to the taxpayer relief request, prior to the decision being issued, whether or not considered, are relevant.

Relevant information that was reviewed while considering the taxpayer's request for relief is detailed in the decision report/fact sheet. The fact sheet provides details of the taxpayer's request and the reasons why it was made, what steps were taken during the review, the officer's summary of recommendations, what decision was reached, and the reasons for the decision.

The following documents would generally fall within the scope of a Rule 317 request:

- first-review taxpayer relief report;
- second-review taxpayer relief report;
- all notes prepared by CRA officers that are contained in the taxpayer relief file; and
- all CRA system printouts of screens reviewed in assessing the relief request, such as ACSES Diary, ELCS Notepad, Notes for Businesses, GHRAPS, T2, BN and RAPID options.

While a document and/or screen print may be relevant to the judicial review application, only material not already in the possession of the applicant must be produced.

Material not already in the possession of the applicant
In situations where specific documents are listed on the request, certify the relevant documents (if not confidential or protected) regardless of whether they are in the applicant's possession. The request may include CRA internal procedures, such as a relevant section or part from a manual or guide. For these requests, sanitized versions available for certification can be obtained from CRA's public reading rooms where available

If the applicant requests that all documents in the possession of the CRA be produced, a determination must be made as to whether each document is already in the possession of the applicant. Only relevant documents that have not been submitted to the CRA by the applicant or authorized representative, or are not duplicate copies of documents issued by the CRA to the applicant, must be produced.

For example:
A letter issued to the taxpayer by the CRA considered during the review is relevant but does not need to be produced because the applicant already has the letter. While an Option C print-out may contain the same information as the notice of (re)assessment or notice of (re)determination issued to the applicant, it is not the same document and must therefore be produced

To determine if documents have been issued by the CRA, review the information in the taxpayer relief file and appropriate mainframe systems, such as RAPID, ELCS, BCCS, ACSES, CSAPP and applicable diary notes.

In some cases it may be difficult to determine whether a document is already in the possession of the applicant. If uncertain, provide a copy of the document unless it is confidential or protected

11.2.5 Prepare certified copy of the material and certificate

The certification of documents does not need to be completed by the authorized delegate who approved the taxpayer relief decision. Generally, the officer who conducted the review and prepared the recommendation for the authorized delegate's approval will prepare the certified copy of the material and certificate.

Once the relevant documents for certification have been identified, three copies of the original documents, printouts of documents retained in electronic form, and computer screen prints must be photocopied and/or printed. Note that single-sided copies of the certified documents are required

While the photocopying and screen prints can be completed by support employees, the relief officer must review each document to confirm that the photocopies and printouts are complete and accurate reproductions of the original documents.

Computer printouts
For guidelines on printing and sanitizing common individual screen printouts, see Table of available printouts - Documents requested by taxpayers or third parties in the Individual Services Technical Help Guide.

The Individual Enquiries Printout Request (IEPR) application provides sanitized printouts of taxpayer information. For example, the following information will not be printed from a RAPID, Option C screen:

- Information about others
- Internal CRA codes

Other RAPID Options available for print using IEPR are:

Income and Deductions	(Rapid Option C)
Information Slips	(Rapid Option DD.3)
Capital Gains and Losses & Multi Year Data	(Rapid Option C-MY)
Home Buyer's Plan	(Rapid Option HH.01)
RRSP Deduction Limit & Multiyear RRSP Contributions	(Rapid Option R.1) (Rapid Option R.7)
Instalment Reminders	(Rapid Option BB.1)
Discounter Clearance	(Rapid Option Q)
Tuition and Education Amounts	(Rapid Option C-MY)

For information about this application, refer to the Individual Enquiries Printout Request User Manual.

For screen prints, other than IEPR, do not forget to black out any information that is not to be disclosed, including any information that would reveal the identity of third parties (spouse's income or SIN, employer's account number, etc.) You must then photocopy the sanitized printout.

Complete Schedule "A"
Three originals of Schedule "A", Certificate pursuant to a request made under Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules must be completed and forwarded to the Department of Justice along with three certified bundle of documents and the taxpayer relief file.

The Court File Number located in the top right corner should be entered by the officer. If this number is not available from the information received, the officer should consult with Justice Counsel.

A description of each document included in the certified copy of material must be listed on Schedule "A". The physical document should appear as itemized on the certificate. See Chapter 13 Appendices for an example of descriptions included on Schedule "A".

The certificate must be signed and dated by the officer who compiled the material and who physically reviewed each photocopy and each printout.

12.5 List of elections covered under section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations

Section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations lists the provisions of the Income Tax Act and Regulations in respect of which a taxpayer or a partnership can apply under subsection 220(3.2) of the Act to make a late or amended election, or to revoke an election.

The list of eligible elections reflects the amendments to section 600 that were published in the Canada Gazette Part II on August 29, 2006, as SOR/2006-200.

The following is the list of the prescribed provisions and a brief description of the nature of the election:

Deferral on non-CCPC employee options
Subsection 7(8) of the Act allows an employee to defer the taxation of an employment benefit realized from a qualifying acquisition of a particular security under an agreement with the employer (or a person not dealing at arm's length with the employer) until the year in which the employee disposes of the security, becomes a non-resident of Canada or dies, whichever occurs first, if the employee elects in accordance with subsection 7(10) to have subsection 7(8) apply.

Deemed outlay or expense
Paragraph 12(2.2)(b) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to reduce the amount of an outlay or expense (other than an outlay or expense which relates to the cost of the property) incurred in the year, the immediately following year or any preceding year, by all or part of any related government assistance received in the year which would otherwise be included in income by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(x).

Interest income accrual rules
Former subsection 12.2(4) of the Act allowed an individual or a trust with individuals as beneficiaries to elect to report accrued interest income on an annual basis with respect to certain life insurance policies and annuity contracts last acquired before December 20, 1980, rather than on a tri-annual reporting basis under former subsection 12.2(3). Subsection 12.2(4) was repealed given the introduction of mandatory annual reporting of accrued income on life insurance policies last acquired after or materially altered after 1989.

Available for use rules on long-term projects
Subsection 13(29) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to include an amount, within limits, as undepreciated capital cost in respect of long-term project depreciable property under the "available for use" provisions of subsections 13(26) to 13(28) prior to the completion of the project.

Amounts paid for undertaking future obligations
Subsection 20(24) of the Act allows a taxpayer to deduct from income certain payments made to obtain another person's agreement to undertake certain future obligations for which an amount was included in the taxpayer's income under paragraph 12(1)(a), if the taxpayer and other person jointly elect in accordance with subsection 20(25).

Cost of borrowed money
The elections contained in section 21 of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to capitalize, instead of deducting as a current expense, the cost of borrowed money used to acquire depreciable property (subsections 21(1) and 21(3)) or used for the exploration, development or the acquisition of a resource property (subsections 21(2) and 21(4)).

Exchanges of property
Subsections 13(4), 14(6), 44(1) and (6) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to defer an income inclusion or the recognition of a capital gain when a replacement property is acquired for a property that was stolen, expropriated or destroyed, or for a former business property that was sold.

Adjustments to cost base
Subsections 13(7.4) and 53(2.1) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to reduce the capital cost of depreciable property and the adjusted cost base of non-depreciable capital property, respectively, by the amount of any related inducement, refund, reimbursement, contribution, allowance, or other assistance which would otherwise be included in income by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(x).

Election where change of use
Subsection 45(2) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to designate a property as his principal residence although there has been a change in use to an income producing property.

Subsection 45(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer a capital gain on the change of use of a property from an income producing property to a principal residence.

Debts established to be bad debts and shares of bankrupt corporation
Subsection 50(1) of the Act applies to debts established to have become bad debts in a taxation year and to certain shares and allows a taxpayer to elect to have a deemed disposition at the end of the year and a reacquisition immediately thereafter at a cost of nil

Successor rules for resource properties
Paragraphs 66.7(7)(c), (d) and (e) and (8)(c), (d), and (e) of the Act allow a predecessor corporation and a successor corporation to elect to transfer the unused pools of resource expenses from the predecessor to the successor corporation.

Transfers or distributions to a taxpayer's spouse, common law partner or spousal/partner trust on the death of the taxpayer
Subsection 70(6.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect to have the rollover rules under subsection 70(6) and 70(6.1) not apply, thus causing the deemed disposition of assets at fair market value under subsection 70(5) and the deemed payment of amounts in Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA) Fund No.2 under subsection 70(5.4).

Transfers of farm property, or family farm corporations and partnerships to child
Subsection 70(9) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.

Subsection 70(9.1) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.

Subsection 70(9.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.

Subsection 70(9.3) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.

Election by legal representative and transferee re reserves
Subsection 72(2) of the Act permits a legal representative of a deceased taxpayer to elect to claim a deduction for certain reserves, provided that the amount so deducted is subsequently included in the income of the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner or a spousal or common-law partner trust.

Inter vivos transfers of property
Subsection 73(1) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have the rollover provisions in respect of an inter-vivos transfer of assets to a spouse or common-law partner or certain trusts not apply, thus causing the assets to be considered to be transferred at fair market value for tax purposes.

Deemed settlement on winding-up
Paragraph 80.01(4)(c) of the Act allows a parent corporation to elect to reduce the amount to which subsection 80(1) (debt forgiveness rules) might otherwise apply in cases where a debt owed between a parent corporation and its subsidiary is settled on the winding up of the subsidiary for less than both the principal amount and the cost amount of the debt.

Expropriation assets acquired as compensation for, or as consideration for sale of, foreign property taken by or sold to foreign issuer
Subsection 80.1(1) of the Act applies to a Canadian resident taxpayer who has acquired "expropriation assets" issued or guaranteed by a foreign government as compensation for the expropriated or forced sale of shares of a foreign affiliate, or foreign property used to carry on business in a foreign country. The election establishes the deemed cost of the expropriation assets and the deemed proceeds of disposition of the property that was expropriated or sold.

Dividends received by taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner
Subsection 82(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have a taxable dividend from a taxable Canadian corporation received by the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner included in the taxpayer's income where such an inclusion increases the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner amount under paragraph 118(1)(a).

Capital dividend
Subsection 83(2) of the Act allows a private corporation to elect to have the full amount of a dividend that is payable by it to be treated as a capital dividend

Eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares
Paragraph 86.1(2)(f) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer the tax on eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares.

Election to defer the 21-year deemed disposition date

Preferred beneficiary election
Subsection 104(14) of the Act allows a trust and its preferred beneficiaries to elect to have the income of the trust included in the income of the preferred beneficiaries, instead of being taxed in the trust.

No rollover on election by trust
Subsection 107(2.001) of the Act allows a personal trust or prescribed trust resident in Canada at the time of the distribution to elect not to have subsection 107(2) applied to a distribution of certain property to a beneficiary in satisfaction of the beneficiary's capital interest in the trust.

Deemed disposition on emigration
Paragraph 128.1(4)(d) of the Act allows an individual (other than a trust) to elect to treat certain properties that would otherwise be exempt from the deemed disposition that occurs when the individual ceases to be resident in Canada as having been disposed of.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning former resident
Paragraphs 128.1(6)(e) and 128.1(6)(c) of the Act apply to an individual (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, and subsequently returns to reside in Canada. The effect of the election is to "unwind" the deemed disposition rule of subsection 128.1(4) for certain properties still held upon the individual's return to Canada.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning trust beneficiary
Paragraph 128.1(7)(d) and 128.1(7)(g) of the Act apply to an individual trust beneficiary (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, receives a distribution of property from the trust while a non-resident, and subsequently returns to reside in Canada while still owning the property. These rules allow the beneficiary and the trust to jointly elect, upon the beneficiary's return to Canada, to "unwind" the deemed disposition rule in subsection 107(2.1) that was triggered when the trust distributed the property to the non-resident beneficiary.

Post-emigration loss on disposition
Paragraph 128.1(6)(c) of the Act applies to an individual (other than a trust) who disposes of taxable Canadian property, after having ceased to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, for proceeds that are less than the deemed proceeds that arose on the deemed disposition on emigration. The individual may elect to reduce the deemed proceeds of disposition when the individual emigrated.

Allocation of income by communal organization
Subsection 143(2) of the Act allows a communal organization to elect to have its taxable income earned by the deemed trust under subsection 143(1) allocated to members of the organization.

Home buyers' plan
Subsection 146.01(7) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative and the surviving spouse or common-law partner to elect not to have the full outstanding balance of the Home Buyers' Plan included on the deceased taxpayer's final return. The practical effect of the election is to put the surviving spouse or common-law partner in the same position as the deceased taxpayer with respect to the balance outstanding.

Disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer
Subsection 164(6) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat certain capital losses or terminal losses of the taxpayer's estate for its first taxation year as capital losses or terminal losses of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Realization of deceased employees' options
Subsection 164(6.1) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat the amount of the loss realized upon the exercise, disposition or expiration of rights to acquire certain securities within the first taxation year of the taxpayer's estate as a loss of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Excess capital dividend
Subsection 184(3) of the Act allows a corporation to elect to have the amount of the elected capital dividend in excess of the balance in the corporation's capital dividend account treated as a separate taxable dividend, thereby avoiding the penalty tax otherwise payable.

Elections to make certain transfers
Subsection 1103(2d) of the Regulations allows a taxpayer to elect to defer a capital cost allowance recapture by transferring the property disposed of to a new class of which the taxpayer has property, when the property disposed of would have been a property of the new class if it had been acquired when the property of the new class was acquired.

Appendix 5A Where to send taxpayer relief requests

The majority of requests will be received and screened at the taxpayer relief intake centres (IC).

Centres of expertise (CoEs)

The CoEs are responsible for reviewing requests for relief of penalty and/or interest transferred from the ICs. It includes the following workloads:

- T1 - Individuals
- T1-OVP (RRSP) – T1-OVP (RESP) - only requests due to financial hardship
- T2 - Corporations
- T3 - Trust returns - only requests due to financial hardship
- GST/HST
- GST/HST rebates – centralized in the Atlantic CoE
- T4 - Payroll accounts, including:
  - payroll service providers – centralized in the Quebec CoE. See Note 3 and also the table under PAYDAC);
  - bank remitters accounts; and
  - Retirement Compensation Arrangements (RCA) - centralized in the Prairie CoE
- T5 - Information returns (return of investment income) - only requests due to financial hardship
- T5018 Information returns (contract payments)
- Native Leasing Services (NLS) – centralized in the Quebec CoE (native individuals with T4 slip issued by Roger Obonsawin). See Note 2.
- Non-residents. T1, T2 and T3 accounts – only requests based on financial hardship
- Nunavut requests - centralized in the Prairie CoE
- Other levies – only requests due to extraordinary circumstances for excise duty (RD accounts) and excise tax (RE accounts) – centralized in the Quebec CoE

Note 1: Consult the table below to verify the exceptions to the above workloads.

Note 2: Send hard document of relief requests for NLS to the Shawinigan TC (without scanning it), attention Christine Martel, Team Leader, Taxpayer Relief, Appeals Division. Once these cases are identified, staff from other ICs will only create a registry entry (group code 90100) indicating relief request re Native Leasing Services/Roger Obonsawin transferred to Quebec CoE. The Quebec CoE will send the acknowledgement letter.

Note 3: Payroll service providers are businesses who specialize in providing payroll services to a large number of clients (main business activity). We do not consider an accounting firm doing the bookkeeping for a business a payroll service provider. For the time being, only requests from Ceridian, TimePlus, ADP, Cognicase and Desjardins should be sent to the Quebec CoE.

Refer to the table to send requests processed outside the CoEs.

Appendix 5B Expediting a request

Generally, a request received at an intake centre (IC) should be expedited when the following circumstances are present:

- the continuation of a business is jeopardized and/or layoff of employees is imminent *;
- there is evidence that a prior relief request is missing or has been lost;
- requests received via the Service Complaints Program, Problem Resolution Program with an urgent tag, Minister's Office, Ministerial Correspondence and/or Ombudsman intervention,
- 3rd or subsequent requests; or
- the correspondence relates to a judicial review application, such as:
    - a case was heard by the Federal Court and a new review has been allowed and/or
    - an application was withdrawn on condition that a new review would be conducted ***

When the above circumstances are present, determine the nature of the request, create a registry entry (if applicable), and either action or forward the correspondence to the responsible section on a priority basis.

When the correspondence is received at an IC, conduct a partial screening only. Do not determine validity and do not examine the file to determine if additional information is required - these steps will be completed by the section of the Agency, including centres of expertise (CoEs), responsible for the review and recommendation. In addition, do not request 1st review documents if the request is for a second review.

Examine the circumstances and customize the acknowledgement letter accordingly. Sending a standard acknowledgement letter may, in some situations, be confusing to the taxpayer and/or inappropriate if discussions with another Agency representative, such as a Service Complaints Officer, have taken place.

If it is unclear whether the case should be expedited, discuss with a resource officer or team leader.

When forwarding the correspondence, attach a memo describing the nature of the request and the reason it had been expedited. Update the registry with notes explaining the actions taken.

ICs must forward a hard copy to the CoE. It is also suggested that ICs staff deliver the hard copy of the request when both areas are located in the same building.

* This may include, but is not limited to, situations where the taxpayer has availed himself/herself of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (CCAA).

 Do not acknowledge 3rd or subsequent requests. The taxpayer will be contacted after it is determined if a new review will be conducted.

 Judicial review applications will rarely be received outside Litigation, Appeals, however, should this occur, contact the Litigation section of the applicable Appeals office to arrange transfer. See 3.6.3 Tier 3 – Referrals to HQ, TRSCD if the request is CoE responsibility.

    - Risk of negative impact on the Agency;
    - Media attention

* Danger and risk are two separate concepts. "Danger", suggests intent on the part of the taxpayer (i.e. moving property out of the country, transferring assets etc). "Risk" suggests irresponsible behaviour or possible insolvency but does not have the same urgency or intent as Danger.

Note: Complexity is determined and coded at an intake centre (IC) for taxpayer relief requests which are centre of expertise (CoE) responsibility. With team leader approval, a file may be re-coded, if an indicator was not present, has changed, or was undetected at the IC level. Requests should be coded and worked at the lowest applicable level.

Appendix 5E File Transfer Guidelines

Other than the Ontario region, generally, a taxpayer relief request will be handled in the region where the request was received. However, there may be circumstances where a transfer may be warranted.

The purpose of these guidelines is to provide a working tool to assist in handling file transfers. Open and prompt communications between affected regions are essential to ensure the success of this policy.

File transfers may occur under the following circumstances:

1. a class or category of files is assigned to a particular office or region;
2. a taxpayer requested transfer;
3. the Agency identified need for a transfer;
4. direction from the Headquarters, Federal Court or Litigation.

See Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide (TRR) for information on transferring the registry entry.

1. Particular Class or Category of Files:

To maximize efficiencies and facilitate consistency, the responsibility of certain group files is assigned to a particular office or region. These situations may include, but are not limited to, a natural disaster, a bulk request and/or project files. This category does not include requests for where a notice of objection, Case Appeals record is open. See 5.5.3.1 When there is a related notice of objection for more information.

Where a request relates to a group request, and the workload has been assigned to a different region, create a registry entry and transfer the case to the office of responsibility

2. Taxpayer requested transfer:

Taxpayers will, from time to time, request that their file be handled in a different region. Requests for transfer will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis in light of the guidelines and factors described below

Note: A request received in a region other than the taxpayer's place of residence and/or books and records is not considered a request for a transfer.

Upon receipt of a taxpayer requested transfer, management in the receiving IC will:

- ask for the reasons, if not already provided;
- inform the other region affected and discuss the taxpayer's request for transfer of the file. Once the decision is made, the office responsible for handling the request will have ownership of the request.

If the two Team Leaders cannot agree on a common position, they will refer the file transfer request to their respective Chief of Appeals. In the unlikely event that a case cannot be resolved between the two regions, consult TRSCD, Headquarters (HQ) via the AB-DGA_HQ-AC Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allégements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux

3. Agency identified need for a transfer:

Where warranted, the Agency may initiate a file transfer at any point, from the time a request is received up to the point when the decision is rendered.

Employees who handle relief requests should apply the following general guidelines and factors to determine whether a file transfer is acceptable. This list is not exhaustive and other relevant factors may be considered when reaching a file transfer decision.

Digitized by Google

4. Direction from the Federal Court or Litigation:

In general, when a taxpayer's application for judicial review is allowed, the subsequent review is conducted in the same region by a person or persons who were not previously involved. However, on occasion, the Federal Court may recommend that the new review be conducted in a different office/region, or at the HQ level. Similarly, an application may be withdrawn after Litigation and/or the Department of Justice has determined that a new review is warranted and on occasion, they may also direct that the new review be conducted in a different office/region or at the HQ level. This type of recommendation is to be respected in all cases. See Chapter 11, Judicial review for more information.

General Guidelines

A request to transfer a file from one region to another in order to facilitate a meeting will be accepted.

The receiving office will ensure that all the relevant facts and any documents in their possession are shared with the office of responsibility.

Regional management should be informed of the impact on resources resulting from file transfers, including resource allocation and workload assignment prior to file transfer decisions

Factors

Note: A file will generally not be transferred from one region to another after the review has begun unless a factor(s) described below is applicable.

- Additional Costs - Any significant additional costs (additional field work, location of in-house experts, travel needs, etc) related to accepting or denying a transfer should also be considered in reaching a transfer decision.

- Conflict of interest - Impartiality is a key element of taxpayer relief reviews and should be considered not only in apparent conflict situations but also in situations where taxpayers may perceive the existence of conflict. For example, a file should be transferred when a delegated authority has been involved at the assessing/audit stage and there is no alternative delegated authority available. Another example of a potential conflict of interest situation is when staff members, their relatives or friends submit a relief request.

- Consistency - Certain files are processed together in a particular office or region to ensure the most efficient and consistent treatment of the files. This factor may also be applicable when determining whether to transfer a substantially similar, individual file.

- Number of files involved - From time to time, extraordinarily large volume of requests may necessitate sharing files with another region in order to process the relief requests within Agency standards for turnaround.

- Privacy issues - The sharing of private and confidential information with co-workers responsible for processing relief requests filed by staff members or their relatives may lead to delicate and embarrassing situations.

- Representative's place of business - Where a representative's place of business is in a different region of responsibility, the transfer request should generally be accepted.

- Required expertise - The office of responsibility that will process the file must have the necessary expertise to deal with the taxpayer relief issues.

- Service Standards – Meeting service standards is one of the Branch's priorities. It is important to ensure that accepting or refusing a transfer request will not result in a significant delay in processing the relief request. This consideration however, must always be balanced with other considerations, including the necessity of an impartial review.

- Taxpayer's choice of language - The region that will handle the file must be in a position to offer the service in the official language of the taxpayer's choice. A transfer may also be warranted if the taxpayer requires assistance in a language other than the two official languages and the service is available in a different region

- Taxpayer's residence - A taxpayer's move outside the territory of the office of responsibility is an example of a situation where a request for transfer should generally be accepted.

Appendix 6B Post-decision Financial Transactions - CoEs

Taxpayer relief officers are responsible for reviewing the facts of a request and recommending a decision.

They will request to the appropriate business area at the TC of record to have the resulting adjustments completed.

ABSB/TC staff is responsible for processing the results (financial transactions) of the decision.

Use the following methods to refer the decision details to the TC:

- T1 a) ERA: Requests to cancel or reduce interest are referred to the TC with an ERA item, category 088, handled by T1 Accounts. Relief officers will provide the details of the decision (year, dates, and registry entry number) Calculations are done at the TC. Electronic Revenue Accounting (ERA) - Table of contents.

- T1 b) RAP: A reassessment is required for a cancellation or reduction of an omission penalty, for the cancellation or reduction (Tier 2 to Tier 1) of a late filing penalty and for instalment penalty. The CoEs will refer the requests for relief from penalties to the TCs by means of an RTM. Priority RAP requests should be rare. Information on the RTM will include:

  - Registry number;
  - Name and SIN of the taxpayer;
  - Year(s) involved;
  - Type of penalty to be adjusted;
  - Adjustment amount (if known);
  - Indication if a reply is required;
  - Indication that the RAP is to be processed on a priority basis and why;
  - Contact information for the taxpayer relief officer

Please note that if no response is requested, TPR assessors do not need to reply to the RTM.

- GST: Relief officer will refer details of the decision to the TC using SA Case.

- T4 (PAYDAC): Relief officer will refer details of the decision to the TC using SA Case.

- T5: The relief officer will send the details of the decision on an RTM to Employer Services of the TC of record for the taxpayer.

- OL (RD and RE accounts): A generic mailbox for each TC will be used to refer decisions.

- One Taxpayer/Multiple Accounts: Send each decision separately to the various sections (i.e. ERA, SA etc.).

T2 Corporate, GST & Source Deductions (PAYDAC) transactions

T2, GST and Source Deductions (PAYDAC) transactions requests will be forwarded via SA Case to the TC of record. The relief officer will create an SA Case for the account. Within the case, the officer will note all details of the request and then transfer to the TC of record.

This is being done using the existing Collections profile and slotting everyone into the Burnaby-Fraser TSO in ORG as a workaround for the centres of expertise that are housed in a TC.

Appendix 8A Roles and responsibilities of Appeals Branch and Debt Management staff

The following are guiding principles and related business rules intended to ensure a common understanding of the roles and responsibilities of Appeals Branch and Debt Management staff (the parties) in situations where a taxpayer has requested relief based on financial hardship and/or the inability to pay.

1. Impartial Review
A review must be conducted in an impartial manner.

Business Rules
Each party will examine their capacity to be impartial and/or where the perception of bias may be present, self-identify and be excused from a review

Where a taxpayer indicates lack of confidence in the impartiality of one or more parties, every effort will be taken to excuse the party or parties and reassign.

Any party previously involved in a taxpayer relief decision will not be involved in a subsequent review

2. Relief of penalty and interest is not for debt settlement purposes
A decision to grant or deny relief relies on a taxpayer's unique set of facts and circumstances. Relief will not be used as a means to resolve a taxpayer's debt.

Business Rules
A taxpayer's full debt obligation, including tax, will be considered when determining if financial hardship and/or inability to pay are present.

A decision to grant relief of penalty and/or interest may be made independently of a taxpayer's ability to address the tax portion of the debt.

3. Debt Management Retains Collection Responsibility
Debt Management retains responsibility for all actions taken to collect the taxpayer's debt, both during and after the taxpayer relief review process.

Business Rules
Other than exceptional situations involving imminent threat of loss to the Crown, Debt Management will limit new enforcement action while a taxpayer relief decision is pending.

Both parties will promptly inform each other of any change in a taxpayer's financial circumstances while a taxpayer relief decision is pending.

Upon completion of a taxpayer relief review, if Appeals staff have determined that a taxpayer may have a permanent inability to pay, they will notify Debt Management staff that the account may warrant write-off consideration. Revenue Collections will examine the situation and determine if the account should be made uncollectible.

4 .Payment Arrangements
Debt Management staff will retain responsibility for negotiating payment arrangements.

Business Rules
Debt Management staff will not delay or deny referral of a taxpayer relief request to Appeals due to the absence of a payment arrangement.

A satisfactory arrangement may include a period of non-payment when a taxpayer is experiencing temporary inability to pay.

Each case must be considered on its own merit based on a taxpayer's ability to pay.

Digitized by Google

When a decision is issued but a payment arrangement is not in place, Appeals staff will inform Debt Management staff of the decision and Debt Management staff will negotiate a payment arrangement with the taxpayer.

6. Assessing Financial Hardship and Inability to Pay

When a request for relief is based, either in whole or in part on financial hardship and/or the inability to pay, Appeals staff will determine whether the taxpayer's circumstances satisfy these reasons, and whether relief is warranted.

Business Rules

Debt Management staff will share information regarding a taxpayer's financial circumstances that is not readily available in CRA systems.

Where information is contradictory and/or unclear, Debt Management staff will provide their input to assist in resolution of the request.

3.3 Regional program advisors

Regional Program Advisors assist offices in their region to resolve taxpayer relief issues that arise. They also monitor taxpayer relief operations within their region to ensure consistent application of the taxpayer relief provisions.

See the Appendices for a list of Regional Program Advisors.

3.4 Taxpayer Relief Committee (TRC)

The TRC is a cross-functional committee, chaired by the Director General of TRSCD. It was established in December of 2005 and meets on an ad hoc basis. It provides a forum where members can discuss new developments and progress in the administration of taxpayer relief.

Members of the TRC include directors' general of applicable Headquarters Branches and directors of Regional Programs (alternatively a Regional Champion and/or Regional Program Advisor) as well as the Director General and the managers of TRSCD.

For more information see the Taxpayer Relief Committee site.

3.5 Taxpayer relief referrals

Field offices are able to resolve most taxpayer relief requests using the policies and guidelines available to them. However, some taxpayer requests may not be easy to resolve because of their complexity, sensitivity, precedent-setting nature, or because they raise cross-functional or policy issues.

The following chart summarizes the referral process that an internal taxpayer relief enquiry should follow.

- Does front line staff need technical or procedural assistance with a taxpayer relief request? Contact the Technical Advisor or Team Leader in your local office.
- Does the local Technical Advisor or Team Leader need assistance with procedural or technical taxpayer relief issues? Contact your local taxpayer relief committee (if applicable in your office). If still not resolved or if your office does not have a taxpayer relief committee, contact your Regional Program Advisor (if applicable) who is responsible for taxpayer relief.
- Does the taxpayer relief committee representative or the Regional Program Advisor need assistance with technical or procedural taxpayer relief issues? Contact the Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) or * contact your Branch directly if your issue is Branch specific or Program specific.

* If the TRSCD requires technical assistance in order to answer a question received in the Common mailbox, or if the issue is Program specific or of an operational nature that falls under the other Branches responsibilities, the TRSCD will refer the enquiry to the applicable Branch directly and the TRSCD will ask for a c.c. of the answer.

4. Taxpayer relief process

This section provides a basic overview of screening and validation, processing steps and review process involved in a taxpayer relief request.

Process maps present a visual image of a business process and help demonstrate how activities are carried out. Process maps developed for taxpayer relief provide the basic steps in handling a taxpayer relief request and are applicable to all taxpayer relief officers.

The following four taxpayer relief process maps may be found on the Taxpayer Relief Process Mapping site:

- Taxpayer Relief Process
- Process of Screening Taxpayer Relief Requests
- Process to Review the Facts of the Case
- Approval Process

4.1 Validate and screen the request

There are three types of taxpayer relief requests:

1. requests to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest;
2. refunds beyond the normal three-year period (individuals and testamentary trusts only);
3. and late, amended, or revoked elections (income tax only)

The request should clearly indicate:

- the type of request (example: cancellation of penalty and/or interest, or a reassessment request);
- the time period in question;
- detailed reasons of the request.

Screening of taxpayer relief requests should be encouraged. Active screening can help expedite the overall processing by making sure requests are reviewed and processed by the right areas and employees and that request-related information is gathered (e.g., requesting returns before a file is ready to be worked on).

Section 4.2.4 of this guide provides instructions for transferring taxpayer relief files.

4.1.1 Unclear / ambiguous request

The taxpayer is not required to use the word "taxpayer relief" or "relief". Each time you receive a request, read the client's letter carefully. If the intent is clear - treat the correspondence as a request for relief.

Digitized by Google

Although requests should be complete, there are instances in which requests may be unclear or ambiguous.

For example, a taxpayer that has been assessed both late filing penalties and/or omission penalties and interest charges may only seek interest relief. The general rule in such cases is not to make any assumptions and resolve any unanswered questions prior to review, as taxpayers may not distinguish penalty from interest charges.

Taxpayer contact should be attempted to confirm the details of their request. This can be done easily by telephone.

See Supporting requests and When more information is needed for more information.

Proceeding with an unclear / ambiguous request or not asking for more information when needed can create additional unnecessary workload and cause processing delays as well as result in poor taxpayer service.

For example, if a request is denied or partially approved based on lack of information or details, the taxpayer may ask for a review of their file. This situation could have been avoided from the start by gathering all the required information prior to file review. If a second review is requested, the task for the reviewing officer would be much more simplified.

4.1.2 Misdirected requests / correspondence

All non-taxpayer relief related requests/correspondence should be redirected to the appropriate area for a response.

In some cases it will be clear that it is not a request for relief under the taxpayer relief provisions. For example, a request to cancel a late filing penalty because the return was filed on time is not a taxpayer relief request. Relief requests are only to be considered in situations where assessments or amounts are valid and correctly charged. Follow local procedures to have the return or amounts reviewed/corrected. No taxpayer relief review is required.

In other cases, consultation with a resource officer, team leader and/or another division may be required. If a decision cannot be made, refer the matter to headquarters, TRSCD at: Taxpayer Relief, General Enquiries/Allègements pour les contribuables, Demandes de renseignements généraux for resolution.

It is important to understand the taxpayer relief provisions legislation in order to review the request in an accurate and consistent manner.

4.1.3 Valid or invalid request

A request is considered valid when a taxpayer seeks to:

- cancel or waive penalties and/or interest relating to a taxation year/period ending in any of the 10 previous calendar years/periods;
- accept late-filed, amended, or revoked income tax elections (income tax only);

Digitized by Google

- issue income tax refunds beyond the normal three-year period (individuals and testamentary trusts only);
- consider situations where the taxpayer suffers from an inability to pay or from financial hardship.

A request is considered invalid when a taxpayer seeks to:

- cancel or waive tax;
- cancel or waive penalties and/or interest under the ITA for tax years prior to 1985, for requests made on or before December 31, 2004;
- cancel or waive penalty and/or interest under the ITA; ETA; EA, 2001; ATSCA or Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 for a tax year ending outside of the 10 previous calendar years;
- issue tax refunds or reduce amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period under the ITA for a tax year ending outside of the 10 previous calendar years;
- accept late, amended or revoked elections under the ITA for a tax year ending outside of the 10 previous calendar years;
- cancel or waive GST/HST gross negligence penalty charged under section 285 of the ETA;
- accept late, amended or revoked elections that are not listed in Regulation 600 of the ITA;
- increase refund interest;
- issue tax refunds beyond the normal three-year period on corporate (T2) returns;
- provide an explanation of the penalties and/or interest charged;
- reimburse costs (such as phone charges, postage costs);
- cancel CRA administrative charges such as a bank charge back fees.

 Refer to Section 2 to determine the effective date of the 10-year limitation period.

4.2 Processing steps

The following summarizes the processing steps when a taxpayer relief request is received.

1) Screen and validate request

The request is screened and validated to identify which area or office should be completing the review. Identify the type of relief request and issue an acknowledgement letter, depending upon local TSO/TC procedures. If the file belongs to another area or office, the originating area/office will transfer the file.

2) Create taxpayer relief registry item

An item is opened on the Taxpayer Relief Registry. For better efficiency, taxpayer service and to maintain service standards, we recommend that, the office that initially receives the taxpayer relief request - "point of entry" should open the item. If the request is to only accept a late filed, amended or revoked election, an item is not opened on the Taxpayer Relief Registry. For information regarding "date received" go to Date Received in The Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide.

000121

Digitized by Google

3) Taxpayer relief registry scratch pad

The Scratch Pad no longer exists in the new registry system launched in April 2009. Information concerning transfers, contact with the taxpayer and delays in processing the relief request is to be updated in Section IV- Info/Delays/Transfer of the on-line fact sheet.

4) Transferring files

For transfers, Section IV- Info/Delays/Transfer of the fact sheet must be completed with information such as originating office, office where the file is being transferred to, date file is transferred, and a brief description of the type of taxpayer relief request. To provide a proper audit trail, the receiving office must modify the Taxpayer Relief Registry when the file is received so that the receiving officer's contact name, telephone number and office responsibility centre and work section, as contained in the Organization System (ORG), are updated.

For more information, see http://sh13y393/WBA007/e_a/1500/1512/08_028.cfm?hdng=4#a424 in the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide.

5) Determine if more information is needed

Ensure that you have all the relevant information needed to review to request. More information can be requested either in writing, by phone, or in person.

See When more information is needed for more information.

6) Gather and analyze facts

Gather and analyze all relevant information. You can find this information in supporting documents and in CRA systems. When analyzing the facts, remain impartial and consider factors contained in this guide and IC07-1.

7) Complete registry fact sheet and make recommendation

An internal report is prepared and a recommendation is made on the fact sheet in the Taxpayer Relief Registry. For further guidelines, see Part 4 in the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide at: http://sh13y393/WBA007/e_a/1500/1512/08_022.cfm?hdng=4

8) Obtain approval

You must have your recommendation reviewed and approved. Either a delegated authority, and/or a committee, depending on local procedures, will carefully consider the report and recommendation.

See section Delegation policies for information on CRA delegation policies for staff who review and approve taxpayer relief requests.

9) Communicating the decision

000122

Digitized by Google

A delegated authority who considered the report, must sign the decision letter unless you are accepting a request for a refund beyond the normal three-year period. All taxpayer relief decisions must be communicated in writing by means of a decision letter or a notice of assessment / reassessment or notice of determination/redetermination.

See Communicating decisions for more information.

10) Update the taxpayer relief registry

All the mandatory fields in the Taxpayer Relief Registry are required to be updated for each completed request before closing the registry item. Close the registry item(s).

11) Process account transactions

Ensure that all taxpayer account transactions are processed.

12) Retaining information

The Access to Information Act requires that documents, such as reports and correspondence, be kept for a minimum of two years in the area that made the review.

5. Delegation Policies

This section sets out the CRA delegation policies for staff who review and approve taxpayer relief requests. It discusses delegation of the minister's power and duties, as well as the first, second, and judicial review processes. This section also provides policies on how to handle requests that are made after a second review, which are not judicial-review requests.

5.1 Delegation of the minister's power and duties

The Minister's powers and duties to exercise his discretion under the taxpayer relief legislation are administratively delegated as specified in the instruments of delegation signed by the Minister.

Positions and acting positions are delegated. People themselves are not delegated authority. The positions they occupy are delegated to perform certain duties.

Each time there is an amendment to a delegation instrument, a separate document is prepared for the approval of the Minister or Commissioner. These instruments are published on the CRA's external Website: Delegation of Ministerial powers, duties, and functions.

5.1.1 First reviews

Low-risk or routine first requests are normally authorized at the first level of supervision. Examples of low-risk or routine requests include:

- requests where the facts of the case are straightforward and the dollar amounts are not significant;
- requests of a non-complex nature that pose little or no risk of setting a precedent, attracting media attention, or bringing the CRA into criticism; and
- requests based on an inability to pay involving less than in penalty and interest, which are otherwise considered to be of a non-complex nature.

More sensitive or complex first requests may, depending on local procedures, be reviewed and authorized by a more senior delegated officer or by a taxpayer relief committee (reviewed by the committee and authorized by a member). These requests include:

- complex requests of a sensitive or precedent-setting nature;
- requests that involve more than one area within a local office or that are cross-functional;
- high-dollar items;
- requests where the media are involved or likely to become involved; and
- cases that may be detrimental to a community or group of taxpayers if an unfavourable decision is made (e.g., a group of employees affected by a large employer audit).

The delegated authority level for the first review approval is usually the Team Leader/Coordinator. An exception to this rule is when you are accepting a request for a refund beyond the normal three-year period. If you are approving the taxpayer's request in full, a Notice of Assessment or Notice of Reassessment will be issued.

Digitized by Google

These notices are issued under the authority of the Commissioner of Revenue and will suffice as being reviewed by the appropriate delegated authority.

Partial or full denials for a request for refund beyond the normal three year period require a decision letter signed by the appropriate delegated authority.

If CRA requested information is submitted after the first level decision letter has been issued, the same persons who solicited the requested information and rendered the decision can be involved in the continuation of the first level review.

Directors should not personally review and make decisions for first requests, since this could affect impartiality if the taxpayer subsequently requests a second review of the decision.

5.1.2 Second reviews

To preserve the impartiality of the review process, second reviews should be made by someone other than the original decision-maker. The director of the tax services office or tax centre (income tax and GST/HST) decides who should conduct second reviews. However, requests for second reviews should be reviewed and authorized by an officer who is more senior than the original decision-maker, a taxpayer relief committee (reviewed by the committee and authorized by a member), or the director. Requests previously decided by a taxpayer relief committee should go to a more senior officer than the chairing committee member, or to a director.

Second requests that were denied because of missing CRA requested information can be reviewed and decided by the same persons who were involved in the original second level decision. If new information not requested by CRA is provided and the original decision-maker still feels that the request should not be granted, the request should automatically go for review to a more senior officer, a taxpayer relief committee, or to a director.

If it is determined that a person or persons who participated in the first review also acted on the second review, that alone can suffice to have the request returned back to CRA for a new review, as can be seen in the case of Robertson v. Minister of National Revenue.

5.2 Requests after second reviews

It is CRA policy that taxpayers are entitled to two administrative reviews within the CRA. Taxpayers also have recourse to judicial review. While CRA policy does not permit a third review, taxpayers sometimes come back to the CRA to ask for a review of a second decision; either before they ask for a judicial review, or because they have no intention to bring the matter to Court.

Here are the policies to follow when such requests are received:

5.2.1 Requests addressed to the taxpayer's director or regional assistant commissioner

Digitized by Google

The director of the office responsible for the second review or the assistant commissioner of the region responsible for that office has full discretion over the necessary course of action. Normally, the case would only be reopened if the taxpayer is providing new relevant information.

Note: When a delegated official at any office reviews a request because new relevant information has been submitted and the request is denied or partially approved, taxpayers must be informed of their right to judicial review even if this right was previously communicated. This note also applies to sections Requests addressed to the minister and Requests addressed to headquarters. See Section Second review denial/partial approval letters for guidelines on writing second review denial and partial approved letters.

5.2.2 Requests addressed to the minister, commissioner, or deputy commissioner

The ministerial correspondence areas have full discretion over all requests addressed to the minister, commissioner, or deputy commissioner. Although they have the authority to change a director's decision, they will normally consult with the director involved in the previous decision to determine the best course of action.

5.2.3 Requests addressed to headquarters functions or another office or region

Requests should be forwarded to the director responsible for the second review, and taxpayers should be informed that their request is being forwarded for review to the office that conducted the second review. If the recipient of the request expresses concerns about the last decision, the matter can be brought informally to the attention of the director responsible for that decision. If necessary, the recipient's assistant commissioner can formally refer the matter to the assistant commissioner of the director responsible for the case.

6. General policies and procedures

This section provides general taxpayer relief review policies and procedures that apply to all business lines and all types of taxpayer relief requests.

6.1 Purpose and intent of taxpayer relief provisions

The taxpayer relief provisions permit the CRA to help taxpayers resolve problems that arise through no fault of their own. The provisions allow for a common-sense approach in dealing with those who, because of personal misfortune or other circumstances beyond their control, are unable to comply with a statutory requirement or have failed to pay or remit an amount when due. The taxpayer relief provisions allow the CRA to be more flexible and responsive to a taxpayer's circumstances when it would be unreasonable or unfair to penalize the taxpayer.

The types of circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control may be summarized as follows:

- natural or human-made disasters such as flood, heavy storms, or fire;
- civil disturbances or disruptions in services such as strikes or demonstrations;
- serious illness or accident;
- serious emotional or mental distress caused by death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment; or
- actions of the CRA, such as providing incorrect information, processing delays or errors, or delays in providing information.

See extraordinary circumstances for more information and guidelines for evaluating them.

Consideration is also given to situations where taxpayers suffer from an inability to pay or from financial hardship. See Inability to pay or financial hardship requests for more information.

The taxpayer relief provisions were not intended and should not be used as a way to negotiate settlement of a taxpayer's account. In all circumstances, taxpayer relief requests should be reviewed independently.

6.2 Administrative reviews

Taxpayers are entitled to two internal administrative reviews, which are generally the responsibility of the taxpayer's local office. Taxpayers are also entitled to a judicial review by the Federal Court.

First review decisions should be made at the first level of supervision. Taxpayers can ask for a second review if they are not satisfied with the outcome of a first review. Requests for second reviews are addressed to the attention of the director of the taxpayer's local office, and the director or a senior official or taxpayer relief committee authorized by the director reviews the decision.

First and second reviews are discretionary administrative reviews. As a result, there is no formal right of appeal. However, taxpayers can apply for a judicial review to the Federal Court, if they feel that discretion was not properly exercised during a first or second review. Taxpayers may apply for a judicial review if they are not satisfied with a CRA decision; however, the scope of the Federal Court review is restricted to the exercise of discretion. The Federal Court will not overturn a CRA decision.

The first review requests must be submitted within the 10 year time limitation. For second review requests, there is no time restriction.

6.3 Ministerial discretion

Discretion is defined as the freedom to make decisions. This section of the guide sets parameters for exercising proper discretion during taxpayer relief reviews. Topics covered are the use of discretion, impartiality, and how to properly analyze facts.

6.3.1 Using discretion

The taxpayer relief provisions give the Minister of National Revenue discretion to cancel or waive penalties and interest, issue income tax refunds or reduce amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period (income tax only), and accept certain late-filed, amended, or revoked elections (income tax only). The minister's discretion is outlined in the phrase "the Minister may." that appears in each taxpayer relief provision.

Some CRA officials are delegated the authority to exercise the minister's powers and duties to allow, partially allow or deny taxpayer relief requests. Positions and acting positions are delegated, not individuals.

Delegated employees must carefully review the taxpayer's request and any documentation relevant to it, such as the taxpayer relief decision report. Most importantly, they are responsible for making a decision to allow, partially allow, or deny a taxpayer's request.

In using discretion, you must consider CRA policies and guidelines, the circumstances that gave rise to the request, submissions made by the taxpayer in dealing with the request, and any other relevant information.

When deliberating on a request it is important that:

- all correspondence and notes of telephone conversations with the taxpayer concerning the request, together with the taxpayer 's file or a summary of the facts relating to the request, be made available to and be reviewed by the person exercising the discretion;
- the person exercising the discretion read and consider the submissions of the taxpayer together with the recommendation and summary of the pertinent facts from the preparer of the recommendation; and
- the preparer of the recommendation be available to the person exercising the discretion to answer any questions that might arise concerning the appropriateness of the recommendation.

The way in which discretion has been exercised can be questioned during second reviews and judicial reviews.

See Delegation policies for more information on delegation and who is authorized to exercise Ministerial discretion.

6.3.2 Making impartial decisions

To properly use discretion, it is essential that taxpayer relief staff involved in review and decision-making remain impartial. Evidence of non-impartiality could have adverse consequences in court. It could also undermine the CRA's reputation for fairness.

For example, we should not automatically refuse a request to cancel or waive penalties and interest because a taxpayer has a poor history of compliance. The circumstances of a request may have been completely out of the taxpayer's control, and this may allow us to grant the request.

Impartiality can best be defined as being just and fair or unprejudiced. The best way to remain impartial when performing a review is to avoid prejudging taxpayers or situations and to not be biased. Equal consideration and treatment must be given to all taxpayers.

Taxpayers deserve to be treated equally, regardless of their:

- age, gender, race, religion, or marital status;
- location (e.g., whether they are from a poor region or an affluent neighborhood);
- background (e.g., their level of education or social status);
- sophistication (e.g., how well they speak);
- access to tax professionals;
- assertiveness or aggressiveness; or
- employer or business sizes.

The above list is not intended to be exhaustive since other extraneous factors exist.

6.3.3 Properly analyzing the facts

Each request should be carefully analyzed. All the relevant facts have to be considered. A reasonable attempt must be made to gather all necessary information to make an informed decision. Unanswered questions during review may indicate that important information is missing, in which case a reasonable attempt should be made to get answers to our questions.

Each request to have the taxpayer relief provisions applied must be evaluated on its own merits. Do not make assumptions-they can jeopardize impartiality. Determine the merit of each case based on the events or parties involved.

When reviewing a request, stick to its facts. If a fact is not relevant to the case, it should not be considered. This also helps to maintain impartiality.

6.4 Consistency

Consistency is equal treatment of taxpayers in the same or similar situations. This section outlines why consistency is important and how it can be achieved through the use of taxpayer relief committees, streamlined policies and guidelines, and enhanced communication.

6.4.1 Why consistency is important

Taxpayers have told us that they want us to apply the taxpayer relief provisions more consistently. The benefits of consistency are numerous and include:

- a fairer system;
- good taxpayer service; and
- improved public perception.

For example, if we allowed some requests because the amounts requested fall under a certain dollar value (e.g., penalties and interest under $10), this would lead to a huge inconsistency in the way the taxpayer relief provisions are applied. Taxpayers in the same situation would be treated differently based on the amount they owe.

This type of practice could also lead some taxpayers or their representatives to shop around for the best deal. This would also not be fair for taxpayers as a whole.

6.4.2 Using taxpayer relief committees

To improve consistency, field offices are encouraged to use taxpayer relief committees in situations where they are appropriate and manageable.

Since the inception of the taxpayer relief provisions, taxpayer relief committees have enhanced consistency by creating common approaches to processes and decision-making within work units and increasing knowledge on the part of staff.

Taxpayer relief committees are normally set at the local level within a division or are inter-divisional. They meet to make decisions on more difficult, sensitive, or precedent-setting cases and to discuss issues such as procedures and common requests. Membership may be fixed or open to any staff who work on taxpayer relief requests as directed by local management.

Some continuity in the makeup of these committees is needed. Continual, heavy turnover in staff would create a situation where a committee would be constantly starting over. However, some turnover can be good, as different employees will bring different viewpoints and experience to the table.

6.4.3 Developing streamlined policies and guidelines

Consistency can also be achieved through streamlined policies and guidelines that are updated in a timely fashion. This ensures that the same information is available to all staff, which leads to consistent and better decisions.

6.4.4 Enhancing communication

000130

Digitized by Google

Meetings or discussion groups for taxpayer relief staff of all levels can be constructive tools to enhance consistency, since this encourages dialogue and helps to ensure that everyone is "on the same page" in applying the taxpayer relief provisions. These meetings can be held within teams, divisions, local offices, or regions to discuss operational issues or problems, as well as update staff on any changes to or any new policies or guidelines.

6.5 Referrals to other areas

This section provides guidelines on when requests should be referred to other areas such as Collections, Appeals, or Audit.

6.5.1 Inability to pay and financial hardship requests

Collections areas within a tax services office are responsible for handling inability to pay and financial hardship requests. These types of requests, if received in other areas, have to be forwarded to Collections. Inability to pay or financial hardship may not be the only reason for the request.

Inability to pay requests related to an objection or appeal also have to be forwarded to Collections. These requests will be held in abeyance by Collections pending the outcome of the appeal process and the final determination of amounts owing. Collections staff should inform taxpayers that their requests will be reviewed after all appeal periods have expired.

6.5.2 Requests where a notice of objection or appeal is outstanding

Except for inability to pay requests, Appeals divisions in a tax services office or a tax centre are only responsible for handling taxpayer relief requests related to an assessment that is or was under objection or appeal.

Assessments that are or were under objection or appeal are recorded in CSAPP (Case Appeals), formerly GLOBUS.

Requests for penalty and/or interest relief related to an objection or appeal will be held in abeyance pending the outcome of the appeal process and the final determination of amounts owing. Appeals staff should notify taxpayers that their requests will be considered after all appeal periods have expired.

6.5.3 Certain Information Returns

Except for reasons due to inability to pay, all taxpayer relief requests received for penalties relief charged on certain information returns must be sent to the Ottawa Technology Centre, Other Programs Unit, 875 Heron Road, Ottawa ON K1A 1A2.

Penalty relief for the following information returns are processed only at the Ottawa Technology Centre (OTC):

- T100A, T100B and T100C, flow -through shares (FTS) information returns
- T106, Information Return of Non-Arm's Length Transactions with Non-Residents
- T1044, Non-Profit Organization (NPO) Information Return
- T5001, T5003, tax shelter information returns

0001131

Digitized by Google

- T5013, Information Return of Partnership Income
- T1134A, Information Return Relating to Foreign Affiliates That are not Controlled Foreign Affiliates
- T1134B, Information Return Relating to Controlled Foreign Affiliates
- Form T1135, Foreign Income Verification Statement
- T1141, Information Return in Respect of Transfers or Loans to a Non-Resident Trust
- T1142, Information Return in Respect of Distributions From and Indebtedness to a Non-Resident Trust

6.5.4 Other requests

Local management is responsible for determining which division/section will handle other types of requests. For example, an office may direct that taxpayer relief requests as a result of an enforcement action (audit) or gross negligence penalties be handled by Audit only.

6.6 Supporting requests

Both the taxpayer and CRA staff are responsible for making sure taxpayer relief requests are properly supported. Taxpayers have to make sure they give details of any extenuating circumstances and the documentation needed to support and establish the validity of their request. Taxpayers also have to reply in a timely manner when we ask them for more information.

It is the CRA's responsibility to make sure taxpayers are made aware that their requests have to be complete. Staff evaluating and reviewing taxpayer relief requests must determine whether taxpayers have provided enough information or if more information should be requested. If more information is needed, staff must try to contact taxpayers to obtain the information before reaching a decision.

Not asking for more information when it is needed can cause processing delays and result in poor taxpayer service and unnecessary additional requests.

See When more information is needed for instructions on how to request more information from taxpayers.

6.7 Requests taken on behalf of taxpayers

As a general rule, CRA employees should not take requests over the telephone or at the counter on behalf of taxpayers for the following reasons:

- Requests accepted over the telephone or in person would in all likelihood be incomplete, since they would not give all the information needed to efficiently resolve the request on the first attempt. More contact would be needed, which in turn would cause processing delays.
- Taking requests over the phone or in person could jeopardize our impartiality since employees could inadvertently substitute themselves in the role of the taxpayer, which could modify or taint the taxpayer's information.

000132

Digitized by Google

Exceptions can be made to these guidelines in cases where previously submitted requests are unactioned or where there is an inability to write or communicate in writing and the taxpayer has no one to help them. In these situations, care must be used to formulate requests on behalf of taxpayers in an impartial way and to try to gather as much detail and information as possible. Taxpayers should be told that more contact might be necessary. Under no circumstances should an opinion be given on whether requests will be approved or denied-this can only be determined after a thorough review.

6.8 Acknowledgement letter

It is advised that an acknowledgement letter be sent for all taxpayer relief requests.

Acknowledgement letters can be created using the Business Client Communication System (BCCS), Electronic Letter Creation System (ELCS), or a personal computer. Verification of the mailing address must be made.

You can find Electronic Letter Creation System (ELCS) information at http://sh13y393/wba007/e_a/1500/1501/08_001.cfm or click on Taxpayer Relief Letters on the Taxpayer Relief Provisions site. ELCS taxpayer relief verses for acknowledgement letters are in the ELCS Topical Index section.

See Appendices for an example of a taxpayer relief acknowledgement letter.

6.9 What constitutes a first or second review

6.9.1 What constitutes a first review

A taxpayer request for relief will result in a first level review if:

- this is the first time the taxpayer has made the request;
- the taxpayer has submitted additional information to support a request for relief for which a decision has not yet been rendered;
- the requested information for a first review is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the request will be considered as a continuation of the first level review; or
- the taxpayer is denied relief under one legislative provision and a subsequent request is made under a different legislative provision. For example, when a client is denied relief under one legislative provision (i.e. 220(3.1) penalty and/or interest relief) and a subsequent request is made under a different legislative provision (i.e. 152(4.2) reassessments beyond the normal reassessment period), the request will be considered as a first request.

6.9.2 What constitutes a second review

A taxpayer request for relief will result in a second level review if:

- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and does not provide further information;

000133

Digitized by Google

- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and provides information that was not included with the first request or requested as part of the first request;
- the taxpayer is asking CRA to reconsider its original decision and cites a reason/motive (i.e. extraordinary circumstances to financial hardship) that was not raised at the time of the first request.
- the requested information for the second review is submitted after the decision letter has been issued, the request will be considered as a continuation of the second level review

6.10 When more information is needed

Discretion is best exercised when all the facts and all questions relevant to a case are gathered, reviewed, and answered. If the information given is incomplete or inappropriate, the taxpayer should be given the opportunity to provide more information before we make our decision. More information can be requested either in writing, by phone, or in person.

6.10.1 Requesting more information in writing

Letters asking for more information can be created using the Business Client Communication System (BCCS), Electronic Letter Creation System (ELCS), or a personal computer. Verification of the mailing address must be made. Taxpayers should be given a reasonable time frame (normally 30 days) to submit the requested information with an additional 10 days allowed for postal delays.

Written requests to the taxpayer should include the following elements or information:

- a precise description of the information requested (e.g., a doctor's letter that would provide the dates and details of an illness);
- a precise description of the receipts / information slips required to support the request for (re)assessment (e.g., child care receipt(s), rent receipt(s) or official donation receipt(s));
- a time frame for the taxpayer to respond (normally 30 days);
- an indication that if a reply is not received within the time frame, the request will be reviewed based on the information available and a decision will be made;
- the name of the employee and their direct phone number or extension the taxpayer can contact for more information or ask for an extension of time to reply; and
- an address for reply.

For more information, please see Communication 2008-13, Incomplete Taxpayer Relief Requests.

You can find Electronic Letter Creation System (ELCS) information at http://sh13y393/WBA007/e_a/1500/1501/08_001.cfm or click on Taxpayer Relief Letters on the Taxpayer Relief Provisions site.

See Appendices for an example of a letter requesting more information.

6.10.2 Requesting more information over the telephone

000134

Digitized by Google

Information can also be obtained by phone. Phone requests should include the same elements and information as listed in Requesting more information in writing. There are advantages to requesting information over the phone, since it can reduce the time in which the needed information is received. However, there is a chance the taxpayer could misinterpret what information is needed or could forget what information was requested.

Staff have to be prepared not to discuss the possible outcome of the case when talking to a taxpayer on the phone. No opinion should be given as to whether the request will be approved or denied-this can only be determined after a thorough review.

If information is requested by telephone, a record of the conversation (i.e., Form T2020) should be placed in the file showing the date of the call, the name of the officer, the name of the person with whom the conversation took place, what information was requested, and the period allowed to give the information.

In addition, place an electronic note recording the same information on the applicable system. For example, an electronic note should be recorded in Section IV- Info/Delays/Transfer of the Taxpayer Relief Registry fact sheet, EI.CS notepad, ACSES diary, GST/HST Notes or other applicable system, depending on the line of business.

6.10.3 Requests involving more than one area

We often receive taxpayer relief requests that involve review by more than one area. When more information is needed, a reasonable attempt should be made to minimize the number of times we contact the taxpayer.

6.11 Communicating decisions

This section gives guidelines on communicating decisions to taxpayer, including their recourse to a second review and judicial review. When more than one area reviews a request, a combined response should generally be sent.

In cases where multiple issues are involved, officers should exercise care and make sure they take into account all the motives in the request before rendering a decision, and cover all aspects in the decision letter. The letter should clearly indicate why the CRA has decided to approve/deny the request. For example, if the request involves both extraordinary circumstances and financial difficulties, the letter must address those issues to the extent that the taxpayer/employer can acknowledge that all of his arguments have been analyzed and covered. The more detail provided, the more unlikely it will be that a second review will be submitted.

A facsimile signature stamp should not be used under any circumstances for taxpayer relief decision letters, as there could be a perception that the delegated official did not actually make the decision.

If the delegated authority is in an acting position, the signature field should be the name and acting position. Do not use "FOR" signatures.

Decision letters to taxpayers should not refer to "taxpayer relief committees" since this term is for internal use only. It may also be confusing to taxpayers. The terms "fairness provisions" and "fairness legislation" have been replaced with the term "taxpayer relief provisions". Based on this change, all taxpayer relief letters and verses should be referencing to this terminology.

000135

Care should be taken to use proper writing style and a current mailing address. Letters should be written in plain language whenever possible. Plain language uses straightforward, familiar words and simple, logical sentences. People reading a letter that is written in plain language should easily understand our decision. Address your reader directly. Try to use pronouns like you, we, us, our, and your, to make your letter more personal (you for the reader, we or us for the CRA). But be consistent; otherwise, you will confuse your reader. Consider the document structure and flow and use your judgment. You can find guidelines for writing in plain language on the Public Affairs Branch site. A list of best practices for writing taxpayer relief decision letters may be found at http://sh13y393/WBA007/e_a/1500/1501/08_001.cfm#pract. The web site also provides an ELCS topical index in order to make the search for taxpayer relief verses easier and faster.

6.11.1 Approval letters

See Appendices for examples of approval letters.

Taxpayer relief requests that are allowed in full cannot be closed over the phone. These decisions must be communicated in writing by means of a decision letter, notice of assessment/reassessment or notice of determination/redetermination. A combined response, such as, informing the taxpayer of the decision over the phone, followed by a decision letter or notice, can be done. The notice of assessment/reassessment and notice of determination/redetermination contains the signature of the Commissioner and is acceptable in lieu of a decision letter for an approval in full.

6.11.2 First review denial/partial approval letters

After a taxpayer relief request has been reviewed and a decision has been made, taxpayers must be advised in writing. Letters can be created using the Business Client Communication System (BCCS), Electronic Letter Creation System (ELCS), or a personal computer.

When communicating decisions, letters should include the following:

- an indication that the decision was made after considering the request, the facts of the case, and the legislation involved;
- a brief summary of the factors which were considered in the decision to deny the request in whole or in part;
- the basis or reasons for the denial or partial approval; and
- the name, position, and telephone number of the officer who handled the case along with an invitation to contact the officer if the taxpayer wants to discuss the matter.

It is very important that the taxpayer has a clear understanding of our decision and the reasoning for the denial in whole or in part. The taxpayer should be informed of what factors were considered in the decision. All comments, facts, and explanations provided by the requestor in writing or verbally need to be addressed by CRA. This is especially the case for a second review denial. The Federal Court may assume facts were overlooked if it is not shown that they have been considered.

Digitized by Google

Most importantly, letters have to inform taxpayers of their right to a second independent review of a denial or partial approval on the first review. Taxpayers should be informed that, if they are not satisfied with the decision or feel that the CRA has not exercised its discretion in a fair and reasonable manner, they can ask in writing that the director of their local tax services office or tax centre review their request again.

Although taxpayers are entitled to apply for a judicial review after the first review, they will only be told of this recourse after a second review.

The delegated official who made the decision to deny or partially approve the taxpayer's request by signing the taxpayer relief decision report, must sign the letter as well.

See Appendices for an example of a first review denial letter.

6.11.3 Second review denial/partial approval letters

After an unfavourable decision or partial approval from a second review, the written reply should inform taxpayers of their right to redress to a judicial review. Second review denial or partial approval letters have to contain the following paragraph:

"If you feel that discretion was not properly exercised during our review of your request for relief, you can apply to the Federal Court for a judicial review within thirty (30) days of the day you received this letter. For more information on the judicial review process and how to apply, phone the Registry of the Federal Court at (phone #). This information is also available at the Federal Court web site: http://www.fct-cf.gc.ca/index_e.shtml."

See Federal Court contact list for telephone numbers and addresses.

The senior officer who authorized the decision to deny or partially approve the taxpayer's request must sign the letter as well.

See Appendices for an example of a second review denial letter.

6.12 Applying the taxpayer relief provisions actively

CRA employees are encouraged to be proactive in communicating and applying the taxpayer relief provisions. This is especially important for front-line employees, since they are the most frequent and important point of contact with the taxpayers. This section discusses how to be proactive and the benefits of being proactive.

6.12.1 How to be proactive

Front-line staff can give information on the taxpayer relief provisions proactively over the telephone or at the counter when a taxpayer's situation warrants. In these circumstances, the information given should be limited to the basic conditions taxpayers have to meet to be eligible for relief under the taxpayer relief provisions and how to make a request. Staff can also be proactive by identifying unclaimed credits and benefits, as well as overpayments, while performing audits, examining a complaint, or evaluating a taxpayer-requested adjustment.

000137

Digitized by Google

When the situation warrants, front-line employees should inform taxpayers of the taxpayer relief provisions and refer them to the following documents:

- IC07-1, Taxpayer relief Provisions
- Memorandum 16-3, Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and/or Interest
- RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief

Employees should understand the taxpayer relief provisions and how they are applied so they do not raise a taxpayer's hopes unnecessarily and generate unnecessary additional work for the CRA. For example, employees should avoid encouraging taxpayers to submit requests when it is determined that the year(s) for which relief is being sought is past the 10-year limitation.

6.12.2 Benefits of being proactive

Although a proactive approach may result in an increase in taxpayer relief requests received, there are many benefits to being proactive in communicating and applying the taxpayer relief provisions. Active communication helps make sure taxpayers receive the information they are entitled to and enhances the taxpayers' confidence in the integrity of our self-assessment system by making sure they pay their proper share of duties and taxes.

6.13 Keeping taxpayer relief records

Taxpayer relief requests and all related information such as reports and correspondence must be kept and stored in the area that made the review for a period of two years. In situations where there has been more than one taxpayer relief request regarding the same matter, the documentation has to be combined and kept for two years from the date of the latest request. The Access to Information Act requires that documents be kept for a minimum of two years from the date they were last used for administrative purposes.

Records can be destroyed after the two-year period has passed. However, local management may choose to extend the retention period, particularly for sensitive cases.

6.13.1 Keeping an audit trail

When a local office receives a taxpayer relief request, an entry is made on the Taxpayer Relief Registry. For each completed request, the Taxpayer Relief Registry item has to be accessed to enter the rationale for the decision and the location of the documentation pertaining to the request. This information is useful in helping answer subsequent taxpayer enquiries or requests for which records were destroyed or cannot be located.

Any other useful information in the form of a narrative can also be added into the Taxpayer Relief Fact Sheet.

6.14 Consent forms - Authorizing or cancelling a representative

6.14.1 Individual, trust and T5 accounts

For individuals (T1 accounts), trusts (T3s) and T5 information returns, form T1013 - Authorizing or Cancelling a Representative, has been revised to include two levels of authorization with expiry dates. Level 1 authorization allows only for the disclosure of information, while level 2 allows for both the disclosure of information and changes to a taxpayer's account.

Therefore, for taxpayer relief requests, level 2 authorization is required. Should you receive requests with either no authorization or level 1 authorization, return the request to the representative advising that you are unable to review the request without level 2 authorization provided on form T1013. A signed letter from the taxpayer, which clearly states the representative has the authority to request changes to the taxpayer's account, is also acceptable.

6.14.2 Business accounts

For business accounts (T2, GST/HST, PAYDAC, Import/Export, etc.) RC59 - Business Consent Form or equivalent information is required for authorizing or cancelling a representative. The form has also been revised to include two levels of authorization with expiry dates. Level 1 authorization allows only for the disclosure of information, while level 2 allows for both the disclosure of information and changes to the Business Number account(s).

6.14.3 Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance Act

CPT139 - Authorization form is used to authorize representatives for matters relating to the Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance Act. There are no differing levels of consent.

7. Guidelines for cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest

This section provides guidelines that apply to all business lines to evaluate taxpayer relief requests for cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with General policies and procedures.

Most Headquarters functions have additional guidelines for their workflows. You can find references to these additional guidelines in Functional guidelines.

The CRA may waive or cancel all or part of any penalty and interest otherwise payable under the taxpayer relief provisions. The ability to waive or cancel penalties and interest is not to be used as a way to arbitrarily reduce or settle tax debt.

Effective April 1, 2007, the Excise Tax Act (ETA) was amended to introduce a failure to file penalty under section 280.1 for GST/HST. Therefore, subsection 281.1(2) will allow CRA to waive or cancel all or a portion of this penalty.

See Legislation for more information.

7.1 Difference between a cancellation and a waiver

The terms cancel and waive have two distinct meanings.

When we reverse a penalty or interest that has already been assessed or charged, we cancel it.

When penalties or interest have not yet been assessed or charged, and at the taxpayer's request or on our own initiative we determine the amount will not be assessed or charged, we waive it.

7.2 Circumstances in which interest and penalties may be cancelled or waived

Interest and Penalties may be cancelled and/or waived in the following types of situations:

a. extraordinary circumstances

b. actions of the CRA

c. inability to pay or financial hardship

The Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within these situations. The request must be made within the 10-year time limit.

Digitized by Google

7.3 Extraordinary circumstances

This section provides examples of various extraordinary circumstances and guidelines for evaluating them.

The types of circumstances beyond a taxpayer's control that may have prevented a taxpayer from making a payment when due, filing a return on time, or otherwise complying may be summarized, but not limited to, the following examples:

- natural or human-made disasters such as flood, heavy storms, or fire;
- civil disturbances or disruptions in services such as strikes or demonstrations;
- serious illness or accident;
- serious emotional or mental distress caused by death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment.

7.3.1 Natural or human-made disasters

Taxpayers can ask for taxpayer relief due to natural or human-made events such as flood, heavy storms, or fire. Relief can be granted when the event destroyed books and records, or made them inaccessible, or for other obvious reasons compliance was delayed or prevented.

Guidelines for evaluating such circumstances include but are not limited to the following:

- Consider the dates and description of events, and whether they correspond to the period when an obligation or requirement was missed.
- Review the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented compliance.
- Review the taxpayer's explanation of what other means were explored to comply with requirements.
- Review the taxpayer's supporting documentation such as a copy of the police, fire, or insurance report to determine whether the dates and description of damages correspond to the taxpayer's presentation of the facts.

7.3.2 Civil disturbances or disruptions in services

Disruptions in services such as a postal strike, a strike within the government, or civil disturbances may give cause to a request for taxpayer relief.

Guidelines for determining if such circumstances prevented compliance include, but are not limited to, the following:

- Review the dates and description of events, and verify that they correspond to the period when an obligation or requirement was missed.

000141

Digitized by Google

- Consider the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented or delayed compliance corresponds to the facts. Consider how long the disruption had been ongoing before the date payments, remittances, income tax, GST/HST, or information returns were due.
- Review the taxpayer's explanation of what other means were explored to comply with the requirement. Does the taxpayer have relatively easy access to a CRA office? Does he or she live in an area with reasonably close access to a tax services office or tax centre?
- Review the taxpayer's supporting documentation such as a newspaper clipping that supports the disruption.

7.3.3 Serious illness or accident

Taxpayers can ask for taxpayer relief if they have suffered from a serious illness or an accident to such an extent that they could not meet an obligation or requirement.

Some guidelines for evaluating such requests include the following:

- Review the date(s) and nature of the illness or accident, and how it corresponds to the period for which the relief is requested.
- Review the taxpayer's explanation of how the event prevented compliance. Consider whether the taxpayer could have had someone else take care of his or her obligations.
- Consider the taxpayer's explanations of whether other personal or business obligations were impaired.
- Review any supporting documentation such as accident reports, insurance reports (accident or health), and medical or hospital reports to make sure they verify the taxpayer's description of events.

For a corporation, estate, or trust, ask if the circumstances involve an individual having sole authority to execute the return, make the deposit, pay the tax, or remit amounts owing to the CRA. If someone else was authorized to meet the obligation, consider the reasons that person did not meet the obligation when evaluating the request. For a business, if only one person was authorized, determine if this was in keeping with reasonable standards of care.

Although it is imperative that these requests be thoroughly verified, they also should be handled with consideration and tact.

7.3.4 Serious emotional or mental distress

Taxpayers can also be granted relief if compliance was delayed or prevented because they suffered serious emotional or mental distress because of a death, serious illness, or accident in the immediate family, marital separation, or loss of employment.

To resolve these types of cases in a consistent manner, consider the following factors:

- Did the taxpayer work during the period in question or do any type of activity that would be similar in complexity to filing an income tax return?

000142

Digitized by Google

- Was the taxpayer hospitalized during the timeframe in question?
- Was the taxpayer under medical care during the timeframe in question?
- Is this (non-compliance, late filing, late payment, etc.) an isolated case?
- Are the tax returns prepared by the taxpayer or a representative?

Guidelines to consider when evaluating such circumstances include those listed in serious illness or accident as well as these additional guidelines:

- Consider the relationship of the parties involved.
- Review the date of death of the family member, marital breakdown, loss of employment, or other traumatic event and how it relates to the period for which the relief is requested.
- Review any supporting documentation to make sure it verifies the taxpayer's description of events.

These types of requests should be handled with consideration and tact.

7.4 Requests that arise due to actions of the CRA

Cancelling or waiving penalties or interest may be appropriate if the penalties or interest resulted mainly because of CRA actions and through no fault of the taxpayer, such as if:

- incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers or published information, or provided in person or over the telephone, led the taxpayer to file returns or make payments or remittances based on incorrect information;
- processing delays resulted in the taxpayer not being informed within a reasonable time that an amount was owing;
- errors occurred in processing; or
- delays occurred in providing information necessary to meet an obligation, such as if the taxpayer could not make the appropriate payments/remittances because the necessary publication or return was not available;
- Undue delays in resolving an objection, appeal or completing an audit.

In cases involving incorrect information provided by the CRA, the following should be assessed:

- Determine whether the taxpayer provided the CRA with accurate and complete information. Missing or inaccurate details provided by taxpayer can lead to an incorrect response on the part of the CRA.
- Assess the relationship between the taxpayer's situation, the information provided, and the penalty and interest assessed.

Digitized by Google

- Assess the degree of completeness of the details given to support a claim of incorrect verbal information. The more detailed the facts presented, (such as date, time, person spoken to, and details of the conversation), the more it could aid in strengthening the case.

In cases where it is alleged that the CRA was responsible for the delay, a determination should be made whether it was so and the period of delay should be established.

The examples, which follow, should help in identifying what is and what is not a delay caused by the CRA.

Examples

CRA delay
If for one reason or another, the CRA took more time than normal to process/complete a file (employee is on sick leave for a long period of time and the files were not reassigned, new priority), we could consider cancelling or waiving a portion of the interest.

Taxpayer delay
Let's take a project where the CRA sends letters to several taxpayers requesting supporting documentation. Some taxpayers comply, provide the requested documentation and have their files reassessed. However, a portion of the taxpayers do not cooperate for unknown reasons, and do not produce the documentation. Six months later, the CRA sends a follow-up letter to obtain the documentation or decides to reassess based on the existing available information. In this type of situation, the CRA should not consider cancelling or waiving interest because the delays have been due to the taxpayer's lack of action or response.

Whenever we review a request to cancel or waive interest and/or penalties, we must take into account the four factors used to arrive at a decision.

The four factors used to make a decision appear in the section 7.9 Factors to consider in arriving at the decision

7.4.1 Proactive taxpayer relief

Approving relief of interest and/or penalties due to the actions of the CRA without a taxpayer relief request is considered proactive taxpayer relief.

One of the circumstances where relief from interest and/or penalties may be warranted is undue delays in resolving an objection, an appeal, or in completing an audit also known as proactive taxpayer relief.

The decision to recommend a waiver/cancellation of interest and/or penalties will be based on the judgment of the CRA officer/auditor and the delegated authority after considering the facts of the case and the guidelines outlined in IC07-1, Taxpayer Relief Provisions and GST Memorandum Series 16-3 Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and/or Interest.

Documentation to support the waiver of interest and/or penalties should include one or more of the following:

- relevant audit or appeals working papers – the information necessary to determine the appropriateness of any waiver of interest and/or penalties.

000144

DISCLOSED PURSUANT TO THE ATI

Digitized by Google

- T2020 Memo to File (or similar working paper) – this should include a chronological account of the audit/objection/appeal as well as comments relating to the cause of any delays.
- taxpayer relief report

All CRA initiated waivers of interest, or cancellation of interest and/or penalty will require a Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR) entry number. The TRR entry should be created as soon as a proactive request is initiated. The received date must reflect the date a recommendation of proactive waiver is made. Close the TRR entry once the decision report has been approved by a delegated authority.

Prepare the decision report. In all cases, the officer/auditor must complete a decision report. All decisions made under the taxpayer relief provisions must be communicated in writing by means of a decision letter, notice of assessment/reassessment or notice of determination / redetermination.

See section 7.19 Taxpayer relief decision reports and section 6.11 Communicating decisions for more information.

See Appendices for an example of a taxpayer relief proactive decision letter.

The letter may be modified to suit the particular case and is not intended to give the taxpayer a detailed explanation, only some insight as to what is being waived/cancelled. If the taxpayer requests clarification, the officer/auditor is instructed to advise the taxpayer as to how the portion of the interest waived/cancelled was calculated and the reason(s).

All decision letters to the taxpayer should be signed by a delegated authority.

The actual interest waived will be provided on the Notice of Assessment/Reassessment (as applicable).

Forward the report and decision letter to the delegated authority and/or taxpayer relief committee for approval.

If the taxpayer disagrees with the interest and/or penalty relief that was proactively allowed by CRA and requests additional interest and/or penalty relief in respect of the same taxation year/audit period, we would consider this as a request for a second review since the Minister, or his delegate, exercised their discretion when they allowed interest and/or penalty relief proactively at the conclusion of the review/audit.

For more information, see section 6.9.2 What constitutes a second review and section 5.1.2 Second reviews.

REMEMBER, be proactive! Waive interest and penalty if it is appropriate, e.g., if there has been undue delay in completing the review/audit.

7.5 Inability to pay or financial hardship

The taxpayer relief provisions were not intended and should not be used as a way to arbitrarily reduce or negotiate settlement of a CRA account. In all circumstances, taxpayer relief requests should be reviewed independently.

000145

DISCLOSED PURSUANT TO ATIA

After confirming an inability to pay all amounts owing, it may be appropriate to consider waiving or cancelling interest in whole or in part to enable payment of the account. For example:

a. when collection had been suspended due to an inability to pay and substantial interest has accumulated or will accumulate;

b. when a taxpayer's demonstrated ability to pay requires an extended payment arrangement, consideration may be given to waiving all or part of the interest for the period from when payments start until the amounts owing are paid, as long as the agreed payments are made on time and compliance with the Act is maintained; or

c. when payment of the accumulated interest would cause a prolonged inability to provide basic necessities (financial hardship) such as food, medical help, transportation, or shelter, consideration may be given to cancelling all or part of the total accumulated interest.

Consideration would not generally be given to cancelling a penalty based on an inability to pay or financial hardship unless an extraordinary circumstance, has prevented compliance. However, there may be exceptional situations that may give rise to cancelling penalties, in whole or in part.

For example, when a business is experiencing extreme financial difficulty, and enforcement of such penalties would jeopardize the continuity of its operations, the jobs of the employees, and the welfare of the community as a whole, consideration may be given to providing relief of the penalties.

See Accounts Receivable Directorate (ARD) of this guide for references to guidelines on inability to pay and financial hardship.

7.6 Other Circumstances

There may be other circumstances in which it may be appropriate to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest. For example, a taxpayer requests relief due to a specific situation that is not considered to be an "extraordinary" circumstance. In these situations, we must consider the request to be valid and review the request in the same manner as we would for any other request.

When preparing the decision report and the letter for a request that is denied or partially denied, it is important to indicate why the specific situation presented does not warrant relief instead of indicating that the request is being denied/partially denied because the circumstance(s) was not considered "extraordinary".

In the court case, Nixon v. Canada (National Revenue) , the judge set aside the decision to deny the request for taxpayer relief. The taxpayer asked for relief due to a specific situation that prevented him from complying with his tax obligations. At the second level review process, both the report and the letter indicated that the request was denied because there were no "extraordinary" circumstances. The judge indicated that our own guidelines were not followed as we did not consider other circumstances as indicated in paragraph 24 of IC 07-01. Paragraph 24 says that the Minister may also grant relief if a taxpayer's circumstances do not fall within situations stated in paragraph 23 (extraordinary circumstances, actions of the CRA or inability to pay or financial hardship). In this case, the taxpayer had a circumstance that was not considered extraordinary and the decision to deny should not have been based on that fact alone. 7.7 Disputed assessment or amount charged

000146

Digitized by Google

Relief should not be considered for a disputed assessment or amount charged. For example, you may have two categories of requests/situations for late filing penalties:

- Taxpayers' admit the return/document is filed late but would like the penalty to be waived/cancelled; or
- Taxpayers may dispute the correctness of the penalty (taxpayers indicate the return/document was filed on time).

The first bullet situations are clearly valid taxpayer relief requests, where you are dealing with correctly charged penalties.

The second bullet situations should not be considered a taxpayer relief request. Taxpayers may dispute the penalty informally by writing/contacting us; they may also formally dispute the penalty by filing a notice of objection.

It is the officer's responsibility to ensure, before recommending taxpayer relief or referring the correspondence to taxpayer relief, that the law was applied correctly. In other words, the assessment must be valid or the taxpayer must have late-filed a return, otherwise taxpayer relief provisions do not apply.

All evidence to either support or negate the taxpayer's claim that the return/payment was filed/made on time should be reviewed, including the taxpayer's compliance history.

7.8 Making a taxpayer relief request

This section of the guide provides guidelines on making first and second taxpayer relief requests and outlines the information needed to make requests as complete as possible.

7.8.1 First requests

Taxpayers or their authorized representative normally have to ask for the cancellation or waiver of a penalty or interest in writing. In a request, taxpayers have to give the reasons why charges should be cancelled or waived, as well as enough relevant information and documents to support the validity of their claim.

When informing taxpayers how to make a taxpayer relief request, it should be stressed to them that it helps to expedite processing when a request is identified as a taxpayer relief request, and whether it is a first or second request. This will save time in screening requests and help avoid situations where requests are held in the wrong inventories for extended periods of time.

Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their requests by writing to the tax centre where they file their returns, or the tax services office serving their area.

Form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief can be used by taxpayers to request relief. Although this is not a prescribed form, field office staff should promote its use by taxpayers. The CRA will not deny a request simply because the taxpayer did not complete a RC4288. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.

Digitized by Google

Addresses and telephone numbers of CRA offices may be found in the listings of the government section of telephone books and on the Contact us page of the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca.

7.8.2 Second requests

If taxpayers do not agree with the CRA's decision in its review of their first request, they are entitled to make a second request, in writing, to the director of the tax centre, or tax services office.

A taxpayer's second request requires the following:

- the reasons why the taxpayer disagrees with our decision (e.g., not all information was considered, certain facts or details were misinterpreted or not considered in their proper context, the taxpayer simply disagrees); and
- any relevant new documents, new facts, or correspondence.

7.8.3 Requests must be complete

Taxpayers should be encouraged to make their taxpayer relief requests as complete as possible. This allows CRA staff to exercise discretion and avoid processing delays. A proper review cannot be conducted if we do not have access to all relevant information.

Staff are encouraged to promote the requirement that taxpayer relief requests be complete when providing guidance or information to taxpayers on the taxpayer relief request process.

Note : Taxpayer relief requests cannot be processed without a valid CRA account number.

A taxpayer relief request should contain the following information, regardless of the business line:

- the type and nature of the extraordinary circumstances that prevented the taxpayer from complying;
- supporting documentation such as death certificates, doctor's statements, or insurance statements;
- in cases involving financial hardship, a meaningful payment arrangement and full financial disclosure;
- supporting details of incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers, published information, or other objective evidence;
- where the incorrect information given by the CRA is of a verbal nature, the taxpayer should give all possible details such as date, time, name of CRA official spoken to, and details of the conversation;
- a complete history of events including what measures were taken (e.g., payments and payment arrangements) and when they were taken to resolve the non-compliance; and
- the name, address, and telephone number where the taxpayer may be reached if more information or explanation is needed.

Requests for the following business lines require the following information in addition to the above:

000148

Digitized by Google

Income tax

- taxpayer's social insurance number or account number
- tax years or periods involved

GST/HST

- taxpayer's GST/HST registration or account number
- reporting periods involved

7.9 Factors to consider in arriving at the decision

Consider the following factors when determining whether it is appropriate to cancel or waive penalties and/or interest:

- Past compliance
- Has the taxpayer knowingly allowed a balance to exist
- Reasonable amount of care
- Has the taxpayer acted quickly to remedy any delay or omission

7.10 Assessing reasonable care

The CRA will generally not make a decision in the taxpayer's favour unless the taxpayer took a reasonable amount of care to comply. In a normal situation, efforts should have been made to avoid, or at least minimize, delays in complying, paying, or remitting amounts due. A taxpayer should remedy any delay or omission within a reasonable time after he or she became aware of the delay or omission, or as soon as circumstances permitted.

Reasonable care is best described as whether the action or inaction of a taxpayer reflects what a person might reasonably be expected to do under comparable circumstances.

If the CRA can determine that a delay in payment or compliance arose through neglect or lack of awareness on the part of the taxpayer, relief under the taxpayer relief provisions should not be granted.

Here are some guidelines to use in determining whether reasonable care was exercised:

- Examine the taxpayer's reasons for failing to comply to determine if the dates and explanations correspond with events on which the penalties or interest are based.
- Examine the length of time between the event cited as a reason for the non-compliance and subsequent compliance, as this can indicate whether care was exercised. For example, if the taxpayer claims that he or she was unable to comply due to a fire, the reasonableness of the length of time between the fire and subsequent compliance may serve to support or refute all or part of the event's effect. This could be more difficult to assess if the reasons claimed are illness, accident, or serious emotional or mental distress. We would normally rely on medical or professional documents or proof submitted by taxpayers.

0001451

Digitized by Google

- Review whether or not the taxpayer could have anticipated the event that caused the non-compliance and to what extent the non-compliance was within the taxpayer's control.
- Determine if the taxpayer or the taxpayer's representative has knowledge that would help in knowing what the requirements or obligations would be and the repercussions in not meeting them.

7.11 Assessing past compliance

We should normally review a taxpayer's past compliance (e.g., penalty/interest history) to help determine if reasonable care was used. This is normally achieved by consulting mainframe applications or consulting a taxpayer's past records.

Evaluating a taxpayer's compliance history is particularly relevant in a situation where a taxpayer claims that he or she was not aware of, or informed of, an obligation such as the requirement to make an instalment payment or remittance, but has been assessed late instalment or remittance penalties in the recent past. If the same type of penalty or interest charges are assessed from year to year, this may indicate that a taxpayer is not exercising reasonable care in meeting his or her obligations. How far back we should assess a taxpayer's compliance history depends on the circumstances of each case.

It should be emphasized that a taxpayer's compliance history should not be the sole basis on which a taxpayer relief decision is based. It is only one of the factors to consider. The purpose or intent of weighing the compliance history when deliberating on a taxpayer relief request is to determine the credibility of the taxpayer's description of events and facts.

Assessing a taxpayer's past compliance would be less relevant if circumstances were out of the taxpayer's control and the non-compliance was reasonably remedied.

The fact that a taxpayer has a poor compliance record would not lead to refusing the taxpayer's request if the circumstances of the case show no evidence of negligence. For example, penalties and interest could be cancelled or waived if an electronic transaction or filing was overdue because of the failure of the CRA's systems, even if a taxpayer has a poor compliance history.

7.12 Special consideration due to extraordinary events

The Minister may issue a news release to announce that special consideration will be given to providing relief due to an extraordinary event that has prevented a large number of taxpayers from meeting their tax obligations. Generally, taxpayers still need to make a written request to get relief.

CRA news releases on extraordinary events that qualify for relief can be found at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/newsroom/releases/menu-e.html.

See Communications for internal instructions issued to field office staff on TRSCD site.

7.13 Third parties

A third party can be defined as a representative acting on behalf of the taxpayer/employer.

Taxpayers are responsible for meeting their obligations under the legislation we administer. As a result, taxpayers are generally considered to be responsible for errors made by third parties. Third parties who receive a fee and give incorrect advice, and make arithmetic or accounting errors should normally be regarded as being responsible to the taxpayer, if the taxpayer has suffered penalty or interest charges because of the party's actions.

In very rare situations, relief could be granted to taxpayers because of third-party errors or delays. An extraordinary circumstance beyond the control of a taxpayer's representative, which prevented the taxpayer from complying, can be a reasonable basis for granting relief. For example, it would be proper to grant relief when a taxpayer's representative cannot file a return or an election on time because the representative was just hospitalized.

This is why it is important to review all taxpayer relief requests with care when third-party error is involved. Special care should be taken in granting taxpayer relief in cases of third-party errors so as not to undermine the principles of self-assessment.

7.13.1 Bank error

There may be exceptional situations where it may be appropriate to provide relief arising from a bank error or delay, if it has been established that the error occurred from a situation beyond the taxpayer's or employer's control. For example, if the employer makes his payment on time directly at his financial institution, but a delay occurs in the transfer of funds to CRA due to a computer breakdown, then it may be possible to consider cancelling the penalty and interest charges on the remittance, providing the bank can corroborate the situation. In this case, the bank is the third party and has admitted being at fault. This is clearly a situation beyond the employer's control. As a general rule, these types of requests should be approved if the financial institution can substantiate the circumstances.

7.13.2 Employer error

An employer error is different from a third party error as the employer commits the error.

In cases of employer error, officers need to look at each taxpayer relief request on a case-by case basis. Where the CRA is satisfied that the employee had no knowledge or could not have been expected to know that the amounts on the T4 were incorrect because of an employer error, it would be reasonable to consider waiving or cancelling the interest and/or penalties.

7.14 Ignorance of the law

Generally, ignorance of the law or taxpayer error should not be accepted as a proper basis for granting relief under the taxpayer relief provisions. If the delay in compliance or in making a payment/remittance arose through neglect, carelessness, or lack of awareness on the part of the taxpayer, the penalties or interest should not normally be cancelled or waived, or the election should not normally be accepted. For example, the fact that a taxpayer was not aware of a filing requirement does not constitute by itself an acceptable reason for granting relief.

000151

7.15 Gross negligence penalties

Relief request to cancel a gross negligence penalty can be considered under subsection 220(3.1).

However, since these penalties indicate a degree of negligence and absence of care and diligence on the part of the taxpayer, the cancellation of a gross negligence penalty may be appropriate only in exceptional circumstances.

Given the nature of a gross negligence penalty, it is more appropriate for a taxpayer to dispute the assessment of the penalty by filing a notice of objection.

7.16 Erroneous refunds

Cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest may be appropriate if the CRA made an error by issuing a cheque to a taxpayer for a greater amount than the taxpayer is entitled to without justification, foundation, or rationale. An example would be a refund cheque for $1,000 mistakenly issued for $10,000, due to a keystroke error.

The question of whether or not to waive or cancel penalties and/or interest that have accrued on a refund issued to a taxpayer in error would need to be decided based on the facts of each individual case.

The main considerations when reviewing such requests would be:

- Whether the taxpayer acted in a timely manner to bring the matter to the CRA's attention: Did the taxpayer contact the CRA within a reasonable time?
- Whether the taxpayer has taken a reasonable amount of care in trying to resolve the situation: Did the taxpayer contact the CRA to question the discrepancy?
- Whether it would have been clear to the taxpayer that an error had been made and that he or she was not entitled to the funds: Was there a discrepancy between the balance or refund calculated by the taxpayer and the amount of the refund received?

Although each case must be evaluated on its own merit, the taxpayer is normally expected to report the occurrence to the CRA within a reasonable time after becoming aware of the error, to qualify for total penalty and interest relief.

7.17 Amounts held in trust

If a taxpayer meets the criteria for taxpayer relief, it should be granted whether or not trust funds (e.g., payroll accounts or GST/HST accounts,) are involved. The fact that amounts are considered to be held in trust should not be the sole basis for denying a request under the taxpayer relief provisions. For example, a waiver or cancellation may be considered in cases of legitimate financial hardship where the continuity of business operations and the continued employment of the firm's employees are unnecessarily jeopardized because of circumstances beyond the control of the taxpayer.

7.18 Reinstating cancelled or waived penalties and/or interest

After penalties and/or interest have been cancelled or waived, they generally cannot be reinstated, since there is no basis in law to allow for reinstatement. Even if penalties or interest could be reinstated, in most cases it would not be fair, expedient, or cost effective to do so after the cancellation or waiver has been granted.

7.19 Taxpayer relief decision reports/fact sheets

This section describes why reports are mandatory, what information they should include, and other essential elements.

7.19.1 Reports/fact sheets are mandatory

Officers who review requests for cancelling or waiving penalties and interest must complete a taxpayer relief decision report - fact sheet. These reports outline the taxpayer's facts and reasons of their request, our analysis of these facts and reasons, and our recommendation to allow, partially allow, or deny the request. A report and its recommendation have to receive proper approval by a delegated authority. See Delegation policies for information on delegation of authority.

Reports are often used as reference material to answer taxpayer enquiries or to help review second requests. Copies of the taxpayer relief decision reports can also be forwarded to the Federal Court to serve as evidence when there has been a request for a judicial review of a taxpayer relief decision.

Taxpayers can also ask for a copy of any taxpayer relief decision report/fact sheet through access to information legislation.

7.19.2 Information to include in a report/fact sheet

As part of the redesigned Taxpayer Relief Registry, a fact sheet has been incorporated into the registry as of April 2009. The report/fact sheet must include the following information:

- the taxpayer's identification - name, account number, social insurance number, GST/HST registration;
- the taxpayer's request -year(s) or period(s) involved, amount of penalties and/or interest sought, nature of the request, i.e., cancellation or waiver;
- the taxpayer's facts and reasons - the circumstances experienced by the taxpayer and how they prevented the taxpayer from meeting an obligation;
- a description of the supporting documents given (or an indication that there are none);
- the officer's analysis of the facts - factors considered in arriving at a recommendation, conversations with the taxpayer or the authorized representative;
- the officer's recommendation - approval, partial approval, or denial; and
- approval by a delegated authority.

7.19.3 Essential elements of a report

When reading the report/fact sheet, someone with little knowledge of the taxpayer relief provisions should be able to understand the taxpayer's request and the reasons why it was made, what steps were taken during the review, what decision was reached, and the reasons for the decision.

If a request is to be allowed in full, the officer's analysis and the resulting taxpayer relief decision report would not require great detail. If the request is to be denied or partially allowed, a more detailed analysis and taxpayer relief decision report is needed.

Here are guidelines to consider when writing a report:

- Be impartial, avoid making personal opinions and judgments.
- Stick to the facts.
- Be clear and concise. Avoid jargon.
- Present the report in a logical order (the ideas and content of the report should have a natural flow).

8. Guidelines for refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three-year period (income tax)

This section gives guidelines for considering taxpayer relief requests for refunds beyond the normal three-year period for individuals and testamentary trusts. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with General policies and procedures.

The Individual Returns and Payments Processing Directorate of the Assessment and Benefit Services Branch has developed additional guidelines, which can be found in functional guidelines.

The CRA may issue a refund beyond the normal three-year period or reduce an amount owing if it is satisfied that such refund or reduction would have been made if a return or request had been filed or made on time, and as long as the assessment or reassessment is correct in law and has not been previously allowed. This only applies to individuals and testamentary trusts.

The request must be made within the 10-year time limit.

See the Legislation section for more information.

8.1 Refunds or reducing tax payable for a statute barred return

An individual or testamentary trust may ask the CRA for a refund or a reduction of tax payable for an income tax return that is beyond the normal three-year period. This may include:

a. a request for a refund of taxes for an income tax return not previously filed;

b. a request for a refund of taxes or a reduction of tax payable due to a deduction/non-refundable tax credit not previously claimed;

c. a request for a refund of taxes or a reduction of tax payable due to a decrease in taxable income; or

d. a request for a refund of taxes due to a refundable credit not previously claimed.

In any situation that a taxpayer or testamentary trust requests a refund beyond the normal three-year period, there may be a recalculation of certain refundable tax credits such as:

a. refundable Quebec abatement for income earned in Quebec by an individual resident of Quebec under subsection 120(2);

b. refundable First Nations abatement for individuals who are subject to income tax legislation of certain First Nations under subsection 120(2.2);

c. goods and services tax/harmonized sales tax (GST/HST) credit available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.5(3);

d. refundable medical expense supplement available to eligible individuals under subsection 122.51(2);

Digitized by Google

e. refundable investment tax credit available to taxpayers under subsection 127.1(1);

f. the tax credit that a beneficiary of a mining reclamation trust can claim under subsection 127.41(3);

g. the tax credit that certain beneficiaries can claim under subsection 210.2(3) for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust;

h. the tax credit a Canadian partnership flows through to its partners for the Part XII.2 tax paid by a trust under subsection 210.2(4); and

i. Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) payments available to eligible individuals for qualified dependants under subsection 122.61(1).

Whenever a request for a refund or reduction in amounts payable beyond the three-year period is accepted, paragraph 152(4.2)(b) allows for a redetermination of the above refundable credits.

8.2 Accepting a refund or adjustment request

The taxpayer relief provisions allow the CRA to issue a refund or reduce the amount of tax owed if it is satisfied that such a refund or reduction would have been made if the return or request had been filed or made on time.

Individuals and testamentary trusts can make a request if they were unaware of, or missed, claiming a deduction or a non-refundable tax credit that was available for the year. Individuals can also ask for refunds or reduction of amounts owing for refundable tax credits such as provincial tax credits or an overpayment of taxes.

The request may result in a calculation or recalculation of credits such as the Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) and/or the Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC).

There do not need to be circumstances beyond a client's control to allow these types of requests. The client needs to provide supporting documentation and the claim must be correct under law and not previously allowed.

Generally, CRA will not accept a request for an adjustment to a statue barred tax year of an individual where the adjustment would result in the increase of taxes, interest, or penalties to the returns of other individuals that are statute-barred and cannot be reassessed by the CRA.

Example 1

A taxpayer files a 2000 T1 income tax return on April 1, 2008. The taxpayer is requesting a refund of a portion of tax paid throughout the year. The return was filed more than three years from the end of the tax year but the request was made within the 10-year time limitation.

The request is accepted and the income tax return is processed. Paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the Income Tax Act (ITA) allows us to refund the overpayment of tax.

0001516

Digitized by Google

Example 2

A taxpayer requests an adjustment to allow a deduction not previously claimed. The taxpayer has submitted an acceptable receipt to support the claim. The return was filed on time but the request was made outside the normal three-year reassessment period. The request was made within the 10-year time limitation. The adjustment will result in a refund of taxes and an increase in the amount of Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC) the individual is entitled to.

The request is accepted and the reassessment processed. Paragraph 152(4.2)(a) of the ITA allows us to reassess the return, paragraph 152(4.2)(b) of the ITA allows for the recalculation of the GSTC and paragraph 164(1.5)(b) us to refund the overpayment of tax.

8.3 Limitations and restrictions

This section provides information on limitations and restrictions regarding taxpayer's request for refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three year period.

8.3.1 Provincial benefits or credits

Time limitations to claim provincial benefits or credits that are administered by CRA for the provinces are stipulated in the applicable provincial act. Subsection 152(4.2) and paragraph 164(1.5)(a) of the ITA do not override provincial limitations, unless provincial law allows for it.

8.3.2 Permissive deductions

CRA will not process a reassessment if the requested credit is the result of an increased claim for capital cost allowance or other allowable deductions, where the taxpayer originally claimed less than the maximum amount allowable.

See IC84-1, Revision of Capital Cost Allowance Claims and Other Permissive Deductions for more information.

8.3.3 Employment Insurance Premiums and Canada Pension Plan

Taxpayer relief provisions to allow a refund beyond the normal three year period does not affect refunds for overpayments of Employment Insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan contributions.

The time limit for refunds is three years under the Employment Insurance Act and four years under the Canada Pension Plan.

8.3.4 Requests based in court decisions or other resolutions

Taxpayer relief requests to reassess a statue barred return will not be allowed if the request is based on another's successful appeal; negotiated settlement or consent to judgment on an appeal if the taxpayer has chosen not to protect their right of objection or appeal.

See IC75-7R3, Reassessment of a Return of Income for more information.

8.4 Making a taxpayer relief request

This section provides guidelines on making first and second taxpayer relief requests and outlines the information needed to make requests as complete as possible.

8.4.1 First requests

Individuals and testamentary trusts or their authorized representatives normally have to ask for a refund in writing. They can do this by filing their income tax return(s) or requests for adjustment together with documentation to support their claim.

Requests should be sent to the tax centre where they file their returns or the tax services office serving their area.

Form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief can be used by taxpayers to request relief. Although this is not a prescribed form, field office staff should promote its use by taxpayers. The CRA will not deny a request simply because the taxpayer did not complete a RC4288. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.

Addresses and telephone numbers of CRA offices may be found in the listings of the government section of telephone books and on the Contact us page of the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca.

A taxpayer's request for a refund or a reduction of amounts owing should include:

- the taxpayer's name, address, and social insurance number, trust account number or other account number provided by CRA
- the tax year(s) involved;
- all supporting documents; and
- an explanation of the adjustment the taxpayer wants.

To support a request, taxpayers should give the following information:

- official receipts or certified "true" copies of receipts or documents (e.g., for tuition, RRSP contributions, charitable donations, and share certificates);
- copies of information slips (e.g., T3, T4, T5);
- details or calculations of specific expenses or deductions being claimed, such as previous and revised business or rental loss statements or investment income schedules; and
- proof of payment such as cancelled cheques for rental payments or notary contracts.

8.4.2 Second requests

If taxpayers do not agree with the CRA's decision in its review of their first request, they are entitled to make a second request, in writing, to the director of the tax centre, or tax services office.

000158

Digitized by Google

A taxpayer's second request requires the following:

- the reasons why the taxpayer disagrees with our decision (e.g., not all information was considered, certain facts or details were misinterpreted or not considered in their proper context, the taxpayer simply disagrees); and
- any relevant new documents, new facts, or correspondence.

8.4.3 Requests must be complete

Taxpayers should be encouraged to make their taxpayer relief requests as complete as possible. This allows CRA staff to exercise discretion and avoid processing delays. A proper review cannot be conducted if we do not have access to all relevant information.

Staff are encouraged to promote the requirement that taxpayer relief requests be complete when providing guidance or information to taxpayers on the taxpayer relief request process.

See When more information is needed for more information.

8.5 Taxpayer relief decision reports/fact sheets

If a request is to be allowed in full, the officer's analysis and the resulting taxpayer relief decision report/fact sheet would not require great detail. For example, a notation that the claim is correct under law, and that it had not been previously allowed and is fully supported, would be sufficient. If the request is to be denied or partially allowed, a more detailed analysis and taxpayer relief fact sheet is needed.

Taxpayer relief procedures for reviewing refunds or reduction in amounts payable beyond the normal three year period are different than those for cancellation or waiver for interest and/or penalties, as there do not need to be circumstances beyond a client's control to allow these types of requests. The client needs to provide receipts, slips, etc., and the claim must be correct under law and not been previously allowed.

For more information/details on the fact sheet, see Part 4 of the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide at: 08_023.cfm

9. Guidelines for accepting late, amended, or revoked elections (income tax)

This section gives guidelines for taxpayer relief requests to accept late, amended, or revoked elections. These guidelines should be used in conjunction with General policies and procedures.

The CRA may extend the filing due date for making certain elections or grant permission to amend or revoke certain election. A late, amended, or revoked election must be correct in law based on the relevant legislation in place for the applicable tax year to which the election applies.

The request must be made within the 10-year time limit.

See Legislation for more information.

000159

Digitized by Google

9.1 Elections covered by the taxpayer relief provisions

The elections for which a request can be made under the taxpayer relief provisions are found in section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations. See the Appendices for a complete list of these elections along with a brief description.

If the request to accept a late, amended or revoked election has been accepted, CRA will consider the late or amended election to have been made at the time it was required. Earlier elections will be cancelled for amended and revoked elections. CRA will reassess the affected returns for the tax years in question even if the years are beyond the taxpayer's normal reassessment period (i.e. statute-barred years).

9.2 Penalty for late filed, amended or revoked elections

Taxpayers that are allowed to late-file, amend, or revoke elections are liable, under subsection 220(3.5) of the Income Tax Act, to a penalty of $100 for each complete month from the due date of the election to the date the taxpayer made a complete application to CRA, to a maximum of $8,000.

The application date is when the taxpayer provided CRA with complete and accurate information for the election under review.

Taxpayers should remit the penalty amount with their request. It is CRA policy not to accept late, amended, or revoked elections, or to process the necessary adjustments unless the penalty is paid. The CRA will determine and assess any unpaid balance of the penalty. Interest will be charged on the unpaid balance of the penalty from the date of the Notice of Assessment to the date of payment.

This penalty is also subject to the taxpayer relief provisions. If the circumstances that allow for accepting a late-filed, amended, or revoked election are the same as the circumstances we would accept for cancelling or waiving penalties and interest, then we should strongly consider not levying this penalty (i.e., waiving it).

In these cases, a Taxpayer Relief Registry item must be created. See Guidelines for cancelling or waiving penalties and/or interest for more information.

9.3 Deemed prescribed elections

The rules and guidelines for accepting late, amended or revoked elections also apply to the following designations and allocations that are considered prescribed elections, under subsection 220(3.21):

- Paragraph 80(2)(i) of the Act allows a taxpayer to designate the order in which commercial debt obligations settled at the same time are to be applied for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.
- Subsections 80(5) to 80(11) allow a taxpayer who has designated a forgiven amount to apply any remaining part of the forgiven amount in certain circumstances.
- Subsection 80.03(7) allows a taxpayer to designate a capital gain that would otherwise arise under subsection 80.03(2) as a forgiven amount for the purpose of the debt forgiveness rules.
- Subsection 132.11(6) allows a mutual fund trust, as well as any electing trust with a December 15 year-end, to choose an amount designated by it for a tax year to be added in computing its income for the year.

9.4 Basis for accepting requests

A request may be accepted in the following situations:

- There have been tax consequences not intended by the taxpayer, and there is evidence that the taxpayer took reasonable steps to comply with the law. This could include, for example, a situation where the taxpayer obtained a bona fide valuation for a property, but after the CRA's review the valuation was found to be incorrect.

- The request arises from circumstances that were beyond the taxpayer's control. Such extraordinary circumstances could include natural or man-made disasters such as flood or fire; civil disturbances or disruptions in services, such as a postal strike; a serious illness or accident; or serious emotional or mental distress, such as death in the immediate family.

- The taxpayer acted on incorrect information given by the CRA. This could include incorrect written replies to queries and errors in CRA publications.

- The request results from what is clearly a mechanical error. This could include using the net book value amount (when obviously the taxpayer intended to use the undepreciated capital cost) or using an incorrect cost.

- The subsequent accounting of the transactions by all parties is as if the election had been made, or had been made in a certain way.

- The taxpayer can demonstrate that he or she was not aware of the election provision, even though the taxpayer took a reasonable amount of care to comply with the law, and undertook remedial action as quickly as possible.

9.5 Basis for denying requests

A request will not be accepted in the following instances:

1. It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer made the request for retroactive tax planning purposes. This could include taking advantage of changes to the law enacted after the due date of the election.
2. Adequate records do not exist to verify whether or not the request can be accepted.
3. It is reasonable to conclude that the taxpayer had to make the request because he or she was negligent or careless in complying with the law.

9.6 Making a taxpayer relief request

This section of the guide gives guidelines on making first and second taxpayer relief requests, and outlines the information needed to make requests as complete as possible.

9.6.1 First requests

000161

Digitized by Google

Taxpayers or their authorized representative normally have to request a late, amended, or revoked election in writing. In their request, taxpayers have to provide the reasons why the election should be allowed and sufficient relevant information and documents to support the validity of their claim.

When informing taxpayers how to make a taxpayer relief request, it should be stressed to them that it helps to speed processing if their requests are properly identified as taxpayer relief requests, and whether it is a first or second request. This will save time in screening requests, and help avoid situations where requests are held in the wrong inventories for extended periods of time.

Taxpayers or their authorized representatives can make their request by writing to the tax centre where they file their returns or the tax services office serving their area.

Form RC4288, Request for Taxpayer Relief can be used by taxpayers to request relief. Although this is not a prescribed form, field office staff should promote its use by taxpayers. The CRA will not deny a request simply because the taxpayer did not complete a RC4288. A copy of this form is available from the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca/formspubs/menu-e.html or by telephone at 1-800-959-2221.

Addresses and telephone numbers of CRA offices may be found in the listings of the government section of telephone books and on the Contact us page of the CRA Web site at www.cra-arc.gc.ca.

9.6.2 Second requests

If taxpayers do not agree with the CRA's decision in its review of their first request, they are entitled to make a second request, in writing, to the director of the tax centre or tax services office.

A taxpayer's second request requires the following:

- the reasons why the taxpayer disagrees with our decision (e.g., not all information was considered, certain facts or details were misinterpreted or not considered in their proper context, the taxpayer simply disagrees); and
- any relevant new documents, new facts, or correspondence.

9.6.3 Requests must be complete

Taxpayers should be encouraged to make their taxpayer relief requests as complete as possible. This allows CRA staff to exercise discretion and avoid processing delays. A proper review cannot be conducted if we do not have access to all relevant information.

Note: Taxpayer relief requests cannot be processed without a valid CRA account number.

A request to accept a late, amended or revoked election should contain the following elements:

- the names, addresses, social insurance numbers, partnership numbers, and corporation numbers of all the taxpayers involved;
- the dates and details of the transactions;
- the date and details of the original election including an explanation of why the taxpayer is asking to amend or revoke an election;

000162

Digitized by Google

- details of a late-filed election, and an explanation why it is being filed late;
- the election needs to be made in the appropriate manner required by the specific provisions of the Act (e.g., filing the election in a prescribed form or in a prescribed manner);
- a brief description of the income tax implications of the acceptance or refusal of the request for all the parties involved; and
- appropriate revised schedules reflecting changes, should accepting the request involve changes to continuing tax account balances.

When the request involves more than one taxpayer, an agreement to the changes requested, signed by all parties, should be included with the request.

A taxpayer relief request should also contain the following information:

- the type and nature of the extraordinary circumstances that prevented the taxpayer from complying;
- supporting documentation;
- supporting details of incorrect information given by the CRA in the form of written answers or errors in published information, or other objective evidence; and
- the name, address, and telephone number, where the taxpayer may be reached if more information or explanation is needed

9.7 Taxpayer relief decision reports/fact sheets

If a request is to be allowed in full, the officer's analysis and the resulting taxpayer relief decision report/fact sheet would not require great detail. For example, a notation that the claim is correct under law, and that it had not been previously allowed and is fully supported, would be sufficient. If the request is to be denied or partially allowed, a more detailed analysis and taxpayer relief fact sheet is needed.

For more information/details on the fact sheet, see Part 4 of the Taxpayer Relief Registry Guide at: 08_023.cfm

10. Judicial review

A judicial review of any discretionary decision made by the federal government from which there is no right of appeal, may be applied for pursuant to Section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, within 30 days of the date notification of the discretionary decision is communicated.

In cases where taxpayers are not satisfied with the discretion the CRA exercised in its review of their requests, taxpayers can apply for a judicial review to the Federal Court by following certain steps. Our role is to advise the taxpayer of the option of pursuing the matter to Federal Court; we are not in a position to advise the taxpayer about Federal Court rules and procedures. Officers should be careful not to give the taxpayer an opinion about their chances of success in court. The Court will focus its review only on whether discretion was properly exercised.

0001653

Digitized by Google

During its review, the Court has access to the taxpayer relief records (e.g., taxpayer's request, taxpayer relief report, and correspondence). As well, the officer who made the decision under review may be asked to give an affidavit to the Court.

There are three possible outcomes of a judicial review:

- withdrawn: the applicant decides not to continue to Court; in this case, the CRA will be advised that the application for judicial review has been withdrawn, meaning the case never makes it to the court hearing stage.
- dismissed: the Court finds that CRA acted in good faith and finds no reviewable error to warrant intervention of the Court.
- allowed: when the Federal Court finds concerns or flaws in our review process, the application for judicial review is allowed.

If the Court rules that discretion was not properly exercised, it will refer the matter back to the minister for reconsideration, as can be seen in Gandy v. Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. As with any subsequent review, cases referred back from the Federal Court must be handled by a person or persons not previously involved. Considerations, including the Court's direction, will determine if the case is referred back to the same office, or in some situations, to a different office, for a new review and decision.

Judicial review decisions are published on the Federal Court website. Search options include the Applicant's name and the year of decision. The site also allows the search for the Federal Court of Appeals decisions.

flows to Taxpayer disagrees, Supreme Court of Canada (which also has an Allowed option) and Dismissed.

10.2 Requests under Rule 317

Most Applicants (taxpayers) request copies of all materials from the Respondent (CRA) that were before the Minister's delegate who rendered the second level taxpayer relief decision, either in their Notice of Application or subsequently - Rule 317.

This section of the guide provides information on Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules and outlines the national standard process to be followed when the Canada Revenue Agency (the "respondent") is notified by the Department of Justice that the taxpayer (the "applicant") has made a Rule 317 request.

The CRA and the Tax Law Services Portfolio from the Department of Justice have come to an agreement about each of their respective roles and responsibilities to ensure requests made under Rule 317 are handled in a consistent, efficient, and timely manner.

The Tax Law Services Portfolio has issued similar procedures to all counsel in the Practice Directive 2010-002, Rule 317 requests – judicial review of requests for taxpayer relief.

10.2.1 Certified copy of material

Under Rule 317 of the Federal Courts Rules, an applicant is entitled to request a certified copy of material that is relevant to their Notice of Application for judicial review, and in possession of the CRA, but not in the possession of the applicant.

The request for certified documents may be included in the Notice of Application or made separately.

When a Rule 317 request is made, the office that conducted the taxpayer relief review and made the recommendation will:

1) Prepare the certified copy of material, and
2) Forward the taxpayer relief file, certificate (Schedule "A") and bundle of documents to the Department of Justice.

Where a separate Rule 317 request is made, and the taxpayer relief file was sent to the Litigation Office at the time the Notice of Application was filed, the Litigation Office will forward the taxpayer relief file to the officer, along with a copy of the judicial review application and the Rule 317 request to prepare the certified copy of material.

10.2.2 Time limit to produce certified copies (Rule 318)

Under Rule 318 of the Federal Courts Rules, the Department of Justice must transmit the certified copy of the requested material to the Federal Court and the applicant within 20 calendar days after the Rule 317 request was received by the Department of Justice. Where the Rule 317 request is made in the Notice of Application, use the Department of Justice received date stamp of service of the Notice of Application by the Federal Court or the Department of Justice received date stamp of service of the Rule 317 request, if it was made after the Notice of Application was filed.

0001186

Digitized by Google

Three certificates (Schedule A) and three certified bundle of materials, along with the taxpayer relief file must be provided to the Department of Justice by courier or hand-delivered at least 5 working days prior to the 20 day deadline.

The "20 calendar days" excludes the day the request is received by the Department of Justice and includes the last day. If the last day falls on a weekend or a holiday, it is due the following business day.

Note: The "20 calendar days" does not include the court's Christmas recess from December 21 to January 7.

For example, a Rule 317 request served on the Department of Justice:

- September 10, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on September 30.
- September 22, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on October 13 (Thanksgiving is October 12, 2009).
- December 16, 2009, the documentation must be transmitted on January 26, 2010.

10.2.3 Rule 317 process

The following summarizes the process when a Rule 317 request is received.

1) The Department of Justice will advise the Litigation Office.

   Upon receipt of a request, the Department of Justice will advise the Litigation Office that a Rule 317 request has been made.

2) The Litigation Office will arrange for the certification of the material.

   Upon receipt, the Litigation Office will:

   - Contact the officer involved with the decision and request that the certified documents be prepared, and
   - Provide the officer with a copy of the Notice of Application and request made under Rule 317 through secure transmission.

3) Certification of the material.

   Generally, the officer who conducted the review and prepared the recommendation for the authorized delegate's approval will prepare the certified copy of material.

   The officer will review the taxpayer relief file and identify all relevant documents, including screen prints to be certified. The Justice counsel assigned to the case will be available to advise the officer preparing the certified material and will make the final decision whether documents and/or specific information should be excluded from the certified bundle of material due to:

   - relevancy to the taxpayer relief decision under judicial review;
   - third party confidential information; or

Digitized by Google

- solicitor-client privilege.

4) Prepare certificate and certified copy of the material.

Prepare three original certificates (Schedule A) and three certified bundle of documents. They must be forwarded along with the entire taxpayer relief file to the Department of Justice at least 5 working days prior to the 20 day deadline.

5) Update the Taxpayer Relief Registry.

Update Section IV – Info/Delay/Transfer field of the Taxpayer Relief Registry to record the date of receipt of the Rule 317 request, confirm that the certification of the material has been completed and record the date the material was forwarded to the Department of Justice.

10.2.4 Identify documents for certification

A judicial review applicant making a request for documents under Rule 317 is required to "identify the material requested", but will often make a request for all documents in the CRA's possession that are not in the applicant's possession.

To identify documents for certification, read the Notice of Application and the request for documents to determine whether the applicant is asking for:

- specific documents; or
- all documents in the CRA's possession.

A document must be produced if it is:

- relevant to the judicial review application; and
- not already in the possession of the applicant.

The officer involved with the taxpayer relief decision will review the taxpayer relief file and identify all the documents that must be certified. Consult with Justice counsel if you are uncertain whether particular documents should be included.

Note: The Department of Justice will decide whether a document should be excluded.

Relevancy

Information reviewed by the officer and the delegated authority prior to the decision being issued is relevant. All documents prepared by them are also relevant. In addition, all supporting documents submitted to the CRA for review in relation to the taxpayer relief request, prior to the decision being issued, whether or not considered, are relevant.

000168

Digitized by Google

Relevant information that was reviewed while considering the taxpayer's request for relief is detailed in the decision report/fact sheet. The fact sheet provides details of the taxpayer's request and the reasons why it was made, what steps were taken during the review, the officer's summary of recommendations, what decision was reached, and the reasons for the decision.

The following documents would generally fall within the scope of a Rule 317 request:

- first-level taxpayer relief report;
- second-level taxpayer relief report;
- all notes prepared by CRA officers that are contained in the taxpayer relief file; and
- all CRA system printouts of screens reviewed in assessing the relief request, such as ACSES Diary, ELCS Notepad, Notes for Businesses, GHRAPS, T2, BN and RAPID options.

While a document and/or screen print may be relevant to the judicial review application, only material not already in the possession of the applicant must be produced.

Material not already in the possession of the applicant

In situations where specific documents are listed on the request, certify the relevant documents (if not confidential or protected) regardless of whether they are in the applicant's possession. The request may include CRA internal procedures, such as a relevant section or part from a manual or guide. For these requests, sanitized versions available for certification can be obtained from CRA's public reading rooms, where available.

If the applicant requests that all documents in the possession of the CRA be produced, a determination must be made as to whether each document is already in the possession of the applicant. Only relevant documents that have not been submitted to the CRA by the applicant or authorized representative, or are not duplicate copies of documents issued by the CRA to the applicant, must be produced.

For example:
A letter issued to the taxpayer by the CRA considered during the review is relevant but does not need to be produced because the applicant already has the letter. While an Option C print-out may contain the same information as the notice of (re)assessment or notice of (re)determination issued to the applicant, it is not the same document and must therefore be produced.

To determine if documents have been issued by the CRA, review the information in the taxpayer relief file and appropriate mainframe systems, such as RAPID, ELCS, BCCS, ACSES, CSAPP and applicable diary notes.

In some cases it may be difficult to determine whether a document is already in the possession of the applicant. If uncertain, provide a copy of the document unless it is confidential or protected.

Digitized by Google

10.2.5 Prepare certified copy of the material and certificate

The certification of documents does not need to be completed by the authorized delegate who approved the taxpayer relief decision. Generally, the officer who conducted the review and prepared the recommendation for the authorized delegate's approval will prepare the certified copy of the material and certificate.

Once the relevant documents for certification have been identified, three copies of the original documents, printouts of documents retained in electronic form, and computer screen prints must be photocopied and/or printed.

While the photocopying and screen prints can be completed by support staff, the taxpayer relief officer must review each document to confirm that the photocopies and printouts are complete and accurate reproductions of the original documents.

Computer printouts

For guidelines on printing and sanitizing common individual screen printouts, see TABLE OF AVAILABLE PRINTOUTS - DOCUMENTS REQUESTED BY TAXPAYER OR THIRD PARTIES in the Individual Services Technical Help Guide.

The Individual Enquiries Printout Request (IEPRT) application provides sanitized printouts of taxpayer information. For example, the following information will not be printed from a RAPID, Option C screen:

- Information about others
- Internal CRA codes

Other RAPID Options available for print using IERPT are:

- Income and Deductions (Rapid Option C)
- Information Slips (Rapid Option DD.3)
- Capital Gains and Losses & Multi Year Data (Rapid Option C-MY)
- Home Buyer's Plan (Rapid Option HH.01)
- RRSP Deduction Limit & Multiyear RRSP Contributions (Rapid Option R.1) (Rapid Option R.7)
- Instalment Reminders (Rapid Option BB.1)
- Discounter Clearance (Rapid Option Q)
- Tuition and Education Amounts (Rapid Option C-MY)

For information about this application, refer to the Individual Enquiries Printout Request User Manual

For screen prints, other than IERPT, do not forget to black out any information that is not to be disclosed, including any information that would reveal the identity of third parties (spouse's income or SIN, employer's account number, etc.). You must then photocopy the sanitized printout.

12. Taxpayer Relief Provisions Financial Reporting

Section 24.2 of the Financial Administration Act requires that forgiveness of a debt or obligation under the acts the CRA administers is to be reported in the Public Accounts. This legal requirement applies to penalties and interest cancelled and waived under the taxpayer relief legislation. The public can access the Public Accounts of Canada through the Public Works and Government Services Canada Web site.

For the various taxpayer relief workloads, the Statistical Tracking Analysis and Reporting System (STARS) and ReportNet produce financial reports based on Taxpayer Relief Registry entries and data which are used to report on the cancellation of penalties and interest. Some of the amounts for waivers of penalties and interest are currently provided based on estimates.

Each Headquarters function is responsible for gathering, verifying, validating, and approving amounts to be reported in the Public Accounts. The Taxpayer Relief and Service Complaints Directorate (TRSCD) is responsible for consolidating this information. The Finance and Administration Branch later incorporates the information provided by TRSCD into the overall CRA financial report that is forwarded to the Public Accounts.

13. Internal Order Number and Activity Types

A national taxpayer relief internal order number or dedicated activity type should be used to track the direct time associated with reviewing requests for consideration under the taxpayer relief provisions legislation.

Certain areas within the Agency have activity types dedicated solely to taxpayer relief. These areas use these dedicated activity types without the need for the internal order number.

If you are not using one of the activity types dedicated solely to taxpayer relief such as 254 or 817, then you should use internal order number 702337 along with the appropriate activity type for your area/workload

13.1 Internal Order Number

In October 2005 a national internal order number 702337 was established to track the direct time associated with handling taxpayer relief requests.

If you cannot use one of the taxpayer relief activity types, then another activity type, along with an internal order number are required. Other activity types such as 437, 537 and 827, can be used for other activities including taxpayer relief. For example, activity type 827 for PAYDAC account review includes time spent on PAYDAC workloads including taxpayer relief. Activity type 437 for T1/T3 complex accounting may include time spent on taxpayer relief requests.

The internal order number 702337 should include the time spent:

- screening and validating the request
- gathering information
- reviewing/analyzing the taxpayer relief request
- preparing the report and making a recommendation
- notifying the taxpayer
- updating the Taxpayer Relief Registry (TRR)

The internal order number should be used for all levels of taxpayer relief consideration; 1st review, 2nd review, and review of decisions returned from court (judicial reviews).

The internal order number should not be used for:

- processing interest cancellations or adjustment requests (this should be charged to the applicable activity type)
- establishing procedural guidelines
- developing policy
- training

Dear Sir/Madam:

We are responding to your letter of (date) requesting the cancellation of the late-filing penalty and arrears interest charged on your account.

We have noted your comments about the late filing of your return. Also, we have carefully considered the facts of the case and your submission as it relates to the applicable legislation. Our review shows that the period of time that has elapsed between your illness and the filing of your return should not have reasonably prevented you from filing your return on time. As a result, we have concluded it would not be appropriate to cancel the penalty and interest charged on your account.

If you believe that we have not exercised discretion in a fair and reasonable manner, you may request in writing that the Director of your tax services office (or tax centre) review the situation.

If you have any questions or want to discuss this matter, please contact XXXXX, (state position). He/She is aware of our correspondence and can be reached at (XXX) XXX-XXXX.

We are responding to your letter of (date) about the cancellation of the late-filing penalty charged on your account.

We have noted your comments about the late-filing penalty. Also, we have carefully considered the facts of the case and your submission as they relate to the applicable legislation. Our review reveals no indication that an error or delay on our part, or circumstances beyond your control, would have affected your ability to file when and as required. As a result, the late-filing penalty has been upheld.

If you feel that discretion was not properly exercised during our review of your request for relief, you can apply to the Federal Court for a judicial review within thirty (30)days of the day you received this letter. For more information on the judicial review process and how to apply, phone the Registry of the Federal Court at (613) 992-4238. This information is also available at the Federal Court Web site: http://www.fct-cf.gc.ca/index_e.shtml

Section 600 of the Income Tax Regulations lists the provisions of the Income Tax Act and Regulations in respect of which a taxpayer or a partnership can apply under subsection 220(3.2) of the Act to make a late or amended election, or to revoke an election.

The list of eligible elections reflects the amendments to section 600 that were published in the Canada Gazette Part II on August 29, 2006, as SOR/2006-200.

The following is the list of the prescribed provisions and a brief description of the nature of the election:

Deferral on non-CCPC employee options

Subsection 7(8) of the Act allows an employee to defer the taxation of an employment benefit realized from a qualifying acquisition of a particular security under an agreement with the employer (or a person not dealing at arm's length with the employer) until the year in which the employee disposes of the security, becomes a non-resident of Canada or dies, whichever occurs first, if the employee elects in accordance with subsection 7(10) to have subsection 7(8) apply.

Deemed outlay or expense

Paragraph 12(2.2)(b) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to reduce the amount of an outlay or expense (other than an outlay or expense which relates to the cost of the property) incurred in the year, the immediately following year or any preceding year, by all or part of any related government assistance received in the year which would otherwise be included in income by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(x).

Interest income accrual rules

Former subsection 12.2(4) of the Act allowed an individual or a trust with individuals as beneficiaries to elect to report accrued interest income on an annual basis with respect to certain life insurance policies and annuity contracts last acquired before December 20, 1980, rather than on a tri-annual reporting basis under former subsection 12.2(3). Subsection 12.2(4) was repealed given the introduction of mandatory annual reporting of accrued income on life insurance policies last acquired after or materially altered after 1989.

"Available for use" rules on long-term projects

Subsection 13(29) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to include an amount, within limits, as undepreciated capital cost in respect of long-term project depreciable property under the "available for use" provisions of subsections 13(26) to 13(28) prior to the completion of the project.

Amounts paid for undertaking future obligations

Subsection 20(24) of the Act allows a taxpayer to deduct from income certain payments made to obtain another person's agreement to undertake certain future obligations for which an amount was included in the taxpayer's income under paragraph 12(1)(a), if the taxpayer and other person jointly elect in accordance with subsection 20(25).

Cost of borrowed money

The elections contained in section 21 of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to capitalize, instead of deducting as a current expense, the cost of borrowed money used to acquire depreciable property (subsections 21(1) and 21(3)) or used for the exploration, development or the acquisition of a resource property (subsections 21(2) and 21(4)).

Exchanges of property

Subsections 13(4), 14(6), 44(1) and (6) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to defer an income inclusion or the recognition of a capital gain when a replacement property is acquired for a property that was stolen, expropriated or destroyed, or for a former business property that was sold.

Adjustments to cost base

Subsections 13(7.4) and 53(2.1) of the Act allow a taxpayer to elect to reduce the capital cost of depreciable property and the adjusted cost base of non-depreciable capital property, respectively, by the amount of any related inducement, refund, reimbursement, contribution, allowance, or other assistance which would otherwise be included in income by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(x).

Election where change of use

Subsection 45(2) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to designate a property as his principal residence although there has been a change in use to an income producing property.

Subsection 45(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer a capital gain on the change of use of a property from an income producing property to a principal residence.

Debts established to be bad debts and shares of bankrupt corporation

Subsection 50(1) of the Act applies to debts established to have become bad debts in a taxation year and to certain shares and allows a taxpayer to elect to have a deemed disposition at the end of the year and a reacquisition immediately thereafter at a cost of nil.

Successor rules for resource properties

Paragraphs 66.7(7)(c), (d) and (e) and (8)(c), (d), and (e) of the Act allow a predecessor corporation and a successor corporation to elect to transfer the unused pools of resource expenses from the predecessor to the successor corporation.

Transfers or distributions to a taxpayer's spouse, common law partner or spousal/partner trust on the death of the taxpayer

Subsection 70(6.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect to have the rollover rules under subsection 70(6) and 70(6.1) not apply, thus causing the deemed disposition of assets at fair market value under subsection 70(5) and the deemed payment of amounts in Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA) Fund No.2 under subsection 70(5.4).

Transfers of farm property, or family farm corporations and partnerships to child

Subsection 70(9) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.

Subsection 70(9.1) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for farm property that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.

Subsection 70(9.2) of the Act allows a taxpayer's legal representative to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred to a child on the taxpayer's death.

Subsection 70(9.3) of the Act allows a spousal or common-law partner trust to elect an amount, within limits, as proceeds of disposition for a share in a family farm corporation, or an interest in a family farm partnership that is transferred from the trust to a child on the spouse or common-law partner's death.

Election by legal representative and transferee re reserves

Subsection 72(2) of the Act permits a legal representative of a deceased taxpayer to elect to claim a deduction for certain reserves, provided that the amount so deducted is subsequently included in the income of the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner or a spousal or common-law partner trust.

Inter vivos transfers of property

Subsection 73(1) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have the rollover provisions in respect of an inter-vivos transfer of assets to a spouse or common-law partner or certain trusts not apply, thus causing the assets to be considered to be transferred at fair market value for tax purposes.

Deemed settlement on winding-up

Paragraph 80.01(4)(c) of the Act allows a parent corporation to elect to reduce the amount to which subsection 80(1) (debt forgiveness rules) might otherwise apply in cases where a debt owed between a parent corporation and its subsidiary is settled on the winding up of the subsidiary for less than both the principal amount and the cost amount of the debt.

Expropriation assets acquired as compensation for, or as consideration for sale of, foreign property taken by or sold to foreign issuer

Subsection 80.1(1) of the Act applies to a Canadian resident taxpayer who has acquired "expropriation assets" issued or guaranteed by a foreign government as compensation for the expropriated or forced sale of shares of a foreign affiliate, or foreign property used to carry on business in a foreign country. The election establishes the deemed cost of the expropriation assets and the deemed proceeds of disposition of the property that was expropriated or sold.

Dividends received by taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner

Subsection 82(3) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to have a taxable dividend from a taxable Canadian corporation received by the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner included in the taxpayer's income where such an inclusion increases the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner amount under paragraph 118(1)(a).

Capital dividend

Subsection 83(2) of the Act allows a private corporation to elect to have the full amount of a dividend that is payable by it to be treated as a capital dividend.

Eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares

Paragraph 86.1(2)(f) of the Act allows a taxpayer to elect to defer the tax on eligible distributions of foreign spin-off shares.

Election to defer the 21-year deemed disposition date

Subsection 104(5.3) of the Act allowed certain family trusts to elect to defer the 21-year deemed disposition date. This provision was terminated with the result that the deferred disposition date was no later than January 1, 1999.

Preferred beneficiary election

Subsection 104(14) of the Act allows a trust and its preferred beneficiaries to elect to have the income of the trust included in the income of the preferred beneficiaries, instead of being taxed in the trust.

Deemed disposition on emigration

Paragraph 128.1(4)(d) of the Act allows an individual (other than a trust) to elect to treat certain properties that would otherwise be exempt from the deemed disposition that occurs when the individual ceases to be resident in Canada as having been disposed of.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning former resident

Paragraphs 128.1(6)(a) and 128.1(6)(c) of the Act apply to an individual (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, and subsequently returns to reside in Canada. The effect of the election is to "unwind" the deemed disposition rule of subsection 128.1(4) for certain properties still held upon the individual's return to Canada.

Departure tax adjustment for a returning trust beneficiary

Paragraph 128.1(7)(d) and 128.1(7)(g) of the Act apply to an individual trust beneficiary (other than a trust) who ceases to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, receives a distribution of property from the trust while a non-resident, and subsequently returns to reside in Canada while still owning the property. These rules allow the beneficiary and the trust to jointly elect, upon the beneficiary's return to Canada, to "unwind" the deemed disposition rule in subsection 107(2.1) that was triggered when the trust distributed the property to the non-resident beneficiary.

Post-emigration loss on disposition

Paragraph 128.1(8)(c) of the Act applies to an individual (other than a trust) who disposes of taxable Canadian property, after having ceased to be resident in Canada after October 1, 1996, for proceeds that are less than the deemed proceeds that arose on the deemed disposition on emigration. The individual may elect to reduce the deemed proceeds of disposition when the individual emigrated.

Allocation of income by communal organization

Subsection 143(2) of the Act allows a communal organization to elect to have its taxable income earned by the deemed trust under subsection 143(1) allocated to members of the organization.

Home buyers' plan

Subsection 146.01(7) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative and the surviving spouse or common-law partner to elect not to have the full outstanding balance of the Home Buyers' Plan included on the deceased taxpayer's final return. The practical effect of the election is to put the surviving spouse or common-law partner in the same position as the deceased taxpayer with respect to the balance outstanding.

Disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer

Subsection 164(6) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat certain capital losses or terminal losses of the taxpayer's estate for its first taxation year as capital losses or terminal losses of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Realization of deceased employees' options

Subsection 164(6.1) of the Act allows a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to elect to treat the amount of the loss realized upon the exercise, disposition or expiration of rights to acquire certain securities within the first taxation year of the taxpayer's estate as a loss of the deceased taxpayer for the year of death.

Excess capital dividend

Subsection 184(3) of the Act allows a corporation to elect to have the amount of the elected capital dividend in excess of the balance in the corporation's capital dividend account treated as a separate taxable dividend, thereby avoiding the penalty tax otherwise payable.

Date of acquisition of control

Subsection 256(9) of the Act allows a corporation to elect not to have the acquisition of control deemed to occur at the commencement of the day on which the acquisition took place. The particular time of day that the acquisition of control took place will be recognized if the corporation makes an election.

Elections to include properties in Class 1

(ii) if subparagraph (i) does not apply and the tax debt was payable on March 4, 2004, or would have been payable on that date but for a limitation period that otherwise applied to the collection of the tax debt, on March 4, 2004; and

(b) ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it begins.

Limitation period restarted

(5) The limitation period described in subsection (4) for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer restarts (and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it restarts) on any day, before it would otherwise end, on which

Agent or legal representative

(7) For the purposes of this section, an acknowledgement made by a taxpayer's agent or legal representative has the same effect as if it were made by the taxpayer.

Extension of limitation period

(8) In computing the day on which a limitation period ends, there shall be added the number of days on which one or more of the following is the case:

(a) the Minister may not, because of any of subsections 225.1(2) to (5), take any of the actions described in subsection 225.1(1) in respect of the tax debt;

(b) the Minister has accepted and holds security in lieu of payment of the tax debt;

(c) if the taxpayer was resident in Canada on the applicable date described in paragraph

(4)(a) in respect of the tax debt, the taxpayer is non-resident; or

(d) an action that the Minister may otherwise take in respect of the tax debt is restricted or not permitted under any provision of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act or of the Farm Debt Mediation Act.

Bar to claims

(9) Notwithstanding any law of Canada or a province, Her Majesty is not liable for any claim that arises because the Minister collected a tax debt after the end of any limitation period that applied to the collection of the tax debt and before March 4, 2004.

Orders after March 3, 2004 and before effect
(10) Notwithstanding any order or judgment made after March 3, 2004 that declares a tax debt not to be payable by a taxpayer, or that orders the Minister to reimburse to a taxpayer a tax debt collected by the Minister, because a limitation period that applied to the collection of the tax debt ended before royal assent to any measure giving effect to this section, the tax debt is deemed to have become payable on March 4, 2004.

In 1986, the respondent, a resident of British Columbia, received a Notice of Assessment from the Minister of National Revenue that indicated a federal and provincial tax liability of $234,136 arising from a series of assessments and unpaid taxes in respect of his 1980 to 1985 taxation years. The respondent did not challenge this assessment, and paid nothing on the outstanding amount. From 1987 to 1998, Revenue Canada made no effort to collect the debt, and statements issued to the respondent during that period did not reflect the 1986 balance. In 1998, Revenue Canada sent a statement of account to the respondent that indicated a balance of $770,583, which included the amount owing as of 1986 and accrued interest. The respondent applied to the Federal Court, Trial Division, for judicial review of the 1998 claim, and sought a declaration that the Crown was prohibited from taking any steps to collect his tax debts for 1990 and prior years. The motions judge dismissed the application. The Federal Court of Appeal set aside that decision and held that the Crown was, pursuant to s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act ("CLPA") and s. 3(5) of the B.C. Limitation Act, statute-barred from collecting the respondent's federal and provincial tax debt.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ.: The six-year limitation period prescribed by s. 32 of the CLPA bars the Crown from collecting the respondent's federal tax debt. First, as a law of general application, s. 32 presumptively applies on a residual basis to all Crown proceedings. The breadth of the provision's application can be narrowed only by an Act of Parliament that has "otherwise provided", either expressly or impliedly, for limitation periods. The Income Tax Act ("ITA") does not provide for limitation periods within its collection provisions, and the legislative silence with regard to prescription in these provisions, interpreted in conjunction with the express language used in the ITA's assessment provisions, supports the finding that Parliament intended that limitation provisions of general application apply to the Minister's collection of tax debts. A purposive interpretation of the ITA confirms this conclusion. Furthermore, the certainty, evidentiary and diligence rationales for limitation periods do not offend the principles of horizontal and vertical equity that should in part govern the ITA and are directly applicable to the collection of tax debts. Second, the ordinary meaning of the phrase "proceedings...in respect of a cause of action" in s. 32 encompasses the statutory collection procedures of the Minister. It would be incongruous to find that s. 32 was intended to apply to the court action but not to the statutory collection procedures that serve the identical purpose. The rationales that support the application of limitation provisions to Crown proceedings apply equally to both the court and non-court proceedings at issue here. To exclude s. 32's application to proceedings that are equivalent in purpose and effect to a court action would frustrate the object and aim of the provision. The legislative history of s. 32 also supports the inference that Parliament intended its application to extend beyond proceedings in court. Third, on both a plain and purposive reading of s. 32, the cause of action in this case arose "otherwise than in a province". Tax debts created under the ITA arise pursuant to federal legislation and create rights and duties between the federal Crown and residents of Canada or those who have earned income within Canada. The debt may arise from income earned in a combination of provinces or in a foreign jurisdiction. The debt is owed to the federal Crown, which is not located in any particular province and does not assume a provincial locale in its assessment of taxes.

The Minister, in its role as agent of the province of British Columbia, is also barred by s. 3(5) of the B.C. Limitation Act from collecting the respondent's provincial tax debt arising under the British Columbia Income Tax Act ("B.C. ITA"). Section 3(5) applies a limitation period of six years to actions for which prescription is not "specifically provided for" in another Act. Under s. 1 of the B.C. Limitation Act, an action is defined as including "any proceeding in a court and any exercise of a self help remedy". The term "self help remedy" encompasses the statutory collection procedures available under the B.C. ITA. A statutory collection procedure is a self help mechanism by which the Minister is able to effect a result that could otherwise be achieved only through an action in court. As well, the B.C. ITA does not specifically provide for limitation periods in its collection provisions. Since the province's collection rights are subject to expiry six years after the underlying cause of action arose, so too are the collection rights of the federal Crown as its agent.

Per Gonthier and Deschamps JJ.: The conclusion that the cause of action arises "otherwise than in a province" is inappropriate in two ways. First, it emphasizes the residence of the creditor instead of relying on the connecting factors of the cause of action. Second, it means that the federal government is not located anywhere in Canada. Common sense dictates that the federal Crown is located in every province. Since the federal government is, by virtue of its agreement with all of the provinces (except Quebec), responsible for collecting all provincial income taxes, it is sensible to bind its federal tax claim to the limits available on the provincial one. Efficiency is thus preserved by invoking one limitation for both the federal and provincial income tax debts arising in each province other than Quebec. Here, all of the connecting factors point to British Columbia. Consequently, the British Columbia six-year limitation period should apply.

MAJOR J. — The issue in this appeal is narrow and easily stated: that is, whether federal and provincial limitation periods when exceeded apply to the Crown's ability to exercise its statutory powers to collect tax debts. I have concluded that the limitation period prescribed by s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50 ("CLPA"), bars the Crown from collecting the respondent's federal tax debt, and that s. 3(5) of the British Columbia Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 266 ("B.C. Limitation Act") bars the Crown from collecting the respondent's provincial tax debt.

Factual Background

The respondent was a resident of British Columbia at all times relevant to this appeal. He received a Notice of Assessment from the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") dated June 17, 1986, that indicated a federal and provincial tax liability of $234,136.04

Digitized by Google

arising from a series of assessments and unpaid taxes in respect of his 1980 to 1985 taxation years. The respondent did not challenge this assessment, and paid nothing on the outstanding amount after 1986. In 1987, while of no consequence to this appeal, the indebtedness was internally written off by Revenue Canada, but was not extinguished or forgiven. From 1987 to 1998, Revenue Canada made no effort to collect the debt, and statements issued to the respondent during that period did not reflect the 1986 balance. However, on January 15, 1998, approximately 12 years after the Notice of Assessment, Revenue Canada, for the first time during this period, sent a statement of account to the respondent that indicated a balance of $770,583.42, which included the amount owing as of June 17, 1986, and accrued interest.
The respondent applied to the Trial Division of the Federal Court for judicial review of the January 15, 1998 claim, and sought a declaration that the Crown was prohibited from taking any steps to collect his tax debts for 1990 and prior years. The motions judge dismissed the application. The Federal Court of Appeal allowed the appeal from that decision, and held that the Crown was statute-barred from collecting the respondent's tax debt reflected in the 1986 Notice of Assessment. The Crown appeals from that decision.

Relevant Statutory Provisions

The following statutory provisions are relevant:

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)
222. All taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts payable under this Act are debts due to Her Majesty and recoverable as such in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act.

223. . . .

An amount payable by a person (in this section referred to as a "debtor") that has not been paid or any part of an amount payable by the debtor that has not been paid may be certified by the Minister as an amount payable by the debtor.

On production to the Federal Court, a certificate made under subsection (2) in respect of a debtor shall be registered in the Court and when so registered has the same effect, and all proceedings may be taken thereon, as if the certificate were a judgment obtained in the Court against the debtor for a debt in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by the statute or statutes referred to in subsection (1) under which the amount is payable and, for the purpose of any such proceedings, the certificate shall be deemed to be a judgment of the Court against the debtor for a debt due to Her Majesty, enforceable in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by that statute or statutes.

(1) Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is, or will be within one year, liable to make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment under this Act (in this subsection and subsections (1.1) and (3) referred to as the "tax debtor"), the Minister may in writing require the person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under this Act.

(1) Where a person has failed to pay an amount as required by this Act, the Minister may give 30 days notice to the person by registered mail addressed to the person's latest known address of the Minister's intention to direct that the person's goods and chattels be seized and sold, and, if the person fails to make the payment before the expiration of the 30 days, the Minister may issue a certificate of the failure and direct that the person's goods and chattels be seized.

225.1 (1) Where a taxpayer is liable for the payment of an amount assessed under this Act, other than an amount assessed under subsection 152(4.2), 169(3) or 220(3.1), the Minister shall not, for the purpose of collecting the amount, [take any collection action] until after the day that is 90 days after the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment.

Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50

32. Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.

British Columbia Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 266

1 . . .

"action" includes any proceeding in a court and any exercise of a self help remedy;

3 . . .

(5) Any other action not specifically provided for in this Act or any other Act may not be brought after the expiration of 6 years after the date on which the right to do so arose.

9 (1) On the expiration of a limitation period set by this Act for a cause of action to recover any debt, damages or other money, or for an accounting in respect of any matter, the right and title of the person formerly having the cause of action and of a person claiming through the person in respect of that matter is, as against the person against whom the cause of action formerly lay and as against the person's successors, extinguished.

(3) A cause of action, whenever arising, to recover costs on a judgment or to recover arrears of interest on principal money is extinguished by the expiration of the limitation period set by this Act for an action between the same parties on the judgment or to recover the principal money.

Judicial History

At the Federal Court, Trial Division ([1999] 3 F.C. 28), the motions judge held that s. 32 of the CLPA does not apply to the statutory collection procedures authorized by the Income

Digitized by Google

Tax Act,
R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"). He found both that the collection procedures do not qualify under s. 32 as proceedings in respect of a cause of action, and that the ITA is a complete code in itself that excludes the application of s. 32. The motions judge also held that the B.C. Limitation Act does not apply to the Crown's collection of the provincial tax debt under the British Columbia Income Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 215 ("B.C. ITA"). As a result, his conclusion was that neither the Crown's collection of the federal nor the provincial tax debt was subject to the limitation periods.
The Federal Court of Appeal disagreed and allowed the appeal ([2001] 3 F.C. 449, 2001 FCA 144). Rothstein J.A. decided that the ITA is not a complete code that excludes the application of
s. 32 of the CLPA, and that the statutory collection procedures qualify as proceedings in respect of a cause of action under s. 32. Consequently, the limitation period prescribed by s. 32 applies to the statutory collection procedures in the ITA. He held that the relevant limitation provision was s. 3(5) of the B.C. Limitation Act. Section 3(5) includes both court proceedings and self help remedies, and so applies to both court and statutory collection procedures under the ITA. Owing to this provision, the Minister was barred from collecting the federal tax debt six years after the right to do so arose. Rothstein J.A. also concluded that s. 3(5) bars the Crown, in its role as collection agent for British Columbia under the B.C. ITA, from pursuing the taxpayer's provincial debt.

Issues

7 The appeal raises the following issues:

(a) Are statutory collection proceedings under the ITA subject to a limitation period pursuant to s. 32 of the CLPA? This requires the determination of:

Does the ITA provide for limitation periods for the collection of tax debts, or otherwise exclude the operation of s. 32 of the CLPA?

Is the exercise of a statutory collection power a "proceeding . . . in respect of any cause of action" under s. 32?

Does the B.C. Limitation Act apply to statutory collection proceedings undertaken by the Crown acting as collection agent for the Province of British Columbia pursuant to the B.C. ITA?

Analysis

The Federal Tax Debt

Is the Federal Tax Debt Subject to Section 32 of the CLPA?
Prior to an analysis of the problem, it is useful to describe the broad collection powers available under the ITA. The Minister is authorized to collect tax debts by means of either a court action or statutory collection procedures. Section 222 of the ITA provides:

Digitized by Google

All taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts payable under this Act are debts due to Her Majesty and recoverable as such in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act.

The various collection mechanisms enumerated in the ITA provide the Minister with an extensive range of remedies to recover debts. The Minister may certify an unpaid tax amount (s. 223(2)) and register the certificate in the Federal Court (s. 223(3)), at which point the certificate is deemed to be a judgment of that court. The Federal Court can then issue a certificate, notification, or writ evidencing the s. 223(2) certificate, which can be used by the Minister to create a charge, lien, priority, or other interest on property in any province (ss. 223(5) to 223(8)). Under the garnishment provision of s. 224(1), the Minister may require a third party who is indebted to the taxpayer to make payments directly to the Minister. The Minister may also order the seizure and sale of the taxpayer's goods and chattels under s. 225(1). These collection powers cannot be exercised until 90 days after the later of the mailing of a notice of assessment or the mailing of a confirmation or variation of the assessment, or until the taxpayer's appeal has been finally determined by the Tax Court of Canada (ss. 225.1(1) to 225.1(4)).

The outcome of this appeal narrows to whether the exercise of these collection powers is subject to prescription under s. 32 of the CLPA. Section 32 applies limitation periods to proceedings brought by or against the Crown in all cases unless Parliament has otherwise provided. The section states:

> Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose. [Emphasis added.]

The section applies to the statutory collection procedures if two criteria are met. First, the ITA must not otherwise provide for limitation periods with respect to the collection of tax debts. Second, the statutory collection procedures must qualify under s. 32 as "proceedings . . . in respect of a cause of action".

I agree with the reasons of the Federal Court of Appeal that each of the two criteria is met in this case, and that s. 32 must apply to the Crown's exercise of statutory collection powers.

Does the ITA Otherwise Provide for Prescription?

11 As a law of general application, s. 32 of the CLPA presumptively applies on a residual basis to all Crown proceedings. The breadth of the provision's application can be narrowed only by an Act of Parliament that has "otherwise provided", either expressly or impliedly, for limitation periods. It is evident that the ITA does not provide for limitation periods within its collection provisions.

12 The noted author E. A. Driedger in Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87, stated that the modern approach to statutory interpretation requires the words of an Act "to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament". These principles have frequently been adopted by this Court both generally and in the construction of taxation legislation: see Will-Kare Paving & Contracting Ltd. v. Canada, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 915, 2000 SCC 36, at para. 32; 65302 British Columbia Ltd. v. Canada, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 804, both in the majority and minority concurring reasons, and Stubart Investments Ltd. v. The Queen, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 536, at p. 578.

13 The assessment provisions of the ITA are clearly stated on prescription. By contrast, the collection provisions of the ITA are silent with respect to prescription. There is no reference in s. 222 or its accompanying provisions to either the absence or presence of a limitation period. Nonetheless, the appellant submits that the ITA has "otherwise provided" for prescription. In the appellant's submission, the ITA constitutes a complete statutory scheme for the collection of taxes, and so silence in the legislation indicates Parliament's intent to avoid fettering the Crown's collection powers with limitation periods.

There is no authority to support the proposition that the ITA is a complete code that cannot be informed by laws of general application. The ITA does not operate in a legislative vacuum: see Will-Kare, supra, at para. 31. See also P. W. Hogg, J. E. Magee and T. Cook, Principles of Canadian Income Tax Law (3rd ed. 1999), at p. 2, where the authors note that the "Income Tax Act relies implicitly on the general law". Accordingly, whether a statute or legal principle affects the operation of the ITA must be decided by an analysis of the specific provisions involved.

Absent legislation or judicial support, the appellant nonetheless requests the Court to interpret s. 222 of the ITA as if it permits the collection of tax debts "at any time". It is "a basic principle of statutory interpretation that the court should not accept an interpretation which requires the insertion of extra wording where there is another acceptable interpretation which does not require any additional wording": see Friesen v. Canada, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 27. This principle weighs against accepting the appellant's interpretation. The provision does not include the words "at any time", and is capable of a reasonable construction without that insertion. The legislative silence with regard to prescription gives rise to the logical inference that Parliament intended for limitation provisions of general application to apply to the Minister's collection powers.

This conclusion is supported by the explicit manner in which the ITA addresses limitation periods in its assessment provisions. The Court held in Friesen, supra, at para. 27, that "[r]eading extra words into a statutory definition is even less acceptable when the phrases which must be read in(sic) appear in several other definitions in the same statute". Numerous provisions in the ITA expressly stipulate that the Minister may make an assessment "at any time": see ss. 152(4), 152(4.2), 159(3), 160(2), 160.1(3), 160.2(3), 160.3(2), 160.4(3), and 227(10.1). Parliament has demonstrated a clear willingness to address the issue of limitation periods in the ITA where it sees fit to do so. As Rothstein J.A. noted at para. 22, "Parliament has put its mind to the limitation question in the Income Tax Act and when it intends there to be no limitation period, it has so stated." Accordingly, the unescapable conclusion is that the plain language used in the collection provisions does not support the inference that Parliament intended to exclude the application of limitation provisions to the Minister's collection powers.

In finding that the collection provisions implicitly exclude s. 32, the learned motions judge appeared to rely predominantly on s. 225.1 of the ITA, which prevents the Minister from initiating collection procedures pending objection or appeal of an assessment by the taxpayer. With respect, I do not agree that s. 225.1 lends any weight to the appellant's argument. The statutory stay prescribed by s. 225.1 is directed towards protecting the taxpayer from collection action pending a final determination of the validity of his or her assessment. Limitation periods, on the other hand, are meant to promote certainty, avoid stale evidence, encourage diligence, and bring repose: see M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6, at p. 29, per La Forest J. The rationales outlined above for stays and limitation provisions are entirely distinct. I agree with Rothstein J.A.'s conclusion at para. 21:

The enactment of a statutory stay which specifies when collection action may commence, cannot logically support the inference that Parliament considered that no limitation period should apply to that collection action.

18 A purposive analysis of the ITA confirms that the collection provisions do not by implication exclude the operation of s. 32. The application of limitation periods to the collection of tax debts does not offend the principles of horizontal and vertical equity that, as Iacobucci J. noted in Symes v. Canada, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695, at p. 738, should in part govern the ITA. The appellant submits that applying laws of prescription to tax collection would unfairly alleviate the tax burden of individuals who experience fluctuations in income at the expense of those who enjoy a steady stream of income. This apparent problem can be averted, however, by the Minister's reasonably diligent exercise of debt collection. If a taxpayer does not have the ability to satisfy a tax debt prior to the expiration of the limitation period, the Minister can choose from a variety of means to extend the limitation period. In Ross v. Canada, [2002] 2 C.T.C. 222, 2002 FCT 401, the Federal Court, Trial Division, held that the registration of a certificate with the Federal Court in accordance with s. 223(3) of the ITA gives rise to a renewal of the limitation period. See also MacKinnon v. Canada, [2002] 4 C.T.C. 48, 2002 FCT 824, where the court found that the taxpayer's acknowledgement of indebtedness by way of a hypothecation agreement with the Minister, and his partial payment of the tax debt, each served to renew the limitation period. There is no need to exhaustively set out the ways in which the Minister can extend the limitation period, other than to note that there are numerous avenues open to the Minister by which renewals may be effected. There is no credible basis to support the submission that the laws of prescription will undermine the equitable collection of taxes when minimum diligence would have the opposite effect.

19 The appellant's submission that the rationales for limitation periods militate against their application to tax collection cannot be correct. As noted above, limitation provisions are based upon what have been described as the certainty, evidentiary, and diligence rationales: see M. (K.), supra, at p. 29. The certainty rationale recognizes that, with the passage of time, an individual "should be secure in his reasonable expectation that he will not be held to account for ancient obligations": M. (K.), supra, at p. 29. The evidentiary rationale recognizes the desire to preclude claims where the evidence used to support that claim has grown stale. The diligence rationale encourages claimants "to act diligently and not 'sleep on their rights'": M. (K.), supra, at p. 30.

20 Each of the rationales submitted as applicable to there being no limitation periods affecting collection are in fact just the opposite and are directly applicable to the Minister's collection of tax debts. If the Minister makes no effort to collect a tax debt for an extended period, at a certain point a taxpayer may reasonably come to expect that he or she will not be called to account for the liability, and may conduct his or her affairs in reliance on that expectation. As well, a limitation period encourages the Minister to act diligently in pursuing the collection of tax debts. In light of the significant effect that collection of tax debts has upon the financial security of Canadian citizens, it is contrary to the public interest for the department to sleep on its rights in enforcing collection. It is evident that the rationales which justify the existence of limitation periods apply to the collection of tax debts.

The legislative silence with regard to prescription in these provisions, interpreted in conjunction with the express language used in the ITA's assessment provisions, supports the finding that Parliament intended that limitation provisions of general application apply to the Minister's collection of tax debts. A purposive interpretation of the statute confirms this conclusion. There was no evidence before the Court to lend any support to the submission that laws of prescription would frustrate the equitable collection of taxes. Finally, the rationales for limitation periods for the reasons given apply directly to the collection of tax debts.

As a result, whether s. 32 of the CLPA applies to the Minister's statutory collection procedures depends entirely upon whether such procedures qualify under s. 32 as "proceedings . . . in respect of a cause of action".

Do the Statutory Collection Procedures Qualify as "Proceedings . . . in Respect of a Cause of Action"?
The application of s. 32 is limited to "proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action". Interpreted in their grammatical and ordinary sense, these words clearly encompass the statutory collection procedures in the ITA. Although the word "proceeding" is often used in the context of an action in court, its definition is more expansive. The Manitoba Court of Appeal stated in Royce v. MacDonald (Municipality) (1909), 12 W.L.R. 347, at p. 350, that the "word 'proceeding' has a very wide meaning, and includes steps or measures which are not in any way connected with actions or suits". In Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990), at p. 1204, the definition of "proceeding" includes, inter alia, "an act necessary to be done in order to obtain a given end; a prescribed mode of action for carrying into effect a legal right".
The statutory collection procedures closely resemble various proceedings in court. The registration of a certificate in Federal Court is deemed by s. 223(3) to be a judgment of that court. As Rothstein J.A. notes at para. 35:

> A requirement to pay under section 224 (as am. by S.C. 1994, c. 21, s. 101) is analogous to a garnishing order issued by a court. . . . Seizure and sale of chattels under subsection 225(1) is a provision closely parallel to a writ of execution issued by a court.

By granting the power to effect the collection of tax debts in this manner, Parliament has provided the Minister with an efficient and expeditious alternative to bringing a court action. However, the court and non- court collection procedures are identical in purpose. Both are mechanisms by which the Minister is able to enforce the collection of tax debts and thereby carry into effect the legal rights of the Crown. It is evident that both kinds of procedures are appropriately characterized as legal proceedings.
The appellant's submission turns on whether these proceedings are undertaken "in respect of a cause of action". The words "in respect of" have been held by this Court to be words of the broadest scope that convey some link between two subject matters. See Nowegijick v. The Queen, [1983] 1
S.C.R. 29, at p. 39, per Dickson J. (as he then was):
The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters.

In the context of s. 32, the words "in respect of" require only that the relevant proceedings have some connection to a cause of action.
A "cause of action" is only a set of facts that provides the basis for an action in court: see Letang v. Cooper, [1964] 2 All E.R. 929 (C.A.), at p. 934; Domco Industries Ltd. v. Mannington Mills, Inc. (1990), 29 C.P.R. (3d) 481 (F.C.A.), per Iacobucci C.J. (as he then was), at p. 496; and Black's Law Dictionary, supra, at p. 221. In this case, s. 222 of the ITA provides that unpaid taxes constitute a debt recoverable by means of a court action, subject to the stay of collection action prescribed by s. 225.1. As a result, as Rothstein J.A. notes at para. 37, the cause of action here involves "the existence of a tax debt and the expiry of the delay period entitling the Minister to take collection action".

In light of the above analysis, the ordinary meaning of the phrase "proceedings . . . in respect of a cause of action" encompasses the statutory collection procedures of the Minister. The exercise of the statutory proceedings is entirely dependent upon a set of facts that would support action by the Minister, i.e., the existence of a tax debt and the expiry of the delay period prescribed by s. 225.1.
I now turn to the French version of s. 32, which states:
Sauf disposition contraire de la présente loi ou de toute autre loi fédérale, les règles de droit en matière de prescription qui, dans une province, régissent les rapports entre particuliers s'appliquent lors des poursuites auxquelles l'État est partie pour tout fait générateur survenu dans la province. Lorsque ce dernier survient ailleurs que dans une province, la procédure se prescrit par six ans.

The words "poursuite", "procédure" and "instance" are all used to render the term "proceedings" in different contexts. "Procédure" is even used to describe a cause of action, as demonstrated by the wording of s. 32 of the CLPA. This can also be verified in some French publications on the translation of English law (see for instance Bouscaren, Greenstein & Cordahi, Les bases du droit anglais (1981)). It is therefore difficult to consider the definition of a single expression to determine the common meaning of the English and French versions of s. 32. Indeed, the legislative history of s. 32, beginning with s. 38(2) (R.S.C. 1970, c. 10 (2nd Supp.)) and later s. 39(3) (R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7) of the Federal Court Act ("FCA"), which as discussed below were its precursors, also denotes both that context matters and that changes in terminology are not necessarily meant to bring about a change in the substantive law.

If we were to confine our analysis to the word "poursuite", we would find that generally, in Canada, that word excludes non-court proceedings: the term is defined in H. Reid, Dictionnaire de droit québécois et canadien (2nd ed. 2001), in the following way, at p. 425:

[TRANSLATION]

Court action brought by a person in order to assert his right or obtain a sanction against the perpetrator of an offence. E.g.: A creditor's proceedings [poursuite] against his debtor.

But French dictionaries, which are also used in Canada, ascribe a broader definition to "poursuite". G. Cornu, in Vocabulaire juridique (8th ed. 2000), at p. 654, writes:

[TRANSLATION] Exercise of a remedy [voie de droit] to compel someone to perform his obligations or submit to the orders of the law or of the public authority.

Cornu further defines "voie de droit" as follows (at p. 909):

[TRANSLATION] Means given by the law to citizens to have their rights recognized and respected or to defend their interests; generic term encompassing court action, means (jurisdictional) of redress, executions, administrative recourses; by ext., any jurisdictional proceeding even initiated by the prosecution.

General dictionaries such as Le Petit Larousse (2003) define "poursuite" as a court proceeding, but also as [TRANSLATION] "[a]n action by the tax authorities to collect treasury debts".

Digitized by Google

It would therefore be difficult to conclude definitively that "poursuite" is more restrictive than "proceedings" and that this is determinative in the context of s. 32. It is then necessary, in this case, to conclude that the common meaning of the English and French versions of the provision is unclear and that resort to the other rules of statutory interpretation is necessary in order to discern Parliament's intent. Applying those rules, construing s. 32 in context, harmoniously with the purpose of the CLPA, I have concluded that it was meant to include administrative mechanisms that enable the Crown to achieve exactly the same result as it would through a formal action in court.

At common law, the Crown was not bound by limitation periods unless a federal statute expressly provided otherwise. On the other hand, the Crown was entitled to the benefit of a limitations defence in proceedings brought against it: see D. Sgayias et al., The Annotated Crown Liability and Proceedings Act 1995 (1994), at pp. 135-36, and P. W. Hogg and P. J. Monahan, Liability of the Crown (3rd ed. 2000), at p. 71. The purpose of s. 32 is obviously, in the search for equity, to extend the same benefit of laws of prescription to subjects defending themselves against proceedings brought by the Crown.

A court action brought by the Minister to recover tax debt in this appeal would be subject to the limitation provisions in s. 32. It would be incongruous to find that s. 32 of the CLPA was intended to apply to the court action but not to the statutory collection procedures that serve the identical purpose. The certainty, evidentiary and diligence rationales that support the application of limitation provisions to Crown proceedings apply equally to both the court and non-court proceedings at issue here. See Berardinelli v. Ontario Housing Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 275, per Estey J., at p. 284:

When one interpretation can be placed upon a statutory provision which would bring about a more workable and practical result, such an interpretation should be preferred if the words invoked by the Legislature can reasonably bear it . . . .

There is no reason to infer that Parliament intended for s. 32's application to turn solely upon the technicality of whether the relevant proceeding took place in court. To exclude s. 32's application to proceedings that are equivalent in purpose and effect to a court action would frustrate the object and aim of the provision.

The legislative history of s. 32 of the CLPA supports the inference that Parliament intended for its application to extend beyond proceedings in court. Section 38 of the FCA was enacted in 1971 (R.S.C. 1970, c. 10 (2nd Supp.)), and later renumbered as s. 39 of R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7. Section 38(2), which was succeeded by s. 39(3), applied limitation provisions to proceedings brought by or against the Crown. Section 39 of the FCA stated:

39. (1) Except as expressly provided by any other Act, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in any province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings in the Court in respect of any cause of action arising in that province.

A proceeding in the Court in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.

Except as expressly provided by any other Act, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions referred to in subsections (1) and (2) apply to any proceedings brought by or against the Crown.

Prior to 1992, s. 32 of the CLPA (then entitled the Crown Liability Act), applied only to tort actions against the Crown. By S.C. 1990, c. 8, ss. 10, and 31, s. 39(3) of the FCA was repealed and s. 32 of the CLPA was amended to apply to all proceedings in respect of a cause of action brought both by and against the Crown.

It is readily apparent, as the Federal Court of Appeal notes at para. 49, that s. 38(2) and later s. 39(3) were the predecessors to the current s. 32 of the CLPA. In determining the legislative intent behind the current wording in s. 32, it is useful to examine the judicial interpretation given to the provisions that came before it. In E. H. Price Ltd. v. The Queen, [1983] 2 F.C. 841, the Federal Court of Appeal considered whether s. 38(2) of the FCA applied to the Minister's registration of a certificate under the Excise Tax Act. In obiter, Clement D.J. held at pp. 847-48 that in the absence of the limiting words "in the Court" that were contained in s. 38(1), "proceedings" under s. 38(2) were not limited to court proceedings and included the Minister's registration of a certificate. In its subsequent amendment of s. 32 of the CLPA, Parliament did not include the words "in the court" or words of a similar limiting effect. As Rothstein J.A. found at para. 50, "it is a fair inference that Parliament, not having done so, meant to adopt the interpretation in E. H. Price so that 'proceedings' in section 32 include all legal processes in respect of a cause of action, whether court or otherwise". Although the words "in respect of a cause of action" were not included in s. 39(3), for the reasons I have outlined, the inclusion of these words in s. 32 does not have the effect of limiting the provision's application to proceedings in court.

I conclude that the English version best reflects the intent of the legislator. As a result, it should be determined which particular limitation period provided by s. 32 applies to these proceedings. This depends upon whether the cause of action on the federal tax debt arose in a province or otherwise than in a province.

(2) Does the Cause of Action Arise in a Province, or Otherwise than in a Province?

Section 32 applies provincial limitation laws to proceedings in respect of a cause of action arising in a province, and a six-year limitation period to those which arise otherwise than in a province. The motions judge, at para. 59, would have found that the cause of action arose otherwise than in a province. The Court of Appeal applied the provincial limitation provision and so, implicitly at least, found that the cause of action arose in a province. In this appeal, the matter is of no particular consequence, because in either case the limitation period runs for six years from the date upon which the cause of action arose. Nonetheless, I conclude that the appellant's cause of action arose otherwise than in a province, and hence that the six-year limitation period provided by s. 32 applies.

Tax debts created under the ITA arise pursuant to federal legislation and create rights and duties between the federal Crown and residents of Canada or those who have earned income within Canada. The debt may arise from income earned in a combination of provinces or in a foreign jurisdiction. The debt is owed to the federal Crown, which is not located in any particular province and does not assume a provincial locale in its assessment of taxes. Consequently, on a plain reading of s. 32, the cause of action in this case arose "otherwise than in a province".

A purposive reading of s. 32 supports this finding. If the cause of action were found to arise in a province, the limitation period applicable to the federal Crown's collection of tax debts could vary considerably depending upon the province in which the income was earned and its limitation periods. In addition to the administrative difficulties that potentially arise from having to determine the specific portions of tax debts that arise in different provinces, the differential application of limitation periods to Canadian taxpayers could impair the equitable collection of taxes. Disparities amongst provincial limitation periods could foreseeably lead to more stringent tax collection in some provinces and more lenient collection in others. The Court can only presume that in providing for a limitation period of six years to apply to proceedings in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province, Parliament intended for limitation provisions to apply uniformly throughout the country with regard to proceedings of the kind at issue in this appeal.

I conclude that the collection proceedings under the ITA are subject to prescription six years after the cause of action arose. As noted above, the cause of action in this case comprised the respondent's tax debt and the expiry of the 90-day delay period after the mailing of the Notice of Assessment dated June 17, 1986. As a result, the cause of action arose on September 16, 1986. The Minister undertook no action in the six years after that date to effect a renewal of the limitation period. Consequently, as of September 16, 1992, s. 32 of the CLPA barred the Minister from collecting the respondent's 1986 federal tax debt. Limitation periods have traditionally been understood to bar a creditor's remedy but not his or her right to the underlying debt. In my view, this is a distinction without a difference. For all intents and purposes, the respondent's federal tax debt is extinguished.

The Provincial Tax Debt

The final issue is whether the Minister, in his or her role as agent of the province of British Columbia, is barred by the B.C. Limitation Act from collecting tax debts arising under the B.C. ITA.

Section 49 of the B.C. ITA provides that s. 222 of the ITA applies for the purposes of the B.C. ITA, subject, as per s. 1(7), to such modifications as the circumstances require to make it applicable to British Columbia. Accordingly, tax debts arising under the B.C. ITA are debts owed to the province.

Section 69 of the B.C. ITA authorizes British Columbia's Minister of Finance and Corporate Relations to enter into a collection agreement whereby the federal government agrees to collect taxes payable under the B.C. ITA and remit those taxes to the provincial government. A collection agreement of this kind between British Columbia and the Government of Canada has been in place since 1962: Memorandum of Agreement, January 28, 1962. Subsection 1(1) of this agreement states as follows:

> Canada, as agent of the Province, will collect for and on behalf of the Province the income taxes imposed under the [B.C. ITA] . . . . [Emphasis added.]

As a result, the provincial government, as principal, has delegated its right to collect tax debts to the federal government, its agent. It has long been accepted that the authority, express or implied, of every agent is confined within the limits of the powers of his or her principal: see F. M. B. Reynolds, Bowstead and Reynolds on Agency (16th ed. 1996), at p. 110. Accordingly, in order to determine the collection rights that are delegated to the federal government, it is necessary to determine the collection rights of the province.

The B.C. Limitation Act governs the law on limitations of actions within British Columbia. Section 14(1) of the British Columbia Interpretation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 238, states that unless an enactment specifically provides otherwise it is binding on the Government of British Columbia. The B.C. Limitation Act does not provide otherwise, and so its provisions apply to proceedings brought by and against the provincial government.

Section 3(5) of the B.C. Limitation Act applies a limitation period of six years to actions for which prescription is not "specifically provided for" in another Act. Under s. 1 of the B.C. Limitation Act, an action is defined as including "any proceeding in a court and any exercise of a self help remedy". I agree with both the motions judge and the Court of Appeal that the term "self help remedy" encompasses the statutory collection procedures available under the B.C. ITA. A statutory collection procedure is a self help mechanism by which the Minister is able to effect a result that could otherwise be achieved only through an action in court. As well, the B.C. ITA does not specifically provide for limitation periods in its collection provisions.

Consequently, the province's right to pursue collection proceedings under the B.C. ITA is subject to the limitation period set out in s. 3(5) of the B.C. Limitation Act. Moreover, pursuant to s. 9(1) of the B.C. Limitation Act, on the expiration of the limitation period, the province's right and title to the tax debt is extinguished, and pursuant to s. 9(3), the province's right and title to interest on the tax debt is extinguished.

As noted above, the federal Crown's right to collect provincial taxes in this case is no greater than the right delegated to it by the province. Since the province's collection rights are subject to expiry six years after the underlying cause of action arose, so too are the collection rights of the federal Crown as its agent.

The cause of action here consisted of the tax debt and the expiry of the delay period allowing collection action to be taken on September 16, 1986. The Minister undertook no action in the six years after that date to effect a renewal of the limitation period. Consequently, as of September 16, 1992, the federal Crown became statute-barred from collecting the provincial tax debt. As well, the right and title of any claimant to the respondent's provincial tax debt, and its accrued interest, were extinguished on that date.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The reasons of Gonthier and Deschamps JJ. were delivered by DESCHAMPS J. — I agree with the reasons of my colleague, Justice Major, except on one point.

In determining where the cause of action arises under s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50, Major J. focusses on the location of the federal government. The conclusion that the cause of action arises "otherwise than in a province" is, in my view, inappropriate in two ways. First, it emphasizes the residence of the creditor instead of relying on the connecting factors of the cause of action and second, it means that the federal government is not located anywhere in Canada or, as the French version of s. 32 reads, the federal government would be located "ailleurs que dans une province". Common sense, rather, would dictate that the federal Crown is located in every province and not "otherwise than in a province".

The cause of action concept is more readily understood in negligence cases. Here, however, the claim has a statutory foundation. It may be characterized as a right in personam, i.e. the right of the Crown against the taxpayer. This Court, in Williams v. Canada, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 877, dealt with a similar problem in a case concerned with a tax exemption. Although the residence criterion was modified in favour of a test encompassing all connecting factors, the situs analysis was upheld to determine the location of the debt. This concept is also used in private international law in order to determine where enforcement of a claim can be pursued: J.-G. Castel and J. Walker, Canadian Conflict of Laws (5th ed. (loose-leaf)), at para. 22.2.

Applying the connecting factors test used in Williams, the factors would be the respondent's residence, his place of employment and the place where his income was received. All of these factors point to British Columbia. The British Columbia six-year limitation period should apply.

Since the federal government is, by virtue of its agreement with all of the provinces (except Quebec), responsible for collecting all provincial income taxes, it is sensible to bind its federal tax claim to the limits available on the provincial one. Efficiency is thus preserved by invoking one limitation for both the federal and provincial income tax debts arising in each province, other than Quebec.

The Queen v. Gibson, 2005 FCA 180, Acknowledgment of Tax Debt Through Loss Carry-back as The Trigger

Date: 20050513
Docket: A-442-04 Citation: 2005 FCA 180
CORAM: DÉCARY J.A. LÉTOURNEAU J.A. PELLETIER J.A. BETWEEN:

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

and
D. KENNETH GIBSON

and

Appellant Respondent

DÉCARY J.A.
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL
FOR ONTARIO Intervener

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

[1] The respondent is seeking a declaration that, due to the expiry of certain limitation periods, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (the Agency) is prohibited from taking collection action against him for tax debts allegedly owing for the 1990 and 1991 taxation years.

[2] In Markevich v. Canada, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a six-year limitation period applied to collection proceedings under the Income Tax Act. The six-year limitation periods at issue in this appeal were to expire on March 18 and 29, 1999, for the 1990 and 1991 tax debts.

[3] On March 2, 1999, i.e. a few weeks before the expiry of the limitation periods, the respondent requested that his losses from subsequent tax years be carried back and applied to the 1990 and 1991 taxation years. The request was granted by the Agency on September 28, 2000. Eventually, notices of reassessment were issued to the respondent for the 1990 and 1991 taxation years in September 2000 and August 2002 respectively.

[4] The Agency having taken no action to collect the tax debts before the expiry of the limitation periods, the respondent filed his application for judicial review on June 11, 2003 to prevent the Agency from taking any further action.

[5] On June 4, 2004, Mosley J. granted the application. With respect to the federal portion of the tax debt, he found that the carry back request did not amount to an acknowledgment by the respondent of his tax debt such as contemplated in Markevich and could not have the effect of extending the six-year limitation period provided in section 32 of the Crown Liability Proceedings Act (R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50). With respect to the collection by the Agency of that part of the tax debt which was owed to the Government of Ontario, he found that such collection would be beyond the two-year limitation period set out in subsection 45(1)(h) of the former Limitations Act (Ontario).

[6] The Crown appealed to this Court. In addition to the ground it had raised below (i.e. acknowledgment of tax debt resulting from the carry back request), it argued that reassessments made in September 2000 and August 2002 were events that renewed the federal and provincial limitation periods, that the ten-year limitation period recently set out in section 222 of the Income Tax Act, as amended by S.C. 2004, c. 22, section 50, applied with respect to the federal tax and that the twenty-year limitation period set out for "specialty" in paragraph 45(1)(b) of the Limitations Act (Ontario) applied with respect to the provincial tax.

[7] The Attorney General for Ontario was granted leave to intervene in the appeal. He argued that under Ontario legislation, the Crown is not bound by a statute unless it is stated therein that the Crown is bound thereby (s. 11 of the Interpretation Act (Ontario)); that the former Limitations Act (Ontario) contains no provision stating that the Act is binding on the Crown; that paragraph 45(1)(h), upon which Mosley J. relied, does bind the Crown but applies only to actions that are penal in nature; and, should the Court find that the Act is binding on the Crown, that the relevant provision would be paragraph 45(1)(b), which sets out a twenty-year limitation period.

[8] The relevant statutory provisions are the following:

(as amended by the B*udget Implementation Act, 2004*, S.C. 2004, c. 22, s. 50)

222. ...

A tax debt is a debt due to Her Majesty and is recoverable as such in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act.

The Minister may not commence an action to collect a tax debt after the end of the limitation period for the collection of the tax debt.

The limitation period for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer begins

if subparagraph (i) does not apply and the tax debt was payable on March 4, 2004, or would have been payable on that date but for a limitation period that otherwise applied to the collection of the tax debt, on March 4, 2004; and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it begins.

The limitation period described in subsection (4) for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer restarts (and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it restarts) on any day, before it would otherwise end, on which the taxpayer acknowledges the tax debt in accordance with subsection (6);
the Minister commences an action to collect the tax debt; or the Minister, under subsection 159(3) or 160(2) or paragraph 227(10)(a), assesses any person in respect of the tax debt.

Notwithstanding any order or judgment made after March 3, 2004 that declares a tax debt not to be payable by a taxpayer, or that orders the Minister to reimburse to a taxpayer a tax debt collected by the Minister, because a limitation period that applied to the collection of the tax debt ended before royal assent to any measure giving

[9] I wish to point out at the outset that the appeal before us was essentially argued on grounds that had not been argued or well articulated in the Federal Court. With respect to the federal tax, the Crown had not raised the argument (which, as we shall see, ends up being a decisive one) based on the 2004 amendment to section 222 of the Income Tax Act. With respect to the provincial tax, it appears that none of the case law which was cited to us by the intervener had been brought to the attention of the Federal Court judge.

The federal limitation period

[10] The hearing before Mosley J. proceeded on April 28, 2004. Bill C-30, which introduced the amendment noted above, received Royal Assent on May 14, 2004. The impugned decision was rendered on June 4, 2004. One is at a loss to understand why the matter was not brought to the attention of the Federal Court judge by counsel for the Crown.

Digitized by Google

[11] The amended section 222 of the Income Tax Act is, to use the words of Linden J.A. in C.I. Mutual Funds Inc. et al v. The Queen (1999), 99 G.T.C. 7075 (F.C.A.) at 7076, "amply clear so as to rebut any presumption against retroactive application." The amendment was introduced as a Parliamentary response to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Markevich. It sets up, at subsection (4), a ten-year limitation period in income tax matters that replaces the six-year general limitation period set out in subsection 32(1) of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act. It goes on in subsection (10) to ensure that the amendment applies to any judgment made after March 3, 2004 that declares a tax debt not to be payable by a taxpayer because a limitation period ended before Royal Assent was given. Subsection (10) goes even further in deeming such tax debt to have become payable on March 4, 2004. The impugned judgment having been made on June 4, 2004, there is no doubt that the tax debt here at issue is deemed to have become payable on March 4, 2004 and that the limitation period expires on March 3, 2014.

[12] Counsel for the respondent was gracious enough to recognize that the amendment suffered from no ambiguity. He timidly suggested that the amendment was inoperative by virtue of section 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Such an argument cannot, of course, be entertained by this Court absent service of a constitutional question to all Attorneys General (see s. 57 of the Federal Courts Act). In any event, the argument would have no chance of success in view, notably, of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Authorson v. Canada (Attorney General), [2003] 2 S.C.R. 40, at 60. The amendment, here, is "clear and unambiguous" and satisfies the "due process of law" required by section 1(a). There being no conflict with the protections afforded by the Canadian Bill of Rights, there is no need for an express declaration that the provision operates notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights.

[13] In view of the conclusion I have reached with respect to the retroactivity of the 2004 amendment to section 222 of the Income Tax Act, I need not examine the other grounds argued by the appellant with respect to the federal tax.

The provincial limitation period

[14] Section 11 of the Interpretation Act (Ontario) provides that no Act affects the right of Her Majesty, unless it is expressly stated therein that Her Majesty is bound thereby.

[15] The former Limitations Act (Ontario) does not expressly state that it binds the Crown. The Ontario Court of Appeal has held that section 11 of the Interpretation Act "reinforces the ancient maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi" and that the Crown is only bound by those provisions of the former Limitations Act in which it is expressly mentioned (Ontario (Attorney General) v. Watkins (1975), 8 O.R. (2d) 513, at 514-515 (C.A.).

[16] Counsel for the intervener concedes that paragraph 45(1)(h) upon which Mosley J. relied does, by its very words, bind the Crown. He points out, however, and correctly in my view, that the jurisprudence interpreting that paragraph and its predecessors establishes that it only applies to actions that are penal in nature (see Thomson v. Lord Clanmorris, [1900] 1 Ch. 718 (C.A.), per Lindley M.R. at 725; Johnson Controls Inc. v. Varta Batteries Ltd. (1984), 80 C.P.R. (2d) 1 (F.C.A.), per Urie J.A. at 18; West End Construction Ltd. v. Ontario (Ministry of Labour) (1989), 62 D.L.R. (4th) 329 (Ont. C.A.), per Finlayson J. at 340; Abraham v. Canadian Admiral Corp. (Receiver of) (1998), 39 O.R. (3d) 176 (Ont. C.A.), per McKinlay J.A. at 181-182).

[17] An action taken to collect Ontario income taxes, which, by virtue of section 30 of the Income Tax Act (Ontario), "are debts due to Her Majesty in right of Ontario," is not a penal action. The two-year limitation period set out in paragraph 45(1)(h) did not apply.

[18] Counsel for the intervener also submits that paragraph 45(1)(b) is not applicable as it does not bind the Crown. I agree. In any event, that paragraph would have been of no use to the respondent as it sets out a twenty-year limitation period.

[19] It is worth noting, before closing, that in the new Limitations Act, 2002 (Ontario), section 3 states that "[t]his Act binds the Crown" and paragraph 16(1)(i) provides that "[t]here is no limitation period in respect of ... a proceeding to recover money owing to the Crown in respect of (i) fines, taxes and penalties, or (ii) interest that may be added to a tax or penalty under an Act." If there was uncertainty before - and I have found none - with respect to the imprescriptibility of tax collection proceedings in Ontario, there can be none now.

Costs

[20] With respect to the intervention, the Attorney General for Ontario was granted leave on the express condition that he "pay to the respondent on a party-to-party basis all extra fees and disbursements incurred by the respondent as a result of his intervention, including costs of the intervention." I would assess the whole of these fees and disbursements at $1,000.00.

[21] With respect to the appeal, had the amendment to section 222 been brought to the attention of the Federal Court judge, this appeal might have been unnecessary. In all likelihood, the judge would have dismissed the application insofar as the federal tax was involved and, in all likelihood, the respondent would not have appealed. On the other hand, the amendment to the federal legislation was of no consequence with regard to the provincial tax and the respondent would have seen that segment of his application dismissed by our Court in any event. At the end of the day, in fairness to the respondent, there should be no costs in the Federal Court and the respondent should be entitled to his costs against the appellant in the appeal, these costs to be assessed, as per rule 407, in accordance with column III of the table to Tariff B.

Disposition

[22] I would allow the appeal, set aside the decision of the Federal Court and dismiss the application for judicial review. There should be no order as to costs in the Federal Court. The respondent should have his costs on the appeal as against the appellant, these costs to be assessed in accordance with column III of the table to Tariff B. The intervener should pay costs, assessed at $1,000.00, to the respondent.

Richard Collins v. CCRA, 2005 FC 1431, An Interpretation of The New Prescription Statute

Digitized by Google

Docket: T-950-05 Citation: 2005 FC 1431

Ottawa, Ontario, this 21st day of October, 2005

Present: THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE SIMON NOËL BETWEEN:

RICHARD COLLINS

Applicant and

CANADA CUSTOMS AND REVENUE AGENCY

Respondent

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] This is an application by Richard Collins (the Applicant), a self-represented applicant, for judicial review of a decision of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency ("CCRA") to seize his pension proceeds in payment of his tax debts. The Applicant, a former resident of Nova Scotia, asks for an order to require the CCRA to cease its collection of tax debts, and for the restitution of the amounts already seized. The applicant now lives in the United States and has requested, pursuant to Rule 369 of the Federal Court Rules, SOR/98-106, for this motion to be decided on the basis of written representations only. The respondent did not oppose.

FACTS

[2] The Applicant's records with the CCRA are summarized in Lucie Allaire's affidavit dated September 30, 2005. According to this affidavit, the seizure of the Applicant's proceeds were executed in relation with 1986, 1988 and 1994 taxation years.

1. 1986 and 1988 Taxation Years

[3] As per Ms. Allaire's affidavit, Notices of Assessment were issued by the Minister of National Revenue ("Minister") for the 1986 and 1988 taxation years on October 14, 1987 and August 8, 1989, respectively. The Minister reassessed the applicant's tax payable for the 1986 and 1988 taxation years by Notices of Reassessment dated October 16, 1989, which were confirmed on or about August 1st, 1990. On October 27, 1989, the Applicant filed Notices of Objection with regards to the 1986 and 1988 taxation years. The applicant then filed a Notice of Appeal to the Tax Court of Canada on December 13, 1990 for the 1986 taxation year. This appeal was dismissed on September 29, 1992. The Notice of Objection for the 1988 taxation year was partly granted. Pursuant to this decision, the tax payable by the Applicant for the 1988 taxation year was reassessed on September 25, 1990. The applicant also filed an application for an extension of time to appeal to the Tax Court of Canada on November 10, 2004, for the 1986 and 1988 taxation years. This application was dismissed on March 23, 2005.

[4] According to Ms. Allaire's affidavit, as of September 28, 2005, the Applicant's outstanding federal and provincial tax liability amounts to $42 025,82 and $13 408,25, respectively, for the 1986 and the 1988 taxation years.

1994 Taxation Year

[5] The Applicant was assessed for the 1994 taxation year on June 15, 1995.

[6] As of September 28, 2005, the Applicant's outstanding federal and provincial tax liability was $799,11 with respect to his 1994 taxation year.

The Respondent's letters and the seizure

[7] As per Ms. Allaire's affidavit, the Respondent decided to collect arrears from the Applicant's pension proceeds from April 2004 to April 2005. A total amount of $1 724, 43 has been seized to date. Between May and September 1995, letters were sent to the applicant asking for the payment of arrears.

Digitized by Google

ISSUE

Was the Respondent lawfully entitled to collect the Applicant's tax debts in respect of his 1986, 1988 and 1994 taxation years?

Were tax debts of the Applicant prescribed as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court in Markevich v. Canada [2003] 1 R.C.S. 94, 2003 CSC 9?

ANALYSIS

[8] In Markevich v. Canada, supra, the Supreme Court of Canada held that, under section 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S. 1985, c. 50, the limitation period for the collection of federal income tax debt was six years. As for the collection of provincial tax debt, the Supreme Court held that the "federal Crown's right to collect provincial taxes is no greater than the right delegated to it by the province". Therefore, the time limitation found in the provincial law was applicable to the CCRA. The Applicant's argument is primarly based on this judgement of the Supreme Court of Canada. In his view, the CCRA should have been more diligent, and is therefore no longer entitled to the collection of arrears by reason of prescription.

[9] In response to this decision, Parliament amended section 222 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Suppl.) ("Federal Act") by enacting Bill C-30, An act to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament, 3rd Sess., 37th Parl, 2004 (received Royal Assent on May 14, 2004) ("Bill C-30"). Subsection 222(4) of the Federal Act reads :

The limitation period for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer

begins

if a notice of assessment, or a notice referred to in subsection 226(1), in respect of the tax debt is mailed to or served on the taxpayer, after March 3, 2004, on the day that is 90 days after the day on which the last one of those notices is mailed or served, and if subparagraph (i) does not apply and the tax debt was payable on March 4, 2004, or would have been payable on that date but for a limitation period that otherwise applied to the collection of the tax debt, on March 4, 2004; and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it begins. (my emphasis)

(4) Le délai de prescription pour le recouvrement d'une dette fiscale d'un contribuable :

commence à courir :

si un avis de cotisation, ou un avis visé au paragraphe 226(1), concernant la dette est posté ou signifié au contribuable après le 3 mars 2004, le quatre-vingt-dixième jour suivant le jour où le dernier de ces avis est posté ou signifié, si le sous-alinéa (i) ne s'applique pas et que la dette était exigible le 4 mars 2004, ou l'aurait étéen l'absence de tout délai de prescription qui s'est appliquépar ailleurs au recouvrement de la dette, le 4 mars 2004 prend fin, sous réserve du paragraphe (8), dix ans après le jour de son début. (je souligne) [10] The wording of subparagraph 222(4) ii) is clear. The word « tout » in the French version leaves no room for interpretation (the English version uses the general expression "a limitation"). Subparagraph 222(4)ii)

Digitized by Google

overrules any limitation period that existed prior to the adoption of Bill C-30. The Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal jurisprudence is unambiguous on this issue (See C.I. Mutual funds Inc. v. Canada, [1999] F.C.J. No. 199, [1999] F.C. 613; Gibson v. Canada, [2005]
No. 817, 2005 FCA 180). A tax debt that was prescribed prior to the adoption of Bill C-30 can nevertheless be enforced by the CCRA under the Act.
[11] As for provincial tax liability, the applicant was a resident of the province of Nova Scotia in 1986, 1988 and 1994. In virtue of a tax collection agreement between this province and the Federal government, the latter is responsible for the collection of taxes on behalf of the former. Section 81 of Nova Scotia's Income Tax Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 217 ("N.S. Act") provides that section 222 of the Federal Act applies to the collection of provincial tax debts. In fact, most of the "enforcement" sections of the N.S. Act refer and make applicable different sections of the Federal Act. Subsection 2(10) further provides that :
Where a provision, in this subsection referred to as "that section", of the Federal Act or the Federal Regulations is made applicable for the purpose of this Act, that section, as amended from time to time, applies with such modifications as the circumstances require for the purpose of this Act as though it had been enacted as a provision of this Act, and in applying that section for the purpose of this Act, in addition to any other modifications required by the circumstances [...]
Therefore, subparagraph 222(4)ii) is applicable to the provincial tax liability, and empowers the CCRA to collect the tax debts owed by the Applicant to the Province of Nova Scotia, until March 4, 2014. [12] For all these reasons, the Respondent was entitled to collect the Applicant's tax debts in respect of his 1986, 1988 and 1994 taxation years.
[13] In the Applicant's view, « the new legislation can in no way revive an alleged fiscal debt that was already extinguished one year earlier by the aforementioned ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada [Markevich v. Canada, supra], for if that were the case, it would have for effect the retroactive annulment of the actual ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada, which makes absolutely no sense » . With deference for the Applicant, the Parliament has discretion to overrule Supreme Court judgments. The principle of parliamentary supremacy is a foundation of Canadian constitutional law: the judiciary must abide by the statutes adopted by Parliament.

COSTS
[14] The Respondent asked for this judicial review application to be dismissed with costs. Having in mind the particularities of this case, no costs are allowed.

ORDER
THIS COURT ORDERS THAT:
- The application is dismissed without costs.

Hugh Doig v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2011 FC 371, a 25 Yr-Old Debt

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] The tax debt at issue in this application arose more than 25 years ago. While death and taxes may be certain, the collection of the latter is not.

[2] Mr. Doig seeks a declaration from this Court that he has no debt for taxes for the 1971 to 1984 taxation years. He says that he paid that debt but that Canada Revenue Agency or its predecessor agency (collectively referred to throughout as "CRA") failed to properly give him credit for payments he made.

[3] For the reasons that follow, I am unable to issue the declaration that is sought. Mr. Doig has waited too long to bring this application, and he has failed to prove on the balance of probabilities that he paid his tax debt.

Background

[4] CRA says that as of June 16, 2009 Mr. Doig was indebted to the Crown in the amount of

$323,738.31, comprised of unpaid taxes, interest and penalties "from taxation years prior to and including 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1991, 1992, and 1993."

[5] Mr. Doig does not dispute the amounts claimed by CRA to be owed with respect to taxation year 1985 and following; he disputes the claim of CRA that there is any debt owed for 1984 and prior taxation years (collectively the "prior period"). He says that he paid the tax debt of the prior period.

[6] This litigation has taken a circuitous route. The applicant initially took the position that the Notices of Assessment for the taxation years 1984 and prior had not been sent to or received by him. However, when the application came on for hearing, the position advanced by the applicant was that the debt from the prior period had been paid by him but that his payments had not been credited to his account by CRA. On consent, the hearing was adjourned and fresh records and memoranda were filed.

[7] I will follow the applicant's division of the prior period into three separate time periods: 1971- 1973, 1974-1979, and 1980-1984.

1971-1973

[8] On January 21, 1975, a Certificate filed by the respondent issued from the Federal Court of Canada – Trial Division in favour of the Crown stating that Mr. Doig had an unpaid tax debt, plus interest for the taxation years 1971 to 1973, in the amount of $14,277.19. A writ of fieri facias was issued and the record indicates that it was paid on or about February 3, 1975. The applicant submits that he was not properly credited with the payment and that the 1971 to 1973 tax liability is included in the amount CRA claims is owed for the prior period.

[9] The respondent agrees that the debt for this period was paid but asserts that no part of the tax debt claimed for the prior period includes or relates to this period of time.

[10] Mr. Doig swears that he made two payments to CRA in the period from 1974 to 1979 in satisfaction of the tax debt that arose within this period.

[11] He attests that: "On March 17, 1978, my wife, Helen Doig (nee Helen Teahen) placed a mortgage on her cottage property for $5,000.00." He says that despite the high interest rate of 13%, "the mortgage was placed on the cottage so that funds could be raised to pay my income tax arrears." He asserts that "my wife gave me the funds and I paid the proceeds to the CRA as partial payment of my outstanding taxes and interests [sic]."

[12] Mr. Doig then attests that in the fall of 1979, CRA in Ottawa contacted him and told him that he had outstanding tax arrears of approximately $17,000.00. Again, his wife placed a mortgage on her cottage property from which she received $16,000.00. Mr. Doig says that he contributed $1,000.00 of his own money and swears that he paid $17,000 to CRA "as payment against my outstanding taxes and interest." He says that:

From 1979 to January 1984, no collections [sic] actions were taken by the CRA's Ottawa or Sudbury collections offices against me and I was not advised of any outstanding tax debt. As such, I conducted my affairs on the basis that I had no tax debt outstanding.

It is my belief that when the Sudbury collections office became aware of the 1975 Certificate that it mistakenly concluded that I had never paid the tax debt.

[13] CRA submits that its records do not show that either payment was made, that the applicant has failed to prove on the balance of probabilities that these payments were made, and that the applicant's behaviour contradicts his claim that he made these payments.

1980-1984

[14] The applicant states that there were no collection steps taken by CRA and that he regularly paid his taxes in this period. He says that he only became aware of the alleged debt in 2005 when CRA withheld a small refund due to him. Following an inquiry to determine why it was withheld, he learned that CRA's records showed a balance forward from January 19, 1986, of $57,575.06.

[15] The respondent states that as a consequence of a change in its computer systems in 1986 a new statement of account was created. The system took the balance owed by the applicant on January 20, 1986 (relating to the 1984 and prior taxation years) and merged it with the tax debt owed on account of the 1985 taxation year and recorded the sum as one amount in July 1986. It states that from that date onward, the computer system labelled the merged debt as the "1985 debt"; however, it was a debt that related to the 1985 and prior taxation years. The respondent submits that its records filed in this proceeding show that it is comprised of debt from the 1985, 1984, 1983, 1982, and prior taxation years.

[16] CRA says that it has filed the best evidence available to prove the debt. It says that because the applicant waited more than 30 years to raise the allegation that he made payments that were not credited to his account, CRA is unable to provide statements of account from the 1970s showing the payments made and credited because all documents from that period have been destroyed.

[17] The respondent also submits that this application is time-barred under the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, RSC 1985, c C-50, s. 32 of which establishes a 6-year limitation period for launching proceedings against the Crown. CRA submits that the applicant knew or ought to have known of the debt he now disputes since at least 1986.

[18] The applicant says that the limitation period for his application is 10 years as provided for in s. 222(4) of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp). He says that he was unaware of the debt at issue until, in response to his inquiry, he received correspondence from CRA dated January 5, 2006, enclosing a Statement of Account that showed a balance forward as at January 19, 1986 of $57,575.06.

[19] In addition to the limitation period, CRA further submits that this application is time-barred based on the doctrines of undue delay, laches and acquiescence.

Issues

[20] The parties addressed three questions:

What is the applicable limitation period prescribed for the applicant's application, and when did the limitation period commence?

If the application is not proscribed by a limitation period, is the applicant barred from obtaining the relief requested on the basis of the doctrines of undue delay, laches, and acquiescence?

Is there a debt owed by the applicant to the respondent for any of the following taxation years: (i) 1971 to 1973; (ii) 1974 to 1979; or (iii) 1980 to 1984?

Analysis

1. The Limitation Period

[21] The Supreme Court of Canada in Markevich v Canada, 2003 SCC 9, disagreed with the view of CRA that no limitation period applied with respect to its collection of tax debts as none was provided in the Income Tax Act. The Supreme Court held that s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act applied to impose a six-year limitation period on the Crown's right to collect federal tax debts of a taxpayer.

[22] Section 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act provides as follows:

32. Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.

[23] In response to the decision in Markevich the government amended the Income Tax Act: SC 2004, c 22, s 50. Section 222 of the Act was amended to read, in relevant part, as follows:

222. (1) The following definitions apply in this section. "action"

« action »

"action" means an action to collect a tax debt of a taxpayer and includes a proceeding in a court and anything done by the Minister under subsection 129(2), 131(3), 132(2) or 164(2), section 203 or any provision of this Part.

"tax debt"

« dette fiscale »

"tax debt" means any amount payable by a taxpayer under this Act.

A tax debt is a debt due to Her Majesty and is recoverable as such in the Federal Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner provided by this Act.

The Minister may not commence an action to collect a tax debt after the end of the limitation period for the collection of the tax debt.

The limitation period for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer

begins

if a notice of assessment, or a notice referred to in subsection 226(1), in respect of the tax debt is sent to or served on the taxpayer, after March 3, 2004, on the day that is 90 days after the day on which the last one of those notices is sent or served, and if subparagraph (i) does not apply and the tax debt was payable on March 4, 2004, or would have been payable on that date but for a limitation period that otherwise applied to the collection of the tax debt, on March 4, 2004; and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it begins.

The limitation period described in subsection (4) for the collection of a tax debt of a taxpayer restarts (and ends, subject to subsection (8), on the day that is 10 years after the day on which it restarts) on any day, before it would otherwise end, on which the taxpayer acknowledges the tax debt in accordance with subsection (6);

the Minister commences an action to collect the tax debt; or the Minister, under subsection 159(3) or 160(2) or paragraph 227(10)(a), assesses any person in respect of the tax debt.

[24] The respondent submits that there is no provision in the Income Tax Act setting out a limitation period for taxpayers who claim that they made payments that were not credited to their account. Therefore, it says, s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act applies and the applicant had six years from the date on which he became aware, or ought to have become aware, that the payments he now claims were made were not credited to his tax account to commence this application.

[25] The applicant submits that s. 222 of the Income Tax Act applies. He says that the respondent's submission that s. 222 permits the Minister to wait ten years to collect taxes but does not permit the taxpayer to defend the Minister's actions is "innovative" but "not tenable." He relies, in part, on the following statement made by the Minister at the time s. 222 was amended:

The Government agrees that a limitation period for the collection of taxes is needed. We believe a 10-year limitation period is appropriate and recognizes the special reporting and assessment system in federal tax acts. It provides a reasonable amount of time for the Canada Revenue Agency and taxpayers to deal with tax debts.

[emphasis added] (Minister of Finance Ralph Goodale, Media Release, "March 4, 2004 Press Release: Minister of Finance Proposes Amendments to Change the Limitation Period for the Collection of Federal Tax Debts" (4 March 2004).)

[26] The approach to the correct interpretation of s. 222 of the Income Tax Act is set out by the Supreme Court in Trustco Mortgage v Canada, [2005] 2 SCR 601, at para. 10:

It has been long established as a matter of statutory interpretation that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": see 65302 British Columbia Ltd. v. Canada, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 804, at para. 50. The interpretation of a statutory provision must be made according to a textual, contextual and purposive analysis to find a meaning that is harmonious with the Act as a whole. When the words of a provision are precise and unequivocal, the ordinary meaning of the words play a dominant role in the interpretive process. On the other hand, where the words can support more than one reasonable meaning, the ordinary meaning of the words plays a lesser role. The relative effects of ordinary meaning, context and purpose on the interpretive process may vary, but in all cases the court must seek to read the provisions of an Act as a harmonious whole. [emphasis added]

[27] In my view, the words of s. 222 of the Income Tax Act are precise and unequivocal – the section applies to the "collection" by the Minister of a tax debt and only to that type of action. Subsection 222(3) provides: "The Minister may not commence an action to collect a tax debt after the end of the limitation period." It is beyond question that the section is directed to actions commenced by the Minister, and, in my view, it is equally beyond question that it applies only to such actions for there is no reference to any others.

Had Parliament intended the limitation period to apply equally to an application by a taxpayer claiming that the debt was paid, it could have easily said so – but it did not. The matter before this Court is an application commenced by the taxpayer, not a proceeding by the Minister to collect a tax debt, and I find that s. 222 of the Income Tax Act has no bearing on this application.

[28] The applicant submits that it is contrary to justice that the Minister may sue to recover a tax debt at any time within the 10 year limitation period but the taxpayer cannot raise a defence that he or she has paid the debt if that payment was made more than six years prior to the Minister's action being commenced. There is nothing in either the Income Tax Act or the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act which prevents a taxpayer from asserting as a defence to a claim that a debt is owed that the debt was paid, even in circumstances where the taxpayer is otherwise prevented by a limitation period from commencing an application seeking a declaration to that effect in anticipation of collection litigation. It is always a defence to debt collection to assert that there is no debt owed; the burden is on the debt collector to establish on the balance of probabilities that there is an unpaid debt.

[29] Having found that s. 222 of the Income Tax Act does not apply to this application, it follows that the limitation period set out in s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act may apply. The question to be answered is thus when, on the facts before us, this limitation period began running.

[30] A cause of action is "[a] group of operative facts giving rise to one or more bases for suing; a factual situation that entitles one person to obtain a remedy in court from another person," or, more simply, "a set of facts that provides the basis for an action in court" (Black's Law Dictionary, 9th ed.; Markevich, above, at para. 27). I agree with the respondent that the facts giving rise to the applicant's cause of action consist of the assertion by the respondent of a tax debt owed by the applicant for the years 1985 and prior and the respondent's collection actions against the applicant to recover the tax debt.

[31] The limitation period provided in the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act begins to run when an applicant knew or ought to have known that a cause of action existed: Central Trust v Rafuse, [1986] 2 SCR 147, at para. 77; Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14, at para. 16. This principle, discoverability, applies to statutory limitation periods unless it is displaced by clear legislative language: Ermineskin Indian Band and Nation v Canada, 2006 FCA 415, at para. 333, aff'd 2009 SCC 9. Mr. Doig says that he only realized that he had an alleged tax debt when CRA retained a refund in 2005 and he investigated and was then informed by letter dated January 5, 2006, that there was a balance forward, as at January 19, 1986, of $57,575.06. He further asserts in his affidavit of January 15, 2009: "From on or about 1992 until on or about 2004, I do not recall receiving any statements relating to this alleged debt."

[32] The applicant's credibility is brought into question when one contrasts his statement with the following:

in July 1986 the applicant was sent a Notice of Assessment that showed taxes owed for the 1985 taxation year of $1,717.13 and a total outstanding balance of $58,798.87;

in each year from 1985 through 1996, the applicant received a Notice of Assessment that reflected a balance forward that far exceeded the tax incurred in the taxation year under assessment;

the applicant was quoted his outstanding balance forward in an amount that included the balance for the prior period 23 times from September 17, 1987 to November 17, 1988;

the applicant was sent 13 statements from February 23, 1989 to September 8, 1992, showing the balance owing for the prior period;

the applicant received 21 "legal warnings" from CRA from June 22, 1989 to November 26, 1993 about the outstanding balance owed; and in the period between June 22, 1989 and January 29, 1997, the applicant made 10 promises to pay the balance owing or to make arrangements to pay it.

[33] The applicant no longer disputes that he received annual notices of assessment from CRA. The evidence in the record establishes that the applicant was aware of the claim that there was a tax debt related to the prior period at least as early as July 1986 when his 1985 Notice of Assessment reflected that debt. Accordingly, the six-year limitation period expired in July 1992, at the latest. Throughout that entire period of time notices were sent to the applicant and conversations were had with him concerning his outstanding tax debt. Indeed, the record shows that on January 29, 1997, after the expiration of the limitation period, the applicant met with a collection officer and stated that he thought he would be able to obtain approximately $68,000 from various sources to settle his account with CRA.

Digitized by Google

[34] The evidence before the Court simply does not support the applicant's assertion that he was unaware of this tax debt during the relevant period of time. Each notice of assessment sent to him reflected the tax debt he now challenges. The first, the 1985 taxation year assessment notice, showed that there was a tax debt due with respect to the applicant's income for that taxation year of $1,717.13 and a total balance outstanding of $58,798.87. Each of the following assessment notices through to 1996 showed the outstanding debt, albeit increased due to interest charges. Further, the respondent has filed evidence of repeated attempts by CRA to recover the tax debt: see Affidavit of Brian Just, paras. 23, 27, 28, and 31 and related Exhibits at Tab 1 of Respondent's Record. Therefore, I find that throughout the 1990s the applicant had knowledge of the facts that form the basis of his application.

[35] Accordingly, the application falls under the limitation period prescribed by s. 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and it is statute-barred.

Undue Delay, Laches and Acquiescence

[36] The same facts supporting the operation of the statutory limitation period underlie the respondent's argument that the applicant is precluded from proceeding with this application on the basis of the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence. In light of my holding above, it is not necessary to deal with this defence to the application, however, in the event that a higher court should disagree with my finding regarding the limitation period, the submissions made by the parties shall be briefly addressed.

[37] The respondent relies on the equitable defence of laches, as adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada in M. (K.) v M. (H.), [1992] 3 SCR 6. At para. 98, quoting R.P. Meagher et al, Equity Doctrines and Remedies, 2d ed (Sydney: Butterworths, 1984), the Supreme Court explained the conditions for the application of this defence:

[the plaintiff has either] (a) acquiesced in the defendant's conduct or (b) caused the defendant to alter his position in reasonable reliance on the plaintiff's acceptance of the status quo, or otherwise permitted a situation to arise which it would be unjust to disturb ...

[38] CRA relies on the applicant's knowledge of the tax debt, its attempts to collect the debt, and the prejudice caused to it by the delay in bringing this application – namely the destruction of records. For the same reasons the application is statute-barred, had the statutory limitation period not applied, I would find that the doctrine of laches would prevent the application from succeeding. Particularly important is the fact that the applicant has delayed for so long in bringing this application, knowing full well of the tax debt claimed by CRA. It is as a direct consequence of that delay that documents were destroyed and the respondent's ability to prove its position has been compromised. It would be unjust and unfair to permit this application to proceed in such circumstances even if it were not statute-barred.

[39] I would add that although the applicant suggested during an earlier pre-hearing motion that the document destruction policies of CRA might provide evidence proving his position that the past debts were paid, no submissions were made in this regard at the hearing.

Is there a debt owed by the applicant to the respondent for any of the following taxation years: (i) 1971 to 1973; (ii) 1974 to 1979; or (iii) 1980 to 1984?

[40] It must first be noted that the Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to entertain an application questioning the validity of tax assessments; that is a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tax Court: Optical Recording v Canada (1990), 116 NR 200 (FCA); Roitman v Canada, 2006 FCA 266; Walker v Canada, 2005 FCA 393.

[41] Mr. Doig states that he is not questioning the validity of the assessments made nor is he suggesting that he never received those notices of assessment. Rather, he says that he paid the debts owing but was not credited with payment. The burden of proof falls squarely on him to satisfy the Court on the balance of probabilities that he paid the debts.

Digitized by Google

1971 to 1973

[42] The parties agree that the debt owed with respect to these three taxation years was paid by Mr. Doig, as evidenced by the Certificate filed in the Federal Court – Trial Division on May 21, 1976.

[43] Mr. Doig asserts that this past debt was improperly carried forward and that he was not credited with having paid it. However, there is no evidence at all to support this assertion. There is no evidence that the 1971 to 1973 debt was carried forward and now forms part of the debt that CRA claims is owed, nor is there any evidence that CRA failed to credit Mr. Doig's account with his payment. Mr. Doig has failed to meet his burden of proof and the Court finds that no part of the debt now claimed arises from the tax once owed for the period 1971 to 1973.

[44] I agree with the submission of the respondent that "a payment made in 1975, in relation to a 1971 [to] 1973 tax debt is not sufficient evidence to contradict a statement of account which shows in January 1984, taxes were owed for years prior to 1982." The applicant's assertion that part of the debt now claimed relates to this period in the early 1970s amounts to no more than supposition and speculation. His own evidence is to that effect: "It is my belief that when the Sudbury collections office became aware of the 1975 Certificate that it mistakenly concluded that I had never paid the tax debt" [emphasis added]. The applicant fails to provide any grounds for that belief and, given that there are eight taxation years after 1973 and prior to 1982 to which the debt recorded at January 1984 could relate, much more than the applicant's belief would be required to find that the payment he made had not been credited to his tax account.

[45] The applicant attests that he made two payments to CRA in this period from funds his wife raised by placing mortgages on her cottage property. He has filed as exhibits copies of these two mortgages. He says that there were no collection efforts taken by CRA from 1979 to January 1984 and he was not advised of any outstanding tax debt. He states that he believed that he had no outstanding debt. As noted previously, the respondent has no record of the applicant having made either payment.

[46] There is no objective evidence filed by the applicant to support his assertion that the money from these mortgages was paid over to him by his wife and that he then paid the money to CRA. The applicant did not file, as one would have expected, an affidavit from his now former wife supporting his statement that she borrowed this money in order that he could satisfy the tax debt nor were any cancelled cheques provided from either the applicant or his former wife showing a payment to CRA. There was no explanation offered for why such evidence was not provided.

[47] The applicant's evidence is not consistent with the documentary record and brings into question his credibility concerning these alleged payments. In his affidavit sworn September 1, 2010, he attests: "The 1975 Certificate was lifted to allow me to make the payments from the mortgage proceeds." The 1975 Certificate related to the arrears for taxation years 1971 to 1973. A copy of the 1975 Certificate filed with the Court on May 21, 1976, shows that it was paid, and paid almost two years before the payments the applicant alleges he made from the mortgage proceeds.

[48] The record reveals that this cottage property had been owned by Mr. Doig until March 13, 1978, when he transferred title to it to Helen Teahen for $2.00 and other consideration. She took out the first mortgage on the property only five days later. The transfer of the property could not have occurred if the writ of fieri facias filed with the local

Sherriff's office had been active.

[49] I accept that the property was mortgaged twice and for the amounts that the applicant states. However, in light of questions relating to the applicant's credibility, his assertion that he made the payments to CRA requires some objective evidence to support it. There is none. The applicant has failed to establish, on the balance of probabilities, that he made payments of some $22,000.00 in the period 1974 to 1979 that CRA failed to credit to his tax account.

1980 to 1984

[50] Mr. Doig says that he heard nothing from CRA from 1979 to 1984 and therefore he was unaware that CRA was of the view that he owed any tax arrears. At the hearing, his counsel confirmed his position that he had paid all amounts owing as of January 1, 1984.

[51] However, the record before the Court relating to the tax situation in the early 1980s brings into serious question the applicant's statement that he was of the view that his account with CRA was current.

[52] Between January 1, 1984 and July 5, 1984, the applicant made payments to the CRA totalling
$3,527.00 and the CRA seized a total of $25.88 from him. This was despite allegedly knowing that his account with the CRA was clear as of January 1, 1984.

[53] In July 1984, the applicant was assessed taxes for the 1983 taxation year of $5,677.76. Thereafter he made payments of $11,066.45 and had $1,430.41 seized from him. Accordingly, in 1984 he paid to the CRA and had seized a total amount ($12,496.86) greater than the amount he owed specifically in relation to the 1983 taxation year ($5,677.76). If Mr. Doig had not had a debt relating to years earlier than 1983, CRA would have been indebted to him for an overpayment of $6,819.10, in addition to the $3,552.88 the CRA would have owed him for the earlier excess payments and seizure. Despite having allegedly paid off all amounts owing to the CRA as of January 1, 1984, the applicant continued to make regular payments to the CRA without ever demanding a refund of the $10,371.98 that would have been owed to him by the CRA.

[54] If one accepts the applicant's claim that he did not know that there was a debt claimed for the prior period, then one must find it reasonable that the applicant, without objection, made tax payments and permitted CRA to garnish sums from him when CRA was indebted to him and not vice versa. One would also have to find it reasonable that the applicant did not question why he did not receive a refund from CRA. I find neither to be a reasonable or expected response, particularly the latter given that in 2005 he questioned why CRA retained what he described as a "small refund" owed to him.

[55] As the respondent submits, not only did the applicant not dispute the debt from the prior period, he made promises to pay the debt on a number of occasions.

[56] I find that the conduct of the applicant, as described above, coupled with the evidence of the respondent that the notices of assessment sent to him reflected the tax owed from the prior period, puts into serious question the applicant's statement that he was led to believe that there was no tax debt from the prior period.

[57] I find that a taxpayer, in light of these facts, would have to be wilfully blind not to be aware that CRA was claiming that a debt was owed from the prior period.

Conclusion

[58] The applicant's application is statute-barred. If it were not statute-barred, then it would have been dismissed due to the applicant's undue delay and the application of the doctrine of laches. In any event, the applicant has failed to establish on the balance of probabilities that he made the necessary payments on account of tax arrears for the period prior to the 1985 taxation year. His application is dismissed.

in this matter is

JUDGMENT
THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that this application is dismissed and the respondent is awarded costs fixed at $15,000.00, inclusive of fees, disbursements and taxes.

Glenn Alexander Ross v. The Queen, 2002 FCT 401, Latent Issue of Requirement to Pay

Docket: T-1881-01
Neutral Citation: 2002 FCT 401

Toronto, Ontario, Wednesday, the 10th day of April, 2002 PRESENT: THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE DAWSON BETWEEN:
GLENN ALEXANDER ROSS
Applicant
- and -
HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN IN RIGHT OF CANADA
Respondent

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER
[1] The issue raised on this application for judicial review is whether on May 16, 2001, by application of certain limitation provisions, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency ("CCRA") was out of time to issue a Requirement to Pay ("Requirement") in respect of a tax debt owed by Mr. Ross, the applicant in this proceeding.

THE FACTS
[2] At all relevant times Mr. Ross has been resident in British Columbia.
[3] On or about May 25, 1993, Revenue Canada, the predecessor to the CCRA, issued notices of reassessment to Mr. Ross in respect of the 1989 and 1990 taxation years. Mr. Ross filed notices of objection in respect of those assessments, but on January 3, 1995 the assessments were confirmed. While he was entitled to appeal those decisions to the Tax Court, Mr. Ross filed no appeal.
[4] By application of subsection 225.1(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.) c.1 ("Act") Revenue Canada was therefore at liberty to commence collection activities with respect to Mr. Ross' indebtedness in respect of the 1989 and 1990 tax years as of April 3, 1995.
[5] On September 30, 1999, a certificate in respect of this debt was registered in this Court as authorized by section 223 of the Act. Also on September 30, 1999, a writ of seizure and sale was issued by the Court. On October 7, 1999, the debt was registered in the British Columbia Personal Property Registry.
[6] On May 16, 2001, CCRA issued a Requirement to Mr. Ross' wife in an effort to collect the monies owed to it by Mr. Ross. The Requirement alleged that Mr. Ross was indebted to the CCRA in the amount of $139,530.48.
[7] Mr. Ross denied, and continues to deny, liability in that amount on the ground that the debt has been statutorily extinguished by operation of subsection 9(1) of the Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c.266 ("Limitation Act"). Parenthetically, it should be noted that at the hearing it was common ground between Mr. Ross and the Crown that Mr. Ross properly owes the sum of $250.00 to the CCRA in respect of a Heating Rebate issued in January, 2001. The balance of the claimed indebtedness is agreed to arise in respect of the 1989 and 1990 taxation years. In these reasons, the word "debt" will be used to mean the monies owing in respect of the 1989 and 1990 years, exclusive of the sum of $250.00 and any interest attributable thereto.

Digitized by Google

[8] This application for judicial review is brought "in respect of a decision of the Minister of National Revenue ["Minister"] which was communicated on May 16, 2001 in a Requirement to Pay [...] wherein it is claimed that the applicant is indebted to the respondent in the total amount of $139,530.48". The relief sought is as follows:

an order, pursuant to sections 18 and 18.1 of the Federal Court Act:

declaring invalid, quashing or setting aside the said decision of the Minister; declaring that the applicant is not indebted to the respondent for the applicant's 1990 and prior taxation years;

ANALYSIS

[9] Consideration of whether the debt has been extinguished begins with the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Markevich v. Canada, 2001 FCA 144 (CanLII), [2001] 3 F.C. 449; 2001 FCA 144, leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada granted [2001] S.C.C.A. No. 371. Mr. Ross relies upon Markevich. The Crown, prosecuting its appeal in Markevich, acknowledges the decision to be binding upon this Court.

[10] Mr. Markevich was a resident of British Columbia who, as of June, 1986, had a total liability for federal and provincial income tax of $234,136.04. In January, 1998, Mr. Markevich was advised that the Minister intended to take collection action for the full amount of the indebtedness. Mr. Markevich challenged the Minister's right to so proceed and the Federal Court of Appeal held that by virtue of the combined effect of section 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50 ("CLPA") and subsection 3(5) of the Limitation Act, the Minister was statute-barred from collecting the amount owing, whether by court action or statutory collection procedures.

[11] As to the nature of this type of indebtedness and permitted collection methods, the Act provides in section 222 that monies owing in respect of taxes, interest, penalties, costs and the like are debts due to Her Majesty and are recoverable as such in the Federal Court, or any court of competent jurisdiction, or in any other manner provided by the Act.

[12] As to the timing of collection efforts, section 225.1 of the Act prohibits the Minister from effecting collection until the happening of certain events. The limit relevant in this case is found in subsection 225.1(2) which precludes collection activity until 90 days after the notice was mailed to Mr. Ross advising him that the re-assessments were confirmed.
[13] Thereafter, the following provisions of the Act deal with collection proceedings both in Court and through the Minister's statutory authority.
(1) For the purposes of subsection 223(2), an "amount payable" by a person means any or all of an amount payable under this Act by the person;
an amount payable under the Employment Insurance Act by the person; (b.1) an amount payable under the Unemployment Insurance Act by the person; an amount payable under the Canada Pension Plan by the person; and an amount payable by the person under an Act of a province with which the Minister of Finance has entered into an agreement for the collection of taxes payable to the province under that Act.
An amount payable by a person (in this section referred to as a "debtor") that has not been paid or any part of an amount payable by the debtor that has not been paid may be certified by the Minister as an amount payable by the debtor.
On production to the Federal Court, a certificate made under subsection 223(2) in respect of a debtor shall be registered in the Court and when so registered has the same effect, and all proceedings may be taken thereon, as if the certificate were a judgment obtained in the Court against the debtor for a debt in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by the statute or statutes referred to in subsection 223(1) under which the amount is payable and, for the purpose of any such proceedings, the certificate shall be deemed to be a judgment of the Court against the debtor for a debt due to Her Majesty, enforceable in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by that statute or statutes.
All reasonable costs and charges incurred or paid in respect of the registration in the Court of a certificate made under subsection 223(2) or in respect of any proceedings taken to collect the amount certified are recoverable in like manner as if they had been included in the amount certified in the certificate when it was registered.
Charge on property
A document issued by the Federal Court evidencing a certificate in respect of a debtor registered under subsection 223(3), a writ of that Court issued pursuant to the certificate or any notification of the document or writ (such document, writ or notification in this section referred to as a "memorial") may be filed, registered or otherwise recorded for the purpose of creating a charge, lien or priority on, or a binding interest in, property in a province, or any interest in such property, held by the debtor in the same manner as a document evidencing
a judgment of the superior court of the province against a person for a debt owing by the person, or an amount payable or required to be remitted by a person in the province in respect of a debt owing to Her Majesty in right of the province may be filed, registered or otherwise recorded in accordance with or pursuant to the law of the province to create a charge, lien or priority on, or a binding interest in, the property or interest.
A document issued by the Federal Court evidencing a certificate in respect of a debtor registered under subsection 223(3), a writ of that Court issued pursuant to the certificate or any notification of the document or writ (such document, writ or notification in this section referred to as a "memorial") may be filed, registered or otherwise recorded for the purpose of creating a charge, lien or priority on, or a binding interest in, property in a province, or any interest in such property, held by the debtor in the same manner as a document evidencing

an amount payable or required to be remitted by a person in the province in respect of a debt owing to Her Majesty in right of the province may be filed, registered or otherwise recorded in accordance with or pursuant to the law of the province to create a charge, lien or priority on, or a binding interest in, the property or interest.

(1) Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is, or will be within one year, liable to make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment under this Act (in this subsection and subsections 224(1.1) and 224(3) referred to as the "tax debtor"), the Minister may in writing require the person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under this Act.

[14] The limitation provisions considered by the Federal Court of Appeal in Markevich, supra, and relied upon by Mr. Ross, are section 32 of the CLPA and subsections 3(5) and 9(1) of the Limitation Act. They, respectively, provide as follows:
The Crown Liability and Proceedings Act
32. Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.
The Limitation Act
3(5) Any other action not specifically provided for in this Act or any other Act may not be brought after the expiration of 6 years after the date on which the right to do so arose.
9(1) On the expiration of a limitation period set by this Act for a cause of action to recover any debt, damages or other money, or for an accounting in respect of any matter, the right and title of the person formerly having the cause of action and of a person claiming through the person in respect of that matter is, as against the person against whom the cause of action formerly lay and as against the person's successors, extinguished.
[15] In Markevich, Justice Rothstein, writing for the Court, considered the scope of the phrase "proceedings [...] in respect of any cause of action" found in section 32 of the CLPA, and considered whether it applies to the Minister's statutory collection procedures under the Act. At paragraph 51 Justice Rothstein wrote:
Statutory collection procedures parallel court proceedings after a judgment is obtained. By enacting the statutory collection procedures under the Income Tax Act, Parliament gave the Minister direct access to enforceable collection procedures that would otherwise only be available after a court action and judgement. The issuance of a requirement to pay by the Minister has substantially the same effect as a garnishing order issued by the Court. It binds a third party debtor to pay to the Crown amounts to which the taxpayer is entitled from that third party. A direction to seize and sell chattels is analogous to a writ of execution issued by a court. In fact, subsection 225(5) provides that such goods and chattels that would be exempt from seizure under a writ of execution issued out of a superior court of the province in which the seizure is made are exempt from seizure by the Minister. To construe the term "proceedings" in section 32 as including these procedures, it seems to me, recognizes the substantial similarity between statutory and court collection procedures.

I conclude therefore that proceedings brought by the Crown in respect of a cause of action in section 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act include both court and statutory collection procedures under the Income Tax Act. The applicable limitation provision is subsection 3(5) of the British Columbia Limitation Act. Under subsection 3(5), an action may not be brought after the expiration of six years after the date on which the right to do so arose. Action is defined as including a self help remedy. Its scope is obviously intended to be broad and not limited to a court action.
The statutory collection procedures under the Income Tax Act are available to the Minister in his own right, exercisable by himself alone, without the necessity of court action. I have no difficulty concluding that statutory collection procedures under the Income Tax Act are self help remedies for purposes of subsection 3(5) of the British Columbia Limitation Act. In any event, by subsection 9(1) of the Limitation Act, after expiry of the relevant limitation period, the cause of action is extinguished.
[17] The predominant feature before the Court in Markevich, supra, was that from 1987 to 1998 Revenue Canada took no steps to collect the debt. Thus, the Federal Court of Appeal had to address the question of whether the Crown might pursue collection of tax debts indefinitely, despite prolonged inaction.
[18] That is not the fact situation now before the Court because within what the Federal Court of Appeal found to be the applicable six-year limitation period the Crown took steps to collect the debt. The Minister filed a certificate in respect of the debt in this Court, obtained a writ of seizure and sale, and registered the debt in the applicable personal property registry.
[19] Mr. Ross argues, however, that those actions do not avail the Minister because the Requirement was issued beyond the applicable six-year limitation period. The parties agree that by application of the principles articulated in Markevich, the limitation period commenced running on April 3, 1995 and so had expired on April 4, 2001.
[20] Mr. Ross says that the filing of the certificate did not protect the Minister's position because:
The Minister' s certificate is not a judgment of this or any Court. The making of a certificate is simply an exercise of statutory authority. To protect against the limitation period the Minister should have commenced proceedings in the Court in respect of the tax debt. This is said to be reflected in the fact that Rule 425(a) of the Federal Court Rules, 1998 ("Rules") provides:
425. An order for the payment of money may be enforced by (a) a writ of seizure and sale in Form 425A. (Underlining added)
Mr. Ross submits that there is no "order" to support the writ because the certificate is not an order. If the certificate is an order, Mr. Ross argues that he should have been served with it on its filing and should have been able to "mount a defense" to it.
The writ of seizure and sale "is fruit of the same poison tree that gave life to the certificate". It would be anomalous if the effect of obtaining and registering the writ would be to allow enforcement proceedings to continue more than six years after the debt became collectible. All enforcement efforts must cease after six years, unless a judgment has been obtained as defined in the Limitation Act.
The limitation period provided in the Limitation Act with respect to judgments does not apply because the certificate does not fall within the definition of "judgment" in the Limitation Act.
[21] In advancing these arguments Mr. Ross relies upon authority such as the Minister of National Revenue
Bolduc, [1961] Ex. C.R. 115; The Queen v. Star Treck Holdings Limited, [1978] 1 F.C. 61

Digitized by Google

(T.D.); Her Majesty the Queen v. T.H. Parker (1981), 2 C.E.R. 181 (F.C.T.D.); and E.H. Price Limited v. The Queen, [1983] 2 F.C. 841 (F.C.A.), all to the effect that a certificate is not a judgment of this Court.

[22] Although expressed in different fashions, the linch-pin of Mr. Ross' position is that the effect of filing the Minister's certificate is so different qualitatively from that of obtaining a judgment that filing a certificate is ineffective to preserve the Minister's rights.

[23] With respect to this position, it is correct that in the context of issues such as how a certificate may be attacked or amended, the Court has stated in the authorities cited by Mr. Ross that a certificate is not, and does not become, a judgment of the Court. But the Court has also in those same cases held that the effect of the making and the registration of a certificate is precisely as is stated in the Act. In the words of Justice Thurlow, as he then was, in Bolduc, supra at page 118, registration of a certificate "has the same force and effect and the same proceedings may be taken upon it as if it were a judgment".

[24] This means that upon registration of the certificate within six years of the commencement of the limitation period, the certificate was capable of supporting the issuance of writs of execution pursuant to Rule 434(1).

[25] While it is true that there is no "order" in the sense of a judgment rendered in a contested proceeding in this Court between Mr. Ross and the Crown, the wording of subsection 223(3) of the Act makes such order unnecessary because through this provision Parliament has made clear its intent that the certificate "has the same effect" of "a judgment obtained in the Court" and all proceedings may be taken on the basis of the certificate as if it were a judgment of the Court.

[26] The answer to Mr. Ross' concern that he should have been notified of the filing of the certificate and given an opportunity to defend his position or appeal the certificate is found in subsection 165(1) of the Act, which requires that a taxpayer challenge the Minister's assessment within 90 days, and in subsection 169(1) of the Act, which requires that an appeal to the Tax Court be brought within 90 days of confirmation by the Minister of an assessment or re-assessment. See: Olympia Interiors Ltd. v. Canada, 2001 F.C.A. 360 at paragraph 5, and 2001 F.C.A. 361 at paragraph 6. Here, no appeal was taken to the Tax Court from the confirmation of the notices of assessment. That was the proper forum for attacking the propriety of the debt. [27] The above analysis deals with the Minister's right to take proceedings on the certificate pursuant to section 223 of the Act. Given the determination of the Federal Court of Appeal in Markevich, supra, that the limitation period also applies to the statutory collection proceedings, I have considered whether the Minister may pursue those remedies more than six years after the debt accrued where a certificate has been filed within the six-year period.

[28] At first blush there may seem little to connect filing a certificate in the Court with preservation of the Minister's right to exercise her statutory collection procedures.

[29] Counsel for the Minister submits that the answer is found in the wording of subsection 224(1) of the Act which allows the Minister to issue a requirement to pay where it is known or suspected that within one year a third party will be liable to make a payment to a person "who is liable to make a payment under" the Act. Because the effect of the filing of the certificate makes a person liable to execution, it is submitted that such person continues to be "liable to make a payment under this Act".

[30] I have been persuaded that this submission is correct for the following reasons.

[31] First, the effect of Markevich is that the limitation period provided in section 32 of the CLPA is applicable to both statutory collection procedures and court collection procedures, and that after the expiry of the relevant limitation period the cause of action is extinguished. This requires the Minister to take remedial steps to collect a tax debt within the limitation period. Markevich does not require the Minister to obtain a judgment of the Court to preserve her rights, nor does Markevich require the Minister to exhaust all collection efforts within the limitation period. Markevich recognizes the similarity between statutory and court collection procedures, and applies limitation laws irrespective of the remedial steps taken to collect a tax debt.

Digitized by Google

[32] Limitation provisions have the effect of requiring a cause of action to be merged in a judgment which is obtained in a proceeding commenced within the limitation period. Given that the filing of a certificate is the mechanism which the Act provides for the Minister to obtain the "same effect" as a judgment, it seems to me that the filing of a certificate must protect the Minister's right to collect a tax debt whether by statutory or court collection procedures.

[33] Subsection 224(1) of the Act allows the issuance of a requirement to pay where the tax debtor is "liable to make a payment under this Act". The tax debtor is not so liable where the Minister is statute-barred from enforcing collection. Where, however, the Minister has preserved the debt by filing a certificate, which has the same effect as a judgment, the debt is not extinguished, the debtor remains liable to pay monies owing under the Act (tax, penalties, interest and the like) and a requirement to pay may be issued.

[34] Moreover, section 3 of the Limitation Act would permit an action to be brought on the certificate, which would be deemed to be a judgment of this Court, within six years. That six-year period has not expired so that the debt so certified has not been extinguished.

[35] Second, this interpretation avoids the incongruity that the Minister could enforce the tax debt through a writ of execution, but not through the statutory collection remedies.

[36] Third, this interpretation is consistent with the rationales for limitation legislation because the filing of the certificate brings about certainty and diligence and avoids the need to rely on stale evidence.

[37] It follows, and I have concluded, that the debt has not been extinguished and that the Requirement was properly issued. The application for judicial review will therefore be dismissed.

[38] The Crown seeks the costs of this application. I can see no reason why the costs should not follow the result of the application, as more particularly set out in the following order.

[39] For these reasons:

ORDER

The application for judicial review is dismissed.

The applicant shall pay to the respondent the costs of this application, to be assessed in accordance with Column III of the table to Tariff B of the Federal Court Rules, 1998.

[1] This is an appeal from a decision of a learned Motions Judge in which he found that the majority of the tax debt pertaining to the Appellant's 1979 through 1982 and 1997 taxation years, had not been extinguished by operation of the Limitation Act R.S.B.C. 1996, c.266. The Respondent cross-appeals that part of the decision holding that the remaining portion of the Appellant's tax debt was statute barred.

[2] Having regard to the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Markevich v. Canada, 2003 S.C.C. 9, the Respondent abandoned her cross-appeal at the beginning of the hearing. The Appellant on the other hand chose to proceed with his appeal, but it is clear that the aforementioned decision of the Supreme Court is equally dispositive of his appeal.

[3] In particular, it can no longer be argued that the applicable limitation period for the collection of taxes and related interests and penalties begins to run when income is earned. As was found by the Motions Judge and confirmed by the Supreme Court in Markevich (paragraphs 27 and 28), that period begins to run as of the time when a tax debt comes into existence and the delay prescribed by section 225.1 of the Income Tax Act (ITA) expires (i.e. 90 days after the mailing of the notice of assessment).

[4] The argument that the registration of a certificate with the Federal Court in accordance with subsection 223(3) of the ITA does not operate to renew the limitation period is equally no longer open to the Appellant. In Markevich the Supreme Court after referring to Ross v. Canada, 2002 D.T.C. 6885 (T.D.) (affirmed 2002 D.T.C. 7462) expressly refers to the registration of this certificate as a means of renewing the limitation period (Markevich, paragraph 18).

[5] It is therefore clear, in light of Markevich that the Appellant's appeal must suffer the same fate as the cross-appeal. However, it became apparent during the course of the hearing that there are issues arising from the reasons of the Motions Judge which could usefully be clarified.

[6] The Motions Judge noted in his reasons that the indebtedness in issue before him arose from assessments and reassessments which he summarized in the following table (reasons, paragraph 2).

Taxation year	Assessment/reassessment	Date
1979	Assessment	July 14, 1980
	Reassessment	April 16, 1984
1980	Assessment	August 4, 1981
	Reassessment	April 16, 1984
1981	Assessment	August 10, 1982
	Reassessment	April 16, 1984
1982	Assessment	September 16, 1983
1983	Assessment	June 25, 1984
1984	Assessment	July 22, 1985
	Reassessment	January 15, 1988
1997	Assessment	June 4, 1998

[7] The conclusion which he reached is stated at paragraph 13 of his reasons in the form of a declaration:

...because they are statute barred, the Minister shall not enforce collection of any amounts for Taxes, Canada Pension Plan, interest or penalties pertaining solely to the Minister's July 14, 1980, and August 4,

Digitized by Google

1981, assessments of the applicant's 1979 and 1980 taxation years. In all other respects, the application for judicial review should be dismissed.

[8] It follows from this declaration that to the extent that the Minister's certificate dated January 20, 1988 (Appeal Book p. 73) reflects amounts relating to the 1979 and 1980 taxation years, they are statute barred unless they are additional income taxes or Canada Pension Plan contributions and related interest and penalties arising from the April 16, 1984 reassessments issued in respect to the Appellant's 1979 and 1980 taxation years.

[9] As well, it is useful to state that the certificate only operates to renew the limitation period with respect to the amounts reflected therein that were not statute barred as of the date of the registration of the certificate. Amounts which were statute barred as of that date, if any, are excluded. [10] It became apparent during the course of the hearing that the Appellant had yet to receive a revised statement of account giving effect to the decision of the Motions Judge. Needless to say, the Appellant is entitled to a detailed statement of account demonstrating that the Motion Judge's decision, insofar as it is favourable to him, has been complied with.

[11] The appeal and the cross-appeal will both be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs. (Sgd.) "Marc Noël"

[27] The certification need not carry an original signature of the appropriately delegated CRA authority to be valid. It can be simply rubber-stamped by the appropriate delegate. See In The Matter Of An Assessment Or Assessments By The Minister Of National Revenue Under The One Or More Of The Income Tax Act (Canada), Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance Act, Employment Insurance Act And Alberta Income Tax Act, Against: Patricia L. > [15] The respondent urged that the certification process followed against her was simply because the Certificate issued under section 223 of the Income Tax Act was improperly signed under the relevant delegation of authority from the responsible Minister. Counsel for CCRA placed before the Court the appropriate delegation document. She also referred me to R. v. Ehli[5] and The Queen v. Galbraith[6] as authority for the proposition that the delegation here was properly exercised albeit that a rubber-stamp impression of the appropriate signature was relied upon. I adopt these authorities and find no irregularity in the certification process here followed by CCRA.

(9) Notwithstanding any law of Canada or of a province, a sheriff or other person shall not, without the written consent of the Minister, sell or otherwise dispose of any property, or publish any notice or otherwise advertise in respect of any sale or other disposition of any property pursuant to any process issued or charge, lien, priority or binding interest created in any proceeding to collect an amount certified in a certificate made under subsection 223(2), interest on the amount and costs, but if that consent is subsequently given, any property that would have been affected by such a process, charge, lien, priority or binding interest if the Minister's consent had been given at the time the process was issued or the charge, lien, priority or binding interest was created, as the case may be, shall be bound, seized, attached, charged or otherwise affected as it would be if that consent had been given at the time the process was issued or the charge, lien, priority or binding interest was created, as the case may be.

Completion of notices, etc.
(10) If information required to be set out by any sheriff or other person in a minute, notice or document required to be completed for any purpose cannot, by reason of subsection 223(9), be so set out, the sheriff or other person shall complete the minute, notice or document to the extent possible without that information and, when the consent of the Minister is given under that subsection, a further minute, notice or document setting out all the information shall be completed for the same purpose, and the sheriff or other person having complied with this subsection is deemed to have complied with the Act, regulation or rule requiring the information to be set out in the minute, notice or document.

Application for an order
(11) A sheriff or other person who is unable, by reason of subsection 223(9) or 223(10), to comply with any law or rule of court is bound by any order made by a judge of the Federal Court, on an ex parte application by the Minister, for the purpose of giving effect to the proceeding, charge, lien, priority or binding interest.

Deemed security
(11.1) When a charge, lien, priority or binding interest created under subsection 223(6) by filing, registering or otherwise recording a memorial under subsection 223(5) is registered in accordance with subsection 87(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, it is deemed

(b) to also be a claim referred to in paragraph 86(2)(a) of that Act.

Details in certificates and memorials
(12) Notwithstanding any law of Canada or of a province, in any certificate made under subsection 223(2) in respect of a debtor, in any memorial evidencing the certificate or in any writ or document issued for the purpose of collecting an amount certified, it is sufficient for all purposes
(a) to set out, as the amount payable by the debtor, the total of amounts payable by the debtor without setting out the separate making up that total; and
(b) to refer to the rate of interest to be charged on the separate amounts making up the amount payable in general terms as interest at the rate prescribed under this Act applicable from time to time on amounts payable to the Receiver General without indicating the specific rates of interest to be charged on each of the separate amounts or to be charged for any particular period of time.

Application of ss. 223(1) to (8) and (12)
223.1 (1) Subsections 223(1) to 223(8) and 223(12) are applicable with respect to certificates made under section 223 or section 223 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, after 1971 and documents evidencing such certificates that were issued by the Federal Court and that were filed, registered or otherwise recorded after 1977 under the laws of a province, except that, where any such certificate or document was the subject of an action pending in a court on February 10, 1988 or the subject of a court decision given on or before that date, section 223 shall be read, for the purposes of applying it with respect to that certificate or document, as section 223 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, read at the time the certificate was registered or the document was issued, as the case may be.

Application of ss. 223(9) to (11)
(2) Subsections 223(9) to 223(11) are applicable with respect to certificates made under section 223, or section 223 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, after September 13, 1988.

Subsection 223(1) provides the primary basis upon which CRA will take steps, if other primary collection efforts fail, to reinforce their interest in the taxes payable by a taxpayer. The scope of the provision relates only to under the Acts cited. Pursuant to subsection 223(3) the step is accepted by the Registar of the Federal Court and registered as a judgment requiring no hearing of fact. It is at the discretion of the taxpayer to commence proceedings to attempt to have the certificate vacated but upon registration it radiates as a certificate against any property of the taxpayer thus preventing its clandestine liquidation. There is a statutory two step process with the certification, the registration of the certificate and then the registration of the charge on any property of the taxpayer.

The Need to Have A Foundation of an Expectedly-Received Notice of Assessment

There have been a few cases in which the taxpayer attempted to argue that since they did not receive a Notice of Assessment of the tax debt the certificates were void. The issue was brought up, in a deduction at source case involving director liability in Dupont Roofing & Sheet Metal Inc. v. MNR[28] where only because of the nature of DAS (that do not require a notice of assessment though in this case the taxpayer was given a trust account audit report) that pursuant to Frederick J. Buccini v. Her Majesty The Queen[29] (which cited Continental Bank of Canada v. R[30]) with:

> ISSUES:
> [11] The several issues raised by the parties can be reduced to two:
> 1. Was it necessary for the Minister to issue notices of assessment to the taxpayer for unpaid payroll taxes and if so, has it been established that notice was given?
> 2. If notice of assessment was required and was not given to the taxpayer, should the certificate be declared a nullity?
> ARGUMENTS & ANALYSIS:
> Standard of Review
> [12] In the present matter, the Minister's discretion to certify the debt was exercised by a designate relying upon the historics record maintained in the CRA electronic database. To the extent that questions of natural justice, legitimate expectation and procedural fairness arise in this matter, the Court must determine whether fairness requires that the decision be overturned: eBay Canada Limited et al. v. MNR, 2008 FCA 348 at para. 36. Otherwise, the issues involve questions of mixed fact and law in which the legal question cannot be extricated from the factual findings and deference should be shown: Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339 at para. 89.
> [13] This matter is, in my view, analogous to a judicial review of a fairness decision by tax officials as the applicant is, in effect, seeking relief from the negative decision he received in response to his objection to the derivative liability assessment. As stated by Justice James O'Reilly in Sandler v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 459, 2010 D.T.C. 5073 at para. 7, this Court "can overturn the Minister's decision under the fairness provision only if it was unreasonable, in the sense that it falls outside the range of possible acceptable outcomes based on the facts and the law", citing Telfer v. Canada (Revenue Agency), 2009 FCA 23 at para. 25. See also: Osborne v. The Attorney General of Canada, 2010 FC 673. The overall standard of review on this application should therefore be reasonableness.

apply to assessments for failure to remit payroll taxes. The applicant does not dispute that a tax liability arose from the corporate activities but argues that the obligation to actually pay the debt does not arise until a notice of assessment is issued and mailed to the taxpayer. The applicant submits that a certificate can only be issued upon default of payment following these actions. Failing proof of issuance of the assessment and proof of mailing of the notice to the taxpayer, the certificate is invalid and must be quashed.

[15] The applicant alleges that notices of the underlying corporate assessments were never issued, or, if issued, were never mailed to Dupont. While it is not necessary to prove receipt, the burden of proving the existence of the notices and the date of mailing falls on the Minister. This, asserts the applicant, is within the Minister's knowledge and the respondent alone controls the means of adducing evidence of the completion of either act.

[16] In this case, the applicant contends, the Minister's evidence contains significant inconsistencies and falls short of establishing that notices of assessment were in fact created and mailed to the applicant. The respondent has been unable to produce the corporate assessments. Moreover, the evidence pertaining to the respondent's mailing practices at the relevant time was not first hand knowledge but was based on "information and belief", contrary to Rule 81 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106. It was within the power of the respondent to provide direct evidence of CRA's mailing procedures, especially in light of the importance of mailing procedures in this application. As witnesses with that knowledge did not provide evidence, the applicant could not directly cross-examine the source of the information relied on by the respondent.

[17] The applicant further submits that its right to procedural fairness has been breached by the Minister's certification of the amount payable without first issuing Notices of Assessment. The scheme of the tax legislation provides that a taxpayer may object to a liability imposed after the taxpayer has been assessed: subsection 165(1) of the ITA; Sections 27.1, 92, 22 CPP, EI and ITA (Ontario) respectively. The respondent is required to "give a taxpayer adequate notice of the basis of reassessment, so that a taxpayer can fairly appeal or respond": Frederick J. Buccini v. Her Majesty the Queen, 2000 DTC 6685 (FCA), at para. 16, referring to Continental Bank of Canada v. R. [1998] 2 S.C.R. 358.

[18] The applicant argues it is fair and reasonable for it to have the legitimate expectation that before the Minister "certifies" an "amount payable" pursuant to subsection 223(2) of the ITA, the Minister would have first ascertained the amount payable via the normal assessment process and then would have completed that assessment process by issuing (i.e. mailing) a Notice of Assessment to the applicant. This would allow the applicant the opportunity to respond by objecting. In the result, the certificate should be nullified as the Minister has not satisfied the burden of proving that the assessment had been mailed.

[19] The respondent's position is that the CRA is not required to mail notices for failure to remit payroll taxes before certifying a payroll tax debt. The ITA requires all employers to calculate, withhold and remit payroll taxes from employee wages. There is no requirement for the mailing of notices of assessment prior to these amounts becoming due. Employers regularly become liable to pay amounts to the Crown without being assessed by the Minister. If the Minister assesses an employer for failure to remit payroll taxes that have become payable, those outstanding amounts are payable to the Receiver General, even if they are in dispute. If an employer fails to comply with source deduction requirements, any outstanding "amount payable", plus interest, may be certified by the Minister of National Revenue for the purpose of securing the debt or as a precursor to collection: In the Matter of an Assessment or Assessments by the Minister of National Revenue Under the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan and the Unemployment Act Against 92000 Holdings Limited, 93 DTC 5047 at para. 5. Collections restrictions, which otherwise prevent the Minister from certifying a tax debt until a notice of assessment has been mailed, do not apply to payroll taxes, in the respondent's submission: ITA s. 225.1(6)(b); Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Swiftsure Taxi Co, 2004 FC 980, [2004] 4 C.T.C. 304 at para. 16; Jus D'Or Inc. v. CCRA, 2007 FC 754 at paras. 12-15.

[20] Further, the respondent submits, mailing requirements are procedural fairness requirements material to pursuing rights of appeal. They do not restrict the collection of payroll debts. Should there have been a true error on the part of the Minister in failing to mail the assessment, the respondent contends that Dupont's remedy is to request an extension of time for filing a Notice of Objection prior to appealing to the Tax Court of Canada.

[21] I agree with the applicant that where proof of the issuance and mailing of a notice of assessment is required, the onus falls on the Minister. This is because the facts are "peculiarly within his [the Minister's] knowledge and he alone controls the means of adducing evidence of them": Aztec Industries Inc. v. Her Majesty the Queen, 95 DTC 5235, [1995] 1 C.T.C. 327 (FCA) at para. 12. Here, the applicant's counsel has effectively pointed out shortcomings in the Minister's evidence concerning the mailing of the underlying assessments such as the lack of direct evidence from a mailroom employee and inconsistencies in the evidence of the Minister's witnesses as to the procedures followed in 2003. But, if it is necessary to find that notices of assessment were mailed, I am satisfied on the basis of the Minister's evidence that the two notices of failures to remit payroll assessments for the 2001 and 2002 tax years were placed into the CRA mail stream and mailed to Dupont in 2003.

[22] As stated by Justice Marshall Rothstein in Kovacevic v. Canada, 2003 FCA 293, 308 N.R. 266 at para. 16:

> [w]hen legislation requires that documents be sent by a large organization such as a government department by ordinary mail, but does not require registered or certified mail or evidence of a more formal means of sending … [G]enerally it would be sufficient to set out in an affidavit, from the last individual in authority who dealt with the document before it entered the normal mailing procedures of the office, what those procedures were.

That standard, in my view, was satisfied by Mr. Gentile's evidence.

[23] I note that in Kovacevic, the legislation required the use of registered mail and the evidence fell short of proving that was done. However, I do not think it was necessary in this case for the Minister to prove that notices of assessment were mailed to Dupont in order to establish that certification of the tax debt was reasonable. There is no factual dispute in this matter that Dupont, through its controlling directors, was aware of the outstanding tax liability. They had met with Mr. Pizzonia and had received from him the trust report setting out the amounts owing for the unpaid payroll taxes in 2001 and 2002.

[24] Mr. Gomes acknowledged in his evidence that he was aware of the debt and that it was roughly the same amount that Dupont was owed by Applewood. Mr. Gomes also acknowledged not having attended to his tax records between the time Dupont and Applewood separated in 2003 and the fire that occurred in January, 2005, thereby displaying a degree of negligence with respect to his corporate responsibilities, tantamount to wilful blindness. He could not say whether the notices were in his box of records or not as he did not examine the contents of the box. The urgency of the matter was only brought home to him when he received the Director's Derivative Liability Assessment in 2005 which attributes the corporation's tax debt to him in his personal capacity.

[25] The jurisprudence relied upon by the applicant to advance the claim that the Minister is required to provide the taxpayer with a notice of assessment involve cases pertaining to personal income tax, not payroll taxes. So, although the Minister may be obliged to provide an individual with a notice assessment, the same is not true for the withholding and remitting of payroll taxes. Section 153 of the ITA explicitly instructs those persons who pay out wages to deduct a certain percentage of the salary for taxes and remit that amount to the Receiver General:

153. (1) Every person paying at any time in a taxation year	153. (1) Toute personne qui verse au cours d'une année d'imposition l'un des montants suivants :

accordance with prescribed rules and shall, at the prescribed time, remit that amount to the Receiver General on account of the payee's tax for the year under this Part or Part XI.3, as the case may be, and, where at that prescribed time the person is a prescribed person, the remittance shall be made to the account of the Receiver General at a designated financial institution.	doit, au moment fixé par règlement, remettre cette somme au receveur général au titre de l'impôt du bénéficiaire ou du dépositaire pour l'année en vertu de la présente partie ou de la partie XI.3. Toutefois, lorsque la personne est visée par règlement à ce moment, la somme est versée au compte du receveur général dans une institution financière désignée.

[26] See also s.108 of the Income Tax Regulations, C.R.C., c. 945 ("Regulations") which further requires payment of taxes not remitted to the Receiver General within 7 days of ceasing to carry on a business:

108.	108.
(2) Where an employer has ceased to carry on business, any amount deducted or withheld under subsection 153(1) of the Act that has not been remitted to the Receiver General shall be paid within 7 days of the day when the employer ceased to carry on business.	(2) Lorsque l'employeur a cessé d'exploiter une entreprise, tout montant déduit ou retenu en vertu du paragraphe 153(1) de la Loi qui n'a pas été remis au Receveur général doit l'être dans les 7 jours de la date à laquelle l'employeur a cessé d'exploiter l'entreprise.

[27] Section 153 of the ITA and s. 108 of the Regulations both apply to the applicant Dupont. In allowing Applewood to transfer only net amounts to Dupont to pay its employees, it failed to adhere to the tax scheme.

[28] Further, the provisions in subsections 225.1(1) and following prohibit the Minister from, among other things, certifying an assessed tax debt or giving notice of such a liability until after the collection-commencement day in respect of the amount. Subsection 225.1(6)(b) makes it clear that these provisions do not apply to amounts required to be deducted or withheld:

[29] Therefore, as correctly argued by the respondent, it is not necessary to mail notices of assessment prior to these amounts becoming due. This is consistent with the duty of the Minister to promote and protect the public interest by ensuring the ITA is applied fairly: Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Swiftsure Taxi Co., 2004 FC 980, [2004] 4 C.T.C. 304 at para. 16; Jus D'Or Inc. v. CCRA, 2007 FC 754 at paras. 12-15.

[32] In other words, the CRA is entitled to verify that payroll taxes have been properly remitted to the Receiver General. Nothing in the present matter suggests that the CRA pursued a course of action that was beyond the ambit of its power as provided by the ITA. The applicant Dupont did fail to withhold employee tax and remit that tax to the Receiver General. The CRA had the statutory authority to follow up on that failure through the certification of the tax debt.

[33] Having found that it was unnecessary for the Minister to issue notices of assessment to the taxpayer Dupont for unpaid payroll taxes, the question of whether the applicant received these assessments becomes moot. In any event, and has already been suggested, the applicant may apply to the Minister to request an extension of time for filing a notice of objection prior to appealing to the Tax Court of Canada: ITA s. 166.1(1); ITA s. 166.2(5) (b) (iii).

[34] Based on the foregoing, I cannot find that it was unreasonable for the Minister to certify the debt in the amount of $204,704.21 plus interest. The ITA does not require the Minister to provide notices of assessments to corporate taxpayers who have an ongoing obligation to remit payroll taxes. Furthermore, it is clear from the evidence that the applicant was either fully aware, or ought to have been aware, of the debt owed and the obligation to pay it. As such, the certificate shall not be declared a nullity and this application for judicial review is dismissed with costs to the respondent.

JUDGMENT

IT IS THE JUDGMENT OF THIS COURT that:

1. the Certificate filed in the Federal Court Registry under s.223 of the Income Tax Act on June 11, 2004 as Court File No. 6552-04 that the amount of $204, 704.21 plus interest from May 15, 2004 was payable by the applicant and had not been paid is valid;

Any Type of Property Can Be Certified

Any type of property can be certified against under the Act. This was the issue in In the Matter against Don McDonald[31] there the taxpayer contested the Minister certificate against his interest in an unadministered estate. The Court held:

> [5] The interest in question in this case – Mr. McDonald's interest in the real estate that falls to be distributed under his father's will to Mr. McDonald and his sisters – arises for consideration under Rule 458(1)(a)(i) as "an interest in real property."
> [6] Rule 458(1)(a) places no limitation on the nature or extent of the judgment debtors "interest in real property or immoveables." As Justice Martineau pointed out in Canada (Minister of National Revenue- M.N.R.) v. Laguerre, 2008 FC 460, [2008] F.C.J. No. 578 at paragraph 3, the registration of a certificate of the Minister is "equivalent to a judgment of this Court" which means that the Minister "may immediately register an interim charge against any immovable (sic) belonging to the judgment debtor mentioned in the certificate in question." Justice Martineau's words are equally applicable to "any" interest in real property.
> [7] Justice Martineau also makes several points at paragraph 5 of his reasons in Laguerre that, in my view, are also applicable to the case before me:
> > 5. Rule 459(1) reads, "At a show cause hearing referred to in paragraph 458(1)(b), the Court shall make the interim charge absolute, in Form 459, or discharge it. In this case, then, the Court has two options: to make the charge absolute or to discharge it. I note that rules 458 and 459 do not require a judgment creditor to seize the immovable immediately (although he could); the goal is rather to charge it with the equivalent of a judicial hypothec to ensure the protection of his rights: R. v. Mullin, [1985] 2 C.T.C. 128. More specifically, the purpose and effect of these rules is the creation of a charge on the debtor's immovable pursuant to a judgment, affecting the said immovable when that judgment is enforced: Re Beaudry, [1979] 2 FC 138. Given that we are simply dealing with a judgment execution measure and that under rule 462, the Court may, > on a motion by the judgment debtor or any other person having a right in the property charged with an interim or absolute charge, discharge or vary the charging order on such terms as it considers just with respect to costs, I do not find it premature to issue a charging order absolute in this case.

[8] Mr. McDonald does not deny that, under his father's will, he has an "interest in real property." He characterizes this interest as "indirect/contingent, beneficial," but it is still an interest in real property.

[9] As Justice Martineau pointed out in Laguerre, Rule 462 allows a discharge or variance on motion of the judgment debtor or any other person with an interest in property subject to an interim or absolute charge under rule 458 or 459, at any time, on such terms as to costs as the Court considers just. In my view, there is sufficient flexibility within the rules to deal with the charge in question should it be necessary to do so as part of the estate administration process. There is really no evidence before me that the charge in question will lead to problems or "chaos" in the administration of the estate. I regard Mr. McDonald's concerns in this regard as speculative and unlikely, given the Court's ability to discharge or vary with suitable terms as to costs.

[10] As regards the scope of "an interest in real property" under 458(1), there is simply nothing in the governing legislation or the Rules to suggest that such an interest should be limited in some way. Mr. McDonald argues that there is nothing to suggest that the wording was intended to encompass the interest he has in the land under his father's estate. In my view, however, it is Mr. McDonald who is seeking to limit the plain and obvious meaning of "an interest in real property or immoveables" and there is nothing in the scheme of the governing legislation, the Rules, or the jurisprudence to suggest that such a limitation should apply. An interest in land is an interest in land, even if it is a beneficial and contingent interest in land. To embark upon a process of trying to carve out certain interests in land that should not be subject to Rule 458 would, in my view, be extremely difficult and would result in the kind of confusion for which I can see no justification in principle or authority.

[11] Jowitt's dictionary of English Law, 2nd ed. (1977) p. 995 (as cited in Words & Phrases, volume 4 at page 1178), establishes that a person has an interest in something when "he has rights, advantages, duties, liabilities, losses or the like, connected with it, whether present or future, ascertained or potential…"

[12] Based on such an expansive definition, I believe that there is little question that the property interests in the land currently maintained by the Respondent would fall within the scope of Rule 458.

[13] Black's Law Dictionary also contains an expansive interpretation of the term "interest." Black's considers an interest to be "a legal share in something; all or part of a legal or equitable claim to or right in property." Black's 7th edition at page 816.

[14] Moreover, in Williams v. Papworth, [1900] A.C. 563, 69 LJPC (as cited in Rystephaniuk v. Prosken, 59 Man R. 142 and Words and Phrases, above,) Lord Macnagten said with regard to the term interest in land,

> It could not, of course, be disputed that the expression "interest in land," unless there was something to restrict the meaning, must include equitable as well as legal interests.

[15] Based on the expansive definition of the word "interest" and the phrase "interest in land," it is my view that the Respondent's interest is encompassed in Rule 458. Furthermore, contrary to the Respondent's argument, there is nothing in the wording of Rule 458 that restricts the meaning of "an interest in real property." As such, on an interpretive basis, it appears that the Respondent's interest is included in Rule 458.

[16] Because the estate has yet to be distributed, the Respondent has a concern that it could be premature to require the Respondent to pay tax on an asset he has yet to acquire. I think that such a concern, although potentially valid, does not arise on these facts.

[17] In this case, it appears the Respondent is attempting to delay distributing the property in question to the beneficiaries, himself included, so that he can avoid paying his share of taxes on the property. As stated by the Applicant, his "failure to convey the legal interest of this real property to the devisees is ostensibly keeping his one quarter beneficial interest in this asset outside the reach of the tax collector." Hence, on these facts, I see no reason not to allow Rule 458(1)(a) to take effect in accordance with the interpretation set out above. As Justice Martineau pointed out in Laguerre, given that we are dealing with a judgment execution measure, there is enough flexibility to deal with anomalies and injustices if and when they arise. They do not arise here.

[18] Consequently, I believe that the interim change in this case should be made absolute in accordance with Rule 459.

CHARGING ORDER ABSOLUTE

UPON MOTION made returnable on January 18, 2010 by Order of Justice Pinard, dated November 30, 2009;

AND UPON reading the material filed on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada in its application for an ex parte interim charging order and on hearing the submissions of counsel for Don McDonald and counsel for the Attorney General of Canada, and upon reading further written submissions filed by both counsel;

IT IS ORDERED THAT:

1. The interest of Don McDonald in the assets specified in the real property described as:
   a. PCL 34570 SEC DKF; PT LOCATION 460P UNSURVEYED TERRITORY PT OF GALT ISLAND, LAKE OF THE WOODS, PT 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 23R5964 and PT 3 and 4 KR341 S/T PT 10 and 13, 23R5964 AS IN LT30027; S/T LT222465; DISTRICT OF KENORA; and stand charged with the payment of $2,546,249.27, the amount due from Don McDonald to Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada as represented by the Minister of National Revenue pursuant to a certificate registered in this Honourable Court on or about May 8, 2008, said certificate having the force of a judgment pursuant to subsection 223(3) of the Income Tax Act, together with any applicable interest, compounded daily, at the rate prescribed under the Income Tax Act and the costs of this motion, which are to be added to the judgment debt.

In MNR v. Marcel Malachowski (also known as …)[32] the Minister based a charging order under Federal Court Rule 458 on an alleged beneficial interest in a piece of real estate when there was a lease with option to buy and the tax debtor had consistently recognized that he would be buying the property in his internal ledgers. The legal owner sought to have the charge removed and there was the following discussion about burden to establish that the certificate must be clearly an unambiguously founded when presented for order:

Issues

[33] The Moving Party requests an order discharging the interim charging order on the following grounds:

1. Suzanne Fishwick is the legal owner of the property described in the charging order;
2. Mr. Malachowski, the Judgment Debtor, has no interest in the property;
3. It was unreasonable for the Minister to pursue the charging order when her representatives knew, in light of the evidence known to them, that the Judgment Debtor had no interest in the property;
4. Rule 462.

[34] In my view, the proper issues in this proceeding are:

1. Who bears the onus in a motion to set aside an interim charging order made under Rule 458?
2. Does Rule 458 of the Rules apply to beneficial interests in real property?
3. Did Mr. Malachowski have a beneficial interest in Nun's Point?

Analysis

Preliminary Matters

[35] Two preliminary matters arise in this motion.

[36] The first is an application by the Moving Party to have the affidavit evidence appending the last wills and testaments of both Ms. Fishwick and Mr. Donihee accepted. Their wills make no mention of Mr. Malachowski. This evidence had not been previously provided and was not subject to cross-examination on affidavit. The Minister takes no position on this application. Given that the Minister has led similar evidence to the effect that the Moving Party and Mr. Donihee treated Mr. Malachowski "like a son" as well as evidence of their involvement as executors of Mr. Malachowski's will, I will admit this evidence.

[37] Second, a letter was sent to the Federal Court by Mr. Malachowski, in which he makes a number of statements. Understandably, Mr. Malachowski has not attended because of his incarceration. However, the evidence discloses he has had resources to draw on. He has been served with the interim charging order and has not taken steps to be represented in these proceedings as a party. Moreover, Mr. Malachowski's statements in the letter have not been presented by way of affidavit or statutory declaration, a step that would be feasible even if he is now in more constrained financial circumstances. Accepting the letter as is would be unfair to the parties adverse in interest. I do not admit Mr. Malachowski's letter either as a submission or as evidence and I will not have any further regard to Mr. Malachowski's letter.

[32] 2011 FC 413

Digitized by Google

Burden of Proof with respect to the Motion

[38] The Moving Party submits that the ultimate burden is on the Minister to demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that the interim charging order should be made absolute and disputes the interim charging order should have even been granted in the first place.

[39] The Moving Party has emphasized that the Minister had a duty to be completely candid with the Court in bringing the ex parte application for an interim charging order. She submits that the Minister failed to discharge this duty by not first obtaining evidence from the Moving Party about her ownership of Nun's Point or by not disclosing to the Court that she held the legal title to the property.

[40] Although Rule 399 provides that an ex parte motion shall be set aside if the party against whom the order is made discloses a prima facie case why the order should not have been made, I consider Rule 399 not to apply since the interim charging order was made under Rule 458. In this case Rules 458 to 465 govern.

[41] Rules 458 to 465 of the Rules establish a procedure for obtaining a charging order. Where a charge is imposed on the land of the judgment debtor on the ex parte motion of the judgment creditor, the property owner is entitled to object to the charging order granted. In particular, Rule 462 provides:

> 462. The Court may, on the motion of a judgement debtor or any person with an interest in property subject to an interim or absolute charge under rule 458 or 459, at any time, discharge or vary the charging order on such terms as to costs as it considers just.
> (emphasis added)

[42] The Moving Party submits that the Federal Court has confirmed during an analysis of Rule 2400, the predecessor to Rule 458, that such an application must recognize the rights of both the judgement debtor and the third party owner of the land at issue: R v Couillard Enterprises Inc, [1978] F.C. 181. She states that the Court must consider the basis of a third party's objection prior to making an interim order absolute.

[43] The Moving Party makes an analogy to the 'jeopardy collection' rules under the ITA. The general rule set out in subsection 225.1(1) of the ITA is that the Minister is ordinarily restricted from collecting from a taxpayer until 90 days after the Notice of Assessment was mailed but under section 225.2, where a court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe the collection of all or part of the amount assessed would be jeopardized by a delay in collection, the court shall authorize the Minister to proceed to collect prior to the expiry of the 90 days.

[44] The Moving Party submits that the Court may set aside an order if it finds the motion record in support of the ex parte authorization contained shortcomings. She refers to Justice Lemieux`s decision in Re Gravel, 2005 FC 1252 (Re Gravel) at para 7 where he quoted and relied on the principles applicable to "jeopardy collection" that had been previously summarized in Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v Services M.L. Marengère Inc, [2000] 176 F.T.R. 1 (MNR v Marengère Inc):

> In terms of burden, an applicant under subsection 225.2(8) has the initial burden to show that there are reasonable grounds to doubt that the test required by subsection 225.2(2) has been met, that is the collection of all or any part of the amounts assessed would be jeopardized by the delay in collection. However, the ultimate burden is on the Crown to justify the jeopardy collection order granted on an ex parte basis. However, the mere suspicion or concern that delay may jeopardize collection is not sufficient per se.
> An ex parte collection order is an extraordinary remedy. Revenue Canada must exercise utmost good faith and insure full and frank disclosure.

[45] The Moving Party also relies on Minister of National Revenue v Landru, [1993] 1 CTC 93 (SKQB) (Landru) as the authority for the proposition that there must be compelling evidence beyond mere suspicion or conjecture that would be likely to jeopardize the collection of the amount assessed.

[46] The Minister's position is that the onus is on the Moving Party bringing this particular motion.

[47] The difficulty with the Moving Party's analogy to the "jeopardy provision" in the ITA is twofold.

[48] First, subsection 225.2(2) sets out a statutory pre-condition that there be reasonable grounds that the collection of the assets would be jeopardized by a delay in collection pending any appeal of the assessment. Rules 458 to 465 of the Federal Court Rules do not contain an analogous precondition that the collection of the assets be jeopardized by delay.

[49] Second, in Re Gravel, counsel for the Minister acknowledged shortcomings in the motion record filed on that ex parte application about the alleged jeopardy. No such admission is made here.

[50] Also in Landru, the taxpayer filed an affidavit attesting to having adequate income to meet his obligations and expressing a bona fide intention to pay the tax debt. Here, there is no declaration by Mr. Malachowski about having income or any intention to pay the outstanding tax debt.

[51] Accordingly neither the statutory provisions nor the evidence in the motion record are in accord with the section 225.1 jeopardy analogy proposed by the Moving Party.

Digitized by Google

[52] In result, I do not agree that the Moving Party's burden to set aside the interim charging order is merely to show that there are reasonable grounds to doubt the validity of the Order. The Moving Party's burden to set aside the interim charging order in advance of any consideration on whether or not to make the Order absolute is the same as with any motion, that is, on the balance of probabilities.

Equitable interest in land

[53] The Minister submits there is evidence to support its position that Mr. Malachowski had a beneficial interest in Nun's Point:

i) the ledger found during the RCMP 2006 raid of the Nun's Point records a $1,000,000 purchase price for the property as well as payments totalling $222,234 between October 19, 2005 and February 22, 2006;

ii) at the time of the RCMP search, Ms. Hooper, Mr. Malachowski's common law spouse, described Ms. Fishwick and Mr. Donihee as the former owners of Nun's Point;

iii) while at the Nun's Point, Mr. Malachowski ordered and had installed in the residence custom built cabinets worth more than $30,000, and

iv) Mr. Malachowski also ordered extensive landscaping at a cost of at least $35,000.

[54] The Moving Party submits that the primary onus is on the Minister to prove Mr. Malachowski has a legal interest in Nun's Point. She argues that for an interest in real property to exist or be proven, there must be a document in writing. She cites the Statute of Frauds R.S.O. 1990, c. S.19, as am. S.O. 1994, c. 27, s. 55:

> 1. (1) Every estate or interest of freehold and every uncertain interest of, in, to or out of any messuages, lands, tenements or hereditaments shall be made or created by a writing signed by the parties making or creating the same, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized in writing, and, if not so made or created, has the force and effect of an estate at will only, and shall not be deemed or taken to have any other or greater force or effect.
> 2. Subject to section 9 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, no lease, estate or interest, either of freehold or term of years, or any uncertain interest of, in, to or out of any messuages, lands, tenements or hereditaments shall be assigned, granted or surrendered unless it be by deed or note in writing signed by the party so assigning, granting, or surrendering the same, or the party's agent thereunto lawfully authorized by writing or by act or operation of law.
> ....

> 4. No action shall be brought to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of the executor's or administrator's own estate, or to charge any person upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of any other person, or to charge any person upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which the action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof is in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith or some person thereunto lawfully authorized by the party.
> 1994, c. 27, s. 55
> 9. Subject to section 10, all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tenements or hereditaments shall be manifested and proved by a writing signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his or her last will in writing, or else they are void and of no effect.
> (emphasis by Moving Party)

[55] The Moving Party submits that the onus is on the Minister to prove that Mr. Malachowski has a legal interest in Nun's Point, and can only do so if the evidence satisfies the requirements under the Statute of Frauds. She submits that there is no evidence to prove that Nun's Point was sold or transferred to Mr. Malachowski and, in the alternative; the Moving Party submits that she has satisfied the onus to prove she is the legal owner of the Nun's Point.

[56] The Moving Party cites R v Mullins, [1985] 2 CTC 128 (FCTD) where the Federal Court held that a co-owner of the land has the right to object to a charging order and was successful in setting aside such a charge.

[57] These submissions skirt the real issue. The proper question, in my view, is firstly whether there can be an equitable interest in land and secondly, whether Rule 458 can attach to such an equitable interest.

[58] The Statute of Frauds itself recognizes an equitable interest in land. Subsection 1(1) of that Act states that every interest in lands shall be made in writing but "if not so made or created, has the force and effect of an estate at will only". Consequently, there may an equitable interest in lands even if not in writing but the legislation gives it limited application.

[59] Moreover, the doctrine of part performance may take an oral agreement for the purchase of land outside the operation of the Statute of Frauds.

[60] In Erie Sand and Gravel Limited v Seres' Farms Limited et al., (2009) 97 O.R. (3d) 241, the Ontario Court of Appeal considered a situation where Erie Sand and Gravel Limited (Erie) wanted to buy a parcel of land from Seres' Farms Limited (Seres' Farms). Erie was aware of a right of first refusal held by a third party, Tri-B Acres Inc. (Tri-B). Erie and Seres' Farm met to discuss the purchase. During the meetings, Seres' Farms insisted on a written offer that it could present to Tri-B. Erie made it clear that it would only provide a written offer when all terms of the sale and purchase were finalized. Erie understood their oral arrangement to be that unless Tri-B matched its offer, it would acquire the land. Erie then made an offer in writing along with a cheque for the full price. Seres' Farms presented this written offer to Tri-B. Tri-B responded by offering to match the selling price but with a partial deposit rather than the full purchase payment. Seres' Farms then sold the land to Tri-B.

[61] The Ontario Court of Appeal held that the purpose of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds is to prevent fraudulent dealings in land based on perjured evidence. However, it added that equity created the doctrine of part performance to prevent the Statute of Frauds from being used as a variant of unconscionable dealings. Since Tri-B did not match the Erie offer, namely the Erie's delivery of the full purchase price along with its offer, Seres' Farms was not entitled to accept the Tri-B offer. The partial performance by Erie in delivering a written offer along with the cheque for payment in full took the agreement outside the operation of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds.

[62] I conclude that an equitable interest in land can exist when partial performance takes an oral agreement outside the scope of the Statute of Frauds.

Rule 458 and Equitable Interests in Land

[63] In Re Laquerre, 2008 FC 460 (Laquerre), Justice Martineau considered a challenge to having an interim charging order made absolute. In the course of ruling the charging order absolute, he considered the effect of a charging order on immoveable property, stating:

> "I note that rules 458 and 459 do not require a judgment creditor to seize the immovable immediately (although he could); the goal is rather to charge it with the equivalent of a judicial hypothec to ensure the protection of his rights: R. v. Mullin, [1985] 2 C.T.C. 128. More specifically, the purpose and effect of these rules is the creation of a charge on the debtor's immovable pursuant to a judgment, affecting the said immovable when that judgment is enforced: Re Beaudry, [1979] 2 FC 138.

[64] In Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v McDonald, 2010 FC 340 (MNR v MacDonald), the respondent sought to have an interim charging order against his interest in an estate discharged claiming that he did not have an interest in the property under Rule 458(1)(a). The property in question was his entitlement to land as provided in his father's will. The respondent admitted having "an indirect, contingent, beneficial interest" but argued that Rule 458 did not encompass this kind of an interest.

[65] Justice Russell found Justice Martineau's words in Laquerre were equally applicable to an interest in real property. Justice Russell stated:

> 10 As regards the scope of "an interest in real property" under 458(1), there is simply nothing in the governing legislation or the Rules to suggest that such an interest should be limited in some way. Mr. McDonald argues that there is nothing to suggest that the wording was intended to encompass the interest he has in the land under his father's estate. In my view, however, it is Mr. McDonald who is seeking to limit the plain and obvious meaning of "an interest in real property or immoveables" and there is nothing in the scheme of the governing legislation, the Rules, or the jurisprudence to suggest that such a limitation should apply. An interest in land is an interest in land, even if it is a beneficial and contingent interest in land. To embark upon a process of trying to carve out certain interests in land that should not be subject to Rule 458 would, in my view, be extremely difficult and would result in the kind of confusion for which I can see no justification in principle or authority.

11 Jowitt's [D]ictionary of English Law, 2nd ed. (1977) p. 995 (as cited in Words & Phrases, volume 4 at page 1178), establishes that a person has an interest in something when "he has rights, advantages, duties, liabilities, losses or the like, connected with it, whether present or future, ascertained or potential..."

12 Based on such an expansive definition, I believe that there is little question that the property interests in the land currently maintained by the Respondent would fall within the scope of Rule 458.

13 Black's Law Dictionary also contains an expansive interpretation of the term "interest." Black's considers an interest to be "a legal share in something; all or part of a legal or equitable claim to or right in property." Black's 7th edition at page 816.

14 Moreover, in Williams v. Papworth, [1900] A.C. 563 (New South Wales P.C.), 69 LJPC (as cited in Rystephaniuk v. Prosken (1951), 59 Man. R. 142 (Man. K.B.) and Words and Phrases, above,) Lord Macnagten said with regard to the term interest in land,

> It could not, of course, be disputed that > the expression "interest in land," unless there was something to restrict the meaning, must include equitable as well as legal interests.

Digitized by Google

> 15 Based on the expansive definition of the word "interest" and the phrase "interest in land," it is my view that the Respondent's interest is encompassed in Rule 458. Furthermore, contrary to the Respondent's argument, there is nothing in the wording of Rule 458 that restricts the meaning of "an interest in real property." As such, on an interpretive basis, it appears that the Respondent's interest is included in Rule 458.

[66] Justice Russell then held the interim charging order in that case should be made absolute.

[67] I would add to the above analysis consideration of the following emphasized words in Rule 458:

> 458. (1) On the ex parte motion of a judgment creditor, the Court may, for the purpose of enforcing an order for the payment of an ascertained sum of money,
> (a) make an order imposing an interim charge for securing payment of that sum and any interest thereon
> (i) on real property or immoveables, or on an interest in real property or immoveables, of a judgment debtor, in Form 458A,
> (emphasis added)
>
> … and
> (b) order the judgment debtor to show cause, at a specified time and place, why the charge should not be made absolute.

[68] Rule 458 not only provides for an interim charge on the real property or immoveables of a judgment debtor but also “on an interest in real property or immoveables”. All words in a statute must not be ignored, but rather attributed a meaning and interpretation that would not render it pointless or redundant, otherwise it is mere surplusage: Ruth Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1994) at 88; R v Proulx, 2000 SCC 5 at para 28; Morguard Properties Ltd v Winnipeg, [1983] 2 SCR 493.

[69] The latter phrase “on an interest in real property” would be redundant given the earlier phrase “on real property” if only legal interests in real property were contemplated. In my view, the addition of these words demonstrates a clear intention by the legislator that the interim charging order could also apply to equitable interests in real property.

[70] I conclude that Rule 458 of the Rules does include equitable interests in real property.

Does Mr. Malachowski have an Equitable Interest in Nun’s Point?

[71] The Moving Party insists there is no evidence that Mr. Malachowski purchased Nun’s Point or made any payments towards purchase. Where there is no evidence of any consideration for the alleged oral agreement, the Moving Party contends the claim for an interest in property should be dismissed: Palkowski et al v Ivancic, 2008 ONCA 419.

Digitized by Google

[72] Contrary to the Moving Party's submission, there is evidence that points to partial performance by Mr. Malachowski for the purchase of Nun's point pursuant to the oral agreement.

[73] First, the Moving Party does not dispute that there was an oral agreement to rent with an option to buy Nun's Point.

[74] Next, there is no issue that Mr. Malachowski moved to Nun's Point and took up residence. He had effective control of the property since there is no evidence the other tenants, his younger brother and friend and his common law spouse and her daughter, were there other than on his approval.

[75] There is the ledger found at Nun's Point during the period Mr. Malachowski resided there showing two payments towards the agreed purchase price for Nun's Point. This ledger was found in a safe in the barn, which is an unusual place to keep a safe, but it matches Mr. Malachowski's practice of concealing his financial activities. The Moving Party denies ownership of the safe and no other competing explanation exists for the safe's presence. Since the property was under Mr. Malachowski's control, I make the inference that the safe, and therefore the ledger, were his.

[76] There is also the evidence of Mr. Malachowski's investment of some $65,000 in improvements to Nun's Point, the kitchen cabinets and the landscaping. Both sets of expenditure clearly relate to improvements on real property. Given the Moving Party's evidence that she cautioned that improvements would be regarded as fixtures, Mr. Malachowski's conduct is consistent with a person who sees the land as his or becoming his property.

[77] Returning to the matter of the ledger, the purchase price for "NUNSPOINT PROPERTY" listed on the ledger, $1,000,000, is the same as the purchase price in the oral agreement that the Moving Party admits to having with Mr. Malachowski. I draw the inference that the ledger records payments he made to the Moving Party pursuant to the oral agreement for the sale and purchase of Nun's Point.

[78] The evidence satisfies me that Mr. Malachowski was engaged in partial performance of the oral agreement with the Moving Party such that he had an equitable interest in Nun's Point. The partial performance is such that his interest would fall outside of the scope of the Statute of Frauds. This type of beneficial interest is indeed contemplated by Rule 258 of the Federal Court Rules.

The Applicant's Burden on the Motion

[79] I now turn to whether the Moving Party has met her burden to show that the interim order should be discharged.

[80] The Moving Party submits the Minister's evidence amounts to mere suspicion that Mr. Malachowski gained a beneficial interest in Nun's Point. She has led evidence to show she holds the legal title to Nun's Point.

[81] I note that the Moving Party and Mr. Donihee twice lent Mr. Malachowski significant amounts of money for bridge financing of his land deals without securing the loans in any written form. The Moving Party also advanced money to pay for Mr. Malachowski's U.S. lawyer and his subsequent bail application which she says was either raised or repaid by Mr. Malachowski's common law spouse, all in cash and undocumented.

Digitized by Google

[82] I find that these financial arrangements are consistent with Mr. Malachowski's purchase of Nun's Point from the Moving Party under terms of an oral agreement. All these transactions are based on oral agreements not documented by written agreements. I have already concluded that Mr. Malachowski was engaged in partial performance of the oral agreement to purchase Nun's Point. The Moving Party has not proven otherwise.

[83] Finally, to address one last point, the Moving Party lead evidence to support her contention that she and her spouse do not have any relationship with Mr. Malachowski other than landlord and tenant. She has submitted evidence that to show that she and Mr. Donihee have sufficient income to maintain their expenses and life style without any payments from Mr. Malachowski for the Nun's Point.

[84] The Minister questions Ms. Fishwick's claim that Mr. Malachowski merely rented Nun's Point. Much of the Minister's evidence was directed at showing that Ms. Fishwick and Mr. Donihee did not have the income or funds to make the expenditures they did without money that only could be explained by cash payments from Mr. Malachowski. Much of Ms. Fishwick's evidence was directed to proving she and Mr. Donihee had income and funds to make the expenditures they did during this period.

[85] I find that the evidence provided to support the Moving Party's assertions of having significant cash resources of their own to draw upon is no better than the Minister's evidence that they dispute. The evidence tendered by the Moving Party does not negate the Minister's evidence.

[86] I conclude that the Moving Party has not satisfied the burden of proof she must meet to support setting aside the interim charging order in advance of a hearing to determine whether the Order should be made absolute.

Conclusion

[87] The motion to set aside the interim charging order by the Moving Party is dismissed and costs of this motion are in favour of the Responding Party.

[88] The evidence before me does not show that Mr. Malachowski completed partial performance for Nun's Point such that he would have been entitled to claim transfer of title in accordance with the terms of the oral agreement between him and the Moving Party. The interim charging order, on its wording, only applied to "Mr. Malachowski's interest in the real property". The question of what his interest, if any, was caught by the making of the interim charging order remains to be determined.

In some instances the peculiarities of the property may require different routes for realization on top of the certification process due to the nature of the property, such as the case of intangible property as was described in Her Majesty v.Timothy Douglas Langevin[33] where the court held:

> [3] The British Columbia Motor Carrier Commission, issuer of the tax debtor's taxicab licence, will not permit a transfer of the licence without receiving a transfer form signed by Mr. Langevin, since he is not now personally exploiting his licence. There is some elderly Ontario jurisprudence to the effect that a liquor vendor's licence cannot be seized under a writ: Walsh v. Walper (1901) III O.L.R. 158, and the Motor Carrier Board seems to adhere to that decision. Historically one cannot seize a licence (tab. 9) M.N.R's authorities: Frederick L. Foster ats William Tuz, creditor 519 at 525, because a licence is considered to be intangible personal property.
> [4] Section 44 of this Court's statute provides:
> 44. Mandamus, injunction, specific performance or appointment of receiver -- In addition to any other relief that the Court may grant or award, a mandamus, injunction or order for specific performance may be granted or a receiver appointed by the Court in all cases in which it appears to the Court to be just or convenient to do so, and any such order may be made either unconditionally or on such terms and conditions as the Court deems just.
> [5] So when a person who ought to pay his income tax, in effect impoverishes all taxpayers who do pay, by making a favourable exception for himself and keeping his tax payments to himself, it appears to be unquestionably just to compel the defaulter to contribute some of his own personal property to relieve the taxpayers and to contribute to the commonwealth. The Minister of National Revenue moves (on notice the Minister attempted to serve on the tax defaulter) and did serve on the Motor Carrier Commission to have a receiver (the bailiff) appointed. Rule 375 runs as follows:
> 375.(1) Motion to appoint receiver -- On motion, a judge may appoint a receiver in any proceeding.
> (2) Remuneration and security -- An order under subsection (10 shall set out the remuneration to be paid to, and the amount of security to be given by, the receiver.

[6] That motion is granted.

[7] Rule 425 of the Act gives the following means:

425. Enforcement of order for payment of money -- An order for the payment of money may be enforced by

(d) the appointment of a receiver; . . .

[8] As can be seen the M.N.R. is certainly not seeking to exclude the licence-issuing Motor Carrier Commission from these proceedings. Having been served, the Commission simply elected not to participate herein. The M.N.R's counsel brought to this Court's attention the decision of Mr. Justice Meredith of British Columbia in 336026 Ltd. v. 355398 B.C. Ltd. [1993] B.C.J. No.2472. Meredith, J. thought that particular situation illustrated a matter between the liquor control authorities and the plaintiff without the need of the Court's intervention. Here, the Motor Carrier Commission has been served with full notice of this proceeding, but does not appear before this Court. Because the tax debtor's taxicab licence is a valuable asset, this Court holds that it is not just that he should continue to enjoy it, while the rest of the taxpayers have to pay for his selfish default and lack of concern. It is just that a receiver should lawfully deprive the tax debtor of the value of that asset.

[9] The Minister's motion to appoint a receiver is allowed. John William Edward Bradshaw of Comox Valley Bailiffs Ltd. is now appointed as receiver, without bond or security, of M.C.C. taxi licence number 11566 currently held by Timothy Douglas Langevin. The receiver may sell the licence subject to the M.C.C.'s approval, and the receiver must apply to the Commission to approve the transfer of the licence to the purchaser. Further, the receiver shall exercise his powers granted hereunder to:

- pay out the proceeds of sale of the taxi licence all amounts owing by Timothy Douglas Langevin under Certificate No. ITA-5685-99 issued by this Court on June 18, 1999, after deducting and paying to himself the reasonable fees and expenses incurred in carrying out his duties under this order;

- pay the balance of the proceeds, if any, of the sale of the taxi licence to Timothy Douglas Langevin; and

- apply to this Court for directions and guidance in the discharge of his duties.

[10] No action at law, or in equity or other proceeding may be taken or continued against the receiver, as receiver, and no proceeding may be taken or continued in respect of the taxi licence without leave of this Court and the Motor Carrier Commission upon notice to the receiver, the Commission and any other parties to this proceeding.

Was Ownership Properly Certified?

In all instances the property that is certified must actually be owned by the tax-debtor, otherwise other parties may stand forward to claim an ownership interest that undermines the certificate and eventual writ and realization. This was the case in In The Matter Of The Income Tax Act v. Patricia L. Whitfield[34] a mother tax-debtor attempted to argue that her son had full ownership interest in her truck, the reason being of economics for his age, and that the funds had come from the son's grandmother had intended the funds to come to him. The court held however:

> [18] Finally, the respondent urged that her son Kyle had a security interest in the Dodge Dakota equal to its full value and that therefore the truck should, without further ado, be turned over to Kyle. The respondent based her argument in this regard on the following: first, an amount of $40,000.00 was deposited into the respondent's bank account by her mother, Kyle's grandmother. It required three signatures to withdraw the money from that account. Those signatures, one of which was that of the respondent, were obtained on a cheque written in favour of the respondent in the amount of $40,000.00. That cheque was used by the respondent to purchase three money orders, one of which was in an amount of somewhere between thirty-one and thirty-two thousand dollars, and that money order was used to purchase the Dodge Dakota.
> [19] The respondent urged that, at all times, it was her intention and that of her mother that the Dodge Dakota would be Kyle's and not hers. The vehicle was, she urged, registered in her name simply because Kyle was, at the time of purchase, 17 years of age and the cost of insurance on the vehicle would have been prohibitive if it were registered in his name. As evidence of this arrangement, the respondent referred me to a "truck agreement" bearing an "effective date" of December 17, 1998 and purporting to be signed on that date by Kyle and the respondent which included the following paragraph:
> Pat Whitfield agrees to purchase the above-mentioned truck on Kyle's behalf, using Kyle's money in order to accommodate the above [the insurance concerns]. Pat also agrees to register and insure the above-mentioned truck in her name until such time as Kyle reaches the age of 21 or until Kyle decides to sell the truck. Pat also agrees to have Kyle register a security interest on the above-mentioned truck after he reaches the age of 18, in order to protect his interest and his investment. In return, Kyle agrees to practice safe > driving habits. Kyle also agrees that he will pay for the gas for the truck.[7]
> On the 26th of November, 1999, almost a year later, and presumably after Kyle reached the age of 18, a security agreement as contemplated by the foregoing paragraph was entered into in favour of Kyle with the debtor indicated to be the respondent. The security document was registered the same day.
> [20] On the basis of the foregoing, the respondent urged that, under the Personal Property Security Act of Alberta[8] and the Civil Enforcement Act of Alberta[9], Kyle's interest to the full value of the Dodge Dakota takes precedence to that of CCRA.

[21] Once again I reject these arguments. By reference to the above-quoted paragraph from the truck agreement entered into by Kyle and the respondent, there was simply no evidence before me, other than what I consider to be the self-serving evidence of the respondent to which I give no weight, that the Dodge Dakota was purchased "...using Kyle's money" and that therefore the Dodge Dakota represented "...his investment." The respondent acknowledged that the funds used to purchase the Dodge Dakota were drawn in her favour from a bank account that she described as hers, although three signatures were required to draw money out of it. Certainly none of those signatures was that of Kyle. The source of the money in the respondent's bank account was apparently her mother. There was absolutely no evidence that her mother intended the $40,000.00 that was transferred into the respondent's bank account to be in whole or in part a gift or a loan to Kyle. I am satisfied that, at least for the purposes of this matter, the Dodge Dakota is the property of the respondent with whose money it was purchased and in whose name it is registered.

In Her Majesty V. Rodney Charles Maxwell Stickle[35] the court recited a substantial amount of jurisprudence on the onus of proving ownership in a seizure situation where it held:

ONUS OF PROOF

[13] I think it helpful before reviewing the evidence to consider who bears the onus of establishing ownership of seized property. This Court has held that where a seizure of property is made and a third party claims ownership of some or all of the assets seized, the onus is on the third party to establish ownership of those assets: 384238 Ontario Ltd. v. The Queen, [1981] C.T.C. 295 (F.C.T.D.); aff'd (1983), 52 N.R. 206 (F.C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1984), 8 D.L.R. (4th) 676 (S.C.C.).

[14] Alberta jurisprudence, made relevant by Rule 448 of the Federal Court Rules, 1998 because the seizure occurred in Alberta, is to similar effect in circumstances as are now before the Court. In Riczu v. Indigion Holdings Ltd. (1997), 207 A.R. 318, Master Waller canvassed the law stating as follows:

In general circumstances, the onus lies with the execution creditor to prove that the goods seized are the goods of the debtor. claiming the goods.That onus however shifts in certain circumstances to the party

In Korpus v. W.F. Botkin Construction Ltd. [1994] S.J. No. 6 p. 1 a 1935 Pierce Arrow automobile was seized from the debtor's father. The father produced a bill of sale which the creditor alleged was a sham. Halverson, J. discussed the applicable principles in this way:

[para 4] Generally, the onus is upon the execution creditor to prove a right to seize particular goods of the debtor. But where the goods are in the possession of the debtor, there is a presumption they are his, and the onus shifts to the claimant to establish his title thereto (see Hudson Bay Company v. Macaskill et. al. (1983), 27 Sask.R. 81 (Sask.Q.B.)). Applying this to the instant case leads to the requirement that the plaintiff establish his ownership of the vehicle.

[para 5] There are three other useful principles arising from the authorities. Firstly, the claimant must show a bona fide sale accompanied by immediate delivery and a continued change of possession (see Morrow v. Western Empire Life Assurance Company, Limited, [1933] 2 W.W.R. 393 (Sask. C.A.) and Belair v. banque d'Hochelaga, [1923] 2 W.W.R. 771 (Sask. C.A.)). Secondly, where the goods belonged to the execution debtor before the seizure and were conveyed to a near relative under suspicious circumstances, the onus is again upon the claimant to prove ownership (see Massey-Harris Company, Limited et al. v. Dell, [1919] 1 W.W.R. 1032 (Sask. C.A.)). Thirdly, corroboration of the claimant's assertion is desirable where the disposition is to a relative (see Kushner v. Yasinka, [1927] 3 W.W.R. 328 (Sask. C.A.) and Avco Financial Services Canada Limited
v. Zacharias et al. and Stevens, [1977] 3 W.W.R. 697 (Sask. D.C.)). As stated earlier, these principles are not binding in the present situation, but they are helpful in assessing the burden upon the plaintiff.

I am satisfied given the family relationship that exists here and the fact that the debtor tenant had possession of the goods at the time of the distraint that a strong onus lies with the applicant father to show his ownership of the goods. In the absence of any concrete documentation a sworn statement is not adequate.

In Cisakowski v. Fikete (1984) 35 Alta L.R. (2d) 392 a tenant attempted to assert that certain distrained goods were actually the property of a corporation other distinct from the tenant. In dismissing the claim, Miller, A.C.J.Q.B., clearly defines the degree the proof necessary using the following terms:

In my view, there is an onus on 112600 to adduce at least some evidence beyond a bold statement in an affidavit establishing 112600's ownership of Abbotsfield Optical. To hold otherwise would require the landlord to prove a negative. Especially where there is some evidence to the contrary, I think it is crucial for a party asserting ownership of seized chattels to put forward strong evidence that should be within his knowledge, if it exists, to support his claim.

[underlining added]

[15] I now turn to the evidence adduced at the hearing.

THE EVIDENCE

The Ditch Witch

[16] Mr. Stickle testified that: the ditch witch is owned by Mr. Bushfield; it is worth about $4,000.00; Mr. Stickle rented it from Mr. Bushfield pursuant to an oral agreement; Mr. Stickle had last used the ditch witch two or three weeks prior to the seizure; and "if and when I'm renting it, if I'm using it, then I pay him accordingly". Mr. Stickle produced no documentation to establish either ownership or rental payments, although he said that he "probably would have [documentation] somewhere". Mr. Stickle said that when seized there were not too many weeds around the ditch witch.

Digitized by Google

[17] Mr. Bushfield did not testify because, according to Mr. Stickle, he was watching for rain and waiting to get his hay crops off.

[18] Mr. Stickle called a representative of the CCRA to testify as to her conversations with Mr. Bushfield. That representative said that Mr. Bushfield had told her that the ditch witch was his, but that he had no documents to prove that.

[19] With respect to the evidence of the CCRA representative, I conclude that the evidence as to Mr. Bushfield's assertion of ownership is not admissible as evidence proving the truth of that assertion. I reach that conclusion because I do not find the statement to be sufficiently reliable to fall within the hearsay exception, nor do I see any necessity for the admission of that evidence to prove the truth of the statement. [20] On the evidence set out above, I would be prepared to find that Mr. Stickle failed to meet the onus upon him to overcome the presumption referred to in Riczu, supra, that goods in his possession are his. However, there is sufficient evidence that it is unnecessary for me to decide this issue simply on the basis of onus.

[21] The bailiff who effected the seizure testified that at the time the seizure was effected Mr. Stickle made no objection to the removal of the ditch witch. Mr. Stickle did not challenge or contradict that evidence. The bailiff also testified that the ditch witch was found with weeds growing around it, it took 30 minutes for the tow truck driver to get the ditch witch "up and running", there was no battery, and it had a flat tire. The bailiff was of the opinion that in view of its condition the equipment could not have been used in the prior few weeks.

[22] I found the bailiff to give his testimony in a forthright, clear way. He agreed with many of the suggestions put to him by Mr. Stickle in cross-examination evidencing a candour in his testimony. He had nothing directly to gain from his testimony on matters touching the ownership of assets. I accept his testimony about the ditch witch.

[23] When I consider the paucity of the evidence adduced by Mr. Stickle, the evidence of the bailiff that Mr. Stickle failed to object to the seizure of the ditch witch at the time of seizure (in circumstances where he was objecting to the removal of other items on the ground that he did not own them) and the evidence of the condition of the ditch witch which was inconsistent with Mr. Stickle's assertion that he was renting and using the equipment, I am satisfied for the purpose of this matter that the ditch witch is the property of Mr. Stickle. [24] I have considered that Mr. Sawatzky, who was assisting Mr. Stickle at the hearing, testified that he attended at the seizure and heard Mr. Stickle tell the bailiff that the ditch witch belonged to Mr. Bushfield. In view of Mr. Stickle's failure to testify or challenge the bailiff's evidence on the point I place no weight on Mr. Sawatzky's testimony. I also note that while Mr. Stickle had excluded all of the other witnesses who he called to testify, Mr. Sawatzky was not excluded and remained in the courtroom. The fact that Mr. Sawatzky had heard prior testimony including that of the CCRA representative, and Mr. Stickle's advice that Mr. Bushfield would not be testifying, are factors which I find also go to reduce the weight to be given to Mr. Sawatzky's testimony.

Certification with Ancillary Proceedings of Actual Tax Determination

The certification process follows the lengthy process of filing and assessment and reassessment all of which have specific mechanical time-frames provided in the Act. As was provided in Her Majesty, Represented By MNR and CRA v. Rodney Charles Maxwell Stickle[36] the court has no jurisdiction to inquire into the correctness of an assessment when the subject of the litigation is the certificate itself. If an assessment is contested, after the certificate has been filed, it will not be successful since the two are independent of each other. This was provided as far back as Olympia Interiors Ltd. and Mary David v. Her Majesty The Queen and The Attorney General of Canada[37] where the taxpayer attempted to state that the certificates were void and unenforceable since the assessment was being contested:

> "[3] On May 1, 1998, MacKay J. referred to the validity of the Contested Certificates when he refused the appellants' motion to join various actions then before the Trial Division of the Federal Court (reported at [1998] F.C.J. No. 576). He wrote as follows: ...[A]ssessments of tax under the Excise Tax Act, or of payments due on behalf of employees under the Income Tax Act, if not questioned by the party assessed and thereafter revised by the Minister, and here those steps did not occur, are ultimately recoverable by the Crown by filing of a certificate in this Court which certificate is then enforceable as a judgment of the Court. Here the assessments were not contested within the 90 day limitation periods applicable under the respective statutes, a period that terminated long before the certificates were filed. Moreover, the validity of those certificates does not appear to have been contested for more than two years after the certificates were filed. In the case of the certificate in Court file GST-41-92 filed in November 1992 and amended in December 1992, the first step by Mrs. David to contest the certificates appears from the file to have been initiated in August 1995. In the case of the certificate in Court file ITA-8447-92 filed in November 1992, the first step initiated by the plaintiffs, an application for an order for particulars, was made in August 1995. As I have noted, long before those first steps were initiated, indeed before the certificates were filed, the 90-day limitation period, fixed by statute, for questioning the assessments underlying the certificates, had expired.

"[9] Written arguments were served and filed in accordance with the time and page limits imposed in the order. However, Mr. Stickle made extensive arguments as to the existence of the underlying debt, alleged errors by CCRA, and whether, contrary to the order of Justice Campbell, he was entitled to exemptions as a farmer. Mr. Stickle also purported to append documents not tendered at trial. I have not had regard to any of the above-noted arguments and evidence for the following reasons.

[10] First, the Act is a comprehensive code for the collection of taxes. A taxpayer who receives a notice of assessment and who disputes his or her obligation may file a notice of objection, and potentially may appeal to the Tax Court of Canada. However, when a certificate is filed in this Court pursuant to section 223 of the Act, the Court has no jurisdiction to inquire into the correctness of the assessment. See: Marcel Grand Cirque Inc. v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue) (1995) 107 F.T.R. 18, and by analogy with the Excise Tax Act, R.S., c. E-15 see Olympia Interiors Ltd. v. Canada (1998) 98 DTC 6306."

[6] We need not deal with the res judicata issue as we agree with MacKay J. that the issue of the validity of the Contested Certificates is separately time-barred by statute, namely by subsections 165(1) of the Income Tax Act and 301(1.1) of the Excise Tax Act. There is no material on the record that demonstrates that the appellants ever filed a notice of objection to the assessment upon which the Contested Certificates are based.

[7] The appeal will be dismissed with costs."[38]

Gregorina Alessandro v. Her Majesty The Queen[39] is an interesting case that illustrates what happens when the taxpayer is successful in merely launching an accompanying Tax Ct. of Canada Appeal in res-establishing the actual amount of debt certified. In this case the taxpayer attempted to have the certificate vacated when she was challenging her tax liability and while the statutory provisions below cited would have operated to allow the Minister to vacate, it was found that they were discretionary[40]:

[3] Ms. Alessandro contends that the subsequent acceptance of her Tax Court appeal obliges the Agency to remove its Certificate of indebtedness from this Court and the two liens registered against her real properties. The Agency declined to accommodate those demands and Ms. Alessandro is now seeking an Order to cancel the Certificate and to vacate the liens. She contends that the collection restrictions contained within section 225.1 of the Act can be applied, after the fact, to reverse the enforcement steps that were lawfully carried out by the Agency before her appeal was launched.

[4] Although the Agency concedes that section 225.1 of the Act prevents it from taking fresh collection steps against Ms. Alessandro, it says that the Act does not require that it reverse any enforcement steps which were lawfully taken at the time. In furtherance of that view, the > [8] Mr. Piccott advances a similar argument relative to the certificate executed under the Income Tax Act. He says that he received no notice of assessment in connection with alleged outstanding income tax. Further, he alleges that he received no notice of the certificate or of pending enforcement action and he argues that the actions of the Minister were unjustified and contrary to the scheme of the Income Tax Act.

Unfortunately, they do not cite any relevant authorities or cases in support of this proposition. I am also of the opinion that the non-payment of the tax debts would constitute a contravention of a rule of public order in this case. It may also bear repeating that according to rule 462, the respondents may ask the Court (by way of a motion) to discharge or vary the charging order absolute if the Tax Court of Canada allows their appeal and refuses to confirm the validity of the reassessments issued by the Minister on August 31, 2006, and April 25, 2007.

Agency did withdraw an outstanding and active Notice of Garnishment that had been sent to Ms. Alessandro's bank; however, it refused any further relief.

[5] In the ordinary course, section 225.1 of the Act does preclude the Agency from taking any collection action against a taxpayer within ninety days of the mailing of a Notice of Assessment. Thereafter, the affected taxpayer can hold the Agency at bay by filing a Notice of Objection or a Notice of Appeal to the Tax Court within the prescribed time. In those instances, section 225.1 of the Act continues to apply. So long as the taxpayer acts in a timely way, section 225.1 of the Act offers seamless protection from collection of claimed tax arrears up to the conclusion of a Tax Court appeal.

[6] This case is anomalous because Ms. Alessandro's Tax Court appeal was initiated well beyond the ninety day filing deadline and, during that time, the Agency proceeded lawfully to enforce its claim by filing a Certificate of indebtedness and by registering its liens.

[7] Counsel for Ms. Alessandro concedes that the Act does not expressly oblige the Agency to reverse lawful collection steps in the face of a subsequently launched appeal; however, he contends that the failure by the Agency to withdraw the Certificate and to vacate its liens violates the spirit or intent of this protective statutory provision.

[9] The fact that the Act does not address the problem arising in this case does not mean that the spirit or underlying intent of this protective scheme has been breached by the Agency's conduct. If Parliament had intended that the Agency ought to be required to take active steps to reverse its previous and lawful collection actions, it could easily have said so. Indeed, in other provisions of the Act, the Agency is expressly required to repay funds or to release security in the face of challenges by a taxpayer (see section 164).

[10] It is also noteworthy that Ms. Alessandro has obtained a substantial benefit from the statutory collection restrictions which are created by these provisions. The Agency is prevented from taking further steps to collect the amount it claims to be owed. The Certificate of indebtedness and liens merely constitute passive security interests in favour of the Agency. If the liens are interfering with Ms. Alessandro's ability to deal with her real estate holdings, she has the ability to substitute the security or to negotiate reasonable alternate arrangements with the Agency.

[11] Although the circumstances in the case of Topol v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) [2003] F.C.J. No. 858, 2003 FCT 658 were somewhat different from those arising here, I accept as correct the following statements by Justice Carolyn Layden-Stevenson concerning the scope of section 225.1 of the Act:

22 Moreover, submits Topol, the position that the writ was lawfully obtained is inconsistent with the purpose of the provision. Referring again to section 225.1, he maintains that the Minister is precluded from taking steps to collect the taxes in dispute for the duration of the dispute, i.e., from assessment through to objection and appeal to the Tax Court. Topol argues that there is, however, a gap in section 225.1 because it does not address the situation where a taxpayer begins the objection or appeal process outside of the time limits specifically prescribed within the section. To give effect to their purpose, the provisions must be interpreted liberally to protect taxpayers when the objection or appeal procedure is commenced beyond the prescribed times. Topol contends that to conclude otherwise means that a taxpayer, unable to adhere to the prescribed time limitation for reasons beyond his or her control and subject to a garnishment issued by the Minister, who is subsequently granted leave to file a notice of objection, will not be able to have the garnished funds returned to him. That taxpayer will have paid the taxes in dispute before an impartial hearing has been concluded. Since he was permitted to file a notice of objection to the 1996 and 1998 tax years on September 24, 2001, more than 90 days after the relevant notices of assessment, if the writ is not lifted, Topol contends that he will have, in effect, paid the taxes in dispute before an impartial hearing has been concluded. Such a result is inconsistent with the purpose of both section 225.1 and subsection 164(1.1) of the Act and should not be permitted in the absence of express wording to that effect in the Act.

29 I note Topol's hypothetical argument that a taxpayer, who for reasons beyond his or her control fails to file a notice of objection within the prescribed time limits and who is subsequently granted leave to file a notice of objection, may be prejudiced and lose the benefit of subsection 164(1.1) if the meaning I have ascribed to "security" is adopted. My observations in this respect are twofold. First, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Topol was unable to file his notices of objection in a timely manner because of reasons beyond his control. In this sense, it may be said that he is the author of his own misfortune. Second, if indeed there exists a gap in the legislation, it is for Parliament, not the court, to remedy. Neither the statute nor the provision support the meaning of the word "security" advanced by Topol. Thus, I conclude that the Minister's decision was not only reasonable, it was correct. This does not and should not be taken to mean, however, that the Minister is at liberty to execute on the writ while the objections with respect to the 1996 and 1998 taxation years remain alive.

[12] In this case, there is no legal basis for requiring the Agency to withdraw the Certificate of indebtedness filed with the Court or to lift the liens against Ms. Alessandro's real properties.

[13] In the result, this application is dismissed with costs payable to the Respondent in the amount of $1,250.00 inclusive of disbursements.

Her Majesty The Queen v. George F. Besselt[41] illustrates the peculiarity of a certificate that should attend to all the details and some ancillary steps that should be concerned with in which it was provided:

[1] The motion before me seeks leave to issue a (new) Writ of Execution. Presumably a Writ of Seizure and Sale in form 425 A. Once leave has been given the creditor is entitled to requisition a Writ from the Registry. The form of Writ is such as to necessitate that the amount of the debt, the rate of interest and the dates from which interest is to run are to be shown. [The amount of costs, if any, and the rate of interest on costs and the dates from which such interest runs is also to be shown where appropriate].

[41] ITA-8787-93

[2] I note that Rule 425 permits enforcement of an Order by, inter alia, a Writ of Seizure and Sale, the "Order" is the certificate filed. Leave in the ordinary way would permit the Registry to issue a Writ to collect the amounts shown in the certificate plus interest from the date shown in the certificate.

[3] If it is desired to obtain a Writ for a different amount than the amount shown in the certificate (which has the effect of an Order or Judgment of this Court) affidavit evidence to justify the deferring amount should be filed and the Order for leave will indicate any change from the amount shown in the certificate. I question whether any increase in amount shown in the certificate could be done ex parte.

[4] In this case a certificate indicates a sum owing to Her Majesty by virtue of an assessment by the Minister of National Revenue. If the creditor has assigned Her rights by statute or otherwise reference should be made to that assignment in the supporting affidavit.

[5] I note that the certificate herein was that of an official of the Department of National Revenue whereas the supporting affidavit to this motion states the debtor is indebted to Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. If that is in fact the case, some indication of the transfer in the supporting affidavit is required. If, however, the agency is merely a publican the debt remains owing to Her Majesty who will be shown in the Writ and the creditor is not the agency.

[6] As previously indicated, this matter should be clarified. It is useful to have the indication that the debt is for income tax. If it were for employment insurance repayments evidence would be required to show that the 6 year limitation period had not expired or was not applicable, so that the duration of the Writ could be appropriately limited.

[7] It has been a customary requirement in Toronto to be advised whether the debtor is aware of the existence of a certificate in the hope that third parties attempting to close real estate transactions will not be unnecessarily surprised.

[8] In this particular case the request for an Order relieving the applicant from complying with the record formal requirements of Rule 364 is denied. The motion is therefore dismissed with leave to reapply ex parte with a motion record containing representations explaining the circumstances."

No Argument for Over-Certification

Pursuant to In the Matter Against Gordon Victor Buck[42] where the taxpayer had contended that the Minister had over-secured his certificate and seized both house and company shares the court held:

"At the conclusion of the hearing on January 13, 1997, with the concept in mind that there must be some balance between the creditor's right to payment and the debtor's right not to be abused, I mentioned Gawler v. Chaplin (1848), 2 Ex. 503, 154 E.R. 590, in which Baron Parke said "The duty of the Sheriff, when he receives a process of execution against a man's goods, is to seize only such quantity of goods as would be reasonably sufficient to pay the amount indorsed on the writ." (E.R. p. 592)[1]. I raised this principle not to detract from the right of the Crown to have properly arrived at tax certificates paid, but, as I say, to make certain that there is a proper balance between creditor and debtor and no abuse of the latter by an excess of recovery procedures. I reserved my decision. Subsequently, and before I had come to a conclusion, counsel for the Crown sought leave to make further written submissions, noting that the seized shares would not be put up for sale until the outcome of the motion had been determined. As it seemed in the interests of justice that both sides have an opportunity, within given time limits, to consider and comment upon the principle in Gawler v. Chaplin, I gave leave. The Crown has made further submissions. Mr. Buck has not.

The shareholder's equity in Mr. Buck's company, at least in 1995, was some $112,000.00. The debt owing, on the Crown's figures, is about $46,000.00. Counsel for the Crown points out that there is what he calls a one-valuable-asset exception to the rule in Gawler v. Chaplin to the effect that if the judgment debtor has only one asset, worth substantially more than the judgment, the Sheriff may still seize, sell and pay to the judgment creditor his or her due, holding the balance for the judgment debtor: see for example Wooddye v. Coles Baily of Southwark, [1595] Noy 59, 74 E.R. 1027. Dunlop on Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, Carswell, 1995, refers at p. 298 to more modern affirmations of this exception, including Anderson v. Liddell (1967- 1968), 117 C.L.R. 36 at 45 and 50-51, a decision of the Australian Court of Appeal involving the sale of a block of land valued at perhaps twice the amount of the judgment. In the Anderson case the Sheriff was found entitled to seize one large item, no matter what excess sum it might bring, that being his duty to the judgment creditor. But this seizure of a share certificate representing the voting shares in Mr. Buck's company, worth somewhat in excess of twice the value of the tax liability, is not the real concern. Rather it is the seizure of the company shares combined with the registration of the certificates, as the equivalent of judgments, against Mr. Buck's home. Certainly a creditor's remedies are cumulative. However, cumulative enforcement can be an abuse of process.

Part of the answer lies in the concept that the registration against property of a judgment, or a certificate in this case, is in itself neither a seizure nor an execution: see for example Power v. Grace, [1932] 2 D.L.R. 793 at 798 (Ont. Court of Appeal) and Re Roadburg and Cedarhurst Properties Ltd. (1979), 93 D.L.R. (3d) 582 at 587 (B.C.C.A.). There must be at least advertisement of a sale and probably a transfer of a special interest in the property to the Sheriff by seizure before the process can go on to become an execution to which the rule in Gawler v. Chaplin might apply.

Taking a slightly different approach, the rule in Gawler v. Chaplin is based on a balancing of the duty of the Sheriff, in favour of the judgment creditor, a duty constrained by fairness to the judgment debtor and reasonableness of the seizure. Is it fair and reasonable for the Crown to both register a certificate against Mr. Buck's property and then seize company shares, thus curtailing Mr. Buck's business activities, with a view to realizing on the shares in order to pay the tax arrears owing under the tax certificates? All the more so taking into account that at least half of the tax debt has been cleared, in part by payments, but largely through tax carry backs. The answer to this lies in the fact that the Crown is entitled to be paid. The Crown is neither in the business of holding mortgages, a third charge in this instance, in the form of registered tax certificates on which interest accrues, nor in the business of selling homes.

On balance the actions of the Crown, to secure the debt against the home and then to find a more manageable asset against which to execute, are fair and reasonable. All the more so in that, as I noted earlier, the Crown has not been hasty in its procedure, but has allowed time for Mr. Buck to make payment."

Layer-Piercing for Other Assets

It is not just the taxpayer's property that can be certified on, her shares in corporations as well as corporate assets themselves may serve as appropriate means to realize tax debt if the corporate shell is so hollow as to be deserved to have its veil pierced. This was the case in In the Matter of the income Tax Act v. Mario Laquerre, Fiducie Mario Laquerre, Fiducie ML, 9075-3153 Québec Inc., 9015-7769 Québec Inc., 9067-6388 Québec Inc., 9029-0065 Québec Inc., 9011-1345 Québec Inc.[43] where the Minister attempted to assert a charging order against corporate assets[44] in a purely alter-ego corporate setting where the taxpayer had sheltered all his substantial assets away from the Minister thus reducing his personal debtor exposure. On the issue of whether the Minister could pierce the veil the court held:

> [9] On October 3, 2007, the applicant filed an ex parte motion seeking to have the corporate veil lifted and seeking an interim charging order against the immovables at issue pursuant to rule 458 of the Rules. According to the applicant's written submissions, the judgment debtors' only assets of value that the Agency has yet to seize or charge with a hypothec belong to 9067 and 9011. The equity in these assets is estimated at $315,000.00 and $320,000.00 respectively. The applicant alleges that lifting the corporate veil is justified because [TRANSLATION] "several [of Laquerre's] non-arm's length companies were established so

[43] 2008 FC 460

[44] The action was actually founded on Rule 459 of the Federal Court Rules whereby the court held:

> [5] Rule 459(1) reads, "At a show cause hearing referred to in paragraph 458(1)(b), the Court shall make the interim charge absolute, in Form 459, or discharge it." In this case, then, the Court has two options: to make the charge absolute or to discharge it. I note that rules 458 and 459 do not require a judgment creditor to seize the immovable immediately (although he could); the goal is rather to charge it with the equivalent of a judicial hypothec to ensure the protection of his rights: R. v. Mullin, [1985] 2 C.T.C. 128. More specifically, the purpose and effect of these rules is the creation of a charge on the debtor's immovable pursuant to a judgment, affecting the said immovable when that judgment is enforced: Re Beaudry, [1979] 2 FC 138. Given that we are simply dealing with a judgment execution measure and that under rule 462, the Court may, on a motion by the judgment debtor or any other person having a right in the property charged with an interim or absolute charge, discharge or vary the charging order on such terms as it considers just with respect to costs, I do not find it premature to issue a charging order absolute in this case.

that he and some of his companies could evade taxes". In fact, the investigation and audit conducted by the Agency reveal that Laquerre and his alter ego companies knowingly set up their distinct legal personalities to escape their tax liabilities and avoid paying the amounts owing to the Minister under the Act. This is against public order and constitutes fraud within the meaning of article 317 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 (C.C.Q.).

[10] The respondents claim that imposing a charge (whether interim or absolute) unduly prevents them from carrying on their legitimate business activities of buying and selling immovable property and will force them into bankruptcy. They also claim that none of the payments referred to in Mr. Ferland's two affidavits (one sworn October 1, 2007, and the other November 20, 2007) were made for the purpose of mingling the assets of the various entities. In this case, the respondents committed no fraudulent acts. Moreover, the non- payment of tax debts does not constitute a contravention of a rule of public order: the judgments debtors are entitled not to pay the tax debts in question before the validity of the impugned notices of assessment has been confirmed by final judgment on the appeals brought before the Tax Court of Canada. The lifting of the corporate veil can only be permitted in limited circumstances. There is nothing to indicate that Laquerre's alter ego companies are being used to dissemble fraud.

[11] A corporation may be considered the alter ego of another corporation when there is such a close relationship between them that what apparently concerns one actually pertains to the activities of the other: Buanderie centrale de Montréal Inc. v. Montreal (City), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 29 at para. 34 (Buanderie centrale). A large number of factors can be identified to determine the existence of such a relationship, but according to the Supreme Court of Canada, the one that is most explicit and most likely to cover all aspects of the concept is control: Buanderie centrale, supra.

[12] According to article 317 C.C.Q., "[i]n no case may a legal person set up juridical personality against a person in good faith if it is set up to dissemble fraud, abuse of right or contravention of a rule of public order." This legislative text prohibits one from setting up the separate legal personality of a corporation to dissemble fraud, abuse of right or contravention of a rule of public order: Québec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) c. Coutu, [1998] A.Q. no 2779 (QL) (C.A.Q.). This decision clearly applies to this case.

[13] As a general rule, I am of the opinion that the non-payment of tax debts may constitute contravention of a rule of public order. Authors Paul and Maurice Martel wrote the following in La Compagnie au Québec, Montréal, Wilson et Lafleur, Martel Ltée., 2005, at page I-64 :

[TRANSLATION]

The expression "contravention of a rule of public order" refers in particular, according to the Minister of Justice, to [TRANSLATION] "contraventions of environmental, public security, communications and public utilities regulations". They are contraventions to legal rules that are imperative in nature and that cannot be derogated from by contract, such as those set out in legislation regarding the organization of the state, as well as administrative and fiscal laws and laws regarding the organization of professional bodies, criminal legislation, labour legislation and the charters of rights and freedoms. This codifies another series of the above-mentioned exceptions established in case law, namely, the use of companies as screens to dissemble a contravention of a rule of public order.

[14] Moreover, in Quebec (Deputy Minister of Revenue) v. Couverture C.G.L. Inc. and Les Entreprises Yvon Latouche Inc. (Unpublished decision, rendered February 15, 1995 – Docket No. GST-100-94), the Federal Court applied the principle set out in article 317 C.C.Q. in the context of an applicant (Les Entreprises Yvon Latouche) objecting to a seizure made by the Deputy Minister of Revenue of Quebec against the defendant (Couverture C.G.L. Inc.). It is clear from Mr. Justice Denault's decision that the applicant had engineered a whole series of transactions to avoid paying the amounts it owed to the Minister of Revenue:

In the case at bar, after hearing the testimony of Yvon Latouche and his wife Ginette Giroux, I have no hesitation in concluding that Yvon Latouche is the alter ego of Les Entreprises Yvon Latouche Inc., as he admitted in his testimony, but most importantly he is the prime mover in Couverture C.G.L. Inc. The incorporation of various companies by Yvon Latouche, sometimes in his own name and sometimes in that of his wife, taking care never to transfer the assets of the company he was discarding to the name of the company he was preparing to do business with, was manifestly done in order to deceive creditors, avoid the payment of debts and, as here, avoid having to reimburse money which he had collected as a trustee but had neglected to reimburse. Clearly, the Court cannot be a tool or accomplice in such machinations.

[15] The judge then concludes as follows:

In the case at bar the Court considers that the applicant cannot set up the legal personality of an artificial person other than the defendant as a means of objecting to the seizure and sale of the property seized. In the circumstances at bar the applicant's opposition constitutes an abuse of right and an attempt by the prime mover in the defendant as well as by the applicant to avoid its obligations. Its opposition therefore cannot be allowed.

[16] In this case, there is no doubt as to the non-payment by Laquerre and his companies and trusts of their tax debts. Despite the collection measures taken following the issuance of the two jeopardy collection orders on September 28, 2007, the full tax debt owed by Laquerre, 9122, 9075, 9015, 9029, ML, Fiducie Laquerre and MJ amounted to $2,809,313.22 (paragraph 23 of Mr. Ferland's affidavit sworn November 20, 2007, filed in response to the respondents' motion to strike). I note that the total debt owed to the judgment creditor by the respondents covered by the seven certificates registered under section 223 of the Act amounts to $1,720,588.80 (see Exhibit 19.1 to Mr. Ferland's affidavit sworn October 1, 2007).

[17] Furthermore, according to the evidence in the docket, I have no doubt that Laquerre attempted to camouflage his actions through his many companies, which constituted a planned business structure. According to the affidavit of Annie Valois, sworn August 31, 2006, Laquerre and the non-arm's length companies or the trusts of which he was one of the beneficiaries were employing a number of tax evasion schemes.

[19] Finally, I note that Laquerre's personal property is mingled with that of his non arm's-length companies. I agree with the following statements of Mr. Justice Barbe in Échafaudages Fast Montréal Inc. c. Alfredo Masciotra, [2001] AZ-01036292.7:

[TRANSLATION]

The personal use of company property does not benefit the company; it constitutes a dishonest act. Article 317 C.C.Q. allows us to disregard the legal person when juridical personality is set up to dissemble fraud. The involvement of the shareholder as sole administrator and president of the company in the company's actions is a key criterion for lifting the corporate veil. Using the company's money to cover personal tanning expenses and failing to inform the applicant of the company's precarious financial situation constitute abuse within the meaning of article 317 C.C.Q.

[Emphasis added]

[20] On the facts in the docket, I find that Laquerre is making personal use of property belonging to his companies and trusts. According to Mr. Ferland's affidavit sworn October 1, 2007, the personal property used by Laquerre (such as his vehicles and his residence) is in the name of his companies and trusts. Moreover, 9122 issued cheques in 2006 to pay off Laquerre's personal credit cards. I note that in 2005, company 9067 issued cheques to entities controlled by the judgment debtor in amounts totalling $195,643.19. There are several other examples in the docket showing that Laquerre has mingled his personal affairs with those of his companies and trusts: see Mr. Ferland's affidavit sworn October 1, 2007, at paras.113 to 135.

[21] This mingling constitutes an act that entitles us to lift the corporate veil. According to the Court of Québec (Civil Division) in Buccaneer Industries Ltd. c. Bresee, [2003] J.Q. no 369 (QL), by mingling a company's account with his personal account, an individual places himself in an uncomfortable situation of conflict, allowing the corporate veil to be lifted:

[TRANSLATION]

The burden of proof is therefore reversed, and he must demonstrate that he has never benefited from the company's income. This mingling of the Bresee family's affairs with those of the company constitutes an act enabling us to lift the corporate veil. It is a blameworthy act.

[22] In conclusion, the respondents' arguments in favour of the dismissal of the judgment creditor's motion to have the corporate veil lifted are not persuasive. Given the convincing evidence presented by the applicant in dockets T-1574-06 and T-699-07, I find that it is in the interests of justice that the judgment debtors be considered one and the same person with a single patrimony for the purposes of all of the measures to collect the judgment debtors' tax debts.

Subsection 223(7) provides flexibility in the tailoring of the application of the certificate to both shorten or prolong its life though there have been some cases where they have lapsed and must be re-registered.

Subsection 223(9) draws in the Minister's ability to postpone action on the realization of the certificate through obtaining a writ of seizure, if in her discretion it is warranted.

Certification the First Step, No Need for Writ to Seize, Second.

The ITA provisions set out a complete set of collection rules that do not extensively depend on provincial money judgment Acts. Generally certification of the tax debt is only the first step of the realization of the property that sets out the ranking of the Minister's preference. It's execution to realization through seizure and sale is the second. However, the courts need not be approached to actually get a writ since the ITA contains a complete set of rules that allow it to operate in counterance to any provincial Acts. While the court need not be approached for hearing in the former, the Writ must be heard in court to accomplish the latter. This was the case in In The Matter Of The Income Tax Act, R.S.C. (5th Supp.) C.1 and In The Matter Of An Assessment Or Assessments By The Minister Of National Revenue Under One Or More Of The Income Tax Act, Canada Pension Plan, Employment Insurance Act, against James Andrew Piccot[45] where the court, initially, held that the Federal Court was the venue for all proceedings for certificate placement and enforcement and that an Writ of seizure should have been obtained rather than merely acting on a certificate. It held:

> [10] The Minister argues that this Court lacks jurisdiction to entertain a challenge to the manner in which the certificates were issued. It further submits that this Court lacks jurisdiction to stay or quash the certificates and that any challenge to the process leading to issuance of the certificates lies solely within the jurisdiction of the Tax Court of Canada.
> [11] As well, the Minister characterizes Mr. Piccott's complaint as relating to the quantification of the amount claimed rather than with the fact that he owes money on account of both income tax and the goods and services tax.
> [12] The Minister argues that proper procedure was followed for enforcement purposes. The relevant sections of both the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act provide that a certificate executed under these statutes is deemed to be a judgment of the Federal Court of Canada and enforceable as such. Both the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act authorize the filing of a memorial, as defined in the legislation, for the purpose of creating a charge or binding interest in property in a province. The respective legislation also provides a process for the enforcement and collection of the debt as recorded in the memorial.
> [13] The Minister argues that the certificate is such a memorial and that it was not necessary to obtain a writ from the Federal Court of Canada in order to authorize and instruct the Sheriff to seize and sell the property of Mr. Piccott.
> [14] Further, the Minister argues that the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador no longer relies on a writ for the enforcement of a judgment. The applicable provincial legislation is the Judgment Enforcement Act and the Minister relies on the definition of "judgment" contained in section 2(1)(bb) of that legislation.
> [15] Otherwise, the Minister takes the position that monies were owing from Mr. Piccott, the certificates were properly executed and proper steps were taken to enforce collection of the outstanding taxes.

[18] In each case, the legislation provides that a certificate produced by the Minister to the Federal Court can be registered in that Court and following registration, it has the same effect as a judgment. However, the certificate when registered is not a judgment and does not become a judgment of the Federal Court. In this regard, I refer to Marcel Grand Cirque Inc. v. Quebec (1995), 107 F.T.R. 18, Olympia Interiors Limited v. Canada (1998), 98 D.T.C. 6306 (F.C.T.D.) and Glenn Alexander Ross v. Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada (2002 D.T.C. 6884), affirmed by the Federal Court of Appeal at [2002] FCA 359. In Marcel Grand Cirque Inc. v. Quebec, supra, the Court said at paragraph 6:

This Court does not have jurisdiction to determine this issue. The Excise Tax Act, like the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 2, contains in effect a complete code for the collection of taxes pursuant to which a taxpayer, after receiving a notice of assessment, may file a notice of opposition and possibly appeal to the Tax Court of Canada. Thus this Court does not have jurisdiction to determine the amount of the assessment and the expenses to which a taxpayer may claim to be entitled.

[21] I am satisfied that it is beyond the jurisdiction of this Court to go behind the execution of the certificates. However, the issue of enforcement of those certificates is within the jurisdiction of this Court in light of the clear statutory language that once registered, a certificate is deemed to be a judgment of the Court against the debtor for a debt due to Her Majesty and enforceable as such.

[22] In both the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act, "court" is defined in terms of the Federal Court of Canada for the purposes of recording and enforcing certificates executed under these statutes. This means, in my opinion, that enforcement proceedings relative to the certificates must be conducted pursuant to the applicable provisions of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.F-7, as amended, and the Federal Court Rules, 1998, SOR/98-106.

[30] There is nothing in the record before me, including the court files, to show that any documents were issued by the Federal Court of Canada. The recorded entries show merely that certificates were filed. No writs were issued, and this is admitted by the Minister. The Minister takes the position that a writ is not necessary, having regard to the manner in which judgments are enforced in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

[31] As noted above, section 56 of the Federal Court Act provides that provincial processes will be engaged for the purposes of enforcing judgments or orders of the Federal Court. While it is clear that a certificate executed under the Income Tax Act or the Excise Tax Act is not a judgment of the Federal Court of Canada, it is equally clear that for the purposes of enforcement, such certificate is deemed to be a judgment. In my view, this deeming provision means that the enforcement processes provided under the Federal Court Act and the Federal Court Rules, 1998 are engaged.

[32] The proper procedure in the present case would have been for the Minister to obtain a writ from the Federal Court of Canada and to forward that writ to the Sheriff. The Sheriff would then be obliged to handle the writ subject to section 56 of the Federal Court Act and the applicable provincial legislation.

[33] The Minister did not obtain writs to enforce payment of the money allegedly due from Mr. Piccott. He should have done so. It follows that the seizure of Mr. Piccott's goods was improperly made and those goods should be immediately returned to Mr. Piccott.

On Appeal[46] the court considered quite a few issues on the interaction of provincial realization and Federal authority under the ITA. It held:

…Copies of these certificates were then put into the hands of the High Sheriff of Newfoundland and Labrador (the Sheriff) pursuant to the Judgment Enforcement Act, S.N.L. 1996, c. J-1.1, with instructions to seize and sell as much of Mr. Piccott's property as necessary to satisfy the amounts owing under the certificates. The Sheriff did his duty. Mr. Piccott challenged the seizure and sale in the Federal Court. Heneghan J. in a decision reported at [2002] F.C.J. No. 1500, 2002 FCT 1116, set aside the seizure and sale because no writ of execution had been issued. Was she right to do so?

[6] The motions judge reviewed the provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Federal Court Act, and the Judgment Enforcement Act before coming to the conclusion that the seizure of Mr. Piccot's goods was irregular and should be set aside. She was persuaded that the applicable legislation required that seizure could only occur on the basis of process issued from the Court. The Court held that in order to proceed to execution, the CCRA was bound to have a writ of execution issued out of the Court and put into the hands of the Sheriff. Since that had not occurred, the seizures were irregular and were set aside. The motions judge also found that the enforcement provisions of the Income Tax Act could not be relied upon to justify the seizure, since they require that the document evidencing the judgment under execution be issued by the Court. Since she could find no evidence of any document being issued, the motions judge found that the seizure was made without authority.

[7] The motions judge began her analysis by reviewing the relevant sections of the Income Tax Act, specifically subsection 223(3) which allows the Minister to register a certificate setting out the amount owed by a taxpayer in the Court. Upon registration, the certificate has the same effect, "and all proceedings may be taken thereon", as if it were a judgment of the Court.

[8] While acknowledging that the certificates had the same effect as a judgment, the motions judge held that the certificates were not, in fact, judgments of the Court. She was supported in this conclusion by the decisions in Marcel Grand Cirque Inc. v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) (1995), 107

F.T.R. 18 , Olympia Interiors Limited v. Canada (1998), 98 D.T.C 6306 (F.C.T.D) and Glenn Alexander Ross v. Canada, 2002 D.T.C. 6884, aff'd at (2002), 301 N.R. 23 (F.C.A.). However, she was of the view that since the certificates were enforceable as judgments of the Court, enforcement proceedings with respect to the certificates had to be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, and the Federal Court Rules, 1998 (the Rules).

[10] The fact that certificates issued under the Income Tax Act are deemed to be judgments of the Court for enforcement purposes led the motions judge to conclude that the provisions of section 56 of the Federal Court Act were engaged. This, in turn, led to the conclusion that the enforcement provisions of the Federal Court Act and Rules were also engaged. Since the Rules require that a writ of execution be issued before execution can be levied (see Rules 433 and following), CCRA was bound to have a writ of execution issued. As a result, the judge concluded that CCRA was required to put the writ in the hands of the Sheriff before calling upon him to seize goods to satisfy the debt certified in the certificates.

[11] The motions judge rejected the argument based upon subsection 223(5) of the Income Tax Act that the registration of a certificate in the Court was sufficient to initiate enforcement proceedings.

[16] Counsel pointed out that while the Judgment Enforcement Act of Newfoundland no longer contemplates the issuance of a writ of execution, the requirements of the Income Tax Act and the Federal Court Act must be satisfied before the provisions of the Judgment Enforcement Act can be invoked. The Federal Court Act required that another step be taken before the certificate became enforceable, namely, the issuance of a writ, and in the absence of such a document, the filing in the provincial system was of no effect.

[17] Finally, counsel made the point that the enforcement provisions of the Judgment Enforcement Act required the filing of a money judgment, which is defined as:

> "money judgment" means a judgment requiring a person to pay money, or that part of a judgment which requires a person to pay money but does not include money payable under an order for contempt;

Since there is nothing in the certificate which requires anyone to pay anything, the certificate itself cannot be a money judgment. For that reason, something further is required to turn the certificate into an enforceable order.

[18] Counsel for the appellant took a different view of the scope and effect of the legislation. He pointed out that the intent of section 56 of the Federal Court Act is to permit the enforcement of Federal Court orders and judgments through provincial enforcement mechanisms. This desire to integrate the federal and provincial systems is reflected in the terms of subsection 56(3) which direct that every writ of execution or other process against property "shall ... be executed, with respect to the property liable to execution and the mode of seizure and sale, as nearly as possible in the same manner as similar writs or process, issued out of the superior courts of the province in which the property to be seized is situated...". Accordingly, counsel for the appellant argued that "The writ is not a necessary precursor to execution so long as the method of execution is one sanctioned in law in the province." Consequently, if the law of Newfoundland recognized the certificate for purposes of enforcement, then nothing in the Federal Court Act required the issuance of a writ which is not required in Newfoundland.

[26] I am satisfied that the original Certificate of Judgment was filed with the Sheriff as proof of the judgment. The questions which remain are whether the Certificate of Judgment is a memorial within the meaning of subsection 223(5), and if it is, whether it must be accompanied by a writ of execution.

[27] Before considering those questions, I note that the Judgment Enforcement Act also provides that notice of registration of a notice of judgment must be provided to the debtor:

(5) A statement verifying the registration of a notice of judgment shall be served on the debtor and the creditor within 30 days after it is registered. This is significant to the extent that part of Mr. Piccott's complaint is that if a writ of execution had been obtained, he would have received notice of the writ before it was executed and could therefore have challenged it prior to his inventory being seized.

[29] The fact that such certificates are enforceable as judgments of the Court brings into play the provisions of the Federal Court Act dealing with enforcement of judgments, specifically section 56 and Rule 423 cited earlier in these reasons. It appears that the motions judge concluded that since the procedure provided for the enforcement of Court judgments includes the issuance of a writ of execution, the enforcement of a certificate which is deemed to be a judgment of the Court also requires the issuance of a writ of execution (see paragraphs 31 and 32 of the motions judge's reasons).

[30] It is clear that Parliament declined to establish a separate federal judgment enforcement system and chose instead to have Federal Court orders enforced through the provincial judgment enforcement systems. This scheme was recognized by this court in Forest v. Hancor, [1996] 1 F.C. 725 (C.A.) where Décary J.A. said:

[22] ... The clear purpose of subsections 13(2) and 56(3) of the Act and Rule 5... is to ensure that the federal and provincial schemes of execution are complementary and to fill any possible gaps by resorting where necessary to the provincial schemes. These provisions are all invitations to the Court to refrain from inflexibility and adopt the interpretation that best facilitates the integration of the two schemes.

...

[23] The reasons for this are easy to explain. The Federal Court is in a way a court of exception that was grafted onto the existing network of superior courts. Its judgments have significant civil implications and it is essential, if they are to be understandable to litigants and if these implications are to be at all uniform, for execution procedures to be as similar as possible to those of the superior courts. This is all the more essential in that the Court as a general rule uses officers of the court appointed, and the seizure and judicial sale machinery established by, provincial authorities. Thus, reasons of administrative convenience as much as of certainty in civil rights matters have led the federal authorities to rely for all practical purposes on provincial practices.

[31] But just as Parliament is free to have Federal Court judgments enforced in the provincial systems, it is also free to provide for other means of enforcing its claims. This is what Parliament did when it enacted section 223 of the Income Tax Act. In addition to deeming certificates to be enforceable as judgments of the Court upon registration, the section goes on to provide a specific method of enforcement of those certificates. If subsection 223 did nothing more than deem registered certificates to be enforceable as judgments of the Court, then the motions judge's conclusion would be beyond challenge. The Minister would be bound to take those steps which are required to enforce a judgment under the Federal Court Act, including the issuance of a writ of execution. But, subsection 223 does not stop there. It goes on to provide a specific means of enforcing these certificates. The scope and detail of those dispositions can be seen from the extracts below:

[32] Parliament has enacted comprehensive provisions for the enforcement of tax liabilities, and has provided for modalities of enforcement which differ from the normal scheme. It is clear that Parliament is competent to legislate specific enforcement provisions for the collection of tax payable, even if those provisions deal with what would otherwise be questions of property and civil rights in a province (see TransGas Ltd. v. Mid-Plains Contractors Ltd., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 753, aff'g (1993), 105 Sask. R. 211 (C.A.)). As a result, the Minister can rely upon those specific provisions as they appear in the Income Tax Act, even if they differ from the enforcement provisions of the Federal Court Act.

Seizure Causes Fair Market Value Dispositions in Debtor's Hands, and Her Accompanying Tax Consequences

When CRA seizes a property is deemed disposed of since there is a change in ownership. This causes differing tax consequences immediately and it is the reponsiblity of the taxpayer to satisfy them. Merely because CRA has ostensibly not given the taxpayer enough notice to arrange his affairs to minimize those tax consequences is not a ground for making a claim for damages as was attempted in the Appeal case of Rochelle L. Moss v. Her Majesty The Queen[47] where the taxpayer attempted to argue that the certificate against some insurance policies, that caused the insurance company to lock them up from her as well, was grounds for higher tax damages she incurred as a consequence. The Court found:

[1] This is an appeal from a decision of Campbell J. (the "trial judge") of the Federal Court (2008 FC 768) dated June 19, 2008, dismissing an action for damages claimed by Rochelle L. Moss (the "appellant") against Her Majesty the Queen (the "respondent"). The appellant's claim alleges that conduct of the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") in relation to the collection of income taxes payable by her, pursuant to the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "ITA"), prevented her from organizing her affairs in a tax advantageous manner and as a result, she incurred an income tax liability that she would not have otherwise incurred.

[47] 2009 FCA 92

Digitized by Google

[4] The insurance companies had contractual arrangements ("insurance policies") with the appellant under which funds were payable to her. Nonetheless, they declined to make any payments to the Minister pursuant to the Requirements and took the position that the insurance policies were exempt from seizure. After soliciting opinions from the Minister, the insurance companies determined that they would not permit the appellant to withdraw any amounts owing to her under the insurance policies until the exemption from seizure issue was settled.

[5] In her statement of claim, the appellant alleges that the Minister caused the insurance companies to "freeze" her insurance policies, which prevented her from restructuring them in such a way that all of the income generated by them would have been immune from income tax. Accordingly, she claims that the actions of the Minister caused damage to her in that the income from her insurance policies was taxable when it need not have been.

[9] The trial judge dismissed the appellant's claim on the basis that she failed to prove that her income tax liability was caused by any action of the Minister. The main findings of the trial judge are succinctly summarized at paragraph 7 of his reasons, where he stated:

… I find that: it is Ms. Moss' conduct that caused the jeopardy order to be issued; as stated, no wrong was committed by the Minister in applying for the order; and no wrong was committed by the Minister in attaching the insurance policies.

[13] The appellant argues that the trial judge erred in failing to consider her allegation that the Minister acted in bad faith in relation to the collection actions that were taken. This argument is without merit because there was no allegation of bad faith on the part of the Minister in the appellant's statement of claim. As such, whether the Minister acted in bad faith was not an issue that was before the trial judge.

[14] In addition, the appellant contends that the trial judge failed to consider whether it was "fair, equitable and reasonable" for the Minister to have caused the appellant to become subject to additional income taxes. This contention was covered by the trial judge's finding that the Minister's actions did not cause the additional income taxes that were assessed against the appellant. That finding – one that we have declined to overturn – made it unnecessary for him to consider whether the Minister's actions were, or were not, "fair, equitable and reasonable".

Note that the case turned on whether the CRA had acted in bad faith of the collection effort via the issuance of the jeopardy order.

Damages on Pushed to Bankruptcy

Does CRA not have a duty to act fairly on voting for proposals in bankruptcy or does it have unfettered discretion? This was the case in Stephen Anthony Edell

Digitized by Google

v. Her Majesty The Queen et al.[48] where the taxpayer made a proposal in bankruptcy, which was voted against by CRA, which automatically deemed the taxpayer to be recognized as bankrupt. The taxpayer attempted to aruge that the CRA owed him a duty of care and that he had suffered damages while the court held:

> [1] This proceeding is an action commenced by the Plaintiff, Stephen Edell, against Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the Superintendent), and Risman & Zysman (the Trustee) for, among other things: an order requiring the CRA to accept his proposal pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. B-3 (the Act), a stay of the deemed bankruptcy under s.57 of the Act, and damages.
> [2] The Plaintiff alleges that the CRA acted in a malicious manner with reckless disregard for commercial reasonableness, for the recommendation of the Trustee, and for its duties as a public agency. He alleges that he has incurred damages and will continue to incur damages due to the unlawful conduct of the CRA.
> [5] The Plaintiff also filed a motion on June 20, 2008 seeking an interim stay of the deemed assignment into bankruptcy pending final determination of this action on its merits and also seeking Court directions concerning his payment obligations during the course of the action.
> Issue
>
> [6] The main issues to be determined in the three motions are:
> Is it plain and obvious that the Plaintiff's Claim discloses no reasonable cause of action?
> Should a stay of the deemed assignment provision section 57 of the Act be issued by this Court.
> Background
> [7] The Plaintiff is indebted to the CRA for outstanding income taxes (inclusive of interests and penalties) and Goods and Services taxes. On January 24, 2008, the Plaintiff made a formal proposal (the Proposal) pursuant to section 50 of the Act listing CRA was his sole creditor.
> [8] The Plaintiff proposed to settle the debt he owed to the CRA for a payment of $75,000.00 over four years; a sum that was less that his total indebtedness to the CRA. In making the Proposal, the Plaintiff had the assistance of the Trustee, who recommended that the CRA accept the Proposal.
> [9] The meeting of creditors stipulated by the Act was scheduled for February 20, 2008. The CRA delivered its Proofs of Claim and its Voting Letter setting out its vote against the Proposal on February 18, 2008. As a result of the vote against by the CRA, the Proposal failed.
> Submissions
> [11] The Plaintiff alleges that the failure of the CRA to accept his Proposal was unlawful, contrary to its duties as a public official, and a violation of public policy. He submits that the CRA is required to conduct its affairs and exercise its discretion in a commercially reasonable manner, in good faith and in the public interest. He submits that the CRA owes a higher and more objective standard of care than other creditors because it must act in the public interest.

[14] Furthermore, the Defendant Superintendent submits that pursuant to section 71 of the Act, once an assignment in bankruptcy has been filed, the bankrupt ceases to have any capacity to dispose of or deal with their property. Pursuant to section 181 of the Act, if the debtor does not believe that the assignment into bankruptcy ought to be filed they can apply to the court with jurisdiction to have the bankruptcy annulled.

[15] There is no authority under the Act to stay the deemed assignment into bankruptcy. Rather, the bankrupt can apply to have the bankruptcy annulled, or bring its concerns to the official receiver for adjudication. The Defendant Superintendent argues that the bankrupt no longer has any right to bring an action in damages.

[17] The Defendant CRA submits that there is no stay available to the Plaintiff against the operation of statute, that there is no cause of action in tort or negligence, and there are no damages that were suffered by the Plaintiff. Furthermore, the Defendant CR A submits that the only way to challenge the Defendant CRA's decision is by judicial review, which the Plaintiff chose not to do.

[18] The Defendant CRA submits that there is no provision in the Act to stay the effect of section 57 and that, while the Federal Courts Act, R.S., 1985, c. F-7 permits this Court to stay proceedings, it contains no provision authorizing it to stay the effect of statutory provisions. Even the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, which has exclusive jurisdiction in bankruptcy matters, cannot exercise that jurisdiction if it conflicts with the provisions of the Act.

[19] The Defendant CRA submits that it has done nothing unlawful in voting down the Proposal. Rather, it carried out its duties in accordance with the Act. The CRA filed its Proofs of Claim and voted on the Pro osal using the Voting Letter as it was permitted to do under the Act. The Act does not require: creditors to attend the meeting; to enter into negotiations; or to accept the Trustee's recommendation. Therefore, the Defendant CRA submits that it cannot be liable for any damages suffered by the Plaintiff under the tort of public misfeasance.

[20] The Defendant CRA submits that it did not act negligently in declining the Plaintiff's Proposal. For the CRA to have a duty of care to the Plaintiff giving rise to negligence there would have to be a sufficiently close relationship between the parties, and no public policy reason to limit or negate the duty owed to him.

The Defendant CRA submits that there is no dut of care owed to an individual proponent who seeks to compromise his tax debt to the CRA.

[21] Furthermore, if the Court was to find a proximate relationship and a duty of care owed to the debtor by the creditor, the Defendant CRA submits that it would run contrary to the scheme for proposals set out in the Act by adding a duty of care that was not mandated by Parliament when it enacted the proposal provisions.

Digitized by Google

[22] The Plaintiff acknowledges that according to the Act once a creditor rejects a proposal the debtor is deemed assignment into bankruptcy. Accordingly, the Plaintiff has sought an order that this deemed assignment be stayed until this action is determined. The Plaintiff claims that an assignment into bankruptcy would be prejudicial to both the interests of the Plaintiff and the public.

Motion to Strike by the Defendant CRA

[36] The Plaintiff alleges that the CRA's failure to accept his Proposal or to negotiate in good faith to amend the terms of the Proposal is unlawful, and contrary to the terms of its duties as a public official and a violation of public policy. The formulation suggests an allegation in the tort of public misfeasance also known as "abuse of public office". The Plaintiff must then show that the CRA: engaged in deliberate and unlawful conduct; knew that its actions were unlawful; and knew that the actions would likely harm the Plaintiff. Odhavji at paragraph 23.

[37] The Plaintiff has not identified any unlawful or deliberate conduct of the CRA other than the rejection of the recommended Proposal without explanation. The Act provides the procedure by which a creditor may respond to or reject a proposal; the CRA followed this procedure. The Act does not require the CRA to provide an explanation for its decision. Without more, the action by the CRA was lawful when considered in the context of the Act.

[38] The Plaintiff also resorted to the language that arises in the tort of negligence. For negligence, he must show that the CRA: owed him a duty of care; breached the standard of care by its actions; foresaw the harm its actions would lead to; and caused the Plaintiff to suffer injury or damages.

[39] Under the Act, the CRA stands in the same position as any creditor. It is entitled to evaluate the Proposal as any debtor would. It is not under any legal duty to accept less than the debt that it is owed. If anything, the CRA has an obligation to the Government of Canada to collect on income tax and goods and services taxes owed to the government. The CRA, as a debtor, does not owe a duty to the Plaintiff.

[40] The Plaintiff contends that in voting against his Proposal, the CRA acted "in a high-handed, arbitrary and capricious manner … in a reckless disregard for the interests of reasonableness and the lawful exercise of its discretion". In his submissions he states:

"It is also well-established law that a public authority exercising a judicial or quasi-judicial or decision- making power has a mandatory obligation to furnish the interested person with written reasons for its decision."

[41] It is clear the Plaintiff is focussed on the CRA's decision as the source of the harm that he alleges. The Plaintiff's choice of proceeding prompts me to consider the Federal Court of Appeal decision in Grenier v. Canada, 2005 FCA 348.

[42] In Grenier, Justice Létourneau, at paragraph 20, held that a litigant who disputes a federal agency's decision was not free to choose between an action and judicial review. A decision made by a federal agency retains its legal force and authority and is judicially operative as long as it has not been invalidated. The Federal Court of Appeal decided that it was necessary that a decision of a federal agency be first attacked by way of judicial review before bringing an action in damages.

[43] The Plaintiff has brought an action in damages by which he seeks to challenge the decision of the CRA not to accept his Proposal in the bankruptcy proceeding. He has chosen an impermissible course of action. However, I express no opinion whether a decision by the CRA in relation to a proposal under the Act may be challenged by way of judicial review instead of by the processes provided for in the legislation.

Certificates, Writs and Other Legal Proceedings

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

An outstanding liability may be collected through the Courts. Court proceedings begin with the Federal Court registration of a Certificate that is prepared by Legal Document and Processing Unit (LDPU). Once a Certificate has been registered in the Federal Court it has the same force and effect as if it were a Judgment for a creditor. Once the Certificate is obtained, a Writ of Seizure and Sale, Memorial or other legal document; depending on the province in which the proceedings are initiated; is required to seize and sell personal or real property or to encumber real property in order to protect the interests of the Crown.

Legislation

This section identifies the legislative provisions relating to Certificates, Writs and Other Legal Proceedings:

When a Debt May Be Certified

Amounts that may be certified immediately following the day of the mailing of the Notice of Assessment include:

Digitized by Google

- amounts payable under the Income Tax Act, Part VIII (includes related interest and penalties)
- GST/HST amounts (includes related interest and penalties)one half the amount assessed on large corporation taxes, under the Income Tax Act, Part 1.3 as well as one half of the amount assessed if the corporation is related to a large corporation.

  Note: For 2006 and subsequent tax years, large corporations must file the required returns or be subject to penalty.
- taxes payable by non-residents under the Income Tax Act, sections 116 and 215(4) (includes related interest and penalties)
- unremitted source deductions (includes related interest and penalties)

Except for cases where a jeopardy order is issued, all other Tax and Excise amounts can only be certified 90 days after the day of mailing of the Notice of Assessment and/or upon conclusion of a Notice of Objection or appeal. Some examples where the amounts can only be certified 90 days following the day of mailing include:

- individual tax
- corporate tax
- third party liabilities
- director's liability

Federal Court Certificates Registered under Provincial Registration Systems

Section 223 of the Income Tax Act and section 316 of the Excise Tax Act allows the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) to register with the Federal Court a Certificate evidencing various amounts payable by a taxpayer. At the time of registration of a Federal Court Certificate, Writ or any other notification thereof (referred to as a Memorial), using the procedure established by the applicable provincial legislation for creating a lien, charge, priority or binding interest in or on land or personal property, in respect of a judgment in the province or debt owing to the province, CRA will register Memorials in the appropriate provincial registry systems. This Memorial will be equally effective for the purpose of binding land and personal property in that province.

A lien, charge, priority or binding interest created under subsection 223(6) of the Income Tax Act and subsection 316(5) of the Excise Tax Act is deemed to give rise to a secured claim in bankruptcy upon registration. This will enable federal tax and GST/HST claims to compete in bankruptcy with other secured claims. As provided in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, prior registration will allow prior ranking amongst secured claims.

For further details refer to the Directive RCD 98-04 Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program - Lien and Charge Registration and Directive RCD 98-06 Lien and Charge Registration

General Information

This section provides general information on certain legal actions that may be initiated:

Digitized by Google

- Certificate
- Memorial
- Writ
- Order

Certificate

A "Certificate" is a formal written assertion, attesting that an amount payable by a tax debtor is outstanding. The registration of a Certificate in the Federal Court has the same force and effect as a judgment of a Court against the tax debtor, for the amount due to the Crown. Amounts are certified in accordance with legislative provisions and certain criteria. Once the debt is certified, additional legal proceedings may be commenced in accordance with the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act, Federal Courts Act, Federal Courts Rules and the Execution Acts of the provinces.

Memorial

A "Memorial" is a document issued by the Federal Court and may be filed, registered or otherwise recorded as creating a charge or lien against real or personal property registered to a debtor, and/or any property the tax debtor holds an interest in.

Writ of Seizure and Sale

A "Writ" is a written command or formal order in favour of the Crown. It is issued for the purpose of directing a person to comply with what is indicated by the Federal Court. In some provinces a Writ is used to place a lien, or charge against real property registered to a debtor.

Writs can be used to implement enforcement measures, for example: Writ of Seizure and Sale.

Order

An "Order" is a written decision and/or direction of a Judge, or under special circumstances, by the Court Registrar. The order requires the parties that receive it to execute or carry out the Court's decision.

Policy

This section provides policy related to Certificates, Writs and Other Legal Proceedings:

- The Validity Time Period of a Writ of Seizure and Sale
- Renewal of a Writ of Seizure and Sale
- Release of a Writ of Seizure and Sale or Memorial
- Approval Authority for Instruction to Sheriffs or Bailiffs

Initiation of Court Action

Court proceedings are initiated by registering a Certificate in the Federal Court. Prior to initiating court action consider the following:

- amount of the debt
- cost of the court action in relation to the potential dollar recovery
- danger of loss
- tax debtor's ability to pay

  Refer to Ability to Pay of the Payment Arrangements chapter for further detail.

- type of assets to be seized

Note: If a Writ, Order or Memorial is registered on the title of a property where the tax debtor resides permanently, the sale of the property is not normally forced by CRA. However, a review of the relevant facts may warrant the sale of the property . Where an exception to this policy is considered Collection officers are required to refer the matter to their assigned Field Support Programs Officer.

Amounts that are Not Certifiable

The following circumstances will generate recoverable amounts that are not certifiable. In the event that these amounts require court action refer the matter to the Department of Justice, and Field Support Programs Officer.

- duplicate refund cheque cashed by the tax debtor
- refund cheque cashed by a person having the same name as the tax debtor
- the cashing of a refund cheque issued following the processing of a fraudulent return, in the name of an alias

Digitized by Google

When to Certify a Debt

A debt may be certified in the following circumstances:

- all other action was ineffective
- assets are available for seizure
- a lien or charge is placed to protect the Crowns interest
- collection of an amount is at risk if immediate action is not taken
- lack of co-operation from the tax debtor
- no satisfactory payment arrangement reached

Validity Time Period of a Certificate

The Certificate remains valid as long as the certified debt is collectible. For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2005-024 Limitation Periods Applicable to the Collection of Tax Debts.

Identification of Seizable Assets

A Writ of Seizure and Sale is required to seize and sell a tax debtor's assets to reduce or satisfy a debt. Before seizing assets it is essential to determine whether the assets held by the tax debtor are seizable.

Related Topics:

- Seizable Assets
- Non-Seizable Assets

Seizable Assets

Seizable assets include:

- business chattels, for example: furnishings, equipment, inventory, livestock, computer equipment
- cash, guaranteed investment certificates, notes receivable, mortgages, bonds, safety deposit box contents,
- RRSPs, refer to Communication TSDMB-2003-004 Funds Held in RRSPs
- exclusive rights, for example: copyrights, patents, exploration rights
- licences and permits, for example: fishing rights, timber licence, taxi licence

Digitized by Google

- personal property, for example: works of art, jewellery, furniture, cars, boats, recreational vehicles
- real estate, for example: building and/or land, interest in property, leases
- principal residence in exceptional circumstances. In situations where a seizure and sale is considered Collection officers are required to refer the matter to their assigned Field Support Programs Officer. One exceptional circumstance may include the expiry of the limitation period. For further details, refer to Communication TSBMB 2005-024 Limitation Periods Applicable to the Collection of Tax Debts

Non-Seizable Assets

The Agency will not ordinarily seize the following assets:

- personal property of an Indian or Indian Band when deemed located on a reserve, refer to the Indian Act*-Collection Guidelines
- irrevocable trust funds, or trust funds set up with clauses prohibiting seizure.
- tools necessary to, and used by the taxpayer in his profession, business, trade or calling

  Note: Refer to the applicable provincial legislation provisions to determine the precise exemptions applicable to your area.

Although these assets are not ordinarily seized, review the relevant facts of each case to determine if seizure action is warranted under the circumstances. Where an exception to this policy is considered Collection officers are required to refer the matter to their assigned Field Support Programs Officer.

The Validity Time Period of a Writ of Seizure and Sale

A Writ is valid for a period of six years. Prior to the expiration of a Writ, an additional six-year period may be requested.

Note: Subsection 437(1) of the Federal Courts Rules states a Writ of Execution is valid for 6 years after it's date of issuance. The date of issuance refers to the certification date, not the date the Writ was registered.

Renewal of a Writ of Seizure and Sale

When a property is under seizure, the renewal of a Writ of Seizure and Sale has the benefit of not interrupting the Agency's priority. It is imperative that potential recovery is not jeopardized by the loss of priority because a renewal application was not made to the Court prior to the expiration of a Writ of Seizure and Sale. For further instructions on how to renew a Writ refer to Renewing a Writ of Seizure and Sale or Memorial

Note: Pursuant to subsection 123(1) of the Excise Tax Act, a partnership is a separate entity, separate from the partners, for GST/HST purposes. Subsection 272.1(1) of the Excise Tax Act stipulates that, for GST/HST purposes, we are dealing with the partnership, and not the partners.

To affect recovery from the individual partners it will be necessary to issue a memorandum assessment against the partners. For further details refer to the chapter Memorandum Assessments

After the memorandum assessments have been issued, Writs of Seizure and Sale and Memorials may be obtained against any partner. There is no requirement to register Certificates against all of the partners.

Prepare a T518 for each partner we are pursuing; and include the partnership name. For further details refer To Recommend Court Action to Certify a Debt for Memorandum Assessment

A Requirement to Pay in the name of the partner debtor is issued to the known partnership entity.

Partnerships in Quebec

Partnerships are either general partnerships, limited partnerships or undeclared partnerships.

In Quebec, they are governed by the Civil Code of Quebec, Book Five, Title two, Chapter X.

The Tax Debtor is a Partner

As a rule, the assets of a partnership cannot be seized to satisfy a partner's personal liability. The exception lies in the undeclared partnership where, in respect of creditors, each partner has retained the ownership of the property constituting his contribution to the undeclared partnership. Such contribution can therefore be seized to satisfy a partner's personal liability.

When contemplating the seizure of a partner's share in partnership, refer to Department of Justice for assistance.

The Tax Debtor is a General or Limited Partnership Indebted for Payroll Deductions

The Civil Code of Quebec, Article 2221 reads:

In respect of third persons, the partners are jointly liable for the obligations contracted by the partnerships but they are jointly and severally liable if the obligations have been contracted for the service or operation of an enterprise of the partnership.

Digitized by Google

Before instituting proceedings for payment against a partner, the creditors shall first discuss the property of the partnership. Meaning, that creditors must first proceed against the partnership's assets. When proceedings are instituted against a partner, the property of the partner is not applied to the payment of creditors of the partnership until after his own creditors are paid.

Despite the clarity of article 2221 and again, in the absence of significant case law on the subject of Collections pursuant to the ITA and partnerships, cases involving the responsibility of a partnership or its partners for Payroll Deductions should be referred to the Department of Justice for legal advice.

The Tax Debtor is an Undeclared Partnership indebted for Payroll Deductions

The Certificate is issued in the partners' name followed by the partnership name, for example, John Doe and Mary Doe sometime operating a partnership together or a firm under the name of Doe's Carpet Cleaner.

An undeclared partnership is not bound to make declarations in the manner prescribed by the legislation concerning the legal publication of partnerships. For this reason it may be difficult to thoroughly identify current members. Verify with the financial institution that there has not been any recent change in partners.

Urgent Requests for Court Documents

For all requests for Court documents where the normal delay in processing by the L.D.P.U. could result in a loss to the Crown, an urgent request may be made.. The Field Support Programs Officer is authorized to contact the L.D.P.U. and will ensure that the Court documents are processed on a priority basis.

Collections Officer must complete the request for Court documents electronically or on paper, whichever is applicable, and indicate the reason for the urgency. - when imminent danger of loss exists

A Writ of Seizure and Sale that has not been wholly executed may be extended beyond the validity period of six years. The renewal procedure is different for Writs of Seizure and Sale before and after they have expired.

Note: subsection 437(1) of the Federal Court Rules states that a Writ of Execution is valid for 6 years after the date of issuance. The date of issuance refers to the certification date, not the date when the Writ was registered.

How to Renew a Writ of Seizure and Sale that has Not Expired

To renew a Writ of Seizure and Sale that has not expired:

Digitized by Google

1. Ninety days prior to the expiration of the Writ of Seizure and Sale, send a memorandum requesting the renewal to the Department of Justice. The request for renewal must provide an explanation as to why the extension is required.

Note: The Department of Justice makes a motion to the Court to issue an Order extending the validity of the Writ of Seizure and Sale for an additional six years. The order is sent to the Tax Services Office.

2. When the extension is received, forward the following documents to the appropriate Sheriff or Bailiff prior to the expiry date of the original Writ of Seizure and Sale:

- a copy of the Writ of Seizure and Sale endorsed with a notice setting out the date, or
- a certified copy of the Court Order, where the Court Order directs that the Writ be extended

A Writ of Seizure and Sale that has been extended prior to its expiration, continues without interruption.

How to request a Re-issuance of an Expired Writ of Seizure and Sale When More than Six Years Have Elapsed

In this instance, a Court Order to renew the Writ cannot be obtained. The Department of Justice must obtain Leave of the Court to re-issue the Writ. Historically, the Courts have not been entirely sympathetic to the position that the deadline was simply missed. Sworn evidence of the reason for the re-issuance of the Writ, which is acceptable to the Court, is usually required for Leave to be granted. If granted, a Court Order will be issued stating that the Writ is to be re-issued.

To request a re-issuance of an expired Writ of Seizure and Sale:

1. Prepare a referral to the Department of Justice, requesting assistance in obtaining Leave of the Court to re-issue a Writ of Seizure and Sale.

Include the following information:

a) tax debtor's name, account number and current address

b) dates and amounts of all payments

c) current balance

d) details of the collection actions taken

e) explanation as to why the re-issuance is required

2. Attach the following documentation to the memorandum copy of the Certificate

   copy of the Writ of Seizure and Sale

3. Obtain the appropriate Tax Services Office authorization.

Digitized by Google

4. Prepare an affidavit.

Refer to Completing an Affidavit.

5. Send the request for legal assistance and the affidavit to the Department of Justice.

Note: If and when Leave of the Court is obtained, the Department of Justice forwards the Court Order to the Tax Services Office.

6. Send a copy of the Court Order to the L.D.P.U. to obtain the new Writ of Seizure and Sale.

Note: Once the new Writ of Seizure and Sale is obtained, the L.D.P.U. forwards the documents to the Tax Services Office.

7. Forward the following documents to the Sheriff or Bailiff for execution:

   Court Order

   new Writ of Seizure and Sale

Refer to Contacts and Addresses for a list of Sheriffs' and Bailiffs' addresses.

Amending a Certificate, Writ of Seizure and Sale or Memorial (pre July 2003)

An amended Certificate, Writ of Seizure and Sale or Memorial is required when:

- an error is identified on the court documents including the Certificate, for example: typographical error, incorrect amount. Where the Certificate contains no errors return the Writ and/or Memorial (as applicable) to the L.D.P.U. for correction by the Court.

  Note: In all cases, the Certificate evidencing the debt must be amended prior to obtaining the Writ of Seizure and Sale or Memorial. Where possible this is done concurrently.

The Primary Garnishment Provisions and the Requirement to Pay Process

Subsections 224(1) through (1.2) provide the primary garnishment abilities of CRA to intercept funds flowing to a tax-debtor from practically any party that will be used to extinguish the tax debt. They have gone through some evolution that expand their scope to any payments payable with on year of service of the requirement to pay (RTP). The target of the RTP isn't funds gratuitously given: it captures any and all commercially recognizable payments that are to be made to the tax-debtor.

It should be noted that the RTP does not create a trust in the recipient's hands of the funds, merely an obligation to pay to the Minister the amount specified. This was the topic in Lamarre and University of Calgary v. Morrison and Receiver-General Of Canada[50] which was further cited in Canada (Attorney- General) v. Royal Bank of Canada[51]which provided:

> [4] We are all of the view that the decision of this Court in re LAMARRE and UNIVERSITY OF CALGARY -v- MORRISON and RECEIVER-GENERAL OF CANADA (1978) 2 W.W.R., 465, enunciated two propositions:- firstly, that a Demand made under Section 224 does not convey the indebtedness to the Crown, nor does it impress it with a trust; and secondly, that the Minister does not, by virtue of the Demand, become a holder of a security. In short, the Crown does not acquire an equitable interest in the indebtedness.[52]

Rank in The Face of Provincial Liens and Claims

In combination with the other provisions of the ITA federal claims for income tax and deductions at source rank over provincial security schemes and other types of interests that may arise in the tax-debtor. This has been commented on in numerous cases which include Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. W. Mullner Trucking Ltd.[53] where the Prov. Appeal Ct. held:

> [1] The issue on this appeal is whether woodworkers in British Columbia have priority over the Minister of National Revenue with respect to competing claims to funds owing for labour and services in connection with logging. The woodworkers' claims arise under the Woodworker Lien Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 491. The Minister's claim is made under the"super priority" provisions of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.),
> 1, and the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15. A Supreme Court chambers judge decided that the woodworkers' lien claims had priority. The Minister appealed.

authorities clearly establish that provincial legislation cannot create a priority scheme that overrides a priority created by federal legislation. Matters relating to the contractual terms under which the funds arose, whether the tax provisions were effectively expropriation of the labour and services of the woodworkers, and any inequity in the result are irrelevant to the determination of priority. It follows that I would allow the appeal.

Statutory Provisions Taxation Statutes

[12] Employers are required under s. 153(1) of the Income Tax Act to withhold amounts from their employees' wages and remit them to the Receiver General for Canada by a specified due date. The Excise Tax Act requires taxpayers to collect and remit GST. Both statutes provide mechanisms to ensure that these requirements are met.

[13] Under the "requirement to pay" provisions in ss. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, the Minister may intercept payments to be made to a tax debtor or a secured creditor of a tax debtor:

Discussion

Statutory Priority

[20] On a plain reading of s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, the Minister's claim to the moneys paid into court by Canfor has priority over the woodworkers' claims under the Woodworker Lien Act.

[21] Section 224(1.2) applies "[n]otwithstanding ... any enactment of a province". It is well-settled that a province cannot create a priority scheme that overrides a federally-created scheme: see Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. M.N.R., 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453 at para. 32; Japan Canada Oil Sands Ltd. v. Stoney Mountain Steel Corp. reflex, (2001), 290 A.R. 251 at para. 25 (Q.B.).

[22] Thus, s. 2(3) of the Woodworker Lien Act, which purports to make the lien under s. 2(2) "a first lien or charge" that has "precedence over all other claims or liens", has no effect on the priority scheme created by s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act.

Canfor's Liability to Pay Baer

[23] The Minister may issue a requirement to pay under s. 224(1.2) "if the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a particular person [in this case, Canfor] is, or will become within one year, liable to make a payment (a) to another person (in this subsection referred to as the"tax debtor") [in this case, Baer] who is liable to pay an amount assessed under subsection 227(10.1) [unremitted source deductions]".

[24] In this case, the Minister became aware that Canfor was, or would within one year become, liable to make a payment to Baer under the harvesting contract. In fact, Canfor owed Baer for harvesting services provided up to February 17, 2000. The Minister issued the requirements to pay on February 21 and 22, 2000.

[25] The respondents contest the Minister's claim that Canfor was liable to make a payment to Baer. The chambers judge appears to have concluded that Canfor's liability to Baer was conditional, because Canfor acknowledged that it owed Baer $175,491.30 "provided the logs are free and clear of all liens and claims". He also referred to provisions of the harvesting contract under which Canfor could have held back or set off monies owing for Baer's failure to perform certain obligations. He concluded that "the money due to Baer depends on the satisfaction of the lien claims" (at para. 66). [26] At the time the requirements to pay were issued, the liens were in existence, though they had not been filed (see Woodworker Lien Act, s. 3(5)). They gave the lien holders rights to seize and sell the logs, but no claim against Canfor for the moneys owed to Baer. Canfor's liability to pay Baer was not conditional on the satisfaction of the lien claims. Although Canfor stated that it was not prepared to pay the amount owing until the logs were no longer subject to the liens, it did not invoke any contractual impediment to the liability. What it did was use the remedy provided in s. 16 of the Woodworker Lien Act: it paid into court the amount for which the liens were claimed, and the liens were vacated, all in accordance with the order made April 3, 2000.

[27] A similar argument was made in Dias v. MacLean 1993 CanLII 4569 (NS

Digitized by Google

SC), (1994), 123 N.S.R. (2d) 231 (S.C.), an application to determine entitlement to funds paid into court as between a claimant under the Mechanics'Lien Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 277, and the Minister under a requirement to pay. The issue was the meaning of "liable to pay" and of "liable to make a payment" in s. 224.(1.2) of the Income Tax Act. The lien claimant argued that at the time the requirement to pay was issued the owners of the property were under no obligation to pay the contractor, which had ceased work on the property. The chambers judge responded (at para. 31):

The argument that the funds paid into Court would never become "payable to, the tax debtor (Fundy), [the contractor], is initially attractive. Those funds are, however, under the contract, payable by the owners to Fundy and to no one else. The Mechanics Lien Act simply creates a statutory scheme to divert those funds to the lien claimants in certain circumstances. Although diverted through the operation of the Act, the funds are nevertheless payable (to the lien claimants) on behalf of Fundy. The Act simply operates to suspend the movement of funds to ensure the security interest of the lien claimants is satisfied.

[28] In Ledcor Construction Ltd. v. 544033 B.C. Ltd., 2006 BCSC 2097 (CanLII), 2006 BCSC 2097, it was similarly argued that monies subject to holdback provisions in the Builders Lien Act, S.B.C. 1997, c. 45 were not owed to the tax debtor (at para. 14). The chambers judge rejected that argument (at para. 17):

This language makes it clear that but for the liens Ledcor would have paid the money to Barnston [the tax debtor], as opposed to paying the money into court for distribution among the lien claimants. In other words the monies are owed to Barnston and but for the security interest would be the property of Barnston.

Security Interest

[31] Under s. 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, "the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor ... notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys, become the property of Her Majesty ... and shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest."

[32] "Security interest" is defined in s. 224(1.3). It "means any interest in property that secures payment or performance of an obligation and includes an interest created by or arising out of a ... lien ... of any kind whatever, however or whenever arising, created, deemed to arise or otherwise provided for".

[33] Section 224(1.3) also defines "secured creditor" as "a person who has a security interest in the property of another person".

[34] The chambers judge concluded (at para. 87) that the woodworkers were not "secured creditors" with "security interests" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act for the lien claims they are given by the legislation are in rem claims against logs which were the property of Canfor and not that of the tax debtor (Baer).

[35] He did not discuss why the liens were not "liens" within the meaning of the term "security interest".

[36] For the purpose of determining the Minister's priority to the funds in court under the requirements to pay, it is sufficient that Canfor was liable to make a payment to Baer, and that the lien claimants' interest was a "security interest". On the plain wording of s. 224(1.3) and the Woodworker Lien Act, the lien claimants' interest in the monies payable to Baer, or in the logs, or in the funds in court, was an interest arising out of a "lien", and was therefore a "security interest". The amount Canfor was liable to pay Baer was payable to the Receiver General, notwithstanding the lien claimants' "security interest[s]".

[37] The respondents maintained that they did not have a "security interest" in the monies otherwise payable to Baer, for two reasons. First, they argued that the "security interest" had to be in property of the tax debtor, Baer. Second, they claimed that their interest in the logs was an in rem interest, and not a "security interest".

[38] Contrary to the respondents' argument, there is nothing in the definition of "security interest" for these purposes that requires that the interest be in the property of the tax debtor. In support of their argument, they cite Caisse populaire Desjardins de l'Est de Drummond v. Canada, 2009 SCC 29 (CanLII), [2009] 2 S.C.R. 94, 2009 SCC 29 at para. 15, where Rothstein J. for the majority, said:

So long as the creditor's interest in the debtor's property secures payment or performance of an obligation, there is a "security interest" within the meaning of this section. [Emphasis added]

[39] This statement cannot be taken to be a general rule or interpretation of the definition of "security interest" within the meaning of s. 224(1.3) of the Income Tax Act, for two reasons. First of all, the interest in property with which the Court was concerned in Caisse populaire was an agreement between a creditor and a debtor, not, as in this case, a lien claimed by a third party. Secondly, the Court was considering the application of the deemed trust provisions in s. 227(4.1) of the Income Tax Act. While the definition of "security interest" for the purposes of that section is found in s. 224(1.3), that section provides expressly that the deemed trust attaches to "property of the person [who has failed to remit source deductions– the "tax debtor" as defined in s. 224(1.2)] and property held by any secured creditor ... of that person that but for a security interest ... would be property of the person" (emphasis added).

[40] That is, s. 227(4.1) provides that the deemed trust attaches to property held by a secured creditor who is the secured creditor of the tax debtor, who has a security interest in property that but for the security interest would be property of the tax debtor.

[41] Section 224(1.2) does not contain the same limitation. It provides, in s. 224(1.2)(a), that money otherwise payable by Canfor to Baer is required to be paid to the Receiver General notwithstanding any security interest in those monies. A "security interest"is "any interest in property", including a lien.

[42] If s. 224(1.2)(b) were applicable, the respondents might have an argument that the lien claimants were not secured creditors who had a right to receive the payment that, but for a security interest in their favour, would be payable to Baer, because the lien claimants did not have a right, under their liens, to the payment Canfor owed Baer under the contract. The Minister does not have to rely on s. 224(1.2)(b), however, in this case. Section 224(1.2)(a) clearly applies.

[43] The respondents' argument that they did not have a "security interest", but an in rem or possessory interest in the logs, relies on the analysis in First Vancouver Finance v. M.N.R., 2002 SCC 49 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 720, 2002 SCC 49. The issue in that case was whether the deemed trust provisions applied to property that had been sold to third party purchasers in the ordinary course of business. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the Minister could not claim an interest in the property.

[44] First Vancouver Finance, like Caisse populaire, is clearly distinguishable, and does not assist the respondents. Again, it dealt with the deemed trust provisions in ss. 227(4) and (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, not with s. 224(1.2), in issue here. Secondly, it considered the position of third party purchasers, not lien claimants.

[45] The decision of this Court in DaimlerChrysler Financial Services (debis) Canada Inc. v. Mega Pets Ltd., 2002 BCCA 242 (CanLII), 2002 BCCA 242, is similarly distinguishable.

[46] Applying the plain wording of s. 224(1.2)(a), the liens secured payment or performance of Baer's obligation to pay the woodworkers for their work. In order to clear the title to the logs, Canfor had to provide for Baer's obligation, subject to the determination of priorities among Baer's creditors (including the lien claimants), by paying the funds into court. It did so in accordance with s. 16 of the Woodworker Lien Act.

[47] Thus, the monies otherwise payable by Canfor to Baer became "the property of Her Majesty" upon the issuance of the requirements to pay, "notwithstanding [the] security interest [of the lien claimants] in those monies".

[48] The payment into court served to clear Canfor's title to the logs, and in effect, gave a "security interest" in the funds in court to the lien claimants, to secure the payment of the liens. The interest of the lien claimants was always, however, subject to the prior claims of other creditors, in this case, the Minister.

[49] The method by which woodworkers' liens are enforced under the Woodworker Lien Act is irrelevant to this analysis, which turns on the plain wording of the statutes.

Inequity

[50] The chambers judge commented (at paras. 97-98) that in enforcing its claim under s. 224(2.1) of the Income Tax Act, the Crown was seeking to "expropriate the labour and services of those lien claimants and leave them unpaid, by claiming priority." He concluded: "The inequity of such a result is patent."

[51] Similar observations challenging the Minister's priority under these provisions were rejected by the Supreme Court of Canada, in Alberta (Treasury Branches) v. M.N.R., 1996 CanLII 244 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 963, and the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, in TransGas Ltd. v. Mid-Plains Contractors Ltd. 1993 CanLII 4413 (SK CA), (1993), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 238, aff'd 1994 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 753.

[52] In Alberta (Treasury Branches), Cory J., for the majority, described the high priority ascribed by Parliament to the collection of source deductions, and rejected the argument that the statutory collection provisions amounted to expropriation (at para. 38):

It is clear that in enacting the sections of the ITA and ETA under consideration Parliament was attempting to ensure the priority of the claim of the MNR over that of other creditors. The primary task of collecting and remitting taxes and contributions under both Acts rests with those who are employers and those who sell goods and services. These amounts so collected could be said to belong not to the collecting debtor entities but to the government. In a sense the funds collected but not remitted might be considered to be held in a form of trust since the entities that have collected these funds are not in any circumstances entitled to retain them. Rather they must remit the funds. In those circumstances the priority granted to the MNR to recover such funds cannot possibly be said to be expropriation without compensation. [Emphasis added.]

[53] In TransGas, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal expressed the purpose of these provisions as follows (at 248, 251):

Therefore, in our opinion, the purpose of the impugned provision is clear – to effect expedient collection of the withheld tax money and thereby prevent its misappropriation or diversion to the tax debtor's other creditors.

The provision enables the Minister to collect withheld taxes by garnisheeing funds payable to the delinquent employer – funds that would not have been available to other creditors if they had been remitted as required by law. In order to ensure the collection of "withheld" tax money, the government has enacted this garnishment provision with the result that it constitutes an integral and essential part of the collection scheme as it is clearly designed to attack the problem of tax deficiencies due to conversion or other types of misappropriation at the source of the deductions.

[54] The direct effect of these provisions on the lien claimants is of course unfortunate, but the fact is that through these provisions amounts deducted from their wages for income tax and other statutory deductions, and payments made for GST, are paid to the Minister, who, under the taxation statutes, was always entitled to them. Sympathy for the lien claimants does not override the plain meaning of the statutes.

Deemed Trust

[55] The Minister claimed in the alternative that the deemed trust provisions applied to the amount payable by Canfor to Baer.

[56] It is not necessary to decide this question, as the Minister's claim under s. 224(1.2) has priority over that of the lien claimants to the funds in court.

Is Underlying Debt Prescribed?

The underlying debt must be in existence in order for the RTP to be valid: if the loan or payable has ceased to exist then there is no "payable" for purposes of the Act and the RTP is ineffective. This was the issue in Imperial Pacific Greenhouses Ltd. v. The Queen[54] where there was considerable issue on the reliability of the witnesses where there was a verbal agreement that the loan was basically contingent on another out-come of ancillary proceedings and no written evidence of such could be produced: it purportedly deferred payment on the underlying debt. In respect of loans that were no t repayable and thus undermining the RTP see also Debra Browning v. The Queen[55] where the Tax Court had to contend with an instance where a debtor to a tax-debtor corporation argued that the debt had been prescribed and "fallen off the table" and thus there was no "payable" with the scope of s. 224(1). It held:

Analysis

[27] In my view, the Respondent's lack of attention to the Minister's power to assess underpins the essential weakness of his position. The starting point for any appeal of an assessment under the Income Tax Act is the validity of the assessment. For an assessment under subsection 227(10) to be valid, all of the prerequisites of subsections 224(1) and (4) must first be fulfilled.[24] Until that substantive determination has been made, I agree with counsel for the Appellant that section 222 does not come into it.

[28] In the present case, the Minister's assessments hinge on the factual assumption that at the time of the Current Requirements to Pay, Ms. Browning was "liable to make a payment" to Berkeley and is accordingly, liable under subsection 224(1) for Berkeley's tax debt[25]. Although her potential tax liability was initiated by the issuance under subsection 224(1) of the Current Requirements to Pay, it is the resulting subsection 227(10) assessment that is under appeal; in challenging that assessment, it is open to Ms. Browning to prove wrong the assumptions upon which it was based.

[29] In Maritime Life Assurance Company v. Her Majesty the Queen[26], for example, the taxpayer succeeded in its challenge of the Minister's assessment for failure to comply with a requirement to pay by showing that it was not liable to make a payment to the tax debtor at the time the requirements to pay were made:

6 The effectiveness of the Minister's Requirements to Pay turns, at least initially, upon the answer to the question whether or not the cash values of the policies were "payable", within the meaning of that word as it is used in subsection 224(1), when the Requirements were made. I understood both counsel to accept that the answer to this question depends simply upon whether or not SK and RK could, at that time, require the Appellant company to pay the cash value of the policies to them forthwith. That this is so is placed beyond dispute by a number of authorities, the most recent of which is the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Canada (Attorney General) v. Yannelis. It was held there that the word "payable", as used in the Unemployment Insurance Regulations, subparagraph 58(8)(b)(i)

... refers to the point in time when vacation pay is due to a claimant in the sense that he is entitled by his contract of employment or by the general law to have it paid to him and his employer is under an obligation to pay it. In other words, it is payable when a claimant is in a position at law to enforce payment. That point in time, as was held in Legge, supra, should not depend on when unpaid vacation pay happened to have been requested if, as a matter of law, it became payable in the above sense at an earlier time. [Emphasis added; original footnotes omitted.]

[30] Thus, while subsection 224(1) permits the Minister to send to a third party a written requirement to pay "the moneys otherwise payable by the tax debtor" on nothing more than a suspicion, no liability will attach if the third party can show that when the requirements to pay were issued, no amount was "due" and that he was under no "obligation to pay it". One possible defence "under the general law" could be to show that as of the effective date of the requirement to pay, the debt was unenforceable by the tax debtor against the third party by operation of a provincial limitation of action statute.

[31] This is the basis of Ms. Browning's defence. In this regard, her situation is quite different from that of the taxpayer in Markevich. Unlike Ms. Browning, Mr. Markevich had been directly assessed and was challenging the enforceability of his otherwise admitted "tax debt" solely by invoking limitation periods under the same provisions of the British Columbia legislation. Although counsel for the Respondent described the question in Markevich as "whether ... the [Minister] was out of time with respect to requirements to pay"[27], as can be seen from Justice Evans' (as he then was) findings of fact in the first instance, references to requirements to pay were only incidental to the substantive issue under appeal; namely, Mr. Markevich's direct liability to the Crown:

The applicant, Mr. Markevich, has been at all material times a resident in the province of British Columbia. In the early 1980s he failed to pay taxes on income that he had earned in the promotion of stocks. He has never challenged the validity or correctness of the notices of assessment issued by the Minister.

In 1986 he was assessed as owing $267,437.61 to Revenue Canada. In 1987 his house was sold and Revenue Canada took the proceeds of sale to reduce his indebtedness. Later in that same year Revenue Canada decided to "write-off" the amount of tax still owed by the applicant, on the ground that he had no other assets and no income, and there were no realistic prospects of collecting the tax from him within the foreseeable future.

"Writing-off" a tax debt does not extinguish or forgive it; it is an internal book-keeping device that removes a taxpayer's tax debt from Revenue Canada's active collection list. Subsection 25(3) of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-11 [as amended] provides that "[t]he writing off of any debt, obligation or claim pursuant to this section does not affect any right of Her Majesty to collect or recover the debt, obligation or claim."

From 1992 the applicant reported income on his tax returns; in some years he was late in paying the amount for which he was assessed. After making payments in respect of those years, he received a statement of account in September 1993 showing the balance owing to Revenue Canada as $0.00. In the years 1995 to 1997 he again fell into arrears, and requirements to pay were issued to creditors informing them of the tax owing by the taxpayer and requiring them to pay to Revenue Canada money that they owed to the applicant. During the period 1995 to 1997, the statements of account sent to the applicant, and the requirements to pay issued to its creditors, showed him as owing only the tax due in respect of those years, not the larger amount owing from the years before 1986.

However, in January 1998 the applicant was informed that he also owed unpaid taxes assessed in the years up to 1986 in the amount $770,583.42, which comprised $267,437.61 of unpaid taxes and $503,145.81 of accrued interest. Apparently as a result of a change of policy, previously written-off tax debts are now included by Revenue Canada in both the statements of account sent to taxpayers, and any requirements to pay issued to taxpayers' creditors.

Having heard virtually nothing about this debt in any of his communications with Revenue Canada since 1986, and having neither acknowledged nor made any payments in respect of this indebtedness since 1986, the applicant was taken aback when he received this information in January 1998. In particular, he feared that the inclusion of this large amount in any requirements to pay that Ms. Kara indicated would be issued to his creditors would be extremely damaging to him in the conduct of his business. However, it should also be noted that in August 1996 the applicant had been told that the assessment notice issued for the tax year 1993 did not include a previously unpaid tax liability and that a detailed statement would follow. It did not.[28][Emphasis added.]

[32] Unlike Mr. Markevich (and, for that matter, the taxpayers in the few cases decided after the consequential amendments to section 222, Gibson v. R.[29] and Collins v.

R.[30]), Ms. Browning is not herself directly indebted to the Crown for her own unpaid taxes. And unlike the taxpayer in Bleau v. Canada[31], she is not attempting to argue that the underlying tax debt of Berkley is statute-barred: in that case, the taxpayer became liable to pay the tax debt of the section 160 transferor at the moment of transfer, long before the expiry of any limitation periods that might have applied. Ms. Browning, however, invokes the limitation period in the provincial statute not as a bar to the Minister's action to collect an already proven tax debt but rather, to show that no such debt ever came into existence.

[33] Turning, then, to the question of whether Ms. Browning was "liable to make a payment" to Berkeley as of the effective dates of the Current Requirements to Pay, I accept Mr. Browning's evidence that, after January 1, 1994, the Appellant made no further payments under the mortgage and Berkeley took no action to enforce its payment. In these circumstances, as of that date, the Appellant was in default under the mortgage and pursuant to the British Columbia Limitation Act, Berkeley had until January 1, 2000 to bring a cause of action to enforce its right of repayment under the mortgage. As this was not done and Ms. Browning did nothing to confirm the debt before the expiry of the limitation period, as of January 1, 2000, the mortgage debt became unenforceable and was extinguished under subsections 3(5), 5(1), 5(2) and 9(1) of the British Columbia Limitation Act.

[34] From this it follows that when the Current Requirements to Pay were issued (October 2000 to July 2007), Ms. Browning was no longer liable to Berkeley under the mortgage. That being the case, the triggering criteria under subsections 224(1) and (4) have not been satisfied, the Minister was without power to assess Ms. Browning under subsection 227(10)and the assessment is, therefore, invalid.

[35] In these circumstances, there is no need to consider the Respondent's arguments in respect of section 222. The Minister cannot use that provision to bootstrap his way over the criteria in section 224 upon which his power to assess under subsection 227(10) depends.

[36] Notwithstanding the amendments to section 222 consequent to Markevich, that case still stands for the proposition that the Minister has a duty to act with some dispatch in collecting tax debts. Here, the Minister's practice of issuing requirements to pay to Ms. Browning in dribs and drabs over a 15-year period in respect of Berkeley's 1989-90 tax debt falls somewhat short of the ideal expressed by Major, J. in paragraph 20 of the Supreme Court of Canada decision:

… If the Minister makes no effort to collect a tax debt for an extended period, at a certain point a taxpayer may reasonably come to expect that he or she will not be called to account for the liability, and may conduct his or her affairs in reliance on that expectation. As well, a limitation period encourages the Minister to act diligently in pursuing the collection of tax debts. In light of the significant effect that collection of tax debts has upon the financial security of Canadian citizens, it is contrary to the public interest for the department to sleep on its rights in enforcing collection. …[32]

[37] The appeals are allowed, with costs, and the assessments of the Minister of National Revenue are vacated.

No Need for Assessment or Certificate to be Issued

There is no need for CRA to issue an assessment or certificate of indebtedness of the tax-debtor in order for the RTP to be legitimate. This was the case in Dr.:Lenard-Zephirin:Gagne

v. MNR et al[56] where the Fed. Ct. held:

> [21] The Applicant submits that the Requirement to Pay is invalid since no certificate was issued by a competent court. As the Minister pointed out, section 224 of the Income Tax Act does not require any formal document to be processed by a competent court before garnishee proceedings can be initiated. Powers are granted to the Minister under this section of the Act: "as soon as the Minister becomes aware that a third person may make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment in to a tax debtor...may require payment". Section 224(1.2) provides for garnishment procedure. Further, this initiative taken by the Minister is confirmed by the Federal Court of Appeal in Sorenson v. M.N.R. 82 D.T.C. at 6246, Thurlow CJ wrote:
> We have not been persuaded that there is any error in the judgment under appeal. Of the various matters referred to, the only point worthy of mention is the submission that procedure to file a certificate under section 223 of the Income Tax Act must be followed by the Minister before he may exercise the power given him by section 224 to require a person who is or is about to become indebted or liable to a taxpayer to make payment to the Receiver General for Canada on account of the taxpayer's liability under the Act. In our opinion, there is no merit in the submission.

No Notice, Right of Judicial Review

Stanley Dingman v. MNR[57] is a wonderful case illustrating some of the parameters in which a RTP can be contested, though unsuccessfully. It is reproduced at length.

Issues

> [7] The applicant has submitted the following issues for consideration:
> There were no legal warnings sent to the applicant prior to the requirement to pay.
> There were no provisions for a statutory right of appeal in the requirement to pay.
> The applicant did have contractual agreements contrary to the respondent.
> [8] I would rephrase the issues as follows:
> What is the appropriate standard of review?
> Did the Minister commit a reviewable error in not providing warning to the applicant that a requirement to pay would be sent to 1094238 Alberta Ltd. and 870413 Alberta Ltd.?
> Did the Minister commit a reviewable error in not providing the opportunity for an appeal?
> Did the Minister commit a reviewable error when he issued a requirement to pay to 1094238 Alberta Ltd. and 870413 Alberta Ltd.?

Applicant's Submissions

> [9] The applicant alleges that he is not an employee of 870413 Alberta Ltd. and has suffered damages through breach of privacy and confidentiality and defamation of character, from this requirement to pay. He also submits that he has never received a response from his November 6, 2002 letter requesting all information pertaining to the tax assessment so as to dispute and/or disprove tax arrears.
> [10] The applicant alleges that according to the Tax Payer Bill of Rights #7, "You have the right, as an individual, not to pay income tax amounts in dispute before you have had an impartial review." The applicant alleges that he did have a contractual agreement contrary to the respondent's "Exhibit B" ruling, therefore solid grounds for an impartial review exists.

[11] The applicant submits that in the event that a review does not concur with the applicant's position, then the Taxpayer's Bill of Rights #12 should come into force which states, "You have the right to relief from penalties and interest under tax legislation because of extraordinary circumstances."

Respondent's Submissions

[12] The respondent submits that there are three issues in this application for judicial review. First, the respondent submits that unless the applicant submits a motion pursuant to Rule 302 of the Federal Court Rules, S.O.R./98-106 (the Rules), permitting him to seek judicial review of both requirements to pay within a single application, the application is "technically invalid".

[13] Second, the respondent submits that the applicant has named the wrong respondent to the application. The respondent submits that the "Minister of National Revenue" is the proper respondent because of subsections 244(1) and 248(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (ITA), and states that it is the Minister of National Revenue who has the statutory right to issue a requirement to pay. The respondent also submits that CRA and the collections officer, G. Gregory Roy, act on behalf of the Minister and perform functions in the Minister's name. Therefore, the respondents will make a motion to remove the respondents named in the style of cause and substitute "The Minister of National Revenue" as the sole respondent to this application for judicial review.

[14] Third, the respondent argues that decisions by the Minister to issue requirements to pay were reasonable which the respondent argues, is the standard of review to be applied in this case. It is argued that the decision by the Minister is a discretionary one under subsection 224(1) of the ITA which states:

Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is, or will be within one year, liable to make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment under this Act (in this subsection and subsections 224(1.1) and 224(3) referred to as the "tax debtor"), the Minister may in writing require the person to pay forthwith, where the moneys are immediately payable, and in any other case as and when the moneys become payable, the moneys otherwise payable to the tax debtor in whole or in part to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under this Act.

[15] The purpose of the provisions, the respondent submits, is to "effectively intercept" the debt owed to the tax debtor and that this is one of many tools used by the Minister in collecting tax debts.

[16] The respondent states that the evidence shows that the Minister was reasonable in issuing a requirement to pay to Graham's Backhoe Service because numerous cheques were payable to the applicant in 2007 and 2008, and these were in turn deposited into the applicant's corporation.

[17] The respondent submits that requirements to pay were a "proper attempt" to collect the applicant's outstanding tax debt and within the power and discretion of the Minister as conferred under the ITA.

[18] The respondent rejects the applicant's argument that the requirements to pay were issued "with no legal warning". The respondent states that this argument could "be construed as a complaint that absent advance notice he was denied a right to be heard by the decision maker". The respondent submits that there is no requirement to issue a legal warning in the ITA. The respondent argues that even if there was a requirement to issue a legal warning, the evidence shows that this would have been "generously met" by the notice of assessment dated June 13, 2002; at least six letters between October 2002 and February 2006 requesting payment, of which at least five warned that legal action might be taken without further notice; and a letter dated October 31, 2002 requesting payment with an explicit warning that legal action may be taken without further notice.

[19] The respondent submits that the Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to review the employment insurance ruling referred to in the letter dated October 30, 2000 which led to the notice of assessment because it is barred by operation of sections 91 and 103 of the Employment Insurance Act,
R.S.C. 1996, c. 23 (EIA), which states that an employment insurance ruling would have to be appealed to the Tax Court of Canada within the prescribed period. Further, when applying section 18.5 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7 (FCA), this Court has said that when attacking a requirement to pay, it cannot be an attack on the underlying assessment where the appeal goes to the Tax Court of Canada. In any case, the respondent argues that the applicant is barred because it was not argued in the notice of application.

[20] Relief from interest and penalties is also barred because it was not argued in the notice of application and there is no evidence that the applicant applied to the Minister of National Revenue for such relief pursuant to subsection 220(3.1) of the ITA.

[21] The respondent submits that this judicial review should be dismissed with costs after allowing the applicant's single application for judicial review to address both requirements to pay, and after amending the style of cause.

Analysis and Decision

[22] There are two preliminary issues to address: the motion to amend the style of cause naming the Minister of National Revenue rather than the collections officer, G Gregory Roy and CRA and whether the two requirements to pay that were issued are judicially reviewable under a single application. The Federal Court of Appeal in Stevens v. Canada (Commissioner, Commission of Inquiry) 1998 CanLii 9074 (F.C.A.) noted the legal principle from an English case, that dealt with joinder of a party: Amon v. Raphael Tuck & Sons Ltd., [1956] 1 Q.B. 357 which stated that a party named in an action should be bound by the result of that action. In this case the collections officer exercises his discretion in collection activities on behalf of the Minister and would not personally be bound by the Court's order in this case, pursuant to subsections 244(1) and 248(1) of the ITA. Therefore, the style of cause should be amended naming the Minister of National Revenue and deleting G Gregory Roy, Collection Enforcement Officer and the Canada Revenue Agency as respondents.

[23] At the hearing of this matter, the parties agreed that pursuant to Rule 302 of the Federal Court Rules, I could order that both requirements to pay could be dealt with in the same judicial review application.

[24] Issue 1

What is the appropriate standard of review?

The questions under review involve questions of mixed law and fact and questions of law. Last year in Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, the Supreme Court of Canada reviewed the standard of review analysis in Canada and eliminated the standard of patent unreasonableness. In doing so, the Supreme Court stated the following about the reformed standard of review analysis at paragraph 62:

In summary, the process of judicial review involves two steps. First, courts ascertain whether the jurisprudence has already determined in a satisfactory manner the degree of defence to be accorded with regard to a particular category of question. Second, where the first inquiry proves unfruitful, courts must proceed to an analysis of the factors making it possible to identify the proper standard of review.

[25] In Beaulieu v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 FC 1236, Mr. Justice Shore examined the case law on discretionary decisions made by the Canada Revenue Agency:

In Barron v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.), 97 D.T.C. 5121, [1997] F.C.J. No. 175 (QL), the Federal Court of Appeal states the reasons serving as the basis for reviewing the exercise of the discretionary power by the Minister's delegate. Indeed, the judge flags and reiterates the comments of Mr. Justice Louis Pratte:

[79] ... when an application for judicial review is directed against a decision made in the exercise of discretion, the reviewing Court is not called upon to exercise the discretion conferred upon the person who made the decision and "the Court may intervene and set aside the discretionary decision upon review only if that decision was made in bad faith, if its author clearly ignored some relevant facts or took into account irrelevant facts or if the decision is contrary to law.

(As quoted by Mr. Justice J. François Lemieux in Wyse v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.), 2007 FC 535, 313 F.T.R. 161; also, Plattig v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 FC 1074, 239 F.T.R. 290 at paragraph 22.)

In a similar case, Mr. Justice Michel Beaudry stated: "The Court will intervene only where the decision is based on an unreasonable explanation. The Court must assess whether the reasons for the decision are tenable." (Gagné v. Canada (Attorney General), 2006 FC 1523, 2007 D.T.C. 5087 at paragraph 15.)

[26] Therefore, although jurisprudence has not determined what standard of review to apply on requirement to pay decisions specifically, I find that the case law on discretionary decisions of CRA point to a reasonableness standard. This is in accordance with Dunsmuir above, where discretionary decisions are to be afforded a high degree of deference. For a decision to be unreasonable, it must be also determined to be improper within the meaning of subsection 18.1(4) of the FCA.

[27] Issue 2

Did the Minister commit a reviewable error in not providing warning to the applicant that a requirement to pay would be sent to 1094238 Alberta Ltd. and 870413 Alberta Ltd.?

The applicant alleges that he is not an employee of 870413 Alberta Ltd. and has suffered damages through breach of privacy and confidentiality and defamation of character from this requirement to pay and that he has never received a response from the November 6, 2002 letter requesting all information pertaining to the tax assessment so as to dispute and/or disprove tax arrears.

[28] I find, however, that the applicant received ample warning that legal action may be taken to collect the debt owing to the Crown. It was incumbent on the applicant to pursue an appeal on his reassessment for the 2000 taxation year and he chose not to. Since then the applicant received multiple letters requesting payment. These letters stated:

If you fail to pay the full amount within 14 days, we may have to take appropriate legal action without further notice.

Digitized by Google

[29] In any case, I agree with the respondent that there is no legal requirement to issue a warning. I would not allow the judicial review on this ground.

[30] Issue 3

Did the Minister commit a reviewable error in not providing the opportunity for an appeal?

The jurisprudence on the jurisdiction of the Federal Court to review tax assessments is clear: there is no jurisdiction according to section 18.5 of the Federal Courts Act and sections 91 and 103 of the Employment Insurance Act. The applicant would have had to appeal through the Tax Court of Canada. I would not allow the judicial review on this ground.

[31] Issue 4

Did the Minister commit a reviewable error when he issued a requirement to pay to 1094238 Alberta Ltd. and 870413 Alberta Ltd.?

The Minister of National Revenue has a statutory duty to collect debts owing to the Crown under subsection 224(1) of the Income Tax Act. I cannot accept that this decision was made in bad faith, that the Minister "clearly ignored some relevant facts or took into account irrelevant facts or that the decision is contrary to law" (see Barron above). The applicant was given ample opportunity to pay the debt over six years.

[32] The applicant argues that it was not reasonable to issue a requirement to pay to 870413 Alberta Ltd. because he was not an employee. Subsection 224(1) of the ITA states in part:

Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is, or will be within one year, liable to make payment to another person who is liable to make payment under this Act…

[33] The section does not stipulate that the applicant would have had to be an employee only that "another person" would be liable to him for payment. The decision of the Minister to issue requirements to pay was therefore reasonable. I would not allow the judicial review on this ground.

[34] The application for judicial review is therefore dismissed.

CANADA REVENUE AGENCY

Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

I. Overview

[1] This is an application for judicial review pursuant to section 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, RSC 1985, c F-7, of the discretionary decision by the Canada Revenue Agency [CRA] to issue a Requirement to Pay [RTP] to the applicants.

[2] The applicants seek an order to quash or invalidate the RTP and a mandamus order to restrict the CRA from instituting any further collection actions until such time that a Notice of Confirmation or variation of assessments has been issued to the applicants.

II. Background

[3] The applicants, Harold Coombs and Joan Coombs, are the directors and controlling shareholders of Select Travel Inc [Select Travel].

[4] Harold Coombs is also the president of Select Travel, a company incorporated under the laws of Ontario.

[5] On March 23, 2010, Select Travel was reassessed by the CRA for the 2004 and 2008 taxation years and was found to owe 6,651.84$ and 597.28$, respectively. On March 24, 2010, the CRA sent a notice of reassessment for those two years and advised Mr. Coombs of an outstanding balance of 8,094.61$. On June 24, 2011, Mr. Coombs filed a Notice of Objection to the reassessment with the Chief of Appeal.

[6] On March 24, 2011, Select Travel was reassessed for the 2009 and 2010 taxation years and was found to owe 1,612.45$ and 1,349.78$, respectively. On August 11, 2011, CRA sent Select Travel a Statement of Account which indicated a tax debt of 12,692.84$. By September 2, 2011, that amount had increased to 12,729.40$.

[7] It is submitted by the respondent, and not contested by the applicants, that the 12,729.40$ amount consists only of Select Travel's source deduction tax liability.

[8] On September 2, 2011, CRA sent the RTP to TD Canada Trust, Select Travel's financial institution, for the amount owing: 12,729.70$. On September 8, 2011, TD Canada Trust complied with the RTP and paid the full amount of 12,729.70$. On September 28, 2011, Harold Coombs filed an application for judicial review on behalf of Select Travel Direct Inc. (file T-1597-11).

[9] On October 7, 2011, Harold Coombs filed another application for judicial review, this time on behalf of himself and his wife, Joan Coombs (file T-1658-11). On November 24, 2011, the respondent sought a motion to strike one of the two Notices of Application on the grounds that they were virtually identical and sought the same relief.

[10] On December 19, 2011, Justice Roger Hughes issued an order stating that both applications would be heard together. However, file T-1597-11 was discontinued on December 7, 2011. The remaining file, T-1658-11 is the object of this application for judicial review.

[11] It should be noted that the applicants are self-represented and submitted no memorandum of argument. Respondent's counsel made a preliminary objection that the Coombs did not have status to appear on behalf of the corporate entity Select Travel in respect of which the complaint concerning the issuance of the RTP and collection has been raised. In the interest of justice, and given their roles as sole directors and shareholders, I granted status to the Coombs to make representations on behalf of Select Travel.

[12] The applicants seek the following:

A. An order quashing the RTP;

B. A declaration that the RTP is unlawful and in violation of paragraph 225.1(d) and subsection 225.1(2) of the Income Tax Act, RSBC 1996, c 215 [ITA];

C. An order restricting the CRA from making further collection actions until a notice of confirmation or variation has been mailed to the applicants;

D. An order stating that the CRA must comply with subsections 225.1(a) to (g) of the ITA;

E. An order compelling the CRA to fulfill its duties pursuant to sections 225.1 and 225.1(2) of the ITA.

III. Issues

[13] The issues, as reformulated, are as follows:

A. Does the Federal Court have jurisdiction to determine the present application regarding whether Select Travel's tax assessments are valid?

B. Was the CRA legally permitted under the ITA to issue the RTP on September 2, 2011 to collect the tax debt?

C. Was the CRA obligated, through the Taxpayers Bill of Rights or for any other reason, to provide reasons for its assessment and collections actions and if so, were these obligations met?

IV. Standard of review

[14] Neither party submitted an evaluation of the applicable standard of review, however, the applicable standard of review for discretionary decisions of the CRA is reasonableness (Dingman v Canada (Minister of National Revenue - MNR), 2009 FC 395).

V. Analysis

[15] Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to hear challenges of tax assessments which are solely within the jurisdiction of the Tax Court of Canada (Walker v Canada, 2005 FCA 393 at para 13). Therefore, to the extent the applicants wish to challenge the validity of the reassessments, the application must fail. Moreover, collection actions taken in respect of a valid assessment are lawful (Krahn v Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FC 471 at paras 9 and 10).

[16] To the extent the applicants challenge the CRA's decision to issue the RTP on September 2, 2011, the Court has jurisdiction.

[17] The applicants submit that CRA erred when it issued the RTP, in failing to consider their Notice of Objection filed on June 2, 2010, and on proceeding with the collection measures before the collection commencement-day, pursuant to subsection 225.1(1) of the ITA.

[18] However, given that the applicants' tax debt represents payroll source deductions, which are required to be deducted or withheld and to be remitted or paid, subsections 225.1(1) to 225.1 (4) do not apply, and CRA was entitled to issue the RTP to collect that debt. The notice of objection is not relevant here (Gagne v Minister of Revenue, 2003 FCT 18 at paras 17, 28, and subsections 225.1(6) (b), (d) and (e) of the ITA).

Digitized by Google

[19] Where there is no stay of such a collection action, the CRA can take immediate collection action as long as the assessment is valid (Canada (Minister of National Revenue - MNR) v Vu, 2004 FC 1783 at para 3; aff'd 2005 FC 788).

[20] Lastly, while CRA was not obligated to provide reasons for its assessment and collections action, pursuant to section 152 of the ITA, nevertheless the evidence shows through the affidavits of Lynn Watson sworn February 6, 2012 and Nancy Arnold sworn November 23, 2011, that sufficient reasons were given to the applicants to explain CRA's reassessment and collections (Newfoundland and Labrador Nurses' Union v Newfoundland and Labrador (Treasury Board), 2011 SCC 62). In reviewing that evidence, I gave little or no weight to references to third party conversations contained in the affidavit of Lynn Watson, but did give weight to the Exhibits to her affidavit, and particularly Exhibits A, B and C, relating to Automated Collections and Source Deduction System business records, evidencing communications with Select Travel and Harold Coombs.

[21] For the reasons stated above, this application is dismissed.

JUDGMENT

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that the application for judicial review is dismissed with costs.

Failure to Respond to RTP and Intercept – Payor Becomes Liable

Subsection 244(4) transfers the liability to pay from the tax-debtor to the non-responding payor in the event that the payment is not paid accordingly to the Minister. It automatically causes the payor to become liable up to the amount paid that was referenced in the RTP. This was the issue in The Queen v. National Trust Company[58] where a bank did not take proper steps when cashing in an RRSP and instead remitted the funds to a party other than the Minister. The issue taken by the bank was that they were acting as a trustee of the RRSP funds and that they were not a debtor purportedly what the provision called for. The Fed. Appeal Ct. held:

Issues

[25] This appeal raises two issues: first, whether the respondent was required to comply with the subsection 224(1) requirement issued and served upon it on 1 February 1994; secondly, if so, whether it is liable to pay to the appellant, pursuant to subsection 224(4), the amount it was required to pay to the Receiver General pursuant to the subsection 224(1) requirement.

[26] The learned Tax Court Judge considered the first issue only. Having determined that issue adversely to the appellant, he did not find it necessary to deal with the second.

[27] Although, as will presently appear, the parties directed their submissions and their oral argument to the first issue, it is clear, at least from the points in issue raised by the appellant in Her memorandum, that both issues were at play during argument of the appeal.

Position of the Parties

[58] A-969-96

Digitized by Google

[28] In support of the contention that the Tax Court Judge erred in allowing the respondent's appeal and vacating the Minister's assessment, the appellant made four submissions. First, that at all relevant times subsequent to 24 February 1993, when the GIC matured, the respondent was a "person liable to make a payment" to the tax debtor and the proceeds of the RRSP and GIC which were deposited in the daily interest savings account were "payable" by the respondent to the tax debtor within the plain meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act. Accordingly, the respondent is liable to pay the amount assessed pursuant to subsection 224(4) as a consequence of its failure to comply with the subsection 224(1) requirement of 1 February 1994. Secondly, the plain meaning of subsection 224(1) does not require that there be a debt owing from the respondent to the tax debtor. Thirdly, and in any event, if a debtor-creditor relationship between the tax debtor is required by subsection 224(1), such a relationship existed in this case. Furthermore, a debtor-creditor relationship may co-exist with that of trustee and cestui que trust. Finally, that the true commercial and practical nature of the relationship between the respondent and the tax debtor was not a true trustee- cestui que trust relationship.

[29] For its part, the respondent makes four submissions in support of the judgment in appeal. The respondent contends, firstly, that subsection 224(1) of the Act applies only in circumstances where a debtor- creditor relationship exists between the person "liable to make payment" and the tax debtor; secondly, that, in this case, such a relationship between the respondent and the tax debtor never existed; thirdly, that the respondent was not a person "liable to make payment" to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act; and finally, that the respondent could not comply with the Minister's requirement to pay without incurring liability to the tax debtor for damages for breach of its obligations as a trustee under the memorandum of agreement between the respondent and the tax debtor.

Analysis

[30] In their written memoranda and in oral argument, counsel for the parties attempted to support their submissions by referring to passages from the reasons for judgment in a number of reported decisions in which various courts have pronounced upon the meaning of the phrase "liable to make a payment" and the word "payable" as found in subsection 224(1) of the Act. I will deal with those cases later in these reasons. For the present, however, I need only say that those judicial pronouncements were made in factual contexts different from that with which we are concerned in this appeal.

[31] What we have to decide in this appeal are first, whether the respondent was required to comply with the subsection 224(1) requirement issued on 1 February 1994. Secondly, if it was, whether it is liable to pay to the appellant the amounts described in subsection 224(4) by reason of its failure to comply.

[32] If both questions are answered affirmatively, then the Minister was right in assessing the respondent and the appeal should be allowed. If they are answered negatively, a contrary result would be mandated.

[33] For convenience, I repeat here the text of subsections 224(1) and (4):

[34] In subsection 224(1) Parliament has invested the Minister with a discretion to issue a requirement in writing pursuant to the subsection if the following conditions precedent are satisfied:

the Minister has knowledge or a suspicion, a person is or will be within 90 days liable to make a payment to a tax debtor, and the amount must be payable immediately or in the future.

Digitized by Google

[35] If those conditions are satisfied, the Minister may, in writing, require the person liable to make the payment to pay to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability under the Act, forthwith, if the moneys are payable immediately, or in any other case, as and when the moneys otherwise become payable to the tax debtor.

[36] Subsection 224(4) imposes a penalty for failure to comply with the requirement to pay. The penalty is a civil one and is an amount equal to the amount that is required to be paid pursuant to subsection 224(1). [37] The critical issue for determination is whether the respondent was a person liable to make a payment to the tax debtor on 1 February 1994, when the requirements to pay were served upon it. [38] It must be recalled that on that date, the GIC had matured for almost one year; that the tax debtor had not only issued instructions to the respondent to cancel the plan, but he had also instructed the respondent either to deposit the proceeds in a daily interest savings account or to pay the proceeds directly to him after deducting therefrom withholding tax.

[39] In these circumstances, is the respondent "a person liable to make a payment" to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1)? Secondly, were the proceeds of the GIC "payable" to the tax debtor either immediately or within 90 days?

[40] I deal first with the question of whether the respondent was "a person liable to make payment" to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1).

[41] Friesen v. The Queen[13] instructs that in interpreting sections of the Act, the correct approach is to apply the plain meaning rule. That is the approach I propose to take in construing subsections 224(1) and (4) of the Act.

[42] In his reasons, the Tax Court Judge accepted the contentions of the respondent that subsection 224(1) would have had application only if it were proved that a debtor-creditor relationship exists between the respondent and the tax debtor. He explained his view in the following passage of his reasons[14]:

"Liable" and "liability" point to a debtor status with the person liable to pay being the debtor. A person who is liable to pay has the quality of a debtor and conversely the person to whom he is liable to make the payment is his creditor. In subsection 224(1), the person must be one who is liable to make a payment, not just that such a person will make a payment otherwise than under an obligation to do so. This again gives credence to the view that the person making the payment is a debtor. Here that relationship does not exist as the Appellant was not liable to make any payment to the tax debtor.

[43] He came to this conclusion purportedly because of the reliance he placed upon a passage from the reasons of Stratton C.J., writing for a unanimous court, in DeConinck v. Royal Trust Corp. of Canada[15] I reproduce in full the paragraph of the reported decision at page 183, which the Tax Court Judge emphasized:

In my opinion, it is difficult to distinguish the Morgan Trust Company case from the present one. Moreover, with respect, I am unable to agree with the conclusion of the judge of first instance in the present case that a trustee who holds funds that are fully vested in a cestui que trust would fall within the definition of a person "liable to make a payment" pursuant to subsection 224(1) of the Income Tax Act. Rather it is my opinion that until a cestui que trust requests payment of the proceeds of an from his trustee, which he is able but not bound to do under the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1841), 41 E.R. 482, no moneys are payable to him nor is his trustee liable to make a payment to him within the meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act. Thus, in my view, the Request to Pay pursuant to subsection 224(1) of the Income Tax Act was not sufficient authority for Royal Trust to collapse Mr. DeConinck's R.R.S.P. and pay the net proceeds to Revenue Canada.

[44] In his memorandum and in oral argument, counsel for the respondent placed great reliance on this passage and upon the other authorities cited in his memorandum.[16]

[45] I have read each of these authorities with care. Although instructive on the issue of whether moneys in an RRSP are held in trust, I am of the opinion, nevertheless, that they do not assist the respondent in the circumstances of this case. Firstly, the cases such as Re Bliss, Kirsh and Doyle et al, supra, decided in the context of provincial garnishee legislation, turned on the phrase whether there were "debts owing and accruing due" to the judgment debtor. Secondly, in none of them had the debtor, as here, expressly instructed the trustee to cancel the plan and directed that the proceeds be remitted to him. In all these cases, it might be appropriate to say, as the Tax Court Judge did in this case, that: " 'liable' and 'liability' point to a debtor status with the person liable to pay being the debtor". But that is not what the plain words of subsection 224(1) require.

[46] The ordinary meaning of the word "liable" in a legal context is to denote the fact that a person is responsible at law[17]. Hence, I am in respectful agreement with McLachlin J. (as she then was) when she stated in Discovery Trust Company v. Abbott et al,[18] a case in which a section 224(1) requirement was served upon a trustee, that:

... the demand on third parties [a subsection 224(1) requirement] by which the Crown's claim is made in this case is not confined to a debtor-creditor relationship, as is a garnishee order; it is stated to extend to any case where the trustee is "liable to make a payment to the taxpayer."

[Emphasis added.]

[47] It is my respectful view, therefore, that the Tax Court Judge was wrong in law to limit the phrase "liable to make a payment" only to situations where a debtor-creditor relationship exists. In so doing, he precluded himself from asking the only relevant question when one is confronted with construction of the subsection. It is this: did the respondent have a responsibility at law to make a payment to the tax debtor on 1 February 1994?

[48] For the reasons that follow, I am of the opinion that the respondent did have such a responsibility. [49] It is useful, in my view, to reproduce here portions of the memorandum of agreement which contained the terms and conditions of the tax debtor's RRSP with the respondent[19]:

Your National Trust Company, Retirement Savings Plan consists of this Memorandum of Agreement and an Application when the following conditions have been met:

The Application is completed and signed by you the "Annuitant" or the "Planholder".

The completed and signed Application is accepted by an authorized Officer of National Trust Company as the Plan Trustee (we, us) and

The Application and Memorandum of Agreement are accepted for registration by the taxation authorities under the Income Tax Act (Canada) and any applicable Provincial Income Tax Act (both of which are referred to in this material as "the applicable tax legislation".)

As long as this Plan remains as a Retirement Savings Plan it is a trust as provided by the applicable tax legislation. The assets and retirement income under the plan may not be pledged as collateral, assigned, or otherwise encumbered.

As a planholder, neither you nor any person with whom you are not dealing at arm's-length is entitled to any loan, benefit or special consideration other than those set out in the Income Tax Act (Canada) paragraph 146(2)(C.4).

Contributions made to us for your Plan will be invested (and reinvested from time to time) in accordance with your written instructions in investments offered by us, from time to time, for your plan.

….

The maturity of a Registered Retirement Savings Plan means it's conversion into an investment which will provide a "retirement income" in the form of an annuity and/or a Registered Retirement Income Fund. A retirement income in the form of an annuity must provide for equal annual or more frequent periodic payments until such time as there is a payment in full or partial commutation of that annuity and where such commutation is partial, equal annual or more frequent periodic payments thereafter. In the event of your death, the commuted value of any remaining payments payable under the annuity may be payable to the designated beneficiary or to your estate. Where payments continue after your death such payments in a year may not exceed the aggregate of the payments in a year before your death.

As permitted in the applicable tax legislation, you may, upon thirty (30) days written notice withdraw all or any portion of the assets of your Plan. Any withdrawal is subject to the terms and conditions of the investments in the Plan and is subject to any withholding tax as prescribed in the applicable tax legislation.

[50] There is no issue here that the memorandum of agreement contemplates the establishment of a trust, under which the tax debtor is the settlor and cestui que trust and the respondent is the trustee. The memorandum is also a contract in which the rights and obligations of the parties are specified.

[51] It should be noticed that the memorandum gives the tax debtor as settlor and cestui que trust a right, exercisable at his discretion, to withdraw all or a portion of the trust res on thirty days written notice to the respondent.

[52] On 24 February 1993, the tax debtor wrote to the respondent at its Winnipeg offices in part[20]:

Further to our recent telephone conversation regarding the above noted plan, this will confirm my earlier instructions to you to collapse same, deduct the requisite amount of withholding tax and release the net proceeds directly to me...

[53] After informing the respondent that it should make no payment to Revenue Canada, because, in his view, the RRSP was not amenable to a subsection 224(1) requirement to pay, the letter continued:

Therefore, I trust that my original instructions will be followed. Pending completion of my instructions, please maintain my R.R.S.P. and convert the type of funding from G.I.C. to a daily savings account that would provide the flexibility of collapse on any date which may be selected.

As additional security for you, I am prepared to provide a Bond of Indemnity. Alternatively, I direct application of the Plan proceeds to the following loans:

Digitized by Google

...
As you are aware, the present Requirement to Pay expires on April 27, 1993. Should nothing be done until that date, my instructions are to collapse same on April 28, 1993 and immediately release the net proceeds to me.

[54] Similar instructions were sent to the respondent at its Stratford office by letter dated 8 March 1993[21]. [55] Paragraph 25 of the statement of agreed facts indicates that it was the respondent's practice to accede to requests of the kind made by the tax debtor to collapse the RRSP and to remit the funds to him and that the respondent would have done so if Revenue Canada had not served upon it the requirement to pay. It is true that this practice does not give rise to any legal obligation on the respondent's part to make any payment. However, it is a contextual element in the appeal which one cannot ignore.

[56] The tax debtor's instructions were clear. After the GIC had matured, he wished to have the net proceeds of the RRSP for his own use and enjoyment. With deference to the Tax Court Judge, I am unable to discern any ambiguity or contradiction in those instructions.

[57] The tax debtor had a contractual right, enforceable in law, to have the net proceeds paid to him. The respondent had a corresponding contractual obligation to make the payment requested. In my respectful view, this legal obligation was sufficient to bring the respondent within the scope of the phrase "a person liable to make a payment" to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1).

[58] I find support for this view in the penultimate sentence of the passage from *DeConinck, supra, to which reference was earlier made. I repeat that sentence here for emphasis:

Rather it is my opinion that until a cestui que trust requests payment of the proceeds of an

R.R.S.P. from his trustee, ..., no moneys are payable to him nor is his trustee liable to make a payment to him within the meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act.

[59] See to the same effect, Hutterian Brethren Church of Smoky Lake et al. v. Provincial Treasurer (Alta.) et al[22].

[60] For these reasons, I conclude that the respondent was a person "liable to make a payment" of the proceeds of the RRSP to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act.

[61] I turn now to consider the issue whether the proceeds were "payable" within the meaning of subsection 224(1). In my view this issue is governed by DeConinck, supra, and the decision of this Court in Canada v. Yannelis[23] where Stone J.A., for the Court, said at 636:

The word "payable" is not a term of art. Nor is it defined in the regulations. I do not see that it was used in any special sense. In my view, therefore, it should be interpreted in the light of ordinary dictionary definitions.

[62] and 638:

I have come to the conclusion that the word "payable" in s. 58(8)(b)(i) [of the Unemployment Insurance Act] refers to the point in time when vacation pay is due to a claimant in the sense that he is entitled by his contract of employment or by the general law to have it paid to him and his employer is under an obligation to pay it. In other words, it is payable when a claimant is in a position at law to enforce payment.

Digitized by Google

[63] Based on those authorities, I am of the view that the proceeds of the RRSP were payable to the tax debtor at the time he requested payment following the maturity of the GIC.

[64] Consequently, on 1 February 1994 when he issued the subsection 224(1) requirement and served it upon the respondent, the Minister had satisfied the three conditions precedent to which I have already referred. The requirement to pay was therefore a valid one and the respondent was obliged to comply with it.

[65] The respondent, being a person "liable to make a payment" to the tax debtor within the meaning of subsection 224(1) was required by that subsection to pay the proceeds of the RRSP to the Receiver General on account of the tax debtor's liability. By letter dated 7 February 1994[24], the respondent expressly refused to comply with the requirement to pay.

[66] In these circumstances, since the respondent did not offer any explanation or excuse to avoid the application of subsection 224(4), I conclude that the Minister was right to assess the respondent as he did and that the Tax Court Judge was in error in reaching a contrary conclusion.

[67] In view of the conclusion I have reached on the narrow issues in this appeal, I do not find it necessary to deal with the broader issues raised by the appellant, such as whether the trust established by the memorandum of agreement is a "true trust", whether a trust and a debt may co-exist and a definition of practical and commercial nature of an RRSP.

[68] I would therefore allow the appeal with costs, both here and below, set aside the judgment of the Tax Court, pronounced on 7 November 1996, and affirm the Minister's assessment.

"Julius A. Isaac" C.J.

"I agree.

A.M. Linden J.A."

Though partially dissenting:

[1] I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and, while I agree with him in the result, I prefer to set out my own reasons for so holding. Whereas I am of the view that subsection 224(1) applies to the respondent for the reasons set out by the Chief Justice, I feel it is necessary to clarify what I consider to be the limited application of this subsection to the trustee/cestui que trust relationship as well as express my concern about placing a trustee in the awkward position of being compelled to breach his or her fiduciary duties to a tax debtor in order to comply with a letter of demand issued pursuant to subsection 224(1) of the Act.

[2] As the respondent notes, there is a strong argument to be made that given the equitable obligations placed upon a trustee, in the absence of express language stating that subsection 224(1) applies to a trustee, it should be confined to a creditor-debtor relationship. Such clear wording is found in subsection 153(1)(l) of the Act.[25] For this reason, I would have liked to limit subsection 224(1) to a creditor-debtor relationship as the Tax Court Judge did.

[3] The language of the section is broad and encompasses the trustee/cestui que trust relationship. In my view, to confine it to a creditor-debtor relationship would be to ignore its breadth. In the future, however, when dealing with situations which require a trustee to breach its fiduciary obligation it would be helpful if the legislation set out clearly that this was the intent and the desired result. While the collection of tax is of the utmost importance, so also is the maintenance of the trustee/cestui que trust relationship which, I would note, is what the respondent sought at all times to uphold.

[4] I would also stress that the applicability of this subsection to a trustee is limited. The only reason the respondent falls within the confines of subsection 224(1) is because the tax debtor instructed the trustee to pay the proceeds of his RRSP directly to him and because this instruction occurred within 90 days of the respondent receiving Revenue Canada's demand letter. The respondent, therefore, became a person liable to make a payment to the tax debtor. If the terms of the trust forbid the tax debtor from cashing out the trust, the respondent would not fall within the confines of subsection 224(1). Similarly, if there had been no request for payment made by the tax debtor the respondent would not be required to make a payment as subsection 224(1) would not apply. This reasoning is consistent with the decision of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in DeConinck v. Royal Trust Corporation of Canada [1989] 1 C.T.C. 179 (N.B.C.A.). In that case Stratton C.J.N.B., speaking for the court, states at page 183:

I am unable to agree with the conclusion of the judge of first instance in the present case that a trustee who holds funds that are fully vested in a cestui que trust would fall within the definition of person ,liable to make a payment' pursuant to subsection 224(1) of the Income Tax Act. Rather, it is my opinion that until a cestui que trust requests payments of the proceeds of an R.R.S.P. from his trustee, which he is able to do but not bound to do under the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1841), 41 E.R. 482, no moneys are payable to him nor is his trustee liable to make a payment to him within the meaning of subsection 224(1) of the Act.

[5] The same result was reached in Morgan Trust Corporation v. Dellelce [1985] 2 C.T.C. 370 where Gratton D.J.C. of the Ontario Supreme Court found at page 373:

In my view since the trustee has no moneys which the trustee would be within 90 days liable to pay to the debtor, then there is no obligation to pay any moneys nor to sell any of the assets which the trustee holds on behalf of Dellecle pursuant to the declaration of trust. Consequently, the only obligation in this case is to reply to the Taxation Office in order to avoid liability under subsection 224(4) of the Act. However, had Morgan Trust within the 90 day period become liable to pay moneys to the debtor, then the trustee would have been bound to pay over such moneys to Revenue Canada

[6] I would also note that subsection 224(1) implies that a trustee is only caught under this provision if the payment requested is being paid directly to the tax debtor and not to someone else. The relevant portion of this subsection states: "Where the Minister has knowledge or suspects that a person is, or will be liable within 90 days to make a payment to another person who is liable to make a payment under this Act..." As the Chief Justice notes in his reasons, the tax debtor's instructions in this case were to pay the proceeds directly to him. Thus, the subsection applied.

[7] The unfortunate result in this case, therefore, is that the respondent is liable to the government for refusing to breach what it believes was its fiduciary duty to the tax debtor.

[8] I would reluctantly dispose of the appeal in the manner set out by the Chief Justice. "F.J. McDonald"

In re the Income Tax Act, against A Corporation Steckmar/Steckmar Corporation (Judgment debtor) and Steckmar National Realty And Investment Corporation (Garnishee), 2004 FC 1568, Unspecified "Term" loans and Issues of Payability to be Decided by Court

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] The purpose of the motion at bar is to appeal an order by the prothonotary pursuant to subsection 51(1) of the Federal Court Rules (1998), SOR/98-106 (the Rules). The latter made a final order of garnishment in favour of Her Majesty the Queen against Steckmar National Realty and Investment Corporation (the garnishee), regarding advances which it received without interest over the last 25 years from Corporation Steckmar/Steckmar Corporation (the judgment debtor).

POINT AT ISSUE

[2] Did the prothonotary err in granting Her Majesty the Queen a final order of garnishment against the garnishee?

[3] For the following reasons, I must answer this question in the negative and I will dismiss the appeal from the prothonotary's decision.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[4] Her Majesty the Queen (the creditor) obtained an order of garnishment against Steckmar National Realty and Investment Corporation (the garnishee) to recover a debt of $126,666.39 plus interest owed her by Steckmar Corporation (the judgment debtor).

[5] The judgment debtor advanced sums totalling $4,255,534.41 to the garnishee over a 25-year period. The garnishee, for its part, used part of this amount, namely the sum of $1,929,767, to make a loan to an American company, Marina Development Inc.

[6] The judgment debtor and the garnishee are related companies, since 49% of the judgment debtor's shares are held by Mr. Steckler, 49% by his sister and 2% by his mother, while the shares of the garnishee all belong to Mr. Steckler. The latter is also 100% owner of Marina Development Inc.

[7] Mr. Steckler acted, inter alia, as manager and director of the garnishee, and claimed to be representative of the judgment debtor and garnishee for the purposes of these proceedings.

[8] The loan between the judgment debtor and garnishee was not confirmed in writing, but they agreed it would be repayable when the garnishee's financial situation permitted. To date, only $776,525 has been repaid.

[9] In his examination in 2000, Mr. Steckler said that the garnishee and judgment debtor were in financial difficulty. He admitted that the debt held by the judgment debtor was regarded as a bad debt as the garnishee was unable to repay its debt.

IMPUGNED DECISION

[10] In making the order, the prothonotary relied inter alia on section 453 of the Rules. In the prothonotary's view, payability is an important aspect of the debt as it concerns the time the term expires. Consequently, a dispute regarding the term is sufficient to make section 453 of the Rules applicable.

Summary determination of liability

453. Where a garnishee disputes liability to pay a debt claimed to be due or accruing to the judgment debtor, the Court may summarily determine any question of liability of the garnishee or order that it be determined in such a manner as the Court may direct.

Jugement sommaire quant à l'obligation du tiers

453. Lorsque le tiers saisi conteste l'obligation de payer au débiteur judiciaire la dette échue ou à échoir, la Cour peut juger par procédure sommaire toute question concernant l'obligation du tiers saisi ou ordonner qu'elle soit instruite de la manière qu'elle précise.

[11] The garnishee maintained that the application of section 453 does not give rise to the relief sought by Her Majesty the Queen. The Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to determine the expiry of the term, based on articles 1512 and 1627 of the Civil Code of Quebec (C.C.Q.).

[12] In response to these allegations, the prothonotary indicated that it is well settled that the Federal Court has the power necessary to resolve questions of provincial law incidental to the principal application. He mentioned that, from reading the relevant rules, it is clear that the payability of the debt was incidental to the question of the garnishments.

[13] Additionally, the prothonotary mentioned that section 453 of the Rules allows the Court to determine "any question of liability of the garnishee or order that it be determined in such a manner as the Court may direct".

[14] To determine whether the garnishee's debt was due, the prothonotary analyzed the kind of obligation which existed between the judgment debtor and the garnishee. As the term of that obligation was uncertain, the prothonotary applied article 1512 of the C.C.Q. to fix it.

[15] However, that article provides that upon the application of one of the parties the Court may intervene to fix the term. In the case at bar, the garnishee alleged that Her Majesty the Queen was not a party to the obligation. However, referring to article 1627 C.C.Q., the prothonotary's conclusion was in favour of Her Majesty the Queen.

ANALYSIS

Preliminary question: What are the Federal Court's powers on appeal from a prothonotary's decision?

[16] In Merck & Co. v. Apotex, [2003] F.C.J. No. 1925 (F.C.A.) (QL), at paragraph 19, the Court explained the standard of review applicable to discretionary orders by prothonotaries. This standard had previously been developed in Canada v. Aqua-Gem Investments Ltd., [1993] 2 F.C. 425 (C.A.).

[17] It has been held that a judge hearing an appeal from a prothonotary's discretionary order should not intervene except in the following two cases:
the order deals with a question vital to the final issue of the principal matter;
the order is clearly wrong, in the sense that the exercise of discretion by the prothonotary was based upon a wrong principle or a misapprehension of the facts.

[18] The effect of the prothonotary's order was that the garnishee was directed to pay the sum of $126,666.39. That surely is a question which is vital to the final issue of the principal matter. The Court must redo the analysis de novo in order to exercise its discretion.

What powers does the Federal Court have regarding execution of a judgment?

[19] The Federal Court derives its powers from federal legislation which expressly confers its jurisdiction. In ITO-International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, at 766, the Supreme Court of Canada set out the conditions for this:
there must be a statutory grant of jurisdiction by the federal Parliament;
there must be an existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes the statutory grant of jurisdiction;
the law on which the case is based must be "a law of Canada" as the phrase is used in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[20] I feel that these three criteria are met in the case at bar. In this regard, Her Majesty the Queen first obtained a certificate confirming the amount owed her by the debtor pursuant to subsection 223(2) of the Income Tax Act (I.T.A.). Later, she filed this certificate in the

Digitized by Google

Federal Court to have it registered (subsection 223(3) of the I.T.A.). The result of registration is to give the certificate the same effect as if an order had been made by this Court. The two subsections of the I.T.A. provide the following:

Certificates

An amount payable by a person (in this section referred to as a "debtor") that has not been paid or any part of an amount payable by the debtor that has not been paid may be certified by the Minister as an amount payable by the debtor.

Registration in court

On production to the Federal Court, a certificate made under subsection 223(2) in respect of a debtor shall be registered in the Court and when so registered has the same effect, and all proceedings may be taken thereon, as if the certificate were a judgment obtained in the Court against the debtor for a debt in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by the statute or statutes referred to in subsection 223(1) under which the amount is payable and, for the purpose of any such proceedings, the certificate shall be deemed to be a judgment of the Court against the debtor for a debt due to Her Majesty, enforceable in the amount certified plus interest thereon to the day of payment as provided by that statute or statutes.

Certificat

Le ministre peut, par certificat, attester qu'un montant ou une partie de montant payable par une personne -- appelée "débiteur" au présent article -- mais qui est impayé est un montant payable par elle.

Enregistrement à la cour

Sur production à la Cour fédérale, un certificat fait en application du paragraphe (2) à l'égard d'un débiteur est enregistré à cette cour. Il a alors le même effet que s'il s'agissait d'un jugement rendu par cette cour contre le débiteur pour une dette du montant attesté dans le certificat, augmenté des intérêts courus jusqu'à la date du paiement comme le prévoit les lois visées au paragraphe (1) en application desquelles le montant est payable, et toutes les procédures peuvent être engagées à la faveur du certificat comme s'il s'agissait d'un tel jugement. Dans le cadre de ces procédures, le certificat est réputé être un jugement exécutoire rendu par cette cour contre le débiteur pour une dette envers Sa Majesté du montant attesté dans le certificat, augmenté des intérêts courus jusqu'à la date du paiement comme le prévoit ces lois.

Digitized by Google

[21] As the certificate is deemed to have the same effect as a judgment of the Court, Her Majesty the Queen may make use of Part 12 of the Rules to obtain enforcement of the judgment. In this regard, section 449 of the Rules provides that it is possible to obtain garnishment for payment of the debt recorded in the judgment.

2. Does the Federal Court have jurisdiction to consider questions of provincial law?

[22] In ITO, supra, at 781, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized that the Federal Court has jurisdiction to decide questions of provincial law when such questions are incidental to the principal application:

The Federal Court is constituted for the better administration of the laws of Canada. It is not, however, restricted to applying federal law in cases before it. Where a case is in "bith and substance" within the Court's statutory jurisdiction, the Federal Court may apply provincial law incidentally necessary to resolve the issues presented by the parties . . .

[23] To the same effect, we may refer to Bois de Construction du Nord (1971) Ltée v. Charles Guilbault Inc. (1986), 77 N.R. 392 (F.C.A.):

Parliament's right under s. 101 of the Constituion Act, 1867 to create "additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada" necessarily implies a right to give those courts the power to ensure that their judgments are executed; similarly, Parliament's power over taxation undoubtedly includes that of ensuring that taxes are collected by a provision such as s. 223 of the Income Tax Act (RSC 1952, c. 148, amended by SC 1970-71-72, c. 63). The power which the Court has to enforce its judgments (and orders and certificates, which the law treats like judgments) would be illusory if it did not carry with it a power to resolve problems raised by such enforcement, whether those problems are governed by federal or by provincial law. Thus, a court which has the jurisdiction to order that the property of a debtor be garnished must necessarily have that of ruling on any objections put forward by third parties claiming to own the garnished property.

[24] At page 223 of that judgment, Marceau J.A. said the following:

Just as the Court has the power to rule on a question of provincial law which arises incidentally in the course of exercising its jurisdictional power, so it has the power to dispose of a question of provincial law which arises in exercising its power of execution. Accordingly, it cannot be concluded merely from the fact that in the case at bar the objection made by the respondent to negative declarations raises questions of provincial law that the Court does not have jurisdiction to determine their legitimacy.

[25] A bit further on, he acknowledged there were some limits:

That is not to say that the Court can rule on all arguments which a garnisher may think it proper to make against a garnishee. The Court's jurisdiction in the matter is merely the corollary of its power to garnish debts owed to a debtor against whom it has rendered judgment: it follows that in the case of an objection to a negative declaration the only arguments which the Court can decide are those which seek to establish that, at the time of the garnishment, the judgment debtor had a claim against the garnishee which had the necessary characteristics for it to be garnished.

[26] The Court must now determine whether the question of provincial law is incidental to the principal matter or whether it is a question of substance.

Application of section 449 of Rules

[27] The question of the payability of the debt is a question incidental to a garnishment. The rule is set out in paragraph 449(1)(a) of the Rules:

Garnishment Proceedings

449. (1) Subject to rules 452 and 456, on the ex parte motion of a judgment creditor, the Court may order

449. (1) Sous réserve des règles 452 et 456, la Cour peut, sur requête ex parte du créancier judiciaire, ordonner :

a) que toutes les créances suivantes du débiteur judiciaire dont un tiers lui est redevable soient saisies-arrêtées pour le paiement de la dette constatée par le jugement :

(i) les créances échues ou à échoir dont est redevable un tiers se trouvant au Canada . . .

be attached to answer the judgment debt . . .

[28] Subsections 451(1) and (2) and section 453 determine the Court's powers when various scenarios mentioned occur. They read as follows:

Garnishment order

451. (1) Where a garnishee has not made a payment into court under rule 450 and does not dispute the debt claimed to be due to the judgment debtor, or does not appear pursuant to a show cause order made under subsection 449(1), on motion, the Court may make an order for payment to the judgment creditor or payment into court of the debt.

Ordonnance de paiement

451. (1) Lorsque le tiers saisi n'a pas fait de consignation à la Cour selon la règle 450 et qu'il ne conteste pas la dette dont on le prétend redevable au débiteur judiciaire, ou lorsqu'il ne se présente pas en application de l'ordonnance rendue en vertu du paragraphe 449(1), la Cour peut, sur requête, rendre une ordonnance exigeant le paiement au créancier judiciaire ou la consignation à la Cour.

Order for future payment

(2) Where a debt owed to a judgment debtor is not payable at the time an order is sought under subsection 449(1), an order may be made for payment of the debt to the judgment creditor under subsection (1) as at the time the debt becomes payable.

Dette non exigible

Si la dette à payer au débiteur judiciaire n'est pas exigible au moment où l'ordonnance visée au paragraphe 449(1) est demandée, une ordonnance peut être rendue en vue du paiement de la dette à son échéance au créancier judiciaire selon les modalités prévues au paragraphe (1). Jugement sommaire quant à l'obligation du tiers

Summary determination of liability

453. Where a garnishee disputes liability to pay a debt claimed to be due or accruing to the judgment debtor, the Court may summarily determine any question of liability of the garnishee or order that it be determined in such a manner as the Court may direct.

453. Lorsque le tiers saisi conteste l'obligation de payer au débiteur judiciaire la dette échue ou à échoir, la Cour peut juger par procédure sommaire toute question concernant l'obligation du tiers saisi ou ordonner qu'elle soit instruite de la manière qu'elle précise.

[29] In short, the Federal Court has the power to resolve this kind of question. Before applying these principles to the case at bar, the type of debt existing here must be determined.

Type of obligation existing between judgment debtor and garnishee

[30] The parties were agreed in saying that this was a term obligation. The garnishee acknowledged its debt to the debtor, but the term itself was in dispute, that is, exactly when the obligation became payable. It argued that the Court had jurisdiction under subsection 451(2), not section 453. In its submission, the

Digitized by Google

Court should have made an order limited to requiring the garnishee to pay only when its financial situation allowed it make such a payment. This is what the writers Baudouin and Jobin (J-L. Baudouin and P-G. Jobin, Les Obligations, 5th ed., Cowansville, Les Éditions Yvon Blais inc., 1998) say at pages 452 and 453, No. 573. [TRANSLATION]

A debtor's obligation to pay "when he can" or "when he has the means to do so" is not a potestative conditional obligation, but rather a term obligation: then the Court is sometimes required to intervene to determine whether the term has actually expired.

[31] Article 1512 of the C.C.Q. provides as follows:

1512. Where the parties have agreed to delay the determination of the term or to leave it to one of them to make such determination and where, after a reasonable time, no term has been determined, the court may, upon the application of one of the parties, fix the term according to the nature of the obligation, the situation of the parties and the circumstances.

The court may also fix the term where a term is required by the nature of the obligation and there is no agreement as to how it may be determined.

1512. Lorsque les parties ont convenu de retarder la détermination du terme ou de laisser à l'une d'elles le soin de le déterminer et qu'à l'expiration d'un délai raisonnable, elles n'y ont point encore procédé, le tribunal peut, à la demande de l'une d'elles, fixer ce terme en tenant compte de la nature de l'obligation, de la situation des parties et de toute circonstance appropriée.

Le tribunal peut aussi fixer ce terme lorsqu'il est de la nature de l'obligation qu'elle soit à terme et qu'il n'y a pas de convention par laquelle on puisse le déterminer.

[32] The first paragraph of this article expressly states that the Court may fix the term upon the application of one of the parties. In the second paragraph, two conditions must be met: the obligation must be a term obligation and there must be no agreement as to how this is to be determined.

[33] In the case at bar, the term is [TRANSLATION] "as the garnishee's financial situation permits". There is nothing in the evidence indicating that any procedure was created to decide on the time of repayment. For example, should the garnishee wait until it has accumulated four million before beginning to make payment? Will periodic payments be made? - how often? However, one thing is certain: there was no written agreement to indicate this.

[34] Consequently, I consider that the Court may decide the question of the expiry of the term, relying on article 1512 of the C.C.Q.

[35] The judgment debtor and garnishee maintained that the Court does not have the powers to decide this question of payability, as they argued that article 1512 specifically provides that the Court may fix the term only upon the application of one of the parties. The respondent, for her part, asked the Court to allow her to exercise in the debtor's name the rights and actions which the latter has regarding the garnishee, pursuant to article 1627 of the C.C.Q.:

1627. A creditor whose claim is certain, liquid and exigible may exercise the rights and actions belonging to the debtor, in the debtor's name, where the debtor refuses of neglects to exercise them to the prejudice of the creditor.

However, he may not exercise rights and actions which are strictly personal to the debtor.

1627. Le créancier dont la créance est certaine, liquide et exigible peut, au nom de son débiteur, exercer les droits et actions de celui-ci, lorsque le débiteur, au préjudice du créancier, refuse ou néglige de les exercer.

Il ne peut, toutefois, exercer les droits et actions qui sont exclusivement attachés à la personne du débiteur.

[36] The Court finds in favour of the respondent as in the circumstances, in view of the number of years which have elapsed without requiring the garnishee to repay the loan, the judgment debtor may surely be regarded as negligent.

Oblique action and garnishment

[37] The debtor and the garnishee argued that the creditor should proceed by action instead of a motion by summary proceeding, as we see in the case at bar. Some writers agree that garnishment is a form of oblique action:

[TRANSLATION]

Garnishment is a means of enforcement on a personal action provided for in the second paragraph of article 569, which states that in all cases the creditor may garnish from a third party monies and property owed or belonging to its debtor. It is a special form of oblique action which allows the creditor, under article 1627 of the Civil Code of Quebec, to exercise the debtor's rights and actions. The creditor thus has a practical remedy of a subrogatory nature which puts the debtor's debt in the hands of the court so it can be transferred to the creditor. (B. EMERY and D. FERLAND, Précis de procédure civile du Québec, vol. 2, 3d ed., Cowansville, Les Éditions Yvon Blais Inc., 1997, p. 198.) [Emphasis added.]

[38] The Court is not dealing here with a situation in which a judgment debtor neglected, for example, to sue the garnishee for damages to obtain what was owed. In that scenario, the judgment creditor would have to bring the action against the garnishee itself in the judgment debtor's place.

[39] In the case at bar, the parties admitted that the debt existed, that the debt was a term obligation. The dispute was as to payability. With respect for the contrary view, the Court feels that the solution is to be found in section 453 of the Rules, with the words "where a garnishee disputes liability to pay . . . the Court may summarily determine": Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) v. Gadbois, 2002 FCA 228, [2002] F.C.J. No. 836 (C.A.) (QL). Incidentally, articles 1512 and 1627 C.C.Q. may be used.

Whether debt payable or to become payable [40] Several points must be considered before determining the payability of the debt. As I said earlier, the parties are agreed that this is a term obligation. No written agreement was made to determine when the term expired. The judgment debtor began making advances to the garnishee 25 years ago, without interest. Some $749,330 were repaid in 1995 and 1996 on a loan of $4,255,534.41. The interim order of garnishment was dated in December 1999. The judgment debtor and garnishee are related businesses.

[41] Taking all these factors into account, the Court finds that the debt is due.

[42] Prothonotary Morneau made no error of law or fact requiring the Court's intervention. His analysis was in great detail, painstaking and well supported by precedent and commentary.

[43] Consequently, the motion is dismissed with costs. ORDER

THE COURT ORDERS: the motion is dismissed with costs.

In the Arena of Bankruptcy

When a RTP has been filed on a tax-debtor, who subsequently enters into bankruptcy prior to payment to the Minister, when it has been held that there is no trust impressed on the amount in the recipient's hands, what happens? Does the property of the tax-debtor entirely pass to the trustee or is there a rank of the RTP in respect of that amount that doesn't become the trustee's patrimony. (While argued on the basis of unremitted GST, there is same comment on s. 224(1.2) RTPs.) This was the issue in Toronto Dominion Bank and Her Majesty the Queen[59] where the Appeal Ct. held:

> DECISION OF THE TCC JUDGE
> [18] After having summarized the facts, the TCC judge identified numerous issues that he considered relevant to his analysis, including the following (Reasons, paragraph 2):
> . . . Is there a transfer of the ownership of money following . . . [the Requirement to Pay] and, if so, did the Notice to Stay cancel the right of ownership?
> [19] First, the TCC judge reviewed the decisions by his own court in Wa-Bowden Real Estate Reports Ltd. v. Her Majesty, [1997] T.C.J. No. 582 (Wa-Bowden) and Absolute Bailiffs Inc. v. Canada, [2002] T.C.J. No. 549, both of which support the point of view that subsection 317(3) of the ETA gives the Crown absolute ownership of the moneys identified in the requirement to pay on receipt thereof by the garnishee (Reasons, paragraphs 4 to 6).
> [20] The TCC judge also addressed the decisions of the Courts of Appeal for Ontario and Saskatchewan in Bank of Montreal v. Canada (Attorney General), 66 O.R. (3d) 161 (Bank of Montreal) and Encor Energy Corp. v. Slaferek's Oilfield Services (1983) Ltd., [1995] G.S.T.C. 54, as well as the decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in Canoe Cove Manufacturing Ltd. (Re), 2 GTC 7151, [1994] B.C.J. No. 982, which are all to the same effect (Reasons, paragraphs 7 to 12).
> [21] Third, the TCC judge dealt with the decisions from Quebec, namely Giguère et le Ministre du Revenu du Québec v. Lloyd Woodfine et la Banque Nationale du Canada, [2001] R.J.Q. 2584, Forget et Druker & Associés Inc. v. Le sous-ministre du Revenu du Québec, [2003] J.Q. No. 1026 and De Courval (Reasons, paragraphs 16 to 19). Those decisions conclude that according to subsection 317(3) of the ETA — and the corresponding provisions of the AMR —the BIA prevails in the event of conflict. In this case, since the amounts subject to the requirement to pay were not fully settled at the time of the bankruptcy, there would be a conflict with subsection 70(1) of the BIA.
> [22] The TCC judge refused to follow the trend in Quebec case law. According to him, the Supreme Court's decision in Alberta (Treasury Branches) v. M.N.R., [1996] 1 SCR 963 (Alberta) must be taken into account, which concluded that Parliament's intention in enacting subsection 317(3) was to create a superior garnishing right that may be set up against all (Reasons, paragraphs 20 to 25).
> [23] The TCC judge concluded his analysis as follows (Reasons, paragraph 27):
> Regardless of the fact that subsection 317(3) of the ETA excludes the application of all federal, provincial or other enactments, with the exception of the BIA, that could have an effect on the application of subsection 317(3), it is still clear that its application here does not contradict the provisions of the BIA, especially subsection 70(1) of the BIA, which only applies to a bankrupt's property. So the tax debtor's property in this case became the property of Her Majesty the Queen at the time the notice pursuant to subsection 317(3) of the ETA was sent, which was before the bankruptcy proposal was made to the creditors.

POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

[24] The appellant is relying on the interpretation adopted by the Quebec courts, particularly the reasons of the Court of Appeal of Québec in De Courval, which contain the most complete and exhaustive analysis on the subject. The appellant submits that subsection 70(1) of the BIA trumps the effects of subsection 317(3) of the ETA because, by its language, only executions that are not completely settled by payment are unaffected by bankruptcy. In this case, since that condition was not met when the notice of stay was filed and since subsection 317(3) of the ETA gives priority to the BIA in the event of conflict, subsection 70(1) of the BIA applies.

[25] The appellant submits that the Supreme Court of Canada's recent decision in Quebec (Revenue)
v. Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny, 2009 SCC 49 (Caisse de Montmagny) supports that conclusion. The appellant places particular emphasis on the key finding that deemed trusts for unpaid GST and QST cease to exist at the time of bankruptcy. The Supreme Court thus rejected the tax authorities' argument that at no time could those moneys have been part of the bankrupt's patrimony and, therefore, part of the property to be liquidated in compliance with the settling scheme established under the BIA (Caisse de Montmagny, paragraphs 18 and 28).

[26] The respondent for her part readily admits that any deemed trusts for the GST which remained unpaid by 9161 (the tax debtor) necessarily ceased to exist at the time of bankruptcy. However, the respondent takes the position that this has no bearing on the operation of the recovery measure set out at subsection 317(3) of the ETA, which was not engaged in Caisse de Montmagny.

[27] According to the respondent, it is well settled since the Supreme Court's decision in Alberta that subsection 317(3) of the ETA, like subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA, has the effect of transferring ownership, which transfer occurs upon the garnishee's receipt of a requirement to pay. In the case at bar, the appellant received the requirement to pay before the notice of stay was filed.

[28] The respondent further submits that, the Court of Appeal of Québec's reasoning in De Courval is based on an incorrect interpretation of the phrase "other than the [BIA]" in subsection 317(3) of the ETA. The effect of those words is not to give precedence to the BIA in the event of conflict, but rather to delimit the time during which the power given to the Minister may be exercised (Bank of Montreal, paragraph 14). Thus, the Minister cannot use that power after bankruptcy proceedings have been initiated. In this case, since the power was exercised before the bankruptcy, it remains fully applicable.

ANALYSIS

[29] The question at issue is the following: When the Minister issues a requirement to pay under subsection 317(3) of the ETA before a notice of stay under section 69 of the BIA is filed and, on the date of that notice, the payment owing in respect of the requirement to pay still has not been made (in whole or in part), does subsection 70(1) of the BIA give priority to the assignment of the tax debtor's property over the Minister's requirement to pay?

[30] The answer to that question depends on the meaning to be given to the words "other than the [BIA]" ("à l'exception de la [LFI]" in the French text) as they appear at subsection 317(3) of the ETA.

Digitized by Google

[31] The appellant, relying on the ordinary meaning of the words, contends that this phrase causes subsection 317(3) to apply despite any other enactment, except the BIA. It follows that where a provision of the BIA conflicts with the operation of subsection 317(3), it prevails.

[32] However, the respondent is of the opinion that the phrase has the effect of delimiting the time within which the Minister's power may be exercised, by preventing that power from being exercised after the BIA comes into play. Since, in this case, the requirement to pay was served before the notice of stay was filed, the power was validly exercised.

[33] Thus put, the question asked is one of pure statutory interpretation. In this respect, it is useful to recall that the provisions of any enactment, including tax statutes, must be construed contextually having regard to the statute read as a whole (R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th Ed., 2008, page 276)).

[34] Before we deal with that question, it is appropriate to address the decision of the Court of Appeal of Québec in De Courval to which the appellant devoted all of its submissions. The facts underlying that decision are similar to those at issue here, except with regard to the nature of the unpaid taxes (Quebec Sales Tax or QST) and the statute under which a requirement to pay was issued (the AMR).

[35] In that case, the Deputy Minister of Revenue (the Deputy Minister) argued that the unpaid taxes were part of the deemed trust created in favour of the Crown, that this trust was unaffected by the bankruptcy and that the requirement to pay issued under the provision equivalent to subsection 317(3) of the ETA had the effect of crystallizing a pre-existing right of ownership. In effect, according to the Deputy Minister, the deemed trust meant that at no time could the unpaid taxes (or moneys in lieu thereof) have been part of the bankrupt's patrimon y (De Courval, paragraphs 13 and 14).

[36] Correctly anticipating the Supreme Court's decision in Caisse de Montmagny, the Quebec Court of Appeal rejected the argument that the deemed trust remained in effect despite the bankruptcy (De Courval, paragraphs 28 to 32). Indeed, as the Supreme Court confirmed (Caisse de Montmagny, paragraphs 12 to 29), since the 1992 amendments (the Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, S.C. 1992, c. 27), the deemed trusts established for GST and QST that have been collected but not remitted or recover able under section 222 of the ETA and section 20 of the AMR cease to exist at the time of the bankruptcy (subsection 67(2) of the BIA). This treatment differs from that applicable to deemed trusts pertaining to source deductions under the ITA, a comprehensive pension plan or the federal employment insurance program, which do survive bankruptcy (subsection 67(3) of the BIA).

[37] The Court of Appeal of Québec then dealt with the argument that section 15.3.1 of the AMR (the provision that is equivalent to the part of subsection 317(3) of the ETA providing that the claimed moneys "become" the property of the Crown) had, in any event, effected a complete transfer of ownership to the Crown before the bankruptcy (De Courval, paragraphs 35 to 37). According to the Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court's decision in Alberta, which attributed that effect to subsection 317(3) of the ETA, is distinguishable because, first, section 70 of the BIA was not at issue and, second, the events in Alberta took place before the 1992 amendments came into force (De Courval, paragraph 36). The Court of Appeal also declined to follow the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Bank of Montreal (De Courval, paragraphs 38 and 39) on the ground, amongst others, that it was reached in reliance of the decision of the Supreme Court in Alberta, which is no longer good law.

[38] Aware of the different treatment that the 1992 amendments afforded to source deductions, the Court of Appeal emphasized subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA, which was intended to facilitate recovery of those deductions in the event of default. Unlike subsection 317(3) of the ETA, that provision applies notwithstanding the BIA and, therefore, notwithstanding subsection 70(1) (De Courval, paragraph 37).

[39] According to the Court of Appeal, the right of ownership conferred by subsection 317(3) of the ETA (and section 15.3.1 of the AMR) operates subject to the tax debtor not going bankrupt and, if that happens, subject to the amount claimed by the requirement to pay being settled in full before the bankruptcy. Otherwise, subsection 70(1) of the BIA prevails.

[40] The Court of Appeal drew this conclusion at the end of its reasons (De Courval, paragraph 45):

[TRANSLATION]

. . ., since the notice under section 15 AMR is an "other process" under section 70 BIA, in order for the BIA not to prevail, the payment must be completed before the bankruptcy date. In this case, such a payment was not made and the amounts owing to the Minister were in a deemed trust on the bankruptcy date. In addition, they were held with other moneys from various sources, so they were not held in a real trust. Consequently, subsection 67(2) BIA applies and the moneys held by the Bank are the property of the bankrupt debtor.

[41] The opinion expressed above, which is based on the Court of Appeal's analysis of subsection 317(3) of the ETA, rests entirely on the premise that the phrase ("other than the [BIA]") causes that statute to prevail in the event of a conflict. That premise is held as true without any discussion. Although in its reasons the Court of Appeal did analyze and distinguish numerous aspects of the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Bank of Montreal, it did not address the following conclusion (Bank of Montreal, paragraph 14):

The appellant submits that under [subsection] 70(1) of the [BIA] a receiving order takes precedence over a garnishment that has not been completely executed by payment being made because [subsection] 317(3) of the ETA is made subject to the BIA. Otherwise, the appellant submits the court would not be giving effect to the words, "other than the BIA". The words "other than the BIA" have meaning apart from the interpretation suggested by the appellant. They mean that any [Goods and services taxes (GST)] payments that become due after a receiving order in Bankruptcy has been made no longer can be collected in priority to other creditors. [Emphasis added.]

[42] This interpretation of the words "other than the [BIA]" is not new. It has been expressed previously, in particular by Justice Sarchuk of the Tax Court of Canada in Wa-Bowden (paragraph 5):

... Subsection 317(3) also specifies that its application is subject to the [BIA]. This has been interpreted in a number of instances to mean that where monies were immediately due and owing prior to the date of bankruptcy, those monies are subject to the application of the Act, but where service of the Requirement occurs after the date of bankruptcy, or where the amount at issue was not immediately due and payable prior to the date of bankruptcy, any monies otherwise payable in the latter two instances are not available to the Respondent. [internal citations omitted] [Emphasis added.]

Adopting that interpretation, Justice Sarchuk found that the moneys subject to the requirement to pay became the property of the Crown on the garnishee's receipt of the requirement and, therefore, were no longer the tax debtor's property at the time of the ensuing bankruptcy (Wa-Bowden, paragraph 6).

[43] Therefore, the issue surrounding the interpretation of the words "other than the [BIA]" remains unresolved.

[44] The interpretation proposed by the appellant according to which the BIA prevails in the event of a conflict seems, at first glance, to stem from the natural meaning of the words.

[45] However, the respondent asks this Court to consider the legislative and jurisprudential context surrounding the adoption of subsection 317(3) in 1990 and the amendment to subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA in that same year, which enactments were intended to confirm, once and for all, the Crown's right of ownership over the amounts subject to a requirement to pay. From that angle, the Supreme Court's decision in Alberta is of particular interest since it sets out the precise state of the law in 1990, when those provisions were adopted.

[46] In that case, the Supreme Court considered the legislative history surrounding subsections 224(1.2) of the ITA and 317(3) of the ETA and, in particular, Parliament's attempts, until then fruitless, to give the Crown right of ownership having priority over all computing claims (Alberta, paragraphs 11 to 14). Both Justice Cory, writing for the majority, and Justice Major, dissenting (but not on this point) expressed the view that the language of subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA, as amended in 1990, was clear enough to give the Crown the right of ownership which had been sought (the amended text and the text it replaced are reproduced at paragraphs 12 and 13, above). Both judges also expressed the view that subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA and subsection 317(3) of the ETA were, in that regard, identical (Alberta, paragraph 1, Justice Cory; and paragraph 58, Justice Major). Among other things, each concluded that on receipt of the requirement, the claimed moneys "become" the property of Her Majesty.

[47] Justice Major, after having specified that he would focus his analysis on subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA rather than subsection 317(3) of the ETA "[f]or the sake of convenience" (idem), wrote the following (Alberta, paragraphs 65, 66 and 69):

Apparently in order to deal with the competing lines of authority as to whether [subsection] 224(1.2) was sufficient to grant a priority to the [Minister of National Revenue] MNR, Parliament amended the section in 1990 by adding the following to the end of the section:

. . . and on receipt of that letter [i.e. the garnishment summons] by the particular person, the amount of those moneys that is required by that letter, to be paid to the Receiver General shall, notwithstanding any security interest in those moneys, become the property of Her Majesty and shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to any such security interest.

This 1990 amendment was made to both the [ITA] and the relevant provisions of the [ETA]. The three trial decisions in the cases at issue in these appeals are principally concerned with the issue of whether this amendment constituted the "something further" which [Lloyds Bank of Canada c. International Warranty Co., (1989), 64 Alta. L.R. (2d) 340 (B.R.), overturned by (1989), 68 Alta. L.R. (2d) 356 (C.A.) (Lloyds Bank)] had held was necessary to transfer the property interest in the funds to the MNR or to grant a priority to the MNR.

69. I agree with Forsyth J. that the 1990 amendments to the [ITA] and the [ETA] were sufficient to provide the "something further" which the Alberta Court of Appeal thought to be necessary in Lloyds Bank. . . .
[Emphasis added.]

No one takes issue with the fact that this "something further" resulted in the Crown becoming the owner of the moneys subject to the requirement upon the garnishee's receipt of the requirement to pay (Alberta, paragraphs 5 and 6).
[48] According to the respondent, it is the time when this ownership-transferring power may be exercised which Parliament had in mind when it provided, in the case of subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA, that it applies "[n]otwithstanding . . . the [BIA]" and, in the case of subsection 317(3) of the ETA, despite any enactment "other than the [BIA]". While Parliament intended that the unpaid source deductions identified at subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA be subject to this power at all times — both before and after bankruptcy — Parliament also intended that the equivalent power under subsection 317(3) only be exercised before bankruptcy. The respondent submits that this is the way in which the words "Notwithstanding . . . the [BIA]" and "other than the [BIA]" must be understood. [49] In my view, that is the correct interpretation. Returning to 1990, deemed trusts had the same effect whether they pertained to source deductions or GST. Both took effect at the time of the default and survived bankruptcy (see paragraph 67(1)(a) of the BIA, as it read before the 1992 amendments), such that the moneys held in those trusts could not, at any time, become part of the tax debtor's patrimony. Therefore, even if a requirement to pay was issued at a time which coincided with the tax debtor's bankruptcy, there was no conflict possible between the BIA and the right of ownership conferred upon the Crown under subsection 317(3) of the ETA, or between the BIA and the right of ownership granted under 224(1.2) of the ITA. It was only after the 1992 amendments that this state of affairs changed and that deemed trusts for unpaid GST ceased to have effect upon the tax debtor's bankruptcy (Caisse de Montmagny, paragraphs 12 to 16).
[50] In this context, it cannot be said that the words "other than the [BIA]" were inserted into subsection 317(3) to give precedence to the BIA in the event of conflict since no conflict was possible. Rather, keeping in mind the principle according to which Parliament does not speak in vain, it seems that the purpose of this phrase was to prevent the power set out at subsection 317(3) from being exercised after bankruptcy.
[51] Subsection 317(3) could not be read otherwise in 1990 and was deliberately left intact when the BIA was amended in 1992, as was subsection 224(1.2) of the ITA. Since the power set out at that subsection may not be exercised after bankruptcy, it is in keeping with the spirit of those amendments to the effect that only source deductions were special and were to be given priority after bankruptcy. This explains why the exercise of the power set out at subsection 224(1.2) is not subject to that limitation and why, since the amendments, the BIA stipulates that bankruptcy does not affect the exercise of that power (subsection 86(3) of the BIA).

[52] Aside from that important difference, the powers set out at subsections 317(3) of the ETA and 224(1.2) of the ITA, when validly exercised, both have the effect of transferring ownership to the Crown of the moneys subject to the requirement to pay on receipt thereof by the garnishee (Alberta, above).

[53] Since the requirement to pay was received by the appellant before the notice of stay was filed, the TCC judge rightly concluded that the Crown became the owner of the moneys required before the bankruptcy occurred and that those moneys were therefore not part of the tax debtor's patrimony at the time of the bankruptcy. Consequently, the appellant had an obligation to pay the amount required and, having failed to do so, is personally liable for making that payment.

[54] I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

This was an appeal from a Trial Division decision dismissing a motion for summary judgment in which the taxpayer claimed that the Minister of National Revenue was not entitled to set-off unpaid income taxes against Canada Pension Plan retirement benefits payable to him. In March 1993, the Minister executed a form of "statutory set-off" requiring that $75,245.22 be retained by way of deduction or set-off, for taxes owing for the years 1986 to 1991, from amounts payable to the taxpayer under the Canada Pension Plan . Although not admitted in pleadings, the Crown admitted in affidavit evidence that the taxpayer was under no liability to pay taxes for the taxation years 1986 to 1991 because he was not a resident of Canada in any of those years. The Crown did, however, maintain that Revenue Canada had not at any time released him from, or forgiven him for unpaid taxes for the taxation years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979 inclusive. The Motions Judge ruled that subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan does not affect the right of deduction or set-off in section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act and concluded that the dispute raised a genuine issue for trial, which could not be decided on summary judgment. There were two principal issues in this appeal:
1) whether the Crown was entitled to set-off unpaid income taxes against retirement benefits payable to the appellant, and 2) if so, whether the 1995 amendment to the Canada Pension Plan prevented the Crown from exercising its right of set-off.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed.
Section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act authorizes the Minister to require retention by way of deduction or set-off "where a person is indebted to Her Majesty". Although the set-off may have been executed with the debt thought to exist for the 1986-1991 taxation years in mind, it was not by its terms limited to that particular debt. In this case the statutory set-off broadly applied to any benefits payable to the appellant under the Canada Pension Plan for any unpaid income taxes including that owing for the 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979 taxation years, up to the limit of $75,245.22 specified therein. This "set-off" is not equivalent in law to "attachment" as understood under the law of Ontario where the set-off was executed. This is a set-off at law as distinguished from equitable set-off. "Attachment" refers to an attachment under legal process while "set-off", in the context of section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act , neither depends on nor requires legal process for its execution. The statute itself provides the necessary authority. The word "attached" in subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan signifies something that is given to or exercised by a third party rather than by the Crown. The benefits payable to the appellant were not insulated from set-off on the basis that they constitute trust funds in the hands of the Crown under paragraph 108(3)(a) of the Canada Pension Plan. It is not the contributions which are paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund that are subject to the statutory set-off but the "benefits" which are or become "payable" to a beneficiary under the Canada Pension Plan . This statute manifests no intention to create a trust either in respect of contributions or benefits. The role of the Crown with respect to monies credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account or to benefits not yet paid is that of an administrator in the exercise of its governmental functions rather than that of a trustee.
Appellant's submission was that the provisions of subsection 65(1.1) of the Canada Pension Plan, which became effective on July 13, 1995, prohibits the setting-off of benefits against a debt for unpaid taxes because such a set-off amounts to "seizure and execution". The new subsection was not intended to bind the Crown and to override the provisions of section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act . If Parliament had intended to nullify the right of set-off in section 224.1, it could easily have done so by express language in subsection 65(1.1). "Set-off" is a quite different legal concept than either "seizure" or "execution" at common-law or in equity. "Seizure and execution" in subsection 65(1.1) are not intended to include a set-off so as to nullify the rights conferred on the Minister under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act . The Crown's right of set-off against the appellant was not affected by the 1995 amendment. As moving party for summary judgment under subsection 432.2(1) of the Rules, the appellant failed to bring forth evidence showing that there was no genuine issue for trial. The respondent has satisfied the requirement of that subsection in showing that there was a genuine issue for trial. The Motions Judge did not err in dismissing the appellant's motion for summary judgment.

Digitized by Google

The following are the reasons for judgment rendered in English by Stone J.A.: By a motion brought in this action the appellant seeks relief by way of summary judgment on the basis that, at law, the Minister of National Revenue is not entitled to have set-off against Canada Pension Plan [R.S.C., 1985, c. C-8] retirement benefits payable to him for any alleged debt for income taxes owing under the Income Tax Act [R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1]. The learned Motions Judge, Rothstein J., dismissed the motion [reflex, [1995] 1 C.T.C. 220]. In argument before this Court the appellant relies as well on a recent amendment of the Canada Pension Plan, from which he argues that the Minister is prohibited from continuing to set-off any benefits payable from and after the date the amendment became law.
A form of "statutory set-off" of March 31, 1993, directed to the "Canada Pension Plan, Income Security Programs, Health & Welfare Canada", was executed by the Director" Taxation, Toronto District Office of the Department of National Revenue Taxation. It reads in part as follows:
PURSUANT to one or more of the following acts, the undersigned hereby requires that $75,245.22 be retained by way of deduction or set-off from such amounts as may be or may become payable by you to the taxpayer whose name appears above, at the rate of an amount each month equal to 100 per centum of each amount which may be or may become payable to the said taxpayer, in respect of the transaction(s) detailed below plus any other amounts that may be or may become payable to the taxpayer, and where the taxpayer is an employee, any amount payable upon termination of employment to such taxpayer by Her Majesty in Right of Canada until such time as this requirement is withdrawn or the amount owed by the taxpayer has been satisfied.
THIS REQUIREMENT has been executed under one or more of the following Acts:
the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

Requisition for payment is to be forwarded monthly in accordance with interdepartmental settlement procedures and must be identified with Intra Number, Creditor Account Code, the taxpayer's name, address, Social Insurance Number, where applicable and Account Number.

The appellant alleges that in April 1992 the Minister advised him to file returns for the taxation years 1986 to 1991, inclusive, in order to be eligible for Canada Pension Plan benefits. He also alleges that prior to filing for those years he "did not owe any monies". He further alleges that he began receiving benefits of $372.30 per month in August 1992. By paragraphs 8 and 9 of his pleading, the appellant alleges as follows:

In or about the month of May 1993 the Defendant seized the plaintiff's Canada pension Plan retirement payments allegedly for taxes owing for the years 1986 through 1991. The last of such payments was received by the plaintiff in April 1993, and there were no taxes owing.

The plaintiff alleges that the seizure of his Canada Pension Plan Benefits is invalid and void under the Canada Pension Plan Act, R.S.C. 1985, chap C-8, as amended, in that:

It is an assignment, charge, attachment, anticipation or giving or taking as security of the plaintiff's benefits in contravention of section 65: and

It is not an authorized payment under section 108. Paragraph 14 of this pleading contains the following allegation:

14. The plaintiff alleges that the Canada Pension Plan Act is a contributory, earnings related plan that offsets loss of income due to retirement, disability and death, and its funds are held in trust by the defendant for the benefit of the contributors one of whom was the plaintiff.

The appellant acknowledges in paragraphs 16 and 18 of his pleading that his income for the years 1973 and 1974 was reassessed by Revenue Canada and that he appealed. By paragraph 19, he alleges:

19. In or about the year 1988 the defendant released and forgave the plaintiff from any debt owing by him to Her for taxes to date, and the appeals were not pursued.

The appellant goes on in paragraphs 20 to 26 to allege that the Minister illegally seized monies standing in his trust account, that the respondent admitted "the impropriety of their actions" and that in or about 1988 "the defendant released and forgave the plaintiff from any debt owing to him to Her for taxes to compensate for the harm injury and damage caused to the plaintiff and his family by their illegal actions". He also alleges certain infringements and denials of rights and freedoms guaranteed by sections 7, 8, 12, 15 and 26 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms [being Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]]. These allegations were not pursued in argument before this Court.

The respondent raises the following defences in paragraphs 9-13 of the statement of defence:

As a result of the aforementioned assessments for taxation years 1986 to 1991 taxes were levied against the Plaintiff in the amount of $70,178.51, including penalties and interest.

After unsuccessful attempts to contact the plaintiff in order to collect the aforementioned debt owing to Her Majesty the Queen, the Minister of National Revenue, pursuant to s. 224.1 of the Income Tax Act, required the detention by way of deduction or set-off in the amount of $75,245.22 which was the amount then owing, including accrued interest, from the amounts payable to the Plaintiff under the Canada Pension Plan. The requisition for this statutory set-off was sent to Health and Welfare Canada on March 31, 1993 and notice was sent to the plaintiff by mail on the same day at his last recorded mailing address.

Pursuant to the statutory set-off required by the Minister of National Revenue, the full amount of the retirement pension payable to the Plaintiff was retained commencing in May, 1993 and continuing to the present date.

The Defendant states that the set-off required by the Minister of National Revenue was and is valid and is not precluded by any provision of the Canada Pension Plan, and, in particular, s. 65. The Defendant states that the set-off is not an assignment, charge, attachment, anticipation or giving or taking as security within the meaning of the said provision. Moreover, the set-off does not constitute and (sic) additional charge to the Canada Pension Plan account and therefore s. 108 of the Canada Pension Plan has no application. The Defendant accordingly denies paragraph 9 of the Plaintiff's Statement of Claim.

With respect to paragraph 14 of the Statement of Claim, the Defendant denies that the monies in the Canada Pension Plan account are held in trust by the Crown for the benefit of contributors to or recipients of money from the account.

Paragraphs 20 and 21 of this pleading allege as follows:

On or about November, 1993 Revenue Canada Taxation received from the Plaintiff T1 Adjustment Requests dated October 18, 1993 with respect to his individual tax returns for taxation years 1986 to 1991 inclusive. The Plaintiff thereby seeks an adjustment on the basis that he was a non-resident of Canada during the said years, that none of the income reported in those tax returns was earned in Canada or received from Canadian sources and that he had filed the returns in order to be eligible for Canada Pension Plan benefits. The said T1 Adjustment Requests have not to date been disposed of and the Defendant, therefore, denies the allegations in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Statement of Claim. In the event that the Plaintiff's requests are granted, there would be no tax liability by the Plaintiff during those taxation years as currently being set-off in the amount of $75,245.22.

The Plaintiff has a previous unpaid debt to the Defendant for unpaid taxes for taxation years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979 inclusive. The Defendant denies that the Plaintiff was released and forgiven for this debt as alleged in paragraph 19 of the Statement of Claim. On or about December 21, 1988 the outstanding balance then owing in the amount of $117,400.74 was deleted by Revenue Canada as being uncollectible. The debt with accrued interest remains outstanding and may be re-instated for collection at any time whenever circumstances indicate that collection is possible. The Defendant further denies the allegations of fact contained in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the Statement of Claim in this regard.

In paragraph 23, the respondent alleges that the appellant did not pursue his assessment appeals and denies "that the appeals were not pursued because the debt was forgiven by Revenue Canada" as alleged by the appellant in paragraph 19 of his pleading. By its affidavit evidence, however, the respondent admits that the appellant is under no liability to pay any taxes under the Income Tax Act for the taxation years 1986 to 1991 because he was not a resident of Canada in any of those years, but that "Revenue Canada did not at anytime release the plaintiff from, or forgive him for" unpaid taxes for the taxation years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979 inclusive[1] even though the debt was "deleted by Revenue Canada Taxation as uncollectible in 1988".[2] This evidence is not controverted.

Shortly after the defence was filed, the appellant launched the motion for judgment upon the grounds set forth in the notice of motion, which read:

Pursuant to Rules 432.1(1) and 432.3, in that the seizure of the Canada Pension Plan Benefits by the Defendant is prohibited by section 65 of the Canada Pension Plan Act R.S.C. 1985, chapt C-8 and amendments thereto, and is null and void;

Pursuant to Rules 432.1(1) and 432.3, in that the payment of the plaintiff's Canada Pension Plan Benefits to the Defendant or to its behalf is prohibited by section 108 of the Canada Pension Plan Act and is null and void;

Pursuant to Rules 341, 432.1(1) nd (sic) 432.2, in that the Defendant has admitted that the debt upon which the Plaintiff's Canada Pension Plan Benefits were seized by it is not owing by the plaintiff to the defendant and is therefore not a debt upon which the said Benefits could be so seized.

Rules 341, 432.1(1) [as enacted by SOR/94-41 , s. 5] and 432.3 [as enacted idem] of the Federal Court Rules [C.R.C., c. 663] read:

Rule 341. A party may, at any stage of a proceeding, apply for judgment in respect of any matter upon any admission in the pleadings or other documents filed in the Court, or in the examination of another party, or in respect of which the only evidence consists of documents and such affidavits as are necessary to prove the execution or identity of such documents, without waiting for the determination of any other question between the parties.

Rule 432.1 (1) A plaintiff may, after the defendant has filed a defence, or earlier with leave of the Court, and at any time prior to the fixing of the time and date for trial, make a motion to a judge, with supporting affidavit material or other evidence, for summary judgment on all or part of the claim in the statement of claim.

Rule 432.3 (1) Where a judge is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to a claim or defence, the judge shall grant summary judgment accordingly.

Where a judge is satisfied that the only genuine issue is the amount to which the moving party is entitled, the judge may order a trial of that issue or grant summary judgment with a reference to determine the amount.

Where a judge is satisfied that the only genuine issue is a question of law, the judge may determine the question and grant summary judgment accordingly.

Where a judge decides that there is a genuine issue with respect to a claim or defence, the judge may nevertheless grant summary judgment in favour of any party, either upon an issue or generally, unless the judge is unable on the whole of the evidence to find the facts necessary to decide the questions of fact or law; or the judge considers that it would be unjust to decide the issues on the motion for summary judgment.

Where a motion for summary judgment is dismissed, either in whole or in part, a judge may order the action, or the issues in the action not disposed of by summary judgment, to proceed to trial in the usual way, but upon the request of any party, a judge may order an expedited trial under rule 327.1.

The appellant does not actually seek a judgment pursuant to Rule 341 but, rather, relies on admissions of the kind referred to in that Rule to support his motion for summary judgment.

In dismissing the motion, the Motions Judge dealt with the issue of whether a debt for unpaid income taxes was owing at the time the statutory set-off was executed, and concluded at page 221 of his reasons:

On this motion, it was agreed by the parties that no income tax moneys were owing by the plaintiff for the years 1986 to 1991. The seizures were originally effected to recover a debt owed for this period. It has been determined that the plaintiff was not a resident of Canada during that period. Nonetheless, the defendant says that the plaintiff owes more than $117,000 in income tax from a period during the 1970s and that the Canada Pension Plan moneys seized should apply to this debt. The plaintiff says he was released from this obligation or that the obligation has been forgiven. On this dispute there is a genuine issue for trial and it cannot be decided on summary judgment.

He dealt next with the appellant's submission that the Canada Pension Plan benefits are insulated from the set-off by virtue of subsection 65(1) and paragraph 108(3)(a) of that statute. At pages 222- 223 of his reasons, the Motions Judge stated:

Section 224.1 [of the Income Tax Act] uses the words "retention by way of deduction or set-off. . .out of any amount that may be or become payable to such person by Her Majesty in right of Canada." Subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan refers to assignments, charges, attachments and security. A deduction or set-off under section 224.1 is between Her Majesty on the one hand and the recipient of moneys from Her Majesty on the other. The assignment, charge, attachment, or security envisaged by subsection 65(1) is to be given to or exercised by a third party, pertaining to moneys payable by Her Majesty as a benefit under the Canada Pension Plan to the recipient thereof. Subsection 65(1) does not affect the right of deduction or set-off in section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act.

Paragraph 108(3)(a) of the Canada Pension Plan provides that all amounts payable under the Canada Pension Plan on account of benefits shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charged to the Canada Pension Plan Account. Section 224.1 allows the Minister to retain, by way of deduction or set-off, amounts that may be or become payable to a person by Her Majesty. Clearly the amounts that are payable to a person in respect of the Canada Pension Plan are amounts that may be retained by way of deduction or set-off by the Minister under section 224.1.

The plaintiff's arguments, based on subsection 65(1) and paragraph 108(3)(a) of the Canada Pension Plan are without merit. This finding is without prejudice to any other basis for claim the plaintiff may have. The matter is otherwise inappropriate to be decided by way of summary judgment and shall be referred to trial.

The statutory provisions in issue are section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1, as amended:

224.1 Where a person is indebted to Her Majesty under this Act or under an Act of a province with which the Minister of Finance has entered into an agreement for the collection of the taxes payable to the province under that Act, the Minister may require the retention by way of deduction or set-off of such amount as the Minister may specify out of any amount that may be or become payable to the person by Her Majesty in right of Canada.

and subsection 65(1) and paragraph 108(3)(a) of the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-8, as amended:

65. (1) A benefit shall not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, and any transaction purporting to assign, charge, attach, anticipate or give as security a benefit is void.

108. . . .

There shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charged to the Canada Pension Plan Account all amounts payable under this Act as or on account of benefits or otherwise;

The appellant also relies on an amendment of the Canada Pension Plan adopted by section 29 of S.C. 1995, c. 33:

29. Subsections 65(2) and (3) of the Act are replaced by the following:

(1.1) A benefit is exempt from seizure and execution, either at law or in equity.

This amendment came into force July 13, 1995.

The principal issues in this appeal are twofold. The first is whether by law the Crown is entitled to a set-off of retirement benefits payable to the appellant against a debt for unpaid income taxes. The second is whether, if the Crown is so entitled, the 1995 amendment of the Canada Pension Plan prohibits the Crown from setting-off those benefits against a debt for unpaid income taxes from and after the date that amendment came into force. These issues must be analyzed with the relief sought on the motion in mind that of securing a judgment before trial pursuant to Rule 341 or Rules 432.1 to 432.7 [as enacted by SOR/94-41 , s. 5] of the Federal Court Rules .

I shall deal with the issues in the order in which they were presented in argument at the hearing. Crown's right of set-off prior to July 13, 1995

The appellant submits that the statutory set-off, if valid, cannot be used to set-off retirement benefits against any debt for unpaid income tax owing for any taxation year other than the taxation years 1986 to 1991, both inclusive. He then contends that the set-off is expressly prohibited by subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and that, in any event, it cannot be effected against monies held in trust by the Crown pursuant to the provisions of that statute.

A summary judgment under Rules 432.1 to 432.7, is available in a proper case. Under paragraph 341(a) of the Rules, judgment may be sought "upon any admission" contained in one of the source documents therein mentioned. In the present case, the respondent did admit that the International Audit Section of Revenue Canada, Toronto District Office, "has deemed Mr. Mintzer to be a non- resident of Canada for taxation purposes for the taxation years 1986 to 1991, inclusive", that the appellant was not required to file income tax returns for those years and that his arrears balance would be adjusted accordingly "to reflect that the particular debt thought to have arisen from these years does not exist".[3] However, it states that a decision was made "to apply any credit balance resulting from the above adjustments, to set-off any subsequent Canada Pension Plan benefits that Mr. Mintzer receives following appropriate adjustments, against the aforementioned debt of Mr. Mintzer in the amount of $117,400.34 owing by him from the taxation years 1973, 1974, and 1976 to 1979".[4]

The appellant submits that he is entitled to judgment under the Rules on the basis of these admissions. He contends that as the statutory set-off expressly required that the sum of "$75,245.22" be retained by way of deduction or set-off from such amounts as may be or may become payable to him under the Canada Pension Plan . He argues that as he owes no taxes for any of the 1986 to 1991 taxation years, the statutory set-off cannot be applied to benefits in respect of a debt for any taxes he may owe for the taxation years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979. I have difficulty in accepting this contention. Section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act authorizes the Minister to require retention by way of deduction or set-off "[w]here a person is indebted to Her Majesty". Although the statutory set-off may have been executed with the debt thought to exist for the 1986 to 1991 taxation years in mind, it is not by its terms limited to the collection of that particular debt. It requires only that the amount of "$75,245.22" be retained by way of deduction or set-off and states that it "has been executed under . . . the Income Tax Act", without identifying a particular taxation year or years for which the debt is owing. It seems to me that the statutory set-off broadly applies to any benefits payable to the appellant under the Canada Pension Plan for any unpaid income taxes including that owing for the 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979 taxation years, up to the limit of $75,245.22 specified therein unless the statutory set-off should earlier be withdrawn.

The appellant next argues that by the statutory set-off the Minister has "attached" the benefits in question contrary to subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan . I do not agree. In my view, this "set-off" is not equivalent in law to "attachment" as understood under the law of Ontario where the set-off was executed. What we have here is set-off at law as distinguished from equitable set-off.[5] By subsection 224.1 of the Income Tax Act the Minister is broadly entitled to a deduction or set-off according to its provisions. In my view, however, "attachment" and "set-off" are distinct legal concepts. As I understand it, "attachment" refers to an attachment under legal process. See e.g. W. C. Fast Enterprises Ltd. v. All-Power Sports (1973) Ltd., Astrope and Royal Bank of Canada 1981 ABCA 178 (CanLII), (1981), 29 A.R. 483 (C.A.), at pages 497-498, where McGillivray, C.J.A. relied, inter alia, on the opinion of Sedgewick J. in Paterson (D.S.) & Co. Ltd., Re, [1931] O.R. 777 (S.C. in bankruptcy), at page 780, that the words "seizure or attachment" in an Ontario statute were "intended to cover exercise of judicial power".[6] I do not see that "set-off", in the context of section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act , depends on or requires legal process for its execution. The statute itself provides the necessary authority. No resort to legal process is required. I respectfully agree with the Motions Judge that the word "attached" in subsection 65(1) of the Canada Pension Plan signifies something that is given to or to be exercised by a third party rather than by the Crown. The subsection appears to be aimed at ensuring that benefits payable under the statute be for the beneficiary's own use by preventing that person from alienating or encumbering them. The exception contained in subsection 65.1(1), allowing an assignment in favour of a spouse, supports this contention. That subsection reads:[7]

65.1 (1) Notwithstanding subsection 65(1) but subject to this section, the Minister may approve the assignment of a portion of a contributor's retirement pension to his spouse, on application in prescribed manner and form by the contributor or his spouse, if the circumstances described in either subsection (6) of (7) exist.

But for this subsection the prohibitions in subsection 65(1) would clearly prevent such an assignment. I can find no indication from the language of the subsection that it was meant to prevent the Minister from exercising the power conferred by section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act.

I am also of the view that the benefits payable to the appellant are not insulated from set-off on the basis that they constitute trust funds in the hands of the Crown under paragraph 108(3)(a) of the Canada Pension Plan. Subsection 62(2) in Part II of that statute indicates at what point in time benefits are deemed to become payable to a beneficiary. It reads:

62. . . .

(2) For the purposes of this Act, where a benefit is payable under this Part commencing with any month, the benefit shall be deemed to have become payable at the beginning of that month.

Subsection 108(1) of the Canada Pension Plan establishes in the accounts of Canada "an account to be known as the Canada Pension Plan Account". Subsection 108(2) [as am. by S.C. 1995, c. 33, s. 46] requires specified amounts and interest to be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and be credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account. Pension "benefits" are, by paragraph 108(3)(a), to be "paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charged to the Canada Pension Plan Account".

On the basis of section 108 the appellant contends that the "benefits" are held in trust by the Crown and cannot be set-off against a debt for unpaid taxes. In my opinion this argument is without merit. It is not the contributions which are paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund that are subject to the statutory set-off but the "benefits" which are or become "payable" to a beneficiary under the Canada

Pension Plan* . It seems to me that the "benefits"[8] as such would no longer be subject to any trust for which the appellant contends, if a trust there be. I am not satisfied, in any event, that the statute manifests an intention to create a trust either in respect of contributions or benefits.[9] As I read the Canada Pension Plan the role of the Crown with respect to monies credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account or to benefits not yet paid, is that of an administrator in exercise of its governmental functions rather than of a trustee.

Crown's right of set-off after July 13, 1995

The appellant submits that the provisions of subsection 65(1.1), which became effective on July 13, 1995, prohibits the setting-off of benefits against a debt for unpaid taxes because such a set-off amounts to "seizure and execution". The respondent advances three arguments against the words "seizure" and "execution" being construed so as to override the right of set-off under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act . First, the amending statute does not purport to expressly qualify the right of set-off under section 224.1, as would have been the case had subsection 65(1.1) of the Canada Pension Plan been introduced with such words as: "Notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute", and that the absence of some such words indicates an intention that the right of set-off be in no way affected by the amendment. Secondly, that just as "set-off" and "attachment" are distinct legal concepts, so too are "set-off", "seizure" and "execution". Finally, by virtue of section 17 of the Interpretation Act , R.S.C., 1985, c. I-21, the Crown is not bound by the restrictions in the 1995 amendment. That section reads:

17. No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except as mentioned or referred to in the enactment.

The respondent argues that nothing in the 1995 amendment manifests an intention to bind the Crown, upon any of the tests laid down in Alberta Government Telephones v. Canada (Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission), 1989 CanLII 78 (SCC), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 225, at pages 270-283, which held that the Crown will be bound by express words in a statute or by a clear intention revealed by the context of other textual provisions or where the purpose of a statute would be wholly frustrated if the government were not bound. (See also Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, per La Forest J. at pages 52-63.) I do not find in subsection 65(1.1) or in the context any intention to bind the Crown including that the purpose of the statute would be wholly frustrated if the Crown were not bound by its provisions.

I cannot see that the new subsection was intended to override the provisions of section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act. The terms used in that section are "deduction or set-off", neither of which appear in subsection 65(1.1). Parliament was obviously well aware of the distinction between attachment and deduction or set-off. If Parliament had intended to nullify the right of set-off in section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act , it could easily have done so by express language in subsection 65(1.1) of the Canada Pension Plan.

Moreover, in its ordinary and natural meaning "seizure" as understood at common law is "a forcible taking possession": Johnston v. Hogg (1882-83), 10 Q.B.D. 432, per Cave J., at page 434.[10] The word "execution" was defined by Lord Denning M.R. in Overseas Aviation Engineering (G.B.) Ltd., In re , [1963] Ch. 24 (C.A.), at page 39, as "the process for enforcing or giving effect to the judgment of the court".[11] The term "set-off" has been defined in Bankruptcy Notice, A, In re , [1934] Ch. 431 (C.A.) by Lord Hanworth M.R., at page 437 as follows:

With regard to the word "set-off", that is a word well known and established in its meaning; it is something which provides a defence because the nature and quality of the sum so relied upon are such that it is a sum which is proper to be dealt with as diminishing the claim which is made, and against which the sum so demanded can be set off.

Digitized by Google

In Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. (London: Butterworths, 1983), vol. 42, paragraph 406, the following definition of that term appears:

Where A has a claim for a sum of money against B and B has a cross-claim for a sum of money against A such that B is, to the extent of his cross-claim, entitled to be absolved from payment of A's claim, and to plead his cross-claim as a defence to an action by A for enforcement of his claim, then B is said to have a right of set-off against A to the extent of his cross-claim. [Footnotes omitted.]

In Sigurdson v. The Queen in right of British Columbia 1982 CanLII 416 (BC CA), (1982), 132 D.L.R. (3d) 131 (B.C.C.A.), Carrothers J.A., speaking for a majority, dealt with the concept of set-off at page 592, as follows:

The law relating to true set-off is well settled. A true set-off of indebtedness can take place only between two debtors who are at the same time one another's creditors. A set-off is merely the remission or cancellation pro tanto of reciprocal debts by applying one's credit receivable from another against one's debt owed to that other. A set-off is a cross-claim for money's worth respecting mutual or reciprocal debts due and owing from and to the same parties in the same right.

It is apparent that "set-off" is a quite different legal concept than either "seizure" or "execution" at common law or in equity.[12]

In my view, the 1995 amendment does not in this case prevent the Crown from exercising its right of set-off under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act. It seems to me that "seizure and execution" in subsection 65(1.1) of the Canada Pension Plan are not intended to include a set-off so as to nullify the rights conferred on the Minister under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act. These words, it appears, were intended to be additions to the list of prohibitions already contained in subsection 65(1). The Crown's right of set-off against the appellant under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act is not, in my view, affected by the amendment.

I am satisfied that the Motions Judge did not err in dismissing the appellant's motion for summary judgment. As already stated, as a matter of law section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act entitles the Minister to set- off for any unpaid taxes owing under that statute for the taxation years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979, inclusive, against benefits payable to the appellant from time to time under the Canada Pension Plan up to the limit specified in the statutory set-off, unless that set-off be earlier withdrawn. I further agree that the respondent's admissions do not provide a valid basis for granting a summary judgment under Rules

432.1 to 432.7. The admissions relate only to the absence of liability for taxes in the taxation years 1986 to 1991, inclusive. They have no bearing on whether the appellant is indebted to Her Majesty for unpaid taxes assessed for the years 1973, 1974 and 1976 to 1979, inclusive. While the appellant pleads that the debt of

$117,400.74 has been forgiven and that he has been released from paying it, he neither offers any supporting evidence nor contradicts the respondent's evidence to the opposite effect. As moving party for summary judgment, he was required by subsection 432.2(1) of the Rules to bring forth evidence, if available, showing that there is no genuine issue for trial within the meaning of subsection 432.3(1) of the Rules: Feoso Oil Ltd. v. Sarla (The), 1995 CanLII 3605 (FCA), [1995] 3 F.C. 68 (C.A.), at page 82. That he has failed to do.

The respondent appears to have satisfied the requirement of subsection 432.2(1) of the Rules of showing by affidavit or other evidence that there is a genuine issue for trial.[13] The defence raised is not clearly without foundation. I respectfully agree with the Motions Judge that the appellant is not entitled to summary judgment at this stage of the proceeding.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs if requested by the respondent.

[12] For definitions of "set-off", see also Palmer, supra , note 5, at pp. 1-4. The result, however, could well be different under the civil law of Quebec. It is noted that the French text of s. 65(1.1) provides that benefits are, in law or in equity, "exemptes d'exécution de saisie et de saisie-arrêt". The word "saisie" in s. 65(1) and (1.1) of the Canada Pension Plan is to be contrasted with the word "compensation" in the French text of s. 224.1 of the Income Tax Act wherein the Minister "peut exiger la retenue par voie de déduction ou de compensation d'un tel montant qu'il peut spécifier". Art. 1676 of the Civil Code of Québec [S.Q. 1991, c. 64] appears to prohibit "compensation" (set-off) if the object of the debt is property exempted from seizure. Art. 553(12) of the Code of Civil Procedure [R.S.Q., c. C-25] exempts from seizure anything declared to be unseizable by law. The Court's attention has not been drawn to any similar law in Ontario where it appears that the common law concepts will operate unless modified by statute.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT NOËL J.A.

[1] This is an appeal from a decision of Justice Harrington of the Federal Court (Federal Court judge) dated March 10, 2009 (2009 FC 249), dismissing the appellant's application for judicial review of the decision of the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) to retain by way of deduction or set-off, under section 224.1 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act), part of the retirement benefits and income supplement owed to him.

[2] Section 224.1 allows the Minister to require the retention of certain monies under the circumstances specified in that section:

224.1 Where a person is indebted to Her Majesty under this Act or under an Act of a province with which the Minister of Finance has entered into an agreement for the collection of the taxes payable to the province under that Act, the Minister may require the retention by way of deduction or set-off of such amount as the Minister may specify out of any amount that may be or become payable to the person by Her Majesty in right of Canada.	224.1 Lorsqu'une personne est endettée envers Sa Majesté, en vertu de la présente loi ou en vertu d'une loi d'une province avec laquelle le ministre des Finances a conclu un accord en vue de recouvrer les impôts payables à la province en vertu de cette loi, le ministre peut exiger la retenue par voie de déduction ou de compensation d'un tel montant qu'il peut spécifier sur tout montant qui peut être ou qui peut devenir payable à cette personne par Sa Majesté du chef du Canada.

[3] The appellant, who acted (and continues to act) without the assistance of counsel, submits that the preconditions for applying this provision have not been met in this case and that the Federal Court Judge was required to reverse the retention effected by the Minister and order the reimbursement.

FACTS

[4] The appellant does not challenge the fact that, in February 2008, he owed $68,789.23 in taxes (the tax debt). The evidence also shows that, at the same time, he was a Crown creditor under the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-8 (CPP) and the Old Age Security Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. O-9 (OASA). The appellant had been receiving $965.33 per month in benefits under these plans.

[5] In March 2008, the Minister began deducting 30% of the monthly amount payable to the appellant and applying it to his tax debt, with the result that the total monthly benefit amount paid to the appellant was reduced to $675.74.

[6] Subsections 65(1) and (1.1) of the CPP and 36(1) and (1.1) of the OASA respectively stipulate that the benefits paid under these acts are exempt from seizure:

65. (1) A benefit shall not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, and any transaction purporting to assign, charge, attach, anticipate or give as security a benefit is void.	65. (1) Une prestation ne peut être cédée, grevée de privilège, saisie, escomptée ou donnée en garantie. (1.1) A benefit is exempt from seizure and execution, either at law or in equity.	(1.1) Les prestations sont, en droit ou en equity, exemptes d'exécution de saisie et de saisie-arrêt.

36. (1) A benefit shall not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, and any transaction purporting to assign, charge, attach, anticipate or give as security a benefit is void.	36. (1) Les prestations sont incessibles et insaisissables et ne peuvent être ni grevées ni données pour sûreté; il est également interdit d'en disposer par avance. (1.1) A benefit is exempt from seizure and execution, either at law or in equity.	(1.1) Les prestations sont, en droit ou en equity, exemptes d'exécution de saisie et de saisie-arrêt.

[7] On April 17, 2008, the appellant sought the cancellation of the statutory set-off and reimbursement of the monies retained. When his request went unanswered, the appellant brought his case to the Minister's attention. After receiving a negative response, the appellant challenged the Minister's decision by way of an application for judicial review in Federal Court.

[8] In support of his request, the appellant raised two arguments. First, he submitted that, since the amounts deducted are exempt from seizure under the sections of the CPP and OASA, set-off cannot be effected according to the applicable private law, in particular article 1676 of the Civil Code of Québec, R.S.Q. 1991, c. 64 (CCQ), which reads as follows:

1676. Compensation is effected regardless of the cause of the obligation that has given rise to the debt.	1676. La compensation s'opère quelque soit la cause de l'obligation d'où résulte la dette.
Compensation does not take place, however, if the claim results from an act perform with intention to harm or if	Elle n'a pas lieu, cependant, si la créance résulte d'un acte fait dans l'intention de nuire ou si la dette a pour

the object of the debt is property which is exempt from seizure.	objet un bien insaisissable.

[9] In the alternative, the appellant argued before the Federal Court that the benefits to which he is entitled are held in trust for him and are not debts that can be subject to the set-off mechanism under section 224.1 of the Act.

DECISION OF THE FEDERAL COURT

[10] The Federal Court judge identified the issue as follows: does the term "set-off" ("compensation" in the French version) in section 224.1 of the Act incorporate civil law concepts of compensation, more specifically, paragraph 2 of article 1676 of the CCQ, according to which compensation "does not take place . . . if the object of the debt is property which is exempt from seizure"? He recognizes that, if so, compensation could not take place, as the "property" in question is exempt from seizure (reasons, paras. 1 to 5).

[11] The Federal Court judge began his analysis by explaining the role of provincial private law in federal law. In this regard, he cites sections 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, which read as follows:

8.1 Both the common law and the civil law are equally authoritative and recognized sources of the law of property and civil rights in Canada and, unless otherwise provided by law, if in interpreting an enactment it is necessary to refer to a province's rules, principles or concepts forming part of the law of property and civil rights, reference must be made to the rules, principles and concepts in force in the province at the time the enactment is being applied.

Le droit civil et la common law font pareillement autorité et sont tous deux sources de droit en matière de propriété et de droits civils au Canada et, s'il est nécessaire de recourir à des règles, principes ou notions appartenant au domaine de la propriété et des droits civils en vue d'assurer l'application d'un texte dans une province, il faut, sauf règle de droit s'y opposant, avoir recours aux règles, principes et notions en vigueur dans cette province au moment de l'application du texte.

Unless otherwise provided by law, when an enactment contains both civil law and common law terminology, or terminology that has a different meaning in the civil law and the common law, the civil law terminology or meaning is to be adopted in the Province of Quebec and the common law terminology or meaning is to be adopted in the other provinces.

8.2 Sauf règle de droit s'y opposant, est entendu dans un sens compatible avec le système juridique de la province d'application le texte qui emploie à la fois des termes propres au droit civil de la province de Québec et des termes propres à la common law des autres provinces, ou qui emploie des termes qui ont un sens différent dans l'un et l'autre de ces systèmes.

[12] In this case, the Federal Court judge asked [TRANSLATION] "whether Parliament intended paragraph two of article 1676 to be available to a tax debtor" (reasons, para. 15). He then referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Mintzer v. Canada, [1996] 2 F.C. 146 (Mintzer) and the distinction made therein regarding the potentially distinct effect of civil law (reasons, paras. 15 and 16).

[13] The Federal Court judge went on to explain that, for section 224.1 of the Act to apply, the two debts must be liquid and that, surely, Parliament was therefore referring to legal set-off, not judicial liquidation (reasons, para. 17). He added that the Minister can, in exercising his discretion, determine the extent of the set-off amount (for example, here, he requires only 30% of the amounts paid to the appellant) and that [TRANSLATION] "[i]t is therefore clear that Parliament did not intend to make all the compensation provisions of the Civil Code of Québec applicable in such circumstances" (reasons, para. 18). In the Federal Court judge's opinion, Parliament could not have intended to provide tax debtors with another way to avoid seizure (reasons, paras. 19 and 20).

[14] Lastly, relying on Mintzer, the Federal Court judge dismisses the appellant's argument that the monies owed to him [TRANSLATION] "are not debts in the hands of Her Majesty" but rather sums that are held in trust for him.

GROUNDS OF APPEAL

[15] In support of his appeal, the appellant repeats the arguments he raised before the Federal Court judge. First, he submits that the Federal Court judge erred in law in declining to give effect to the civil law as suppletive law. Second, the Federal Court judge should not have relied on Mintzer to find that the benefits owed to the appellant are not held in trust. According to the appellant, the conclusion in Mintzer, to the extent that it established that the benefits payable to him are debts, was incorrect.

ANALYSIS AND DECISION

[16] The first issue is as follows: on the basis of sections 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, must the term "compensation" found in the French version of section 224.1 of the Act be interpreted in reference to the concept of compensation as defined at articles 1672 to 1682 of the CCQ? More specifically, must paragraph 2 of article 1676 of the CCQ, which states that property that is exempt from seizure cannot be subject to compensation, apply? This is a matter of pure statutory interpretation that is subject to the standard of correctness.

[17] According to sections 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, it is appropriate to refer to the civil law when it is "necessary" to do so, except where "otherwise provided by the law" (see on this point St-Hilaire v. Canada (Attorney General), 2001 FCA 63, [2001] F.C.J. No. 444 (QL), para. 43). The burden is therefore on the appellant to show that it is necessary to incorporate the civil law notions on which he relies and that there is no provision to the contrary in federal law.

[18] The purpose of the collection measures set out in section 224.1 of the Act is to allow the tax authority to collect debts owing to that authority. At first glance, Parliament wanted to allow the Minister to retain the amounts owing by the Crown to a tax debtor to ensure payment of that person's tax debt. Contrary to what the appellant seems to believe, that the Minister may satisfy the appellant's debts from the amounts payable to the appellant is consistent with the objective sought (appellant's memorandum, paras. 42 and 43).

[19] Like any statutory provision, section 224.1 must be read in its "entire context and in [its] grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, para. 21). The context of section 224.1 obviously includes the provisions of the Act that pursue the same objective.

[20] In this respect, a reading of subsection 225(5) of the Act reveals that, when Parliament wishes to make its collection measures subject to the seizure exemption rules made by the provinces, it does so expressly:

225. (5) Such goods and chattels of any person in default as would be exempt from seizure under a writ of execution issued out of a superior court of the province in which the seizure is made are exempt from seizure under this section.	225. (5) Les biens meubles de toute personne en défaut qui seraient insaisissables malgré un bref d'exécution décerné par une cour supérieure de la province dans laquelle la saisie est opérée sont exempts de saisie en vertu du présent article.

[21] This Court also upheld the effect of this recognition in circumstances similar to the ones here. In Marcoux v. Canada (Attorney General), 2001 FCA 92, [2001] F.C.J. No. 493 (QL), the issue was whether the seizure exemption rules set out in article 553(7) of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q. c. C-25, prevented the Minister from exercising his power to collect. The Court dealt with this argument as follows (para. 13):

. . . As Décary J.A. noted in St-Hilaire, supra, at para. 30 of his reasons, Parliament may derogate from the civil law when it legislates on a subject that falls within its jurisdiction. Section 224, when read with s. 225, shows that in creating the methods of seizure mentioned in those sections Parliament had in mind the exemptions from seizure enacted in private law, and chose to take them into account in s. 225 and not take them into account in s. 224. Contrary to what was argued by counsel for the appellant, Parliament has spoken on the point at issue.

[Emphasis added.]

[22] Similarly, paragraph 122.61(4)(b) of the Act states that child tax benefits "cannot be assigned, charged, attached or given as security". However, at paragraph 122.61(4)(d), Parliament deemed it necessary to specify that these benefits "cannot be retained by way of deduction or set-off under the Financial Administration Act".

[23] It is therefore clear that, when Parliament wishes to limit its power to effect a set-off, it does so expressly. The inevitable conclusion is that there is no such limitation imposed on section 224.1. [24] Beyond the context of section 224.1, the statutory set-off mechanism set out in this section is fundamentally different from the one underlying compensation under Quebec civil law. For example, unlike article 1673 of the CCQ, which states that compensation is effected "by operation of law", section 224.1 provides that "the Minister may require the retention". Similarly, section 224.1 grants the Minister the power to determine the amount that will be subject to the set-off, whereas, under article 1673 of the CCQ, mutual debts are automatically extinguished up to the amount of the lesser debt. Lastly, the right to effect a set-off provided at section 224.1 is exercised in respect of an "amount [. . .] payable" and not a debt, as stipulated in article 1676 of the CCQ.

[25] These characteristics reveal that the statutory set-off described in section 224.1 is inspired by common law and is a complete departure from the civil law concept of compensation. Not only is it unnecessary to refer to civil law to give effect to section 224.1, but the law underlying this provision, in particular the concept of set-off borrowed from common law, requires otherwise. In my respectful view, the argument that Parliament relied on civil law as suppletive law cannot succeed, and the Federal Court judge was correct in law in rejecting it.

[26] Next, the appellant submits that the Minister cannot effect set-off, as the benefits payable to him are held in trust and not "debts" owing to him by the Crown. In Mintzer, this Court already decided this issue (Mintzer, para. 17):

On the basis of section 108 the appellant contends that the "benefits" are held in trust by the Crown and cannot be set-off against a debt for unpaid taxes. In my opinion this argument is without merit. It is not the contributions which are paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund that are subject to the statutory set-off but the "benefits" which are or become "payable" to a beneficiary under the Canada Pension Plan. It seems to me that the "benefits" as such would no longer be subject to any trust for which the appellant contends, if a trust there be. I am not satisfied, in any event, that the statute manifests an intention to create a trust either in respect of contributions or benefits. As I read the Canada Pension Plan the role of the Crown with respect to monies credited to the Canada Pension Plan Account or to benefits not yet paid, is that of an administrator in exercise of its governmental functions rather than of a trustee. (endnotes omitted)

[Emphasis added.]

[27] The appellant challenges that decision, citing subsection 8(3) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, R.S.C. 1985, c. 32 (2nd Supp.), whose full title is An Act respecting pension plans organized and administered for the benefit of persons employed in connection with certain federal works, undertakings and businesses. Subsection 8(3) states, among other things, "The administrator shall administer the pension plan and pension fund as a trustee . . .". The appellant contends that, according to this provision, the funds of the plans to which he contributes are held in trust.

[28] It is unclear whether this provision applies to the CPP or the OASA, but, in any event, this has no bearing on the reasoning of this Court in Mintzer, according to which the benefits to be paid, once payable, are no longer part of the trust.

[29] Lastly, and in any case, the Crown is not bound by the seizure exemption provisions set out in the CPP and OASA. Under section 17 of the Interpretation Act, "[n]o enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner", unless otherwise indicated. The provisions of the CPP and OASA appear to be aimed at "ensuring that benefits payable under [these] statute[s] be for the beneficiary's own use by preventing that person from alienating or encumbering them" (Mintzer, para. 15). Although these provisions apply to third parties, there is no indication of any intention to bind the Crown (idem, para. 18).

[30] I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

IC 98-1R3
DATE: February 12, 2008

This version is only available electronically.
This document cancels and replaces Information Circular 98-1R2, Collection Policies, dated December 3, 2006 concerning collection policies.
This circular gives you a general overview of many of the collections policies that we at Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) have for individuals, businesses, and organizations that owe money to the Crown. It will help you understand your rights and responsibilities when dealing with us. However, it does not provide in-depth details of the topics it discusses.
Therefore, if you have questions about policies not covered in this circular, would like confirmation of specific aspects of those discussed, or need any additional information, please contact the Revenue Collections Division of your tax services office. For the telephone number of your tax services office, see the listing in the government section of your telephone book.
We have to modify our collections policies periodically since legislative provisions and requirements can change at any time. We make every effort to provide updates in a timely manner. However, if a discrepancy should arise between Information Circular 98-1R3, Collections Policies, and current legislation or our most recent policies, the latter shall take precedence.
The circular describes collections policies for taxes, duties, charges, contributions, and premiums that you are required to pay or remit under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act, Excise Act 2001, Air Travellers Security Charge Act, Excise Act, Customs Act, Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, Canada Pension Plan , Unemployment Insurance Act , and Employment Insurance Act.

Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001, the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, the Excise Act, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment Insurance Act. Some requirements related to source deductions are also discussed.

Section 15 discusses collections policies regarding payroll and other source deductions, Goods and Services Tax/Harmonized Sales Tax (GST/HST) and charges on air transportation (Air Travellers Security Charge Act). These are amounts that are deemed to be held in trust, under either the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act or the Air Travellers Security Charge Act. These amounts, deducted from employees' wages and other individuals, GST/HST that registrants collect on supplies of goods and services and charges in respect of air transportation service, are treated differently from other amounts owing. Also discussed is the possible liability of directors for amounts owing under the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act. Furthermore, although amounts owing under the Excise Act 2001 and the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, are not considered trust funds, directors can be held liable.

Section 16 deals only with the collection of amounts owing under the Customs Act and other legislation related to goods imported into Canada. While you can get more information about collection of such amounts from your tax services office, you should direct questions on any other issues related to the importation of goods to your nearest customs office.

Section 17 provides a final word and explains how to get more information.

In this circular, we use the term person to include, as applicable, individual and corporate taxpayers, partnerships, employers and remitters of source deductions, GST/HST registrants, individuals and corporations that receive GST/HST rebates, licencees, importers/exporters, customs brokers, and international travellers.

1. Payment and other obligations

Employees who file an income tax return each spring will likely have paid part or all of their taxes through amounts their employers deducted from their income. The amount an employer deducts depends on the credits employees claimed on Form TD1, Personal Tax Credits Return. If an employee's situation changes during the year, or if the information on the form is out-of-date, the employee should fill out a new TD1 form so that the employer can deduct the proper amount of tax from the employee's income. If the employer makes regular deductions, it is less likely that the employee will have to pay a large tax balance when it is time to file an income tax return.

Self-employed and other individuals whose income tax is not payroll or source deducted, or only partially so, may have to make instalment payments. Doing so will help them avoid a large balance owing when it is time to file their income tax return. Please see the pamphlet P110, Paying Your Income Tax by Instalments, to determine if you should be making instalment payments for your current tax year. We charge interest and in some cases a penalty, on late or insufficient instalments.

Most corporations have to make monthly income tax instalment payments throughout the year for their current tax year or fiscal year. This measure helps ensure that any balance owing at the end of a corporation's fiscal year will be minimal. We charge interest on late or insufficient corporation income tax instalments. For more details on corporation income tax instalments, please see publications T4012, T2 Corporation – Income Tax Guide, T7B-CORP*, Corporation Instalment Guide*. Effective April 1, 2007, a new penalty applies when a person fails to file a return for a reporting period as and when required under the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act. The amount of the penalty payable by the person is based on the total of all amounts required to be paid for a reporting period that were not paid on the day on which the return was required to be filed and the number of complete months that the return remains oustanding. Specifically, the amount of penalty that becomes payable will first be calculated by taking 1 per cent of the total of all amounts, each of which was required to be paid for the period and which were not paid on the day on which the return was required to be filed. To that amount an additional amount will be added, equal to ¼ per cent of the total of all amounts determined above multiplied by the number of complete months, not exceeding 12, that the return remains outstanding. A person shall pay a failure to file penalty if the person misses a due date for filling a return required under the Act. The Minister of National Revenue is not required to first serve the person with a demand for a return. This new penalty is modelled after the failure to file penalty under the Income Tax Act, although the rates applied under these Acts are lower.

Balances owing under the Income Tax Act are payable no later than:
• April 30 of the following tax year, for individuals;
• 90 days after the end of the tax year, for a trust (T3);
• April 30 of the following year, for a deceased person who has died within the period of January 1 to October 31;
• six months after the date of death, for a deceased person who has died within the period of November 1 to December 31. (For greater detail, see publication T4011*, Preparing Returns for Deceased Persons*.)
• two months or, in some cases, three months from the end of the fiscal period, for corporations (even though they have up to 6 months to file their T2 return); and
• the 15th day of the month after the month they were deducted (must be received on or before the 15th) for payroll deductions, except for:
(i) accelerated remitters who must remit more frequently; or
(ii) small business employers who are notified by us that they qualify for quarterly remittances of payroll deductions.
(For greater detail, see the employers' guide T4001, Payroll Deductions and Remittances)

Balances owing for GST/HST under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act are payable no later than:
• the end of the month following the end of the reporting period, for a GST/HST registrant who is a monthly or quarterly filer; or
• the end of the third month following the end of the reporting period, for a GST/HST registrant who is an annual filer.
(For greater detail, see publication RC4022, General Information for GST/HST Registrants.)

Balances owing under Parts I to VII of the Excise Tax Act for other taxes are payable as follows:
• not later than the last day of the month following the end of the reporting periods.

Balances owing under the Excise Act 2001 are payable as follows:
• not later than the last day of the first month after each fiscal month of the person;
• differently for duties on tobacco (see sections 42 and 43 of the EA 2001).

Balances owing under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act are payable as follows:
• not later than the last day of the first month after each fiscal month of the carrier.

Balances owing under the Excise Act are payable as follows:
• no later than the second to last business day of the month following the month during which the beer was produced.

Balances owing under the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 are payable as follows:

Digitized by Google

• not later than the last day of the first month after each fiscal month of the person.

Under the Income Tax Act, on any unpaid amount assessed, we charge interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until it is paid. Also, where a person fails to deduct, withhold, remit or pay an amount deducted or withheld, the person is liable to a penalty of 10% of the amount. If the failure was made knowingly or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence the penalty is 20% of the amount. Under the Excise Tax Act, we charge interest on unpaid GST/HST and these are also compounded daily until the amount owing is paid. For taxes other than GST/HST, we charge interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until the day the amount owing is paid.
Under the Excise Act 2001, we charge interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until the day the amount owing is paid.
Under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, we charge interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until the day the amount owing is paid.
Under the Excise Act, we charge penalty and interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until the day the amount owing is paid.
Under the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, we charge interest that is compounded daily from the date the amount is due until the day the amount owing is paid.

2. Collection and enforcement
Except for the types of assessments listed in section 8 of this circular, "Exceptions to collection restrictions," we will not usually start legal action until 90 days after the day we mail a Notice of Assessment or a Notice of Reassessment. Effective April 1, 2007, the 90 day collection restriction does not apply anymore on deductions or Set-offs which can be sent following the issuance of the Notice of Assessment or Notice of Reassessment except for the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, which still has the 90-day collection restriction.
Any amount you owe is payable immediately when assessed or reassessed. If you do not agree with the assessment or reassessment, see Section 9 of this circular. If you cannot pay the total amount owing immediately, please contact the Revenue Collections Division of your Tax Services Office to discuss a mutually satisfactory short-term payment arrangement based on your ability to pay. We will consider payment arrangements when you have tried all reasonable ways of getting the necessary funds, either by borrowing or rearranging your financial affairs, and you still cannot pay the balance in full.
To help us determine your ability to pay, you will have to make full disclosure and give evidence of your income, expenses, assets, and liabilities. Collection officers may verify the information you provide before accepting an arrangement.
Should you not agree with the decision made by a collections officer, you have the right to discuss the matter with his or her supervisor. Officers will provide you with their supervisor's name and telephone number on request. However, if your debt remains unpaid with no mutually acceptable payment arrangement, we may take legal action such as garnisheeing your income (i.e., we may intercept funds payable to you) or initiate other legal actions such as issuing a set-off or directing a sheriff to seize and sell your assets. (See section 6 of this circular, "Legal action to collect.")
If you cannot make a payment on your liability, we may allow you to postpone payment until your financial situation improves. During that time, any interest and/or penalties that apply will continue to accrue on the liability. There may be exceptional situations when we may waive or cancel penalties and interest under the Taxpayer Relief Provisions. (See section 3 of this circular for greater detail.)

3. Taxpayer Relief Provisions
The "taxpayer relief provisions" apply to interest and penalty only.

Digitized by Google

We may waive or cancel part or all of penalty and interest charged on amounts owing, for ten calendar years after:
• the end of a taxation year under the Income Tax Act;
• the end of a reporting period for GST/HST under the Excise Tax Act;
• the end of a reporting period under Parts I to VII of the Excise Tax Act;
• the day an amount was required to be paid under the Excise Act 2001; and
• the end of a fiscal month under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act.
• the end of a reporting period under the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006,
We may consider these actions when you are prevented from making a payment when due, or otherwise complying with the above acts because of circumstances beyond your control.
Such circumstances include:
• natural or man-made disasters, such as a flood or fire;
• civil disturbances or disruptions in services such as a postal strike;
• a serious illness or accident; and
• serious emotional or mental distress caused by a death in the immediate family.
We may also cancel or waive interest or penalty charges if such charges were mainly the result of our own actions, such as if material available to the public contained errors which led taxpayers to file returns or make payments based on incorrect information.
Also, we may waive or cancel all or part of interest and/or penalty charges where there is an inability to pay beyond your control. For example:
• collection has been suspended because of an inability to pay caused by the loss of employment and the person is experiencing financial hardship; or
• a person is unable to conclude a reasonable payment arrangement because the interest and penalty charges absorb a significant part of the payments. In such a case, we may consider waiving interest and penalties in full or in part, for the period from when payments start until amounts owing are paid, provided the agreed payments are made on time in accordance with your ability to pay.
You, or your authorized representative, can make a written request to your tax services office to cancel or waive interest and penalties. You can get more details in Information Circular IC07-1, Taxpayer Relief Provisions, and in GST Memorandum 500-3-2-1, Cancellation or Waiver of Penalties and Interest.
We can usually finalize a taxpayer relief request within four to six weeks, if we have all the supporting information.

4. Disagreement with an amount owing

If you disagree with, or if you do not understand an assessment or a reassessment, you should contact the Client Services Division of your tax services office immediately for an explanation. If you cannot resolve the matter in this manner, you can file an objection. In section 9 of this circular, we discuss objections and appeals.

5. Acceptance of security

We will accept adequate security instead of payment under some circumstances.
For example, if the Tax Court of Canada or the Canadian International Trade Tribunal dismisses your appeal and you exercise your right to appeal to a higher court, we will ask you to immediately pay the full amount owing regardless of your further rights to appeal. However, we will accept adequate security instead of payment, such as a Bank Letter of Guarantee (Letter of Credit).
In addition, for certain elections under the Income Tax Act, you have to provide adequate security for us to accept the election.
You or your representative should contact the Revenue Collections Division of your tax services office for more information about security, such as mandatory clauses for Bank Letters of Guarantee or Mortgages.

6. Legal action to collect

If you do not pay an amount voluntarily, we may take legal action to:

- garnishee wages or other income sources;
- seize and sell assets; or
- use any other means under any applicable statutes or laws to collect an amount owing.

Garnishment action allows us to intercept funds payable to you by a third party, such as wages or other income sources. Similarly, if any other federal government department owes you money, we can issue a requirement for set-off to that department to have all or part of that money sent to us. We will then apply this amount against your outstanding balance. We will notify you by mail of the garnishment or set-off action.

The Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act provide for the registration of a certificate in the Federal Court of Canada for unpaid amounts. Once registered, the certificate has the same force and effect as a judgment obtained in the Court. When the debt is certified, we will usually notify you by mail. If you still do not pay the amount, we may obtain a writ or memorial and seize assets and/or property, and have it advertised and sold by the sheriff. You have to pay all reasonable costs and charges incurred to collect the amount certified, and are still liable for any remaining balance. All proceeds from the sale remaining after costs and charges are paid will be applied to the debt. Once we undertake set-off, garnishment, or other legal proceedings, we will not usually withdraw them until the account is paid in full, or it can be shown that the action is causing undue hardship.

7. Collection restrictions

Except as outlined in section 8 of this circular, we cannot normally initiate the following types of legal action until 90 days after the day we mail the Notice of Assessment or Notice of Reassessment:

- begin legal proceedings in a court;
- certify the amount in the Federal Court under section 223 of the Income Tax Act, section 83 of the Excise Tax Act, section 88 of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or section 288 of the Excise Act 2001;
- require a third party who owes a person money to make a payment under subsection 224(1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 84(1) of the Excise Tax Act, subsection 89(1) of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or subsection 289(1) of the Excise Act 2001;
- require an institution or other third party who is lending or advancing a person money to make a payment under subsection 224(1.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 84(3) of the Excise Tax Act, subsection 89(2) of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or subsection 289(2) of the Excise Act 2001;
- require a person to turn over money under subsection 224.3(1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 92(1) of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or subsection 292(1) of the Excise Act 2001;

and

- give a notice, issue a certificate, or make a direction under subsection 225(1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 93(1) of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or subsection 293(1) of the Excise Act 2001.

8. Exceptions to collection restrictions

The restrictions to our ability to take legal action, outlined in section 7 of this circular, do not apply to assessments issued for the following items:

- Amounts deemed to be held in trust, (see section 15 of this information circular, “Trust funds.”)

Digitized by Google

including:
(i) an amount deducted or withheld, and required to be remitted or paid under the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance Act, Employment Insurance Act, or a regulation made under those Acts (i.e., payroll and other source deductions);
(ii) GST/HST collected as or on account of tax under Division II, Part IX of the Excise Tax Act; and
(iii) charges collected under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act.
The restrictions also do not apply to the following:
Under the Income Tax Act:
• Scientific research and experimental development tax credits – an amount payable under Part VIII of the Income Tax Act.
• Non-resident tax – an amount of tax required to be paid under section 116, or under a regulation made under subsection 215(4) of the Income Tax Act, that has not been paid.
• Penalties – the amount of any penalty payable for failure to remit or pay a deemed trust amount, as and when required by the Income Tax Act, Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance Act, Employment Insurance Act, or a regulation made under those Acts.
• Interest – any interest payable under a provision of the Excise Tax Act, Income Tax Act, Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance Act, and Employment Insurance Act on an amount referred to in any of the above paragraphs.
• Large corporations – for income tax purposes only, where a large corporation as defined in subsection 225.1(8) of the Income Tax Act has been assessed, we may take action to collect half of the amount assessed at any time during the first 90 days after the amount is assessed, regardless of whether an objection or appeal has been filed. After this 90-day period, if there is no objection or appeal, we can collect the outstanding balance. After the 90-day period, where an objection or appeal is filed, we can collect up to half of the amount under dispute and any balance not in dispute.
• A reassessment with the taxpayer's consent under subsection 152(4.2).
• A reassessment after the dispostion of an appeal with the consent in writing from the taxpayer under subsection 169(3).
• A reassessment after the waiver of penalty and/or interest under subsection 220(3.1).
Under the Excise Tax Act:
• Any penalties or fines imposed pursuant to a conviction for an offence under the act.
• A reassessment issued following an objection pursuant to subsection 81.15(4) or an appeal pursuant to subsection 81.38(1).
• Amounts payable after the dispostion of an appeal or further appeal under subsection 81.39(2) and (3).
Under the Excise Act 2001:
• If the total of all amounts assessed that remain unpaid exceeds $1,000,000, 50% of the total amounts.
In addition, the collection restrictions, outlined in section 7 of this circular, do not apply if collection of all or part of an assessed amount would be jeopardized if there were a delay in collecting it. Section 12 of this circular, "Special provisions," discusses collections in jeopardy.

9. Objections and appeals

If you do not agree with an income tax assessment, you can file an objection by either writing a letter or by completing Form T400A, Objection – Income Tax Act, and sending it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, in your tax services office or tax centre.
To file an objection to a CPP or EI assessment for the premiums that we indicate you owe, either write a letter or complete Form CPT100, Appeal Under the Canada Pension Plan and/or Employment Insurance Act, and send it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, in your tax services office. If you do not agree with a GST/HST assessment or determination under Part IX of the Excise

Digitized by Google

Tax Act, you can file an objection by completing Form GST159, Notice of Objection (GST/HST), and sending it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, of your tax services office. Form E413, Notice of Objection (Excise Tax Act), must be used for objections to other taxes assessed under the Excise Tax Act. If you do not agree with an assessment under the Excise Act 2001, you can file an objection by completing Form E680 Notice of Objection (Excise Act 2001) and send it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, at your tax services office.

If you do not agree with an assessment under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, you can file an objection by completing Form E676 Notice of Objection (Air Travellers Security Charge Act) and send it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, at your tax services office.

If you do not agree with an assessment under the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, you can file an objection by completing Form Notice of Objection (Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006) and send it to the Assistant Director, Appeals, at your tax services office.

The time limit for individuals (other than trusts) and testamentary trusts to object to income tax assessments is the later of the following two dates: one year from the return's filing due date or 90 days after the date of the mailing of the assessment or reassessment notice. The time limit to object to an income tax assessment in all other cases and to an assessment made under the Excise Tax Act (including GST/HST), the Excise Act 2001, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act is 90 days after the date of mailing of the Notice of Assessment or Notice of Reassessment.

Under the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act you may request in writing an extension of time to file an objection. You can get more information from your tax services office.

For income tax purposes:

• When you file an objection, we normally do not take any legal action on the disputed balance until 90 days after the date the Appeals Division mails a notice confirming or varying the assessment under objection. If you appeal the decision to the Tax Court of Canada or the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, we do not normally take any legal action until the court mails its decision or you discontinue the appeal. (See section 8 of this circular for exceptions.)

• If the court dismisses your appeal or you discontinue it, we will ask you to immediately pay the full amount owing regardless of any further rights of appeal or judicial review you may have or wish to exercise. If you do not pay or provide acceptable security, we may initiate legal action to collect the debt. However, under the Income Tax Act we will refund to you what you have paid on disputed amounts for which you have been successful in subsequent appeals, with applicable interest. (See section 5 of this circular, "Acceptance of security.")

• If, under subsections 225.1(5) of the Income Tax Act, 286(7) of the Excise Act 2001, 86(5) of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or 86(8) of the Excise Tax Act, you file an objection or appeal to the Tax Court of Canada, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal or the Federal Court of Appeal, and you agree in writing to delay proceedings until judgment has been given in a similar action before the Tax Court of Canada, Federal Court of Appeal, or the Supreme Court of Canada, we cannot take legal action until we notify you in writing of the Court's decision.

• When a large corporation, as defined in subsection 225.1(8) of the Income Tax Act, has been assessed, we may take action to collect under subsection 225.1(7) of the Income Tax Act half of the amount assessed at any time during the first 90 days after the amount is assessed, regardless of whether the assessment is under dispute. Where an objection or appeal is filed, we can collect up to half of the amount under dispute and any balance not in dispute.

• When an assessed amount is under dispute and a delay would jeopardize its collection, there are provisions to permit us to take immediate collection action. (See section 12 of this circular, "Special provisions.") Interest under the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001, the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Excise Tax Act is charged at the prescribed rate on all amounts owing, regardless of whether they are disputed or not. We can take action to collect amounts owed as a result of assessments listed in section 8 of this circular even if you file an objection or an appeal.

10. Repayment of disputed amounts (Income Tax Act)

If the Appeals Division has not confirmed or varied an income tax assessment within 120 days of the date a notice of objection is served, you can apply in writing for the return of all amounts paid with respect to amounts in dispute, or the release of any security provided for the tax in dispute. A disputed amount may include taxes, interest, penalties, or other amounts payable.

Similarly, if you appeal an income tax assessment to the Tax Court of Canada, you can request the return of any disputed amount which has been paid, or the return of any security provided for the amount in dispute. This does not apply to security provided or amounts paid by non-resident persons for amounts in dispute regarding the disposition of particular types of taxable Canadian properties and Canadian resource properties.

A large corporation, within the meaning assigned by subsection 225.1(8) of the Income Tax Act, is entitled to a repayment or return of security of one half of the disputed amount.

However, if making a repayment or surrendering security could jeopardize collection of the disputed amount, we may apply for a judicial order to permit us to retain the payment or the security.

Under the other acts, there is no requirement to reimburse any amount paid or return security pledged on a disputed assessment.

11. Refunds applied to other debts

A refund will not be paid to a person until the person has filed with the Minister all returns and other records of which the Minister has knowledge that the person is required to file under the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act 2001 and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act.

We can offset (apply against another debt) your repayment or refund to debts for which you are liable. However, for debts that relate to the Income Tax Act, we will not usually offset a refund against an outstanding amount, other than a deemed trust debt, if the amount owing is the subject of an objection or appeal on which neither CRA's Appeals Division nor the Court has made a decision.

12. Special provisions

It is our policy to approach tax compliance consistently and responsibly. There are cases when we must use the enforcement provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or the Excise Act 2001 because our ability to collect taxes has been, or is likely to be, defeated by the transfer, sale, loss, relocation, or other disposition of a person's assets.

a) Collection in jeopardy

When we have reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of all or part of an amount we have assessed would be jeopardized if there were a delay in collecting it, we can take action. Under the Income Tax Act, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and the Excise Act 2001, a judge of a superior court of a province or of the Federal Court of Canada can authorize us to take collection action at once. When we are granted such an authorization, you have the right to apply to a court for a judicial review of it. Since we are not restricted from taking collection action for payroll or other source deduction amounts, we do not have to apply to the courts before taking such action.

A similar provision is available under the Excise Tax Act for amounts other than Part IX (GST/HST) amounts, with the exception that the Minister of National Revenue or a delegated authority may approve the action. For GST/HST amounts under Part IX, we do not have to apply to the courts before taking such action on amounts that have already been assessed. However, for the net tax of a reporting period that is remittable but not yet payable, the agency can apply to a judge of the superior court of a province or the Federal Court to obtain judicial authorization to assess the amount determined by the Minister to be remittable by a registrant at the time the application is heard and to take action to recover that amount.

If we believe that you have left or are about to leave Canada, we can require you to immediately pay all amounts owed, whether or not due at the time. If you do not make the payment, we can seize your goods and chattels.

b) Property transfers

If you have an amount owing under the Income Tax Act, Part IX (GST/HST) of the Excise Tax Act, the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 or the Excise Act 2001 for the tax year or reporting period in which you transfer property, or previous tax years or reporting periods, the following rules under section 160 of the Income Tax Act, section 325 of the Excise Tax Act, section 96 of the Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006 and section 297 of the Excise Act 2001 apply.
Under the above conditions, if you transfer property to

- a spouse or a person who has since become your spouse,
- a person under 18 years of age, or
- a person with whom you were not dealing at arm's length, the person to whom you transfer property becomes liable for the lesser of the amount you owe, or the excess of the fair market value of the property over the consideration given for the property.

These rules do not apply to a transfer of property between you and your spouse under a decree, order, or judgment of a competent tribunal, or under a written separation agreement where, at the time of transfer, you and your spouse were separated and living apart as a result of the breakdown of your marriage. For transfers occurring after 1992, marriage includes a common-law relationship.

c) Prosecution for failing to file a return

If you fail to file a return as and when required under the Income Tax Act, Part IX (GST/HST) of the Excise Tax Act or the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, you are guilty of an offence. If you are convicted, you are liable to a fine of between $1,000 and $25,000, or both a fine and imprisonment for up to 12 months. For failure to file returns other than GST/HST returns, the Excise Tax Act provides for a fine of between $10 and $100. Under the Excise Act 2001 the liability on summary conviction to a fine is not more than $100,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 12 months, or both.

13. Amounts owing by estates of deceased persons

If a deceased person's estate has amounts payable or remittable, we will contact the executor or administrator of the estate and ask for payment of the outstanding amounts. If the executor or administrator does not comply, we may take legal action to collect the debt.
Before distributing the assets of an estate, the executor or administrator must get a clearance certificate from us. The certificate will state that all amounts assessed or liable to be assessed have been paid or secured by the estate.
If executors or administrators distribute some of the assets of the estate before they get a clearance certificate, they will be liable, to the extent of the value of the assets distributed, for any amounts that have not been paid or are assessed later. For more information, contact your tax services office. (For greater detail, see publication T4011*, Preparing Returns for Deceased Persons*.)

14. Confidentiality

To preserve the right to confidentiality, we will only release your confidential information to your authorized representatives, or as the law authorizes us. It is our policy to confirm the identity and authorization of all parties concerned before we release confidential information. However, if it is necessary for us to take legal action, the legal documents will contain certain aspects of a person's tax liability, such as the amount and type of debt owed.

15. Trust funds

The collection restrictions outlined in section 7 of this circular do not apply to trust funds described in this section.

You are deemed to hold the following amounts in trust:

Under the Income Tax Act

• amounts that are deducted from employees and other individuals for:

(i) income tax;

(ii) Canada Pension Plan (CPP) contributions; and

(iii) Employment Insurance (EI) premiums.

Under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act

• amounts collected as or on account of GST/HST, less allowable input tax credits.

Under the Air Travellers Security Charge Act

• amounts collected as or on account of charges on air transportation service.

You have to send us these amounts as the legislation requires. You must also include the employer's portion of CPP and EI when remitting source deductions. For a GST/HST amount, you can deduct allowable input tax credits before remitting it.

If you do not comply with the legislation that applies, we will assess the amount owing and ask you to immediately pay the full balance, including interest and any penalties that apply. If you do not pay the balance owing, we may, at the time we issue a Notice of Assessment, garnishee your sources of funds (including trade receivables, bank deposits, loans, advances, and other income), or we may begin to seize and sell assets. Any assets we seize will be sold by sheriff's auction, unless the account is promptly paid in full, including any costs resulting from this action.

We may hold the directors of a corporation jointly and severally liable if the corporation fails to deduct, withhold, or remit amounts deemed to be held in trust, and we are unable to collect from the corporation. In addition, the directors are jointly and severally liable, with the corporation, to pay any penalty or interest that has accrued or will accrue on outstanding amounts.

Once we have issued assessments against directors, we will not usually start legal action against them before 90 days have passed from the day we mail the Notice of Assessment, or while the assessments are under objection or appeal. When these limitations do not apply, we may without delay garnishee the personal income of the directors that have been held liable, or we may seize and sell their personal assets if they do not voluntarily remit the amounts the corporation failed to deduct or remit. For more information about the rights and obligations of directors of a corporation, contact your tax services office. Information Circular 89-2R2, Directors' Liability – Section 227.1 of the Income Tax Act, Section 323 of the Excise Tax Act, Section 81 of the Air Travellers Security Charge Act and subsection 295(1) of the Excise Act 2001, also gives more information on this topic.

It is an offence to withhold amounts but fail to remit them to the Receiver General for Canada or willfully fail to pay, collect, or remit GST/HST, or net tax. Under the Income Tax Act and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act, if convicted, you are liable to a fine of between $1,000 and $25,000, or both a fine and imprisonment for up to 12 months. Under the Excise Tax Act, if convicted, you are liable to a fine of $1,000 plus 20% of the GST/HST or net tax that you should have paid, collected, or remitted, or both a fine and imprisonment for up to six months.

16. Customs – Canada Borders Service Agency (CBSA)

This section deals only with certain general aspects of the customs collection policy that applies to any duty, tax, fee, penalty, charge, or other amount owing to the Crown related to goods imported into Canada. These amounts may be owing under the Customs Act, Customs Tariff, Excise Tax Act, Special Import Measures Act, and/or related regulations, referred to as the applicable Acts. For further information on collection policy, contact your tax services office. For information on any other customs issue, contact the nearest customs office.

Payment obligations
A person must present a complete entry document to customs for goods imported. Such a document includes declarations on the value for duty, origin, and tariff classification of those goods. The person must also pay any duties and taxes owing, or post security where applicable, when goods enter Canada. Customs will not release goods for which these amounts are not paid or secured at the time of arrival. More information about security can be found in CBSA Memorandum D17-1-5, Importing Commercial Goods.

Re-determination
CBSA may re-determine the origin, tariff classification, or value for duty of the goods. As a result, the person may owe additional duties, taxes, or other charges such as interest back to the 31st day after the person should have paid the duties and taxes. The person must normally pay these amounts within 30 days of CBSA decision.

Interest
Where authorized by the applicable Acts, we will charge daily compound interest at either the prescribed or specified rate, from the day after the amount was owed to the Crown up to and including the day the amount owing is paid. Where authorized by the Special Import Measures Act, we will charge simple monthly interest at the prescribed rate up to and including the day the amount owing to the Crown is paid. Under the Special Import Measures Act, any fraction of a month is considered to be a full month. More information on interest provisions can be found in CBSA Memorandum D11-6-5, Interest and Penalty Provisions: Determinations/Re-Determinations, Appraisals/Re-Appraisals and Duty Relief, or CBSA Memorandum D14-1-6*, Liability for Payment of Provisional* Duty, Anti-dumping Duty and Countervailing Duty Under the Special Import Measures Act.

Enforcement
When goods are not reported, or are reported falsely to customs, the Customs Act allows CBSA to seize the goods. In cases where the goods are not available for seizure or are impractical to seize, section 124 of the Customs Act allows for the issuance of a Notice of Ascertained Forfeiture, assessing an amount of money in lieu of a seizure. A Notice of Penalty Assessment may also be issued under section 109.3 for a contravention of the Customs Act. Any amount of money demanded in a Notice of Ascertained Forfeiture or a Notice of Penalty Assessment becomes payable on the day the notice is served on the person. That person is in default and subject to collection action unless the person pays the amount owing or, within 90 days after the date of service of the notice, requests a decision of the Minister under section 131 of the Customs Act.

Notice of Arrears
If a person does not pay the amounts owing within 30 days of the date the amount was due, CRA will issue a Notice of Arrears.

Collection and legal action
If you do not pay an amount voluntarily, we may take legal action to:
• garnishee wages or other income sources;
• seize and sell assets; or
• use any other means under the applicable statutes or laws to collect an amount owing.
Garnishment action allows us to intercept funds payable to you by a third party, such as wages or other income sources. Similarily, if any other federal government department owes you money, we can issue a requirement for set-off to that department to have all or part of that money sent to us.

Digitized by Google

We will then apply this amount against your outstanding balance. We will notify you by mail of the garnishment or set-off action. The Act provides for the registration of a certificate in the Federal Court for unpaid amounts. Once registered, the certificate has the same force and effect as a judgment obtained in the Court. When the debt is certified, we will usually notify you by mail. If you still do not pay the amount, we may obtain a writ of memorial and seize assets/or property, and have it advertised and sold by the sheriff. You have to pay all reasonable costs and charges incurred to collect the amount certified, and are still liable for any remaining balance. All proceeds from the sale remaining after costs and charges are paid will be applied to the debt. Once we undertake set-off, garnishment, or other legal proceedings, we will not usually withdraw them until the account is paid in full, or it can be shown that the action is causing undue hardship. We may suspend your importation privileges as well as take lien action against goods imported by or reported for exportation by you. These goods may be detained and sold to satisfy the amount demanded in the notice. We will continue to detain and sell imported and exported goods or continue other legal proceedings against you, until the amount owing to the Crown is paid in full, unless other acceptable payment arrangements are made to suspend these actions.

Collection restrictions

If a person is liable for the payment of an amount under this Act, if an amount is demanded in a notice served under section 109.3 or 124, or if an amount is demanded under paragraph 133(1)(c) or subsection 133(1.1) in a notice served under subsection 131(2), we will not take the following actions until the ninety-first day after the day the notice is given to the debtor:

- begin legal proceedings in court;
- certify the amount under section 97.24 of the Customs Act;
- garnishee a person's wages; and
- require the retention of an amount the federal government owes to a person by way of deduction or set-off under section 97.26 of the Customs Act.

Alternative payment arrangements

We will consider alternative payment arrangements when you have tried all reasonable ways of getting the necessary funds, either by borrowing or rearranging your financial affairs, and you still cannot pay the balance in full. In this situation, you should contact the Revenue Collections Division of your tax services office, or the office shown on the Notice of Arrears, to discuss a mutually satisfactory short-term payment arrangement based on your ability to pay.

When determining ability to pay, we will expect you to make a full disclosure and give tangible evidence of your income, expenses, assets, and liabilities. Collections officers may verify the information you provide before accepting an arrangement. However, if your debt stays outstanding with no mutually acceptable payment arrangement, we may take legal action such as garnisheeing your income (i.e., we may intercept funds payable to you) or directing a sheriff to seize and sell your assets.

If you cannot make a payment for your liability, we may allow you to defer payment until your financial situation improves. During that time any interest or penalty that apply will continue to accrue on the liability. There may be exceptional situations when we may consider waiving or canceling interest or penalties under the interest and penalty provisions.

Interest and penalty provisions

We may waive or cancel part or all interest or penalty charges payable under the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff. We may consider these actions when you are prevented from making a payment when due, or otherwise complying with the Customs Act or Customs Tariff because of circumstances beyond your control. Such circumstances include:

- natural or human-made disasters, such as flood or fire (which destroy the records of the importer);

Digitized by Google

• civil disturbances or disruptions in service, such as a postal strike;
• death or incapacity of the person who is directly responsible for ensuring the importer's compliance;
• errors proven to have been committed by employees of the CRA or CBSA which resulted in incorrect information being supplied to the importer; and
• material published by the CRA or CBSA, directed to the importing public, which contained errors that resulted in the importer's actions giving rise to the interest or penalty.

It may also be appropriate to waive or cancel all or part of interest and penalty charges where there is an inability to pay beyond your control. For example:
• when collection action has been suspended due to an inability to pay; or
• when an importer is unable to conclude a reasonable payment arrangement because the interest charges absorb a significant portion of the payments.

In such cases, we may consider waiving interest and penalties, in whole or in part, for the period when payments start until the amounts owing are paid. However, the agreed payments have to be made on time. You, or your authorized representative, can make a written request to the tax services office or the office shown on the Notice of Arrears for a waiver or cancellation of interest and/or penalties. More information about the guidelines for canceling and waiving interest and penalties can be found in CBSA Memorandum D11-6-5, Interest and Penalty Provisions: Determinations/Re-Determinations, Appraisals/Re-Appraisals and Duty Relief.

Under the Special Import Measures Act, there is no authority to cancel or waive any interest payable.

Disputes and appeals

Appeals of Notices of Arrears

Section 97.23 of the Customs Act provides that a person to whom a Notice of Arrears is sent or delivered under subsection 97.22(1) may appeal the notice up to 30 days after the notice is sent or delivered by way of an action in the Federal Court, if no appeal is or was available under section 67 or 68 of the Customs Act. This, therefore, excludes assessments resulting from CBSA decisions concerning the origin, tariff classification, or value for duty of imported goods.

Seizures and forfeitures appeal process

Where a contravention of the Customs Act has been alleged and a seizure made or a Notice of Ascertained Forfeiture or a Notice of Penalty Assessment issued, you may request a decision of the Minister under section 131 of the Customs Act within 90 days of the date of the seizure or the service of the notice.

Where you have requested a decision of the Minister and the decision rendered demands payment of an amount of money, you may within 90 days after being notified of the decision, appeal the CBSA decision by way of an action in the Federal Court. 17. A final word
Our collection policies help us apply the law fairly. Our procedures are designed to allow us to consider each person's financial situation. At the same time, we have an obligation to uniformly and fairly apply the provisions of the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act, Excise Act 2001, Air Travellers Security Charge Act, Excise Act, Customs Act, Softwood Lumber Products Export Charge Act, 2006, Customs Tariff, Special Import Measures Act, and other acts and regulations, such as the Canada Pension Plan and the Employment Insurance Act, that we administer for other government departments. We have to ensure that all individuals, corporations, employers, licensees, registrants, importers/exporters, customs brokers, international travellers, and all other persons pay the required amount of tax, duties, fees, penalties, and other amounts owing to the Crown.

The 90 Day Pause to Collection When Objection
Subsection 225.1(2) details that the Minister shall not start any of the collection mechanics described in Sec. 225.1(1) until 90 days past the date that the objection to the assessment was made.

Appeals Prevent Collection Acts to Start
Subsection 225.1(3) details an opportunity for the taxpayer to contest an assessment to the TCC whereby while the appeal is still in controversy collection actions cannot be commenced.

James Walker v. Her Majesty the Queen, 2005 FCA 393, "I Didn't Receive the Assessment and The Collectors Started Calling": Whether s. 18.5 of the Federal Court Rules can Stop Collection Activity when the Underlying Process Hasn't Been Properly Pursued

MALONE J.A.
Introduction
[1] This appeal canvasses the scope of section 18.5 of the Federal Courts Act R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7 (the Act) and the powers of the Federal Court where the statutory authority of the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) to carry out collection proceedings against a taxpayer under the Income Tax Act R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Suppl.) (the ITA), is challenged. Section 18.5 of the Act reads as follows:
[2] The order under appeal was rendered by Beaudry J., a judge of the Federal Court (the Applications Judge), on August 11, 2004. Reasons in support are reported as 2004 FC 1105.

Background
[3] Mr. Walker filed his 1998 tax return on April 30, 1999, and received a notice of assessment for that taxation year on May 20, 1999.
[4] According to affidavit evidence filed by a manager of the Canada Revenue Agency, a notice of reassessment for the 1998 tax year was sent by registered mail to the appellant on May 13, 2002, and was returned unclaimed. Mr. Walker deposes that he never received the notice of reassessment. The first he claims he heard of it was when he was contacted in August of 2002 by a collections officer regarding an amount allegedly due for 1998. The Minister's collection efforts rest on the alleged mailing of the notice of reassessment to the appellant.
[5] On October 7, 2003, the appellant commenced an application for judicial review in the Federal Court for an order declaring that no debt was owing in respect of the 1998 taxation year, since no notice of reassessment was ever sent, and restraining the Minister from further collection action.

[6] On October 31, 2003, a document purporting to be a copy of the 1998 notice of reassessment was provided to Mr. Walker's lawyer. The appellant filed a notice of objection to this document on December 19, 2003 and subsequently a notice of appeal in the Tax Court of Canada. That proceeding is now in abeyance as the Minister has filed a motion, as yet unheard, to the effect that the notice of objection is out of time pursuant to subsection 165 (1) of the ITA. That subsection reads:...

The Decision Below

[7] The application for judicial review was heard by Beaudry J. on July 20, 2004. The Applications Judge concluded that section 18.5 of the Act barred Mr. Walker from judicial review because he had a right of appeal under subsection 169 (1) of the ITA. That subsection reads as follows:

[8] In reaching this conclusion, Beaudry J. relied on the decision of this Court in Optical Recording Corp. v. Canada, [1991] 1 F.C. 309 (C.A) [Optical], which decided that the ITA provided the Tax Court of Canada with the full and appropriate procedure for appealing all issues regarding assessments and reassessments, including whether the notice of the reassessment was sent on May 13, 2002.

[9] The appellant now appeals, asserting that section 18.5 of the Act allows the Federal Court to review the legality of the Minister's collection process and, incidentally, to decide whether the Minister has established that the notice of reassessment was sent. The appellant argues that any question as to the mailing of the notice of reassessment is necessarily collateral to a review of the Minister's conduct.

Standard of Review

[10] The issue under review is whether section 18.5 of the Act allows the Federal Court to judicially review these collection proceedings, or if the Court is precluded by the exclusive jurisdiction granted to the Tax Court of Canada by section 169 of the ITA. Since this inquiry involves a question of law the appropriate standard is one of correctness.

V. Analysis

[11] In enacting section 18.5, Parliament intended to avoid parallel proceedings in the Federal Court in those instances where a federal statute expressly provides for an appeal in another forum. Here, the notice of reassessment is an administrative act of a government official that falls within the broad parameters of section 18.1 of the Act giving rise to judicial review (see Evans, J., as he then was, in Markevich v. the Queen, [1999] 3 F.C. 28 at paragraph 14). At the same time, Parliament has enacted sections 165, 169 and 180 of the ITA, which comprise a complete appeal procedure which allows the appellant to raise in the Tax Court of Canada all issues relating to his reassessment.

[12] The appellant acknowledges that in the Tax Court proceeding the issue of whether a notice of reassessment for the 1998 taxation year was sent to him within the statutory time limit would be raised. In this case, the resolution of that issue will require a determination as to whether a notice of reassessment for the 1998 taxation year was mailed to the appellant by May 20, 2003, the end of the "normal reassessment period" as defined in subsection 152 (3.1) of the ITA.

[13] Put another way, the legal efficacy of the key document in this case, the document entitled "notice of reassessment" which the Minister alleges was mailed on May 13, 2002, is a matter to be determined by the Tax Court of Canada in an income tax appeal. Section 18.5 of the Act should be interpreted, as far as possible, to preclude parallel proceedings in the Federal Court and the Tax Court of Canada in respect of substantially the same underlying issue. In this case, section 18.5 should preclude the Federal Court from entertaining an application for judicial review in which the critical issue is the legal efficacy of that key document. In my view, it makes no difference that the appellant claims to be seeking such a determination, not as an end in itself, but in support of his application for an order precluding the Minister from relying on the key document as a basis for collection action.

[14] In support of his submissions, the appellant relied on a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Markevich v. the Queen, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94. In that case, the Federal Court undertook a judicial review of the Minister's decision to collect a tax debt that was time barred, but in so doing that Court was not required to determine anything that could also have been determined by the Tax Court of Canada. Accordingly the Markevich decision is of no assistance to the appellant in the present appeal.

[15] An application for judicial review may be made to the Federal Court to challenge the legality of collection measures taken by the Minister to collect taxes allegedly due. However, the Federal Court's jurisdiction does not extend to an application involving an attack on the underlying reassessment on which collection measures are based. In the present case, the appellant says that the Minister cannot justify collection measures by relying on a reassessment allegedly made in May 1998 without proving that notice of it was mailed to him. This is sufficient to engage section 18.5.

[16] For this reason, I would dismiss this appeal with costs. "B. Malone" J.A.

Test Case Abeyances

Subsection 225.1(4) allows the taxpayer to perhaps agree with the Minister to place the collection of a debt in abeyance until a similar Tax Court of Canada case has been determined to better clarify whether tax is in fact payable. It's to be noted that this provision only applies to TCC proceedings and not Federal Court Appeals ) Where a taxpayer has agreed under subsection 173(1) that a question should be determined by the Tax Court of Canada, or where a taxpayer is served with a copy of an application made under subsection 174(1) to that Court for the determination of a question, the Minister shall not take any of the actions described in paragraphs 225.1(1)(a) to 225.1(1)(g) for the purpose of collecting that part of an amount assessed, the liability for payment of which will be affected by the determination of the question, before the day on which the question is determined by the Court.

Abeyance not Relevant When Clear Decision On A "Same Or Substantially The Same" Issue

Subsection 225.1(5) provides that the Minister can proceed with any collection actions cited in Sec. 225.1(1) when the TCC, FC or SCC does render a judgment on a "same or substantially the same" issue, notwithstanding that the taxpayer has made an Objection or has appealed to the Tax Court.

Idem – 225.1(5)

Notwithstanding any other provision in this section, where a taxpayer has served a notice of objection under this Act to an assessment or has appealed to the Tax Court of Canada from an assessment and agrees in writing with the Minister to delay proceedings on the objection or appeal, as the case may be, until judgment has been given in another action before the Tax Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court of Canada in which the issue is the same or substantially the same as that raised in the objection or appeal of the taxpayer, the Minister may take any of the actions described in paragraphs 225.1(1)(a) to 225.1(1)(g) for the purpose of collecting the amount assessed, or a part thereof, determined in a manner consistent with the decision or judgment of the Court in the other action at any time after the Minister notifies the taxpayer in writing that the decision of the Tax Court of Canada in that action has been mailed to the Minister, judgment has been pronounced by the Federal Court of Appeal in that action, or judgment has been delivered by the Supreme Court of Canada in that action, as the case may be.

Charles Webster v. The Minister Of National Revenue et al., 2003 FCA 442, Agreement on Ancillary Test Case does not Prompt Statutory Collection Delay Protections if Test Case Not Favourable

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

ROTHSTEIN J.A.

[1] The issue in this appeal from Heneghan J. of the Trial Division (as it then was) is the interpretation of subsection 225.1(5) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1 as amended. The appeal involves when the Minister of National Revenue may take collection action after a decision is issued in another action, pending which the taxpayer and the Minister had agreed to hold a Notice of Objection in abeyance pursuant to subsection 225.1(5).

Digitized by Google

FACTS

[2] The appellant, Charles Webster, was reassessed in respect of his 1991, 1992 and 1993 taxation years. He filed a Notice of Objection with the Minister. While the Notice of Objection was pending before the Minister, the appellant and the Minister, as contemplated by subsection 225.1(5), entered into an agreement to delay proceedings on the objection until judgment was given in another case - Global Communications v. The Queen. Global's appeal was allowed in part in the Tax Court, 97 D.T.C. 1293, but on appeal to this Court, [1999] F.C.J. No. 966, its appeal was dismissed and the Minister's cross-appeal allowed. The judgment of this Court was issued on June 18, 1999. On October 27, 2000, the Minister issued a notice to the appellant confirming the reassessments against him. By letter dated November 7, 2000, the Minister indicated his intention to proceed with collection action in respect of the amounts at issue in the reassessments. On December 7, 2000, the appellant filed a Notice of Appeal in the Tax Court of Canada in respect of the reassessments.

[3] The appellant, relying on subsection 225.1(3), says the Minister is precluded from taking collection action against him until his appeal in the Tax Court is determined and a copy of the Tax Court decision is mailed to him. The Minister says that the appellant, by agreeing to delay proceedings on his Notice of Objection by an agreement in writing of the kind referred to in subsection 225.1(5), waived any protection against collection provided by subsection 225.1(3). The Minister could therefore commence collection action at any time after notifying the appellant of the decision of the Tax Court in Global.

[4] The appellant brought an application for judicial review in the Trial Division seeking a declaration, injunction, and writ of prohibition enjoining the Minister from taking any collection action. Heneghan J. dismissed the appellant's judicial review. I agree that the judicial review was properly dismissed.

RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[5] The relevant provisions of the Act are subsections 225.1(1), (2), (3) and (5). Subsections 225.1(1), and (3) provide a continuum of protection precluding the Minister from taking collection action against the taxpayer:

> first, until after the day that is 90 days after the day of mailing of a Notice of Assessment;
> second, if the taxpayer serves a Notice of Objection, until after the day that is 90 days after the day the Minister has mailed to the taxpayer a Notice of Confirmation or Variation of the assessment;
> third, if the taxpayer appeals from the Confirmation or Variation to the Tax Court, until the day of mailing of a copy of the decision of the Tax Court to the taxpayer.

[6] Subsections 225.1(1), (2) and (3) provide:

7] Subsection 225.1(5) provides that where the Minister and a taxpayer enter into a written agreement to delay proceedings on an objection or appeal until a decision is given in another action, the Minister may take collection action in a manner consistent with the judgment of the Court in the other action at any time after the Minister notifies the taxpayer in writing of the decision in the other action. Subsection 225.1(5) provides:

ANALYSIS

[8] It appears that subsection 225.1(5) is intended to save the taxpayer and the Minister the administrative and litigation costs of pursuing an objection or appeal if it is thought that the decision in a case in which the issue is the same, or substantially the same, may be dispositive of the taxpayer's objection or appeal.

[9] An agreement under subsection (5), however, only deals with collection. It is not an agreement whereby the Minister and the taxpayer are necessarily bound by the decision in the other action. The taxpayer is not precluded from filing an appeal or continuing with an appeal irrespective of the decision in the other action.

[10] However, once the Minister notifies the taxpayer of the decision in the other action, the Minister is free to take collection action against the taxpayer. The plain meaning of subsection (5) supports this view. The combination of the opening words of the subsection "Notwithstanding any other provision in this section" ... and the empowering words which come later " the Minister may take any of the actions described ... at any time after the Minister notifies the taxpayer..." leave little doubt as to the legislator's intention. The immunity from collection action found in subsections (2) and (3) is subordinated to the Minister's right to proceed under subsection (5).

[11] The appellant argues that the words "as the case may be" in subsection (5) should be interpreted to mean that an agreement to delay proceedings on an objection does not constitute an agreement to delay an appeal to the Tax Court. As a result, an agreement to delay an objection will not prevent subsection (3) from protecting the taxpayer against collection action if a notice of appeal is filed in the Tax Court after notification of the decision in the other action.

[12] I am of the opinion that the words "as the case may be" are intended to ensure that an agreement to delay proceedings is specific to the stage of the taxpayer's proceedings with the Minister. That is, if the agreement is made at the objection stage, it delays the objection; if it is made at the appeal stage, it delays the appeal. But once the delay is ended by notification of the decision in the other action, the Minister is free to take collection action at any time.

[13] I think the appellant's interpretation of subsection (5) would lead to two unexplained anomalies. First, if the appellant's interpretation is correct, a taxpayer who agreed to a delay at the objection stage would be in a better position than a taxpayer who agreed to a delay at the appeal stage. If an agreement is made at the objection stage and the taxpayer files a Notice of Appeal after being notified of the decision in the other action, protection against collection under subsection (3) would apply. However, in the case of a taxpayer who had already filed a Notice of Appeal in the Tax Court before making the agreement, that protection would be lost by reason of subsection (5). There is no logical reason to support such a difference in treatment. The right of the Minister to take collection action arises when the taxpayer is notified of the decision in the other action irrespective of whether the taxpayer's case is at the objection or appeal stage.

[14] Second, the appellant concedes that the words "at any time" in subsection (5) mean that the Minister may take collection action at any time after notification of the decision in the other action. Yet he says that as soon as the taxpayer files a Notice of Appeal in the Tax Court, the Minister would have to stop that collection action. However, it seems to me that, if the intent of subsection (5) was to give collection protection to a taxpayer once a Notice of Appeal was filed in the Tax Court, the wording of subsection (5) would parallel the wording in subsection (2). That is, the taxpayer would be given 90 days to file a Notice of Appeal in the Tax Court before collection action could be taken. On the contrary, the words "at any time" are used, which are the antithesis of the continuum of protection against collection provided by subsections (1)-(3). [15] In the alternative, the appellant says that the judgment in the Global case is not the same or substantially the same as the issues in his case and cites a number of differences. He says that on judicial review, the Court must determine if the issues in his Notice of Objection and in the Global decision are or are not the same or substantially the same, and, if they are not, the Minister may not invoke subsection (5) to take collection action. Rather, he says, once an appeal is filed in the Tax Court, he should be entitled to protection from collection action under subsection (3).

[16] I cannot agree. For the purposes of subsection (5), the issue is whether an agreement in writing to delay proceedings pending the outcome in the other action has been entered into. Where the parties agree in writing that the issues in the other case are the same or substantially the same, a Court on judicial review will not go behind that agreement.

[17] The actual decision in the other action only becomes relevant when determining how much of the amount assessed may be collected. I do not preclude the possibility of a dispute over the amount assessed against the taxpayer "determined in a manner consistent with the decision or judgment of the court in the other action." However, that is a dispute as to what amount the Minister may collect, not whether he is free to take collection action at all.

CONCLUSION

[18] I conclude that once an agreement is entered into under subsection (5), the taxpayer is bound by the subsection (5) procedure and collection action may be taken at any time after notification of the decision in the other action, notwithstanding subsections (2) and (3). The taxpayer is not required to enter into such an agreement but if he elects to do so, he is bound by the agreement and the right of the Minister to take collection action at any time after notification of the decision in the other action.

[19] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.
[20] The Court was requested to permit written submissions on the matter of costs. Within 7 days of the date of these reasons, the Minister shall serve and file written submissions of not more than 2 pages. The Court will entertain a request for a lump sum of costs inclusive of fees and disbursements. Within 7 days of receipt of the Minister's submissions as to costs, the appellant shall serve and file written submissions of not more than 2 pages in respect of costs. Of course, it is open to the parties to agree to costs if they are able to do so and to so advise the Court.

Background Information

This section identifies background information related to Requirement to Pay:

- Security Under the Bank Act
- Registration of the Notice of Intention to Enforce Security
- Security Debenture Given to a Bank and Other Lenders
- Personal Property Security Legislation
- Collection Restrictions on Reassessments

Security Under the Bank Act

Section 427 of the Bank Act authorizes a bank to lend money against the security of the borrower's equipment and products, including the book debts arising from the sale of these products. Pledging such security transfers ownership of the book debts to the bank. In order for the security to be effective against other creditors, a Notice of Intention must be registered in the appropriate agency not more than three years before the security is given. Registration of a Notice of Intention with one agency will not be reflected at any other agency. If the Notice of Intention is not registered with the correct office, then the security is not valid against third parties.

Therefore, it is important that Collectors investigate the correct office and the time frame to ensure that the security agreement is valid.

For more details refer to Memoranda 03-09, Validating Bank Act Security (S.427 Bank Act).

- TD Canada Trust in Newfoundland

Registration of the Notice of Intention to Enforce Security

Registration of the Notice of Intention to Enforce Security must occur at:

a) the agency for the province in which is located the place of business of the person by whom or on whose behalf a Notice of Intention is signed

b) if that person has more than one place of business in Canada and the places of business are not in the same province, the agency for the province in which is located the principal place of business of that person, or

c) if that person has no place of business, the agency for the province in which the person resides

Registration of a Notice of Intention to Enforce Security with one office of the Bank of Canada or an authorized representative of the Bank of Canada, or Clerk of the Court will not be reflected at any other office.

Security Debenture Given to a Bank and Other Lenders

A security debenture given to a bank or other lenders in return for a loan or advance constitutes a continuing charge on the assets of the company, which may include the book debts. Three types of charges are:

- a fixed charge debenture
- a floating charge debenture
- combination of a fixed charge and a floating charge debenture

Related Topics:

- When Is a Combination Charge Debenture Created

When Is a Fixed Charge Debenture Created

A fixed charge debenture is created when the security document specifies and describes the assets covered by the charge.

When Is a Floating Charge Debenture Created

Digitized by Google

A floating charge debenture is created when there is a continuous charge on the assets of the company but the company is permitted to deal freely with those assets in the usual course of business until the security holder intervenes to enforce his claim. The pool of assets over which the charge floats will be constantly changing, unless something happens to cause the floating charge to crystallize. The bank will then intervene to enforce its claim. In Quebec, a Movable Hypothec without delivery would constitute a similar charge.

When Is a Combination Charge Debenture Created

A combination charge is created when there is a fixed charge on certain assets and a floating charge on certain assets. The security document describes which assets are covered by the fixed charge and which assets are covered by the floating charge.

Crystallizing a Floating Charge Debenture

Crystallizing or transforming a floating charge debenture into a fixed charge debenture occurs when the security becomes enforceable allowing the bank to take action.

Under the terms of a floating charge debenture, certain acts or events described in the security document will cause the security to become enforceable by the bank. These may include default in payment, the commission of an act of bankruptcy, a bulk sale of assets, etc.

The action or actions necessary for the bank to effect crystallization are also stated in the security document and usually include the giving of notice and the appointment of a Receiver. When crystallization occurs, the bank's customer is no longer free to deal with the assets covered by the security.

Personal Property Security Legislation

The provincial personal property security legislation or other similar provincial legislation provide for the registration of a general assignment of book debts or a debenture. The personal property security legislation has its own security document and it can, depending on its terms, supplement or replace a general assignment of book debts and debenture.

Collection Restrictions on Reassessments

Previously, the Agency had taken the position that collection restrictions, imposed by section 225.1 of the Income Tax Act, applied only to additional amounts assessed in a reassessment, provided that the 90-day restriction period had expired on the original assessment. There was no policy on this subject in relation to the Excise Act 2001. Although the old policy and procedures manual for the Excise Tax Act – Non-GST did contain the collection restriction on reassessments, we will include the Excise Tax Act – Non-GST in this new policy for consistency purposes.

Since subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act (ITA), section 2 of the Excise Act 2001 (EA 2001) and subsection 58.1(1) of the Excise Tax Act (ETA) define an assessment to include a reassessment, collection restrictions, imposed by section 225.1 of the ITA, section 286 of the EA 2001 and section 86 of the ETA, apply to the full amount of a reassessment. Therefore, once the Agency has issued a notice of reassessment, we will not continue or initiate collection actions, in respect of the amounts reassessed:

Digitized by Google

- until after the day that is 90 days after the day of the mailing of the notice of reassessment (ITA, EA 2001 and ETA);

- until after the day that is 90 days after the day on which a notice is mailed to the debtor that the Agency has confirmed or varied the assessment, following the filing by the debtor of a notice of objection to the reassessment, in respect of the amount in controversy (ITA, EA 2001 and ETA);

- before the day of mailing of a copy of the decision of the Court to the debtor or the day on which the debtor discontinues the appeal, whichever is the earlier following the filing of a notice of appeal on the reassessment, in respect of the amount in controversy (ITA, EA 2001 and ETA); and

- This applies to the ITA only: before the day on which the Court has determined a question, where a taxpayer has agreed, under ss. 173(1), that the Tax Court of Canada should determine a question, or where a taxpayer is served with a copy of an application, made under s. 174(1) to that Court, for a determination of a question, in respect of that part of an amount assessed, the liability for payment of which will be affected by the determination of the question (ITA only).

  Exception: Under the ITA only, collection restrictions do not apply to a reassessment made following the waiver of penalty or interest under subsection 220(3.1).

Related Topic:

- Collection Measure Undertaken Prior to Reassessment

Collection Measure Undertaken Prior to Reassessment

A reassessment of a particular tax year under the ITA or an amount owing under the EA 2001 or ETA does not affect or destroy the validity of collection actions in respect of the amount owing, when such action was taken before the reassessment. Accordingly, the Agency is not legally required to withdraw a requirement to pay, pursuant to subsection 224(1) or (1.1) of the ITA, subsection 289(1) or (2) of the EA 2001 and subsection 84(1) of ETA or return monies collected before the reassessment.

If the reassessment has resulted in a lesser amount owing, and the new amount, arising from the reassessment, has been satisfied by the amounts already collected, any collection taken will have to be cancelled.

If the Agency had issued a Requirement to Pay or a Set-off on the initial assessment or an earlier reassessment, in respect of a particular tax year under the ITA or an amount owing under the EA 2001 or the ETA that has been reassessed, the policy is that the TSO will immediately advise the third parties not to comply with the Requirement to Pay or Set-off until further notice, or, if they prefer, cancel the Requirement to Pay or Set-off and reissue a new one after the 90-day collection restriction has expired. If the Requirement to Pay or Set-off had not been cancelled the Agency will instruct those third parties to resume remitting garnishee payments to the Receiver General or effecting set-off when collection restrictions expire.

Alberta Workers' Compensation Board Entitlement to Set Off

Where benefits have been paid in error, the Workers' Compensation Board (WCB) of Alberta is entitled to set-off against benefits in priority to a Requirement to Pay issued by CRA. Also, by virtue of section 44 of the Worker's Compensation Act the WCB has the discretion to redirect periodic compensation benefits to either:

- a spouse or child dependent of the worker and residing in Alberta without adequate means of support
- a spouse or child in the case of Court ordered maintenance or alimony whether or not residing in Alberta

Business Access Canada (formerly Contracts Canada)

Business Access Canada's site provides information with respect to all federal government contracts that have been awarded through Public Works and Government Services Canada (PWGSC). For example, if the Department of Agriculture is purchasing cleaning services for their offices, the information with respect to who was awarded the contract would be displayed on the Business Access Canada site. Consequently, collection officers should conduct routine searches of this readily available site. For further details, refer to Business Access Canada.

Factors to Consider Before Issuing a Requirement to Pay

In the case of Taxation amounts refer to the Income Tax Act, section 225.1 for the collection restrictions that are effective for 90 days after the day of the mailing of the notice of assessment.

Factors to consider before issuing a Requirement to Pay:

- ensure that all amounts are legally collectible
- the tax debtor has not sought protection under a provision of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (with the exception of Enhanced Requirement to Pay issued in respect of a source deductions liability)
- ensure that the debt is not under appeal
- recognize the consequences of putting an X in category 4 of the Requirement to Pay
- set the terms of the Requirement to Pay according to the tax debtor's ability to pay

  Note: For additional information, refer to Directive ARD 02-04, Garnishment - Calculation of Deductions except for the province of Quebec where this Directive is in abeyance.

- apply good judgement when issuing a Requirement to Pay
- a financial institution has a right to offset if it is owed an amount on a loan that is payable on demand; any surplus of funds must be remitted to CRA
- trust accounts are used by lawyers, notaries, Real Estate companies, trustees in bankruptcy, Executors of estate etc. Bank accounts opened " in trust " hold funds for third parties and therefore can be seized only under exceptionally rare circumstances, usually by obtaining a Garnishee Court Order (GCO) rather than by issuing a Requirement to Pay. Also, the GCO will generally aim at seizing funds held in trust by a third person, for example, a lawyer, on behalf of a specific tax debtor known to be this lawyer's regular client.

  Note: There is another type of trust account, which may be attached by garnishment. At times, in order to escape the scope of a garnishment, a tax debtor will do his banking transactions via a so called "in trust" account opened usually for a related family member such as a child. In this particular case, a detailed review of the bank account is required to identify if the deemed owner of such a bank account is actually the debtor and therefore providing proof to justify its seizure via garnishment. It should be noted that a Requirement for Information will be required to access these banking records to demonstrate that the funds are held for and used by the tax debtor and not the person named in the trust account. Also, we should research the Bank's policy with respect to trust accounts to determine who they deem to be the actual owner of that account.

When to Issue a Requirement to Pay on Joint Bank Accounts

Issue a Requirement to Pay (RTP) on joint bank accounts when:

- the signatories on the joint bank account are jointly and severally liable as a result of a partnership debt on account of income tax, source deductions or GST
- the signatories on the joint bank account have, in their capacity as corporate directors, each been assessed in respect of the corporation's failure to remit source deductions or GST
- where one of the signatories is liable for personal taxes and the other signatory has been assessed, under the Income Tax Act, section 160 or the Excise Tax Act, section 325 in respect of a non-arm's length transfer, in which case the liability is, to the extent of the amount assessed against the transferee, owed jointly and severally

  Note: This circumstance is not restricted to taxes due by an individual, but is equally applicable in the case of a proprietor owing source deductions or GST and making a non-arm's length transfer to a co-signatory of a jointly held bank account.

- in the province of Québec, some financial institutions may comply with a garnishee on a joint bank account where the tax debtor is one of the two holders and bank deposits can be traced to the tax debtor. Some other financial institutions will comply with the extent of freezing the joint bank account. Other financial institutions will comply by merely remitting the total contents of the joint account in the name of the Receiver General and the second holder of the joint bank account. When this is the case, unless we are able to have the other holder endorse the remittance, the RTP is not valid.
- except for the province of Québec, do not garnish joint bank accounts when only one of the joint bank account holders is indebted to CRA
- the joint bank account holders are both indebted but for different debts

For further detail refer to the procedures, Requirement to Pay Issued to Joint Bank Accounts in Québec and Requirement to Pay Issued to Joint Bank Accounts in Other Provinces and to the directive, RCD-95-01, Garnishment of Joint Accounts.

Garnishable Sources

Garnishable sources include:

Digitized by Google

- salaries
- wages

  Note: If there is any doubt that the tax debtor is still employed by an employer confirm employment by telephone prior to issuing a garnishment.

  Refer to Directive ARD 02-04, Garnishment - Calculation of Deductions, for guidelines for computing the amounts from employment that are subject to application of a Requirement to Pay except for the province of Quebec where the Directive is in abeyance.

- bank accounts, including joint bank accounts

  Refer to When to Issue Requirement to Pay on Joint Bank Accounts for policy and Requirement to Pay Issued to Joint Bank Accounts in Quebec and Requirement to Pay on Joint Bank Accounts in Other Provinces for the appropriate procedures.

  Note: A bank account may constitute the first enforced funds to clear all or most of the tax arrears. However, be aware that this action could also close a business.

- unused line of credit to the extent that it will freeze the account as the financial institution will require the debtor's consent to satisfy the Requirement to Pay
- irregular payments made to individuals who provide property and/or services to a person
- term deposits, guaranteed investment certificates (GIC)
- Refer to GarnishingTerm Deposits or GICs Requiring the Original Document and Garnishing Non-Redeemable Term Deposits, GICs or RRSPs for further detail.
- Registered Retirement Savings Plans (RRSP)

  Note: RRSPs are used as a last resort because deregistration can generate an additional tax liability for the year in which it is cashed. Refer to Directive ARD-2003-004 Funds Held in RRSP's.

- Rental income

  Refer to Communication ARD-2004-011 Changes to Requirements to Pay Issued to Tenants where the Landlord Debtor is an Individual for instructions on how to complete a Requirement to Pay where the tax debtor is an individual landlord and the third parties his tenants.

- Integrated Proceeds of Crime

  Refer to Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies for further details.

- other sources of income, for example, pension income, dividend payment etc.

  Refer to Garnishing Pension Benefits in Ontario for further detail.

Digitized by Google

- companies that have been awarded government contracts

  Refer to Background Information, Business Access Canada for further detail.

- alimony payments providing they are granted to and for support of the spouse debtor and not for child support and, as in all cases, the RTP does not create an undue hardship to the tax debtor. Memoranda 01-21 Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act, delegates authority approval to the Team Leader as the lowest level of approval

Non Garnishable Sources

Non-garnishable sources include:

- accounts receivable and assets of a partnership to satisfy a personal tax liability of one of the partners. The Quebec Civil Code makes exception for an undeclared partnership where, in respect of third persons, each partner retains the ownership of the property constituting his contribution to the undeclared partnership

- accounts receivable in which a third party has a security interest duly registered to the extent of the unpaid portion of the secured creditor's debt and, providing the secured creditor has enforced its security

  Note: This does not apply to accounts receivable garnished with an Enhanced Requirement to Pay.

- amounts payable to a spouse in accordance with a separation agreement or divorce decree for the maintenance and support of dependent children

- in any situation where the financial institution freezes the trust account of our client and Agency officials have no evidence to suggest that the account is being used to facilitate non-trust transactions, the financial institution should be advised that the Requirement to Pay is not effective against these funds

- income earned by a Canadian citizen employed by a foreign government

- provincial legislation exempts specific types of life insurance registered retirement savings plans from seizure

  Refer to Directive ARD-2003-004 Funds Held In RRSPs for further detail.

Category 4 Criteria

The provisions of category 4 on the requirement to pay only become operative when an "x" is identified in box 4. A requirement to pay with an "x" identified in box 4 is issued to a financial institution or an individual in different situations and is effective, under subsection 224(1.1) or 317(2) ETA, for 90 days. All other terms of the requirement under subsections 224(1), 224(1.2), and 317(1) & (3) ETA will remain in effect of a period of one year.

Issuing a Requirement to Pay with an "x" in Category 4 to Financial Institutions

Issue a requirement to pay to a financial institution with an "x" identified in box 4, in the following situations:

- all accounts receivable are pledged pursuant to a valid security agreement and all other assets are fully encumbered
- the tax debtor is receiving payments in the form of loans or advances that are secured
- the tax debtor becomes indebted to the financial institution at some point during the effective period of the requirement to pay and has provided security for the indebtedness
- the tax debtor is already indebted and it is suspected that the tax debtor may, within 90 days, for garnishments issued pursuant to the Excise Tax Act, section 317 and the Income Tax ss. 224(1.1) and one year for garnishments issued pursuant to the Income Tax, ss. 224(1), borrow further and provide security to the financial institution

When box 4 is activated, the Requirement to Pay under subsection 224(1.1) will remain in effect for 90 days. All other terms of the Requirement to Pay will remain in effect for one year. Be sure to advise the bank that was served with the Requirement to Pay of these timeframes.

Issuing a Requirement to Pay with an "x" in Box 4 to an Individual

Issue a requirement to pay to an individual with an "x" identified in box 4, in the following situations:

- grounds exist to suspect that within 90 days for requirements to pay issued pursuant to the Income Tax Act, ss. 224(1.1) and the Excise Tax Act, ss. 317(2) that:

Digitized by Google

- a person will loan or advance moneys to the tax debtor
- a person will make a payment on behalf of the tax debtor who is suspected to be employed or engaged in providing services or property to the person
- the tax debtor is not dealing at arm's length with a person which is a corporation and it is suspected that the corporation will loan or advance moneys, to or will make payments on behalf of the tax debtor

  Note: Where there is evidence of moneys owed to the tax debtor in the form of a loan for which no repayment date is stipulated, CRA considers the loan payable on demand.

- it is unclear whether a payment constitutes an advance or other type of payment
- the tax debtor is receiving payments in the form of loans or advances

When box 4 is activated, the Requirement to Pay under subsection 224(1.1) will remain in effect for 90 days. All other terms of the Requirement to Pay will remain in effect for one year.

Validity Period

A Requirement to Pay when issued is valid for the following periods:

- garnishments issued pursuant to subsections 224(1) and 224(1.2) ITA or 317(1) and 317(3) ETA attach funds payable or that become payable to the tax debtor within one year
- where these monies include periodic payments, the garnishee remains valid during or after the one year period until such time as the liability captured by the Requirement to Pay is satisfied. Periodic payments are defined as recurring payments not necessarily at precise time intervals, (Callwood v. Her Majesty the Queen, 2006 FCA 188).
- in circumstances where Box 4 has been "Xed", the garnishee will attach those funds that would otherwise be lent, advanced or paid to a tax debtor, and is valid only for 90 days from the date of service. However, the remaining terms of the garnishee still remain valid for up to one year from the date of service, unless the monies being received are periodic payments in which case the garnishee will remain valid for up to one year or until such time as the liability captured by the requirement to pay is satisfied

Garnishment and the Indian Act

Refer to the Indian Act* – Collection Guidelines' Chapter for information on how to determine whether funds payable to a First Nation's member may be eligible for garnishment.

Service of the Requirement to Pay to a Designated Branch

The Bank Act now allows the serving of a Requirement to Pay to designated branches for the Chartered Banks. These service points are to be used when the Bank may be known, but the particular branch is unknown.

Digitized by Google

Under no circumstances may the use of this new facility be used as a method to arbitrarily search for bank account(s). You must have reasonable expectation that the taxpayer does in fact deal with a particular financial institution.

For a list of designated branches, refer to Appendix A of Communication TSDMB-2006-020 (ARD), Changes to the Bank Act allowing a Designated Branch for the point of Service for Requirements to Pay and Requirements for Information.

Refer to the Procedures section entitled Completing a Requirement to Pay when Serving a Designated Branch.

Enhanced Requirement to Pay (ERTP)

Since its enactment, in 1987, the policy surrounding the application of an ERTP has evolved from their initial use of attaching account/trade receivables to a broader use, similar in scope to the application of the Deemed Trust provisions.

However, an ERTP will usually represent an amount greater that what can be claimed under the Deemed Trust provisions.

ERTP enable the Agency to claim priority over amounts payable to a debtor, despite the fact that secured creditors may have claims against the funds.

What Amounts to Include in an Enhanced Requirement to Pay

ERTP issued under the ITA only apply to liabilities arising as a result of amounts deducted from employees' remuneration that have not been remitted. Such liabilities include amounts for federal and provincial income tax, employees' and employers' share of CPP contributions and EI premiums as well as related penalty and interest.

ERTP issued under the ITA must not be used to collect a debt:

Digitized by Google

- arising from assessments raised for failure to deduct amounts from employees' remuneration such as income tax, Part XIII tax, CPP contributions or EI premiums (whether or not the assessment has been issued on a notional basis)
- arising from assessments raised for directors' liability issued pursuant to the ITA or the ETA.
- amounts arbitrarily assessed
- late-filed T-4 Information Return penalties
- penalties or interest related to any of the above amounts
- amounts deducted or withheld before December 17, 1987

In the instances noted above use a regular Requirement to Pay.

An ERTP issued under the Excise Tax Act captures any debt assessed pursuant to Part IX of the Act. Consequently, it would be appropriate to use the ERTP provisions to claim priority over the interests of secured creditors, to recover assessed and not remitted net GST plus related penalties and interest whether or not the assessment has been issued on a notional basis, provided the circumstances are within the guidelines provided in Communication ARD-2004-009, Deemed Trusts and Enhanced Requirements To Pay - Non-Construction Sector.

It should be noted the net GST is to be remitted by the registrant regardless of whether the registrant has collected the tax.

Whether issued pursuant to provisions of the ITA or ETA care must be exercised to ensure that the ERTP only refer to amounts that can be legitimately included on the garnishment document to avoid the possibility of a Court ruling the ERTP to be invalid.

An ERTP issued pursuant to the Air Travellers Charge Security Act applies to any assessed liability under that Act, including penalties and interest. Accordingly, the use of an ERTP is appropriate to claim priority over the interests of secured creditors, whether or not the assessment has been issued on a notional basis.

When to Use an Enhanced Requirement to Pay

The question of whether an ERTP is valid and enforceable in a given situation is a matter of related facts and provincial statutes as applicable to where the property is located. For further details refer to Communication ARD-2004-009, Deemed Trusts and Enhanced Requirements To Pay - Non-Construction Sector.

One test that the ERTP provisions must pass in order to apply is that the funds sought to be intercepted "...but for the security interest...would be payable to the tax debtor". It may be that this "but for" requirement has not been met when the funds resulted from a sale that the debtor did not initiate, or consent to. Regardless, Collection Officers are encouraged to issue the ERTP in such circumstances and, upon being challenged, contact the Department of Justice immediately to determine if there is an amount "...that but for the security interest...would be payable to the tax debtor".

Counsel will advise when and if the Collection Officer must:

- claim priority on another basis

Digitized by Google

- withdraw the ERTP; or
- let the ERTP stand

Issue an ERTP to intercept the following:

Note: The following list is not exhaustive; moreover it is not applicable to the construction industry:

- accounts receivable
- to intercept proceeds from real property that are surplus after property taxes attributable to the specific property have been paid to the municipality and all prescribed security interests have been satisfied
- when the debtor is also a secured creditor, to intercept any payments or disposition of proceeds that the debtor is entitled to receive because of the security interest, despite the fact that the debtor's security may be a prescribed security interest
- to intercept payments due to a debtor under rental or lease arrangements for real or personal property

  Note: In the case of real property see Directive RCD-00-31 Mortgagee in Possession and Attornment of Rent and obtain the assistance of Department of Justice if necessary.

- when a secured creditor is taking action to realize from security to intercept proceeds from the disposition of personal property that is subject to a chattel mortgage, purchase money security interest, or any other form of voluntary or non-consensual security interest

  Note: It is recommended that DOJ be contacted to determine if the secured creditor has met the "but for" test. Please refer to the exception concerning a landlord's distress action for rent arrears as set out within the section When Not to Assert Priority Under An Enhanced Requirement to Pay and within Communication ARD-2004-009, Deemed Trusts and Enhanced Requirements To Pay - Non-Construction Sector.

- to intercept amounts deposited or invested with a third party, such as a financial institution
- to intercept amounts receivable by a debtor for goods or services, whether or not they were provided in the course of a debtor's usual business activities; (e. g. old equipment that has been replaced or sold)
- to intercept proceeds of insurance claims payable such as those that pertain to a debtor's inventory
- to intercept the proceeds of insurance claims in the case of real property to obtain surplus funds that remain after prescribed security interests have been satisfied

Note: Please ensure that a National Early Warning System (NEWS) Report has been completed in advance of any Collection action against sensitive sources (for e.g. Media threat) or in any circumstance deemed applicable by a local TSO.

When Not to Assert Priority Under An Enhanced Requirement to Pay

Specific circumstances where an ERTP must not be used to assert priority are set below. For further detail refer to Communication ARD-2004-009 Deemed Trusts and Enhanced Requirements To Pay - Non-Construction Sector. Please note this section does not apply to the construction sector.

- to claim priority over a sheriff's fee that pertains to seizure and sale of a debtor's property (Note: when a sheriff's or bailiff's fee if acting in the capacity of a sheriff, appears excessive, contact Headquarters)
- to intercept the proceeds from dispositions resulting from a landlord's distress action for rent arrears (Note: it may be possible to claim priority on the basis of the deemed trust provisions)
- to intercept proceeds from real property dispositions that are required to satisfy a creditor's prescribed security interest
- to intercept proceeds from real property dispositions required to satisfy property tax arrears due to a municipality
- to intercept proceeds of insurance claims payable to secured creditors to the extent that they relate to property that is subject to prescribed security interests
- to intercept proceeds of insurance claims that pertain to the repair or restoration of real property that is subject to prescribed security interests; and
- to intercept proceeds of insurance claims that relate to the repair or restoration of either real property or personal property when:
  - i. the work has been authorized by the insurance company
  - ii. the person authorized to do the work is at arm's length with the debtor; and
  - iii. the work has been completed or substantially completed

Memoranda of Understanding

When administering the policies set out in Communication ARD-2004-009, Deemed Trusts and Enhanced Requirements To Pay - Non-Construction Sector, Tax Services Offices must take into account the implications of funds sharing "Memoranda of Understanding" when a MOU exists between the Agency and a province or territory. It is emphasized that such a MOU does not apply when:

- a case comes under the jurisdiction of either the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; or
- a case is brought before the court

Enhanced Requirement to Pay in Receivership Situations

The use of enhanced requirements to pay in receivership situations is flexible and each case should be decided on its own merits. The application of an enhanced requirement to pay will require the cooperation of receivers. Further, the circumstances of individual cases may, in some instances, cause concern to some receivers. Therefore, give consideration to the receiver's concerns, although it may not always be possible to accommodate every concern.

For further detail refer to the procedure, Collecting a Tax Debt in Receivership Situations and to the Directive (RCD 95-5) The Use of Enhanced Garnishment in Receivership.

Enhanced Requirement to Pay in Construction Setting

The Supreme Court of Canada, has confirmed in the case, TransGas Ltd. vs. Mid-Plains Contractors Ltd. that enhanced requirements to pay issued under the Excise Tax Act, subsection 317(3) and the Income Tax Act, subsection 224(1.2) take precedence over the rights of lien claimants pursuant to builder's lien legislation.

The enhanced garnishment is not to be enforced in respect of percentage holdbacks under provincial building lien registration providing the lien claims are valid. For further details refer to Memorandum 01-07 entitled Directive CO-88-13 and Memorandum CO-92-13 Construction Lien Claims and Double Jeopardy.

Enhanced Requirement to Pay in Consumer Proposal

Although the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act imposes no impediment on the Agency from issuing an Enhanced Requirement to Pay to recover source deductions in a consumer proposal, it should only be done if the insolvent debtor is reluctant to guarantee payment of those amounts within six months of the approval of the proposal. For further details, refer to Directive RCD-01-05, The Status of Source Deductions in a Consumer Proposal.

> Note: If an Enhanced Requirement to Pay has been issued prior to a tax debtor filing a Notice of Intention to file a proposal, the third party should be instructed to remit any funds to the tax debtor. The effect of the Enhanced Requirement to Pay is not to be released merely suspended. For further details and examples of release letters to be used, refer to Directive RCD-01-06, Liquidation Proposals.

Enhanced Requirement to Pay under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act

Usually, a company will ask the Court to stay the Agency from issuing Enhanced Requirements to Pay to collect the Payroll Deductions debt. In so doing, the company is committed to pay the entire Payroll Deductions debt due within six months of the approval of the plan. As well, the company must remain up to date on current remittances.

If the company does not ask the Court to prohibit the use of Enhanced Requirements to Pay, the "notwithstanding" clause of the Enhanced Requirement to Pay provision (Subsection 224 (1.2) of the ITA) applies, and Enhanced Requirements to Pay can be issued provided that:

- the stay of proceedings order does not bar the Agency from doing so; or

Digitized by Google

- the company is liquidating its assets; or
- the stay of proceedings terminates as per one of the following:
  - the order expires
  - the plan is rejected by the creditors or the Court
  - there is a default on any of the terms of the plan
  - six months has elapsed since the sanctioning of the plan
  - creditors realize on their security on property which could be subject to an Enhanced Requirement to Pay issued pursuant to Subsection 224 (1.2)

    Note: In all instances, an opinion on this issue should be obtained from the Dept. of Justice.

For additional details, refer to the Directive ARD 01-02, The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Service of Enhanced Requirements To Pay

The information regarding the service of an ERTP is applicable whether issued pursuant to the ITA, ETA or the Air Travellers Security Charge Act.

The ERTP provisions provide for service by any means. Accordingly, Enhanced Requirements To Pay can be issued by using a variety of methods such as, for example, use of regular or registered mail, as well as being served personally.

The Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Air Travellers Security Charge Act deem anything, sent by first class mail, to have been received by the person to whom it was sent on the day it was mailed.

In the case Adele Schafer v. Her Majesty The Queen , (1998) T.C.J. No.459 Court File APP-478-96-GST, the court ruled:

> In a large organization, such as government department, a law or accounting firm or a corporation, where many pieces of mail are sent out every day, it is virtually impossible to find a witness who can swear that he or she put an envelope addressed to a particular person in the post office. The best that can be done is to set out in detail the procedures followed, such as addressing the envelopes, putting mail in them, taking them to the mailroom and delivering the mail to the post office.

In the Schafer case, The Federal Court of Appeal confirmed the use of this standard and, in doing so, determined service cannot be rebutted as it is deemed to have been made.

It is suggested that local procedures include that the Revenue Collections Division be notified by the mailroom whenever there is a disruption in the regular flow of outgoing mail so that a corresponding notation is made in the account's diary.

Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies

Digitized by Google

When is a Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies Issued

A Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies is issued to intercept monies:

- to satisfy a debt, due as a result of an assessment raised by the Investigations Division

  Note: The basis for the assessment is usually the monies seized by the police.

- where an Order of Disposition is granted returning the monies to the tax debtor

Collection officers should be mindful that officials are required to deal with seized property according to the time lines set out within the Criminal Code. Collections must first determine from Investigations, under which section of the Criminal Code the funds or assets were seized and the date the seizure took place. Most importantly, it needs to be determined when the detention order will expire and/or when the funds or property seized may become otherwise restorable to the tax debtor.

Please refer to Communication ARD-2004-006, Collections Policy for Integrated Proceeds of Crime (IPOC) Cases, for further details.

When is a Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies not Appropriate

A Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies is not appropriate when CRA seeks to seize:

- jewellery
- gold wafers
- vehicles
- real property

A Certificate registered within an applicable Provincial Registry System and/or a Writ of Seizure and Sale is required to effect the seizure of the above. Refer to the Certificates and Writs chapter for further detail.

When do Monies Become Available to CRA

Monies become available to CRA when:

- an Order of Restoration is given by a magistrate
- an Order of Disposition is given
- any portion of the money becomes otherwise returnable to the tax debtor

Monies Not Available To Satisfy a Debt

Digitized by Google

Concerns arise when all of the assets and/or funds of an accused have been seized. In some cases, the accused could make an application for restoration of some of the seized funds in order to finance their legal defence or living expenses by way of an application under section 462.34 of the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code provides that where an accused has no other means to fund a legal defence other than the assets that are seized and held, then a judge may make an order varying the original seizure and allow some of the funds to be dispersed to the accused or their counsel for these purposes. Be aware that an erosion of the funds can occur when the accused applies to have their legal defence or living expenses paid out from seized funds.

It is recommended that Collections should defer the collections of seized funds unless informed by investigations or the prosecuting lawyer that a successful forfeiture is no longer likely.

Monies not available to satisfy a debt also include:

- any monies used for the purchase of narcotics, where the tax debtor is convicted of an offence

  Note: The funds are disposed of by the SPMD.

- monies forfeited to the Crown
- monies where SPMD is unable to make an order for disposition
- monies held indefinitely by the police or SPMD
- when it is found that the tax debtor is not the owner of the money

Please refer to Communication ARD-2004-006, Collections Policy for Integrated Proceeds of Crime (IPOC) Cases, for further details or contact HQ Field Support or the Department of Justice for assistance in these matters.

Function of the Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies Covering Letter

The function of the Requirement to Pay Restorable Monies covering letter is to:

1) Advise police and/or the SPMD not to release the monies to the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) until:

   - an Order of Restoration is granted by the Magistrate ordering the monies be returned to the tax debtor
   - an Order is made by the Magistrate to return monies seized pursuant to a court order to the tax debtor
   - an Order of Disposition is issued by the SPMD ordering the monies returned to the tax debtor
   - any of the monies become otherwise restorable to the tax debtor

2) Request the police and/or the SPMD to notify CRA when one of these circumstances takes place.

Refund on Garnished Amounts

When a credit balance appears on an account as a result of garnishment action and the taxpayer requests a refund, the collection officer should ensure that no other monies are owed to CRA (including Memo Assessments). In order to hold the individual partners jointly and severally liable for the partnership debts a memorandum assessment must be raised against each individual partnership debt.

  For further details refer to Memorandum 03-05, Liability of Partnerships and Partners for GST/HST.

- Individual Partners of a Partnership for a Partnership Debt except in the Province of Quebec:

Partnerships in Quebec

Partnerships are either general partnerships, limited partnerships or undeclared partnerships. In Quebec, they are governed by the Civil Code of Quebec, Book Five, Title two, Chapter X.

- The Tax Debtor is a Partner

  In Quebec, little case law has dealt with the subject of Collections pursuant to the ITA and partnerships. It is therefore recommended to exercise care and address one Requirement to Pay in the partnership name as well as others to the partners' name citing the operating name of the partnership when aiming to attach sums that are liable to be paid to a tax debtor partner such as his share of the profits in the partnerships.

  As a rule, the assets of a partnership cannot be seized to satisfy a partner's personal liability. The exception lies in the undeclared partnership where, in respect of creditors, each partner has retained the ownership of the property constituting his contribution to the undeclared partnership. Such contribution can therefore be attached to satisfy a partner's personal liability.

  When contemplating the seizure of a partner's share in partnership, refer to Department of Justice for assistance.

- The Tax Debtor is a General or Limited Partnership Indebted for Payroll Deductions

  The Civil Code of Quebec, Article 2221 reads:

  > In respect of third persons, the partners are jointly liable for the obligations contracted by the partnerships but they are jointly and severally liable if the obligations have been contracted for the service or operation of an enterprise of the partnership.

  Before instituting proceedings for payment against a partner, the creditors shall first discuss the property of the partnership. Meaning, that creditors must first procede against the partnership's assets. When proceedings are instituted against a partner, the property of the partner is not applied to the payment of creditors of the partnership until after his own creditors are paid.

  Despite the clarity of article 2221 and again, in the absence of significant case law on the subject of Collections pursuant to the ITA and partnerships, cases involving the responsibility of a partnership or its partners for Payroll Deductions should be referred to the Department of Justice for legal advice.

- The Tax Debtor is an Undeclared Partnership Indebted for Payroll Deductions

  A garnishee is issued in the partners' name followed by the partnership name, for example, John Doe and Mary Doe sometime operating a partnership together or a firm under the name of Doe's Carpet Cleaner.

  An undeclared partnership is not bound to make declarations in the manner prescribed by the legislation concerning the legal publication of partnerships. For this reason it may be difficult to thoroughly identify current members. When a garnishee is issued to a bank, verify with the financial institution that there has not been any recent change in partners.

Digitized by Google

Financial Institutions

The task of identifying "legal entities" is complex, it is nevertheless vital to do so, in order to ensure that RTPs are issued to valid third parties. For example, some well-intentioned bank employees may direct you for instance to simply using the corporate brand name to capture all legal entities. This should not be done, as this could jeopardize the Crown's position in the event of an eventual non-compliance.

For example, there are a large number of legal entities providing an array of financial services under the "TD Canada Trust" and other brand names. Collection Officers should anticipate, in some instances, significant effort in order to locate and identify a valid legal entity as a bank garnishment source.

For further details refer to Memorandum 02-09 Requirements To Pay Naming Conventions TD Canada Trust.

Garnishee Summons in Alberta

Provincial legislation in Alberta allows for the use of Garnishee Summons. This action could be considered if all avenues to collect the liability, with the use of Requirements to Pay, had been exhausted, without success.

The Courts issue Garnishee Summons. In order to obtain a Garnishee Summons, the tax debt must be certified in Federal Court and a Writ of Seizure and Sale is required to be filed in the applicable region or municipality. In Alberta, the Writ must also be filed with the applicable Personal Property Registry.

The Garnishee Summons is especially useful in situations where the tax debtor has a joint bank account and the other party to the joint bank account does not have a liability with CRA. If a Garnishee Summons is obtained and issued to the bank in this scenario, the bank is required to pay, from the joint account, that portion which is considered to be the tax debtor's. The amount would then be paid into Court.

It is suggested that Collection Officers in Alberta refer to their local Tax Services Office for specific procedures.

   If situation a, b or c do not exist, refer to Determining if Funds May be Shared with Receiver and Determining if Funds May be Payable to the Receiver for further investigation.

Jeopardy Orders

Subsection 225.2(2) details the statutory basis by which the Minister may act to realize any amount merely assessed under the ITA. Subsection 225.2(3) further provides that this process can be pursued regardless of whether an actual assessment has been forwarded to the taxpayer if the mailing would reasonably further jeopardize the realization, in the judge's opinion. The acts that the judge may grant the Minister to do are limited to those in s. 225.1(1) which are:

- commence legal proceedings in a court,
- certify the amount under section 223 against a property of the taxpayer preventing her from dealing with a clear title to it,
- require a person to make a payment under subsection 224(1) under a Requirement to Pay (RTP) to a party who will soon be making a payment to the tax-debtor,
- require an institution or a person to make a payment under subsection 224(1.1) in the form of a RTP to a financial institution,
- require a person to turn over moneys under subsection 224.3(1) where money has been seized pursuant to a police action in respect of a criminal law, or
- give a notice, issue a certificate or make a direction under subsection 225(1) seizing the taxpayer's property.

all the relevant facts since the taxpayer party is not present and cannot make representations as to the validity of the assertions. This has been one the subject of numerous cases whereby the taxpayer has attempted, in some instances successfully, to bring to the court's attention additional factors not revealed that have either upheld or quashed the ex parte order.

Notwithstanding section 225.1, where, on ex parte application by the Minister, a judge is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of all or any part of an amount assessed in respect of a taxpayer would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount, the judge shall, on such terms as the judge considers reasonable in the circumstances, authorize the Minister to take forthwith any of the actions described in paragraphs 225.1(1)(a) to 225.1(1)(g) with respect to the amount.[61]

In The Matter Of Brent Robarts, 2010 FC 875, a Review of a Jeopardy Order

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] This is a review of a jeopardy order issued under subsection 225.2(2) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act) by a judge of this Court on April 12, 2010 (the Order). For the reasons indicated below, the Order should be set aside.

– LEGAL FRAMEWORK

[2] The general rule, pursuant to subsection 225.1(1) of the Act, is that the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) is restricted from collecting amounts owing by a taxpayer until 90 days after the day on which the notice of assessment is mailed.

[3] Nevertheless, where a judge upon an ex parte application by the Minister is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of all or any part of the amount assessed in respect of the taxpayer would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount, the judge shall authorize the Minister to take forthwith any of the actions described in paragraphs 225.1(1)(a) to 225.1(1)(g) of the Act (the collection actions).

[4] That being said, the taxpayer may apply to a judge of the Court to review the authorization. The judge shall determine the question summarily and may confirm, set aside or vary the authorization and make such other order as the judge considers appropriate. No appeal lies from such an order. See paragraphs 225.2(8), (9), (11) and (13) of the Act.

[5] There is no dispute concerning the guiding factors which are well known relating to the review of a jeopardy order (see Minister of National Revenue v. Services M.L. Marengère Inc., [2000] 1 C.T.C. 229, 2000 D.T.C. 6032 at paragraph 63 (Services M.L. Marengère)). A two-stage test governs the review which involves aspects of an appeal and a hearing de novo.

[6] First, the taxpayer must provide evidence that there are reasonable grounds to doubt that the collection of all or any part of the amount assessed against him would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount. However, even where a taxpayer fails to meet their initial evidentiary burden, it remains open to the reviewing judge to set aside a jeopardy order where the Minister has not met the obligation to make a full and frank disclosure.

[7] Where the taxpayer has met this initial threshold, the Minister then has the ultimate burden to show that the jeopardy order was justified. At that latter stage, the Court will review all the evidence on record and ask itself whether, on the whole of the evidence submitted by the parties, there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of any part of the assessed amount would be jeopardized by delay.

– EX PARTE APPLICATION MADE BY THE MINISTER

[8] The named respondent, Mr. Brent Robarts, who is 64-years-old, is a businessman of the city of Kelowna, British Columbia.

[9] On February 1, 2010, the respondent was reassessed for taxes owing in the amount of $1,265,953.57 (the Tax Debt) for his 2005, 2006 and 2008 tax years as appears from the notices of reassessments (the Reassessments) mailed at that time by the Canada Revenue Agency (the CRA). [10] On April 6, 2010, the Minister applied for a jeopardy order with respect to the Tax Debt.

[11] A first affidavit by Ms. Amy Walterhouse, sworn April 7, 2010 (the April affidavit) containing the main allegations against the respondent, was made in support of the Minister's application. There is also a second affidavit by Ms. Walterhouse, also sworn April 7, 2010, but its relevance for the purpose of this review is limited (its only object concerns the production of the Reassessments).

[12] Ms. Walterhouse is the CRA officer assigned to Mr. Robarts' collection file.

[13] The Minister's view, based on the affidavits of Ms. Walterhouse, is that there were (and continue to be) reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized if delayed.

[14] Five grounds were alleged at paragraph 36 of the April affidavit:

The funds in the respondent's known bank accounts, which totalled approximately $687,706.62, were the only known significant asset of the respondent that was sufficient to pay all or part of the Tax Debt.

The respondent was in the position to withdraw the funds before the CRA was otherwise able to certify the debt and garnish his bank accounts.

The respondent had significantly under-reported his income. He had failed to accurately report business income and rental income in respect to his tax matters in the past.

The 90-day statutory stay relating to the Reassessments was still in effect. Thus, the respondent could file notices of objection to the Reassessments; the Minister would be unable to collect until the conclusion of any objection or appeal period.

The respondent had been conducting his tax affairs in an unorthodox manner. He appeared to have dissipated two substantial assets immediately after being notified of the Reassessments.

[15] As Ms. Walterhouse explained in her April affidavit, on March 23, 2010, she conducted searches of various registries in British Columbia and of the respondent's known financial accounts held with CIBC, ING Direct and Scotiabank iTrade in an effort to locate any assets belonging to the respondent. She found out on this occasion that earlier on, that is, on January 27, 2010, the respondent had withdrawn $109,000 from one of his Scotiabank iTrade accounts and that on January 28, 2010 he had transferred his half interest in a property located in Arizona to Ms. Voll (the Arizona property). This occurred just days after she had spoken with the respondent about the Reassessments.

[16] Mr. Justice Zinn was satisfied that the evidence the Minister put forward in support of the application showed that there were reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized if delayed, and as such, granted the Order on April 12, 2010.

[17] Following the issuance of the Order, the CRA froze and seized all the respondent's bank accounts and assets. Indeed the CRA has seized $147,178.67 from accounts held with CIBC and ING Direct and has placed a freeze on the Scotiabank iTrade accounts and the $250,000 RRSP held with the CIBC (collectively the Funds).

– THE PRESENT MOTION IN REVIEW

[18] The respondent asks this Court to set aside the Order and to order the Minister to lift the seizure and freeze of the Funds.

[19] The respondent has no assets in his name in Canada other than the Funds. Denying that he had any intention to dissipate his assets or put them out of reach of the Minister, the respondent submits to the Court that his bank accounts already included registered plans and guaranteed investment certificates, which are long-term investments.

Digitized by Google

Indeed, any income that the respondent has earned recently is from trading securities through his Scotiabank iTrade account. Otherwise, he is not able to earn income to support himself.

[20] The respondent also stresses that nothing allowed the Minister to conclude that he had failed to accurately report income and invokes his good faith. Notices of objection to the Reassessments have been filed. Indeed, whether the respondent has "significantly under-reported his income" is the very issue for the determination by the appeals division of the CRA and the Tax Court of Canada. There were a number of reasons for his belief that such income did not need to be reported. Moreover, he also points out that he never earned rental income and that the Minister exaggerated his request for the issuance of a jeopardy order with unsubstantiated claims.

[21] The respondent also challenges the suggestion made by the Minister that he has been "conducting his tax affairs in an unorthodox manner as he appears to have dissipated two substantial assets." Indeed, the Minister has failed to present relevant evidence with respect to the withdrawal of $109,000 in January 2010.

[22] In a nutshell, the respondent submits that the Order was made:

1. without the benefit of complete information, which information was readily available to the Minister;
2. based on an incomplete summary of the relevant law;
3. based on unsubstantiated facts which were presented in an effort to taint the respondent's character; and
4. based on misrepresentations with respect to relevant caselaw crucial to the Minister's submissions.

[23] To support his grounds of attack, the respondent has provided an affidavit and has also produced an affidavit by Ms. Corina Voll, both sworn on May 5, 2010. Since 1993, Ms. Voll has lived on and off with the respondent. This evidence, which was not before Mr. Justice Zinn, explains the taxpayer's basis for challenging the Reassessments and also clarifies the circumstances and intentions of the taxpayers with respect to the two transactions which Ms. Walterhouse qualified in her April affidavit as "unorthodox behaviour" and a "dissipation of assets".

[24] On the other hand, the Minister submits the Order should be upheld on the basis that:

1. The respondent has failed to provide reasonable grounds to doubt that the test for granting the Order has been met;
2. The evidence put forward by the respondent is insufficient to disturb the findings of Mr. Justice Zinn;
3. The Minister made full and frank disclosure to this Court with respect to all information relevant to the application for the Order known at that time.

[25] Thus, the Minister submits that it was reasonable to conclude here that, if the Order was not granted, the collection of all or any part of the amount assessed would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount. In this regard, the Minister submits that the evidence already produced and the explanations of the respondent are insufficient to reasonably doubt that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized by the granting of a delay.

[26] In addition to relying on the April affidavit, the Minister also relies on the third affidavit of Ms. Walterhouse sworn on July 15, 2010 and appended material (the July affidavit). The main purpose of the July affidavit is to respond to the allegations made by the respondent that there was no prompt and frank disclosure at the time of the making of the application.

Digitized by Google

[27] In her July affidavit, Ms. Walterhouse explains that she provided all relevant information in the possession of CRA at the time the jeopardy application was made. First, she did not know that the respondent had deposited $109,000 back in his Scotiabank iTrade account despite making requests for the most current information. Second, none of the information proffered to the Court with respect to the transfer of the half interest of the Arizona property was known to the CRA and, at the time the application was made, the Minister fully disclosed that the CRA was intending to raise assessments against Ms. Voll pursuant to section 160 of the Act.

– DETERMINATION AND FINDINGS BY THE REVIEWING JUDGE

[28] The present motion made by the respondent to set aside the Order should be allowed.

[29] First, I am not satisfied that the obligation to make a full and frank disclosure has been met by the Minister.

[30] Second, I find the respondent has provided cogent evidence that there are reasonable grounds to doubt that the collection of all or any part of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized by a delay.

[31] Third, on the whole of the evidence submitted by the parties, the Minister has not shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the Order and collection actions taken as a result are justified considering the particular circumstances of this case.

[32] Four, provided that there is not a change of situation and that the respondent respects all the undertakings mentioned in his affidavit, there is no reason to maintain the seizure and freeze of the Funds.

– OBLIGATION TO MAKE A FULL AND FRANK DISCLOSURE NOT FULFILLED BY THE MINISTER

[33] The Minister had the duty to exercise utmost good faith and to insure full and frank disclosure (Minister of National Revenue v. Services M.L. Marengère Inc., [2000] 1 C.T.C. 229, 2000 D.T.C. 6032 at paragraph 63). This duty stems directly from the fact that the hearings for the issuing of jeopardy orders are necessarily ex parte, and thus the Minister must fairly present the situation in its entirety, in the respondent's absence.

[34] This duty of disclosure has been described and defined in various ways by the jurisprudence.

[35] In all ex parte matters the applicant is obliged to draw to the attention of the Court all facts in issue, even those which it considers unhelpful or inconvenient, and all relevant case law. (Minister of National Revenue v. Arab, 2005 FC 264, [2005] 2 C.T.C. 107 at paragraph 11). Indeed, full and frank disclosure requires that the Minister disclose "what might reasonably be regarded as [known] weaknesses". (Minister of National Revenue v. 159890 Canada Inc., [1997] 3 C.T.C. 284, 97 D.T.C. 5495 at paragraph 10). Overall, the disclosure must be "adequate" or "reasonable" as determined by the circumstances (R. v. Chamas, 2006 FC 1548, [2007] 2 C.T.C. 16 at paragraph 37).

[36] First, it now appears from the new evidence brought to the attention of the Court that the inquiry made by Ms. Walterhouse on March 23, 2010, was incomplete and that important material facts (apparently these facts were not known to the Minister, as explained by Ms. Walterhouse in her July affidavit) were omitted from the April affidavit and the presentation made by counsel to the Court in April 2010.

[37] The alleged omission to make a full and frank disclosure concerns the withdrawal of $109,000 on January 27, 2010 from one of the respondent's Scotia iTrade accounts two days after he was notified of the Reassessments. In her April affidavit, Ms. Walterhouse states that she had been unable to further trace the $109,000. Thus, she believed that the respondent was dissipating his only remaining assets, which were the Funds that would satisfy the Tax Debt. However, the respondent's Scotia iTrade account for March 2010 clearly demonstrates that the Minister's representative assumption was based on erroneous information since the amount of $109,000 was re-deposited on March 10, 2010.

[38] The respondent argues that the Minister's failure to report to the Court that the $109,000 had been credited back to his bank account on March 10, 2010, amounts to a violation of the Minister's duty of full and frank disclosure. He contends that the erroneous information that the $109,000 was untraceable was the central piece of information that the Minister relied on to request the jeopardy order. Thus, given that the correct information was available to Ms. Walterhouse prior to signing her April affidavit, the Minister's omission directly affected the outcome of the Court's decision.

[39] I agree with the respondent. In my opinion, the Minister's failure to report the reappearance of the $109,000 in the respondent's bank account on March 10, 2010 falls squarely in the category of an omission that was directly relevant to the authorization of the jeopardy order obtained a month afterwards. Indeed, apart from the allegation made by Ms. Walterhouse that the respondent had also transferred his half-interest in the Arizona property to Ms. Voll, the disappearance of the $109,000 from the Scotia iTrade account, was the Minister's only proof that the respondent was dissipating his sole Canadian assets, i.e. the Funds.

[40] Upon signing the April affidavit, Ms. Walterhouse should have assured herself that all relevant inquiries had been made with respect to transactions made in March 2010 and that up-to-date information was readily available from the financial institution or made available by the taxpayer. On March 11, 2010, Ms. Walterhouse was advised by Mr. John De Pompa, Director of Compliance at Scotia iTrade, that the March statements would be prepared at the beginning of April 2010, yet she did not subsequently ask that these statements be provided by the financial institution.

[41] While the omission to report the March 10, 2010 deposit of $109,000 was apparently made with no malicious intent, it severely undermines the ex parte application that was made by the Minister on April 6, 2010. The jeopardy order issued on the basis of these misleading, incomplete or incorrect facts cannot stand in the circumstances. (Papa, re, 2009 FC 49, [2009] 4 C.T.C. 93 at paragraphs 21 to 23; Canada (Commissioner of Competition) v. Air Canada (2000), [2001] 1 F.C. 219 (Fed. T.D.) at paragraph 13).

[42] While the omission mentioned above is determinative, the respondent also argues that there were misrepresentations with respect to relevant caselaw crucial to the Minister's submissions.

[43] The Minister relied heavily on the Minister of National Revenue v. Cormier-Imbeault, 2009 FC 499, [2009] 6 C.T.C. 45 (Cormier-Imbeault), as justification for the jeopardy order, suggesting to the Court that the facts were very similar.

[44] At paragraph 22 of the Minister's written submissions, counsel states that in Cormier-Imbeault:

The Minister made an application for a jeopardy order on the basis that the taxpayer's only remaining asset was money in a bank account. As well, the taxpayer had transferred his half-interest in a house in which he jointly owned with his wife upon learning that the CRA was in a position to undertake collection measures. Shore J. granted the Minister's application for a jeopardy order and stated in his reasons that the taxpayer was in a position to withdraw all or part of the amounts held in the bank account at any moment.

[45] The respondent now submits that the above recital of the facts in Cormier-Imbeault

Digitized by Google

is incomplete and that the Minister's failure to accurately set out the reasoning of Justice Shore is not in keeping with the standard of the outmost good faith and disclosure.

[46] Justice Shore states in Cormier-Imbeault, at paragraph 7, a number of factors established by case law that can justify a jeopardy order:

1. there are reasonable grounds to believe that the taxpayer has acted fraudulently;
2. the taxpayer has proceeded to liquidate or transfer his or her assets;
3. the taxpayer is evading his or her tax liabilities; and
4. the taxpayer has assets that could potentially lessen in value over time, deteriorate or perish.

[47] From a reading of Justice Shore's analysis found at paragraph 8, we can see that Ms. Cormier- Imbeault's only assets having a realizable value were the amounts held in a bank account and half of her undivided ownership of the family residence. In addition, Justice Shore noted that in fact, in the past, there had been many withdrawals made in the bank account. Furthermore, Mr. Imbeault's previous conduct indicated that "he is not trustworthy", namely the taxpayer:

had already pleaded guilty to tax evasion; had transferred his half of the family residence to Ms. Cormier-Imbeault upon learning that the CRA was in a position to undertake collection measures; and had hidden the existence of the bank account and the amount of almost $600,000 from the CRA.

[48] Noting that the money in the bank could be withdrawn at any time, Justice Shore concluded that it was urgent and imperative that the CRA be in a position to seize the bank account. Besides authorizing the applicant to take forthwith collection actions, furthermore, in accordance with subsection 225.2(3) of the Act, Justice Shore also authorized the applicant to serve to the taxpayers the notices of assessment at the same time as the jeopardy order. It must be remembered that subsection 225.2(3) of the Act further requires that the judge be satisfied that "the notice of assessment by the taxpayer would likely further jeopardize the collection of the amount".

[49] Given the above, questions could legitimately be raised of whether the Minister acted in accordance with its duty of utmost good faith in not bringing to the attention of Justice Zinn that the decision made by Justice Shore in Cormier-Imbeault and relied upon by the applicant in paragraph 22 of their written submissions, was rendered ex parte, both under subsections 225.2(2) and (3) of the Act. We can see that very important factual elements and salient features of the reasoning are omitted by counsel.

[50] Although good faith must be presumed, again, this oversimplification in the Minister's presentation leaves a sour taste. It is true that the decision rendered in Cormier-Imbeault is included in the applicant's book of authorities. However, in view of the urgency of the matter, it is not generally expected that, at this stage, the Judge will go beyond the Minister's presentation. Considering that the application for a jeopardy order is made ex parte, such important omissions on relevant case law from the Minister's written submissions, are certainly not compliant with the spirit of these extraordinary procedures.

[51] Be that as it may, there are further reasons to set aside the Order as discussed below.

– INITIAL BURDEN OF PROOF MET BY THE RESPONDENT

[52] The evidence on record consists of the sworn affidavits of Ms. Walterhouse, Mr. Robarts and Ms. Voll, who have not been cross-examined on their affidavits. There is no reason to find any one of them not credible.

[53] At the hearing of this motion, both counsels indicated to the Court that the veracity of facts recited in these affidavits was not in issue. What is challenged by the parties is the weight to be given by the Court to the evidence respectively filed by the Minister and the respondent, each party submitting that they have discharged themselves of their burden of proof.

[54] Having analyzed the evidence and closely read the parties' materials in light of their respective submissions and the principles earlier exposed at paragraphs 5 to 7 of the present reasons for order, the respondent has met the initial burden of satisfying the reviewing Judge that there are reasonable grounds to doubt that the collection of all or any part of the amount assessed against him would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount.

[55] As aforementioned, five grounds were alleged by the Minister in support of its application to obtain a jeopardy order:

The funds in the respondent's known bank accounts, which totalled approximately $687,706.62, were the only known significant asset of the respondent that was sufficient to pay all or part of the Tax Debt;

The respondent was in the position to withdraw the funds before the CRA was otherwise able to certify the debt and garnish his bank accounts;

The respondent had significantly under-reported his income. He had failed to accurately report business income and rental income in respect to his tax matters in the past;

The 90-day statutory stay relating to the Reassessments was still in effect. Thus, the respondent could file notices of objection to the Reassessments; the Minister would be unable to collect until the conclusion of any objection or appeal period; and

The respondent had been conducting his tax affairs in an unorthodox manner. He appeared to have dissipated two substantial assets immediately after being notified of the Reassessments.

[56] At the hearing of the present motion, counsel for the Minister was ready to concede that taken alone or cumulatively, the four grounds listed at subparagraphs (i) to (v) of paragraph 36 of the April affidavit of Ms. Walterhouse may not have been sufficient to allow the issuance of a jeopardy order. However, the fifth ground listed at paragraph (v) above was determinative. It concerns the two actions taken by the respondent after he learned late January 2010 that the Reassessments were coming.

[57] As aforesaid, the Minister based himself on the following facts:

On January 27, 2010, the respondent had withdrawn $109,000 from one of his Scotiabank iTrade accounts; and

On January 28, 2010 he had transferred his half-interest in the Arizona property to Ms. Voll.

[58] In the case at bar, the Minister has submitted that the above actions constitute unorthodox behaviour which raises a reasonable apprehension that it would be difficult to trace funds or recover them for the Tax Debt. Having considered the explanations given by the respondent and Ms. Voll (with respect to the Arizona property), there are no reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized by delay in view of these two isolated actions. Their explanations are plausible and are not contradicted by other evidence on record. This evidence shed a new light on the Minister's fear that the respondent was about to liquidate the Funds.

[59] First, with respect to the withdrawal of $109,000 from his Scotiabank iTrade account on January 27, 2010, the respondent explains in his affidavit that he intended on combining that amount with $101,000 in his CIBC account and purchasing a CIBC money market certificate for $210,000. Market conditions at that time suggested that a money market certificate could be had at an interest rate of nearly 3%. However, the rates stayed low (near 1.25%) so he decided not to purchase the money market certificate and sent the cheque for $109,000 back to Scotia iTrade to redeposit in his account, which was done on March 10, 2010, as appears from the March statement produced with the respondent's affidavit. I find the respondent's explanations entirely plausible.

[60] Second, with respect to the transfer of his half interest in a property in Arizona on January 28, 2010 to Ms. Voll, the respondent explains that the Arizona property was purchased with funds that both he and Ms. Voll considered to belong to the latter. The property was put into both their names on agreement that the respondent would purchase a condominium in Kelowna in both their names. As he was unable to fulfill his end of that bargain, he was only ensuring that the title to the property reflected the true ownership of the property. Besides, the property was transferred into Ms. Voll's name after she made a demand for repayment of debt. Again, while the timing of this transfer may look suspicious, the explanations provided by the taxpayers are plausible and should not be discarded by the Court.

[61] The jurisprudence has not given a definition to the phrase "unorthodox behaviour", although it has given many examples of what it considers to be unorthodox behaviour. A few examples are as follows:

Keeping large amounts of cash in places such as one's apartment, safety deposit boxes and a cold storage depot locker (Minister of National Revenue v. Rouleau, [1995] 2 C.T.C. 442, 101 F.T.R. 57 at para. 6);

Keeping large amounts of cash, untraceable through normal banking records, in the trunk of an automobile (Minister of National Revenue v. Arab, 2005 FC 264, [2005] 2 C.T.C. 107 at para. 20);

Keeping double accounts for a restaurant, with one being for entries in the sales journal, the general ledger and income tax returns, and the other being for additional sales not reported by the holding company of the restaurant (Delaunière, re, 2007 FC 636, 2008 D.T.C. 6274 (Eng.) at para. 4);

Keeping large amounts of cash in a safety deposit box, a filing cabinet in one's house and in the pocket of a housecoat (Mann v. Minister of National Revenue, 2006 FC 1358, [2007] 1 C.T.C. 243 at para. 43); and Advancing funds to a company about to be dissolved in order to avoid paying income tax (Laquerre, re, 2008 FC 459, 2009 D.T.C. 5596 (Eng.) at para. 11).

[62] The respondent's behaviour is clearly not in the same category as the above examples. The Minister flagged two suspicious incidents, namely the transfer of the half ownership in the Arizona property to Ms. Voll and the withdrawal of the $109,000, and the respondent has provided a reasonable explanation for each incident. Therefore, there are reasonable grounds to doubt that the collection of all or any part of the amount assessed against the respondent would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount. [63] I will now examine the rest of the evidence pertaining to the other grounds raised by the Minister to sustain their allegation that there were (and continue to be) reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized if delayed.

– TEST ESTABLISHED BY SUBSECTION 225.2(2) OF THE ACT NOT MET BY THE MINISTER

[64] Subsection 225.2(2) of the Act requires the Minister to show "that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of all or any part of an amount assessed in respect of a taxpayer would be jeopardized by a delay in the collection of that amount …" (emphasis mine). Reasonable grounds to believe in the context of subsection 225.2(2) of the Act has been held to constitute a standard of proof that "while falling short of a balance of probabilities, nevertheless connotes a bona fide belief in a serious possibility based on credible evidence." (see Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) v. 514659

B.C. Ltd., 2003 FCT 148, at para. 6; Qu v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2001 FCA 399, at para. 24; Papa, re, 2009 FC 49, [2009] 4 93 at para. 16 (Papa).

[65] I have already dismissed the allegation made by the Minister that the respondent had been conducting his tax affairs in an unorthodox manner because he appeared to have dissipated two substantial assets immediately after being notified of the Reassessments. This leaves the other allegations made by the Minister to the effect that the Funds were the only known significant asset of the respondent, that he was in the position to withdraw the Funds before the CRA was otherwise able to certify the Tax Debt and garnish his bank accounts, that he had failed to accurately report business income and rental income regarding these tax matters in the past, and that the 90-day statutory stay relating to the Reassessments was still in effect when the Minister applied for a jeopardy order.

[66] Ms. Walterhouse's April affidavit first explains the basis of the Reassessments. Following the completion on January 4, 2010 of the internal audit conducted by the CRA, the Minister considered that the respondent had not accurately reported business income regarding two properties located in Surrey, as well as capital gains regarding a third property in Kelowna. These sale transactions occurred on October 31, 2005, August 31, 2006 and April 29, 2008 respectively. Thus, the respondent was reassessed for taxes owing in the amount of $1,265,953.57. Notices of opposition have been filed by the respondent.

[67] The respective positions taken by the Minister and the respondent with respect to the merit of the Reassessments are highly debatable. The general rule established by the jurisprudence is that the correctness of an assessment is determined in a different forum from that where the jeopardy order is challenged. At the stage of challenging the jeopardy order, the validity of the assessments must simply be accepted by the Court (Services M.L. Marengère Inc., at paras 64 and 73; Minister of National Revenue v. Reddy, 2008 FC 208, [2008] 3 C.T.C. 10 at para. 30). However, this does not necessarily mean that the Court should not examine the evidence submitted contesting the assessment, when evaluating whether or not a jeopardy order is warranted.

[68] If the record shows that a good portion of the evidence used by the Minister to justify the jeopardy order is seriously challenged by the taxpayer, the Court cannot simply ignore these submissions when determining whether the jeopardy order should stand. The Minister's assertions must necessarily be called into question (see Minister of National Revenue v. Douville, 2009 FC 986, 357 F.T.R. 316 at paras 16 and 20).

[69] In the case at bar, Ms. Walterhouse herself, in her April affidavit, has made a number of factual allegations that go beyond the mere fact that Reassessments were issued on February 1, 2010. These allegations were made in an effort to taint the taxpayer's character and form the basis for the issuance of the Order. Ms. Walterhouse alleges that the respondent had significantly under-reported his income and that he had failed to accurately report business income and rental income in respect to his tax matters in the past. [70] It is not challenged that on February 25, 2010, the respondent informed Ms. Walterhouse that he had retained a tax lawyer to assist him in his objections to the Reassessments and had asked that all future correspondence regarding these issues be directed to his lawyer. Ms. Waltherhouse confirms in her April affidavit that she was aware of the fact that the respondent had discussed with his lawyer the possibility of making payments in order to reduce the interest accruing on his Tax Debt. That being said, on March 8, 2010, respondent's counsel confirmed to the CRA's representative in charge of collection that he would be filing notices of objection to the Reassessments.

[71] I can say at this point that the Minister's evidence, which is contradicted in many regards by the respondent's evidence, does not allow me to conclude, as pressed in Ms.

Digitized by Google

Walterhouse's affidavit, that the respondent has "significantly under reported his income" and that he has "failed to accurately report business income and rental income." First, the respondent vehemently denies having ever earned rental income. Second, the respondent may have been mistaken in reporting some gains and may not have been justified in not reporting others, but the proper tax treatment of those gains will be determined in due course. Third, at the hearing, counsel for the respondent agreed that the Court could not draw a negative inference out of the respondent's omissions to report these gains because this litigious question has not been settled yet.

[72] From a reading of Ms. Walterhouse's affidavit, it also appears that the only assets in Canada belonging to the respondent have been constituted of sums of money deposited in various financial institutions, notably the accounts held with CIBC, ING Direct and Scotiabank iTrade. On the other hand, as corroborated by the respondent in his affidavit, this situation has been in existence for a number of years. In the past three years, he has been trading securities and conducting his trades through his Scotia iTrade account. By their very nature, liquid assets may be easily dissipated or put beyond the reach of the Minister, but this is not, by itself, a reasonable ground for believing the taxpayer will waste, liquidate or otherwise transfer such assets so as to make it unavailable to the Minister. (Minister of National Revenue v. Rouleau, [1995] 2 C.T.C. 442, 101 F.T.R. 57 at para. 9; Mann v. Minister of National Revenue, 2006 FC 1358, [2007] 1 C.T.C. 243 at para. 39; R. v. Paryniuk, 2003 FC 1505, 2004 D.T.C. 6023 at para. 14)

[73] The question of whether the assets seized are sufficient to satisfy the alleged Tax Debt is not definitive when evaluating whether a jeopardy order should be granted. The fact that the taxpayer was unable to pay the amount assessed at the time of the assessment is not, by itself, conclusive or determinative (see Danielson v. Canada (Deputy Attorney General), [1986] 2 C.T.C. 380, 7 F.T.R. 42 at paras 7 and 15 (Danielson). Evidence that the taxpayer was dissipating his assets or moving his assets out of the jurisdiction would be required (Danielson, above, at para. 8). Other factors such as lying about one's assets, the disposition made of one's assets and involvement in nefarious activities would also be considered (Minister of National Revenue v. Ament, 97 D.T.C. 5033, 124 F.T.R. 135 at para. 23).

[74] I agree with the respondent that the totality of the actions taken between the date he learned that the Reassessments were coming (i.e. January 25, 2010) and the date the Minister applied for a jeopardy order (i.e. April 6, 2010) must be considered by the Court. Furthermore, several of the respondent's financial characteristics and actions could easily be misinterpreted, when in fact, they appear to be reasonable where the totality of the evidence is considered. In the case at bar, the respondent has only had liquid assets for several years and has not made many withdrawals over the years. In fact, he undertook in his affidavit to be conservative with his stock activities and to not withdraw any sums of money until the Tax Debt has been evaluated and finalized.

[75] Ms. Walterhouse volunteered to call the respondent on January 25, 2010, to tell him that the Reassessments were coming. This was apparently not a case where the Minister felt that a jeopardy order should be issued before the notice of assessment was received by the taxpayer because this would likely further jeopardize the collection of the amount (see paragraph 225.2(3) of the Act).

[76] The withdrawal of the $109,000 on January 27, 2010 was the single most important fact the Minister relied upon when he made an application for a jeopardy order on April 6, 2010. That fact was incorrect as the money was re-deposited on March 10, 2010. During the months of February and March 2010, the Funds were untouched by the respondent who would have had ample time to dispose of said funds prior to the making of the Minister's application.

Digitized by Google

[77] Mere suspicion or concern is not sufficient to establish reasonable grounds. The respondent's explanation that he transferred his half of the Arizona property to Ms. Voll in late January 2010 to better reflect the true ownership of the property is plausible, in light of the loans made between the parties and the state of their relationship at the time. In any event, as stated at paragraph 31 of Ms. Walterhouse's April affidavit, Ms. Voll will be assessed pursuant to section 160 of the Act for the respondent's Tax Debt. Thus, the amount assessed, therefore, is not put beyond the reach of the Minister nor is it jeopardized by delay, further considering that the Arizona property had been bought a long time before the Reassessments and was always out of the reach of the Minister.

[78] In view of this evidence, as of April 6, 2010, there were certainly no reasonable grounds for believing the respondent would waste, liquidate or otherwise transfer property so as to make it unavailable to the Minister. The same conclusion holds today in view of the totality of the evidence submitted by the parties. [79] In this regard, at paragraphs 62 to 64 of his sworn affidavit dated May 5, 2010, , the respondent has made a series of undertakings in an effort to prove to the Court his good faith and his willingness to comply with the reassessment process, in the absence of a jeopardy order. Indeed, the respondent has undertaken:

Not to waste, liquidate or transfer out of Canada any of his assets until the resolution of the outstanding tax dispute with the CRA.

Not to deplete the capital of any of his investments until the resolution of the outstanding tax dispute with the CRA.

To conduct his financial affairs in a conservative manner until the resolution of the outstanding tax dispute with the CRA.

[80] The undertakings above constitute a relevant factor in deciding whether or not it is appropriate in the circumstances to confirm, set aside or vary the Order previously made by Justice Zinn on April 12, 2010 (see Danielson, above; 1853-9049 Qué. Inc. c. R, [1987] 1 C.T.C. 137, 9 F.T.R. 63; Sagman, re, 2004 FC 1630, [2005] 1 C.T.C. 165; Minister of National Revenue v. Douville, 2009 FC 986, 357 F.T.R. 316).

[81] Good faith must be presumed. Acknowledging the undertakings made by the respondent, I have no indication today that the respondent will not respect his undertakings or that he is otherwise untrustworthy. Although certain actions taken by the respondent appeared suspicious to the tax authorities, I am ready to give him the benefit of the doubt.

[82] Having thoroughly reviewed the evidence and relevant case law and applicable legal principles, overall, I am not satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of the Tax Debt would be jeopardized by delay.

VII – CONCLUSION

[83] In view of the foregoing, the present motion made by the respondent shall be allowed.

[84] Consequently, the Order shall be set aside and the Minister shall be ordered to forthwith withdraw from taking or pursuing collection actions with respect to the Tax Debt, including the seizure and freeze of the Funds which must be promptly lifted by the CRA. This is without prejudice to the Minister's right to make a new application if there is a change of situation or if the respondent fails to comply with the undertakings made to the Court.

[85] Considering the result, costs shall be in favour of the respondent.

Doreen Tennina et al v. Minister of National Revenue, 2010 FCA 25

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT LAYDEN-STEVENSON J.A.
[1] The Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) seeks to quash the appellants' notice of appeal filed on September 29, 2009 appealing Federal Court orders dated September 1, 2009 rendered pursuant to subsections 225.2(1) and 225.2(2) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act). The orders in question are commonly known as jeopardy orders. The appellants also filed a notice of application for review pursuant to subsection 225.2(8) of the Act in the Federal Court with respect to the same jeopardy orders.

Relevant Statutory Provisions
[2] The text of section 225.2 of the Act is attached to these reasons as Schedule "A". Briefly, for context, section 225.1 of the Act prohibits the Minister, while an amount assessed under the Act is in dispute, from taking any of the collection actions that are delineated in paragraphs 225.1(a) to (g). The effect of this restriction is to prevent the Minister from taking collection action on the account until such time as the objection and/or appeal from the assessment has been determined or the relevant time period within which to file such objection and/or appeal has expired.

Digitized by Google

[3] Subsection 225.2(2) constitutes an exception to the prohibition in section 225.1. Where, on ex parte application by the Minister, a judge is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the collection of all or any part of an amount assessed in respect of a taxpayer would be jeopardized by a delay in collection of that amount, the judge shall authorize the Minister to proceed with collection. The taxpayer, subsequently, may seek a review of the authorization under paragraph 225.2(8) of the Act. The judge who hears the review may confirm, set aside or vary the authorization and make such other order as the judge considers appropriate. Pursuant to subsection 225.2(13), the review order is final and may not be appealed.

The Appellants' Notice of Appeal

[4] In their notice of appeal, the appellants request that the jeopardy order(s) be set aside, that the collection action(s) taken pursuant to the order(s) be set aside or quashed and that the normal procedure pursuant to section 225.1 of the Act resume on the ground that "the ex parte provision(s) in s. 225.2 of the Income Tax Act are of no force and effect and unconstitutional." Various breaches of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are alleged.

The Arguments

[5] The Minister submits that section 225.2 of the Act provides a complete and exhaustive process to challenge the jeopardy order. The appellants must follow that process (subsection 225.8 of the Act) and are expressly precluded from appealing to this Court by section 225.2(13).

[6] The appellants argue that subsection 225.2(13) does nothing other than "specifically and strictly" bar an appeal from an application under subsections 225.2(8) and 225.2(11) of the Act. It does not bar an appeal from the initial order itself, "particularly when the appeal challenges, on constitutional grounds, the jurisdiction of the Federal Court to make the order under subsection 225.2(2) in the first place." Apparently, identical grounds are contained in the review application before the Federal Court.

Analysis

[7] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the appellants' notice of appeal must be struck.

[8] First, it is inappropriate for the identical point to be raised by the identical parties in the identical file, simultaneously, in two courts. Such an approach has the potential to give rise to contradictory decisions and draw the administration of justice into disrepute: Del Zotto v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue) (2000), 181 F.T.R. 168 (F.C.).

[9] Second, the Supreme Court of Canada has repeatedly stated, as a matter of statutory interpretation, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act and the intention of Parliament. While Canadian tax legislation has been strictly interpreted in an era of more literal statutory interpretation, today, all statutes, including the Income Tax Act, must be interpreted in a textual, contextual and purposive way: Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601. The Act's provisions are to be interpreted in order to achieve consistency, predictability and fairness:

Digitized by Google

Shell Canada Ltd. v. Canada*, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 622.

[10] Section 225.2 of the Act provides a comprehensive scheme with respect to jeopardy orders. Parliament provided a remedy for taxpayers aggrieved by ex parte jeopardy orders. Upon application by the taxpayer, subsection 225.2(8) provides for a review of the order by a judge of the same court that granted the authorization under subsection 225.2(2). Subsection 225.2(11) grants broad powers to the reviewing judge who may set aside or vary the authorization and may make such other order as the judge considers appropriate. In short, the legislative scheme contemplates and incorporates a review mechanism for ex parte orders. The mechanism chosen and legislated by Parliament is the one set out in subsection 225.2(8), no more and no less.

[11] It is settled law that, by virtue of subsection 225.2(13), no appeal lies from an order made pursuant to subsection 225.2(11): Papa v. Her Majesty the Queen, 2009 FCA 112, 2009 DTC 5090; Dauphin c. Canada, 2009 CAF 257, 2009 DTC 5164. It is also settled law that there is no right of appeal from a decision unless expressly granted by statute; the Charter does not provide such a right. The provisions of section 27 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, which grant a right of appeal, may be overridden by other statutes: Luitjens v. Canada (Secretary of State) (1992), 142 N.R. 173 (F.C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1992), 143 N.R. 316n. The appellants, in relying on section 27 of the Federal Courts Act, seek to do indirectly what they cannot do directly.

[12] Third, while it is unquestionably open to litigants to challenge the constitutionality of a statute or the provisions of a particular enactment, characterizing an argument as one of constitutional invalidity does not create a right of appeal, where none otherwise exists.

[13] In summary, there is no right of appeal from an order made pursuant to subsection 225.2(2) of the Act. The appellants' remedy is the review provision provided by Parliament in subsection 225.2(8).

[14] I would therefore strike the notice of appeal with costs to the respondent.

Collection in Jeopardy

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

Collection in Jeopardy, also referred to as "Jeopardy", is defined as a situation where the collection of an account is put at risk due to the collection restrictions imposed by legislation i.e. Subsections 225.1(1)a) to g) of the Income Tax Act.

When a jeopardy situation is recognized, there are provisions under the various acts that, in certain circumstances, set aside collection restrictions and allow immediate collection.

In order to invoke the jeopardy provisions and proceed with immediate collection action, the CRA must make an ex parte application to the courts. A judge evaluates the evidence presented and, if satisfied that a delay would jeopardize the collection of the account, grants a jeopardy court order. Once the order is obtained, the CRA proceeds with immediate collection action.

The tax debtor has the right to a judicial review of the court order. Upon review, the Court may confirm, set aside or vary the jeopardy court order. However, a request for judicial review does not delay, or hold in abeyance enforcement of the jeopardy court order.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation relating to collection in jeopardy.

- Income Tax Act (ITA), s 164(1.2), s 225.2 and s 226(1)
- Excise Act 2001 (EA) s 287(1)

What Constitutes Jeopardy?

- A jeopardy situation exists when a delay in collection action, due to legislated collection restrictions, may result in a loss to the Crown.
- GST/HST jeopardy situations arise when a debit is forthcoming, and a delay, resulting from reporting/filing requirements, would cause the collection of that amount to be in jeopardy. In these circumstances the CRA can make ex-parte application to the Court to assess and proceed immediately.

Digitized by Google

- The test is whether the evidence, on balance of probability, is sufficient to lead a right-thinking person to conclude that it is more likely than not that collection of the account would be jeopardized by the delays imposed by the legislation.

Note: The jeopardy provisions of the various Acts are not invoked unless there is reasonable potential for recovery

Tax Debtor May Leave Canada

Evidence that a tax debtor has or is about to leave Canada is a primary indicator of possible jeopardy in collection.

Section 226 of the ITA, Section 322 of the ETA, and Section 94(1) of the SLPECA provide specific collection remedies applicable to situations involving tax debtors leaving Canada.

For further details, refer to Taxpayer Leaving the Country - Demand for Payment 226(1) and Directive RCD 00-32, Jeopardy Assessments and Collection under Section 322.1 of the Excise Tax Act

Role of the Department of Justice

The Department of Justice is responsible for ensuring the ex parte application meets the criteria for successful application to the Court. The Department of Justice will:

- review and provide an opinion on the information submitted by Collections with respect to obtaining a jeopardy court order
- assist in the preparation of all affidavits, and counsel affiants as required
- apply to the Court to have a judge hear the ex parte application and appear on behalf of the CRA
- represent the CRA should the tax debtor seek remedy through a judicial review

For further details, refer to TSDMB 2008-021 Making referrals to the Department of Justice

Policy

This section provides policy pertaining to collection in jeopardy. For a legal opinion on a particular jeopardy collection matter, please consult with the Department of Justice.

Elements of a Jeopardy

The following are the basic elements necessary for a jeopardy application. All elements must be in existence before making the ex-parte jeopardy court order application:

- Liability
  - a substantial tax liability assessed or about to be assessed

  Note: All debts relating to the application must be assessed prior to the service of the jeopardy court order, on the tax debtor

- Danger of Loss
  - sufficient evidence to prove an imminent danger of loss

  Refer to Jeopardy Indicators for further details.

Digitized by Google

- Collectability
  - there must be reasonable potential for recovery

  Note: The Minister must show that at the time of making the application sufficient assets exist to which the Crown would look for payment

- Evidence – the Minister must have evidence supporting the following assertion(s):
  - a delay in collection will result in a loss to the Crown
  - sufficient assets exist to which the Crown could look for payment and if collection is delayed the assets would no longer be available for payment of the debt

An order to proceed with immediate collection is necessary to protect the Crown's interest.

Types of Accounts to Review for Danger of Loss

Collection officers are responsible for screening and identifying accounts where a danger of loss may exist and, if appropriate, make a recommendation for a jeopardy application. Any detrimental changes in the tax debtor's financial situations should be considered. The following are types of accounts that must be reviewed for danger of loss on a regular basis:

PROTECTED

Jeopardy Indicators

Factors or indicators, that should be considered when evaluating a potential jeopardy situation, include:

Prior history - of the tax debtor individually, or as a corporate director, with respect to:

- compliance, remittances, and other statutory requirements
- the use of complex corporate structures and nominees to shield assets/income
- evasiveness and uncooperativeness when dealing with the CRA

Canadian residential instability – as evidenced by:

- prolonged stays outside the country and/ or Canadian property/assets for sale
- banking or business transactions outside the country
- employment and/or the purchase of assets outside the country

Digitized by Google

Dealing with assets to the detriment of creditors

- encumbering assets up to or beyond fair market value (FMV)
- selling or transferring assets at less than FMV, and the timing of these sales or transfers following contact by CRA
- non-arm's length transactions and lending monies without security
- assets moved out of the country
- unusual corporate transactions involving dividends or shareholder loans
- any asset activity uncharacteristic of the tax debtor

Legal actions by other creditors

- any collection enforcement activity by other creditors

Nature of assessment / involvement in criminal activities

- tax evasion, initial assessment, audit reassessment, non-filer etc...
- tax debtors involvement in criminal activities such as narcotics, theft or fraud

> Note: Although relevant in making a determination as to whether there may be jeopardy involved in a particular matter, caution must be exercised when relying on this element. A jeopardy application hearing is not the proper forum to discuss the validity of underlying assessments or affidavits. The Department of Justice has advised of potential pitfalls in this regard and will act accordingly.

For further details, refer to Communication ARD-2004-006 Collections Policy for Integrated Proceeds of Crime (IPOC) Cases.

Counter indicators

Counter indicators are any relevant factors of the tax debtor's situation that suggest that the collection of the account is not in jeopardy. As jeopardy court orders are of an ex parte nature, it is the responsibility of the Agency to ensure all relevant factors representative of the tax debtor's situation be disclosed in the application and brought to the attention of the judge. Failure to disclose any relevant counter indicators may result in dismissal at the application stage or upon judicial review.

Counter indicators may include the following:

- promises to pay and/or offers of PDC arrangements
- explanations and/or intended plans to repay the debt
- previous payment arrangements to resolve prior tax debts that were acceptable to the Agency
- circumstances that tie the tax debtor to Canada
- payments made to the primary and any related accounts

Tax Debtor Leaving Canada

Factors indicating that a tax debtor is in the process of leaving the country include:

- tax debtor's assets and/or principle residence have been sold or are for sale
- tax debtor is dealing with financial institutions, investments, and the purchase of assets located in another country
- children's educational files have been transferred
- statements made by the tax debtor indicate that there is reluctance to resolve issues pertaining to present or future liabilities
- substantial dollar amounts have not been reported
- there has been a request for Clearance Certificates
- ITA s 226, ETA s 322, and SLPECA s 94(1) are applicable to situations where there is evidence that the tax debtor has left, or is about to leave the country. Specifically, a Demand for Payment must be used by the Minister to demand the payment of all taxes, interest and penalties owed for the current tax year and/or the previous year in addition to any unassessed tax years and years where collection restrictions are in effect at the time of service of the notice. Previous assessed years should not be included in the Demand for Payment, as the Minister is able to take all necessary collection actions to collect these debits.
- as a matter of policy after issuance of the Demand for Payment, a Notice of Assessment will be mailed to the tax debtor

If a tax debtor fails to pay the amounts requested under ITA s 226, and SLPECA s 94(1) and the danger of loss is so imminent it leaves no available time to make application for a jeopardy court order, ITA Subsection 226(2) and SLPECA Subsection 94(2) permits the seizure and sale of assets in accordance with, Subsections ITA 225(2) thru (5), and SLPECA 93(2) through (4), the seizure of chattel provisions. Such a situation might exist where a tax debtor has been held at a border crossing and Customs has contacted Collections for immediate actioning of the current or impending tax debt. These provisions are a significant departure from ITA Subsection 223(2), which authorizes debt certification etc. ITA Subsections 225(2) to (5) only provide for the seizure of chattels, not real property nor the issuance of Requirements to Pay.

If on the other hand there is time to file a jeopardy application, serious consideration should be given to initiating the action. If not, the ability of the Minister to seize assets may, as explained above, be very limited.

Collection Restrictions on Reassessments

It is important to know that a particular reassessment is in respect of the tax year, and is not limited to the increased or decreased amount. Therefore, once there is a reassessment, collection restrictions apply to the entire year. If jeopardy collection action is undertaken, it will apply to the entire year, and not just to the incremental amount.

For further details refer to Communication ARD-2005-022 Collection Restrictions following Reassessments under the Income Tax Act, Excise Act 2001 and *Excise Tax Act – Non GST.

Authority Approval – Approval Process

When there is evidence that warrants jeopardy collection action, the file should be forwarded to the Collection Team Leader for review and approval for further action. With the concurrence of the Collections Team Leader, the Department of Justice is to be contacted to determine whether sufficient facts are present to warrant a jeopardy application.

Once an affirmative opinion is received from the Department of Justice, collection officers forward a package, including:

- the Statement of Facts,
- copies of all relevant documentation
- notice(s) of assessments or reassessments
- notes from Audit or Investigations
- evidence of tax debtor's conduct etc. and
- copies of correspondence with the Department of Justice, to the TSO Director for approval to proceed with a jeopardy application. It is recommended that the package be referred to the TSO Director using the T2001 Memorandum Form as a cover sheet, so that the written concurrence of all applicable authority levels required can be documented.

For details concerning authority and approval levels relating to jeopardy in collections, refer to Memorandum 01-21, Delegation of the Minister's Powers Under the Income Tax Act, *Excise Tax Act and Customs Act, and TSDMB 2008-021 Making referrals to the Department of Justice

Proceeding with an Investigation

To avoid time consuming investigations:

- screen each referral to determine if a detailed jeopardy investigation is required
- ensure the information obtained is complete, accurate and recorded chronologically in the docket and in the online diary.

Comprehensive Investigation

A comprehensive investigation includes confirming the following factors:

- legal name of the tax debtor including trade styles and aliases
- the basis for suspicion that the tax debtor is about to leave Canada (if applicable)
- the basis for the belief that the tax debtor will not pay voluntarily
- the amount of the liability
- details of assets available for seizure (if applicable)
- the type of legal action necessary to recover amounts owing

Once the elements listed above have been confirmed, determine the following:

- the degree of danger of loss
- the collection potential (is the full liability recoverable?) including property and asset searches and any additional sources of recovery
- the extent of investigation necessary
- the number of persons required to conduct the investigation

Provide all documents substantiating the claim.

Obtain assistance, as required, from Audit and Enforcement regarding current financial information such as:

- present bank account(s)
- financial statements, particularly the balance sheet
- the security interests of other creditors
- statement of income and expenses

Completing a Statement of Facts

The Statement of Facts is intended to provide the TSO Director and the Department of Justice with sufficient information and evidence to authorize and proceed with a Notice of Motion. It must also provide the Department of Justice with a summary of the key evidence for the preparation of affidavits and the ex parte application. The Statement of Facts may also serve as an exhibit to the affidavit(s) should there be a judicial review.

Format

List, in chronological order, only facts supported by admissible evidence.

> Note: Subsection 225.2(4) of the ITA provides that statements contained in an affidavit filed in the context of an application under Section 225 ITA may be based on belief with sufficient grounds therefore.

Headings:

BACKGROUND

- Name
- Address
- Date of birth
- Marital/Family status
- Occupation

TAX LIABILITY

- Amounts and tax years involved
- Basis of liability

ASSETS FROM WHICH RECOVERY MAY BE EFFECTED

- List: property, bank accounts, investments, etc.

SEQUENCE OF RELATED EVENTS

- This is a chronological summary of the account history leading to the request for a jeopardy application
- It must clearly describe the jeopardy elements, indicators and counter indicators

For clarity, categorize and place the facts in the appropriate sections of the Statement of Facts. Background information should not be intermixed with the direct jeopardy facts.

There are some general rules required in the preparation of a Statement of Facts:

- It need not be signed

Digitized by Google

- the pages are not numbered
- the entries must be in chronological order
- it is written on plain paper, not letterhead
- It must identify each person involved, including first/last name
- it must stick to the relevant facts, WITHOUT amplification

To review a sample of a completed Statement of Facts, please refer to Section 3.1 of the Jeopardy Overview Learner's Guide (TD8700-000-L), pp. 3.5-3.8.

Risk Analysis

Once the Statement of Facts has been completed, prepare a Risk Analysis to summarize conclusions based on the balance of probability.

Purpose

The Risk Analysis contains conclusions, inferences or observations consistent with those that would be reached by a reasonable person given the same set of facts. The Risk Analysis should show that, based upon a "balance of probabilities", a delay would jeopardize the collection of the amount outstanding.

The Risk Analysis is based upon facts as summarized within the Statement of Facts.

Format

The Risk Analysis is the conclusion of the Statement of Facts, which summarizes the danger of loss aspect of the account.

The Risk Analysis should address all relevant factors highlighted in the Statement of Facts as well as consider any counter-indicators.

Note: It is acceptable to draw conclusions as to what might happen at a future date, provided that reasonable consideration be given to the facts contained in the Statement of Facts in support of your conclusions.

To review a sample of a completed Risk Analysis, please refer to Section 3.2 of the Jeopardy Overview Learner's Guide (TD8700-000-L) p. 3.10..

Application for Court Order

The Department of Justice will make application via a Notice of Motion and appear on behalf of the Minister. The judge will review the evidence and render a decision.

Tax Assessments / Court Order

An authorization to proceed with immediate collection activity may be granted even though the Notice of Assessment has not been sent to the tax debtor. This authorization is granted when the Court is satisfied that sending the notice to the tax debtor would be detrimental to our collection actions. When the jeopardy authorization is granted, the amount assessed will immediately become due and payable. Otherwise, the assessment must be sent prior to the hearing date.

Service of Court Documents

Once a court order is obtained, the client must be served within a prescribed amount of time, pursuant to the applicable Act. The Department of Justice may seek an extension if the prescribed time is insufficient.

A letter, called a Letter of Introduction, signed by the TSO Director will accompany the documents and address the following points:

- an introduction to the documents (for example: Court order and, if applicable, the Notice of Assessment)
- a brief summary of the Court's direction (i.e. which court granted what and when etc)
- the authority for the actions taken
- the client's appeal rights pertaining to the jeopardy action and the name and telephone number of the Assistant Director sponsoring the assessment in case further clarification of the assessment is required

Upon service of the court order, the client must be given the opportunity to pay the amount owing.

To review a sample of a Letter of Introduction, please refer to Section 3.4 of the Jeopardy Overview Learner's Guide TD8700-000-L) p.3.21.

Collection Action

Immediate legal action can proceed once the client has been served with the court order and a request for payment has been made (service is effected by personal service or in accordance with directions of a judge). Where a tax debtor has applied or intends to apply for a judicial review, collection action should not be postponed. By law, collection action granted by the jeopardy provisions is not stayed pending a judicial review.

Headquarters policy, however, recommends that liquidation of seized assets be postponed until the 30-day review period has expired and, ultimately, until the judge renders a review decision.

Also, collection action will be stayed should a tax debtor seek remedy under the Farm Debt Mediation Act. If such an instance should occur, Head Office policy states that no jeopardy action will be undertaken.

For details regarding the application of the Farm Debt Mediation Act to jeopardy in collections, refer to Directive RCD-00-27, The Effect of the Farm Debt Mediation Act on Revenue Collection.

Judicial Review

Pursuant to the provisions of the various Acts, tax debtors may challenge a jeopardy authorization in court. The burden to justify the jeopardy authorization rests with the Minister.

The Minister must, in the context of such a review, demonstrate that the authorization to proceed was warranted in the circumstances.
The scope of the review is limited to the facts relating to the question of whether there are reasonable grounds to believe collection would be jeopardized by granting a delay in collection action. The validity of an outstanding notice of objection or appeal is irrelevant in the context of this type of review.

- Basic Steps
- Steps to follow if a Hearing has been ordered
- Affidavits
- Examining Affiants

Basic Steps

The following are the basic steps of a judicial review:

- the tax debtor files a notice of motion to have the jeopardy authorization vacated
- an application will be made fixing the time and place for the hearing
- a copy of the Motion is served on the Deputy Attorney General
- the hearing is heard in public (usually) or behind closed doors (exceptionally)
- a decision is rendered by the Court

Steps to follow if a Hearing has Been Ordered

Good planning and organization is essential when dealing with the short time frames required for a judicial review. Therefore, upon being advised that a hearing has been ordered, the Collection Officer must:

- inform the Tax Services Office management of the hearing
- list all the departmental staff who were involved in the investigation who will likely be called upon to testify for the Crown, and inform them of the upcoming hearing (Note: The info should be readily available from the Statement of Facts)
- contact the Regional Office of the Department of Justice to arrange for the preparation of affidavits, court briefs, etc.
- should a different attorney be representing us for the judicial review, ensure he has all relevant documentation including the Statement of Facts, recent communication, etc.

Affidavits

Affidavits are used to introduce evidence. The Department of Justice reviews the evidence to assist in preparing the affidavit.

It is the responsibility of the Department of Justice to help prepare all affidavits necessary for the initial application and judicial review, when applicable.

The affiant must carefully review every part of an affidavit before signing it. The swearing of an affidavit is a solemn oath to the effect that its contents are true.

8. Notice of Assessment prepared in anticipation of court order

9. Department of Justice makes an ex parte application

10. Obtain additional court order(s) as necessary i.e. an order for opening doors may be required if there are reasonable grounds to believe in the existence of a safe or safe deposit box.

11. Prepare the Letter of Introduction, certify the debt, obtain writs, prepare T1118s, legal hypothecs, any documents relevant to anticipated collection measures.

12. Service of court order, Assessment Notice (within 72 hours of order if no extension of time sought in jeopardy order), Letter of Introduction, and other documents, where applicable, for legal hypothec, certificate, garnishee orders, etc.

Refund or Release of Security Pursuant to Subsection 164(1.1) ITA

Subsection 164(1.1) of the ITA authorizes the Minister, upon application by the tax debtor, to repay amounts paid or surrender security accepted for amounts in dispute.

This type of request is usually submitted to Appeals who in turn complete and forward Form T420 to Collections for consideration.

Conditions Required to Satisfy Subsection 164(1.1) ITA

The following three conditions must be met to satisfy Subsection 164(1.1) ITA:

- the first condition is that the tax debtor must have either filed a notice of objection that the Minister, after 120 days, has not confirmed, varied or issued a reassessment in respect thereof, or the tax debtor has appealed to the Tax Court of Canada
- the second condition is that the tax debtor must have paid amounts on account of the amounts in dispute and/or the Minister must have accepted security for the amounts in dispute
- the third condition is that the tax debtor must have made a written application to the Minister for payment of the amounts or surrender of the security

When all three above-noted conditions have been met, the Minister will subsequently determine the amount of the repayment or the amount of the security to be surrendered in accordance with the provisions of Paragraphs 164 (1.1)(c) and (d) of the ITA or may invoke jeopardy provisions under 164(1.2) ITA.

Digitized by Google

It should be noted that a court order pursuant to 164(1.2) ITA allows the Agency to withhold a refund or the release of security and that, where other collection measures are sought, consideration should be given to jeopardy provisions pursuant to 225.2(2) ITA.

Jeopardy indicators under 225.2(2) ITA are applicable to Subsection 164(1.2) ITA with such modifications as circumstances require. Please refer to the Section Jeopardy Indicators.

When jeopardy action is undertaken pursuant to 164(1.2) of the ITA, the role of the Department of Justice is the same as its role in jeopardy actions pursuant to 225.2(2). Please refer to the Section Role of the Department of Justice.

Contrary to jeopardy actions pursuant to 225.2(2) ITA, an application under 164(1.2) is not ex parte. The tax debtor is notified of our intent to invoke jeopardy provisions and he may both attend the hearing and/or make representations.

For details concerning authority and approval levels relating to actions pursuant to 164 (1.2) ITA, refer to Memorandum 01-21, Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and Customs Act.

When the Minister's denial of a request rests on the fact that the three conditions are not met, no appeal of this decision is provided for in the Income Tax Act. In Topol v Canada* 2003 FCT 658 (T-801-02, May 27 2003) the Court addressed the standard of review applicable to the Minister's decision. In his decision, the judge held that "I agree with the applicant that the Trial Division of the Federal Court has jurisdiction pursuant to Section 18.1 of the Federal Court Act and that the appropriate and indeed the only avenue available to the applicant to challenge the Minister's denial of the applicant's requests under Subsection 164(1.1) of the Act is by way of judicial review".

What Constitutes a "An Amount Paid on Account" or a "Security"

In Topol v Canada 2003 FCT 658 (T-801-02, May 27 2003) the Court held that a non-capital loss carried back from a subsequent taxation year was not "an amount paid on account" of the amount in dispute and therefore could not satisfy the second condition under 164(1.1) ITA.

In Topol the Court also determined that payments received in the form of deductions at source did not qualify as "an amount paid on account of the amounts in dispute" therefore denying the second condition.

Another issue of significance in Topol was the fact that the tax debtor, through the judicial review, sought to have removed a writ of seizure and sale obtained by the Minister, with respect to a taxation year that was later under appeal. The tax debtor argued that the Minister's writ should fall under the meaning of "accepted security" captured by the second precedent condition. These are the Court's conclusions in regard to the writ:

"A writ of seizure and sale, as I understand it, is an enforcement procedure. It is an order to a sheriff to enforce a judgment or order of the court. The writ in issue is the Minister's writ, not that of the tax debtor, although its effect is to afford some type of security to the Minister in the broad sense. In my view, the "security" referred to in Subsection 164(1.1) is security provided by the tax debtor to the Minister. The specific wording of the provision refers to "security accepted". Of necessity, to be accepted, it must have been offered or provided. A writ of seizure and sale, sought and obtained by the Minister, cannot be regarded as security provided by the tax debtor"

The Court found that a writ of seizure and sale, sought and obtained by the Minister, could not be regarded as security provided by the taxpayer.

- Return all signed and authorized copies of the T420 to Appeals, if Collections does not agree with the client's request.
- When in agreement with the request, Collections will send copies #1 and #2 (signed and authorized) to Revenue Accounting, if a refund is to be issued. Once completed, Revenue Accounting will return copy # 1 to Appeals, confirming that the process has been completed.
- If only security is to be returned to the client, follow the guidelines in the Security Chapter of the Collections Manual to effect the release, returning copies #1 and #2 (signed and authorized) to Appeals, and entering a detailed notation in the diary.
- Retain copy #3.

Note: Subsection 164(1.1) gives the Agency the discretion to either withhold a credit that is being considered for refund, or release any qualified security that may be held (the reason for the T420), if it can be reasonably considered that eventual collection of the account is in jeopardy and a subsequent court order would have to be obtained pursuant to the jeopardy of ITA 164(1.2).

A copy of the T420 is available via InfoZone.

Taxpayer Leaving the Country – Demand for Payment 226(1)

1. Collections will confirm with the necessary assistance from Compliance Programs Branch or Enforcement Divisions:
   - tax debtors name
   - the basis for the suspicion that the taxpayer has left or is about to leave the country
   - the amounts of the proposed assessment(s) for all taxation years
   - the proposed date of assessment
   - details of assets available for seizure

2. When the Assistant Director, Revenue Collections concurs with the recommendation to invoke Subsection 226(1), full particulars, together with the recommendation will be submitted under the Assistant Director's signature to the TSO Director for approval to proceed.
3. A Demand for Payment letter will be prepared for the Director's signature. The letter will include the following information:

Digitized by Google

- statement to the effect the Minister of National Revenue suspects the tax debtor has left or is about to leave Canada and thereby give notice and demand immediate payment
- the dollar amount being demanded and what tax, contributions, benefits repayments, interests, etc it comprises
- the applicable statutory authorities for demanding payment (ITA, ETA, Province, CP, EI)

5. On receipt of the Demand for Payment letter from the director:

   - effect personal service of the letter. Have the taxpayer acknowledge receipt by signing a copy, ensuring that both the time and date of receipt are recorded on the copy. If the taxpayer refuses to acknowledge, leave the letter and complete an affidavit of service
   - request payment immediately, or realizable security, from the taxpayer. Payment other than cash, money order or certified cheque will not normally be accepted
   - send the demand for payment by registered mail if personal service is impossible. Obtain written confirmation from the Post Office of the date and time of mailing of letter, assessments, etc.
   - prepare an affidavit of service by registered mail using the Post Office document of confirmation as proof of delivery

   Note: As a matter of policy, after issuance of the Demand for Payment letter, a Notice of Assessment will be mailed to the taxpayer.

5. If the taxpayer is suspected of leaving Canada and jeopardy action is required, the timing of the Demand for Payment letter under 226(1) and assessment notice must be coordinated with the actions under 225.2.

Income tax — Administration and enforcement —Collection — Source deductions — Trust for moneys deducted — Employer failing to remit payroll deductions — Accounts receivable sold to third party — Whether property acquired by tax debtor after statutory deemed trust arises subject to trust — If so, whether sale of trust property to third party releases property from trust — Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), s. 227(4), (4.1).
The respondent, First Vancouver Finance, entered into a factoring agreement with Great West Transport whereby it would purchase Great West's accounts receivable at a discount. After purchase, the Great West invoices were forwarded to Great West's debtors, along with notification that the accounts had been sold and that subsequent payments should be made directly to First Vancouver. Among the accounts purchased were several owing by Canada Safeway Limited. As of the date of the factoring agreement, Great West owed money to the Minister of National Revenue because of unremitted payroll deductions. First Vancouver had made arrangements with the Minister to forward part of the purchase price of the accounts to be applied to Great West's arrears. The Minister served Canada Safeway with Enhanced Requirement to Pay Notices ("RTPs") as authorized by the Income Tax Act ("ITA"). In response, Canada Safeway made payments to the Minister relating to accounts which Great West had assigned to First Vancouver. First Vancouver brought an application to recover the amounts paid by Canada Safeway to the Minister pursuant to the RTPs. The Court of Queen's Bench granted the application in part, holding that First Vancouver was entitled to the moneys owing on accounts factored before the RTPs were issued. The Court of Appeal upheld that decision.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The ITA requires employers to deduct and withhold amounts from their employees' wages ("source deductions") and remit these amounts to the Receiver General by a specified due date. Under s. 227(4), when source deductions are made, they are deemed to be held separate and apart from the property of the employer in trust for Her Majesty. If the source deductions are not remitted to the Receiver General by the due date, the deemed trust in s. 227(4.1) becomes operative and attaches to property of the employer to the extent of the amount of the unremitted source deductions. The trust is deemed to have existed from the moment the source deductions were made. The s. 227(4.1) deemed trust is similar in principle to a floating charge over all the tax debtor's assets in favour of Her Majesty. As long as the tax debtor continues to be in default, the trust continues to float over the tax debtor's property. At any given point in time, whatever property then belonging to the tax debtor is subject to the deemed trust. As property comes into possession of the tax debtor, it is caught by the trust and becomes subject to Her Majesty's interest. Similarly, property which the tax debtor disposes of is thereby released from the deemed trust. The mutuality of treatment between incoming and outgoing property relating to the deemed trust is supported by both the plain language of the provisions as well as their purpose and intent. Her Majesty's interest in the tax debtor's property is protected because, while property which is sold to third party purchasers is released from the trust, at the same time, the proceeds of disposition of the alienated property are captured by the trust. Commercial certainty is promoted owing to the fact that third party purchasers are free to transact with tax debtors or suspected tax debtors without fearing that Her Majesty may subsequently assert an interest in the property so acquired.

Since the deemed trust created by ss. 227(4) and 227(4.1) encompasses property which comes into the hands of the tax debtor after the trust arises, when Great West came into possession of the Canada Safeway invoices, the deemed trust, which had already arisen as a consequence of Great West's default in remittances, successfully attached to those invoices. However, the deemed trust does not operate over assets which a tax debtor has sold in the ordinary course to third party purchasers. Once the Canada Safeway invoices had been factored to First Vancouver, the Minister was prevented from asserting its interest in these invoices.

Introduction

This appeal concerns the interpretation of the deemed trust provisions in ss. 227(4) and 227(4.1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"). At the hearing of this appeal, the Court dismissed the appeal with reasons to follow. The dispute is over certain property which came into the hands of the tax debtor after a deemed trust under s. 227(4.1) arose. The property was subsequently sold to a third party, after which time the Minister of National Revenue ("Minister") asserted an interest in the property on the basis that it continued to be subject to the deemed trust even after its sale.

As a result, the two specific issues to be resolved on this appeal are, first, whether property which comes into the tax debtor's hands after the deemed trust arises is subject to the trust, and, second, if so, whether the sale of trust property to third parties serves to release this property from the ambit of the trust.

Section 153(1) of the ITA requires employers to deduct and withhold amounts from their employees' wages ("source deductions") and remit these amounts to the Receiver General by a specified due date. By virtue of s. 227(4), when source deductions are made, they are deemed to be held separate and apart from the property of the employer in trust for Her Majesty. If the source deductions are not remitted to the Receiver General by the due date, the deemed trust in s. 227(4.1) of the ITA becomes operative and attaches to property of the employer to the extent of the amount of the unremitted source deductions. As well, the trust is deemed to have existed from the moment the source deductions were made.

For the reasons set forth below, I find that the s. 227(4.1) deemed trust is similar in principle to a floating charge over all the tax debtor's assets in favour of Her Majesty. The trust arises the moment the tax debtor fails to remit source deductions by the specified due date, but is deemed to have been in existence from the moment the deductions were made. As long as the tax debtor continues to be in default, the trust continues to float over the tax debtor's property. Thus, at any given point in time, whatever property then belonging to the tax debtor is subject to the deemed trust.

Viewed in this way, it is clear that, as property comes into possession of the tax debtor, it is caught by the trust and becomes subject to Her Majesty's interest. Similarly, property which the tax debtor disposes of is thereby released from the deemed trust. This mutuality of treatment between incoming and outgoing property relating to the deemed trust is supported by both the plain language of the provisions as well as their purpose and intent. Most importantly, Her Majesty's interest in the tax debtor's property is protected because, while property which is sold to third party purchasers is released from the trust, at the same time, the proceeds of disposition of the alienated property are captured by the trust. Moreover, commercial certainty is promoted owing to the fact that third party purchasers are free to transact with tax debtors or suspected tax debtors without fearing that Her Majesty may subsequently assert an interest in the property so acquired.

Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal on the basis that, although the property acquired by the tax debtor after the deemed trust arose became subject to the trust, when this property was sold to a third party, it was thereby released from the ambit of the deemed trust. As such, after the sale, Her Majesty could no longer assert an interest in the property.

Facts

The respondent, First Vancouver Finance ("First Vancouver"), is engaged in the business of factoring accounts receivable. Great West Transport Ltd. ("Great West") is in the transportation business. On November 6, 1997, First Vancouver and Great West entered into a factoring agreement providing for the purchase by First Vancouver of Great West's accounts receivable at a discount. Pursuant to the agreement, First Vancouver became the owner of certain debts due to Great West.

Under the terms of the factoring agreement, First Vancouver purchased accounts through assignments entered into from time to time at Great West's option. First Vancouver did not purchase an individual account until it was submitted for approval, and it was not bound to purchase it up to that point. After purchase, the Great West invoices were forwarded to Great West's debtors, along with notification that the accounts had been sold and that subsequent payments should be made directly to First Vancouver. Among the accounts purchased were several owing by Canada Safeway Limited or its associated undertakings ("Canada Safeway").

As of the date of the factoring agreement, Great West owed money to the Minister because of unremitted payroll deductions and goods and services tax ("GST"). First Vancouver was aware from the time it began dealing with Great West in November of 1997 that Great West was in arrears in respect of its payroll deductions and GST accounts. First Vancouver had, as of November 10, 1997, made arrangements with the Minister to forward part of the purchase price of the accounts, in the form of semi-monthly payments of $10,000, to the Minister which were to be applied to the arrears of Great West then outstanding. In addition, Great West remained directly responsible to the Minister for its ongoing payroll deductions and GST remittances as they became due. While First Vancouver regularly made payments pursuant to its arrangement with the Minister, Great West failed to meet its ongoing tax obligations.

In January and February of 1999, Great West made 10 individual assignments to First Vancouver, relating to accounts receivable payable by Canada Safeway and its associated undertakings. On February 10, 1999, the Minister served Canada Safeway with Enhanced Requirement to Pay Notices ("RTPs"), as authorized by s. 224(1.2) of the ITA and s. 317(3) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15, as amended. In response, Canada Safeway made payments totalling $187,444.66 to the Minister relating to accounts which Great West had assigned to First Vancouver between January 4 and February 17, 1999. Two of the sets of Canada Safeway accounts, totalling $31,086.43, were assigned to First Vancouver on February 11 and February 17, 1999, after the RTPs had been issued. However, the remainder of the accounts had already been assigned to First Vancouver before February 10, 1999 when the RTPs were issued. At no time prior to the payments from Canada Safeway to the Minister did First Vancouver receive any notice that the Minister was claiming an interest in any Great West accounts purchased by First Vancouver.

In response to the Minister's actions, First Vancouver brought an application in the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench to recover the amounts paid by Canada Safeway to the Minister pursuant to the RTPs.

Wimmer J. of the Court of Queen's Bench held that the monies owing on accounts factored prior to February 10, 1999, the date upon which Canada Safeway was served with the RTPs, were not subject to garnishment or to the deemed trust provisions of the ITA, or to any claim pursuant to the Excise Tax Act, and therefore that First Vancouver was entitled to these amounts. However, he held that the RTPs had captured the two accounts assigned after the RTPs were issued ("post-RTP accounts").

On appeal, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal of the Minister and the cross-appeal of First Vancouver on the issue of the post-RTP accounts.
