Quite simply, the evidence does not support the appellants' submission that the orders in these cases will paralyse the enforcement of taxation statutes in the province. The appellants are still at liberty to carry out searches and effect seizures. The appellants can still investigate and proceed under other sections of the Act, specifically ss. 38 and 39. Accepting, for the purpose of argument, the appellants' contention that this case will act as a precedent, it must be observed that there are so few searches and seizures carried out each year under taxation statutes in the province that this case is still one of exemption and not of suspension. In RJR -- MacDonald, supra, it was held that the onus of demonstrating harm to the public interest is a relatively low one for government authorities opposing interlocutory orders. The following appears at p. 346:

Digitized by Google

> The test will nearly always be satisfied simply upon proof that the authority is charged with the duty of promoting or protecting the public interest and upon some indication that the impugned legislation, regulation, or activity was undertaken pursuant to that responsibility. Once these minimal requirements have been met, the court should in most cases assume that irreparable harm to the public interest would result from the restraint of that action. [Emphasis added.]

However, the public interest will not always be harmed by granting a stay, particularly where the case in one of exemption rather than suspension (at p. 346):

> Consideration of the public interest may also be influenced by other factors. In Metropolitan Stores, it was observed that public interest considerations will weigh more heavily in a "suspension" case than in an "exemption" case. The reason for this is that the public interest is much less likely to be detrimentally affected when a discrete and limited number of applicants are exempted from the application of certain provisions of a law than when the application of the law is suspended entirely.

The sole adverse effect of the impounding orders is that the appellants will not be able to see the documents seized until the constitutionality of the legislation is determined. The evidence indicates that this may delay the investigation in two ways. First the documents seized may well contain evidence which can be used in the prosecution. Secondly, the documents seized may enable the investigators to find additional evidence in the form of witnesses and other documents. The evidence does support the appellants' submission that the delay caused by the impounding orders may make it more difficult for the investigators to find more evidence in the form of other documents and witnesses when the orders are lifted.

However, the evidence also establishes that there are some avenues of investigation which can still be pursued while the impounding orders are in place. Further, it is clear that very few searches are conducted in a year. Quebec has approximately 4.2 million individual taxpayers, 240,000 corporate taxpayers, 223,000 employers, and 302,000 "agents". Despite the large base of taxpayers, the Ministère du Revenu of Quebec, carries out only some 45 investigations per year under all taxation legislation. Further, only some 25 searches and seizures are carried out in these 45 annual investigations. These statistics clearly indicate that the impounding orders will not curtail the investigative process.

The appellants further allege that it is confronted with a problem by the systematic granting of impounding orders with respect to documents seized pursuant to s. 40 of the Act. The appellants refer to eight cases, including the two which are the subject of this appeal.

Those cases are as follows: Ameublement Jeanne Inc. v. Québec (Procureur général), Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-003335-872, granted April 15, 1987; Brochetterie Tino Inc. v. Québec (Procureur général), Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-008861-898, denied July 17, 1989, [1989] R.D.F.Q. 98; Restaurant le Gourmet grec Inc. v. Séguin, Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-004272-892, denied April 5, 1989, [1989] R.D.F.Q. 80; Courrier grec du Canada Ltée v. Québec (Procureur général), Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-002016-895, denied February 24, 1989; the present appeal 143471 Canada Inc. and Tabah; Cuisines Multiform internationales Inc. v. Angers, granted January 31, 1992, [1992] R.D.F.Q. 46 (Sup. Ct.), and Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-002049-920, granted April 14, 1992, [1992] R.D.F.Q. 126; Électro Marine Diesel Inc. v. Québec (Procureur général), Sup. Ct. Montréal, No. 500-05-005278-922, granted April 28, 1992, [1992] R.D.F.Q. 125. The respondents also brought to the Court's attention Groupe Shakiba Inc. v. Québec (Procureur général), Sup. Ct. Québec, No. 200-05-001644-934, granted June 3, 1993, [1993] R.D.F.Q. 70. These cases reveal that over a six year period, of nine motions, five were granted (one of these, Ameublement Jeanne Inc. was on consent), and four were refused.

It is true that these cases reveal that no applications for impounding orders have been denied since the decision of the Court Appeal of Quebec in Zeppetelli v. Canada, [1990] 2 C.T.C. 354. However, it is also true that they do not disclose a problem of a flood of impounding orders. The figures reveal not a flood, but at most a very slow and irregular trickle. I cannot accept that the enforcement of taxation statutes in the province of Quebec will be paralysed by impounding orders when the scant number of searches and seizures is compared to the number of taxpayers in the province.

Digitized by Google

It is not without significance that the Superior Court judges who heard the initial applications for the impounding orders, specifically found that there was no evidence that these orders would paralyse the investigation and prosecution of offences. Marquis J. in the Tabah case, [1990] R.D.F.Q. 90, wrote (at p. 96):

> [TRANSLATION] The respondents argue that if the present application is granted there will be such an increase in this type of action that eventually enforcement of the Act will be paralyzed.
>
> It should be noted in this regard that this is a case concerning the meals and hotels tax. The evidence is that the Department conducts forty-five (45) investigations per year under this Act: twenty-five (25) of these result in searches. To date an impounding order has only been granted once. The fear of Department employees is understandable but is not based on any factual evidence adduced. [Emphasis added.]

Hannan J. in 143471 Canada Inc., [1990] R.D.F.Q. 104, wrote (at p. 109):

> [TRANSLATION] Clearly this affidavit indicates that the effect of a stay would not be to suspend any other investigation or prosecution of the applicants [respondents before this Court] for any other offence in respect of any other period. It would not have the effect of limiting the application of any tax legislation to any taxpayer or even to the applicants, except for use of the documents subject to the seizure.

Further, there cannot be any suggestion that the orders in these cases were granted on the basis of judicial "rubber stamping". The cases were argued extensively and careful reasons delivered. For example, the argument in the Tabah case lasted three days and that in 143471 Canada Inc. lasted two days. In both cases the reasons given for the orders were careful and detailed.

The evidence clearly establishes that the granting of impounding orders will certainly not paralyse the enforcement of taxation laws in the province of Quebec. Even if in every case where searches were carried out, impounding orders were in fact issued, this would not have the effect of paralysing the enforcement of taxation legislation. It must be remembered that the impounding orders do not prevent searches. They do no more than delay the appellants viewing the documents seized. It cannot be said that the impounding orders in this case so interfere with the enforcement of taxation laws as to seriously harm the public interest. I think it unlikely that citizens will consider that they can break taxation laws with impunity when searches and seizures can still take place. Obviously, the balance of convenience would be very different if the respondents were seeking to have the carrying out of searches and seizures pursuant to ss. 40 and 40.1 of the Act enjoined. Here, the respondents seek no more than the maintenance of the impounding orders. Further, like La Forest J., I would conclude that the limitation period for laying charges will not run while the impounding orders are in effect. In the circumstances, I can reach no other conclusion than that the balance of convenience favours the respondents.

I agree with my colleague that the presence or absence of a flood of applications is not determinative in deciding whether an interlocutory order should be granted. The nature and scope of the order requested, as well as the circumstances of each case will determine whether the court hearing the application should be concerned about a flood of similar requests.

Digitized by Google

However, those concerns cannot be based on mere speculation. In my view, for a court to act based upon those concerns, there must be a substantial risk that there will be a flood of requests.

In this case, the evidence simply does not support the proposition that there is a probability, or even a real possibility, let alone a substantial risk, that there would be a flood of similar requests as a result of granting these applications.

My colleague suggests at the end of his reasons that there is an onus on an applicant for an interlocutory stay or impounding order (the respondents before this Court) to show that granting the stay or impounding order forwards the public interest. The discussion in RJR -- MacDonald at pp. 343-47 on which my colleague relies does not hold that in all cases an applicant for a stay must show that granting such an order is in the public interest. As a general rule all an applicant need show is that the public interest is not hurt by the order. What that passage considers is the situation where an applicant argues not only that its own private interest but also the public interest will be hurt by the refusal of a stay. In those circumstances, the private applicant has a higher threshold than the government respondent to establish that the public interest is served by its position. That is not this case. While in a general sense it can be said that there is a public interest in preventing unconstitutional searches, the respondents in this case do not rely on that public interest to support the impounding orders. Rather, they rely on their own privacy interests, and the fact that the public interest will not be harmed by granting the impounding orders. Thus, the respondents in this case only have to show that granting the orders will not harm the public interest, not that granting the orders will forward the public interest. This the respondents have done.

In summary, the evidence establishes that there is no serious interference with the enforcement of taxation statutes resulting from the granting of the impounding orders. There is then, no interference with the public interest and on this basis the impounding orders should be upheld. Further, even if it can be said that in a certain sense, the irreparable harm the respondents would suffer from the refusal of the impounding orders is small, since there is no significant interference with the public interest, the impounding orders should be upheld.

Delay

As I have indicated, if the judicial system could deal with the constitutional issue within a relatively short period, there would be no question that the impounding order would be the fairest and most reasonable method of proceeding. The prosecution would be protected, since the documents seized would be in safe keeping and could not be altered or changed. At the same time, the respondents' privacy interest in the documents, small though it may be, would be protected. How long is reasonable? Obviously, if the delay were a matter of weeks there would be no problem. Just as clearly, if the determination could be made within six months, there could be no significant prejudice suffered by anyone. It seems the delay will be longer than that in the province of Quebec. Judges of the Trial Division and the Court of Appeal work well and diligently under the pressure of an ever increasing case load. Courts and judges can do no more. Who then should bear the responsibility for that delay? Surely it should not be the individual, where as in this case, a serious question of law is raised as to the constitutional validity of search and seizure provisions of the legislation. The respondents should not suffer as a result of judicial delay. Ordinarily I would trust that this matter could be expedited and disposed of by the Court of Appeal of Quebec as expeditiously as possible. This Court has been advised that the Court of Appeal of Quebec granted the request of the respondent 143471 Canada Inc. to expedite the hearing of the appeal. The appeal was heard April 13, 1994. The Court of Appeal of Quebec dismissed the appeal on May 18, 1994, J.E. 94-934. I would expect that the application of Tabah would be bound by this decision. As a result it is not necessary to consider a direction to expedite the hearing of the appeal in 143471 Canada Inc. or the application in Tabah.

Digitized by Google

Disposition

In the result, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs, LA FOREST, L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ and MCLACHLIN JJ. dissenting.

Solicitors for the appellants: Veillette & Associés, Montréal.
Solicitors for the respondents: Phillips & Vineberg, Montréal.
Solicitors for the respondent Hétu: Woods Brouillette Des Marais, Montréal.

Obtain Information On Unnamed Taxpayers From Third Parties

Subsections 231.2(2)-(6) provide the means by which the Minister can look into the tax affairs of unnamed persons via sending a request for information concerning them to third parties. There are, understandably, limits on this power that many defences have attempted, in some cases successfully, to call "a fishing expedition" into a taxpayer's affairs.

The Historic SCC on Unnamed Persons – Tempered Now

There is a considerable amount of jurisprudence examining the limits of this power, one of the founding cases of which is James Richardson & Sons v. M.N.R.[86] whereby the Minister went on a foray into a future broker's activities, including making requests of the customers' identities and activity, to gather information on whether, generally, there was proper tax reporting being done by this type of group. The Minister did acknowledge that no one was under investigation which is important since there must be a genuine tax enforcement intent when the RFI under this provision is affected. On appeal to the SCC the Court held:

> The Minister of National Revenue in a check on futures traders' compliance with the Income Tax Act demanded and received from the appellant confidential information about the trading activities of its customers in 1977 but was not given the means to identify individual accounts. Although the appellant had been told that other commodity brokers would also be approached to participate in the project, demands for information were made only on the appellant. On appellant's refusal to identify its customers' accounts, respondent served a formal demand under s. 231(3) of the Act. Later, similar demands were made with respect to 1978 and 1979. The Minister acknowledged that neither the broker nor any of its customers were the subject of investigation by the Department in respect of their tax liability. Appellant attacked the validity of these demands in certiorari and declaratory proceedings in the Federal Court. These actions, which were consolidated at trial, were dismissed by the trial judge. Appeals to the Federal Court of Appeal were also dismissed.
>
> Held: The appeals should be allowed.
> The Minister cannot under s. 231(3) of the Act conduct a "fishing expedition" into the trading activities of the customers of one broker. A demand can only be made for information relevant to the tax liability of a person or persons under that section if a genuine and serious inquiry is being conducted into the tax liability of such person or persons. The section does not authorize a general survey of compliance by a class of taxpayers. This can be effected under ss. 221(1)(d) and 233 but only if the Minister has obtained a regulation under s. 221(1)(d) requiring all traders to file returns of their futures activities.

[86] [1984] 1 S.C.R. 614

Digitized by Google

Given the statutory interpretation of s. 231(3), it was not necessary to consider the constitutional questions arising out of this case.
The events leading up to the demand for information from the appellant are relatively complex but the most relevant ones can be stated fairly simply. The appellant is a commodities futures market broker in Winnipeg. In October 1974 the Department of National Revenue decided that it was necessary to check on compliance with the Income Tax Act by traders in the commodities futures market. In June 1979, after the appellant had queried the Department's legal authority to demand from it confidential information about its clients' affairs but had nevertheless participated in a feasibility study, the Department requested the appellant's magnetic tape file of their clients' commodity monthly statements for 1977 so that it could process the information on a test basis. The Department guaranteed confidentiality of the data during the test period and undertook to advise the appellant of any subsequent intention to use the information in an income tax compliance project. It also agreed to treat other Canadian commodity brokers in a similar way by inspecting their files for use in any such project.
The appellant supplied the information but with clients' account numbers only and no means of identifying them. In December 1979 the respondent requested the following information:
a complete listing of office locations identifying each by the office number; and a complete listing of customers' names and addresses, identifying each by account number.

The Federal Court of Appeal

In the Federal Court of Appeal [reported at [1983] 1 F.C. 257] the appellant submitted, relying on the Canadian Bank of Commerce case, that a requirement for information under s. 231(3) was not for a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act unless the purpose was to obtain information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons whose tax liability was currently under investigation. It argued that the requirements in the present case did not meet this test. A requirement for information concerning all the customers of the appellant engaged in commodity trading was not, it submitted, a requirement related to some specific person or persons within the meaning of the Canadian Bank of Commerce decision.
Mr. Justice Le Dain, speaking for a unanimous Court, held that the judgment in the Canadian Bank of Commerce case presented no obstacle to the Minister in this case. The verification of compliance with the Income Tax Act by the commodity trading customers of the appellant was undoubtedly a purpose related to the administration and enforcement of the Act within the meaning of s. 231(3), and s. 231(3) was within the legislative authority of Parliament under s. 91(3) of the Consitution Act, 1867. Moreover, the Department was engaged in a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liability of some specific person or persons. Mr. Justice Le Dain said, at p. 270:
The judgment in Canadian Bank of Commerce was based on the agreed fact that the requirement in that case related to a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liability of some specific person or persons, but I do not read the judgment as purporting to treat that as the only valid purpose under what is now subsection 231(3). In any event I am far from certain that the present case is essentially distinguishable from that on which the majority of the Supreme Court based their conclusion. In the majority opinion of Cartwright J. (as he then was) the words "some specific person or persons" are obviously understood as referring not to named person but merely to existing identifiable persons. A reference to all of the commodity trading customers of the appellant comes within this meaning of the words.

Digitized by Google

Leave to appeal to this Court was granted and the following questions settled by order of the Chief Justice:

Is Section 231(3) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72 C. 63 as amended, intra vires the Parliament of Canada under the provisions of Section 91(3) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Are the Demands made upon the Appellant, James Richardson & Sons, Limited under Section 231(3) of the Income Tax Act S.C. 1970-71-72 C. 63 as amended, void under the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Are the Demands made upon the Appellant, James Richardson & Sons, Limited under Section 231(3) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72 C. 63 as amended, void under the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

The appellant appeals on four grounds, namely:

the requirements are not authorized by s. 231(3) of the Act;

section 231(3) of the Act is ultra vires the Parliament of Canada;

the requirements are void under the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and the requirements are void under the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

If the appellant succeeds on the first ground as a matter of statutory interpretation then it is not necessary to consider the constitutional issues raised in the other three grounds.

The respondent counters these arguments by saying that what is required from the appellant is not the "information returns" mentioned in s. 221(1)(d). Nor have the demands for information in this case been made of a "class of persons" as s. 221(1)(d) requires. The respondent says that s. 22l(1)(d) contemplates the filing of information returns by a general class of persons on a regular basis whereas s. 231(3) is "part of the Department's investigating tools to obtain information". Such tools are vital, the respondent submits, to a self- assessment system. Nothing, he says, in either s. 221(1)(d) or s. 233 prevents the respondent from requiring under s. 231(3) information from a specific commodities broker regarding the tradings of a specific group of traders in commodities futures in respect of a specified period of time. The respondent submits that the case is squarely covered by this Court's decision in the Canadian Bank of Commerce case, supra.

The language of s. 231(3) of the Income Tax Act is unquestionably very broad and on its face would cover any demand for information made to anyone having knowledge of someone else's affairs relevant to that other person's tax liability. It would, in other words, if construed broadly, authorize an exploratory sortie into any taxpayer's affairs and require anyone having anything to contribute to the exploration to participate. It would not be necessary for the Minister to suspect non-compliance with the Act, let alone to have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the Act was being violated as required in s. 231(4). Provided the information sought had a bearing (or perhaps even could conceivably have a bearing) on a taxpayer's tax liability it could be called for under the subsection.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce case, however, makes it clear that the subsection is not to be construed that broadly. It establishes through the majority judgment written by Mr. Justice Cartwright (as he then was) that:

the test of whether the Minister is acting for a purpose specified in the Act is an objective one and has to be decided on the proper interpretation of the subsection and its application to the circumstances disclosed;

the obtaining of information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons whose liability to tax is under investigation is a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act;

it is not necessary that the person from whom the information is sought be one whose liability to tax is under investigation;

Digitized by Google

the fact that the giving of the information may disclose private transactions involving persons who are not under investigation and may not be liable to tax does not invalidate the requirement.
The respondent acknowledges that neither the appellant nor any of its customers is a person whose tax liability is under investigation within the meaning of the Canadian Bank of Commerce case. It submits however, that that is only one of the purposes contemplated by s. 231(3). The purpose in this case is to verify the accuracy of income tax returns made by the appellant's customers who were traders in commodities futures. This also, it submits, is a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act.
I have some difficulty with the respondent's submission in relation to the Canadian Bank of Commerce case. If, indeed, the ratio of that case is that a demand for information which meets the test of being related to a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liability of some specific person or persons is a demand made for purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Act, how can it be said, consistent with that decision, that a demand which does not meet such a test is also for a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act? If this is so, it was pointless for the Court in the Canadian Bank of Commerce case to make a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liability of some specific person or persons a prerequisite of the validity of the requirement in that case. Yet Mr. Justice Cartwright makes it clear that his judgment is premised on that prerequisite being there. After referring to certain paragraphs in the stated case he states at p. 738, that it is common ground "that the requirement addressed to the appellant relates to a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liabilitity of some specific person or persons". He then makes the point that the fact that the answer to the requirement may disclose private transactions involving a number of persons who are not under investigation and may not be liable to tax will not invalidate the requirement. He reiterates the purpose of the requirement at p. 739:
The purpose of the requirement, then, is to obtain information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons whose liability to tax is under investigation; this is a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act.
Accordingly, while I agree with Le Dain J. that the Court in the Canadian Bank of Commerce case did not say that the purpose in that case, namely the obtaining of information relevant to someone's tax liability, was the only purpose for which a requirement could validly be made under s. 231(3), it did nevertheless insist on a prerequisite to that particular purpose, namely that the someone's tax liability be the subject of investigation, and it is that prerequisite which the appellant submits is missing in this case.
…
It seems to me that what the Minister is trying to do here, namely check generally on compliance with the statute by traders in the commodities futures market, cannot be done by conducting a "fishing exp edition" in to the affairs of one broker's customers under s. 231(3) of the Act. If the Minister seriously thinks that traders in the commodities futures market generally are not reporting their transactions properly for income tax purposes, then he has s. 221(1)(d) available to him. He can obtain a regulation under that subsection requiring all such traders to file returns of their transactions in the commodities futures market. Having obtained such a regulation, he is then in a position to demand such returns at large without regard to whether or not any specific person or persons are currently under investigation. The very presence of those provisions in the Act serves, in my view, to support the approach taken in the Canadian Bank of Commerce case that s. 231(3)

Digitized by Google

is only available to the Minister to obtain information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons if the tax liability of such person or persons is the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry.

In Redeemer Foundation v. Canada (National Revenue)[87] the Minister asked a charity for the names of its donors as well as the recepients of its academic awards since he thought that the two were related in a tax avoidance scheme. The charity refused and argued to the Supreme Court it was held in the head-note:

> The appellant Foundation, a registered charity, operates a forgivable loan program that finances the education of students at an affiliated college. The Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") was concerned that some donations to the program were not valid charitable donations because the donors' contributions were made solely to finance the education of their own children. CRA served the Foundation with a requirement to record the identity of each donor and the name of the student who received credit for each donation. In a subsequent audit, CRA requested the donor information, which the Foundation provided. CRA advised the Foundation that there might be grounds to revoke its charitable status and to reassess its donors. Notices of reassessment were sent to some donors. The Foundation applied for judicial review of the CRA's request for donor information. The reviewing judge declared that the request was improper without prior judicial authorization, the donor information should be returned, and the Minister of National Revenue should be prevented from acting upon the information to reassess donors. The Federal Court of Appeal set aside the reviewing judge's order and dismissed the application for judicial review.
>
> Held (Binnie, Deschamps and Rothstein JJ. dissenting in part): The appeal should be dismissed.

[87] [2008] 2 S.C.R. 643, 2008 SCC 46

Digitized by Google

Per McLachlin C.J. and LeBel, Fish and Charron JJ.: The Minister was entitled to the donor information through the combined effect of ss. 230(2)(a) and 231.1 of the Income Tax Act, and the Minister was not required to obtain judicial authorization before requesting the information. The Minister has a broad power under s. 231.1 to inspect, audit and examine taxpayers' records and any information that is or should be in the taxpayer's books. The Foundation was required to collect the donor information pursuant to its record keeping obligations under s. 230(2)(a) because the information was necessary for determining whether to revoke its registration as a charity. Section 231.2 still serves a useful purpose if s. 231.1 is read as authorizing the Minister to obtain information on unnamed third parties during the audit of a taxpayer without judicial authorization, since s. 231.2 addresses circumstances where the Minister needs information about one or more taxpayers outside the context of a formal audit. [1] [12-13] [15]

Regardless of whether the donor list was used by the CRA in pursuing its audits of the donors themselves, the CRA's request for the donor information was made for the legitimate purpose of investigating the validity of the Foundation's status as a registered charity. The CRA could not confirm whether the donors' contributions were valid charitable donations without the requested information. The donor information is clearly the type of record that the Foundation is required to keep to verify the legitimacy of its donations and requiring the CRA to obtain judicial authorization before requesting it would be illogical and would serve no useful purpose. Furthermore, reassessment of donors is a logical consequence of a determination that a registered charity is not operating a valid charitable program. A donor can reasonably expect that his or her donation will be examined if the registered charity is audited and that his or her claimed tax credit will be non-compliant if the charitable program is not valid. Requiring judicial authorization whenever an audit of a charity entails a possibility that its donors might be investigated and reassessed would be unworkable and, given the reciprocal nature of many tax arrangements, would potentially require judicial authorization in a variety of other circumstances. Lastly, there is minimal risk that the Minister will audit taxpayers who are not suspected of non-compliance solely to investigate unnamed taxpayers for non-compliance. [16-21] [26-27]

The Federal Court does not have the jurisdiction to order the Minister to vacate tax assessments.

Taxpayers should challenge evidence used for a reassessment before the Tax Court of Canada. [28]

Per Binnie, Deschamps and Rothstein JJ. (dissenting in part): The CRA is acting outside ss. 230 and 231.1 of the Income Tax Act when it seeks information other than to verify a taxpayer's compliance with the Act through an audit of the taxpayer, and judicial authorization is required under s. 230.2(2) if the information it seeks pertains to unnamed persons. While read in isolation ss. 230 and 231.1 might be interpreted as empowering the CRA to require a taxpayer to keep and provide information identifying unnamed persons, these provisions must be interpreted with regard to s. 231.2. In order for that section to be necessary and to have any meaning, it must provide the CRA with power in addition to what it is given under ss. 230 and 231.1. If the CRA could request information pertaining to unnamed persons under its audit powers, then it could avoid the requirement for judicial authorization and s. 231.2(2) — a taxpayer protection provision — would be ineffective. This is not an issue of reading down s. 231.1(1) to avoid redundancy, but rather an issue of reading ss. 230, 231.1 and 231.2 coherently. Whereas ss. 230 and focus on the taxpayer's compliance with the Act, s. 231.2 enhances the CRA's power and may be used for additional purposes such as dealing with non-payment and obtaining information about unnamed persons. [35-41]

Digitized by Google

Here, the CRA's request was improper without judicial authorization under s. 231.2(2). As early as July 2000, if not before, the CRA intended to reassess the Foundation's donors. This is not a case where its purpose was solely to audit the Foundation and the information was entirely within the Foundation's records. The CRA sought information pertaining to the compliance of specific but unnamed persons and nothing in the Act required the Foundation to keep that information other than the CRA's specific request under
s. 230(3). In the circumstances of this case, the CRA could not require the information under its power to audit the Foundation or under s. 230(3) without obtaining judicial authorization under s. 231.2(2), nor could it avoid s. 231.2(2) by making a verbal or informal request for the donor information. Furthermore, the CRA cannot justify bypassing s. 231.2(2) with arguments based on reciprocity of tax treatment or taxpayers' low expectations of privacy in their tax records. Because the authority of the CRA is so broad, it is required to follow the procedures provided in the Act rigorously. Section 231.2(2) was intended to provide some minimal restraint on the CRA's broad, unilateral authority and judicial authorization under s. 231.2(2) is required when, in the course of an audit of a taxpayer, the CRA forms the intention to obtain information pertaining to unnamed persons. [41] [43] [46-49] [54-56]

Discretion of Judge to Withhold Authorization

In The Minister of National Revenue and Nassereddin Derakhshani[88] the steps the Minister took to identify the taxpayers, and surrounding information that would allow them to be attended to, was at issue when a s. 231.2(2) request was made on a taxpayer. There was some issue as to whether the judge in the petitioning court had the discretion to withhold authorization to compel the taxpayer to release the information at the Appeal court held:

[1] This is an appeal from a decision by Justice Martineau (the Federal Court judge or the trial judge) refusing to give effect to the ex parte application filed by the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) for authorization to issue a requirement to provide information relating to unnamed persons pursuant to section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act).

…

Substantive issue

[15] In support of the Minister's appeal, counsel for the Minister alleges that the Federal Court judge should have granted the requested authorization since the evidence filed established that the two conditions provided at subsection 231.2(3) of the Act were met:

231.2 …

…

On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as

[88] 2009 FCA 190

Digitized by Google

the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that the person or group is ascertainable; and the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act.
[Minister's emphasis.]

[16] According to counsel for the Minister, the record clearly establishes that the group of persons to whom the required information refers is ascertainable and that the provision of that information is necessary for the purposes of enforcing the Act. It follows that it was the duty of the Federal Court judge to issue the authorization; he had no discretion in the matter.

[17] That being said, counsel for the Minister is misreading subsection 231.2(3) of the Act. The judge hearing an application under this provision is the one who must be satisfied ("est convaincu" in the French text) that the required conditions are met. Clearly, such discretion must be exercised judicially, but, where it has been, the judge has the final say.

[18] Contrary to what counsel for the Minister asserts, I do not believe that the decision of our Court in
M.N.R. v. Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, 2007 FCA 346, [2008] 3 F.C.R. 366, supports the argument he advances (Memorandum, at paragraph 22). In that case, our Court began its analysis with the following statement (at paragraph 5):
This provision clearly states that the ex parte order will be made if the person or group referred to is ascertainable and if the information or documents are required to verify compliance with any duty or obligation under the Act.
[Double underlining added.]
In that case, it was not a matter of establishing whether the judge hearing an application under subsection 231.2(3) has any residual discretion. The dispute pertained to the contents of the two conditions under that provision and, more specifically, to the question of whether a "genuine and serious" inquiry remains one of the applicable conditions. After having explained that this criterion has its origins in case law dating from when the Act read differently, the Court ruled that it did not apply. That was the context in which the Court explained that an authorization "will be made" when the two conditions now found at subsection 231.2(3) are satisfied.

[19] It is useful to recall that the existence of judicial discretion is essential to the constitutional validity of this type of provision, which is comparable to a seizure even when used in a regulatory (or even non- criminal) context (McKinlay Transport Ltd., above, at page 642). It is this discretion, conferred upon an independent judge, which protects individuals from the damaging use of this kind of power and brings it in line with the requirements of section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Baron v. Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416, at page 443). In this case, the wording of paragraph 231.2(3), according to which the judge ". . . may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate . . ." authorize the requirement ". . . where the judge is satisfied . . ." that the prescribed conditions are met, leaves no doubt as to the existence of this discretion.

[20] In the alternative, the Minister alleges that the Federal Court judge clearly misused his discretion. This brings into question the use that can be made of the oral "reasons" related by counsel for the Minister and reproduced at the beginning of this analysis (at paragraph 3).

Digitized by Google

[21] At the hearing, counsel for the Minister explained that he felt uneasy relying on the words of the judge that he himself had related and are not entered in the minutes. After being reminded by the Court that the respondent had not raised any objection in that regard, counsel for the Minister hinted at another problem. He explained that after having informed counsel for the Minister that his application would be dismissed, the Federal Court judge had given him a number of options, including that of dismissing his application with or without reasons. Counsel for the Minister had opted for dismissal without reasons, which explains why the reasons are not reported in the minutes.

[22] In the circumstances, I understand better why counsel for the Minister did not rely on the statements he related to attack the trial judge's exercise of discretion. In my opinion, it would have been inappropriate to do so.

[23] In the absence of reasons, we can only review the case as it was made to the trial judge by the Minister and ask ourselves whether, in light of that case, it was open to the trial judge to exercise his discretion as he did.

[24] The affidavit filed in support of the application is brief. It is signed by Francis Goulet, the Canada Revenue Agency auditor in charge of the respondent's file. The inquiry was part of an audit project aimed at taxi drivers. The affidavit reveals that the respondent does business under the legal name "Service d'impôt Bilan Enr." and prepares tax returns for others. The inquiry revealed that the returns of three taxi drivers prepared by the respondent between 2002 and 2006 were prepared [TRANSLATION] "without the necessary documentation and based on an estimation of earnings and expenditures" in two cases and [TRANSLATION] "without supporting documentation on income and by estimating expenditures from receipts" in the other case (Affidavit of Francis Goulet, at paragraphs 9, 10 and 11).

[25] At paragraph 13, the auditor explained having been unable to obtain the information sought because

[TRANSLATION]

[The respondent] did not send the CRA his clients' tax returns using the electronic filing system. I am unable to establish the identity or number of his clients because that information is not manually recorded in the CRA's databases.

[26] Lastly, the auditor explained that once the information is obtained, he will be able to conduct the necessary audits on the respondent's clients and determine, if applicable, the assessments and penalties that are required (idem. at paragraph 14).

[27] What is astounding, in reading this affidavit, is that it does not provide the judge with a single piece of information regarding the requirement to provide information that he is being asked to authorize. Accepting that the number of individuals affected by the requirement is unknown, the auditor in charge of the respondent's file still has knowledge of the respondent's business. In that respect, no reference is made to the respondent's tax returns or to the information likely to be found therein about his business, including the amount of income from the business. I must observe that the affidavit filed in support of the requirement does not point to any suspicion of inaccuracy in the information appearing on the respondents' tax returns.

[28] The affidavit also seems incomplete in another respect. Normally, the name of a professional who prepares a tax return on behalf of another person must appear on the return. That is part of the required information. The affidavit is silent on the subject. I clarify, in that respect, that nowhere is it stated in the affidavit that the required information is not available, but indeed that such information is not manually recorded in the databases (see paragraph 13, quoted at paragraph 25, above). This implies, without it being possible to know for certain, that the required information could be obtained other than by a requirement to provide information.

Digitized by Google

[29] The fact that it may be possible to obtain the information using other means does not exclude the possibility that a requirement might be authorized, but that is information that must be provided to the judge. A judge must not be left in the dark on such an important point.

[30] In my view, the affidavit filed in support of the requirement shows a fundamental lack of rigour, and the Federal Court judge exercised his power appropriately in declaring that he was not satisfied.

The Inter-play of the Process

Whitewater Golf Club Inc. V. Minister Of National[89] illustrates exactly how a Trial court will handle a judicial review of a request for unnamed persons that stems from a general audit into a taxpayer's affairs. In this case a golf clubs members were the subject of a request for identity to further find out how they had handled the fees that they had paid to the club, while the club objected to their being identified. The Trial court held, giving a run-down of how the provisions were to play:

[1] By order dated July 24th, 2008, issued ex parte in Ottawa, Ontario, pursuant to subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supplement), as amended (the ITA), and paragraph 289(3) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-15 (the ETA), I authorized the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) to impose on the applicant, Whitewater Golf Club Inc. (Whitewater), a requirement that it provides the Minister with certain information and documents relating to a group of unnamed persons (the authorization).

[2] The required information is with regard to Whitewater's November 30, 2003 through November 30, 2005 taxation years, and includes: the names and addresses of persons or corporations to whom Whitewater supplied goods or services; sales journals, sales invoices or other supporting documentation; any and all accounting documents under Whitewater's control or in its possession concerning monies received with regard to the sale of goods or services; any and all documentation concerning monies received from the sale of goods or services to customers (members) including all bank statements, bank deposit books, and records of monies received from customers (members).

[3] The authorization and the notice to the respondent were served upon Whitewater's representative on July 31, 2008. Before me is an application by Whitewater for a review of the authorization pursuant to subsections 231.2(5) and (6) of the ITA and paragraph 289(5) of the ETA. Furthermore, Whitewater is seeking an order dismissing the Minister's originating application (T-1099-08). For the reasons that follow, the application for review will be dismissed.

[4] The Canadian income tax system is a self-reporting and self-assessing system (R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627) (McKinlay Tranport). However, the Minister is given significant statutory powers to enable him to identify incidents of non-compliance and to take corrective action. In this regard, it bears mentioning that taxpayers have a very low expectation of privacy in their business records relevant to the determination of their tax liability: McKinlay Transport, above and Redeemer Foundation v. Canada (National Revenue), [2008] S.C.R. 643, (Redeemer) at para. 25.

[89] 2009 FC 739

Digitized by Google

[5] The powers of the Minister include a number of tools that permit the Minister to compel the production of information the Minister considers necessary to fulfil his mandate. One of those tools is found in subsection 231.2(1) of the ITA, and it permits the Minister, in certain circumstances, to compel the production of information about unnamed persons if the Minister first obtains the approval of a judge (defined in section 231 to mean a judge of the Federal Court or a judge of the superior court of the relevant province or territory). It reads in relevant part as follows:

(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act (including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person), […] by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as is stipulated in the notice, any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or any document.

[6] Recourse to subsection 231.2(2) is made when the Minister wishes to verify whether an ascertainable class of persons has complied with the ITA and information relevant to that question is accessible by someone who has no statutory obligation to provide it to the Minister in the form of an information return or in the course of the Minister's examination of the person's own tax affairs. Subsection 231.2(2) reads as follows:

231.2 (2) The Minister shall not impose on any person (in this section referred to as a "third party") a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) to provide information or any document relating to one or more unnamed persons unless the Minister first obtains the authorization of a judge under subsection 231.2(3).

[7] The procedure to be followed when the Minister wishes to seek judicial authorization to compel the production of information about unnamed persons is set out in subsections 231.2(3) to (6). If the application is successful and the Minister acts on the authorization, the third party has an opportunity to apply to the same judge, or a judge of the same court, for a review of the authorization. That review may result in the authorization being cancelled, confirmed or varied. Subsections 231.2(3) to (6) read as follows:

231.2 (3) On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that the person or group is ascertainable; and the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act.

Where an authorization is granted under subsection 231.2(3), it shall be served together with the notice referred to in subsection 231.2(1).

Where an authorization is granted under subsection 231.2(3), a third party on whom a notice is served under subsection 231.2(1) may, within 15 days after the service of the notice, apply to the judge who granted the authorization or, where the judge is unable to act, to another judge of the same court for a review of the authorization.

Digitized by Google

On hearing an application under subsection 231.2(5), a judge may cancel the authorization previously granted if the judge is not then satisfied that the conditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) and 231.2(3)(b) have been met and the judge may confirm or vary the authorization if the judge is satisfied that those conditions have been met.

[8] At issue in the present proceedings is the Minister's compliance with the second condition for a judicial authorization under subsection 231.2(3) of the ITA that "the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act". Thus, the applicant submits that in the course of the audit being performed by the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), the Minister requested the names of its corporate members in furtherance of that audit and not for the purpose of reviewing the compliance by said members with the provisions of the ITA or the ETA. The applicant further submits that the Minister, in making the ex parte application, did not provide full disclosure of all material facts and evidence it relied on in the material used to support its application.

[9] The CRA is conducting a full compliance audit of the applicant for income tax and GST/HST purposes. As part of this audit the CRA requested a copy of the financial statements, specifically working papers from the accountant and a copy of the electronic books and records of Whitewater. By exchange of correspondence during the months of December 2006 and January 2007 the applicant's counsel informed CRA that the applicant would only be providing paper copies of the records requested due to the fact that the electronic records contained the names of members of Whitewater. A letter, dated November 2007, from the Minister's counsel, Mr. MacPhee, to the applicant's counsel stated: "I have spoken with my client on this matter, and they have confirmed that Whitewater Golf Club Inc. is the only party under audit, and the records sought are necessary to properly complete their audit."

[10] Nonetheless, the Minister acknowledges that CRA's position on how to proceed on this matter changed somewhat from the time the information in issue was first sought. Although it was initially the position of the CRA audit that the members' names would only be used as part of the audit of Whitewater, the CRA later amended its position on this matter and assured the Court that the unnamed persons being sought would also be investigated to ensure compliance with the ITA and the ETA. This change of position was clearly set forth in the Minister's originating application (T-1099-08).

[11] The applicant submits that the Minister's assertion, following which the information is now sought to verify compliance with the legislation in question, is not bona fide and that this position was only adopted to bring it within the requirements of the ITA to obtain the authorization, in breach of the Minister's obligation to conduct a tax audit in good faith and to act judiciously in the exercise of its audit powers M.N.R. v. Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, 2007 FCA 346 , [2007] F.C.J. No. 1477 F.C.A. at para. 48).

[12] The Minister submits that at the outset of this audit the CRA was provided with "screener's comments" giving direction as to how to conduct the CRA audit. Based on said comments as well as CRA's review of this matter, it was determined that one of the purposes of the Whitewater audit was also to ensure the compliance of corporate members with regards to the limitation of the deductibility of golf membership by these corporate members.

[13] Nonetheless, the applicant further submits that while referred to by Ms. Mary Davies in her affidavit sworn on May 21, 2008 filed in support of the Minister's ex parte initial application, the screener's comments were never filed as exhibits and thus the Minister failed to provide full disclosure of all material facts and evidence it relied on to support its application.

Digitized by Google

[14] The grounds of review of an authorization granted under subsection 231.2(3) of the ITA and paragraph 289(3) of the ETA have previously been stated. Thus, this Court will vary or cancel the authorization previously granted only if it is not satisfied that the conditions in subsections 231.2(3)(a) and 231.2(3)(b) have been met.

[15] The recent decision of the Supreme Court in Redeemer further confirmed at para. 27 that: [I]f an organization's charitable program is not valid, then both the charity and any of its donors who claim tax credits are non-compliant. The CRA has a valid interest in investigating both. The same would be true of any other relationship involving reciprocal tax treatment. [...]

[16] The authorization at issue will be confirmed, as the Court is satisfied that the requirement is imposed in good faith by the Minister in order to verify compliance by Whitewater Gold Club members with their duties and obligations under the ITA. Moreover, the applicant has provided no compelling rationale for this Court to vary the authorization, and I see no sound reason for restricting today the requirement to corporate members since non-corporate members may have also claimed non-allowable deductions or GST refunds.

[17] The applicant has provided no objective evidence to support its allegation of bad faith. The Minister's change of position regarding the audit of the Whitewater members themselves, which resulted in the Minister seeking the authorization at issue, is not a sufficient ground by itself to annul the authorization. Indeed, this change of position was clearly stated in the material filed in support of the ex parte application. The case at hand is precisely that of a relationship involving reciprocal tax treatment as referred to in Redeemer. It appears to me that the Minister took the more prudent approach of seeking judicial authorization and followed the suggestion previously made by applicant's counsel that judicial authorization be obtained.

[18] In conclusion, the applicant's submissions regarding the Minister's failure to fully disclose the material in support of which the Whitewater members are not being audited has no legal or reasonable basis. Furthermore, there is no obligation under the ITA regarding the nature of the particular evidence that has to be filed in support of an application ex parte for an authorization. There was certainly no obligation in this case to produce protected material with the affidavit of Mary Davies. The only conditions to be satisfied are those set forth in subsections 231.2(3)(a) and 231.2(3)(b) of the ITA which have clearly been met. Again, there is sufficient proof on the record that the information was sought by the Minister to ensure the member's compliance under paragraph 18(1)(l) of the ITA. At the hearing of this application, other valid grounds to verify compliance, such as GST refunds, were also provided by Minister's counsel. Finally, the records of members exist and the applicant cannot simply refuse their access on the ground that it is not obliged by law to maintain such records.

Ascertainable Class Size Not a Limit

Digitized by Google

In MNR v. Greater Montréal Real Estate Board[90] the Appeal court had to ascertain the present RFI Unnamed person provisions when the taxpayer organization argued that its list of members was too broad (2,000) while at Trial the judge held against the MNR when it was seemingly settled that there was a "genuine and serious" inquiry into the third parties affairs. The case is very important since considerable amendments had occurred to these provisions in the Act following a few SCC. The Appeal court held:

> [1] The Minister of National Revenue (MNR) is appealing a decision by Madam Justice Johanne Gauthier (the judge) dated September 6, 2006. This decision set aside an earlier order dated June 28, 2005, which was made ex parte under subsection 232.2(3) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th supp.), c. 1 (the Act). That order authorized the MNR to impose a requirement on the Greater Montréal Real Estate Board (the GMREB) to provide information and documents relating to a group of unnamed taxpayers.
>
> …
>
> [3] In the autumn of 2004, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency serving the Montérégie/Rive- sud area set out to verify whether the real estate agents and licensed brokers living or carrying on business in that area were complying with the Act. This investigation was intended to determine, inter alia, whether the agents and brokers had completed their income tax returns properly and whether they had reported the commissions they had earned.
>
> …
>
> [5] This provision clearly states that the ex parte order will be made if the person or group referred to is ascertainable and if the information or documents are required to verify compliance with any duty or obligation under the Act.
>
> [6] In the order at issue, the judge upheld her initial finding that the group referred to by the MNR in its ex parte application constituted an ascertainable group within the meaning of paragraph 231.2(3)(a). She also set aside her previous order and determined that the "Minister has not established that, at this stage of the project, the request for information is intended to determine whether each and every one of the GMREB members (real estate agents and brokers) has complied with the Act by reporting all of their income": paragraph 58 of the order.
>
> The issues
>
> [7] The analysis of section 231.2 of the Act and its application to the facts of this case are at the heart of the dispute, as evidenced by the parties' submissions. The MNR contends that the first judgment is erroneous in that the judge found that t here was no "genuine and serious inquiry" about the agents and brokers referred to in the request for information. For its part, the GMREB argues that the judge erred in finding that the group was ascertainable.
>
> The identifiable group
>
> [9] The judge was correct in finding that the group referred to in the application was ascertainable under paragraph 231.2(3)(a) of the Act.
>
> [10] The GMREB argues that a group is ascertainable when the persons in the group have done something specific together in the pursuit of a common objective, which is not the case here [TRANSLATION] "because there is no reason to believe that there is a common link related to the administration of the Act": respondent's memorandum, paragraph 52. The GMREB refers to the decisions in: Canada (M.N.R.) v. National Foundation for Christian Leadership, 2004 FC 1753 (appeal dismissed: 2005 FCA 246), [Christian Leadership]; Artistic Ideas Inc. v.

[90] 2007 FCA 346

Digitized by Google

Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 68, [Artistic Ideas]; M.N.R. v. Sand Exploration Ltd. et al., [1995] 3 FC 44, [Sand Exploration]; and Fédération des caisses populaires Desjardins du Québec, No: 200-00-000001-94, [1997] 2 C.T.C. 159 (Sup. Ct.), [Fédération des caisses].

[11] These judgments are of no assistance in this case and do not support the GMREB's position on "ascertainable group". The reasons in these cases must be read with caution, bearing in mind the particular context of the legislation in effect at the time they were written since section 231.2 of the Act was significantly amended in 1996. The other legislative provisions on which the reasons were based must also be considered.

[12] Accordingly, in Fédération des caisses, the MNR made an arbitrary identification based on the nature of the transactions and not on the persons making those transactions. In that case, the individuals or companies had transferred sums of money out of Canada through the Fédération or one of the Caisses affiliated with it for a given period. This case required the analysis of section 231.2 prior to its amendment.

[13] In Artistic Ideas, our Court authorized the MNR to obtain the names of charitable organizations involved in "art flips" under subsection 231.2(1), not subsections (2) or (3). The Court ruled that there was no evidence that the MNR wanted to obtain the names of the charities to verify their compliance with the Act. In fact, their names were necessary solely for the Minister's investigation of the third party Artistic Ideas.

[14] The Sand Exploration and Christian Leadership cases also do not support GMREB's argument that the pursuit of a common objective is a prerequisite for a group to be ascertainable.

[15] Last, the GMREB contends that the group is not ascertainable because it numbers close to 2,000 people: respondent's memorandum, paragraph 52. This argument is not convincing. In All Saints Greek Orthodox Church v. Canada (MNR), 2006 FC 374, at least 1300 donors made up the ascertainable group within the meaning of the Act.

[16] In this case, the audit involves the group composed of real estate agents and brokers living or carrying on business in the area served by the Canada Revenue Agency's Montérégie/Rive-Sud Tax Services Office. Gauthier J. correctly concluded that this was an ascertainable group for purposes of section 231.2 of the Act.

[17] I will now deal with the arguments about a genuine and serious inquiry.

The genuine and serious inquiry

[18] The judge accepted the GMREB's submission that the MNR was not conducting a genuine and serious inquiry about one or more individuals in the identified group. She ruled that a genuine and serious inquiry was a condition precedent for judicial authorization under subsection 231.2(3) of the Act.

[19] The judge suggested that any new application for authorization by the MNR would have to specify "that a genuine audit is under way in regard to each and every one of the members of this group and not only an investigation or project aimed at selecting the members of the group who are to be audited later": paragraph 59 of the order. Consequently, she was not satisfied with the evidence, ruling that the MNR was only conducting an audit project, and she set aside her previous order, concluding that there was no genuine and serious inquiry.

[20] The statutory provision under review does not mention "genuine and serious

Digitized by Google

inquiry." This expression, which originated in The Canadian Bank of Commerce v. The Attorney General of Canada, [1962] S.C.R. 729, [Canadian Bank of Commerce] and resulted from a simple admission by the parties (ibidem, p. 733), has since been repeated and argued as if it were an established legal principle.

[21] In my view, whether a "genuine and serious inquiry" exists is not the appropriate test in considering an application under subsection 231.2(3) of the Act. The question is not whether the MNR began a genuine and serious inquiry, let alone one involving every unnamed person of the group. Rather the question is: was the applications judge satisfied that the information or documents relating to one or more unnamed persons (forming an ascertainable group) was required to verify compliance with the Act?

The Richardson and Canadian Bank of Commerce decisions

[22] Over the years, the provision under review has been the subject of legislative amendments that must be borne in mind when analyzing the cases cited by the parties to support their arguments. I will spend more time discussing Richardson (James Richardson & Sons) v. the Department of National Revenue, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 614, [Richardson], which, together with Canadian Bank of Commerce, is cited as the leading case on the concept of serious and genuine inquiry.

[23] In Richardson, the Supreme Court of Canada reviewed the facts in light of section 231 of the Act [1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63]; the relevant parts at that time read as follows:

231. …

…

The Minister may, for any purposes related to the administration or enforcement of this act, by registered letter or by a demand served personally, require from any person

any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return, or production, or production on oath, of any books, letters, accounts, invoices, statements (financial or otherwise) or other documents.

within such reasonable time as may be stipulated therein.

…

Where the Minister has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a violation of this act or a regulation has been committed or is likely to be committed, he may, with the approval of a judge of a superior or county court, which approval the judge is hereby empowered to give on ex parte application, authorize in writing any officer of the Department of national Revenue, together with such members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or other peace officers as he calls on to assist him and such other persons as may be named therein, to enter and search, if necessary by force, any building, receptacle or place for documents, books, records, papers or things that may afford evidence as to the violation of any provisions of this Act or a regulation and to seize and take away any such documents, books, records, papers or things and retain them until they are produced in any court proceedings.

An application to a judge under subsection (4) shall be supported by evidence on oath establishing the facts upon which the application is based.

[Emphasis added]

Digitized by Google

The section referred to the commission of a violation and authorized certain persons to enter and search for evidence of the violation.

[24] In that case, the MNR had decided that it was necessary to verify whether traders in the commodities futures market were complying with the Act. In order to do so, the Minister had asked Richardson to provide its clients' commodity monthly statements so that the information could be processed on a test basis. Richardson had supplied the information but with clients' account numbers only and no means of identifying them. The MNR had asked for additional information, including a complete list of customers and personal information about them. Richardson had refused, alleging, inter alia, that the MNR's demands were for "information returns respecting . . . [a] class of information" required in connection with assessments. Richardson added that these demands fell instead within the ambit of paragraph 221(1)(d) and section 233 of the Act, which provided:

[25] Richardson was successful before the Supreme Court of Canada, which confirmed that a demand could only be made for information relative to the tax liability of a person or persons under the former subsection 231(3) of the Act if a genuine and serious inquiry was being conducted into the tax liability of such person or persons. The section did not authorize a general survey of compliance by a class of taxpayers. The MNR was invited to use paragraph 221(1)(d) to "obtain a regulation . . . requiring all such traders to file returns of their transactions in the commodities futures market" (ibidem, p. 625).

[26] The Richardson decision must be read and applied with caution. In Artistic Ideas, Mr. Justice Rothstein, writing for the Federal Court of Appeal, was reserved about Richardson and Bank of Commerce. Rothstein J.A. wrote:

[9] …These authorities p re -date subsections 231.2(2) and (3), although it is apparent that their enactment was prompted, at least in part, by the Richardson case. While they provide useful background, the relevant legislation is different today than at the time of those decisions.

[27] In fact, subsection 231.2(1), as it currently reads, is the former subsection 231(3) supra, to which, in 1986, Parliament added the terms "notwithstanding any other provision of this Act" and "subject to subsection 2". This amendment to section 231.2 did not substantially change the earlier wording.

[28] At the same time, Parliament added subsections 231.2(2) to (6), which, in 1995, led Rothstein J., as he then was, to state that compliance with the procedure in subsections 231(2) and (3) of the Act addressed the "mischief" identified in Richardson (Sand Exploration, supra).

[29] I do not believe that Richardson and Canadian Bank of Commerce pose an obstacle to the MNR's submission in this case. In Richardson, as I indicated earlier, the MNR requested information in order to process it on a test basis. Furthermore, the judgment in Canadian Bank of Commerce was premised on the fact, acknowledged by the parties, that the requirement in that case was made in good faith and that it involved a genuine and serious inquiry about specific persons. Mr. Justice Cartwright wrote on page 738:

… it appears to be common ground, (i) that the requirement addressed to the appellant relates to a genuine and serious inquiry into the tax liability of some specific person or persons …

[Emphasis added]

[30] With respect, and unlike Madam Justice Wilson who wrote for the Court in

Digitized by Google

Richardson, I do not believe that Cartwright J. thereby "makes it clear that his judgment is premised on that prerequisite being there" (ibidem, p. 624), that is, that the requirement must relate to a genuine and serious inquiry.

[31] But there is more. Prior to 1996, subsection 231.2(3) of the Act required that the application for authorization be supported by information on oath addressing the following four conditions:

231.2 (3) …

the person or group is ascertainable;

the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act;

it is reasonable to expect, based on any grounds, including information (statistical or otherwise) or past experience relating to the group or any other persons, that the person or any person in the group may have failed or may be likely to fail to provide information that is sought pursuant to the requirement or to otherwise comply with this Act; and the information or documents is not otherwise more readily available.

[32] In 1996, the conditions in paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection (3), i.e., reasonable grounds to believe that there has been non-compliance with the Act and the difficulty in obtaining the information otherwise, were repealed.

Section 231.2 of the Act currently in effect

[33] According to the judge, the MNR had to establish that each and every one of the members of the GMREB identified in the application was the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry. Otherwise, the Minister was conducting a fishing expedition, which is prohibited by Richardson. I do not agree. This finding perpetuates the reasoning in Canadian Bank of Commerce and Richardson without distinguishing the facts of the case and the statutory provision currently in effect.

[34] Generally, the MNR's powers of investigation and audit in the Act are the consideration for a self- reporting and self-assessing tax system that depends upon the honesty and integrity of taxpayers for its success (R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627).

[35] It is recognized that the audit powers in section 231.2 of the Act are an intrusive measure affecting the right to the protection of private information and must be construed restrictively (Sand Exploration, supra, p. 52).

[36] These general principles are not being challenged, but it is nonetheless necessary to give meaning to the legislative amendments. Commenting on the 1995 Budget Papers, tax expert David M. Sherman wrote the following about the conditions in paragraphs (c) and (d):

These restrictions [231.2(3)(c) and (d)], which make it difficult for Revenue Canada to obtain timely information in order to verify compliance with the Act, are being eliminated. This proposed measure will improve Revenue Canada's ability to verify compliance with the self- assessment system with respect to transactions where no information reporting is required. [The Practitioner's Income Tax Act, 32nd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 2007)].

[37] I believe that removing conditions (c) and (d) from the former subsection

Digitized by Google

231.2(3) shows Parliament's intention to ease the MNR's burden of proof in the sense suggested by tax expert Sherman because the MNR no longer has to establish reasonable grounds for believing that a violation has been committed or demonstrate that the information is not otherwise more readily available.

[38] While I recognize that a strict interpretation is required, it must not have the effect of adding another condition to the provision—which occurs if we accept the respondent's argument—that is, that the MNR must prove that he or she is conducting a genuine and serious inquiry relating to unnamed persons referred to in the application. Nor can the provision be interpreted in such a way as to re-insert the conditions in paragraphs (c) and (d).

[39] Section 231.2 of the Act must be interpreted by considering all of its parts, including the headings and sub-headings, which are also part of the statute (Pierre-André Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, 3rd ed. (Carswell: Scarborough, 2000) p. 79; R. v. Lucas, [1998] 1 S.C.R 439, 463). Headings may help to situate a provision within the general structure of the statute and determine the intention of Parliament.

[40] What about section 231.2 of the Act? This section is found in Part XV of the Act, entitled "Administration and Enforcement," under the heading "General". Subsections 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) explicitly state that they are intended to be used for "the administration and enforcement" of the Act.

[41] This general expression, which introduces the provision under consideration, allows us to situate section 231.2 of the Act in context; the section refers to the MNR's audit powers, as opposed to its investigative powers. As the Supreme Court of Canada pointed out in R. v. Jarvis, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757 at 761, "a distinction can be drawn between the audit and investigative powers" under the Act.

[42] Administrative policy and interpretation, while not binding, can also be an important factor where there is doubt as to the meaning of legislation (R. v. Nowegijick, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29). In the case before us, the respondent is relying on Information Circular IC71-14R3, entitled The Tax Audit, to establish that an "audit project" relating to certain members of the GMREB is not an audit within the meaning of the Act.

[43] This argument is without merit. On the one hand, I find that there was, in this case, an audit within the meaning of the Act. On the other hand, the circular describes the role, policies and practices of the tax audit; the audit project is only one of the methods available to the MNR in its "selection of files for audit" process (ibidem).

[44] In this case, the MNR asked the respondent to provide a list of its members in a given geographic area in order to compare the data with the information it already had. The fact that the MNR was just beginning the audit in no way precludes the application of paragraph 231.2(3)(b). Clearly, the MNR cannot argue that each and every one of the members were the subject of a "genuine and serious inquiry", which was what the judge criticized: those members are still not identified. Imposing such a requirement on the MNR neutralizes the utility of subsections 231.2(2) and (3) of the Act, which permit, under judicial authorization, verification of the honesty of a tax return.

[45] Regardless of what the GMREB says on this point, it appears to me that in removing paragraphs (c) and (d) from subsection 231.2(3), Parliament permitted a type of fishing expedition, with the authorization of the Court and on conditions prescribed by the Act, all for the purpose of facilitating the M

Digitized by Google

NR's access to information. It seems to me that the strict approach adopted by the judge in this case is not appropriate for the provision under review. This approach, borrowed from Richardson, was necessitated by the scope of the former statutory provision which, if interpreted too broadly, left open the possibility of abuse by tax enforcement officials (Sand Exploration, supra).

The applicable test

[46] Despite its penal sanctions, the Act is essentially and primarily regulatory and administrative. The MNR's audit powers, including the powers described in subsection 231.2(3), are necessary to achieve the objectives of the Act and to ensure compliance with it (McKinlay, supra; Thomson Newspaper Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425).

[47] In a tax system based on the principle of self-reporting and self-assessment, the MNR must be given broad powers to audit taxpayers' returns and inspect all records that maybe relevant to the preparation of these returns (Bisaillon et al v. The Queen, 99 D.T.C. 5695 (FCA)).

[48] It follows from my reading of paragraph 231.2(3)(b) that the MNR's ex parte application will be granted if the applications judge is satisfied that the information or documents are required for a tax audit conducted in good faith. This good faith guarantees that the MNR will act judiciously in the exercise of its audit power under section 231.2 to ensure the administration and enforcement of the Act.

[49] Having thus defined the applicable test on an application for judicial authorization under subsection 231.2(3), it is my view, based on the MNR's ex parte notice of application, supported by the affidavit of auditor Christiane E. Joly, that the tax audit in this case was conducted in good faith, that it had a genuine factual basis and that its objective was to ensure compliance with the Act.

[50] In this case, the MNR received documents from the GMREB in March 2005 while auditing a real estate agent who was a member of the organization. Several months later came the ex parte application at issue involving certain unnamed members of the GMREB. The affidavit in support of the application expressly states the objective: [TRANSLATION] "to determine whether the brokers who earned commissions following the sale of immovable property complied with all the duties and obligations under the Act" (appeal book, p. 39). The MNR therefore satisfied the requirements in the Act and, more specifically, those in section 231.2.

Digitized by Google

Related to 3rd Party and Whether Access Through Other Route Relevant

In MNR v. Lordco Parts Ltd[91] the Minister was attempting to verify that winners of a contest for the taxpayer's customers had reported their fringe benefits as a result of employment properly with the taxpayer's customers and had no way to identify them except to make a Sec. 231.2 request. The taxpayer contested and the Trial court held:

> [1] This is an application brought pursuant to subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act[1] for an order authorizing the Minister of National Revenue to impose on the respondent, Lordco Parts Ltd., a requirement to produce information and documents relating to certain persons whose identities are unknown to the Minister. The Minister seeks the identity of these persons to verify their compliance with the Income Tax Act. For the reasons specified below, the Court is in accord with the position of the Minister.
>
> [2] This application is made without notice as permitted by subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act.
>
> II. Background
>
> [3] Lordco Parts Ltd. is a company incorporated pursuant to the laws of British Columbia, having a registered and records office at 22866 Dewdney Trunk Road, Maple Ridge, British Columbia. Lordco is a distributor and retailer of automotive parts and accessories (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 5).
>
> [4] In 2008, the CRA completed a corporate business audit of Lordco with respect to its 2005 and 2006 taxation years. In the course of the corporate business audit, CRA noted that Lordco had established an incentive program which includes a bi-annual promotional cruise for its customers. The bi-annual cruises are organised and hosted by Lordco. Concerns were raised regarding the reporting and taxation of any of the benefits arising from these bi-annual cruises for those individuals who participated in the cruises (Affidavit of B. Wong at paras. 6 and 7).
>
> [5] In July 2009, CRA commenced an employer compliance audit for Lordco with respect to the 2006 and 2007 calendar years. The employer compliance audit was expanded to include the 2008 and 2009 calendar years in January 2011 (Affidavit of B. Wong at paras. 8 and 20).
>
> [6] The employer compliance audit included the consideration of the issue of whether individuals received and reported a taxable benefit on their 2007 and/or 2009 returns for the non-business portion of the cruises, organized and hosted by Lordco, which took place in 2007 and 2009 in furtherance of its incentive program (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 8 and 23).
>
> A. Lordco's Cruise in 2007
>
> [7] Based on information obtained by CRA regarding the promotional cruise organized and hosted by Lordco in 2007, the cruise promotion operates generally as follows: Lordco customers earn rebates based on the volume of their purchases of Lordco products. A customer may purchase tickets for the promotional cruise with these rebates. If the value of the customer's rebates were not sufficient to cover the price of the cruise, Lordco permitted the customer to pay the balance of the price with cash (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 10).
>
> [8] Customers were permitted to purchase tickets for the 2007 cruise with customer rebates earned between November 1, 2005 and June 30, 2007. As many of these customers were companies, not specific individuals, the companies nominated individual employees to attend the cruise as representatives (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 11).

[91] 2011 FC 209

Digitized by Google

[9] Based on a review of the 2007 cruise itinerary, CRA determined that 30% of the cruise was for business purposes while 70% of the cruise was for non-business. As such, an individual attending the 2007 cruise may have had obligations to report a taxable benefit under the Income Tax Act with respect to the non-business portion of the cruise (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 12).

[10] CRA takes the position that Lordco was required to issue and file T4A slips for individuals who attended the cruise because it was the primary payer for the 2007 cruise through the rebates. T4A slips are issued by a payer to an individual who has received what is commonly referred to as "other income", such as lump-sum payments, research grants, and non-cash gift benefits. CRA uses the T4A slips to verify that the individual has properly reported the taxable benefit on his or her tax return. Lordco failed to issue and file T4A slips for the individuals who attended the 2007 cruise (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 13).

[11] CRA wishes to verify whether the individuals attending the 2007 cruise reported the taxable benefit relating to the non-business portion of the cruise. In order to do so CRA must identify the individual taxpayers who attended the 2007 cruise. As Lordco did not issue any T4A slips for the cruise, CRA cannot identify these individuals to begin the process of verifying whether they received a taxable benefit and properly reported it so that CRA may accurately determine the amount of tax payable (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 14).

[12] On August 10, 2010, CRA issued a named requirement to provide information and documents under subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act seeking, among other things, a list of individuals who attended the 2007 cruise along with the companies they represented, the individuals' addresses and the registration forms (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 17).

[13] By letter dated September 9, 2010, Lordco declined to provide the names, addresses, and registration forms of the individuals who attended the cruise. Citing subsection 231.2(2) of the Income Tax Act, Lordco asserted that the requirement could not compel such information as the information sought for the individuals related to unnamed persons (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 18).

[14] Lordco did provide with its letter a list of the companies which purchased cruise packages (the Reconciliation List). The Reconciliation List shows that 516 companies purchased cruise packages and that a total of 1059 cruise packages were sold (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 19).

B. Lordco's Cruise in 2009

[15] The CRA auditor, Mr. Bernie Wong, was advised by Lordco's controller, Mr. Rick Sayers, that Lordco also organized and conducted a cruise in 2009 further to its bi-annual travel incentive promotion (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 21).

[16] Lordco's cruise in 2009 was organized in a similar manner as the 2007 cruise in that customers purchased cruise tickets with rebates earned from Lordco. Based on the cruise in 2007, the companies which purchased cruise tickets for 2009 may have nominated individuals to attend the cruise as representatives. As such, an individual who attended the 2009 cruise may have obligations to report a taxable benefit under the Income Tax Act with respect to any non-business portion of the cruise (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 22).

[17] To verify Lordco's tax obligations with respect to 2009, Mr. Wong requested information and documents from Lordco with respect to the 2009 cruise in order to verify whether Lordco was required to issue T4A slips to individuals who attended the 2009 cruise, and if so, whether the individuals who attended the cruise received and reported a taxable benefit on their 2009 tax return (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 23).

[18] Mr. Sayers responded on behalf of Lordco, to the request for the information by letter dated February 8, 2011. With respect to the 2009 cruise information, Mr. Sayers advised that "as with prior years, I am unable to supply a list of the actual attendees as we consider this third party information" (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 25).

Digitized by Google

[19] CRA does not know the identities of the individuals who attended the cruises. CRA is unable to complete the employer compliance audit and verify whether the individuals who attended the cruises have any tax obligations arising under the tax legislation, and the amount of that obligation. As well, CRA is unable to issue information slips to the individuals who attended the cruises on behalf of Lordco, if required (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 26).

[20] Lordco organized the cruises and in doing so, received information about each individual who attended the cruise by way of the registration forms. Lordco would also have information regarding the company customer each individual attended on behalf of. As such, obtaining the list of individuals who attended the 2007 and 2009 cruises from Lordco appears to be the most efficient and reasonable way of identifying these individuals (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 27).

[21] The CRA seeks to determine if the unnamed persons, that is, the unidentified individuals who attended the cruises, are complying with their duties and obligations under the Income Tax Act. The CRA specifically seeks to identify the individuals who attended the cruise, and verify that such individuals correctly reported for tax purposes any taxable benefit gained on the cruises and paid the required taxes that may have arisen. Once the individuals are identified, the CRA intends to issue T4A slips to the individuals showing the amount of the cruise as a taxable benefit (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 28).

[22] Therefore, to determine whether the individuals who attended the cruises have complied with their obligations under the Income Tax Act, the CRA seeks judicial authorization to send a requirement to provide information and documents relating to unnamed persons to Lordco, pursuant to subsection 231.2(2) of the ITA, for the following information and documents:

a. A list of the names of the individuals who attended the 2007 cruise along with the company that they represented.
b. A list of the addresses of the individuals who attended the 2007 cruise.
c. The registration forms for the individuals who attended the 2007 cruise.
d. A list of the names of the individual who attended the 2009 cruise along with the company that they represented.
e. A list of the addresses of the individuals who attended the 2009 cruise.
f. The registration forms for the individuals who attended the 2009 cruise.

(Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 31)

[23] The CRA intends to address the requirement to the attention of Mr. Sayers who is the controller for Lordco (Affidavit of B. Wong at Exhibit "I").

[24] The individuals are an identifiable group because the information and documents sought are limited to those individuals who attended the cruises hosted and organized by Lordco in 2007 and 2009 (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 32).

[25] As the 2007 cruise relates to the 2007 taxation year, any reassessments issued to the individuals who attended the cruise may be statute-barred as early as the end of February 2011 (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 33).

[26] The documents and information sought by the CRA in the unnamed requirement are not for the purposes of any criminal investigation (Affidavit of B. Wong at para. 35).

III. Issue

[27] The only point in issue is whether the evidence proffered by the Minister satisfies the criteria set out in subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act such that an order be granted imposing on the respondent, Lordco Parts Ltd., a notice to produce information and documents in the form sought by the Minister.

IV. Analysis

A. The statutory framework

Digitized by Google

[28] The Canadian income tax system is a self-reporting and self-assessing system that depends on the honesty and integrity of taxpayers for its success.[2] However, situations occur where this self-reporting system is contravened to avoid paying their full share of tax as required under the Income Tax Act by failing to comply with the rules set out in the Act.[3]

[29] The Minister has the task of administering and enforcing the Act and has been given broad powers to carry out this mandate. One of the provisions enacted by Parliament to assist the Minister is section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act.[4]

[30] Subsection 231.2(1) of the Act provides that the Minister may, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act, require a person to provide any information or additional information or any documents to the Minster within a reasonable time from the service of a written notice requiring the same. Such a notice is colloquially known as a "requirement to provide information and documents" or an "RFI".

[31] In R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., the Supreme Court of Canada held that subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act provides the "least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Income Tax Act can be effected".[5] The Court upheld the constitutionality of requirements for information and documents, holding that such requirements did not violate section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.[6]

[32] The obtaining of information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons whose tax liability is under review by the Minister is recognized as a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.[7]

[33] The Minister is also permitted to request from a third party information and documents relating to one or more persons unknown to him through the issuance of a requirement;[8] however, the Minister must first seek and obtain the authorization of a judge before he may issue the requirement.[9] The Act allows the Minister to make the application for the judicial authorization on a without notice basis.[10]

[34] Subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act sets out two criteria that are to be satisfied before a judge may authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement relating to one or more unnamed persons. First, pursuant to subsections 231.2(3)(a) of the Income Tax Act, the judge is to be satisfied on the evidence that the person or group is ascertainable. Second, pursuant to subsections 231.2(3)(b) of the Income Tax Act, the judge is to be satisfied on the evidence that the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under the Act.

[35] The Minister's application is to be granted if the judge is satisfied that the information or documents are required for a tax audit conducted in good faith.[11]

[36] Where judicial authorization is granted, the Minister is required by subsections 231.2(4) of the Income Tax Act to serve the order together with the requirement upon the respondent.

[37] Pursuant to subsections 231.2(5) of the Income Tax Act, the respondent may apply to the court for a review of the authorization within 15 days of service of the notice. Subsections 231.2(6) of the Income Tax Act permit the court to cancel, confirm, or vary the authorization upon review.

B. Statutory conditions for judicial authorization are met

[38] It is submitted that the evidence presented by the Minister on this application satisfies the two criteria necessary for judicial authorization allowing the Minister to issue an unnamed person requirement:

a. the person or group referred to is ascertainable; and
b. the requirement is made to verify compliance by persons in the group with any duty or obligation under the Act.

C. The person or group is ascertainable

[39] The Minister is attempting to ascertain the identity of the group of unnamed persons who attended the 2007 and/or 2009 cruise organized and hosted by Lordco.

Digitized by Google

[40] The group of unnamed persons is ascertainable because each member of the group was an individual who attended the 2007 and/or 2009 cruise organized and hosted by Lordco.

[41] As such, the group of unnamed persons is finite and is ascertainable.

[42] The Minister has ascertained a group of taxpayers, which the CRA is unable to identify, in order to verify their income, particularly with respect to taxable benefits, and ensure the accuracy of the amount of tax payable.

[43] The Minister needs the information and documents sought in the requirement to be imposed upon the respondent to permit the Minister to identify the unnamed persons who comprise this group. Upon identifying these persons, the Minister intends to verify that the each person has complied with their obligations under the Income Tax Act for the 2007 and/or 2009 calendar year.

[44] As such, the information and documents are required in good faith for the purpose of verifying compliance by the unnamed persons with their respective obligations under the Income Tax Act.

Minister of National Revenue v. RBC Life Insurance Company, 2011 FC 1249, A Case of Incomplete Disclosure on ex parte Application that Does Not Necessarily Cause Order to be Set Aside, But Ulterior Motive to Proper Tax Enforcement and Analysis of the Nature of the Court's Process

[1] These are four motions, brought by the respondents RBC Life Insurance Company, Industrial Alliance Pacific Insurance and Financial Services Inc., Industrielle Alliance Assurance et Services Financiers Inc. and BMO Life Assurance Company [collectively the Insurers], to cancel ex parte orders of this Court dated October 6, 2009, April 12, 2010 and June 7, 2010. The orders were issued pursuant to section 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) [the Act], and authorize the Minister of National Revenue to impose on the Insurers requirements to produce certain information and documents.

[2] For the reasons that follow, the motions will be granted.

Part I – Background Facts

[3] On October 6, 2009, Justice Yvon Pinard granted the Minister of National Revenue [the Minister] ex parte authorization to issue the requirement to RBC Life Insurance Company [RBCI]. The requirement, which was served on November 5, 2009, seeks "all information and documents relating to RBC Life Insurance Company's 10-8 plan holders," including names and social insurance numbers, business numbers, or trust numbers. The requirement was issued following claims by the Minister that this information was required in order to verify that these persons are in compliance with the Act. On November 19, 2009, RBCI moved to challenge Justice Pinard's order.

[4] On April 12, 2010, I granted two ex parte applications brought by the Minister for authorization to issue similar requirements to Industrial Alliance Pacific Insurance and Financial Services Inc. and Industrielle Alliance Assurance et Services Financiers Inc. [collectively IA]. The first of these requirements seeks "A listing of all loans outstanding [...] contracted by individuals, corporations and/or trusts" relating to IA's 10-8 plan in a specified period, including: names; policy numbers; social insurance numbers, business numbers or trust numbers; amounts owing on any loans; the cash surrender value of their policies; and the interest on the loans for each 10-8 plan holder. The second requirement seeks "Une liste de tous les prêts [...] souscrit par toute personne physique, fiducie et/ou compagnie, faisant l'objet de la Stratégie 10-8" in a specified period. On April 30, 2010, IA moved to challenge both of my orders.

Digitized by Google

[5] Justice Richard Mosley issued an order authorizing a requirement to BMO Life Assurance Company [BMO] on June 7, 2010. The requirement seeks "all information and documents" in a specified period pertaining to BMO's 10-8 plan holders. On July 14, 2010, BMO moved to challenge Justice Mosley's order.

[6] At the same time that BMO was served with the requirement authorized by Justice Mosley's order, it was also served with a requirement issued without judicial authorization which sought "all information and documents [...] relating to BMO Life Assurance Company's (formerly AIG Life Insurance Company of Canada) 10-8 Investment Plans" during a specified period. This requirement was challenged by way of an application for judicial review which BMO commenced on July 12, 2010. Although the parties' joint submissions address this application together with the four motions described above, the application will be dealt with in separate reasons.

[7] All of the requirements concern insurance leveraging strategies for high net worth individuals referred to as "10-8 plans." A 10-8 plan involves two essential elements: a life insurance policy that includes an investment account, and a loan which is secured by the life insurance policy in an amount equal to the balance of the investment account. The term "10-8 plan" refers to the interest rates applicable to these elements, as the policy-holder pays 10% interest on the loan and receives an 8% return on the investment in the life insurance policy. The 10-8 plan creates a tax benefit because the 8% interest paid to the client is tax-exempt as part of a life insurance policy, and the 10% interest payable on the loan may be tax-deductible if it is used to produce income.

[8] Each of the Insurers provided the Minister with information and documents relating to their 10-8 plans, although BMO did not provide this information until after it was served with the two requirements. Each of the Insurers also refused to provide the Minister with names or other identifying information relating to its 10-8 plan holders. The Minister therefore initiated the ex parte applications described above to seek authorization to issue the various requirements in an effort to obtain information relating to the identities of 10-8 plan holders. I note, however, that each of the requirements is considerably more broad than merely seeking the identifies of the Insurers' 10-8 plan holders in a given period.

[9] On February 24, 2010, Prothonotary Martha Milczynski issued an order pursuant to Rule 54 of the Federal Courts Rules requiring the Minister to produce all relevant documents related to Justice Pinard's order. Prior to Prothonotary Milczynski's order, the Minister had refused to produce anything other than certain documents that RBCI had created and provided to the Minister, as well as a news article and a publicly available presentation about 10-8 plans. The Minister refused to disclose any other documents on the basis that they were privileged or irrelevant, failing even to produce the documents to her counsel for review. Prothonotary Milczynski disagreed, finding that "The Court, [sic] and RBCI need to know all the facts that were within the Minister's knowledge at the time of the hearing. [...] The information sought is relevant to the issue of whether the Minister made full and frank disclosure at the time the ex parte application was made." Prothonotary Milczynski therefore ordered the Minister to produce her file to RBCI and awarded RBCI its costs of the motion.

[10] Following Prothonotary Milczynski's order, the Minister made further disclosure to RBCI. However, the Minister continued to refuse to produce certain documents – namely, documents surrounding an Advanced Income Tax Ruling Request [ATR] made by another insurer regarding its 10-8 plan and internal discussions relating to the consideration of the ATR by the General Anti-Avoidance Rule Committee [GAAR Committee], as well as the questionnaire which the Minister had developed to send to 10-8 plan holders. The Minister refused to produce these documents, again claiming privilege and that they were not relevant to the motion.

Digitized by Google

[11] An ATR is a publicly available document issued by CRA. Generally, the purpose of an ATR is to seek guidance from CRA as to how it will apply the provisions of the Act in a specific context. This ATR, which was submitted by a third party insurer in 2007, provided detailed information about the submitter's proposed 10-8 plan and sought to determine whether the proposed plan complied with the Act. In contrast to a technical interpretation in which CRA addresses a hypothetical scenario, an ATR provides a specific and concrete scenario for the CRA to consider.

[12] This particular ATR was considered by the GAAR Committee, a specialized committee within CRA Rulings. The GAAR Committee assesses the potential application of the GAAR, an exceptional provision that allows CRA and the Minister to address abusive tax avoidance behaviour. GAAR can only be used as a last resort where no other provisions of the Act apply. After examining the ATR, the GAAR Committee concluded that the proposed 10-8 plan was likely in compliance with the Act and did not believe that the GAAR could be successfully applied.

[13] In light of the Minister's continued refusal to produce documents relating to the GAAR Committee's consideration of the ATR, the Insurers brought a second disclosure motion. On January 13, 2011, Prothonotary Roza Aronovitch ordered the Minister to produce the above described documents, finding that "The Minister may wish to argue at the hearing on the merits that the documents sought to be produced by way of the direction to attend are not relevant, however, it is not open for argument at this juncture, as that determination has already been made."

[14] Following Prothonotary Aronovitch's order, the Minister produced the documents in question and from these documents a different picture emerges. For the reasons set out below, these documents establish that the Court was not in a position to appreciate the full context in which the Minister brought the ex parte applications and the orders must therefore be cancelled.

[15] The four motions were consolidated along with BMO's application on January 13, 2011. The hearing was based on a joint record and joint written submissions from both parties. These reasons will address the four motions brought by the Insurers.

Part II – The Evidence

[16] The evidence in each of the ex parte applications consisted of the following:

- In the RBCI application, an affidavit of Randy Jacobs, CRA officer, stating that "CRA is seeking to verify the compliance with the obligations and duties under the Income Tax Act of certain taxpayers who are clients of [RBCI] and who participate in [...] the '10-8 plan'" and that "The CRA is not aware of the identity of the RBC Insurance policyholders who have participated in the [10-8 plan]. The Minister seeks to determine whether the RBC Insurance policyholders who have participated in the [10-8 plan] have complied with their duties and obligations under the Income Tax [sic];"
- In the IA applications, two nearly identical affidavits of Michel Lévesque, CRA officer, both stating that "Depuis 2008, l'ARC a entrepris de vérifier si les contribuables qui ont souscrit comme clients aux produits généralement connus sous le nom de « programmes 10/8 » auprès de compagnies d'assurance ont respecté quelque devoir ou obligation prévu par la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu" and that "les informations recherchées et décrites au paragraphe 11 de ma dénonciation serviront à vérifier si chacune des personnes physiques, fiducies ou compagnies ayant participé à la Stratégie 10/8 décrite aux sous-paragraphes 9I, 9II, 9III A. à J. inclusivement ont

Digitized by Google

respecté quelque devoir ou obligations prévu par la LIR;"

- And, in the BMO application, an affidavit of Linda Szeto, CRA officer, stating that "I am seeking to verify the compliance with the obligations and duties under the Income Tax Act of certain taxpayers who are clients of BMO Life who participate in the 10-8 program," that "The CRA is currently examining the 10-8 program offered by certain insurance companies, including BMO Life, to their policyholders," and that "In order to verify if the unknown policyholders [...] who have participated in the 10-8 program have complied with their duties and obligations under the Income Tax Act, the Minister requires BMO Life to provide [the information listed in the requirement]."

[17] However, a significant amount of additional evidence was disclosed following the orders of Prothonotary Milczynski and Prothonotary Aronovitch.

[18] The following evidence was disclosed in response to Prothonotary Milczynski's order:

- A ruling dated December 6, 2004 in response to an inquiry regarding the deductibility of the interest paid on the loan, which concluded that "Apart from the issue of reasonableness [of the interest rate], as it would seem that this type of arrangement is not in accord with the purpose and spirit of the provisions in the Act related to exempt insurance policies we have referred this matter to the Department of Finance for their consideration;"
- E-mail correspondence between various individuals at the Canada Revenue Agency, including the following statements:
  - While discussing the strategy of using targeted audits to alert the insurance industry to its concerns regarding 10-8 plans, "We should make sure we have some technical basis supporting our concerns before we embark on this project, otherwise we could look pretty bad. [...] we better back up our concerns with real effective and timely action" and that "Finance has been aware that there are a number of issues with the policyholder legislation. About 8-9 years ago they started to look into revamping policyholder tax policy (we attended the meetings) but it didn't get off the ground (too big a project) [...] it looks like policyholder reform in [sic] now being reconsidered." [my emphasis]
  - Upon learning that insurance governance bodies were receiving inquiries from insurers seeking clarification as to the Canada Revenue Agency's interest in and concerns with 10-8 plans, "This is all good. In fact, I'm delighted. Policyholder taxation is an area long overdue for attention;"
  - In instructions to front-line auditors at the launch of the 10-8 plan audit program, "You should put together all the facts. You must be able to answer the following questions. You will notice that this does not require knowing the names of the participants;" and
  - In an update on the progress of the 10-8 plan audit project, "[redacted] did provide the names of the participants and we chose 20 files and started a test audit."

[19] The following additional evidence was disclosed following Prothonotary Aronovitch's order on the second disclosure motion:

- A memorandum from F. Lee Workman, manager of the Charitable and Financial Institution Sectors, to the GAAR Committee which states the following:
  - "any loans under the [collateral loan facility] will not be 'policy loans' as defined in subsection 148(9), the assignment of the policy as security for the loans under the [collateral loan facility] will not be a disposition of an interest in the policy by virtue of paragraph (f) of the definition of 'disposition' in subsection 148(9), and provided the loans to be advanced by the insurer to the policyholder under the [collateral loan facility] will be borrowed money for the purposes of paragraph 20(1)(c) the interest paid on the [loan] advances will be deductible by the policyholder;"

Digitized by Google

- "the only manner in which the tax benefits to be realized the [sic] proposed transactions might be challenged is by denying a portion of the interest the policyholder claims under paragraph 20(1)(c) on the basis that the interest rate of 10% is not reasonable;"
- "the exempt policy can reasonably be said to have been purchased primarily for insurance purposes (and investment purposes to the extent permitted by the 'exempt policy' rules);"
- "The entering into of the [collateral loan facility], in order to obtain a loan from the insurer, can reasonably be said to have been undertaken by the policyholder, primarily to obtain financing;"
- "It is the fact that the borrowing is at an annual rate of 10% that might be said to have not been undertaken for a bona fide non-tax purpose as the rate is probably higher than the policyholder would likely be willing to pay on a borrowing [sic] from a bank where a policy has been assigned as collateral. The reasonability of the 10% rate is not a GAAR issue however;"
- "the collateral assignment of the policy to the insurer as security for the loan is an ordinary commercial transaction;"
- "given that whether a transaction or a series of transactions were arranged primarily for a non-tax purpose is a question of fact, it may be difficult to convince a court that the series of transactions is an avoidance transaction;"
- "the Department of Finance Explanatory Notes that were released with section 245, state that 'Subsection 245(3) does not permit the "re-characterization" of a transaction for the purposes of determining whether or not it is an avoidance transaction. In other words, it does not permit a transaction to be considered an avoidance transaction because some alternative transaction that might have achieved an equivalent result would have resulted in higher taxes.'"
- "the fact that the 8% rate of return being earned on the [collateral loan account] balance will be tax deferred is consistent with the words, object, spirit and purpose of section 12.2 and section 306 of the Regulations;"
- "the proposed series of transactions is not a misuse of the definition of 'policy loan' nor an abuse of the scheme of the Act with respect to policy loans;"
- "If the loan in question is not a 'policy loan' at law, then it would be difficult to argue that the proposed transactions are an abuse of the provisions of the Act dealing with policy loans;" and
- "we do not believe that the GAAR can be successfully applied to redetermine the implications of these transactions but it is our view that there are policy concerns that should be considered with a view to proposing amendments." [My emphasis]

- A memo from Margaret McCreary, Insurance Specialist, to the Manager of the GAAR & Technical Support Section stating that "Insurance policy tax legislation is out of date and has not kept up with the innovations in insurance products. [...] For years, insurance companies took a conservative approach and tailored their products to fit the intent, if not the exact wording, of the legislation. [...] the largest insurers are starting to lose a bit of their market share and they are concerned that the designs of the new products being offered by their competitors are no longer within the spirit of the legislation," and concluding that "a limited number of targeted audits will be extremely effective in putting the industry on notice that CRA is concerned about the direction they are headed;" and

Digitized by Google

- Additional email correspondence between individuals at the Canada Revenue Agency which contains the following statements:
  - Following a GAAR Committee meeting at which 10-8 plans were discussed, "The discussion was interesting and the decision was that CRA would not provide a ruling. It would send a message to the insurance industry that we are troubled with the arrangement. Finance certainly was concerned by the 10/8 arrangement from a policy perspective …" and "That response [to the ATR] is that we will not provide a ruling, that both the CRA and Finance believe this product to be contrary to tax policy with regard to exempt policies, it is not clear that the 10% interest meets the reasonable test in paragraph 20(1)(c) and we are leaving the door open to the possible application of GAAR until we have audited a specific case;"
  - In an update regarding the audit strategy for dealing with 10-8 plans, "I said we would be starting an audit blitz early next year on a number of insurers know [sic] to be offering the product with the objective of obtaining sample contracts to review the 20(1)(c) interest deductions and to consider the application of GAAR;" [My emphasis]

Part III – Relevant Statutory Provisions

[20] These motions concern section 231.2 of the Act:

231.2 (3) On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that	231.2 (3) Sur requête ex parte du ministre, un juge peut, aux conditions qu'il estime indiquées, autoriser le ministre à exiger d'un tiers la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue au paragraphe (1) concernant une personne non désignée nommément ou plus d'une personne non désignée nommément — appelée « groupe » au présent article —, s'il est convaincu, sur dénonciation sous serment, de ce qui suit :
(a) the person or group is ascertainable; and	a) cette personne ou ce groupe est identifiable;
(b) the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act.	b) la fourniture ou la production est exigée pour vérifier si cette personne ou les personnes de ce groupe ont respecté quelque devoir ou obligation prévu par la présente loi;
[…]
(5) Where an authorization is granted under subsection 231.2(3), a third party on whom a notice is served

Digitized by Google

under subsection 231.2(1) may, within 15 days after the service of the notice, apply to the judge who granted the authorization or, where the judge is unable to act, to another judge of the same court for a review of the authorization.	[…] (5) Le tiers à qui un avis est signifié ou envoyé conformément au paragraphe (1) peut, dans les 15 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, demander au juge qui a accordé l'autorisation prévue au paragraphe (3) ou, en cas d'incapacité de ce juge, à un autre juge du même tribunal de réviser l'autorisation.
(6) On hearing an application under subsection 231.2(5), a judge may cancel the authorization previously granted if the judge is not then satisfied that the conditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) and 231.2(3)(b) have been met and the judge may confirm or vary the authorization if the judge is satisfied that those conditions have been met.	(6) À l'audition de la requête prévue au paragraphe (5), le juge peut annuler l'autorisation accordée antérieurement s'il n'est pas convaincu de l'existence des conditions prévues aux alinéas (3)a) et b). Il peut la confirmer ou la modifier s'il est convaincu de leur existence.

Part IV – Issues

[21] There are three issues before the Court on these motions:

1. Did the Minister fail to make full and frank disclosure in the ex parte applications?
2. Were the requirements obtained for the purpose of verifying compliance with the Act?
3. Does section 231.2(3) of the Act unjustifiably infringe section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Part V – Discussion

1. Full and Frank Disclosure

i. The law

[22] Given the ex parte nature of the applications, the Applicant had a duty to make full and frank disclosure to the Court. It is well established that this burden requires the party in an ex parte hearing to present all material facts, even if those facts are adverse to its case.

[23] This Court was faced with a similar statutory provision in Canada (Commissioner of Competition) v Labatt Brewing Co et al, 2008 FC 59, 323 FTR 115. In that context, Justice Anne Mactavish noted that, in ex parte proceedings, the "normal checks and balances of the adversary system" are absent, and that the Court is therefore "at the mercy" of the party seeking ex parte relief (at paras 23 to 24). She also noted that "There is no situation more fraught with potential injustice and abuse of the Court's powers than an application for an ex parte injunction" (Watson v Slavik, in Labatt, above, at para 24). This potential injustice is the reason why the party seeking ex parte relief "must inform the Court of any points of fact or law known to it which favour the other side" (Friedland in Labatt, above, at para 25).

[24] As Justice Mactavish noted in Labatt, above, this duty of full and frank disclosure

Digitized by Google

is crucial to the proper exercise of judicial discretion:

> Section 11 of the Competition Act provides for independent judicial oversight with respect to the extensive investigative powers granted to the Commissioner under the Competition Act. To this end, section 11 does not mandate that the Court act as a mere "rubber stamp" […]
>
> I agree that the Court must indeed be satisfied that the two statutory conditions precedent to the granting of a production order have been met […] However, in order to properly exercise the discretion conferred on the Court by section 11 of the Competition Act, and for the Court to be able to control its own processes, and to guard against the abuse of those processes, the Court must also be fully apprised of the relevant circumstances surrounding the request. [At paras 50-51]

[25] My colleague Justice Luc Martineau also considered a jeopardy order issued pursuant to the Act in Canada (National Revenue) v Robarts, 2010 FC 875, 374 FTR 87. In that decision, Justice Martineau noted that:

> In all ex parte matters the applicant is obliged to draw to the attention of the Court all facts in issue, even those which it considers unhelpful or inconvenient, and all relevant caselaw. […] Indeed, full and frank disclosure requires that the Minister disclose "what might reasonably be regarded as [known] weaknesses". […]
>
> While the omission [in the Minister's disclosure] was apparently made with no malicious intent, it severely undermines the ex parte application that was made by the Minister. [At paras 35 and 41]

[26] The Federal Court of Appeal considered the disclosure obligation in section 231.2 proceedings in R v Derakhshani, 2009 FCA 190, 2010 DTC 5043. In that decision, the unanimous Court noted the importance of full and frank disclosure to the judicial discretion captured in subsection 231.2(3):

> It is useful to recall that the existence of judicial discretion is essential to the constitutional validity of this type of provision, which is comparable to a seizure even when used in a regulatory (or even non-criminal) context […] It is this discretion, conferred upon an independent judge, which protects individuals from the damaging use of this kind of power and brings it in line with the requirements of section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms […]
>
> The fact that it may be possible to obtain the information using other means does not exclude the possibility that a requirement might be authorized, but that is information that must be provided to the judge. A judge must not be left in the dark on such an important point. [At paras 19 and 29, my emphasis]

[27] It seems to me that the most basic element of the duty to make full and frank disclosure is the disclosure to the Court of any information that has already been provided (see Labatt, above, at paras 93 and 94).

[28] Pursuant to Rule 399 of the Federal Courts Rules, the Court can quash an ex parte order where it was issued based on "misleading, incomplete, or incorrect" facts (see Canada (Commissioner of Competition) v Air Canada, [2001] 1 FC 219, 186 FTR 48 at para 14). Although the ex parte applications were brought under section 231.2(3) of the Act, Rule 399 nonetheless applies (see Air Canada, above, at para 5).

Digitized by Google

[29] However, an order will not automatically be cancelled because of any breach of this duty. An ex parte order will only be disturbed where non-disclosure is material and must be such that, had the information been disclosed, it would have affected the exercise of the ex parte judge's discretion (see Labatt, above, at paras 31 and 98).

[30] The Court retains the discretion to continue an ex parte order despite flawed disclosure:

> [I]t is important to keep in mind that the reason for the disclosure requirement is firstly to deprive the person who has not observed the rule of an advantage improperly obtained and secondly to act as a deterrent to ensure that persons who make ex parte applications realize that they have a duty of disclosure and that they appreciate the consequences if they fail in that duty.
>
> [...] In exercising its discretion, the court should consider the extent of the culpability with regard to the non-disclosure, and the importance and significance of the matters that were not disclosed to the court to the outcome. [Sherwood Dash Inc v Woodview Products Inc, [2005] OTC 1061, 2005 at paras 39-40]

ii. Parties' Submissions

[31] The Insurers submit that the Minister failed to make full and frank disclosure in the ex parte applications. She was required to present a balanced view to the Court and to disclose any facts which could operate against her, citing several decisions including Robarts, above, at para 35 and Labatt, above, at paras 25-26.

[32] Further, the Minister cannot justify the lack of disclosure on the basis that the information is immaterial,

> The duty extends to placing before the court all matters which are relevant to the court's assessment of the application, and it is no answer to a complaint of non-disclosure that if the relevant matters had been placed before the court, the decision would have been the same. The test as to materiality is an objective one, and it is not for the applicant or his advisers to decide the question; hence it is no excuse for the applicant subsequently to say that he was genuinely unaware, or did not believe, that the facts were relevant or important. [Steven Gee, Mareva Injunctions and Anton Piller Relief, 3rd ed. (London: FT Law & Tax, 1995) at p 98, in Labatt, above, at para 31]

[33] The Insurers also note that it is no excuse for a party to say that it did not intend to mislead the Court with its flawed disclosure, citing R v Morelli, 2010 SCC 8, [2010] 1 SCR 253 at para 59.

[34] The Insurers compare the orders under review to the power of the Commissioner of Competition to compel disclosure with judicial authorization, noting that this Court has held that,

> [T]he Court must indeed be satisfied that the two statutory conditions precedent to the granting of a production order have been met – namely that there is a section 10 inquiry under way, and that the respondent has information that is relevant to the inquiry – prior to granting a production order under the Act. However, in order to properly exercise the discretion conferred on the Court by section 11 of the Competition Act, and for the Court > to be able to control its own processes, and to guard against the abuse of those processes, the Court must also be fully apprised of the relevant circumstances surrounding the request. [Labatt, above, at para 51]

Digitized by Google

[35] Finally, the Insurers argue that the Court's discretion to continue the ex parte orders despite the flawed disclosure is exceptional and limited, and that it should not be exercised simply because the orders would probably have been granted had the disclosure been complete, citing Sherwood Dash, above, at paras 37-39.

[36] Thus the four ex parte orders must be cancelled because the Minister failed to make full and frank disclosure. In particular, the Minister had a duty to disclose the documents and emails surrounding the GAAR Committee's consideration of the ATR and the Canada Revenue Agency's plan to audit 10-8 plan holders, as well as the significant volume of information about 10-8 plans that had already been disclosed to the Minister before the ex parte applications.

[37] The Minister, on the other hand, claims that the ex parte orders were sought for the purpose of verifying whether the 10-8 plan holders are in compliance with the Act, and that the GAAR Committee documents and internal discussions are immaterial to this end.

[38] The Minister further submits that, in order for the ex parte orders to be set aside, the Insurers must demonstrate that the disclosure made at the hearing was "misleading, inaccurate or incomplete," citing Labatt, above, at para 34. She also claims that the Insurers must show that, but for the lack of disclosure, the orders would not have been made, citing Re Papa, 2009 FC 49, [2009] 4 CTC 93 at paras 21-23. Therefore the Insurers have not met this high burden and that I should therefore decline to exercise my discretion to cancel the orders.

iii. Analysis

[39] In my opinion, the Minister fell short of her obligation to make full and frank disclosure in two respects. First, she did not disclose the significant volume of information that the Insurers had already provided to her before the ex parte applications were commenced. These documents provided a great deal of information about the Insurers' 10-8 plans, and with the exception of the identities and personal information of the Insurers' 10-8 plan holders, responded fully to the requirements for which the Minister sought ex parte authorization.

[40] The second, and more troubling, omission is the Minister's failure to disclose internal documents and information suggesting that the 10-8 plans comply with the letter of the Act, if not with its spirit. These documents – the bulk of which were only disclosed to the Insurers after two separate motions – are undoubtedly material and, had they been disclosed to the Court, could certainly have affected the outcome of the ex parte applications.

[41] More specifically, the evidence disclosed following the Prothonotaries' orders include the following material facts which were not disclosed to the Court on the ex parte applications:

a) The fact that the Department of Finance had refused to amend the Act to address the outdated policyholder provisions;
b) The ATR, which provided a great deal of information regarding a specific 10-8 plan for the express purpose of determining whether the plan complied with the Act;
c) The fact that the GAAR Committee had determined that the 10-8 plan likely complied with the letter of the Act, if not with its spirit; and
d) The decision to "send a message to the industry" by refusing to answer the ATR and to take measures to "chill" 10-8 plan business, in part by undertaking an "audit blitz".

Digitized by Google

[42] The fact that the Minister decided to undertake an "audit blitz" to "send a message to the insurance industry" is clearly relevant to the balancing exercise that the Court has to undertake in deciding whether or not the orders should be granted. For the Court to be able to control its own processes and to guard against any abuses, it must be fully apprised of all relevance circumstances surrounding the request (see Labatt, above, at paras 47 and 51 to 52).

[43] Although subsection 231.2(6) of the Act does not explicitly state that the Court can cancel an authorization previously issued based on a lack of disclosure, I find that Rule 399 of the Federal Courts Rules gives me the inherent power to do so (see Air Canada, above, at para 5). The Court must retain the authority to control its own processes and to remedy any abuse that results from an ex parte order granted based on incomplete or misleading disclosure.

[44] I note as well that, had the Minister disclosed these material facts on the ex parte applications, the orders might still have been granted. However, I would have had many questions for the Minister about the information she had already received and CRA's position on the 10-8 plans and her goal in auditing 10-8 plan holders. As was the case in Derakhshani, above, the evidence omitted from the ex parte applications does not exclude the possibility that the requirements might be authorized, but the information must be before the judge. Otherwise the ex parte applications become a rubber stamp exercise and the Court cannot effectively exercise its discretion.

[45] I am satisfied that this information was material and that, because of its omission from the ex parte applications, the Court was not in a position to make an informed decision. As a result, the orders must be cancelled.

2. Purpose of the Requirements

i. The law

[46] Section 231.2(3)(b) requires that the Minister's purpose in seeking to issue a requirement concerning unnamed persons be to "verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act." This purpose requirement is one of two conditions of which the presiding judge must be satisfied in order for the authorization to be granted, the other condition being that the group must be ascertainable.

[47] The purpose requirement in subsection 231.2(3)(b) of the Act has not been the subject of much adjudication. It appears that this dearth of judicial consideration results from the Minister's broad audit powers under the Act:

> Accordingly, the Minister of National Revenue must be given broad powers in supervising this regulatory scheme to audit taxpayers' returns and inspect all records which may be relevant to the preparation of these returns. The Minister must be capable of exercising these powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds for believing that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act. Often it will be impossible to determine from the face of the return whether any impropriety has occurred in its preparation. A spot check or a system of random monitoring may be the only way in which the integrity of the tax system can be maintained. [McKinlay, above, at para 36]

[48] The most direct ruling on the purpose requirement in subsection 231.2(3)(b) comes from Justice Johanne Gauthier in Minister of National Revenue v Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, 2006 FC 1069, 303 FTR 29: "The language of the Act is clear. The information and documents requested must be for the purpose of verifying whether the persons being investigated have complied with some duties or obligations set out in the Act. The courts have held that the information must be "relevant" to the inquiry" (at para 61).

Digitized by Google

[49] In Nadler Estate v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 935, [2005] 4 CTC 7, Justice Johanne Gauthier noted that "The Act does not require that the third party from whom the information is sought be given any details as to the purpose of the Requirement" (at para 9) and was satisfied that the Requirement at issue was valid because "The Requirement properly indicates the name of the taxpayer concerned, refers to the appropriate enabling provision and gives a description of the information required which is sufficient to enable Canada-Israel Securities Ltd. to prepare its response" (at para 9).

[50] Similarly, I held in Ministre du Revenu national v Banque Toronto Dominion, 2004 FC 169, 253 FTR 90 that:

> It is not the function of a financial institution to which the requirement is sent to decide on the relevance of the information sought under that requirement. It noted [sic] that the procedure created under subsections 231.2(2) and (3) of the I.T.A. has the twofold function of requiring the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency to justify the obtaining of the information required when the requirement relates to unnamed persons and allowing the financial institution to which the requirement is sent to comply with its obligations to its clients. [At para 15]

[51] However, the Minister may have more than one purpose in issuing requirements. Where a secondary purpose such as the audit of a named taxpayer is sufficiently connected to the enforcement purpose relating to the unnamed persons, subsection 231.2(3)(b) is still satisfied (see Whitewater Golf Club Inc v Minister of National Revenue, 2009 FC 739, [2009] 6 CTC 51 at paras 15 to 16).

ii. Parties' Submissions

[52] The Insurers submit that the requirements were issued for an improper purpose: namely, a fishing expedition intended to chill their 10-8 plan business. They claim that the Minister failed to establish in the ex parte applications that the requirements were necessary to verify compliance with the Act and note that the Minister has not alleged any specific breach of the Act.

[53] The Insurers argue that the Minister was required to act in good faith in exercising her powers under section 231.2 of the Act, citing Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, above, at para 48.

[54] Further, section 231.2(3) requires the Minister to show that the requirements are necessary to ensure compliance, again citing Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, above. They claim that the requirements were not actually necessary to verify that the 10-8 plans were in compliance with the Act, and that they had already provided enough information to allow the Minister to determine that their 10-8 plans comply with the Act without conducting any audits.

[55] The Minister submits that nothing in the record contradicts the evidence in the ex parte applications that the requirements are needed to conduct targeted audits of 10-8 plan holders and ensure their compliance with the Act. She is not required to justify her decision to audit, and that an audit program that targets 10-8 plan holders is not evidence of bad faith.

iii. Analysis

[56] As stated above, I am satisfied that the orders must be quashed solely because of the incomplete disclosure. However, I will make the following comments about the question of the Minister's true purpose in issuing the requirements since the issue was fully argued before me.

[57] There is no merit to the Insurers' claim that the Minister was required to identify a specific section of the Act that she believed had been breached. The Supreme Court held in McKinlay, above, that "The Minister must be capable of exercising these [audit] powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds for believing that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act. Often it will be impossible to determine from the face of the return whether any impropriety has occurred in its preparation" (at para 36). The Minister was not, therefore, required to give more detail as to the purpose of the Requirements as long as the information is "relevant" to the verification of compliance with a duty of obligation under the Act. Subsection 231.2(3) does not require the Minister to show that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there is failure to comply with a provision of the Act.

Digitized by Google

[58] At the hearing, the Insurer's conceded that the Minister had a valid audit purpose in issuing the requirements, but argued that this valid purpose was extraneous to her primary goal, which was to chill their 10-8 plan business. I agree.

[59] I do not believe that the Minister's central purpose in issuing the requirements is sufficiently tied to her valid audit purpose. Contrary to the Minister's pretension, I did find evidence that the targeted audit of specific 10-8 plan holders was not only done to test the reasonableness of the 10% payable interest rate or the possible application of the GAAR but to send a message to the industry. I am not satisfied that the Minister's attempt to "send a message" is a valid enforcement purpose such that subsection 231.2(3)(b) of the Act is satisfied or that this goal is sufficiently connected to the Minister's valid audit purpose.

[60] Moreover, I am not satisfied that the requirements are actually necessary for the Minister to verify compliance with the Act. The only evidence in the ex parte applications to the effect that the requirements were necessary consisted of bald assertions by the Minister's affiants, who apparently were not apprised of the context in which the applications were brought. Not only have the Insurers provided the Minister with a substantial amount of information, but RBCI has also provided her with the identities of certain of its 10-8 plan holders. Of course, it is not the role of the Court to question the Minister's decision to audit someone (see Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, above, at para 28). However the Minister cannot pretend that she is unable to audit any of the Insurers' 10-8 plan holders or to otherwise determine whether the 10-8 plans comply with the Act because that is simply not the case. Further, the ATR, although made by another insurer, provided sufficient concrete information to allow the Minister to make a determination – and, in fact, she determined that the 10-8 plan likely complies with the Act.

[61] The Minister therefore was already in a position to assess the 10-8 plans and their compliance with the Act. Again, this begs the question of her true purpose in bringing the ex parte applications.

[62] If, as the Minister's delegates claimed in the internal emails, "Policyholder taxation is an area long overdue for attention," then the manner in which it should receive this attention is through legislative amendment. It is a misuse of the Minsiter's powers – powers which the Courts have repeatedly called "intrusive" – to use section 231.2 to pursue policy objectives rather than to enforce tax obligations. It was not open to the Minister to seek ex parte authorization under the pretence of verifying compliance with the Act when her true purpose was to achieve through audits what the Department of Finance refused to do through legislative amendment.

3. Constitutionality of Section 231.2(3) of the Act

[63] The Charter issue is raised in the specific context of these motions and is intertwined with the first two issues. In light of my above conclusion that ex parte orders must be cancelled, it is unnecessary for me to address this issue.

Part VI – Conclusion

[64] As a result of the incomplete disclosure in the ex parte motions, these motions are allowed and the ex parte orders are cancelled with costs.

Digitized by Google

The Minister Of National Revenue v. Cormark Securities Inc., 2011 FC 1472, Purported Vagueness of Class of Identities, Purported Ability to Realize Info. from Other CRA Source, All Not Conclusive

[1] Cormark Securities Inc. seeks to set aside an ex parte Order of this Court made pursuant to section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp) (the "Requirement Order"). The Order authorized the Minister of National Revenue to impose a Requirement on Cormark to provide information and documents relating to one or more unnamed persons involved in a specified form of transaction. In these transactions, companies engaged in one industry were attempting to deduct losses generated by companies that had been engaged in a different industry.

[2] Cormark alleges that the Minister failed to make full and frank disclosure in its ex parte application, with the result that the Requirement Order should be set aside. It further asserts that the affidavit evidence provided in support of the motion was vague, confusing and showed a fundamental lack of rigour. As such, Cormark says that it cannot comply with the Order.

[3] Cormark also argues that the evidence provided by the Minister in support of the ex parte application did not include the type of information that the Federal Court of Appeal has held to be essential to this type of application.

[4] Cormark further submits that the unnamed person or group of persons is not ascertainable and that the purpose of the Requirement Order is not to verify an unnamed person's or group of persons' compliance with any duty or obligation under the Act.

[5] For the reasons that follow, I have concluded that the Minister did provide full and frank disclosure in support of its ex parte application. Cormark has also not persuaded me that the evidence provided in support of the Minister's ex parte motion was vague or confusing, or that the group targeted by the Requirement Order is not ascertainable. As a consequence, Cormark's motion will be dismissed.

Background

[6] Cormark Securities Inc. (formerly known as Sprott Securities Inc.) is an investment management company carrying on business in Alberta.

[7] According to the evidence provided by the Minister in support of the ex parte application for a Requirement Order, the Canada Revenue Agency [CRA] is currently working on a project known as the "Tech Wreck" project. The Tech Wreck project is focussed on verifying the compliance with the Income Tax Act of certain unnamed persons involved in a particular kind of transaction with the assistance of investment management companies in Alberta, including Cormark.

[8] In the transactions in question, investors acquire a minority of shares in a corporation that has become insolvent, bankrupt or otherwise unable to continue, but which has significant pools of tax losses ("Losscos"). The investors then cause a change to the directors of the Lossco to favour the interests of the investors. The new directors cause the Lossco to involve itself in a new business. Income from the new business is then offset against the losses generated by the Lossco's previous business. For the purpose of these reasons, such transactions will be referred to as "Lossco Transactions".

[9] The ability of a business to deduct losses may be restricted if there has been a change in control of the business. The CRA is concerned that through these types of transactions, there has been an effective change in control of the Lossco, and that investors are trying to avoid the change of control restrictions in the Act.

[10] The Tech Wreck project started after the CRA's Calgary office noted that businesses with oil and gas assets were trying to deduct losses incurred by businesses engaged in research and development. An investigation revealed that certain investment management companies in Alberta, including Cormark, were promoting or facilitating these transactions.

Digitized by Google

[11] The unnamed persons who are the targets of the Requirement are clients of Cormark, or are otherwise known to Cormark, who have entered into or promoted, or attempted to enter into or promote Lossco Transactions. According to the CRA, these individuals are thus ascertainable.

[12] The purpose of the Requirement Order was thus to verify compliance by these unnamed persons with the duties and obligations imposed upon them by the Income Tax Act, and to determine whether these individuals had correctly computed and reported their taxable income.

The Requirement Order

[13] By Order dated March 21, 2011, Justice Kelen authorized the CRA to impose a Requirement on Cormark to provide information and documents under the authority of subsection 231.2(1) of the Act relating to one or more unnamed persons. A copy of the Requirement Order is attached as Annex A to these reasons.

[14] The Requirement was served on Cormark on July 14, 2011, following which Cormark brought this motion seeking to have the Requirement set aside.

The Relevant Statutory Provisions

[15] These motions relate to section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act. The provisions that are relevant to this motion state that:

231.2 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act (including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person), of a comprehensive tax information exchange agreement between Canada and another country or jurisdiction that is in force and has effect or, for greater certainty, of a tax treaty with another country, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as stipulated in the notice, (a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or (b) any document.	231.2 (1) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, sous réserve du paragraphe (2) et pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi (y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi), d'un accord général d'échange de renseignements fiscaux entre le Canada et un autre pays ou territoire qui est en vigueur et s'applique ou d'un traité fiscal conclu avec un autre pays, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne, dans le délai raisonnable que précise l'avis : a) qu'elle fournisse tout renseignement ou tout renseignement supplémentaire, y compris une déclaration de revenu ou une déclaration supplémentaire; b) qu'elle produise des

Digitized by Google

[…]
(3) On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that
(a) the person or group is ascertainable; and
(b) the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act.
(c) and (d) [Repealed, 1996, c. 21, s. 58(1)]
[…]
(5) Where an authorization is granted under subsection 231.2(3), a third party on whom a notice is served under subsection 231.2(1) may, within 15 days after the service of the notice, apply to the judge who granted the authorization or, where the judge is unable to act, to another judge of the same court for a review of the authorization.
(6) On hearing an application under subsection 231.2(5), a judge may cancel the authorization previously granted if the judge is not then satisfied that the conditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) and 231.2(3)(b) have been met and the judge may confirm or vary documents.

[…]
(3) Sur requête ex parte du ministre, un juge peut, aux conditions qu'il estime indiquées, autoriser le ministre à exiger d'un tiers la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue au paragraphe (1) concernant une personne non désignée nommément ou plus d'une personne non désignée nommément — appelée « groupe » au présent article —, s'il est convaincu, sur dénonciation sous serment, de ce qui suit :
a) cette personne ou ce groupe est identifiable;
b) la fourniture ou la production est exigée pour vérifier si cette personne ou les personnes de ce groupe ont respecté quelque devoir ou obligation prévu par la présente loi;
c) et d) [Abrogés, 1996, ch. 21, art. 58(1)]
[…]
(5) Le tiers à qui un avis est signifié ou envoyé conformément au paragraphe (1) peut, dans les 15 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, demander au juge qui a accordé l'autorisation prévue au paragraphe (3) ou, en cas d'incapacité de ce juge, à un autre juge du même tribunal de réviser l'autorisation.
(6) À l'audition de la requête prévue au paragraphe (5), le juge peut annuler l'autorisation accordée antérieurement

Digitized by Google

the authorization if the judge is satisfied that those conditions have been met.	s'il n'est pas convaincu de l'existence des conditions prévues aux alinéas (3)a) et b). Il peut la confirmer ou la modifier s'il est convaincu de leur existence.

Did the Minister Provide Full and Frank Disclosure?

[16] There is no dispute that the Minister must provide full and frank disclosure of all of the relevant facts when seeking ex parte relief from the Court under subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act.

[17] As Justice Sharpe noted in United States of America v. Friedland, [1996] O.J. No. 4399 (Q.L.), [Friedland] both the judge hearing an ex parte motion and the party against whom the order is sought are literally "at the mercy" of the party seeking the relief in issue. As a consequence, the law requires that a party seeking ex parte relief must do more than simply present its own case in the best possible light, as would be the case if the other side were present. Rather, the person seeking ex parte relief must:

> [S]tate its own case fairly and must inform the Court of any points of fact or law known to it which favour the other side. The duty of full and frank disclosure is required to mitigate the obvious risk of injustice inherent in any situation where a Judge is asked to grant an order without hearing from the other side: Friedland, above at para. 27.

[18] The Court did, however, observe at paragraph 31 of Friedland that the duty to make full and frank disclosure is not to be imposed in a formal or mechanical manner. That is, a party should not be deprived of a remedy because of "mere imperfections in the affidavit or because inconsequential facts have not been disclosed". Rather, the defects complained of must be relevant and material to the discretion to be exercised by the Court: see Friedland, above at para. 31, and Canada (Commissioner of Competition) v. Labatt Brewing Co., 2008 FC 59, 323 F.T.R. 115 at para. 27.

[19] That being said, court orders - even those made without notice to the opposing party - are not lightly to be set aside. As Justice Reed observed in Canada (Commissioner of Competition) v. Air Canada, [2001] 1 F.C. 219, [2000] F.C.J. No. 1177 (Q.L.) at para. 13, "[t]he non-disclosure or errors, in the evidence placed before the issuing judge, must be such as to have caused the issuing judge, had he or she known of them, to have refused to grant the order".

[20] In seeking to have the Requirement set aside, Cormark's first argument is that the Minister failed to provide full and frank disclosure of relevant and material information in its ex parte application. In particular, Cormark asserts that the Minister failed to disclose that he could have obtained the information being sought by other means.

[21] According to Cormark, the Minister could have obtained the information sought through the Requirement Order by mining its own databases. Each unnamed Lossco is a corporation which would have had to file a T-2 return each year. As a result, each company would have had to disclose whether it was claiming any kind of losses or scientific research and experimental expenditures, and whether it was inactive. Each company would also have to disclose whether its major business activity has changed since it filed its last return, and the nature of the business now carried on by the company.

[22] The Minister could also have obtained information from the System for Electronic Document Analysis and Retrieval [SEDAR]. According to Cormark's affiant, the Minister should have been able use SEDAR to identify any Lossco that was a reporting issuer in Canada without the need for the Requirement Order.

Digitized by Google

[23] Finally, Cormark points out that the Minister has been able to obtain information with respect to at least one oil and gas company involved in a Lossco-type transaction as evidence that the Requirement Order is not necessary here. In support of this contention, Cormark has produced documents with respect to the reassessment of Fortress Energy Inc. and the CRA's disallowance of non-capital losses claimed by that company.

[24] In support of its argument, Cormark relies on the decision in R. v. Derakhshani, 2009 FCA 190, 323 F.T.R. 115. There the Federal Court of Appeal observed that the fact that the Minister may obtain the information sought using other means "does not exclude the possibility that a requirement might be authorized, but that is information that must be provided to the judge. A judge must not be left in the dark on such an important point": at para. 29. See also Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) v. RBC Life Insurance Co., 2011 FC 1249, [2011] F.C.J. No. 1537 (Q.L.) at para. 29.

[25] Having failed to disclose to Justice Kelen that the information being sought was available elsewhere, Cormark says that the Minister failed to make full and frank disclosure with the result that the Requirement Order should be set aside.

[26] I am not persuaded that the information sought by means of the Requirement would be available to the CRA by other means. Cormark has not demonstrated that the CRA would be able to identify a Lossco by reviewing its T-2 and SEDAR filings without first knowing the name of the company in question.

[27] Moreover, it is clear that the type of Lossco Transactions that are of concern to the Minister involve the acquisition of a minority of the shares of the Lossco by investors. In response to questions from the Court, counsel for Cormark conceded that information regarding such acquisitions would not be available to the CRA, either through the company's own tax filings or through SEDAR.

[28] It is also clear from the evidence of Derek Carroll, a Team Leader in the Audit Division of the CRA, that agreements entered into by the minority investors which give them effective control of the Lossco play a central role in the tax schemes in question. Without these agreements, investors acquiring a minority interest in Losscos would not be able to cause a change to the directors of the Lossco to favour the interests of the investors and to involve the Lossco in a new business. In response to questions from the Court, Cormark conceded that neither the existence nor the content of these agreements would be discoverable by the Minister through SEDAR or through the Lossco's T-2 filings.

[29] Finally, the information provided with respect to the Fortress Energy Inc. does not assist Cormark, as there is nothing in the evidence to indicate how the company's potential involvement in a Lossco Transaction came to the attention of the CRA.

[30] As a consequence, I am not persuaded that the Minister breached the duty of full and frank disclosure in this case.

Is the Group Ascertainable?

[31] Cormark submits that the affidavit evidence provided by the Minister in support of the motion was both confusing and misleading and that it showed a fundamental lack of rigour, with the result that the unnamed persons or entities identified in the Requirement Order are not ascertainable.

[32] In particular, Cormark says that the language used in Mr. Carroll's affidavit was imprecise. By way of example, Cormark points to Mr. Carroll's statement in his affidavit that Losscos are not entitled to deduct losses if there has been a change in control of "the business", noting that "corporation" and "business" are each defined terms in the Income Tax Act. Cormark noted that Mr. Carroll admitted in cross-examination that this statement was imprecise, and that it would have been more precise to say that the ability of a corporation to deduct losses may be restricted if there has been a change in the control of "the corporation" and not "the business". However, when read in context, it is clear that the two terms were being used interchangeably.

Digitized by Google

[33] Cormark also points out that Mr. Carroll's affidavit states that in accordance with the Income Tax Act, a business can deduct losses for the purposes of computing its taxable income "in certain circumstances". Cormark contends that this statement was misleading. In support of this contention, Cormark points out that Mr. Carroll conceded in his cross-examination that the general rule under subsection 3(d) of the Act is that a business can deduct losses in calculating its income.

[34] In addition, Cormark takes issue with Mr. Carroll's failure to define various terms used in his affidavit and in the Requirement.

[35] I agree with Cormark that the language used by Mr. Carroll in his affidavit is not as precise as one may have liked. That said, I am not persuaded that the affidavit was misleading or confusing when the statements in issue are read in context.

[36] Indeed, when the affidavit that was provided by Mr. Carroll in support of the Minister's ex parte application is read as a whole, it is quite clear which type of transactions were of concern to the CRA, and what kind of information Cormark would need to look for in order to comply with the Requirement Order. This is especially so when regard is had to the step-by-step example of a Lossco Transaction contained in the Requirement letter which is attached as Schedule "A" to the Requirement Order.

[37] Cormark also takes issue with the reference in Mr. Carroll's affidavit and the Requirement letter to the "acquisition of tax attributes" of one taxpayer by another. "Tax attributes" are defined in the Requirement letter as "undepreciated capital cost balances, capital losses, non-capital losses, unused Scientific Research and Experimental Development ("SRED") expenditures, and/or unused SRED tax credits".

[38] Lou D'Souza, Cormark's Chief Compliance officer, deposes that he does not know how a taxpayer can make an "acquisition" of the tax attributes of another taxpayer, with the result that Cormark cannot identify the taxpayers who engaged in the types of transactions in issue.

[39] Cormark further contends that this aspect of Mr. Carroll's evidence was misleading, as Mr. Carroll himself conceded on cross-examination that one taxpayer cannot technically acquire the tax attributes of another taxpayer.

[40] However, as the Minister points out, Mr. Carroll went on to explain that in the course of work done on the Tech Wreck project, the CRA had seen a series of transactions that had been designed to get around the "acquisition of control" rules. These transactions resulted in the effective acquisition of one taxpayer's tax losses by another taxpayer. In light of this, I am not persuaded that there was anything misleading about this aspect of Mr. Carroll's evidence.

[41] Cormark also argues that the Requirement Order is vague, and that the unnamed person or group of persons is not ascertainable.

[42] The Minister submits that the unnamed persons are ascertainable, in that they were made up of clients of Cormark who either participated in one of the Lossco Transactions or attempted to enter into such a transaction. In addition, some members of the group are promoters known to Cormark who promoted or attempted to promote Lossco Transactions.

[43] I agree with the Minister that Cormark would know which of its clients entered into a Lossco Transaction and which of its clients attempted to enter into a Lossco Transaction with the assistance of Cormark. Cormark would also be in a position to advise the CRA as to those entities known to it that had promoted or attempted to promote Lossco Transactions.

[44] Moreover, Cormark is not being required to speculate as to whether specific Lossco Transactions were actually concluded, given that the Minister is only seeking the names of those individuals and companies known to Cormark who attempted to enter into or promote a Lossco Transaction. As a consequence, I am satisfied that the individuals and companies targeted by the Requirement Order constitute an ascertainable group.

Digitized by Google

Is the Purpose of the Requirement to Verify Compliance with the Act?

[45] Finally, Cormark challenges Mr. Carroll's statement that "the purpose of the Requirement [...] is to verify compliance by the unnamed persons who have entered into or promoted, or attempted to enter into or promote, a Transaction with the duties and obligations imposed under the Income Tax Act, and whether they have correctly calculated their taxable income".

[46] Cormark asserts that the Minister has failed to demonstrate that promoting, attempting to promote, or attempting to enter into a Lossco Transaction would avoid a duty or obligation imposed under the Act, as required by paragraph 231.2(3)(b) of the Income Tax Act.

[47] Cormark notes that in cross-examination, Mr. Carroll admitted that, other than promoter fees (which are not the subject of the Requirement Order), there is no impact on a taxpayer's tax liability where the taxpayer merely considered a transaction of the type described in Mr. Carroll's affidavit. Similarly, there is no impact on a promoter or intended promoter's tax liability where the promoter or intended promoter merely promoted or considered promoting a Lossco transaction.

[48] It is true the audit powers in section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act are an intrusive measure affecting the right to the protection of private information. As a consequence, the statutory provision must be construed restrictively: M.N.R. v. Sand Exploration Ltd. et al., [1995] 3 FC 44 at 52.

[49] That said, in Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) v. Greater Montréal Real Estate Board, 2007 FCA 346, [2008] 3 F.C.R. 366 at para. 45 [Greater Montreal] the Federal Court of Appeal held that as long as the conditions prescribed by the Act are complied with, the effect of the 1996 amendments to section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act is to permit "a type of fishing expedition ... for the purpose of facilitating the MNR's access to information".

[50] Moreover, the Minister no longer needs to show that the Requirement Order relates to a "genuine and serious inquiry" into the tax liability of a specific person or persons, or, for that matter, each and every person or entity targeted by the Order. Rather, it is appropriate to grant an ex parte application for a Requirement Order where the judge is satisfied that the information or documents relating to one or more unnamed persons is required to verify compliance with the Income Tax Act through a tax audit that is conducted in good faith: see Greater Montreal, above at paras. 21 and 48.

[51] I am satisfied that the Minister has met this test in this case. Mr. Carroll stated under oath that the Minister has reason to believe that promoters of a Lossco Transaction may also have participated in that transaction, thereby affecting the promoter's duties and obligations under the Income Tax Act. Moreover, Mr. Carroll believes that entities who attempted to participate in a Lossco Transaction through Cormark may have gone on to conclude the transaction through a separate investment management company with the attendant consequences for the entities' duties and obligations under the Act.

Conclusion

[52] For these reasons, Cormark's motion to set aside the March 21, 2011 ex parte Requirement Order of this Court is dismissed. The Minister is entitled to his costs, which are fixed at $3,500.

Digitized by Google

Inquiries by CRA/Justice

It some instances it is paramount to question parties on their knowledge of a taxpayer's affairs to fathom out exactly what is going on with them and in determining their tax aspects. In some instances in can lead to merely administrative action such as financial penalties, and, in others, penal tax evasion charges may be appropriate. It obviously depends on the outcome of the findings of the inquiry.

Inquiry - S. 231.4

231.4 (1) The Minister may, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, authorize any person, whether or not the person is an officer of the Canada Revenue Agency, to make such inquiry as the person may deem necessary with reference to anything relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act.

Appointment of hearing officer

(2) Where the Minister, pursuant to subsection 231.4(1), authorizes a person to make an inquiry, the Minister shall forthwith apply to the Tax Court of Canada for an order appointing a hearing officer before whom the inquiry will be held.

Powers of hearing officer

(3) For the purposes of an inquiry authorized under subsection 231.4(1), a hearing officer appointed under subsection 231.4(2) in relation thereto has all the powers conferred on a commissioner by sections 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act and that may be conferred on a commissioner under section 11 thereof.

When powers to be exercised

(4) A hearing officer appointed under subsection 231.4(2) in relation to an inquiry shall exercise the powers conferred on a commissioner by section 4 of the Inquiries Act in relation to such persons as the person authorized to make the inquiry considers appropriate for the conduct thereof but the hearing officer shall not exercise the power to punish any person unless, on application by the hearing officer, a judge of a superior or county court certifies that the power may be exercised in the matter disclosed in the application and the applicant has given to the person in respect of whom the applicant proposes to exercise the power 24 hours notice of the hearing of the application or such shorter notice as the judge considers reasonable.

Rights of witness at inquiry

(5) Any person who gives evidence in an inquiry authorized under subsection 231.4(1) is entitled to be represented by counsel and, on request made by the person to the Minister, to receive a transcript of the evidence given by the person.

Rights of person whose affairs are investigated

(6) Any person whose affairs are investigated in the course of an inquiry authorized under subsection 231.4(1) is entitled to be present and to be represented by counsel throughout the inquiry unless the hearing officer appointed under subsection 231.4(2) in relation to the inquiry, on application by the Minister or a person giving evidence, orders otherwise in relation to the whole or any part of the inquiry on the ground that the presence of the person and the person's counsel, or either of them, would be prejudicial to the effective conduct of the inquiry.

Digitized by Google

The principal case that deals with the issues of the scope of the inquiry and whether it can be challenged on Charter grounds are the set of cases of Del Zotto where the taxpayer attempted to argue his s. 7-8 charter rights were infringed on when a colleague was about to be compelled to give testimony. Taking a long route the Federal Appeal Ct. did find for the taxpayer, even with consideration of the processes that would come into play with respect to the admissibility of the fact-finding results, while the Supreme Court found, thankfully, the opposite. In many instances taxpayer knowledge cannot be obtained through various RFI's or warrants since it resides only in the minds of the parties to be subpoenaed and while not necessarily leading to a criminal prosecution it needs to be realizable in some form for the thorough application of the Act. Taken a few steps to get it there, the Supreme Court thankfully thought so.

Del Zotto v. Canada, [1997] 3 FC 40, A-55-97

Legislation cited (available on CanLII)
Constitution Act, 1982, The, Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 — 1; 7; 8; 11; 13; 17; 52(1); 231.4; 231(14); 231(15); 239; 239(1)
Criminal Code, RSC 1985, c C-46 — 535
Federal Courts Act, RSC 1985, c F-7 — 28
Inquiries Act, RSC 1985, c I-11 — 4; 5; 11; 239(1)
Public Inquiries Act, RSO 1990, c P.41
Securities Act, RSBC 1996, c 418
Tobacco Tax Act, RSO 1990, c T.10 — 24
Decisions cited

- Baron v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 154 (SCC)
- Baron v. Canada (C.A.), reflex
- British Columbia Securities Commission v. Branch, 1995 CanLII 142 (SCC)
- Del Zotto v. Canada, 1997 CanLII 6325 (FC)
- Guay v. Lafleur, 1964 CanLII 45 (SCC)
- Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC)
- Knox contracting ltd. v. Canada, 1990 CanLII 71 (SCC)
- Norway Insulation Ltd. v. R., 1995 CanLII 7439 (ON SC)
- Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), 1995 CanLII 86 (SCC)
- R. v. Colarusso, 1994 CanLII 134 (SCC)
- R. v. Dyment, 1988 CanLII 10 (SCC)
- R. v. Eddy (T.), 1994 CanLII 5274 (NL SCTD)
- R. v. Mckinlay transport ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC)
- R. v. Plant, 1993 CanLII 70 (SCC)
- R. v. S. (R.J.), 1995 CanLII 121 (SCC)
- Schreiber v. Canada (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 6333 (FCA)
- Starr v. Houlden, 1990 CanLII 112 (SCC)
- Thomson newspapers ltd. v. Canada (Director of investigation and research, restrictive trade practices commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC)
- Yang v. R., 1996 CanLII 8230 (ON SC)

A-55-97
Angelo Del Zotto and Herbert B. Noble (Appellants) (Plaintiffs)
v.
Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada, the Minister of National Revenue, John Edward Thompson and D. Reilly Watson (Respondents) (Defendants)
Indexed as: Del Zotto v.Canada (C.A.)

Digitized by Google

Court of Appeal, Strayer and MacGuigan JJ.A. and Henry D.J."Toronto, May 12, 13 and 14; Ottawa, June 10, 1997.

Constitutional law " Charter of Rights " Criminal process " Appeal from dismissal of actions for declarations Income Tax Act, s. 231.4 contravening Charter, s. 8 " S. 231.4 permitting Minister to authorize inquiry into anything relating to administration, enforcement of Act " After indicating intention to charge Del Zotto with tax evasion under s. 239(1)(a), (d), Revenue Canada commencing s. 231.4 inquiry " Only Noble subpoenaed " Appeal allowed " S. 8 right evolving into right to reasonable security of one's privacy " Intrusiveness of search, gathering of evidence for prosecution of taxpayer determining whether preconditions for search established in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc. apply " S. 231.4 inherently oriented towards criminal prosecution " Trial Judge not giving sufficient weight to fact inquiry criminal investigation " Search involving order to appear for examination under oath with documents sufficient for violation of s. 8 " Any threatened seizure bringing s. 8 into play " Since s. 8 protecting privacy rights of people, not places, Del Zotto having reasonable expectation of privacy over documents, information held by others at different places " Right to privacy protected prior to actual physical search, i.e. as soon as any government action threatens security of individual's privacy interest " S. 231.4 struck down as violating Charter, s. 8.

Income tax " Seizures " Appeal from trial judgment dismissing actions for declarations Income Tax Act, s. 231.4 contravening Charter, ss. 7, 8 " S. 231.4 permitting Minister to authorize inquiry into anything relating to administration, enforcement of Act " Revenue Canada proposing to charge Del Zotto with tax evasion under s. 239(1)(a),(d) " S. 231.4 inquiry commenced " Only Noble summoned as witness " Appeal allowed " S. 231.4 inquiry inherently oriented towards criminal prosecution " Trial Judge not giving adequate weight to fact inquiry criminal investigation " Possibility Del Zotto could be subpoenaed " Reasonable expectation of privacy in peril from beginning of inquiry " Given inherent orientation of s. 231.4, any threatened seizure sufficient to bring s. 8 into play " Unlimited investigation into financial affairs over six years revealing many aspects of private life " Revenue Canada must have reasonable, probable cause to set up criminal inquiry into financial affairs of taxpayer " As violating Charter, s. 8, s. 231.4 struck down.

This was an appeal from a Trial Division judgment dismissing actions for declarations that Income Tax Act, section 231.4 contravened Charter, sections 7 and 8. Section 231.4 permits the Minister to authorize an inquiry into anything relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act. A hearing officer appointed to conduct an inquiry has all the powers conferred on a commissioner by the Inquiries Act, sections 4 and 5, i.e. the power to summon witnesses, including the same power as a court of record to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence. The appellant, Del Zotto, was suspected of tax evasion. In 1986 Revenue Canada began an investigation into his financial affairs and in 1991 departmental officials advised him that they proposed to charge him with tax evasion under paragraphs 239(1)(a) and (d). In late 1992 National Revenue appointed an inquiry officer and obtained the appointment of a hearing officer. Del Zotto was advised that an inquiry would be made into his financial affairs for the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive. The inquiry got under way but Del Zotto was not summoned as a witness, although it was acknowledged that he might be. The appellant, Noble, was summoned to appear with all documents in his possession or control relating to the financial affairs of Del Zotto for the taxation years in question.

Charter, section 7 guarantees the right not to be deprived of life, liberty or security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Section 8 guarantees the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

Held, (Strayer J.A. dissenting), the appeal should be allowed.

Per MacGuigan J.A. (Henry D.J. concurring): An inquiry under section 231.4 is inherently oriented towards criminal prosecution, based not on the labels used but on what is really in question in such a proceeding, i.e. on the values of criminality or innocence in play.

Digitized by Google

The right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures under Charter, section 8 has evolved into a right to the reasonable security of one's privacy. The locus classicus for section 8 is Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc. wherein it was held that section 8 must be broadly and liberally construed to effect its purpose, which is to secure a person's right to a reasonable expectation of privacy against governmental encroachments. In the absence of exigent circumstances, section 8 requires prior authorization by a judicial officer as a precondition to a criminal law seizure, on a standard of reasonable and probable grounds both as to the commission of an offence and as to the evidence to be afforded by the search.
What determines whether the principles and guidelines in Hunter apply is the intrusive nature of the search in question and the gathering of evidence for the prosecution of the taxpayer. The Trial Judge correctly concluded that "a full weighing of all the circumstances [was] required", but he did not give adequate weight to the focussed criminal investigation in the case at bar, and was unduly influenced by Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission) in relation to the lesser form of intrusion and the low degree of expectation of privacy for business affairs which he had analyzed to exist. It was enough for a violation of section 8 if the proposed search involves an order to appear for examination under oath with documents (subpoena duces tecum), under the principle that section 8 confers an entitlement to a reasonable expectation of privacy. It was unnecessary to wait for Del Zotto to be subpoenaed. His right to a reasonable expectation of privacy was in peril from the time the inquiry began. A trigger is needed for the invocation of Charter, section 8, which does not apply in the absence of a search or seizure. Given the inherent orientation of section 231.4 towards criminal prosecution, any threatened seizure is sufficient to bring section 8 into play.
Since section 8 protects the privacy rights of people, not places, Del Zotto had a reasonable expectation of privacy over documents and information held by other people at different places. An investigation into all cash received and all cash spent is necessarily, in today's modern world, a window into most of a person's private life. The combination of forced documentary production and forced oral testimony can be particularly intrusive. The right to privacy is protected in advance of any physical search, that is, as soon as any government action threatens the security of the individual's privacy interest. National Revenue has no right to conduct a criminal investigation into the financial affairs of taxpayers merely by setting up an inquiry under section 231.4, a procedure which establishes no safeguards for the taxpayer. What is required for validity is a judicial inquiry based upon reasonable and probable cause, the normal standard for criminal investigation.
No justification under Charter, section 1 having been advanced, section 231.4 violated Charter, section 8 and had to be struck down.
Per Strayer J.A. (dissenting): Characterization as a criminal process did not mean that the preconditions for a search as established by the Supreme Court in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc. had automatically to be met before an inquiry under section 231.4 could be commenced. It is only when particular uses of the subpoena power by such an inquiry, or particular subsequent uses of evidence obtained through such subpoenas threaten to endanger Charter, section 7 or 8 rights that those rights should be invoked.
A subpoena issued to Noble would not per se invade Del Zotto's right to know the Crown's "case to meet". In the absence of evidence as to the relationship between Del Zotto and Noble, there was no reason for the Court to assume that any question put to, or document demanded from Noble, would disclose Del Zotto'Ñ defence to a charge which had not yet been laid. There is a proper time and method for protecting an accused's rights against self-incrimination, but this was not it.
The rights in section 8 apply differently depending on the reasonable expectation of privacy in respect of the subject-matter and the nature of the intrusion on such privacy. Such factors go to the reasonability of any seizure.

Digitized by Google

One had to look at the total context of the process to determine whether a statutory scheme is "regulatory" or "criminal". The "context" in which these matters must be judged involves a number of factors: the nature and the purpose of the legislative scheme whose administration or enforcement is in question; the mechanism for discovery or mandatory production employed and the degree of its potential intrusiveness; and the availability of judicial supervision. All of these factors must be considered in determining whether a seizure, real or potential, would be unreasonable within section 8. The predominant purpose of the inquiry was to seek evidence for possible prosecution of Del Zotto under paragraphs 239(1)(a) and (d). Those paragraphs were designed to ensure compliance with the self-reporting requirements of the Income Tax Act and those paragraphs have been characterized as part of what is really a regulatory scheme.

In comparison with a search, a subpoena duces tecum does not result in a major intrusion upon one's privacy. Furthermore, the only subpoena duces tecum issued herein was directed to Noble. Any documents which he may have had concerning Del Zotto's financial affairs were presumably no longer private to Del Zotto; but whether they were, because of some relationship between him and Noble, was a matter to be explored on evidence before the hearing officer. Further, a subpoena duces tecum can be attacked generally or in respect of a particular document either before the hearing officer or, if necessary, on judicial review, if it can be demonstrated that in the particular circumstances someone's constitutional right is about to be violated. Objections could then be raised as to the relevance of a particular document to the legitimate purposes of the inquiry.

There was no basis for declaring section 231.4 invalid. Theoretical and potential invalid uses or consequences of the use of section 231.4 do not justify a declaration of total invalidity. Nothing had as yet happened in this inquiry to justify a declaration of its invalidity. Although the terms of reference of the inquiry were unnecessarily broad, it was open to Noble or Del Zotto to insist that these terms be confined in their application to the scope of subsection 231.4 so that personal documents having nothing to do with the collection of income tax would not need to be produced. The time for a witness to object is when the Crown seeks to use his own evidence against him. Thus the time for raising the objection was not at the inquiry, but at any subsequent trial of Del Zotto. If a person is called at an inquiry, he can successfully object to testify if the predominant purpose is to obtain evidence to incriminate him. Here that predominant purpose in respect of Del Zotto has been admitted, but Del Zotto has not yet been called and may never be called.

statutes and regulations judicially considered

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, being Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44], ss. 1, 7, 8, 11, 13.

Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23 , ss. 17, 34 (as am. by S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 76, s. 16).

Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44], s. 52(1).

Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46.

Federal Court Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-7 , s. 28.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148 (as am. by S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 1), ss. 231(3),(7),(8),(12), (13),(14),(15), 231.4 (as enacted by S.C. 1986, c. 6, s. 121), 239 (as am. by S.C. 1988, c. 55, s. 182; c. 61, s. 25).

Income Tax Act (The), S.C. 1948, c. 52, s. 115(4).

Income War Tax Act, 1917 (The), S.C. 1917, c. 28, s. 8(3).

Digitized by Google

Inquiries Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-11 , ss. 4, 5.
Public Inquiries Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 411.
Securities Act, S.B.C. 1985, c. 83.
Tobacco Tax Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. T.10. cases judicially considered applied:
Baron v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 154 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416; (1993), 99 D.L.R. (4th) 350; 78 C.C.C. (3d) 510; 18 C.R. (4th) 374; 13 C.R.R. (2d) 65; [1993] 1 C.T.C. 111; 93 DTC 5018; 146 N.R. 270; affg reflex, [1991] 1 F.C. 688; (1991), 91 DTC 5055; 122 N.R. 47 (C.A.); Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425; (1990), 65 D.L.R. (4th) 161; 54 C.C.C. (3d) 417; 29 C.P.R. (3d) 97; 76 C.R. (3d) 129; 47 C.R.R. 1; 106 N.R. 161; 39 O.A.C. 161; Starr v. Houlden, 1990 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1366; (1990), 68 D.L.R. (4th) 641; 55 C.C.C. (3d) 472; 110 N.R. 81; 41 O.A.C. 161; Schreiber v. Canada (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 6333 (FCA), [1997] 2 F.C. 176 (C.A.). distinguished:
British Columbia Securities Commission v. Branch, 1995 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 3; (1995), 123 D.L.R. (4th) 462; [1995] 5 W.W.R. 129; 4 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1; 60 B.C.A.C. 1; 97 C.C.C. (3d) 505; 7 C.C.L.S. 1; 38 C.R.R (4th) 133; 27 C.R.R. (2d) 189; 180 N.R. 241; 99 W.A.C. 1.
considered:
Yang v. R. 1996 CanLII 8230 (ON SC), (1996), 31 O.R. (3d) 66 (Gen. Div.); Del Zotto v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue " M.N.R.), [1993] F.C.J. No. 885 (C.A.) (QL); Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; (1984), 55 A.R. 291; 11 D.L.R. (4th) 641; [1984] 6 W.W.R. 577; 33 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193; 27 B.L.R. 297; 14 C.C.C. (3d) 97; 2 C.P.R. (3d) 1; 41 C.R. (3d) 97; 9 C.R.R. 355; 84 DTC 6467; 55 N.R. 241; R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627; (1990), 68 D.L.R. (4th) 568; 55 C.C.C. (3d) 530; 76 C.R. (3d) 283; 47 C.R.R. 151; [1990] 2 C.T.C. 103; 90 DTC 6243; 106 N.R. 385; 39 O.A.C. 385; R. v. S. (R.J.), 1995 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 451; (1995), 121 D.L.R. (4th) 589; 96 C.C.C. (3d) 1; 36 C.R. (4th) 1; 26 C.R.R. (2d) 1; 177 N.R. 81; 78 O.A.C. 161; R. v. Dyment, 1988 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 417; (1988), 73 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 13; 55 D.L.R. (4th) 503; 229 A.P.R. 13; 45 C.C.C. (3d) 244; 66 C.R. (3d) 348; 38 C.R.R. 301; 10 M.V.R. (2d) 1; 89 N.R. 249; R. v. Plant, 1993 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 281; (1993), 145 A.R. 104; [1993] 8 W.W.R. 287; 12 Alta. L.R. (3d) 305; 84 C.C.C. (3d) 203; 24 C.R. (4th) 47; 17 C.R.R. (2d) 297; 157 N.R. 321; 55 W.A.C. 104; Cock v. Attorney-General (1909), 28 N.Z.L.R. 405 (C.A.); R. v. Colarusso, 1994 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 20; (1994), 110 D.L.R. (4th) 297; 87 C.C.C. (3d) 193; 26 C.R. (4th) 289; 19 C.R.R. (2d) 193; 49 M.V.R. (2d) 161; 162 N.R. 321; 69 O.A.C. 81.
referred to:
R. v. Norway Insulation Inc. 1995 CanLII 7439 (ON SC), (1995), 28 O.R. (3d) 432; [1995] 2 C.T.C. 451; 29 C.R.R. (3d) 163; 95 DTC 5328 (Gen. Div.); R. v. Harris, R. (1995), 95 DTC 5653 (B.C.S.C.); R. v. Jarvis, [1997] A.J. No. 214 (Alta. Prov. Ct.) (QL); R. v. Soviak, [1997] O.J. No. 1215 (Prov. Div.) (QL); Guay v. Lafleur, 1964 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1965] S.C.R. 12; (1964), 47 D.L.R. (2d) 226; [1964] C.T.C. 350; 64 DTC 5218; Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), 1995 CanLII 86 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 97; (1995), 124 D.L.R. (4th) 129; 31 Admin. L.R. (2d) 261; 39 C.R. (4th) 141; 180 N.R. 1; R. v. Kabbebe, [1997] A.Q. No. 273 (Que. C.A.) (QL).
APPEAL from the Trial Division judgment (Del Zotto v. Canada, 1997 CanLII 6325 (FC), [1997] 2 F.C. 428; (1997), 143 D.L.R. (4th) 340 (T.D.)) dismissing actions for declarations that Income Tax Act, section 231.4 contravened Charter, sections 7 or 8. Appeal allowed.

Digitized by Google

counsel:
Edward L. Greenspan, Q.C. and David W. Stratas for appellant Angelo Del Zotto.
Mahmud Jamal and Alan D. Gold for appellant Herbert B. Noble.
Ivan S. Bloom, Q.C. and Gordon S. Campbell for respondent Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada.
Graham F. Pinos, Q.C. for respondent D. Reilly Watson.
solicitors:
Greenspan & Associates, Toronto, and Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt, Toronto, for appellant Angelo Del Zotto.
Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt, Toronto and Gold & Fuerst, Toronto, for appellant Herbert B. Noble.
Deputy Attorney General of Canada for respondent Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada.
Graham F. Pinos, Q.C., Toronto, for respondent D. Reilly Watson.
The following are the reasons for judgment rendered in English by Strayer J.A. (dissenting): I have had the opportunity to read a draft of the reasons of my colleague MacGuigan J.A. and I regret that I am unable to agree with him. Instead I would dismiss the appeal because I am in agreement with the reasoning of the learned Trial Judge [1997 CanLII 6325 (FC), [1997] 2 F.C. 428].
The Trial Judge rejected the appellants' action for declarations, based on section 7 and section 8 of the Charter [Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, being Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]]. With respect to section 7 his conclusions were essentially to the effect that any guarantees under that section related to self-incrimination and as Del Zotto, the "target" of the inquiry and the person the Crown hopes to prosecute, has not been subpoenaed it is at best premature to invoke section 7. With respect to section 8 he concluded that having regard to the context in which the subpoena duces tecum is being used, the regulatory context of the inquiry, and the limited intrusiveness of such a subpoena, there is no unreasonable seizure involved at the stage of the issue of the subpoena. I adopt his reasoning and the comments which follow are simply an elaboration of certain aspects considered by him.
Briefly put I am unwilling to accept that because some might characterize this as a criminal process the preconditions for a search as proclaimed by the Supreme Court in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc.[1] must automatically be met before an inquiry under section 231.4 of the Income Tax Act [S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63 (as enacted by S.C. 1986, c. 6, s. 121)] can be commenced. If particular uses of the subpoena power by such an inquiry, or particular subsequent uses of evidence obtained through such subpoenas threaten to endanger section 7 or 8 rights, it is only then that those rights should be invoked.
The appellants' case suffers from verbal excess: the inflation of language which detracts from precise consideration of what is involved here. The factum tells us that:
Such Inquiries are a hallmark of the worst of the police states that the world has seen.[2]
Much was heard of the Star Chamber, now dead some 350 years but still the stuff of legal rhetoric. Revenue Canada was said to have "passed" (sic) the Rubicon.[3] Counsel argued that this whole process would destroy the "Golden Thread" of the common law, a familiar[4] but unhelpful metaphor in the application of finely balanced Charter guarantees. The possible prosecution of Del Zotto was equated to an ordinary criminal prosecution, and the requirement that any witness be obliged to appear in private before a hearing officer (where he would be represented by counsel) was equated to anyone being obliged to face and respond to a police interrogation.
As I understand it, the appellants' proposition is essentially as follows. No process whereby any person (whether or not connected in any way to a potential accused) might be compelled to testify or produce documents concerning that potential accused, can be initiated unless the Crown first meets the conditions laid down in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc.[5] for the issuance of a search warrant involving the search of business or private premises. For these purposes it is irrelevant what the nature of the document sought or the questions put may be; nor is the fact that such evidence and such testimony will be given in private with counsel for the witness and the potential accused present before a hearing officer appointed by a judge of the Tax Court. It is equally irrelevant that an inquiry of this type has been held[6] to be an administrative process where there are no findings of guilt or responsibility, that oral evidence taken there cannot be used directly in a subsequent trial, and that various protections exist under sections 7 and 13 of the Charter with respect to the use of original or derivative self-incriminatory evidence should such a situation arise.

Digitized by Google

I am unable to accept this proposition nor do I think it is consistent with the Supreme Court jurisprudence most relevant to the statutory provisions in question here, namely sections 231.4 and 239 [as am. by S.C. 1988, c. 55, s. 182; c. 61, s. 25] of the Income Tax Act.

Section 7 of the Charter

I agree with the analysis of the Trial Judge on this matter. I would only add that I find it particularly difficult to understand how the appellants can argue at this time that a subpoena issued to Noble will per se invade the right of the potential accused, Del Zotto, to know the Crown's "case to meet". It was explained that the real meaning of this requirement is that the accused should not be obliged to disclose his defence until after he has been charged, a trial ensues, and the Crown has closed its case. While I do not in any way question that right, I do not understand why this automatically presents a barrier to anyone"whether in any way connected to the potential accused or not"from being the object of a subpoena duces tecum . It is common ground that there is no evidence on the record as to what relationship Noble has to Del Zotto if any. Why then should this Court assume that any question put to, or document demanded from, Noble will disclose the defence of Del Zotto to a charge which has not yet even been laid? This would mean that no one could be subpoenaed even to produce public records concerning Del Zotto or to testify as to his public movements or public utterances. With respect, I think the appellants overreach when they make this argument. As I will suggest below, there is a proper time and method for protecting an accused's undoubted rights against self-incrimination, but this is not it.

Section 8 of the Charter

I find the appellants' argument that the inquiry is simply evidence gathering for a criminal prosecution to be overly simplistic, leading to the premature and unnecessary conclusion that all rules applicable to a Criminal Code [R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46] prosecution apply including the principles in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc. No doubt many Charter guarantees, including all of section 11 (applying to anyone "charged with an offence") would apply at the appropriate time. However the rights in section 8 apply differently depending on the reasonable expectation of privacy in respect of the subject-matter and the nature of the intrusion on such privacy. Such factors go to the reasonability of any seizure.

Thus while the "full panoply" of constitutional rights are of course available to the appellants, one must consider, in the specific context, what are the relevant constitutional rights. I agree with my colleague on the importance of the privacy interest, but it is an interest which is conditioned in many ways by conflicting public interests.

I should say first, in addressing the requirements of section 8 in the present case, that I find those decisions of the Supreme Court on mandatory production of documents not involving searches to be much more relevant than those involving the conditions for issuing search warrants. I also distinguish cases such as Starr v. Houlden[7] on the basis that they involved the criminal nature of potential and public findings of fact or law. An inquiry such as we are concerned with makes no findings and is conducted in private.

Digitized by Google

In my view the two most pertinent cases are the Thomson case[8] and R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd.[9] both decided on March 29, 1990. The McKinlay case is particularly relevant since it involved a form of discovery under the Income Tax Act. The Thomson case involved the compulsory production of evidence to determine whether an offence under section 34 [as am. by S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 76, s. 16] of the Combines Investigation Act had been committed by those ordered to testify and to produce documents. Neither case involved a search warrant. In both cases the processes were held not to infringe on section 8 rights. On the other hand, cases such as Hunter[10] and Baron v. Canada[11] involved the preconditions for the issue of search warrants.

Like my colleague MacGuigan J.A. I take guidance from what was said by Sopinka J., on behalf of a unanimous Court in Baron,[12] that labels as to whether a statutory scheme is "regulatory" or "criminal" are not determinative in deciding whether an unreasonable search or seizure is authorized. Instead he affirmed that one must look at the total context of the particular process in question. Baron involved the use of search warrants issued under the Income Tax Act without the issuing judge being allowed any discretion once reasonable grounds were established. While acknowledging that the Court had found the Income Tax Act to be regulatory in McKinlay, Sopinka J. concluded that because a "physical entry and search" would be authorized in the case before him the issue of the search warrants should meet the preconditions as defined in Hunter . He went on to say, however:

Physical search of private premises . . . is the greatest intrusion of privacy short of a violation of bodily integrity. It is quite distinct from compelling a person to appear for examination under oath and to bring with them certain documents, under a subpoena duces tecum (Thomson Newspapers, supra), or to produce documents on demand (McKinlay Transport, supra). Both La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. acknowledged in Thomson Newspapers, supra, at pp. 520 and 594, respectively, that the power to search premises is more intrusive of an individual's privacy than the mere power to order the production of documents. [Emphasis added.]

Clearly, then, Sopinka J. was not prepared to say that section 8 precludes any mandatory production of documents where a prosecution is potentially involved.

It appears to me from the jurisprudence that the "context" in which these matters must be judged involves a number of factors: the nature and the purpose of the legislative scheme whose administration or enforcement is in question; the mechanism for discovery or mandatory production employed and the degree of its potential intrusiveness; and the availability of judicial supervision. One must consider all of these factors in determining whether a seizure, real or potential, would be unreasonable within the meaning of section 8.

The Thomson case involved the validity of orders to testify and to produce documents, issued by a member of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission under section 17 of the Combines Investigation Act.[13] There was no judicial involvement in the issue of such orders and no preconditions as to their issue. For all practical purposes these orders were like a subpoena duces tecum. The orders in question made it clear that the purpose of the inquiry was to determine whether the objects of the orders had committed an offence of predatory pricing under the Combines Investigation Act, an offence punishable with imprisonment. Similarly in the present case, although no such order exists stating a purpose of prosecution, the Crown acknowledges that the predominant purpose of the inquiry is to seek evidence for possible prosecution of Del Zotto under paragraphs 239(1)(a) and (d) of the Income Tax Act.

A majority of a five-member court in Thomson held that section 17 did not violate section 8 of the Charter. While there are five-separate judgments it appears that the three who upheld section 17 vis-à-vis section 8 of the Charter looked at various of the contextual factors mentioned above. La Forest J. stated that expectations of privacy are different in respect of regulatory and criminal matters. He said that the fact that there was possible imprisonment involved as a sanction for this offence under the Combines Investigation Act did not necessarily make the matter criminal for purposes of a reasonable expectation of privacy. He then analyzed the nature and purpose of the Combines Investigation Act and found that it was a scheme of economic regulation concerning matters of concern for the economy, but did not involve the control of acts morally or socially reprehensible within the normal scope of the criminal law. He pointed out the importance for business to observe the requirements of free competition and to conform to the law without regular inspection. Because the effectiveness of the law was so dependent on self-regulation in areas not normally open to official surveillance it was important that there be an effective system of penalties for its non-observance. Thus the penalties related to the regulatory purpose of the Act. He stated that the conduct for which a penalty was imposed

Digitized by Google

. . . is made criminal for strictly instrumental reasons.[14]

He went on to make comparisons with the Income Tax Act in this respect, in particular section 239 which is one of the sections in issue in the present case. He observed:

As a final comment, I would point out that the Combines Investigation Act is not, as regards sanctions, unlike the Income Tax Act. Under section 239 of the latter Act, a taxpayer can be liable to imprisonment to a term "not exceeding 5 years", provided he is, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, proceeded against by way of indictment. The offences in relation to which this punishment can be imposed are defined in s. 239(1). They include making "false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act" (s. 239(1)(a)); destroying, altering or secreting records or books "to evade payment of a tax imposed by this Act" (s. 239(1)(b)); making or acquiescing in the omission of "a material particular" from the "records or books of account of a taxpayer" (s. 239(1)(c)); evading "wilfully, in any manner . . . compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act" (s. 239(1)(d)); and conspiring "with any person to commit an offence described by paragraphs (a) to (d)" (s. 239(1)(e)). All of these offences relate to conduct that might well be discovered by the exercise of the power to order the production of documents which s. 231(3) confers on the Minister of National Revenue. This has not prevented this Court from characterizing s. 231(3) as a regulatory or administrative power of investigation; see R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., supra. I do not see why we should regard the possibility of imprisonment as having a different effect in the case of s. 17 of the Combines Investigation Act.[15]

While it might be said that his comments on the Income Tax Act in the context of the Thomson case were obiter dicta, it should be noted that this case, and the McKinlay case which actually involved the Income Tax Act, were decided on the same day and he makes reference to McKinlay in this passage. Further, in his concurring judgment in McKinlay he adopts his reasons in Thomson in support of his conclusion in McKinlay that the Income Tax Act, though supported by penal sanctions, is essentially of an administrative nature.[16] The two decisions are therefore interrelated.

La Forest J. went on to conclude that in this kind of regulatory context the expectations of privacy are much less in respect to enforcement for the purpose of section 8. This led him to conclude that the procedure in question in Thomson, which was much like a subpoena duces tecum, did not involve any unreasonable seizure within the meaning of section 8 of the Charter.

L'Heureux-Dubé J. agreed in Thomson that both the Combines Investigation Act and the Income Tax Act are regulatory in nature and she cited this as an important reason for the expectations of privacy being somewhat less.

Sopinka J. in Thomson concluded that section 17 did not violate section 8 of the Charter, but he did not rely on section 17 being part of a regulatory scheme. He decided the matter instead on the basis of the nature of an order under section 17 compelling the production of documents. He found this not to be a "seizure" within the meaning of section 8. He therefore did not have to address the question of whether it was "reasonable". His decision is however important in underlining the modest degree of intervention involved with an order such as a subpoena duces tecum . Even if, as now seems to be the predominant view, one treats such orders as "seizures", the limited degree of intervention involved, as underlined by the reasoning of Sopinka J., is an important factor in determining the reasonability of a "seizure".

Digitized by Google

Wilson J. with whom Lamer J. [as he then was] concurred in a separate opinion in Thomson, agreed with the general principles set out above but characterized the Combines Investigation Act as being of a criminal nature and therefore she thought more stringent controls were appropriate with respect to seizures. This does not much concern our analysis of the Income Tax Act, however, because as noted below, in the McKinlay case she characterized that Act as regulatory and upheld the relevant provisions.

In McKinlay the same five-member Court upheld subsection 231(3) of the Income Tax Act which authorized the conduct of an income tax audit by service on behalf of the Minister of letters on taxpayers demanding information and the production of documents. Again this scheme was attacked under section 8 of the Charter because it did not involve any preconditions for the issue of such letters as set out in the Hunter case. Wilson J. with whom Lamer, La Forest, and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. concurred, analyzed the nature and purpose of the Income Tax Act. She noted that it is [at page 636] "[a] chief source of revenue for the federal government". (It might be observed in passing that it is also a chief source of revenue for all provincial governments except that of Quebec.) The Act operates on a self-reporting basis. It is necessary that the Minister have some adequate powers of inspection because there will always be those who do not comply with reporting requirements. She stated that:

The Minister must be capable of exercising these powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds for believing that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act.[17]

She concluded that the demands for information in question violated no reasonable expectation of privacy, given the general nature and purpose of the Act. Further she emphasized that this kind of demand was "the least intrusive means" for monitoring compliance. Sopinka J., while concurring in the result did so on the same basis as adopted by him in Thomson , namely that there was no seizure involved and therefore section 8 was not engaged. Again this at least underlines the lack of intrusiveness of a mere demand for documents.

The McKinlay case is very pertinent because, although it did not involve a potential prosecution (except for non-compliance with the demand for information) it involved a form of compulsion not very different from a subpoena duces tecum. Further, in one way it was more intrusive in that the information was simply provided to the Minister without an administrative process such as an inquiry under section 231.4 where the target of an investigation can be represented by counsel and where objections can be made to relevancy.

Drawing on these cases which are most pertinent because they directly or indirectly support the regulatory nature of the Income Tax Act and the contextual approach to what is a reasonable seizure, I will refer to a few salient features of the present case.

First it should be observed that section 8 of the Charter does not apply to the compulsion of testimony. As observed by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in the Thomson case:

To hold that an order to testify constitutes a "seizure", presumably a "seizure" of one's thoughts, would be to stretch that word beyond any meaning.[18]

Secondly, instead of dwelling on generalities concerning section 239 of the Income Tax Act, it is important to see just what it provides.

239. (1) Every person who has

(a) made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive

Digitized by Google

statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act or a regulation,
(b) to evade payment of a tax imposed by this Act, destroyed, altered, mutilated, secreted or otherwise disposed of the records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(c) made, or assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive entries, or omitted, or assented to or acquiesced in the omission, to enter a material particular, in records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by the Act, or (e) conspired with any person to commit an offence described in paragraphs (a) to (d), is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to
(f) a fine of not less than 50%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or
(g) both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.
(2) Every person who is charged with an offence described in subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted upon indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to
(a) a fine of not less than 100%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded; and
(b) imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years.
In the present case Revenue Canada has advised Del Zotto that he may be charged under paragraphs 239(1)(a) and (d), all part of the same scheme. What is striking about the offences described in paragraphs 239(1)(a) to (e) is that they all involve possible tax evasion through false returns, falsified documents, wilful evasion or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing. This is not a typical criminal law but is a law designed to ensure compliance with the self-reporting requirements of the Income Tax Act and was characterized as part of what is really a regulatory scheme by La Forest J. in the passage from Thomson quoted above. As he said in connection with the Combines Investigation Act, such conduct
. . . is made criminal for strictly instrumental reasons.
There cannot be the exaggerated claims to privacy connected with the administration of the Income Tax Act which the appellants assert. The Act requires all manner of disclosure. The taxpayer must, for example, disclose: his place of residence; his age; his social insurance number; his marital status or whether he is living common law; his sources and amounts of income; his dependants, their ages and possible physical conditions if handicapped; the amounts and objects of his charitable or political donations, if he is to claim tax credits; whom he employs and entertains if he seeks to deduct the costs as business expenses; and details of his pension arrangements. If he is employed he must disclose many of these details not only to Revenue Canada but also to his employer so that mandatory tax deductions can be made.
A subpoena duces tecum is not a major intrusion of privacy as compared to a search. This has been recognized on several occasions.[19] It should further be noted that in the present case the only subpoena duces tecum which has ever been issued has been directed not to Del Zotto, the supposed "target", but to Noble, a person whose status is unknown to the Court. It is not irrelevant that any documents which Noble may have about Del Zotto are presumably no longer private to Del Zotto: if they are because of some relationship between him and Noble that is a matter to be explored on evidence before the hearing officer.
Further, a subpoena duces tecum can be attacked generally or in respect of a particular document either before the hearing officer or if necessary on judicial review, if it can be demonstrated that in the particular circumstances someone's constitutional right is about to be violated.[20] Objections could also be raised then as to the relevance of a particular document to the legitimate purposes of the inquiry.

Digitized by Google

Section 231.4 under which this inquiry is held guarantees both the witness and the "target" of the inquiry the right to be "represented" by counsel save in exceptional circumstances. Notwithstanding the suggestions of counsel for the appellants, I can find no authority for the proposition that counsel representing a witness or a target would not be allowed to raise objections as to relevance or constitutionality in respect of a particular subpoena or a particular document. The natural meaning of "represented" must include that right.

All of these factors when taken together lead me to conclude, as did the learned Trial Judge, that the holding of an inquiry and the issuing of subpoenas duces tecum cannot per se be seen as inevitably leading to an unreasonable seizure within the meaning of section 8 so as to justify its termination at this point.

Remedies

The learned Trial Judge emphasized that the mere establishment of the inquiry and the issue of a subpoena to Noble did not violate section 8. On the appeal the appellants, who had asked in their original relief for a declaration that section 231.4 is invalid or in the alternative that this particular inquiry is invalid, criticized the learned Trial Judge for deciding only the last question. I think it is obvious from his judgment that he considered there to be no basis for declaring the whole section to be invalid. With this I agree.

This is not a case such as Hunter or Baron where the section can have little or no valid application because it lacks an essential ingredient. The gravamen of the appellants' complaint is that in certain circumstances an inquiry established under this section, or a particular subpoena issued by such an inquiry, or the production of a particular document, or the use in subsequent proceedings of evidence gleaned by the inquiry, could violate someone's constitutional rights under sections 7 or 8 of the Charter. The same could be said of an inquiry established under the federal Inquiries Act[21] and the various comparable provincial statutes which authorize in the broadest possible terms the establishment of commissions of inquiry with powers of subpoena, etc. There have been many instances of successful attacks on particular terms of reference of such commissions or on particular actions or findings of commissioners, some relating to constitutional rights similar to those in question here. But just because the Inquiries Act could on occasion be used for unconstitutional purposes, this would not justify a declaration of its total invalidity. Nor in my view do theoretical and potential invalid uses or consequences of the use of section 231.4 justify a declaration as to its invalidity.

Nothing has as yet happened in this particular inquiry to justify a declaration of its invalidity.

It is true that the terms of reference of the inquiry are very broad and, I think, unnecessarily so. They authorize an inquiry . . . into the financial affairs of the said Angelo Del Zotto, for the taxation years 1979 to 1985 inclusive.

But it is surely open to Noble or Del Zotto to insist that these terms be confined in their application to the scope of subsection 231.4(1) which authorizes an inquiry 231.4 (1) . . . relat[ing] to the administration or enforcement of this Act.

Therefore personal documents having nothing to do with the collection of income tax need not be produced. As noted earlier, objections can be taken before the hearing officer and if necessary judicial review may be sought, but all at the time the problem actually arises. At most, a particular subpoena could be attacked instead of waiting to dispute specific documents. But the appellants have not sought this remedy.

As for concerns about self-incrimination, these too should be raised and dealt with before the inquiry or even later if the Crown seeks to use self-incriminating evidence or documents, or evidence derived therefrom, at a subsequent trial. As was held in R. v. S. (R.J.),[22] a witness may be compelled to testify in a trial of another for a crime in which the witness may be implicated, but may object later in his own trial to any evidence derived from his own testimony in the first trial. That is, the time for a witness to object is when the Crown seeks to use his own evidence against him. The same may be true where it is sought to use evidence against an accused at trial derived from compelled evidence from his wife at an earlier proceeding.[23] But that is because she, like the accused, would not be a compellable witness at the trial. This means that the time for raising the objection is not at the inquiry in this case, but at any subsequent trial of Del Zotto. Again, as held by the Supreme Court in British Columbia Securities Commission v. Branch[24] if a person is called at an inquiry (the first proceeding) he can successfully object to testify if the predominant purpose is to obtain evidence to incriminate him. In the present case that predominant purpose in respect of Del Zotto has been admitted. But Del Zotto has not been called yet and may never be called.

Digitized by Google

In short if there are circumstances in which the use of this inquiry power, or the subsequent use of evidence derived from it, may impinge on constitutional rights there will be opportunities to assert those rights at the time when an intrusion is imminent and demonstrable. So far the Court has only been treated to hypothetical possibilities.

For these reasons I am of the view that the appeal should be dismissed and that no declaration should be made at this time of invalidity of either the Act or the inquiry.

The following are the reasons for judgment rendered in English by MacGuigan J.A.: This case involves a constitutional challenge to the "inquiry provision," section 231.4 of the Income Tax Act , R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, as amended (the Act), on the basis of sections 7 and 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter).

I

The appellant Del Zotto fell under suspicion of tax evasion following a 1985 audit by the Audit Branch of Revenue Canada. In 1986 an investigation into his financial affairs was begun by the Special Investigations Branch (SI) of Revenue Canada, which led in turn to the initiation of an inquiry into his financial affairs for the years 1979 through 1985, authorized by section 231.4, which reads as follows:

231.4 (1) The Minister may, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, authorize any person, whether or not he is an officer of the Department of National Revenue, to make such inquiry as he may deem necessary with reference to anything relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act.

(2) Where the Minister, pursuant to subsection (1), authorizes a person to make an inquiry, the Minister shall forthwith apply to the Tax Court of Canada for an order appointing a hearing officer before whom the inquiry will be held.

(3) For the purposes of an inquiry authorized under subsection (1), a hearing officer appointed under subsection (2) in relation thereto has all the powers conferred on a commissioner by sections 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act and that may be conferred on a commissioner under section 11 thereof.

(4) A hearing officer appointed under subsection (2) in relation to an inquiry shall exercise the powers conferred on a commissioner by section 4 of the Inquiries Act in relation to such persons as the person authorized to make the inquiry considers appropriate for the conduct thereof but the hearing officer shall not exercise the power to punish any person unless, on application by the hearing officer, a judge of a superior or county court certifies that the power may be exercised in the matter disclosed in the application and the applicant has given to the person in respect of whom he proposes to exercise the power 24 hours notice of the hearing of the application or such shorter notice as the judge considers reasonable.

(5) Any person who gives evidence in an inquiry authorized under subsection (1) is entitled to be represented by counsel, and, on request made by him to the Minister, to receive a transcript of the evidence given by him.

Digitized by Google

(6) Any person whose affairs are investigated in the course of an inquiry authorized under subsection (1) is entitled to be present and to be represented by counsel throughout the inquiry unless the hearing officer appointed under subsection (2) in relation to the inquiry, on application by the Minister or a person giving evidence, orders otherwise in relation to the whole or any part of the inquiry on the ground that the presence of the person and his counsel, or either of them, would be prejudicial to the effective conduct of the inquiry.
Pursuant to subsection 231.4(3) above, a hearing officer appointed to conduct an inquiry has all the powers conferred on a commissioner by sections 4 and 5 of the Inquiries Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-11, which state:
4. The commissioners have the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to (a) give evidence, orally or in writing, and on oath or, if they are persons entitled to affirm in civil matters on solemn affirmation; and
(b) produce such documents and things as the commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine.
5. The commissioners have the same power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.
The first predecessor provision of section 231.4 was enacted in 1917 but allowed inquiries only into "the income of any taxpayer": The Income War Tax Act, 1917 , S.C. 1917, c. 28, subsection 8(3). In 1948 that wording was changed to allow inquiries "relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act: The Income Tax Act , S.C. 1948, c. 52, subsection 115(4). The inquiry provision was further amended by providing for the inclusion of certain procedural protections for the taxpayer, such as the appointment of an independent hearing officer: S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, subsections 231(7), 231(8), 231(12), 231(13), 231(14), 231(15). Section 239 of the Act is also relevant, since it is common ground that the inquiry provision is used for the investigation of tax evasion offences under that provision, which reads as follows:
239. (1) Every person who has
(a) made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act or a regulation,
(b) to evade payment of a tax imposed by this Act, destroyed, altered, mutilated, secreted or otherwise disposed of the records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(c) made, or assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive entries, or omitted, or assented to or acquiesced in the omission, to enter a material particular, in records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade, compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act, or (e) conspired with any person to commit an offence described by paragraphs (a) to (d), is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to
(f) a fine of not less than 50%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or
(g) both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.
(2) Every person who is charged with an offence described in subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted on indictment and, if convicted is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to (a) a fine of not less than 100%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was

Digitized by Google

sought to be evaded; and
(b) imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years.
On April 19, 1991, at a meeting with officials of SI, counsel for the appellant Del Zotto was advised that Revenue Canada proposed to charge him with income tax evasion under paragraphs 239(1)(a) and (d) of the Act (Case on Appeal, Vol. XV, at page 2495). The amount of federal taxes sought to be evaded was stated to be $1,669,062 (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1058).
Sections 7 and 8 of the Charter are as follows:
7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.
8. Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.
In the latter part of 1992 National Revenue appointed an inquiry officer and obtained the appointment of a hearing officer from the Chief Judge of the Tax Court. The appellant Del Zotto was advised on 21 April 1993 that an inquiry would be made into his financial affairs for the taxation years 1979 to 1985 inclusive and that the calling of evidence would begin on 6 May 1993 (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1089). The appellant Del Zotto was not himself initially called as a witness, though the letter of 30 September 1992 from the Assistant Deputy Minister to the Deputy Minister of the Department requesting the setting up of the commission of inquiry admitted that "it is a possibility that Angelo Del Zotto may also be subpoenaed before the Inquiry" (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1059). The witness subpoenaed to appear on 6 May was the appellant Noble, who was summoned to appear with all documents in his possession or control relating to the financial affairs of the appellant Del Zotto for the taxation years 1979 to 1985 inclusive, including documents relating to five named corporations (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at pages 1090-1091).
On 6 May counsel for both appellants requested an adjournment to allow the inquiry's powers to be tested by this Court (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1044 ff). The adjournment was granted the next day.
The section 28 challenge brought before this Court was to the appointment of the hearing officer to preside over the inquiry. This Court held, following Guay v. Lafleur, 1964 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1965] S.C.R. 12, that the inquiry was a purely administrative matter which can neither decide nor adjudicate upon anything, and that the application for judicial review had therefore to be dismissed: [Del Zotto v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue"M.N.R.), [1993] F.C.J. No. 885 (C.A.) (QL)]. However, the Court (per Hugessen J.A.) added (at page 6 (QL)):
In his argument counsel for the applicant expressly declined to make any Charter-based attack on section 231.4. In light of the fate suffered by adjacent and related sections of the Income Tax Act [he referred to Baron v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 154 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416; and to Minister of National Revenue v. Kruger Inc., [1984] 2 F.C. 535], such an attack cries out to be made.
It is that attack which is before us in the case at bar, following a decision on the merits by the Trial Division on 24 January 1997 [1997 CanLII 6325 (FC), [1997] 2 F.C. 428].
II
What is the character of an investigation launched by SI?
First, it should be noted that the objective of Special Investigations is "to plan and administer criminal investigation programs": Taxation Operations Manual (T.O.M.) of Revenue Canada, subsection 1111(1), Case on Appeal, Vol. VIII, at page 1252. Moreover, "only cases with a prosecution potential will be selected for full-scale investigation": T.O.M., subsection 1112(3), Case on Appeal, Vol. VIII, at page 1253.
In the case at bar, on 26 January 1986 the Audit Department made a T-124 fraud referral concerning the appellant Del Zotto to SI. On 24 April SI formally decided to keep the Del

Digitized by Google

Zotto matter for preliminary investigation and opened a file. A full-scale investigation was decided on in 1989.

I have already related the setting up of the inquiry in 1992. A section 231.4 inquiry is an investigative tool in the criminal process. In the words of T.O.M. (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1172):

11(12)01 INQUIRIES UNDER SECTION 231.4 OF
THE INCOME TAX ACT

11(12)1.1 When Use is Justified

(1) An Inquiry may be conducted as a means of strengthening our case in either of two areas of the investigation.

(2) Firstly, witnesses whose evidence is material to our case in an anticipated prosecution are examined under oath to determine what they will say in Court. Even then, the story might later be varied but, should any witness give contradictory evidence from that given under the Inquiry, this can be put to the witness. Unless a justifiable reason can be given for the change in his sworn testimony, it can leave him open to a charge of perjury. In any event, it definitely weakens the value of his testimony, especially concerning any statements he might make that would otherwise be damaging to the Crown's case. The evidence is admissible but has little probative value.

(3) Secondly, the following types of witness may be questioned under oath to draw out facts not otherwise obtainable:

(A) Witnesses known to have information material to the case, who have not and will not divulge it in voluntary interview or interrogation, but who are believed to be of the type that, if questioned under oath, will tell the truth.

(B) Witnesses"perhaps friendly to the tax evader"who will not reveal what they know in an interview but who infer or admit that, if they were put under oath, they would tell the truth.

(C) Witnesses who are impartial but who are most reluctant to become involved.

(D) Witnesses whose evidence is required to fill in major gaps in the documentary evidence available.

(4) Witnesses appearing in an Inquiry will normally have been interviewed at an earlier stage in the investigation, but there is no point in doggedly questioning, under oath, a subject who has lied persistently in voluntary interview. He is no doubt lying because he feels his own best interests are served by so doing and he can be expected to lie under oath just as readily as he would in other circumstances.

11(12)1.2 Timing

(1) An Inquiry is not normally implemented until the more conventional methods of investigation have been exhausted.

There can be no doubt from reading the Department's own understanding of what an inquiry is about that it can be thought of only in a criminal investigatory context: note, for instance, the references to "an anticipated prosecution," "perjury," and "the tax evader". Departmental witness McCarney admitted that, absent settlement, a prosecution always followed an inquiry (Case on Appeal, Vol. II, at page 354). For good measure, T.O.M. acknowledged that "An Inquiry is never irrevocably closed; in practice, its proceedings are simply adjourned sine die" (Case on Appeal, Vol. VII, at page 1176).

National Revenue's own interpretation of its mandate cannot, of course, be taken as definitive of the purpose of section 231.4. It does, however, reveal its breadth, and, more important, its effects on a taxpayer.

It can hardly be a surprise that lower courts have consistently held that, when a case is put in the hands of SI, even if the statute is otherwise a regulatory one, the case at that moment becomes a criminal investigation: R. v. Norway Insulation Inc. (1995), 28 O.R. (3d) 432 (Gen.

Digitized by Google

Div.); R. v. Harris, R. (1995), 95 DTC 5653 (B.C.S.C.); Yang v. R. 1996 CanLII 8230 (ON SC), (1996), 31 O.R. (3d) 66 (Gen. Div.); R. v. Jarvis, [1997] A.J. No. 214 (Alta. Prov. Ct.) (QL), decided 25 February 1997; R. v. Soviak, [1997] O.J. No. 1215 (Prov. Div.) (QL), decided 24 March 1997. Typical is the decision of LaForme J. in Yang, which dealt with the seizure of tobacco under the Tobacco Tax Act [R.S.O. 1990, c. T.10]. After stating that in his view the provisions of the Act in question were quasi-criminal law, LaForme went on to add (at page 76):

Even if I am wrong in my general comments respecting the potential nature of the provisions, namely s. 24 of the Tobacco Tax Act, Special Investigations transformed the purpose of the provisions from merely regulatory to quasi-criminal when it relied on the section to undertake a full-scale investigation for purposes of laying charges against targeted individuals and businesses.

In a case such as that at bar, the conclusion as to the existence of a criminal investigation must be a fortiori.

I believe the words of Hugessen J.A. for this Court, relating to a neighbouring provision of the Act in Baron v. Canada, reflex, [1991] 1 F.C. 688, at pages 693-694, which the Supreme Court did not disagree with in arriving at the same conclusion, are highly persuasive:

As a preliminary matter, it is as well to make clear at the outset that in my opinion we are dealing with procedures that are criminal in their nature. It is not necessary at this stage to characterize in constitutional terms the source of Parliament's legislative power, a question on which the Supreme Court has recently divided and which awaits a definitive resolution by a majority of the members of that Court (see Knox Contracting Ltd. v. Canada, 1990 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 338).

It is enough simply to read the section under attack and its repeated reference to "offence" to realize that the section is concerned with the detection and prosecution of crime, albeit a limited category of crime, namely offences under the Income Tax Act . This makes the legislation different in kind from the type of administrative enforcement mechanisms found in adjacent sections of the Income Tax Act such as were upheld by the Supreme Court in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627.

The requirements of a self-reporting and self-assessing income tax system may justify an easing of Charter [Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, being Part I of the Constitution Act 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act, 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]] standards where the primary purpose of a search is simply to ensure that taxes are paid as and when due. Where as here, however, we are dealing with provisions whose stated aim is the discovery and preservation of evidence "for the purpose of a criminal proceeding" nothing less than the full panoply of Charter protection is appropriate.

It is true, as La Forest J. has pointed out in Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425, at pages 515-516, that one cannot conclude from the sanctions alone, that a particular provision is criminal or regulatory,[25] and that the Supreme Court held in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, that a provision of the Act was regulatory in nature, though obviously it was of a different frame of mind on the appeal from this Court's decision in Baron v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 154 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416, where it held that the same provision violated section 8 of the Charter.

In Baron, Sopinka J. held for a unanimous Court that what is ultimately important are not labels but the values at stake in a particular context. The Court had held in McKinlay Transport, supra, that in the context of a mere income tax audit, the Income Tax Act was a regulatory statute, and no Charter issue was raised by compulsion to produce information and documents. Sopinka J. distinguished that case as involving merely the effective monitoring of compliance with the Act. In Baron "[t]he purpose of the search is to provide evidence to be used in the prosecution of ITA offences" (at page 444).

Digitized by Google

Justice Sopinka put the result in Baron (striking down the provision of the Act as unconstitutional) on two grounds (at page 445):
Given the intrusive nature of searches and the corresponding purpose of such a search to gather evidence for the prosecution of a taxpayer, I see no reason for a radical departure from the guidelines and principles expressed in Hunter [v. Southam].
The intrusive nature of the power to search premises in Baron is, of course, not matched by the subpoena duces tecum in the case at bar, but it seems to me that the equally important factor of gathering information for the prosecution of a taxpayer is present with greater force in this case. Later, Sopinka J. disapproved of fishing expeditions by the state, and went on to say (at page 448):
This Court established in Hunter that a standard of credibly based probability rather than mere suspicion should be applied in determining when an individual's interest in privacy is subordinate to the needs of law enforcement.
We have it from the mouth of National Revenue that such a standard was intended to be short-circuited in the case at bar.
In the words of the respondent's witness McCarney, who drafted the memorandum to the Deputy Minister recommending that an inquiry be established, "In my personal opinion, from my vantage point at Head Office, I do not think we had grounds for a search warrant on Del Zotto" (Case on Appeal, Vol. II, at pages 224-225). In other words, the Department lacked reasonable and probable cause for a proper criminal investigation, and moved to an inquiry as a back-door alternative, since that procedure did not require any showing of reasonable and probable cause.
I can conclude only that an inquiry under section 231.4 is inherently oriented towards criminal prosecution, based not on the labels used but on what is really in question in such a proceeding, in other words, on the values of criminality or innocence in play. I regard such a conclusion as a fortiori in the case at bar.
III
The right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures under section 8 of the Charter has evolved into a right to the reasonable security of one's privacy.
The locus classicus for section 8 law is Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, where Dickson J. (as he then was) held for the Court that section 8 must be broadly and liberally construed to effect its purpose, which is to secure a person's right to a reasonable expectation of privacy against governmental encroachments. In the absence of exigent circumstances, section 8 requires prior authorization by a judicial officer as a precondition to a criminal-law seizure, on a standard of reasonable and probable grounds both as to the commission of an offence and as to the evidence to be afforded by the search. In analyzing section 8, Dickson J. said for the Court (at page 158), "There is, further, nothing in the language of the section to restrict it to the protection of property or to associate it with the law of trespass."
In R. v. Dyment, 1988 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 417, La Forest J. (with whom Dickson C.J. concurred), penned concurring reasons for decision which put a great deal of emphasis on privacy under section 8 (at pages 427-428):
The foregoing approach is altogether fitting for a constitutional document enshrined at the time when, Westin tells us, society has come to realize that privacy is at the heart of liberty in a modern state; see Alan F. Westin, Privacy and Freedom (1970), pp. 349-50. Grounded in man's physical and moral autonomy, privacy is essential for the well-being of the individual. For this reason alone, it is worthy of constitutional protection, but it also has profound significance for the public order. The restraints imposed on government to pry into the lives of the citizen go to the essence of a democratic state.

Digitized by Google

Claims to privacy must, of course, be balanced against other societal needs, and in particular law enforcement, and that is what s. 8 intended to achieve.
Justice La Forest continued [at pages 429-430]:
Finally, there is privacy in relation to information. This too is based on the notion of the dignity and integrity of the individual. As the Task Force [on Privacy and Computers, Information Canada, 1972] put it (p. 13): "This notion of privacy derives from the assumption that all information about a person is in a fundamental way his own, for him to communicate or retain for himself as he sees fit." In modern society, especially, retention of information about oneself is extremely important. We may, for one reason or another, wish or be compelled to reveal such information, but situations abound where the reasonable expectations of the individual that the information shall remain confidential to the persons to whom, and restricted to the purposes for which it is divulged, must be protected. Governments at all levels have in recent years recognized this and have devised rules and regulations to restrict the uses of information collected by them to those for which it was obtained; see, for example, the Privacy Act, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 111.
One further general point must be made, and that is that if the privacy of the individual is to be protected, we cannot afford to wait to vindicate it only after it has been violated. This is inherent in the notion of being secure against unreasonable searches and seizures. Invasions of privacy must be prevented, and where privacy is outweighed by other societal claims, there must be clear rules setting forth the conditions in which it can be violated. This is especially true of law enforcement, which involves the freedom of the subject.
In R. v. Plant, 1993 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 281, at pages 292-293, Sopinka J. (for 6 of 7 members of the Court) also fastened on the significance of informational privacy under section 8:
Some indication of the parameters of the protection afforded by s. 8 with respect to informational privacy can be derived from the following passage from the reasons of La Forest J. in Dyment, supra, at pp. 429-30, commenting on the Report of the Task Force on Privacy and Computers:
In modern society, especially, retention of information about oneself is extremely important. We may, for one reason or another, wish or be compelled to reveal such information, but situations abound where the reasonable expectations of the individual that the information shall remain confidential to the persons to whom, and restricted to the purposes for which it is divulged, must be protected.
Consideration of such factors as the nature of the information itself, the nature of the relationship between the party releasing the information and the party claiming its confidentiality, the place where the information was obtained, the manner in which it was obtained and the seriousness of the crime being investigated allow for a balancing of the societal interests in protecting individual dignity, integrity and autonomy with effective law enforcement. It is, then, necessary to apply this contextual approach to the facts of the case at bar.
The United States Supreme Court has limited application of the Fourth Amendment (the right against unreasonable search and seizure) protection afforded by the United States Constitution to situations in which the information sought by state authorities is personal and confidential in nature: United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976). That case determined that the accused's cheques, subpoenaed for evidence from a commercial bank, were not subject to Fourth Amendment protection. While I do not wish to be taken as adopting the position that commercial records such as cancelled cheques are not subject to s. 8 protection, I do agree with that aspect of the Miller decision which would suggest that in order for constitutional protection to be extended, the information seized must be of a "personal and confidential" nature. In fostering the underlying values of dignity, integrity and autonomy, it is fitting that s. 8 of the Charter should seek to protect a biographical core of personal information which individuals in a free and democratic society would wish to maintain and control from dissemination to the state. This would include information which tends to reveal intimate details of the lifestyle and personal choices of the individual.

Digitized by Google

In Plant the police action was merely to check the electrical consumption at the address in question, and this was held to reveal very little about the personal lifestyle or private decisions of the occupant. It is significant, however, that Justice Sopinka specifically reserved the Court's decision as to an accused's cheques subpoenaed for evidence from a commercial bank. (This issue surfaced recently in this Court in Schreiber v. Canada (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 6333 (FCA), [1997] 2 F.C. 176, to which I shall return in a moment.)

Subsequently in R. v. Colarusso, 1994 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 20, at page 60, La Forest J., writing for the majority of the Court, said:

This really goes to the underlying reason for the protection afforded by s. 8; one must not overemphasize the purely physical aspects of the seizure. In both Hunter and Dyment, the Court emphasized that what is protected by s. 8 is people, not places or things. The principal right protected by s. 8 is individual privacy, and the provision must be purposively applied to that end.

He then proceeded to quote the paragraph above relating to privacy in relation to information.

This Court's most recent consideration of section 8 occurred in Schreiber, supra, where a majority held that the Canadian standard for the issuance of a search warrant was required to be satisfied for a letter of request to a foreign country to search and seize a citizen/resident's banking documents and records. Linden J.A. rested this holding squarely on Hunter (at page 235):

On the facts in Hunter, Dickson J. held that the provision of the statute authorizing certain broad-ranging searches was inconsistent with section 8 of the Charter. He did this on the basis that the authorization did not have to be granted by an impartial and judicial arbiter and because authorization did not depend on evidence of reasonable and probable grounds, established upon oath, to believe that an offence had been committed.

He emphasized the guarantee of "security" in section 8. Stone J.A. in dissent took a different point of view on this (at pages 207-208):

It would be wrong, in my view, to emphasize the word "secure" at the expense of the remaining language of section 8, when that section guarantees the right to be secure against "unreasonable search and seizure" by Canadian state actors. In the present case, as I understand the facts, the Canadian authorities neither possessed the ability to carry out a search or seizure in Switzerland nor requested that the Swiss authorities should do so as their agents.

This difference of opinion is not relevant to the case at bar.

As I have already suggested, I believe the Trial Judge, was misled by his reliance on Thomson. The Supreme Court had no difficulty in unanimously distinguishing Thomson as well as McKinlay in Baron. Whether one conceives of the Act as regulatory legislation whose application is not in all instances governed by that fact, or, as seems better to me, as legislation with a regulatory side (audit and payment) and a criminal investigatory side, makes no difference to the realism of the judicial scrutiny as to what is really underway. In the opinion of the Court in Baron what mattered was the intrusive nature of the search in question and the gathering of evidence for the prosecution of the taxpayer.

I am strengthened in my approach by the conclusions advanced by the Supreme Court in Starr v. Houlden, 1990 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1366. That case involved a commission of inquiry pursuant to the Ontario Public Inquiries Act [R.S.O. 1980, c. 411] (with powers similar to those under the federal Inquiries Act and under section 231.4 of the Income Tax Act) to inquire into the facts surrounding the relationships between Patty Starr and other persons. The issue that fell for decision by the Supreme Court was whether such a provincial inquiry was ultra vires the province as an infringement of the federal criminal law power.

Digitized by Google

In the course of his reasons for decision Lamer J. (as he then was) wrote for six of seven judges (at pages 1407-1409):

Second, it is not necessary for the Commissioner to make findings of guilt in the true sense of the word for the inquiry to be ultra vires the province. It suffices if the inquiry is in effect a substitute police investigation and preliminary inquiry into a specific allegation of criminal conduct by named, private citizens. In my view, the investigation the Commissioner is asked to undertake, and the findings of fact he will make as a result of his investigation, place him in a similar position as a judge conducting a preliminary inquiry under s. 535 of the Criminal Code.

. . .

In essence the inquiry is entering into the preliminary stages of the judicial criminal process by taking evidence, determining its sufficiency and ultimately deciding whether a prima facie case exists . . . .

The foregoing description is very like what is proposed by the respondents in the case at bar: a substitute police investigation into a specific allegation of criminal conduct, viz., the making of false or deceptive statements in a tax return under paragraph 239(1)(a) of the Act, by a named private citizen. It does not seem to be forbidden to the inquiry even to pass over to being a preliminary inquiry, in which the hearing officer would determine the sufficiency of the evidence, and ultimately decide whether a prima facie case exists, though I am aware of no duty on the hearing officer to go so far.

Because of the different circumstances of Starr, the sanction there was quite different, the unconstitutionality of the provincial action as transgressing on criminal law, from what is needed in the case at bar. But from Justice Lamer's embrace of the New Zealand Court of Appeal decision in Cock v. Attorney-General (1909), 28 N.Z.L.R. 405, at page 425, where an inquiry was held to be "virtually a trial for the offence without the protection that the law gives to accused persons," it is obvious that the vice of a substitute police investigation has a broader meaning for him. (In New Zealand, with no issues of federalism, the governmental excess led to a writ of prohibition at common law.)

The Supreme Court's decision in British Columbia Securities Commission v. Branch, 1995 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 3, which was particularly urged on us by the respondents, allowed company officers to be required to testify and to produce documents, on a holding that the British Columbia Securities Act [S.B.C. 1985, c. 83] is regulatory in nature and indeed forms part of a much larger framework which regulates the securities industry throughout Canada. The primary goal of securities legislation was said to be the protection of the investor, the secondary goals capital market efficiency and ensuring public confidence in the system. Given this background, it was not surprising that the Court found a low expectation of privacy. In particular, Sopinka and Iacobucci JJ. held for the Court that "[d]ocuments produced in the course of a business which is regulated have a lesser privacy right attaching to them than do documents that are, strictly speaking, personal" (at page 41, emphasis added). Such business records, dedicated to a special regulated purpose, are a long way from the general records of a taxpayer in the course of administering his/her affairs. These general records cannot be swept into the kind of narrow category appropriate under securities legislation.

The Trial Judge acknowledged that "it is not in dispute that subsection 231.4(3) provides for warrantless seizures contrary to the Hunter criteria" (at page 462). He was correct, I believe, in his conclusion that "[a] full weighing of all the circumstances is required" (at page 463). He does not, however, in my view give adequate weight to the focussed criminal investigation in the case at bar, and was unduly influenced by Thomson in relation to the lesser form of intrusion and the low degree of expectation of privacy for business affairs which he analyzed to exist.

Digitized by Google

Is it enough for violation of section 8 if the proposed search is less intrusive than that in Hunter and Baron, involving rather an order to appear for examination under oath with documents (under a subpoena duces tecum)? I believe it is, under the principle asserted by Dickson J. in Hunter that section 8 confers an entitlement to a reasonable expectation of privacy (at page 159). Moreover, as Linden J.A. said of Hunter in Schreiber (at page 235), "the existence of an actual illegal search conducted under the statute was apparently not of importance to the holding of unconstitutionality."

The whole inquiry is aimed at the financial affairs of the appellant Del Zotto over a six-year period. Although he is not at present under subpoena, there is a possibility that he will be summoned himself. On the facts of this case, it is not enough to wait for the appellant Del Zotto to be subpoenaed. His right to a reasonable expectation of privacy is in peril from the time the inquiry begins.

As I see it, the section 231.4 process is inherently oriented towards criminal prosecution, a conclusion that is particularly obvious in the present case, where the appellant Del Zotto is not only subject to being summoned but has even been told under what paragraphs of subsection 239(1) he will eventually be prosecuted. In respect of its inherent orientation, section 231.4 is like the inquiry in Starr, and not at all like the normal commission inquiry under the Inquiries Act, which has a general public purpose.

Of course, a trigger is needed for the invocation of section 8 of the Charter. Section 8 does not apply in the absence of a search or seizure. In my view, given the inherent orientation of section 231.4, any threatened seizure is sufficient to bring section 8 into play.

Since section 8 protects the privacy rights of people, not places, the appellant Del Zotto has a reasonable expectation of privacy over documents and information held by other people at different places. Anything to do with his financial affairs over six years may include many items of a very personal or private nature such as personal expenditures (e.g. gifts to friends and relatives, reading materials), donations (e.g. to churches, charities or political parties), personal tastes (e.g. food, clothes), his relationship with family members (what he buys for them, what they give to him), and so on. Documents and information concerning his financial affairs over six years, without limitation, could reveal incredibly intimate and personal details about his preferences, habits, opinions, hopes and activities. The same is true for witnesses who have knowledge of his financial affairs during 1979-1985"their own personal preferences may become relevant to the terms of reference of the inquiry. Simply put, as the appellants emphasized, an investigation into all cash received and all cash spent is necessarily, in today's modern world, a window into most of a person's private life.

Although, as I have noted, Sopinka J. withheld judgment in Plant as to cheques subpoenaed for evidence, the matter has now been settled in this Court by Schreiber where Linden J.A. held (at page 232):

In contrast, the bank records sought in the letter of request, unlike electricity consumption records, reveal important and personal details about an individual. The heightened privacy interest in banking records was described by Puddester J. in R. v. Eddy (T.) as a "substantially greater expectation of privacy relating to the records of an individual's personal financial position, and the pattern of the individual's operating on his or her bank account" (1994 CanLII 5274 (NL SCTD), (1994), 119 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 91 (S.C.T.D.), at p. 126). Puddester J. found in that case that warrantless inquiries by the police at a bank regarding the identity of a bankbook holder and about a major transaction which took place on that account did interfere with a reasonable expectation of privacy.

Digitized by Google

The combination of forced documentary production and forced oral testimony can be particularly intrusive, if an invoice leads to questions about the activity which gave rise to the invoice and all the context surrounding it. As a result, in the words of Linden J.A. in Schreiber, "the right to privacy is protected in advance of any physical search, that is, as soon as any government action threatens the security of the individual's privacy interest" (at page 218).

None of this is to say that National Revenue has no right to conduct a criminal investigation into the financial affairs of Del Zotto or anyone else. It is rather to say that it has no special right to do so merely by setting up an inquiry under section 231.4, a procedure which establishes no safeguards for the taxpayer. The hearing officer appointed is not a judicial officer, nor are there any rules for the inquiry, except such guidance (see T.O.M.) as suits the Crown. Although the taxpayer is entitled to counsel, "unless the hearing officer . . . orders otherwise," there is some doubt whether in such an administrative proceeding the counsel would be entitled to question witnesses. As the Supreme Court held in Guay v. Lafleur , supra, and this Court reiterated in the judicial review hearing in this case, such an inquiry is a purely administrative one. In my opinion what is rather required for validity is a judicial inquiry based upon reasonable and probable cause, the normal standard for criminal investigation.

Since the respondent advanced no justification under section 1 of the Charter, I am of the view that section 231.4 of the Act violates section 8 of the Charter, and that striking the provision down under subsection 52(1) of the Constitutional Act, 1982 [Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]] is an appropriate remedy. Reading the statute down would have been a much simpler matter in Baron than here, but the Court was not disposed to do so. I am equally disinclined. As the section 231.4 process is in my opinion vitiated from the outset, with the issuance of a subpoena duces tecum to the appellant Noble, it is unnecessary to await further actual infringements.

IV

Since I have resolved the matter under section 8 of the Charter, I find no need to deal with the arguments advanced under section 7.

I would allow the appeal with costs here and below, set aside the decision of the Trial Division, and declare that section 231.4 of the Income Tax Act and subpoenas issued under it are of no force or effect under subsection 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Henry D.J.: I agree.

[1] 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145.

[2] Appellants' factum, at para. 150.

[3] Id., at para. 50.

[4] See e.g. Mortimer, J. Rumpole and the Golden Thread (N.Y.: Penguin, 1983), at pp. 55-96, passim.

[5] Supra, note 1.

[6] Guay v. Lafleur, 1964 CanLII 45 (SCC), [1965] S.C.R. 12. See also Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425, at p. 457 where Wilson J. stated that a hearing under s. 17 of the Combines Investigation Act [R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23] set up specifically to determine if there was evidence that certain named parties had committed an offence "does not determine any rights or impose any liabilities".

[7] 1990 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1366.

[8] Supra, note 6.

[9] 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627.

[10] Supra, note 1.

[11] 1993 CanLII 154 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416.

Digitized by Google

[12] Id., at pp. 444-445.
[13] R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23.
[14] Supra, note 6, at p. 510.
[15] Id, at pp. 515-516.
[16] McKinlay, supra, note 9, at p. 650.
[17] Id., at p. 648.
[18] Supra, note 6, at p. 569.
[19] See e.g. McKinlay, supra, note 9, at pp. 649-650; Thomson, supra, note 6, at pp. 522, 594.
[20] See e.g. Thomson, supra, at pp. 532, 534-535, 594-595 and 613.
[21] R.S.C., 1985, c. I-11.
[22] 1995 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1995] 1 S.C.R. 451. See also Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), 1995 CanLII 86 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 97, at pp. 152-153.
[23] R. v. Kabbebe, [1997] A.Q. No. 273 (Que. C.A.).
[24] 1995 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 3.
[25] With respect to La Forest J's comparison of the Combines Investigations Act and the Income Tax Act as to sanctions, I respectfully believe that the learned Trial Judge [at p. 467] overextended the comparison when he stated that the "explicit link between sanctions . . . tends to reinforce the application of Thomson to the present case." In my view the comparison does not have any significance beyond sanctions.
La Forest J. did not see the Combines Investigation Act as dealing with "real crimes" (at p. 510), but with "the preservation of the competitive conditions which are crucial to the operation of a free market economy" (at p. 510), "far removed from what is the typical concern of the criminal law system, i.e. the underlining (of) crucial social values, (emphasis added) where "(t)he sort of things prohibited"acts of violence, dishonesty and so on"are acts violating common sense standards of humanity' which we regard as meriting disapprobation and punishment" (at p. 509). But, of course, the sanctions provision (viz. s. 239) relating to s. 234.1 deals primarily with fraud and dishonesty, the heartland of criminal behaviour for La Forest J.

Del Zotto v. Canada, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 3
Her Majesty The Queen in right of Canada,
the Minister of National Revenue and John Edward Thompson Appellants
v.
Angelo Del Zotto and Herbert B. Noble Respondents
and
The Attorney General for Ontario, the Attorney General of Quebec and the Attorney General for Alberta Interveners
Indexed as: Del Zotto v. Canada
File No.: 26174.
1999: January 20; 1999: January 21.
Present: Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin, Major, Bastarache and Binnie JJ.
on appeal from the federal court of appeal Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Search and seizure -- Inquiry under Income Tax Act -- Whether s. 231.4 of Income Tax Act infringes s. 8 of Canadian Charter of

Digitized by Google

Rights and Freedoms.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Fundamental justice -- Inquiry under Income Tax Act -- Whether s. 231.4 of Income Tax Act infringes s. 7 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Taxation -- Income tax -- Inquiry -- Whether s. 231.4 of Income Tax Act constitutional -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148 [now R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)], s. 231.4 [ad. 1986, c. 6, s. 121].

APPEAL from a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal, [1997] 3 F.C. 40, 215 N.R. 184, 147 D.L.R. (4th) 457, 97 D.T.C. 5328, [1997] 3 C.T.C. 199, 46 C.R.R. (2d) 324, 116 C.C.C. (3d) 123, [1997] F.C.J. No. 795 (QL), setting aside a judgment of the Trial Division, [1997] 2 F.C. 428, 125 F.T.R. 161, 143 D.L.R. (4th) 340, 97 D.T.C. 5145, [1997] 2 C.T.C. 103, 41 C.R.R. (2d) 63, [1997] F.C.J. No. 85 (QL), dismissing the respondents' constitutional challenge of s. 231.4 of the Income Tax Act. Appeal allowed.

Ivan S. Bloom, Q.C., and Gordon S. Campbell, for the appellants.

Edward L. Greenspan, Q.C., and David Stratas, for the respondent Del Zotto.

Alan D. Gold and Mahmud Jamal, for the respondent Noble.

Michel Y. Hélie, for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario.

Monique Rousseau and Gilles Laporte, for the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec.

Robert C. Maybank and Christine L. Enns, for the intervener the Attorney General for Alberta.

The following is the judgment delivered by

//The Court//

1 The Court -- The appeal is allowed with costs throughout for the reasons given by Strayer J.A. of the Federal Court of Appeal. The judgment of the Court of Appeal is set aside and the trial judgment is restored. The constitutional questions are answered as follows:

1. Does s. 231.4 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, as amended, restrict rights guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
   The answer is no.
2. If so, can these restrictions be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
   Given the answer to the first question, the second question does not arise.
3. Does s. 231.4 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, as amended, restrict the right guaranteed by s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
   The answer is no.
4. If so, can these restrictions be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
   Given the answer to the third question, the fourth question does not arise.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitor for the appellants: The Department of Justice, Ontario Regional Office, Toronto.

Solicitors for the respondent Del Zotto: Greenspan, Nenein & White, Toronto.

Solicitors for the respondent Noble: Gold & Fuerst, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario: The Attorney General for Ontario, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec: The Department of

Digitized by Google

Justice, Sainte-Foy.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General for Alberta: The Attorney General for Alberta, Edmonton.

Spencer v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 278, Compellable Witness Notwithstanding Conflict with International Disclosure Laws

Spencer v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 278
Date: October 10, 1985
Docket: 17603
Other formats: PDF WPD

Printer Friendly

Spencer v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 278
Robert Spencer Appellant;
and
Her Majesty The Queen Respondent.
File No.: 17603.
1985: March 26; 1985: October 10.
Present: Dickson C.J. and Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard, Lamer, Wilson, Le Dain and La Forest JJ.
on appeal from the court of appeal for ontario

Evidence -- Witnesses -- Compellability -- Canadian resident refusing to disclose information received while working as bank manager in Bahamas -- Disclosure of such information constituting criminal offence under Bahamian law -- Whether witness should be compelled to testify.

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- Liberty and security of the person -- Compellability of witness -- Canadian resident refusing to disclose information received while working as bank manager in Bahamas -- Disclosure of such information constituting criminal offence under Bahamian law -- Charter of Rights inapplicable -- Infringement of liberty or security not resulting from operation of Canadian law -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 7.

Appellant, a crown witness in a prosecution against a person charged under the Income Tax Act, refused to testify about his knowledge relating to specific customers and transactions of the Royal Bank in the Bahamas because s. 10 of the Bahamian Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act, 1965, as amended, makes it a summary conviction offence punishable by a fine or a term of imprisonment to reveal such knowledge. Appellant, a resident and citizen of Canada, acquired this knowledge while he was manager of the main Freeport Branch in the Bahamas. He has not returned there since 1974. The Provincial Court ordered the appellant to testify but the order was quashed by a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario. On appeal, the Court of Appeal restored the Provincial Court judge's order.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Dickson C.J. and Beetz, McIntyre, Chouinard, Lamer, Wilson, Le Dain and La Forest JJ.: For the reasons given by the Court of Appeal, appellant is a compellable witness in Canada and must testify notwithstanding the Bahamian statute.

Furthermore, to compel appellant to testify does not constitute an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which guarantees "everyone...the right to life, liberty and security of the person...." That section has no application in the present case.

Digitized by Google

The infringement of liberty or security, if any, does not result from the operation of Canadian law, but solely from the operation of Bahamian law in the Bahamas. To allow the appellant to refuse to give evidence in the present circumstances would permit a foreign country to frustrate the administration of justice in this country in respect of a Canadian citizen in relation to what is essentially a domestic situation.

Per Estey J.: Canadian courts are not prevented from compelling a witness by the fact that giving the evidence sought may constitute a crime in another country. Our courts, however, should not lightly make orders which may result in a violation or an unnecessary circumvention of the laws or procedures of a friendly state. Here, a preferable alternative at trial would have been to grant a stay of proceedings to allow the appellant sufficient time to apply to a Bahamian court for an order permitting disclosure, which would exempt him from criminal liability under s. 10 of the Bahamian Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act, 1965. If no such order had been sought or obtained within a reasonable time, our courts would have had no option but to compel the appellant to testify.

Cases Cited

Re Application of Chase Manhattan Bank, 297 F.2d 611 (1962); Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113 (1895); Re International Bank of Washington, Supreme Court of the Bahamas, No. 38 of 1980; Re Nassau Bank and Trust Co., Supreme Court of the Bahamas, No. 95 of 1975, referred to.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act, 1965, Bahamas, No. 64 of 1965, s. 10 [am. No. 3 of 1980, s. 2].

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 7.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (1983), 145 D.L.R. (3d) 344, 2 C.C.C. (3d) 526, setting aside a judgment of Montgomery J.[1], quashing a decision of a Provincial Court judge ordering the appellant to testify. Appeal dismissed.

[1] Summarized at (1982), 8 W.C.B. 111.

John Sopinka, Q.C., and Donald Houston, for the appellant.

Michael R. Dambrot, Mark L. Jewett and Robert W. Hubbard, for the respondent.

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Beetz, McIntyre, Chouinard, Lamer, Wilson, Le Dain and La Forest JJ. was delivered by

1. LA FOREST J.--In this case the Crown seeks to compel the appellant Mr. Spencer, who is a crown witness in a prosecution against one Robert McGregor for contravening the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, as amended, to testify about his knowledge relating to specific customers and transactions of the Royal Bank in the Bahamas. Mr. Spencer, who is a resident and citizen of Canada, acquired this knowledge while he was a manager of the main Freeport Branch in the Bahamas where, subject to certain exceptions, s. 10 of the Bahamian Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act, 1965, as amended, makes it a summary conviction offence punishable by a fine not exceeding $15,000 or a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both, to reveal such knowledge.

2. His Honour Judge Parker of the Ontario Provincial Court, who heard the case, ordered that Mr. Spencer must testify notwithstanding the Bahamian statute, but this order was quashed by Montgomery J. of the Supreme Court of Ontario. On appeal to the Ontario Court of Appeal (1983), 145 D.L.R. (3d) 344, 2 C.C.C. (3d) 526, that court set aside Montgomery J.'s judgment and restored the order of Judge Parker. In its view, the public and the courts have a right to Mr. Spencer's evidence whether or not the giving of this evidence constituted a crime in the Bahamas. I agree with this conclusion substantially for the reasons given by MacKinnon, A.C.J.O. Under these circumstances it becomes unnecessary to consider whether or not the Bahamian statute had extra-territorial effect.

Digitized by Google

3. In this Court counsel for Mr. Spencer raised, though somewhat feebly, an argument not dealt with by the Ontario Court of Appeal, namely, that compelling Mr. Spencer either to breach Bahamian law or be found in contempt for not testifying constitutes an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which guarantees that everyone has a right not to be deprived of life, liberty or security of the person. This provision, he argued, afforded Mr. Spencer a protection similar to that given by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

4. This argument raises the interesting question whether the Charter applies to a result flowing from the interplay of a common law principle (as opposed to a federal or provincial statute) and a foreign statute. I do not, however, find it necessary to comment on this point because, assuming the application of the Charter to common law principles, I do not think Mr. Spencer can successfully rely on s. 7. The Canadian law in no way deprives him of his liberty or security. To the extent that these may be interfered with, it is the foreign law that does so. Nor does the operation of the Canadian law substantially put him in jeopardy of prosecution under the law of the Bahamas, where he has not returned since 1974. Only if he decides to go there will he be in jeopardy of prosecution.

5. The infringement of Mr. Spencer's liberty or security, if any, does not result from the operation of Canadian law, but solely from the operation of Bahamian law in the Bahamas. Under these circumstances the Charter has no application. To allow Mr. Spencer to refuse to give evidence in the circumstances of this case would permit a foreign country to frustrate the administration of justice in this country in respect of a Canadian citizen in relation to what is essentially a domestic situation. Indeed such an approach could have serious repercussions on the operation of Canadian law generally.

6. I would dismiss the appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

7. ESTEY J.--I am in respectful agreement with the law as expressed in the judgment of La Forest J. and the disposition there proposed. The fact that the giving of the evidence sought in this case may constitute a crime in another country cannot prevent the Canadian courts from compelling a witness to testify. However, the threat arising in a foreign jurisdiction of criminal proceedings against a Canadian resident for revealing information in a Canadian judicial proceeding is a serious consideration to be borne in mind in a proceeding such as this. Thus any course by which such a serious consequence may be avoided must be carefully considered by our courts. In these proceedings it is therefore relevant to take note of the fact that under Bahamian law an appropriate order releasing the appellant may be obtained from a Bahamian court. Section 10 of the Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act, 1965, as amended, provides:

> 10.--(1) No person who has acquired information in his capacity as
>
> (a) director, officer, employee or agent of any licensee or former licensee;
>
> ...
>
> shall, without the express or implied consent of the customer concerned, disclose to any person any such information relating to the identity, assets, liabilities, transactions, accounts of a customer of a licensee or relating to any application by any person under the provisions of this Act, as the case may be, except--
>
> ...
>
> (iii) when a licensee is lawfully required to make disclosure by any court of competent jurisdiction within The Bahamas, or under the provisions of any law of The Bahamas.

Digitized by Google

...

(3) Every person who contravenes the provisions of subsection (1) of this section shall be guilty of an offence against this Act and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifteen thousand dollars or to a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years or to both such fine and imprisonment.

8. This Bahamian legislation was passed in order to ensure that the Bahamas remained an attractive location for foreign banks and other financial institutions. According to the Bahamian Chief Justice, "the secrecy provisions is one of the pillars of this part of our economic structure, the destruction of which would lead to the collapse of the whole structure which it supports" (Re Nassau Bank and Trust Co., Supreme Court of the Bahamas, No. 95 of 1975, unreported). The provisions are of equal importance to the Canadian and other foreign companies doing business in the Bahamas. In this context, international comity dictates that Canadian courts should not lightly disregard the Bahamian provisions by requiring the appellant in this case to testify. " `Comity' in the legal sense, is neither a matter of absolute obligation, on the one hand, nor of mere courtesy and good will, upon the other. But it is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens or of other persons who are under the protection of its laws": Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113 (1895), at pp. 163-64.

9. It therefore would have been a preferable alternative at the trial level to have granted a stay of these proceedings so as to allow the appellant sufficient time to make application to a Bahamian court of competent jurisdiction for an order permitting disclosure of the evidence sought to be compelled. Such an order was asked for and granted in the case of Re International Bank of Washington, Supreme Court of the Bahamas, No. 38 of 1980, unreported, in circumstances substantially similar to those existing in this case, and in Re Application of Chase Manhattan Bank, 297 F.2d 611 (2nd Cir. 1962), a subpoena duces tecum was modified to permit application to be made to the appropriate Panamanian authorities for permission to disclose information covered by Panama's secrecy provisions. Moore J. spoke at p. 613 in the latter case of the "obligation to respect the laws of other sovereign states even though they may differ in economic and legal philosophy from our own. As we recently said ... `upon fundamental principles of international comity, our courts dedicated to the enforcement of our laws should not take such action as may cause a violation of the laws of a friendly neighbor, or, at the least, any unnecessary circumvention of its procedures'."

10. If an authorizing order had not been sought or obtained within a reasonable time, the Canadian courts would have had no option, having regard to the subject matter of these proceedings, but to proceed in the manner indicated by the Ontario Court of Appeal below.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Stikeman, Elliott, Toronto.

Solicitor for the respondent: Roger Tassé, Ottawa.

Copies - S. 231.5

231.5 (1) Where any document is seized, inspected, audited, examined or provided under any of sections 231.1 to 231.4, the person by whom it is seized, inspected, audited or examined or to whom it is provided or any officer of the Canada Revenue Agency may make, or cause to be made, one or more copies thereof and, in the case of an electronic document, make or cause to be made a print-out of the electronic document, and any document purporting to be certified by the Minister or an authorized person to be a copy of the document, or to be a print-out of an electronic document, made pursuant to this section is evidence of the nature and content of the original document and has the same probative force as the original document would have if it were proven in the ordinary way.

Digitized by Google

Compliance
(2) No person shall, physically or otherwise, interfere with, hinder or molest an official (in this subsection having the meaning assigned by subsection 241(10)) doing anything that the official is authorized to do under this Act or attempt to interfere with, hinder or molest any official doing or prevent or attempt to prevent an official from doing, anything that the official is authorized to do under this Act, and every person shall, unless the person is unable to do so, do everything that the person is required to do by or under subsection (1) or sections 231.1 to 231.4.

Foreign Based Information and Treaty Interaction
The Act clearly provides extensive powers to CRA to obtain relevant documentary material to legitimately assess a taxpayer's tax position in s. 231.6.

Definition of "foreign-based information or document" - S. 231.6
231.6 (1) For the purposes of this section, "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available or located outside Canada and that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person.

Requirement to provide foreign-based information
(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that a person resident in Canada or a nonresident person carrying on business in Canada provide any foreign-based information or document.

Notice
(3) The notice referred to in subsection 231.6(2) shall set out

- (a) a reasonable period of time of not less than 90 days for the production of the information or document;
- (b) a description of the information or document being sought; and
- (c) the consequences under subsection 231.6(8) to the person of the failure to provide the information or documents being sought within the period of time set out in the notice.

Review of foreign information requirement
(4) The person on whom a notice of a requirement is served under subsection 231.6(2) may, within 90 days after the service of the notice, apply to a judge for a review of the requirement.

Powers on review

Digitized by Google

(5) On hearing an application under subsection 231.6(4) in respect of a requirement, a judge may

(a) confirm the requirement;

(b) vary the requirement as the judge considers appropriate in the circumstances; or

(c) set aside the requirement if the judge is satisfied that the requirement is unreasonable.

Idem

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.

Time during consideration not to count

(7) The period of time between the day on which an application for review of a requirement is made pursuant to subsection 231.6(4) and the day on which the review is decided shall not be counted in the computation of

(a) the period of time set out in the notice of the requirement; and

(b) the period of time within which an assessment may be made pursuant to subsection 152(4).

Consequence of failure

(8) If a person fails to comply substantially with a notice served under subsection 231.6(2) and if the notice is not set aside by a judge pursuant to subsection 231.6(5), any court having jurisdiction in a civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act shall, on motion of the Minister, prohibit the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice.

Unlike the primary document-acquisition sections (231.1-231.2) this section has a reasonableness test that can allow a judge to set-aside, vary or all-together cancel the request depending on the circumstances.

The RFI can also only be phrased in respect documents that are held by a related party to the Canadian-resident taxpayer, or who must be carrying on business in Canada, regardless of whether they are controlled by the taxpayer or not. If the non-resident party is merely related, it is possible to obtain their records as well, and if any of their records are relevant, as to be determined by the Minister's representatives, they must lend themselves to examination.

This was the case in Saipem Luxembourg S.A. v. CRA[92] where the Minister made a request of a non- resident, the taxpayer's parent corporation, though who did do business in Canada through its subsidiary. The Minister made a request for ALL of the parent's financial records to determine the tax position of the party doing business in Canada while the taxpayer argued that the scope was too broad and was unreasonable. On appeal the Court held:

> [1] In the course of assessing Saipem Luxembourg S.A.'s (Saipem) liability for income tax, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (the Agency) served upon it a notice of requirement (the Requirement) pursuant to subsection 231.6(2) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1, (5th Supp.) as amended from time to time (the Act). The Requirement demands that Saipem produce for the Agency's inspection the whole of its corporate records for its fiscal years ending July 31, 1999 and 2000. The issue in this appeal is whether the

[92] 2005 FCA 218

Digitized by Google

Requirement is so broad as to be unreasonable and therefore liable to be set aside pursuant to subsection 231.6(5) of the Act.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

[2] Saipem is incorporated under the laws of Luxembourg and maintains its head office in that country. It owns and operates very specialized vessels which are used for marine construction. In 1998 and 1999, Saipem contracted to employ one of its vessels, the S7000, the most powerful heavy lift vessel in the world, in the procurement, transportation and installation of the Venture, Thebaud, and Triumph jackets and topsides for the Sable Offshore Energy Project (the Sable Project). The 1998 work was done pursuant to a contract dated August 4, 1998, between Saipem and Saipem UK Limited, a related company, which had in turn contracted with the owners of the Sable Project, Mobil Oil Canada Properties. The work itself was done over a period of 53 days in September and October 1998. At the completion of the contract, the S7000 left Canadian waters to carry out contracts in other parts of the world.

[3] The contract for the work done in 1999 is dated December 14, 1998. The work itself was done in Canadian waters between August 15, 1999 and September 16, 1999. Given Saipem's July 31 fiscal year end, the 1998 work fell into the fiscal year ending July 31, 1999, and the work done in 1999 fell into the fiscal year ending July 31, 2000, hence the notice of requirement to produce documents for those two fiscal years.

[4] The Canada-Luxembourg Tax Convention provides that a resident of one contracting state is not liable to pay tax on business income earned in the other contracting state, unless the business in question is carried on through a permanent establishment in the other state. Saipem filed income tax returns for each of the taxation years in which it had business income in Canada, but claimed that since it had no permanent establishment, it was not taxable on its Canadian business income. The Minister has not yet issued notices of assessment in respect of those taxation years, insisting that he is unable to do so until he can make an independent determination as to whether or not Saipem had a permanent establishment in Canada during the relevant period.

[5] Saipem has offered to produce to the Agency all of the documents relevant to its Canadian operations. The Agency's position is that this makes Saipem the judge of the relevance of the documents it produces. It argues that it has no means of verifying information provided by Saipem other than by carrying out an audit of Saipem's books and records. In its Memorandum of Fact and Law, the Agency says:

> 29. ...the Minister seeks information in order to carry out a general audit of the Appellant's affairs for 1999 and 2000 with a view to determining its Canadian tax liability, if any.

[6] Saipem also offered to have the Tax Court of Canada decide whether it had a permanent establishment in Canada. Section 173 of the Act authorizes the Tax Court of Canada to decide any question of fact, law or mixed fact and law as a preliminary proceeding. The Agency rejected Saipem's offer on the basis that it does not have the necessary facts to submit such a question to the Court.

[7] According to subsection 231.6(4) of the Act, the person who has been served with a notice of requirement may, within 90 days, apply to a judge of the Federal Court for a review of the requirement. Subsection 231.6(5) authorizes the judge to confirm, vary or, if the judge is satisfied that it is unreasonable, set aside the notice of requirement. Saipem brought such an application. In a decision reported at (2004) D.T.C. 6068, 2004 FC 113 (Saipem Luxembourg S.A. v. Canada (Customs and Revenue)), Mr. Justice Rouleau of the Federal

Digitized by Google

Court dismissed Saipem's application, relying on the decision of the Federal Court in Merko v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) (T.D.), [1991] 1 F.C. 239 (Merko).

[8] Rouleau J. found that the test to be applied is not whether the information requested will be relevant in determining the applicant's liability to pay tax in Canada, but rather whether the information is relevant to the administration of the Act. He concluded that the Agency's duty to verify Saipem's tax liability necessarily required the production of its books and records:

[24] In the present case, the respondent seeks information in order to carry out a general audit of the applicant's affairs for the 1999 and 2000 fiscal years with a view to determining its Canadian tax liability. It is trite law that one of the purposes of an audit is to verify information. The fact that some information has been provided by the taxpayer or may be available from another source is irrelevant.

[25] It is the CCRA's duty to verify the applicant's tax liability which necessarily requires the production of the applicant's books and records. If, after being examined, they have no impact on Canadian tax liability and if some information gleaned from the audit proves to be irrelevant it shall be treated as such but, before such a determination can be made, the books and records must be made available.

[26] In conclusion one need only refer to the summary of Merko v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue-M.N.R.), supra:

> "Parliament intended to give the Minister far-reaching powers under section 231.6 to obtain information available outside of Canada. The Minister need only show that it is relevant to the administration or enforcement of the Act. The taxpayer is protected from abusive use of the provision through the power of a judge to review the requirement. The respondent's requirement was not an abuse of the process nor was the request unreasonable."

Accordingly, the learned applications judge dismissed the application.

[9] Saipem appeals from the decision of the Federal Court.

THE SCHEME OF THE ACT

[10] It is helpful to situate the notice of requirement in its statutory context. Subsection 230.(1) requires every person carrying on business in Canada to maintain books and records at its place of business:

230.(1) Every person carrying on business and every person who is required, by or pursuant to this Act, to pay or collect taxes or other amounts shall keep records and books of account (including an annual inventory kept in prescribed manner) at the person's place of business or residence in Canada or at such other place as may be designated by the Minister, in such form and containing such information as will enable the taxes	230.(1) Quiconque exploite une entreprise et quiconque est obligé, par ou selon la présente loi, de payer ou de percevoir des impôts ou autres montants doit tenir des registres et des livres de comptes (y compris un inventaire annuel, selon les modalités réglementaires) à son lieu d'affaires ou de résidence au Canada ou à tout autre lieu que le ministre peut désigner, dans la forme et renfermant les renseignements qui permettent d'établir le

Digitized by Google

payable under this Act or the taxes or other amounts that should have been deducted, withheld or collected to be determined.	montant des impôts payables en vertu de la présente loi, ou des impôts ou autres sommes qui auraient dû être déduites, retenues ou perçues.

[11] As a person carrying on business in Canada, Saipem was under an obligation to maintain, at its place of business in Canada, the books and records required to enable the Minister to determine its liability for tax. The Agency can take advantage of this obligation by attending at the taxpayer's premises and conducting an inspection of those books and records. Thus, the Agency is in a position to independently verify, at the taxpayer's place of business, the taxpayer's income and expenses, and thus his or her liability for income tax.

231.1(1) An authorized person may, at all reasonable times, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, (a) inspect, audit or examine the books and records of a taxpayer and any document of the taxpayer or of any other person that relates or may relate to the information that is or should be in the books or records of the taxpayer or to any amount payable by the taxpayer under this Act, and (b) examine property in an inventory of a taxpayer and any property or process of, or matter relating to, the taxpayer or any other person, an examination of which may assist the authorized person in determining the accuracy of the inventory of the taxpayer or in ascertaining the information that is or should be in the books or records of the taxpayer or	231.1(1) Une personne autorisée peut, à tout moment raisonnable, pour l'application et l'exécution de la présente loi, à la fois : a) inspecter, vérifier ou examiner les livres et registres d'un contribuable ainsi que tous documents du contribuable ou d'une autre personne qui se rapportent ou peuvent se rapporter soit aux renseignements qui figurent dans les livres ou registres du contribuable ou qui devraient y figurer, soit à tout montant payable par le contribuable en vertu de la présente loi; b) examiner les biens à porter à l'inventaire d'un contribuable, ainsi que tout bien ou tout procédé du contribuable ou d'une autre personne ou toute matière concernant l'un ou l'autre dont l'examen peut aider la personne autorisée à établir l'exactitude de l'inventaire du contribuable ou à contrôler soit les

Digitized by Google

any amount payable by the taxpayer under this Act, and for those purposes the authorized person may (c) subject to subsection 231.1(2), enter into any premises or place where any business is carried on, any property is kept, anything is done in connection with any business or any books or records are or should be kept, and (d) require the owner or manager of the property or business and any other person on the premises or place to give the authorized person all reasonable assistance and to answer all proper questions relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act and, for that purpose, require the owner or manager to attend at the premises or place with the authorized person.	renseignements qui figurent dans les livres ou registres du contribuable ou qui devraient y figurer, soit tout montant payable par le contribuable en vertu de la présente loi; à ces fins, la personne autorisée peut : c) sous réserve du paragraphe (2), pénétrer dans un lieu où est exploitée une entreprise, est gardé un bien, est faite une chose en rapport avec une entreprise ou sont tenus ou devraient l'être des livres ou registres; d) requérir le propriétaire, ou la personne ayant la gestion, du bien ou de l'entreprise ainsi que toute autre personne présente sur les lieux de lui fournir toute l'aide raisonnable et de répondre à toutes les questions pertinentes à l'application et l'exécution de la présente loi et, à cette fin, requérir le propriétaire, ou la personne ayant la gestion, de l'accompagner sur les lieux.

[12] The Minister can also issue a notice of requirement pursuant to subsection 231.2(1):

231.2(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person, by notice served personally or	231.2(1) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, sous réserve du paragraphe (2) et, pour l'application et l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi, par avis signifié à personne ou

Digitized by Google

by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as is stipulated in the notice, (a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or (b) any document. (2) The Minister shall not impose on any person (in this section referred to as a "third party") a requirement under subsection (1) to provide information or any document relating to one or more unnamed persons unless the Minister first obtains the authorization of a judge under subsection (3).	envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne, dans le délai raisonnable que précise l'avis : a) qu'elle fournisse tout renseignement ou tout renseignement supplémentaire, y compris une déclaration de revenu ou une déclaration supplémentaire; b) qu'elle produise des documents. (2) Le ministre ne peut exiger de quiconque -- appelé "tiers" au présent article -- la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue au paragraphe (1) concernant une ou plusieurs personnes non désignées nommément, sans y être au préalable autorisé par un juge en vertu du paragraphe (3).

[13] If the Minister proposes to issue a Requirement with respect to unnamed persons, he or she must obtain the prior approval of a judge. See subsection 231.2(2).

[14] Where a non-resident taxpayer is carrying on business in Canada, the Minister may require it to produce documents or records which are located outside Canada:

231.6(1) For the purposes of this section, "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available or located outside Canada and that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any	231.6(1) Pour l'application du présent article, un renseignement ou document étranger s'entend d'un renseignement accessible, ou d'un document situé, à l'étranger, qui peut être pris en compte pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant

Digitized by Google

person. (2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that a person resident in Canada or a non-resident person carrying on business in Canada provide any foreign-based information or document.	payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi. (2) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne résidant au Canada ou d'une personne n'y résidant pas mais y exploitant une entreprise de fournir des renseignements ou documents étrangers.

[15] The person who is subject to the obligation to produce foreign-based information or document may challenge the notice of requirement's reasonableness before the Federal Court:

231.6(4) The person on whom a notice of a requirement is served under subsection 231.6(2) may, within 90 days after the service of the notice, apply to a judge for a review of the requirement. (5) On hearing an application under subsection 231.6(4) in respect of a requirement, a judge may (a) confirm the requirement; (b) vary the requirement as the judge considers appropriate in the circumstances; or (c) set aside the requirement if the judge is satisfied that the requirement is unreasonable.	231.6(4) La personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé peut, dans les 90 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, contester, par requête à un juge, la mise en demeure du ministre. (5) À l'audition de la requête, le juge peut : a) confirmer la mise en demeure; b) modifier la mise en demeure de la façon qu'il estime indiquée dans les circonstances; c) déclarer sans effet la mise en demeure s'il est convaincu que celle-ci est déraisonnable.

[16] If the person in question does not produce the foreign-based information or document when required to do so, then no use may be made of that information by the person in any subsequent proceedings:

Digitized by Google

231.6(8) If a person fails to comply substantially with a notice served under subsection(2) and if the notice is not set aside by a judge pursuant to subsection (5), any court having jurisdiction in a civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act shall, on motion of the Minister, prohibit the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice.	231.6(8) Si une personne ne fournit pas la totalité, ou presque, des renseignements ou documents étrangers visés par la mise en demeure signifiée conformément au paragraphe (2) et si la mise en demeure n'est pas déclarée sans effet par un juge en application du paragraphe (5), tout tribunal saisi d'une affaire civile portant sur l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi doit, sur requête du ministre, refuser le dépôt en preuve par cette personne de tout renseignement ou document étranger visé par la mise en demeure.

[17] By way of contrast, if a person fails to comply with a Requirement issued pursuant to section 231.2, the Minister may apply to a judge for a compliance order pursuant to section 231.7 which, in the event of non-compliance, may give rise to contempt proceedings.

ISSUE

[18] The issue to be decided is whether the Minister's notice of requirement which requires Saipem to produce all of its corporate books and records for the 1999 and 2000 fiscal years is unreasonable.

ANALYSIS

[19] After dealing with the issue of standard of review, I propose to begin by examining the limited jurisprudence on section 231.6 to see if it provides any guidance as to what constitutes an unreasonable notice of requirement. As we shall see, it provides very little assistance. In the absence of such guidance, I propose to apply the test of reasonableness found in the recent Supreme Court decision, Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 247, 2003 SCC 20 (Law Society of New Brunswick), in assessing whether the notice of requirement in this case is reasonable.

[20] What is the standard of review? This Court is sitting in appeal of a decision of an applications judge whose task it was to determine whether the notice of requirement issued to Saipem is reasonable. The role of this Court is as described by the Supreme Court of Canada in Dr. Q. v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, 2003 SCC 19:

[43] ...The role of the Court of Appeal was to determine whether the reviewing judge had chosen and applied the correct standard of review, and in the event she had not, to assess the administrative body's decision in light of the correct standard of review, reasonableness. At this stage in the analysis, the Court of Appeal is dealing with appellate review of a subordinate court, not judicial review of an administrative decision. As such, the normal rules of appellate review of lower courts as articulated in Housen, supra, apply. The question of the right standard to select and apply is one of law and, therefore, must be answered correctly by a reviewing judge.

Digitized by Google

[21] In this case, the standard of review to be applied by the reviewing judge is defined by the statute: reasonableness. It is only if the reviewing judge has made a palpable and overriding error in the application of that standard, that this Court is entitled to intervene.

[22] Before turning to the applications judge's reasons, a brief review of the jurisprudence is in order. The jurisprudence dealing with subsection 231.6(5) is not extensive, but nonetheless provides some examples of notices of requirement which the Courts have found to be reasonable. On the other hand, it provides little guidance as to the basis on which a court might find a notice of requirement unreasonable. The first case to consider the issue was Merko where the notice of requirement was served on the taxpayer after his notice of objection had been filed. The documents which it required Merko to produce related to certain investments in respect of which he had claimed large losses. The major issue in the case was whether the serving of a notice of requirement after a notice of objection had been filed was an abuse of process. Cullen J. held that there was no temporal limitation on when a notice of requirement could be served and dismissed the abuse of process claim. The learned judge then turned to the question of reasonableness:

> [24] Is the demand reasonable? Parliament, through the wording of the Act, leaves no room for doubt that the demand for the foreign-based information or document is prima facie reasonable given the far-flung nature of the business of the limited partnership and the large loss claimed by this applicant. The applicant must clearly make an attempt to secure the foreign-based information or document unless it is his contention that the request/demand is unreasonable in which case a procedure is in place to make his case, and hence the application to this Court. I cannot find the request unreasonable. There is no requirement that any information or document be provided but there is the sanction of subsection 231.6(8) i.e., the taxpayer, if he withholds any such required information or document, cannot use it at a subsequent civil proceeding. The requirement puts the taxpayer on notice about the kind of information being sought, not only from him but others. He can choose to seek out all the data possible, and tender it to National Revenue or he can indicate that some or all of the information sought cannot be produced, or will not be produced. If he takes the latter position, there is the sanction of subsection 231.6(8) mentioned earlier.
>
> [25] Accordingly, there being no abuse of the process provided in the Income Tax Act, and in the circumstances here the requirement is reasonable, I will confirm the said requirement. The respondent is entitled to its costs of this motion in any event of the cause.
>
> [Merko at p. 249-250]

[Emphasis added.]

[23] The learned judge said two things about the reasonableness of the notice of requirement. He began by commenting that the language of the legislation left no doubt that the requirement was prima facie reasonable given the far-flung nature of the limited partnership and the large losses claimed by the taxpayer. If the judge was saying that it was not unreasonable for the Minister to request further information, given the large losses claimed, there is little with which to quarrel. Presumably, the learned judge was not saying that the language of the legislation made every notice of requirement prima facie reasonable.

Digitized by Google

[24] The learned judge also concluded that the notice of requirement was reasonable because it did not compel the taxpayer to produce any information. It simply stipulated the consequences of non-production of the information. With respect, this is an erroneous reading of the legislation. Subsection 231.6(2) clearly empowers the Minister to demand production of foreign-based documents. Furthermore, the recipient of a notice of requirement is not free to choose which of the documents demanded he will produce, as suggested in the learned judge's reasons. Subsection 231.6(8) is explicit that if the notice of requirement is not "substantially complied with", the court may make an order which "prohibit[s] the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice" [emphasis added]. Consequently, even if the taxpayer partially complies with the Requirement, the court can order than none of the material covered by the notice can be tendered, not even those documents which have been produced. Thus, the broader the demand, the more drastic the consequences of non-compliance.

[25] There have been few other cases which have considered the question of reasonableness in the context of subsection 231.6(5) of the Act. In Bernick v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2002 D.T.C. 7167 (Ont. S.C.J.) (Bernick), the taxpayer challenged a notice of requirement which called upon him to disclose the names and partnership interests of other members of an offshore partnership of which he was a member. Bernick refused to provide the information on the ground that the Minister should have proceeded under subsection 231.2(3) which requires the Minister to obtain court authorization before issuing a notice of requirement relating to "one or more unnamed persons". Swinton J. decided that subsection 231.2(3) did not apply as the Minister was not investigating the unnamed persons; he was investigating Bernick. Citing Merko, the learned judge went on to find that the notice of requirement was reasonable as the Minister was seeking information about the operation of the partnership from those involved in it in an effort to determine whether Bernick was entitled to claim partnership losses. I take this to mean that the learned judge was satisfied that there was a rational connection between the information sought and the issue in respect of which the information was sought.

[26] Merko and Bernick appear to apply a body of jurisprudence dealing with a notice of requirement issued pursuant to section 231.2 (or its predecessor) which holds that a notice of requirement which seeks to obtain information relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons whose liability to tax is under investigation is a purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act. See Canadian Bank of Commerce v. Canada (Attorney General), [1962] S.C.R. 729 (Canadian Bank of Commerce), per Cartwright J. This is so even if much of the information requested turns out to be irrelevant. Canadian Bank of Commerce per Kerwin C.J. Since foreign-based document is defined as information or a document which is maintained outside Canada and "that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act", this test is, to that extent, relevant to a notice of requirement issued pursuant to subsection 231.6(2).

[27] The element which is present in section 231.6, and which is lacking in section 231.2, is the availability of judicial review of the notice of requirement on the ground of unreasonableness. Such a review lacks any substance if a notice of requirement is reasonable simply because the information requested is, or may be, relevant to the administration and enforcement of the Act. Given that Parliament took the trouble to provide for a review on the basis of reasonableness, I conclude that Parliament intended that a notice of requirement in respect of a foreign-based document must not only relate to a document which is relevant to the administration and enforcement of the Act but that it must also not be unreasonable.

Digitized by Google

[28] When one turns to the decision of the Federal Court in this case, one notes that the issue of reasonableness is not addressed. The judge takes care to point out that the verification of the taxpayer's information is a purpose relevant to the administration and enforcement of the Act:

> [23] Thus, the test to be applied is not whether the information requested will be relevant in determining the applicant's Canadian tax liability, but rather whether the information is relevant to the administration of the Act.

[29] This is the test which is applied in the cases dealing with a notice of requirement delivered under section 231.2 of the Act which contains no provision for review of the notice of requirement on the basis of reasonableness. The judge goes on to cite the Federal Court Reports head note from Merko:

...The taxpayer is protected from abusive use of the provision through the power of a judge to review the requirement. The respondent's requirement was not an abuse of the process nor was the request unreasonable.

[30] The learned judge never does say why he found the notice of requirement in this case reasonable. To the extent that he adopted the reasoning in Merko, the difficulty is that there is no issue of abuse of process in this case, as there was in Merko. If he meant to say that a notice of requirement is reasonable if it is not otherwise an abuse of process, I must say, with respect, that he conflated the two issues in Merko into a single issue and, to that extent, he failed to appreciate the test to be applied under subsection 231.6(5), and consequently, he did not apply it. This is a palpable and overriding error, as a result of which this Court is called upon to apply the proper test.

[31] What does "reasonable" (and by extension, "unreasonable") mean in these circumstances? In Law Society of New Brunswick, the Supreme Court said at paragraph 47:

The standard of reasonableness basically involves asking "After a somewhat probing examination, can the reasons given, when taken as a whole, support the decision?"

Given that the reviewing Court under subsection 231.6(5) is reviewing a decision (the content of the notice of requirement) on a standard of reasonableness, I find that this is an appropriate statement of the test to be applied. To apply that standard to this case, one needs some understanding of the extent of the demand and the reasons for which it is made.

[32] In Merko and Bernick, the notices of requirement called for the production of records relating to a specific transaction in respect of which the taxpayer was claiming a tax benefit. The link between the documents whose production was sought and the individual's tax liability is obvious and reasonable. In this case, the notice of requirement requires Saipem to produce the whole of its corporate documentation for two fiscal years. The link between the documents to be produced and Saipem's liability for tax is more remote.

[33] The Agency justifies the breadth of the notice of requirement on the basis that it requires production of all of Saipem's documents in order to conduct an audit for the purpose of verifying information submitted by Saipem. This position is well summarized at paragraph 29 of the Agency's Memorandum of Fact and Law:

In the present case the Minister seeks information in order to carry out a general audit of the Appellant's affairs for 1999 and 2000 with a view to determining its Canadian tax liability, if any. As stated in McKinlay, one of the purposes of an audit is to verify information. The fact that information has been provided by the taxpayer or is possibly available from another source is irrelevant. It is the CCRA's interest in verifying the Appellant's tax liability that compels the production of the Appellant's books and records. All of the Appellant's books and records are relevant to an audit even if some of them only serve to verify, after being examined, that they have no impact on its Canadian tax liability.

Digitized by Google

[34] The issue before the reviewing Court is not the reasonableness of the Agency's intention to conduct an audit, but the reasonableness of the notice of requirement in light of the Agency's determination that an audit is required. Saipem's argument that the Agency could have obtained the documents it seeks by issuing a notice of requirement with respect to specific classes of documents seeks to question the reasonableness of conducting an audit. In the absence of some evidence of bad faith or other improper motive, the appropriateness of an audit is outside the mandate of the Court under subsection 231.6(5).

[35] The question therefore is whether the Agency's intention to conduct an audit of Saipem supports the need for a notice of requirement in respect of the whole of Saipem's corporate records. A "somewhat probing examination" leads to an inquiry as to whether one can truly conduct an audit solely on the basis of material provided by the person being audited, without the possibility of verification that no further records exist. In practice, the issue seldom arises as I have no doubt that most businesses confronted with a notice of requirement of the sort in issue here, accept the Agency's offer to treat their consent to an on-site audit as sufficient compliance with the notice of requirement. But the reasonableness of the notice of requirement is to be assessed according to its terms, not according to some alternate method of compliance.

[36] It is the Agency's prerogative as to whether it will conduct an audit, and what form that audit will take. Given that the records in question are, by definition, maintained outside Canada, the Agency can do little more to gain access to the records than issue the notice of requirement which it issued here. If the result is an audit which does not meet the Agency's usual standards, it is nonetheless the best audit the Agency can conduct in the circumstances. As a result, I conclude that the Agency's determination to conduct an audit supports the scope of the notice of requirement served upon Saipem by the Minister.

[37] For those reasons, applying the test which the applications judge should have applied, I find that the notice of requirement issued to Saipem is not unreasonable, and therefore, I would dismiss the appeal with costs and, pursuant to paragraph 231.6(5)(a) of the Act, confirm the notice of requirement.

"J.D. Denis Pelletier"
J.A.

"I concur
Alice Desjardins J.A."

"I agree
M. Nadon J.A."

In Fidelity Investments Canada Limited And CRA[93] at issue was whether the reasonableness

[93] 2006 FC 551

Digitized by Google

test was upset with the possibility that CRA would not be able to guarantee that the information requested of foreign-resident parents would not be made public. At issue was whether fees charged by a parent to its sub. were reasonable. The court held:

I. Introduction

[1] Fidelity Investments Canada Limited (the "Applicant") brings two applications for judicial review, pursuant to the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, as amended, relative to two Notices of Requirement ("Notice" or "Notices"), issued by the Canada Revenue Agency (the "CRA" or the "Respondent"), under section 231.6 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), as amended (the "Act"). The relief sought by the Applicant is an order varying or setting aside the Notices.

II. Facts

[2] The Applicant is a body corporate, incorporated in 1987 under the laws of Canada and continued, under the laws of Ontario, in 1989. It was amalgamated under the laws of Ontario in 1994. It has filed the affidavit of Mr. Kevin Ross Barber, Vice-President, Finance, with the Applicant, as evidence in these proceedings. By a Notice dated July 12, 2004, the Applicant was required to provide information and production of the financial statements of Fidelity Investments Money Management, Inc. ("FIMMI") for the taxation years ended 1999, 2000, 2001 and 2002. If the financial statements are not prepared, then the Respondent seeks production of schedules or summaries that reflect year-end, income, expense, assets and liabilities. The Applicant's challenge to that Notice is the subject of proceeding T-1807-04.

[3] By another Notice dated July 12, 2004 and issued by the CRA, the Applicant was required to provide information and financial statements of Fidelity Management and Research Co. ("FMR Co.") for the taxation year 1998. That Notice is the subject of proceeding T-1808-04.

[4] According to the evidence, the Applicant is the subject of an audit by the CRA for the taxation years 1998 to 2002, inclusive. The audit began in February 2002. Prior to receipt of the Notices, the Applicant received a letter, dated March 22, 2004, from the CRA, requesting it to provide certain information and documents. It has complied with the request with the exception of providing the financial statements of FIMMI and FMR Co. to the Respondent.

[5] The Applicant is a wholly-owned subsidiary of FMR Corp. FMR Corp. is an American corporation, based in Boston, Massachusetts. It is the parent of a group of companies, collectively known as the "FMR Group" that also includes FIMMI. The FMR Group manages mutual funds and provides other services, including brokerage, life insurance, retirement, human resources and benefits outsourcing services. It provides investment management services to retail and institutional investors in Canada through the Applicant. FMR Corp., and each of its subsidiaries, including FIMMI, are private corporations and their shares are not traded on any public stock exchange.

[6] FIMMI, a wholly-owned subsidiary of FMR Corp., is a registered investment advisor in the United States of America. It provides related investment services relative to certain portfolios of funds distributed by the Applicant. It is a private corporation and its shares are not traded on any public stock exchange.

[7] Mr. Barber deposed that the Applicant has subcontracted some of its responsibilities to FIMMI and FIMMI has contracts with FMR Co. to manage the portfolios of certain funds. He further deposed that he had been informed by Mr. Gregory Wass, Vice-President, Taxation, FMR Corp., that FIMMI provides various services for other members of the FMR Group but not to non-members of the FMR Group.

[8] Further, Mr. Barber deposed that the Applicant paid FIMMI and FMR Co. for the advisory services provided by them. The reasonableness of those fees is under review by the CRA. In that regard, FMR Corp. hired the accounting firm of Ernst & Young who "benchmarked" the fees using investment advisory fee dates provided by an independent third party for the Applicant's 1998 taxation year. A copy of that report was provided to the CRA. An earlier report had been prepared in 1996 by Coopers and Lybrand; that document was also provided to the Respondent.

Digitized by Google

[9] The Applicant received further correspondence from Ms. Donna O'Connor, Auditor, International Audit Section, CRA, dated June 8, 2004. In that letter, attached as an exhibit to the affidavit of Mr. Barber, Ms. O'Connor attempted to respond to the concerns expressed by the Applicant in connection with the provision of the information and documents requested in the March 8, 2004 letter. She reviewed certain provisions of the Act that authorize the CRA to request information and documents. She advised that the CRA was unable to give a guarantee that the information obtained will not be used in any other audit or for any other purpose than the audit of the Applicant.

[10] Further, Ms. O'Connor rejected the suggestion that the CRA attend to review the financial statements in Boston without copies being made. Finally, she referred to a "Transfer Pricing Memorandum", TPM-04, a document generated by the CRA, and advised that the CRA would use the requested information as a "secret comparable" in another file only as a last resort, as a basis of assessment, if it was unable to use publicly available documents.

[11] The Applicant's concerns about the use of the requested information and documents, respecting both FIMMI and FMR Co., were again addressed in correspondence dated June 25, 2004, from its solicitors to Ms. Maria Praulins, Director of CRA. The Applicant offered to provide the financial information contained in the FIMMI and FMR Co. financial statements in a specific manner. First, the Applicant proposed that the CRA review FIMMI and FMR Co.'s financial information that specifically dealt with transactions with the Applicant. If this information was inadequate, the Applicant was prepared to discuss what further information would be required. Alternatively the Applicant proposed that the CRA agree to enter into a confidentiality agreement concerning its review of FIMMI and FMR Co. financial statements. The Applicant says that the information requested bears no relationship to the reasonableness of the fees that it paid to FIMMI and FMR Co.

[12] The CRA responded to these proposals by letter dated June 30, 2004. It refused to grant an undertaking that the information requested from FIMMI and FMR Co. would be protected from being used for purposes other than the audit of the Applicant or that the information would not be made public as the result of being used in the audit of another Canadian taxpayer. The CRA took the position that such an approach, that is an undertaking to protect confidential material, is governed by section 241 of the Act and the relevant treaty.

[13] Mr. Barber deposed in his affidavit that he had been advised by Mr. Gregory Wass that the financial information of FIMMI and FMR Co. that is the subject of the Notices is "an extremely confidential trade or business secret" and that public release of this information could be prejudicial to the competitive position of FMR Group in the marketplace. Finally, Mr. Barber deposed that he had been informed by Mr. Wass that FIMMI and FMR Co. will provide the information requested to the Applicant if appropriate protection is provided by the CRA upon the loss of confidentiality and the use of that information for other purposes. The Applicant is not in a position to compel FIMMI and FMR Co. to disclose the requested information.

[14] For its part, the CRA filed the affidavit of Ms. Donna O'Connor. In her affidavit, Ms. O'Connor reviewed the history of the audit, the delivery of correspondence and documents pursuant to the Notices, and the rationale for the issuance of the Notices. The CRA takes the position that the information contained in the financial statements of FMR Co. and FIMMI is necessary in order to complete its audit. She deposed that the CRA is not satisfied that the transfer-pricing studies prepared relative to the fees paid by the Applicant to FMR Co. and FIMMI are reliable. She also questioned whether these reports relied on adequate methodology.

Digitized by Google

[15] In cross-examination upon her affidavit, Ms. O'Connor said that the CRA was looking for the financial statements in order to advance its work relative to review of the transfer-pricing, that is the fees paid by the Applicant to FIMMI and FMR Co. She said that the 1996 study prepared by Coopers and Lybrand was neither relevant nor helpful since it had been prepared for the American tax authorities. Similarly, she said that the 1999 study, prepared by Ernst and Young was not acceptable because the CRA could not determine the relationship between the parties for the purpose of establishing the best comparables. That issue, that is the best comparables, is important to the Respondent for the purposes of assessing the reasonableness of the fees in issue.

[16] As well, according to Ms. O'Connor, the two studies that were provided by the Applicant do not contain sufficient quality information to support a proper application of the CUP method, that is "comparable uncontrolled price". She said that the CRA does not believe that the CUP method submitted by the Applicant is reliable for the purpose of assessing the transfer pricing. Further, she said that it is part of a regular audit to "review the financial position of related party services to establish if their financial results are consistent with that other party charged for such services regardless of the transfer pricing methodology used".

[17] Ms. O'Connor expressed doubt about the reliance of both Coopers and Lybrand and Ernst and Young upon Lipper data in carrying out their respective studies of transfer-pricing relative to the fees paid by the Applicant to FIMMI and FMR Co.

III. Submissions

[18] The Applicant argues that according to the Act, the Notices are to be reviewed by this Court upon the standard of reasonableness. It submits that the Notices are unreasonable on several grounds. First, it says that the Notices are too broad and relate to companies that are separate companies. Then, it submits that the CRA has not shown why it needs this information or that it is relevant for the purpose of administering the Act.

[19] The Applicant argues that these Notices are in conflict with the provisions of the Convention Between Canada and the United States of America With Respect to Taxes on Income and Capital, 31 August 1984, Can. T.S. 1984 No. 15, as amended (the "Treaty"). Finally, it submits that the lack of any guarantee of protection of confidential information leads to the inference that the Notices are unreasonable.

[20] For its part, the Respondent takes the position that it can request information for ensuring that taxpayers comply with the principles of self-reporting and self-assessing income, as authorized by the Act. It argues that the Applicant has failed to provide acceptable evidence that the information sought is confidential information. It submits that the applicable standard of review in this case is unreasonableness and says that, in any event, the Notices are not unreasonable, having regard to the statutory authority for production of information or documents that are relevant to the administration or enforcement of the Act.

[21] The Respondent argues that section 231.6 is not inconsistent with the requirements of the Treaty. It notes that pursuant to subsection 3(c) of Article XXVII of the Treaty, there is no obligation to provide information that would disclose trade secrets, the disclosure of which is not contrary to public policy. It submits that subsection 3(c) of that Article limits, but does not prohibit, a contracting state's obligation to comply with section 1 of that Article. Article XXVII provides that contracting states shall exchange information concerning taxes. The Respondent argues that the Applicant has failed to show that the information contained in the financial statements comes within the terms of subsection 3(c) and if it does, that its disclosure would be contrary to public policy.

Digitized by Google

[22] Second, the Respondent submits that the affidavits of Mr. Barber constitute inadmissible hearsay evidence because they are based on information and belief, not personal knowledge. It argues that the affidavits should be stricken out.

[23] Finally, the Respondent alleges that the Applicant has improperly named the CRA as the respondent to this proceeding. It says that the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") is the appropriate respondent since the Minister, not the CRA, is authorized to issue notices pursuant to section 231.6 of the Act.

IV. Discussion and Disposition

[24] This proceeding arises under section 231.6 of the Act which provides as follows:

231.6. (1) For the purposes of this section, "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available or located outside Canada and that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person.	231.6. (1) Pour l'application du présent article, un renseignement ou document étranger s'entend d'un renseignement accessible, ou d'un document situé, à l'étranger, qui peut être pris en compte pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi.
(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that a person resident in Canada or a non-resident person carrying on business in Canada provide any foreign-based information or document.	(2) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne résidant au Canada ou d'une personne n'y résidant pas mais y exploitant une entreprise de fournir des renseignements ou documents étrangers.
(3) The notice referred to in subsection 231.6(2) shall set out	(3) L'avis doit:
(a) a reasonable period of time of not less than 90 days for the production of the information or document;	a) indiquer le délai raisonnable, d'au moins 90 jours, dans lequel les renseignements ou documents étrangers doivent être fournis;
(b) a description of the information or document being sought; and	b) décrire les renseignements ou documents étrangers recherchés;
(c) the consequences under subsection 231.6(8) to the person of the failure to provide the information or	c) préciser les conséquences prévues au paragraphe (8) du documents being sought within the period of time set out in the notice.

Digitized by Google

(4) The person on whom a notice of a requirement is served under subsection 231.6(2) may, within 90 days after the service of the notice, apply to a judge for a review of the requirement.

(5) On hearing an application under subsection 231.6(4) in respect of a requirement, a judge may

(a) confirm the requirement;

(b) vary the requirement as the judge considers appropriate in the circumstances; or

(c) set aside the requirement if the judge is satisfied that the requirement is unreasonable.

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.

(7) The period of time between the day on which an application for review of a requirement is made pursuant to subsection 231.6(4) and the day on which the review is decided shall not be counted in the computation of

(a) the period of time set out in the notice of the requirement; and

(b) the period of time within which an assessment may be défaut de fournir les renseignements ou documents étrangers recherchés dans le délai ci-dessus.

(4) La personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé peut, dans les 90 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, contester, par requête à un juge, la mise en demeure du ministre.

(5) À l'audition de la requête, le juge peut:

a) confirmer la mise en demeure;

b) modifier la mise en demeure de la façon qu'il estime indiquée dans les circonstances;

c) déclarer sans effet la mise en demeure s'il est convaincu que celle-ci est déraisonnable.

(6) Pour l'application de l'alinéa (5)c), le fait que des renseignements ou documents étrangers soient accessibles ou situés chez une personne non-résidente qui n'est pas contrôlée par la personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé, ou soient sous la garde de cette personne non-résidente, ne rend pas déraisonnable la mise en demeure de fournir ces renseignements ou documents, si ces deux personnes sont liées.

(7) Le délai qui court entre le jour où une requête est présentée conformément au paragraphe (4) et le jour où il est décidé de la requête ne compte pas dans le calcul:

a) du délai indiqué dans l'avis correspondant à la mise en demeure qui a donné lieu à la requête;

Digitized by Google

made pursuant to subsection 152(4).	b) du délai dans lequel une cotisation peut être établie conformément au paragraphe 152(4).
(8) If a person fails to comply substantially with a notice served under subsection 231.6(2) and if the notice is not set aside by a judge pursuant to subsection 231.6(5), any court having jurisdiction in a civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act shall, on motion of the Minister, prohibit the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice.	(8) Si une personne ne fournit pas la totalité, ou presque, des renseignements ou documents étrangers visés par la mise en demeure signifiée conformément au paragraphe (2) et si la mise en demeure n'est pas déclarée sans effet par un juge en application du paragraphe (5), tout tribunal saisi d'une affaire civile portant sur l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi doit, sur requête du ministre, refuser le dépôt en preuve par cette personne de tout renseignement ou document étranger visé par la mise en demeure.

[25] I will first address the applicable standard of review. Contrary to the submissions of the Respondent, the standard of review here is the standard of reasonableness. That standard of review is identified in the Act, in paragraph 231.6(5)(c). In light of the language of this statutory provision, it is not necessary to engage in a pragmatic and functional analysis to determine the appropriate standard of review. In Saipem LuxembourgS.V. v. Canada(Customs and Revenue Agency), [2005] 3 C.T.C. 294 (F.C.A.),leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [2005] S.C.C.A. No. 368 (Q.L.) at paragraph 21, the Federal Court of Appeal confirmed this standard of review.

[26] The standard of reasonableness was discussed in Canada(Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748 where the Supreme Court of Canada said the following at paragraph 56:

> 56. ... An unreasonable decision is one that, in the main, is not supported by any reasons that can stand up to a somewhat probing examination. Accordingly, a court reviewing a conclusion on the reasonableness standard must look to see whether any reasons support it. The defect, if there is one, could presumably be in the evidentiary foundation itself or in the logical process by which conclusions are sought to be drawn from it. An example of the former kind of defect would be an assumption that had no basis in the evidence, or that was contrary to the overwhelming weight of the evidence. An example of the latter kind of defect would be a contradiction in the premises or an invalid inference.

[27] The question, then, is whether it was reasonable for the CRA to seek production, pursuant to section 231.6, of the financial statements of FMR Co. and FIMMI, having regard to the purposes of the Act and the known facts. I need address only the issue of production of the financial statements of FMR Co. and FIMMI since the evidence of Mr. Barber, to the effect that the Applicant has provided all documents and information requested with the exception of the financial statements, is corroborated by Ms. O'Connor in the transcript of her cross-examination upon her affidavit.

Digitized by Google

[28] The purpose of the Act, broadly stated, is to allow the federal government to collect funds that will be spent by the Government of Canada. The Canadian income tax system is based upon self-reporting of income. The purpose of the Act and its reliance upon self-assessment of income is discussed in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627 at pp. 636 and 637.

[29] In McKinlay, the Supreme Court also discussed the availability to the Minister of broad investigatory powers, including the authority to require the production of information and documents; see AGT Ltd v. Canada (Attorney General), [1997] 2 F.C. 878. Section 231.6 is one of those far-ranging provisions that authorizes the Minister to seek the production of information and documents. Section 231.6 is directed to the production of foreign-based information or documents, as defined in subsection 231.6(1).

[30] Section 231.6 speaks to the general criterion that the information and documents requested "may be relevant to the administration or enforcement" of the Act. In AGT, the Federal Court of Appeal commented upon this requirement of relevance as follows:

> 27. Subsection 231.2(1) is drafted in broad language, but its scope has been reduced through the rules of interpretation to situations where the information sought by the Minister is relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons, and when the tax liability of such person or persons is the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry. ... [Notes omitted]

[31] In the present case, the Respondent argues that the financial statements are relevant for the purposes of conducting an audit of the Applicant. That audit must relate to the tax liability of the Applicant. There is no question that such liability relates to the enforcement and administration of the Act. There is no challenge made to the initiation of the audit.

[32] Specifically, the Respondent says that the financial statements of FMR Co. and FIMMI, two American corporations that are related to the Applicant, are necessary because it is unable to assess the reasonableness of fees paid by the Applicant to FIMMI and to FMR Co. In light of subsection 231.6(6), the fact that the Applicant is related to FMR Co. and FIMMI does not make the requirement to produce information and documents unreasonable. In my opinion, however, the relationship alone does not make the requirements "reasonable". The factor of relevance must also be satisfied. In my view, there must be evidence that the documents requested are relevant for the purposes of the Act.

[33] The Applicant challenges the Respondent's dismissal of the two transfer pricing studies that it provided, on the grounds that the Respondent's employees were unfamiliar with the Lipper methods and did not adequately investigate the bases upon which Coopers and Lybrand and Ernst and Young, respectively, reached their conclusions. The Applicant argues that the Respondent did not understand the two studies.

[34] As noted above, the decision of the Respondent to issue the Notices is reviewable on the standard of reasonableness. The concept of reasonableness includes relevance, relative to the Act. Although the Applicant argues that the information sought is not relevant and that its principal concern here is with the protection of confidential material, I am not persuaded that the material in question is not relevant. I draw this conclusion from the Applicant's offer to disclose the information to the CRA, albeit in a protected environment where no copies would be made and subject to the provision of an undertaking to maintain confidentiality.

Digitized by Google

[35] In view of the evidence submitted by the Respondent, I am satisfied that the information sought to be produced, that is the financial statements of FIMMI and FMR Co., is relevant to the conduct of an audit of the Applicant. The conduct of an audit pursuant to the Act is relevant for the administration and enforcement of the Act.

[36] It is not necessary for me to address, in detail, the Applicant's submissions concerning the Treaty. In my opinion, the existence of the Treaty does not overrule or limit the Minister's right to pursue the requested information by means of notices issued pursuant to section 231.6 of the Act. That is the course of action chosen in this case.

[37] I am satisfied that the financial statements in question are essentially confidential materials. In this regard, I refer to Montana Band of Indians v. Canada (1988), 51 D.L.R. (4th) 306 (F.C.T.D.) at 315. I am also satisfied that the evidence submitted by the Applicant is sufficient to support the claim to confidential status of the financial statements of privately held corporations, that is FIMMI and FMR Co., notwithstanding the fact that the affidavit of Mr. Barber is based on information and belief and that he has no personal knowledge of the contents of those documents. Mr. Barber's evidence is the "best evidence" available.

[38] I agree with the Applicant's submissions concerning the admissibility of hearsay evidence on a principled basis, as discussed in R. v . Khan, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 531 and R. v. Smith, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 915. As well, in P.S. Partsource Inc. v. Canadian Tire Corp. (2001), 11 C.P.R. (4th) 386 (F.C.A.), the Federal Court of Appeal discussed the applicability of the common law principles concerning the admissibility of hearsay evidence.

[39] The production of an affidavit from Mr. Wass would have potentially exposed that individual to cross-examination or, alternatively, to the risk of having the affidavit stricken out if he failed to submit to cross-examination. The cross-examination of Mr. Wass may well have destroyed any claim for non-disclosure of the financial statements on the grounds of confidentiality. Any order striking out his affidavit may have impacted upon the evidentiary basis of the Applicant's application for judicial review.

[40] The Respondent relies on section 241 of the Act in response to the Applicant's concerns with the protection of confidential information. The correspondence exchanged between employees of the CRA and the Applicant clearly shows that the Respondent is not prepared to accord to the Applicant any guarantee of confidentiality, other than is provided by section 241 of the Act. Generally, that section provides that taxpayer information shall not be "knowingly" disclosed to any person, except as authorized by this section.

[41] The status of the information sought here as "taxpayer information", relative to the Applicant, was not addressed in this proceeding. However, Ms. O'Connor, as the representative of the Respondent, said in her cross-examination that the Respondent would support a request by the Applicant for an in camera proceeding if such request was made in relation to future judicial proceedings. As well, she stated that the Respondent would give the requisite notice if any request was made for the disclosure of the financial statements, in order to allow the Applicant to pursue its legal remedies.

[42] Section 231.6 does not identify the confidential nature of information as a basis for non-disclosure when a notice is issued pursuant to this provision. There is no evidence to suggest that the Respondent is engaged in a "fishing trip" for the purpose of using the financial statements of FIMMI and FMR Co. other than in the conduct of an audit of the Applicant. In general, the Minister is subject to the obligation of acting in good faith. That obligation has been recognized by the Courts in respect of notices issued pursuant to section 231.2 of the Act; see M.N.R. v. Sand Exploration Ltd., [1995] 3 F.C. 44 (T.D.). I see no reason in principle why the same obligation of good faith would not exist with respect to notices issued pursuant to section 231.6 of the Act.

[43] That being so, I conclude that the Applicant's concerns about the confidential nature of the financial statements in issue do not establish that the request for their production is unreasonable. Having regard to the evidence before me, including the cross-examination of Ms. O'Connor, I am satisfied that the Notices are reasonable.

Digitized by Google

[44] There is a final issue to be addressed. The Respondent argues that it is not the most appropriate respondent in this proceeding, that the Minister should have been named in that capacity. In this regard, the CRA refers to subsection 231.6(2) and says that this provision authorizes the Minister, not the CRA, to issue the Notices. It submits that the situation is not remedied by the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency Act, S.C. 1999, c. 17, s. 69 (now called the Canada Revenue Agency Act) that allows the CRA to be named in judicial proceedings only "in respect of any right or obligation acquired or incurred by the Agency".

[45] The Applicant's response to this argument is that the Notices were issued by the CRA, not by the Minister. Further it submits that in Saipem, the CRA was named as the Respondent, without comment by the Federal Court of Appeal.

[46] According to Rule 303(1) of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (the "Rules"), an applicant in a judicial review proceeding shall name, as respondent, every person "directly affected" by the order sought or "required to be named as a party under an Act of Parliament" under which the proceeding is brought. It is clear that the Minister is a person "directly affected" since the order sought here if granted, would result in the non-disclosure of information sought by him. The Minister would certainly be an appropriate Respondent.

[47] The Act is silent as to the identification of the respondent in an application for review of a Notice, pursuant to subsection 231.6(2). The general rule is that set out in Rule 303(1). In my opinion, it may be more appropriate for the Minister to be named as the respondent but in this case, the absence of the Minister as a party caused no prejudice or confusion. The failure to name the Minister had no material effect.

V. Conclusion

[48] These applications for judicial review are dismissed. The Respondent shall have its taxed costs on the basis of Column III of Tariff B, counsel fees for one counsel only and for one proceeding only.

ORDER

These applications for judicial review are dismissed. The Respondent shall have its taxed costs on the basis of Column III of Tariff B, counsel fees for one counsel only and for one proceeding only. This Order shall be filed in T-1807-04 and placed on the file in T-1808-04.

"E. Heneghan"
Judge

SOFT-MOC INC. v. MNR/AG of Canada, 2013 FC 291, Judicial Review of S. 231.6 Foreign Information Request

Date: 20130320
Citation: 2013 FC 291

Digitized by Google

Ottawa, Ontario, March 20, 2013
PRESENT: The Honourable Mr. Justice Russell BETWEEN:

SOFT-MOC INC.

Applicant

and

THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE AS REPRESENTED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA

Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an application for judicial review pursuant to subsection 18.1 of the Federal Courts Act, RSC, 1985, F-7, and subsections 231.6(4) and 231.6(5) of the Income Tax Act, RSC, 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) (ITA). The Applicant seeks review in respect of a decision (Decision) of the Assistant Director, Toronto East Tax Services Office, Canada Revenue Agency (Director), dated 21 December 2011, to issue a Foreign-Based Information Requirement (Requirement) requiring the Applicant to obtain and provide to the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) certain foreign-based information and documents.

BACKGROUND

[2] The Applicant is a Canadian resident corporation that sells footwear. Mr. Bryan Bardocz is the President of the Applicant and owns 10% of the Applicant's common shares. Mr. Bert Krista owns, directly or indirectly, 90% of the Applicant's common shares. In 2004, Mr. Krista took up residence in the Bahamas and incorporated the other four corporations involved in this application: ITPC Inc. (ITPC), Manser Inc. (Manser), MWF Inc. (MWF) and SoftPOS Inc. (SoftPOS). Mr. Krista wholly owns these four corporations.

[3] During the course of its operations, the Applicant received services from ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS, all of whom have their centers of operation in Nassau, Bahamas. During 2005 and 2006, the Applicant paid substantial amounts to these four corporations for a variety of services, such as merchandising services, information technology consulting services, business development services and software licensing fees.

[4] In April 2009, the Minister undertook an audit of the Applicant (Transfer Pricing Audit or TPA). Part of the TPA included a review of the payments made by the Applicant to ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS as consideration for the services provided by them to the Applicant. The TPA also aimed to determine whether the services said to be provided by the four companies were provided in the Bahamas or in Canada and, if the services were provided in the Bahamas, how they were provided.

[5] The Minister also sought to determine whether the consideration paid by the Applicant to the four companies benefited the Applicant. This determination was to assist in ascertaining whether the transfer price paid by the Applicant was an "arm's length transfer price."

[6] On 6 October 2009, the Applicant received an audit query from the Minister. The Applicant provided a binder of material in response. The Applicant received a second audit query on 28 January 2010, to which it responded on 26 March 2010. On 21 December 2011, the Minister issued the Requirement to the Applicant for foreign-based information pursuant to subsection 231.6(2) of the ITA.

Digitized by Google

[7] In addition to the Requirement, the Applicant was served with a request to provide certain domestic information dated 16 January 2012. On 20 March 2012, the Applicant provided the Minister with a binder of material in response to this request.

[8] On 24 January 2012, Mr. Bardocz wrote to Terry North, counsel for Mr. Krista, Manser, ITPC, MWF and SoftPOS in the Bahamas, informing him of the Requirement. On 5 March 2012, Mr. North responded to a portion of the 74 questions issued in the Requirement. MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser declined to provide some of the requested information on the basis that such information did not exist or was confidential and proprietary, or that the release of such information would detrimentally affect the competitive advantage of each corporation.

[9] The following information was not provided by the Applicant in response to the Requirement:

a. Minute books, personnel charts, information relating to the organizational structure and financial statements of ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS;
b. The names of independent buyers and purchasing agents with whom ITPC networked and any correspondence exchanged with them;
c. The names of industry experts contacted by ITPC in 2005 and 2006;
d. The names of information technology specialists who were involved in providing services, and documents supporting payments made to these specialists;
e. Documents to support payments to a U.S.-based company from Manser, and correspondence exchanged between it and Manser;
f. Whether Manser and SoftPOS provided services to other arm's length or non-arm's length customers and, if so, the names of those customers and a detailed description of the services provided; and
g. The names of employees or external computer contractors hired by Manser and their telephone numbers.

[10] Mr. Bardocz, on behalf of the Applicant, says that he does not know why the information is confidential or proprietary in nature, or how it would affect the competitive advantage of the four companies. Upon receiving the answers provided by the four companies, the Applicant commenced this judicial review.

DECISION UNDER REVIEW

[11] The Decision under review in this application is the Requirement issued by the Director on 21 December 2011. Pursuant to subsection 231.6(2) of the ITA, the Director lays out 74 questions to which the Applicant's previously provided responses from the audit queries were considered incomplete or lacking in detail.

[12] The questions in the Requirement ask for a variety of detailed information about the four Bahamian companies. Employees' names and phone numbers are requested, as is the personal information of external contractors and specialists. There are also questions about service contracts, how business relationships were built up, details about manufacturers, independent buyers and purchasing agents, merchandising agents, marketing and advertising allowances, new retail stores and their images, new products, and sales and customer programs.

[13] The Requirement requests specific details of some of the services provided by Manser to the Applicant. It also requests expenses incurred by Manser, and the cost and profit allocated to the Applicant by Manser. There are also a variety of questions about tradeshows attended by ITPC.

Digitized by Google

ISSUES

[14] The Applicant raises forward the following issues:

a) Whether the Requirement should be entirely set aside as being unreasonable on account of the following:

i. It is overly broad in scope;

ii. It requires the production of information and documents that are not relevant to the administration or enforcement of the ITA; and

iii. It requests certain information that cannot be obtained or provided by the Applicant because such information is confidential and proprietary, non-existent, or otherwise unavailable; or

b) Whether the Requirement should be varied so as to delete all questions relating to information that cannot be obtained or provided by the Applicant by virtue of such information being confidential and proprietary, non-existent, or otherwise unavailable.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

[15] The Supreme Court of Canada in Dunsmuir v New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9 held that a standard of review analysis need not be conducted in every instance. Instead, where the standard of review applicable to a particular question before the court is well-settled by past jurisprudence, the reviewing court may adopt that standard of review. Only where this search proves fruitless must the reviewing court undertake a consideration of the four factors comprising the standard of review analysis.

[16] In Saipem Luxembourg S.A. v Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2005 FCA 218 [Saipem], the Federal Court of Appeal held that the standard of review applicable to a requirement under subsection 231.6 of the ITA is reasonableness. This was also the finding of the Federal Court in Fidelity Investments Canada Ltd. v Canada (Revenue Agency), 2006 FC 551 [Fidelity] at paragraph 27.

[17] The Applicant points out that in the context of subsection 231.6, the Requirement may be found to be unreasonable even if all the requested information is relevant to the administration of the ITA. The Federal Court of Appeal said at paragraph 27 of Saipem:

> The element which is present in section 231.6, and which is lacking in section 231.2, is the availability of judicial review of the notice of requirement on the ground of unreasonableness. Such a review lacks any substance if a notice of requirement is reasonable simply because the information requested is, or may be, relevant to the administration and enforcement of the Act. Given that Parliament took the trouble to provide for a review on the basis of reasonableness, I conclude that Parliament intended that a notice of requirement in respect of a foreign-based document must not only relate to a document which is relevant to the administration and enforcement of the Act but that it must also not be unreasonable.

[18] When reviewing a decision on the standard of reasonableness, the analysis will be concerned with "the existence of justification, transparency and intelligibility within the decision-making process [and also with] whether the decision falls within a range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and law." See Dunsmuir, above, at paragraph 47, and Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v Khosa, 2009 SCC 12 at paragraph 59. Put another way, the Court should intervene only if the Decision was unreasonable in the sense that it falls outside the "range of possible, acceptable outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and law."

Digitized by Google

STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[19] The following provisions of the ITA are applicable:

Definition of "foreign-based information or document"	Sens de « renseignement ou document étranger »
231.6 (1) For the purposes of this section, "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available or located outside Canada and that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person.	231.6 (1) Pour l'application du présent article, un renseignement ou document étranger s'entend d'un renseignement accessible, ou d'un document situé, à l'étranger, qui peut être pris en compte pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi.
Requirement to provide foreign-based information	Obligation de fournir des renseignements ou documents étrangers
(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that a person resident in Canada or a non-resident person carrying on business in Canada provide any foreign-based information or document.	(2) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne résidant au Canada ou d'une personne n'y résidant pas mais y exploitant une entreprise de fournir des renseignements ou documents étrangers.
[…]	[…]
Review of foreign information requirement	Révision par un juge
(4) The person on whom a notice of a requirement is served under subsection 231.6(2) may, within 90 days after the service of the notice, apply to a judge for a review of the requirement.	4) La personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé peut, dans les 90 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, contester, par requête à un juge, la mise en demeure du ministre.
Powers on review	Pouvoirs de révision
(5) On hearing an application under subsection 231.6(4) in respect of a requirement, a judge may	(5) À l'audition de la requête, le juge peut :
(a) confirm the requirement;	a) confirmer la mise en
(b) vary the requirement as the judge considers

Digitized by Google

appropriate in the circumstances; or

(c) set aside the requirement if the judge is satisfied that the requirement is unreasonable.

Idem

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.

[…]

Consequence of failure

(8) If a person fails to comply substantially with a notice served under subsection 231.6(2) and if the notice is not set aside by a judge pursuant to subsection 231.6(5), any court having jurisdiction in a civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act shall, on motion of the Minister, prohibit the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice.

demeure;

b) modifier la mise en demeure de la façon qu'il estime indiquée dans les circonstances;

c) déclarer sans effet la mise en demeure s'il est convaincu que celle-ci est déraisonnable.

Précision

(6) Pour l'application de l'alinéa (5)c), le fait que des renseignements ou documents étrangers soient accessibles ou situés chez une personne non-résidente qui n'est pas contrôlée par la personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé, ou soient sous la garde de cette personne non-résidente, ne rend pas déraisonnable la mise en demeure de fournir ces renseignements ou documents, si ces deux personnes sont liées.

[…]

Conséquences du défaut

(8) Si une personne ne fournit pas la totalité, ou presque, des renseignements ou documents étrangers visés par la mise en demeure signifiée conformément au paragraphe (2) et si la mise en demeure n'est pas déclarée sans effet par un juge en application du paragraphe (5), tout tribunal saisi d'une affaire civile portant sur l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi doit, sur requête du ministre, refuser le dépôt en preuve par cette personne de tout renseignement ou document étranger visé par

Digitized by Google

la mise en demeure.

ARGUMENTS

The Applicant

The Requirement is Overly Broad in Scope

[20] The Applicant says that the information relating to MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser was requested by the CRA in order to assist in determining:

a) Whether the services were provided in the Bahamas or in Canada, and if provided in the Bahamas how they were provided; and

b) What is the most appropriate transfer pricing methodology for consideration paid by the Applicant to the four Bahamian companies, and whether the services were paid for at an "arm's length transfer price."

The Applicant submits that the information requested by the CRA goes well beyond what is necessary to enable the CRA to make determinations on the above issues.

[21] The Requirement requested the following information in questions 1-5, 8, 14, 23, 24, 29, 32 and 52:

a. The names of IT specialists involved in the services provided by Manser and documents supporting the payments made thereto;

b. Extensive details about a United States-based computer company that provided services to Manser, such as copies of emails and other correspondences, the name of the contact person, dates and details of services performed, the applicable service contract and documentation supporting payment for services;

c. Information about services Manser provided to any customers besides the Applicant;

d. Minute books, financial statements and a list of directors and employees for all four companies;

e. The names and telephone numbers of anyone hired by Manser to perform services for the Applicant;

f. A breakdown and details of the costs and profits allocated to the Applicant by Manser;

g. The names of independent buyers and purchasing agents with whom ITPC networked, as well as correspondences with these parties;

h. The names of industry experts contacted by ITPC; and

i. The names of other buyers with whom ITPC networked to discuss upcoming trends.

[22] The Applicant says that it has already provided the CRA with a significant amount of information for purposes of the Requirement. Specifically, it has provided:

a. Details of the processes whereby each of the four companies provided services to the Applicant; and

b. Background documentation such as correspondence, names and contact information supporting the services performed by each of the four companies for the Applicant.

[23] In Saipem, above, the requirement at issue sought "information, and production of all invoices, correspondence, agreements, contracts with amendments, financial statements, books and records of account, reports, memoranda, schedules, working papers, minutes of meetings, telexes, faxes or other documents…" The information was sought in order to carry out a general audit of the applicant's affairs with a view to determining its Canadian tax liability. The Federal Court of Appeal described the information sought by the CRA at paragraph 32 of Saipem as follows:

Digitized by Google

> In Merko and Bernick, the notices of requirement called for the production of records relating to a specific transaction in respect of which the taxpayer was claiming a tax benefit. The link between the documents whose production was sought and the individual's tax liability is obvious and reasonable. In this case, the notice of requirement requires Saipem to produce the whole of its corporate documentation for two fiscal years. The link between the documents to be produced and Saipem's liability for tax is more remote.

[24] The Applicant submits that the Requirement at issue in the present case requests the production of information even more remote than the information requested in Saipem. The CRA has essentially requested the whole of the corporate documentation of four separate foreign corporations. In addition, the purpose of the requirement in Saipem was to conduct a general audit. The purpose of the Requirement in the present case is not general; it is to determine the location from which ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS provided services to the Applicant, the manner in which those services were provided, and the appropriate transfer pricing methodology that should be applied.

[25] In Maheux c Canada (Procureur général), 1999 CarswellQue 1176 [Maheux], the requirement was issued in order to allow the CRA to confirm certain deductions for business losses claimed by a group of investors in their Canadian income tax returns. Part of this involved the consideration of certain payments that had been made to the foreign company in exchange for services allegedly provided by the foreign company. The Requirement at issue in the present case demanded the production of information such as minute books, the general ledger, sales records, salary records, bank statements, financial statements, and information relating to the business carried on by that foreign company. The Court in Maheux found the requirement to be overly broad, and that it should have been limited to information concerning the deductions. The Court varied the requirement so that the applicant was only ordered to provide confirmation of certain expenses which led to the deductions that were claimed by the group of investors.

[26] The Applicant submits that, as in Maheux, the Requirement in the present case was issued for a specific purpose: to allow the CRA to determine the location from which ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS provided services to the Applicant, the manner in which those services were provided, and the appropriate transfer pricing methodology to be applied. The Applicant submits that the Requirement requests a variety of information that is not relevant to this purpose, and that the Requirement should be limited to information that is relevant to the Minister's stated purpose.

[27] Given the narrow parameters of the Minister's stated purpose in the present case, the Applicant says that the request to provide minute books, names of executive directors, minutes of board meetings, organization charts, personnel charts and financial statements is overly broad and amounts to a "fishing expedition" by the CRA. In addition, the request to provide highly specific business and trade information possessed by Manser and ITPC is overly broad, not necessary and/or irrelevant, and the Applicant submits it is unreasonable for the CRA to require the Applicant to provide this information.

[28] The Applicant further submits that it has already provided the CRA with detailed and substantive information that is sufficient to reach determinations on the issues identified as the purpose of the TPA. Had the CRA given proper consideration to these materials, the Requirement may not have been necessary, or the questions in the Requirement could have been substantially more focused and concise.

[29] Mr. Nick Yiu, the CRA auditor assigned to this matter, was unable to identify any other audits of retail businesses that he had conducted. The Applicant submits that this indicates that he lacked experience in conducting international audits of retail businesses. Prior to the issuance of the Requirement, Mr. Yiu made no attempt to interview Mr. Krista, who Mr. Yiu states is a substantial shareholder of the Applicant. He briefly interviewed Mr. Bardocz once, as well as Mr. Matthew Wall, who was a short-term advisor to the Applicant.

Digitized by Google

[30] After Mr. Yiu's initial meeting with Mr. Bardocz, he did not request any additional follow-up meetings. Mr. Yiu admitted in his cross-examination that this was unusual in the context of a TPA. He also said in his testimony that to the date of cross-examination he had not completed a review of even the domestic materials that he received from the Applicant. The Applicant submits that had Mr. Yiu conducted further interviews with Mr. Bardocz, Mr. Krista or other high-level employees, and if he had completed a review of the materials already given, he could have significantly narrowed the scope of the Requirement.

The Requirement Demands the Production of Information and Documents that are not Relevant to the Administration or Enforcement of the ITA

[31] The test for relevance of foreign-based documents was described in European Marine Contractors Ltd. v Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), 2004 FC 114 [European Marine] at paragraph 23 as follows:

> Thus, the test to be applied is not whether the information requested will be relevant in determining the applicant's Canadian tax liability, but rather whether the information is relevant to the administration of the Act.

[32] The Respondent has taken the position that the four Bahamian companies are related to the Applicant, but this does not in itself make the Requirement reasonable. As the Federal Court said in Fidelity, above, at paragraph 32:

> …In light of subsection 231.6(6), the fact that the Applicant is related to FMR Co. and FIMMI does not make the requirement to produce information and documents unreasonable. In my opinion, however, the relationship alone does not make the requirements "reasonable". The factor of relevance must also be satisfied. In my view, there must be evidence that the documents requested are relevant for the purposes of the Act.

[33] In Fidelity, the only documents in dispute were the financial statements of two related corporations. The applicant in that case had also offered to disclose the documents subject to certain restrictions. Here, the information sought in the Requirement is far more extensive, and the Applicant has made no explicit or implicit concession of the relevance of any of the documents listed.

[34] The Applicant submits that even if all the information requested is relevant to the administration of the ITA, it is still unreasonable. The information requested by the CRA is not relevant to making determinations on the specific issues identified in the Affidavit of Mr. Yiu. The detailed information requested in the Requirement is entirely irrelevant to the administration of the ITA as it relates to the Applicant, and cannot assist the CRA in determining the location from which services were provided, the manner in which services were provided, or the appropriate transfer pricing methodology.

[35] The Applicant further submits that section 231.6 "pertains only to information as to a particular taxpayer in question." In eBay Canada Ltd. v Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.), 2007 FC 930 at paragraph 22 the Court provided as follows:

> The Applicants argue that since section 231.6 makes express provision whereby the Minister can seek information from foreign sources, section 231.2 must be read such that it contemplates only information resident in Canada. Counsel for the Minister argues that section 231.6 is more restrictive than section 231.2 in that section 231.6 pertains only to information as to a particular taxpayer in question whereas section 231.2 pertains to "any information" and to "any person" so long as the purposes are genuinely those contemplated by the Income Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

[36] The Applicant submits that the information about MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser requested in the Requirement relates only to those corporations, and not to the Applicant. Therefore, such documents are outside the scope of subsection 231.6 of the ITA.

The Requirement Demands Information that Cannot be Obtained or Provided by the Applicant Because Such Information is Confidential and Proprietary, Non-existent, or Otherwise Unavailable

[37] In Fidelity, the requirement at issue sought the financial statements of two related foreign companies. The Court was satisfied the financial statements in question were essentially confidential, and held at paragraphs 42-43:

> Section 231.6 does not identify the confidential nature of information as a basis for non-disclosure when a notice is issued pursuant to this provision. There is no evidence to suggest that the Respondent is engaged in a "fishing trip" for the purpose of using the financial statements of FIMMI and FMR Co. other than in the conduct of an audit of the Applicant. In general, the Minister is subject to the obligation of acting in good faith. That obligation has been recognized by the Courts in respect of notices issued pursuant to section 231.2 of the Act; see M.N.R. v. Sand Exploration Ltd., [1995] 3 F.C. 44 (T.D.). I see no reason in principle why the same obligation of good faith would not exist with respect to notices issued pursuant to section 231.6 of the Act.
>
> That being so, I conclude that the Applicant's concerns about the confidential nature of the financial statements in issue do not establish that the request for their production is unreasonable…

[38] The Applicant submits the issue of confidentiality in the present application can be distinguished from Fidelity in two respects. First, the information requested in this Requirement is far more extensive than that requested in Fidelity. The Requirement here demands the production of a significant amount of corporate information, as well as sensitive details regarding business practices and procedures of four foreign corporations.

[39] Secondly, the issue in Fidelity was the disclosure of the financial statements to the CRA. Here, the issue is the disclosure of the information to the Applicant. The four Bahamian corporations do not wish to provide this information to anyone, including the Applicant. In particular, Manser and ITPC do not want to provide the contact information of and correspondence with buyers and purchasing agents, industry experts, IT specialists, other customers, and employees.

[40] The value of the services performed by MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser derives from their specific industry knowledge. For these corporations to divulge the information requested, including to the Applicant itself, would undermine the value of the services. The CRA's attempt to value these services should not destroy their value in the process.

[41] The Applicant acknowledges that subsection 231.6(6) of the ITA says that a requirement shall not be considered unreasonable because the information requested is under the control of a non-resident person and the Applicant is related to that person. However, as established in Fidelity, the fact that the parties are related does not make the Requirement reasonable. The Applicant submits that the extent and nature of the information sought by the CRA is such that the Requirement is unreasonable and should be set aside.

Consequences of Failure to Comply

[42] The Federal Court of Appeal described the potential consequences of a failure to comply with a requirement at paragraph 24 of Saipem:

> …the recipient of a notice of requirement is not free to choose which of > the documents demanded he will produce, as suggested in the learned judge's reasons. Subsection 231.6(8) is explicit that if the notice of requirement is not "substantially complied with", the court may make an order which "prohibit[s] the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice" [emphasis added]. Consequently, even if the taxpayer partially complies with the Requirement, the court can order than none of the material covered by the notice can be tendered, not even those documents which have been produced. Thus, the broader the demand, the more drastic the consequences of non-compliance.

Digitized by Google

[43] The Applicant says that the risk it faces from the potential application of subsection 231.6(8) is enhanced by the uncertainty of the application of the subsection, which is not definitively determined on a judicial review of a requirement but in the course of a future civil proceeding. As described in 1144020 Ontario Ltd. v Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.), 2005 FC 813 at paragraph 78:

> In my view, it is not appropriate that this Court issue such a declaration of substantial compliance, at least in the circumstances of the present case. While the Court has the evidence of the applicant's deponents that the applicant has complied with the foreign-based requirements, there is no independent means of verifying the accuracy of this evidence. The proper time and forum for the determination of substantial compliance is when, in any civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act, the applicant attempts to introduce information or a document that the Minister believes was covered by the foreign-based requirements.

[44] The Applicant submits that it has already provided significant information to the CRA in response to the Requirement, and that the risk of holding that it has failed to substantially comply with the Requirement is unfairly prejudicial to the Applicant, considering its overly broad scope.

Conclusion and Relief Sought

[45] The Applicant reiterates that the Requirement is unreasonable because it is overly broad in scope, it requires production of information that is irrelevant to the administration of the ITA and the stated purpose of the Requirement, and it requires the production of confidential information from third parties which, if disclosed, would destroy the value of the services provided by those third parties. In addition, the broad scope of the Requirement creates a risk the Applicant will lose recourse to information legitimately provided in response to the Requirement. Accordingly, the Applicant submits the Requirement is unreasonable and should be set aside.

[46] In the alternative, the Applicant submits the Requirement should be varied to delete all questions relating to information that cannot be obtained or provided by the Applicant by virtue of such information being confidential and proprietary, non-existent or otherwise unavailable. Specifically, the Applicant requests the following questions in the Requirement be varied or deleted: 1-5, 8, 14, 15, 23, 24, 29, 32, 52.

The Respondent

[47] The Respondent points out that section 231.6 of the ITA gives the Minister strong, comprehensive and far-reaching powers to secure foreign based information or documents which "may be relevant to the administration or enforcement" of the ITA (Merko v Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.), [1991] 1 FC 239 at paragraph 24). The Respondent submits that the Requirement is reasonable as it seeks relevant and necessary information and documents, it is not overly broad, and the material sought is available.

Digitized by Google

The Material Sought is for a Purpose Related to the Administration and Enforcement of the ITA

[48] Obtaining information and documents relevant to the tax liability of a taxpayer through the issuance of a requirement is a purpose related to the administration and enforcement of the ITA. Subsection 231.6(1) says that foreign-based information includes any information or document "that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act" [emphasis added].

[49] The Respondent points out that a requirement issued under section 231.2 of the ITA is valid if the requested information may be relevant for the determination of the tax liability of a taxpayer. The case law establishes that the threshold for relevance is low (see Tower v Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.), 2003 FCA 307 at paragraph 29; Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP and Gilbert Schmunk v The Minister of National Revenue, 2002 DTC 7310 (FCTD) at paragraphs 20-27). The threshold for relevance for a requirement issued under subsection 231.6 is similarly low. Furthermore, the Minister has no way of knowing whether the material sought is relevant until she has had an opportunity to examine that material (AGT Ltd. v Canada (Attorney General), [1997] 2 FC 878 (FCA) at paragraph 23).

The Material Sought is Relevant and Necessary

[50] The Affidavit of Mr. Yiu clearly sets out why this material is necessary and how it is relevant to the administration and enforcement of the ITA. He maintains that the information is required in order to determine from which location the services of the four Bahamian companies were provided, and to determine the proper transfer-pricing methodology. Mr. Yiu maintained on cross-examination that this information is required for him to properly perform the TPA.

[51] The Requirement seeks specific information and documents from the four companies related to the services they provide to the Applicant, how the services are provided, and who within the company provides the services. This material will enable the Minister to perform a functional analysis and determine where and how the services were provided. The Requirement also seeks corporate and financial materials to enable the Minister to determine the appropriate transfer pricing methodology to apply so that she can determine whether the transfer price paid by the Applicant was an arm's length transfer price.

[52] The Applicant says that the material sought is "entirely irrelevant" to the administration of the ITA as it relates to the Applicant, but the Respondent submits that this is incorrect. On cross-examination, Mr. Yiu said that he conducts interviews with the people who run companies as part of the audit. In order to conduct interviews, the CRA requires the names of executive directors and must have access to organizational and personnel charts.

[53] With respect to the other information, Mr. Yiu was clear that the material was sought in order to verify the answers previously provided by the Applicant. Mr. Yiu explained that he needs to verify that the services provided by the four companies exist, and who performs them (see page 196 of the Respondent's Record). Thus, the Respondent submits the information sought is relevant.

The Requirement is not Overly Broad

[54] Given that the information sought from the Applicant is necessary and relevant to the ongoing TPA, the Respondent submits that the Requirement is not overly broad. The Applicant characterizes the CRA's purpose as having "narrow parameters," and argues that the Requirement amounts to a "fishing expedition." The Respondent submits that this characterization is inaccurate and fails to appreciate the complex nature of a TPA and the type of information that is needed to verify that the transfer price paid by the Applicant to the four companies is an arm's length transfer price.

Digitized by Google

[55] Guidance as to the nature or type of information and documents to be obtained as part of a TPA is found in the CRA's Information Circular 87-2R as well as the 2010 Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development Transfer Pricing Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises and Administration (the Guidelines). The Guidelines explain the wide variety of documentation that ought to be considered in determining a transfer pricing methodology (page 44 of the Respondent's Record).

[56] Mr. Yiu explained in his affidavit and cross-examination that the first step is to review the function provided by the offshore entity. Function refers to what services are provided by the staff of the off-shore entity and the Canadian company. It is necessary to determine if the functions exist before the appropriate methodology can be selected. This is determined after a review of documents that would indicate that the services were in fact performed. Mr. Yiu explains in his affidavit that at this stage, the CRA does not have enough information to determine which pricing methodology to use (page 6 of the Respondent's Record).

[57] In Saipem, above, the Federal Court of Appeal held it was reasonable for the Minister to require production of the whole of the foreign company's corporate documentation for two fiscal years. The Applicant seeks to distinguish that case on the basis that the Minister's stated purpose was to perform a general audit, whereas here the Minister's purpose is to conduct a narrower TPA. The Respondent submits this is simply not the case. Part of the general audit in Saipem was to determine whether the company had a permanent establishment in Canada. To do so, production of the corporate documents was required. Here, the Minister seeks information to determine whether the services were performed in the Bahamas or in Canada, and if performed in the Bahamas how they were provided, in order to determine the appropriate transfer pricing methodology. The information sought from the Applicant is necessary to make those determinations.

[58] The Applicant also relies on the decision in Maheux. The evidence given by the principal of the foreign company in that case was that the requirement sought information that included business dealings of the foreign company that did not involve the Canadian taxpayers. The Court limited the requirement to the information in the possession of the foreign company that related to the Canadian taxpayers (Maheux at paragraphs 34-35).

[59] The Respondent submits that, unlike in Maheux, the Requirement in this case does not inadvertently capture the four companies' other business dealings. There is no evidence that these companies had any business dealings with any persons other than the Applicant at the material time. In fact, the evidence is that the Applicant is MWF, SoftPOS and ITPC's only client.

[60] The Applicant proposes that the scope of the Requirement can be narrowed and that Mr. Yiu should interview certain people. The Federal Court of Appeal made clear in Saipem that it is not up to the Applicant to say how the CRA should conduct its audit. The Federal Court of Appeal said at paragraph 36 of Saipem that "It is the Agency's prerogative as to whether it will conduct an audit, and what form that audit will take."

[61] The Applicant also suggests that the information and documents provided to date provide a response to the Requirement. The Respondent submits that there is no evidence before this Court to support this suggestion.

[62] Although the material sought is part of the records of the four companies, it is still relevant and necessary to determine the Applicant's tax liability, and whether the transfer price paid to the four companies for the services provided was at an arm's length transfer price. The Requirement is not overly broad in scope and should not be set aside in whole or in part as it seeks relevant and necessary information that is required in order to properly conduct the TPA of the Applicant's 2005 and 2006 taxation years.

The Information is not Confidential or Proprietary

[63] There is no evidence that the information sought is confidential and/or proprietary.

Digitized by Google

The only evidence before the Court is the affidavit of Mr. Bardocz. In cross-examination, he could not provide an explanation as to why the documents requested were confidential and/or proprietary, and he admitted he never asked any of the four companies for an explanation. He admitted on cross-examination that he never followed up with any of the companies as to why this information would be considered confidential or proprietary.

[64] In any event, the Respondent submits it is not unreasonable to require production of information pursuant to subsection 231.6 even if the information is confidential or proprietary. In Fidelity, above, it was found at paragraphs 42-43 that the confidential nature of information is not a basis for non-disclosure pursuant to a requirement issued under subsection 231.6 of the ITA.

[65] The Applicant suggests that the four Bahamian companies do not wish to disclose this information to anyone, including the Applicant, because disclosing the information could "destroy" the very value of the services the four companies provide. The Respondent submits that there is no evidence that disclosure would have any impact on the value of the services provided by the four companies. As previously stated, Mr. Bardocz was unable to explain why this information is confidential and/or proprietary, and there is no other evidence as to how disclosure would impact the value of the services provided by the four companies.

[66] The Applicant and the four companies are related. Mr. Krista owns 90% of the Applicant and 100% of the foreign companies. It is Mr. Krista who empowers Mr. Bardocz to run the Applicant in Canada. The Applicant is MWF, SoftPOS and ITPC's only client. The Respondent states that it is disingenuous to argue that, as owner of the four foreign companies, Mr. Krista refuses to disclose the information to the Applicant.

[67] The Respondent also questions whether the Applicant could or would use the information in any way to the detriment of the four companies. Given that the Applicant is MWF, SoftPOS and ITPC's only client, the only way the information could affect the services they provide would be if the Applicant chose to alter their arrangement.

[68] The ITA specifically prohibits this type of attempt to shelter information at subsection 231.6(6):

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.	(6) Pour l'application de l'alinéa (5)c), le fait que des renseignements ou documents étrangers soient accessibles ou situés chez une personne non-résidente qui n'est pas contrôlée par la personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé, ou soient sous la garde de cette personne non-résidente, ne rend pas déraisonnable la mise en demeure de fournir ces renseignements ou documents, si ces deux personnes sont liées.

[69] The Respondent submits it is not open to the Applicant to argue that the Requirement is unreasonable because the information being sought is in the hands of the four companies, which are related to the Applicant.

[70] To the extent that the Applicant has concerns with disclosing the information to the Minister, the Court in Fidelity noted at paragraph 42 that the Minister is subject to an obligation to act in good faith. As established in that case, concerns with providing information to the CRA do not establish that production is unreasonable.

Digitized by Google

[71] The Respondent submits there is no evidence that disclosing the information will impact the value of the services the four companies provide. Therefore, the confidential and/or proprietary nature of the information is no basis for limiting the information sought under the Requirement.

Consequences of the Failure to Comply

[72] Where the information sought by the Minister is both necessary and relevant to the TPA, subsection 231.6(8) operates as it should to prevent abuse. The Respondent submits that if individuals were permitted to pick and chose what information to provide, and then later during a civil proceeding they are permitted to rely on only what they choose to provide, there is potential for them to create a completely inaccurate representation of their tax affairs.

[73] The Respondent takes the position that the information in this case is both necessary and relevant to the TPA issues, and the potential consequences for failing to disclose are no basis for narrowing or setting aside the Requirement.

ANALYSIS

Broadness and the Relevance of the Information Requested in the Requirement

[74] The Applicant's position is that the information and documents requested by CRA go well beyond what is necessary to enable CRA to make determinations on the issues of concern under the TPA. Relying upon Saipem, above, the Applicant says that not only was the information and documentation requested not relevant to the administration and enforcement of the ITA, it amounted to a far-reaching fishing expedition.

[75] In the present case, it is true that the Requirement was issued for specific purposes:

a. To allow CRA to see or determine the location from which ITPC, Manser, MWF and SoftPOS provided services to the Applicant;

b. To allow CRA to determine the manner in which the services were provided; and

c. To allow CRA to determine the appropriate transfer pricing methodology.

[76] The Applicant's complaint is that, given these objectives, the requirement to produce minute books, organization charts, personnel charts, and financial statements for each of the four Bahamian companies is overly broad, and the requirement to produce information related to the highly specific business and trade information of the four companies is overly broad, unnecessary, irrelevant, and unreasonable. Due consideration to the materials provided to date, or an interview with Mr. Krista would have provided sufficient information for the specific purposes or would have significantly narrowed the scope of the Requirement.

[77] In his affidavit and on cross-examination, Mr. Yiu explains the analysis that is required to determine an appropriate transfer pricing methodology. As part of this process, it is necessary to document whether the services were in fact performed at the material time. It is also necessary to ascertain and confirm what functions were provided by the four Bahamian companies and the Applicant. However, before the appropriate transfer pricing methodology is selected CRA has to ascertain if the functions of all these companies exist and were performed. As Mr. Yiu explains in his affidavit, all of the documentation requested was needed to assess the arms-length issue because CRA needs to know the who, what, where and how of how the services were provided to the Applicant in a situation where the Applicant and the four Bahamian companies were owned and controlled by Mr. Krista. Any information already provided by the Applicant needs to be verified. Under this kind of TPA the quality of information provided cannot be ascertained without verification.

[78] In my view, the Applicant has not convincingly challenged Mr. Yiu's evidence that this was the best evidence for CRA to seek for the purposes of the TPA.

Digitized by Google

[79] In this case, CRA is conducting a TPA of the Applicant. In connection with that TPA, the Minister is reviewing the payments made by the Applicant to the four Bahamian companies for the services. The Minister seeks specific information related to those payments to determine whether the services were performed in the Bahamas or Canada and, if in the Bahamas, how the services were provided, and to determine the appropriate transfer pricing methodology to be applied so that the Minister can ascertain whether the transfer price paid was an arms-length transfer. In my view, the information sought from the Applicant is necessary to make these determinations and to verify information that has already been provided.

[80] Also, in my view, the link between the information and documentation requested and the purposes of the TPA is both obvious and reasonable. As in Saipem, at paragraph 36:

> It is the Agency's prerogative as to whether it will conduct an audit, and what form that audit will take. Given that the records in question are, by definition, maintained outside Canada, the Agency can do little more to gain access to the records than issue the notice of requirement which it issued here. If the result is an audit which does not meet the Agency's usual standards, it is nonetheless the best audit the Agency can conduct in the circumstances. As a result, I conclude that the Agency's determination to conduct an audit supports the scope of the notice of requirement served upon Saipem by the Minister.

[81] Subsection 231.6 of ITA makes it clear that "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available, or located outside of Canada and that "may be relevant" to the administration or enforcement of the Act, including the collection of any amount payable under the act by any person.

[82] The documents requested in the Requirement need to be both relevant and reasonable, but the cases say that the threshold is low and the powers of the Minister are wide-ranging. See Tower, above, at paragraph 29. As the Respondent points out, Saipem, above, also makes it clear that it is not for the Applicant to say what will suffice. See paragraph 35.

[83] Further, as the Respondent points out, unlike in Maheux, the Requirement issued to the Applicant is this case does not inadvertently capture irrelevant business dealings of the four Bahamian companies. This is because there is no evidence to indicate that these companies do business with anyone else except the Applicant. The Applicant is the only client of three of the companies. This justifies the scope of the documentation and information requested. Mr. Krista owns, either directly or indirectly, 90% of the Applicant's common shares. He ceased doing business in Canada in 2004 and took up residency in the Bahamas, whereupon he incorporated the four companies to provide services to the Applicant. Mr. Krista owns 100% of the common shares of the Bahamian companies. During 2005 and 2006, the Applicant paid substantial amounts of money to the four Bahamian companies as consideration for a variety of services to be provided to the Applicant.

[84] Given these arrangements, it is obvious that the information which the CRA seeks may well be part of the corporate and other documents requested in the Requirement, and it is not for the Applicant to say that such information could be ascertained by other means. See Saipem, above, at paragraph 36. Even an interview with Mr. Krista would not have provided the CRA with the objective confirmation it requires to complete the TPA. In my view, then, the Requirement is not overly broad in scope because it seeks relevant and necessary information to properly conduct the TPA for the 2005 and 2006 taxation years and assess the Applicant's tax liability and whether the transfer price paid by the Applicant to the four Bahamian companies for the services was an arms-length transfer price. Documentation and information requested in the Requirement are both relevant and reasonable.

Information in Confidential and Proprietary, Non-existent, or Otherwise

Digitized by Google

Unavailable

[85] The Applicant seeks to distinguish the present situation from that in Fidelity, above, in several ways. The Applicant says that, in Fidelity, the Court was only dealing with allegedly confidential financial statements for two related companies. In the present case, the Requirement seeks the production of significant corporate documentation, as well as sensitive details regarding business practices and procedures of the four Bahamian companies.

[86] The Applicant provides little in the way of evidence to establish that the corporate documentation and business practices and procedures in question are confidential or proprietary or sensitive. There is no reason to distinguish the present situation from the guidance given in Fidelity on point:

> In Fidelity the Applicant argued that the requirement at issue was unreasonable, in part because the documents sought by the CRA, being financial statements of two related foreign corporations, were confidential. The Court was satisfied that the financial statements in question were essentially confidential, but held:
>
> > Section 231.6 does not identify the confidential nature of information as a basis for non-disclosure when the notice is issued pursuant to this provision. There is no evidence to suggest that the Respondent is engaged in a "fishing trip" for the purpose of using the financial statements of FIMMI and FM Co. other than in the conduct of an audit of the Applicant. In general, the Minister is subject to the obligation of acting in good faith. That obligation has been recognized by the Courts in respect of notices issued pursuant to section 231.2 of the Act; see Minister of National Revenue v. Sand Exploration Ltd., [1995] 3 F.C. 44 (Fed. T.D.). I see no reason in principle why the same obligation of good faith would not exist with respect to notices issued pursuant to section 231.6 of the Act.
> >
> > That being so, I conclude that the Applicant's concerns about the confidential nature of the financial statements in issue did not establish that the request for their production is unreasonable.
> >
> > […]

[87] The Applicant also says that the four Bahamian companies are, unlike in Fidelity, not refusing to disclose information to CRA; they are refusing to disclose the documentation and information to anyone, including the Applicant.

[88] Given the corporate relationship between the Applicant and the four Bahamian companies, and the control that resides in Mr. Krista, this is equivalent to saying that Mr. Krista refuses to divulge information to the Applicant — a company he controls — from four companies he also controls. In any event, the proprietary or sensitive character of information is not a reason for finding a notice of requirement unreasonable. See Fidelity, above, at paragraph 43.

[89] The rationale offered by the Applicant is that the value of the services performed by MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser derives from the specific industry knowledge, contact information, and other confidential business information possessed by those corporations. It is alleged that for any of these corporations to divulge such information to any person or corporation, including the Applicant itself, would undermine the value of the services to which such information relates.

[90] The Applicant argues that to the extent that the CRA seeks to determine the value of the services performed by MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser, it would be entirely antithetical to such determination to destroy the value of such services by indirectly forcing MWF, ITPC, SoftPOS and Manser to divulge the very business strategies and practices that allow them to provide such value to the Applicant in the first place.

Digitized by Google

[91] There is no evidence to support these assertions.

[92] In my view, the relevance and reasonableness of the Requirement have nothing to do with the compellability of either the four Bahamian companies or Mr. Krista. As in Saipem, given that the documentation and information are maintained outside of Canada, CRA could do little more to gain access to the records than issue the Requirement. Subsection 231.6(6) of the Act provides as follows:

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.	(6) Pour l'application de l'alinéa (5)c), le fait que des renseignements ou documents étrangers soient accessibles ou situés chez une personne non-résidente qui n'est pas contrôlée par la personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé, ou soient sous la garde de cette personne non-résidente, ne rend pas déraisonnable la mise en demeure de fournir ces renseignements ou documents, si ces deux personnes sont liées.

There is no evidence before me that it would require an extensive effort to provide the information requested or that providing it would destroy its value as alleged by the Applicant.

[93] The Minister's obligation to act in good faith under the ITA and the protection that this provides has not been challenged before me. There is no basis upon which to set aside this Requirement.

[94] Finally, the consequences of not providing the documentation and information requested as outlined in subsection 231.6(8) of the Act cannot, in my view, have anything to do with the relevance or reasonableness of the Requirement. Mr. Krista and the four Bahamian companies he controls are not compellable, but they have to realize that the Applicant's inability to substantially comply with the Requirement at this stage could lead to future negative consequences for the Applicant. This is, in essence, the purpose behind the issuance of a requirement under the ITA, and the consequences seem wholly appropriate in this case.

Digitized by Google

JUDGMENT

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that

1. The application is dismissed with costs to the Respondent.

"James Russell"
Judge

Access to Information on Foreign Databases and What Constitutes Foreign-based Information Ebay Canada Limited And Ebay Cs Vancouver Inc. v. MNR[94] is an appeal case that perfectly speaks of the issue of whether information accessible in Canada through a computer terminal, generally, is foreign based information that would allow it to fall under the scope of Sec. 231.6. The issue was raised by the taxpayer's counsel since the Minister had made a request of the identity of Powersellers on the eBay network to determine their tax positions and eBay counsel attempted to argue that since the information "resided" on servers in the US it was not within the scope of the Sec. 231.2 RFI request and since s. 231.6 did not allow requests for unidentified taxpayers (foreign source info.) it could also not be requested under that section. The appeal court held:

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

EVANS J.A.

A. INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal by eBay Canada Ltd. and eBay CS Vancouver Inc. (collectively, "eBay Canada" or "the appellants") from a decision of the Federal Court (2008 FC 180). In that decision, Justice Hughes affirmed his ex parte order authorizing the Minister of National Revenue to impose a requirement on the appellants to produce information identifying "PowerSellers" in Canada who have sold more than a certain volume of items on eBay, the world's largest global online marketplace. The Minister wants this information, as well their gross sales, in order to determine whether the PowerSellers have complied with their obligation under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.) c. 1 ("Act") to report their income.

[2] The requirement to produce information in this case was imposed under section 231.2 of the Act which confers broad and general powers on the Minister to require any person to produce information for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Act. The appellants say that this section does not apply to the facts of this case because the information sought is "foreign-based information", which is the subject of a comprehensive code in section 231.6. It is important in this case, they argue, to determine which section the Minister may use because section 231.6 does not provide for the imposition of a requirement to produce foreign-based information relating to unnamed persons. In contrast, section 231.2 expressly empowers the Minister, with judicial authorization, to require the production of information relating to unnamed persons.

[3] The information identifying Canadian eBay sellers is stored as electronic records on servers in the United States owned by eBay Inc. ("eBay US"). The records are compiled and maintained by eBay International AG ("eBay International"), a Swiss corporation which is a wholly owned subsidiary of eBay US. The principal question to be decided in this appeal is whether the information sought by the Minister is "foreign-based" because it is "available or located outside Canada" for the purpose of subsection 231.6, despite the fact that the appellants, Canadian corporations, have been authorized to access it in Canada for use in their business, but do not download it to their computers.

---

[94] 2008 FCA 348

Digitized by Google

[4] In my view, Justice Hughes made no reversible error in concluding on the facts before him that the information sought was not "foreign-based information"; even though stored on servers outside Canada, it was also located in Canada because of its ready accessibility to and use by the appellants. Consequently, it was open to the Minister to seek its production by a requirement imposed on the appellants under section 231.2, without regard to any possible limitations on those powers flowing from the presence of section 231.6. Since the Judge properly authorized the imposition of the requirement under section 231.2, I would dismiss the appeal.

B. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[5] eBay US operates an online marketplace ("eBay") in conjunction with its subsidiaries around the world. Registered users of eBay offer goods and services for sale on one of eBay's websites for purchase by the highest bidder. Sellers pay a fee for use of the eBay marketplace. Neither eBay US nor any of its subsidiaries is a party to the contracts of sale made by buyers and sellers on eBay.

[6] The appellant, eBay CS Vancouver Inc., is wholly owned by eBay US. The other appellant, eBay Canada Limited, is wholly owned by eBay International, the wholly owned subsidiary of eBay US.

[7] eBay International conducts most eBay activities outside the United States, including billing eBay users for fees and banking, the provision of a website platform directed at the eBay market in Canada, and a website with the domain name of eBay.ca, which is situated on servers outside Canada. eBay Canada uses the eBay.ca domain name and provides market assistance and research, and other administrative services, to eBay International, but has nothing to do with billing customers, receiving payments, or collecting fees.

[8] eBay US and eBay International grant eBay Canada secure online access to confidential information about Canadian users of eBay, which is stored on eBay US's servers in California. Under provisions in agreements with eBay US and eBay International, eBay Canada is required to keep confidential information provided to it "concerning the eBay system", except to the extent that its disclosure is ordered by law. eBay Canada says that these provisions include information concerning PowerSellers in Canada.

[9] The information sought from eBay Canada by the Minister comprises the names, addresses and other identifying information, and the gross sales for 2004 and 2005, of eBay PowerSellers who are registered as having a Canadian address. Registered eBay users earn the PowerSeller designation on the basis of the value of their eBay sales, the length of time that they have been selling, their financial record, and whether they have been the subject of complaints from other eBay users.

[10] PowerSellers' sales records vary widely. They may include, on the one hand, individuals who, on a casual basis, have sold goods or services for US$3,000 in one year and, on the other, corporations that have sold items for as much as US$450,000 in a similar period.

[11] Designation as a PowerSeller carries significant benefits. For instance, PowerSellers receive an enhanced level of eBay services, and potential purchasers are likely to have more confidence in the reliability and integrity of a seller with this designation. The PowerSellers program is an important part of the promotion of eBay and exists in many countries. Registered eBay users may join a program in their own country; residents of Canada may become PowerSellers on eBay.ca. The precise number of PowerSellers in the Canadian program is not known, but is estimated to be in the region of 10,000.

[12] There is no evidence that eBay Canada has either printed, or downloaded onto its computers in Canada, the information about PowerSellers sought by the Minister. However, it is conceded that eBay Canada has been granted access to and regularly uses this information as an integral part of its business: see 2007 FC 930 at para. 12.

Digitized by Google

[13] The Minister did not know the names and contact information of Canadian PowerSellers or the value of the goods and services that they had sold on eBay. Accordingly, he applied ex parte to the Federal Court under subsection 231.2(3) for an order authorizing him to impose a requirement on eBay Canada to produce information and documents that would enable him to audit them. Justice Hughes granted the ex parte application on November 6, 2006, requiring the appellants to provide to the Minister

> … the following information and documents for any person having a Canadian address according to your records (including individual, corporation and joint venture) who qualified for the PowerSeller status under eBay's PowerSeller program in Canada at any time during the two calendar years 2004 and 2005:
>
> a) account information – full name, user id, mailing address, billing address, telephone number, fax number and email address; and
>
> b) merchandise sales information – gross annual sales
>
> Original documents in their original forms are required. Photocopies of information or documents will not be sufficient. Where these records exist in electronic format, I require that the records be provided in electronically readable format.

[14] After receiving notice of the ex parte order, the appellants made an application to Justice Hughes under subsection 231.2(5) to review it.

C. DECISION OF THE FEDERAL COURT

[15] Before issuing his final judgment, which is the subject of this appeal, Justice Hughes issued reasons and a partial judgment on September 18, 2007 (2007 FC 930), in which he rejected the appellants' principal argument. They had argued that the information and documents sought could not be the subject of a requirement under the Minister's general power in section 231.2, because they were stored on servers in California and therefore constituted "foreign-based information" for the purpose of section 231.6. Further, they said, section 231.6 does not authorize a requirement to be imposed for the production of foreign-based information relating to unnamed persons. The appellants alleged that, by resorting to section 231.2, the Minister had improperly tried to escape this and other limitations imposed by section 231.6 on requirements to produce records located outside Canada.

[16] The Judge noted the breadth of the power conferred on the Minister by subsection 231.2 to require the production of information, including the power to require a person to produce information relating to another person whose tax affairs the Minister wished to examine. Justice Hughes concluded that the scope of the power exercisable under section 231.2 in this case cannot be affected by section 231.6, because section 231.6 applies only to "foreign-based information", which, he found, did not include the information sought by the Minister from eBay Canada.

[17] In reaching this conclusion, Justice Hughes observed that, since electronically stored information relating to PowerSellers was readily, lawfully, and instantaneously available in a variety of places to eBay entities, including to the appellants in Canada, the location of the servers on which it was stored was irrelevant (2007 FC 930 at para. 23). He relied on judicial descriptions of telecommunications from a foreign state to Canada, and vice versa, as being "both here and there" (see Society of Composers, Authors and Music Publishers in Canada v. Canadian Association of Internet Providers, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 427 at para. 59 ("SOCAN")), and on the particular facts of this case concerning eBay Canada's permitted and actual use of the information.

[18] Justice Hughes delayed deciding the remaining issue (namely, whether there was sufficient evidence that the Minister required the information to audit Canadian PowerSellers for compliance with the Income Tax Act) until this Court released its decision in Canada

Digitized by Google

(Minister of National Revenue) v. Greater Montreal Real Estate Board, 2007 FCA 346, 2007 D.T.C. 5740, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 32404 (April 24, 2008) ("GMREB"), and the parties had had an opportunity to make written submissions on it. In further reasons and final judgment, dated February 13, 2008 (2008 FC 180), Justice Hughes held that he was bound by GMREB on the applicable test (the "good faith audit" test) and concluded that on the basis of the evidence before him, the Minister had met it. He also said that, even if the more demanding test relied on by the appellants were applicable (the "genuine and serious inquiry" test), the evidence was sufficient to meet it too.

[19] Having also satisfied himself that the Minister had met the statutory preconditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) and (b) to the imposition of a requirement under this section, Justice Hughes affirmed his ex parte order authorizing the requirement, but amended it to cover information concerning the identity of PowerSellers "registered as having a Canadian address", rather than those "having a Canadian address according to your records".

[20] This appeal is from the final judgment of Justice Hughes. However, since the issues raised are considered in both sets of the Judge's reasons, it will be necessary to refer to the reasons for the partial and the final judgments.

D. LEGISLATIVE FRAMEWORK

[21] It is important to situate the particular issues raised in this appeal within the wider context of the statutory powers from which they arise. The following general provision confers broad powers on the Minister to require the provision of information and documents.

231.2(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as stipulated in the notice, (a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or (b) any document.	231.2(1) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, sous réserve du paragraphe (2) et pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne, dans le délai raisonnable que précise l'avis : a) qu'elle fournisse tout renseignement ou tout renseignement supplémentaire, y compris une déclaration de revenu ou une déclaration supplémentaire; b) qu'elle produise des documents.

[22] While subsection 231.2(1) is stated to operate "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act", it is expressly made subject to subsection (2), which provides that prior judicial authorization is needed when, as in the present case, the requirement relates to information respecting unnamed persons.

231.2(2) The Minister shall not impose on any person (in this section referred to as a "third party") a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) to provide	231.2(2) Le ministre ne peut exiger de quiconque — appelé « tiers » au présent article — la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue

Digitized by Google

information or any document relating to one or more unnamed persons unless the Minister first obtains the authorization of a judge under subsection 231.2(3).

(3) On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that

(a) the person or group is ascertainable; and

(b) the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act.

au paragraphe (1) concernant une ou plusieurs personnes non désignées nommément, sans y être au préalable autorisé par un juge en vertu du paragraphe (3).

(3) Sur requête ex parte du ministre, un juge peut, aux conditions qu'il estime indiquées, autoriser le ministre à exiger d'un tiers la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue au paragraphe (1) concernant une personne non désignée nommément ou plus d'une personne non désignée nommément — appelée « groupe » au présent article —, s'il est convaincu, sur dénonciation sous serment, de ce qui suit :

a) cette personne ou ce groupe est identifiable;

b) la fourniture ou la production est exigée pour vérifier si cette personne ou les personnes de ce groupe ont respecté quelque devoir ou obligation prévu par la présente loi.

[23] It is evident from paragraph 231.2(3)(b) that subsection 231.2(2) is intended to be used when the Minister wishes to verify whether the unnamed persons, not the person on whom the requirement is served, are in compliance with their obligations under the Act. See, for example, Bernick v. Canada (Minster of National Revenue), 2002 D.T.C. 7167 at para. 10 (Ont. SCJ).

[24] A person on whom an ex parte order is served under subsection 231.2(3) must be served with notice of both it and the notice referred to in subsection 231.2(1) (see subsection 231.2(4)), and may request a review of the order by a judge, normally the judge who issued it.

(5) Where an authorization is granted under subsection 231.2(3), a third party on whom a notice is served under subsection 231.2(1) may, within 15 days after the service of the notice, apply to the judge who granted the authorization or, where the judge is unable to act, to another judge of the same court for a review of the authorization.

(5) Le tiers à qui un avis est signifié ou envoyé conformément au paragraphe (1) peut, dans les 15 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, demander au juge qui a accordé l'autorisation prévue au paragraphe (3) ou, en cas d'incapacité de ce juge, à un autre juge du même tribunal de réviser l'autorisation.

[25] In conducting the review, the judge must consider whether she or he is satisfied that the conditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) and (b) are met. If the judge is not so satisfied, the ex parte order may be cancelled, otherwise the order may be confirmed or varied: subsection 231.2(6).

Digitized by Google

[26] The sanctions for non-compliance with an order issued under section 231.2 are criminal prosecution (section 238) and contempt proceedings (subsection 231.7(4)).

[27] Section 231.6 was added to the Act in 1988 by S.C. 1988, c. 55, section 175, and deals with requirements for the production of "foreign-based information", which is defined as follows.

231.6 (1) For the purposes of this section, "foreign-based information or document" means any information or document that is available or located outside Canada and that may be relevant to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person.

231.6 (1) Pour l'application du présent article, un renseignement ou document étranger s'entend d'un renseignement accessible, ou d'un document situé, à l'étranger, qui peut être pris en compte pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi.

[28] The scope of the power to require the production of any foreign-based information or document is defined as follows.

231.6 (2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that a person resident in Canada or a non-resident person carrying on business in Canada provide any foreign-based information or document.

231.6 (2) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne résidant au Canada ou d'une personne n'y résidant pas mais y exploitant une entreprise de fournir des renseignements ou documents étrangers.

[29] A person served with a notice of a requirement under subsection 231.6(2) may request a judge to review the requirement, including on the ground that it is unreasonable.

231.6 (4) The person on whom a notice of a requirement is served under subsection 231.6(2) may, within 90 days after the service of the notice, apply to a judge for a review of the requirement.

(5) On hearing an application under subsection 231.6(4) in respect of a requirement, a judge may

(a) confirm the requirement;

(b) vary the requirement as the judge considers appropriate in the circumstances; or

231.6 (4) La personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé peut, dans les 90 jours suivant la date de signification ou d'envoi, contester, par requête à un juge, la mise en demeure du ministre.

(5) À l'audition de la requête, le juge peut:

a) confirmer la mise en demeure;

b) modifier la mise en demeure de la façon qu'il estime indiquée dans les circonstances;

Digitized by Google

(c) set aside the requirement if the judge is satisfied that the requirement is unreasonable.

(6) For the purposes of paragraph 231.6(5)(c), the requirement to provide the information or document shall not be considered to be unreasonable because the information or document is under the control of or available to a non-resident person that is not controlled by the person served with the notice of the requirement under subsection 231.6(2) if that person is related to the non-resident person.

c) déclarer sans effet la mise en demeure s'il est convaincu que celle-ci est déraisonnable.

(6) Pour l'application de l'alinéa (5)c), le fait que des renseignements ou documents étrangers soient accessibles ou situés chez une personne non-résidente qui n'est pas contrôlée par la personne à qui l'avis est signifié ou envoyé, ou soient sous la garde de cette personne non-résidente, ne rend pas déraisonnable la mise en demeure de fournir ces renseignements ou documents, si ces deux personnes sont liées.

[30] Unlike section 231.2, section 231.6 contains no provisions specifically dealing with requirements for information relating to unnamed persons to enable the Minister to determine if they are in compliance with their obligations under the Act. However, under subsection 231.2(2) such a requirement may only be imposed with a judicial authorization, which itself is subject to judicial review. In contrast, all requirements under section 231.6 are subject to judicial review.

[31] On the other hand, section 231.6 contains its own sanction for non-compliance, in addition to the possibility of prosecution under section 238. However, the sanction of contempt proceedings, provided by section 231.7 when a person does not comply with a requirement imposed under section 231.2, is not available for a failure to comply with a section 231.6 requirement.

231.6 (8) If a person fails to comply substantially with a notice served under subsection 231.6(2) and if the notice is not set aside by a judge pursuant to subsection 231.6(5), any court having jurisdiction in a civil proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act shall, on motion of the Minister, prohibit the introduction by that person of any foreign-based information or document covered by that notice.

231.6 (8) Si une personne ne fournit pas la totalité, ou presque, des renseignements ou documents étrangers visés par la mise en demeure signifiée conformément au paragraphe (2) et si la mise en demeure n'est pas déclarée sans effet par un juge en application du paragraphe (5), tout tribunal saisi d'une affaire civile portant sur l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi doit, sur requête du ministre, refuser le dépôt en preuve par cette personne de tout renseignement ou document étranger visé par la mise en demeure.

E. ISSUES AND ANALYSIS

Two preliminary matters

(i) statutory interpretation

Digitized by Google

[32] In order to interpret statutes consistently with legislative intent, courts must determine their meaning by reference to their text, context and purpose. Thus, while the ordinary and grammatical meaning of a statutory text is the point of departure for any interpretative exercise, it is rarely the end of the journey. The meaning of the text must also be found in the purpose of both the provision in question and the statute as a whole. Whenever possible, the text of the statute should be interpreted in a manner which furthers that purpose.

[33] As for context, a court should interpret a disputed provision in light of related statutory provisions in an attempt to give a coherent meaning to the group: Redeemer Foundation v. Canada (National Revenue), 2008 SCC 46 at para. 15. In addition, a court should take into consideration external context when interpreting legislation. Thus, for example, Justice Binnie said in SOCAN (at para. 43) that courts had to "transpose" the provisions of a Copyright Act designed to cover works protected by the Berne Convention of 1886, as revised in 1908, " to the information age, and to technologies undreamt of by those early legislators."

[34] This "modern approach" to interpretation which takes account of statutory text, context and purpose also applies to the Income Tax Act, although particular weight may be given to the ordinary meaning of the text: Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Canada, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 601 at paras. 10-11; Imperial Oil Ltd. v. Canada, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 447 at para. 26. The Supreme Court of Canada has provided additional guidance which is relevant to the interpretation of the Act's enforcement powers. Thus, in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, a case involving a challenge under section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to the Minister's power to require the production of documents, Justice Wilson noted (at 648) that the major drawback of a self-reporting tax system such as ours is that some taxpayers will attempt to evade tax, by failing to report income, for example. Accordingly, she said:

> [T]he Minister of National Revenue must be given broad powers in supervising this regulatory scheme to audit taxpayers' returns and inspect all books and records which may be relevant to the preparation of these returns. The Minister must be capable of exercising these powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds for believing that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act. … A spot check or a system of random monitoring may be the only way in which the integrity of the tax system can be maintained.

(ii) standards of review

[35] On an ex parte application by the Minister under subsection 231.2(3), the judge has discretion to authorize the imposition of a requirement, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, if satisfied that paragraphs (a) and (b) are met. On a request under 231.2(5) for a review of an authorization granted under subsection 231.2(3), the judge reviews a judicial order which, in most cases, will have been granted by that judge. In these circumstances, the standards of review to be applied by this Court on an appeal from a judge's decision under subsection 231.2(5) are those prescribed in Housen v. Nikolaisen, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235.

[36] Thus, questions of law, including questions of statutory interpretation and procedural fairness decided by Justice Hughes in this case, are subject to review on appeal on a standard of correctness. On the other hand, findings of fact are reviewable only for palpable and overriding error, as are applications of the law to the facts, unless the question is more legal than factual or a general question of law can readily be extrapolated, in which case correctness is the standard of review.

[37] With these considerations in mind, I turn to the issues in this appeal. The appellants' grounds of appeal can be reduced to four propositions: (i) the Application Judge erred by holding that the requirement does not relate to "foreign-based information"; (ii) since the information in this case is "foreign-based" it can only be obtained in accordance with section 231.6, which does not extend to information relating to unnamed persons; (iii) if, contrary to the above, section 231.2 is applicable, a requirement may only be confirmed under subsection 231.2(3) if there is evidence that the Minister is conducting a "genuine and serious inquiry" as to whether specific members of the class of unnamed persons are in compliance with the Act; and (iv) the Application Judge breached the duty of fairness by failing to give notice to eBay US and eBay International before varying the terms of the requirement in a manner that adversely affected them.

Digitized by Google

Issue 1: Is the information which eBay Canada was required to produce "foreign-based information" for the purpose of section 231.6?

[38] Counsel for eBay Canada says that the Minister's general power to issue requirements under section 231.2 must be read in light of section 231.6, which specifically prescribes the circumstances in which the Minister may impose a requirement for the production of "foreign-based information". Counsel relies on the presumption that a general statutory provision should not be interpreted as derogating from a specific provision. However, this argument only comes into play if the information sought by the Minister in this case is indeed "foreign-based" for the purpose of section 231.6. In my view, it is not.

[39] Subsection 231.6 defines "foreign-based information or document" as "any information or document that is available or located outside Canada". What the Minister requires to be produced in this case is "information", not a "document". However, for the purposes of sections 231.1 to 231.7, section 231 defines "document" as including "a record". "Record", in turn, is defined by subsection 248(1) to include "any other thing containing information, whether in writing or in any other form", a definition broad enough to include information in electronic form stored on a server.

[40] Counsel for the appellants says that, as a matter of law, information in electronic form stored on a server is "located" where the server is situated and, until downloaded or printed, is not located anywhere else. He argues that the fact that information is "available" in another country to those who have access to the server through their computers is not sufficient to make it "located" in that other country for the purpose of section 231.6.

[41] Counsel could not relate the interpretation of "located" that he advanced to a statutory purpose served by section 231.6. He pointed out, however, that cases in which telecommunications had been described as being "here and there" (see especially, SOCAN at paras. 58 and 59) do not support a conclusion that information stored on a server is "located" both at the site of the server and wherever it is accessed. Counsel noted that, by their very nature, telecommunications have two end points: the location of the communicator and the location of the recipient of the communication. This is not true of information.

[42] I agree that neither SOCAN nor Libman v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 178, another telecommunications case, is directly analogous to the question in issue here. More important, however, SOCAN instructs courts to interpret legislation in light of contemporary technology and, if necessary, to "transpose" its terms to take into account the changed technological environment in which it is to be applied.

[43] Section 231.6 was enacted in 1988, when information technology was much less developed, and less widely used, than it is today. I can well understand that a written document may be "located" where it is physically situated, and nowhere else. Of course, a copy of the document may be located elsewhere, but that is a separate document with its own location. In order to determine the parameters of the concept of "location" on the present facts, it is helpful to consider whether the rationale for a separate statutory regime governing requirements to produce "foreign-based information or document" applies to information in electronic form which is accessible through computers situated far from the servers on which the information is stored.

Digitized by Google

[44] Section 231.6 was enacted following the publication of the Department of Finance's White Paper on Tax Reform (Ottawa: Canadian CCH Limited, 1987), which recommended changes in the law to make it easier for the Minister to obtain information about cross-border transfer pricing: Annex 2, pp. 223 and 224. However, the language of section 231.6 deals with foreign-based information more generally and is not in terms limited to requiring the production of information concerning international transfer pricing. Because a requirement to produce documents cannot be served extraterritorially on the person in possession of them, subsection 231.6(2) enables the Minister to serve a notice on a person resident in Canada requiring the production of documents located outside Canada.

[45] The person on whom a notice is served under subsection 231.6(2) may apply for a review of the requirement on the ground, among others, that it is unreasonable: subsection 231.6(5). Subsection 231.6(6) provides that a requirement is not "unreasonable" for this purpose on the ground that the information or document in question is under the control of a non-resident person who is not controlled by, but is related to, the person to whom the requirement was issued.

[46] In order to induce compliance with a requirement, subsection 231.6(8) provides that a judge may prohibit a person who has failed to comply substantially with the requirement from relying on foreign-based information covered by it in a civil proceeding relating to the enforcement or administration of the Act.

[47] The scheme of section 231.6 suggests that Parliament was concerned that it could be unduly onerous for a person to be required to produce material located outside Canada and in the possession of another person, and that the section may operate in an unduly extraterritorial manner. While these concerns may be taken into account on a review by a judge for unreasonableness, they are largely irrelevant to the information (bulky as it may be) that is the subject of the requirement in the present case.

[48] This is because, with the click of a mouse, the appellants make the information appear on the screens on their desks in Toronto and Vancouver, or anywhere else in Canada. It is as easily accessible as documents in their filing cabinets in their Canadian offices. Hence, it makes no sense in my view to insist that information stored on servers outside Canada is as a matter of law located outside Canada for the purpose of section 231.6 because it has not been downloaded. Who, after all, goes to the site of servers in order to read the information stored on them?

[49] Nor is the extraterritorial application of the Act a significant issue on the present facts. For example, the agreements with eBay Canada expressly provide that they may disclose confidential "eBay System Information" (which the appellants say includes information about PowerSellers) which "is required to be disclosed by order of any court": Appeal Book, vol. II, pp. 295-96. Nor does the requirement oblige a person outside Canada to do anything.

[50] Counsel concedes that the information identifying PowerSellers registered as having an address in Canada would be located in Canada if the appellants had downloaded it to their computers. In my view, it is formalistic in the extreme for the appellants to say that, until this simple operation is performed, the information which they lawfully retrieve in Canada from the servers, and read on their computer screens in Canada, is not located in Canada.

[51] I would only add that, although Justice Hughes does not frame his reasons by reference to the statutory definition of "foreign-based information" in subsection 231.6(1), he clearly meant that the information in question could be "located" at places other than the site of the servers where it is stored. For example, he stated (2007 FC 930 at para. 23) that information stored electronically outside Canada "cannot truly be said to 'reside' only in one place", and (supra at para. 25) the information required by the Minister "is not foreign but within Canada" for present purposes.

Digitized by Google

[52] Having concluded that information in electronic form stored on servers outside Canada is in law capable of being located in Canada for the purpose of section 231.6, I now consider whether Justice Hughes's application of the law to the particular facts of this case was vitiated by palpable and overriding error. In my view, it was not. In finding that the information in question was located in Canada within the meaning of section 231.6, Justice Hughes properly took into consideration the fact that eBay US and eBay International had granted the appellants access to information about Canadian PowerSellers for the purpose of their business, and that they indeed used it for this purpose. The facts support the following conclusion by Justice Hughes (supra at para. 25):

> For perhaps corporate efficiency the information is stored elsewhere, but its purpose is in respect of Canadian business. The information is not foreign but within Canada for the purposes of section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act.

[53] Since the facts of this case do not engage section 231.6, it is not necessary to consider whether the presence of that section in the statutory scheme reduces the Minister's powers under section 231.2 when the requirement relates to "foreign-based information".

Issue 2: Before authorizing the Minister to impose a requirement for information concerning unnamed persons pursuant to subsection 231.2(3), must a judge be satisfied that the Minister is conducting "a genuine and serious inquiry" into whether specific members of the group of persons identified are in compliance with the Act?

[54] The appellants first raised this issue before Justice Hughes in the course of oral argument. He delayed issuing final judgment until this Court had rendered its decision in GMREB, where the issue also was whether the Minister had to satisfy the judge that he was engaged in a "serious and genuine inquiry" of specific members of the group of persons to whom the information relates before a requirement could be imposed under subsection 231.2(3).

[55] In reasons written by Justice Trudel, the Court held that subsection 231.2(3) does not oblige the Minister to adduce evidence that he is conducting a "serious and genuine inquiry" into one or more specific individuals in the group of unnamed persons to whom a requirement relates. The Court concluded (at para. 21) that the judge authorizing the requirement had only to be satisfied that the information in question "was required to verify compliance with the Act by one or more of the unnamed persons in the group" or that "the information is required for a tax audit conducted in good faith" (at para. 48).

[56] Justice Hughes correctly regarded himself as bound by GMREB. Before this Court, counsel for the appellants argued that we should not follow GMREB. He argued that it was wrongly decided because it was inconsistent with an earlier decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, James Richardson & Sons, Limited, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 614 ("James Richardson"). Following its previous decision in Canadian Bank of Commerce v. Attorney General of Canada, [1962] S.C.R. 729, the Court in James Richardson applied the "serious and genuine inquiry" test to the provision of the Act in force at that time which was analogous to section 231.2.

[57] However, this Court has decided in Miller v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 FCA 270, 220 D.LR. (4th) 149, that only in unusual and limited circumstances should one panel of the Court decline to follow a decision of another panel. In particular, Justice Rothstein (then of this Court) stated that, in order to ensure a degree of certainty and stability in the law, a panel should not depart from a prior decision of another panel "merely because it considers that the first case was wrongly decided" (at para. 8). However, the Court in Miller also said (at para. 10) that a panel was not bound to follow a prior decision which was "manifestly wrong" in one or more specified senses, which do not include inconsistency with a prior Supreme Court of Canada decision.

Digitized by Google

[58] Nonetheless, counsel for the appellants argued that it is fundamental to the due administration of justice in Canada that lower courts are bound by decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. Hence, he said, it must always be open to this Court to decline to follow one of its previous decisions if that decision was inconsistent with previous Supreme Court jurisprudence.

[59] I do not agree. In my opinion, a determination by this Court of the legal effect of a Supreme Court decision is as subject to the general principle set out in Miller as a decision by this Court on any other question of law. It is clear that that general principle does not depend on the importance of the particular legal rule at issue, because it was applied in Miller to a prior decision of the Court on a question of constitutional law and the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. On the other hand, as Miller makes clear (at para. 20), it is open to counsel to argue that a decision of this Court should not be followed on the ground that it has been overruled, expressly or impliedly, by a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court.

[60] Parenthetically, in Phoenix Bulk Carriers Ltd. v. Kremikovski Trade, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 588, 2007 SCC 13, the Supreme Court of Canada noted (at para. 3) that the Federal Court of Appeal had allowed the appeal from the Federal Court in that case because the Federal Court of Appeal considered itself bound by one of its previous decisions, even though it would have reached a different result if it had not been for that previous decision. In allowing the appeal, the Supreme Court expressly left open "the merits of the practice that led the Federal Court of Appeal to allow the appeal".

[61] Even if Judges of this Court are not bound to follow colleagues' decisions which they are satisfied are manifestly wrong on grounds not listed in Miller, I am not persuaded that GMREB is such a case, even though, in the view of one commentator, "it may have come as a surprise to many tax practitioners" (see Margaret Nixon, "The Minister's Power to Issue Requirements: Minister of National Revenue v. Greater Montreal Real Estate Board" (2008), 15 Tax Litigation, 954).

[62] Section 231.2 was enacted in response to the problems created for the Minister by the decision in James Richardson: see the comments of Justice Rothstein in Minister of National Revenue v. Sand Exploration Ltd., [1995] 3 F.C. 44 (T.D.) at 51-2. Of particular importance in this context is the fact that subsections 231.2(2) and (3) introduced the need for ex parte judicial authorization before the Minister can impose a requirement on a taxpayer to produce information relating to persons unnamed, and subsection 231.2(5) conferred a right of review of the judge's ex parte order. In addition, the repeal of the restrictions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(c) and (d) on the Minister's power to impose requirements lightened the Minister's burden: see 1996 S.C., c. 21, subsection 58(1).

[63] To oblige the Minister to prove that a genuine and serious inquiry was being conducted with respect to specific persons within the ascertained group of taxpayers would, in a case such as the present, rob subsections 231.2(2) and (3) of much of their efficacy. Moreover, the Supreme Court of Canada's refusal of leave to appeal the decision in GMREB does nothing to strengthen the appellants' argument that it was wrongly decided.

[64] In further support of his argument that we are not constrained by GMREB to relieve the Minister from having to show the existence of a serious and genuine inquiry before a judge may authorize a requirement under subsection 231.2(3), counsel brought to our attention the pre-GMREB decision of our Court in AGT Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1997] 2 F.C. 878 (F.C.A.). In that case, which was apparently not put before the panel which decided GMREB, Justice Desjardins, writing for the Court, said (at para. 27):

Digitized by Google

> Subsection 231.2(1) is drafted in broad language, but its scope has been reduced through the rules of interpretation to situations where the information sought by the Minister is relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons, and when the tax liability of such person or persons is the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry. Given these criteria, I find that no error was committed by the motions judge. (Emphasis added.)

[65] However, unlike GMREB, the issue of the appropriate test seems not to have been thoroughly canvassed before the Court in AGT, and the effects of the amendments to the Income Tax Act in response to the decision in James Richardson were not the subject of detailed analysis by the Court. Moreover, AGT concerned a requirement issued under subsection 231.2(1) in circumstances where judicial authorization was not required, because the information sought did not relate to unnamed persons, but to documents in the possession of a federal agency. Moreover, unlike the present case, the Minister was interested in auditing the person on whom the requirement was imposed.

[66] Finally, counsel relied on the public policy embodied in privacy legislation to buttress his argument that the "serious and genuine inquiry" test should be applied to requirements imposed under section 231.2. It was important, he said, to protect individuals from large scale and indiscriminate "fishing expeditions" of the kind being launched by the Minister to obtain personal details of Canadian PowerSellers, when he had not a shred of evidence that any of them were failing to report income.

[67] Given the purpose and terms of the statutory scheme, this line of argument does not, in my opinion, warrant our revisiting GMREB. In a self-reporting system of taxation, "[t]axpayers have a very low expectation of privacy in their business records relevant to the determination of their tax liability" (Redeemer Foundation v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue) 2008 SCC 46 at para. 25) and a requirement "provides the least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Income Tax Act can be effected" (R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., supra at 649).

[68] In short, even if more than one view may reasonably be held on the issue decided by GMREB, this is an insufficient basis for the Court to re-examine it. Considerations of both judicial economy, and certainty and stability in the law indicate that we should depart from our previous decisions only when they are manifestly in error.

[69] Having properly rejected the "serious and genuine inquiry" test on the ground that he was bound by the decision of this Court in GMREB, Justice Hughes concluded, largely on the basis of an affidavit, that the information sought in the requirement was needed by the Minister to conduct a good faith audit of PowerSellers resident in Canada to ensure that they were complying with their obligations under Canada's tax laws: 2008 FC 180 at para. 7. There was ample evidence to support this conclusion; his application of the correct law to the facts did not constitute palpable and overriding error.

Issue 3: Did Justice Hughes breach the duty of procedural fairness when he amended the terms of his ex parte order without notice to eBay US and eBay International?

[70] The ex parte order issued by Justice Hughes confined the scope of the requirement which the Minister proposed to impose on eBay Canada to information relating to PowerSellers "having a Canadian address according to your records". (Emphasis added.) As counsel explained it, the appellants found this limitation to their liking because it enabled them to argue that since they (as opposed to eBay US or eBay International) owned no records relating to Canadian PowerSellers, the requirement did not oblige them to produce anything.

[71] At the inter partes hearing, Justice Hughes removed the reference to "your records" in these limiting words and substituted, "registered as having a Canadian address".

Digitized by Google

In the appellants' view, this amendment broadened the scope of the requirement by bringing within it records belonging to eBay International stored on servers owned by eBay US. If this amendment did not strictly make the requirement binding on these non-parties, the appellants maintain, it adversely affected them by exposing their records to disclosure. Consequently, they argue, Justice Hughes should have given notice to eBay US and eBay International that he proposed to amend his ex parte order in this respect, and afforded them an opportunity to make representations on the appropriate wording to define this aspect of the scope of the order.

[72] I do not agree. First, one person may not generally impugn a decision on the ground that it was made without giving a fair hearing to some other person. For the most part, a breach of the duty of procedural fairness may be relied on as a ground of review only by persons to whom the duty is owed. However, eBay US and eBay International, which counsel for the appellants was at pains to insist are separate legal entities from the appellants, have not sought intervener status in this appeal in order to raise the procedural fairness issue.

[73] Second, I am not persuaded that eBay US and eBay International were adversely affected by the amendment to the order. It seems to me fanciful to argue, as the appellants do, that the original limitation on the ex parte order meant that eBay Canada would not have to produce any information because the appellants "owned" no "records".

[74] I see little to commend an interpretation of a judge's order that would render it nugatory. A more plausible view of the restriction, in my view, is that it was intended to ensure that, regardless of who "owned" the information to which the appellants had access, they only had to produce information relating to PowerSellers in Canada. The further amendment made by Justice Hughes at the inter partes hearing, without objection by eBay Canada (see 2007 FC 930 at para. 14), does not seem to me materially different from the corresponding provision in the ex parte order which it replaced. Rather, it was probably intended by Justice Hughes simply to clarify his previous order.

F. CONCLUSIONS

[75] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

"John M. Evans"

J.A.

Compliance order – 231.7(1)

(1) On summary application by the Minister, a judge may, notwithstanding subsection 238(2), order a person to provide any access, assistance, information or document sought by the Minister under section 231.1 or 231.2 if the judge is satisfied that the person was required under section 231.1 or 231.2 to provide the access, assistance, information or document and did not do so; and in the case of information or a document, the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege (within the meaning of subsection 232(1)).

Notice required – 231.7(2)

An application under subsection (1) must not be heard before the end of five clear days from the day the notice of application is served on the person against whom the order is sought.

Judge may impose conditions – 231.7(3)

A judge making an order under subsection (1) may impose any conditions in respect of the order that the judge considers appropriate.

Contempt of court – 231.7(4)

Digitized by Google

) If a person fails or refuses to comply with an order, a judge may find the person in contempt of court and the person is subject to the processes and the punishments of the court to which the judge is appointed.
Appeal – 231.7(5)
An order by a judge under subsection (1) may be appealed to a court having appellate jurisdiction over decisions of the court to which the judge is appointed. An appeal does not suspend the execution of the order unless it is so ordered by a judge of the court to which the appeal is made.

Compliance Orders and Contempt of RFIs

The mechanics of the ITA clearly allow CRA to apply to a court (s. 231.7) to have the RFI enforced, and if need be, after resilient resistance to supply, to have the taxpayer held in contempt of the founding court order and sentenced to either fine and/or incarceration. Generally, from the sentences that have been handed down, Crown counsel have simply asked for fine/incarceration plus costs, plus of course, the RFI to be respected, so by simply ignoring a RFI, given how sparingly they are in fact used, you run considerable risks.[95]

Compliance order - S. 231.7
231.7 (1) On summary application by the Minister, a judge may, notwithstanding subsection 238(2), order a person to provide any access, assistance, information or document sought by the Minister under section 231.1 or 231.2 if the judge is satisfied that

> (a) the person was required under section 231.1 or 231.2 to provide the access, assistance, information or document and did not do so; and
> (b) in the case of information or a document, the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege > (within the meaning of subsection 232(1)).

Notice required
(2) An application under subsection (1) must not be heard before the end of five clear days from the day the notice of application is served on the person against whom the order is sought.

Judge may impose conditions
(3) A judge making an order under subsection (1) may impose any conditions in respect of the order that the judge considers appropriate.

Contempt of court
(4) If a person fails or refuses to comply with an order, a judge may find the person in contempt of court and the person is subject to the processes and the punishments of the court to which the judge is appointed.

Appeal
(5) An order by a judge under subsection (1) may be appealed to a court having appellate jurisdiction over decisions of the court to which the judge is appointed. An appeal does not suspend the execution of the order unless it is so ordered by a judge of the court to which the appeal is made.

[95] See Minister of National Revenue And Linda Mae Marshall, 2006 FC 788, for the classic start-off. 125 2006 FC 455

Digitized by Google

In Minister Of National Revenue v. Kevin William Middleton[125] the actions were taken to the point of ordering a contempt of court using the following Federal Court Rules:

> I. Introduction
>
> [1] The Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") seeks an Order, pursuant to the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (the "Rules") that Mr. Kevin William Middleton (the "Respondent") is in contempt of Court.II. History of this Action
>
> [2] By Notice of Application filed on April 19, 2005, the Minister sought an Order pursuant to section 231.7 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "Act") that the Respondent provide certain information and documents to the Minister, pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Act.
>
> [3] Following a hearing, an Order ("Compliance Order") was issued by Justice Kelen on May 9, 2005, requiring the Respondent to comply with a notice issued by the Minister pursuant to the Act. The Order provides as follows:
>
> > THIS COURT ORDERS pursuant to section 231.7 of the Income Tax Act that the Respondent shall comply with the notice issued by the Minister and shall forthwith, and in any event not later than 30 days after being served with this Order, provide the Information and Documents to a Canada Customs and Revenue Agency officer acting under the authority conferred by the Income Tax Act or other person designated by the Commissioner of Customs and Revenue.
> >
> > THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that the Minister is authorized to effect service of this Order on the Respondent by personal service pursuant to Rule 128 of the Federal Court Rules, 1998.
> >
> > THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that costs are awarded to the Minister in the amount of $400.00.
>
> [4] On December 5, 2005, upon the motion of the Minister, a further order was issued requiring the Respondent to appear February 14, 2006 at 9:30 a.m., before a judge of this Court to show cause why he should not be found in contempt of an Order of the Court, specifically the Order of May 9, 2005. By letter dated January 10, 2006, the Minister sought Directions from the Court concerning the manner of proving the contents of the Court file. On January 23, 2006, a Direction was issued by the Court, directing the Minister to prove the contents of the Court file by means of certified copies of the relevant documents, that is copies certified under the seal of the Court.
>
> [5] The Minister, by his counsel, submitted copies of documents purporting to be certified by a legal assistant with the office of counsel. Following two brief adjournments on February 14, 2006, counsel obtained certified copies of relevant documents from the Registry of the Court.
>
> III. The Evidence
>
> [6] As part of his case, the Minister submitted certified copies of certain documents maintained on the Court file in this proceeding as follows:
>
> 1. Exhibit 1 – certified copy of the Order of Justice Kelen dated May 9, 2005;
> 2. Exhibit 2 – certified copy of the Affidavit of Michael J. Lawless, swearing to personal service of the Order of May 9, 2005 upon the Defendant at the Victoria Sheriff's cells on August 5, 2005.
> 3. Exhibit 3 – certified copy of the Order of May 5, 2005,

Digitized by Google

requiring the Respondent to appear before a Judge of the Federal Court at Vancouver on Tuesday the 14th day of February, 2006, at 9:30 a.m. to hear proof of the charge that he is or may be guilty of contempt of the Order of Mr. Justice Kelen dated May 9, 2005;

4. Exhibit 4 – Certified copy of the affidavit of service of Jan Falkowski relative to personal service upon the Respondent at 3620 Munns Road, Victoria of the Order of December 5, 2005, together with a copy of the Order of May 9, 2005 and the affidavit of Tiziana Hespe sworn October 11, 2005.

[7] Following the entry of the above-referenced certified copies as Exhibits 1 to 4, Mr. Allan Tocher was called to testify on behalf of the Minister. Mr. Tocher, an employee with the Canada Revenue Agency, is a resource officer/complex case officer who handles the collection of complex "high dollar" files. He is responsible for the collection of taxes owed by the Respondent. He testified that the Respondent's tax debt is approximately $30,000.00.

[8] Mr. Tocher said that, in preparing himself to testify, he had reviewed approximately 50 pages of computer diary entries, as well as file folders containing Federal Court Certificates, asset searches and correspondence to and from the Respondent. The file materials reviewed by Mr. Tocher include a copy of a "Requirement to Provide Information and Documents" that was issued on September 17, 2004, addressed to the Respondent. According to Mr. Tocher, he attempted to serve this document upon the Respondent in the hallway of the Provincial Court in Victoria on September 17, but the document fell to the floor and the Respondent walked away. A copy of the Requirement was entered as Exhibit 5.

[9] The Respondent, after receipt of the Requirement, sent a note to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency in Victoria on September 23, 2004. The Respondent apologized if he had "appeared rude to you on Friday the 17th of September". A copy of this note was entered as Exhibit 6.

[10] Mr. Tocher testified that he subsequently re-served the Requirement upon the Respondent on November 2, 2004. This service took place at the first meeting of creditors after the Respondent had assigned himself into bankruptcy. The Respondent did not provide the information and documents requested in the Requirement, although he did submit various correspondence to the Agency. This correspondence was not produced by the witness.

[11] However, Mr. Tocher said that recently the Respondent had forwarded two documents to the Tax Service Office in Victoria. The two documents were submitted together. The first is entitled "Registered Notice of Copyright Name Common Law Trademark Claim" and the second is entitled "User Agreement". The two documents, stapled together, were admitted as Exhibit 7.

[12] Mr. Tocher testified that apart from a couple of voicemails from the Respondent within the last several weeks, there has been no other communication with him. In concluding his evidence, Mr. Tocher said that the Respondent has not provided any response to the Compliance Order.

IV. Discussion and Disposition

[13] The issue in this motion is whether the Minister has met the burden of showing that the Respondent is in contempt of an Order of this Court, specifically the Compliance Order dated May 9, 2005. That Order was issued pursuant to section 231.7 of the Act which provides as follows:

231.7. (1) On summary application by the Minister,	231.7. (1) Sur demande sommaire du ministre, un

Digitized by Google

a judge may, notwithstanding subsection 238(2), order a person to provide any access, assistance, information or document sought by the Minister under section 231.1 or 231.2 if the judge is satisfied that

(a) the person was required under section 231.1 or 231.2 to provide the access, assistance, information or document and did not do so; and

(b) in the case of information or a document, the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege (within the meaning of subsection 232(1)).

(2) An application under subsection (1) must not be heard before the end of five clear days from the day the notice of application is served on the person against whom the order is sought.

(3) A judge making an order under subsection (1) may impose any conditions in respect of the order that the judge considers appropriate.

(4) If a person fails or refuses to comply with an order, a judge may find the person in contempt of court and the person is subject to the processes and the punishments of the court to which the judge is appointed.

(5) An order by a judge under subsection (1) may be appealed to a court having appellate jurisdiction juge peut, malgré le paragraphe 238(2), ordonner à une personne de fournir l'accès, l'aide, les renseignements ou les documents que le ministre cherche à obtenir en vertu des articles 231.1 ou 231.2 s'il est convaincu de ce qui suit:

a) la personne n'a pas fourni l'accès, l'aide, les renseignements ou les documents bien qu'elle en soit tenue par les articles 231.1 ou 231.2;

b) s'agissant de renseignements ou de documents, le privilège des communications entre client et avocat, au sens du paragraphe 232(1), ne peut être invoqué à leur égard.

(2) La demande n'est entendue qu'une fois écoulés cinq jours francs après signification d'un avis de la demande à la personne à l'égard de laquelle l'ordonnance est demandée.

(3) Le juge peut imposer, à l'égard de l'ordonnance, les conditions qu'il estime indiquées.

(4) Quiconque refuse ou fait défaut de se conformer à une ordonnance peut être reconnu coupable d'outrage au tribunal; il est alors sujet aux procédures et sanctions du tribunal l'ayant ainsi reconnu coupable.

(5) L'ordonnance visée au paragraphe (1) est susceptible d'appel devant le tribunal ayant compétence pour entendre les appels des décisions du tribunal ayant rendu

Digitized by Google

over decisions of the court to which the judge is appointed. An appeal does not suspend the execution of the order unless it is so ordered by a judge of the court to which the appeal is made.	l'ordonnance. Toutefois, l'appel n'a pas pour effet de suspendre l'exécution de l'ordonnance, sauf ordonnance contraire d'un juge du tribunal saisi de l'appel.

[14] Contempt proceedings in this Court are governed by Rules 466 to 472. Rules 466(b), 467(1), (3) and (4), 469 and 470(2) are relevant to the present matter and provide as follows:

466. Subject to rule 467, a person is guilty of contempt of Court who ... (b) disobeys a process or order of the Court;	466. Sous réserve de la règle 467, est coupable d'outrage au tribunal quiconque : … b) désobéit à un moyen de contrainte ou à une ordonnance de la Cour;
467. (1) Subject to rule 468, before a person may be found in contempt of Court, the person alleged to be in contempt shall be served with an order, made on the motion of a person who has an interest in the proceeding or at the Court's own initiative, requiring the person alleged to be in contempt (a) to appear before a judge at a time and place stipulated in the order; (b) to be prepared to hear proof of the act with which the person is charged, which shall be described in the order with sufficient particularity to enable the person to know the nature of the case against the person; and (c) to be prepared to present any defence that the person may have.	467. (1) Sous réserve de la règle 468, avant qu'une personne puisse être reconnue coupable d'outrage au tribunal, une ordonnance, rendue sur requête d'une personne ayant un intérêt dans l'instance ou sur l'initiative de la Cour, doit lui être signifiée. Cette ordonnance lui enjoint : a) de comparaître devant un juge aux date, heure et lieu précisés; b) d'être prête à entendre la preuve de l'acte qui lui est reproché, dont une description suffisamment détaillée est donnée pour lui permettre de connaître la nature des accusations portées contre elle; c) d'être prête à présenter une défense.
... (3) An order may be made under subsection (1) if the Court is satisfied that there	.. (3) La Cour peut rendre l'ordonnance visée au paragraphe (1) si elle est

Digitized by Google

is a prima facie case that contempt has been committed.	d'avis qu'il existe une preuve prima facie de l'outrage reproché.
(4) An order under subsection (1) shall be personally served, together with any supporting documents, unless otherwise ordered by the Court.	(4) Sauf ordonnance contraire de la Cour, l'ordonnance visée au paragraphe (1) et les documents à l'appui sont signifiés à personne.
469. A finding of contempt shall be based on proof beyond a reasonable doubt.	469. La déclaration de culpabilité dans le cas d'outrage au tribunal est fondée sur une preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable.
470. (2) A person alleged to be in contempt may not be compelled to testify.	470.(2) La personne à qui l'outrage au tribunal est reproché ne peut être contrainte à témoigner.

[15] In Lyons Partnership, L.P. v. MacGregor (2000), 5 C.P.R. (4th) 157 (F.C.T.D.), the Court held that the Rules codify the common law of contempt. The moving party must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had personal knowledge of the Court order; that the defendant was a primary actor, expressly or impliedly, in the conduct at issue; and that the defendant possessed the necessary mens rea.

[16] The Minister bears the burden of showing, first, that the Respondent was served with the Compliance Order of May 9, 2005. In that regard, he relies on the affidavit of Michael Lawless who deposed that he personally served the Respondent at the Victoria Sheriff's cells on August 2, 2005.

[17] Personal service upon an individual is governed by Rule 128. Rule 128(1) provides as follows:

128. (1) Personal service of a document on an individual, other than an individual under a legal disability, is effected	128. (1) La signification à personne d'un document à une personne physique, autre qu'une personne qui n'a pas la capacité d'ester en justice, s'effectue selon l'un des modes suivants :
(a) by leaving the document with the individual;	a) par remise du document à la personne;
(b) by leaving the document with an adult person residing at the individual's place of residence, and mailing a copy of the document to the individual at that address;	b) par remise du document à une personne majeure qui réside au domicile de la personne et par envoi par la poste d'une copie du document à cette dernière à la même adresse;
(c) where the individual is carrying on a business in Canada, other than a partnership, in a name or style other than the individual's own name, by	c) lorsque la personne exploite une entreprise au Canada, autre qu'une société de personnes, sous

Digitized by Google

leaving the document with the person apparently having control or management of the business at any place where the business is carried on in Canada;	un nom autre que son nom personnel, par remise du document à la personne qui semble diriger ou gérer tout établissement de l'entreprise situé au Canada;
(d) by mailing the document to the individual's last known address, accompanied by an acknowledgement of receipt form in Form 128, if the individual signs and returns the acknowledgement of receipt card or signs a post office receipt;	d) par envoi par la poste du document à la dernière adresse connue de la personne, accompagnée d'une carte d'accusé de réception selon la formule 128, si la personne signe et retourne la carte d'accusé de réception;
(e) by mailing the document by registered mail to the individual's last known address, if the individual signs a post office receipt; or	e) par envoi par courrier recommandé du document à la dernière adresse connue de la personne si la personne signe le récépissé du bureau de poste;
(f) in any other manner provided by an Act of Parliament applicable to the proceeding.	f) le mode prévu par la loi fédérale applicable à l'instance.

[18] Since there is no evidence that any attempt was made to serve the Respondent by any of the means addressed in Rule 128(1)(b) to (e), I must consider whether service upon him at the Victoria Sheriff's cells is valid personal service, for the purpose of Rule 467(4).

[19] The Rules provide no specific requirements as to the place of service. According to Rule 128(1)(a), personal service upon an individual may be effected by leaving the document with the individual. Rule 144(1) provides that service of a document under the Rules may be effected at any time. According to the affidavit of Michael Lawless, the Respondent was served with a copy of the Order of May 9, 2005, at the Victoria Sheriff's Cells on August 2, 2005 at 2:40 p.m. I am satisfied that the Respondent was personally served with the Order of which he is alleged to be in contempt. The requirements of Rule 467(4) have been met.

[20] The next question for consideration is whether the Minister has met his burden of showing that the Respondent, having knowledge of the Compliance Order, failed to comply with it. The Minister must establish this with proof beyond a reasonable doubt; see Bhatnager v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 217.

[21] On the basis of the evidence of Mr. Tocher, I am satisfied that the Respondent has failed to produce the information and documents requested. Mr. Tocher gave his evidence in a straight-forward manner and there is no basis to disbelieve him. The documents submitted as Exhibits 6 and 7, that is a note and copies of a Copyright Agreement and a User Agreement, do not respond to the terms of the Compliance Order. There is no evidence that the Respondent submitted any other documents to the Minister or his agents.

Digitized by Google

[22] The tenor of the documents sent by the Respondent to the Tax Service Office in Victoria, that is the "Registered Notice of Copyright" and "User Agreement", is that the Respondent is not subject to the provisions of the Act. On its face, the Act is a law of general application. There is no evidence that it does not apply to the Respondent.

[23] The Compliance Order was issued pursuant to section 237.1 of the Act. That provision allows the Minister to apply to a judge, on a summary basis, for the provision of any assistance, information or document that is sought pursuant to sections 231.1 or 231.2 of the Act. According to subsection 231.2(1), the Minister may require any person to provide information for "any purpose related to the administration or enforcement" of the Act, including collection purposes.

[24] Mr. Tocher testified that the Respondent has a tax debt of approximately $30,000.00. He also testified that his file contains various certificates from this Court. Although he did not elaborate on this, I understand his evidence to refer to certificates issued by the Minister pursuant to section 223 of the Act. Such Certificates, once deposited with the Court, enjoy the status of a judgment that may be enforced pursuant to the Rules; see Canada v. Piccott (2004), 326 N.R. 177 (F.C.A.).

[25] It appears to me that the Minister obtained the Compliance Order for purposes associated with the purposes of the Act. There is no evidence to explain non-compliance with the Order. The validity of the Compliance Order can only be challenged by legal process; see Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 892.

[26] The Respondent alone was the subject of the Compliance Order. Upon the evidence before me, he failed to obey it. He was the principal actor. By his failure to comply, he has disobeyed that Order. The documents that he submitted to the CCRA, that is the so-called Copyright Agreement and User Agreement, indicate an intention to not comply with the Compliance Order. I infer from these documents an intention of non-compliance; that satisfies the required elements of mens rea.

[27] In these circumstances, I am satisfied that the Minister has met the burden and the legal test described in Lyons Partnership. An Order for Contempt will issue.

[28] The next matter is the appropriate penalty. Rule 472 governs the imposition of a penalty that may be imposed when the Court has found a person to be in contempt and provides as follows:

472. Where a person is found to be in contempt, a judge may order that	472. Lorsqu'une personne est reconnue coupable d'outrage au tribunal, le juge peut ordonner :
(a) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years or until the person complies with the order;	a) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans ou jusqu'à ce qu'elle se conforme à l'ordonnance;
(b) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years if the person fails to comply with the order;	b) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans si elle ne se conforme pas à l'ordonnance;
(c) the person pay a fine;	c) qu'elle paie une amende;
(d) the person do or refrain from doing any act;	d) qu'elle accomplisse un acte ou s'abstienne de
(e) in respect of a person

Digitized by Google

referred to in rule 429, the person's property be sequestered; and	l'accomplir; e) que les biens de la personne soient mis sous séquestre, dans le cas visé à la règle 429;
(f) the person pay costs.	f) qu'elle soit condamnée aux dépens.

[29] The Minister seeks a fine of $3,000.00, costs in the amount of $2,000.00, together with the provision for a term of imprisonment if the Respondent fails to pay the fine and costs within a specified time. As well, the Applicant seeks the issuance of an order in the same terms as the Compliance Order, together with the imposition of a term of imprisonment if the Respondent fails to comply within a specified time. In effect, the Applicant is seeking the re-issuance of the May 9, 2005 Compliance Order with additional terms, that is the imposition of a prison term for failure to comply.

[30] In Canadian Copyright Licensing Agency v. U-Compute, 2005 FC 1644, the Court identified three factors to be considered in imposing a penalty for contempt, at paragraph 76:

> 76. In Lyons Partnership, L.P. v. MacGregor, [2000] F.C.J. No. 341, this Court summarized the relevant factors to be considered in framing a penalty. In assessing the penalty for contempt the Court should consider the gravity of the contempt, deterrence of similar conduct, any profit made from the contemptuous conduct, whether the contempt offence is a first offence, the contemptor's past conduct and the presence of any mitigating factors such as good faith or apology.

[31] In the circumstances outlined above, I am satisfied that a fine should be imposed upon the Respondent, as a sanction for his disobedience of the Court's Order of May 9, 2005. However, I am not persuaded that the fine should be as high as $3,000.00, in the absence of evidence to support that amount. Reference to other cases where a $3,000.00 fine was imposed does not mean that the same fine should be imposed here. I impose a fine of $2,000.00.

[32] The Minister seeks costs in the amount of $2,000.00. An award of costs is in the discretion of the Court; see Rule 400(1). In this case, I am satisfied that an award of costs in the amount of $1,000.00 is appropriate.

[33] I am not persuaded that a further Order should be issued, as sought by the Minister, requiring the Respondent to provide information and documents within a specified time period, failing which a term of imprisonment could be imposed. The Compliance order of May 9, 2005 remains in full force and effect.

Digitized by Google

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS THAT:

1. The Respondent is found to be in contempt of the Order dated May 9, 2005, pursuant to Rule 466(1)(b) of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106;
2. A fine of $2,000.00 is imposed upon the Respondent, payable within thirty (30) days of service upon him of this Order;
3. The Respondent is to pay costs in the amount of $1,000.00 within thirty (30) days of service upon him of this Order;
4. If the Respondent fails to pay the fine of $2,000.00 and costs of $1,000.00 within thirty (30) days of being served with this Order, the Court imposes a sentence of fifteen (15) days imprisonment for default of payment of the fine and a sentence of fifteen (15) days imprisonment for default of payment of the costs, such sentences to run consecutively.

"E. Heneghan"

Judge

…a lenient condition to satisfy.

In Minister Of National Revenue v. Sandra Bjornstad[126] Rule 472 of the Federal Court Rules was also applied in a court order when a s. 231.7 court order for a RFI was ignored. The justice held:

REASONS FOR ORDER

DAWSONJ.

[1] In these reasons I explain why I have found Ms. Bjornstad to be in contempt of the Court's order of February 21, 2006 and note that her continued failure to comply with that order may lead to her imprisonment.

APPLICABLE LEGAL PRINCIPLES

[2] Rule 466(b) of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (Rules) provides that a person is guilty of contempt of court who disobeys an order of the Court.

[3] Principles to be applied when considering whether to find a person in contempt of court are:

1. The party alleging contempt has the burden of proving such contempt, and the person alleged to be in contempt (the contemnor) need not present evidence to the Court.
2. The constituent elements of contempt must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.
3. In the case of disobedience of an order of the Court, the elements which must be established are the existence of the Court order, knowledge of the order by the alleged contemnor, and knowing disobedience of the order.
4. Unless the Court otherwise directs, evidence to establish contempt shall be given orally.

See: Rules 469 and 470, and Tele-Direct (Publications) Inc. v. Canadian Business Online Inc. (1998), 151 F.T.R. 271.

[4] The fundamental purpose of the Court's contempt power is to ensure respect for the judicial process so as, in turn, to secure the proper and effective functioning of the judicial system. In short, the rule of law requires that court orders be complied with.

FINDINGS OF FACT

[5] Oral evidence in support of the allegation of contempt of court was given by: Mr. So, an auditor with the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA); Ms. Duff, a civil enforcement bailiff; and Mr. Ebeling, another civil enforcement bailiff. Each person testified in a straight-forward manner with no inconsistencies or inherent implausibilities in their evidence. Each answered questions I put to them directly and without hesitation. I find each witness to be credible and accept their evidence.

Digitized by Google

[6] Additionally, certified copies of the Court's orders of January 23, 2006, February 21, 2006, and May 23, 2006 (all described below) were tendered and received as exhibits.

[7] Ms. Bjornstad did not attend in Court, nor did she otherwise respond to the application to find her to be in contempt of court.

[8] On the basis of the above described evidence, I am satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the following facts:

1. On July 19, 2005, Mr. So, accompanied by another auditor employed by the CRA, met with Ms. Bjornstad at her home in Stony Plain, Alberta. At that time Mr. So personally served Ms. Bjornstad with a Requirement to Provide Information and Documents (Requirement) issued pursuant to paragraphs 289(1)(a) and (b) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 and paragraphs 231.2(1)(a) and (b) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.). Attached to the Requirement as Appendix A was a list of the documents Ms. Bjornstad was required to provide. Attached as Appendix B to the Requirement was a series of questions Ms. Bjornstad was required to answer in respect of the period from January 1, 2002 to December 31, 2004. Attached to these reasons as Appendices A and B are true copies of the appendices attached to the Requirement. The Requirement specified that the information and documents were to be provided within 30 days of receipt.

2. Ms. Bjornstad failed to make any response to the Requirement. No information or documents were provided by her, or on her behalf.

3. On January 30, 2006, Ms. Bjornstad's husband was personally served at Ms. Bjornstad's residence with a copy of the applicant's record filed in this proceeding by the Minister of National Revenue (Minister) in which he sought an order requiring Ms. Bjornstad to comply with the Requirement. Ms. Bjornstad's husband was also served with a copy of the Court's order of January 23, 2006 which permitted documents to be served upon Ms. Bjornstad by handing them to an adult person at her residence.

4. On February 21, 2006, the Court allowed the Minister's application and ordered that Ms. Bjornstad comply with the Requirement by March 23, 2006. This is the order she failed to obey.

5. On March 5, 2006, Ms. Bjornstad was personally served with the Court's order of February 21, 2006.

6. Ms. Bjornstad did not comply with the Requirement by March 23, 2006 as required by the Court's order, or at all. To date, neither the required documents nor information has been provided by Ms. Bjornstad.

7. On May 23, 2006, an order was made requiring Ms. Bjornstad to appear at the Court's general sitting in Edmonton on June 19, 2006 and to be prepared to answer the allegation of contempt of court made against her.

8. On May 24, 2006, Ms. Bjornstad was personally served with the Court's order of May 23, 2006.

[9] These facts establish, without doubt, the existence of the Court's order of February 21, 2006, Ms. Bjornstad's knowledge of that order, and Ms. Bjornstad's disobedience of that order. She is guilty of contempt of court because she has disobeyed the Court's order of February 21, 2006.

APPROPRIATE DISPOSITION

[10] The Minister seeks an order requiring Ms. Bjornstad to: provide the information and documents; pay a fine of $2000.00; and pay costs.

[11] Rule 472 deals with the penalty which may be ordered on a finding of contempt. The rule provides that:

472. Where a person is found472. Lorsqu'une personne est

Digitized by Google

to be in contempt, a judge may order that
(a) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years or until the person complies with the order;
(b) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years if the person fails to comply with the order;
(c) the person pay a fine;
(d) the person do or refrain from doing any act;
(e) in respect of a person referred to in rule 429, the person's property be sequestered; and
(f) the person pay costs.

reconnue coupable d'outrage au tribunal, le juge peut ordonner :
a) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans ou jusqu'à ce qu'elle se conforme à l'ordonnance;
b) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans si elle ne se conforme pas à l'ordonnance;
c) qu'elle paie une amende;
d) qu'elle accomplisse un acte ou s'abstienne de l'accomplir;
e) que les biens de la personne soient mis sous séquestre, dans le cas visé à la règle 429;
f) qu'elle soit condamnée aux dépens.

[12] I am prepared to order that:

1. The order that accompanies these reasons is to be personally served upon Ms. Bjornstad by leaving a copy of it with her.
2. Within 30 days of service of the order upon her, Ms. Bjornstad shall provide the information and documents which she was required to provide pursuant to the Requirement and the Court's order of February 21, 2006. As noted above, for ease of reference the information and documents are set out in Appendices A and B to these reasons.
3. Within 30 days of service of the order upon her, Ms. Bjornstad shall pay a fine of $2,000.00. I am satisfied that this amount reflects the gravity of the contempt and will deter similar conduct. But for the Minister's request at the oral hearing for a fine in this amount I would have been inclined to order payment of a larger fine. I reject the Minister's attempt to later seek an increased amount in the context of his submission on costs.
4. Within 30 days of service of the order upon her, Ms. Bjornstad shall pay costs to the Minister which I fix in the amount of $4,090.85. This amount represents reasonable costs calculated on a solicitor-client basis, recognizing that the services provided for in the previous order with respect to costs made by Justice Campbell should not be duplicated. I am satisfied this amount pays expenses reasonably incurred by the Minister. It includes an allowance of $440.85 on account of Court fees and disbursements. The award of costs on a solicitor-client basis reflects the policy of the Court that a party who assists the Court in the enforcement of its orders and in ensuring respect for its orders should not be put out of pocket. See, for example, Coca-Cola Ltd. v. Pardham (c.o.b. Universal Exporters), 5 C.P.R. (4th) 333 (F.C.T.D.) aff'd on other grounds, (2003) 23 C.P.R. (4th) 173 (F.C.A.) and the authorities reviewed in the trial division by Associate Chief Justice Lutfy (as he then was).
5. In the event that Ms. Bjornstad does not comply with paragraph 2 above, the Minister may seek an order pursuant to Rule 471 requesting that the Attorney General of Alberta assist the Court by bringing Ms. Bjornstad before any judge of this Court to show cause why she should not be imprisoned for some period of time, or until she complies with the Court's order of February 21, 2006.

"Eleanor R. Dawson"
Judge

Digitized by Google

Ottawa, Ontario
June 28, 2006

REQUIREMENT TO PROVIDE INFORMATION AND DOCUMENTS
APPENDIX A:
The following documentation is to be provided for the period January 1, 2002 to December 31, 2004.
Business Records:
1) All source documents such as income & expense invoices.
2) All books of entry such as synoptic journal, cash receipts and disbursement journal, general journal, general ledgers and grouping schedules, if applicable.
3) Chart of accounts and a listing of vendors and suppliers
4) Accounts payable list, accounts receivable list and payroll ledgers, if applicable.
5) Bank statements, cancelled cheques and duplicate deposit books.
6) Credit card statements and source documents for business purchases
7) Contracts, loan and lease agreements
8) Details of drawings account
9) Copies of income tax returns for 2002, 2003 and 2004
10) List of fixed assets purchased and disposed; with date purchased, description and amount. Supporting documentation will be required as well.
11) Capital Cost Allowance (CCA) Schedule
12) Copies of year end financial statements
13) Sales invoices, sales summaries, work estimates, and work orders.
14) All backups of accounting software, if any, for the above stated audit period.
15) GST returns and the working papers used to prepare the GST returns.
16) Accountant's or Representative's working papers, grouping schedules and adjusting entries for the years under audit.
Personal Records:
1) All personal bank account statements/passbooks, transaction records, cancelled cheques and bank account reconciliation's.
2) All credit card statements, line of credit statements, and loan/mortgage documents including the repayment schedules and the purpose of the loans.
3) All insurance policy documents.
4) List of major personal assets (eg real estate, vehicles, equipment, recreational, etc.) along with the approximate costs/proceeds of disposition and year of acquisition/disposal.
5) Personal investment statements (eg. RRSP, mutual funds, term deposits, etc.).
6) If you have received any non-taxable sources of funds that would impact your financial situation during the audit period, please provide the details.

REQUIREMENT TO PROVIDE INFORMATION AND DOCUMENTS
APPENDIX B:
1. BUSINESS HISTORY:
A) When and how was the business started or acquired?
Organization type is:
Changes to business structure and/or ownership during the audit period are as follows:
List of Shareholders & Directors (and % shares) or partners (and % interest):
List of any related or associated businesses (or persons):
Is the taxpayer part of a group (for promotion purposes etc.):

Digitized by Google

B) Determine the nature of goods and services performed - including any secondary and/or by-products. (refer to specific guidelines for this type of business, if available, for common sources).

Description activity A: _____%
Description activity B: _____%
Description activity C: _____%

Most common activity or product sold currently and in the audit period:

	Main Goods/Services Sold/Provided
Major Customers
i) 7% taxable
ii) 0% taxable
iii) Exempt
iv) Major suppliers

Days and hours of operation:
Are operations seasonal?
Peak and slack periods of operation.
D) Has there been any changes in the goods and services provided in recent years?
E) Major business asset acquisitions and dispositions:
Acquisitions/Dispositions:

Item acquired/ disposed of	Date	Cost	Proceeds	Percentage Commercial Use

2. MAINTENANCE OF BUSINESS BOOKS AND RECORDS:

A) List and describe the books and records maintained?

Business fiscal year end:
Bookkeeping System:
manual:
computerized:
type of software used:

B) Vending Licenses, municipal and/or provincial:
C) Who maintains the books and records?
Persons and responsibility:
Frequency of visits to the accountant:
Personal portions and how determined:
"Travel/Promotion" expenses:
"Vehicle" expenses
"Personal Consumption"
How involved is the owner in the handling of cash in the business?
What controls are in place in owner's absence?
D) Preparation of Income Tax and GST Returns:
Are the GST returns/elections prepared and filed by the taxpayer, staff (bookkeeper or controller) or an external accountant?
Are the Income Tax returns and financial statements prepared and filed by the taxpayer, staff (bookkeeper or controller) or an external accountant?
E) Accounting for Sales/Revenue and GST on Taxable Supplies

Digitized by Google

How are sales and accounts receivable recorded in the books and records?
How sales received and receivable recorded in the books and records?
How is GST received and receivable recorded in the books and records?
How is GST calculated (7% or 7/107)?
Is GST collected on all sales/services?
Are credit cards accepted? Are cheques accepted?
What is the percentage (%) of credit card sales?
What is the percentage (%) of cash sales?
Does the cash register total the GST collected?
What is the basis of the gross revenues income reported on the financial statements - ie. is gross reported revenue net of or does it include GST and PST?.
How is GST reported on the GST tax returns - ie. received or receivable?
F) Accounting for Expenses and GST Input Tax Credits
How are purchase and expense transactions recorded in the books and records?
How are purchases and expenses - paid and payable - recorded in the books and records?
How is GST - paid and payable - recorded in the books and records in respect of expenses?
What purchases make up your regular ITC's?
Who are your major suppliers?
Is an adjustment made for personal portions of expenses?
Is an adjustment made for personal portions of GST paid on "Travel/Promotion" expenses, "Vehicle" expenses and "Personal Consumption"?
Are purchases/expenses paid by cheque, cash or both?
Estimate the percentage (%) of cash purchases/expenses.
What is the basis of purchases and expenses claimed on the financial statements - ie. do expenses include or are they net of ITC's?.
How are ITC's claimed on the GST tax returns - ie. paid or payable?
G) Was a physical inventory count taken and how is the inventory valued?

3. BUSINESS BANKING

What are the business bank accounts and their location for the audit period and current year - details:

Financial Institution	Acct Numbers	Type of Account	Signing Authority

Who prepares the deposits?
How often are the deposits made?
Are all receipts deposited to the business account?
In which bank account(s)?
Are there any deposits to the business accounts other than sales:
ie. personal funds/loans etc?
Is there any cash withheld from the deposits?
For what purpose? (ie cash expenses/owner's draws).
Is a daily cash reconciliation done?
Is a cash float maintained - how much?
How are credit card receipt deposits handled? Is a separate bank account maintained for either Visa or MasterCard deposits?
Were there any business loans or lines of credit outstanding during the audit period - details:

3. PERSONAL BANKING

What are the personal bank accounts and their location for the audit period and current year - details:

Financial Institution	Acct Numbers	Type of Account	Signing Authority

Nature and source of deposits to personal accounts:
Drawings/wages/sale of personal assets:

Digitized by Google

Spouse's (or equivalent's) personal bank accounts:
Financial Institution Acct Numbers Type of Account Signing Authority
Nature and source of deposits to personal accounts:
Wages/sale of personal assets:
4. Any non-taxable sources of funds?
Inheritances/lottery winnings/gifts/gambling:
Cash-on-hand:
How much "cash" do you maintain outside of your personal and business bank accounts?
Have you ever maintained any extraordinary "cash" amount outside of your personal or business bank accounts?
Do you maintain one or more safe deposit boxes?

5. Other Personal Investments:

Determine existence of and details of the following:
Have you loaned or given money personally - i.e. family/friends, etc.?
List real property bought/sold or owned currently and during the audit period.
i.e. Principal/Primary Residence
Cottage/Time Shares/Vacation Properties
Rental Properties Development Property
Vacant Land
Farm Land
List vehicles bought, sold or owned during the audit period. (Obtain details.)
i.e. Automobiles
Boats/Yachts/Planes
Motorbikes/All terrain vehicles
Recreation Vehicles/Trailers
List other personal asset acquisitions/dispositions.
i.e. Furniture/Appliances/Stereo/Video/TV
Antiques or Collectibles
Works of Art/Coins, etc.
Any individual or family vacations taken during the audit period? (Obtain details.)
6. Personal Loans/Mortgages/Lines of Credit
Mortgages (principal residence or rental property)
Vehicle Loans
Personal Loans
Lines of Credit
Credit Cards
Were there any non-institution loans made or outstanding during the audit period i.e. family/friends, etc.? (Obtain details.)
Have you received any money from family/friends, etc.? (Obtain details.)
Do you or have you ever held any money in trust for others? (Obtain details.)
7. International Information
Determine existence of and details of the following:
Offshore assets and liabilities.
Trust set-up offshore.
Business operations offshore.
Offshore banking information.
Offshore investment information and brokerage details.
Foreign pension income.

Digitized by Google

Foreign tax returns for all of the audit period.

See also MNR v. Alistair John Camplin[96] for the argument that the taxpayer was not bound by the compliance order since he felt that it didn't apply to his "natural person". The court held otherwise and disposed of the argument.[97]

Minister Of National Revenue v. The Money Stop Ltd And Tel Sutherland, 2013FC133, An Example of a S. 231.7 Contempt Proceeding

Date: 20130207
Docket: T-2045-11
Citation: 2013 FC 133
Ottawa, Ontario, February 7, 2013
PRESENT: The Honourable Mr. Justice Zinn
BETWEEN:

THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Applicant

and

THE MONEY STOP LTD and TEL SUTHERLAND

Respondents

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

Mr. Sutherland and The Money Stop Ltd., his business, have had every opportunity to satisfy an Order of this Court, or to purge their contempt, but have not done so. They chose not to attend their sentencing hearing.

Background

[1] The Minister of National Revenue required certain financial records in order to conduct an audit of The Money Stop Ltd, a "payday lender" with three locations in Alberta and whose director is Tel Sutherland.

[2] The Canada Revenue Agency [CRA] requested this information in July and August 2011, and it further asked that it be provided by October 2011. The respondents failed to comply.

[3] The Minister initiated an application for an order of compliance pursuant to section

---

[96] 2006 FC 818
[97] 2007 FC 183

Digitized by Google

231.7 of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th supp), which Justice Harrington granted on February 6, 2012. The respondents did not comply with Justice Harrington's Order.

[4] As a consequence of their failure to comply with Justice Harrington's Order, the Minister initiated contempt proceedings. By Order dated April 3, 2012, Justice Gleason directed that the respondents appear before this Court to answer the allegation that they were guilty of contempt.

[5] At the contempt hearing on July 3, 2012, the respondents admitted that they had not complied with Justice Harrington's Order. Based on that admission, and being satisfied that all other requirements had been met, on July 4, 2012 I issued an Order finding the respondents in contempt but permitted them a further period of 30 days to provide the following six items of information, failing which the Minister was at liberty to proceed with a request that this Court sentence the respondents for their contempt:

a. The password and username for the electronic version of the respondents' QuickBooks records previously provided on an USB key;
b. Individual cheque cashing transaction information in electronic format on a USB key, including password and username;
c. Bank statements, cancelled cheques, and duplicate deposit books for all business bank accounts;
d. Corporate Minute Book;
e. Completed RC59, Business Consent Form, to allow the Canada Revenue Agency to deal with the individual or firm who prepared the amended Corporate Tax Returns; and
f. Personal bank statements and cancelled cheques for 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2009.

[6] The Minister filed evidence that the respondents have failed to comply, they have failed to provide those six items, and accordingly the Minister asks that the respondents be sentenced now for their contempt.

[7] The sentencing hearing came on by way of videoconference between the Court in Ottawa, Ontario, and Edmonton, Alberta, on Tuesday, January 29, 2013. The respondents were properly served with notice of the hearing and, in fact, Mr. Sutherland had been in contact with the Court Registry prior to that date, making it clear that he was aware of the hearing. Nonetheless, and despite providing additional time for them to appear in case they were late, the respondents failed to appear before the Court on January 29, 2013. In addition to having been served with the notice of hearing, the respondents had previously been served and were aware of the sentence that the Minister was seeking for their contempt. Further, I also specifically asked the applicant and the Court Registry to inform me if the respondents contacted either of them subsequent to the sentencing hearing. As of this date, neither has so informed me nor have the respondents apparently attempted to communicate with the Court in any way.

[8] The Minister filed additional affidavit evidence on this hearing which proves that, although the respondents "delivered five boxes of documents to a hotel near the offices of the CRA," they failed to provide to the Minister with the following:

a. The password and username for the electronic version of the respondents' QuickBooks records previously provided on an USB key;
b. Individual cheque cashing transaction information in electronic format on a USB key, including password and username;
c. Corporate Minute Book;
d. Completed RC59, Business Consent Form, to allow the Canada Revenue Agency to deal with the individual or firm who prepared the amended Corporate Tax Returns; and

Digitized by Google

e. Personal bank statements and cancelled cheques for 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2009.

Further, although the respondents provided the Minister with some business bank statements and cancelled cheques, they did not provide those listed on Schedule A attached hereto.

[9] The respondents have provided no evidence either through affidavit or oral testimony to dispute the Minister's evidence, which the Court therefore accepts. I remain satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the respondents remain in contempt.

[10] The Minister submits that the following sanctions are warranted and appropriate:

(a) a fine of $5,000 plus solicitor-client costs, to be paid within 30 days, failing which Tel Sutherland is to be imprisoned for 30 days; and

(b) an order that the information set out in my Order dated July 4, 2012, other than that since provided, be provided to the Minister within 30 days of service of this Order, failing which Tel Sutherland is to be imprisoned until the respondents comply.

The Minister proposes other terms involving safeguards in case payment or disclosure is not possible, and the provision of warrants in the case of non-compliance.

[11] Rule 472 of the Federal Courts Rules outlines the Court's jurisdiction regarding penalties for contempt:

472. Where a person is found to be in contempt, a judge may order that	472. Lorsqu'une personne est reconnue coupable d'outrage au tribunal, le juge peut ordonner :
(a) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years or until the person complies with the order;	a) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans ou jusqu'à ce qu'elle se conforme à l'ordonnance;
(b) the person be imprisoned for a period of less than five years if the person fails to comply with the order;	b) qu'elle soit incarcérée pour une période de moins de cinq ans si elle ne se conforme pas à l'ordonnance;
(c) the person pay a fine;	c) qu'elle paie une amende;
(d) the person do or refrain from doing any act;	d) qu'elle accomplisse un acte ou s'abstienne de l'accomplir;
(e) in respect of a person referred to in rule 429, the person's property be sequestered; and	e) que les biens de la personne soient mis sous séquestre, dans le cas visé à la règle 429;
(f) the person pay costs.	f) qu'elle soit condamnée aux dépens.

[12] The Federal Court of Appeal in Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Winnicki, 2007 FCA 52, at para 17, endorsed that the following factors are to be considered when determining an appropriate penalty for contempt:

1. the gravity of the contempt in the context of the particular circumstances of the case as they pertain to the administration of justice;
2. whether the contempt offence is the first offence;

Digitized by Google

3. presence of any mitigating factors such as good faith or an apology; and
4. deterrence of similar conduct.

[13] The Minister also points to this Court's decision in Minister of National Revenue v Marshall, 2006 FC 788, at para 16 [Marshall], wherein this Court considered the following factors relevant to determining a sentence for contempt of an Order of this Court to disclose information pursuant to section 231.7 of the Income Tax Act:

> i. The primary purpose of imposing sanctions is to ensure compliance with orders of the court. Specific and general deterrence are important to ensure continued public confidence in the administration of justice;
> ii. Proportionality of sentencing requires striking a balance between enforcing the law and what the Court has called "temperance of justice";
> iii. Aggravating factors include the objective gravity of the contemptuous conduct, the subjective gravity of the conduct (i.e. whether the conduct was a technical breach or a flagrant act with full knowledge of its unlawfulness), and whether the offender has repeatedly breached orders of the Court; and > iv. Mitigating factors might include good faith attempts to comply (even after the breach), apologize or accept responsibility, or whether the breach is a first offence.

[14] In my view, ensuring compliance with orders made by the Court pursuant to the Income Tax Act is critical because most everyone in Canada pays tax, and reporting is largely self-reporting. If efforts by the Minister taken to ensure that taxpayers have complied and accurately reported income are ignored or thwarted, the taxation regime is seriously compromised and that affects every Canadian as we are dependant on tax revenue to fund most of our social and other programs, and indeed our government as a whole. In that sense, compliance with the Income Tax Act is a fundamental civic duty which cannot be taken lightly or ignored.

[15] Moreover, the breach here is not unintentional. The respondents have known for many months of this Court's Order and they have been provided, more than once, with an opportunity to comply or explain their non-compliance. They have done neither. The recent delivery of five boxes of documents, to a location other than the offices of the CRA, might be deserving of more positive consideration if those boxes contained most of the materials ordered to be produced. However, as the record indicates, these respondents have yet to produce the majority of the items ordered. I am particularly disturbed by the respondents' failure to produce the password and username for the electronic version of the respondents' QuickBooks records previously provided on an USB key, because this was specifically discussed when the respondents previously appeared before me. Mr. Sutherland not once suggested that it was unavailable; rather, despite my best efforts to obtain its disclosure in open Court, he claimed in the July 2012 hearing that he did not then recall it. This suggests, in particular, an intentional and deliberate flouting of the Court's Order.

[16] The Minister references the fact that Mr. Sutherland has appeared at each hearing as a mitigating factor. Had he also appeared at the sentencing hearing, it may well have weighed in his favour. Having failed to appear at this important and critical hearing to explain the respondents' actions or to dispute the Minister's evidence, however, I give it little weight.

[17] In Marshall, unlike this case, the respondents were not given a further opportunity to comply beyond the section 231.7 compliance order. These respondents were given a further opportunity to comply by virtue of my July 4, 2012 Order. The following penalty was ordered in

Digitized by Google

Marshall:

> 1. The respondent is guilty of contempt of this Court's order dated March 2, 2006, and shall pay a fine of $3,000.00 within 30 days from the date of service of this Order, and shall pay the applicant's legal costs in the amount of $2,000.00 within 30 days from the date of service of this Order. Failure to pay this fine and the legal costs within 30 days shall subject the respondent to 30 days' imprisonment.
> 2. The respondent shall also provide the information and documents set out in the Court's order dated March 2, 2006 within 30 days from the date of service of this Order, or provide the Minister with a full explanation why the respondent does not have this information and these documents, failing which the respondent shall be imprisoned for 10 days, such term to run consecutive to any other term of imprisonment imposed by this Order.
> 3. The respondent shall not be imprisoned for failure to pay the fine or the legal costs if within 30 days from the date of service of this Order the respondent arranges with the Minister for an oral examination under oath and provides evidence satisfactory to the Court that she is not able to pay the fine or the legal costs, or that she needs an extended time period in which to pay.
> 4. If the Minister informs the Court by affidavit that payment of either the fine or the legal costs has not been made within 30 days from the date of service of this Order, and that the respondent has not arranged with the Minister for an oral examination under oath with respect to her ability to pay the fine or the legal costs, the Court shall issue a warrant for the imprisonment of the respondent for 30 days.
> 5. If the Minister informs the Court by affidavit that the respondent has not provided the information and documents set out in the Court's order dated March 2, 2006, within 30 days from the date of service of this Order or provided the Minister with a full explanation why the respondent does not have this information and these documents, then the Court shall issue a warrant for the imprisonment of the respondent for a term of 10 days, such term to run consecutive to any other term of imprisonment imposed by this Order.

[18] These respondents have already had the benefit of lenience shown in the earlier Orders granting them time to comply and purge their contempt. Having failed to take advantage of that and having failed to either appear to explain their contempt or to provide evidence of compliance, they are deserving of little more. A swift and serious penalty is appropriate to compel compliance from these respondents, act as a general deterrent, and maintain the public's confidence in the administration of justice. Justice is tempered by ordering no more than is necessary to accomplish these legitimate ends; a balance I have considered in arriving at my Order.

[19] The Minister is also seeking solicitor-client costs and has provided a Bill of Costs showing a total of $19,905.74, being $18,200.95 in fees and $1,704.79 in disbursements. The amount appears to the Court to be reasonable and, in these circumstances, it is appropriate that the Minister not be out of pocket for having to enforce this Court's Orders.

Digitized by Google

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that:

1. The respondents, having been found on July 4, 2012, guilty of contempt of this Court's Order dated February 7, 2012, and having failed to provide the Minister with the information and documents set out in the Court's Order dated July 4, 2012, and having provided no defence or explanation for having failed so to do, shall pay a fine of $5,000.00 within 30 days from the date of service of this Order, and shall also pay the applicant's legal costs in the amount of $19,905.74 within 30 days from the date of service of this Order. Failure to pay this fine and the legal costs within 30 days shall subject the respondent, Tel Sutherland, to 30 days imprisonment.

2. The respondents shall also provide the information and documents set out in the Court's Order dated July 4, 2012, except those described in these Reasons for Order as having been provided since that date, within 30 days from the date of service of this Order, failing which Tel Sutherland shall be imprisoned for three (3) years, such term to run consecutive to any other term of imprisonment imposed by this Order.

3. Tel Sutherland shall not be imprisoned for failure to pay the fine or the legal costs described in paragraph 1 of this Order if within 30 days from the date of service of this Order the respondents arrange with the Minister for an oral examination under oath and provide evidence satisfactory to the Court that they are not presently able to pay the fine or the legal costs, or that they need an extended time period in which to pay.

4. Tel Sutherland shall not be imprisoned for failure to produce the documents and information described in paragraph 2 of this Order if within 30 days from the date of service of this Order the respondents arrange with the Minister for an oral examination under oath, and provide evidence satisfactory to the Court that they are not able to produce those documents or information and that their inability to do so does not stem from their own intentional actions, recklessness, or negligence.

5. If the Minister informs the Court by affidavit that payment of either the fine or the legal costs described in paragraph 1 of this Order has not been made within 30 days from the date of service of this Order and that the respondents have not arranged with the Minister for an oral examination under oath with respect to their ability to pay the fine or the legal costs, and the respondents have not satisfied the Court in accordance with paragraph 3 of this Order, the Court shall issue a warrant for the imprisonment of Tel Sutherland for 30 days.

6. If the Minister informs the Court by affidavit that the respondents have not provided the information and documents set out in paragraph 2 of this Order within 30 days from the date of service of this Order and that the respondents have not arranged with the Minister for an oral examination under oath with respect to their ability to produce those documents and information, and the respondents have not satisfied the Court in accordance with paragraph 4 of this Order, then the Court shall issue a warrant for the imprisonment of Tel Sutherland until the Minister informs the Court by affidavit that the respondents have provided all of the information and documents set out in paragraph 2 of this Order, or a term of three (3) years, whichever is earlier. Such term shall run consecutive to any other term of imprisonment imposed by this Order.

"Russel W. Zinn"
Judge

Digitized by Google

SCHEDULE "A"

Bank Note	Account #	2007	2008	2009
			All for the year (Y/N)
BMO	Redacted	Y	Y	Y
TD Canada Trust	Redacted	Y	Y*3	N/A
TD Canada Trust	Redacted	Y	Y*1	N/A
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	N*7
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	N*6
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	N*6
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	N*6
Royal Bank
^	Redacted	Y	Y	N*9
TD Canada Trust	Redacted	Y	Y*5	N/A
TD Canada Trust	Redacted	Y	Y*4	N/A
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	N*6
ATB	Redacted	Y	Y	Y*8
ATB	Redacted	Y*	Y	N*6
BMO	Redacted	N/A	Y*2	Y

*Missing Feb, 2006 Stmt
*1- Account closed March 9, 2007
*2- Account opened March 28, 2007
*3- Account closed March 9, 2007
*4- Account closed March 9, 2007
*5- Account closed April 10, 2007
*6- Missing Jan 2008 Stmt
*7- Missing Dec 2008 & Jan 2009 Stmt
*8- Account closed June 11, 2008
*9- Missing all statements – Feb 2008 to Jan 2009
^ - Also require Jan 2006 & Feb 2009 bank statements as monthly bank statements do not go to end of month. i.e. Jan 31st.

There have been instances where a taxpayer was found not to be in contempt of a court order to respond to a RFI as was the case in MNR And Bernard Dropsy, As Representative Of Cd²l Coopérative De Services En Développement International, And As Administrator Of Warrington[98]. In this case the taxpayer was found not to have access to the records requested, was not a de facto representative of the taxpayer group, and the court found for him.
In Minister Of National Revenue V. Kocsis Transport Ltd.[99] a taxpayer's excuse that there had been hazardous water damage and mould growth that prevented him from complying with a

[98] 2009 FC 820
[99] 2009 FC 1216

Digitized by Google

ordered RFI "didn't hold water": the court held that every corporate taxpayer was responsible for maintaining accurate records and found for contempt.

Issues in Solicitor Client Privilege

There is an inherent limitation on trying to advocate that tax accountants and other types of accountants have a legitimate "client privilege" in refusing to disclose client records to CRA in any of the numerous instances where they may be asked to do. Such an issue arises in instances of seized documents and those requested under a RFI.[100]

Definitions - S. 232

232. (1) In this section,

"custodian" « gardien »
"custodian" means a person in whose custody a package is placed pursuant to subsection 232(3);

"judge" « juge »
"judge" means a judge of a superior court having jurisdiction in the province where the matter arises or a judge of the Federal Court;

"lawyer" « avocat »
"lawyer" means, in the province of Quebec, an advocate or notary and, in any other province, a barrister or solicitor;

"officer" « fonctionnaire »
"officer" means a person acting under the authority conferred by or under sections 231.1 to 231.5;

"solicitor-client privilege" « privilège des communications entre client et avocat »
"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.

Solicitor-client privilege defence - S. 232(2)

(2) Where a lawyer is prosecuted for failure to comply with a requirement under section 231.2 with respect to information or a document, the lawyer shall be acquitted if the lawyer establishes to the satisfaction of the court

> (a) that the lawyer, on reasonable grounds, believed that a client of the lawyer had a solicitor- client privilege in respect of the information or document; and
> (b) that the lawyer communicated to the Minister, or some person duly authorized to act for the Minister, the lawyer's refusal to comply with the requirement together with [100] See The Fragile Privilege: Establishing and Safeguarding Solicitor-Client Privilege by Gloria Geddes in the Canadian Tax Journal, (1999), Vol. 47, No. 4 / no 4 Pg. 799 for an older discussion.

Digitized by Google

a claim that a named client of the lawyer had a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the information or document.

Seizure of certain documents where privilege claimed - S. 232(3)

(3) Where, pursuant to section 231.3, an officer is about to seize a document in the possession of a lawyer and the lawyer claims that a named client of the lawyer has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of that document, the officer shall, without inspecting, examining or making copies of the document,

(a) seize the document and place it, together with any other document in respect of which the lawyer at the same time makes the same claim on behalf of the same client, in a package and suitably seal and identify the package; and

(b) place the package in the custody of the sheriff of the district or county in which the seizure was made or, if the officer and the lawyer agree in writing on a person to act as custodian, in the custody of that person.

Examination of certain documents where privilege claimed - S. 232(3.1)

(3.1) Where, pursuant to section 231.1, an officer is about to inspect or examine a document in the possession of a lawyer or where, pursuant to section 231.2, the Minister has required provision of a document by a lawyer, and the lawyer claims that a named client or former client of the lawyer has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, no officer shall inspect or examine the document and the lawyer shall

(a) place the document, together with any other document in respect of which the lawyer at the same time makes the same claim on behalf of the same client, in a package and suitably seal and identify the package or, if the officer and the lawyer agree, allow the pages of the document to be initialed and numbered or otherwise suitably identified; and

(b) retain it and ensure that it is preserved until it is produced to a judge as required under this section and an order is issued under this section in respect of the document.

Application to judge

(4) Where a document has been seized and placed in custody under subsection 232(3) or is being retained under subsection 232(3.1), the client, or the lawyer on behalf of the client, may

(a) within 14 days after the day the document was so placed in custody or commenced to be so retained apply, on three clear days notice of motion to the Deputy Attorney General of Canada, to a judge for an order

(i) fixing a day, not later than 21 days after the date of the order, and place for the determination of the question whether the client has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, and

(ii) requiring the production of the document to the judge at that time and place;

(b) serve a copy of the order on the Deputy Attorney General of Canada and, where applicable, on the custodian within 6 days of the day on which it was made and, within the same time, pay to the custodian the estimated expenses of transporting the document to and from the place of hearing and of safeguarding it; and

(c) if the client or lawyer has proceeded as authorized by paragraph 232(4)(b), apply at the appointed time and place for an order determining the question.

Disposition of application

Digitized by Google

(5) An application under paragraph 232(4)(c) shall be heard in camera, and on the application

(a) the judge may, if the judge considers it necessary to determine the question, inspect the document and, if the judge does so, the judge shall ensure that it is repackaged and resealed; and

(b) the judge shall decide the matter summarily and,

(i) if the judge is of the opinion that the client has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order the release of the document to the lawyer, and

(ii) if the judge is of the opinion that the client does not have a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order

(A) that the custodian deliver the document to the officer or some other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was seized and placed in custody under subsection 232(3), or

(B) that the lawyer make the document available for inspection or examination by the officer or other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was retained under subsection 232(3.1), and the judge shall, at the same time, deliver concise reasons in which the judge shall identify the document without divulging the details thereof.

Order to deliver or make available

(6) Where a document has been seized and placed in custody under subsection 232(3) or where a document is being retained under subsection 232(3.1) and a judge, on the application of the Attorney General of Canada, is satisfied that neither the client nor the lawyer has made an application under paragraph 232(4)(a) or, having made that application, neither the client nor the lawyer has made an application under paragraph 232(4)(c), the judge shall order

(a) that the custodian deliver the document to the officer or some other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was seized and placed in custody under subsection 232(3); or

(b) that the lawyer make the document available for inspection or examination by the officer or other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was retained under subsection 232(3.1).

Delivery by custodian

(7) The custodian shall

(a) deliver the document to the lawyer

(i) in accordance with a consent executed by the officer or by or on behalf of the Deputy Attorney General of Canada or the Commissioner of Revenue, or

(ii) in accordance with an order of a judge under this section; or

(b) deliver the document to the officer or some other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue

(i) in accordance with a consent executed by the lawyer or the client, or

(ii) in accordance with an order of a judge under this section.

Continuation by another judge

(8) Where the judge to whom an application has been made under paragraph 232(4)(a) cannot for any reason act or continue to act in the application under paragraph 232(4)(c), the application under paragraph 232(4)(c) may be made to another judge.

Digitized by Google

Costs
(9) No costs may be awarded on the disposition of any application under this section.

Directions
(10) Where any question arises as to the course to be followed in connection with anything done or being done under this section, other than subsection 232(2), 232(3) or 232(3.1), and there is no direction in this section with respect thereto, a judge may give such direction with regard thereto as, in the judge's opinion, is most likely to carry out the object of this section of allowing solicitor-client privilege for proper purposes.

Prohibition
(11) The custodian shall not deliver a document to any person except in accordance with an order of a judge or a consent under this section or except to any officer or servant of the custodian for the purposes of safeguarding the document.

Idem
(12) No officer shall inspect, examine or seize a document in the possession of a lawyer without giving the lawyer a reasonable opportunity of making a claim under this section.

Authority to make copies
(13) At any time while a document is in the custody of a custodian under this section, a judge may, on an ex parte application of the lawyer, authorize the lawyer to examine or make a copy of the document in the presence of the custodian or the judge by an order that shall contain such provisions as may be necessary to ensure that the document is repackaged and that the package is resealed without alteration or damage.

Waiver of claim of privilege
(14) Where a lawyer has, for the purpose of subsection 232(2), 232(3) or 232(3.1), made a claim that a named client of the lawyer has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of information or a document, the lawyer shall at the same time communicate to the Minister or some person duly authorized to act for the Minister the address of the client last known to the lawyer so that the Minister may endeavour to advise the client of the claim of privilege that has been made on the client's behalf and may thereby afford the client an opportunity, if it is practicable within the time limited by this section, of waiving the claim of privilege before the matter is to be decided by a judge or other tribunal.

Compliance
(15) No person shall hinder, molest or interfere with any person doing anything that that person is authorized to do by or pursuant to this section or prevent or attempt to prevent any person doing any such thing and, notwithstanding any other Act or law, every person shall, unless the person is unable to do so, do everything the person is required to do by or pursuant to this section.

Minister of National Revenue v. Welton Parent Inc., 2006 FC 67, a Tax Lawyer's files, though Substance Acutely Measured…

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] Welton Parent seeks an order cancelling or varying my order dated March

Digitized by Google

31, 2004 authorizing the Minister of National Revenue to impose on it a requirement which seeks to produce information and documents relating to one or more unnamed persons under subsection 231.2(3) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.) (ITA).

[2] This order of March 31, 2004 was granted on an ex parte application. Pursuant to subsection 231.2(6) of the ITA, it may be cancelled if I am not satisfied that the conditions set out in paragraphs 231.2(3)a) and b) have been met, and it can be confirmed or varied even if I am satisfied that those conditions have been meet.

[3] In addition to challenging the validity of this order and the resulting requirement on the basis that the statutory conditions for issuing it were not met, Welton Parent challenges its validity on three additional grounds which it says are each independently sufficient to justify quashing it.

[4] It submits that:

i) the requirement imposed on it seeks information and documents that are protected by solicitor-client privilege;

ii) subsections 231.2(3), (5), (6) and section 232 of the ITA unjustifiably infringe sections 7 and 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedom, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c.11 (Charter),by failing to provide for adequate protection of solicitor-client privilege and are, therefore, of no force and effect. In that respect, the Court should apply the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (A.G.), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209 in which section 488.1 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, which mirrored section 232 of the ITA, was quashed. Alternatively, for the same reason, the order of March 31, 2004 unjustifiably infringes sections 7 and 8 of the Charter and should be quashed pursuant to subsection 24(1) of the Charter and subsection 231.2(6) of the ITA.

iii) the Minister failed to make a full and frank disclosure of all the facts and information within the knowledge of the Canada Custom Revenue Agency (CCRA) that would indicate that the information and documents sought by the requirement are privileged or potentially privileged.

BACKGROUND

[5] CCRA is conducting audits, for the taxation years of 1997 to 2003 inclusive, of various Canadian employers who have claimed expenses for salaries and wages incurred in respect of contributions to what those unnamed employers claim to be offshore "health and welfare trusts" for the benefit of their employees.

[6] The interpretation bulletin IT-85R2 defines "health and welfare trust" as a vehicle which allows special treatment for employers acting for the benefit of their employees. A health and welfare trust contribution that meets the criteria set out in the bulletin and the costs related to it may be deducted by an employer as a business expense.

[7] During the course of the audits referred to above, approximately twenty-five health and welfare trusts were identified and CCRA is of the view that these trusts did not in fact meet the criteria established in the interpretation bulletin because, among other things:

a) the employers have been contributing amounts to offshore trusts which could revert back to them in the future;

b) the contributions have been unreasonably high in light of the wages earned by the employees and in light of comparable insurance plans;

c) the funds available are used for other things than to provide health and welfare benefits;

d) the payments are not made enforceable by the trust; and

e) the employer and the trustee are not dealing at arm's length.

Digitized by Google

[8] On that basis, CCRA's position has been that contributions to such trusts will not be deductible in the year they are made.

[9] In the twenty-five cases referred to above, CCRA found an actuarial valuation prepared by the actuarial firm of the respondent, Welton Parent. In each case, it appears that CCRA was well aware that Welton Parent was providing those valuations to Ottawa lawyers. It also knew that the respondent did not deal directly with the unnamed employers.[1]

[10] Although at the time the authorization was sought, CCRA was only aware of the involvement of two lawyers, Gregory Sanders and William Johnston, it is clear that Welton Parent also provided similar services to a third Ottawa lawyer, Hari S. Nesathurai.[2] Each of these lawyers uses a slightly different legal structure to establish their respective group sickness and accident insurance plans, but these plans are essentially the same. A "group sickness and accident insurance plan" is one type of benefit plan that qualifies under the interpretation bulletin IT-85R2 as a "health and welfare trust". Hereinafter, I will refer to the arrangements set up by the three Ottawa lawyers as "the Plans".

[11] It is not contested that the three lawyers were retained to provide legal advice to their clients, the unnamed taxpayers. CCRA takes the position, however, that prior to the reply to its motion record, it was not fully aware of their role and their exact relationship with Welton Parent.

[12] The evidence shows to my satisfaction that the legal mandate of these lawyers included the setting up of the Plans and the giving of an opinion to the unnamed employers on the taxability of expenses associated with the Plans.

[13] There is no evidence that those lawyers actually promoted the use of the Plans[3] or that they were involved in the financing or setting up of the Plans in any capacity other than as legal advisers. In fact, the evidence indicates that employers wishing to set up such Plans were actually referred to the three counsel by accountants and financial advisers. For example, Mr. Sanders received referrals from various Canadian chartered banks, including the Royal Bank of Canadaand the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

[14] Those lawyers retained Welton Parent directly to perform actuarial valuations of the liabilities and funding requirements of their Plans and to make recommendations based on each unnamed employer's ability to pay. The extent to which the actuarial valuations were used to render the legal opinion and fulfill the legal mandate of each lawyer will be discussed later. It is sufficient to say at this stage that, in addition to being used by the three lawyers for their own purposes, these valuations were also remitted to the custodian or the trustee of the various Plans because, in each case, they had a contractual obligation to obtain such valuations once a given Plan was established.

[15] In the course of some of its audits, CCRA obtained copies of legal opinions rendered by Mr. Sanders and Mr. Johnston to some of the taxpayers it was investigating. In those instances, the Court can only assume that the taxpayers waived their legal advice privilege.

[16] As it appears clearly from the affidavit of Daniel Rivet, dated March 5, 2004 and submitted in support of the Minister's ex parte application to the Court for the order authorizing the imposition of a requirement on Welton Parent, one of the main purposes of the requested requirement was to obtain the names of the employers who had established such Plans and were still unknown to CCRA.

[17] In his affidavit, Mr. Rivet also mentions that, if necessary, CCRA would also issue a requirement to the employers or the "promoters" at a later date to obtain additional documentation such as letters of wishes and trust agreements.

[18] The involvement of the Ottawa lawyers is mentioned only once in this affidavit and it is in a paragraph which explains why the arrangements failed to meet the criteria set out in the interpretation bulletin.

Digitized by Google

[19] At subsection 9(h) of his affidavit, Mr. Rivet states:

9) Review of trust agreements to date reveal that these arrangements are failing to meet the above criteria for a number or reasons. These include cases where:

(...)

(h) the documents in the files that have been reviewed by the CCRA are similar and originate from two Ottawa based lawyers (the "promoters");

[20] Thereafter, in his affidavit and in his testimony before the Court at the hearing to obtain the authorization, Mr. Rivet referred to these lawyers only as promoters. He did not indicate that CCRA had obtained copies of the legal opinions provided by these lawyers which clearly indicate that their role was mainly to act as legal advisers to their clients, the unnamed employers. In the course of these audits, it also appears that CCRA had several discussions with Welton Parent and at least one of the Ottawa lawyers.

[21] In addition to the flaws identified in paragraph 9 of his affidavit, Mr. Rivet also indicates that Welton Parent did not calculate the contributions to the Plans in accordance with accepted actuarial standards (paragraph 12 of his affidavit).

[22] The order of March 31, 2003 was issued without special conditions or reference to solicitor-client privilege. When the requirement was delivered to Welton Parent, it immediately contacted the three lawyers who had appointed it. The lawyers in turn sought to obtain instructions from the unnamed employers as to whether or not they were authorized to waive solicitor-client privilege, with respect to their names and the other information in the files of Welton Parent. They were instructed to file the present motion to preserve privilege and have done so through the respondent, Welton Parent.[4]

[23] No attempt was made by CCRA to contact the Ottawalawyers to discuss the issue of privilege when the requirement was served. However, CCRA agreed to suspend the time granted to reply to the requirement until a decision is made with respect to this motion.

[24] Extensive evidence was filed by both parties on this motion. In particular, the respondent filed affidavits by Gregory Sanders, William Johnston, Hari S. Nesathurai and Joann Williams (Welton Parent) and the Minister filed an additional affidavit of Daniel Rivet. All affiants were cross-examined.

LEGISLATION

[25] The most relevant provisions of the ITA are the following:

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.):	Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, L.R.C. (1985), ch. 1 (5e suppl.) :
231.2(3) On ex parte application by the Minister, a judge may, subject to such conditions as the judge considers appropriate, authorize the Minister to impose on a third party a requirement under subsection 231.2(1) relating to an unnamed person or more than one unnamed person (in this section referred to as the "group") where the judge is satisfied by information on oath that (a) the person or group is ascertainable; and (b) the requirement is made to verify compliance by the person or persons in the group with any duty or obligation under this Act. (c) (Repealed by S.C. 1996, c. 21, s. 58(1).)	231.2 (3) Sur requête ex parte du ministre, un juge peut, aux conditions qu'il estime indiquées, autoriser le ministre à exiger de tod'un tiers la fourniture de renseignements ou production de documents prévue au paragraphe (1) concernant une personne non désignée nommément ou plus d'une personne non désignée nommément -- appelée "groupe" au présent article --, s'il est convaincu, sur dénonciation sous serment, de ce qui suit: a) cette personne ou ce groupe est identifiable; b) la fourniture ou la production est exigée pour vérifier si cette personne ou les personnes de ce groupe ont respecté quelque devoir ou obligation prévu par la

Digitized by Google

(d) (Repealed by S.C. 1996, c. 21, s. 58(1).)présente loi;
(5) Where an authorization is granted under*c*) (Abrogé par L.C. 1996, ch. 21, art.
subsection 231.2(3), a third party on whom58(1).)
a notice is served under subsection*d*) (Abrogé par L.C. 1996, ch. 21, art.
231.2(1) may, within 15 days after the58(1).) service of the notice, apply to the judge who(5) Le tiers à qui un avis est signifié ou granted the authorization or, where theenvoyé conformément au paragraphe (1) judge is unable to act, to another judge ofpeut, dans les 15 jours suivant la date de the same court for a review of thesignification ou d'envoi, demander au juge authorization. qui a accordé l'autorisation prévue au
(6) On hearing an application underparagraphe (3) ou, en cas d'incapacité de subsection 231.2(5), a judge may cancelce juge, à un autre juge du même tribunal the authorization previously granted if thede réviser l'autorisation.
judge is not then satisfied that the(6) À l'audition de la requête prévue au conditions in paragraphs 231.2(3)(a) andparagraphe (5), le juge peut annuler 231.2(3)(b) have been met and the judgel'autorisation accordée antérieurement s'il may confirm or vary the authorization if then'est pas convaincu de l'existence des judge is satisfied that those conditions haveconditions prévues aux alinéas (3)a) et b). Il been met. peut la confirmer ou la modifier s'il est convaincu de leur existence.

[26] The other relevant sections such as 231.7, 232 and 238 of the ITA, sections 7, 8 and 24 of the Charter and sections 487 and 488.1 of the Criminal Code are included in Annex 1.

ANALYSIS

A- Should the requirement be cancelled because it was not sought for the purpose of verifying compliance with any "duty or obligation" under paragraph 232.1(3)b) of the ITA?

[27] As mentioned, the respondent argues that the applicant has failed to provide the Court with proper evidence showing that the requirement was necessary to verify compliance with any specific "duty or obligation" under the ITA. In their view, the Minister only referred to an alleged breach of an untested interpretation bulletin which is not binding on the courts or CCRA.

[28] Welton Parent submits that subsection 231.2(3) sets a very high threshold for the issuance of an unnamed person requirement that must be contrasted with the threshold set out at subsection 231.2(1), which permits the issuance of a requirement "for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this act".

[29] On the other hand, the Minister says that the requirement is valid because the requested information may be relevant to the determination of the tax liability of the unnamed taxpayers and that, indeed, section 231.2 sets a low threshold even for unnamed persons.

[30] It is not disputed that, in this particular instance, the group of unnamed taxpayers is ascertainable (paragraph 231.2(3)a)). I am satisfied that the affidavit of Mr. Rivet (in particular paragraphs 3, 17, 21 and 25) and his testimony (particularly at page 464, line 10 through page 465 of volume 4 of Welton Parent's motion record) at the ex parte hearing established that the Minister was seeking the required information to verify compliance by the unnamed employers with their duty to pay taxes on all revenues except for deductions permitted under the ITA.

[31] The unnamed employers are clearly the persons who are being investigated by the applicant and I am satisfied on the evidence presented that there may be a problem with the deductions made by these unnamed employers, with respect to their contributions to the Plans.

[32] This situation is very similar to the one recently reviewed by the Federal Court of

Digitized by Google

Appeal in Canada (M.N.R.) v. National Foundation for Christian Leadership, [2005] F.C.J. No. 1115 (F.C.A.)(QL), where Justice Sharlow confirmed that the conditions in paragraph 231.2(3)b) had been properly met. I conclude that the order authorizing the issuance of the requirement should not be cancelled on that basis.

B- Are the information and documents targeted by the requirement protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege?

1) Information and documents other than the names of the employers:

[33] After reviewing the evidence, particularly the affidavits of Gregory Sanders, William Johnston and Hari S. Nesathurai, the transcripts of their cross-examinations and the samples of their opinions, I conclude that the valuation reports of Welton Parent and the advice it provided were important elements on which all counsel relied to give their opinions on the tax consequences of the Plans they were mandated to establish on behalf of their clients. There is no doubt that, for Mr. Sanders, an actuarial opinion was necessary to support the reasonableness of the clients' deductions under the ITA (motion record, volume 4, page 558). Similarly, Mr. Johnston's uncontradicted evidence was that such an opinion was an essential pre-condition for him to opine on compliance with Canadian income tax law (motion record, volume 3, page 217). For Mr. Nesathurai, it is equally clear that the actuary report was essential to determine whether the funding of the plan was reasonable. Only after receiving a confirmation of the reasonableness of the actuarial assumptions was he able to provide his legal opinion to his client. Even the applicant recognizes that pursuant to the interpretation bulletin, an actuarial report is essential to determine whether the contributions can be deducted.

[34] There is uncontradicted evidence that the lawyers' clients expected that the information given to their lawyers for the purpose of obtaining legal advice would remain privileged and confidential and would be disclosed to no one without their express consent.

[35] For example, the evidence of Gregory Sanders is that he discussed privilege virtually every time he first met with a potential client. He advised his clients that all information that they conveyed to him would be privileged, "including their names and contact information", since he was a tax lawyer and disclosing their name would violate their rights with respect to privilege (cross-examination of Mr. Sanders, motion record, volume 4, pages 484 to 486, questions 49, 50 and 52).

[36] It appears that Mr. Johnston even advised his clients not to tell others that he was their lawyer, because Ottawa is not a very big town and people know that he is a tax law practitioner with a specialized tax practice (motion record, volume 4, page 646).

[37] The lawyers also provided evidence that they had always expected that all the information that they provided to Welton Parent about their clients would be privileged and would be kept in the strictest confidence and not disclosed to anyone except themselves or their clients.

[38] On that basis, Welton Parent, on behalf of the unnamed employers, urges the Court to conclude that all the information in its files are protected by the legal advice privilege.

[39] I will deal with the status of the names of the various employers as a separate issue because, in respect of this question, the parties do not appear to disagree on the law. Rather, they disagree on how it should apply in the particular circumstances of this case. In contrast, their disagreement with respect to the other information and documentation referred to in the requirement directly concerns the extent of the concept of legal advice privilege in Canada.

[40] In effect, the respondent says that the law in Canadaactually recognises that its report and correspondence with the Ottawa lawyers are privileged. For Welton Parent, a correct interpretation of the decision of President Jackett in Susan Hosiery Ltd. v. Canada

Digitized by Google

(M.N.R.), [1969] 2 Ex. C.R. 27 indicates that communications between a client's accountant and a solicitor are privileged where the accountant was hired in the context of providing legal advice.

[41] This decision was in their view properly interpreted and applied by Justice Gibson in Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. v. M.N.R., [1996] 1 F.C. 367 at page 383, and by Justice Heneghan in AFS and Co. v. Canada, 2001 D.T.C. 5330.

[42] According to the respondent, Susan Hosiery has been interpreted too restrictively in several decisions including the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario in General Accident Assurance Company et al. v. Chrusz et al., [1999] O.J. No. 3291.The respondent also says that Chrusz should be distinguished because, contrary to what happened in that case, there is no evidence here that the unnamed taxpayers are trying to use the legal advice privilege to artificially shield evidence that would otherwise not have been privileged.

[43] The respondent also refers to other decisions, such as Long Tractor Inc. v. Canada (Deputy Attorney General) (1997), 155 D.L.R. (4th) 747, Methanex Corp. v. Canada(Department of National Revenue), [1997] 1 W.W.R. 573, Cineplex Odeon Corp. v. M.N.R. (1994), 114 D.L.R. (4th) 141, Telus Communications Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2004] F.C.J. No. 1918 (C.A.)(QL), which allegedly support its position.

[44] There is no doubt, and it is not contested, that solicitor-client privilege is a fundamental right and a substantive rule of law in Canada (Canada v. Solosky, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821, Descôteaux v. Mierzwinski, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860, R. v. McClure, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 445 and Lavallee, above). Courts have also often recognized the need to adopt a very liberal approach to the scope of such privilege (Stevens v. Canada (Prime Minister), [1998] 4 F.C. 89 (C.A.) at paragraph 21).

[45] Because of the importance of the concept and recognizing the significance of the issue raised by the respondent in the context of multi-disciplinary practices and in areas of the law which have become extremely complex, such as tax law, the Court has very carefully examined all the authorities cited even though I will not deal in detail with each and every one of them here.

[46] Before reviewing these authorities, it is important to mention that the parties agree that Welton Parent was not serving as a channel of communication between the three lawyers involved in this case and their clients. In fact, Welton Parent never communicated with anybody other than the solicitors themselves.[5]

[47] Also, as indicated, Welton Parent has taken the position that the Court does not need to change the law to conclude that their files are privileged. It simply has to properly construe the existing case law.

[48] The Minister takes the opposite view. He says that Canadian law on the subject has been properly summarized by Justice Doherty in Chrusz and that to conclude that the documentation and information in the possession of Welton Parent in this case is privileged would require an extension of the law with respect to legal advice privilege.

[49] In Susan Hosiery, the Exchequer Court of Canada used the decision in Wheeler v. Le Marchant (1881), 17 Ch. D. 675 as the starting point for its analysis of the law with respect to solicitor-client privilege.

[50] In Wheeler, a land surveyor had been retained by a solicitor for the purpose of obtaining information required to enable him to give the legal advice sought by his client.

[51] As in the present case, it was clear that the land surveyor had not been engaged to serve as a conduit between the solicitor and his client for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. He was not a representative or agent of the client. The English Court of Appeal decided that the communications between the solicitor and his expert were not communications to which legal advice privilege extended.

Digitized by Google

[52] After quoting from Justice Cotton's decision in Wheeler, President Jackett said that none of the decisions to which he had been referred since then seemed to have changed or added to the law so far as it was relevant to what he had to decide on the motion before him.

[53] I therefore understand that in Susan Hosiery, the Court applied to the particular facts before it the law as it then stood. The Court simply reformulated the principles set out in Wheeler, by saying at paragraph 8:

(a) all communications, verbal or written, of a confidential character, between a client and a legal adviser directly related to the seeking, formulating or giving of legal advice or legal assistance (including the legal adviser's working papers, directly related thereto) are privileged; and

(b) all papers and materials created or obtained specially for the lawyer's "brief" for litigation, whether existing or contemplated, are privileged.

[54] It then added at paragraph 12:

Applying these principles, as I understand them, to materials prepared by accountants, in a general way, it seems to me

(a) that no communication, statement or other material made or prepared by an accountant as such for a business man falls within the privilege unless it was prepared by the accountant as a result of a request by the business man's lawyer to be used in connection with litigation, existing or apprehended; and

(b) that where an accountant is used as a representative, or one of a group of representatives, for the purpose of placing a factual situation or a problem before a lawyer to obtain legal advice or legal assistance, the fact that he is an accountant, or that he uses his knowledge and skill as an accountant in carrying out such task, does not make the communications that he makes, or participates in making, as such a representative, any the less communications from the principal, who is the client, to the lawyer; and similarly, communications received by such a representative from a lawyer whose advice has been so sought are none the less communications from the lawyer to the client.

[55] Based on the evidence then before the Court and after recognizing that, in practice, smaller corporations do engage accountants to act for them in such matters, President Jackett concluded that Mr. Pall, Susan Hosiery's auditor, was indeed acting as representative of Susan Hosiery for the purpose of obtaining legal advice from Susan Hosiery's lawyer when it communicated with the lawyer. Thus, their communications were privileged.

[56] This interpretation of Wheeler has been adopted in England and in Australia (see Pratt Holdings Pty Ltd. v. Commissioner of Taxation, [2004] F.C.A.F.C. 122 (F.C.A.) at paragraphs 23 to 33 and 91 to 97, Price Waterhouse (a firm) v. BCCI Holdings (Luxembourg) SA and other, [1992] BCLC 583 (Ch. Div.), page 5, Three Rivers District Counsel and others v. Governor and Company of the Bank of England (No. 5), [2004] UKHL 48, [2005] 4 All ER 948 (H. L.) at paragraph 99).

[57] This is also exactly how the Court of Appeal of Ontario in Chrusz understood Wheeler and Susan Hosiery (see pages 22 and 23 to 27).

[58] For example, at page 23, the Court says: "Wheeler v. Le Marchant, supra, illustrates the first principle that communications to or by a third party are not protected by client-solicitor privilege merely because they assist the solicitor in formulating legal advice for a client". In that respect, Justice Doherty notes that one must be careful when reviewing authorities on this subject given the inconsistent terminology used. He also points out that one must ascertain that comments made in a case about solicitor-client privilege were indeed intended to apply to communications with third parties where litigation was not ongoing or not contemplated.

Digitized by Google

[59] In Chrusz, the Court of Appeal had to determine whether the report of a claims adjuster who had originally been retained directly by the client, an insurance company, was privileged because, sometime after the appointment of this expert, the insurance company retained a lawyer and directed the claims adjuster to report to the lawyer. The Court of Appeal had to review and analyze the extent of the solicitor-client privilege not only in the context of legal advice but also in the context of litigation because in that case, ultimately, the insurance company commenced an action for fraud against its insured.

[60] The Court considered the rationale for the legal advice privilege (referred to as the solicitor-client privilege in the decision as opposed to the litigation privilege) and reviewed the authorities on the subject, particularly in respect of its application to communications by or to a third party. It concluded[6] that the privilege extended to all situations in which the third party's expertise was required to interpret, for the solicitor, information provided by the client or when the third party serves as a conduit of advice from the lawyer to the client or of instructions from the client to the lawyer.

[61] For Justice Doherty, the existence of a solicitor-client privilege should not depend on the concept of agency; rather, one should adopt a functional approach to determine if it should apply. In that respect, he said at page 26:

I agree with the Divisional Courtthat the applicability of client-solicitor privilege to communications involving a third party should not be determined by deciding whether Mr. Bourret is properly described as an agent under the general law of agency. I think that the applicability of client-solicitor privilege to third party communications in circumstances where the third party cannot be described as a channel of communication between the solicitor and client should depend on the true nature of the function that the third party was retained to perform for the client. If the third party's retainer extends to a function which is essential to the existence or operation of the client-solicitor relationship, then the privilege should cover any communications which are in furtherance of that function and which meet the criteria for client-solicitor privilege.

Client-solicitor privilege is designed to facilitate the seeking and giving of legal advice. If a client authorizes a third party to direct a solicitor to act on behalf of the client, or if the client authorizes the third party to seek legal advice from the solicitor on behalf of the client, the third party is performing a function which is central to the client-solicitor relationship. In such circumstances, the third party should be seen as standing in the shoes of the client for the purpose of communications referable to those parts of the third party's retainer.

[62] It is interesting to note that in drawing this distinction between essential and non-essential functions, Doherty J.A. returned to the seminal case of Wheeler.

[63] Applying this approach, the Court in Chrusz found that the claims adjuster did not have the authority to seek legal advice or to give instructions on legal matters on behalf of the insurance company; his authority did not reach inside the client-solicitor relationship. Rather, his function was to educate the solicitor as to circumstances surrounding the fire so that the client could receive the benefit of better informed advice from his lawyer and could then instruct the latter as to the legal steps to be taken on its behalf. Thus, the claims adjuster's correspondence and communications with the lawyer were not privileged.[7]

[64] In College of Physiciansof British Columbia v. British Columbia (Information and Privacy Commissioner), [2002] B.C.J. No. 2779, the Court of Appeal of British Columbia found the analysis of Justice Doherty in Chrusz compelling and adopted it to determine whether the experts' opinions obtained by the College's lawyer were covered by a legal advice privilege.

[65] In that particular case, the experts were retained to help the lawyer interpret and assess whether the evidence supported an allegation that a certain doctor had hypnotized his patient. The Court, after adopting the functional approach, said:

Digitized by Google

The experts were not authorized by the College to direct the lawyer to act or to seek legal advice from her. The experts were retained to act on the instructions of the lawyer to provide information and opinions concerning the medical basis for the Applicant's complaint. While the experts' opinions were relevant, and even essential, to the legal problem confronting the College, the experts never stood in the place of the College for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. Their services were incidental to the seeking and obtaining of legal advice.

[66] It concluded that the opinions were not covered by legal advice privilege.

[67] In my review, I have obviously considered the decision of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in Lamey (Litigation Guardian of) v. Rice (2000), 190 D.L.R. (4th) 486 (N.B.C.A.). In that case, the Court does not refer to or mention Chrusz and, after a brief analysis, it concludes that an adjuster's report prepared at the request of the lawyer, as well as the correspondence between the lawyer and the adjuster, were protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[68] Having carefully considered the reasoning of the Court in that case, I agree with the comments found in the Second Edition Supplement prepared by S. Lederman and A. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada, LexisNexis Buttherworths, 2004, at paragraph 14.71.3, that the better view is that of Justice Doherty in Chrusz.

[69] Before concluding my comments on the authorities, I will briefly refer to the decisions of this Court and of the Federal Court of Appeal[8] cited by the respondent.

[70] In Telus, Justice Linden had to determine whether excised portions of a memorandum were subject to solicitor-client privilege. The Court reviewed certain cases dealing with legal advice communicated to a client through an agent and referred to Susan Hosiery as a case where "the communications between two accountants and a lawyer were deemed to be privileged because the accountants were obtaining legal advice on behalf of the client" (paragraph 15).

[71] The respondent put some emphasis on the fact that Justice Linden approved the decision of Master Peppiat in Sunwell Engineering Co. et al. v. Mogilevski et al. (1986),9 C.P.C. (3d) 479. I do not see how this case supports the respondent's position for it is clear that, in Sunwell, the communications between the patent agent and the client for which privilege was sought were nothing more than a mere passing on and restating of the solicitor's opinion obtained by the patent agent on behalf of his client. This was again a simple conduit case as was the case before the Court of Appeal in Telus, above.

[72] The respondent then says that Justice Gibson, in Interprovincial Pipe-Line Inc., above, accepted that solicitor-client privilege extends "to advice provided by professionals retained by outside counsel in the course of preparation of legal advice to the counsel's clients" (at page 383).

[73] The learned judge did use such a description of the solicitor-client privilege in his decision but, in doing so, he was simply restating the principle as it was put before him by the parties. He clearly says that such a statement of the law was not in dispute. Therefore, he does not analyze the authorities in that respect. There are insufficient details in the decision to enable me to conclude without a doubt that, in Interprovincial Pipe-Line Inc., the accountant Price Waterhouse was not a third party whose functions fell within the parameters set out in Chrusz and Susan Hosiery.

[74] My own review of the authorities leads me to conclude that the statement put before the Court by the parties in Interprovincial Pipe-Line Inc. was inaccurate if it was meant to apply to situations where litigation was not ongoing or contemplated.

[75] The respondent then referred to the decision of Justice Heneghan in AFS and Co., above, particularly to paragraph 21 of her decision where she says:

The jurisprudence has established that there are two distinct branches of solicitor-client privilege: litigation privilege and legal advice privilege. The former protects all communications between the solicitor, client or third parties made in the course of existing or contemplated litigation. The latter protects all communications between a solicitor and client and third parties, that directly relate to the seeking, formulating or giving of legal advice.

Digitized by Google

(My emphasis)

[76] Again, the decision contains few details as to the exact function performed by and role of the third party whose communications were the subject of the motion. Having carefully considered this decision, I am not prepared to accept that Justice Heneghan intended to add to or extend the law as it existed prior to her decision and as it was expressed in Susan Hosiery and Chrusz, to which she refers.

[77] In any event, Justice Heneghan revisited this issue in Belgravia Investments Ltd. v. Canada, [2002] F.C.J. No. 870. In that case, CCRA requested documents relating to certain investments by Belgravia and the taxpayer claimed that some of them were protected by solicitor-client privilege. This documentation consisted mostly of communications moving from Belgravia to its advisers, both legal and non legal, and the exchange of documents between the legal advisor and the other professional advisers, primarily the accountants.

[78] Justice Heneghan reviews the general principles applicable as well as various authorities, including Susan Hosiery and Chrusz, to determine if there were limits to the application of solicitor-client privilege to communications with non legal professionals or third parties. The learned judge concludes at paragraphs 49 and 50:

The limits on solicitor-client privilege, in relation to non-legal professionals, has been considered. The general rule is that communications, statements or other materials prepared by third parties for and on behalf of a solicitor are subject to the privilege only where those documents are prepared in contemplation of litigation; (...)

Accounting documents will be subject to the privilege if the accountant is used as a representative of a client to obtain legal advice; (...) Where a communication is made to an agent, such as an accountant who must consider it and provide an individual opinion, no privilege attaches. Where a document is created by a lawyer who has been consulted by the client's own lawyer in relation to the client's business, the general rule is that such documents will be privileged; (...).

(My emphasis)

[79] If Justice Heneghan's position in AFS & co. was ambiguous, she certainly clarified her views in Belgravia. I see nothing in her summary of the law that differs from my understanding of the authorities.[9]

[80] In view of the foregoing, the Court concludes that, in the present context, Welton Parent's file, including its reports, notes, drafts and communications with the unnamed taxpayers' lawyers, does not fall within the class of solicitor-client privilege simply because these lawyers used the respondent's views to provide legal advice to their client.

[81] Thus, this leaves only the question of whether, in the present case, the names of the employers are protected by solicitor-client privilege.

2) The names of the employers:

[82] The issue with respect to the disclosure of the names of the employers, as I understand it here, is that, in the very particular circumstances of this case, disclosure of this information would effectively reveal not only the fact that these employers sought legal advice from those specific lawyers but also the nature and the very substance of the legal advice given by the lawyers to these employers with respect to the Plans.

[83] Before reviewing the particular circumstances on which the respondent relies to support its position, I will briefly review the applicable principles.

[84] First, it is agreed that, as mentioned by Justice Arbour in Lavallee, at paragraph

Digitized by Google

28, "the names of the client may very well be protected by solicitor-client privilege, although this is not always the case".

[85] In saying this, Justice Arbour was echoing the concerns expressed by Justice Coté of the Alberta Court of Appeal in that same case ((2000), 184 D.L.R. (4th) 25) who had said at paragraph 56 that :

The very fact that a certain client consulted a certain type of lawyer may be very sensitive, and may indirectly reveal important secrets. It may well reveal the topic on which legal advice was sought: Dorchak v. Krupka (1997), 196 A.R. 81, 90 (C.A.).

[86] Justice Veit of the Alberta Queen's Bench in that case ((1998), 160 D.L.R. (4th) 508, at page 525) had also said:

(...) in some situations, it may be critically important for a client to be confident that no one will know that she has consulted a divorce lawyer, or a lawyer who specializes in sterilization claims, or in claims for individuals who contracted AIDS through the blood supply, or in defending drunk driving charges.

[87] The reasoning here is exactly the same as the one adopted to protect other types of information which would reveal the nature of the confidential legal advice provided (see Maranda v. Richer, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 193, at paragraph 22, with respect to administrative information). It is not new and it was applied in an income tax context (verification of a lawyer's tax returns) more than forty years ago in Re Solicitor, (1962), 36 D.L.R. (2d) 594 (BCSC), affirmed, (1964), 45 D.L.R. (2d) 134, leave to appealed dismissed, [1965] S.C.R. 84. There, the Court held that the Minister of National Revenue is not entitled to use his coercive powers to require a lawyer to disclose the names of his clients as these clients had the right to keep secret and privileged the fact that they had sought legal advices.

[88] In Legal Services Society v. British Columbia (Information and Privacy Commissioner) (2003), 226 D.L.R. (4th) 20 (B.C.C.A.), the British Columbia Court of Appeal had to consider whether a reporter should be permitted to obtain the names of the five lawyers with the highest billing for legal aid clients. The Court found that the names of the lawyers could not be disclosed because an assiduous reporter could use this information to deduce that particular clients were funded by legal aid (paragraphs 37-38). It held that because privilege must be retained as a right that is as close to absolute as possible, the line must be drawn on the side of the protection of the privilege (paragraph 40).

[89] This means that like any other information conveyed by a client to his lawyer on a confidential basis for the purpose of obtaining legal advice, the names and coordinates of a client will be protected by solicitor-client privilege if, on the particular circumstances of the case, disclosing them would reveal the topic and substance of the legal advice sought.

[90] In his memorandum and at the hearing, the Minister did not dispute the respondent's position as to the law on this issue.

[91] In fact, the applicant did not make any comments specific to the disclosure of the names of the employers in his memorandum. At the hearing, when asked to clarify his position, the applicant specifically referred the Court to paragraph 38 of his written representations, which simply says that, in any event, not everything in a solicitor-client relationship is privileged, and to paragraphs 44 to 47 of those submissions where the Minister takes the position that even if the information sought was privileged, the privilege was waived when the information was voluntarily sent to third parties such as, in this case, the trustees or custodians of the various Plans and Welton Parent.[10]

[92] It is interesting that the applicant did not argue at the hearing that the names sought were simply the names of the clients of Welton Parent rather than those of the Ottawa lawyers. This is probably because Mr. Rivet himself in his cross-examination acknowledged that although the request was sent to Welton Parent, it was indeed indirectly seeking the names of the clients of those lawyers (motion record, volume 5, pages 713-714, questions 237-240).

Digitized by Google

[93] Given that Welton Parent only worked on the Plans set out by the three Ottawa lawyers and was at all times communicating only with them, the Court is satisfied that the requirement is indeed seeking the names of these lawyers' clients.

[94] What is of particular concern here, as it was for the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Legal Services Society (paragraph 22) and for Justice LeBel speaking for the majority in Maranda (paragraph 24), is that there is little doubt in my mind that if Welton Parent is required to disclose apparently neutral information (names of the employers) either as a separate list or as part of the documents exchanged with the lawyers, an assiduous and intelligent investigator at CCRA will be able to determine the nature of the legal advice given to each of these employers.

[95] Even though Mr. Rivet indicated in his testimony that the copies of the legal opinions in his possession did not mention any dollar amounts, the Court is satisfied that the copies of the legal opinions in the possession of CCRA disclose the nature and to a great extent, the substance of the legal advice given by those lawyers.[11]

[96] This is an exceptional case that goes well beyond the concerns expressed by Justice Coté and Justice Veit in Lavallee.

[97] With respect to Hari S. Nesathurai, even if CCRA did not have a sample of his opinion before the filing of this motion (the time at which the Court should focus its analysis), it appears to the Court that CCRA will obtain enough information from Welton Parent's file to again clearly know the nature of the services he rendered and of his legal advice.

[98] As noted in Re Solicitor, as far back as 1675, the common law has been that "the benefit of doubt should always go to sustain solicitor-client privilege" (page 599).

[99] One must, therefore, determine whether the unnamed employers waived the privilege protecting the nature and substance of the legal advice they sought from the three Ottawa lawyers when their names were voluntarily given by their lawyers to Welton Parent and to the trustees or custodians of the Plans.

[100] In their submissions and in their evidence, Welton Parent states that the solicitor-client privilege belongs to the client and may only be waived by the client through his or her informed consent (Justice Arbour at paragraph 39 in Lavallee and Justice Major at paragraph 37 of R. v. McClure, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 445).

[101] Since the nature of the legal advice privilege is so fundamental that the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee, at paragraph 36, held that it must be retained as a right as close to absolute as possible, the Court agrees that it should not lightly be abrogated.

[102] The Court recognizes that a client's intention to waive is not always determinative because, as mentioned in J. Sopinka, S. Lederman and A. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada, Second Edition, Butterworths, Toronto and Vancouver, 1999, at paragraph 14.96, page 756, other considerations unique to the adversarial system, such as fairness to the opposite party and consistency of positions, may come into play. But the Court cannot find any such considerations here.

[103] Normally, the essentials of a waiver of a legal right (such as a time limitation or contractual rights) include a conscious intention to relinquish that right (see Saskatchewan River Bungalows Ltd. v. Maritime Life Assurance Co., [1994] 2 S.C.R. 490, at paragraphs 19-20).

[104] The Court should depart from the general principles applicable to the waiver of other types of legal rights only when absolutely necessary.

[105] In my view, it is because of the fundamental nature of the privilege that Courts are becoming more reluctant to find waivers of solicitor-client privilege, particularly legal advice privilege, than in the past. This can also explain why concepts such as common interest privilege and limited waivers have been developed. The most recent example is the decision of the Ontario Divisional Court in Philip Services Corp. (Receiver of) v. Ontario Securities Commission, [2005] O.J. No. 4418).

Digitized by Google

[106] The Ottawa lawyers say that the disclosure to the trustees and custodians of the Plans and to Welton Parent was made for a limited purpose - that is, solely to establish and/or implement the Plans. In their affidavits, they say that their clients gave them no authority to waive their privilege beyond that limited purpose, and that neither they nor their clients gave that authority to Welton Parent.

[107] The respondent also relies on the "common interest privilege". This concept applies to information that is shared among parties to a commercial transaction and ensures that such sharing does not result in a waiver or loss of the privilege vis-à-vis parties outside of the group.

[108] It appears from the testimony of Hari S. Nesathurai that a trustee or a custodian of a purpose-based trust, such as those created for the Plans, must know from whom he received the money because anti-money laundering regulations require disclosure of that information. This makes eminent sense and the applicant produced no evidence that the Plans could be established without disclosing at all the names of the employers who funded them.

[109] At the hearing, the applicant also submitted that the Court should consider that this information was or could also be shared with everyone connected with the Plan, such as the employees, the enforcers of the Plans, etc. However, the applicant did not refer in its memorandum or at the hearing to any specific evidence that would indicate that the sharing of the names with these persons gave them sufficient information to know that these employers had retained the Ottawa lawyers to obtain their legal advice on the taxability of their contribution or to know the substance of such legal advice.

[110] There is little evidence as to how the trustee or the custodian treated this information[12] and no evidence on whether any other person to whom the name was or could be disclosed would be in a position to know and ascertain the name of the lawyer representing that party, or the nature and substance of the legal advice he gave.

[111] Although it may well be that Welton Parent could issue a valuation report without having the names of the employers on file, it is clear that when this information was passed on by Mr. Sanders and Mr. Johnston, these lawyers were acting on the belief that such disclosure did not waive their clients' privilege with respect to the nature and substance of the legal advice that had been sought from them. They were wrong in that respect but at least this means that they did not act on the belief that their clients had expressly or implicitly authorized them to waive their legal privilege.

[112] The Court also finds that it was understood by Welton Parent that they had to protect the confidentiality and privilege of the information they received (discussions with the lawyers, notice of privilege on e-mails, etc.).

[113] In the present circumstances, the Court is not willing to infer that the clients implicitly authorized their lawyers to waive the privilege on the nature and substance of their legal advice when they authorized them to obtain an actuarial report from Welton Parent.

[114] The Court concludes that it is not satisfied that the privilege protecting the fact that they sought legal advice with respect to these Plans, and with respect to the nature and substance of such advice, has been waived by the unnamed taxpayers.

[115] In view of the foregoing, the Court concludes that the names of the employers in this very unique case are indeed protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[116] This means that, unless the subsections of the ITA that are challenged are found to be invalid, the order will have to be varied to exclude from the information sought the names of the employers, as well as any reference to such names or these employers' coordinates in the documentation contained in the file of Welton Parent.[13]

Digitized by Google

C- Do subsections 231.2(3)(5) and (6) and section 232 of ITA unjustifiably infringe section 8 of the Charter?

[117] Although the notice of motion includes a reference to section 7 of the Charter, the respondent confirmed at the hearing that the Court should only review the validity of the impugned sections in light of section 8 of the Charter. The parties have limited their arguments to that section.

[118] Relying on the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee, Welton Parent submits that subsections 231.2(3), (5) and (6) of the ITA are unconstitutional because they do not allow a requirement to be cancelled by the Court on grounds of solicitor-client privilege.

[119] It also claims that section 232 is unconstitutional because it allows for the loss of privilege without the client's knowledge or consent and, as such, does not minimally impair their privilege, again, contrary to Lavallee.

[120] It is evident that, in this case, section 232 of the ITA does not directly apply. No requirement was sent to a lawyer, no document is about to be seized in the hand of a lawyer, and no lawyer is being prosecuted for failure to comply with a requirement.

[121] Despite this, Welton Parent argues that the Court should review the constitutionality of this section because it is indirectly involved. According to the respondent, the Minister was trying to circumvent the solicitor-client privilege by sending the requirement to Welton Parent instead of sending it to the Ottawa lawyers. Welton Parent also says that the Minister could assert that the scheme provided for in section 232 applies because, by serving the requirement on Welton Parent, the Minister was in fact serving it on their principals, the Ottawa lawyers (see paragraphs 190 and 191 of the respondent's written representations at page 1439 of their motion record).

[122] But, the Minister did not say that 231.2(3) was constitutional because it was supplemented by the procedure provided for at section 232. He argues that subsections 231.2(3), (5) and (6) stand on their own, and that they give sufficient flexibility to the authorizing judge and the reviewing judge to ensure their validity.

[123] The Court finds that section 232 is not engaged in this case and, therefore, that it would be inappropriate to review or comment on the constitutionality of this section.

[124] Obviously, this makes the task of the respondent more difficult because, in Lavallee, the Supreme Court of Canada quashed section 488.1 of the Criminal Code which dealt only with searches and seizures of documents in the possession of a lawyer and mirrored the procedure set out in section 232 of the ITA to a great extent. The respondent had thus focused its submissions on this section.

[125] Like section 487 of the Criminal Code, which deals with the issuance of search warrants in general, subsection 231.2(3) applies to the issuance of requirements with respect to unnamed taxpayers in general.

[126] The validity of section 487 has been confirmed by the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Piersanti & Co., [2003] O.J. No. 23 and has been discussed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in its decision in Festing v. Canada (A.G.) (2003), 172 C.C.C. (3d) 321. It has not been reviewed by the Supreme Court of Canada except when leave to appeal from Piersanti was denied (R. v. Piersanti & Co., [2003] S.C.C.A. No. 105). But I will say more about these decisions later.

[127] The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee, followed the approach set out in R. v. Edwards, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 128, where Justice Cory said:

There are two distinct questions which must be answered in any s. 8 challenge. The first is whether the accused had a reasonable expectation of privacy. The second is whether the search was an unreasonable intrusion on that right to privacy.

Digitized by Google

[128] This is the approach I will adopt.

[129] The Minister submits that in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] S.C.J. No. 25, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the constitutionality of the predecessor to subsection 231.2(3) and distinguished the investigation of criminal conduct from the enforcement of compliance with the ITA. At paragraph 35, the Court said:

In my opinion, s. 231(3) provides the least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Income Tax Act can be effected. It involves no invasion of a taxpayer's home or business premises. It simply calls for the production of records which may be relevant to the filing of an income tax return. A taxpayer's privacy interest with regard to these documents vis-à-vis the Minister is relatively low. The Minister has no way of knowing whether certain records are relevant until he has had an opportunity to examine them. At the same time, the taxpayer's privacy interest is protected as much as possible since s. 241 of the Act protects the taxpayer from disclosure of his records or the information contained therein to other persons or agencies.

[130] It then concluded that the sending of a requirement did not offend section 8 of the Charter where the information was sought for the purpose of ensuring compliance with the ITA.

[131] More recently, in Bisaillon v. Canada, [1999] F.C.J. No. 1477 (F.C.A.)(QL), the Federal Court of Appeal dismissed the argument that a requirement to provide documents or information infringes sections 7 and 8 of the Charter. Justice Létourneau summarized the principles set out in McKinlay and found that they were still applicable. He said at paragraph 3:

In fact, McKinlay Transport Ltd., [...] a judgment by the Supreme Court of Canada, applies in the case at bar and disposes of the constitutional arguments made by the appellants. In that case the Supreme Court concluded that:

(a) the Act is essentially a regulatory measure;

(b) s. 231(3) (the predecessor of s. 231.2(1)) is not criminal or quasi-criminal law;

(c) application of that subsection constitutes a seizure since it infringes the individual's expectations of privacy;

(d) only unreasonable seizures contravene s. 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms;

(e) seizure in an administrative and regulatory context must be distinguished from seizure in a criminal or quasi-criminal situation;

(f) in a taxation system based on the principle of self-reporting and self-assessment, the Minister of National Revenue has to have broad powers to audit taxpayers' returns and inspect records which may have been used to prepare those returns;

(g) the Minister of National Revenue must be able to exercise these powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds to believe that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act;

(h) s. 231(3) provides the least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Act can be carried out; and

(i) the taxpayer's privacy interest with regard to documents which may be relevant in income tax returns is relatively low in relation to the Minister.

In our opinion, it is not a serious argument for the appellants to say that a requirement to provide documents or information, like the one at bar, infringes the constitutional provisions of ss. 7 and 8 of the Charter when that requirement is made as part of a genuine administrative investigation for the purpose of recovering money owed and with a real objective of collecting information in that connection. Of course, it cannot be used as a stratagem for the covert purpose of obtaining information to be used in criminal proceedings.

Digitized by Google

[132] This does not mean, however, that even in the context of enforcing compliance of the ITA, a taxpayer has a low expectation of privacy with respect to documents or information protected by solicitor-client privilege. This question was never addressed in Bisaillon or in McKinlay.

[133] In Lavallee, the Supreme Court of Canada found that when solicitor-client privilege is at stake, the expectation of privacy is of the highest order. Even if the Court must adopt a contextual approach to such an issue, I see no reason why a taxpayer would have a lower expectation of privacy in respect of the legal advice sought by him simply because we are in the context of enforcing the ITA.

[134] Since the decision in Re Solicitor, no authorities have been cited that would indicate that solicitor-client privilege does not apply to the same extent in the income tax context as in any other context. Anyone looking at the language of section 231.7(1)(b), for example, would conclude that the legislator did not intend to lower the taxpayer's expectation in that respect.

[135] I find that the statement of Justice Arbour in Lavallee as to the expectation of privacy with respect to information protected by solicitor-client privilege applies here.

[136] In respect of the second part of the test, the only argument raised by the respondent to say that 231.2(3) constitutes an unreasonable intrusion on the right to privacy of the information protected by solicitor-client privilege is the fact that section 231.2(6) does not allow the Court to cancel the order authorizing the issuance of the requirement if the criteria set out in section 231.2(3) have been met.

[137] The respondent submits that it is important to also consider that any person who fails to comply with a requirement issued under section 231.2(3) is guilty of an offence and may be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months or to a fine not exceeding $25,000 or both (section 238(1)). In this case, the requirement warned Welton Parent specifically of the possibility of imprisonment and of a fine if it failed to comply within 30 days.

[138] The applicant says that pursuant to section 231.2(3), the authorizing judge has the discretion to impose any terms of execution or conditions he or she considers appropriate. This includes anything that would be relevant to the protection of solicitor-client privilege. He says that in fact, in this case, the Court did put its mind to the issue before issuing the authorization and could have set conditions.

[139] Furthermore, where solicitor-client privilege is raised or becomes an issue, a reviewing judge may vary the order and exclude information or documents on the basis of such privilege. According to the applicant, subsection 231.2(5) ensures that no documents are provided to the applicant before a reviewing judge has put his or her mind to the issue. He submits that the present motion shows that one can get the issue decided without disclosing the names of the clients seeking to rely on the privilege and without any infringement of such a right. Section 231.7 further ensures that no compliance order may be granted by a Court until it is satisfied, among other things, that the information and documentation sought by the Minister is not privileged.

[140] When the Supreme Court of Canada heard Lavallee, it was also seized with two other cases involving the validity of section 488.1 of the Criminal Code. One of them was Festing v. Canada (2001), 159 C.C.C. (3d) 97. In that case, the British Columbia Court of Appeal had struck down section 488.1 and this portion of its decision was affirmed by the

Digitized by Google

Supreme Court of Canada.

[141] But the Court of Appeal in Festing had also found that section 487 of the Criminal Code would be unconstitutional in so far as it applied to searches in law firms and had declared that the words "other than the law office" be read into the introductory words of that section. That portion of the decision was not before the Supreme Court of Canada and the Court of Appeal had suspended its effect until the Supreme Court of Canada ruled on the validity of section 488.1. In its remanded decision found at Festing v. Canada (A.G.) (2003), 172 C.C.C. (3d) 321, the Court of Appeal sets aside its previous order finding section 487 unconstitutional and it simply extends the definition of "law office" for the purpose of applying the Lavallee guidelines to any places where privileged documents may reasonably be expected to be located.

[142] At about the same time, the Ontario Court of Appeal (Justice Weiler, Justice Abella and Justice Charron) had to review a similar issue in Piersanti & Co.[14] In this case, Piersanti & Co. was appealing from the dismissal of its application for an order quashing a search warrant and declaring section 487 unconstitutional to the extent that it authorized the search of law offices and the seizure of documents therein. At paragraph 3 of its decision, the unanimous Court of Appeal agreed with the applications judge that the reasoning of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in its 2001 decision in Festing should not be followed in light of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee. Instead, the Court of Appeal found that the constitutional imperatives for the protection of solicitor-client privilege can be adequately met through the application of common law principles relating to the issuance of search warrants.

[143] If the existence of the common law guidelines set out in Lavallee was found to constitute a sufficient safeguard against unreasonable searches in the context of criminal proceedings and the issuance of search warrants under section 487, it is difficult to envisage why they could not properly support the validity of a much less intrusive process in an administrative or regulatory context. A copy of the guidelines is attached as Annex 2 to these reasons.

[144] There is no reason why the Lavallee guidelines could not be applied to a search warrant issued under the ITA (section 232). Similarly, there is no reason why those guidelines, adapted to the circumstances, could not be applied in the context of a requirement authorised under subsection 231.2(3). As I said, and the parties did not dispute it, they would have to be adapted. For example, as this provision deals with unnamed taxpayers, it would simply not be possible for the Minister to contact or give notice to those taxpayers.

[145] If one applies the Lavallee guidelines, no authorization will be issued with regard to documents that are known to be protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[146] Further, no authorization will be granted without referring to the guidelines where it is reasonable to expect that privileged or potentially privileged information or documentation may be included in the material requested (Festing (2003)).

[147] As I will explain it later in these reasons, had I known all of the facts that were known to the applicant when it sought the ex parte authorization, I would not have authorized the issuance of the requirement unless it had included a specific reference to the fact that Welton Parent was not required to disclose any information or documentation protected by solicitor-client privilege, and that this issue had to be properly considered with its clients or its lawyers before any information or documentation was sent to CCRA.

[148] When one looks at subsection 231.2(3) in the context of the scheme provided for in sections 231.1 to 231.7 and 232, it is clear that Parliament intended the Court to take the steps necessary to protect solicitor-client privilege.

[149] The Court is also convinced that one cannot incur the penalties provided for in section 238 of the ITA if one can establish that one could not fulfill the requirement because solicitor-client privilege prevented it. As section 232 does not apply, there was no need for Welton Parent to identify or name the person on whose behalf it was claiming solicitor-client privilege (R. v. McNeney (1984), 11 C.C.C. (3d) 557). Also, the Court agrees with the applicant that this case is proof enough that Welton Parent and their unnamed clients can assert their privilege within the existing scheme without having to disclose their identities.

Digitized by Google

[150] In view of the above, the Court is satisfied that subsections 231.2(3)(5) and (6) do not constitute an unjustified infringement of section 8 of the Charter.

[151] That does not mean that the requirement, as issued and sent to Welton Parent without any special warning or precaution with respect to solicitor-client privilege, does not constitute an unreasonable search.

[152] I will deal with this issue if it is necessary at the same time as I review the last argument raised with respect to the validity of the requirement and the ex parte order and when I exercise my discretion under subsection 231.2(6) of the ITA.

C- Breach of duty of full and frank disclosure

[153] It is not disputed that the applicant had the duty to make full and frank disclosure in the utmost good faith when it sought the authorization of the Court under paragraph 231.2(3).

[154] In R. v. Araujo, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 992, at paragraph 47, the Supreme Court of Canada said that "a corollary to the requirement of an affidavit being full and frank is that it should never attempt to trick its readers". The parties giving evidence in an ex parte application "should not allow themselves to be led into the temptation of misleading the authorizing judge, either by the language used or strategic omissions".

[155] Justice Gibson in The Minister of National Revenue v. 159890 Canada Inc., 97 DTC 5495, at page 5497, also specified that the obligation of full and frank disclosure requires the Minister to disclose "what might reasonably be regarded as weaknesses in the case" for his ex parte order. His view was confirmed in another context by the Supreme Court of Canada in Ruby v. Canada (Solicitor General), [2002] 4 S.C.R. 3 at paragraph 47 where Justice Arbour said that the disclosure must include the facts adverse to one's interest.

[156] What the respondent says is that the Minister's evidence was incomplete, inaccurate and misleading, and more particularly that:

i) it was incomplete because the Minister did not disclose that he knew that the information and documentation requested were potentially privileged because of their knowledge that the Ottawa lawyers were giving legal opinions to these employers and also because Mr. Johnston had already raised the issue of privilege during a meeting with CCRA concerning one of the twenty-five tax audits referred to earlier (memorandum of May 21, 2003 at page 1189 of the respondent motion record);

ii) it was incomplete because the Minister failed to disclose that his position on the validity of the Plans was untested and was solely based on an interpretation bulletin;

iii) it was inaccurate and misleading with respect to the manner in which Welton Parent's valuations were performed, and;

iv) it was misleading in how it presented the fact that Ottawalawyers were somewhat involved in the file as promoters.

[157] Although the affidavit filed in support of the ex parte application did not discuss the relative strength of the Minister's position with respect to the Plans, this issue was canvassed during the testimony of Mr. Rivet at the ex parte hearing. It was acknowledged that there had been no decision yet confirming the Minister's position and that a first appeal on this question was in progress. The Court is satisfied that there was full and frank disclosure in that respect.

[158] With respect of the allegation that the Minister failed to give accurate evidence

Digitized by Google

when Mr. Rivet said at paragraph 12 of his affidavit that the valuations were not made in accordance with accepted actuarial standards, the Court finds that there was no material misrepresentation that would justify quashing the order.

[159] Mr. Rivet acknowledged that although Ms. Laird, the expert in his department, challenges the reasonableness of some of the assumptions made by Welton Parent, she never said that its opinion was not made in accordance with accepted actuarial principles. Mr. Rivet agreed that the wording he used in his affidavit was "not quite what it should be".

[160] This overstatement did color the file but the Court is satisfied that it was not material because the Court clearly understood from Mr. Rivet's testimony that it was the reasonableness of the assumptions that was challenged. This is normally a matter of opinion. In any event, this was only one of the many issues raised by CCRA (paragraph 9 of Mr. Rivet's affidavit).

[161] The last deficiency raised by the respondent is more serious as it relates to the potentially privileged nature of the information sought by the Minister. After a careful review of the transcript of Mr. Rivet's cross-examination and the documentary evidence produced by the respondent, the Court is not convinced that CCRA or Mr. Rivet knew that Welton Parent or its principals considered all the documentation and information in their files privileged. There is insufficient evidence to support the respondent's assertion that the applicant intentionally deceived the Court as to the role played by the lawyers in this file. There is no doubt that the Court misunderstood the role of the lawyer because of the use of the term "promoters" throughout the affidavit and particularly during the testimony of Mr. Rivet. But I will come back to this issue later.

[162] It is clear that the Minister had to be alert and alive to the issue of solicitor-client privilege. He had the duty to ensure that all available information that could impact on the Court's exercise of its discretion, particularly in respect of the need to impose special conditions to protect solicitor-client privilege, was disclosed.

[163] Mr. Rivet testified that CCRA did not turn its mind to the fact that the Ottawa lawyers were acting at all times as legal advisers, and this despite the fact that he had personally reviewed one of Mr. Johnston's opinions with respect to the tax consequences of one of the Plans. He never turned his mind to the issue of solicitor-client privilege either because he presumed that "whether or not it (Welton Parent's valuation) went through the lawyer this was for the trustee and not for the legal opinion" (transcript of cross-examination at page 738 of the respondent motion record).

[164] On its face, this is contrary to what was argued in the applicant's memorandum for the ex parte hearing. At paragraph 13, the applicant says that "the group of unnamed persons is ascertainable as the respondent has provided opinions to each of the taxpayer employers known to have participated in these health and welfare trusts, (...)".

[165] Recognizing the complexity of the case, and the fact that in one of the sample opinions it is said that the valuation is obtained for the trustee, the Court will give the benefit of the doubt to the applicant.

[166] The Court finds that considering the information at paragraph 15 of Mr. Rivet's affidavit, it was not unreasonable to expect that the report of Welton Parent and its file would not be protected by any privilege. Welton Parent was clearly not a conduit between the Ottawa lawyers and their clients, the employers, and there was no indication that they were essential to the solicitor-client relationship.

[167] But this reasoning cannot be applied in respect of the request to disclose the names of the employers. Mr. Rivet knew that the "promoters" were acting as legal advisers to the employers. He knew the substance of their advice because CCRA had obtained samples of such legal opinions. He had even met with Mr. Johnston in the context of the audit of one of the Plans.

Digitized by Google

[168] As mentioned earlier, Mr. Rivet also acknowledged that although the Minister was asking for the names of the employers through Welton Parent, he was indirectly seeking the names of the clients of the two Ottawa lawyers.

[169] All this information was relevant and material. It should have been disclosed to the Court as clearly as possible. It should certainly not have been buried in the affidavit among technical details as the existence of the Ottawalawyers was in paragraph 9 of Mr. Rivet's affidavit.[15]

[170] The matter was evidently complex and the circumstances quite particular. But there was no urgency in this matter and the applicant had ample time to consider all the issues.

[171] The Court cannot adequately fulfill its role when it is not presented with all the evidence that could indicate that it was reasonable to expect that the names requested were protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[172] It was certainly open to the applicant to believe that any privilege which might have existed with respect to the names of the employers was waived when this information was given to the respondent and to the trustees. He simply had to say so to the Court. This did not relieve him of his obligation. As I said, the applicant has an onerous duty on an ex parte application. He must be conscious that all facts adverse to his position must be included in the evidence provided to the Court.

[173] The fact that the Court itself was alive to the issue of privilege and raised the point during the hearing, does not relieve the applicant of his duty either. Especially when it is evident that the Court misunderstood the role of the lawyers/promoters. It raised the matter because "(...) the promoter may have been given a legal opinion" At that time, it would have been simple to rectify the situation and explain to the Court that, in fact, the promoters were the ones giving the legal opinions to the employers. In his response, the applicant clearly focused on the nature of the actuarial opinion. The problem associated with the disclosure of the names of the employers was never discussed.

[174] I am satisfied that the Court was never in a position to assess the potentially privileged nature of this particular information and there is no doubt that, had it known all the facts that were within the knowledge of the applicant before its sought the ex parte authorization, the Court would not have granted the authorization with respect to the names of the employers unless the requirement clearly stipulated that it covered only documents or information that were not subject to a solicitor-client privilege and that Welton Parent had to discuss this issue with its clients and its lawyers, if necessary, before responding to the requirement.

[175] The respondent argued that any breach of the duty of full and frank disclosure would be sufficient to quash the order in its entirety. In the present circumstances, where there was no intention to deceive, the Court finds that the breach only affects the authorization with respect to the request to disclose the names of the employers.

[176] Pursuant to subsection 231(6), the Court has the authority to vary the order and I will do so.

[177] Because the names of the employers are covered by solicitor-client privilege or, alternatively, as a result of a breach of the duty of full and frank disclosure, the Court finds that the applicant should not be authorized to issue a requirement requesting the names of the employers and that reference to such names should also be deleted from any documentation and information to be provided to CCRA pursuant to the requirement. Now that the issue of solicitor-client privilege has been fully canvassed, there is no further need to refer to it in the requirement.

[178] The only issue left is whether the order should be quashed in its entirety because it also unjustifiably infringes the unnamed taxpayers' right to solicitor-client privilege contrary to section 8 of the Charter.

Digitized by Google

[179] I do not need to discuss this issue with respect to the names of the employers for this portion of the order has already been struck.

[180] With respect to other information listed in the requirement, the Court is not satisfied that the order of March 30, 2004 unjustifiably infringes section 8. As I said, the files and correspondence between Welton Parent and the Ottawalawyers are not covered by solicitor-client privilege and the applicant had no reason to believe that they would be.

[181] The motion is therefore granted in part. Both parties sought their costs but made no representations on that point at the end of the two days of hearing. The matter is somewhat unusual in that there were three different lawyers representing the Ottawa lawyers involved in the motion and, as I said, they were only partially successful.

[182] Should the parties not be able to agree on this matter, the respondent shall file its written representations on costs on or before February 14, 2006 and the applicant shall file his reply on or before February 24, 2006.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that:

1. The motion is granted in part;
2. The order dated March 30, 2004 is amended as follows:

paragraph a) shall read:

The Minister of National Revenue is authorized to impose on the respondent a Requirement in the form attached hereto except that paragraph 1(a) of the said Requirement shall be deleted and the names of the employers and their coordinates if any, shall be deleted from the documentation to be provided in accordance with paragraph 1(b) to 1(f) of the Requirement;

3. If necessary, an order with respect to costs will be issued after receiving the parties written representations.

"Johanne Gauthier"

JUDGE

In the case of MNR v. Bruce Kitsch, Leslie Tower, Robert Tower and BDO Dunwoody LLP, 2003 FCA 307, Ability of Minister to Elicit Information From Tax Accountants of Information of "Non-Document" Nature (Questions) And Documentary Evidence

Indexed as: Tower v. M.N.R. (F.C.A.)

Federal Court of Appeal, Létourneau, Sharlow and Malone JJ.A.--Vancouver, June 24; Ottawa, July 22, 2003.

Income Tax -- Practice -- On advice of accountant, taxpayers entering transactions to produce interest expense deductions -- M.N.R. issuing two requirements to accounting firm to provide tax files, tax planning documents, written responses to questions under Income Tax Act, s. 231.2(1) -- Applications Judge ordering compliance with requirements except parts requiring written responses or creation of new documents -- S. 231.2(1)(b) providing Minister with power to compel production of "any document" -- Minister entitled to compel production of documents, records under s. 231.2(1)(b), to ask questions to elicit knowledge, facts under s. 231.2(1)(a) which permits Minister to compel production of "information" -- Taxpayers' accountants having no right of redaction with respect to documents subject of requirements as no evidence of third party information therein -- As requested information may be relevant to tax liability requirements issued for purpose of administration, enforcement of Act.

Practice -- Privilege -- Whether material prepared by accountants for purpose of providing tax advice privileged communications -- "Class" privilege , "case-by-case" privilege discussed -- Solicitor-client privilege rooted in proper administration of justice -- Advice given by tax accountants not elevated to level of solicitor- client privilege -- As disputed communications not meeting Wigmore's four principles set out in treatise on evidence, not covered by case-by-case privilege.

Digitized by Google

Construction of Statutes -- Income Tax Act, s. 231.2(1) -- S. 231.2(1)(a) giving Minister power to compel production of « information » ; s. 231.(1)(b) giving power to compel production of « any document » -- Presumption against redundancy and every word in statute presumed to make sense, play specific role in advancing legislative purpose -- Different interpretation must be given to both paragraphs, and different meanings given to « information » , « document » -- « Information » meaning knowledge or facts -- To exercise power, Minister must be able to ask questions to elicit knowledge, facts, figures.
REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

MALONE J.A.
Introduction

This appeal and cross-appeal arise from an order of a Judge of the Federal Court, Trial Division (the Applications Judge) dated September 3, 2002, which allowed, in part, an application for judicial review of two decisions of the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) to issue two "Requirements to Provide Information" (Requirements). These Requirements were issued pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act). Reasons in support of this order are reported as Tower v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N.R.) (T.D.), [2003] 2 F.C. 146, [2002] 4 C.T.C. 220, 2002 D.T.C. 7315.

[2] In his Requirements, dated July 11 and July 18, 2001, the Minister required BDO Dunwoody (Dunwoody), the accountants for Bruce Kitsch, Leslie Tower and Robert Tower (the Taxpayers) to deliver up all the tax files, tax planning documents and all of the files relating to the Taxpayers, and to provide written responses to certain questions. The Applications Judge ordered the Taxpayers to comply with the Minister's Requirements, except for those parts which required written responses to questions, or which compelled Dunwoody to create new documents; these latter demands being said to be outside the scope of subsection 231.2(1).

[3] Subsection 231.2(1) of the Act provides authority for the Minister to issue requirements. It reads:

Requirement to provide documents or information -	Production de documents ou fourniture de renseignements -
231.2. (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as is stipulated in the notice,	231.2. (1) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, sous réserve du paragraphe (2) et, pour l'application et l'exécution de la présente loi, y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne, dans le délai raisonnable que précise l'avis:
(a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or	a) qu'elle fournisse tout renseignement ou tout renseignement supplémentaire, y compris une déclaration de revenu ou une déclaration supplémentaire;
(b) any document.	b) qu'elle produise des documents.

Digitized by Google

[Emphasis added] [Je souligne]

Issues

[4] Various errors of law are alleged in the appeal and cross-appeal. In brief, these are the issues:

On Appeal

(a) does subsection 231.2(1) allow Dunwoody to refuse to answer the Minister's written questions or to create new documents?

(b) does subsection 231.2(1) permit Dunwoody to redact, that is, remove, confidential references and information in respect of persons other than the Taxpayers from the documents to be delivered in response to the Minister's Requirements?

On Cross-appeal

(c) were the Requirements issued for the purpose of the administration and enforcement of the Act within the meaning of section 231.2?

(d) was certain of the requested material that was prepared by Dunwoody for the purpose of providing tax advice to the Taxpayers privileged?

Facts

[5] The Taxpayers were businessmen who decided, in 1997, to emigrate from Canada and give up their Canadian residency. They informed their accountants, Dunwoody in Kelowna, British Columbia, of their intention and were referred to Jas Butalia, a chartered accountant with the Calgary office of Dunwoody, who specializes in income tax matters.

[6] As a result of their discussions with Mr. Butalia, the Taxpayers entered into transactions that apparently were intended to produce interest expense deductions that would offset the taxable income expected to arise when the Taxpayers ceased to be residents of Canada in 1998.

[7] The Taxpayers each negotiated separate loans with Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC) in amounts ranging from USD $50 million to $100 million. In their 1997 and 1998 income tax returns, the Taxpayers claimed deductions for the interest expenses associated with those loans.

[8] The Minister's initial assessment of the Taxpayers' 1997 taxation years allowed the Taxpayers their claimed interest deductions.

[9] By letters dated May 12, 2000, the Minister requested from the Taxpayers information regarding the 1997 and 1998 tax deductions. Dunwoody responded on behalf of the Taxpayers on September 20, 2000, but certain information requested by the Minister was not supplied.

[10] By letters dated May 11, 2001, the Minister set out his position as to why the Taxpayers should not be allowed the deductions taken for the CIBC loans in the 1997 taxation year. Subsequently, the Taxpayers were reassessed by the Minister and the interest deductions were disallowed for the 1997 and 1998 taxation years. On August 7, 2001, each of the Taxpayers filed notices of objection to challenge the correctness of the reassessments. Those objections are now outstanding. Meanwhile, on July 11 and July 18, 2001, the Requirements were served on Dunwoody.

[11] The Requirements required production of numerous documents, including all tax files, planning documents, working paper files, permanent files, records, minutes or notes of all conversations or meetings, detailed billings, detailed telephone records, promotional material, and correspondence relating to the Taxpayers. In addition, they required answers to a number of questions to be answered by Mr. Hughes, the Taxpayers' accountant at the Kelowna office of Dunwoody, and Mr. Butalia. The questions would appear to be designed to elicit facts that were likely to be within the knowledge of Mr. Hughes and Mr. Butalia. There has been no suggestion that Mr. Hughes and Mr. Butalia did not possess the knowledge required to answer the questions. However, the Minister conceded that if they did not possess the information, an answer to that effect would have complied with the Requirements.

Digitized by Google

[12] The Taxpayers and Dunwoody commenced an application for judicial review challenging the validity of the Requirements, and also making a claim of privilege with respect to the required documents and information. The Applications Judge allowed the application in part. He found that the general tax liability of the Taxpayers was the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry by the Minister, and that the Requirements met the tests of relevance and reasonableness established by this Court in AGT Limited v. Canada (Attorney General) (C.A.), [1997] 2 F.C. 878. However, he interpreted subsection 231.2(1) as giving the Minister the right to require the production of documents, but not the right to require the answers to questions, and on that basis he held that the Requirements were invalid with respect to the questions asked of Mr. Hughes and Mr. Butalia.

[13] The Applications Judge also indicated that if any of the documents or information to be produced under the Requirements referred to a client of Dunwoody unrelated to the appellants, Dunwoody had the right to redact the documents to expunge that person's name before the document or information was submitted to the Minister. Dunwoody did not redact any information from the requested material which it prepared but did not deliver to the Minister, pending the ultimate outcome of these proceedings.

Analysis

Issue a): Does subsection 231.2(1) allow Dunwoody to refuse to answer the Minister's written questions or to create new documents?

[14] The Applications Judge held that the powers of subsection 231.2(1) require the production of documents and information in existence, but that it is not framed so broadly that accountants can be required to respond to written interrogatories. He reasoned that if subsection 231.2(1) of the Act were intended to be so broad as to provide the Minister with the option to conduct a written examination for discovery, Parliament would have so provided. It is my respectful opinion that the learned Applications Judge erred in his interpretation of subsection 231.2(1). His error, in my view, lies in his failure to give a meaning to paragraph 231.2(1)(a).

[15] In statutory interpretation there is a presumption against redundancy. The governing principle has been described in Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed. (Markham: Butterworths, 2002) at 158:

It is presumed that the legislature avoids superfluous or meaningless words, that it does not pointlessly repeat itself or speak in vain. Every word in a statute is presumed to make sense and to have a specific role to play in advancing the legislative purpose.

[16] The same principle is expressed as follows by Iacobucci J. in Communities Economic Development Fund v. Canadian Pickles Corp., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 388 at paragraph 36:

It is a principle of statutory interpretation that every word of a statute must be given meaning: "A construction which would leave without effect any part of the language of a statute will normally be rejected" (see also Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (12th ed. 1969), at p. 36).

[17] Applied in this case, that principle dictates that meaning must be given to both paragraphs (a) and (b) of the subsection 231.2(1), and unless there is good reason to the contrary, a different interpretation must be given to both paragraphs, and different meanings to the words "information" and "document".

[18] The word "information", used in paragraph 231.2(1)(a), is not defined in the Act.

Digitized by Google

Referring to the The Concise Oxford English Dictionary, 10th ed., "information" is defined as "facts or knowledge provided or learned as a result of research or study" or "what is conveyed or represented by a particular sequence of symbols, impulses, etc." The French version of paragraph 231.2(1)(a) uses the word "renseignement". In Collins Robert Unabridged French-English Dictionary (5th ed.), "renseignement" is defined as "information, piece of information".

[19] Turning to paragraph 231.2(1)(b), it provides the Minister with the power to compel production of "any document". Again, referring to The Concise Oxford English Dictionary, 10th ed., "document" is defined as "a piece of written, printed, or electronic matter that provides information or evidence or that serves as an official record." However, the word "document", as used in the Act, is not restricted to writings. It is defined in section 231 to include "money, a security and a record". "Record" in turn is defined in subsection 248(1) as including "an account, an agreement, a book, a chart or table, a diagram, a form, an image, an invoice, a letter, a map, a memorandum, a plan, a return, a statement, a telegram, a voucher, and any other thing containing information, whether in writing or in any other form".

[20] Paragraph 231.2(1)(a), when properly interpreted, empowers the Minister to compel a taxpayer to provide "information", meaning knowledge or facts. In order to exercise this power, the Minister must be able to ask questions to elicit the knowledge, facts or figures. The words "return of income or supplementary return" in paragraph (a) does not detract from this interpretation as the preceding word "including" means that the phrase is not exhaustive of the meaning of "information." These words enable the Minister not only to get the information regarding a taxpayer's income, but also to specify the form in which this information must be provided, i.e. a tax return containing prescribed information rather than in a letter. In my view, the Minister is therefore able to compel production of documents and records under paragraph 231.2(1)(b) and ask questions to elicit knowledge or facts under paragraph 231.2(1)(a).

Issue b): Does subsection 231.2(1) of the Act permit Dunwoody to redact, that is, remove, confidential references and information in respect of persons other than the Taxpayers from the documents to be delivered in response to the Minister's Requirements?

[21] In preparing to disclose the requested material to the Minister, Dunwoody was concerned that some material might contain the names of or information concerning other clients not legally associated with or related to the Taxpayers. Accordingly, during the course of argument, Dunwoody asked the Applications Judge for permission to redact such names or information from the material if it became necessary to protect confidential third party information. The Applications Judge agreed with this proposal.

[22] Once Dunwoody assembled the required documents, it was discovered that there was nothing to be redacted. It is argued for the Taxpayers that this issue should not be dealt with at all because it is moot, in the sense that there is no live controversy between the parties on the question of redaction of the documents. The Crown argues that this is an appropriate case in which to deal with the issue despite its mootness (see Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General of Canada), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342 at 353. In my view, it is appropriate to deal with the Applications Judge's conclusion on the redaction issue, despite its mootness, because of the likelihood of uncertainty and confusion that could result from the Applications Judge's comments, and also because the issue is amenable to a simple resolution.

[23] The record before the Applications Judge contains no evidence that there was any third party information in any of the documents that were the subject of the Requirements. Dunwoody's proposal to redact third party information was based solely on speculation as to a potential future problem. Therefore, the Applications Judge erred in stating that Dunwoody has a right of redaction with respect to the documents that are the subject of the Requirements. Rather, what he should have concluded is that Dunwoody had failed to establish any factual basis for asserting a right of redaction (assuming, without deciding, that such a right may exist).

Digitized by Google

[24] That is sufficient to dispose of the redaction issue in this case. I recognize that this resolution of the matter leaves unanswered theoretical questions. For example, it is debatable whether there is a right of redaction at all with respect to documents that fall within the scope of a valid requirement under subsection 231.2(1). In this regard, there is jurisprudence from the Supreme Court of Canada that supports the proposition that a requirement is not invalid merely because it results in the disclosure of private transactions involving persons who are not under investigation and may not be liable to tax (see Canadian Bank of Commerce v. Attorney General of Canada (1962), 35 D.L.R. (2d) 49 at 54; James Richardson & Sons v. Minister of National Revenue, 9 D.L.R. (4th) 1 at 7; and R. v. McKinlay Transport, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627 at paragraph 16.)

[25] If a right of redaction exists in theory, there is an issue as to who ought to determine whether the right should be exercised in a particular case, the person to whom the requirement is directed, or the Minister, or the Court. If a dispute should arise in future about the right to redact a document that is within the scope of a valid requirement but contains third party information that for some reason the Minister ought not to have, I have no doubt that the parties will find a way to have the issues debated in an appropriate forum. Meanwhile, I prefer to express no opinion on issues that do not arise in this case.

[26] For these reasons, the Minister's appeal is well founded and should be allowed, subject only to the resolution of the issues raised in the cross-appeal.

Issue c): Were the Requirements issued for the purpose of the administration and enforcement of the Act within the meaning of section 231.2?

[27] The evidence establishes that the Requirements are intended to test the Taxpayers' entitlement to the interest deduction. Broadly speaking, entitlement to the interest deduction depends upon whether the statutory conditions in paragraph 20(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act are met, and if not, whether the general anti-avoidance rule in subsection 245(2) applies.

[28] The position of the Taxpayers is that the Requirements would result in the disclosure of tax planning documents and information about their subjective intention in entering into the transactions that gave rise to the claim for the interest deduction. They argue that the Minister cannot possibly require tax planning documents and evidence of subjective intention for the purpose of the administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act, because those matters are not relevant to the applicability of paragraph 20(1)(c) or subsection 245(2). I am unable to accept this argument. The scope of subsection 231.2(1) is not as limited as the Taxpayers suggest.

[29] A number of cases have dealt with the scope of subsection 231.2(1) (see R. v. McKinlay Transport, supra; James Richardson & Sons v. Minister of National Revenue, supra; AGT Limited v. The Attorney General of Canada, supra; and R. v. Jarvis, 2002 D.T.C. 7547 (S.C.C.) at paragraph 51). The relevant principles from these authorities establish that the determination of a taxpayer's tax liability is a purpose related to the administration and enforcement of the Act. A requirement is valid if the requested information may be relevant in the determination of the tax liability of the named taxpayer. This is a low threshold. Subsection 231.2(1) gives the Minister a broader authority to obtain information than would be the case if, for example, the Minister were conducting pre-trial examinations for discovery in the context of an income tax appeal.

Digitized by Google

[30] In my view, the information which the Taxpayers object to producing may be relevant to determining their tax liability under the Act. As Desjardins J.A. stated at paragraph 23 for an unanimous panel of this Court in AGT Limited v. The Attorney General of Canada, supra:

Because of the nature of the conduct regulated by the Income Tax Act, there are, in many cases, no ways of determining whether prescribed conduct has been engaged in, short of studying the process by which a suspected corporation or business has made and implemented its decision.

[31] First of all, tax planning information can shed light on intention and therefore may be important in interpreting contracts or determining whether persons are acting at arm's length. Further, it may be relevant in determining the residency of the Taxpayers, which is an issue in the present case, since a relevant factor is whether they intended to sever their ties to Canada permanently or only temporarily. Finally, the subjective intention of the Taxpayers may be relevant in determining interest deductibility or the applicability of the general anti-avoidance provision. The purpose test may be an objective one, but a taxpayer's intention is certainly a relevant consideration (see Ludco Enterprises Ltd. v. Canada, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 1082 at paragraphs 54-55; and Fraser Milner Casgrain v. Minister of National Revenue, 2002 D.T.C. 7310, [2002] 4 C.T.C. 210 (F.C.T.D.)).

[32] The Taxpayers also assert that the Requirements, which are intended to elicit information about the 1997 and 1998 taxation years, were issued more than three years after the initial assessment of those years, and thus after the expiry of the normal limitation period for those years. They argue that because the Minister cannot reassess those years, they need not produce any documents covered by the Requirements. I cannot agree. First, there is no statutory time limit for requirements. Second, the record does not establish that the Minister cannot reassess the Taxpayers for 1997 and 1998. Assuming, without deciding, that the Requirements relate only to those years, there are numerous statutory provisions that permit the Minister to reassess within three years after the expiry of the normal limitation period. There are also statutory exceptions that remove all time limitations.

[33] Finally, the Taxpayers argue that the Requirements improperly subvert the Tax Court of Canada Rules (General Procedure), SOR/90-688a, relating to pre-trial discovery. The simple answer to this argument is no income tax appeal has been commenced in this case. In any event, the Minister's right to investigate the affairs of a taxpayer is not necessarily limited by the commencement of an appeal (see Canada v. Imperial Oil Limited and Inco Limited, 2003 FCA 289). There may be situations where the exercise of a statutory power of investigation is abusive, but this is not such a case.

[34] For the foregoing reasons, in my analysis, the Applications Judge correctly determined that the Requirements were issued for the purpose of the administration and enforcement of the Act.

Issue d): Was certain of the requested material that was prepared by Dunwoody for the purpose of providing tax advice to the Taxpayers privileged?

[35] This issue raised the question as to whether tax memoranda, notes of tax advice, or other documents which set out or show the tax advice given by a tax accountant to a client and the reasoning or analysis behind the tax advice are privileged communications. If so, such communications would not be subject to disclosure under Canadian law even though the subject matter may be relevant to an income tax audit or Tax Court proceeding.

Digitized by Google

[36] The Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that there are two types of legal privilege - "class" privilege and "case-by-case" privilege (see R. v. Gruenke, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 263 at paragraph 26). The Taxpayers urge that their confidential communications with Mr. Butalia, when properly understood, can fit within either category of privilege. They assert that the evidence establishes that they dealt with Dunwoody, and Mr. Butalia in particular, on the understanding that the tax advice they received was confidential. They argue that had they known that tax advice could only be shielded by solicitor-client privilege they would not have discussed the matters with Dunwoody.

[37] In 1990, this Court confirmed that an accountant-client privilege does not exist in relation to advice given by an accountant in connection with the search and seizure provisions of the Act (see Baron v. Canada, [1991] 1 F.C. 688, (1990) 91 D.T.C. 5055, [1991] 1 C.T.C. 125). The Taxpayers say it is now time to recognize a class privilege for communications between tax accountants who provide professional tax advice to their clients in the course of a professional relationship and such privilege should extend to all types of tax advice; income tax, excise tax, goods and services tax, sales tax and real property tax. It is urged that the categories of privilege are not static and can evolve over time, with the identification of a new class on a principled basis (see Lamer C.J. in R. v. Gruenke, supra, at paragraph 35).

[38] I see nothing in the submissions of the Taxpayers that militates against the earlier ruling rendered by this Court in Baron v. Canada, supra. Solicitor-client privilege is rooted in the proper administration of justice, made necessary by the need for confidential advice in prosecuting one's rights and preparing defences against improper claims (see R. v. McClure, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 445 at 457-459). Lawyers are legally and ethically required to uphold and protect the public interest in the administration of justice (see Fortin v. Chrétien, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 500 at paragraph 49). In contrast, accountants are not so bound. Nor do they provide legal advice, as to do so would constitute a breach of provincial and territorial laws governing the legal professions. In my analysis, no overriding policy consideration exists so as to elevate the advice given by tax accountants to the level of solicitor-client privilege.

[39] As for case-by-case privilege, the Supreme Court of Canada has directed that the principles set out by Professor Wigmore in his American treatise on evidence provide a general framework to determine whether or not a communications is privileged. Within this framework, policy considerations and the requirements of fact-finding can be weighed and balanced on the basis of their relative importance in each case. Consequently, a principled approach to the question of case-by-case privilege should always be employed, taking into account each of the four factors, and the particular circumstances of each case (see R. v. Gruenke, supra, at paragraph 35).

[40] The four Wigmore principles are these:

(a) The communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed.

(b) This element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relation between the parties.

(c) The relation must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered.

(d) The injury that would inure to the relation by the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of litigation.

(see John Henry Wigmore, Evidence in Trials at Common Law, vol. 8. (Boston: Little, Brown, 1961) at 527.)

Digitized by Google

[41] In discussing the first Wigmore principle, the Supreme Court of Canada has stated that "it is absolutely crucial that the communications originate with an expectation of confidentiality . . .. Without this expectation of confidentiality, the raison d'être of the privilege is missing" (see R. v. Gruenke, supra, at paragraph 39). While a chartered accountant, as a matter of professional ethics, is required to keep his communications with clients confidential, the accountant knows, or should know, that this confidentiality is restricted by the power of the Minister to require disclosure. Therefore, Dunwoody and the Taxpayers have not discharged their onus of showing that the relationship in issue carried with it an expectation of confidentiality sufficient to meet this first Wigmore principle.

[42] The Taxpayers have also not shown that confidentiality was essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of their relationship with Mr. Butalia so as to satisfy Wigmore's second principle. Confidentiality may be desired, as with all personal and professional relationships, but the relationships here did not depend on confidentiality for their existence. Indeed, according to his evidence, had Mr. Kitsch believed that there was no confidentiality involved, he would have still used the same firm of accountants for business and financial advice.

[43] Further, the Taxpayers have not shown that the tax accountant-client relationship is one that in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered to the degree that would attract privilege. While confidentiality may be preferred, the tax accountant-client relationship is in no way as fundamental to society and the administration of justice as the solicitor-client relationship.

[44] The rare situations where case-by-case privilege has been extended to certain specifically identified communications have included clients and their doctors, sexual assault therapists and clergy. These relationships are sedulously fostered to the extent that privilege may apply to them in certain limited circumstances. The reason is obvious. Canadian society puts a much higher value on the physical, mental and spiritual integrity of a person than on personal wealth. It is recognized that unnecessary harm and suffering could result from deterring an individual from consulting a doctor, a sexual assault therapist, or a member of the clergy. The worst that could happen if a person is discouraged from seeking income tax advice is that the person might fail to take advantage of a tax saving opportunity, unfortunate perhaps, but not a threat to one's physical, mental or spiritual well being.

[45] In considering the fourth Wigmore principle, it must be determined whether the interests served by protecting the communications from disclosure outweigh the interest in getting at the truth and correctly disposing of the matter (see M.(A.) v. Ryan, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 157 at paragraphs 16 and 31). The balancing of the injury to the relationship against the benefit of the correct disposal of the matter involves purely public policy considerations. As Chief Justice McLachlin held, at this stage of analysis, an occasional injustice should not be accepted as the price of extending privilege from disclosure. While it is true that the traditional categories of privilege necessarily run the risk of occasional injustice, "that does not mean that courts, in invoking new privileges, should lightly condone its extension." (M.(A.) v. Ryan, supra, at paragraph 32). In that case, the potential injury to be suffered due to the disclosure of the disputed information was described, at paragraph 30, as one that:

perpetuates the disadvantage felt by victims of sexual assault, often women. The intimate nature of sexual assault heightens the privacy concerns of the victim and may increase ... the difficulty of obtaining redress for the wrong. The victim of a sexual assault is placed in a disadvantaged position as compared with the victim of a different wrong... She is doubly victimized, initially by the sexual assault and later by the price she must pay to claim redress - redress which in some cases may be part of her program of therapy.

Digitized by Google

Nonetheless, the Court affirmed the disclosure of all documents except the personal notes of a person who would not be called as a witness at trial and whose opinion was of no consequence. The unsuccessful claim of privilege in that case illustrates the high threshold of injury necessary to overcome the benefit of correctly disposing of the matter.

[46] The Taxpayers have not shown that any public injury would occur should these tax accountant-client communications continue to be subject to review by the Minister. Innumerable tax accountant-client relationships have functioned fully in the past notwithstanding the Minister's opportunity to review their communications. Whatever the public injury feared by the Taxpayers may be, it has not precluded the full and satisfactory maintenance of those past relationships despite the Minister's powers of review. If tax accountant-client communications are subject to the spectre of case-by-case privilege, the harm done to the verification and enforcement of the Act would be considerable, and would outweigh whatever injury, if any, that would inure to such relationships. Overall, in my analysis, the balancing of public interests favours disclosure.

[47] The disputed communications in this appeal and cross-appeal do not meet any of Wigmore's four principles and are therefore not covered by case-by-case privilege. The Applications Judge correctly held that the documents requested in the Requirements are not subject to either class or case-by-case privilege.

[48] It was drawn to the courts attention that since July 22, 1998, the United States, pursuant to I.R.C. § 7525 (1986), has afforded a class privilege to federally authorized tax practitioners with respect to tax advice given to their clients. Except for criminal matters, the scope of that privilege, where the tax advice given involves either the Internal Revenue Service or United States Federal Court proceedings, is the same as for attorney-client privilege. While a matter of policy interest, it is of no consequence to the task at hand. In addition, a review of the content of that legislation undoubtedly reveals that enactment of the class privilege for accountants is better left with Parliament.

[49] The cross-appeal should be dismissed with costs. The appeal should be allowed with costs, the order of the Applications Judge, dated September 3, 2002, should be set aside, and the application for judicial review should be dismissed with costs.

"B. Malone"
J.A.
"I agree
Gilles Létourneau
J.A."
"I agree
K. Sharlow
J.A."

Opinion Provided to Lawyers From Sub-contractors (Accountants)

On the issue of accountants' (auditor's) material that was supplied to a solicitor to obtain a legal opinion the Federal Court in Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. and IPL Energy Inc. v. MNR[101] provided:

Digitized by Google

T-1229-95

Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. and IPL Energy Inc. (Applicants)

v.

Minister of National Revenue (Respondent)

Indexed as: Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc.v. M.N.R. (T.D.)

Trial Division, Gibson J."Calgary, September 5; Ottawa, October 13, 1995.

Income tax " Practice " Privilege " Application under Income Tax Act, s. 232 to determine whether solicitor- client privilege validly claimed for auditors' notes, advice to applicants' counsel for purpose of providing legal advice " Applicants voluntarily disclosing information to auditors, subject to oral limitations, as required by Canada Business Corporations Act, s. 170 "Waiver depending on intention" Applicants intending to disclose privileged information only to assist in conduct of audit "Waiver for that limited purpose" Auditors lacking authority to waive privilege on behalf of applicants " Written statement of intent, formal arrangement re: auditors' notes advisable.

Corporations " Canada Business Corporations Act, s. 170 requiring corporation to furnish whatever documents auditor demands " Auditors not directly invoking s. 170, but applicants aware of its existence, auditors' rights thereunder and voluntarily disclosing solicitor-client privileged information subject to oral limitations " S. 170 to be invoked only in manner limiting privilege to extent absolutely necessary " To be interpreted restrictively.

This was an application under Income Tax Act, section 232 to determine whether solicitor-client privilege was validly claimed in respect of two groups of documents: (1) auditors' notes made in the course of an audit of the applicants, and (2) documents exchanged between the auditors' Edmonton and Toronto offices concerning advice provided by the auditors to independent counsel retained to give legal advice to applicants. There was no evidence that the applicants were aware of the existence of the group (2) documents. In conducting the audit, the auditors were entitled to rely on Canada Business Corporations Act, subsection 170(1) (which requires a corporation to furnish whatever documents the auditor demands). Subsection 170(1) was not directly invoked, but the applicants knew of its existence and of the auditor's rights thereunder, and voluntarily disclosed solicitor-client privileged information subject to strict oral limitations. The issues were: (1) whether solicitor-client privilege extended to the documents; and (2) if so, whether disclosure to auditors under section 170 constituted waiver of privilege, or waiver for a limited purpose only.

Held, solicitor-client privilege was validly claimed, subject to agreement to release privilege with respect to certain documents or portions of documents.

Subsection 170(1) gives an auditor the authority to demand access to documents which might interfere with solicitor-client confidentiality. It should be invoked only as necessary, and then in a manner that will limit the confidentiality or privilege only to the extent that is absolutely necessary. Subsection 170(1) must be interpreted restrictively. Since Parliament could easily have stated that any disclosure of a solicitor-client privileged document pursuant to subsection 170(1) amounted to a waiver of privilege for the purposes of tax investigations, but did not, it would be inappropriate to interpret subsection 170(1) more broadly than necessary to achieve the end clearly sought to be served.

Waiver depends on intention. The applicants intended to disclose the legal opinions only for the limited purpose of assisting in the conduct of the audit and examination of financial statements. The legal opinions were made available in accordance with the duty to assist under subsection 170(1). It would be contrary to public policy if making the legal opinions available for the audit automatically removed the cloak of privilege otherwise available. The disclosure of legal advice received by the applicants to its auditors was a waiver of solicitor-client privilege for a limited purpose and did not extend to a waiver for other purposes, such as disclosure by the auditors in response to the Minister's requirements.

---

[101] T-1229-95

Digitized by Google

If the doctrine of limited waiver is to be relied on, it would be prudent to set forth in writing the client's intent regarding limited waiver in any disclosure to its auditors of solicitor-client privileged information and in the formal arrangement between the client and its auditors. Further, there should be some more formal arrangement regarding the disposition of auditors' notes of complex legal advice on complex transactions once those notes have served their purpose.

The auditors' advice to the applicants' legal counsel was covered by solicitor-client privilege and the applicants were unaware of the disclosure of that advice to another office of the auditors, and therefore did not consent to its disclosure and waive privilege. Finally, the auditors had no authority to waive privilege on behalf of the applicants.

statutes and regulations judicially considered

Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-44 , s. 170(1).

Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1, ss. 231.2(1), 232(1) "judge", "solicitor-client privilege", (3.1)(b), (4)(a)(i),(ii), (5)(a), (b), (i),(ii)(A) (as am. by S.C. 1994, c. 13, s. 7), (B) (as am. idem), (9).

cases judicially considered applied:

Descôteaux et al. v. Mierzwinski, 1982 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860; (1982), 141 D.L.R. (3d) 590; 70 C.C.C. (2d) 385; 28 C.R. (3d) 289; 1 C.R.R. 318; 44 N.R. 462; Playfair Developments Ltd v D/MNR, reflex, [1985] 1 C.T.C. 302; (1985), 85 DTC 5155 (Ont. S.C.); Ed Miller Sales & Rentals Ltd. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co. 1988 ABCA 282 (CanLII), (1988), 61 Alta. L.R. (2d) 319; 22 C.P.R. (3d) 290 (C.A.); British Coal Corp v Dennis Rye Ltd (No 2), [1988] 3 All ER 816 (C.A.).

considered:

Air Canada v. McDonnell Douglas Corp. 1994 CanLII 7295 (ON SC), (1994), 19 O.R. (3d) 537 (Gen. Div.).

APPLICATION under Income Tax Act, section 232 to determine whether solicitor-client privilege was validly claimed for auditors' notes and advice to the applicants' counsel for the purpose of providing legal advice to the applicants. Solicitor-client privilege was validly claimed, subject to agreement to release privilege in respect of certain documents or portions of documents.

counsel:

Mendy M. Chernos and Douglas S. Ewens, Q.C. for applicants.

Douglas B. Titosky for respondent. solicitors:

McCarthy Tétrault, Calgary, for applicants.

Deputy Attorney General of Canada for respondent.

The following are the reasons for order rendered in English by

Gibson J.: On May 8 and 15, 1995, requirements under subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act[1] were served on Dennis Blumenthal of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton, by the respondent, for document production relating to Price Waterhouse's audit and examination of the 1993 consolidated financial statements of Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. (the predecessor to IPL Energy Inc.) and for answers to certain questions. The applicants instructed their internal legal counsel to advance claims of solicitor-client privilege on behalf of the applicants with respect to certain of the documents and information in the possession of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton which allegedly evidenced legal advice obtained by the applicants. In the result, privilege was claimed in respect of 33 documents and with regard to information as to whether any officers, employees and representatives of the applicants had reviewed the relevant material in the hands of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton and, if so, who reviewed the material and when.

Digitized by Google

This application under section 232 [as am. by S.C. 1994, c. 13, s. 7] of the Income Tax Act resulted to determine the question of whether the claim to solicitor-client privilege is valid. The central provisions of section 232 of the Income Tax Act for the purpose of this application read as follows:

232. (1) In this section,

. . .

"judge" means a judge of a superior court having jurisdiction in the province where the matter arises or a judge of the Federal Court;

. . .

"solicitor-client privilege", means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.

. . .

(3.1) Where, pursuant to sections 231.1 and 231.2, an officer is about to inspect or examine a document in the possession of a lawyer and the lawyer claims that a named client of the lawyer has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of that document, the officer shall not inspect or examine the document and the lawyer shall place the document, together with any other document in respect of which the lawyer at the same time makes the same claim on behalf of the same client, in a package and suitably seal and identify the package or, if the officer and the lawyer agree, allow the pages of the document to be initialed and numbered or otherwise suitably identified; and retain it and ensure that it is preserved until it is produced to a judge as required under this section and an order is issued under this section in respect of the document.

Where a document has been seized and placed in custody under subsection (3) or is being retained under subsection (3.1), the client, or the lawyer on behalf of the client, may within 14 days after the day the document was so placed in custody or commenced to be so retained apply, on three clear days notice of motion to the Deputy Attorney General of Canada, to a judge for an order fixing a day, not later than 21 days after the date of the order, and place for the determination of the question whether the client has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, and requiring the production of the document to the judge at that time and place;

serve a copy of the order on the Deputy Attorney General of Canada and, where applicable, on the custodian within 6 days of the day on which it was made and, within the same time, pay to the custodian the estimated expenses of transporting the document to and from the place of hearing and of safeguarding it; and if the client or lawyer has proceeded as authorized by paragraph (b), apply at the appointed time and place for an order determining the question.

Digitized by Google

An application under paragraph (4)(c) shall be heard in camera, and on the application
the judge may, if the judge considers it necessary to determine the question, inspect the document and, if the judge does so, the judge shall ensure that it is repackaged and resealed; and the judge shall decide the matter summarily and, if the judge is of the opinion that the client has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order the release of the document to the lawyer, and if the judge is of the opinion that the client does not have a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order that the custodian deliver the document to the officer or some other person designated by the Deputy Minister of National Revenue, in the case of a document that was seized and placed in custody under subsection (3), or that the lawyer make the document available for inspection or examination by the officer or other person designated by the Deputy Minister of National Revenue, in the case of a document that was retained under subsection (3.1), and the judge shall, at the same time, deliver concise reasons in which the judge shall identify the document without divulging the details thereof.
The documents in which solicitor-client privilege is claimed are generally of two types: first, notes apparently prepared by partners or employees of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton in the course of conduct of the audit and examination of the 1993 consolidated financial statements of Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc., and documents exchanged between Price Waterhouse, Edmonton and Price Waterhouse, Toronto concerning advice provided by Price Waterhouse, Toronto to independent counsel retained by the applicants to, in turn, provide legal advice to the applicants. In respect of documents in the first category, some of them on their face disclose that the applicants were aware of their existence prior to the service of the requirements on Price Waterhouse, Edmonton by the respondent. In respect of documents in the second category, the documents themselves provide no evidence, and there was no evidence before me, that the applicants were aware of their existence prior to the service of the requirements.
In the conduct of its audit and examination, Price Waterhouse, Edmonton was entitled to rely on subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act[2] which reads as follows:
170. (1) On the demand of an auditor of a corporation, the present or former directors, officers, employees or agents of the corporation shall furnish such information and explanations, and access to records, documents, books, accounts and vouchers of the corporation or any of its subsidiaries as are, in the opinion of the auditor, necessary to enable him to make the examination and report required under section 169 and that the directors, officers, employees or agents are reasonably able to furnish.
In the cross-examination of James Andrew Telford on his affidavit filed on behalf of the applicants in this matter, the following exchanges took place relative to Price Waterhouse, Edmonton's reliance on section 170 of the Canada Business Corporations Act and the applicants' response in relation to legal opinions that they had received from outside counsel:
Q. Did they (Price Waterhouse, Edmonton) give you a reason for requesting those legal opinions?
A. They said that they had "I mean, they had a statutory right under the Canada Business Corporations Act to ask for whatever they wanted, and they felt that in order to provide a clear audit opinion and not qualify as to generally accepted auditing standards that they needed to review those legal opinions.
Q. Did they indicate that to you in writing or verbally?

Digitized by Google

A. Verbally. Mr. Dennis Blumenthal, to me verbally.
Q. Did Mr. Blumenthal make specific reference to the Canada Business Corporations Act and his rights under that Act?
A. I don't believe that Mr. Blumenthal specifically referred to the Canada Business Corporations Act.
Q. Did Mr. Blumenthal specifically refer to a right to see the legal opinions?
A. Yes, he did.
Q. Did you agree with him?
. . .
A. My understanding, in my position as Manager, Tax and Risk Management, and as a Chartered Accountant, was that Mr. Blumenthal was entitled to see those documents.
Q. What did you do, given that understanding?
A. I requested the legal opinions be couriered to me from the law firms. I had a meeting with Mr. Blumenthal where I told him that basically I believe its paragraph 9 of my affidavit where I say that I considered the documents to be subject to privilege, that I did not wish to release that privilege, and that I was only doing so because he had demanded them as an auditor, that he was not to make any copies or notes or extracts of the documents.
Q. You specifically provided him not to make copies or notes of the "
A. I specifically provided him not to.
Q. Did you do this in writing or orally?
A. Orally.
Q. And do you recall what precisely you told Mr. Blumenthal during your meeting in mid-January, 1994?
A. What I precisely told him is what is contained in paragraph 9 in my Affidavit. That's to the best of my recollection.
Q. And having communicated that to Mr. Blumenthal, did he respond?
A. It's my recollection that Mr. Blumenthal agreed with my terms.
Q. And on that basis he was allowed to review the documents?
A. That's correct.[3]

POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

The applicants assert that legal opinions provided to them by outside counsel are solicitor-client privileged and that that privilege extends to the notes produced by Price Waterhouse, Edmonton in the conduct of the audit and examination of the applicant's financial statements in the circumstances before me. The applicants argued that disclosure of the legal opinions to Price Waterhouse, Edmonton did not amount to a waiver of privilege or, if it did, it amounted to a waiver for a limited purpose only, that is, for the purpose of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton's audit and examination. In support of this position, the applicants argued that subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act should, in the absence of specific terminology to the contrary, be interpreted as interfering with solicitor-client privilege only to the extent absolutely necessary to achieve the ends of that provision and of provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act related to it. They argued that any other interpretation of subsection 170(1) would be contrary to public policy since the result would be that compliance with the statutory duty would result in a waiver of a privilege that is seen to be in the public interest.
On behalf of the applicants, it was argued that the applicants did not intend to waive their privilege as evidenced by the exchange that apparently took place between James Andrew Telford on behalf of the applicants and Mr. Blumenthal on behalf of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton and that intent is the governing factor in the determination of whether or not there has been a waiver of privilege under the law of Alberta which, it was agreed, is the appropriate law on the facts before me. Finally, with regard to the documents produced by Price Waterhouse, Edmonton, the applicants argued that to determine that the disclosure of legal opinions that took place by the applicants amounted to a waiver of privilege, other than for a limited purpose, would undermine the common interest of corporations, their auditors and the shareholders of corporations in full and open disclosure to auditors that is intended to ensure production of accurate audited financial statements.

Digitized by Google

In relation to the notes of advice provided to the applicants' outside counsel by Price Waterhouse, Toronto, the applicants argued that such notes were clearly subject to solicitor-client privilege as evidencing advice given in the course of development of legal advice and that there could not possibly be any waiver of that privilege by the applicants in circumstances where they were unaware of the provision of that information by Price Waterhouse, Toronto to Price Waterhouse, Edmonton.

Finally, on the information that the applicants refused to produce, the applicants argued that any examinations conducted by them of the documentation in the possession of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton were conducted in contemplation of litigation and therefore the identity of those who conducted any such examinations and when they did so is privileged information.

On behalf of the respondent, it was argued that documentation produced by independent auditors for their own purposes in the course of an audit and examination does not benefit from the solicitor- client privilege of the auditor's client in favour of the client. Further, the respondent argued that disclosure of documents subject to solicitor-client privilege, results in waiver whether or not the disclosure is under compulsion of law and that waiver for a limited purpose only is not recognized in Canadian law. With regard to the documentation evidencing advice provided by Price Waterhouse, Toronto, the respondent argued that there was no evidence before me that the applicants were unaware of this disclosure and that, if the applicants were aware, that awareness without objection amounted to a waiver of solicitor-client privilege.

ANALYSIS

In Descôteaux et al. v. Mierzwinski,[4] Lamer J., as he then was, speaking for the Supreme Court of Canada on the subject of solicitor-client privilege, stated at page 875:

It is quite apparent that the Court in that case [Solosky v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 9 (SCC), [1980] 1 821] applied a standard that has nothing to do with the rule of evidence, the privilege, since there was never any question of testimony before a tribunal or court. The Court in fact, in my view, applied a substantive rule, without actually formulating it, and, consequently, recognized implicitly that the right to confidentiality, which had long ago given rise to a rule of evidence, had also since given rise to a substantive rule.

It would, I think, be useful for us to formulate this substantive rule, as the judges formerly did with the rule of evidence; it could, in my view, be stated as follows:

The confidentiality of communications between solicitor and client may be raised in any circumstances where such communications are likely to be disclosed without the client's consent.

Unless the law provides otherwise, when and to the extent that the legitimate exercise of a right would interfere with another person's right to have his communications with his lawyer kept confidential, the resulting conflict should be resolved in favour of protecting the confidentiality.

When the law gives someone the authority to do something which, in the circumstances of the case, might interfere with that confidentiality, the decision to do so and the choice of means of exercising that authority should be determined with a view to not interfering with it except to the extent absolutely necessary in order to achieve the ends sought by the enabling legislation.

Digitized by Google

Acts providing otherwise in situations under paragraph 2 and enabling legislation referred to in paragraph 3 must be interpreted restrictively.

By reference to the facts here at issue, subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act clearly gives someone, an auditor, the authority to do something, demand access to records and documents, which, in the circumstances of the case, might interfere with solicitor-client confidentiality, as for example, when the respondent, as here, serves requirements for document production and information relating to the auditors' audit and examination of the financial statements of a client. In accordance with proposition 3, subsection 170(1) should be invoked only as necessary and then only in a manner that will limit the interference with the confidentiality or privilege to only the extent that is absolutely necessary. Further, by virtue of proposition 4, provisions such as subsection 170(1) must be interpreted restrictively.

On the facts before me, subsection 170(1) was not directly invoked on behalf of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton, but the applicants' knowledge of its existence and of the auditor's rights under that provision led to the disclosure of solicitor-client privileged information on a voluntary basis and only under strict limitations, albeit limitations that were only imposed orally.

In Playfair Developments Ltd v D/MNR,[5] Mr. Justice Galligan, at pages 307 and 308, reiterated the importance attached to preservation of solicitor-client privilege in the following terms:

If I tend to lean in favour of finding privilege, it is because, as has often been said, the confidentiality of a solicitor/client communication is very important. If in doubt, I think it is appropriate to uphold the privilege.

I find this statement to be consistent with the principle of interpreting subsection 170(1) of Canada Business Corporations Act restrictively.

In Ed Miller Sales & Rentals Ltd. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co.,[6] Chief Justice Laycraft held at pages 326 and 327:

It must first be noted that the director's inquiry is not a public proceeding. The director hears witnesses in private and even in the absence of other subjects of the inquiry and their solicitors. Secondly, to hand a privileged document to one party to litigation for the purpose of settlement or any other purpose, does not, in my opinion, show any intention that the privilege is thereby to terminate as to other parties or in related litigation.

The respondent also argued that the Caterpillar companies waived any privilege which existed by failing to object when the officer of [the other defendant] produced [the accountant's] report on his examination for discovery. The simple answer is that, even if one litigant has the status to interject on the examination for discovery of another, the objection is pointless if his co-defendant is resolved to produce the document. Waiver depends on intention. Failure to make a pointless objection does not, in my opinion, demonstrate that intention. [Underlining added by me for emphasis.]

This case is of particular importance in the context of this application for at least three reasons: first, it is a decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal and, under the definition "solicitor-client privilege" in subsection 232(1) of the Income Tax Act, it is the law of the province where the matter arises that is to be turned to, to determine the existence of solicitor-client privilege. It was not disputed before me that this matter arose in the province of Alberta. Second, Chief Justice Laycraft emphasizes in the underlined words that waiver depends on intention and the evidence before me discloses that the applicants' intention was to do all in their power to protect their solicitor-client privilege while complying with the demands of their auditors under the potential sanction of a qualified auditor's certificate and, ultimately, subsection 170(1) of Canada Business Corporations Act. Finally, in the first paragraph quoted above, Chief Justice Laycraft can be seen to imply approval of the doctrine of a limited waiver of solicitor-client privilege. If the doctrine of limited waiver is adopted, then, even if the disclosure of legal advice received by the applicants to its auditors amounted to a waiver of solicitor-client privilege, and I am satisfied that it did, then, consistent with the intent of the applicants, it can be found that that waiver was for a limited purpose and did not extend to a waiver for other purposes such as disclosure by the auditors in response to the requirements of the respondent.

Digitized by Google

The doctrine of limited waiver is clearly enunciated in British Coal Corp v Dennis Rye Ltd (No 2).[7] Neill L.J. stated at pages 821-822:

Has anything happened which has caused that privilege to be waived or otherwise lost?

In my judgment the answer to this question is plainly No. Let it be assumed that all the documents have come into the possession of the defendants with the implied consent of the plaintiff and that it could be established that it would have supplied the ... documents even without an order of the court. Nevertheless, it is clear that the plaintiff made the documents available for a limited purpose only, namely to assist in the conduct first of a criminal investigation and then of a criminal trial. This action by the plaintiff, looked at objectively as it must be, cannot be construed as a waiver of any rights available to it in the present civil action for the purpose of which the privilege exists.

. . .

In my judgment the action of the plaintiff in making documents available for the purpose of the criminal trial did not constitute a waiver of the privilege to which it was entitled in the present civil proceedings. Its action in regard to ... the ... documents was in accordance with its duty to assist in the conduct of the criminal proceedings, and could not properly be construed as an express or implied waiver of its rights in its own civil litigation. Indeed, it would in my view be contrary to public policy if the plaintiff's action in making the documents available in the criminal proceedings had the effect of automatically removing the cloak of privilege which would otherwise be available to them in the civil litigation for which the cloak was designed.

The foregoing passages can be adopted here by analogy. It was clearly the applicants' intent to disclose the legal opinions that it had received for a limited purpose only, namely to assist in the conduct of the audit and examination of its financial statements. It made the legal opinions available in accordance with its duty to assist that can be drawn from subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act. It would, in my view, be contrary to public policy if the applicants' action in making the legal opinions available for audit purposes "had the effect of automatically removing the cloak of privilege which would otherwise be available to them" on an audit by the respondent. This conclusion is, I am satisfied, consistent with the propositions quoted above that have been enunciated by the Supreme Court of Canada and consistent with a strict interpretation of the impact on solicitor-client privilege of subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act. If Parliament had intended there to be a secondary purpose in subsection 170(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act beyond the primary purpose of accuracy in financial reporting, it was open to it to enunciate that purpose by clear direct or indirect amendment to the Income Tax Act stating that any disclosure of a solicitor-client privileged document pursuant to subsection 170(1) amounted to a waiver of privilege for the purposes of tax investigations. Since Parliament did not do so, it would be inappropriate and, indeed, contrary to the principles enunciated in Descôteaux, to interpret subsection 170(1) more broadly than necessary to achieve the end clearly sought to be served.

Digitized by Google

Counsel drew my attention to the decision of Master Peppiatt of the Ontario Court (General Division) in Air Canada v. McDonnell Douglas Corp.[8] where the learned Master, at page 545, referred to the statement of Chief Justice Laycraft in Ed Miller Sales, supra, to the effect that "to hand a privileged document to one party to litigation for the purpose of settlement or any other purpose, does not, in my opinion, show any intention that the privilege is thereby to terminate as to other parties or in related litigation". The learned Master commented:

His Lordship cited no authority for this statement. While the judgment of an appellate court in another province is entitled to great respect, in this case it is contrary to authority in this province.

Counsel for the respondent cited authority from Ontario courts and from courts in the United States that the learned Master might have relied upon. With great respect, on the facts before me, and on the basis of the foregoing analysis, I prefer to adopt the doctrine of limited waiver that, as I stated earlier, I find implicit in the earlier-quoted statement of Chief Justice Laycraft. Once again, I find it particularly appropriate to adopt this position since it is acknowledged by the parties that this matter arose in the province of Alberta.

A final cautionary note before I leave this aspect of this matter. The evidence before me relating to the intent of the applicants to limit any waiver arising from the disclosure to their auditors was entirely based on recollection of oral discussion between James Andrew Telford on behalf of the applicants and Mr. Blumenthal on behalf of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton. If the doctrine of limited waiver is to be relied on in future in similar circumstances, it would appear to me to be the prudent course of action to set forth in writing the client's intent regarding limited waiver in any disclosure to its auditors of solicitor-client privileged information and in the formal arrangement between the client and its auditors. Further, it would appear to me to be the height of unreasonable expectation to expect auditors, in the course of a highly complex audit and examination, to refrain from making notes of complex legal advice on complex transactions provided, as was here apparently the case, in response to a demand of the auditors, a stipulation with which the auditors here obviously did not comply. Some more formal arrangement regarding the disposition of such notes as between the client and the auditors, once those notes have served their purpose for the auditor, would appear to be desirable.

I turn then to the documents purportedly disclosing advice provided by Price Waterhouse, Toronto to outside counsel for the applicants in the course of preparation by counsel of legal advice for the applicants. That disclosure apparently took place in exchanges between Price Waterhouse, Toronto and Price Waterhouse, Edmonton. As indicated earlier, counsel for the respondent indicated that there was no evidence before me that the applicants were unaware of these exchanges. Unlike counsel for the respondent, I have now had the advantage of reviewing the documents in question. They bear no indication whatsoever that the applicants were provided with copies of these documents. I am prepared on this basis to assume that the applicants were unaware of these documents. Since it was not disputed before me that solicitor-client privilege extends to advice provided by professionals retained by outside counsel in the course of preparation of legal advice to the counsel's client, I am satisfied that, first, the advice of Price Waterhouse, Toronto to outside legal counsel was covered by solicitor-client privilege, second, that the applicants were unaware of the disclosure of that advice by Price Waterhouse, Toronto to Price Waterhouse, Edmonton and therefore did not consent to its disclosure and thus waive privilege, and finally, that Price Waterhouse, Toronto had no authority to waive privilege on behalf of the applicants. My review of the documents in this category has been conducted in accordance with these principles.

Digitized by Google

Finally, I turn to the information regarding examinations conducted by officers, employees or representatives of the applicants that the applicants' claim is privileged. Examination of claims to privilege with respect to such information does not easily fit within the scheme of section 232 of the Income Tax Act. Indeed, I conclude it does not fit at all. For that reason, no order is made with respect to the claim to privilege regarding that information. That being said, it should be abundantly apparent that one or more officers, employees or representatives of the applicants examined documents in the possession of Price Waterhouse, Edmonton relating to the audit and examination of the 1993 consolidated financial statement of Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc. How else would the claim for privilege asserted in respect of certain of those documents have arisen? Having so concluded, I am not certain that the identity of the officers, employees or representatives who reviewed the files and the date or dates when the review was conducted is particularly relevant if the respondent has received assurances, as he has, that no information or documentation was removed, transferred, culled, destroyed or altered, except as disclosed, with respect to the documents on which privilege is claimed.

CONCLUSION

Against the foregoing analysis, with the assistance of counsel for the applicants, and in the absence of counsel for the respondent, I reviewed the documents in respect of which privilege is claimed. As I indicated early on in these reasons, there are 33 such documents. They were provided to me in two packages, the first containing 30 documents and the second 3 documents. Each package was covered by an index and a copy of each index was provided to the respondent. At the opening of the hearing before me, counsel for the applicants released the applicants' claim to privilege in respect of documents 7, 8 and 26 in the first package and document 3 in the second package. Counsel also released the applicants' claim to privilege in respect of portions of documents 4, 5, 6, 13, 15 and 23 in the first package. During my examination of the documents in the presence of counsel for the applicants, counsel further released the applicants' claim to privilege in respect of a portion of document 25 in the first package. Also during my examination of the document in the presence of counsel for the applicants, I found myself to have a different view from counsel as to whether or not a document should be severed in order to provide as much information as possible to the respondent. If I do not do an injustice, the view of counsel was that the totality of the document should be protected unless a substantive portion of the document can be disclosed. With great respect, that would involve me in an attempt to exercise discretion as to what might or might not be of use to the defendant in his investigation and, inevitably, in the withholding of information, however innocuous, that is not subject to a valid claim of solicitor-client privilege. Accordingly, in my final examination of the documents, I have concluded in favour of releasing to the respondent all information, no matter how trivial I might consider it to be, that I do not regard, in itself, as being the subject of a valid claim to solicitor-client privilege. My conclusions in this regard are set out in my order.

TREATMENT OF COURT FILE

Paragraph 6 of the interim order in this matter provides as follows:
The existing court file in this proceeding, and any further materials filed in this proceeding, shall be sealed until further order of This Honourable Court.
Materials added to the file since the date of that order include the applicants' record, the written submissions of the respondent, the book of authorities of the respondent, the packages of documents handed to me sealed and that are the subject of the application, the transcript of the hearing before me and a letter dated October 11, 1995 addressed to me from counsel for the applicants. I consulted with counsel on whether or not the file documentation other than the documents that are the subject of the application could be opened to the public on the principle that files of this Court are, in the absence of compelling reasons, open for public examination. Counsel agreed that all documentation on the file could be made open with the exception of the documents that are the subject-matter of the application and of certain references in the applicants' record and in the transcript to third parties with whom the applicants are involved in confidential business relationships. On that basis, I invited counsel for the applicants to review the applicants' record and the transcript and suggest to me appropriate deletions. Counsel's letter of October 11 is a response to this invitation. Subject to my review of the recommended deletions and my final decision with respect to them, my order will provide for the treatment of this file, other than the documents that are the subject of the application, as any other file in the registry of this Court.

Digitized by Google

COSTS

Counsel drew to my attention the fact that subsection 232(9) of the Income Tax Act provides as follows:

232. ...

(9) No costs may be awarded on the disposition of any application under this section.

Accordingly, no costs will be awarded to either party.

[1] R.S.C., 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1, as amended.

[2] R.S.C., 1985, c. C-44, as amended.

[3] Transcript of cross-examination on affidavit of James Andrew Telford, Edmonton, Alberta, June 23, 1995, at pp. 8, 12 to 14, and 20. Applicant's record, Tab E. Paragraph 9 of Mr. Telford's affidavit referred to reads as follows:

9. All of the Privileged Documents evidence legal advice provided by Outside Counsel to IPL with respect to the Transaction or other business of IPL, and are therefore solicitor-client privileged. IPL has not waived, and wishes to preserve, that privilege. IPL provided the privileged information referenced in the Privileged Documents to Blumenthal in or about January of 1994 only because Price Waterhouse demanded it in its capacity as IPL's auditors, because IPL was statutorily compelled to comply with that demand, and because IPL needed to ensure full disclosure was made to Price Waterhouse to allow Price Waterhouse to conduct a complete audit. In doing so, IPL never intended to waive, and indeed expressed its intention to preserve, its proper claim to solicitor-client privilege in respect of that information. I specifically told Blumenthal that IPL considered the legal advice in question to be solicitor-client privileged information of IPL, that IPL would not release and wished to retain that privilege, and that accordingly Price Waterhouse should not take copies or make notes of that legal advice.

[4] 1982 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860.

[5] reflex, [1985] 1 C.T.C. 302 (Ont. S.C.).

[6] 1988 ABCA 282 (CanLII), (1988), 61 Alta. L.R. (2d) 319 (C.A.)

[7] [1988] 3 All ER 816 (C.A.).

[8] 1994 CanLII 7295 (ON SC), (1994), 19 O.R. (3d) 537 (Gen. Div.).

Common Interest Privilege

Digitized by Google

Whether a particular record retains common interest privilege – where a legal opinion is provided to more than one party and one party relinquishes its interest is an interesting point by which CRA can obtain access to information in determining tax aspects. It was examined in Pitney Bowes Of Canada Ltd., Pitney Bowes Credit Corporation, Royal Bank Of Canada, Maple Assets Pipin Limited v. Her Majesty The Queen whereby it was held:

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] This is a motion pursuant to s. 232(4) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1, as amended (hereinafter "the Act") to determine whether the applicants have a solicitor-client privilege in respect of certain documents that would protect them from disclosure to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (hereinafter "the CCRA"), which is otherwise required under s. 231.2 of the Act.

I. Factual Background

[2] The documents in question relate to a multilateral commercial transaction that took place in 1997 ("the leasing transaction"). As part of that transaction, Pitney Bowes of Canada Ltd. ("Pitney Bowes") purchased railway cars from NS Group N.V. ("N.S. Group"), and then leased them to Maple Assets Pipin Limited ("MAPL"), who then sub-leased these cars to NS Group. Royal Bank of Canada ("Royal Bank") loaned Pitney Bowes a portion of the purchase price of the railway cars.

[3] Various parties were represented by different legal counsel in the leasing transaction. In particular, McMillan Binch represented all of the applicants in one way or another. To avoid conflicts, different lawyers were involved in different aspects of the transaction, and Clifford Chance of the UK provided independent advice on certain matters to Royal Bank and MAPL.

[4] The parties to the leasing transaction agreed that, where multiple parties needed legal advice in areas where their interests were not adverse, they would all obtain advice from one legal counsel, regardless of the general legal representation in the transaction. In particular, Clifford Chance of the UK provided two opinions on United Kingdom law, both dated December 12, 1997: one addressed solely to Pitney Bowes, and the other addressed jointly to N.S. Group and Royal Bank. It is these two opinions that are the subject of this application.

[5] On April 18, 2002, the CCRA served McMillan Binch with a requirement pursuant to s. 231.2 of the Act to provide documents related to the leasing transaction. McMillan Binch refused to provide certain documents to the CCRA, claiming that they were exempt from disclosure on the basis of solicitor-client privilege. Those documents were sealed in two boxes and have been retained by McMillan Binch in accordance with s. 232(3.1) of the Act. McMillan Binch then brought an application to determine the question of solicitor-client privilege which has resulted in this motion.

[6] The parties have reached a settlement with regard to many documents. The only documents that remain in dispute are the two legal opinions by Clifford Chance described above. The sole issue is whether these two documents are protected by solicitor-client privilege and are thereby excluded from disclosure to the CCRA.

[7] The relevant sections of the Act are set out below as an Annex.

II. Issue

[8] Are the two legal opinions dated December 12, 1997, authored by the United Kingdom law firm of Clifford Chance and in the possession of the applicants, protected by solicitor-client privilege?

Digitized by Google

III. Analysis

[9] I have reviewed the numerous cases cited to me by the parties on the subject of solicitor- client privilege. Those that were decided in circumstances similar to the matter before me appear to support the position of the applicants. Counsel for the respondent, in all candour, urged me to conclude that those cases were wrongly decided.

[10] On one level, this matter is simple. Indeed, the applicants see it that way. The respondent is seeking disclosure of legal opinions in the custody of the applicants' solicitors. Those opinions, say the applicants, are privileged under the ordinary rules protecting solicitor-client communications.

[11] The respondent sees things differently, arguing that attaching privilege to the documents in issue would amount to an unjustified extension of the concept of privilege, even beyond what is contemplated by the so-called "common interest" privilege.

A. Common Interest Privilege in Litigation

[12] In Buttes Gas and Oil Co. v. Hammer, et al. (No. 3), [1980] 3 All E.R. 475, Lord Denning described common interest privilege as "a privilege in aid of anticipated litigation in which several persons have a common interest" (at 483). In that case, privilege was found to attach to documents prepared after the point in time when litigation between the parties was anticipated. The privilege extended to documents prepared by the litigants and shared with other persons who, while not parties to the litigation, had interests in common with the respective litigants. Lord Denning provided a simple example to illustrate the kind of situation where this kind of privilege should be recognized:

> Owners of adjoining houses complain of a nuisance which affects them both equally. Both take legal advice. Both exchange relevant documents. But only one is a plaintiff. . . In all such cases I think the courts should, for the purposes of discovery, treat all the persons interested as if they were partners in a single firm or departments in a single company. Each can avail himself of the privilege in aid of litigation (at 484).

[13] One can readily see the logic of such a rule. However, its relevance to these proceedings is not immediately apparent. Clearly, the common interest privilege Lord Denning had in mind was a specific kind of privilege that applied in circumstances when litigation was contemplated. In those circumstances, it is clear which parties have interests in common and which are adversaries. That is not the case here. In the case at bar, the parties were trying to achieve a fairly large commercial transaction. There is no suggestion that litigation was on their minds. The parties had overlapping, but not identical, interests. They were neither adversaries nor brothers-in-arms. It would be difficult to view them "as if they were partners in a single firm or departments in a single company", to use Lord Denning's words.

[14] Strictly speaking, then, the rule in Buttes is not applicable here. However, Lord Denning's reasoning may be. The point of recognizing common interests is not as a means of determining whether privilege exists. The real issue is whether privilege has been lost. In Lord Denning's example, a legal opinion secured by the plaintiff homeowner is clearly privileged. The question is whether that privilege would be lost if the opinion was shared with the plaintiff's neighbour. His answer was that the privilege would remain intact if the opinion was shared with persons who had common interests. It would be otherwise if the opinion was shared with the nuisance-causing defendant.

[15] In the matter before me, it seems obvious that the legal opinions the disclosure of which is sought by the respondent are prima facie privileged. The question is whether privilege was lost when those opinions were shared with other parties to the transaction. To answer that question, one must decide whether the logic of Buttes has any application to commercial transactions.

Digitized by Google

B. Common Interest Privilege in Commercial Transactions

[16] Other courts have addressed this issue and have concluded that Buttes applies when parties to a commercial transaction share legal opinions with one another. Of the cases cited to me, Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue), [2002] B.C.J No. 2146, is closest to the circumstances before me. There, the respondent sought production of a number of documents relating to the creation of certain business partnerships. The documents in issue included legal advice that was prepared for one group of companies and then shared with other corporate parties to the proposed transaction. In the course of his reasons, Lowry J. summarized in the following terms the other recent cases in the area, all of which were cited to me (Archean Energy Ltd. v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue) (1997), 98 D.T.C. 6456 (Alta. Q.B.), [1997] A.J. No. 347 (QL); Anderson Exploration Ltd. v. Pan Alberta Gas Ltd., [1988] 10 W.W.R. 633 (Alta. Q.B.) and St. Joseph Corp. v. Canada (Public Works and Government Services), 2002 FCT 274, [2002] F.C.J. No. 361 (QL) (T.D.):

In Archean Energy, legal opinions concerning the tax consequences of a number of share purchases were developed for one company which subsequently provided them to a second company, the purchaser in the transactions. The opinions were held, on application by the purchaser under the Income Tax Act, to be privileged because they had been provided to further the common interest of having the transaction concluded and not with the intent of waiving the privilege attached. In Anderson Exploration, two corporations exchanged confidential documents of a proprietary nature in negotiating a merger. A legal opinion obtained by one was also given to the other. Later, in unrelated litigation involving a subsidiary of one of the corporations, the plaintiff sought access to the documents arising from the merger negotiations. The court held that the disclosure of the documents to third parties did not waive the privilege that attached to all of the documentation because of the common interest associated with their disclosure. And in St. Joseph, legal opinions exchanged in the course of a commercial transaction were held to be privileged given that the parties had a joint interest in ensuring its completion (at para.8).

[17] In the result, Lowry J. held that besides the common interest litigation privilege recognized in Buttes, the courts should also recognize another kind of common interest privilege: one based on "the parties' common interest in the successful completion of a transaction" at (para. 12). He found that "economic and social values inherent in fostering commercial transactions" favoured the recognition of such a privilege. It is that kind of privilege that he applied to the circumstances before him.

[18] As mentioned above, in these kinds of cases the real issue is whether the privilege that would originally apply to the documents in dispute has somehow been lost - through waiver, disclosure or otherwise. This is a question of fact that will turn on a number of factors, including the expectations of the parties and the nature of the disclosure. I read the foregoing cases as authority for the proposition that in certain commercial transactions the parties share legal opinions in an effort to put them on an equal footing during negotiations and, in that sense, the opinions are for the benefit of multiple parties, even though they may have been prepared for a single client. The parties would expect that the opinions would remain confidential as against outsiders. In such circumstances, the courts will uphold the privilege.

[19] However, the cases do not say, as I read them, that the mere existence of a commercial transaction is sufficient on its own to insulate all shared solicitor-client communications from attempts to gain access to them. There may well be cases where the parties to a commercial transaction disclose privileged documents in circumstances that suggest that there has indeed been a loss or waiver of privilege. As mentioned, in the commercial setting it is less clear than in Lord Denning's example which parties have common interests. Therefore, it is more difficult to make a hard and fast rule. I agree with the observation of Slatter J. in Pinder v. Sproule, [2003] A.J. No. 32 (QL)(Q.B.) that "[p]otential parties to a merger or other business transaction are in many ways adverse in interest, and it strains the common interest exception to try and fit disclosures between such parties within that exception" (at para. 62).

Digitized by Google

[20] Still, in many commercial transactions, the parties will want to negotiate on the footing of a shared understanding of each other's legal position. They will seek legal advice from reputable solicitors whose opinions will be respected by the other parties. Indeed, the solicitors may represent more than one party to the deal. The sharing of legal opinions will ensure that each party has an appreciation of the legal position of the others and negotiations can proceed in an informed and open way. The advice may be provided for one or more party on the understanding that others should be provided copies. The expectation, whether express or implied, will be that the opinions are in aid of the completion of the transaction and, in that sense, are for the benefit of all parties to it. Such circumstances, in my view, create a presumption that the privilege attaching to the solicitor-client communications remains intact notwithstanding that they have been disclosed to other parties.

C. Application to the Facts of this Case

[21] Here, the legal opinions in issue were prepared by Clifford Chance for specific parties: Pitney Bowes of Canada Ltd. on the one hand, and N.S. Group N.V. and Royal Bank of Canada on the other. Those opinions were privileged communications between solicitors and clients. The question is whether the disclosure of those opinions to the other parties dissolved that privilege.

[22] The applicants acknowledge that some of the parties were adverse in interest in many aspects of the transaction. However, the expectation was that these opinions, as well as others, should be sought and distributed among them so that the parties would have a common understanding of certain legal aspects of the transaction. The opinions were prepared with distribution in mind. This approach was economical, in that each party did not have to seek the same legal advice. It also facilitated completion of the transaction because parties were informed of the respective legal positions of the others. While the opinions are addressed to particular clients, they were prepared with the intention of sharing them with other parties with like interests for their collective benefit.

[23] In these circumstances, the presumption is that the privilege should be maintained unless there is some evidence to suggest that it was somehow waived, disclosed to outsiders or otherwise terminated. There is no evidence of this in the case before me. Accordingly, these documents are privileged and should remain in the custody of McMillan Binch.

JUDGMENT

IT IS HEREBY ADJUDGED THAT:

(x) an opinion written by Clifford Chance dated December 12, 1997 addressed solely to Pitney Bowes of Canada Limited, and

(b) an opinion written by Clifford Chance dated December 12, 1997 addressed jointly to NS Group N.V. and to Royal Bank of Canada, London Branch; are not required to be produced to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency under the requirement to provide documents dated April 18, 2002 and shall remain in the custody of McMillan Binch.

Digitized by Google

The remaining documents are to be dealt with in the manner set out in the Consent to Order dated February 10, 2003 and filed with the Court at the hearing of this motion on February 11, 2003 in Toronto.

"James W. O'Reilly"
J.F.C.C.

The Minister Of National Revenue v. Grant Thornton et al., 2012 FC 1313, A Recent SCP: Documents realized Through Auditor Which Prompted Extension of Privilege to Cover as well as Concerns Over Common Interest

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] The central dispute in this case concerns whether three short documents are protected by solicitor client privilege [SCP].

[2] The Intervener has also challenged the constitutionality of the statutory provisions pursuant to which the Applicant seeks to compel the production of those documents, on the basis that that they potentially permit the Minister to access documents that are protected by SCP, without the privilege- holder's knowledge or consent. The Intervener submits that such potential access to documents protected by SCP constitutes an unreasonable search and seizure, and thereby contravenes s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[3] The documents in question were either knowingly or inadvertently disclosed by the Intervener to its auditor, the Respondent, which did not participate in these proceedings.

[4] For the reasons that follow, I find that:
each of the three documents is protected by SCP; and on the particular facts in this case, it is not necessary or appropriate to decide the constitutional question that has been raised.

Background

[5] The Canada Revenue Agency [CRA] is engaged in a review of the 2005 reorganization [Reorganization] of the Foremost Industries Income Fund [FIIF].

[6] Foremost Industries Inc., at all relevant times, acted as the administrator of FIIF.

[7] Following the Reorganization, FIIF ceased to exist, and Foremost Income Fund [Fund] was created. Foremost Industries Inc., at all relevant times in 2005 and 2006, was also the administrator of Fund. In 2006, the Intervener, Foremost Industries Ltd., became the new administrator of Fund, as successor to Foremost Industries Inc. Except where otherwise indicated below, the various entities referred to above will be collectively referred to as Foremost.

[8] Among other things, it appears that CRA is reviewing losses that were claimed by one of Fund's unit holders, which resulted from a complicated series of transactions that followed the Reorganization, and which apparently were unavailable to other unit holders.

[9] In a letter dated January 30, 2010, Mr. Craig Bell advised that he was the Secretary and General Counsel of FIIF, and director of the administrator of FIIF, before and at the time of the Reorganization. He further advised that he was the initial trustee of FIIF, and that he no longer serves Fund in any of the aforementioned capacities. In addition to being a member of the Law Society of Alberta, Mr. Bell has been a chartered accountant since 1988.

Digitized by Google

[10] The Respondent was retained as the auditor for FIIF and also performed some ancillary tax filing work for FIIF.

[11] Pursuant to subsections 231.1(1)(a) and (b) of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, C. 1 (5th Supp.) [ITA], CRA sent a letter dated December 2, 2010 to the Respondent notifying it that it was required to produce certain information and documents in relation to the Reorganization within 30 days of the date of the letter [the "Requirement Letter"]. That letter did not indicate the procedure to be followed if any of the documents or other information falling within its scope [Documents and Information] were entitled to the protection of SCP. Indeed, that letter did not mention SCP whatsoever and was not copied to the Intervener.

[12] By letter dated December 22, 2010, CRA received a reply from the Respondent which provided some of the Documents and Information in response to the Requirement Letter. The Respondent also stated that it had been advised by FIIF that FIIF was asserting SCP over three documents [Retained Documents], which it identified as follows:

Memo to Trustees, October 31, 2005, Re: Transaction Backgrounder, 4 pages, by Craig Bell, CA LLP;

Memo to File, March 22, 2006, Re: T3 and Other Tax Considerations, 3 pages by Craig Bell, CA LLP;

Memo, untitled, undated, 3 pages, by Craig Bell, CA LLP.

[13] On March 28, 2011, Wendy Bridges, counsel to the Applicant, sent the Respondent a letter proposing the following two options to resolve the issue of whether or not the Retained Documents were protected by SCP:

proceedings pursuant to subsection to 237.7(1)(b) of the ITA, or referral of the matter to a Department of Justice lawyer located outside Edmonton, for a non-binding opinion as to whether the Retained Documents are protected by SCP.

[14] The Respondent subsequently advised a representative of the Applicant by telephone that it elected to proceed with the first of those two options. In addition, Ronald J. Robinson, litigation counsel to Fund, became aware of Ms. Bridges'proposal and objected to it on the basis that it did not provide any role for the privilege holder in the process and was contrary to CRA's stated policy of obtaining information directly from taxpayers rather than from third parties.

[15] In May 2011, CRA filed a Notice of Application for a compliance order under subsection 231.7(1) solely against the Respondent, although it did serve a"courtesy copy" of that document on the Intervener. A few weeks later, the Intervener sought leave to intervene in these proceedings, which was granted on consent on June 15, 2011. One month later, the Intervener filed a Notice of Constitutional Question in respect of sections 231.2(1) and 231.7 of the ITA.

[16] At an initial hearing before me on August 16, 2011, a dispute as to whether the Intervener was entitled to raise its constitutional question without Leave of the Court was settled on consent. That consent was reflected in an Order dated September 7, 2011, which also revised the timetable for the hearing of this matter and the steps to be taken by the parties prior to that hearing.

Relevant Legislation

[17] The legislation relevant to this application is set forth in the ITA and is attached to these reasons as Appendix "A".

[18] In brief, subsection 231.2(1) permits the Minister, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the ITA, to require any person to provide any information or any document within such reasonable period of time as stipulated in a written notice served in accordance with that provision. Pursuant to subsection 238(1), it is an offence to fail to comply with a requirement issued under section 231.2. That offence is punishable on summary conviction by (a) a fine of between $1,000 and $25,000, or (b) a fine in that range and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months.

Digitized by Google

[19] Pursuant to subsection 231.7(1), on summary application by the Minister, a judge may, among other things, order a person to provide any information or documents sought by the Minister under section 231.2, if the judge is satisfied that:

the person was required under section 231.1 or 231.2 to provide the information or document and did not do so; and the information or document is not protected from disclosure by SCP, as that term is defined in subsection 232(1).

Analysis

Are the Documents protected by SCP?

Relevant legal principles

[20] SCP has evolved from a rule of evidence into a substantive principle and a principle of fundamental justice (Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v Canada (Attorney General) [2002] 3 SCR 209, at paras18 and 49 [Lavallee]). This principle protects not only the privacy interests of a person who seeks legal advice, but also supports the integrity and fairness of our judicial system (Lavallee, above, at paras 36 and 49).

[21] At its core, and subject to very limited exceptions that either do not apply in this case or are discussed in Part III. A. (iii) below, this principle protects from disclosure (i) communications between a solicitor and his or her client, (ii) which entail the seeking or giving of legal advice, and (iii) which are intended to remain confidential (Canada v Solosky [1980] 1 SCR 821, at 837 [Solosky]).

[22] This protection is not confined to communications in which legal advice is provided. Rather, it extends to all communications "engaged in for the purpose of enabling the client to communicate and obtain the necessary information or advice in relation to his or her conduct, decisions or representation in the courts" (Miranda v Richer, [2003] SCR 193, at para 30 [Miranda]). In brief, SCP protects all communications made within the framework of the solicitor-client relationship (Descôteaux v Mierzwinski [1982] 1 SCR 860, at para 71; Canada (Privacy Commissioner) v Blood Tribe Department of Health [2008] 2 SCR 574, at para 10 [Blood Tribe] ; Samson Indian Band v Canada, [1995] FCJ No 734, at para 8). However, communications made outside of that framework are not protected by SCP (Solosky, above, at 835). For example, SCP does not extend to purely business or policy advice that may be provided by a solicitor (R v Campbell [1999] 1 SCR 565, at para 50), or to documents that are not otherwise privileged and somehow come into the possession of a solicitor (Belgravia Investments Ltd v Canada, [2002 F.C.R. No. 870, at para 46 [Belgravia]).

[23] As acknowledged by the Applicant at the hearing of this Application on March 12, 2012, the foregoing applies with equal force to a solicitor's work product. That is to say, a solicitor's work product produced for the purpose of giving legal advice and intended to remain confidential is protected by SCP. (Keefer Laundry Ltd v Pellerin Milnor Corp [2006] BCJ No 1761, at paras 103- 104 [Keefer];Susan Hoisery v Minister of National Revenue, 69 DTC 5278, at 5282 [Susan Hoisery]). This is based on the theory that no one should be permitted to "look into the mind" of the lawyer as he or she is preparing a case (Keefer, above, at para 104). It is also entirely in keeping with the "broad and all-encompassing" approach to SCP (Pritchard v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission), 2004 SCC 31, at para 16 [Pritchard]). However, while such work product itself is protected by SCP, facts that have an independent existence and do not arise "out of the solicitor-client relationship and of what transpires within it" are not so protected if they are otherwise discoverable (Miranda, above, at paras 30-32; Belgravia, above, at paras 44-45, quoting with approval Susan Hoisery, above).

Digitized by Google

[24] When an investigating authority comes into possession or otherwise becomes aware of a document or other information that may be protected by SCP, every effort should be made to contact the privilege holder, who should then be given a reasonable opportunity to (i) determine whether a claim of privilege should be asserted, (ii) make such assertion, if he or she decides to do so, and (iii) have the issue judicially decided, if the claim is contested. An investigating authority can only inspect the documents if and when it has been judicially determined that the documents are not protected by privilege (Lavallee, above, at para 49).

[25] Privilege does not come into being by an assertion of a privilege claim. It exists independently. In addition, the privilege belongs to the client and can only be asserted or waived by the client or through his or her informed consent (Lavallee, above, at para 39).

[26] The burden of proof rests on the person asserting SCP to establish that the information in question meets the necessary requirements (Belgravia, above, at para 47). However, once established, the onus is on the party seeking to overcome the privilege to establish that the information should be disclosed (Smith v Jones, [1999] 1 SCR 455, at para 46; Camp Development Corp v South Coast Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, [2011] BCJ No9 104, at para 10 ; Archean Energy, above, at para 30; Western Canada Place Ltd v Con-Force Products Ltd [1997] AJ No 354, at para 18).

The Documents and SCP

[27] From the outset of these proceedings, the Applicant has specifically maintained that the Minister is not seeking production of documents that are protected by SCP. However, the Applicant has emphasized that any of the Retained Documents that involve communications by Craig Bell in his capacity as trustee or accountant are not protected by SCP. Therefore, the Applicant took the position that if the Court was if the view that any of the Retained Documents may be entitled to the protection of SCP, the Respondent should produce those documents to the Court to enable the Court to determine the validity of the Intervener's assertion of SCP.

[28] Foremost took the position that it was not necessary for the Court to review the Retained Documents to determine whether they are protected by SCP, which it is asserting as administrator of Fund and on behalf of Fund and other Foremost entities. In support of this position, it asserted that the uncontroverted evidence is that the Retained Documents are related to legal advice and not accounting advice or services.

[29] The"uncontroverted evidence" in question consisted of:

the"privilege" markings on the Retained Documents; its assertion that the Retained Documents were created outside the limited time period in which Mr. Bell was a trustee of fund; its assertion that Mr. Bell did not create the Retained Documents in his capacity as an accountant, and has never acted for Foremost in an accounting capacity; its assertion that there is no evidence to suggest that Mr. Bell provided any accounting services whatsoever to Foremost, which has its own chief financial officer and a complement of accounting staff; and its assertion that the Retained Documents relate to the provision of legal advice on the Reorganization, and not to the provision of advice on accounting matters.

Digitized by Google

[30] With respect to the markings on the Retained Documents, the word "PRIVILEGED" was typed at the top of the initial page of the first of the three documents. As to the second of those documents, the words "PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL" were stamped at the bottom of each page. In addition, the following was stamped on each page: "The writer has been retained by Counsel to act on its behalf for the purposes of supporting legal advice in this matter." As to the third of the documents, the following words were typed at the top of the first page: "PRIVILEGED & CONFIDENTIAL – PREPARED UNDER EXPECTATION OF SOLICITOR & CLIENT PRIVILEGE".

[31] There may well be circumstances in which it is not necessary for the Court to review documents in respect of which a claim of privilege has been made, in order to determine whether they are protected by privilege. However, the evidentiary record in this case, as it existed at the time of the hearing on March 12, 2012, was not such as to enable me make that determination in respect of the Retained Documents. Accordingly, in a Direction issued on May 18, 2012, I stated that it was necessary for the Court to examine the documents to assess whether they are entitled to such protection (Solosky, above, at 837;Risi Stone Ltd v Groupe Permacon Inc, [1990] 3 FC 10, at para 4). I therefore directed the Respondent to file the Retained Documents under seal with the Court within 10 days, to permit a determination on the privilege issue to be made.

[32] In determining whether a document authored by a solicitor contains a communication that is protected by SCP, and in the absence of other evidence, it would ordinarily be appropriate to give substantial weight to the fact that the document is identified as being privileged. However, in this case, there was such other evidence, which included the following:

In addition to being a solicitor, Mr. Bell has been a chartered accountant since 1988;

One of the Retained Documents was undated, and may, notwithstanding Mr. Bell's representations to the contrary, have been prepared during the time that Mr. Bell was a trustee of FIIF;

Mr. Bell, who did not provide any evidence with respect to the Retained Documents, has advised numerous parties, including Mr. Pat Breen, "as to their respective governance roles, duties, responsibilities and liabilities" (Breen Affidavit, sworn on July 27, 2011, at para 11 [Breen Affidavit #2]). Mr. Breen has been the President and a Director of the Intervener since before the reorganization of FIIF into Fund.

Most importantly, Foremost had prior opportunities to identify and assert a claim of privilege in respect of the Retained Documents, yet failed to do so. This is reflected in Exhibit "D" to the Affidavit sworn by Mr. Breen on June 8, 2011 [Breen Affidavit #1], which includes a copy of a Service-Related Complaint that evidences a long and acrimonious series of exchanges, dating back to 2006, between Foremost and CRA regarding the reorganization. This was also confirmed during Foremost's cross- examination of Ms. Helen Little, a Team Leader in the Aggressive Tax Planning Section of the CRA (Cross-Examination on Affidavit of Helen Mary Little, December 8, 2011, at pages 15, 28, 38 and 42). Moreover, in oral submissions to the Court on March 12, 2012, counsel to the Applicant stated that Messrs. Breen and Bell were specifically requested to provide the information that was subsequently sought from the Respondent. In Response, counsel to Foremost simply observed that Mr. Bell received a "request letter"from CRA, rather than a "requirement letter," and that Mr. Bell was under no obligation to "self-identify privileged documents which are exempt from disclosure" under the ITA (Transcript, at 10 – 17).

[33] I have some difficulty with the suggestion that documents or other information that is within the scope of a request or requirement issued by CRA pursuant to the ITA may simply be withheld, without ever being identified on a privilege log, or otherwise, based on a view that the information is protected by SCP. Such a manner of proceeding would prevent the CRA or another regulatory authority in similar circumstances from ever being able to contest the assertion that the information in question is protected by SCP. Given that the party asserting SCP may well be wrong in that regard, it is essential that any information which falls within the scope of a request made pursuant to validly enacted legislation, and in respect of which a claim of SCP is asserted, be identified on a privilege log or in some other manner, so that the regulatory authority is aware of its existence and has an opportunity to challenge the assertion.

Digitized by Google

[34] Turning to three Retained Documents, the document dated October 31, 2005 is addressed to "Trustees" and is identified as a "Transaction Backgrounder". In Breen Affidavit #2, at para 14, Mr. Breen stated that this "document was created for the trustees of the Fund (as client representatives and proposed trustees as of that date) on the legal aspects and considerations surrounding the Reorganization." This document is largely devoted to describing the structure, objectives and broad steps of the Reorganization. Towards the end, under the heading" Considerations," there is a reference to "counsel" having been sought in respect of certain issues that appear to be legal in nature, although there is no discussion of the specifics of any legal advice that may have been received. Taken alone, this suggests that the document may not have been prepared by Mr. Bell in his capacity as legal counsel. However, there is a subsequent general statement of belief that appears to convey a legal conclusion. This is followed by a second statement of belief regarding another legal issue. With the foregoing in mind, and given that a "broad and all-encompassing" approach should be taken to SCP (Pritchard, above, at para 16), I am inclined to err on the side of caution and conclude that this document is a protected communication that was (i) generated within the framework of a solicitor-client relationship, (ii) related to the giving of legal advice, and (iii) intended to be kept confidential, as evidenced by the word "PRIVILEGED" at the top of the first page. I note also that this document pre-dates the short period of time during which Mr. Bell was a trustee of Fund.

[35] The second of the Retained Documents, dated March 22, 2006, is a memorandum to"file," entitled "T3 and Other Tax Considerations." In Breen Affidavit #2, at para 15, Mr. Breen stated that he was advised by Mr. Bell "that the document was created by him to memorialize his legal analysis of certain aspects of the Reorganization and was the basis of legal advice provided to the Fund and its predecessor and related and affiliated entities." As with the document described immediately above, this document is largely descriptive. Generally speaking, it describes certain transactions that appear to relate to the reorganization and then describes and their tax consequences for certain Foremost entities and other taxpayers. In several places, it is difficult to ascertain whether the statements made are based on accounting or legal considerations. However, once again, I decided to err on the side of caution and conclude that the document is protected by SCP, on the basis that it is work product which could well have been prepared by Mr. Bell in his capacity as a solicitor, and for the purpose of either providing legal advice to Foremost or assisting another solicitor to provide such advice. In reaching this conclusion, I also gave some weight to (i) Mr. Breen's evidence that, to the best of his knowledge, Mr. Bell "has never acted for the Fund or any of the Foremost entities in an accounting capacity", and (ii) the lengths to which Mr. Bell went to convey his view that the document is protected by SCP. As previously noted, that document is stamped "PRIVILEGED" in very large font at the top of each page, "PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL" at the bottom of each page, and is stamped with the following statement on each page: "The writer has been retained by Counsel to act on its behalf for the purposes of supporting legal advice in this matter." With respect to this last statement, given that SCP also extends to documents created by a lawyer who has been consulted by another lawyer in the course of the latter's provision of legal advice to his or her client (Belgravia, above at para 50), the fact that Mr. Bell may not have been retained directly by Foremost, but rather by other counsel to Foremost, had no bearing on my determination. I should add that the lengths to which Mr. Bell went to convey his view that this document is protected by SCP satisfy me that the document was intended to remain confidential. In addition, I note that the document post-dates the short period during which Mr. Bell was a trustee of Fund.

Digitized by Google

[36] I also hasten to add that it is not necessary on the specific facts of this case to consider the potential relevance of the definition of SCP set forth in subsection 232(1) of the ITA, which, on its face, is confined to"communications … passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence." This is because the Applicant has acknowledged that SCP extends to work product created in connection with the giving of legal advice, and it has also confirmed that it is not seeking access to any documents that are protected by SCP. In addition, Foremost has not questioned the scope of the definition of SCP in subsection 232(1), which is referred to in paragraph 231.7(1)(b). That said, I would observe in passing that "legislative language that may (if broadly construed) allow incursions on solicitor-client privilege must be interpreted restrictively" (Blood Tribe, above, at para 11).

[37] The third of the Retained Documents (the "Undated Memo") is undated and unaddressed. In Breen Affidavit #2, Mr. Breen stated that he was advised by Mr. Bell that he created the memo "in conjunction with the parties *[sic]*outside legal advisers at both Bennett Jones LLP and Blakes LLP in early 2006." Mr. Breen also stated that Mr. Bell advised him that "the document delineates legal analysis on the structure of the Reorganization" and "formed the basis of legal advice provided to the Fund and its predecessor and related and affiliated companies."

[38] As with the second of the Retained Documents, the Undated Memo contains no solicitor-client communication. Contrary to Mr. Breen's statement, it also does not appear to contain any legal analysis on the structure of the reorganization. This undermines Mr. Breen's assertion, which is hearsay, regarding the legal purpose of the memo, which is not otherwise immediately ascertainable. On its face, the document simply begins by stating certain historical facts and then briefly describes certain transactions that will occur prior to the Closing Date, as well as the various steps involved in the previously mentioned reorganization. The document ends by stating certain "Final Balances" and referring to an unspecified "taxable capital gain/income." Given the foregoing, I initially concluded that this document is not protected by SCP.

[39] After conveying the above conclusions regarding the Retained Documents to counsel during a telephone conference on June 12, 2012, and inviting counsel to advise as to how they wished to proceed, counsel to the Intervener offered to provide further background information with respect to the creation and intent of the Undated Memo. I accepted that offer and issued a Direction, dated June 26, 2012, that set forth the dates by which such further information, and any response and reply that the Applicant and the Intervener, respectively, might wish to make, would have to be submitted.

[40] On July 5, 2012, the Intervener filed an Affidavit by Mr. Wallace Shaw, a member of the Law Society of Alberta and counsel with Blake Cassels & Graydon LLP. Based on the additional evidence set forth in that Affidavit, I am now satisfied that, as with the first two Retained Documents, the Undated Memo is also protected by SCP.

[41] In his affidavit, Mr. Shaw stated that he created the Undated Memo with Mr. Bell"while working with him to analyze the legal tax implications of various steps in the Reorganization." Among other things, he also stated that the document:

"was definitely not an accounting exercise";

Digitized by Google

"was created to track the legal tax implications of steps in the Reorganization, which analysis I later communicated to my clients involved in the Reorganization"; and
"was directly related to the provision of legal tax advice to my clients as well as Mr. Bell's".

[42] In contrast to Mr. Breen's hearsay evidence, Mr. Shaw's evidence is that of one of the authors of the Undated Memo, who is also an officer of the Court. In addition, Mr. Shaw's description of the contents of that document is more accurate and his description of their link to legal advice rings truer and is more persuasive than Mr. Breen's. It also corroborates Mr. Breen's evidence regarding the co-authorship of the document. In my view, Mr. Shaw's evidence warrants sufficient weight to tip the balance in favour of a conclusion that the Undated Memo is legal work product that is protected by SCP. In contrast to the term sheet that was discussed in Belgravia, above at para 78, and that was distributed to third parties for the purposes of "relaying the proposed terms of the transaction," I am satisfied that the Undated Memo was directly related to the provision of legal tax advice to Foremost and to Mr. Shaw's clients. I am also satisfied that this document was created for the purpose of providing such legal advice. Therefore, the fact that it does not appear to contain any legal thinking or analysis, and may even simply list facts that are otherwise discoverable, is not sufficient to deprive it of the protection afforded by SCP (Universal Sales Ltd v Edinburgh, 2009 FC 151, at para 22 [Universal Sales]).

[43] In addition, given that the authors of the Undated Memo inserted the words "PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL– PREPARED UNDER THE EXPECTATION OF SOLICITOR & CLIENT PRIVILEGE" at the top of the document, I am satisfied that they intended that the document be kept confidential.

[44] I have some sympathy with the Applicant's position that Mr. Bell, as the author of the first two Retained Documents and as one of the authors of the Undated Memo was best placed to provide evidence regarding those documents. However, given that he is also Foremost's counsel, I am not prepared to draw an adverse inference from the fact that he did not provide such evidence. (Butterfield v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 396, at para 12). I agree with Foremost that there is now sufficient reliable evidence before the Court to enable me to determine that the Retained Documents are protected by SCP.

iii. Was there a Limited Waiver of SCP or an inadvertent disclosure of the Retained Documents?

[45] The Applicant submits that even if the Retained Documents were at one time protected by SCP, that privilege was waived when those documents were disclosed to the Respondent, Foremost's auditor.

[46] The Respondent was retained subsequent to the Reorganization of Fund, to audit Fund's financial statements.

[47] Documents that are protected by SCP and that are knowingly disclosed in confidence by the privilege holder to an auditor for the limited purpose of enabling the auditor to perform an audit and issue a fairness opinion retain such protection vis à vis other third parties, under the doctrine of limited waiver (Interprovincial Pipe Line Inc and IPL Energy Inc v The Minister of National Revenue ((1995), 95 DTC 5642, at 5646-7; Anderson Exploration Ltd v Pan-Alberta Gas Ltd, [1998] A.J. No 575, at paras 28-30 [Anderson Exploration]; Philip Services Corp v Ontario Securities Commission, [2005] OJ No 4418, at paras 47 and 57-58 [Philip Services]). It bears emphasizing that under this doctrine, the intention of the privilege holder is key.

[48] It also bears emphasizing that cases involving disclosure of privileged information to financial institutions are not particularly relevant to a consideration of the issue of limited waiver in the context of such disclosure to an auditor. In the latter context, there is a strong public interest in companies and other types of business organizations being properly audited, for the benefit of actual and potential shareholders or other members of the investing public, even where the disclosure of privileged information is not strictly mandated by statute (see, for example, Philip Services, above, at para 57). In furtherance of that public interest, the disclosure of privileged information that may reasonably be required by an auditor for the purposes of providing a fairness opinion will not be considered to constitute an unlimited waiver of SCP, when such disclosure is made in confidence and solely for that purpose.

Digitized by Google

[49] Unfortunately, neither the Applicant nor Foremost has adduced any evidence to establish how the documents came into the possession of the Respondent. However, Mr. Breen stated that (i) he is unaware of how the Respondent came into possession of the Retained Documents, (ii) none of the Foremost entities, to his knowledge, voluntarily or knowingly provided those documents to the Respondent, and (iii) there was no intention to waive any SCP in those documents (Breen Affidavit #1, at para 18). During cross-examination on his affidavits, Mr. Breen added that (i) he had never seen the Retained Documents, (ii) he did not contact anyone in the Respondent's organization to inquire as to how the Retained Documents came into possession of those documents, and (iii) he was informed by CFO of Foremost, who was responsible for overseeing Foremost's dealings with its auditor (the Respondent), that he did not know how the Respondent came into the possession of those documents (Cross-Examination on Affidavits of Patrick Warren Breen, October 6, 2011, at pp. 20-21).

[50] In these circumstances, I am not satisfied that Foremost knowingly disclosed the Retained Documents to the Respondent for the limited purpose of enabling it to perform its audit, and with the intention of maintaining SCP over those documents for all other purposes. Indeed, Mr. Breen's evidence suggests that it is unlikely that Foremost did so. It follows that the limited waiver exception cannot be relied upon by Foremost to maintain the SCP in the Retained Documents. However, Foremost may still be able to maintain that SCP pursuant to the doctrine of inadvertent disclosure, discussed below.

[51] The Applicant further submits that any SCP which may have attached to the Undated Memo was waived when the contents of that document were presumably shared with the clients of Mr. Shaw, who stated in his affidavit that (i) he communicated his analysis to his "clients involved in the Reorganization" and (ii) the purpose of the Undated Memo was "directly related to the provision of legal tax advice to my clients." The Applicant also impugned Mr. Shaw's affidavit on the basis that he failed to identify his client, to explain the nature of his involvement in creating the memo, and to explain the nature of the relationship between his clients and Foremost.

[52] In his affidavit, Mr. Shaw did in fact identify one of the "several entities" by whom he was retained, namely, TOM 2003-4 Income Fund. While his description of his involvement in the creation of the Undated Memo was somewhat vague, I am satisfied that he was a co-author of the document. As noted above, this was corroborated by Mr. Breen. In addition, this is implicit in his statement that the document "was created in conjunction with Craig Bell while working with him to analyze the legal tax implications of various steps in the Reorganization."I am also satisfied that he co-authored the document in his capacity as a solicitor to one or more entities involved in the Reorganization, and for the purpose of providing legal tax advice to those clients. This is clear from his statement quoted immediately above and his additional statements that "the document was created to track the legal tax implications of steps in the Reorganization" and that he communicated his analysis to his clients "involved in the Reorganization."

[53] In these circumstances, I am satisfied that the Undated Memo did not lose its privileged nature merely because it was co-authored by Mr. Shaw, a solicitor who did not represent Foremost, or because its contents were disclosed to his clients in the context of the provision of legal advice to them by him.

Digitized by Google

[54] It can be inferred from the fact that Messrs. Bell and Shaw co-authored the Undated Memo and then relied on that memo to provide legal tax advice to their respective clients that those clients shared a common interest in completing the Reorganization in a manner that had certain tax consequences. It can also be inferred that Messrs. Bell and Shaw intended that their joint work product as set forth in Undated Memo would be used by each of them in providing advice to their respective clients, and that such work product was produced for the common benefit of their clients. [55] There is no evidence that Mr. Bell, Mr. Shaw or their respective clients intended or anticipated that the Undated Memo would be disclosed to anyone who did not have a common interest in the completion of the Reorganization (St. Joseph Corp v Canada (Public Works and Government Services), 2002 FCT 274, at para 79). Indeed, the insertion of the words "PRIVILEGED AND CONFIDENTIAL – PREPARED UNDER THE EXPECTATION OF SOLICITOR & CLIENT PRIVILEGE" at the top of the document make it readily apparent that Messrs. Bell and Shaw intended that the document remain confidential.

[56] There is also no evidence that the Undated Memo was disclosed to anyone who did not have a common interest in the completion of the reorganization.

[57] Given all of the foregoing, I am satisfied that the common interest exception to the rule that SCP is lost when the protected information is disclosed to a third party applies (Pitney Bowes of Canada Ltd v Canada, 2003 FCT 214, at paras 16-23; Anderson Exploration, above, at paras 21-27; Almecon Industries Ltd v Anchortek Ltd, [1999] 1 FC 507, at para 9; Maximum Ventures Inc v De Graaf, [2007] BCJ No 2355, at paras 14-16; Archean Energy Limited and Titleist Energy Inc v The Minister of National Revenue(1997), 98 DTC 6456, at para 30 [Archean Energy]). Accordingly, the SCP attached to the Undated Memo was not waived due to the fact that Mr. Shaw participated in its creation or communicated all or part of the work product set forth in that document to his clients in the course of providing legal tax advice to them.

[58] This brings me to the doctrine of inadvertent disclosure.

[59] It appears to be settled now that the mere physical loss of custody of documents protected by SCP does not automatically result in the loss of the protection afforded by SCP (Royal Bank of Canada v Lee, [1992] AJ No 433, at p. 5).

[60] Indeed, one line of jurisprudence holds that SCP can only be waived through informed consent. (See, for example, Metcalfe v Metcalfe, [2001] MJ No 115, at para 14 (CA); and Lavallee, above, at para 36). To the extent that this jurisprudence stands for the proposition that inadvertent disclosure can never result in the loss of SCP, even, for example, where the privilege holder was negligent, careless, or failed to act promptly to assert SCP upon discovering the inadvertent disclosure, I do not endorse it.

[61] I prefer a second line of jurisprudence that holds that it is preferable to look at all of the circumstances of the case in determining whether to maintain SCP over documents that have been inadvertently disclosed (Chapelstone Developments Inc v Canada, [2004] NBJ No 450, at paras 46- 55 (CA) [Chapelstone];Stevens v Canada, [1998] FCJ No 794, at para 50 (FCA); Armstrong v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FC 1013, at para 23; Brass v Canada, 2011 FC 1102, at para 83 [Brass]; Dublin v Montessori Jewish Day School of Toronto, [2007] OJ No 1062, at paras 67-70; S&K Processors v Campbell Avenue Herring Producers Ltd [1983] BCJ No 1499, at para 6 (BCSC); Maximum Ventures Inc v de Graaf, [2007] BCJ No 1784, at para 40;Toronto Port Authority v Toronto (City), [2008] OJ 5274, at paras 30-32;).

Digitized by Google

[62] This second line of jurisprudence has identified numerous factors to be considered by a Court in determining whether to exercise its discretion to maintain SCP over documents that have been inadvertently disclosed.

[63] One such factor is whether the privilege holder took swift steps to assert SCP upon learning of the inadvertent disclosure of privileged documents (Chapelstone, above, at para 55; Universal Sales, above, at para 31; Pacific Northwest Herb Corp v Thompson, [1999] BCJ No 2772, at paras 21-23). In the case at bar, there is no evidence that Foremost was aware that the Retained Documents had been inadvertently disclosed to the Respondent, or that it remained silent or did not take immediate action to assert SCP once it became aware of that disclosure. Indeed, the opposite appears to be true. Foremost seems to have learned that the Applicant was contesting the Respondent's assertion of SCP over the Retained Documents when Mr. Bell was copied on the Applicant's letter to the Respondent dated March 28, 2011. Two weeks later, on April 14, 2011, Foremost's outside litigation counsel (Mr. Robinson) wrote to the CRA to insist that the CRA's efforts to achieve a resolution regarding the privilege claim that had been asserted by the Respondent be henceforth directed to him, rather than the Respondent. Foremost then promptly sought intervener status in these proceedings for the explicit purpose of defending its SCP in the Retained Documents. In my view, these actions by Foremost weigh in favour of exercising the Court's discretion to maintain SCP over the Retained Documents.

[64] A number of additional factors to be considered by a Court in determining whether to exercise discretion to maintain privilege over inadvertently disclosed documents were identified by Wein J. in Airst v Airst, [1998] OJ No 2615, at paras18-19 [Airst]. These are:

i. the way in which the documents came to be released; ii. the timing of the discovery of the disclosure;
the timing of the application to recover the documents;
the number and nature of the third parties who have become aware of the documents;
v. whether the maintenance of the privilege will create an actual or perceived unfairness to the opposing party; and
vi. the impact on the fairness, both actual and perceived, of the processes of the Court.

[65] With respect to the manner of release of the documents, Wein J. suggested that admission of the disclosed documents into evidence may be appropriate where the disclosure occurred through the carelessness of the party claiming privilege, as opposed to through any wrongdoing of the opposing party. In the present case, there is no evidence to suggest such carelessness or wrongdoing.

[66] Wein J. also suggested that it may be appropriate to admit inadvertently disclosed documents where a failure to do so could leave a party with a sense that the Court was denying itself the opportunity to assess conflicting information on a material point, and consequently could negatively reflect on the public perception of the administration of justice. That consideration is not a factor in the case at bar, as I would not be depriving myself of an opportunity to assess conflicting information on a material point, if I were to maintain the SCP in the Retained Documents.

[67] In addition, Wein J. observed that in other cases, the information might have become so widely distributed that it would be futile as a practical matter to attempt to prevent its admission into Court. Once again, that is not a relevant consideration in the case at bar, as there is no evidence that the Retained Documents have been disclosed to anyone other than the Respondent and the clients of Messrs. Bell and Shaw. On the contrary, the record suggests that the inadvertent disclosure was limited to the Respondent, who appears to have obtained the documents in the context of an auditor-client relationship.

[68] Ultimately, Wein J. exercised his discretion to maintain SCP over the documents in question in Airst, above, after finding that the disclosure was limited in scope and restricted to one individual who had been retained in a capacity that might be broadly construed as confidential. In reaching this conclusion, Wein J. added that the Court's ability to assess facts underlying the issues in the case would not be impaired by the lack of disclosure. In the case at bar, each of these factors weighs in favour of the exercise of my discretion to maintain SCP over the Retained Documents.

Digitized by Google

[69] In Brass, above, at paras 86-91, Prothonotary Lafrenière of this Court exercised his discretion to maintain SCP in respect of inadvertently disclosed documents, primarily on the basis that (i) the party asserting SCP reacted quickly upon discovering its inadvertent production of privileged documents to the other party in the litigation, (ii) the party asserting privilege would have suffered significant prejudice if the SCP were not maintained, whereas the other party would suffer little prejudice if that occurred, and (iii) there was no evidence that the privilege holder had intended to waive its privilege. In the course of reaching that conclusion, Prothonotary Lafrenière observed that prejudice is more easily made out where the privilege at issue is SCP. I agree, and find that the considerations upon which he relied in reaching his conclusion also weigh in favour of exercising my discretion to maintain SCP in respect of the Retained Documents.

[70] In addition to the foregoing, the Applicant has not been able to establish that it would suffer any prejudice if SCP were maintained over the Retained Documents in the circumstances of this case.

[71] As to the fairness and truth seeking functions of the Court, given that the principle issue in these proceedings is whether the Retained Documents are protected by SCP, I am not satisfied that this consider merits significant weight in the Applicant's favour in this particular case.

[72] In its oral submissions, the Applicant essentially suggested that I should give negative weight to the fact that (i) Mr. Breen did not contact the Respondent to ascertain how it obtained the Retained Documents, and

(ii) Foremost did not adduce evidence with respect to the various factors that are relevant to the Court's determination of whether to exercise its discretion to maintain SCP in respect of the Retained Documents. I am sympathetic to this position, and have therefore given some negative weight to these considerations.

[73] However, given the other factors that I have discussed above, and, most importantly, given the fact that the Retained Documents appear to have been inadvertently disclosed to Foremost's auditor, a party with whom Foremost implicitly had a relationship of confidence, I am inclined to exercise my discretion in favour of maintaining SCP in respect of the Retained Documents. In my view, in the absence of any evidence whatsoever to suggest otherwise, it can be inferred that the Respondent came into possession of the Retained Documents in confidence, in the course of conducting its audit of Foremost.

Conclusion regarding the Retained Documents

[74] For the reasons set forth above, I find that the Retained Documents:

are protected by SCP;

were not knowingly disclosed to the Respondent pursuant to an express or implied limited waiver of privilege; and were inadvertently disclosed to the Respondent in circumstances which, considered together with the actions taken by Foremost to swiftly assert SCP in relation to the Retained Documents upon discovering such disclosure, warrant the exercise of the Court's discretion to maintain SCP in respect of those documents.

The Constitutional issue

Digitized by Google

[75] Foremost has requested this Court to declare sections 231.2 and 237.1 of the ITA unconstitutional, on the basis that they potentially permit the Minister to access documents that are protected by SCP, without the privilege-holder's knowledge or consent. Foremost asserts that this constitutes an unreasonable search and seizure, contrary to s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[76] I agree with the Applicant that this is not an appropriate case for the Court to make a determination on the question of the constitutionality of sections 231.2 and 237.1 of the ITA. In short, the allegedly unconstitutional fact scenario identified by Foremost did not arise in this case and remains somewhat hypothetical.

[77] In this case, Foremost was served a copy (albeit on a "courtesy" basis) of the Applicant's Notice of Application for a compliance order against the Respondent under subsection 231.7(1). Indeed, it was also copied on a letter dated March 28, 2011 from the Applicant to the Respondent, which proposed two alternatives for addressing the privilege issue that the Respondent raised in respect of the Retained Documents. These communications quickly led Foremost to seek intervener status in this proceeding, which ultimately was granted on consent. Foremost then availed itself of its opportunity to vigorously defend its interest in maintaining SCP in the Retained Documents. After considering the written and oral submissions made by the Applicant and Foremost, I ultimately determined that each of the Retained Documents were and remain protected by SCP. As a result, the Applicant will not, in fact, obtain access to any privileged information, and there is certainly no issue of such access being obtained without the privilege holder's knowledge or consent.

[78] In these circumstances, it is unnecessary, and would not be appropriate, for the Court to address the constitutional question raised by Foremost. That issue can be revisited if and when a more appropriate factual matrix presents itself (Phillips v Nova Scotia(Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), [1995] 2 SCR 97, at para 6; Apotex Inc v Astrazeneca Canada Inc, 2012 FC 559, at paras 69 and 70; Duitama Gomez v Canada (Minister of Public Safety & Emergency Preparedness), 2010 FC 593, at paras 71-74; Suescan v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 FC 438, at paras 26-28; Bedada v Canada (Solicitor General), 2007 FC 121, at paras 16-20; Native Council of Nova Scotia v Canada (AttorneyGeneral), 2007 FC 45, at paras 40 and 57-58; Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v Welton Parent Inc, 2006 FC 67, at paras 123, 149-150, and 178-179; Canada (Information Commissioner) v Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation& Safety Board, 2005 FC 384, at paras 67-75; Mahjoub v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration),2006 FC 1503, at para 111).

[79] Chambre des notaires du Québec c Canada (Procureur général), 2010 QCCS 4215, [2010] JQ 8868, is distinguishable, as it involved requirements letters issued by the CRA to a number of lawyers. It also involved certain issues that do not arise on the facts of this case, particularly with respect to subsection 232 (1) of the ITA and the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, RSQ, c C-12.

Costs

[80] Foremost submitted that it should be granted full indemnification costs for its intervention, on the ground that it should have been named as the Respondent in Notice of Application filed by the Applicant in these proceedings, in which the Applicant sought production of the Retained Documents. It further submitted that the Applicant's tactics in seeking access to privileged documents from a third party, rather than the privilege holder, should be soundly discouraged.

[81] In my view, the situation is much more nuanced than suggested by Foremost.

[82] As previously discussed in these reasons, Foremost and its trustees had numerous opportunities to identify and claim SCP in respect of the Retained Documents. At no time did they do so. The documents only came to light on December 22, 2010, when they were identified by the Respondent, in its response to the Applicant's requirements letter. In these circumstances, I am sympathetic to the Applicant's position that the appropriate respondent in this proceeding was Grant Thornton, the entity which was known to have possession of the Retained Documents, as opposed to Foremost, an entity that had never disclosed the existence of those documents and that might well not have possession of the originals or copies of those documents. That said, the Applicant may have been able to avoid the costs associated with these proceedings had it availed itself of Foremost's request to discuss the issue of whether the Retained Documents were protected by SCP, directly with Foremost.

Digitized by Google

[83] In its own attempt to find an expeditious resolution to the issue of whether the Retained Documents were in fact protected by SCP, the Applicant proposed to the Respondent, in a letter dated March 28, 2011 that was copied to Foremost, that this narrow issue be referred to the Court for a determination. Neither the Respondent nor Foremost availed itself of that opportunity. In fact, even during the hearing of this matter in March 2012, Foremost resisted the suggestion that the Court review the Retained Documents to determine whether they are protected by SCP. Foremost also continued to press the constitutional issue it had raised, even after the Applicant made clear that it did not want access to any documents that the Court might determine are protected by SCP, and even after I reminded Foremost's counsel of this during the hearing. [84] Moreover, Foremost curiously made no effort whatsoever to contact the Respondent to find out how the Retained Documents came into the Respondent's position. The Applicant also made no such effort. This left the Court in a much more difficult position when addressing the submissions made by Foremost with respect to the issues of limited waiver and inadvertent disclosure. In addition, by leading its evidence with respect to the Retained Documents through Mr. Breen, whose only information about those documents came from Mr. Bell, Foremost made it very difficult for the Applicant to conduct a meaningful cross-examination with respect to those documents.

[85] In these circumstances, and given the findings that I have made on the issue of limited waiver and on the constitutional issue, I have determined that there should be no cost award made in this proceeding.

Conclusion

[86] The Retained Documents are protected by SCP. Accordingly, this Application is dismissed.

[87] As to the constitutional issue raised by Foremost, this is not an appropriate case for the Court to make a determination, because the allegedly unconstitutional fact scenario identified by Foremost did not arise on the particular facts of this case and remains somewhat hypothetical.

JUDGMENT

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that

Digitized by Google

this Application is dismissed;
this is not an appropriate case in which to make a determination on the constitutional issue raised by Foremost; and there shall be no award of costs.

"Paul S. Crampton"
Chief Justice

Material Released Pursuant to Another Statutory Requirement
When material is provided under an assumption of confidentiality to another government body solicitor- client may be de facto waiver as may be held by a court subsequently. This was found in the following where the issues were thoroughly canvassed.

A-514-96
AGT Limited (Applicant)
v.
The Attorney General of Canada (Respondent)

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

DESJARDINS J.A.

This appeal deals with the validity and enforceability of three notices of requirements issued by the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") to the appellant AGT Limited (AGT) pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act.[1]

These notices of requirements read in their substantive parts:[2]

> For the purposes related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act, pursuant to the provisions of subsection 231.2(1) thereof, I hereby require from you within 30 days from the date of delivery of this notice, file copies of correspondence, agreements, reports, memoranda, schedules, working papers, minutes of meetings, notes to files, telexes, facsimile transmissions and other documents in your possession or under your control, and in the manner originally kept relating directly or indirectly to the following:
>
> (i) documents and information filed with the Canadian Radio and Telecommunication Commission and not previously provided for the years 1990 to July 1995
>
> The aforementioned enumeration of classes of documents or information is not to be presumed to be exhaustive of the material which the officer or officers of this Department will wish to review and subsequent reference may be made to classes or specific documents or information which must be provided pursuant to this agreement.
>
> ...
>
> If this requirement is not complied with you may be liable to prosecution without further notice under subsection 238(1).

The documents and information sought by the Minister under the notices of requirements are materials the appellant filed with the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (the "CRTC") for the years 1990 to July 1995, which now enjoy the status of confidential material by virtue of a decision of the CRTC made pursuant to sections 350 and

Digitized by Google

358 of the Railway Act,[3] and sections 18 and 19 of the CRTC Telecommunications Rules of Procedure.[4]

The facts

The appellant is a telephone company whose activities have been regulated by the CRTC since October 4, 1990. Prior to October 4, 1990, telephone service in the province of Alberta was provided by the Alberta Government Telephones Commission. Being a Crown corporation exempt from federal and provincial income tax, it never claimed capital cost allowance. For accounting purposes, however, it did calculate an annual depreciation expense which it included in the calculation of its revenue requirement. Pursuant to the Alberta Government Telephones Reorganization Act,[5] the Commission was restructured as of October 4, 1990, for purposes of privatization. Telus Corporation was formed to act as a holding corporation to facilitate the privatization of the provincial Crown agent. Most telephone operations and assets were transferred to the appellant, a subsidiary of Telus which became a regulated business under the jurisdiction of the CRTC. AGT became, at the same time, a taxable entity.

In preparation for the organization and privatization of the Alberta Government Telephones Commission, the Minister was asked for an advanced tax ruling as to whether depreciable assets for tax purposes should be valued at original cost, approximately $ 4 billion, or a net book value, i.e. original cost less depreciation of about $ 2.2 billion. The tax ruling allowed the original cost as undepreciated capital cost.

In October 1991, the appellant filed an application to the CRTC for a Revenue Requirement proceeding, initially for 1992. The revenue requirement is intended to cover AGT's expenses, costs of capital and other items; but of relevance here, is the fact that the allowed revenue is also intended to cover AGT's income tax liability.

During the course of its application to the CRTC, AGT took a more conservative approach on its income tax liability than in its income tax returns to the Minister. Before the CRTC, the corporate taxpayer furnished the CRTC with certain documents on which it claimed and obtained confidentiality pursuant to sections 18 and 19 of the CRTC Telecommunications Rules of Procedure.

The Minister of National Revenue, who had been conducting a general audit of AGT involving the review and verification of the financial statements and tax returns filed by the appellant in 1990 and 1991,[6] became aware of the confidential material the appellant had filed with the CRTC. As a result of an internal memo, three representatives of the Minister visited the CRTC on 22 June 1995, so as to have access to the material. The CRTC, however, refused to release the confidential documents.

In July 1995, after attempting unsuccessfully to obtain the confidential documents in issue directly from the CRTC, the Minister issued the notices of requirements under subsection 231.2(1) of the Act requiring AGT to produce the documents in question.

The taxpayer applied for judicial review to the Trial Division of this Court challenging the validity and enforceability of the notices of requirements. The application was dismissed in a decision which is now reported.[7]

The parties' contentions

The appellant has pressed upon us two key arguments. Firstly, that the notices of requirements were not authorized under subsection 231.2(1). Secondly, that the documents sought to be seized were privileged under the "Wigmore Rules" as outlined in cases such as R. v. Gruenke.[8] We chose not to hear the respondent on this second issue, since we are satisfied that the motions judge did not err in his disposition of that argument.

With regard to the first issue, the appellant contends that the notices of requirements are invalid because they do not meet the conditions set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd.,[9] namely that the documents "be relevant to the filing of the income tax return", and that the seizure be "reasonable" within the meaning of section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.[10]

Digitized by Google

With regard to the threshold test for relevance, the appellant submits that although McKinlay stands for the proposition that seizures under subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act have a lower threshold test than the "reasonable grounds" test for seizure in a criminal law context, it is still incumbent upon the Minister to demonstrate to the court, by affidavit or otherwise, that the notices of requirements are designed to seek production of only those documents that may be relevant to his compliance verification function. To issue a notice of requirement which deliberately disregards the potential relevance of a document is clearly outside the scope of the section.

In the case at bar, there are issues as between the Minister and AGT with regard to the classification of certain assets for tax purposes.[11] The appellant submits that the Minister has admitted that the notices of requirements seek the production of information which is irrelevant to these issues. During cross-examination, Ms. Sharon Marlene White, a representative of the respondent, conceded that AGT could not be forced to give its opinion on the risk assessment of those assets.[12] She made clear, however, that the Minister is interested in the facts underlying the risk assessment. The following exchange then occurred:[13]

> Q You just issued the requirement knowing that a consequence may be that you would end up with information that you are not entitled to?
>
> A I issued a requirement asking for all documents filed with the CRTC, whatever they may be.
>
> [Emphasis added]

Such an admission, claims the appellant, indicates that the Minister is operating an impermissible fishing expedition. The Minister, it says, is entitled to business records a taxpayer is obligated to keep, but not to opinion documents and business strategies.

The appellant further argues that the seizure is unreasonable because the appellant's privacy interest in the documents sought to be seized outweighs the state's interest in those documents. The appellant submits that it has a compelling privacy interest in the documents because, at the time the notices of requirements were issued, the sought for documents enjoyed confidentiality by virtue of the CRTC's decision which had determined that it is in the public interest that the documents remain confidential. The fact that the appellant is not required by the Act to maintain the type of documents in issue is further evidence that the state's interest in obtaining the documents does not outweigh the appellant's privacy interest. The motions judge should have considered that the documents at issue came into existence by compulsion of law for a very specific purpose since the information was prepared and provided to the CRTC so as to allow the CRTC to discharge its statutory duty. The diversion which the Minister is seeking is, therefore, unreasonable.

The appellant finally argues that the Minister's extra-legal conduct in seeking access to the information is clearly at odds with the rule of law and the values embodied by section 8 of the Charter. The attempt to obtain the documents through the CRTC is an intricate part of the seizure in issue and goes to the determination of whether the seizure was reasonable.

The respondent maintains that the notices of requirements meet the legal requirements of McKinlay. The Minister is entitled to obtain documents which might contain not only facts, but which might reveal the roadmap followed by the taxpayer in his assessment. The Minister is entitled to have access to documents which might flag situations likely to assist him in the enforcement of the Act.

Analysis

The seminal case is McKinlay where the Supreme Court of Canada found that subsection

Digitized by Google

231(3) of the Income Tax Act, now 231.2(1), constitutes a valid seizure within the meaning of section 8 of the Charter. The Court upheld the Minister's warrantless demand for a taxpayer's private documents and information, in the context of the administration or enforcement of the Act, on the basis that there was a lower standard of reasonableness for the production of those documents.

Wilson J., speaking for herself and Lamer C.J.,[14] noted that the federal Income Tax Act was a regulatory statute, and that the meaning to be given to the word "unreasonable", as found in section 8 of the Charter, would be less strict in an administrative and regulatory context:[15]

> It is consistent with this approach, I believe, to draw a distinction between seizures in the criminal or quasi-criminal context to which the full rigours of the Hunter criteria will apply, and seizures in the administrative or regulatory context to which a lesser standard may apply depending upon the legislative scheme under review. I do not believe that when the Chief Justice said in Simmons at p. 527 that departures from the Hunter criteria would be rare he was applying his mind to searches or seizures in the context of regulatory legislation. I think he was addressing as in the cases of Hunter and Simmons themselves searches or seizures in a criminal or quasi-criminal context. It is with these considerations in mind that I examine the reasonableness of s. 231(3) of the Income Tax Act.

She then continued:[16]

> At the beginning of my analysis I noted that the Income Tax Act was based on the principle of self-reporting and self-assessment. The Act could have provided that each taxpayer submit all his or her records to the Minister and his officials so that they might make the calculations necessary for determining each person's taxable income. The legislation does not so provide, no doubt because it would be extremely expensive and cumbersome to operate such a system. However, a self-reporting system has its drawbacks. Chief among these is that it depends for its success upon the taxpayers' honesty and integrity in preparing their returns. While most taxpayers undoubtedly respect and comply with the system, the facts of life are that certain persons will attempt to take advantage of the system and avoid their full tax liability.
>
> Accordingly, the Minister of National Revenue must be given broad powers in supervising this regulatory scheme to audit taxpayers' returns and inspect all records which may be relevant to the preparation of these returns. The Minister must be capable of exercising these powers whether or not he has reasonable grounds for believing that a particular taxpayer has breached the Act. Often it will be impossible to determine from the face of the return whether any impropriety has occurred in its preparation. A spot check or a system of random monitoring may be the only way in which the integrity of the tax system can be maintained. If this is the case, and I believe that it is, then it is evident that the Hunter criteria are ill-suited to determine whether a seizure under s. 231(3) of the Income Tax Act is reasonable. The regulatory nature of the legislation and the scheme enacted require otherwise. The need for random monitoring is incompatible with the requirement in Hunter that the person seeking authorization for a search or seizure have reasonable and probable grounds, established under oath, to believe that an offence has been committed. If this Hunter criterion is inapplicable, then so too must the remaining Hunter criteria since they all depend for their vitality upon the need to establish reasonable and probable grounds. For example, there is no need for an impartial arbiter capable of acting judicially since his central role under Hunter is to ensure that the person seeking the authorization has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a particular offence has been committed, that there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the authorization will turn up something relating to that particular offence, and that the authorization only goes so far as to allow the seizure of documents relevant to that particular offence.

Digitized by Google

This is not to say that any and all forms of search and seizure under the Income Tax Act are valid. The state interest in monitoring compliance with the legislation must be weighed against an individual's privacy interest. The greater the intrusion into the privacy interests of an individual, the more likely it will be that safeguards akin to those in Hunter will be required. Thus, when the tax officials seek entry onto the private property of an individual to conduct a search or seizure, the intrusion is much greater than a mere demand for production of documents. The reason for this is that, while a taxpayer may have little expectation of privacy in relation to his business records relevant to the determination of his tax liability, he has a significant privacy interest in the inviolability of his home.

In my opinion, s. 231(3) provides the least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Income Tax Act can be effected. It involves no invasion of a taxpayer's home or business premises. It simply calls for the production of records which may be relevant to the filing of an income tax return. A taxpayer's privacy interest with regard to these documents vis-à-vis the Minister is relatively low. The Minister has no way of knowing whether certain records are relevant until he has had an opportunity to examine them. At the same time, the taxpayer's privacy interest is protected as much as possible since s. 241 of the Act protects the taxpayer from disclosure of his records or the information contained therein to other persons or agencies.

The appellant claims in essence that although subsection 231.2(1) of the Act has been declared constitutionally valid, each notice of requirement issued under that provision must meet the test of relevancy and reasonableness.

The short answer to this contention is that once a statutory provision is declared valid, as was done with respect to subsection 231.2(1) of the Act in McKinlay, the constitutional analysis ends. Only a statutory analysis is then required. It is under this analysis that I now consider the appellant's arguments about relevancy and reasonableness.

Under the Income Tax Act, the Minister is concerned with verifying the tax liability of the taxpayer which is first revealed in the taxpayer's return. It will often be "impossible to determine from the face of the return whether any impropriety has occurred in its preparation".[17] Because of the nature of the conduct regulated by the Income Tax Act, there are, in many cases, no ways of determining whether proscribed conduct has been engaged in, short of studying the process by which a suspected corporation or business has made and implemented its decision.[18] Investigatory mechanisms which force corporations and other businesses to divulge what they and only they can know about their internal affairs are part of the state's interest in the enforcement of the Act.[19]

While an individual or a corporation's interest in having business strategies kept in confidence is recognized,[20] the balancing no doubt favours the state. Wilson J. in McKinlay recognizes that the "Minister has no way of knowing whether certain records are relevant until he has had an opportunity to examine them".[21] There is an ultimate safeguard. Not all of those documents are necessarily admissible against the taxpayer in a court of law or in another proceeding. Only those in accord with the rules of evidence shall be admissible.

Digitized by Google

The fact that the documents in issue were prepared for another forum, namely for providing the CRTC with information required under a rate setting process, does not prevent the Minister from having access to them since they are relevant to the potential tax liability of the taxpayer. Moreover, the fact that they were sealed by order of the CRTC from public access does not prevent the Minister from having access to them when he is engaged in enforcing the Act. These propositions follow from McKinlay.

The notices of requirements constitute the least intrusive means by which effective monitoring of compliance with the Act can be effected.[22] The fact that the Minister used extra-legal means to try to obtain the documents is an irrelevant consideration with respect to the validity of the notices of requirements. The fact of the matter is that those documents were not obtained from the CRTC.

Subsection 231.2(1) is drafted in broad language, but its scope has been reduced through the rules of interpretation[23] to situations where the information sought by the Minister is relevant to the tax liability of some specific person or persons, and when the tax liability of such person or persons is the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry. Given these criteria, I find that no error was committed by the motions judge.

I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

The appellant asked, in the event the appeal is dismissed, that the judgment of this Court be stayed for a period of ninety days so as to allow the appellant to submit an application to the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal to that Court. The respondent agreed. On consent, I would stay this judgment for a period of ninety days. If an application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is filed before the expiry of that period, the stay would stand until the application is disposed of by that Court.

"Alice Desjardins"

J.A.

"I agree

A.J. Stone J.A."

"I agree

A.M. Linden J.A."

Privilege Doesn't Apply to Supporting Financial Transactions of Lawyer

In MNR v. S. Bruce Cornfield et al.[102] the court reviwed the jurisprudence on whether a lawyers account ledgers and resulting cheques and vouchers were subject to solicitor-client and provided:

REASONS FOR ORDER

SNIDER J.

[1] The Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) is asking this Court to issue an Order (Compliance Order), under section 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C, 1985, c. E-15, that would require the Respondent, Mr. S. Bruce Cornfield, to provide certain documents and information to the Minister.

I. Background

[102] 2007 FC 436

Digitized by Google

[2] Mr. Cornfield is a lawyer and a member of the Law Society of British Columbia. His client, Child Construction Ltd. (CCL), is indebted to Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada for GST in the amount of $53,382.29 as of September 15, 2006.

[3] In July 2003, Mr. Cornfield handled the conveyance involving a transfer of property by CCL to a third party.

[4] By letter served on January 6, 2006, the Minister issued a requirement for information (RFI) pursuant to subsection 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, requiring Mr. Cornfield to provide the following information and documents to the Minister (the Information and Documents) within 30 days of the date of service of the RFI:

(a) A statement of adjustments with respect to the sale of the property described as Parcel Identifier 023014806, Strata Lot 105, Section 9, Victoria District, Strata Plan VIS3305, by CCL to Sarah Harper and Richard Allan Stensrud, on July 30, 2003.

(b) A copy of the direction to pay with respect to the property transaction identified in paragraph (a) above.

(c) Copies, front and back, of the cancelled cheques in regards to the distribution of monies with respect to the property transaction identified in paragraph (a) above.

[5] Mr. Cornfield has refused to provide the Minister with the Information and Documents sought by the RFI within 30 days. In a letter to the Vancouver Island Tax Services Office of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), dated January 23, 2006, Mr. Cornfield explained his reasons for not providing the Information and Documents:

> I have been unable to locate my client . . . Absent instructions to the contrary from the client, I must take the position that the requested information may be subject to a solicitor-client privilege. . . . I draw your attention to the Professional Conduct Handbook for B.C. Lawyers that states:
>
> > a lawyer who is required under the Criminal Code, the Income Tax Act, or any other federal or provincial legislation, to produce or surrender a document or provide information which is or may be privileged shall, unless the client waives the privilege, claim a solicitor-client privilege in respect to the document.
>
> Given the above, what you are asking me to do is something that is contrary to my governing society's code of conduct, and compliance may even result in disciplinary action against me.

[6] Upon application, the Law Society of British Columbia (the Law Society) was granted intervener status in this Application by Order of Justice Gauthier dated December 20, 2006. In her Order, Justice Gauthier described the right of the intervener to:

> make representations in writing and orally in respect of all issues concerning solicitor-client privilege raised in this application including the procedures which a Court should follow in considering an order for production of documents in the possession of a lawyer and the protection of solicitor-client privilege in the face of a demand for production of documents by the applicant.

[7] Written and oral submissions were made by the Minister and the Law Society.

Digitized by Google

II. Issues

[8] The overarching issue in this application is whether the Compliance Order should issue to require Mr. Cornfield to produce the Information and Documents. To respond, two questions must be addressed:

1. Are the Information and Documents, in this case, subject to solicitor-client privilege?
2. Does s. 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act provide adequate protection to the rights of the lawyer's client (or former client) to claim solicitor-client privilege? And, if not, should the Federal Court consider adding certain procedural safeguards such as a requirement to serve notice on the client?

[9] As I understand the submissions of the Intervenor, they are not seeking to require the suggested procedures be applied to this particular case. Thus, if I determine that the Information and Documents are not subject to solicitor-client privilege and that the other requirements of s. 289.1 have been met, the Compliance Order will issue.

III. Analysis

A. What is the relevant statutory framework?

[10] In brief, the relevant provisions of the Excise Tax Act operate in the following manner. The full text of these provisions is set out in Appendix A to these reasons. Almost identical provisions are contained in the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.).

[11] The Minister is authorized, pursuant to s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, to require a person to provide any requested information or documents, upon notice. It is important to note that the Minister's authority is not restricted to the taxpayer. Third parties may be served with requests for information. The only stipulation is that the purpose be "related to the administration or enforcement of this Part, including the collection of any amount payable or remittable under this Part".

[12] Where a request for information is made and the person has failed to comply, s. 289.1 provides the Minister with a means to enforce compliance with s. 289. Specifically, s. 289.1(1) allows the Minister to seek, by way of "summary application", a court order requiring the person to provide the information or document sought under s. 289. To issue the order – commonly referred to as a Compliance Order – the judge must be satisfied that: (a) the person was required under s. 288 or s. 289 to provide the information; and (b) "in the case of information or a document, the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege (within the meaning of subsection 293(1))".

[13] The definition of solicitor-client privilege, in s. 293(1) of the Excise Tax Act, is as follows:

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional	«privilège des communications entre client et avocat » Droit qu'une personne peut posséder, devant une cour supérieure de la province où l'affaire prend naissance, de refuser de divulguer une communication entre elle et son avocat en confidence professionnelle. Toutefois,

Digitized by Google

confidence, except that, for the purposes of this section, an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting invoice, voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.	pour l'application du présent article, le relevé comptable d'un avocat, y compris une facture ou une pièce justificative ou tout chèque, ne doit pas être considéré comme une communication de cette nature.

[14] Under s. 289.1(2), the person must be given notice of the application at least five clear days before it is heard. Subsection 289.1(3) gives the judge hearing the application the discretion to impose such conditions on the order as the judge considers appropriate.

B. What has been the practice of the Federal Court in these matters?

[15] The Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act contain an explicit procedure for bringing compliance order applications. As noted above, s. 289.1 (1) of the Excise Tax Act provides that the compliance order is to be obtained "on summary application by the Minister". The same requirement for a "summary application" is set out in s. 231.7 of the Income Tax Act. In that context, Prothonotary Lafrenière of this Court provided a format for bringing such applications in Minister of National Revenue v. Norris, 2002 CarswellNat 1250, [2002] 3 C.T.C. 346. In Norris, the Prothonotary authorized the Minister of National Revenue to institute proceedings under s. 231.7 of the Income Tax Act by way of motion under Rule 358 et seq. of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (the Rules), rather than by way of application under Rule 300 et seq. of the Rules. As stated by Prothonotary Lafrenière in Norris, above, at paras. 5-7:

> Although a proceeding under subsection 231.7 of the Income Tax Act must be brought by way of notice of application, the procedure set out in the Federal Court Rules, 1998 which governs applications appears ill-suited for summary disposition of such matters. Consequently, in this particular case and subject to any further directions or order of the Court, the following procedure should be followed in the proposed proceeding under subsection 231.7.
>
> The Applicant shall file a Notice of Application in Form 301, to be treated by the Registry as both an originating document and notice of motion, which shall:
>
> (a) set out the day, time and place at which the application will be heard, either at a General Sittings of the Court or such special sitting date as may have been appointed by the Judicial Administrator upon informal request by the Applicant:
>
> (b) be amended by deleting any references to Rule 300 et seq.;
>
> (c) contain a notice in capital and bold characters which reads as follows: "The Respondent who wishes to oppose the application shall serve a Respondent's Record and file three copies of it not later than 2:00 p.m. on the last business day before the hearing of the application."; and
>
> (d) be accompanied by the appropriate filing fee.
>
> Once the Notice of Application has been filed, the Applicant shall personally serve the Respondent with an Application Record

Digitized by Google

> containing a table of contents, the notice of application, each supporting affidavit and documentary exhibit and the Applicant's memorandum of fact and law. The Applicant shall file three copies of the Application Record, and proof of service thereof in accordance with ss. 237.1 of the Income Tax Act, forthwith and in any event no later than two clear days before the return date of the hearing of the application.

[16] Although one may argue that the Order was limited to the particular case before the Prothonotary, the procedure that he outlined has been followed, for compliance orders under both the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act, since 2002.

[17] Consistent with the direction provided by Prothonotary Lafrenière and with the notice provisions set out in s. 289.1(2) of the Excise Tax Act, the Minister's practice is to serve notice on "the person against whom the order is sought". Thus, the Minister, following s. 289.1(2) of the Excise Tax Act and the direction of Prothonotary Lafrenière, has not followed Rule 303 of the Rules and named, as a Respondent, the affected taxpayer as a "person directly affected by the order sought in the application".

C. Are the Information and Documents sought in this case subject to solicitor-client privilege?

[18] I turn now to the first issue before me. Specifically, should a Compliance Order be issued? Resolution of this issue requires that I first determine whether the Information and Documents, in this case, are subject to solicitor-client privilege.

[19] In recent decisions, the Courts have consistently affirmed that, in the context of a real estate transaction, cheques from a solicitor's account and a statement of adjustments are not subject to solicitor-client privilege (In the Matter of the Legal Profession Act and Martin K. Wirick, 2005 BCSC 1821, 51 B.C.L.R. (4th) 193, [2005] B.C.J. No. 2878 (B.C. Sup. Ct.) (QL); Minister of National Revenue v. Vlug, 2006 FC 86, 2006 D.T.C. 6285, [2006] F.C.J. No. 142 (F.C.) (QL); Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Reddy, 2006 FC 277, 146 A.C.W.S. (3d) 568, [2006] F.C.J. No. 348 (F.C.) (QL); Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, 2005 FC 1538, [2006] 1 C.T.C. 113, [2005] F.C.J. No. 1907 (F.C.) (QL)). More specifically, the Federal Court in Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, Vlug and Reddy held that such documents and information requested under the Excise Tax Act or the parallel provisions of the Income Tax Act are not subject to solicitor-client privilege.

[20] Given this clear authority, there is no question that the Information and Documents requested in the RFI are not the subject of solicitor-client privilege.

D. Should the procedures currently used by the Court be amended?

[21] The Law Society has intervened in this application with a concern that they describe as the "greater good". They assert that, once a lawyer is served with an RFI, the lawyer is in an immediate conflict between their duty to their client vis-à-vis privilege and the duty to comply with the statute. At a minimum, the Law Society requests that this Court direct the Minister to take the following steps in all such compliance order applications:

1. Name the taxpayer as a Respondent to the application pursuant to Rule 303 of the Rules, thereby giving the taxpayer immediate rights to assert any claims of privilege; and
2. Require the sealing of the documents and their submission to the Court.

[22] While acknowledging (I think) that the Information and Documents in this case are not subject to solicitor-client privilege, the Law Society argues that there may be circumstances where this type of document or information held by a lawyer may be privileged. The Law Society submits that the lawyer's client is the only party who can waive that privilege. They refer the Court to certain provisions of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook of the Law Society dealing with "Confidential Information". In particular, paragraphs 13 and 14 are entitled "Disclosure required by law" and provide as follows:

Digitized by Google

> 13. A lawyer who is required by law or by order of a court to disclose a client's affairs shall not divulge more information than is necessary.
>
> 14. A lawyer who is required under the Criminal Code, the Income Tax Act or any other federal or provincial legislation, to produce or surrender a document or provide information which is or may be privileged shall, unless the client waives the privilege, claim a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document.

[23] In general, I would not presume to interpret the rules of the Law Society. However, in this case, two of these rules have been raised as a reason for changing the practice of the Federal Court. Accordingly, I feel that I should respond to the arguments before me. And, in my view, there are a number of problems with those arguments.

[24] In the face of consistent and clear direction from this and other courts that documents in the nature of those described in the RFI are not subject to solicitor-client privilege, it is difficult to see how paragraph 14 of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook of the Law Society can have any applicability. Paragraph 14 applies only where the document or information "is or may be privileged". If the Information and Documents do not satisfy that test, paragraph 14 is not engaged.

[25] Since the Information and Documents under discussion in this application – and, more generally, as provided for in the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act – are not privileged, there is nothing for the client to waive. The provisions of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act are very clear. Upon a request, the lawyer must provide the requested information, unless it is subject to solicitor-client privilege. Whether one uses the definition in the statutes or a common law definition of solicitor-client privilege, the law has established that accounting records, including any supporting invoice, voucher or cheque, are not protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[26] Further, the position of the Law Society fails to take into account the difference between confidential and privileged documents. As acknowledged by counsel for the Law Society, privileged documents form a subset of documents that are "confidential". All documents in the possession of a lawyer may be described as confidential but only those that satisfy the test for a claim of solicitor-client privilege may be withheld pursuant to the provisions of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. If paragraph 14 of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook is to apply to documents which, in the opinion of the courts, are not subject to privilege, then lawyers would be obliged to obtain the waiver from the client of all documents held by the lawyer for a client. This ignores the intent of paragraphs 13 and 14 which, on my reading, permit the disclosure of non-privileged information where a lawyer is required by law to produce or surrender a document or provide information.

[27] The Law Society argues that only the client – and not the lawyer – has the right to decide whether a document may be privileged and whether to claim that privilege. While this is no doubt correct, it appears to me that, where the law is clear that certain information is not privileged, such a right simply does not arise.

[28] The Law Society raises the problem that sometimes these types of documents may contain notations or other information that may be privileged. This is not the case with the Information and Documents that are the subject of this application; the Law Society does not assert that the documents at issue in this application are annotated. Further, this situation has never arisen to the knowledge of the parties to this application. However, I acknowledge that this situation could arise in a future case. The simple response to this concern is that a financial or accounting record that contains privileged information in the form of a notation is not a document that satisfies the definition of non-privileged information or documents. A Compliance Order may only be issued if the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege, either pursuant to s. 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act or under principles of common law. If such circumstances were to arise, the statute and the Federal Court procedures for obtaining a Compliance Order would, in my view, suffice to provide the important protection for privileged documents and information.

Digitized by Google

[29] I also note that the judge hearing the application for a Compliance Order may impose any conditions in respect of the order that the judge considers appropriate (Excise Tax Act, s. 289.1(3)). Further service requirements could be imposed. Since the submissions of the Law Society are based on hypothetical situations, it is impossible to address every possible scenario.

[30] Lastly, I turn to the Law Society's submission that the Minister should be required to follow Rule 303(1) and name the taxpayer as a Respondent. In their view, the taxpayer is a "person directly affected by the order sought in the application". The problem with this argument is, first, that the Court, in Norris, above, expressly determined that this Rule would not apply. Second, and more importantly, the summary application procedure set out in the Excise Tax Act requires service only on the party from whom the information is sought.

[31] In sum, I am not persuaded that the evidentiary record in this case establishes a need for further procedural steps for the protection of solicitor-client privilege. More generally, there is no evidence that the current procedure has resulted in a breach of the fundamental legal rights of solicitor-client privilege. There is no need, at this time, to add a requirement to serve the taxpayer or to provide a sealed copy of the documents to the Court, unless such procedures are warranted on the facts of a particular application.

IV. Conclusion

[32] In conclusion, I am satisfied that:

(a) the Respondent was served with the RFI as required under s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act;

(b) the Respondent did not provide the Information and Documents sought by the Minister; and

(c) the Information and Documents are not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege.

[33] Accordingly, the Compliance Order will issue. Further, the Court will provide no direction on the procedure for making application for Compliance Orders and affirms the procedure set out in the Excise Tax Act and in Norris, above.

[34] Since the Minister did not seek costs, no costs will be awarded.

"Judith A. Snider"

Judge

See also R. v. Stewart McKelvey & Dee - 2007 NBQB 081 for: D E C I S I O N

RUSSELL, J.

[1] In this application the Crown seeks an Order, inter alia:

… requiring Sheriff Keith Ball to bring the seized documents marked with the affidavit of Britt Dysart which was provided to him by Veronica Hatt on September 1, 2006 before this

Digitized by Google

Honourable Court at a specified date and time for the purpose of permitting this Honourable Court to examine the contents of the box, hear representations of the applicant and respondents, and make a determination of whether a solicitor/client privilege exists;
a review of the documents by this Honourable Court to ensure that the only person holding a potential solicitor/client privilege in the documents is Mark Dee;
(e) a determination by this Honourable Court as to the existence of any solicitor/client privilege in the seized documents and consequent Orders:
for the return of solicitor/client privileged documents to the law firm of Stewart McKelvey Stirling Scales; and allowing the applicant herein to make use in accordance with the law of the documents to which no solicitor/client privilege attaches.
[2] The background of the matter is that on August 21, 2006 an officer of the CCRA swore an Information to Obtain Production Order and consequently obtained such an order for the premises of the law firm of Stewart McKelvey Stirling and Scales. The Production Order was served on a lawyer of that firm at their Fredericton address. The Production Order, obtained pursuant to the provisions of Section 487.012 of the Criminal Code, "authorized the production of records pertaining to the estate of Joan Dee including correspondence, memorandum, and other documentation including letters of directions, statement of adjustments and statement of trust funds, and banking records and copies thereof, including cancelled cheques drawn on Royal Bank of Canada Account Number 00884-003-1252154, Petrie Richmond Goss "Trust". On September 1, 2006 the lawyer provided the CCRA officer with a box of documents. She immediately turned them over to Sheriff Keith Ball pending this application to determine whether solicitor-client privilege applied to any of the documents.
[3] At the hearing of the matter Counsel for Mark Dee appeared and argued the documents were subject to solicitor-client privilege. In the Information to Obtain Production Orders the CCRA officer alleged that she has reasonable grounds to believe Mark Dee has committed the following offence: Mark Dee, in his role as executor of the Estate of Joan Dee, has committed an offence as defined by paragraph 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act by willfully evading the payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act upon the Estate of Joan Dee for the 1998 taxation year.
[4] It should be noted he has not been charged with that or any other offence on the material before me. It is also apparent that the named law firm acted with respect to the estate of Joan Dee.
[5] Following argument I retained the documents received from Sheriff Keith Ball and reviewed them individually.

THE LAW
[6] In Descouteaux v Mierzwinksi [1982] 1 S.C.R. 860, the Supreme Court of Canada in quoting from Wigmore said: 2007 NBQB 81 (CanLII)

"Where legal advice of any kind is sought from a professional legal adviser in his capacity as such, the communication relating to that purpose, made in confidence by the client, are at his instance permanently protected from disclosure by himself or by the legal adviser, except the protection be waived."
[7] In Stevens v Canada (Prime Minister) [1998] 4 F.C. 89 C.A., Mr. Justice Linden for the Court wrote at paragraph 15:
It will be seen that Canadian law has sought to strike an appropriate balance between openness and secrecy by creating two exceptions to the privilege. One exception, which will be discussed later, is for communications which are themselves criminal or which counsel a criminal act (e.g. where a lawyer advises a client to conceal evidence). The second exception, which will be analysed in depth later, relates to that information which is not a communication but is rather evidence of an act done by counsel or is a mere statement of fact. This prevents a stifling of the discovery process which would take place if a client could, by merely communicating a fact to his or her lawyer, prevent the discovery of that fact. Similarly, a person is not immune from discovery with regard to certain transactions merely because they were performed by counsel. Both exceptions acknowledge that tension involved in this area of the law, and both accept that justice is better served by lifting the privilege in those cases.

Digitized by Google

[8] And at paragraph 25:

Perhaps the most important distinction that needs to be highlighted is that it is only communications that are protected by the privilege. Acts of counsel or mere statements of fact are not protected. In Susan Hosiery Ltd. v Minister of National Revenue, Jackett P., after reviewing the rules relating to solicitor-client privilege stated:

"What is important to note about both of these rules is that they do not afford a privilege against the discovery of facts that are or may be relevant to the determination of the facts in issue. What is privileged is the communications or working papers that came into existence by reason of the desire to obtain a legal opinion or legal assistance in the one case and the materials created for the lawyer's brief in the other case. The facts are documents that happen to be reflected in such communications or materials are not privileged from discovery if, otherwise, the party would be bound to give discovery of them."

The general rationale for not protecting matters of fact or acts done is the detrimental effect it would have on litigation. For example, a person cannot avail himself or herself of the privilege by simply communicating a fact to a lawyer or allowing the lawyer to perform an act in his or her place.

[9] And at paragraphs 41 through 44:

¶41 In Law Society of P.E.I. v. P.E.I. (Attorney General), the R.C.M.P. attempted to seize documents in the possession of a lawyer relating to trust ledgers, general ledgers, and bank reconciliation ledgers which pertained to the dealings of a number of the lawyer's clients. MacDonald C.J.T.D. determined:

It is the communications between the client and his lawyer that are privileged. The trust ledgers, general ledgers and bank reconciliation ledgers are not communications between the solicitor and the client. These documents form part of the solicitor's records and are reports of acts, not communications. Privilege does not attach to these documents.

¶42 Thus, the jurisprudence in this area is not really in conflict. It merely reflects the existence of a broad exception to the scope of the privilege, namely, that it is only communications which are protected. The acts of counsel or mere statements of fact are not protected. This is an important balancing mechanism which, along with the prohibition against protecting communications which are themselves criminal, takes into account the public interest inherent in the proper administration of justice.

¶43 Where a lawyer is involved in the dealings of his or her client, like the disposition of funds held in trust for the client, as in Greymac, or the execution of an agreement for the purchase and sale of property, the existence or contents of these acts are not protected. The lawyer, in those situations, is not in the process of giving advice to the client, but is more like a witness to an objective state of affairs.

¶44 This explains the apparent conflict between the reasons of Southey J. in Greymac and Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada. In the former case the trust account was determined not to be protected by the privilege, while the solicitor's accounts in the latter case were held to be privileged. The statement of account is privileged because it is integral to the seeking, formulating and giving of legal advice. The trust account ledger is not protected because it relates to acts done by counsel. [10] I am satisfied this reflects the state of the law in claims of solicitor-client privilege and have reviewed the documents having regard to these principles.

Digitized by Google

DISPOSITION

[11] I was provided an accordian file which was wrapped and sealed. It contained 7 buff file folders each of which contained documents, letters, memos and other written material. The file folders have been replaced in the accordian file and resealed.

That packet will, pursuant to Section 488.1(4)(d)(ii) of the Criminal Code, be delivered to Sheriff Keith Ball who will deliver it to Veronica Hatt, the officer of the CCRA who seized the documents. This packet contains only material that I have concluded does not attract solicitor-client privilege.

[12] The material that I conclude was privileged has been removed from the file folders and placed in a large envelope which I have sealed. Pursuant to Section 488.1(4)(d)(i) that envelope will be returned to the Respondent by Sheriff Ball.

David H. Russell, J.C.Q.B.

See also

20110224

Docket: T-88-09 Citation: 2011 FC 224

Ottawa, Ontario, February 24, 2011

PRESENT: The Honourable Mr. Justice Mandamin BETWEEN:

TAXPRO PROFESSIONAL CORPORATION AND HARI NESATHURAI

Applicant and

THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Respondent

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT AND JUDGMENT

[1] The Applicant, a lawyer and his professional corporation, seeks, among other remedies, an Order setting aside the Respondent's requirement to provide information and documents relating to the Applicant's client, a Canadian corporate taxpayer, 1082955 Ontario Limited.

[2] An officer of the Canada Revenue Agency issued the requirement pursuant to paragraphs 231.2(1)(a) and of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c.1 as amended (ITA) by a letter dated December 22, 2008. The Applicant is required by the legislation to comply.

[3] The Applicant claims the information and documents sought by the Respondent are covered by solicitor- client privilege and brings this application.

[4] The Respondent asks the Court to either dismiss the application or require the Applicant to prepare a list of documents over which solicitor-client privilege is claimed to be reviewed and decided upon by the Court.

[5] I have decided that the documents are reviewable by the Court in order to determine whether solicitor-client privilege applies.

Background

[6] Mr. Nesathurai is a lawyer licensed to practice law in Ontario. The bulk of his practice is tax law. 1082955 Ontario Limited (108 Ltd.) is his client.

[7] Mr. Roy Crooker is an officer of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA). He began an audit of 108 Ltd.'s 2005 taxation year and later expanded his audit to include the 2003 and 2004 taxation years.

Digitized by Google

[8] The impetus for the CRA requirement for information and documents relate to payments made by 108 Ltd. to Specialty Insurance Limited (SIL), an entity organized in St. Lucia, West Indies, in the years 2003, 2004 and 2005. The payments were made for the purpose of acquiring three separate Group Sickness and Accident Insurance Polices from SIL. The CRA alleges the same amounts, less an accommodation fee, were loaned back to 108 Ltd. by Continental Trust Corporation (CTC), a Bermudian corporate entity related to SIL.

[9] The December 22, 2008 s. 231.2(1) requirement under the ITA was sent to the Applicant for information and documents with a listing of items sought. A similar request was delivered to the Applicant's client, 108 Ltd., which responded on February 11, 2009 by providing the CRA with the documents and information not covered by the solicitor-client privilege claimed. 108 Ltd. did not waive solicitor-client privilege with respect to the documents the Applicant claimed to be covered by privilege.

[10] The remaining items at issue from the December 22, 2008 requirement are items A, G and H. from the original list. They read:

Any and all planning documents or information with respect to 1082955 Ontario Limited (1082955) and the purchase of the insurance premiums from Specialty Insurance Limited (SIL) and the loans from Continental Trust Corporation Limited (CTC).

Any and all memorandum, correspondence, letters, emails, notes, records of discussions or any other kind of document, whether in paper format, electronic format or any other type of format between any of 1082955, Hari S. Nesathurai, SIL or CTC or any other third party with respect to SIL, GSAIP or CTC;

Any and all documents or information of any type whatsoever attached to any correspondence between Hari Nesathurai and 1082955; …

[11] The Applicant has placed before the Court a sealed envelope labelled: "Confidential Documents – Solicitor- Client Privileged Materials: Not to Be Opened Until Hearing of this Application".

Legislation

[12] The Income Tax Act, (1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)) provides:

231.2 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act (including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person), of a comprehensive tax information exchange agreement between Canada and another country or jurisdiction that is in force and has effect or, for greater certainty, of a tax treaty with another country, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as stipulated in the notice, any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or any document.

…

232. (1) In this section,

"judge" means a judge of a superior court having jurisdiction in the province where the matter arises or a judge of the Federal Court;

"lawyer" means, in the province of Quebec, an advocate or notary and, in any other province, a barrister or solicitor;

"officer" means a person acting under the authority conferred by or under sections 231.1 to 231.5;

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.

Digitized by Google

…

An application under paragraph 232(4)(c) shall be heard in camera, and on the application

the judge may, if the judge considers it necessary to determine the question, inspect the document and, if the judge does so, the judge shall ensure that it is repackaged and resealed; and the judge shall decide the matter summarily and, if the judge is of the opinion that the client has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order the release of the document to the lawyer, and if the judge is of the opinion that the client does not have a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, shall order that the custodian deliver the document to the officer or some other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was seized and placed in custody under subsection 232(3), or that the lawyer make the document available for inspection or examination by the officer or other person designated by the Commissioner of Revenue, in the case of a document that was retained under subsection 232(3.1), and the judge shall, at the same time, deliver concise reasons in which the judge shall identify the document without divulging the details thereof.

(emphasis added)

Issue

[13] The Applicant identifies a single issue: Does solicitor-client privilege protect the documents from production?

[14] The Respondent frames the issue as whether the Minister properly issued a requirement for information documents to the Applicant.

Analysis

[15] Pursuant to paragraphs 231.2(1)(a) and (b), the Minister may require that any person provide any information or any document for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the ITA. This requirement is broad, limited only to any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act.

[16] The Applicant contends the Respondent's requirement is overly broad, as demonstrated by the words "Any and all …" and amounts to a fishing expedition. But, even if it was not, the Applicant contends the information and documents are protected from production because of solicitor-client privilege.

[17] The Applicant submits the applicable principle is that articulated in Descoteaux v Mierzwinski, [1982] 1 SCR 860 (Descoteaux) by the Supreme Court of Canada:

In summary, a lawyer's client is entitled to have all communications made with a view to obtaining legal advice kept confidential. Whether communications are made to the lawyer himself or to employees, and whether they deal with matters of an administrative nature such as financial means or with the actual nature of the legal problem, all information which a person must provide in order to obtain legal advice and which is given in confidence for that purpose enjoys the privileges attached to confidentiality. This confidentiality attaches to all communications made within the framework of the solicitor-client relationship, which arises as soon as the potential client takes the first steps, and consequently even before the formal retainer is established.

[18] The Applicant cites from Vern Krishna, The Fundamentals of Income Tax Law, 7th ed.

Digitized by Google

(Carswell: 2009) for the proposition that the tax plans are included as documents over which privilege should be recognized. That text reads:

For tax purposes, "privilege" means the right that a person has to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between client and lawyer in a professional confidence.

In general terms, the following types of documents are covered by solicitor-client privilege:

Correspondence between solicitor and client

Opinion letters

Tax plans, reorganizations, agreements of purchase and sale and other agreements.

[19] The Applicant submits that he has tendered affidavit evidence in support of the claim for solicitor-client privilege and the Respondent must consequently advance its own evidence refuting the claim of privilege. Since the latter has not, the Applicant submits the solicitor-client privilege claim should be sustained: Watt v Baycrest Hospital, [1991] OJ No. 1107 at p. 2 (Gen. Div.) (Watt).

[20] The Applicant also points out solicitor-client privilege is a constitutional right recognized by sections 7 and 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being schedule B to the Canada Act, 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11. The Applicant submits that the privilege is absolute and will only yield in defined circumstances. It does not involve a balancing of interests on a case by case basis: Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v Canada (Attorney General) 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 SCR 209 at para 36 (Lavallee, Rackel & Heinz).

[21] The Applicant submits the Respondent is not entitled to any documents beyond those already provided by 108 Ltd. and, more specifically, the Respondent is not entitled to any documents in the Applicant's possession that are protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[22] The Respondent states that s. 231.2 requires the production of information and documents for any purpose related to the administration and enforcement of the ITA. The Respondent argues this is necessary in a self-reporting tax system since the Minister must be given broad powers to audit a taxpayer's returns, including inspection of all records which may be relevant to the preparation of those returns. Unless the material is subject to solicitor-client privilege, the Minister is entitled to review anything which may be relevant in verifying the tax liability of a taxpayer under audit: R v McKinlay Transport Ltd, [1990] 1 SCR 627 at para 33 (McKinlay Transport). I agree with this submission.

[23] The Respondent asserts it is not seeking documents protected by solicitor-client privilege. Rather, the Respondent "... seeks production of ... those documents in the Applicant's file that are not subject to solicitor-client privilege because they pertain to acts of counsel or statements of fact that are located in Mr. Nesathurai's file or are document[s] exchanged between the Applicant and a third party".

[24] The Respondent argues acts of counsel or mere statements of fact, as well as communications with third parties are not subject to solicitor-client privilege. While statements of account are generally held to be privileged, trust ledgers and other financial reports of that type are not privileged: Stevens v Canada (Prime Minister) [1998] 4 FC 89 (FCA) at paras 27, 42-43 (Stevens).

[25] The Respondent adds the party asserting solicitor-client privilege must provide evidence the documents are privileged. It submits that, other than making an assertion that all the documents in his file is covered by solicitor-client privilege, the Applicant has not provided any evidence to support that statement. Further, the Respondent has not been able to make any assessment of the validity of that assertion as the Applicant has declined to provide a list of the documents over which privilege is asserted.

Digitized by Google

[26] The starting point for any analysis is section 231 of the ITA, in particular:

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.

[27] The classic definition of solicitor-client privilege can be found in Wigmore on Evidence (McNaughton rev. 1961) at para 2292:

Where legal advice of any kind is sought from a professional legal advisor in his capacity as such, the communications relating to that purpose, made in confidence by the client, are at his instance permanently protected from disclosure by himself or by the legal advisor except the protection be waived.

[28] Solicitor-client privilege is one of the few nearly absolute class privileges recognized at common law:

v McClure, [2001] 1 SCR 445 at paras 27-28.

[29] The Supreme Court has recognized solicitor-client privilege as a right protected by sections 7 and 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter). In Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz, the Supreme Court declared a section of the Criminal Code permitting searches of law offices violated the section 8 of the Charter. The Court wrote at para. 49:

Solicitor-client privilege is a rule of evidence, an important civil and legal right and a principle of fundamental justice in Canadian law. While the public has an interest in effective criminal investigation, it has no less an interest in maintaining the integrity of the solicitor-client relationship. Confidential communications to a lawyer represent an important exercise of the right to privacy, and they are central to the administration of justice in an adversarial system. Unjustified, or even accidental infringements of the privilege erode the public's confidence in the fairness of the criminal justice system. This is why all efforts must be made to protect such confidences.

[30] At the same time, a distinction must be recognized between the lawyer's ethical duty to keep matters concerning a client confidential and the concept of solicitor-client privilege. The distinction between confidentiality and privilege was recognized in Solosky v Canada, [1980] 1 SCR 821, (1979) 50 CCC (2d) 495 (Solosky), at p. 502:

... it is not every item of correspondence passing between solicitor and client to which privilege attaches, for only those in which the client seeks the advice of counsel in his professional capacity, or in which counsel gives advice, are protected.

[31] In R v B, [1995] 3 BCLR (3d) 363, 5 WWR 374 (BCSC) Justice Thackray canvassed the law concerning this distinction. His comments at paras 26 and 27 are apt:

I find helpful the following passage from Sopinka, Lederman and Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (Toronto: Butterworths, 1992) [pp. 626-27]:

Although confidentiality is the cornerstone for the protection of communications within particular relationships, confidentiality alone is not sufficient to attract privilege. Confidentiality may well attract other legal and ethical rights and obligations but it does not have its foundation in the evidentiary doctrine of privilege. Evidence law does not concern itself with the ethical requirement upon a professional such as a lawyer to hold in strict confidence all information acquired in the course of his or her professional relationship concerning the business and affairs of a client. The lawyer has a professional duty not to divulge such information without the client's approval or unless required by law to do so. This ethical rule is wider than the evidentiary solicitor-client privilege and applies without regard to the nature of the source of the information or the fact that others may share the knowledge. Where there is a stronger public interest in disclosure, it will override the professional duties of confidence. [Footnotes omitted.]

Digitized by Google

In spite of the difficulty in defining the concepts of confidentiality as distinct from privilege, I am satisfied that there is a distinction. It is not enough, in my opinion, to establish only confidentiality in order to effect non-disclosure. It is only those documents that are privileged that are subject to non-disclosure.

[32] There are also limits to solicitor-client privilege. It does not apply if the privilege has been waived. Further, there are exceptions: privilege does not apply to communications in which legal advice is neither sought or offered, nor where the communication is not intended to be confidential and not where a client seeks the assistance or advice of a lawyer in order to facilitate the commission of a crime or a fraud: Solosky, above.

[33] In Descoteaux, the Supreme Court of Canada identified limitations to solicitor-client privilege at para 71:

… This confidentiality attaches to all communications made within the framework of the solicitor-client relationship, which arises as soon as the potential client takes the first steps, and consequently even before the formal retainer is established.

(emphasis added)

[34] Finally, paragraph 231.2(1) of the ITA provides a statutory clarification of the limitation with respect to a lawyer's records: "… except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication."

[35] An issue may also arise with documents exchanged between a lawyer and third parties. In Copthorne Holdings Ltd v Canada, 2005 TCC 491 (Copthorne Holdings), a Tax Court case, Mr. Chief Justice Rip considered whether privilege attached to four types of communications between a lawyer and others. Of relevance are communications between a law firm and third parties. The Court found if the third party was an agent of the law office, then the same privilege that applies to employees of the firm applies to agents. The Court relied in part on para. 14.71 of J. Sopinka, S.N. Lederman, and A.W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (1999):

A lawyer, in the ordinary course of his or her practice, utilizes employees such as articling students, law clerks and secretaries. Communication to such agents for the purpose of facilitating the obtaining of legal advice is equally protected. The same can be said about the client's agents, so long as they are employed as his or her agents for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. That is so, notwithstanding that the agent may add something to the communication as a product of his or her own skill. [...] In Goodman & Carr v. Minister of National Revenue, an accountant's opinion was sent to the client's lawyer at the client's request. It was held not to be privileged because the agent was not an agent for the client seeking legal advice, but was really offering his own opinion. Because these communications through agents are not normally made in a litigious atmosphere, this situation must be distinguished from the case where a third party is retained to obtain facts or to make a report to assist the client or his or her solicitor in litigation.

(emphasis added)

[36] Another distinction arises in Maranda v Richer, 2003 SCC 67 (Maranda) where the Supreme Court drew the distinction between facts and communications in paragraph 30:

…The protection conferred by the privilege covers primarily acts of communication engaged in for the purpose of enabling the client to communicate and obtain the necessary information or advice in relation to his or her conduct, decisions or representation in the courts. The distinction is made in an effort to avoid facts that have an independent existence being inadmissible in evidence (Stevens, supra, at para. 25). It recognizes that not everything that happens in the solicitor-client relationship falls within the ambit of privileged communication, as has been held in cases where it was found that counsel was acting not in that capacity but simply as a conduit for transfers of funds (Re Ontario Securities Commission and Greymac Credit Corp. (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 328 (Div. Ct.); Joubert, supra). (emphasis added)

Digitized by Google

[37] In Westra Law Office (RE), 2009 ABQB 391 (Westra) the court held that a signed agreement, such as a loan or a mortgage, is not privileged because they are "actions rather than communications directly related to the seeking, formulating or giving of legal advice." That case involved three parties to a mortgage, purchaser (Gours), seller (Sharma) and mortgage company (ResMor). The Court wrote at para 43:

"Mr. Sharma has not demonstrated solicitor-client privilege over the documents held by Westra Law office pertaining to this real estate transaction as against the Gours or ResMor. The parties to the real estate transaction all used the services of Mr. Westra to effectuate the deal and each is entitled to be privy to the information he had respecting the arrangements pertaining to the others. The communications are not confidential as between the parties, so as to meet that condition of solicitor- client privilege, although they are confidential vis a vis the outside world. However, the Gours and ResMor have waived any privilege that did exist as against the outside world. Documents that are communications between Mr. Westra and any of the three parties must be disclosed on that basis." (emphasis added)

[38] The questions when presented with the documents at issue will be whether or not they constitute a communication or some statement of fact. In Belgravia Investments Ltd v R, 2002 FCT 649, Justice Heneghan stated at paras 44-46:

In Susan Hosiery Ltd., supra, the Exchequer Court distinguished between documents and the facts contained in those documents, for the purpose of recognizing privilege. President Jackett expressed himself on this point as follows at pages 5282-5283:

…the letter or statement itself is privileged but the facts contained therein or the documents from which those facts were drawn are not privileged from discovery if, apart from the facts having been reflected in the privilege documents, they would have been subject to discovery. For example, the financial facts of a business would not fall within the privilege merely because they had been set out in a particular way as requested by a solicitor for purposes of litigation, but the statement so prepared would be privileged.

This statement of principle means that although certain documents may be protected against disclosure, facts contained in those documents, which otherwise may be discoverable, are not protected.

Furthermore, no automatic privilege attaches to documents which are not otherwise privileged simply because they come into the hands of a party's lawyer. In General Accident Assurance Ltd. v. Chrusz (1998), 37 O.R. (3d) 790 (Ont. Div. Ct.) at page 796 (reversed on other grounds (2000), 45 O.R. (3d) 321 (Ont. C.A.)), the Court said "An original document that is clothed with no privilege does not acquire privilege simply because it gets into the hands of a solicitor."

[38] The first question I have to address is how to proceed. The Applicant has provided an affi davit upon which he was cross-examined. Since he has declined to present a list with information concerning the documents for which he asserts privilege, his evidence does not establish any or all the documents are covered by solicitor-client privilege. Not surprisingly, the Respondent has also provided insufficient evidence that any or all the documents in the Applicant's possession are not covered by privilege. In my view, neither Applicant nor Respondent has put sufficient evidence before me to resolve this issue on their submissions alone. In result, it is necessary that I examine the documents themselves to ascertain whether they are covered by solicitor-client privilege in accordance with the principles discussed above.

Digitized by Google

Documents under Solicitor-Client Privilege

[39] The Applicant has provided within his sealed envelope a numbered listing of documents and descriptions which, considering paragraph 232(5), I will follow without the accompanying description.

[40] I consider the following documents to be covered by solicitor-client privilege, and they may not be disclosed without the client's waiver or consent. My reason for finding privilege follows the listing of the exhibit numbers.

Exhibit Author Recipient Date

1

Hari S. Nesathurai ("HSN") Darko Vranich/Vrancor (the Client)

June 22, 2004

[41] The cover letter, legal opinion and appended documents prepared for 108 Ltd. are privileged legal advice. 108 Ltd. has not waived privilege for these documents.

2

HSN

Colin Hames of Continental Trust Corporation Limited June 20, 2003

[42] The cover letter to Colon Hanes of CTC conveys the legal opinion and appended documents for 108 Ltd. prepared in 2003. The Applicant testified in cross examination he acted for 108 Ltd., SIL and CTC. This legal opinion would not be privileged as between 108 Ltd., SIL and CTC but is privileged in regard to outside persons unless waived by one of the three clients. As there is no evidence of waiver by 108 Ltd, SIL or CTC, this document remains privileged.

7-30

HSN and Tyler McDiarmid Tyler McDiarmid and HSN

June 18, 2007 to November 24, 2008

[43] The initial email correspondence beginning with the Exhibit 7 involves a request for information which arguably relates to financial information rather than legal questions. In Exhibit 10, there is a request by 108 Ltd. for another copy of HSN's invoice which is eventually provided. In my view, if it weren't for the disclosure by 108 Ltd. in its own response to the requirement served on it by Respondent, the correspondence would have been privileged, given the client's request and the Applicant's provision of the invoice. Accordingly, because of the waiver, I do not think privilege arises on this ground.

[44] However, this correspondence, Exhibits 7 – 30, evolves into exchanges about the Respondent's requirement leading to the Applicant's provision of legal advice concerning solicitor-client privilege. In Descoteaux, the Supreme Court noted confidentiality attaches to all communications within the framework of solicitor-client relationships as soon as the client takes the first steps. In result, I find all the communications contained in the entire sequence, Exhibits 7 – 30, to be privileged.

31

HSN

Client, 1082955 Ontario Limited October 4, 2005

[45] The invoice by the Applicant for legal services is privileged as it identifies the subject matter for which legal services were provided to 108 Ltd. The privilege has not been waived by 108 Ltd., unlike the June 2004 Invoice referred to in the above in document email correspondence. I conclude this document is privileged.

Digitized by Google

Documents not under Solicitor-Client Privilege

[46] I turn now to those documents I do not consider to be privileged. 3

HSN

Darko Vranich/Vrancor June 2005

[47] The above description states the document "missing the actual reporting letter as per Exhibits 1 and 2 above." The document only includes a Deed of Settlement made June 1, 2005 between SIL and CTC with attachments. While the Deed of Settlement is between parties who are subject to the Respondent's audit, the subject matter concerns 108 Ltd. and falls within the broad scope of subsections 231.2(1) as discussed in paragraph 22 above.

[48] The document and attachments in Exhibit 3 are essentially similar to the above mentioned appended documents in Exhibits1 and 2. It involves an agreement between the two offshore parties who the Applicant says are his clients also. The subject matter touches on the broad scope of matters relevant to 108 Ltd.'s taxable status. However, there are three significant differences. First, not only is there no covering letter, there is also there is no legal opinion. Second, there is no evidence, either in the Applicant's affidavit or in his cross examination, that these documents were part of a legal opinion provided to 108 Ltd., SIL or CTC. There is only the unsworn assertion in the listing of documents which does not have any weight as evidence. Finally, the appended documents in Exhibits 1 and 2 included unsigned documents. Here the Deed of Settlement and attachments are signed and complete in that respect.

[49] I conclude that the document in Exhibit 3 comes with a statement of fact as discussed in Maranda and Westra rather than a communication given in the course of formulating or providing professional advice. I conclude this document is not covered by solicitor-client privilege.

4-6

HSN and Tyler McDiarmid HSN and Tyler McDiarmid June 18, 2007

[50] These emails involve discussion of financial matters without any indicia or suggestion that legal advice is being sought or given. They also were sent on one day, June 18, 2007 approximately six months before the remaining emails in Exhibits 7 to 30. They clearly constitute a separate batch of emails. I conclude these emails fall outside the framework of the solicitor-client relationship as described in Descoteaux.

Conclusion

[51] I conclude the documents identified as being subject to solicitor-client privilege, the documents in Exhibits 1, 2, 7 to 30 and 31 are exempt from disclosure pursuant to paragraph 232(5)(b)(i) of the ITA.

[52] The documents not identified as being covered by solicitor-client privilege, the documents in Exhibits 3 and 4 to 6, are not exempt from disclosure under the paragraph 231.2(1)(a) and (b) of the ITA.

[53] For the protection of the Applicant and his client 108 Ltd., all documents shall remain under seal until the expiry of the applicable appeal period. Upon expiry of the appeal period and upon no appeal being filed, the Applicant will provide the documents in Exhibits 3 and 4 to 6 to the Respondent.

[54] There will be no order for costs. JUDGMENT

THIS COURT ORDERS AND ADJUDGES that:

The documents identified as being subject to solicitor-client privilege, in Exhibits 1, 2, 7 to 30, and 31 are exempt from disclosure pursuant to paragraph 232(5)(b)(i) of the ITA.

The documents not identified as being covered by solicitor-client privilege, in Exhibits 3, and

Digitized by Google

4 to 6, are not exempt from disclosure under the paragraph 232.1(2)(a) and (b) of the ITA. For the protection of the Applicant and his client 108 Ltd., all documents shall remain under seal un til the expiry of the applicable appeal period. Upon expiry of the appeal period and upon no appeal being filed, the Applicant will provide the documents in Exhibits 3 and 4 to 6 to the Respondent.
There will be no order for costs.
"Leonard S. Mandamin"
Judge

MNR v. Joseph R. Jakabfy, 2013 FC 706, An Example of SCP Not Applying to a Lawyer's Financial Records

Date: 20130625
Docket: T-1040-13
Citation: 2013 FC 706
Toronto, Ontario, June 25, 2013
PRESENT: The Honourable Mr. Justice Zinn
BETWEEN:

THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Applicant

and

JOSEPH R. JAKABFY

Respondent

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] The Minister of National Revenue is asking the Court to issue an Order under section 231.7 of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) requiring Joseph R. Jakabfy, a barrister and solicitor, to provide certain documents and information to the Minister.

[2] The documents and information sought from the Respondent relate to the sale of a property by Donald Lavallee and his wife Nicole Lavallee. Donald Lavallee has unpaid personal income taxes and unpaid GST. The Minister wished to determine how Donald Lavallee distributed the proceeds from the sale of the property in order to determine whether he transferred any or all of the proceeds to a non-arm's length person such that an assessment might be raised against the transferee pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, or section 325 of the Excise Tax Act, RSC 1985, c E-15.

[3] To that end, in November 2010, pursuant to section 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act, a requirement for information and documents was delivered to the Respondent, who had acted for Donald Lavallee in respect of the sale of the property. The requirement required Mr. Jababfy to provide the Minister with the following:

a. A copy of trust account ledger showing names and amounts for all transactions where disbursements were made to or on behalf of Nicole Lavallee, 920199 Ontario Ltd.[a corporation owned and controlled by Donald Lavallee and his family] or Donald Lavallee.

Digitized by Google

b. A copy of trust account ledger or cheque journal showing names and amounts for all transactions where money was received and was paid on behalf of Nicole Lavallee, 920199 Ontario Ltd. Or Donald Lavallee.

c. Copies of all cancelled cheques (front & back) for all transactions in which amounts were paid to or on behalf of Nicole Lavallee, 920199 Ontario Ltd. or Donald Lavallee.

d. A copy of the statement of adjustments or disbursement statement for all transactions.

e. Copies of all invoices/receipts for payment made on behalf of Nicole Lavallee, 920199 Ontario Ltd. or Donald Lavallee.

[4] Upon receipt of this requirement for information and documents, Mr. Jababfy wrote to his clients seeking their instructions:

> I would request your Authorization to release documentation to Canada Revenue Agency (if we still have it), so that the Revenue Canada will not be put to the expense of obtaining an Order of the Court for compliance.
>
> On the other hand, of you want to oppose their Application you should indicate this to me.

[5] In an affidavit sworn in this matter, Mr. Jakabfy attests:

> Shortly after sending this letter I was instructed by Mr. Lavallee, in very strong terms, not to produce the Documents to CRA and instead to claim privilege over them.
>
> I advised CRA of the position that my Former Clients were taking in a letter dated November 16, 2010.... Since that time, I have received no contrary instructions from the Lavallees. ...I have advised CRA that I am not in a position to produce the documents in response to the Requirement without an Order from the Court.

[6] Mr. Jakabfy, in his affidavit, and through the representations of counsel he has retained, advises the Court that he takes no position on this application "other than that the Court should decide whether the Documents are privileged and that no costs should be awarded against me." He has provided a schedule to the Court listing the documents in his possession which conform to the request for information. Further, his counsel has filed with the Court, in a sealed envelope, those documents and has instructions from Mr. Jakabfy that if the Court determines that no privilege attaches to the documents, they are to be delivered by counsel to the Minister immediately.

[7] The Court observes that Mr. Jakabfy has acted appropriately in this matter in his dealings with his former clients, with the Minister, and with the Court. No costs will be ordered against him.

[8] This Court has held that three conditions must be satisfied under subsection 231.7(1) of the Income Tax Act before the Court can order a person to provide the information and documents sought by the Minister under section 231.2 of that Act; See Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Currie, 2008 FC 237, para 25:

> a) the Respondent was required under subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act to provide the Information and Documents

Digitized by Google

sought by the Minister;

b) the Respondent has failed to provide the Information and Documents sought by the Minister; and

c) the Information and Documents sought by the Minister are not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege.

[9] The Court is satisfied, based on the record before it that the first two conditions are satisfied. The only question is whether the information sought is protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[10] Not all communication between a solicitor and his client is protected by the privilege. Section 232 of the Income Tax Act defines solicitor-client privilege for the purposes of that Act, as follows:

> "solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.

[11] This definition is in keeping with the law of solicitor-client privilege which has held that the protection applies to communications involving the seeking and providing of legal advice and does not apply to documents that are "evidence of an act or transaction rather than a communication:" Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, 2005 FC 1538, para 18.

[12] This Court has ordered the production of information and documents relating to financial transactions directed through a solicitor's trust account, such as cheques, statements of adjustment, and account ledgers, on numerous occasions: See for example: Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Reddy, 2006 FC 277; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, 2005 FC 1538; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Cornfield, 2007 FC 436; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – MNR) v Currie, 2008 FC 237.

[13] Counsel for the Minister, as an officer of the Court, brought to our attention the decision of the Québec Superior Court in Chambre des notaires du Québec c Canada (Procureur général), 2010 QCCS 4215, [2010] JQ 8868 which held that sections 231.2 and 231.7 and the definition of "solicitor-client privilege" in subsection 232(1) of the Income Tax Act were contrary to sections 7 and 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are of no force and effect as against Quebec notaries and lawyers with respect to documents and information protected by "professional secrecy." That decision is under appeal.

[14] The Court declines to follow that decision for three reasons. First, a decision of the Québec Superior Court is not binding on this Court. Second, the decision appears to rely heavily on the professional obligations of notaries and lawyers set out in their respective Codes of Professional Conduct, which is not applicable to the Respondent. Third, and most importantly, there is no "professional secrecy" or privilege attaching to the requested documents and information in Ontario jurisprudence.

[15] For these reasons, the Court finds that the documents and information the Minister required the Respondent to produce are not subject to solicitor-client privilege.

Digitized by Google

ORDER

UPON the application of the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister"), coming for hearing on June 24, 2013, at the Federal Court, 180 Queen Street West, Suite 200, Toronto, Ontario M5V 3L6;

AND UPON reviewing the materials filed by the parties and upon hearing the submissions of the parties;

AND UPON BEING SATISFIED THAT:

1. By requirement dated November 1, 2010 (and also bearing the date October 22, 2010), the Minister required Mr. Jakabfy, barrister and solicitor, pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act, to provide information and documents relating to Mr. Donald Lavallee and Ms. Nicole Lavallee's sale of real property in August 2003 to third party purchasers. The respondent acted as counsel for the Lavallees on the sale of the property.
2. Mr. Lavallee is indebted under the Income Tax Act with respect to his 2001 to 2003 taxation years; as at September 1, 2011, Mr. Lavallee owed the amount of approximately $62,734.00. Mr. Lavallee also owes a GST debt under the Excise Tax Act with relating to the January 1, 2001 to December 31, 2003 reporting periods; as at April 10, 2013, Mr. Lavallee owed in the amount of approximately $59,838.00.
3. The Minister requires the information and documents sought from the Respondent for purposes related to the administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act. More specifically, the purpose is to determine how Mr. Lavallee distributed his share of the proceeds from the sale of the real property, in particular, to determine whether Mr. Lavallee has any assets that the Canada Revenue Agency may take action against to collect upon to satisfy Mr. Lavallee's outstanding income tax debt (and GST debt) and to determine if Mr. Lavallee transferred any or all of his share of the proceeds received from the sale of the property to an non-arm's person such that an assessment may be raised against the transferee(s) pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act (and/or section 325 of the Excise Tax Act) and whether the transferee(s) have any assets or other sources of income that the Canada Revenue Agency can collect against.
4. To date, Mr. Jakabfy has not provided the information and documents required by the Minister;
5. The Minister does not seek information or documents that are protected by solicitor-client privilege within the meaning of subsection 232(1) of the Income Tax Act (or subsection 293(2) of the Excise Tax Act).

THIS COURT ORDERS that Mr. Jakabfy shall, within three weeks after being served with a copy of this Order, provide the information and documents required in the requirement dated November 01, 2010 (and also dated October 22, 2010) which is attached as Appendix "A" to this Order, to Ms. Carole Cameron of the Canada Revenue Agency, Sudbury Tax Services Office, 1050 Notre Dame Avenue, Sudbury, Ontario, P3A 5C1, or another officer who may be identified by the Applicant for that purpose.

AND THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that the Minister is authorized to effect service of this Order on Mr. Jakabfy by personal service under Rule 128 of the Federal Courts Rules.

AND THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that no costs are ordered on this application.

"Russel W. Zinn"
Judge

Digitized by Google

MNR v. Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal, 2005 FC 1538, A Clear Instance of Lawyer's Financial Records Not Being Subject to SCP

REASONS FOR ORDER AND ORDER

[1] This is an application for a compliance order under section 231.7 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) as amended (the "Act"), regarding a requirement for documents and information issued by the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") to the respondents on February 18, 2004 pursuant to section 231.2 of the Act (the "Requirement"). The respondents are a firm of barristers and solicitors practising in Calgary, Alberta. The issue in these proceedings is whether the records sought by the applicant are protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[2] The Minister's department, Canada Customs Revenue Agency ("CCRA") commenced an audit of 173 individual Registered Retirement Savings Plan ("RRSP") annuitants respecting transactions in 2001 and 2002. Funds totalling $8, 425, 330 were allegedly paid to the respondents, in trust, by trust companies administering the annuitants self-directed RRSP's. The funds are alleged to have been used to subscribe for common shares of a corporation called Asset Trax Inc., ("ATI"). Some of the shares were issued to the RRSP trusts indirectly through a Costa Rica based corporation called Transportes Castlewood S.A. ("Transportes").

[3] CCRA suspects that the RRSP annuitants were participating in a scheme designed to extract funds from their RRSPs without payment of income tax. It is alleged that ATI received $1.00 per share from the $10.00 per share paid into the respondents' trust account. CCRA wishes to audit the respondents' accounting records to determine who received the $9.00 per share balance allegedly disbursed from the respondent's trust account. Accordingly, CCRA requested documents and information related to ATI share purchases from the respondents, which requests were refused on the ground that the information was subject to solicitor-client privilege.

[4] On February 18, 2004, CCRA served a notice (the "requirement") in accordance with subsection 231.2(1) requiring the respondents' trust account records pertaining to transfers from nine trust companies for ATI share purchases.

[5] Subsequent to service of the requirement, an order was issued under the Legal Profession Act of Alberta by the Court of Queen's Bench appointing a Custodian for the practice of Mr. Manesh Bindal, a member of the respondent law firm during the material times. Counsel acting on behalf of the Custodian represented the respondents in these proceedings, effectively as a surrogate for the Law Society.

[6] The Custodian stands in the same place as Mr. Bindal with respect to any solicitor-client relationship he may have had at the relevant times and maintains the position that the information sought by the applicant is privileged. The respondents contend that Transportes and all 173 of the annuitants should be given notice of the application for a compliance order to allow them to assert their claim to privilege.

[7] An affidavit from Mr. Bindal was tendered in evidence on this application by the respondents and he was cross-examined on that affidavit.

[8] In his affidavit, Mr. Bindal states that in January 2001 he entered into a retainer arrangement with Transportes under which certain sums of money were deposited into and paid out of his trust account. In the course of his retainer, cheques were sent to him by trust companies, by Transportes or directly by investors for the purchase of shares in various companies. The cheques were usually designated "In Trust" for a particular investor.

[9] On cross-examination, Mr. Bindal stated that his arrangement with Transportes was very limited. No client was specified for the purchase and sale of shares. He would simply act on behalf of Transportes to deal with the funds that came into his trust account and which would be released at the direction of Transportes. There were no specific trust conditions attached to these funds and he was not retained specifically in connection with the ATI share sale that is the subject matter of the requirement.

Digitized by Google

[10] The respondents submit that Bindal had a solicitor-client relationship with Transportes. While Transportes was undoubtedly a client of the law firm, there is nothing on the record before me to suggest that this relationship in any way entailed communications for the purpose of obtaining or providing legal advice. This was a straight commercial relationship using the law firm's trust accounts to receive and transfer funds.

[11] Further, the respondents submit that Mr. Bindal owed a duty of care to the investors to safeguard their investments giving rise to a reasonable inference that they were also "clients" entitled to assert privilege over their communications with the law firm. In support of the second proposition, respondents rely upon an excerpt from a text on Lawyers' Professional Liability, by Grant and Rothstein (Butterworths, 1998) which, at pages 89-90, addresses solicitors' liability to third parties. The learned authors cite Yang v. Overseas Investments (1986) Ltd., [1995] 4 W.W.R. 231 and Texas Industries Ltd.v. Siewert (1996), 194 A.R. 303 (Q.B.) as providing examples of circumstances in which a duty of care to third parties by lawyers may arise. [12] It may well be that the respondents owed a duty of care to the RRSP annuitants to safeguard their investments but that does not, in my view, establish a solicitor-client relationship between the respondents and the investors or dispose of this matter. Indeed, the cases cited by Grant and Rothstein are notable for concluding that a duty of care may arise notwithstanding the absence of any direct client relationship with the solicitor and do not directly address the question at issue.

[13] Counsel for the respondent candidly admits that he could find no authority which expressly states that a solicitor-client relationship may arise with respect to third parties but points to the broad principles set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General); White, Ottenheimer & Baker v. Canada (Attorney General); R.v. Fink, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209 for determining questions of privilege in relation to the search for and seizure of records from lawyers' offices.

[14] The Lavallee principles, among other things, require that every effort should be made to contact potential clients and to give them a reasonable opportunity to assert a claim of privilege and, if contested, to have the issue judicially determined. Where notification of potential privilege holders is not possible, the lawyer who had custody of the documents seized or another lawyer appointed either by the Law Society or by the Court, should examine the documents to determine whether a claim of privilege should be asserted.

[15] I note that the trust account records in question here are currently in the possession of counsel for the respondents. In July 2005, respondents' counsel wrote to Transportes and to several of the trust companies that acted on behalf of the RRSP annuitants to inform them of the application before the court. There appears to have been no application to intervene in these proceedings. That, of course, would not be determinative of whether privilege attaches to the records but indicates, nonetheless, that some effort was expended to notify the "potential" clients, albeit by the respondents and not by the state.

[16] The applicant's position is that while the accounting records may be confidential records of the respondents' law practice, they are not privileged at common law or under subsection 232(1) of the Act. Subsection 232(1) excludes accounting records from the scope of oral or documentary communications protected by solicitor-client privilege. The respondent suggests, without formally challenging the provision, that subsection 232(1) is constitutionally suspect in light of Lavallee, above, and the subsequent decision by the Supreme Court in Maranda v. Richer, 2003 SCC 67.

[17] Among other decisions, the applicant relies upon Re Ontario Securities Commission

Digitized by Google

and Greymac Credit Corp., Re OntarioSecurities Commission and Prousky (1983), 146 D.L.R. (3d) 73 (Ont. Div. Ct.); Stevens v. Canada (Prime Minister), [1998] 4 F.C. 89 (F.C.A.) and R. v. Serfaty, [2004] O.J. No. 1952 (Sup. Ct.) (QL).

[18] Greymac, above, has long stood for the proposition that solicitor-client privilege does not extend to records of financial transactions directed through solicitor's trust accounts as such records are evidence of an act or transaction rather than communications. Hence, oral evidence regarding such matters and the solicitor's books of account and other records pertaining thereto, with advice and communications relating to advice expunged, are not privileged and the solicitor may be compelled to answer questions and produce the material.

[19] Contrary to the respondents' submission, in my view Greymac remains good law notwithstanding Lavallee and Maranda. In Maranda, Justice LeBel, for the majority (Justice Deschamps concurring in the result) held that the substantive rule of privilege cannot rely on the distinction between facts and communication and thus, in that case, defence counsel's fee records were protected. However, he expressly noted, at paragraph 30, that not everything that happens in the solicitor-client relationship falls within the scope of privilege "as has been held in cases where it was found that counsel was not acting in that capacity but simply as a conduit for transfers of funds" citing Greymac as authority.

[20] In Kilbreath v. Saskatchewan (Attorney General), [2004] S.J. No. 770, 2004 SKQB 489, Wilkinson J., reviewing the cases prior to and after Lavallee and Maranda respecting the scope of the privilege for records in the possession of lawyers summarized the cases in which the privilege was found not to attach, as follows at paragraph 16:

Thus, as examples that are by no means exhaustive, the solicitor-client privilege does not attach to documents unrelated to the giving of proper advice, but stored with the solicitor to avoid seizure. (R. v. Colvin, Ex parte Merrick, [1970] 3 O.R. 612 (Ont. H.C.J.)). The privilege does not apply to documents merely held by the lawyer, including accounting records and trust reconciliations, conveyancing documents and documents relating to the sale of property where no advice was sought or given in respect of them: Kranz, supra. It does not apply to actual currency, which does not communicate any information other than the value of the individual bill: R. v. Law Office of Simon Rosenfield, [2003] O.J. No. 5821 (S.C.J.). It does not apply to deposits of funds into a lawyer's trust account unrelated to the giving or receiving of advice, but merely to protect the funds from seizure: R. v. Serfaty, [2004] O.J. No. 1952 (S.C.J.). It does not apply where the connection between the parties is more in the nature of a business or commercial relationship, or where the disclosure sought is of actions taken, rather than communications passing between solicitor and client, or where the communications are in furtherance of criminal or fraudulent activity. It does not apply to documents if the client possessing the privilege exercises the right to waive the privilege either expressly, or implicitly in a manner acceptable to the court: Rosenfeld, supra, and R. v. Serfaty, supra.

[21] In this case, there is no evidence in the record before me that the respondents were retained to provide legal advice to Transportes, or to any of the 173 individual annuitants on behalf of whom the trust companies forwarded funds to the respondents for the purchase of shares. At best, the respondents were merely "conduits for the transfer of funds" as described by LeBel J., in Maranda and there is no basis in the evidence to conclude that the records will disclose any privileged communication.

[22] At the conclusion of the hearing and after I had indicated the outcome of the application, counsel for the respondents' questioned whether the scope of my order should extend to the last item in the list of requirements sought in the February, 18, 2004 notice, that is: "[c]ontracts between Singh Walters Bindal and their client/s that determined the handling of any money/funds on behalf of any person, as defined by subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act..." Counsel submitted that this last requirement may be outside the scope of the non-privileged trust account records pertaining to funds transfers.

Digitized by Google

[23] Mr. Bindal's evidence was that he had a retainer solely with Transportes. As I have concluded that was simply a commercial arrangement for funds transfers, I see no reason why any contracts setting out the terms of that arrangement should not be disclosed, so long as they contain no privileged communications or facts. Counsel for the respondents should review any contracts in the records before they are released to the applicant and may seek direction from the Court if there are any communications or statements believed to be privileged.

[24] The applicant seeks costs in the amount of $1000.00. As the application arose over a question of privilege, I will exercise my discretion not to award costs to the successful party.

ORDER

THIS COURT ORDERS that the Respondents shall comply with the Requirement to Provide Documents and Information attached as Exhibit "D" to the September 9, 2004 affidavit of Margaret Nieboer, within 15 days of the date of this order. No costs are awarded.

"Richard Mosley"

JUDGE

Calgary, Alberta November 15, 2005

Procedure to Handle Solicitor-client Assertions

In MNR v. S. Bruce Cornfield et al.[103] the Federal Ct. opined that the procedure to attend to s. 231.7 (RFI) requests that caused solicitor-client to arise was:

REASONS FOR ORDER

SNIDER J.

[1] The Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) is asking this Court to issue an Order (Compliance Order), under section 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C, 1985, c. E-15, that would require the Respondent, Mr. S. Bruce Cornfield, to provide certain documents and information to the Minister.

I. Background

[2] Mr. Cornfield is a lawyer and a member of the Law Society of British Columbia. His client, Child Construction Ltd. (CCL), is indebted to Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada for GST in the amount of $53,382.29 as of September 15, 2006.

[3] In July 2003, Mr. Cornfield handled the conveyance involving a transfer of property by CCL to a third party.

[4] By letter served on January 6, 2006, the Minister issued a requirement for information (RFI) pursuant to subsection 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, requiring Mr. Cornfield to provide the following information and documents to the Minister (the Information and Documents) within 30 days of the date of service of the RFI:

(a) A statement of adjustments with respect to the sale of the property described as Parcel Identifier 023014806, Strata Lot 105, Section 9, Victoria District, Strata Plan VIS3305, by CCL to Sarah Harper and Richard Allan Stensrud, on July 30, 2003.

(b) A copy of the direction to pay with respect to the property transaction identified in paragraph (a) above.

(c) Copies, front and back, of the cancelled cheques in regards to the distribution of monies with respect to the property transaction identified in paragraph (a) above.

[103] 2007 FC 436

Digitized by Google

[5] Mr. Cornfield has refused to provide the Minister with the Information and Documents sought by the RFI within 30 days. In a letter to the Vancouver Island Tax Services Office of the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), dated January 23, 2006, Mr. Cornfield explained his reasons for not providing the Information and Documents:

> I have been unable to locate my client . . . Absent instructions to the contrary from the client, I must take the position that the requested information may be subject to a solicitor-client privilege. . . . I draw your attention to the Professional Conduct Handbook for B.C. Lawyers that states:
>
> > a lawyer who is required under the Criminal Code, the Income Tax Act, or any other federal or provincial legislation, to produce or surrender a document or provide information which is or may be privileged shall, unless the client waives the privilege, claim a solicitor-client privilege in respect to the document.
>
> Given the above, what you are asking me to do is something that is contrary to my governing society's code of conduct, and compliance may even result in disciplinary action against me.

[6] Upon application, the Law Society of British Columbia (the Law Society) was granted intervener status in this Application by Order of Justice Gauthier dated December 20, 2006. In her Order, Justice Gauthier described the right of the intervener to:

> make representations in writing and orally in respect of all issues concerning solicitor-client privilege raised in this application including the procedures which a Court should follow in considering an order for production of documents in the possession of a lawyer and the protection of solicitor-client privilege in the face of a demand for production of documents by the applicant.

[7] Written and oral submissions were made by the Minister and the Law Society.

Digitized by Google

II. Issues

[8] The overarching issue in this application is whether the Compliance Order should issue to require Mr. Cornfield to produce the Information and Documents. To respond, two questions must be addressed:

2. Are the Information and Documents, in this case, subject to solicitor-client privilege?
3. Does s. 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act provide adequate protection to the rights of the lawyer's client (or former client) to claim solicitor-client privilege? And, if not, should the Federal Court consider adding certain procedural safeguards such as a requirement to serve notice on the client?

[9] As I understand the submissions of the Intervenor, they are not seeking to require the suggested procedures be applied to this particular case. Thus, if I determine that the Information and Documents are not subject to solicitor-client privilege and that the other requirements of s. 289.1 have been met, the Compliance Order will issue.

III. Analysis

A. What is the relevant statutory framework?

[10] In brief, the relevant provisions of the Excise Tax Act operate in the following manner. The full text of these provisions is set out in Appendix A to these reasons. Almost identical provisions are contained in the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.).

[11] The Minister is authorized, pursuant to s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, to require a person to provide any requested information or documents, upon notice. It is important to note that the Minister's authority is not restricted to the taxpayer. Third parties may be served with requests for information. The only stipulation is that the purpose be "related to the administration or enforcement of this Part, including the collection of any amount payable or remittable under this Part".

[12] Where a request for information is made and the person has failed to comply, s. 289.1 provides the Minister with a means to enforce compliance with s. 289. Specifically, s. 289.1(1) allows the Minister to seek, by way of "summary application", a court order requiring the person to provide the information or document sought under s. 289. To issue the order – commonly referred to as a Compliance Order – the judge must be satisfied that: (a) the person was required under s. 288 or s. 289 to provide the information; and (b) "in the case of information or a document, the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege (within the meaning of subsection 293(1))".

[13] The definition of solicitor-client privilege, in s. 293(1) of the Excise Tax Act, is as follows:

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional	«privilège des communications entre client et avocat » Droit qu'une personne peut posséder, devant une cour supérieure de la province où l'affaire prend naissance, de refuser de divulguer une communication entre elle et son avocat en confidence professionnelle. Toutefois,

Digitized by Google

confidence, except that, for the purposes of this section, an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting invoice, voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.	pour l'application du présent article, le relevé comptable d'un avocat, y compris une facture ou une pièce justificative ou tout chèque, ne doit pas être considéré comme une communication de cette nature.

[14] Under s. 289.1(2), the person must be given notice of the application at least five clear days before it is heard. Subsection 289.1(3) gives the judge hearing the application the discretion to impose such conditions on the order as the judge considers appropriate.

B. What has been the practice of the Federal Court in these matters?

[15] The Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act contain an explicit procedure for bringing compliance order applications. As noted above, s. 289.1 (1) of the Excise Tax Act provides that the compliance order is to be obtained "on summary application by the Minister". The same requirement for a "summary application" is set out in s. 231.7 of the Income Tax Act. In that context, Prothonotary Lafrenière of this Court provided a format for bringing such applications in Minister of National Revenue v. Norris, 2002 CarswellNat 1250, [2002] 3 C.T.C. 346. In Norris, the Prothonotary authorized the Minister of National Revenue to institute proceedings under s. 231.7 of the Income Tax Act by way of motion under Rule 358 et seq. of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (the Rules), rather than by way of application under Rule 300 et seq. of the Rules. As stated by Prothonotary Lafrenière in Norris, above, at paras. 5-7:

> Although a proceeding under subsection 231.7 of the Income Tax Act must be brought by way of notice of application, the procedure set out in the Federal Court Rules, 1998 which governs applications appears ill-suited for summary disposition of such matters. Consequently, in this particular case and subject to any further directions or order of the Court, the following procedure should be followed in the proposed proceeding under subsection 231.7.
>
> The Applicant shall file a Notice of Application in Form 301, to be treated by the Registry as both an originating document and notice of motion, which shall:
>
> (a) set out the day, time and place at which the application will be heard, either at a General Sittings of the Court or such special sitting date as may have been appointed by the Judicial Administrator upon informal request by the Applicant:
>
> (b) be amended by deleting any references to Rule 300 et seq.;
>
> (c) contain a notice in capital and bold characters which reads as follows: "The Respondent who wishes to oppose the application shall serve a Respondent's Record and file three copies of it not later than 2:00 p.m. on the last business day before the hearing of the application."; and
>
> (d) be accompanied by the appropriate filing fee.
>
> Once the Notice of Application has been filed, the Applicant shall personally serve the Respondent with an Application Record

Digitized by Google

> containing a table of contents, the notice of application, each supporting affidavit and documentary exhibit and the Applicant's memorandum of fact and law. The Applicant shall file three copies of the Application Record, and proof of service thereof in accordance with ss. 237.1 of the Income Tax Act, forthwith and in any event no later than two clear days before the return date of the hearing of the application.

[16] Although one may argue that the Order was limited to the particular case before the Prothonotary, the procedure that he outlined has been followed, for compliance orders under both the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act, since 2002.

[17] Consistent with the direction provided by Prothonotary Lafrenière and with the notice provisions set out in s. 289.1(2) of the Excise Tax Act, the Minister's practice is to serve notice on "the person against whom the order is sought". Thus, the Minister, following s. 289.1(2) of the Excise Tax Act and the direction of Prothonotary Lafrenière, has not followed Rule 303 of the Rules and named, as a Respondent, the affected taxpayer as a "person directly affected by the order sought in the application".

C. Are the Information and Documents sought in this case subject to solicitor-client privilege?

[18] I turn now to the first issue before me. Specifically, should a Compliance Order be issued? Resolution of this issue requires that I first determine whether the Information and Documents, in this case, are subject to solicitor-client privilege.

[19] In recent decisions, the Courts have consistently affirmed that, in the context of a real estate transaction, cheques from a solicitor's account and a statement of adjustments are not subject to solicitor-client privilege (In the Matter of the Legal Profession Act and Martin K. Wirick, 2005 BCSC 1821, 51 B.C.L.R. (4th) 193, [2005] B.C.J. No. 2878 (B.C. Sup. Ct.) (QL); Minister of National Revenue v. Vlug, 2006 FC 86, 2006 D.T.C. 6285, [2006] F.C.J. No. 142 (F.C.) (QL); Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Reddy, 2006 FC 277, 146 A.C.W.S. (3d) 568, [2006] F.C.J. No. 348 (F.C.) (QL); Canada (Minister of National Revenue) v. Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, 2005 FC 1538, [2006] 1 C.T.C. 113, [2005] F.C.J. No. 1907 (F.C.) (QL)). More specifically, the Federal Court in Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, Vlug and Reddy held that such documents and information requested under the Excise Tax Act or the parallel provisions of the Income Tax Act are not subject to solicitor-client privilege.

[20] Given this clear authority, there is no question that the Information and Documents requested in the RFI are not the subject of solicitor-client privilege.

D. Should the procedures currently used by the Court be amended?

[21] The Law Society has intervened in this application with a concern that they describe as the "greater good". They assert that, once a lawyer is served with an RFI, the lawyer is in an immediate conflict between their duty to their client vis-à-vis privilege and the duty to comply with the statute. At a minimum, the Law Society requests that this Court direct the Minister to take the following steps in all such compliance order applications:

2. Name the taxpayer as a Respondent to the application pursuant to Rule 303 of the Rules, thereby giving the taxpayer immediate rights to assert any claims of privilege; and
3. Require the sealing of the documents and their submission to the Court.

[22] While acknowledging (I think) that the Information and Documents in this case are not subject to solicitor-client privilege, the Law Society argues that there may be circumstances where this type of document or information held by a lawyer may be privileged. The Law Society submits that the lawyer's client is the only party who can waive that privilege. They refer the Court to certain provisions of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook of the Law Society dealing with "Confidential Information". In particular, paragraphs 13 and 14 are entitled "Disclosure required by law" and provide as follows:

Digitized by Google

> 13. A lawyer who is required by law or by order of a court to disclose a client's affairs shall not divulge more information than is necessary.
>
> 14. A lawyer who is required under the Criminal Code, the Income Tax Act or any other federal or provincial legislation, to produce or surrender a document or provide information which is or may be privileged shall, unless the client waives the privilege, claim a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document.

[23] In general, I would not presume to interpret the rules of the Law Society. However, in this case, two of these rules have been raised as a reason for changing the practice of the Federal Court. Accordingly, I feel that I should respond to the arguments before me. And, in my view, there are a number of problems with those arguments.

[24] In the face of consistent and clear direction from this and other courts that documents in the nature of those described in the RFI are not subject to solicitor-client privilege, it is difficult to see how paragraph 14 of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook of the Law Society can have any applicability. Paragraph 14 applies only where the document or information "is or may be privileged". If the Information and Documents do not satisfy that test, paragraph 14 is not engaged.

[25] Since the Information and Documents under discussion in this application – and, more generally, as provided for in the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act – are not privileged, there is nothing for the client to waive. The provisions of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act are very clear. Upon a request, the lawyer must provide the requested information, unless it is subject to solicitor-client privilege. Whether one uses the definition in the statutes or a common law definition of solicitor-client privilege, the law has established that accounting records, including any supporting invoice, voucher or cheque, are not protected by solicitor-client privilege.

[26] Further, the position of the Law Society fails to take into account the difference between confidential and privileged documents. As acknowledged by counsel for the Law Society, privileged documents form a subset of documents that are "confidential". All documents in the possession of a lawyer may be described as confidential but only those that satisfy the test for a claim of solicitor-client privilege may be withheld pursuant to the provisions of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. If paragraph 14 of Chapter 5 of the Professional Conduct Handbook is to apply to documents which, in the opinion of the courts, are not subject to privilege, then lawyers would be obliged to obtain the waiver from the client of all documents held by the lawyer for a client. This ignores the intent of paragraphs 13 and 14 which, on my reading, permit the disclosure of non-privileged information where a lawyer is required by law to produce or surrender a document or provide information.

[27] The Law Society argues that only the client – and not the lawyer – has the right to decide whether a document may be privileged and whether to claim that privilege. While this is no doubt correct, it appears to me that, where the law is clear that certain information is not privileged, such a right simply does not arise.

[28] The Law Society raises the problem that sometimes these types of documents may contain notations or other information that may be privileged. This is not the case with the Information and Documents that are the subject of this application; the Law Society does not assert that the documents at issue in this application are annotated. Further, this situation has never arisen to the knowledge of the parties to this application. However, I acknowledge that this situation could arise in a future case. The simple response to this concern is that a financial or accounting record that contains privileged information in the form of a notation is not a document that satisfies the definition of non-privileged information or documents. A Compliance Order may only be issued if the information or document is not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege, either pursuant to s. 289.1 of the Excise Tax Act or under principles of common law. If such circumstances were to arise, the statute and the Federal Court procedures for obtaining a Compliance Order would, in my view, suffice to provide the important protection for privileged documents and information.

Digitized by Google

[29] I also note that the judge hearing the application for a Compliance Order may impose any conditions in respect of the order that the judge considers appropriate (Excise Tax Act, s. 289.1(3)). Further service requirements could be imposed. Since the submissions of the Law Society are based on hypothetical situations, it is impossible to address every possible scenario.

[30] Lastly, I turn to the Law Society's submission that the Minister should be required to follow Rule 303(1) and name the taxpayer as a Respondent. In their view, the taxpayer is a "person directly affected by the order sought in the application". The problem with this argument is, first, that the Court, in Norris, above, expressly determined that this Rule would not apply. Second, and more importantly, the summary application procedure set out in the Excise Tax Act requires service only on the party from whom the information is sought.

[31] In sum, I am not persuaded that the evidentiary record in this case establishes a need for further procedural steps for the protection of solicitor-client privilege. More generally, there is no evidence that the current procedure has resulted in a breach of the fundamental legal rights of solicitor-client privilege. There is no need, at this time, to add a requirement to serve the taxpayer or to provide a sealed copy of the documents to the Court, unless such procedures are warranted on the facts of a particular application.

IV. Conclusion

[32] In conclusion, I am satisfied that:

(a) the Respondent was served with the RFI as required under s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act;

(b) the Respondent did not provide the Information and Documents sought by the Minister; and

(c) the Information and Documents are not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege.

[33] Accordingly, the Compliance Order will issue. Further, the Court will provide no direction on the procedure for making application for Compliance Orders and affirms the procedure set out in the Excise Tax Act and in Norris, above.

[34] Since the Minister did not seek costs, no costs will be awarded.

"Judith A. Snider"
Judge[104]

---

[104] In Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General); White, Ottenheimer & Baker v. Canada (Attorney General); R. v. Fink, 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209, the SCC provided opinion in handling searches of law firms and attending to protecting solicitor-client privilege with:

The following guidelines reflect present-day constitutional imperatives for the protection of solicitor-client privilege and apply to law office searches until new legislation is in place.

A search warrant should not issue for documents known to be protected by solicitor-client privilege.

Digitized by Google

Duncan Thompson v. The Minister Of National Revenue, 2013 FCA 197, SCP of a Lawyer Subject to Enforcement Action

Heard at Calgary, Alberta, on June 12, 2013.
Judgment delivered at Ottawa, Ontario, on August 29, 2013.
REASONS FOR JUDGMENT BY: TRUDEL J.A.
CONCURRED IN BY: PELLETIER J.A.
MAINVILLE J.A.

As well, they should not issue if other reasonable alternatives to the law office search exist.
The issuing justice must be rigorously demanding with respect to solicitor-client privilege.
Unless otherwise authorized by the warrant, all documents in a lawyer's possession must be sealed before being examined or seized.
Every effort must be made to contact the lawyer and the client when the search warrant is executed and, where the lawyer or the client cannot be contacted, a representative of the Bar should oversee the sealing and seizure of documents.
The investigating officer executing the warrant should report the efforts made to contact all potential privilege holders to the justice of the peace. These privilege holders should then be given a reasonable opportunity to assert a claim of privilege and, if that claim is contested, to have the issue judicially decided.
If notification of potential privilege holders is not possible, the lawyer who had custody of the documents seized, or another lawyer appointed either by the Law Society or by the court, should examine the documents to determine whether a claim of privilege should be asserted, and should be given a reasonable opportunity to do so.
The Attorney General may make submissions on the issue of privilege but should not be permitted to inspect the documents beforehand, and the prosecuting authority can only inspect the documents if and when it is determined by a judge that the documents are not privileged.
Where sealed documents are found not to be privileged, they may be used in the normal course of the investigation.
Where documents are found to be privileged, they are to be returned immediately to the holder of the privilege, or to a person designated by the court.

Digitized by Google

Date: 20130829
Docket: A-515-12
Citation: 2013 FCA 197
CORAM: PELLETIER J.A.
TRUDEL J.A.
MAINVILLE J.A.
BETWEEN:
DUNCAN THOMPSON
Appellant
and
THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE
Respondent
REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
TRUDEL J.A.

Introduction

[1] This appeal calls upon this Court to consider the solicitor-client privilege (or privilege) asserted by a lawyer who is the subject of enforcement proceedings pursuant to the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act).

[2] Mr. Thompson (or the appellant) has raised the shield of solicitor-client privilege to protect basic information regarding his accounts receivable, arguing that his clients' names and amounts owing are protected and out of the Minister of National Revenue's reach (Minister or respondent).

Background and Context

[3] More specifically, this appeal is from an Order of the Federal Court (T-1180-12) wherein Russell J. (the Judge) allowed the application of the Minister for a compliance order under subsection 231.7(1) of the Act.

[4] The Judge found that the appellant did not comply with the Requirement for Information (Requirement) provided to him by the respondent pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Act, which states:

231.2 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act (including the collection of any amount payable under this Act by any person), of a comprehensive tax information exchange agreement between Canada and another country or jurisdiction that is in force and has effect or, for greater certainty, of a tax treaty with another country, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as stipulated in the notice,	231.2 (1) Malgré les autres dispositions de la présente loi, le ministre peut, sous réserve du paragraphe (2) et pour l'application ou l'exécution de la présente loi (y compris la perception d'un montant payable par une personne en vertu de la présente loi), d'un accord général d'échange de renseignements fiscaux entre le Canada et un autre pays ou territoire qui est en vigueur et s'applique ou d'un traité fiscal conclu avec un autre pays, par avis signifié à personne ou envoyé par courrier recommandé ou certifié, exiger d'une personne, dans le délai raisonnable que précise l'avis :

Digitized by Google

(a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or	a) qu'elle fournisse tout renseignement ou tout renseignement supplémentaire, y compris une déclaration de revenu ou une déclaration supplémentaire;
(b) any document.	b) qu'elle produise des documents.

[5] As a result, the Judge ordered that "the respondent shall comply with the Requirement issued by the Minister and shall forthwith, and in any event not later than 30 days after being served with this Order, provide the information and documents [sought]" (Speaking Order, appeal book, volume 1, page 30 at paragraph 1). Hence the within appeal by Mr. Thompson, which I propose to allow in part, but for completely different reasons than those advanced by the appellant.

[6] Although I generally agree with the legal statements made by the Judge in his Speaking Order, I am of the view that the appellant's objections called for an intervention by the Federal Court to ensure that the question of privilege over individual client names was addressed before the release of the clients' accounts receivable information was ordered.

[7] The information and documents sought by the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) consist of:

> 1. A completed statement of your income and expenses, and assets and liabilities as of January 30, 2012 (form enclosed). The income and expense, and asset and liability statement includes any sole or joint income, expense, asset, or liability.
> 2. A current accounts receivable listing as of January 30, 2012.
> 3. Copies of all your bank statements, credit card statements, utility bill statements, gas and electric bill statements, loans statements and mortgage statements for sole and joint accounts for the period January 1, 2011 to December 31, 2011.
>
> (affidavit of Maria Van Dyk, collection officer with the Canada Revenue Agency, Exhibit A, Requirement date February 6, 2012, appeal book, volume 1, page 41).

[8] Mr. Thompson responded to the Requirement giving his explanation under six headings: Income; Expenses (personal and business); Assets as of January 30, 2012; Liabilities (excluding Canada Revenue Agency); Accounts Receivable Listing; and Statements (ibidem, Exhibit C, page 47).

[9] Following a review of the appellant's information, the CRA found that he had provided sufficient information only with regard to his income and business expenses. The CRA noted that no details were provided regarding his accounts receivable other than a total balance owing.

[10] Despite his failure to follow through with the Requirement under most headings, Mr. Thompson, both in this Court and below, has made solicitor-client privilege the focus of his objection to the Requirement. Amongst other arguments, he has raised section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 (Charter) alleging that the Requirement is akin to an unreasonable search or seizure. He has also filed a Notice of Constitutional Question pursuant to section 57 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. , 1985, c. F-7:

> Can Section 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act be interpreted, applied or enforced so as to require a Barrister and Solicitor who, himself, is the subject of the proceedings or inquiry by the Applicant (and not his clients), to divulge information about unnamed clients, which information is protected by the principles of solicitor-client privilege, found in the Legal Professions Act, R.S.A. 2000 c. L-8, the Rules of the Law Society of Alberta and the Law Society of Alberta Code of Conduct, and in the common law applicable to the Province of Alberta thereby causing that Barrister and Solicitor to violate his Code of Conduct, breach those Rules and contravene the Act, rendering him liable for serious penal and civil consequences? (appeal book, volume 2, page 521).

Digitized by Google

Standard of Review

[11] Even before discussing the Judge's Speaking Order and the parties' position, it is useful to state the applicable standard of review.

[12] The standard of correctness applies to questions of law, while the standard of palpable and overriding error applies to questions of fact and mixed fact and law: Canada (National Revenue) v. RBC Life Insurance Company, 2013 FCA 50 at paragraph 11. The interpretation of the Act and the legal approach to solicitor-client privilege are questions of law. They attract no deference. Most issues in this appeal are questions of law.

[13] With this said, I can immediately dispose of one of the ten grounds of appeal raised by the appellant in his memorandum of fact and law at paragraph 66 and following (ground of appeal E) :

> The Learned Justice erred in law by concluding under Section 231.7(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act that the Appellant had failed to provide all the information and documents sought by the Minister in the specific Requirement issued February 6, 2012, and improperly allowed the Minister to amend, change, amplify or expand the Requirement by ordering the Appellant to "provide additional information and documents sought by the Minister as set forth in the Affidavit of Maria Van Dyk" filed with this Application.

[14] I find that the Judge did not expand the Requirement. In his Speaking Order, the Judge states:

> My review of the evidence suggests to me that the [appellant] has not fully complied with the Minister's request and I do not think his arguments that it is not clear what the Minister wants, or that the Minister already has the information and documentation, stand up to scrutiny or are supported by the evidence. (Judge's Speaking Order, appeal book, volume 1, page 21 at paragraph 2).

[15] This is a finding of fact. The appellant has not convinced me that the Judge committed a reviewable error in concluding as he did.

[16] Neither did he convince me that it was not open to the Judge to order the appellant to provide "additional information and documents … as set out in the affidavit of Maria Van Dyk" where such information was not listed in the Requirement (ibidem, page 29 at paragraph 2).

[17] As I read this affidavit, it appears to me that the Minister is simply seeking full disclosure of the information and documents sought in the Requirement. The "additional" information and documents are, in reality, the documents related to the three categories of information and documents described in the Requirement (see paragraph [7] of these reasons), which the appellant has failed to provide in his response to the Requirement.

[18] The failure of the appellant to make full disclosure as requested by the Minister is what brought the parties to court. As soon as the Judge was satisfied under subsection 231.7(1) that (a) Mr. Thompson was required under section 231.2 to provide information or documents and did not do so; and (b) the information or document was not protected from disclosure by solicitor-client privilege within the meaning of subsection 232(1), he was entitled make the order that he did.

Digitized by Google

[19] The remaining nine grounds of appeal raised by the appellant all concern, in one way or another, the question of solicitor-client privilege. For the sake of convenience, I have regrouped them under the following three issues:

(1) Which party bore the evidentiary burden to establish that the information at issue was subject to privilege?

(2) Did the Court err in finding that the information requested by the respondent – information relating to the appellant's business accounts receivable, including the names and amounts owed by the appellant's client – consists of accounting records and is not subject to solicitor-client privilege?

(3) Did the Court err in finding that the decision does not infringe any privacy rights under section 8 of the Charter?

[20] I will return to these issues after reviewing the relevant portion of the Speaking Order under appeal, the general scope of the solicitor-client privilege and subsection 232(1) of the Act, which states:

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be such a communication.	« privilège des communications entre client et avocat » Droit qu'une personne peut posséder, devant une cour supérieure de la province où la question a pris naissance, de refuser de divulguer une communication orale ou documentaire pour le motif que celle-ci est une communication entre elle et son avocat en confidence professionnelle sauf que, pour l'application du présent article, un relevé comptable d'un avocat, y compris toute pièces justificative out tout chèque, ne peut être considéré comme une communication de cette nature.

[21] Finally, I shall dispose of the constitutional question.

The Judge's Speaking Order

[22] The Judge expressed his conclusion in these words:

> … I have considerable sympathy for the situation [Mr. Thompson] now finds himself in whereby his clients could face garnishee proceedings if their names are disclosed, which might come as a surprise to them and will certainly not assist the [appellant] who practices law in a small town … [H]owever I do not think the law supports [his] position. The information and documents that the Minister is seeking are simply financial records of the [appellant] and, in my view, are not privileged… (ibidem, appeal book, volume 1, pages 21-22 at paragraphs 3 and 4).

[23] Referring to Lavallee, Rackel & Heintz v. Canada (Attorney General); White, Ottenheimer & Baker v. Canada (Attorney General); R. v. Fink, 2002 SCC 61, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 209 [Lavallee], the Judge noted that clients' names are not always privileged. He found, as a matter of fact, that Mr. Thompson had provided no evidence to show that any particular client name should be protected and that Mr. Thompson had failed to establish that the financial records sought by the Minister constituted or contained information or documents properly protected by solicitor-client privilege.

Digitized by Google

[24] The Judge also considered the appellant's argument on section 8 of the Charter and dismissed it. Noting that Mr. Thompson conceded that section 8 protects against unjustified state intrusions on a person's reasonable expectation of privacy, the Judge observed that taxpayers have a very low expectation of privacy in their business records relevant to the determination of their tax liability, and that an expectation of privacy should not be confused with a duty of confidentiality.

[25] Furthermore, the Judge pointed out that duties of confidentiality pursuant to the regulatory directives of bodies such as the Law Society of Alberta cannot be relied on to invalidate a provision of the Act: Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3; Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, 2001 SCC 67, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 113. In any case, the Law Society of Alberta's Code of Conduct contains an explicit exception to the duty of confidentiality where "required by law or a court to do so": Rule 2.03(1)(b) Confidential Information (Judge's Speaking Order, appeal book, volume 1, page 27 at paragraph 22).

[26] Finally, relying on R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, the Judge stated that subsection 231.2(1) of the Act provides the least intrusive means to effectively monitor compliance with the Act. For the aforementioned reasons, and in light of the circumstances, the Judge concluded that both the provision of the Act and the Requirement met the requirements of section 8 of the Charter (ibidem at paragraphs 25-28).

The Position of the Parties

[27] Mr. Thompson's position is straightforward. He asserts that the names, addresses, phone numbers of clients and the amount that they owe their lawyers for legal services rendered are always privileged. They cannot form part of a lawyer's accounting records within the meaning of subsection 232(1) of the Act.

[28] Bills or statements of accounts are at the very core of the relationship between solicitors and clients. They are privileged. The Minister would be interfering in that unique relationship if she was allowed to enforce her Requirement. Amongst other consequences, the appellant would no longer be in a position to diminish the amount owed by a given client or write it off completely after service of garnishment proceedings by the Minister to this client.

[29] As a result, the appellant argues that the Judge took an incorrect and restrictive approach to the meaning of solicitor-client privilege and failed to give full effect to the common law principles of solicitor-client privilege set out in Canada (Privacy Commissioner) v. Blood Tribe Department of Health, 2008 SCC 44, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 574.

[30] Furthermore, the appellant argues that the Judge erred in applying the definition of "solicitor-client privilege" found at subsection 232(1) of the Act, reproduced above at paragraph [20], to the facts of this case. In his view, this definition applies only to matters arising under section 232 of the Act (entitled solicitor-client privilege) and not to a consideration of whether a compliance order should issue under section 231.7 of the Act.

[31] In any event, the appellant also states that the Judge erroneously prioritized the Act over the Legal Profession Act, R.S.A. 2000 c. L-8, the Rules and the Code of Conduct of the Law Society of Alberta, which he submits take precedence over the Act as matters of property and civil rights in the province.

[32] Finally, as mentioned above, the appellant invokes section 8 of the Charter. Relying upon the case of Baron v. Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416, a case in which the Supreme Court of Canada found section 231.3 of the Act of no force and effect and in violation of section 8, the appellant opines that the same reasoning applies to subsection 231.2(1) of the Act. He submits that sections 231 through 232 of the Act interfere with the administration of justice in a manner comparable with subsection 231(3). He states:

Digitized by Google

> … the Minister's attempted interference with the clients' guaranteed right and freedom regarding "solicitor-client privilege" can not [sic] be "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" as is required by Section 1 of the [Charter] and as provided in Section 8 thereof (appellant's memorandum of fact and law, page 26, Ground of Appeal "J").

[33] The respondent fully supports the Order of the Federal Court. She asserts that the Judge made no reviewable error, whether in law or in fact.

Solicitor-Client Privilege

[34] Solicitor-client privilege is one of the most revered doctrines under the common law, described by the Supreme Court of Canada as "one of the most ancient and powerful privileges known to our jurisprudence". It is generally seen as a "fundamental and substantive rule of law": R. v. National Post, 2010 SCC 16, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 477 at paragraph 39, quoting R. v. McClure, 2001 SCC 14, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 445 [McClure] discussed by Professor Adam Dodek in "Solicitor-Client Privilege in Canada, Challenges for the 21st Century" (Discussion Paper for the Canadian Bar Association, February 2011).

[35] In McClure at paragraph 35, Major J. wrote:

> … solicitor-client privilege must be as close to absolute as possible to ensure public confidence and retain relevance. As such, it will only yield in certain clearly defined circumstances, and does not involve a balancing of interests on a case-by-case basis.

[36] Court reiterated this position in Lavallee, adding:

> Accordingly, this Court is compelled in my view to adopt stringent norms to ensure its protection (at paragraph 36).

[37] More recently, the Supreme Court stated as follows in R. v. Cunningham, 2010 SCC 10, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 331 at paragraph 26, [Cunningham]:

> It need hardly be said that solicitor-client privilege is a fundamental tenet of our legal system. The solicitor-client relationship is integral to the administration of justice; privilege encourages the free and full disclosure by the client required to ensure effective legal representation.

[38] While the Supreme Court of Canada has adopted a firm stance on the importance of privilege, it has also consistently recognized that the claim of privilege is not absolute. As stated above, solicitor-client privilege will yield in clearly defined circumstances. Of relevance to the within appeal are the following limitations to the protection against disclosure afforded by privilege.

[39] Firstly, the privilege belongs to the client, not the lawyer: Smith v. Jones, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 455 at paragraph 46. It can only be asserted or waived by the client or through his or her informed consent (Lavallee at paragraph 39). It "serves to both protect the essential interests of clients and ensure the smooth operation of Canada's legal system…": Foster Wheeler Power Co. v. Société intermunicipale de gestion et d'élimination des déchets (SIGED) inc., 2004 SCC 18, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 456 at paragraph 34 [Foster Wheeler] [Emphasis added.]

[40] Secondly, solicitor-client privilege applies only to a communication between a lawyer and client, which is of a confidential character, and which is directly related to the seeking, formulating or giving of legal advice. Put differently, privilege will not attach to communications in which legal advice is neither sought nor offered or where the communication is not intended to be confidential. The purpose of privilege is to ensure that clients will not fear that information given in confidence to their lawyers may later be disclosed and used against them: Canada (Combines Investigation Act) (Re), [1975] F.C. 184, 55 D.L.R. (3d) 713 at paragraph 12 approved and adopted in Solosky v. The Queen [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821, page 834).

Digitized by Google

[41] Thirdly, courts have determined that solicitor-client privilege protects client names, but only in certain circumstances. In R. v. Budd, 2002, [2002] O.T.C. 893, the Ontario Superior Court canvassed Canadian case law and authorities on the question of privilege over client names, and concluded that privilege protects client names where the identity of the client "constitutes the foundation of the retainer" or "the essence of the consultation" (at paragraphs 14-15). The Court determined that the general rule is that client names are not per se privileged in Canadian law.

[42] In the same year that Budd was decided, the Supreme Court concluded to the same effect in Lavallee. It stated: "The name of the client may very well be protected by solicitor-client privilege, although this is not always the case": See also Thorson v. John Jones (1973), 38 D.L.R. (3d) 312 (B.C.S.C.) and R. D. Manes and M. P. Silver, Solicitor-Client Privilege in Canadian Law (Markham, Ont: Butterworths, 1993) at page 141, quoted in Lavallee.

[43] Lastly, privilege is distinct from, and narrower than, the duty of confidentiality. The appellant relies on the duty of confidentiality he owes his clients pursuant to the Law Society of Alberta's Rules and its Code of Conduct. However, courts and law societies recognize the distinction between the duty of confidentiality and solicitor-client privilege. The Law Society of Alberta's Code of Conduct includes this commentary under Rule 2.03 concerning confidentiality:

> This rule must be distinguished from the evidentiary rule of lawyer and client privilege, which is also a constitutionally protected right, concerning oral or documentary communications passing between the client and the lawyer. The ethical rule is wider and applies without regard to the nature or source of the information or the fact that others may share the knowledge.

[44] The Supreme Court has similarly distinguished between the two concepts. In Cunningham, the Court stated that its reasons, which "address the application, or non-application, of solicitor-client privilege" should not be taken as affecting "counsel's ethical duty of confidentiality" (at paragraph 31). Similarly, in Foster Wheeler, the Court distinguished between "the scope of the lawyer's obligation of confidentiality" (i.e., the duty of confidentiality) on the one hand, and "the application of the immunity from disclosure designed to protect that confidentiality" (i.e., solicitor- client privilege) on the other (at paragraph 29).

Subsection 232(1) of the Act

[45] As mentioned above, subsection 232(1) defines solicitor-client privilege for the purposes of the Act. For ease of reference, I reproduce it again:

"solicitor-client privilege" means the right, if any, that a person has in a superior court in the province where the matter arises to refuse to disclose an oral or documentary communication on the ground that the communication is one passing between the person and the person's lawyer in professional confidence, except that for the purposes of this section an accounting record of a lawyer, including any supporting voucher or cheque, shall be deemed not to be	« privilège des communications entre client et avocat » Droit qu'une personne peut posséder, devant une cour supérieure de la province où la question a pris naissance, de refuser de divulguer une communication orale ou documentaire pour le motif que celle-ci est une communication entre elle et son avocat en confidence professionnelle sauf que, pour l'application du présent article, un relevé comptable d'un avocat, y compris toute pièces

Digitized by Google

such a communication.

justificative out tout chèque, ne peut être considéré comme une communication de cette nature.

[46] This definition is in line with the teachings of the Supreme Court of Canada on the law of solicitor-client privilege. It protects from disclosure those communications passing between solicitor and client in professional confidence, i.e. communications that involve seeking and providing legal advice. I fail to see how it applies to accounting records and supporting vouchers and cheques, which constitute, as a general rule, evidence of an act or transaction rather than a privileged communication: See also Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.) v. Jakabfy, 2013 FC 706 at paragraph 11 [Jakabfy]; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.) v. Singh Lyn Ragonetti Bindal LLP, 2005 FC 1538 at paragraph 18; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.) v. Reddy, 2006 FC 277; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.) v. Cornfield, 2007 FC 436; Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.) v. Currie, 2008 FC 237. Of course, if for some unusual circumstances a lawyer's accounting records contain privileged communications, these communications would remain subject to judicial scrutiny under the Act since legislative language governing the production of documents must be read so that it does not include communications subject to solicitor-client privilege: Canada (Privacy Commissioner) v. Blood Tribe Department of Health, above at paragraph 11.

[47] I also fail to understand the appellant's argument as to the non-applicability of the definition of solicitor-client privilege found in the Act to his case. The Minister has instituted her proceedings under subsection 231.7(1) because the appellant had failed to comply with a Requirement served pursuant to subsection 231.2(1) of the Act. Paragraph 231.7(1)(b) refers specifically to that definition when stating the Judge's task when presented with a summary application for a compliance order.

[48] I now turn to the three specific issues identified earlier at paragraph [19] of these reasons.

The Burden of Proof

[49] Mr. Thompson raised the shield of solicitor-client privilege. It is the party asserting privilege that bears the evidentiary burden to establish the claim on a balance of probabilities.

[50] Mr. Thompson did not. To the contrary, the Judge found that "on the record before [him], there is nothing to suggest that any client's name requires the protection of privilege" (Judge's Speaking Order, appeal book, volume 1, page 22 at paragraph 5). This factual finding is fully supported by the evidence, especially Mr. Thompson's affidavit, which contains only generalities about his legal practice (appellant's affidavit, appeal book, volume 2, page 335 and ff.).

[51] One of the difficulties with the appellant's position that names of clients are always privileged is that it runs contrary to the foundation of the taxation system in Canada, which is a self-assessing and self-reporting system. On his theory, the CRA could never seek and obtain information from a solicitor or barrister about the revenue generated by his practice or otherwise that would enable the CRA to ensure compliance or determine non-compliance by a lawyer. Indeed, the appellant goes as far as arguing that privilege covers the financial institutions who hold registered mortgages on his own personal interests because he provides legal services to these financial institutions where he also has bank accounts.

[52] In my view, the appellant could not succeed on his argument by simply raising the shield of privilege on behalf of his clients whose names the Minister was seeking and by hiding behind it. The appellant is a taxpayer whose compliance with the Act the Minister is fully entitled to verify. Had Mr. Thompson raised solicitor-client privilege until he had further opportunity to consult with his clients and assess their rights, and then provided specifics in his affidavit explaining why some of the names might attract privilege, he would have been in a better position to persuade the Judge that his position might be justified.

Digitized by Google

[53] It is also noteworthy that the Court observed that there was no indication, on record, that the appellant had even informed his clients that he was asserting privilege on their behalf. Rather, it appears that he is attempting to protect his clients from knowledge of the whole matter. Once again, the Judge found that the appellant "has provided no evidence to show that any particular client name should be protected in this case" (Judge's Speaking Order, appeal book, volume 1, page 25 at paragraph 14). I have not been persuaded that the Judge committed reviewable errors when he made these findings.

The Information Requested is not Subject to Solicitor-Client Privilege

[54] Interestingly, case law provides a very recent example of a barrister and solicitor whose clients were facing a compliance order under section 231.7 of the Act. In Jakabfy, Mr. Jakabfy was found to have acted appropriately in his dealings with his former clients (the Lavallees) and with the Minister. Upon receipt of the Requirement addressed to him, seeking information as to how Mr. Lavallee had distributed the proceeds from the sale of a property, Mr. Jakabfy wrote to his clients and sought their specific instructions. He then, by sworn affidavit, informed the CRA of his clients' refusal to disclose the relevant information. In the end, the Federal Court Judge ordered Mr. Jakabfy to provide the information in the form of, inter alia, trust account ledger, cheque journal, statement of adjustments or disbursements, copies of invoices or receipts for payments. All these documents were found not to be privileged.

[55] In Mr. Thompson's case, the Minister seeks similar documents, more particularly a "current accounts receivable listing". In his memorandum of fact and law, the appellant argues that names of clients are as privileged as statements of account. He asserts that, contrary to what the Judge found, client names do not form part of an accounting record of a lawyer (at paragraphs 35-37). I disagree with the appellant.

[56] Section 230 of the Act generally defines the terms "Records and Books of Account". They are documents containing "such information as will enable the taxes payable under this Act or the taxes or other amounts that should have been deducted, withheld or collected to be determined". The particular situation of lawyers is addressed in subsection 230(2.1) in these terms:

(2.1) For greater certainty, the records and books of account required by subsection 230(1) to be kept by a person carrying on business as a lawyer (within the meaning assigned by subsection 232(1)) whether by means of a partnership or otherwise, include all accounting records of the lawyer, including supporting vouchers and cheques.	(2.1) Il est entendu que les registres et les livres de comptes qui doivent, en vertu du paragraphe (1), être tenus par une personne exploitant une entreprise consistant dans l'exercice de la profession d'avocat (au sens du paragraphe 232(1)) en société de personnes ou autrement comprennent tous les registres comptables de l'avocat, y compris les pièces justificatives et les chèques.

[57] Statements of account are not the same as a lawyer's accounting records. The latter consist essentially of statements of fact such as the name of the client, the amount billed for the professional services, the payments received and the amounts still owed. Statements of account, by contrast, may reveal a history of the file. They may contain information including the nature of the consultation, a summary of communications between solicitor and client, and so on, which may be covered by solicitor-client privilege.

Digitized by Google

[58] In this case, the Minister is not seeking the information contained in statements of account. She seeks purely factual information consisting of the names of the clients and the amounts of money owed by these clients individually.

[59] At the hearing of this appeal, Mr. Thompson admitted that he could institute legal proceedings to recover his fees from an uncooperative client. In light of the public nature of court proceedings, he would be obliged to reveal an uncooperative client's identity and amounts owing in order to recover these fees. On that answer alone, it is difficult to accept his position that this information is subject to solicitor-client privilege. I note that the Law Society of Alberta's Code of Conduct provides for circumstances where this type of information may be disclosed. Rule 2.03(5) states:

> 2.03(5) A lawyer may disclose confidential information in order to establish or collect the lawyer's fees, but must not disclose more information than is required.

[60] Consistent with this example, what Mr. Thompson is asked to provide is no more than the information he would need to include in a Statement of Claim to disclose a cause of action.

[61] In light of the foregoing, I conclude that the Judge did not err in finding that the information requested in the Requirement was not subject to solicitor-client privilege.

Privacy Rights not Infringed under Section 8 of the Charter

[62] The appellant asserts that the Minister's attempted interference with clients' guaranteed rights in relation to solicitor-client privilege violates section 8 and is not saved by section 1 of the Charter. As the appellant has failed to establish that the Court erred in finding that a class privilege does not attach to the accounting records and client names requested by the Minister, there is no interference with any rights in relation to privilege, and this argument cannot succeed.

[63] The appellant also refers to the case of Baron v. Canada, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 416 in which the Supreme Court of Canada struck down section 231.3 of the Act, because the provision interfered with judicial discretion as to whether or not a search warrant should be issued to enter, search any building, receptacle or place and seize any document or thing that may afford evidence as to the commission of an offence under this Act. However, in the circumstances at bar, the appellant points to no evidence that the Court's decision-making ability is fettered by the wording of the provisions at issue.

[64] Further, the appellant's analogy with the physical seizure of documents in the course of executing a warrant does not apply on the facts. There is no entry of tax officials onto the appellant's premises. The Requirement consists solely of a demand for production of documents. Finally, I note a recent decision from the Superior Court of Quebec wherein a Judge of that Court declared unconstitutional and inoperable sections 231.2, 231.7 and subsection 232(1)(5) of the Act as far as Quebec lawyers and notaries were concerned: Chambre des notaires du Québec c. Canada (Procureur general), 2010 J.Q. no. 8868; [2010] QCCS 4215.

[65] I am unmoved by this decision. Firstly, a Quebec Superior Court decision is not binding on this Court. That decision is under appeal and no decision on the appeal has been rendered to date (appeal filed on October 7, 2010, 500-09-021073-101). Secondly, the facts of that case are distinguishable as they involve information requirements issued by the CRA to a number of Quebec notaries in order to obtain information and documents concerning their clients. The Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q. c. C-12 and Quebec's Code of Ethics of Notaries, R.R.Q., c. N-3, r. 2 and Code of Ethics of Advocates, R.R.Q., c. B-1, r. 3 are also relied upon. They are not applicable to the appellant.

Digitized by Google

[66] As a result, I conclude that the appellant points to no palpable error in the Judge's reasons on the Charter questions that would justify our intervention.

The Notice of Constitutional Question

[67] The need for a notice of constitutional question is linked to the remedy sought by a party: Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage) v. Mikisew Cree First Nation, 2004 FCA 66, [2004] 3 F.C.R. 436. Section 57 of the Federal Courts Act states that the constitutional validity, applicability, or operability of an Act of Parliament shall not be judged unless notice has been served. Neither in his Notice of Appeal nor in the Order Sought section of his memorandum of fact and law does the appellant seek a finding that the provisions of the Act under which the Minister acted in this case are invalid, inapplicable or inoperable as required by section 57. As a result, it is not necessary to address the question raised in the notice of constitutional question.

Conclusion

[68] As announced at the outset of these reasons, I propose to partially allow the appeal although, as did the Judge, I dismiss all of Mr. Thompson's arguments. In my respectful view, however, the Judge's order was premature with respect to the accounts receivable listing. Once he had decided that Mr. Thompson's position on that issue could not stand, the Judge had to take the appropriate steps to verify whether solicitor-client privilege protected any of Mr. Thompson's clients individually. The appellant had built his case on an erroneous understanding of the law of solicitor-client privilege. As a result, he had made the blanket statement that clients' names are always privileged. On a proper understanding of privilege and the construction of the statutory provisions and rules at play, it is possible that some of the appellant's clients' names are protected by solicitor-client privilege. If that is the case, these clients ought to have the opportunity to assert this privilege, and Mr. Thompson should be given the chance to lay the proper evidentiary foundation on their behalf.

[69] There is no specific obligation on a lawyer to advise a client when asserting a right on his or her behalf, when this right is in jeopardy. That being said, provincial law societies impose general obligations on lawyers, or make recommendations to lawyers, which suggest that the appellant should be asserting and pursuing the claims of solicitor-client privilege after having informed his clients and having obtained their instructions in this regard.

[70] With respect, I find that the Judge, as guardian of the law, should have fashioned a remedy addressing the critical issue of privilege before making his Order. The Act provides for the compliance order to be made by a Judge ensuring enough flexibility and discretion for him or her to remain the protector of the rights attached to solicitor-client privilege.

[71] As he did not fashion such a remedy, I propose to return the file to the Federal Court for a new hearing, on the question of the accounts receivable listing. Mr. Thompson may then have the opportunity to get his clients' instructions and, on the basis of these reasons, may file new sworn affidavits explaining why individual clients' names are privileged, if in fact this continues to be the case. I will not impose a time limit to do so and leave it up to the Federal Court to set the timelines for the parties to exchange further affidavits or materials. However, I should add that the clients on whose behalf the appellant is claiming privilege should produce their own affidavits explaining the history of their accounts. Copies of such affidavits should be served on the respondent, with clients' names redacted.

[72] As for the rest of the missing information and documents, as listed in Ms. Maria Van Dyk's affidavit (appeal book, volume 1, page 35 and ff.), the Judge's Speaking Order stands. The missing information and documents shall be produced as ordered and in an unredacted version within thirty (30) days of the judgment to issue. For the sake of clarity, the relevant paragraphs of Ms. Van Dyk's affidavit describing the missing information and documents are reproduced in an Annex to these reasons.

Digitized by Google

Costs

[73] Considering the result of this appeal, I would order that each party bear its own costs.

"Johanne Trudel"
J.A.
"I agree
J.D. Denis Pelletier J.A."
"I agree
Robert M. Mainville J.A."

Digitized by Google

ANNEX

(Ms. Maria Van Dyk's sworn affidavit of June 21, 2012)

8. […]

(a) N/A

(b) N/A

(c) Personal Expenses: the [appellant] provided insufficient information. The [appellant] provided a listing of various discretionary expenses that include food/groceries, life insurance, household repair, vacation, charitable donations, clothing, memberships, recreation/entertainment, gifts to family, miscellaneous spending and medical & prescription. He indicated that his expenditures for the utilities, satellite and internet were detailed on the statements he provided to the CRA. However, the information provided is in the form of numerous redacted utility and banking documents, making it impossible to ascertain the various expenses. No information was provided for the following:

(i) mortgage payments;
(ii) property tax payments;
(iii) phone payment (home phone & personal cell);
(iv) cable payment;
(v) internet payment;
(vi) utility payment (water / sewage);
(vii) gas & electric payment;
(viii) home and auto insurance payments;
(ix) vehicle payments;
(x) gas and oil payments (for vehicle);
(xi) vehicle maintenance payments;
(xii) credit card payments;
(xiii) bank loan payments;
(xiv) other loan payments; and
(xv) any other expenses he may have but has not reported with his response to the Requirement;

(d) Assets: the [appellant] provided insufficient information in regards to his assets, as follows:

(i) the [appellant] stated he has a joint interest in 80 acres but failed to provide the location of the 80 acres. Furthermore, no information was provided as to whether his personal residence is located on the 80 acres or where otherwise the personal residence might be located;
(ii) the [appellant] stated that he owns six motor vehicles, but has failed to list the motor vehicles, with their respective VIN and value for each vehicle;
(iii) the [appellant] stated that he has three recreational vehicles but failed to list them or provide any identifying features; and
(iv) the [appellant] stated that he has $1,100 on deposit at the bank, but failed to disclose which bank the deposit is with. The bank statements provided were redacted. The information the [appellant] redacted from the bank statements include: bank information, transit number, bank number, bank account number and transaction details;

(e) Liabilities: the [appellant] failed to provide sufficient information regarding his liabilities as follows:

(i) the [appellant] stated he had credit card debt of $33,000 but did not provide details as to which credit card companies with which he carries

Digitized by Google

debt. The [appellant] redacted the relevant information in the credit card statements including the credit card issuer, account number and transaction details;

(ii) the [appellant] claimed to have $80,000 in payables but has not broken this balance down or associated this balance with business or personal payables; and

(iii) the [appellant] provided total balances in regard to mortgages and a statement concerning a "judgment debt" but failed to provide any supporting details or any supporting documents that show what payments he is making on the judgment debt or mortgage.

CRA Internal Operations Manual - Requests for Information

(see below)

Digitized by Google

REQUIREMENTS FOR INFORMATION 1

Overview 1

Legislation 1

Background Information 1
Financial Institutions that Accept Service of RFI Letters 1
Lapse of RFI's 1

Policy 2
Initial Informal Request for Information 2
Cases Where an Informal Request is Not Issued 3
Restricted Use of an RFI 3
When to Issue a Written RFI 3
Cases Where it is Necessary to Issue a Second RFI 4
ELCS RFI Letters 4
Time Allowed to Comply 4
Dates Required Within RFIs 4
The "Re-Line" 5
RFI to Financial Institution 6
Joint Accounts 7
Other RFI Situations 7
RFI and Unnamed Persons 7
Approval Authority 9
Situations Where Client Privilege is Claimed 9
Solicitor-Client Privilege 9
Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client 10
Information in Respect of a Lawyer who is the Subject of Collection Action 11
Service of an RFI Letter 11
Service of the RFI at Designated Branch 11
Personal Service of an RFI Letter 12
Circumstances When Personal Service Should be Effected on Banks 12
Obtaining Information from the Bank of Canada 12
Requests for Payment by Third Party for Costs Incurred 12
Extension of Time 13
RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders) 14

Procedures 14
RFI Letters Issued to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area 15
RFI Issued by Mail to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area 15
Personal Delivery or Servicing of an RFI to a Third Party Out of the TSO Area 16
Assistance Required by the Investigations Division in Another TSO 16
Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client 17
Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of a Lawyer Who is the Subject of Collection Action 18
Completing an RFI Letter 18
Identifying the Client 19
Identifying an Individual 19
Identifying a Proprietor 19
Identifying a Partnership 19
Identifying a Corporation 20
Completion of the "Re-Line" 21
Date of Director's Signature 21

Digitized by Google

Time Allowed for Compliance 21
Time Period for RFI 22
Suggested Verses for RFIs 22
Phrases for Information/Documents Required from an Individual 23
Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Financial Institutions 23
Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Insurance Companies 24
Phrases for a Review of Books and Records 25
Phrases for Information/Documents Required from a Credit Card Company 25
Phrases for a Review of Books and Records of Paydac Accounts 25
RFI Approval Levels 26
Number of Copies Required 26
Completing an RFI When Serving a Designated Branch 27
Personal Service of an RFI 27
Identifying Yourself 28
Service of the RFI 28
Documenting Service 28
The Need for a Witness 29
Completing an Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605 29
Swearing of the Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605 30
Non Compliance With an RFI Letter 30
Prosecution Action 30
Compliance Order 31
Non-Compliance by a Provincial Ministry 31
RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders) 31
Completing Approval for Prosecution 32

Resource Material 33

Digitized by Google

Requirements for Information

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

This chapter provides particulars regarding the issuance of Requirements to Provide Information and Documents (RFI), to financial institutions such as Banks, Caisses Populaires, Credit Unions, Trust Companies, as well as to various third party sources.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation related to Requirements for Information (RFI):

- Income Tax Act, section: 231.2, 231.5, 231.6, 231.7, 233.1
- Excise Tax Act, subsection: 289(1), 289(2), 289(3), 289(4), 289(5), 289(6), 289.1(1), 293
- Excise Act (2001), section: 208(1)
- Customs Act, subsection: 43(1)
- Air Travellers Security Charge Act subsection: 38(1)
- Canada Pension Plan subsection: 25(5), 25(7)
- Employment Insurance Act subsection: 88(5), 88(7)

Background Information

This section identifies background information related to Requirements for Information (RFI):

- Financial Institutions that Accept Service of RFI Letters
- Lapse of RFI's

Financial Institutions that Accept Service of RFI Letters

The following institutions accept service at their branches of RFI Letters:

- all chartered banks
- caisses populaires
- credit unions
- trust companies

Lapse of RFI's

Technically, an RFI never lapses. However, compliance with an RFI is considered complete when all the details, available by the third party or at or through a branch bank at the time of service, have been provided for the names given.

Digitized by Google

Policy

This section identifies policies related to Requirements for Information:

- Initial Informal Request for Information
- Cases Where an Informal Request is Not Issued
- Restricted Use of an RFI
- When to Issue a Written RFI
- Cases Where it is Necessary to Issue a Second RFI
- ELCS RFI Letters
- Time Allowed to Comply
- Dates Required Within RFIs
- The "Re-Line"
- RFI and Unnamed Persons
- Approval Authority
- Situations Where Client Privilege is Claimed
- Solicitor-Client Privilege
- Service of an RFI Letter
- Service of the RFI at Designated Branch
- Personal Service of an RFI Letter
- Circumstances When Personal Service Should be Effected on Banks
- Obtaining Information from the Bank of Canada
- Requests for Payment by Third Party for Costs Incurred
- Extension of Time
- RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders)

Initial Informal Request for Information

It is recommended that when requesting information for the first time from a third party source or from the tax debtor, a written information request letter be sent. Issue ELCS letter 19641 prior to proceeding with an RFI letter. However, do not issue a request letter if information or documents are required from a financial institution. Proceed directly to the issuance of an RFI.

Digitized by Google

Cases Where an Informal Request Is Not Issued

An informal written request for information is made prior to proceeding with a formal RFI letter except in cases where:

- it is believed that a formal request would serve no purpose
- the information is required on an urgent basis, or
- the letters are issued to financial institutions and trust, savings, loan and mortgage companies, investment companies

Restricted Use of an RFI

The issuance of an RFI to a financial institution, such as a bank, regarding one or more of its customers, is a serious step. It is serious from the bank's viewpoint because of time, expense and that valuable customers are involved and because the RFI is enforceable under the law. It is serious from the tax debtor's viewpoint because it may adversely affect his credit rating or otherwise strain his relationship with the financial institution.

Therefore, the use of an RFI should be limited. Refer to the section When to Issue a Written RFI for further detail.

When to Issue a Written RFI

The issuance of RFIs to institutions are to be closely controlled and their use limited to these situations:

- the information required is essential to the investigation
- the amount of the debt is substantial
- there is evidence that the tax debtor is uncooperative or is using evasive tactics to avoid payment of tax
- it is necessary to prove non-compliance with a Requirement to Pay or non-arms length transfer
- the information is required on an urgent basis
- the information cannot be obtained from other sources and is so clearly essential to the investigation that prosecution would be warranted in the event of non-compliance
- investigations cases where fraud is established or seriously suspected
- an urgent payroll examination is required and the Trust Examiner has been unsuccessful in gaining access to the books and records
- the Agency is a substantial creditor within an insolvency proceeding and information is required to confirm the legitimacy of an insolvency/proposal
- information is required to confirm the validity of any type of Memorandum Assessment being considered

Digitized by Google

Cases Where it is Necessary to Issue a Second RFI

Issue a second RFI when either:

- a second investigation into the affairs of a tax debtor is opened some time after the conclusion of the first investigation, or
- when a tax debtor, named in the RFI, makes use of an alias not set out in that RFI

Some scenarios may necessitate the involvement of the Department of Justice or our Investigation Section. Therefore, all scenarios must be reviewed on a case-by-case basis with the available facts used to determine the best course of action. Keep in mind that your main consideration should be that of perfecting proper service in order to avoid potential problems if the prosecution process becomes a necessity later on.

For further details refer to the sections Personal Service of an RFI Letter and Extension of Time.

ELCS RFI Letters

The following are the ELCS system RFI letters:

- ELCS letters 19647: Formal Requirement for Information
- ELCS letters 19646: Requirement for Production of Books and Records
- ELCS letters 19648: Requirement to Produce Information and Documents for Financial Institutions
- ELCS letters 80789: Requirement to Provide Documents or Information for an RRSP

For further information regarding ELCS letter 80789 refer to Communication ARD-2003-004, entitled Funds held in RRSPs.

Time Allowed to Comply

RFI letters have successfully been attacked in court because the time allowed for compliance was unreasonable. The tax debtor or a third party cannot be expected to drop everything in order to comply immediately with an RFI letter. Terms such as "forthwith" or "without delay" are unacceptable. The length of time to comply will be dictated by such factors as the number of documents, availability of information or documents, and number of tax years involved. If there is a possibility of error, it should be that too much time rather than too little time was allowed. Normally, an RFI letter will allow thirty days for compliance.

RFI letters to financial institutions will normally allow a time limit of thirty days to comply. The thirty days is pre-printed on the Requirement to Provide Information and Documents form (T375 or T375A), however the ELCS forms allow any number of days to be entered. It is recommended that discretion be used when allocating the number of days required to respond.

For further details, refer to Time Allowed for Compliance.

Dates Required Within RFIs

RFI letters must bear the date on which the authorized person signs the letter. In order to allow the full number of days for compliance, TSOs should estimate the number of days as follows:

Digitized by Google

- the day which marks the start of the time limit is not counted, but the due date is counted
- non-juridical days are counted but when the last day is a non-juridical day, the time limit is extended to the next following juridical day

The RFI letter must also include the date of service as the opening paragraph of the RFI document states "from the date of delivery." Therefore, the RFI must have two dates indicated on the document.

- date of Director's signature or stamp
- date of service on the party

These dates must be indicated on the document to show the Courts that non-compliance has occurred when it comes to prosecuting for failure to comply with an RFI. As a result, it is suggested that the Collection Officer estimate the date of when the authorized person will sign or stamp the RFI. It is then recommended that the officer date stamp the RFI when perfecting service or estimate the number of days required to effect personal service or registration delivery and add this time to the number of days allowed to respond.

For more details refer to Completing an RFI Letter.

The "Re-Line"

The Agency currently faces numerous challenges from various third parties regarding the issuance of Requirements for Information (RFIs).

To address these issues, changes have been made to the wording of all RFIs to minimize further legal challenges.

The RFI letters available on ELCS (19646, 19647, and 19648) have two "Re-line" options available for completion. These "Re-line" options must also be included within all non-ELCS based RFIs currently in use.

They are as follows:

1. Re: "X"
   - for taxpayer(s) who are the subject of an RFI where the RFI precedes the assessment itself
2. Re: The Tax Liability of "X"
   - for taxpayers who are the subject of an RFI with an assessed liability

     Note: There are no issues of confidentiality when selecting "Re-line" option number two as the Agency is entitled to divulge the fact that the subject of the RFI holds a tax liability.

Only the tax debtor who is the subject of the collection investigation and is liable or about to be liable to pay tax, should be added to the selected "Re-line."

Digitized by Google

Please refer to Appendix "A" Examples 1 & 2, within Communication ARD-2004-044, entitled Requirement for Information (RFI), Differentiating Taxpayer(s) who are the Subject of Collection Action from Co-Account Holders and Others.

All other parties who are not the subject of the collection action, should be identified in the body of the RFI.

Therefore an "introductory phrase" in the body of all RFIs must be present and read as follows:

"The information sought under this Requirement for Information is

- "held by" or "in respect of" (insert the person's name who we seek information on)
- "in respect of the account held by (insert name of account holder)"

Refer to Appendix "A" Example 5, within Communication ARD-2004-044, entitled Requirement for Information (RFI), Differentiating Taxpayer(s) who are the Subject of Collection Action from Co-Account Holders and Others.

Related Topics:

- RFI to Financial Institution
- Joint Accounts
- Other RFI Situations

RFI to Financial Institution

Recently, numerous financial institutions have not properly complied with our RFIs due to a wording issue. Changes have been made to ELCS letter 19648 to resolve this issue.

ELCS letter 19648 previously required information from financial institutions "in respect of the account held by..." This RFI letter has been amended to allow a collector the option to select one of the following:

1. "in respect of..."
   - This option should be used where the collector is requesting all information related to the dealings of the named taxpayer(s).
2. "in respect of the accounts held by..."
   - This option should be used where we are trying to verify the existence of bank accounts held by the named taxpayer(s).

For further details refer to Communication ARD-2005-039 entitled, Change Made to ELCS versa 19648-Requirement for Information to Financial Institution.

Where a taxpayer who is the subject of a collection action has been identified by the selected "Re-line", and the information is being requested from a bank or credit union, and the information sought relates to, for example, a company with which the taxpayer is associated or the taxpayer's spouse, neither of which have a tax liability; the company or the taxpayer's spouse should be identified in the body of the RFI but not the "Re-line."

Digitized by Google

For further details, please review Appendix "A" Example 5, within Communication ARD-2004-044, entitled Requirement for Information (RFI), Differentiating Taxpayer(s) Who are the Subject of Collection Action from Co-Account Holders and Others.

Joint Accounts

In a "joint account" situation, other co-account holders, who are not the subject of collection action or information gathering should not be added to the "Re-line." Rather, they should be included instead in the body of the RFI as part of the bank account description. The "introductory phrase" cited above in the section, The "Re-Line", should be used for this purpose.

In a "joint account" situation, the completed introductory phrase should read:

"The information sought under this Requirement for Information and Documents is in respect of the account held by "X", "Y", and "Z"."

Please note that "X" would appear in the selected "Re-line" in addition to the introductory phrase or "account description" in the body of the RFI.

This change responds to the need to differentiate between taxpayers who are the subject of collection or information gathering action and co-account holders who may not be.

Clearly distinguishing between persons who are the subject of collection or information gathering action and co-account holders should help minimize the rejection of RFIs or subsequent compliance orders on the grounds that the RFIs are seeking information on an "unknown person."

For further details, please review Appendix "A" Example 3, within Communication ARD-2004-044, entitled Requirement for Information (RFI), Differentiating Taxpayer(s) Who are the Subject of Collection Action from Co-Account Holders and Others.

Other RFI Situations

Where the taxpayer who is the subject of collection action has been identified by the selected "Re-line" but the information is being requested from a third party who does not have a tax liability, for example the taxpayer's employer or business associate; the third party should be identified in the body of the RFI but not in the "Re-line."

For further details, please review Appendix "A" Example 4, within Communication ARD-2004-044, entitled Requirement for Information (RFI), Differentiating Taxpayer(s) Who are the Subject of Collection Action from Co-Account Holders and Others.

Where exceptional circumstances exist not covered by Communication ARD-2004-044, please contact the Department of Justice prior to issuing an RFI for further guidance.

RFI and Unnamed Persons

In the context of collection action in respect of an identified taxpayer, on numerous occasions Collectors will need to obtain information such as client lists, the names of persons or businesses to whom the taxpayer has paid or received money or the names of parties with whom the taxpayer may have entered into a contract for the lease or purchase of goods and services. In short, persons or businesses that are "unknown" to the collector.

In respect of "unknown persons", recent case law has impacted the effectiveness of an RFI where that document may divulge the identity of an unnamed person.

Digitized by Google

In the case Minister of National Revenue v. Banque Toronto Dominion (2004 FCA 359), the Federal Court of Appeal (FCA) stated than an RFI issued under subsection 231.2(1) of the ITA could not compel a third party to provide information which would divulge the identity of an unnamed person. The FCA further directed the CRA to seek a "judicial authorization" under the provisions of subsection 231.2(2) and (3) of the ITA when faced with type of situation. The Court also recognized however, that in practical terms this would be not possible to do, since the same subsections stipulate that the unnamed persons in question must be themselves under investigation (which would not be the case).

In a more recent FCA decision, Canada Revenue Agency v. Artistic Ideas Inc (2005 FCA 68), the Court stated that where unnamed persons are not under investigation, that subsection 231.2(2) and (3) do not apply.

Where in the context of collection action in respect of an identified taxpayer, a Collector contemplates issuing RFIs that are intended to obtain or could have the effect of forcing disclosure of unnamed third parties not identified in the RFI, the following course of action should be followed:

1. Collectors should first (where applicable and practical), conduct an audit or inspection of the taxpayer's books and records either at the taxpayer's or employer's premises or at the premises of a third party (i.e. accountant).

   The inspection or audit of books and records is not subject to any restrictions as to the information relating to unnamed parties that may have dealings with the taxpayer. These inspections are authorized by subsection 231.1(1) of the ITA and 289(1) of the ETA.

2. Where the taxpayer or employer does not keep books and records or where the above is not feasible or practical, Collectors should seek the information required from the taxpayer or employer by issuing an RFI to them directly.

   In this context Collectors may also request from third parties such as financial institutions, information in respect of the taxpayer or employer. The issuance of RFIs would be authorized by section 231.2(1) of the ITA and subsection 289(1) of the ETA.

3. Where an identified taxpayer, employer, or financial institution to whom an RFI has been issued, invokes the TD Bank decision or subsections 231.2(2) and (3) of the ITA or subsections 289(2) and (3) of the ETA and refuses to provide information that may disclose the identity of unnamed persons, Collectors must consult with the Department of Justice (DOJ) as to the proper course of action to take in the particular circumstance.

   Notwithstanding the TD Bank decision, DOJ takes the position that in view of the FCA decision in Canada Revenue Agency v. Artistic Ideas Inc, the taxpayer, the employer or a financial institution may be the subject of an application under section 231.7 of the ITA or 289.1 of the ETA, to compel production of the information.

   The rational behind this view is that where unnamed persons are not themselves the subject of investigation, collection or other administrative action, subsections 231.2(2) and (3) ITA and 289(2) and (3) ETA, do not apply since the names of unnamed persons are necessary solely for the Minister to investigate, take collection or other administrative action against the identified taxpayer referred to in the RFI.

4. According to the current case law, judicial authorization to issue an RFI is required where the Agency is seeking the identity of unnamed persons in order to take collection action against them or to verify compliance by the unnamed person. In these circumstances, the matter must be referred to the Department of Justice for action.

Digitized by Google

In all cases not covered in the previous steps, ensure that you seek the advice/assistance of the Department of Justice.

For further details, refer to Communication ARD-2005-016, entitled Requirement for Information-Unnamed Person or seek assistance from your Field Support representative.

Approval Authority

The approval authorities for RFI letters are:

A. To a Financial Institution or third party source:

   Authority to use the Director's facsimile signature stamp is given to lower level positions, but not lower than Manager, Revenue Collections.

B. In circumstances where an ex-parte application to require a third party to provide information or documents (unnamed persons):

   Where an RFI is to be issued in the above circumstance, the authority is delegated to the Director's signature.

Where it is anticipated that non-compliance may occur and enforcement action may be necessary it is suggested that the RFI letter only be issued under the personal original signature of the TSO Director.

A Director of a TSO seeking information can issue and sign the standard bank RFI letters on any branches of banks and financial institutions located within Canada. The territorial scope of the Director's authority to sign a requirement letter is not restricted by legislation.

Ensure the signature block, of the Requirement for Information, reflects the correct title for the work description of the delegated authority approving the Requirement for Information.

For further details, refer to RFI Approval Levels and TSDMB-2008-017 Correct Signatures for Requirement for Information (RFI) and Requirement to Pay (RTP)

Situations Where Client Privilege is Claimed

When a collection officer is attempting to obtain information from a professional, for example: a doctor or lawyer, it is imperative that the information is not demanded after client privilege is claimed. If client privilege is claimed, the collections officer should leave the premises and contact the Department of Justice advising of the situation along with the type of information requested to determine available courses of action.

Solicitor-Client Privilege

While not all communications between a lawyer and a client are covered by privilege, there is a judicial trend towards widening the scope of solicitor-client privilege. Recent decisions made by the Supreme Court of Canada in Lavalle, Rakel & Heintz v Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 61 and Leo Rene Maranda v. Corporal Normand Leblanc et al, 2003 SCC67, have resulted in significant implications for CRA operations, in respect of the issuance of RFIs.

These decisions have given rise to the following legal interpretations:

- Solicitor-client privilege has evolved from a mere "rule of evidence" into a "constitutionally protected right" that must be protected by both the state and the Courts.

Digitized by Google

- Procedure set out in section 488.1 of the Criminal Code for protecting solicitor-client privilege is unconstitutional and accordingly has been struck down, because it does not sufficiently protect solicitor-client privilege.

- Procedures set out in section 232 of the Income Tax Act and section 293 of the Excise Tax Act for protecting solicitor-client privilege are likely also unconstitutional given that Section 488.1 of the Criminal Code was modelled after section 232 of the Income Tax Act. Also, as the Supreme Court of Canada points out at paragraph 21 of its reasons for judgment in Lavallee, "s. 232 of the Income Tax Act was enacted in 1956, long before the constitutional entrenchment of the protection against unreasonable search and seizure and other fundamental rights and freedoms."

Therefore, the procedure outlined within in sections 232 of the Income Tax Act and 293 of the Excise Tax Act should also be considered unconstitutional and cease to be used.

Until new legislation is in place, stringent norms must be respected to protect solicitor-client privilege when in search of documents or information:

- An RFI should not be issued for documents or information known to be protected by solicitor-client privilege.

- Officials must minimize interference with law offices. Accordingly an RFI should not be issued to law offices if other reasonable alternatives exist in terms of possible source of information.

- Potential privilege holders must, to the extent possible, be contacted so as to afford them a reasonable opportunity to assert a claim of privilege.

For further details, refer to Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege.

Related Topics:

- Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client

- Information in Respect of a Lawyer Who is the Subject of Collection Action

Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client

Where CRA seeks information from a lawyer in respect of the affairs of the lawyer's client, great care must be taken to protect solicitor-client privilege.

First of all, the CRA can no longer demand information from a lawyer it knows is solicitor-client privilege. In practical terms, this essentially means that, in keeping with the applicable law, only accounting records of a lawyer, including any supporting vouchers or cheques, can now be demanded from a lawyer when trying to collect tax amounts owing by one of his/her clients.

This type of information would include, for example, information relating to the lawyer's trust account including debits and credits, monthly statements of account and cheques drawn upon or deposited to that account.

It is to be expected that lawyers will attempt to invoke solicitor-client privilege to protect such information. For the time being, the CRA considers that other types of information in the lawyer's possession are presumed to be covered by solicitor-client privilege and should not be made the subject of an RFI, unless there are grounds to reverse the presumption.

Digitized by Google

Secondly, when in search of trust account information, the law office must be seen as a source of information of last resort. As mentioned above, there exists a duty to protect solicitor-client privilege and, by implication, to limit the number and scope of demands for information to lawyers.

For further details, refer to the Procedures section entitled Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client and to Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege.

Information in Respect of a Lawyer who is the Subject of Collection Action

Where CRA seeks to obtain information from a lawyer who is himself or herself the subject of collection action, the rules are slightly different. The CRA takes the position that, since the information sought in such circumstances amounts to nothing more than the books and records of the lawyer in his/her capacity as taxpayer, the presumption in Maranda does not apply.

Until further notice, the CRA may in such cases choose from a list of options to acquire trust account information. For further details, refer to the Procedures section entitled, Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of a Lawyer Who is the Subject of Collection Action and to Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege.

Service of an RFI Letter

An RFI letter can be served using the following methods:

- registered mail
- personal service, refer to the policy Personal Service of an RFI Letter for further detail

Subsections 231.2 (1) of the Income Tax Act (ITA) and 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act state that the Minister can effect service by notice served personally or by registered mail. Also subsections 244(5) and 244(6) of the ITA and subsections 335(1) and 335(2) of the ETA provide means for proof of service by mail or by personal service.

Service of the RFI at Designated Branch

The Bank Act now allows the serving of an RFI to designated branches for the Chartered Banks. These service points are to be used when the Bank may be known, but the particular branch is unknown.

Under no circumstances may the use of this new facility be used as a method to arbitrarily search for bank account(s). You must have reasonable expectation that the taxpayer does in fact deal with a particular financial institution.

For a list of all designated branches, refer to Appendix "A" of Communication TSDMB-2006-020, Changes to the Bank Act allowing a Designated Branch for the point of Service for Requirements to pay and Requirements for Information.

Refer to the Procedures section entitled, Completing an RFI When Serving a Designated Branch.

Digitized by Google

Personal Service of an RFI Letter

Personal service is preferred because it facilitates the proof of service when prosecution for failure to comply is warranted. There may be restrictions within each province as to how we may effect service of any document, such as effecting service on a Sunday or holiday or restrictions to the time of day service can be made. Collectors must determine and be aware of any restrictions that may apply within the jurisdiction to which the RFI will be served.

RFI letters are served personally:

- to the person to whom it is directed in the case of an individual
- to a director officer, official or adult person in the employ of the addressee in the case of a corporation

It is important to remember that personal service of a bank RFI does not entitle our officers to request immediate production of large amounts of documents and/or information. The bank remains entitled to a reasonable compliance period specified in the requirement.

Circumstances When Personal Service Should be Effected on Banks

Effect personal service on bank branches in the following circumstances:

- servicing of an RFI letter simultaneously with or soon after the seizure of a tax debtor's records, thus preventing the tax debtor from obtaining the release of any original documents which might have been retained by the bank, for example, financial statements, undelivered cancelled cheques, etc.
- situations when a tax debtor is suspected of having conducted bank transactions using nominees, fictitious persons, and/or outside accommodating agents, the personal contact is intended to ascertain the relation between the tax debtor and any bank transaction carried in the name of the above mentioned type of individual
- situations where a tax debtor is suspected of having obtained either leniency and/or outright accommodation from one or more bank employees

It is important to remember that personal service of a bank RFI does not entitle a Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) officer to request immediate production of large amounts of documents and/or information. The bank remains entitled to a reasonable compliance period specified in the RFI letter.

Obtaining Information from the Bank of Canada

RFI letters for the Bank of Canada must go through the Investigations Division in the TSO. Investigations will forward the RFI to the Investigations Directorate at Headquarters who will then send the request to the Bank of Canada. The Investigations Directorate has assured that these requests will be handled on a priority basis.

For further details, refer to Memorandum 01-02 and Memorandum 01-10 both of which are entitled, Statutory Set-Offs and Requirements for Information to the Bank of Canada.

Requests for Payment by Third Party for Costs Incurred

CRA does not pay financial institutions or other tax debtors for the internal costs incurred by them in relation to the servicing of statutory requirements under section 231.2 of the Income Tax Act or subsection 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act. Should a financial institution send you an invoice for search costs simply inform them that our Policy is not to pay fees related to a search for information relating to the issuance of an RFI.

Digitized by Google

Extension of Time

There is no provision in either the Income Tax Act or the Excise Tax Act to grant extensions. The granting of an extension will invalidate the RFI and make prosecution impossible. This factor should always be considered when stipulating a time frame in the RFI.

It is therefore essential that when service is executed, the Collector ensure that the person being served fully understands that the RFI must be complied with in the time stipulated.

Although an extension cannot be granted, the Department will be reasonable if the RFI is complied with before the summons to appear in Court is issued. As a rule, if the person complies before the summons is issued, we will not proceed with further action.

The following are situations that may arise and the procedures that should be followed in each case by Collectors:

A. A Collector is informed by the person served that the books, records, or information are available, but the time period has not yet expired:

   - In this situation, it is up to the Collector to immediately make arrangements to review the books and records, or information required at the place where they are located. If you do not do this immediately, or do so after the time period has expired, access is denied, you may not be able to prosecute for non-compliance.

B. We are informed after the time period has expired that the information or records are available at a given location. Steps have been taken to commence prosecution action, but a summons has not yet been served:

   - Again, it is up to the Collector to attend and obtain the information or records immediately, however, no promise will be given not to prosecute. This decision will be made after the required information or records are in hand.

C. We are informed, after the summons is served, that the information or records are available at a given location.

   - Again, arrangements must be made immediately to attend the location of the records or information. However for compliance purposes, prosecution will very likely continue.

D. The party served with the RFI shows that there are exceptional circumstances that prohibit them from honouring the RFI within the time frame specified. However, the party has been attempting to comply with the terms.

   - We can issue a new RFI extending the time frame allowed. Therefore, we are in effect invalidating the first RFI issued and now binding the party to the new date listed on the second RFI. If prosecution procedures were to be initiated it would be under the second RFI. However, this method must be used on an extremely rare basis. The party must provide clear, irrefutable evidence that compliance with the first RFI is impossible.

Digitized by Google

RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders)

Circumstances may arise wherein a financial institution will fail to comply with the issuance of an RFI served because the bank account holder is either unknown to the CRA or where only one of the bank holders is named within the RFI in the case of a joint account. It is the Agency's position, that the CRA is entitled to all information regarding an account, even though it does not know the name of the joint account holder or of the account holder.

It is the Agency's policy to pursue non-compliance action against a financial institution, which fails to comply with a valid RFI once all reasonable attempts to resolve legitimate concerns, if any, have been exhausted.

The following situations must be referred to the Department of Justice for consideration of non-compliance action after having consulted with your Field Support Program Officer:

- where the information is refused because only one bank account holder is identified (joint bank account)
- where the information is refused because the bank account holder is unknown

For additional details, refer to Communication ARD-2004-037, entitled Requirements for Information-Financial Institutions Non-Compliance Action (Joint and Unknown Account Holders) and Communication ARD-2005-016, entitled Requirements for Information-Unnamed Person.

Procedures

This section identifies procedures related to Requirements for Information letter:

- RFI Letters Issued to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area
- RFI Issued by Mail to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area
- Personal Delivery or Servicing of an RFI to a Third Party out of the TSO Area
- Assistance Required by the Investigations Division in Another TSO
- Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client
- Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of a Lawyer Who Is the Subject of Collection Action
- Completing an RFI Letter
- Completing an RFI When Serving a Designated Branch
- Personal Service of an RFI
- Completing an Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605
- Swearing of the Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605
- Non-Compliance with an RFI Letter

Digitized by Google

- RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders)
- Completing Approval for Prosecution

RFI Letters Issued to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area

Delivery and servicing of an RFI letter is the primary responsibility of the TSO who issued and signed the RFI letter, unless alternate arrangements are made beforehand between offices.

In any case, where enforcement action (prosecution) is likely, the RFI letter should be signed and issued by the Director of the Tax Services Office within whose territory the RFI letter is served. This procedure recognizes the responsibility of the resident Director for enforcement of the RFI letter, the different court systems across the country, the different jurisprudence in each province and the different procedures followed by the Regional Offices of the Department of Justice.

RFI Issued by Mail to a Third Party Residing Out of the TSO Area

When it is necessary to issue an RFI letter by either certified or registered mail to a party residing out of the TSO area where enforcement action (prosecution) is likely, proceed in the following manner:

1. Complete the RFI letter as outlined in the procedures Completing an RFI Letter. The delivery and service of an RFI letter is the primary responsibility of the TSO who issued and signed the RFI letter, unless alternate arrangements are made beforehand between offices.
2. Make a copy of the RFI letter, following the procedures outlined within Number of Copies Required.
3. Prepare a memorandum summarizing the particulars of the account, including the following:
   - account number
   - name of tax debtor
   - name and address of branch
   - intended date of service
   - name and telephone number of the collections officer
4. Attach the copy of the RFI letter to the memorandum.
5. Fax this information to the Assistant Director of Revenue Collections of the TSO in whose area the addressee resides so they are aware of the action being taken in their area.
6. Forward an extra copy of the RFI letter to the Director of the TSO in whose area the addressee resides.

If enforcement action (prosecution) is likely, the RFI letter should be signed and issued by the Director of the TSO within whose territory the RFI letter is served. This procedure recognizes the responsibility of the resident Director for enforcement of the RFI letter, the different court systems across the country, the different jurisprudence in each province and the different procedures followed by the Regional Offices of the Department of Justice. This is particularly important where jurisdictions cross provincial boundaries.

Digitized by Google

Personal Delivery or Servicing of an RFI to a Third Party Out of the TSO Area

Where the assistance of the TSO in whose area the addressee resides is required for personal delivery and/or servicing of the RFI letter, proceed in the following manner:

1. Prepare a Memorandum for signature in the name of the originating office's Assistant Director, Revenue Collections requesting the assistance of the other TSO.

2. The Memorandum to the Assistant Director should include the following:

   - sufficient background and particulars of the case
   - instructions necessary for the TSO to service the RFI letter
   - name of the tax debtor
   - account number
   - name of collections officer in charge of the case
   - telephone number of the collections officer in charge of the case

   The local Assistant Director should then forward the Memorandum to their counterpart at the TSO where the assistance is required.

3. If only servicing assistance is requested of the TSO, attach a copy of the signed RFI letter addressed to the financial institution or third party.

4. When the Director of the TSO where the tax debtor is resident is asked to sign the RFI attach the required copies of the completed and unsigned RFI letter.

Assistance Required by the Investigations Division in Another TSO

Where the assistance of the Investigations Division in the affected TSO is desirable in delivering and/or servicing of an RFI letter on a financial institution or third party, proceed with the following:

1. Prepare a Memorandum for signature in the name of the originating office's Assistant Director, Revenue Collections requesting the assistance of the Investigations Division. The Memorandum should include the following:

   - sufficient background and particulars of the case
   - instructions necessary for the TSO to service the RFI letter
   - name of the tax debtor
   - account number
   - name of collections officer in charge of the case
   - telephone number of the collections officer in charge of the case

Digitized by Google

2. The Memorandum should then be forwarded to the Assistant Director, Investigations Division, of the originating TSO who will then forward the request to their counterpart in the applicable TSO.

Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client

As mentioned in the Policy section entitled Information in Respect of the Affairs of a Lawyer's Client, there exists a duty to protect solicitor-client privilege and, by implication, to limit the number and scope of RFIs to lawyers.

The following are the recommended steps to follow (in order of consideration) regarding the issuance of RFIs in these circumstances:

1. Provided this will not jeopardize or unduly delay collection, the first step is to request (formally by way of RFI or informally, depending on the circumstances) from people other than the lawyer the accounting information of interest to the collections investigation. Namely: the taxpayer who is the subject of the collections investigation, the seller or the buyer in transactions of interest, etc. On the basis that jeopardy and undue delay in collection are not present in the vast majority of cases, the first step to take in trying to obtain information concerning transactions that have gone through a lawyer is, as a general rule, to contact people other than the lawyer

2. If the name of the bank responsible for the trust account information of interest to the CRA is not known:

   - demand from the lawyer by way of an RFI the name of the bank as well as the trust account number; and

   - send an RFI to that bank demanding that it provide accounting information relating to transactions of interest to the collections investigation – copying the potential privilege holder (to the extent possible) at the two stages of communication

     Note: Until such time as the Courts provide clear guidance on the issue of whether accounting information relating to a lawyer's trust account are covered by solicitor-client privilege in a tax collection context, there is good reason to err on the side of caution and give the potential privilege holder every opportunity to be heard.

3. If the name of the bank responsible for the trust account information of interest and the trust account number are known:

   - demand the information directly from the Bank, by way of an RFI, and inform the lawyer and his client of having done so by sending them each a copy of the RFI

4. If all of the above steps fail to obtain accounting information relating to transactions that have gone through a lawyer, the next step is to send an RFI to the lawyer demanding all of the accounting information in his or her possession that concerns the transaction(s) at issue, and copy the potential privilege holder on the communication.

For more details refer to Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor-Client Privilege: Information in Respect of a Lawyer Who is the Subject of Collection Action

The following are the recommended steps to take when the CRA seeks to obtain information from a lawyer who is himself or herself the subject of collection action:

1. Issue an RFI to the lawyer in order to obtain information as to the amount of fees paid or owed to the lawyer by his/her clients, his or her list of clients, and other like information essential for collection purposes; OR

2. Issue an RFI to clients of the lawyer in order to seek information or documents as to the amount of fees paid or owed by the clients to the lawyer; OR

3. Issue an RFI to the bank with which the lawyer deals and seek from the bank information such as monthly statements of account as well as cheques drawn upon or deposited to such accounts.

For more details refer to Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege.

Completing an RFI Letter

When completing an RFI, form T375 or T375A or ELCS letters 19646, 19647, 19648 or 80789, there must be no spelling errors or typing erasures.

The following is a breakdown of an RFI letter by area. Each area has its own part to play in the overall process. A mistake or error in any one of the areas may invalidate your efforts to secure information or to prosecute for failure to comply.

Related Topics:

- Identifying the Client
- Identifying an Individual
- Identifying a Proprietor
- Identifying a Partnership
- Identifying a Corporation
- Completion of the "Re-Line"
- Date of Director's Signature
- Time Allowed for Compliance
- Time Period for RFI
- Suggested Verses for RFIs
- RFI Approval Levels
- Number of Copies Required

Digitized by Google

Identifying the Client

In preparing an RFI you first must properly identify the party you will be serving. Once you have identified the party you need to confirm the legal name when possible. As in all legal documents, naming the wrong party can invalidate the action.

Identifying an Individual

The proper legal given name of the individual identified must be used when addressing an RFI. If you know that the party uses an alias, use the alias also in addressing the RFI letter.

For example, the party is a doctor using her maiden name professionally, Dr. Mary Elizabeth Smith. She is married to David Jones and represents herself as Mary Jones in her non-professional life.

In this example, the RFI should read:

- Mary Elizabeth Jones (sometime known as Mary Elizabeth Smith)

The address listed should be the known address of the individual named on the RFI.

Identifying a Proprietor

Use the proper given legal name when preparing an RFI for the proprietor of a business. You must include the name or trade style of the business operated if your investigation reveals that it is their only source of income.

For example, if you know that the client's name is John Thomas Jones and that he operates a proprietorship entity operating as Jones Cafe, address the RFI in this format. Do not use John T. Jones. Avoid the use of initials wherever possible.

In this example, the RFI should read:

- John Thomas Jones (sometime carrying on business as Jones Cafe)

The address listed in an RFI to a proprietorship should be the home address of the proprietor, if the address is different from the business address of the proprietorship entity.

Identifying a Partnership

When prosecution action is taken against a partnership for failure to provide information, action will be taken against only one of the partners. Therefore a decision should be made prior to the issuance of the RFI as to which partner we would consider any prosecution action against in the event of non-compliance. The partner should be the one who has the ability to comply with the terms of the RFI. Section 244(20) of the ITA allows the Agency to enjoin all members of a partnership when at least one partner has been served.

Use the full proper legal given name of the partner identified and the partnership name/trade style.

For example, a partnership operates as D & A Accounting Service. There are two partners, Douglas McGregor and Andy Smith. We have identified Douglas McGregor as the partner to which we intend to serve the RFI.

In this example the RFI should read:

Digitized by Google

Douglas McGregor
D & A Accounting Service

The RFI should be addressed to the address of the partnership. In the case of an inactive partnership, it is acceptable to address it to the identified partner's home address.

Identifying a Corporation

In all cases the RFI must identify the Corporation's legal name and Head Office address as registered within the applicable provincial or federal registry system, regardless of where the corporation actually operates. If you are aware that the legal name and the name under which the client is operating are different, there is nothing wrong with using both names on the RFI. This should be confirmed by a corporate registry search prior to the issuance of the RFI.

When issuing an RFI to a corporation that is being investigated, a director or officer of the corporate entity must be named in the RFI and both the director (or officer) and the corporate entity served.

During this process, two RFIs are prepared for service concurrently. The first RFI will indicate the proper name and address of the corporation. The second RFI will be issued indicating the name and address of a corporate director or officer and citing the name of the corporation within the "Re" line.

For example, RFIs to a corporation should be prepared as follows:

- For service on the corporate entity (RFI #1):

  ABC Company Ltd.
  111 Any Street
  Anytown, Province, Postal Code

- For service on the director/officer (RFI #2):

  John Doe
  123 Main St.
  Anytown, Province, Postal

  Re: ABC Company Ltd.

The RFI in the name of the corporate director can be served wherever they can be located. This process also ensures that the CRA can prosecute the enjoined Director or Officer in a case of non-compliance.

Care must be exercised by the collections officer to ensure the named individual is an actual officer or director of the company. To establish who is the responsible officer or director, reference may be made to:

- prior T2 returns for corporate director/officer information
- the applicable provincial/federal corporate registry system
- the corporation's Minute Book (if available)

Digitized by Google

- any corporate document signed by the individual that would indicate control of the corporation

Occasions may arise when the sources listed above are not available or are of such an age that doubt exists as to current application. In these instances, it will be necessary to interview in person the last known officers to establish who is responsible for the operation and/or control of the company.

Completion of the "Re-Line"

The proper completion of the "Re-Line" is vital so as to minimize future legal challenges regarding the issuance of RFIs as they relate to the issue of "unnamed persons."

For details regarding the proper use and completion of the "Re-Line", refer to the Policy section entitled The "Re-Line."

Date of Director's Signature

RFIs must bear the date on which the Authorized Person signs the letter. Enter the date on which the Authorized Person has signed the letter. It is recommended that a date stamp be used when dating the document.

Ensure the signature block, of the Requirement for Information, reflects the correct title for the work description of the delegated authority approving the Requirement for Information.

For further details refer to the section entitled Approval Authority, and TSDMB-2008-017 Correct Signatures for Requirement for Information (RFI) and Requirement to Pay (RTP).

Time Allowed for Compliance

The normal time frame allocated for compliance with an RFI is 30 days. The courts have determined this period as a reasonable length of time for the party to respond to the RFI.

However, RFIs have been challenged in court because the time limit set for the production of information was found to have been unreasonable.

What is reasonable is a question of fact in each case. A party cannot be expected to drop everything in order to comply with the RFI. In addition, the effort required to produce the information should be taken into account.

The following factors must be taken into consideration:

- the amount of work involved to compile the information in relationship to the staff available
- the time of year, given that some businesses have peak periods in their year and as such may not have the time to gather the information at that time
- if the use of a professional is required, then consideration must be given to their schedule as well

You must also consider the following:

- every effort must be made to ensure that the due date does not fall on a Saturday, Sunday or holiday (non-juridical days). However, in the event that the due date does fall on a Saturday, Sunday or holiday after service/delivery of the RFI has occurred, then the federal Interpretation Act (Section 26) deems the date for compliance to be the next business day.

Digitized by Google

- add time to the due date to permit the service or delivery of the RFI if you are predating your RFI before delivery
- when requiring multiple years, the general rule is to allow at least 30 days for each tax year requested
- possible delays in the servicing of the RFI

Therefore, you must ensure that all factors are considered when making your determination of reasonable time. The decision must be based on the facts at hand, the circumstances involved, on a case-by-case basis.

Time Period for RFI

When completing an RFI, you must determine the exact periods required for the review of information. Each tax year involved should be on a separate RFI letter. Also, any information requested for a time period that spans more than one fiscal period requires an RFI for each period.

For example:

> Information is requested from a party in the form of cancelled cheques and sales invoices for the period August 1, 2003 to August 1, 2004.

In this example, we must issue two separate RFIs for the information desired:

- one for the period August 1, 2003 to December 31, 2003; and
- one for the period January 1, 2004 to August 1, 2004

Each RFI non-compliance may constitute a separate offence where prosecution is contemplated. However, where the practice is to seek remedy to a failure to comply by obtaining a Compliance Order pursuant to section 231.7 ITA or section 289.1 ETA, multiple RFIs are not necessary to the action.

> Note: When identifying the period for review, no short forms or abbreviated dates can be used. You must write the dates in full: Month, Day, Year to Month, Day, Year.

Suggested Verses for RFIs

You may encounter situations where the use of an RFI requires that the document be customized to secure specific information unique to the third party being served. In those instances, it is suggested that the RFI be customized to narrow the scope of your search, which will allow the third party to better expedite the return of the information required.

The following are some suggested phrases for use against various third parties.

Related Topics:

- Phrases for Information/Documents Required from an Individual
- Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Financial Institutions

Digitized by Google

- Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Insurance Companies
- Phrases for a Review of Books and Records
- Phrases for Information/Documents Required from a Credit Card Company
- Phrases for Review of Books and Paydac Accounts

Phrases for Information/Documents Required from an Individual

A Net Worth Statement as of (INSERT DATE), complete with supporting schedules, showing full details of all your assets, liabilities, household expenses and including information as follows:

The names, branches and account numbers of all financial institutions in which you maintain either accounts or safety deposit boxes or both, including information of amounts on deposit as at (INSERT DATE). For the period (INSERT START OF PERIOD) to (INSERT END OF PERIOD) provide copies of monthly banking statements for all accounts.

Details of all bonds, common shares and preferred shares maintained by you, whether or not registered in your name, including the individual cost per share, and the current location of each security.

Details of all real property owned by you, whether or not registered in your name, including the legal description, and amounts of encumbrances. Provide the names and addresses of encumbrances, and the location of the applicable Registry office.

Details of all insurance carried by you, with names of insurance companies, face value of policies, policy numbers, cash surrender values and accrued dividends where applicable, and the location of policies.

Details of all mortgages and loans receivable in which you have a beneficial interest, giving details of amounts due to you as of (INSERT DATE), dates of registration, Registry Office where registered, and legal description of property encumbered. Where applicable provide terms of repayment, maturity date, and names and addresses of all mortgages or other debtors.

Details of all loans and mortgages payable by you as at (INSERT DATE), including the current market value of all security given, together with legal description of all property pledged.

Details of all automobiles owned by you, as at (INSERT DATE), including year, model and make of vehicle, license plate number, vehicle identification number, names and addresses of lien holders or encumbrances and cost of each vehicle.

Full details of any other assets owned by you, whether or not registered in your name, but not included in the foregoing.

Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Financial Institutions

Statements of account setting out all entries in all accounts including, but not limited to, chequing, savings, current accounts, term deposits, Guaranteed Investment Certificates and Canada Savings Bonds, at your Branch, that are known to be or to have been operated or controlled by, for, or on behalf of the person(s) named above or any of them and all joint accounts in the names of any of those persons and another or others.

Digitized by Google

A statement setting out particulars of all transactions, including but not limited to loans, loan applications lines of credit, mortgages, mortgage applications, signature cards for all accounts held, credit card accounts, safety deposit box rentals, safekeeping and security dealings at your Branch with, to, for or on behalf of the person(s) named above or any of them either alone or with another or others, or any person or persons known to be or to have been acting on behalf of those persons or any of them.

All documents, including but not limited to authorizations, power of attorney, mail and telegraphic transfers, accounts, vouchers, letters, contracts, letters of credit and statements that are known to be or to have been related to the entries or transactions set out in the statements required above.

Copies of Signature cards for all accounts held.

Phrases for Information/Documents Required from Insurance Companies

For general information the following can be used:

Statement setting out all policy numbers, investments and mortgages held with your company that are known to be or to have been operated or controlled by, for, or on behalf of the persons named above or any of them and all joint accounts, policies in the name of any of those person(s) and another or others. Any investments held with your institution shall include reference numbers and current market value for any RRSP's, Term Deposits and Mutual Funds.

A statement setting out all particulars of all transactions, including the face value of any policies, cash surrender values, accrued dividends, loans and collateral thereto held by (INSERT NAME OF INSURANCE COMPANY) with, to, for or on behalf of the person(s) named above or any of them either alone or with another or others, or person or persons known to be or to have been acting on behalf of those persons or any of them.

A statement setting out particulars of all provisions of the above noted policy or policies. This statement shall include the renewal, conversion, beneficiary, settlement and general provisions of the said policy or policies. In addition, please provide all policy riders that modify or restrict the conditions of any and all policies held by (INSERT NAME OF DEBTOR).

A statement setting out the effective insurance date(s), term period(s), reinstatement dates of any lapsed policy or policies and the amount and method of the premium payments. Please provide all details of the premium payments including front and back true copies of the last three (3) months worth of cheques received by (INSERT NAME OF INSURANCE COMPANY) for policy payment. If any or all policies held by your institution are paid on an annual basis, please provide front and back true copies and/or the method of payment for a one (1) year policy period. These true copies shall include any cancelled cheques, drafts, mail and telegraphic transfers, deposit slips and debit and credit advances that are known to be or to have been related to the method of payment of any instruments held by your institution.

All documents, including authorizations, power of attorney, mail and telegraphic transfers, accounts, vouchers, letters, contracts, letters of credit and statements that are known to be or have been related the entries or transactions set out in the statements required under above.

For specific information the following can be used:

Copy of all policies maintained by your firm on behalf of (INSERT NAME).

Description of all insured items with details as to coverage amount, value and replacement value of all items insured. Such items include chattels/personal property, livestock, real property and/or dwellings.

Digitized by Google

Details of all insurance brokers, including name, address and policy number(s) associated with (INSERT NAME).

Details of all claims made, including front and back copies of all cheques issued to (INSERT NAME).

If applicable, copies of post dated cheques on file. If payments are made via direct withdrawal, provide the financial institution name, transit number, account number in which insurance fees are deducted from.

Any other documents held other than those listed above relating to (INSERT NAME).

Phrases for a Review of Books and Records

All books and records relating to the above, for the fiscal period (INSERT START OF PERIOD) to (INSERT END OF PERIOD) including, however, not limited to:

The Corporate Minute Book including, but not limited to the Shareholders Register, Directors Register, Share Certificate Register, Minutes of Shareholder Meetings, Minutes of Directors Meetings.

All records recording day to day business transactions including, but not limited to cash receipts, cash disbursements, billing statements, cancelled cheques, bank statements, cheques registers, payroll records, journal entries, shareholder loan accounts and deposit books.

A complete list of money, shares, securities, interest, dividends or any asset held directly, indirectly or beneficially by (INSERT NAME OF CORPORATION) for (INSERT NAME OF DIRECTOR (S) if applicable).

A complete list of all personal guarantees, trust agreements and/or power of attorneys signed by (INSERT DIRECTOR (S) NAME (S) in his capacity as director/shareholder of (INSERT NAME OF CORPORATION).

A complete list of all corporate assets that (INSERT NAME OF DIRECTOR (S)) has or had a beneficial, direct or indirect interest in for the above noted period.

A complete list of any type of financial remuneration received by (INSERT NAME OF DIRECTOR (S)) from (INSERT NAME OF CORPORATION) for the above noted period.

Phrases for Information/Documents Required from a Credit Card Company

Credit card application forms, copies of monthly statements, copies of cheques received in payment, and the names of authorized signatures for the period (INSERT START OF PERIOD) to (INSERT END OF PERIOD).

Phrases for a Review of Books and Records of Paydac Accounts

For purposes related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act, pursuant to the provision of subsection 231.2(1) of the said Act, I hereby require from you, within (INSERT NUMBER OF DAYS IN FULL) (INSERT NUMBER OF DAYS NUMERICALLY) days from the date of service hereof, information and documents as follows for the period (INSERT START OF PERIOD) to (INSERT END OF PERIOD);

1. Payroll journals (salary, wages, commission etc.).

Digitized by Google

2. Cheque register or cash disbursement journal.
3. Sales journal.
4. Cash receipts journal.
5. Accounts receivable ledger.
6. General ledger.
7. Accounts payable ledger.
8. Cancelled bank cheques and statements.
9. Payroll remittance receipts.
10. Minute book including Shareholder's register.
11. Your copy of Employment Insurance Commission Record of Employment forms that were completed during the above-noted period.

RFI Approval Levels

The approval levels for the issuance of RFIs within Revenue Collections are outlined in the Authorities Matrix which stipulates that the persons authorized to approve the issuance of RFIs at the TSO level are as follows:

- Director, Tax Services Office
- Assistant Director, Revenue Collections Division
- Assistant Director, Revenue Collections and Client Services
- Manager, Revenue Collections Division
- Manager, Revenue Collection and Client Services

It is recommended that all RFIs be issued in the name of the Director, Tax Services Office, regardless of who has the delegated authority to sign the document.

RFIs are to bear the date on which the Director or his/her delegates, sign the RFI, regardless of when they are served. This can be done by printing the letter with an estimated date of signature or by date-stamping the document upon receiving the appropriate signature.

Ensure the signature block, of the Requirement for Information, reflects the correct title for the work description of the delegated authority approving the Requirement for Information.

For further details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2008-017 Correct Signatures for Requirement for Information (RFI) and Requirement to Pay (RTP)Co

Number of Copies Required

Upon receipt of the signed original, the Collector must make three (3) copies of the signed original. At this point the Collector must visually compare the copies to the original and then proceed to initial and date the lower right hand corner of the copies AND the original. This procedure is necessary for court purposes when it comes to possible non-compliance prosecution as the Collector is attesting to the fact that the duplicates are in fact copies of the original RFI.

Digitized by Google

It is the practice of some TSOs to submit four original versions of the same RFI for signature. In these circumstances the process noted above would not be required.

When serving the RFI, the Collector will then serve an original copy of the requirement on the third party and have the third party sign a copy to acknowledge receipt (or all copies) of the document for our records. The other two clean copies are kept on file for use in the case of prosecution for non-compliance. Please refer to the section Personal Service of an RFI, for further details.

Completing an RFI When Serving a Designated Branch

When serving an RFI to a designated branch, you are to prepare the accompanying ELCS letter 19648. On the "third party address" screen you must insert Designated Branch on the "Attention line." This distinction will let the Bank know that they are to search all data bases for information and assets. It is critically important to ensure that you have indicated the proper legal entity of the Bank to reduce the exposure of non-compliance.

To ensure the best search results from the Designated Branch, please be as specific as is possible when identifying the taxpayer or third party. Please refer to the section The Re-Line for further details.

Personal Service of an RFI

When choosing personal service it is of extreme importance that you:

- Properly identify the person to whom the RFI is addressed. Service on the wrong person will adversely effect any attempt to prosecute for failure to comply.
- Make a note of who was present when the document was served (witnesses).
- In the case of a corporation ensure your information is current and that you are dealing with the proper authorized person. In addition you must ensure that you have two (2) copies of the requirement, one for the corporation and one for the officer and/or director you wish to enjoin in the action.

Please refer to the section Completing an RFI Letter for further details.

Care must be exercised when addressing an RFI to an incorporating lawyer. Ensure that his involvement goes beyond the incorporation of the firm. In cases where there is denial of any knowledge of the person you are seeking, it is extremely important to probe for information. Do not accept what you are being told without a more satisfactory explanation.

Related Topics:

- Identifying Yourself
- Service of the RFI
- Documenting Service
- The Need for a Witness

Digitized by Google

Identifying Yourself

It is important to identify yourself so as to clearly establish the Agency's legal authority to serve the RFI. The best way to identify yourself is with the use of the RC121A identification card issued to you by the Agency. It is also good practice to leave your business card.

Service of the RFI

Serve the RFI letter by giving the original to the person named on the RFI or in the case of a financial institution, an authorized person. At this time you should:

- explain the content and deadline date
- ask for a signature to acknowledge receipt on one of the duplicate copies (or all copies)
- take note of the time and date of service in case you have to swear an affidavit
- where possible, obtain the name and phone number of the person responsible for providing the information in case you need to follow-up on the status of the RFI

In the event the party refuses to accept and sign the duplicate copy you should leave the original there. The party served does not have to touch the RFI. By leaving the document with them you have perfected service. Return to the office and swear out the affidavit of service immediately.

Please refer to the section Completing An Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605, for more details.

If the party is not readily available or you have been told that the party is not there, do not leave the RFI with an employee, secretary or other third party, as this method of service will nullify any potential prosecution should non-compliance occur. This method of service is problematic as the Agency will not be able to show the Courts that service of the RFI was properly perfected.

As a result, simply inform the third party you are dealing with that you will return again to attempt to serve the documents. At this juncture you may attempt to serve the documents at another site if you have located the party somewhere else.

Remember while the RFI letter must be addressed to the corporate head office or an individual's residential address, you may serve the RFI anywhere the named party can be physically located with the exception of financial institutions. The Agency must make what the Courts deem a "reasonable effort" to serve the named party on the RFI letter before they will consider the issue of non-compliance with the RFI in the prosecution process.

The remaining 3 copies of the RFI are retained following service for the following:

- the first copy is attached to the Affidavit of Service Form TX605 (if required)
- a second copy is utilized as evidence for any potential prosecution action (if applicable)
- the third copy is retained within the tax debtor's file

Documenting Service

It is important that notes be taken whenever an RFI is served, as certain information may be needed in court to establish service. The following information must be recorded when serving an RFI:

Digitized by Google

- the date of service
- the time of service
- the address of service if different from the address indicated on the RFI
- the full name of the party served including a brief description (male or female, height, colour of hair, etc.)
- how the identity of the party was confirmed (verbal confirmation, by a review of legal identification, etc.)
- what explanation was given to the client about their responsibilities with respect to the information and documents required and the time limits imposed
- a warning of potential prosecution should the non-compliance occur

The Need for a Witness

The following are examples of when you might consider taking a witness when effecting service on an RFI:

- the history of the client indicates he/she is belligerent
- there is a previous history of non-compliance
- service will take place in a remote area or location where the safety of the collector may be an issue if the client has an history of non-compliance

The safety of the Collector is a key issue. Your safety is your prime consideration. When in doubt, take a witness with you.

Completing an Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605

When applicable, upon returning to the office the Collection Officer will swear out a complete Affidavit of Personal Service Form TX605. Form TX605 can be accessed through the Infozone web site within the Forms and Publications section.

Complete the form as follows:

1. Enter the full name and address of the tax debtor exactly as shown on the true copy of the RFI, after the phrase "In the Matter of the Income Tax Act or Excise Tax Act."
2. Enter the full name and home address of the officer of CRA who personally served the RFI on the named party.
3. Record the date the RFI was personally served.
4. Enter the name and address of the tax debtor exactly as shown on the true copy of the RFI.

   Note: Where an RFI is served on an officer of a corporation, include the statement, "Personally served ABC Corporation Limited by leaving the Requirement to Provide Information and Documents with Mr. John Doe who is an officer/director of the company."

Digitized by Google

5. Enter the word "Notice" after the words "with a."

6. Enter the applicable section of the Income Tax Act or Excise Tax Act referred to in the notice after the words "pursuant to."

7. Enter the word "Notice" after the words "handing the said."

After the Affidavit for Personal Service, TX605 is prepared, it is to be sworn before an officer designated to administer oaths, refer to Swearing of the Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605.
Where any difficulties are encountered in the completion of RFI letter affidavits, it is recommended that the assistance of the Investigation Division be sought in order to ensure that the documentation is properly prepared.

Swearing of the Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605
After the Affidavit for Personal Service, form TX605 is prepared, it is to be sworn before an officer designated to administer oaths. You must ensure that the following guidelines are met:

- The date must be the same as the date the affidavit is sworn.
- The officer designated under the Income Tax Act or Excise Tax Act to administer oaths ensures that the true copy of the RFI letter is stapled to the affidavit for personal service, form TX605.
- Under no circumstances should an Affidavit of Personal Service, form TX605, be prepared if the RFI letter was not served personally on the individual but was left instead with someone else (for example tax debtor's spouse), substitution service cannot support a prosecution.

Non Compliance With an RFI Letter
This section contains information on measures dealing with non-compliance to an RFI.

Related Topics:

- Prosecution Action
- Compliance Order

Prosecution Action
When the RFI is not complied with by the due date plus 10 days:

1. Complete an Approval for Prosecution, form TX615 in duplicate.
2. Attach copies of relevant documents including:
   - RFI letter
   - the Affidavit for Personal Service, Form TX605
   - details of the case

Digitized by Google

3. Obtain the Assistant Director, Revenue Collections approval in the area indicated as recommended by supervisor.

4. Obtain the approval of the Director of the TSO once the Assistant Director Revenue Collections has approved the recommendation. The Director may delegate the signing authority to the Assistant Director of Revenue Collections.

5. Once the Director has approved the prosecution forward all documents to the appropriate section responsible for prosecutions as per local TSO parameters.

Compliance Order

Collections has a second option when dealing with non-compliance to an RFI. Legislation passed on June 14, 2001, contained in Sections 231.7 of the ITA and 289.1 of the ETA allows the Minister to seek an order to provide the access, assistance, information, or document sought by way of summary application, known as a Compliance Order. The judge hearing the application will have the discretion to allow the order or to attach such conditions to the order, as he/she considers appropriate. A person who refuses to comply with the judge's order may be found in contempt of court.

The Ministerial powers relating to Sections 231.7 of the ITA and 289.1 of the ITA to seek a Compliance Order have been delegated to the Director.

For further details, refer to Memorandum 01-08, entitled Bills C-13 and C-22, or contact your HQ Field Support officer for assistance. It is also recommended that Collection Officers refer to Communication ARD-2004-015, entitled Guidelines for the Use of ITA 231.7 and ETA 289.1, or access the guidelines directly.

Related Topic:

- Non-Compliance by a Provincial Ministry

Non-Compliance by a Provincial Ministry

When forwarding Requirements for Information to Provincial Ministries or Agencies, please note that if any non-compliance issues arise you should immediately contact your respective HQ Field Support Officer for his/her review and approval of any proposed non-compliance proceedings. It is recommended that you consult HQ prior to obtaining a legal opinion from the Department of Justice.

RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders)

As noted within the Policy section entitled, RFI Non-Compliance Action Against Financial Institutions (Joint and Unknown Account Holders), scenarios that fall within this category should be referred to the Department of Justice for review and possible action.

The following information should be forwarded to the Department of Justice for such a referral:

- details regarding the primary account involved within the investigations including the reasons the RFI action was taken

- a copy of the RFI served to the offending financial institution

Digitized by Google

- a copy of any written response from the financial institution outlining the reasons why the RFI was not complied with or any facts regarding proof of non-compliance
- full contact information for all involved parties

The Department of Justice will consult with the Agency's banking liaison and advise them of the course of action to be taken. The Department of Justice will then proceed with an Application on the Agency's behalf under section 231.7 ITA or section 289.1 ETA to compel compliance.

Once the case has been referred to the Department of Justice, optional ELCS letter 80794 may be sent to the financial institution notifying them that the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice and that the filing of an Application under section 231.7 ITA or section 289.1 ETA has been made or that other legal measures may be taken.

For further details, refer to Communication ARD-2004-037, entitled, Requirements for Information-Financial Institutions Non-Compliance Action (Joint Account Holders) and Communication ARD-2005-016, entitled Requirements for Information-Unnamed Person.

Completing Approval for Prosecution

If the RFI letter is not complied with by the due date plus 10 days, an Approval for Prosecution, form TX615 (formerly TX13) which summarizes the case for the Tax Services Office Director or Assistant Director, Revenue Collections depending on local policy, will be completed in duplicate. Form TX615 can be accessed through InfoZone under the Forms and Publications section.

Complete form TX615:

The minimum fine requested is usually $1,000 as prescribed by subsection 238(1); of the ITA or ss 326(1) of the ETA however, depending upon the circumstances, the amount can be to a maximum of $25,000.

Where Approval for Prosecution, form TX615, refers to convictions or acquittals for other offences, only list those prosecutions normally handled by CRA. If the tax debtor has not been prosecuted during the preceding four years, no prosecution history will be shown.

Obtain your local delegated signatures for the authority lines "File reviewed by" and "Recommended by", located on the bottom of the Approval for Prosecution TX615.

Forward the following items to the delegated approval level for signature:

- duplicate copies of the Approval for Prosecution, forms TX615 and Affidavit of Personal Service, form TX605 (formerly TX25)
- the true copy of the Requirement for Information Letter, as Exhibit A

After the file has been approved, forward the following items to the person assigned within Revenue Collections or within the TSO for prosecutions:

- the prosecution file
- the Approval for Prosecution, form TX615
- the Affidavit of Personal Service, form TX605
- a true copy and two other copies of the RFI letter

Digitized by Google

The officer responsible for the prosecution will prepare an Affidavit form TX610 (formerly TX17) as evidence that the information was not supplied by the due date as well as the information and Summons. Once a court date is set, both the Officer named on the Affidavit, form TX610 and the Collection Officer who swore the Affidavit of Personal Service, form TX605 may be required to attend.

For more extensive information refer to NF/NR Prosecutions Chapter, located in the Trust Accounts NF/NR – Operations Manual.

> Note: Procedures for prosecution are contingent on local TSO parameters. Some Revenue Collections Divisions will continue to utilize the Investigations Division for all prosecution actions, while others have their own Divisional prosecution officers or specialists assigned the task of prosecutions. Local TSO or Revenue Collections Divisional policy will ultimately determine how prosecutions are actioned within each TSO.

Resource Material

Memorandum 01-02, Statutory Set-Offs and Requirements for Information to the Bank of Canada, issued February 12, 2001.

Memorandum 01-08, Bills C-13 and C-22, issued June 26, 2001.

Memorandum 01-10, Statutory Set-Offs and Requirements for Information to the Bank of Canada, issued July 6, 2001.

Memoranda 01-21, Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act, issued December 18, 2001.

Communication ARD-2003-004, Funds held in RRSPs, issued October 21, 2003.

Communication ARD-2004-015, Guidelines for the Use of ITA 231.7 and ETA 289.1, issued April 13, 2004.

Communication ARD-2004-033, Issuing Requirements for Information to Lawyers-Solicitor-Client Privilege, issued June 11, 2004.

Communication ARD-2004-037, Requirements for Information-Financial Institutions Non Compliance Action (Joint and Unknown Account Holders) issued June 23, 2004.

Communication ARD-2004-044, Requirement for Information (RFI) Differentiating taxpayer(s) who are the subject of collection action from co-account holders and others, revised April 7, 2005.

Communication ARD-2005-016, Requirement for Information-Unnamed Person, issued April 1, 2005.

Communication ARD-2005-039, Change Made to ELCS Verse 19648-Requirement for Information to Financial Institution, issued November 10, 2005.

Communication TSDMB-2006-020, Changes to the Bank Act allowing a Designated Branch for the point of Service for Requirements to pay and Requirements for Information, issued February 27, 2006.

Digitized by Google

Glossary

Form T375 (ELCS letter 19648)

Used to obtain information and/or documents from financial institutions and is issued by registered mail.

Form T375A

Utilized to obtain information and/or documents from financial institutions. The only difference from Requirement to Provide Info and Documents is that this format is used to effect personal service of the letter.

Non-juridical day

Black's Law Dictionary defines "Non-juridical day" as a "Day on which process cannot ordinarily issue or be executed or returned, and on which courts do not usually sit."

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

[105]

OFFENCES AND PUNISHMENT

Offences and punishment - S. 238(1)

238. (1) Every person who has failed to file or make a return as and when required by or under this Act or a regulation or who has failed to comply with subsection 116(3), 127(3.1) or 127(3.2), 147.1(7) or 153(1), any of sections 230 to 232 or a regulation made under subsection 147.1(18) or with an order made under subsection 238(2) is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to

(a) a fine of not less than $1,000 and not more than $25,000; or

(b) both the fine described in paragraph 238(1)(a) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months.

Compliance orders

(2) Where a person has been convicted by a court of an offence under subsection 238(1) for a failure to comply with a provision of this Act or a regulation, the court may make such order as it deems proper in order to enforce compliance with the provision.

Saving

---

[105] "Sun Tears", 2011, Patricia Vertes, Howick, Quebec

Digitized by Google

(3) Where a person has been convicted under this section of failing to comply with a provision of this Act or a regulation, the person is not liable to pay a penalty imposed under section 162 or 227 for the same failure unless the person was assessed for that penalty or that penalty was demanded from the person before the information or complaint giving rise to the conviction was laid or made.

Filing is a Strict Obligation, Absent of Frame of Mind

In Sandra June Gibbs v. Regina[106] the filing requirements of the Act were commented on. It's important to note that the only method to defend a strict liability (obligation) as this is with the defence of due in that the steps the taxpayer took to comply with the Act were those a reasonable person would have taken. In this case the court held:

> Did the trial judge err in characterizing the offence as one of strict liability when it should be considered a full mens rea offence?
>
> [65] The offences in question are created by s. 238(2) of the Act. It is common ground that offences created by s. 238 are strict liability offences for which the defence of due diligence is available: R v. Rohan's Rockpile Ltd. (1981), 26 B.C.L.R. 125, 57 C.C.C. (2d) 388 (B.C.C.A.); R v. Adair, [2000] 3 C.T.C. 116, 2000 BCSC 861 at para. 5. Further, in R v. Bordignon, [1981] B.C.J. No. 342 (B.C. Co. Ct.), the court considered a corporate offence, not dissimilar to counts 3 and 4 in this case, and concluded that following the Court of Appeal's decision in Rohan's Rockpile, these were also strict liability offences. For this reason, there is no requirement to establish the mental element or mens rea for the offences the appellant was charged with. [66] The only defence available to an individual charged with a strict liability offence is due diligence. The appellant must "establish, on the balance of probabilities, that [s]he took all reasonable steps, which would have been expected of a reasonable man, to comply with the Notice" (Adair at para. 5). As acknowledged by this court in Adair, a finding of due diligence is considered a finding of fact and an appellant court must not interfere with a trial judge's conclusions on matters of fact unless there is a palpable or overriding error.
>
> [67] With regard to counts 3 and 4, the offences relating to the filing of the corporate income tax returns, the Crown has the additional burden of proving that a defendant is a director of the corporation, and that the defendant is a party as defined in s. 242 of the Act. Section 242 of the Act reads: Where a corporation commits an offence under this Act, any officer, director or agent of the corporation who directed, authorized, assented to, acquiesced in or participated in the commission of the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence and is liable on conviction to the punishment provided for the offence whether or not the corporation has been prosecuted or convicted.
>
> [68] The trial judge found that since the appellant had been personally served with the Requirements to file the corporate returns, was a director of the corporation and was in charge of the tax aspects of the corporation, that she was a party to the corporate offence. She received the Requirements and did nothing to bring herself in compliance with them.
>
> Did the trial judge err in finding that the appellant's actions did not amount to due diligence?
>
> [69] The appellant submitted to this court, as she did to the learned trial judge, that she exercised due diligence in:
>
> Refusing to respond to the Requirements because of the failure on the part of the CRRA field officer to fill out the questionnaire.
>
> Trying and failing to find a certified compilation of the Act.

---

[106] 2006 BCSC 481

Digitized by Google

[70] The appellant's claim that her obligation to comply with statutory requirements disappeared when Amissah failed to fill out a questionnaire cannot constitute due diligence. This same argument was rejected by the Summary Appeal Court in Canada (Attorney General) v. Voth (2001), 211 Sask. R. 270, 2001 SKQB 469. The court ruled at para. 27:

Nor was Revenue Canada faced with a simple or straight-forward request to clarify its purpose. Instead, it was asked to complete and return a detailed and offensive questionnaire. It was quite justified in refusing to do so.

[71] The decision was upheld by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Canada (Attorney General) v. Voth 2002 SKCA 47.

[72] In this case, the "Notice of Demand for Information" given to Amissah was incomprehensible. Amissah was not under any obligation to respond to such a document, nor was he likely even able to respond.

[73] The appellant's belief that the Act does not exist in a form binding on her is a mistake of law, and cannot constitute due diligence.

[74] In R. v. Klundert (2004), 242 D.L.R. (4th) 644, 187 C.C.C. (3d) 417, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused (2005), 339 N.R. 198, the Ontario Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeal from an acquittal of a person charged with tax evasion. Dr. Klundert had been acquitted based on his belief that the Act was invalid. Doherty J.A., for the panel, wrote at paras 59 and 60:

A person's mistaken belief that a statute is invalid or is otherwise not applicable to that person's conduct is a mistake of law. It is, however, a mistake of law that is irrelevant to the existence of the fault requirement in s. 229(1)(d). Nor can that kind of mistake of law provide a freestanding excuse for the commission of a crime: Criminal Code, s. 19; R. v. Jones (1991), 66 C.C.C. (3d) 512 (S.C.C.) at 516- 517; R. v. Watson (1999), 137 C.C.C. (3d) 422 (Nfld. C.A.), at 431-33.

There are solid policy reason for drawing a distinction between an accused who mistakenly believes that he or she is complying with the Act and an accused who knowingly violates the Act, but mistakenly believes that the Act is invalid. The former is trying to comply with the law. Particularly where the law is complex, a mistake concerning the applicable law can logically negate the blameworthiness of the person's conduct. The latter is not trying to obey the law, but is instead deciding which laws should be obeyed. An acquittal based on a mistaken belief as to the validity of a law would undermine the rule of law.

[75] The British Columbia Court of Appeal adopted the reasoning in Klundert in R. v. Kennedy, [2005] I.C.T.C. 321, 2004 BCCA 638.

[76] The trial judge's finding that the appellant had not exercised due diligence is one of fact. Again, the trial judge not only did not err in his finding, he was correct.

Further, in R. v. Burko[107] the Ontario Superior Court of Justice held:

[29] The parties are on common ground that this is a regulatory offence, and is thus one of strict liability. Accordingly, once the actus reus of the offence has been established, the only defence is that the accused exercised due diligence. The onus is on the accused to show due diligence.

[30] In my view, once the actus reus of the offence has been proven, and the onus shifts to the accused to establish due diligence, I cannot see that a W.(D.) analysis is required. Such an analysis is required in order to determine whether the Crown has proven an offence beyond a reasonable doubt. In doing so, a trial judge must consider whether defence evidence raises a reasonable doubt, even if it is not believed. However, in the case of a regulatory offence, once the actus reus has been established, and the onus is on the accused to establish due diligence, it is no longer relevant to consider whether the evidence of the accused, even if not believed, raises a reasonable doubt.

[107] 2011 ONSC 479

Digitized by Google

[31] I did not understand Mr. Halfyard to dispute what I have just articulated. However, he submitted that in determining whether the actus reus of an offence has been committed, even in the case of a regulatory offence, the onus is on the Crown to prove the actus reus beyond a reasonable doubt. At that stage, a W.(D.) analysis is still appropriate. Thus, in considering whether the actus reus had been proven beyond a reasonable doubt, the trial judge was required to consider whether the evidence of Mr. Burko and his wife, even if not accepted, raised a reasonable doubt.

[32] I agree with Mr. Halfyard. In my view, the trial judge conflated the issue of whether the actus reus had been established with the defence of due diligence. However, in the particular circumstances of this case, the appeal should nevertheless be dismissed.

[33] In this case, as far as the actus reus was concerned, the only issue was whether the documents had been filed in time. If they had been filed in time, no offences were committed. If they were not filed in time, the actus reus was made out.

[34] As far as the defence of due diligence was concerned, the only evidence was that of Mr. Burko and his wife. If that evidence was accepted, the defence of due diligence was made out. If the evidence was not accepted, the defence of due diligence was not made out.

[35] The evidence of the accused in relation to both the actus reus of the offences and the defence of due diligence was the same – the evidence of Mr. Burko and his wife. In her Reasons for Judgment, the trial judge made it clear that she did not believe the evidence of either Mr. Burko or his wife. In these narrow circumstances, once the trial judge did not accept any of the defence evidence, there was no room to find that there was any reasonable doubt as to the actus reus of the offences. The only other evidence before the trial judge supported a finding that the actus reus of the offences had been established. In the particular, narrow, circumstances of this case, a W.(D.) analysis would have made no difference to the result. This was a very simple case, and the evidence was straightforward. The trial judge made clear findings. No reviewable error has been shown.

[36] With respect to the defence of due diligence, since the trial judge did not believe the evidence of Mr. Burko and his wife, the defence was simply not made out.

[37] Thus, I do not accept Mr. Burko's argument based on R. v. W.(D.).

Various Excuses Not Enough to Not Comply

The Proverbial Mouldy/Damaged Papers

In the recent case of R. v. Hanlon[108] the BC Appeal Court canvassed the issue of when source documents necessary to prepare the tax returns of the offending taxpayer had been damaged through neglect thereof. It held:

[13] There is no dispute that the appropriate income tax return was not filed by the specified date. The only issue at trial and on appeal was the question of whether Ms. Hanlon could succeed on her due diligence defence to a strict liability offence: R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1299.

[14] The provincial court judge reviewed the evidence and concluded:

[18] While I am enormously sympathetic to her physical condition and what she was living through with respect to her sons' medical conditions, and all of the problems at the school, and all of the problems with respect to mountains of disorganization and paper

[108] 2009 BCCA 598

Digitized by Google

everywhere, I do not read from the medical records that that is necessarily a complication in her life. It does not necessarily flow from the medical. It is tied in with, but I am sure that there are many people that suffer from that syndrome that have found ways and have been forced to find ways of helping themselves get organized.

[19] That does not appear to have been the case with Ms. Hanlon and I find that the efforts that were made or not made and the amount of time that it took are not reasonable. So that the defence with respect to due diligence, either looking at it strictly from her personal circumstances or that of the reasonable person, are not sufficient and were not sufficient at the time. So that results in a conviction.

[15] The appellant appealed her conviction and applied for an order admitting fresh evidence on appeal in the form of viva voce testimony from one of her doctors.

[16] The summary conviction appeal judge admitted the fresh evidence. He noted, as did the provincial court judge, that there had been some flooding in her home and that as a consequence, a number of documents that might have assisted her in filing her income tax return, were damaged and mouldy.

[17] The summary conviction appeal judge dismissed the appeal, having concluded that the provincial court judge made no error in law and that the judge had considered the medical evidence and properly considered whether, on a balance of probabilities, the due diligence defence had been established.

[18] He held that the fresh evidence, which he had admitted, did not impact any of the findings of the trial judge.

[19] At the application for leave to appeal before me, counsel for the appellant emphasized the consequences of the flood. In his written argument he asserted: However the learned Supreme Court Judge concerned himself only with subjective considerations in Paragraphs 15, 16, 17. No consideration is ever given to the objective consequences of the flood, which was the reason for the extension request of Exhibit

That request was not alleging mental illness but physical incapacity. That incapacity expressed in Exhibit 7 and the evidence at trial from the Appellant was disregarded by Silverman J., just as it had been by Gedye, PCJ.

[20] He argued that the combination of her medical condition and the circumstances of the water damage were ignored by both judges. He says that “this case, of all cases, should meet the test of due diligence”.

[21] In R. v McKinney, 2004 BCPC 9, [2004] B.C.J. No. 161 (aff’d 2008 BCCA 211), the trial judge summarized the principles applicable to the defence of due diligence at para. 60:

[60] The Court of Appeal in the Whissell-McLeod decision agreed with the reasoning of Judge Oliver of this Court in R. v. Gill, [1989] B.C.J. No. 2225, October 19, 1989. A “taxpayer who allows his records to get into such a state that his income tax obligations can only be fulfilled through costly efforts does so at his peril” (at paragraph 9). The Act obligates taxpayers to both provide timely information when required, as well as to file income tax returns.

[22] In order for leave to be granted, the appellant must:

identify an error on the part of the summary conviction appeal court, which raises an issue of law alone, establish that the appeal is of general importance, and establish that the appeal has a reasonable possibility of success: R. v. Moore, 2000 BCCA 588, [2000] B.C.J. No. 2164.

[23] In R. v. Meikle, 2006 BCCA 558, 71 W.C.B. (2d) 784, it was held that the overriding concern in considering the last two parts of the test in Moore is the interests of justice.

Digitized by Google

[24] The error which the appellant identifies is the failure of the trial judge and the summary conviction appeal judge to recognize the consequences of the water damage on her efforts to file her 2002 income tax return. Her counsel says this evidence should have satisfied the defence of due diligence.

[25] Having reviewed the transcript of her evidence on this point, I would not accede to this argument. The appellant has failed to identify an error on the part of the summary conviction appeal court judge that raises an issue of law alone. The appellant has, at best, identified an issue of mixed fact and law, and therefore fails to establish this ground for leave to appeal. Moreover, the appellant has also failed to establish that this appeal is of general importance and has failed to establish that the appeal has a reasonable possibility of success, particularly considering the explanation of the due diligence defence in R. v. McKinney.

"I Had No Taxes Payable, Thus No Need to File, and I ignored the Demand to File"

In R. v. Carter[109] the BC Provincial Court had to determine whether, amongst other reasons, a taxpayer charged under s. 238(1) had various defences available to him, including recent bad health. It opined:

Issues

[16] In his written argument, Mr. Drove, counsel for Mr. Carter, raised a number of issues, which were reframed by Federal Crown Counsel, Mr. Kaun, in his argument and are now restated by me as follows:

Was the tax liability of Carter subject to a genuine and serious inquiry by the Minister of National Revenue?

Did Carter exercise due diligence in filing his tax returns in response to the notices of requirement to file?

Is the imposition of a minimum penalty of $1,000 per count cruel and unusual punishment, thereby violating s. 12 of the Charter?

Is the decision of the Minister to proceed with charges of failure to comply with the notices pursuant to s. 231.2(1) and (1)(a) of the Act rather than with charges of failure to file within a reasonable time contrary to s. 150(1) and 162 cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s. 12 of the Charter?'

Discussion

[17] Dealing first with number three above, the minimum penalty and s. 12 of the Charter of Rights, this clearly is an issue, which must await a verdict of guilt or innocence, as it only applies to any penalty that may be imposed after a conviction, if any. Therefore, I will not deal with it at this time.

[18] Before going on to discuss the evidence, I must take note of the fact that the accused gave evidence and called an additional witness. Therefore, I must instruct myself in the principles of W.(D.) as to the defence evidence as follows:

If I believe the accused and his evidence raises a defence, I must acquit.

If I do not believe his evidence, but the defence evidence as a whole raises a defence I must acquit.

It is only after I have rejected the evidence of the accused and the defence witness that I may examine the case for the Crown to see if they have proved their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

[19] Number one: Was the tax liability of Mr. Carter the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry by the Minister of National Revenue?

---

[109] 2011 BCPC 253

Digitized by Google

[20] This argument arises as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in James Richardson the Minister of National Revenue, 1984 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 614.

[21] In that case the Supreme Court of Canada examined the scope of what is now s. 231.2(1) and concluded the Minister cannot go on a "fishing expedition," but rather the section is only available to be used if the Minister is seeking information relevant to the tax liability of a specific person, and that person is the subject of a genuine and serious inquiry. (My summary).

[22] In the Richardson case, the Minister was trying to check out compliance by traders in the commodities futures market, but the Minister did not know the identity of the customers of the appellant commodities broker. Justice Wilson writing for the court found that this type of broad general inquiry without being related to a specific person's tax liability was not a serious and genuine inquiry. The requirement to file cannot be used as "a subterfuge for some other purpose." (See Canadian Bank of Commerce v. the Attorney General of Canada, 1962 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 729 and R. v. Dakus, 1988 AJ, No. 608).

[23] Further the B.C. Court of Appeal in R. v. Van Egmond, 2002 BCCA 226 (CanLII), 2002 BCCA 226, commented on this issue as follows in the words of Mr. Justice Braidwood: Mr. Van Egmond, as a result of his not having filed his own tax returns for a considerable number of years, was under legitimate investigation. (See also R. v. Sharma, [1995] B.C.J. No. 2113).

[25] On the evidence that I have before me, especially the running notes and history contained in Exhibit 1, there is ample evidence to support the conclusion that Revenue Canada was conducting a serious and genuine inquiry into the tax liability, if any, of Mr. Carter. To determine this, the Minister needed Mr. Carter to complete and sign a tax return for each of the years set out in the Indictment.

[26] The notice of requirement to file commenced the process of determining what, if any, income tax was owing by Mr. Carter. Mr. Carter failed to comply with the notice of requirement to file for over a year, well beyond the 90-day time limit set out in the notice. (See Exhibit 1).

[27] The defence argument that because there were no taxes owing by Mr. Carter at the time the demand was served on him and therefore there was no genuine and serious inquiry, is circular at best.

[28] In the case of R. v. Packard, 2006 BCSC 719 (CanLII), 2006 BCSC 719, the court held that tax liability is not a pre-requisite to issuing a valid notice of requirement.

[29] The only way the correct tax liability of Mr. Carter could be determined was by assessing completed and signed returns. Mr. Carter failed to do that as required. I find there was a genuine and serious inquiry in this case for each of the taxation years.

[30] Number two: Did Carter exercise due diligence in filing his tax returns in response to the notice of requirement?

[31] These offences under s. 238 of the Income Tax Act are offences of strict liability where the defence of due diligence is available to the accused on a balance of probabilities. In strict liability offences the Crown must only lead evidence the accused has not done what he was required to do by performing some duty or fulfilling some obligation.

[32] Once that is established the offence is proven unless the accused can show on a balance of probabilities that he has taken reasonable steps to comply with the Income Tax Act requirements and the notice of requirement to file. (See R. v. Rolin, 2 C.R.R. 166, and the case of Sault Ste. Marie, (1978) 40 C.C.C. (2d) 353, (S.C.C.)).

[33] If the accused can show he took all reasonable steps then he may argue that he exercised due diligence. In support of the due diligence defence, the defence points out in part:

Digitized by Google

On receipt of the notice Carter faxed them to Knudson.
Carter's stroke in April 2006 affected his memory and hampered his ability to comply with the 90- day requirement in the notice of requirement to file.
Revenue Canada refused to grant an extension of the 90-day time limit.
[34] Counsel for Mr. Carter submits that his client did comply with the requirements and that the 90-day time limit was unreasonable in these circumstances; therefore, submits the defence, the unsigned nil returns were filed in June 2008 and this constituted due diligence on the facts in the case at bar.
[35] The first thing I would note is that these charges were not laid until April 14th, 2008 some 10 months after the notice of requirement was personally served on Mr. Carter. Had the Crown proceeded with these charges on the 91st day after the day of service I might give some weight to this argument; however, I find that over 10 months even in these circumstances is more than reasonable time to comply with the notice. [36] As tragic as the aftermath of Mr. Carter's stroke was, the courts have rejected the submission that some attempts to comply, together with compassion, equate to due diligence. (See Mr. Justice Hood in R. v. Adair, 2000 BCSC 861 (CanLII), 2000 BCSC 861, at Paragraph 18.)
[37] Further the Indictment covers the years 2001 to 2006 and Ms. Knudson, the bookkeeper, was retained in March 2006 before the stroke occurred. There was no evidence of any health issues for Mr. Carter in the years 2001 to 2005 when he failed to file his income tax returns for those years.
[38] In R. v. Kemnay, 27th of November 2001, unreported, Port Coquitlam Registry 6200701T in the B.C. Provincial Court, the court there commented that [as read in]:
Citizens of Canada have both rights and duties. One of those duties being the filing of income tax returns. The failure to file is both blameworthy and culpable.(See Paragraph 13 of that decision).
[40] As further evidence of a lack of due diligence, the Crown points out that even when the returns were filed in 2008 they were not signed, nor were they completed as they just had the words "Nil" written on them. [41] The notice of requirement served on Mr. Carter sets out plainly what is required; that is, completed and signed tax returns for each of the years set out. The filing of nil or not applicable returns has been held not to constitute compliance with a notice of requirement. (See Jacques v. HMTQ, 2000 BCSC 430 (CanLII), 2000 BCSC 430).
[42] The defence argument that the Canada Revenue Agency does not absolutely require all income tax returns to be signed by the taxpayer is answered by the fact that the notice of requirement does have this obligation clearly and plainly set out.
[43] In the case of R. v. Euerby, 1992 B.C.J. No. 396, the court had this to say in the words of Mr. Justice Murphy:
I only wish to note that the charge is not one of failing to file a return but failing to comply with a notice to file a return. In the notice, sufficient time is given to comply and as well the consequences of failing to comply are set out. A person receiving such a notice is well aware of the consequences of failing to comply, and therefore has the opportunity to avoid the consequences.
[44] Even if I reject none of the defence evidence, here I find the accused has failed to establish on a balance of probabilities due diligence.
[45] Number four. Is the decision of the Minister to proceed with charges of failing to comply with the notices of requirement pursuant to s. 231.2(1) and 238 of the Act rather than with charges of failure to file within a reasonable time contrary to s. 150(1) and 162, cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s. 12 of the Charter?
[46] The defence submissions on this argument are unclear as to what remedy, if any,

Digitized by Google

they are seeking assuming they establish a breach of s. 12 on a balance of probabilities. Further this defence argument seems to be predicated on the assumption that the Minister of National Revenue, rather than the Director of Public Prosecutions, makes the prosecutorial decisions in cases like this.

[47] I think I can take judicial notice of the fact that while the Canada Revenue Agency may investigate offences like this, they do not prosecute them. It is also trite law that prosecutorial decisions made by the Crown are, absent egregious conduct, susceptible to limited judicial review. However, while the Supreme Court of Canada in Krieger v. the Law Society of Alberta, 2002 SCC 65 (CanLII), [2002] 3 S.C.R. 372, makes it clear some decisions of the Crown are not a true exercise of prosecutorial discretion and therefore open to judicial review, these instances will by their very nature be rare.

[48] For example, tactical decisions about the conduct of a trial versus prosecutorial discretion about whether or not to lay a charge will be treated differently. (See R. v. DeZenet al, 2010 ONSC 974 (CanLII), 2010 ONSC 974, Ontario Supreme Court.)

[49] In the case at bar, I find that this decision of the Director of Public Prosecutions is one of those decisions that is not open to judicial review. There is no evidence of any improper motive or conduct on the part of the Crown. Accordingly, there is no evidence to the standard on a balance of probabilities to hold that Mr. Carter's s. 12 Charter rights have been breached. I dismiss that argument.

[50] Accordingly and for the reasons given, I find the accused guilty as charged on all six counts.

[51] All right, I will deal now with the matter of the decision in Logan and then we can go back and discuss the next steps in Carter.

(REASONS CONCLUDED)

CORRIGENDUM – Released October 20, 2011

In the Oral Reasons for Judgment dated June 16, 2011, the following change has been made:

[1] In paragraph 16, reference to s. 231.2(2)(a) of the Income Tax Act should have been to section 231.2(1)(a). Paragraph 16 now reads:

[16] In his written argument, Mr. Drove, counsel for Mr. Carter, raised a number of issues, which were reframed by Federal Crown Counsel, Mr. Kaun, in his argument and are now restated by me as follows:

Was the tax liability of Carter subject to a genuine and serious inquiry by the Minister of National Revenue?

Did Carter exercise due diligence in filing his tax returns in response to the notices of requirement to file?

Is the imposition of a minimum penalty of $1,000 per count cruel and unusual punishment, thereby violating s. 12 of the Charter?

Is the decision of the Minister to proceed with charges of failure to comply with the notices pursuant to s. 231.2(1) and (1)(a) of the Act rather than with charges of failure to file within a reasonable time contrary to s. 150(1) and 162 cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s. 12 of the Charter?

"It's Against My Religion – and My Charter"

In Little v. R.[110] a taxpayer attempted to argue that it was against his religion to file tax returns in the face of s. 2 of the Charter. The New Brunswick Appeal Court spoke unequivocally on it with:

ROBERTSON J.A.

[1] Section 2(a) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that "everyone" has the fundamental freedom of "conscience and religion". This appeal asks whether those who oppose abortion on grounds of "religion", or as a matter of "conscience", are relieved of the legal obligation to file annual tax returns and, by necessary implication, the obligation to pay taxes, because of this Charter right. The answer has to be no. The non-filing of annual returns, like the non-payment of taxes, does not qualify as a religious practice nor has it become the tenet of any religious faith. The refusals are simply acts of civil disobedience intended to bring about change in government policy, the law, or both. Admittedly, the refusals may be the product of an informed conscience, but the Charter was not intended to insulate such acts from the rule of law. Otherwise, everyone who disagrees with government policies and the expenditure of public monies in furtherance of those policies would be entitled to abandon their obligation to bear their proportionate share of the national debt while continuing to receive no-cost public benefits such as Medicare. This is not how a true democracy functions and this is one of the reasons why the appellant's appeal is doomed to failure. Moreover, these realties are not overtaken by the argument that Canada's taxation laws represent forced participation in the funding of abortions. The fact that a person files a tax return and pays taxes does not connote an expression of support for any government policy or expenditure. These obligatory acts are the annual price Canadians pay to ensure there is a continuing debate over the appropriateness of government policies and expenditures made in accordance with the existing law.

[110] 2009 NBCA 53

Digitized by Google

[2] The appellant, David Little, was charged under s. 238(1) of the Income Tax Act R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) for failing to file an individual income tax return for each of the years 2000, 2001 and 2002. The failure arose after the Minister of National Revenue issued a notice demanding compliance pursuant to s. 231.2(1)(a). At trial, Mr. Little admitted the essential elements for each of the three summary conviction offences, while raising two Charter defences. First, he argued that his s. 2(a) right to freedom of religion was infringed. The trial judge accepted that Mr. Little, a Roman Catholic, holds the sincere religious belief that abortion is wrong; a belief which is rooted in the tenets of his faith. The trial judge also found that Mr. Little had failed to establish any religious requirement to abstain from filing annual tax returns. The trial judge further held that the obligation to file such returns did not interfere with Mr. Little's religious beliefs or practices and, therefore, s. 2(a) of the Charter was not engaged. Alternatively, the trial judge held that had s. 2(a) been engaged, Mr. Little had nevertheless failed to establish that the interference with his religious freedom was other than trivial or insubstantial. The trial judge went on to reject Mr. Little's discrimination argument based on s. 15(1) of the Charter. A conviction was entered and the minimum $1000 fine was imposed for each of the three infractions. The trial decision is now reported as R. v. Little (D.T.) (2007), 328 N.B.R. (2d) 1, [2007] N.B.J. No. 495 (QL), 2008 NBPC 2.

[3] Mr. Little appealed the trial judge's decision. The summary conviction appeal court judge observed that Mr. Little had failed to cite any authority for the proposition that it is permissible to refrain from filing annual tax returns because one disagrees with government polices or expenditures. Unable to identify any error on the part of the trial judge, the appeal judge dismissed Mr. Little's appeal. The decision is now reported as R. v. Little (2008), 339 N.B.R. (2d) 151, [2008] N.B.J. No. 407 (QL), 2008 NBQB 348.

[4] Mr. Little's first ground of appeal challenges the sufficiency of the appeal judge's reasons for judgment. Admittedly they are brief, but understandably so. The issues raised in this case are essentially questions of law. In finding that the trial judge did not err in law or principle, it was open to the appeal judge to adopt the reasoning of the trial judge in disposing of Mr. Little's argument based s. 2(a) of the Charter. Hence, the issue before us is whether the appeal judge erred in failing to identify error on the part of the trial judge. In my respectful view, neither judge erred. My reasons respond to the fullness of the legal argument advanced in this Court. Admittedly, these reasons do not deal with all of the issues raised. With respect to the discrimination argument based on s. 15(1) of the Charter, I say no more as it lacks merit. Moreover, I am not prepared to entertain Mr. Little's argument based on s. 7 of the Charter. That issue was not raised below and, with great respect, is no more deserving of consideration than his s. 15(1) argument. Self-represented litigants must understand that courts are not obligated to address arguments that are premised on misunderstandings of the law. I should also point out that the Crown opposed the granting of leave to appeal while asking us to embrace the approach adopted by the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. R. (R.) (2008), 90

Digitized by Google

O.R. (3d) 641, [2008] O.J. No. 2468 (QL), 2008 ONCA 497, in regard to applications for leave to appeal summary conviction offences. Bluntly stated, now is not the time to deal with the matters raised in that decision.

[5] It takes little prescience to anticipate the fallout from a legal precedent holding that s. 2(a) of the Charter provides a valid defence to those who refuse to file annual tax returns or to pay taxes because of a sincere belief that monies used to fund government programs which are objectionable, either on religious grounds or as a matter of conscience, is wrong. The federal and provincial governments would be deprived of substantial revenue needed to fund government programs which are universally accepted as furthering the public interest. This explains why the surrounding jurisprudence is inevitably brief but pithy. I propose to follow suit by examining only the main tenets of the Charter jurisprudence surrounding s. 2(a). Two decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada must be canvassed. I start with the Supreme Court's definition of religious freedom authored by Dickson C.J. in R. v. Big M Drug Mart, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, [1985] S.C.J. No. 17 (QL):

A truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct. A free society is one which aims at equality with respect to the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms and I say this without any reliance upon s. 15 of the Charter. Freedom must surely be founded in respect for the inherent dignity and the inviolable rights of the human person. The essence of the concept of freedom of religion is the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. But the concept means more than that.

Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the state or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or restraint. Coercion includes not only such blatant forms of compulsion as direct commands to act or refrain from acting on pain of sanction, coercion includes indirect forms of control which determine or limit alternative courses of conduct available to others. Freedom in a broad sense embraces both the absence of coercion and constraint, and the right to manifest beliefs and practices. Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience. [pp. 336- 337]

[6] The above passages reveal that religious freedom embraces three interrelated aspects: (1) the right to entertain religious beliefs without fear of hindrance or reprisal; (2) the right to manifest religious belief by worship, practice, teaching and dissemination; and (3) the absence of coercion or constraint. The latter embraces the notion that no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his or her beliefs, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. In brief, s. 2(a) protects religious beliefs and practices. Laws which restrict or impede the right to adhere to a religious practice are suspect as are laws which force a person to act contrary to their religious beliefs. Of course, s. 2(a) does more than protect religious beliefs. It makes room for the conscientious objector whose judgment is informed by other sources.

Digitized by Google

[7] The Supreme Court's decision in Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 551, [2004] S.C.J. No. 46 (QL), 2004 SCC 47, is also important for two reasons. It outlines the analytical framework to be applied when dealing with a Charter argument based on freedom of religion. The decision also provides an expanded definition for the legal concept of "religious practice". At issue in the case was the right of orthodox Jews to build succahs (temporary dwellings) on the balconies of their condominium apartments. The succahs would be used for nine days, each year, during a religious festival. However, the condominium by-laws prohibited structures of any kind on balconies and the claimants knew this at the time they purchased their units. Though the Court was deeply divided, the majority of the Supreme Court upheld the rights of the claimants and in so doing defined "protected religious practice" in the broadest of terms. The practice need not be a part of an established belief system or even a belief shared by others. The claimant need only establish a sincere belief that the practice is "of religious significance". Of particular relevance to this appeal is the analytical framework the Supreme Court imposed in regard to Charter claims tied to infringement of the right to religious freedom:

Thus, at the first stage of a religious freedom analysis, an individual advancing an issue premised upon a freedom of religion claim must show the court that (1) he or she has a practice or belief, having a nexus with religion, which calls for a particular line of conduct, either by being objectively or subjectively obligatory or customary, or by, in general, subjectively engendering a personal connection with the divine or with the subject or object of an individual's spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials; and (2) he or she is sincere in his or her belief. Only then will freedom of religion be triggered. [para. 56]

[8] In brief, a claim of interference with one's freedom of religion has two components: the practice or belief must have a nexus with religion and the claimant must be sincere in his or her belief with respect to the religious practice. Once these criteria are met the claimant's s. 2(a) Charter right is "triggered". But Amselem goes one step further and imposes a third criterion. A court must ascertain whether the burden imposed on the religious practice is "non-trivial" or "insubstantial". In other words, the claimant must establish that the impugned legislative provision interferes with the ability to act in accordance with one's religious beliefs in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. In brief, once the claimant establishes a nexus between the practice and the claimant's sincerely held religious beliefs and once it is shown that the interference with the religious practice is neither trivial nor insignificant, an infringement of s. 2(a) of the Charter has been established. At this juncture, the onus falls on the Crown to justify the infringement under s. 1 (see Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 256, [2006] S.C.J. No. 6 (QL), 2006 SCC 6).

[9] Returning to the facts of the present case, I have been able to distil from Mr. Little's submissions two Charter arguments: (1) the provisions of the Income Tax Act requiring him to file annual tax returns interfere with his right to practice his religion; and (2) the same provisions require him to participate in a government scheme for the funding of abortions contrary to his religious beliefs. I shall deal with the issues in the order stated.

[10] With respect to Mr. Little's first Charter argument, one must first ask whether the refusal to file annual income tax returns qualifies as a religious practice in the Catholic Church. The answer is self-evident: "no". To his credit, Mr. Little does not argue that his Catholic faith regards the filing of income tax returns as "sinful". Indeed one can take judicial notice of the fact that local parishes of the Catholic Church continue to issue annual tax receipts to parishioners who may claim a tax credit under the heading "charitable donations". As well, Mr. Little does not argue that the Catholic Church teaches that it is wrong to participate in a government taxation scheme that raises revenue to defray the cost of public expenditures because some of those tax dollars will "trickle down" and be used to defray the cost of public abortions. Within this context, the nonfiling of income tax returns does not qualify as a religious practice because there is no "nexus" between the so-called practice and religion. But the analysis must go one step further and apply the expanded definition of "religious freedom" outlined in Amselem. The expanded definition embraces sincerely held beliefs that are not necessarily in conformity with religious teachings. Mr. Little argues: "It is my sincere, personal religious belief, based on what the church teaches, that my Father in heaven does not want me to sign and file tax returns unless and until the law is overturned prohibiting tax funded abortion". The folly of this argument is adroitly addressed by the Crown. It is difficult to understand the assertion that something as profound and personal as a religious practice or belief, worthy of this country's constitutional protection, would disappear with a change of government policy. However, if Mr. Little's refusal to file his income tax returns is seen conceptually, not as a religious practice or belief, but rather as a strategy or tactic to compel change, the problem resolves itself as being merely the relationship between ends and means. This is why the refusal to file annual tax returns must be regarded as an act of civil disobedience, not a religious practice or belief.

Digitized by Google

[11] Mr. Little's second Charter argument is that the provisions of the Income Tax Act require him to participate in a federal scheme which funds public abortions contrary to his sincerely held religious belief that abortion is wrong. At the outset, let me say that the argument is problematic for the following reason. Mr. Little was charged with and convicted of failing to file annual income tax returns, not for failing to pay taxes properly assessed by the Canada Revenue Agency. Until such time as Mr. Little files these returns, the Agency is simply not in a position to assess whether Mr. Little is obligated to pay taxes. In truth, Mr. Little's true objection lies in the prospect of being required to pay taxes which in turn will trickle down and be used to defray the costs of funding abortions. But until such time as he files his annual tax returns, and until such time as it is determined that taxes are owing and there is a demand for payment and a refusal to pay, it is questionable whether Mr. Little's Charter "coercion argument" warrants consideration. This reality did not escape the Crown. On a preliminary motion, the Crown argued before the trial judge that the Charter claim was premature given the fact that Mr. Little was only required to file an income tax return and there had been no determination with respect to tax liability. However, the trial judge held there was sufficient evidence to allow the Charter defence to proceed. In the circumstances, I shall deal with Mr. Little's coercion argument. [12] I have already affirmed the finding below that the provisions of the Income Tax Act requiring the filing of annual returns and the payment of taxes do not pose an obstacle to one's right to entertain and manifest religious beliefs. The only question is whether the statutory scheme requiring taxpayers to contribute to the revenue stream used to fund all government programs, including abortion, amounts to impermissible "coercion" such that the Charter claimant is being forced to participate in something which he or she opposes based on religious beliefs or an informed conscience. Mr. Little's Charter coercion argument has two premises: (1) abortion is wrong; and (2) it is wrong to participate in a secular scheme intended to generate revenue used to defray the costs of abortions. No one questions that these assertions qualify as sincerely held beliefs. Of course, the non-believer (the agnostic or atheist) would be entitled to make the same argument as s. 2(a) of the Charter also embraces freedom of conscience.

Digitized by Google

[13] This is not the first time a person has invoked the Charter as a defence to paying monies to be used for purposes viewed as objectionable on religious grounds or as a matter of conscience. In Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 211, [1991] S.C.J. No. 52 (QL), a unionized worker objected to paying union dues because of the union's expenditures of monies unrelated to collective bargaining activities. Specifically, the worker objected to payments to a political party and disarmament campaigns. He argued that compulsory membership in a union and payment of dues under the Rand formula breached his s. 2(b) right to freedom of expression and his s. 2(d) right to freedom of association. Ultimately the Charter claims were rejected, but the Court was divided on the underlying reasons. Some of the justices held that the union expenditures violated the worker's s. 2(d) right of freedom of association as the expenditures were not sufficiently related to the concerns of the bargaining unit, but that the legislation was saved under s. 1. Other members of the Court found no violation of s. 2(d). With respect to the Charter claim based on s. 2(b), the Court was unanimous. There was no infringement. I need only refer to passages from that decision relevant to this case. La Forest J. observed: "In short, the manner in which the Union expends its funds would properly be regarded as the expression of the opinions and positions of the Union qua corporate entity. It would not be regarded as an expression of the thoughts and opinions of the many individuals who contribute to the Union's coffers" (p. 340). With respect to whether the mandatory payment of union dues infringes s. 2(b), Wilson J. held:

"It seems axiomatic that the payment of taxes does not signify in the eyes of others support for the uses to which tax money is put or support for the political party in power, or indeed support for the idea of government at all" (p. 280). She further wrote: "The fact that the appellant is obligated to pay dues [...] does not inhibit him in any meaningful way from expressing a contrary view as to the merits of the causes supported by the Union" (pp. 280-281).

[14] No analogy is perfect. But, the facts of the present case and those in Lavigne share one common thread. In both cases, the Charter claimant was required to contribute monies to be used for one or more purposes which the claimant found objectionable. In Lavigne the Supreme Court held that this requirement did not infringe upon the claimant's right to freedom of expression because payment did not signify support for the causes represented by the expenditures. In a similar view, it can be argued that the payment of taxes ultimately used to defray the cost of a public expenditure (abortion) does not signify the taxpayer's support for that expenditure. Correlatively, if there is no infringement of the taxpayer's right to freedom of expression, how can there be an infringement of the same taxpayer's freedom of conscience? I pose the question because acts of sincere expression are invariably the product of an informed conscience. For example, had the claimant in Lavigne objected to a union expenditure to a pro-choice advocacy group, as opposed to a political party that supports such groups, why should the result have been any different? Perhaps it is unwise to compare, let alone conflate, the Charter freedoms of expression, religion and conscience. But there are cases where the claimant's s. 2(a) Charter argument has been rejected on the ground that the government's expenditure of tax dollars cannot reasonably be regarded as an expression of support for the expenditure. [15] The first of two cases to be discussed is Prior v. Canada, [1989] 2 C.T.C. 280 (F.C.A.), 101 N.R. 401, [1989] F.C.J. No. 903 (QL) leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, 21709 (Sept. 20, 1990). In that case, the taxpayer sought a declaration that she was entitled to be repaid 10.5% of taxes paid because that was the percentage amount of the federal budget allocated to military spending. The taxpayer's arguments, based on 2(a) and s. 15(1), were rejected by the motion judge who dismissed the application for declaratory relief as failing to disclose a reasonable cause of action. The Federal Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. Writing for the court, Marceau J.A. held:

Digitized by Google

I have no difficulty in saying with the motions judge that neither the payment of income tax nor the defence expenditures of the Government of Canada in any way affect, curtail, diminish or infringe the Appellant's conscience or religion within the meaning of paragraph 2(a) of the Charter. The income tax paid by her under the secular scheme of the Income Tax Act charging her business or employment income to tax, in no way identifies her with any of the functions of the Government of Canada be they political, social, economic, defence or for the Peace Order and Good Government of Canada.[QL]

[16] In Petrini v. Canada (1994), [1995] 1 C.T.C. 200 (F.C.A.), [1994] F.C.J. No. 1451 (QL), the Federal Court of Appeal was again required to deal with a taxpayer claiming that the use of tax revenues for government purposes, which offended the taxpayer's religious beliefs, was an infringement of Charter rights. Writing for the Court, Hugessen J.A. crafted a solitary paragraph that offers a practical response to Mr. Little's Charter arguments:

The underlying principle decided by Prior may be simply stated: the Charter guarantees of freedom of conscience and religion cannot operate to prevent the government from employing general tax revenues in ways which offend the religious beliefs or consciences of some of its citizens. The obligation that such citizens have to pay taxes to support the government (and therefore, indirectly, the programs which offend them) does not breach those freedoms. The taxpayer, so long as he or she is not compelled to agree with government policy or forbidden from advocating contrary views, has no justiciable complaint. The simple, if subjectively unpleasant, obligation to pay taxes to a government some or all of whose views and programs one opposes does not imply support of such views and programs or force the taxpayer to act contrary to his or her personal beliefs and convictions; on the contrary, it is an essential part of living in a democracy such as Canada.

There is no need to invoke section 1 to support this conclusion for it is inherent in the system of government which has existed in this country for over 125 years. [para. 3, (QL)]

[17] The subsequent jurisprudence of the Supreme Court in Amselem and Multani does not detract from the incisiveness of the above passage. The filing of annual income tax returns, like the payment of taxes, cannot reasonably be regarded as an expression of support for a particular government expenditure or policy so as to offend a claimant's Charter right to freedom of religion and conscience. Nor can it be characterized as coercion of the kind embraced by the concept of freedom of religion and conscience. A pacifist who resists compulsory military service may object on grounds that military service is contrary to his or her religious beliefs or objectionable as a matter of principle and conscience. Most certainly, forced participation in these circumstances triggers the application of s. 2(a) of the Charter. But the same pacifist cannot invoke that Charter provision as a valid basis for the refusal to file annual income tax returns and to pay taxes duly assessed. The same reasoning applies to those who object to public funding of abortions through the taxation system. The coercion of which Mr. Little complains is simply too remote to invoke his s. 2(a) Charter rights. Any perceived interference with his religious beliefs cannot be regarded as "substantial" within the meaning of the jurisprudence.

[18] I would deny the application for leave to appeal.

J. T. ROBERTSON, J.A.

We Concur:

LARLEE, J.A.

Digitized by Google

KATHLEEN A. QUIGG, J.A.

An Expanded Defence

In R. v. Maleki the Ontario Court Of Justice held, with respect to s. 238, without citing supporting authority on the expanded defences, that:

> Issues
>
> The offences alleged by the crown are of a strict liability nature. The crown must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the prohibited act: R. v. Sault Ste. Marie (City) [1978] S.C.J. No. 59 (S.C.C.). In these types of offences, the prosecution need not prove the existence of mens rea; the doing of the prohibited act prima facie imports the offence, leaving it open to the defendant to avoid liability by proving that he took all reasonable care. The test is what a reasonable man would have done in the circumstances. Once that crown has successfully established that the offences were committed, there are three defences available to the accused: 1) due diligence, 2) officially induced error and 3) necessity. The onus shifts to the defendant to establish one or the other of these defences on a balance of probabilities.
>
> The primary issue in this case is whether the crown has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that Mozafar failed to comply with the Notices requiring him to file a completed personal income tax T1 for the relevant years. The issues raised by the defence in this regard are:
>
> defects in the affidavits filed by the crown;
>
> the mistaken address on the face of the Requirement;
>
> the scope of the searches conducted by Redvers to verify non-compliance;
>
> problems with initiating the prosecution; and
>
> the assertion that Mozafar in fact filed the returns demanded by the Requirement. I shall deal with each of these issues in turn.
>
> Defects in the Affidavits
>
> Mr. Lindsay submitted that there were mulitiple "serious" and "blatant errors" in the affidavits sworn by Mr. Redvers which rendered them, individually and collectively, a nullity and insufficient to establish guilt. Apart from the issues which I will discuss in more detail later, his concerns were about technical defects: the date the affidavits were sworn, that Redvers did not aver that the documents annexed thereto were "made by or on behalf of the Minister or a person exercising a power of the Minister;" that Redvers did not initial the Notices attached to the affidavits to ensure they were true copies; and that there are inconsistencies in the Requirement and the affidavits in their references to the "Toronto Centre Tax Services Office," the "Toronto Tax Services Office" and "Toronto District Office."
>
> With respect to the viability of the allegedly "technical defects," I make the following comments. Mr. Redvers swore the affidavits on August 11, 2003, approximately six weeks after the June 30, 2003 deadline given to Mozafar to file his returns. His Affidavit of Failure to Comply refers to his "examination and search of the appropriate records…up to and including July 25, 2003." Whatever the recommendation in the Taxation Operation Manuals (hereafter "TOM" or "TOMS"), these are administrative guidelines that have no legal significance. There can be no issue that an Information alleging failure to file "on or about the 1st day of July 2003" can be based on affidavits sworn and the searches made on the dates before this court. Similarly, the TOM may recommend placing one's initials on the true copy of the Requirement. Such initials are unnecessary, however, when the affiant swears that the copy attached is a true copy. I also find that any alleged problems with the lack of reference to the Minister and the different references to the Toronto Tax

Digitized by Google

Services Office were cured by the viva voce evidence heard on the trial.

Relying on R. v. Dionne [1998] S.J. No 189 (Sask Q.B.), Mr. Lindsay submits that as all the affidavits of Mr. Redvers indicate the same errors, the affidavits do not make out the crown's case. Unlike Dionne supra, however, this is not a case where the defence elected to call no evidence, nor where the crown was allowed to reopen its case to cure problems with the affidavits. The affidavits were admitted on consent (presumably subject to argument), and accepted prima facie on a motion for a directed verdict without the defendant raising the above allegedly technical defects. Where the affiant has subsequently been cross-examined and re-examined, and other witnesses have given viva voce evidence, I am bound to decide the case on the basis of all the evidence before the court, whatever the technical defects with respect to the affidavits: R.v Lasruk [2006] O.J. No. 4621 (Ont. S.C., Belleghem J.). Had the defence elected to call no evidence, so that the affidavits were the only evidence before the court, the weight to be accorded to the affidavits (or not) would have been substantially different than is the case before me at the conclusion of five days of evidence heard at trial. Mr. Lindsay's concerns about Redvers' Affidavits of Service is an example. There appear to be two Affidavits of Service sworn with respect to each count before the court. One sworn August 11, 2003 refers to an Affidavit attached hereto as Exhibit "B." That attachment was sworn on the same date, but the "Exhibit B" reference was sworn February 5, 2004. The affidavits of service may not have strictly complied with the requirements of s. 244(6) I.T.A. and the dates may be different but, on all the evidence before the court, there can be no doubt that Mozafar was properly served with the Requirements on the date indicated in the Affidavits of Service. In his viva voce evidence, Redvers confirmed his personal service to the defendant. The diary notes entered as an exhibit also indicate that, after making two previous attempts to serve him at his home unsuccessfully, Redvers spoke to Mozafar on the telephone and they agreed to meet. Redvers knew Mozafar from previous contacts and personally served him with the documents when they met. This evidence is uncontradicted.

Mistaken address on the Requirement There is no dispute that the CCRA Requirement to File shows a return address for the "Toronto Centre Tax Office 1 Front St. E., Toronto, Ontario M5J 2X6." The Requirement directs Mozafar to file the return at the "Toronto Centre Tax Services Office at the address shown above to the attention of Paul Redvers." The crown concedes that the Toronto Centre tax office "is located at 1 Front St. West, and that the Hummingbird Centre is located at 1 Front St. East."

I disagree with the submission that the typographical error on the Requirement return address renders the Notice of no force and effect. Redvers testified that the postal code on the return address was the correct postal code. Even if it were not, Mozafar knew where the Toronto tax office on Front Street in Toronto was located and where he could contact Mr. Redvers. On May 29 2001, Mozafar met CRA Collections Officer Judy Marshall at the tax office at 1 Front Street West. At that time, he served her with a Superior Court Statement of Claim that, on its face, included the address of the "Canada Custom and Revenue Agency, 1 Front Street West, Toronto. The Requirement also contained Mr. Redvers' correct telephone number. The uncontradicted evidence of Mr. Redvers is that Mozafar called him by telephone at that number several times.

I am satisfied that Mozafar could have filed his returns at the correct office and/or contacted Mr. Redvers had he chosen to do so. Where Mozafar had actual knowledge of the location of the Toronto tax office on Front Street and of Redvers' phone number, he cannot point to a typographical error on the face of the Requirement to claim officially induced error.

Scope of the Search to Verify Non-Compliance

Mr. Lindsay's most substantial submission is that Redvers search of the "adequate records" was insufficiently comprehensive to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Mozafar failed to file a return as required anywhere in Canada. This submission is based on the two lines of jurisprudence noted previously. The first relates to proof that the SIN number used to do the examination and search of the CRA computer file was linked to Mozafar. The second questions the assertion that proof of a search of "the appropriate records in the Toronto District Office" is sufficient to establish that Mozafar did not file a return elsewhere.

Digitized by Google

Identification

Mr Lindsay submitted that as part of its obligation to show that a careful examination and search of appropriate records was performed, the crown was required to prove that Mozafar has a specific SIN number, that Redvers checked to see if that SIN actually identified Mozafar, and that he performed his search using that SIN number which resulted in a negative response. He further submitted that the search method used by Redfers was not authorized by CRA policy and fell short of what is required to prove non-compliance with the Requirement beyond a reasonable doubt.

These submissions are based on the evidence of Wallace Dove who worked for several years with Revenue Canada and is very familiar with the TOMS designed to instruct Revenue Canada officials on how to perform their duties. His evidence is that there is a SUDS computer system in place (Systeme Universal Delpac System) "to maximize the effectiveness and efficiency of the Non-Filer/Non-Registrant Program." The details of that computer program are set out in the Non-Filers/Non-Registrants Operations Manual-2002 filed as Exhibit 28. Dove testified that when he worked at Revenue Canada, inputing the name of the taxpayer was insufficient to guarantee accurate identification, so officers were required to use account numbers and then SIN numbers. Now all taxpayers are required to provide a SIN, pursuant to s. 237 of the I.T.A. and a taxpayers account number is his or her SIN number. It was his evidence that this SIN number has become the main identifier of taxpayers on the Revenue Canada computer database. With that SIN, Revenue Canada officers can access information on virtually any taxpayer in the country. In this case, Redvers testified that he did not use Mozafar's SIN number for his examination and search of the records. He testified that taxpayers are cross-indexed by name, address and SIN number. In his role as a field investigator in the non-registrant/nonfiler section of CCRA, he typically follows up on only a limited number of files, and typically does not search by SIN number but by name and address.

In this search, Redvers used the information on the file that he knew to be accurate. On June 5 2001, he had met Mozafar personally at the home address he had used when he filed his returns previously. Prior to serving Mozafar in May 2003, he attended at his home again and spoke with his wife. During his work on the file, he also checked multiple other sources of information, including Equifax and immigration files, to confirm his identity. These sources confirmed the address and SIN number on file with CRA. Redvers testified that, using the CRA computer database, he was able to verify that Mozafar Maleki is the only taxpayer with that name in all of Canada. He was not asked when he did the search, but I infer, from the timing of this evidence (on May4th in sur-crossexamination) and the fact that Redvers had not mentioned this previously, that he had done that computer search in the interval since he last testified in court. His evidence on this point has no relevance to the search he did before swearing his affidavit in 2003. Alicia Rawlins, the CRA Prosecution Liaison Officer, did a CRA computer search prior to swearing the Information before this court on September 30, 2004, to ensure that no filings were made in the interval since Redvers had sworn his affidavit. She searched the CRA computer mainframe system by Mozafar's name and SIN number. She testified that there was a second Mozafar Maleki on the computer system at that time but the reference was very old and she believed that he was deceased.

I take the evidence of Mr. Dove with a grain of salt. Notwithstanding my order for the exclusion of witnesses, Mr. Dove was present in court to hear the testimony of Mr. Redvers for at least one day. He last worked at Revenue Canada in l990, did not have personal experience with TOM's outside his own area, and has no personal knowledge if Exhibit 28 was the current version or whether any amendments had been made since. More important, Dove's evidence about SIN numbers as the distinguishing identifier of taxpayers has most weight when searching a common name where there could be many taxpayers with the same name. Where there is evidence that the name Mozafar Maleki is relatively unique, and his identification can be verified by birthdates and addresses, the significance of the SIN number is greatly diminished. Given Redvers' personal knowledge of Mozafar and his file, there can be no doubt that the person identified as Mozafar Maleki on the Requirement is the same person whose records Redvers searched and who is the defendant before the court.

Digitized by Google

Scope of the Search

Redvers attested in his affidavit that he had made a "careful examination and search of the appropriate records in the Toronto District Office for Mozafar Maleki" and he was "unable to find" that a completed income tax return "had been made and filed or provided up to and including July 25, 2003, by the said Mozafar Maleki." In his viva voce evidence, he testified that he searched his files in his home and his Toronto office and the Ontario tax office in Sudbury, and that, given the system in place, he was satisfied that Mozafar never gave a return to him or anyone else.

It is the system in place that ensures that Redvers' search was sufficient. Once Mozafar's file was transferred to him in May 2001, the system required that he hold that file in his own filing system until he was satisfied that he had received the returns. He testified that the system of filing across Canada is based on residence, that each tax office is responsible for the postal codes in part of the country, and required to store returns from that area for a certain number of years. All filings for an Ontario resident such as Mozafar would be sent for processing and then stored in the Ontario tax office in Sudbury. On assuming carriage of the file, a note is made in the Sudbury office that any filing is to be sent to him. Once a Requirement is issued, that fact is entered onto the nationwide CRA computer and, thereafter, if a tax return comes in to anyone anywhere, the computer indicates that this is a "file under requirement" and provides the name of the person to whom it is to be sent. When a prosecution is approved, a "keep" code is also placed on the computer file, so that anyone receiving the return anywhere in Canada would receive a message that this file cannot be sent for assessment and must be forwarded to the field investigator responsible for the file. Alicia Rawlins confirmed the system in place to the effect that, where a Requirement has been issued, as soon as a return is received anywhere, the officer who receives the filing is required to update the computer system and contact the office responsible for the file. I put no weight on Mr. Lindsay's submission that, as Mr. Redvers did not personally examine the Sudbury files himself, the results of any search done for Mozafar's file in Sudbury is hearsay evidence. Redvers testified that everyone anywhere in the CCRA system would know that he was responsible for Mozafar's file and at least three different officers would have had to have ignored the "keep" code for him not to have received any possible filing by Mozafar. These would be the person who received the filing, the person who processed it in Sudbury, and his or her supervisor who alone could override the code. Having received no indication from Sudbury of any filing by Mozafar for the relevant years, nor any filed returns from any other office, I find that Redvers was entitled to rely on the system in place to verify the physical search of his own files, and that what he did constituted a "careful examination and search of the appropriate records."

Problems in initiating the prosecution

Mr. Lindsay submitted that the signature of the Director was required before Redvers was authorized to issue a Requirement, or commence a prosecution, and that there was no evidence before the court that the Director gave this authorization. With respect, I put no weight whatsoever on this argument. The Requirements on their face was issued over the signature of Alice Shields, Director-Taxation, Toronto.

Digitized by Google

As for authority to commence a prosecution, the viva voce evidence of Alicia Rawlins was that she was employed by the CRA as a prosecution liaison officer on September 30, 2004 when she swore the Information before a Justice of the Peace. Section 244(1) of the I.T.A. is a complete answer to Lindsay's submission. It provides that "an information under the I.T.A. may be laid…by any officer of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency…and, where an information purports to be laid or made under this Act, it shall be deemed to have been laid or made by a person thereto authorized by the Minister and shall not be called in question for lack of authority of the informant…." The Information before this court on its face indicates that Alicia Rawlins is an Officer of Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, and charges three counts of offences under the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Lindsay also submitted that the Information which alleged that the defendant "unlawfully failed to comply with the notice…in that he did not provide the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, in the said Toronto Region, Province of Ontario, a completed Income Tax Form…" was "fatally defective" in that it did not allege an offence known to law. On his reading, the offence charged was a failure to comply with a notice to file a return at a specific address, whereas the offence was actually a charge of failing to comply with a notice to file a return, pursuant to s. 231.2 of the Act.

This is another argument without merit. The Requirement on its face indicates that the return was to be filed at the Toronto Centre Tax Services Office at the address indicated. The impugned words on the Information merely refer to the jurisdiction in which the offences occurred, and provide particulars for the offences that are also identified by the correct section of the I.T.A. in each count. I agree with Mr. Gilman that the defendant was never misled as to the gravamen of the offences charged: see R. v. Cote (1977), 33 C.C.C. (2d)353(SCC):

The golden rule is for the accused to be reasonably informed of the transaction alleged against him, thus giving him the possibility of a full defence and a fair trial. When, as in the present case, the information recites all the facts and relates them to a definite offence identified by the relevant sections of the Code, it is impossible for the accused to be misled. To hold otherwise, would be to revert to the extreme technicality of the old procedure.

Were the returns demanded by the Requirement in fact Filed by Mozafar?

Mr. Lindsay submitted that Redvers and Marshall both conceded that Mozafar did file returns for all the tax years at issue. This is clearly not the evidence before the court. The viva voce evidence of the CRA officers indicates that Mozafar had filed returns up to 1998, but not thereafter. The only evidence of a T1 return from Mozafar is a 1999 T1 form received at the Toronto tax office on April 23, 2001 and deemed "unacceptable" by CCRA officials.

The evidence before me indicates that Mozafar submitted a six-page tax form at that time with none of the prescribed information. Apart from his name and address, there was no SIN number, no numbers of any kind, no signature, and nothing that could be used to process the filing. The only markings on the document was the notation "n/a" on every line, several drawings including a stick figure being hanged, the notation that "this form does not seem to be authorized by the Minister of National Revenue" and the words "Restricted Information" in place of the SIN number. After consultation with her team leader, Judy Marshall concluded that this was not a valid tax return. When she transferred the file to Alan Redvers, he agreed.

The conclusion of the CRA officers is supported by the jurisprudence. An income tax return without any statement of income or assets is not a valid return: R. v. Morgan [1995]

Digitized by Google

O.J. No. 4725 (Ont. C.J. Prov. Div. Rawlins J.). "A demand to file a tax return is a request for financial information, and 'n/a' was not a response, but an evasion:" R. v. Jacques [2000] B.C.J. No. 576 para 28-35 (B.C.S.C.) affirmed [2001] B.C.J. No 812 (B.C.C.A.), and does not constitute compliance with section 238(1) of the I.T.A.: R. v. Meikle [2005] B.C.J. No. 2267 para 40 (B.C.S.C., Rice J.)

Mr. Lindsay submitted that because the crown did not disclose a copy of this l999 filing, Mozafar's Charter rights to full disclosure, make full answer and defence, and a fair hearing have been subject to "irremediable prejudice" and he seeks a stay of proceedings or a mistrial. Mr. Lindsay's assertion to the contrary, there is absolutely no evidence that Redvers destroyed the document. The evidence indicates that both Marshall and Redvers thought that the defaced invalid 1999 T1 filed by Mozafar was stored as a "permanent record," but it could not be found for the purposes of disclosure. Mr Lindsay submitted that Mozafar's opportunity to show his due diligence has been jeopardized by the loss of this 1999 T1 form, because it cannot be put before the court to assess the validity of the CRA's conclusion that it was "unacceptable."

I am satisfied that there is absolutely no merit to Mr. Lindsay's submissions about this document. The undisputed viva voce evidence of two CRA officials is more than enough to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the T1 form filed by Mozafar in April 2001 was not a valid tax return. That being the case, there is no doubt that this filing could not qualify as a "completed" T1 for l999 "including a Statement of Assets and Liabilities and a Statement of Income and Expenses" as was demanded by the Requirement served in May 2003. There is absolutely no reason why the court must see the original document to validate the conclusions of the CRA officials on this issue.

Nor do I put any weight on the evidence of Wallace Dove that Mozafar showed him his l999, 2000 and 2001 tax returns before he put these returns in the mail. Since Mozafar was not available for cross-examination, I put no weight on anything Dove said that he told him. Dove, moreover, could not be certain that he actually saw the 2001 return and acknowledged that he didn't actually see any of the information on the forms. He testified that Mozafar put the returns in an envelope, sealed it and put it in the mail while they were attending a political party meeting together in London Ontario, but he couldn't say when this occurred. It is totally incredible to me that Mr. Dove offered this evidence in the closing minutes of his cross-examination by the crown, and that there was no mention of any such evidence during his lengthy direct examination by Mozafar. I consider this evidence neither credible nor reliable.

Much more significant is the evidence of Redvers that he was not aware of any other T1 forms (besides the 1999 form discussed previously) filed by Mozafar for the years at issue. Whatever concerns one may have had about the demeanour and deportment of Mr. Redvers at trial, I have absolutely no reason to doubt the veracity of his Affidavits sworn on August 11, 2003, nor the credibility and reliability of his viva voce evidence at trial. His evidence was generally corroborated by the other CRA officials, and particularly by Judy Marshall as to the nature of the alleged 1999 filing and by Alicia Rawlins who testified that, as of September 30, 2004, her computer search of the CRA database indicated that there was no filing from Mozafar for 1999, 2000 and 2001. Ms Rawlins, and the TOM entered as exhibit 28, also corroborated Redvers' evidence about the system in place to ensure that any filing by Mozafar anywhere else would be routed to him.

Having found that Mozafar filed no valid return for the years at issue, I do not have to deal with Mr. Lindsay's submission that s. 238(1) of the I.T.A. was not the proper charge in this matter, and that the proper charge, if at all, should have been under s. 162(5) of the I.T.A. for failure to provide complete information.

Conclusion

Digitized by Google

On all the evidence before this court, I find that Mozafar was personally served with three Requirements to file completed income tax returns for I999, 2000 and 2001 on or before June 30, 2003, and that Mozafar filed no such returns. I find that the crown has proven that Mozafar committed the offences beyond a reasonable doubt. Mozafar has offered no evidence of any valid defences. There will be a conviction on all three counts.

The Principal Evasion Charge, Sec 239(1)

Other offences and punishment - S. 239(1)
239. (1) Every person who has

(a) made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act or a regulation,
(b) to evade payment of a tax imposed by this Act, destroyed, altered, mutilated, secreted or otherwise disposed of the records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(c) made, or assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive entries, or omitted, or assented to or acquiesced in the omission, to enter a material particular, in records or books of account of a taxpayer,
(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act, or (e) conspired with any person to commit an offence described in paragraphs 239(1)(a) to 239(1)(d), is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to
(f) a fine of not less than 50%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or
(g) both the fine described in paragraph 239(1)(f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

Offenses re refunds and credits
(1.1) Every person who obtains or claims a refund or credit under this Act to which the person or any other person is not entitled or obtains or claims a refund or credit under this Act in an amount that is greater than the amount to which the person or other person is entitled

(a) by making, or participating in, assenting to or acquiescing in the making of, a false or deceptive statement in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made under this Act or a regulation,
(b) by destroying, altering, mutilating, hiding or otherwise disposing of a record or book of account of the person or other person,
(c) by making, or assenting to or acquiescing in the making of, a false or deceptive entry in a record or book of account of the person or other person,
(d) by omitting, or assenting to or acquiescing in an omission to enter a material particular in a record or book of account of the person or other person,
(e) wilfully in any manner, or
(f) by conspiring with any person to commit any offence under this subsection, is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to (g) a fine of not less than 50% and not more than 200% of the amount by which the amount of the refund or credit obtained or claimed exceeds the amount, if any, of the

Digitized by Google

refund or credit to which the person or other person, as the case may be, is entitled, or (h) both the fine described in paragraph 239(1.1)(g) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

Prosecution on indictment

(2) Every person who is charged with an offence described in subsection 239(1) or 239(1.1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted on indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to

(a) a fine of not less than 100% and not more than 200% of

(i) where the offence is described in subsection 239(1), the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, and

(ii) where the offence is described in subsection 239(1.1), the amount by which the amount of the refund or credit obtained or claimed exceeds the amount, if any, of the refund or credit to which the person or other person, as the case may be, is entitled; and

(b) imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years.

Offence with respect to confidential information

(2.2) Every person who

(a) contravenes subsection 241(1), or

(b) knowingly contravenes an order made under subsection 241(4.1) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to both.

The Nature of the Offences

[62] As earlier indicated the accused are charges with offences contrary to ss. 239(1)(a) and239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act (Canada). The relevant portions of s. 239(1) are:

239(1) Every person who has

(a) made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of,false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answerfiled or made as required by or under this Act or regulation,...

(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade, compliancewith this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act, or

(e) conspired with any person to commit an offence described byparagraphs (a) to (d),

is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liableon summary conviction to

(f) a fine of not less than 25% and not more than double the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or(g) both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

Wilfully Evading Payment of Taxes

[63] Each of the taxpayers is charged with "wilfully evading payment of taxes during namedtaxation years. A single count of tax evasion spanning a number of taxation years is notobjectionable: R. v. Mah (1974), 19 C.C.C. (2d) 210 (Alta. C.A.).

[64] Neither of the important terms set out in s. 239(1)(d) "wilful" or "evade" are defined inthe Income Tax Act. The meaning of the terms used this section is explained in a number ofauthorities cited by Mr. Davidson.

[65] In R. v. Baker (1973), 16 C.C.C. (2d) 126 (Nova Scotia District Court) McLellan, Co. Ct.J. said at p. 131:"With that finding I entirely agree, and would point out that the English authorities referred to above reinforce the conclusion reached by Her Honour --namely, that where the evasion referred to is in a penal statute or is between citizen and Government, it is intended to included something like underhand dealing, or to use her words, it is intended to include some "element of artifice, craft or strategy."

Digitized by Google

[66] In R. v. Paveley (1976), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 483 (Sask. C.A.) all three members of the Courtmade comments about the meaning of "evade" or "wilfully evade". Woods J.A. followed R. v.Baker, supra and found that to fall within the section there needs to be a scheme or artifice withintent to deceive. Brownridge J.A. said at p. 488 that "wilfully" should be interpreted as "with an evil intention". At p. 492 Bayda J.A. said:"The word "wilfully" as used in the subsection under consideration, carries a distinct connotation of deliberate purpose and ulterior motive. To ascribe to the word a meaning which negates or overlooks that purpose or motive is to dilute the meaning of the word to a point where its use is rendered completely unnecessary.I have no hesitation in concluding that the offence with which the appellant is charged falls into the second class of offence mentioned by Ritchie J.

[acts done with a specific and ulterior motive]. It follows then that for a conviction to take place under s. 239(1)(d) of the Act there must be proof of the actus reus, the "manner", to use the word of the statute, in which the alleged offence was committed, and, also proof of a specific intent, that is to say, proof that the act which constitutes the "manner" was done with a particular purpose – the purpose of evading the payment of tax."

[67] In The Queen v. Branch (1976) 76 D.T.C. 6112 (Dist. Court Alta.) Medhurst J. observed at p. 6113:"In my opinion the word evade implies something of an underhanded or deceitful nature. In other words a deliberate attempt to escape the requirement of paying tax on income that had been earned. This intention can be inferred from acts of omission or commission."

[68] In The Queen v. Landes [1988] 1 C.T.C. 124 Scheter J. reviewed the law extensively relating to offences relating to s. 239(1)(a) and 239(1)(d) and concluded that both offences required mens rea that established actions that were secretive, deceitful or secretive in nature.

[69] In R. v. D. Fisher [1993] 1 C.T.C. 374 (Alta. Prov. Ct.) Hamilton P.C.J. held that the mens rea required for offences under s. 239(1)(a) or 239(1)(d) could be based upon the doctrine of wilful blindness.

[70] In R. v. Dipasquale (1993) 93 D.T.C. 5239 (Ont. Gen. Div.) Sheppard J. observed at p.5391:"With respect to the mens rea of the offence, a charge of wilful evasion is a specific intent offence. A court must find on the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt an intent to evade the payment of income tax. Carelessness or recklessness without knowledge of the facts constituting the offence is not sufficient. Wilful blindness may be equivalent of knowledge if the facts are such that a court can infer knowledge (see R. v. Sandhu 73 C.R. (3d) 162."

[71] In R. v. Kleyson [1996] M.J. No 69 [Man. Q.B.] Schwartz J. said:"It is sufficient, in my view, to convict an accused of evasion if the prosecution is able to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused made false or deceptive statements in their tax returns with the intent of evading or attempting to evade the payment of taxes."

[72] Ms. Bottcher sought to distinguish the judicial consideration of the meaning of the terms "wilful" and "evade" on a factual basis. Her submission is that the majority of these cases deal with situations where the accused failed to file income tax returns for a number of years. The legal principles, in those cases, in the submission of the Crown are limited to those situations. I do not concur completely in that view; some of the principles are applicable. To be successful in a prosecution pursuant to s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act, where evasion of the payment of income tax is alleged, the Crown must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused willfully evaded or attempted to evade payment of income taxes. A deliberate but intentional scheme to avoid tax payment even if it were not underhanded would be sufficient. Carelessness or recklessness of a taxpayer in omitting information in a tax return will not be sufficient to prove the required mens rea. The Crown must prove that the accused deliberately omitted the income with the intent to avoid payment of taxes. Alternatively, the Crown can rely upon the doctrine that the accused was wilfully blind as to the supplying of that information. Proof by the Crown of a deceitful or underhanded scheme to avoid taxes would be sufficient to establish a deliberate intention.

Digitized by Google

[73] In the case at bar, the Crown theory is that the accused deliberately pocketed money from their cash businesses and failed to report the pocketing or skimming of the money on their income tax returns. If that theory has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt then the necessary actus reus, and mens rea would have been proven.

Making a False Statement

[74] Here, the taxpayers are charged with a number of offences that they did "make, participate in, assent to or acquiesce in the making of a false or deceptive statement" in an income tax return contrary to s. 239(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act.

[75] Frequently the Crown charges an accused with making a false statement and tax evasion in the same information, as they did in this case. In my view, the tax evasion charge is an alternative offence to the offences of making a false statement in the specific income tax year. The tax evasion charge arises out of the same delict as the false statement offences. Therefore, if the Crown has sufficient evidence to prove all of the offences beyond a reasonable doubt, a judicial stay ought to be entered on the less serious charges: R. v. Kienapple (1974), 15 C.C.C.(2d) 525 (S.C.C.); R. v. Thetrault (1976) C.T.C. 719 (Alta. Prov. Ct.); R. v. Kolenhof 66 D.T.C.5441. Should this be the result, Ms. Bottcher conceded the less serious offences are the false statement offences.

[76] Because of the frequency with which the Crown charges ss. 239(1)(a) and 239(1)(d)offences in the same information or indictment, often the judicial authorities often refer to mens rea for each being similar. Certainly that is the result of the analysis found in R. v. Landes, supra that the intention of each required some sort of deception.

[77] However, there is a some distinction between the two in that the term "wilfully" is not used in s. 239(1)(a). Therefore, reference to judicial interpretation of the word "wilfully" would be inapplicable to section 239(1)(a) offences.

[78] There are some cases where the mens rea of s. 239(1)(a) has been considered. In Acme Slide Fastener Company Ltd. v. Thomas Edward Knott (1962) C.T.C. 320 (Que. Sup. Ct.) Ouimet J. wrote at p. 326: "A distinction must be drawn, at the outset, between poor accounting practices, which might be difficult to unravel, and false or deceptive statements in an income tax return."

[79] In R. v. Regehr (1968) C.T.C. 122 (Yuk. C.A.) the Court held in effect that the trial judge's direction that omissions due to carelessness or negligence would not be sufficient to prove a s. 239(1)(a) offence.

[80] The actus reus or wrongful action of a s. 239(1)(a) Income Tax Act offence, is making, participating in, assenting to or acquiescing in the making of a false or deceptive statement. The mens rea of this offence is that the individual did so intentionally or at least with a wilfulblindness to the falsity or deceptiveness of the statement. Again carelessness will not suffice. The mens rea and actus reus of the offence must be proven by the Crown beyond a reasonable doubt. Here, the Crown's theory of the commission of this offence is the same as the theory relative to tax evasion set out above. If the Crown can prove that theory beyond a reasonable doubt these offences would have been proven.

Lesser Amount Proven

[81] Where the Crown proceeded by summary conviction it is imperative that the trial judge find that the taxpayer sought to evade a particular amount of taxes because the penalty assessed is dependent upon that finding: s. 239(1)(f). The Crown in this instance has specified certain monetary amounts in each of the counts before the Court. If the Crown proves that lesser amounts were not reported or evaded, then the trial judge could find the accused guilty of that lesser amount and amend the information accordingly: R. v. Century 21 Ramos Realty Inc. (1987), 32 C.C.C. (3d) 353 (Ont. C.A.) at p. 369-70; R. v. Cormier (1986), 29 C.C.C. (3d) 481 (B.C.C.A.) at pp. 486-7.

Digitized by Google

In R. v. Topedge Investments Ltd.[111] the burdens were spoken of:

Analysis of the Law

[43] It should be stated at the outset that the Defence abandoned its argument of 'officially induced error.' Accordingly, the following case law was presented by Crown and Defence relating to the burden of proof in Section 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act of Canada: R. v. Baker (1973),16 C.C.C. (2d) 126; R. v. Paveley (1975) 76 DTC 6415 (Sask.C.A); R. v. Branch (1975) 76 DTC 6112 (AB.D.Ct.); R. v. Medicine Hat Greenhouses Ltd. [1981] C.T.C. 141 (ABCA); R. v. Pongratz [1982] F.C.J. No. 75 (Fed.Ct.); R. v. De Wolf (1982) 67 C.C.C. (2d) 43 (BCCA); Schwarz v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue - M.N. R.), [1991] T.C.J. No. 419R. v. Jorgensen [1995] 4 S.C.R. 55 (SCC); R. v. Harding (2001), 57 O.R. (3d) 333 (Ont.C.A.); R. v. Jarvis [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757 (SCC); R. v. Klundert (2004),242 D.L.R. (4th) 644 (Ont. C.A.); v. Kennedy [2005] 1 C.T.C. 321 (BCCA); R. v. Mortensen 2004 ABPC 104 (ABPC); and R. v. Chahine- Badr [2006] 2 C.T.C. 243 (Ont. Ct. Just.).

[44] In Paveley, supra, the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal held that for a conviction to take place, there must be proof of two ingredients: first, the 'manner' through which the evasion was accomplished (the actus reus), and second, the intention to accomplish an evasion of payment of taxes in the sense of accomplishing something forbidden by or in defiance of the law (mens rea). The court adopted the view that "willfully" means not merely to commit an act voluntarily, but to commit it purposely with an evil intention, to do so deliberately, intentionally and corruptly and without any justifiable excuse. It was said that "willfully" carried a distinct connotation of deliberate purpose and ulterior motive. In order to convict, the court may infer that the accused committed the actus reus with intent to evade payment of taxes. The presence of an artifice or scheme makes it easier to draw the necessary inference of intent to evade payment of taxes, but such artifice or scheme is not a necessary element of the offence created by the subsection.

[45] In Branch, supra, which was decided after Paveley by the District Court in Calgary later in 1975, the court held that the definition of "evade" implies something of an underhanded or deceitful nature to escape the requirement of paying tax on income that had been earned. In that case, the accused therein, during the period in question, was having unspecified personal problems, was emotionally 'washed up,' did not destroy records, and was not secretive about his default. In these circumstances, he was found not guilty. Similarly this was the case in Schwartz, supra, where that accused essentially became an alcoholic, operating his business in an alcoholic haze. While filed late, he actually did file his tax returns. He was found not guilty of tax evasion. In Branch, supra, the Court found that the accused had not engaged in any artifice, craft or strategy. He had merely failed to file his tax returns and there were many redeeming circumstances to his situation, unlike the instant case.

[46] In the Medicine Hat Greenhouses, *supra,*case, the Alberta Court of Appeal noted that the Crown had the onus to establish 'willfulness' and 'evasion' beyond a reasonable doubt.

[47] The Pongratz*, supra,*case from the Federal Court of Appeal involved an accountant who postponed the preparation and filing of his own return to a time of the year when it was more convenient to prepare it (i.e. outside of tax filing season). He had a good reason for the delay and always filed his return; it was simply late. He always paid the late filing fees and the taxes owing plus penalty. This is remarkably distinguishable from the instant case, where Edgelow has not filed tax returns for the last nine years and has no satisfactory reason for the delay. The case confirms that since the Income Tax Act is a penal statute it must be construed strictly against the taxing authority.

[111] 2007 ABPC 230

Digitized by Google

[48] The De Wolf, supra, case, however, is right on point. In that case, the accused was charged with willfully evading payment of taxes over a five year period by failing to declare income received by him. That accused failed to declare income received by him in the amount of $135,000. He had not filed income tax returns for a fifteen year period, believing he had no taxable income. However in the material time relating to the charge, like Edgelow, De Wolf believed he had received income upon which tax was payable, but he had difficulties: he was indebted and had numerous obligations and did not have the resources to pay the tax. Like Edgelow, De Wolf was delaying the filing of his tax returns in the hope that he would be able to raise sufficient funds to file the returns and pay the outstanding tax liability. He, like Edgelow, had prospects. Like Edgelow, the evidence was quite clear that when De Wolf was in funds sufficient to meet his liability to the income tax department, he made a deliberate choice to pay the funds elsewhere: a loan to the Royal Bank and funds to his wife for maintenance and support. Edgelow did the same, he allowed a foreclosure of his home that had equity in it and he settled a divorce action and property settlement with his wife. Like Edgelow, De Wolf had a motive in not filing his returns at that time: to do so would have alerted the tax authorities to the fact that he was paying creditors and making payments to his family rather than meeting his obligations with respect to his income tax liability. The British Columbia Court of Appeal held that "willfully" carried the connotation of deliberate purpose and ulterior motive. The question of his intent was affected by the background against which it is suggested that he did not pay tax, intended not to pay tax and intended to evade tax. The Court upheld the lower court finding that there was a deliberate purpose and ulterior motive in the non-payment, which together, established the willful evasion of payment.

[49] Neither the Jorgensen*, supra,* or Harding*, supra,* cases were particularly analogous or material to the instant case, Jorgensen discussing the concepts of 'knowingly' and "without lawful justification or excuse' in the context of selling obscene material and Harding discussing the concept of 'willful blindness' in the context of a willful promotion of hatred charge.

[50] The Klundert*, supra,* case was a situation where the taxpayer held the opinion the federal government did not have the legislative power to impose or collect income tax, so he stopped completing his returns and paying taxes owing under the Income Tax Act. In setting out the context, the Ontario Court of Appeal observed that the functioning of the Income Tax Act of Canada was dependent upon accurate self- assessment of tax owing through timely reporting of income and calculation of tax owing. This view was later confirmed in Jarvis*, supra,* where the Supreme Court of Canada stated at para 51: "It follows from the tax scheme's basic selfassessment and self-reporting characteristics that the success of its administration depends primarily upon taxpayer forthrightness." At para 56 the Court approved of the finding in Knox Contracting CanLII135 (SCC): "Those who do evade the payment of income tax not only cheat the State of what is owing to it, but inevitably increase the burden placed upon the honest taxpayers." In the Chahine-Badr*, supra,* case, the Ontario Supreme Court noted in para 23, that it is ". . . only where the encouragement to honesty fails and the taxpayer deliberately attempts to evade taxes may the authorities resort to criminal proceedings. They should be given every opportunity to first resolve taxpayer non-compliance through judicious use of their regulatory powers."

Digitized by Google

[51] It was noted that where tax is owed, the failure to conform as indicated "has the inevitable effect of avoiding, at least for a time, the payment of tax required under the Act." [para 42]. The Court also confirmed at para. 35, that the "the word 'evade' had two possible meanings: the act of deliberately avoiding something or the act of avoiding something in an underhanded or devious way. The Ontario Court of Appeal adopted the interpretation of Bayda, J.A. in Paveley, supra, holding that the conduct component of the crime of evading tax contrary to s.239(1)(d) is made out "if the Crown proves that the accused voluntarily performed an act or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid payment of tax owing under the Act." At para. 41, Doherty, J.A. states:

[41] The authorities that require that the evasion be deceitful or underhanded confuse the conduct component of the crime of tax evasion with the fault component of that crime. Fault rests in the state of mind that accompanies the doing of the prohibited conduct. It is the culpable state of mind that distinguishes the legitimate tax planner from the dishonest tax evader. Both may engage in the same course of conduct that can aptly be described as a deliberate attempt to avoid payment of tax. The difference lies in their respective states of mind. Unlike the tax evader, the tax planner does not intend to avoid the payment of a tax that he or she knows is owed under the Act, but rather intends to avoid owing tax under the Act.

[52] In interpreting the word 'wilfully,' the Court held in para. 46 that:

[46] . . . culpability will follow only where the accused engages in conduct intended to avoid the payment of tax owing under the Act. More precisely, I think the fault component in s.239(1)(d) is twofold. First, the accused must know that tax is owing under the Act and second, the accused must intend to avoid or intend to attempt to avoid payment of that tax. An accused intends to avoid, or intends to attempt to avoid, payment of taxes owing under the act where that is his purpose, or where he knows that his course of conduct is virtually certain to result in the avoiding of tax owing under the act.

[53] In order to convict, Doherty stated at para. 47, that the trier of fact must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused knew there was tax owing and did something or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid the payment of the tax owing, or knowing that avoiding payment of tax imposed by the Act was a virtual certain consequence of his actions. Klundert, it was held, knew he owed tax and his false 'protester' belief that the federal government had no authority to collect tax afforded him no defence in law.

[54] Like Edgelow, Mr. Kennedy in the Kennedy, supra, case, sold property and realized a substantial taxable capital gain. Like Edgelow, Kennedy consulted an accounting firm, discussed the tax implications of the sale and was fully aware a capital gain would accrue as a result of the sale and that he would have to pay taxes on same. Kennedy determined not to declare the income on the tax returns he did file. Like Klundert, Kennedy believed the federal government did not have the constitutional ability to tax individuals. In Kennedy, the B.C. Court of Appeal quoted the case of M.N.R. v. Teodori (1997), 97 G.T.C. 7187, with approval, noting the most nearly comparable provisions of the Criminal Code are those relating to fraud. Relating to the actus reus, the Court suggested using corporate funds for personal purposes, nondisclosure of important facts, exploiting the weakness of another, unauthorized diversion of funds, and unauthorized arrogation of funds or property would all be relevant, and that it was not necessary for the prosecution to show that the accused personally profited. With respect to the mens rea element, the court suggested the relevant elements were deceit, falsehood or some other dishonest act that deprived another of what is or should be his; having a subjective awareness that one was undertaking a prohibited act which could cause deprivation in the sense of depriving another of property or putting that property at risk. The Court also noted that the personal feeling of the accused about the morality or honesty of the Act or its consequences was irrelevant.

Digitized by Google

[55] Of course, one is ever mindful of the case of R. v. W.(D.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 742 (SCC), where the Supreme Court of Canada instructs on the issue of credibility as follows:
if the evidence of the accused is believed, he must be acquitted;
if the accused is not believed, but the judge is left in reasonable doubt by his testimony, the accused must be acquitted.
if the accused's testimony leaves the judge in no doubt, the judge must determine on the basis of the evidence that is accepted whether the Crown has proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Proper Forum as a Criminal Offence

The proper court to hear a tax offence case can only be a provincial court since it is a criminal case and these type of cases are always heard at the provincial level. This was the opinion in Sandra June Gibbs v. Regina[112]

Did the trial judge err in hearing the trial? Should it have been heard in Federal Court?

[34] Section 238 of the Act stipulates that failing to file is a summary conviction offence. The Criminal Code R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 applies to summary conviction offences created by a federal statute. Section 34(2) of the Interpretation Act R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21 directs as follows:

All the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to indictable offences apply to indictable offences created by an enactment, and all the provisions of that Code relating to summary conviction offences apply to all other offences created by an enactment, except to the extent that the enactment otherwise provides.

Section 798 of the Criminal Code provides that summary conviction offences are to be heard by a summary conviction court. The Provincial Court of British Columbia is considered a summary conviction court.

Need of Existence of Mens Rea

Tax evasion is a species of fraud and is the statutory offspring of the common law offence of cheating the public revenue. Perhaps one of the most important cases that describes the elements of the act is R. v. Klundert[113] which is reproduced following.

I

Overview

[1] Dr. Klundert, an optometrist, carried on business for many years in Windsor, Ontario. Prior to 1993, with the help of an accounting service, he prepared and filed his tax returns as required under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1 (the "Act"). By 1993, however, Dr. Klundert had formed the opinion that the federal government did not have the legislative power to impose or collect income tax. He stopped completing his returns and paying taxes owed under the Act.

[2] Not surprisingly, Dr. Klundert's position brought him into conflict with the Canada Customs Revenue Agency (the "CCRA"). Eventually, Dr. Klundert was charged with making a false statement in his 1993 tax return contrary to s. 239(1)(a) of the Act, and tax evasion between December 31, 1992 and June 13, 1998, contrary to s. 239(1)(d) of the Act.

---

[112] 2006 BCSC 481

[113] 2004 CanLII 21268 (ON CA)

Digitized by Google

The Crown proceeded by indictment and Dr. Klundert elected trial by jury. [3] Dr. Klundert acknowledged that he did not report his income or pay the taxes owing under the Act during the relevant years. He contended that his refusal to pay the taxes did not constitute an evasion but was instead an honest protest against what he believed to be unlawful governmental action.

[4] The jury convicted Dr. Klundert of making a false statement (count 1) and acquitted him on tax evasion (count 2). On count 1, the trial judge imposed a fine of $80,541.00 and placed Dr. Klundert on probation for two years.

[5] Dr. Klundert appeals his conviction and sentence on count 1. The Crown appeals the acquittal on count 2. [6] I would allow the Crown's appeal from the acquittal on count 2. The trial judge erred in law in instructing the jury that an honest belief that the Act was beyond the legislative power of the federal government was relevant to culpability on a charge of tax evasion. I would also allow Dr.Klundert's appeal from his conviction on count 1. The verdicts returned by the jury were, in the light of the instructions given by the trial judge, irreconcilably inconsistent. Since there must be a new trial on count 2 and the two charges are closely interrelated, I think it best to order a new trial on count 1 as well.

II

Facts

[7] Many of the relevant facts were agreed upon at trial. It was acknowledged that Dr. Klundert had substantial income in the years 1993 to 1998, that he owed tax under the Act, that he chose not to declare any of that income in his tax returns and that he did not pay his income taxes.

[8] Dr. Klundert partly completely his 1993 return. He completed the personal information component (step one) and the goods and services tax credit application (step two). He left the calculation of total income, the calculation of taxable income, and the calculation of total non-refundable tax credits, blank (steps three, four and five). Dr. Klundertleft step six, the calculation of tax owing or refund claimed, blank, except he showed a "0" balance owing. He signed and dated (April 27, 1994) the return immediately below the printed words:

I certify that the information given on this return and in any document attached is correct, complete and fully discloses my income from all sources.

[9] Above his signature, Dr. Klundert wrote:

Collecting income tax by the government is against the Constitution of Canada!

[10] Dr. Klundert's 1994 tax return was basically blank, except for some personal information such as Dr. Klundert's address and social insurance number. The return was not signed. In two places on the return, Dr. Klundert wrote:

It is against the Constitution of Canada to charge federal income tax!

[11] Dr. Klundert does not appear to have filed returns for 1995 and 1996, although he testified that he believed those returns were submitted along with many others by a tax protest organization known as Shareholders of Canada. Dr. Klundert acknowledged that his 1995 and 1996 returns, like his 1993 and 1994 returns, did not disclose any of his income, did not show any tax owing and raised the same objection to paying income tax as was raised in 1993 and 1994.

[12] Dr. Klundert's 1997 tax return also did not disclose any income or declare any tax owing. He filled in virtually every blank in the form with the entry "N/A" meaning "not applicable". The form was also stamped with the words:

Without prejudice, 'natural person' all rights reserved: B.N.A. s. 94 *Charter of Rights and Freedoms*s. 52(1) and s. 26.

[13] Dr. Klundert did not sign the return but did write on the form indicating that the federal government had no constitutional power to impose a "direct" tax. He also claimed a refund of

Digitized by Google

"all tax ever paid plus interest".
[14] It was agreed that Dr. Klundert's total unreported income for the years 1993 through 1997 was $1,474,389.00. The federal tax owing on that amount was $348,231.00.
[15] Dr. Klundert testified that he knew that the CCRA would take steps to try to recover the tax owing under the Act and that it had broad powers to assist in that endeavour. He anticipated that the CCRA would pursue him aggressively. Dr. Klundert told OHIP, one of the main sources of his income, to forward his payments to an account in his wife's name in an effort to keep the funds out of the hands of the CCRA. He set up Canadian off-shore bank accounts in the Cayman Islands and Switzerland, for the same purpose.
[16] Dr. Klundert did not challenge the constitutionality of the Act at trial. He did, however, testify that by 1993 he had come to believe that the Constitution did not give the federal government the power to impose direct taxes and that the Act was unconstitutional. He maintained that belief at the time of trial, but said he could not afford the costs of a constitutional challenge. Dr. Klundert also testified that he believed he could not receive an impartial hearing on the issue before a judge who was paid by the federal government.
[17] It is unnecessary to detail the basis upon which Dr.Klundert came to his opinion as to the constitutionality of the Act. I accept for the purposes of the appeal that it was open to the jury to find that between 1993 and 1997 Dr. Klundert honestly believed that the Act was beyond the legislative power of the federal government.

III

The Crown Appeal

[18] The Crown contends that the trial judge misdirected the jury as to the essential elements of the crime of tax evasion. The Crown argues that the trial judge erred in telling the jury that:
tax evasion required proof of an intention to deceive and proof of an artifice scheme or strategy; and a refusal to pay tax in protest based on an honest belief that the federal government did not have the power to impose the tax negated an intention to evade the payment of taxes and entitled Dr. Klundert to an acquittal.
[19] Section 239(1)(d) of the Act provides:
Every person who has …
wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act …
is guilty of an offence…
[20] As particularized in count 2 of the indictment, the Crown alleged that Dr. Klundert had wilfully evaded or attempted to evade payment of taxes owing under the Act between 1993 and 1998.
[21] In his initial charge, the trial judge instructed the jury:
In order to convict him of count 2 [tax evasion] you have to come to a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so wilfully and wilfully in this case, among other things, means with a specific intention to evade payment of taxes as part of a craft, an artifice or a strategy. Well, we all know what craft, artifice, strategy is [emphasis added].
[22] The trial judge told the jury that an intention to protest the payment of taxes was inconsistent with an intention to evade the payment of taxes:
[F]ailure to either file tax returns or filing incomplete tax returns and not paying taxes for a number of years in succession might suggest to you an attempt to evade, but if it does suggest to you an attempt to evade you may nevertheless not find him guilty on this count [count 2] unless you conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that that was the purpose that he did it for, to evade taxes as opposed to protest. You do not have to choose one or the other. You must, in order to convict, be sure that the Crown has satisfied you beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt, including his specific intent [emphasis added].

Digitized by Google

[23] In summarizing Dr. Klundert's "protestor" defence, the trial judge again drew a distinction between an intention to evade income tax and an intention to protest the legality of the Act. He said:

Mr. Christie, as I have said, submits to you that there must be a specific intent to deceive as opposed to a specific intent to protest. I have already discussed that with you. He is absolutely right in that, that if you find beyond a reasonable doubt that his intent was to deceive then you can convict. Mr. Christie says if he had an honest intention to protest that is not knowingly making a false statement since it is only an opinion and he is entitled to be wrong and mistaken as long as he is honest in that belief. That is probably correct, if you do not take into account recklessness or wilful blindness [emphasis added].

We give scope to people who protest …

[24] After several hours of deliberation, the jury asked:

Can defence use tax protester as a defence? [25] The trial judge responded:

[B]eing a tax protester in and of itself is not a defence to either charge. However, if you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused had the specific intention to evade income tax and he only did what he did to protest and not to evade or have a reasonable doubt on that issue then the Crown has not satisfied you beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt as far as the mental element required [emphasis added].

[26] About two and a half hours later, the jury returned with three more questions about the mental element of the crime of tax evasion. The trial judge responded:

Please explain the mental elements about the evasion of taxes.

The word evade implies something of an underhanded or deceitful nature. In other words, a deliberate attempt to escape the requirement of paying tax on income that had been earned.

…

Please explain the relevance of being a tax protester.

There is no relevance as long as his belief is honest. You can't just get up and say I'm a tax protester, therefore I'm innocent. What the Crown has to prove is that his tax protest is a deceitful method of evading taxes and the Crown has to prove that beyond a reasonable doubt. You have heard Dr. Klundert. He said, I didn't intend to evade taxes, I just intended to protest.

If we find that he was honest in his beliefs, do we therefore find him innocent?

Well remember what I told you, if you believe what he said, if you believe his evidence, the Crown has not proved that he had the specific intent to evade taxes beyond a reasonable doubt. If you feel that he is honest, or if you have a reasonable doubt about it, in other words, I think he is honest, then the Crown has not proved that he had the intention to evade taxes beyond a reasonable doubt[emphasis added].

[27] After a brief discussion with counsel, the jury was recalled. The trial judge told the jury that he misspoke in his recharge when he was explaining the relevance of being a tax protestor. The trial judge corrected his previous instruction in these terms:

As to the answer to question two, please explain the relevance of being a tax protester in this case. You can be a tax protester in this case. You can be a tax protester but if the Crown proves beyond a reasonable doubt that your protest was for the purpose of evading taxes then you may find him guilty. If he is reckless about it and is honest then you would have a reasonable doubt that he did it for the purpose of evading tax. If he is dishonest about it then you may find that the Crown has proved his intent to evade tax beyond a reasonable doubt.

[28] The net effect of the trial judge's instructions was to tell the jury that a person who refused to pay his or her taxes as a protest could not be convicted of evading the payment of taxes if that protest was made"honestly". Applied to Dr. Klundert's evidence the instruction became a direction that a refusal to comply with the Act based on an honest belief that the Act was beyond the powers of the federal government was a defence to a charge of wilfully evading taxes. The jury was told that Dr. Klundert should be acquitted of that charge unless the Crown could prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he did not have that honest belief.

Digitized by Google

IV

Analysis

[29] Counsel for Dr. Klundert does not challenge the constitutionality of the Act. The power of the federal government to impose and collect an income tax cannot be in any doubt.[1]

[30] The Crown appeal raises two questions:

Can a person be said to evade the payment of income tax when that person makes no attempt to deceive or trick the tax collector, but instead makes a straightforward refusal to pay?

Is an honest belief that the Act is unconstitutional relevant in determining whether an accused has the requisite culpable mental state?

[31] Both questions require analysis of the constituent elements of the offence of tax evasion.

[32] The Act contains several enforcement provisions ranging from those imposing civil penalties (ss. 162-163), to regulatory offences (s. 238), to criminal offences. The offences created by s. 239(1), including tax evasion, are true criminal offences: see R. v. Knox Contracting Ltd.,1990 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R. 338 at 346-348. Tax evasion is a species of fraud and is the statutory offspring of the common law offence of cheating the public revenue: see R. v. Cardoso 1999 CanLII 13250 (QC CA), (1999), 139 C.C.C. (3d) 430 at 436-437 (Que. C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1999] S.C.C.A. No.

467. A determination of the constituent elements of the offence of tax evasion must be informed by the criminal law nature of that offence. For analytical purposes, the constituent elements of a crime are divided into the elements which describe the prohibited conduct (actus reus) and those which describe the requisite fault (mens rea). For most true crimes, the fault component consists of a culpable state of mind which must accompany the prohibited conduct and relate to some if not all of the elements of the prohibited conduct: see R. v. Sault Ste. Marie (1978), 40 C.C.C. (2d) 353 at 362 (S.C.C.).

[33] An analysis of the constituent elements of an offence must begin with the statutory language used to create the offence. For convenience, I will repeat that language:

Every person who has …

(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act …

is guilty of an offence …

The Actus Reus

[34] The components of the conduct requirement of the crime of tax evasion are captured by the words:

… in any manner evaded or attempted to evade … payment of taxes imposed by the Act.

[35] The offence requires proof of an act or course of conduct which has the effect of evading or attempting to evade payment of taxes actually owed under the Act. In normal parlance, the word evade can refer to the act of deliberately avoiding something, or it can carry a sinister connotation meaning an underhanded or devious way of avoiding something.

Digitized by Google

[36] Some courts, relying on the criminal nature of the offence of tax evasion and the need to distinguish between legitimate tax planning and the crime of tax evasion, have opted for the more sinister definition of evasion: see Quebec (Deputy Minister of Revenue) v. Service Acier Inoxydable Couture Inc. 1999 CanLII 13436 (QC CA), (1999), 141 C.C.C. (3d) 573 at 575 (Que. C.A.). For example, in R. v. Baker (1973), 16
(2d) 126 at 131 (N.S. Cty. Ct.), the court said:

[W]here the evasion referred to is in a penal statute or is between citizen and Government, it is intended to include something like underhanded dealing, or to use her words [the trial judge] it is intended to include some "element of artifice, craft or strategy".

[37] Support for the more benign definition of evasion is found in R. v. Paveley (1976), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 483 (Sask. C.A.). In *Paveley*the taxpayer had not filed tax returns for a number of years. He was acquitted partly because the trial judge concluded that the mere failure to file returns did not constitute a scheme or artifice and did not, therefore, amount to evasion under the Act.

[38] The appeal from the acquittal was unanimously dismissed, however, the court took varying views of the meaning of evasion under the Act. Woods J.A., at p. 486, supported the position taken by the trial judge. Brownridge J.A., at pp. 487-488, held that evasion did not necessarily require a craft, artifice or stratagem, but did require a wilful evasion. In his view, if a taxpayer refused to file tax returns with the intention of evading tax, the taxpayer was guilty of tax evasion regardless of whether his conduct amounted to an artifice or scheme.

[39] Bayda J.A. provided a helpful analysis of the elements of the offence of tax evasion. He first examined the meaning of the word "wilful" in arriving at the mens rea requirement. I will return to that analysis later. He then turned to the conduct component. He said at pp. 494-495:

I am not prepared to go so far as to say that only in those cases where there is an artifice or scheme can there be a conviction for evasion under this subsection. The presence of an artifice or scheme would tend to make it easier to draw the necessary inference of intent to evade payment of taxes, but in my respectful view it cannot be said that the existence of an artifice or scheme is a necessary element of the offence created by this subsection. Where the necessary intent is present, then the "manner" in which the intent is carried out is not important. The plain words of the subsection specify it may be done "in any manner" [emphasis added].

[40] I agree with the above interpretation of Bayda J.A. Section 239(1)(d), unlike other parts of s. 239, is not limited to specified conduct, but speaks in broad terms: see R. v. Kidd (1974), 6 O.R. (2d) 769 at 772 (H.C.). The conduct component of the crime of evading tax contrary to s. 239(1)(d) is made out if the Crown proves that the accused voluntarily[2] performed an act or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid payment of tax owing under the Act.

[41] The authorities that require that the evasion be deceitful or underhanded confuse the conduct component of the crime of tax evasion with the fault component of that crime. Fault rests in the state of mind that accompanies the doing of the prohibited conduct. It is the culpable state of mind that distinguishes the legitimate tax planner from the dishonest tax evader. Both may engage in the same course of conduct that can aptly be described as a deliberate attempt to avoid payment of tax. The difference lies in their respective states of mind. Unlike the tax evader, the tax planner does not intend to avoid the payment of a tax that he or she knows is owed under the Act, but rather intends to avoid owing tax under the Act .

[42] The conduct component of the crime of tax evasion, as I would describe it, was not in issue in this case. Dr. Klundert did not declare his income or pay his income taxes owing under the Act for a number of years. He owed tax under the Act. The functioning of the Act depends on accurate self-assessment of tax owing through timely reporting of income and calculation of tax owing. Where tax is owed under the Act, a failure to report income and properly calculate the tax owing on that income has the inevitable effect of avoiding, at least for a time, the payment of tax required under the Act. As observed by the trial judge in the course of his instructions to the jury, Dr. Klundert's liability turned on his state of mind.

Digitized by Google

The Mens Rea

[43] The fault component of the crime of tax evasion as set out in s. 239(1)(d) is found in the word "wilfully". In R. v. Docherty reflex, (1989), 51 C.C.C. (3rd) 1 and 7 (S.C.C.), the Court described the word "wilfully" when used in a crime creating statutory provision as, perhaps the archetypal word to denote a mens rea requirement. It stresses intention in relation to the achievement of a purpose. It can be contrasted with lesser forms of guilty knowledge such as "negligently" or even "recklessly". In short, the use of the word "wilfully" denotes a legislative concern for a relatively high level of mens rea ... [emphasis added].

[44] While the word "wilfully" refers to a culpable mental state, the exact meaning of the word will depend on the context in which it is used: see R. v. Buzzanga and Durocher reflex, (1979), 49 C.C.C. (2d) 369 at 379-85 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Keegstra 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), (1990), 61 C.C.C. (3d) 1, per Dickson J. at p. 57-58, McLachlin J. at 118 (S.C.C.); Ratzlaf v. U.S. 114 S. Ct. 655 at 659 (1994).

[45] In Docherty, supra, the court indicated that wilfully "stresses intention in relation to the achievement of a purpose." Bayda J.A., in Paveley at p. 492, took a similar approach to the meaning of the word wilfully in s. 239(1)(d):

The word "wilfully" as used in the subsection under consideration, carries a distinct connotation of deliberate purpose and ulterior motive. To ascribe to the word a meaning which negates or overlooks that purpose or motive is to dilute the meaning of the word to a point where its use is rendered completely unnecessary. ... It follows then that for a conviction to take place under s. 239(1)(d) of the Act, there must be proof of the actus reus, the "manner" to use the word of the statute, in which the alleged offence was committed, and, also proof of a specific intent, that is to say, proof that the act which constitutes the "manner" was done with a particular purpose – the purpose of evading the payment of tax [emphasis added].[3]

[46] Although I would avoid the use of the phrase "ulterior motive", I agree with Bayda J.A. that the word "wilfully" in s. 239(1)(d) signals that culpability will follow only where the accused engages in conduct intended to avoid the payment of tax owing under the Act. More precisely, I think the fault component in s. 239(1)(d) is twofold. First, the accused must know that tax is owing under the Act and second, the accused must intend to avoid or intend to attempt to avoid payment of that tax. An accused intends to avoid, or intends to attempt to avoid, payment of taxes owing under the Act where that is his purpose, or where he knows that his course of conduct is virtually certain to result in the avoiding of tax owing under the Act: see Buzzanga, supra, at 383-385.

[47] In most cases of tax evasion, the trial judge will adequately describe the elements of the offence by instructing the jury that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused:

did something or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid the payment of tax imposed by the Act;

knew there was tax imposed by the Act;[4] and engaged in the conduct for the purpose of avoiding or attempting to avoid payment of tax imposed by the Act or knowing that avoiding payment of tax imposed by the Act was a virtual certain consequence of his actions.

Digitized by Google

[48] The requirements of knowledge and purpose which together make up the fault component of the offence are closely related. A person who does not know that there is a tax imposed by the Act cannot do something for the purpose of evading payment of that tax. That same person may, however, know there is a tax imposed under the Act, and do something that has the effect of evading the payment of that tax without necessary having done so for the purpose of evading the payment of the tax.

[49] The requisite knowledge or purpose may be negated by a mistaken belief. A taxpayer may through arithmetic error misstate the amount of tax owing, or she may be unaware of the statutory definition of income, or she may have come to a mistaken conclusion as to the application of that definition to her affairs. The first of these errors is factual, the second, legal, and the third is a mixture of both.

[50] Factual errors can negate the fault requirement of an offence requiring knowledge and purpose. Purely legal errors raise a more difficult problem. A mistake of law does not excuse the commission of a criminal offence: Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 19. The fault element of a crime may, however, be defined so as to make various kinds of errors, including purely legal errors relevant to the existence of the required culpable mental state: A. Mewett and M. Manning, Criminal Law,3rd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1994) at pp. 389-391; H. Stuart, "Mistake of Law Under the Charter", (1998) 40 Crim. L.Q. 476 at 486-494. For example, where an offence requires that the Crown prove that an accused acted without "colour of right". Mistakes as to the applicable civil law can provide the basis for a "colour of right": R. v. Demarco(1973), 13 C.C.C. (2d) 369 at 372 (Ont. C.A.). In those cases the mistake of law is not advanced as an excuse for committing the crime but rather negates the existence of the required culpable state of mind: R. v. Howson,[1966] 3 C.C.C. 348 at 356 (Ont. C.A.). Similarly, where an offence requires proof that the accused intended to violate a court order, a mistake as to the legal effect of that court order can negate the required culpable state of mind: R. v. Ilczyszyn reflex, (1988), 45 C.C.C. (3d) 91 at 95-96 (Ont. C.A.).

[51] In Docherty, supra, the accused was charged with wilfully breaching the term of his probation that required him to keep the peace and be of good behaviour. The charge arose out of his conviction on a charge of being in care and control of a motor vehicle while impaired. The accused, while impaired, was sitting behind the wheel of an automobile. He had no intention of driving the automobile. He testified that he thought the automobile was not in operating condition and for that reason, he believed that he was doing nothing wrong sitting behind the steering wheel. Under the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code, his conduct amounted to the crime of "care and control".

[52] Wilson J., in accepting that the accused's honest belief that he was not committing a criminal offence was relevant to the fault component of the offence said at page 13:

[P]roof of the mens rea would therefore require that the respondent intended to commit the criminal offence under s. 236 [care and control] when he sat behind the wheel in an intoxicated condition. …

In my view, where the actus reus of s. 666(1) [breach of probation] consist of the commission of a criminal offence, an honest belief on the part of the accused that he is not committing that offence means that the accused cannot be said to have willfully failed or refuse to comply with the probation order.

[53] As I read Docherty, the court held that the accused's conduct breached the term of his probation requiring him to keep the peace only because it was a criminal offence, otherwise there was nothing in the conduct which amounted to a failure to keep the peace.

Digitized by Google

Consequently, in these circumstances, he could only be said to have wilfully violated his probation order if he knew his conduct amounted to a criminal offence.

[54] As the above cases demonstrate, ignorance, or mistake of law can negate the requisite culpable state of mind. Nothing said above should, however, be taken as suggesting that ignorance, or mistake of law will routinely negative the fault element in criminal offences. Most crimes do not require knowledge of the illegality, or certainly the criminality, of the conduct in issue to establish the requisite fault: see R. v. Molis,1980 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 355; R. v. Théroux reflex, (1993), 79 C.C.C. (3d) 449 at 459 (S.C.C.). The extent to which any mistake, including a legal mistake, can negate the fault requirement turns on an interpretation of the language of the statute in the legislative context in which it is used.

[55] Section 239(1)(d) is part of an Act which is necessarily and notoriously complex. It is subject to ongoing revision. No lay person is expected to know all the complexities of the tax laws. It is accepted that people will act on the advice of professionals and that the advice will often turn on the meanings to be given to provisions in the Act that are open to various interpretations. Furthermore, it is accepted that one may legitimately structure one's affairs so as to minimize tax liability. Considered in this legislative context, I have no difficulty in holding that a mistake or ignorance as to one's liability to pay tax under the Act may negate the fault requirement in the provision, regardless of whether it is a factual mistake, a legal mistake, or a combination of both.

[56] Crown counsel accepts that an error in law may lead to a reasonable doubt as to whether an individual wilfully evaded tax. That concession is consistent with authority from this court, R. v. Sihler (1976), 31 C.C.C. (2d) 73 at 79 (Ont. C.A.), and authority from other jurisdictions: see Donnelly v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, [1960] N.Z.L.R. 469 at 472 (S.C.); Hefler, supra.

[57] A strong line of American authority is also consistent with the concession made by the Crown. That authority defines "wilfully" in the provision creating the crime of tax evasion as meaning: "a voluntary intentional violation of a known legal duty": U.S. v. Bishop, 93 S. Ct. 2008 at 2017 (1973); U.S. v. Pomponio, 97 S. Ct. 22 at 23 (1976); U.S. v. Cheek, 111 S. Ct. 604 at 610-611 (1991). In Cheek, White J., at pp. 610-611, described the relevance of legal error to the required mental state in this way:

But carrying this burden requires negating a defendant's claim of ignorance of the law or a claim that because of a misunderstanding of the law he had a good faith belief that he was not violating any of the provisions of the tax laws. This is so because one cannot be aware that the law imposes a duty upon him and yet be ignorant of it, misunderstand the law, or believe that the duty does not exist. In the end, the issue is whether based on all the evidence, the Government has proved that the defendant was aware of the duty at issue, which cannot be true if the jury credits a good-faith misunderstanding and belief submission, whether or not the claimed belief or misunderstanding is objectively reasonable [emphasis added].

[58] Can Dr. Klundert's belief that the Act is beyond the powers of the federal government and, therefore invalid, constitute a mistake of law negating the fault component of the crime of tax evasion? The answer must be "no". Section 239(1)(d) refers to the "payment of tax imposed by the Act". Dr. Klundert knew full well that he owed tax imposed by the Act. His mistake did not go to knowledge of his obligation to pay taxes owing under theAct but rather to the government's right to impose that obligation on him. He did not assert that he was doing his best to comply with the law but, through ignorance or mistake, failed to do so. To the contrary, he acknowledged the obligation to pay under the Act and made a considered decision to refuse to pay because of a belief that the law requiring him to pay was invalid.

Digitized by Google

[59] A person's mistaken belief that a statute is invalid or is otherwise not applicable to that person's conduct is a mistake of law. It is, however, a mistake of law that is irrelevant to the existence of the fault requirement in s. 239(1)(d). Nor can that kind of mistake of law provide a freestanding excuse for the commission of a crime: Criminal Code, s. 19; R. v. Jones 1991 CanLII 31 (SCC), (1991), 66 C.C.C. (3d) 512 at 516-517 (S.C.C.); R. v. Watson 1999 CanLII 13906 (NL CA), (1999), 137 C.C.C. (3d) 422 at 431-33 (Nfld. C.A.).

[60] There are solid policy reasons for drawing a distinction between an accused who mistakenly believes that he or she is complying with the Act and an accused who knowingly violates the Act, but mistakenly believes that the Act is invalid. The former is trying to comply with the law. Particularly where the law is complex, a mistake concerning the applicable law can logically negate the blameworthiness of the person's conduct. The latter is not trying to obey the law, but is instead deciding which laws should be obeyed. An acquittal based on a mistaken belief as to the validity of a law would undermine the rule of law.

[61] There can be no suggestion that a person who honestly believes that the Act is invalid has no option but to evade the payment of taxes and then defend a charge of tax evasion on the basis of a belief that the Act is invalid. As Dr. Klundert acknowledged, there were mechanisms in place whereby he could have challenged the validity of the Act without evading payment of taxes owed under the Act. He chose not to pursue any of those avenues. Indeed, even in this case, he did not defend the charge, as he clearly could have, by asking the judge to declare s. 239(1)(d) invalid.

[62] My conclusion that Dr. Klundert's belief that the Act was invalid is irrelevant to his liability under s. 239(1)(d) is consistent with the conclusion in Cheek, supra, a case involving a tax protestor who refused to pay his income tax claiming that the Act was unconstitutional. In holding that the accused's belief as to the validity of the Act was irrelevant on the charge of wilfully evading income tax, White J. said, at 612-613:

Claims that some of the provisions of the tax code are unconstitutional are submissions of a different order. They do not arise from innocent mistakes caused by the complexity of the Internal Revenue Code. Rather, they reveal full knowledge of the provisions at issue and a studied conclusion, however wrong, that those provisions are invalid and unenforceable. …

We do not believe that Congress contemplated that such a taxpayer, without risking criminal prosecution, could ignore the duties imposed upon him by the Internal Revenue Code and refuse to utilize the mechanisms provided by Congress to present his claims of invalidity to the courts and to abide by their decisions. …

We thus hold that in a case like this, a defendant's views about the validity of the tax statutes are irrelevant to the issue of willfulness and need not be heard by the jury, and, if they are, an instruction to disregard them would be proper. For this purpose, it makes no difference whether the claims of invalidity are frivolous or have substance [emphasis added].

[63] Dr. Klundert's evidence as to his beliefs concerning the validity of the Act were irrelevant to his liability under s. 239(1)(d). The jury should not have heard that evidence. Having heard it, the trial judge should have told the jury that it was irrelevant to Dr. Klundert's culpability.

[64] It was also submitted that apart entirely from a defence based upon an honest belief as to the invalidity of the Act, Dr.Klundert's evidence that he did not declare his income, and refused to pay tax owing under the Act in protest, was relevant to whether he acted for the purpose of evading tax owing under the Act. As I understand this submission, a straightforward refusal to pay tax owing under the Act, as a protest, is inconsistent with a finding that the refusal to pay was made for the purpose of evading tax owing under the Act. This submission confuses motive and purpose. On Dr. Klundert's own evidence, he made a considered decision not to pay tax that he knew was owing under the Act. In furtherance of that decision, he did not report income, did not calculate the tax owing under the Act and did not pay the tax. He also took steps to put his assets beyond the reach of the CCRA. On his own evidence, he clearly intended not to pay tax that he knew was owing under the Act. The fact that he made no attempt to conceal this intention or purpose made him a somewhat unusual tax evader, but did not detract from his own evidence as to his purpose. His evidence that he acted in protest is evidence as to his motive; it is his explanation for why he decided to avoid paying taxes that he knew he owed under the Act. Dr. Klundert's motive, that is to protest the validity of the Act, was, in fact, cogent evidence that he had the requisite culpable state of mind. He knew full well his obligations under the Act and set out to avoid those obligations to protest the government's power to impose those obligations.

Digitized by Google

V

The Appropriate Order

[65] The instructions to the jury reveal error in law. That error went to the heart of the only issue in dispute on the tax evasion charge. The acquittal cannot stand.

[66] The acquittal was entered by a court composed of a judge and jury. Having concluded that the Crown appeal must be allowed, this court's only option is to order a new trial: Criminal Code, s. 686(4)(b)(ii).

[67] At the new trial, Dr. Klundert will not be allowed to advance the "protestor" defence as I have held it is not a defence in law to the charge. That was the only defence advanced at his first trial. On the retrial, however, Dr. Klundert can advance any defence that is legally available to him.

VI

Dr. Klundert's Appeal

[68] Dr. Klundert was convicted of making a false statement in his 1993 tax return contrary to s. 239(1)(a) of the Criminal Code. The relevant part of that section reads:

Every person who has … (a) made …false or deceptive statements in a return … is guilty of an offence …

[69] Where the Crown proceeds by indictment, s. 239(2)provides that the accused is subject to a fine calculated by reference to the amount of tax evaded and imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. [70] I have described the contents of Dr. Klundert's 1993 tax return above (paras. 8, 9). He did not declare his income, showed a "0"balance owing, and signed the return.

[71] The trial judge, over the objection of Crown counsel at trial, instructed the jury that they could convict on count one only if the Crown proved that Dr. Klundert intended to evade the payment of tax by making a false statement. He told the jury:

You must find in order to convict him of count one, that he did it specifically for the purpose of evading income tax.

[72] On the trial judge's instructions, the same intention to evade the payment of tax was required to convict Dr. Klundert on counts one and two. The "protestor" defence was equally open on both, in the light of the trial judge's instructions. In fact, the trial judge told the jury that:

The elements of count two are literally the same as the elements of count one.

Digitized by Google

[73] He also told the jury:
If you believe Dr. Klundert's evidence that he only did this to protest with no intention to evade then you must acquit him on both counts. Even if you don't believe Dr. Klundert's evidence, if it might reasonably be true, if it leaves you with a reasonable doubt about his guilt or about an essential element of the offence, either offence, you must find him not guilty.
[74] I confess considerable difficulty understanding why an intention to evade the payment of tax is an essential element of a charge under 239(1)(a): see W.I. Innes, Tax Evasion, supra, at pp. 1-13, 4-45 to 4-51; Hefler, supra, at p. 288.[5] On appeal, the Crown did not take issue with the correctness of this instruction. In any event, for the purposes of considering Dr. Klundert's argument that the verdicts are irreconcilably inconsistent, the correctness of the instruction is not important. I need not determine whether the instruction was correct.
[75] Inconsistent verdicts cannot stand where the appellant demonstrates that the verdicts are so at odds that no reasonable jury who understood the evidence and followed the legal instructions could have arrived at those verdicts: R. v. McShannock reflex, (1980), 55 C.C.C. (2d) 53 at 55-56 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Varga 2001 CanLII 8610 (ON CA), (2001), 159 C.C.C. (3d) 502 at 526-27 (Ont. C.A.).
[76] The appellant has met that onus here. The "protestor" defence advanced by Dr. Klundert was exactly the same on count one and count two. It was the only defence advanced on count two. The jury's acquittal on that count indicates that the "protestor" defence gave rise at least to a reasonable doubt as to Dr. Klundert's guilt. The conviction on count one, however, indicates that the jury rejected exactly the same defence on count one. The verdicts smack of a compromise, which while perhaps understandable, is legally unacceptable.
[77] It is arguable that despite the irreconcilable inconsistencies in the verdict, the conviction on count one should stand. On this argument, the "protestor" defence should not have been left on either count and the inconsistency flowing from the uneven application of that defence to the two counts results in no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice. This argument is not without merit, however, since there must be a new trial on count two, and the charges are closely interrelated, I think the administration of justice is best served by quashing the conviction on count one and ordering a new trial on that count, as well.
[78] Although it is not necessary for the purposes of determining the outcome of the appeal, I will address one other argument made on behalf of Dr. Klundert as it may arise if there is a new trial. Counsel argued that the trial judge should have put the defence described in s. 39(1)of the Criminal Code, to the jury. That provision provides:
Everyone who is in peaceable possession of personal property under a claim of right, and everyone acting under his authority, is protected from criminal responsibility for defending that possession, even against a person entitled by law to possession of it,if he uses no more force than is necessary [emphasis added].
[79] Section 39(1) by its terms plainly speaks to the use of force to protect property by a person in peaceable possession of personal property under a claim of right. It has no application here. To the extent that a person charged under s. 239(1) can advance a "claim of right" defence, that claim is a denial of the requisite culpable state of mind. I have addressed the scope of the fault requirement in my reasons dealing with the Crown's appeal.

VII

Conclusion

[80] I would allow the Crown's appeal from the acquittal on count two, set aside the acquittal

Digitized by Google

and order a new trial. I would allow Dr.Klundert's appeal from the conviction on count one, set aside the conviction and order a new trial.

RELEASED: "DD" "AUG. 30 2004"
"Doherty J.A."
"I agree S.T. Goudge J.A."
"I agree Cavarzan J. per Doherty J.A."

[1]Section 91(3) of the Constitution Act, 1867, assigns to the federal government the power of "the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation". In Re Anti-Inflation Act 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373 at 390, Chief Justice Laskin referred to the federal taxing power as "apparently limitless". See also P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 4th ed. (looseleaf) (Thomson Canada Ltd.: Toronto, 1997) at pp. 30-2;
MacDonald, "Taxation Power in Canada" (1941) 19 C.B.R. 75 at 76-77.
[2]I use voluntary as meaning a conscious and willed act. See D. Stuart Canadian Criminal Law: A Treatise, 4thed. (Carswell Toronto: 2001) at pp. 103-107.
[3]The interpretation of Bayda C.J. has gained support in other judicial and academic quarters: see R. v. de Wolf 1982 CanLII 347 (BC CA), (1982), 67 C.C.C. (2d) 43 at 45, 48 (B.C.C.A.); R. v. Pongrantz, [1982] CTC 259 at 261(FCA); R. v. Hefler (1980), 42 N.S. R. (2d) 276 at 288-290 (N. S. Ct. Cty.);
W.I. Innis, Tax Evasion (Toronto: Carswell, 1995) at p. 4-10 to 4-15.
[4]Wilful blindness is the legal equivalent of knowledge: see *R. v. Harding*2001 CanLII 21272 (ON CA), (2001), 160 C.C.C. (3d) 225 at 240-243 (Ont. C..A.). Wilful blindness was not an issue in this case.
[5]The fact that an accused who files a false return is subject to a fine calculated by reference to the amount of tax evaded would not appear to make an intention to evade tax an element of the offence created by s. 239(1)(a). Even if there is no tax evaded, a person convicted under s. 239(1) would still be liable to imprisonment.

In R. v. Therrien[114] the court had to ascertain whether there was enough evidence to prove both actus reus and mens rea when the taxpayer had simply hoarded and used others purchase invoices and failed to properly instruct his return compilers or make corrections when they source documents went into the mix. It held:

Analysis of Legal Issues

What is the requisite actus reus and mens rea for theses charges and have they been established by the Crown's evidence?

Does the use of the word "wilfully" in section 239(1)(a) import an additional aspect to the Crown's burden on the count alleging wilful evasion of taxes, beyond that necessary to prove the counts involving the making of false or deceptive statements in tax returns?

[75] The actus reus of the offence under section 239(1)(a) is making, participating in, assenting to or acquiescing in making a false or deceptive statement in an income tax return (Derose). The mens rea of the offence is that the taxpayer did so intentionally, or with wilful blindness, as to the falsity or deceptiveness of the statements (Derose).

[76] Mr. Therrien provided a list of "expenses" to the people who prepared his returns. The fuel expenses were totaled by Mr. Therrien's assistant at his direction from receipts in a box in Mr. Therrien's office. Mr. Therrien had kept all these receipts, although there was apparently no legitimate reason to do so. He kept and had his assistant total receipts that included what were obviously receipts for expenses paid by the dealership, credit card purchases made by his wife, many receipts for what were obviously "middle expenses" and duplicate receipts. The totals of those receipts and the drivers' wages were then given to the individuals who prepared the returns. Those totals contained false or deceptive information. Even if Mr. Therrien was entitled to claim expenses he bore, Mr. Therrien did not bear the whole of the drivers' wages - yet he claimed the total. Nor did he bear any of the "first fill" gas expenses - as they were billed to a sundry account and not to the sale of particular vehicles. However, Mr. Therrien had his assistant total thousands of dollars of "first fill" expenses, using duplicate receipts. These totals were included in the returns.

[114] 2005 CanLII 22808 (MB PC)

Digitized by Google

[77] Mr. Therrien's brother Wayne and Ken Nault prepared the returns. They answered the questions on the income tax form in a false or deceptive manner, based on the information provided to them by Mr. Therrien. For example, in response to the direction on the1997 form "Statement of Employment Expenses", in response to the direction "Total kilometres driven in taxation year to earn income", Wayne Therrien filled in "21,500". In 1998, in response to the direction "Enter the kilometres you drove in the taxation year to earn employment income", the entry was "35,575". Obviously Mr. Therrien, who worked mainly in the office, did not drive that many kilometres in order to earn income.

[78] Mr. Rick Therrien then signed at the end of the returns, "I certify that the information given on this return and in any documents attached is correct, complete and fully discloses all my income." The 2000 return filed by Mr. Nault is somewhat different in that it was filed electronically and was not signed by Mr. Therrien. However, it also was prepared based on a breakdown of expenses provided by Mr. Therrien. A completed 2000 return was sent to Mr. Therrien on April 6, 2001 with a letter stating, "We have prepared your return based on the information you have provided to us. Please review the return carefully to ensure that it is accurate and complete..." Neither in Mr. Therrien's evidence, nor in argument, was any distinction made between the 1997-1999 and the 2000 returns.

[79] It is difficult to separate the actus reus and the mens rea as, in my mind, the deliberate and fraudulent intent came before the preparation of the returns - in the gathering of and provision of information to the preparers of the returns. However, Mr. Therrien did have reminders and opportunities to rectify the situation. In the returns signed by him, there was a warning, below the place for his signature, stating, "It is a serious offence to make a false return." He was sent the 2000 return and asked to review and sign it. He also had the opportunity to reconsider what he had done a number of times during the audit and again when he agreed to a formal interview. Instead he lied to the auditor both on the telephone and, later, in a letter he typed himself.

[80] Mr. Therrien's "defence" - that he thought he was entitled to claim a portion of the expenses because his income had been reduced by a portion of the delivery expenses - although it may have qualified as a defence, is not, when the evidence is examined, believable. I believe Mr. Therrien intentionally provided information which he knew would result in false or deceptive statements being made on his return. He was at least wilfully blind to the falsity or deceptiveness of the statements. However, to say though that Mr. Therrien was only "wilfully blind" would be erroneous. In his testimony he stood by the claims made in his return – he did not say that his brother or Mr. Nault had made a mistake, that he had not read the forms, or that there was any kind of misunderstanding.

[81] In terms of the amounts alleged, I find that Mr. Therrien misrepresented and sought to evade at least the amounts alleged in the Information, with the exception of the 1997 return, where his brother apparently claimed more in drivers' wages than the documentation provided by Mr. Therrien indicated - $18,023 as opposed to Mr. Therrien's figure of "12,072".

[82] The defence quoted Hefler at paragraphs 37 to 39 - "an honest belief in a course of action, although mistakenly based upon an error of law, is a defence to a crime of fraudulent intent or other specific intent of an analogous nature". Unfortunately for Mr. Therrien, the evidence does not reveal such an "honest belief". To the contrary.

Digitized by Google

[83] In regards to an offence under section 239(1)(d) - "wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted…to evade payment of taxes imposed by this Act", the Paveley judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal is apparently definitive on this issue (at page 492). Justice Bayda wrote:

The word "willfully" as used in the subsection under consideration, carries a distinct connotation of deliberate purpose and ulterior motive. To ascribe to the word a meaning which negates or overlooks that purpose or motive is to dilute the meaning of the word to a point where its use is rendered completely unnecessary…It follows then that for a conviction to take place under s. 239(1)(d) of the Act, there must be proof of the actus reus, the " manner", to use the word of the statute, in which the alleged offence was committed, and also proof of a specific intent, that is to say proof that the act which constitutes the "manner", was done with a particular purpose--the purpose of evading the payment of tax.

[84] Justice Bayda then concluded at page 493:

… in those cases where a particular purpose or a specific intent is an essential element of the offence, then proof of the act the natural consequence of which would be a certain result and no explanation is given, entitles, but does not bind, the court hearing the matter, to find the accused guilty of doing the act with the necessary intent.

[85] Mr. Therrien, in his evidence, did not testify that a mistake of some kind was made. Rather he testified that he believed he was entitled to a make a claim for expenses that he did not personally pay, but that he did it in a certain way for convenience sake. After a close review of the evidence, Mr. Therrien's explanation is incapable of belief.

[86] I believe the Crown has established the requisite actus reus and mens rea for all offences. I do not, therefore, find it necessary to decide whether the addition of the word "wilfully" creates a higher onus on the Crown.

Beyond a Reasonable Doubt

To convict a tax cheat, or even send one to trial, there must exist that there was a tax offence provable beyond a reasonable doubt at trial. This was reviewed in R. v. Yelle[115] where the court held:

Issues

[4] The overarching issue is: has the test for a directed verdict has been met by the applicants (i.e., could the evidence before me allow a reasonable jury, properly instructed in the law, conclude that the elements of the offences have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt)?

[5] The thrust of the application brought by the three accused is that it is an essential element of the offences charged that the accused persons have a tax liability under the Income Tax Act, and that the Crown has failed to lead evidence upon which a jury could find such a tax liability. Accordingly, it is necessary to identify the elements of the offences charged.

Facts

[6] Since this is a directed verdict application, the evidentiary portion of the trial is not yet necessarily concluded. Accordingly, there is simply evidence before me, and there cannot yet be conclusive findings of fact. It is therefore more convenient to deal with the evidence, and its impact on the directed verdict application, in the section of these Reasons headed “Law and Analysis”.

[115] 2010 ABPC 94

Digitized by Google

Law and Analysis

[7] In an application for a directed verdict, the Court is to assume that the trier of fact will believe the evidence which has been tendered by the Crown. The judge in a directed verdict application is not to weigh the direct evidence before him or her. However, with respect to circumstantial evidence before the Court, the judge will engage in a limited weighing exercise for the sole purpose of determining whether a properly instructed trier of fact could reasonably draw from the evidence whatever inferences are necessary to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty. The law was summarized by McLachlin,

C.J.C. in R. v. Arcuri (G.) (2001), 274 N.R. 274 (S.C.C.) at paragraphs 21-25 and 29-32:

[21] The question to be asked by a preliminary inquiry judge under s. 548(1) of the Criminal Code is the same as that asked by a trial judge considering a defence motion for a directed verdict, namely, “whether or not there is any evidence upon which a reasonable jury properly instructed could return a verdict of guilty”: Shephard, supra, at p. 1080; see also R. v. Monteleone, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 154; 78

N.R. 377; 23 O.A.C. 241, at p. 160. Under this test, a preliminary inquiry judge must commit the accused to trial “in any case in which there is admissible evidence which could, if it were believed, result in a conviction”: Shephard, supra, p. 1080.

[22] The test is the same whether the evidence is direct or circumstantial: see R. v. Mezzo, [1986] 1

S.C.R. 802; 68 N.R. 1; 43 Man.R.(2d) 161, at p. 842-43; Monteleone, supra, at p. 161. The nature of the judge’s task, however, varies according to the type of evidence that the Crown has advanced. Where the Crown’s case is based entirely on direct evidence, the judge’s task is straightforward. By definition, the only conclusion that needs to be reached in such a case is whether the evidence is true: see Watt’s Manual of Criminal Evidence (1998), at § 8.0 (“[d]irect which evidence is evidence which, if believed, resolves the matter in issue”); McCormick on Evidence (5th Ed. 1999), at p. 641;

J. Sopinka, S.N. Lederman and A.W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (2nd Ed. 1999), at s. 2.74 (direct evidence is witness testimony as to “‘the precise fact which is the subject of the issue on trial’”). It is for the jury to say whether and how far the evidence is to be believed: see Shephard, supra, at pp. 1086-87. Thus if the judge determines that the Crown has presented direct evidence as to every element of the offence charged, the judge’s task is complete. If there is direct evidence as to every element of the offence, the accused must be committed to trial.

[23] The judge’s task is somewhat more complicated where the Crown has not presented direct evidence as to every element of the offence. The question then becomes whether the remaining elements of the offence - - that is, those elements as to which the Crown has not advanced direct evidence - - may reasonably be inferred from the circumstantial evidence. Answering this question inevitably requires the judge to engage in a limited weighing of the evidence because, with circumstantial evidence, there is, by definition, an inferential gap between the evidence and the matter to be established - - that is, an inferential gap beyond the question of whether the evidence should be believed: see Watt’s Manual of Criminal Evidence, supra, at § 9.01 (circumstantial evidence is “any item of evidence, testimonial or real, other than the testimony of an eyewitness to a material fact. It is any fact from the existence of which the trier of fact may infer the existence of a fact in issue”); McCormick on Evidence, supra, at pp. 641-472 (“circumstantial evidence ... may be testimonial, but even if the circumstances depicted are accepted as true, additional reasoning is required to reach the desired conclusion”). The judge must therefore weight the evidence, in the sense of assessing whether it is reasonably capable of supporting the inferences that the Crown asks the jury to draw. This weighing, however, is limited. The judge does not ask whether she herself would conclude that the accused is guilty. Nor does the judge draw factual inferences or assess credibility. The judge asks only whether the evidence, if believed, could reasonably support an inference of guilt.

Digitized by Google

[24] The principles described above are well settled. In Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Jackson (1877), 3 App. Cas. 193, at p. 197, Lord Cairns wrote:

"The judge has a certain duty to discharge, and the jurors have another and a different duty. The Judge has to say whether any facts have been established by evidence from which [the matter in issue] may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether, from those facts ... [the matter in issue] ought to be inferred." (Emphasis omitted)

We reaffirmed the traditional common law rule in Shephard, supra. As I noted in Charemski, supra, the same rule applies in England, in Australia, and in the United States: see Cross and Tapper on Evidence (8th Ed. 1995), at pp. 190-92; Peter Gillies, Law of Evidence in Australia (2nd Ed. 1991), at pp. 206-8; Curley v. United States (1947), 160 F.3d 229, at p. 232 (the judge "must determine whether upon the evidence ... a reasonable mind might fairly conclude guilt beyond a reasonable doubt").

[25] Notwithstanding certain confusing language in Mezzo[,] supra, and Monteleone[,] supra, nothing in this court's jurisprudence calls into question the continuing validity of the common law rule: see M. Bloos and M. Plaxton, An Almost-Eulogy for the Preliminary Inquiry: "We Hardly Knew Ye" (2000), 43 Crim. L.Q. 516, at p. 256. In Mezzo, supra, the issue was whether the Crown had proffered sufficient evidence as to identity. McIntyre, J., writing for the majority, stated that a trial judge can direct an acquittal only if there is "no evidence' as to an essential element of the offence: Mezzo, supra, at pp. 840-43. He also stated that the judge has no authority to "weigh and consider the quality of the evidence and to remove it from the jury's consideration": Mezzo, supra, at p. 842. Those statements, taken alone, might be understood to suggest that a preliminary inquiry judge must commit the accused to trial even if the Crown's evidence would not reasonably support an inference of guilt. However, as the dissent in Charemski, supra, discusses (at para. 27), the remainder of McIntyre, J.'s, reasons make clear that by "no evidence capable of supporting a conviction," and by "weighing" McIntyre, J., was referring to the ultimate determination of guilt (a matter for the jury), as distinguished from the determination of whether the evidence can reasonably support an inference of guilt (a matter for the preliminary inquiry judge). His concern was to reject the argument that the judge must determine whether guilt is the only reasonable inference. His reasons cannot be read to call into question the traditional rule, namely, that the judge must determine whether the evidence can reasonably support an inference of guilt.

[8] More recently, the test was set out by L-V. D'Auteuil, J. in R. v. Captain M. Savaria, 2009 CarswellNat 1106; 2009 CM 3001 (Can. Ct. Martial) at paragraphs 5-9:

A motion of this kind, made immediately after counsel for the prosecution declares his evidence closed, is different from a motion requesting acquittal on the basis of a reasonable doubt. The latter argument is to the effect that there is some evidence concerning all the essential elements of a charge and on which a reasonable jury, properly instructed could return a verdict of guilty, but that is insufficient to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Since the concept of reasonable doubt does not come into play until all the evidence has been adduced, the concept of reasonable doubt cannot be considered here unless the accused has decided not to adduce evidence or has declared his case closed, which is not the case here.

I do not have to assess the quality of the evidence in determining whether or not counsel for the prosecution has adduced some evidence concerning each of the essential elements of the offence in the third, fourth and fifth counts, on the basis of which a reasonable jury, properly instructed in the law, could return a verdict of guilty.

Digitized by Google

The test for a directed verdict was set out by Justice Ritchie in United States of America v. Shephard, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 1067, at page 1080, and reads as follows:

... whether or not there is any evidence upon which a reasonable jury properly instructed could return a verdict of guilty.

It is important to note that the burden of proof lies with the accused to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that the test has been met.

The Supreme Court confirmed that test at paragraph 9 of its decision in R. v. Moteleone, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 154, in the following terms:

Where there is before the court any admissible evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, which, if believed by a properly charged jury acting reasonably, would justify a conviction, the trial judge is not justified in directing a verdict of acquittal.

The test is the same, whether the evidence is direct or circumstantial. The application of this test will vary with the kind of evidence adduced by the prosecution. When the prosecution's case is based entirely on direct evidence, the application of the test is simple. If the judge determines that the prosecution has adduced some direct evidence on each of the essential elements of the offence, the motion must be dismissed. The only issue that will remain relates to the truth of the evidence, and this aspect will have to be considered by the trier of fact. However, where the evidence of an essential element of the offence is based on circumstantial evidence, the question to be decided relates not merely to the truth of this evidence. To the extent that the evidence is accepted as truthful, there is also the issue of whether the inferences based on this evidence, as proposed by the prosecution, can be drawn as suggested. The judge must weigh the evidence by determining whether there is a reasonable likelihood that this evidence will support the inferences proposed by the prosecution. The judge does not ask whether he or she personally would draw such inferences and does not determine the credibility thereof. The only question is whether the evidence, if it is believed, may reasonably support an inference of guilt.

[9] Sections 239(1)(a) and 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act read as follows:

Every person who has made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act or a regulation,

. . . .

(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act,

. . . .

... is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to a fine of not less than 50% and not more than 200% of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

Elements of the Offence

[10] With respect to the offences charged under section 239(1)(a), the Crown has alleged that each of the accused persons:

"made, acquiesced in, participated in or assented to the making of a false or deceptive statement" in various Income Tax Returns by "understating [his or her] taxable income"; and

"made, acquiesced in, participated in or assented to the making of false or deceptive statements in the Returns of Income for one or more of the taxation years 1991 to 1998 inclusive, of the partners of the S.R.O. Partnership by providing to the partners false information and documentation to wit: the Capital Cost Allowance allocated to each partner for the S.R.O. Partnership's 1994 and 1995 fiscal periods ending December 31st with respect to computer software acquired by the S.R.O. Partnership".

Digitized by Google

[11] With respect to the offences charged under section 239(1)(d), the Crown has alleged that each of the accused persons:

for various taxation years, wilfully evaded the payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act; and for various taxation years, "wilfully evaded or attempted to evade compliance with the Income Tax Act or payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act ... of the partners of the S.R.O. Partnership by providing to the partner false information and documentation to wit: the Capital Cost Allowance allocated to each partner for the S.R.O. Partnership's 1994 and 1995 fiscal periods ending December 31st with respect to computer software acquired by the S.R.O. Partnership".

[12] As I understand the theory of the Crown, the accused persons wilfully misrepresented in various documents filed with the Canada Revenue Agency (or its predecessors) the Capital Cost Allowance in respect of computer software purchased by the S.R.O. Partnership. To put it in very summary fashion, the Crown alleges that the accused persons orchestrated an agreement between the S.R.O. Partnership ("S.R.O.") (as purchaser) and a company trading as Balmoral Holdings ("Balmoral") (as vendor) under the terms of which S.R.O. purchased certain computer software for a price of $4,000,000.00 The Crown alleges that the price of $4,000,000.00 was far in excess of the fair market value of the software, and that the entire transaction was created for the improper purpose of creating an inflated capital cost allowance which was then distributed to the partners who had purchased units in S.R.O. The allocation of the inflated capital cost allowance, so alleges the Crown, permitted the taxpayers to whom the allocations were made to evade the payment of taxes properly owing from the taxpayers to Her Majesty.

[13] With respect to the charges of making false statements and evading the payment of taxes, Counsel on behalf of the accused persons submitted that it is fundamental to the Crown's allegations against their clients that the Crown prove that there was tax owing for the taxation years noted in the Information. Defence counsel submitted that if the capital cost allowance calculated by S.R.O. and allocated to its partners was calculated and allocated in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax Act, then no false statements had been made, no taxes were owing, and, consequently, there was no evasion of payment of taxes.

[14] The Crown summarized its position as follows:

One further comment on law, and then I will get into the factual situation. If I understand my learned friend's argument properly, the elements that the Crown would have to prove under 239 would, from case to case, be a moving target. In other words, depending upon whatever scheme is alleged to have been committed by a particular accused, you have to go into various technical provisions in the Income Tax Act and introduce those particular technical sections into 239 and prove each one of those beyond a reasonable doubt in order to prove that there had been tax evasion. My submission is the criminal law, as far as I know, I am not aware of any case that supports that proposition. The elements that we need to prove here are the elements of fraud, dishonesty and deprivation, and the deprivation, of course, relates to Her Majesty's purse.

[15] Though counsel vigorously submitted that their two approaches to the question of what the Crown must prove were different, upon reflection, I do not think they were significantly at odds.

Digitized by Google

[16] The Crown alleges that the representations made by the accused persons about the S.R.O. capital cost allowance were dishonest, and that as a result Her Majesty was wrongly deprived of tax revenue. The accused persons say that there can be no dishonesty if there is no tax owing under the provision of the Income Tax Act.

[17] The Crown alleges that tax was owing because the amount claimed as capital cost allowance was knowingly inflated through an inflated purchase price for the software.

[18] The Defence submits that one must look to the provisions of the Income Tax Act to first determine whether the purchase price upon which the claimed capital cost allowance was calculated must be accepted as stated by S.R.O. or whether it is open to attack. The Defence says that in the case at bar the Canada Revenue Agency must accept the stated purchase price in calculating the capital cost allowance unless the transaction between S.R.O. and Balmoral was a non-arm's length transaction. The Defence agrees that if transaction through which S.R.O. purchased the computer software was non-arm's length, and if the fair market value of the software was less than the stated purchase price, then the capital cost allowance must be calculated using the fair market value of the software. The Defence agrees that there is evidence before the Court to the effect that the fair market value of the software was much less than $4,000,000.00.

[19] In my view, the Crown and Defence are basically saying the same thing. The Crown submitted that the elements of the offences which it must prove are dishonesty and deprivation. The Defence submitted that the Crown must prove that tax is owing by showing that the capital cost allowance claimed was higher than it should have been, and that that can only be done by showing that S.R.O. and Balmoral engaged in a non- arm's length transaction in the purchase of the computer software. That is simply a particularization of dishonesty (knowingly claiming a false capital cost allowance) and deprivation (reducing tax owing by relying on a falsely claimed capital cost allowance).

[20] The end result is that the Crown must prove that tax which was properly owed to Her Majesty was not paid because the accused persons in a non-arm's length transaction misrepresented the purchase price of the computer software with the result that they misrepresented the capital cost allowance. I rely on Judge Bruce's comments in R. v. Bromley, [2004] 3 C.T.C. 58 (B.C. Prov. Ct.) at paragraph 110:

Addressing first the issue of taxability, [it] is apparent that this is an element of the offences charged and, accordingly, must be proven by the Crown beyond a reasonable doubt. The Court must ask whether the Crown has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the income sought to be taxed is properly subject to tax according to tax law and that each deduction sought to be disallowed is properly disallowed in accordance with tax law.

Is there evidence before the Court in relation to the elements of the offences?

[21] In approaching this question, I have been greatly aided by, and am grateful for, the tax analysis set out in the submissions of Messrs. Haymour and Misutka on behalf of the accused Viccars.

[22] The concept of capital cost allowance and its role in computing income tax has been generally set out in Halsbury's Laws of Canada, First Edition, Income Tax (General), (Markham, LexisNexis Canada Inc., 2008) at paragraphs HTG-152 and HTG-153:

. . . .

... Deduction of capital cost allowance. A taxpayer cannot deduct expenditures on account of capital outlays, depreciation, obsolescence or depletion. The prohibition against the deduction of depreciation and similar expenses flies in the face of accounting principles. The Income Tax Act does, however, allow for the deduction of capital cost allowance ("CCA") in lieu of such expenses: in computing income from a business or property, a taxpayer may deduct such part of the capital cost to the taxpayer of property, or such amount in respect of the capital cost to the taxpayer of property, if any, as is allowed by regulation. Thus, a taxpayer cannot deduct depreciation calculated for financial statement purposes, but may claim a deduction for capital cost allowance, according to prescribed rules.

Digitized by Google

Capital cost allowance system. The basic concept underlying the capital cost allowance system is fairly straightforward: CCA is a deduction from income that is intended to allocate the approximate cost of capital assets over their useful lives. Thus, in a sense, the CCA system is nothing more than statutory depreciation at pre-determined rates. ...

. . . .

The CCA allows a taxpayer to deduct the actual cost of depreciable assets over a period of time. ... [Footnotes Omitted]

[23] In the case at bar, the capital cost allowance claimed was based on the $4,000,000.00 purchase price for the computer software as set out in the agreement between S.R.O. and Balmoral Holdings.2 That purchase price must be accepted for tax purposes if the agreement between S.R.O. and Balmoral Holdings was an arm's length transaction: Downey v. R. (2006), 355 N.R. 84 (Fed. C.A.).

[24] However, if the transaction between S.R.O. and Balmoral Holdings was a non-arm's length transaction, then section 69(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act applies. That section reads:

69. (1) . . .

Except as expressly otherwise provided in this Act, (a) where a taxpayer has acquired anything from a person with whom the taxpayer was not dealing at arm's length at an amount in excess of the fair market value thereof at the time the taxpayer so acquired it, the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired it at that fair market value; ...

[25] In McLarty v. Minister of National Revenue (2008), 374 N.R. 311 (S.C.C.), Justice Rothstein, speaking for himself and six other members of the Court, said at paragraph 43:

[43] It has long been established that when parties are not dealing at arm's length, there is no assurance that the transaction "will reflect ordinary commercial dealing between parties acting in their separate interests" (Swiss Bank Corp. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1974] S.C.R. 1144, at 1152). The provisions of the Income Tax Act pertaining to parties not dealing at arm's length are intended to preclude artificial transactions from conferring tax benefits on one or more of the parties. Where the parties are found not to be dealing at arm's length, the taxpayer who has made an acquisition is deemed to have made the acquisition at fair market value regardless of whether the amount paid was in excess of fair market value. ...

[26] It is the partnership (i.e., S.R.O.) which is the taxpayer referred to in section 69(1)(a): section 96 of the Income Tax Act, and Deptuck v. Minister of National Revenue, (2003) 303 N.R. 250 (Fed. C.A.) at paragraph 14.

[27] Consequently, in calculating the capital cost allowance in respect of the computer software purchased by S.R.O., if the purchase was a non-arm's length transaction, and if the fair market value of the software was less than the purchase price, then it is the fair market value (as opposed to the purchase price) which would have to be used in calculating the capital cost allowance.

[28] The question which must now be addressed is whether there is evidence before the Court which would allow a reasonable trier of fact, properly instructed in the law, to conclude that the agreement by S.R.O. to purchase the computer software from Balmoral Holdings was a nonarm's length transaction. It is conceded for the purposes of this application that there is evidence before me that the fair market value of the computer software was less than the purchase price set out in the agreement.

[29] The Income Tax Act does not define the terms "arm's length" or "non-arm's length". However, the concepts are discussed by the Supreme Court of Canada in McLarty v. Minister of National Revenue, supra. At paragraphs 44-45, Justice Rothstein said;

Digitized by Google

[44] Arm's length is not defined in the Income Tax Act. However, s. 251(1) provides: "(1) For the purposes of this Act, related persons shall be deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length; it is a question of fact whether persons not related to each other were at a particular time dealing with each other at arm's length."
[45] The parties in this case were not related. It is therefore a question of fact whether they were dealing at arm's length.
[30] Likewise, in the case at bar, the parties were not related,3 and whether they were dealing at arm's length is a question of fact.
[31] At paragraph 62, Rothstein, J. said;
62 The Canada Revenue Agency Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin IT-419R2 "Meaning of Arm's Length" (June 8, 2004) sets out an approach to determine whether the parties are dealing at arm's length. Each case will depend on its own facts. However, there are some useful criteria that have been developed and accepted by the courts: see for example Peter Cundill & Associates Ltd. v. R., [1991] 1 C.T.C 197 (Fed. T.D.), aff'd [1991] 2. C.T.C. 221 (Fed. C.A.). The Bulletin provides:
. . . By providing general criteria to determine whether there is an arm's length relationship between unrelated persons for a given transaction, it must be recognized that all encompassing guidelines to cover every situation cannot be supplied. Each particular transaction or series of transactions must be examined on its own merits. The following paragraphs set forth the CRA's general guidelines with some specific comments about certain relationships.
The following criteria have generally been used by the courts in determining whether parties to a transaction are not dealing at "arm's length":
was there a common mind which directs the bargaining for both parties to a transaction; were the parties to a transaction acting in concert without separate interests; and was there "de facto" control.
[32] In Gestion Yvan Drouin Inc. v. R., [2001] 2 C.T.C. 2315 (T.C.C. [General Procedure]), Justice Archambault summarized the law on determining whether a transaction was "arm's length", and proposed a test. At paragraphs 73-75, the learned trial judge said:
Having analyzed the legal context in which the arm's length concept is applied, we shall now examine its interpretation in the case law. My colleague Judge Bonner had to deal with the concept in McNichol v. R. (1997), 97 D.T.C. 111 (T.C.C.), at pages 117 and 118:
Three criteria or tests are commonly used to determine whether the parties to a transaction are dealing at arm's length. They are:
the existence of a common mind which directs the bargaining for both parties to the transaction, parties to a transaction acting in concert without separate interests, and
"de facto" control.
The common mind test emerges from two cases. The Supreme Court of Canada dealt first with the matter in Minister of National Revenue v. Sheldon's Engineering Ltd. At pages 1113-14 Locke J., speaking for the Court, said the following: Where corporations are controlled directly or indirectly by the same person, whether that person be an individual or a corporation, they are not by virtue of that section deemed to be dealing with each other at arm's length. Apart altogether from the provisions of that section, it could not, in my opinion, be fairly contended that, where depreciable assets were sold by a taxpayer to an entity wholly controlled by him or by a corporation controlled by the taxpayer to another corporation controlled by him, the taxpayer as the controlling shareholder dictating the terms of the bargain, the parties were dealing with each other at arm's length and that s. 20(2) was inapplicable.

Digitized by Google

This decision of Cattanach, J. in Minister of National Revenue v. T R Merritt Estate is also helpful, At pages 5156-66 he said: In my view, the basic premise on which this analysis is based is that, where the "mind" by which the bargaining is directed on behalf of one party to a contract is the same "mind" that directs the bargaining on behalf of the other party, it cannot be said that the parties were "dictating" the "terms of the bargain" on behalf of both parties, it cannot be said that the parties were dealing at arm's length.

The acting in concert test illustrates the importance of bargaining between separate parties, each seeking to protect his own independent interest. It is described in the decision of the exchequer Court in Swiss Bank Corporation v. Minister of National Revenue[.] At page 5241 Thurlow J. (as he was then) said:

To this I would add that where several parties - - whether natural persons or corporations or a combination of the two - - act in concert, and in the same interest, to direct or dictate the conduct of another, in my opinion the "mind" that directs may be that of the combination as a whole acting in concert or that of any of them in carrying out particular parts or functions of what the common object involves. Moreover as I see it no distinction is to be made for this purpose between persons who act for themselves in exercising control over another and those who, however numerous, act through a representative. On the other hand if one of several parties involved in a transaction acts in or represents a different interest from the others the fact that the common purpose may be to so direct the acts of another as to achieve a particular result will not by itself serve to disqualify the transaction as one between parties dealing at arm's length. The Sheldon's Engineering case [supra], as I see it, is an instance of this.

Finally, it may be noted that the existence of an arm's length relationship is excluded when one of the parties to the transaction under review has de facto control of the other. In this regard reference may be made to the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Robson Leather Company Ltd. v. Minster of National Review, 77 D.T.C. 5106. [Emphasis added]

In my opinion, although Judge Bonner (like many others) sets out three separate tests for identifying arm's length dealing, they constitute essentially just one test that may be summarized succinctly as follows: is there control of one party by the other? What the three tests are intended to determine is the existence of a relationship between persons who are parties to a given transaction where one of the parties exercises over the other an influence such that this other party is no longer free to participate in the transaction in an independent manner.

With respect to the second test - - acting in concert without separate interests, which is the one relied on by the Minister in this case - - one can say that it will be met where a person merely participates in a transaction, not for his own benefit but for someone else's or, even if he is acting for his own benefit, if he is also acting for someone else in a context of reciprocity. That person is acting without a separate interest and not independently in his own interest.

[33] In the course of his very helpful submissions, Mr. Haymour, on behalf of the defendant Viccars, submitted that since the question is whether the sale of the computer software4 was a non-arm's length transaction, one must determine when that transaction occurred (so that one may determine who were the directing minds of the two parties at that time). Following up on that theme, I asked the assembled Defence counsel the date on which when they contend that the transaction occurred. Mr. Lord replied on behalf of all accused. He reviewed a number of the documentary exhibits, and said "one cannot know when the transaction occurred". Mr Lord submitted that "the only evidence is inferential, and it occurs at both ends of the transaction." He took the position that a trier of fact "couldn't conclude that SRO Partnership, with any certainty, got the software any later than mid November of '94."

Digitized by Google

[34] Mr. Befus, on behalf of the Crown, in equally helpful submissions, pointed to evidence which could lead to the inference that the source codes for the software were not delivered to Balmoral by the company from which Balmoral bought the programme until sometime in 1995, and that, therefore, Balmoral could not have delivered them to S.R.O. until sometime in 1995.

[35] Upon further reflection, I think efforts spent in determining the date on which S.R.O. actually received the software do not bear directly on the relevant question. Section 69(1), in saying, "where a taxpayer has acquired anything from a person with whom the taxpayer was not dealing at arm's length", is referring to the time of the "dealing" as opposed to the time when the acquisition (transfer of property) actually occurs.

[36] In my view, the state of the evidence leads to these conclusions:

The date of the "dealing" between Balmoral Holdings and S.R.O. (as that term is used in section 69(1) of the Income Tax Act) will have to be determined by way of inference from the evidence. The documents constitute some, but not all, of the evidence on the point. The entirety of the events leading up to the ultimate allocation of the capital cost allowance to the partners of S.R.O. will have to be considered by the trier of fact in order to determine when the "dealing" between Balmoral Holdings and S.R.O. occurred.

Ruling

Until one knows the date of the "dealing" between Balmoral Holdings and S.R.O. (which, on the state of the evidence before me, is a matter which must be left to the trier of fact), one does not know at which date one must determine whether S.R.O. was dealing with Balmoral Holdings at arm's length.

It must be remembered that the question of whether S.R.O. was "dealing" with Balmoral Holdings at arm's length is a question of fact. While the law has set out various factors a trier of fact should consider in determining whether the taxpayer (S.R.O) was dealing with Balmoral Holdings at arm's length, at the end of the day the question is not solely about the factors, rather, the ultimate question remains: Was the taxpayer dealing with Balmoral Holdings at arm's length? The answer to that ultimate question involves the concept of control, both in its commonality and degree. The answer to that ultimate question can only be determined when the trier of fact considers all the evidence surrounding the "dealing", together with the inferences which may be properly drawn from that evidence. It is for the trier of fact to consider matters such as the events surrounding the creation of S.R.O., the role the defendant Viccars played in creating S.R.O. and his role in Balmoral Holdings, the role the defendant Viccars played in creating the cascading legal arrangements which resulted in Balmoral acquiring the computer software at a cost of $42,500.00 U.S. as recorded in a written agreement bearing the date of January 13, 1994, and, S.R.O. acquiring the computer software8 at a cost of $4,000,000.00 CDN as recorded in a written agreement bearing the date of January 14, 1994. In my view, if the trier of fact accepted the Crown's evidence as it exists in this trial, and drew from that evidence the possible inferences favourable to the Crown's case, the trier of fact could conclude that S.R.O. did not deal with Balmoral Holdings at arm's length.

If the trier of fact concludes that the dealing between S.R.O. and Balmoral Holdings was not at arm's length, then the trier of fact could conclude that the evidence, including but not limited to the significant difference between the price at which Balmoral Holding acquired the software and the price at which it sold the software to S.R.O., supports beyond a reasonable doubt the conclusion that the defendants did commit the offences with which they are charged.

Digitized by Google

[37] The application of the defendants for a directed verdict is dismissed.

Knowingly Non-Payment Enough

See also the earlier case of R. v. De Wolf[116] where the BC Appeal Ct. opined on a case where the taxpayer knew he had income taxes coming due, contacted the CRA about them, but had made no payment towards them when he could have, preferring to extinguish personal debts:

> [33] LAMBERT J.A. (orally):—I agree with the reasons of my brother presiding. I would like to make two short observations.
>
> [34] The first relates to the wording of the charge under s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63. The charge is one of wilfully evading the payment of taxes. I am concerned that the cases under that section are tending to give rise to a web of synonyms which might be taken to express the only test.
>
> [35] The test that was used in R. v. Paveley (1975), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 483, 70 D.L.R. (3d) 237, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 577, by Mr. Justice Bayda was an appropriate one for that case and, in my view, was an appropriate one for this case. That is, that there was a deliberate purpose in the non-payment and an ulterior motive in the non- payment which, together, would establish the wilful evasion of payment.
>
> [36] I wish to make it clear, as I understand my brothers do, that this is not in our view the only test for this offence.
>
> [37] The second point that I wish to make is that the evidence established that the appellant had not filed any income tax returns for the period from 1963 to 1978, though the offence with which he was charged related only to 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977 and 1978. The question of his intent in those last five years is affected by the background against which it is suggested that he did not pay tax and intended not to pay tax and, indeed, to evade tax.
>
> [38] I would grant leave to appeal, but I would dismiss the appeal.

Poor Record Keeping Not a Defence

A taxpayer who refuses to simply maintain and advise herself accurately of the net income and consequently income taxes that are due has no defence to an argument for tax evasion as was described in R. v. MacNeil[117] where another doctor delegated accounting to his spouse and made estimates of both income and expenses. It was held that:

> [1] The accused, John Peter MacNeil earned professional income as a doctor. However, his accounting or recording of income and expenses was inadequate. Hence, a Revenue Canada Agency audit disclosed that there were discrepancies between the income he claimed and the amount he actually received. He had underreported his income and had exaggerated his expenses. As a result, the Canada Revenue Agency added the undisclosed and underreported amounts to his income and adjusted the expenses.
>
> [2] Additionally, they have charged him with four counts of failure to include additional taxable income. The charges are based upon his making false and deceptive statements in the filing of his 1998, 1999, 2000 and 2001, T1 Income Tax and Benefit Returns for those stated years. They also have charged him with wilfully evading the payment of taxes by failing to report the additional taxable income between December 31, 1997 and November 13, 2002.

---

[116] 1982 CanLII 347 (BC CA)

[117] 2007 NSPC 23

Digitized by Google

…
[4] It was also apparent that he did not emphasize proper bookkeeping or accounting methods nor paid close attention to financial details as he lacked adequate books of accounting and supporting documentation. He habitually estimated his annual income by determining his income for a portion of the year and then converting that to an annual total. He also estimated his expenses. There was also evidence that he was experiencing financial difficulties as he was heavily in debt with cash flow problems.
[5] For the taxation years 1998 to 2000 he did not file a formal statement of income and expenses. Likewise, he claimed the full spousal deduction for his then spouse and claimed her income to be zero for the taxation years 1998, 1999 and 2000 and to be $100.00 for 2001. However, he claimed that he paid his spouse an honorarium for her assistance in the amount of $1200.00 in the taxation years 1999 and 2001 and $32, 000.00 in 2000. His spouse did not file a tax return for those relevant years.
[6] The Canada Revenue Agency investigated, audited and reassessed the accused for the taxation years 1998-2001. As a result of the audit the accused has admitted that he had additional taxable income and should have paid additional federal taxes. He, however, has submitted that his conduct did not rise to the level of any criminality as the surrounding circumstances including the state of his mind could have impacted on his action.
Issue
[7] Having admitted to the fact that he filed the statements and the evidence supports the filing of the documents the real issue therefore is whether the statements were simply errors of omissions or, gross negligence or fraud with the intention to evade the payment of taxes.
Position of the Parties
[8] In the Crown's view, as a medical doctor where, professionally, accuracy is required and necessary, we have someone who because of his inauspicious financial circumstances was determined to reduce his taxable income by any means possible. Thus, by his system of estimations of his income and expenses, if he did not knowingly fail to report all of his income and overstated his expenses for the subject years, he was wilfully blind as to his actual income and expenses that could have been easily obtained from accessible bank statements and MSI and, he at least acted so negligently that it amounted to his being grossly negligent. Being sloppy was not criminal but one has to consider the frequency of these errors and omissions to see whether they were done consciously or inadvertently.
[9] On the other hand, the accused pointed to the various sections of the Tax Act and emphasized that on the various degrees of culpability he was at least negligent but neither criminally fraudulent nor conduct amounting to a scheme of evasion. Significantly, however, he does not deny making the incorrect statements. In short, he did not wilfully or intentionally evade the payment of taxes.
Analysis
[10] It seems to me that the Crown only put questions to the accused about the errors and omissions which he said were correct or confirmed what he did. But, he was not asked the reasons for doing what he did in order to assess his motives or mind set. The suggestion was that he should be penalized criminally because he guessed his income and expenses and was very cavalier in his approach to tax preparation and reporting without consulting any tax specialists. However, the questioning did not elicit from him a rational or valid reason for his errors, save the reference of a busy practice and household problems.
[11] However, were the estimates reasonable? I gathered from his testimony that he was not contesting that he filed the statements and that the information was not quite accurate. In fact, he has made that admission. He, however, is saying that he did not wilfully evade the payment of taxes. Thus, he has presented the proposition and it seems to me that, in a proper case, it is conceivable that one could make inaccurate statements in their tax return but did not intend to evade the payment of taxes in the sense that one did not deliberately set into motion a scheme or a plan with the sole intent to evade the payment of taxes although the net effect is not paying the proper amount of taxes. See: R.v. Hefler, [1980] N.S.J.111 (Co. Ct.), R.v. Klundert, 2004 D.T.C. 6609 (Ont. C.A.)

Digitized by Google

[12] Nonetheless, I agree with the submission of Crown counsel on the submission that it would have been a simple matter for the accused to obtain his bank statements to ascertain his true income in the same way as did the auditors. In the audit, material amounts were found not to be included as income and significant amounts were disallowed as expenses as they were either unreasonable or unsupported.

[13] With respect to his expenses, it was obvious that some could not be considered as legitimate in computing professional income. In particular, for the taxation year 2000, when he was aware that his spouse was not assisting in doing any work for his practice, he claimed he paid her a salary of $32,000.00 but on his T1 he showed that she earned no income and claimed the maximum spousal non refundable credit. The net effect was to lessen his tax liability. Moreover, for the years 1999 and 2000 he filed no expense statements but submitted a global estimate for expenses that upon investigation he could not justify and which resulted in a large portion being disallowed.

[14] Thus, it would appear, and I conclude and find that the accused casually went about the business of reporting his income and expenses. Further, he gave no regard to the correct way of reporting his income and expenses and, as he sought no professional advise on these pertinent issues, he appeared to have interpreted the tax laws to his benefit. Moreover, I find that he, as a reasonable, intelligent, professional person, fully aware of all the facts and information available to him, and in his position, knew or ought to have known that he could have obtained his income particulars from the MSI and from his bank statements.

[15] Moreover, I find that he knew or must have known that he did not pay his spouse the amounts that he indicated that he did and as a result did not incur those expenses. For example, presuming that he could simply deduct the full amount of the spousal credit while at the same time claiming a salary expense that had the effect of diminishing further his tax liability, I find was reckless to the point of being fraudulent. Additionally, I find that there were no mistakes as to the facts that would have been supportable, no honest belief was asserted and, he gave no plausible explanations for the misleading statements.

[16] I therefore think that the accused quandary is due to the manner in how he handled his reporting responsibilities for the subject years. In any event, I find that notwithstanding any sentiments to the contrary, he knew that he was making false statements that with a minimum amount of inquiry could have been rectified. The reasonable inference is that he anticipated and knew that the Canada Revenue Agency would rely upon those statements to assess is tax liability. The Canada Revenue Agency did rely upon these deliberately untrue statements as if they were true and thereby lost potential tax revenues. As a result, I conclude and find that the statements he made on his tax returns for the subject years were false and deceptive.

[17] Even so, the Canada Revenue Agency has determined that he not only made false and deceptive statements in his tax returns for the subject years, which he does not dispute and which I have found, but that he also wilfully evaded the payment of taxes, to which assertion he strongly objects. Therefore, on the facts, did he wilfully evade the payment of taxes?

[18] By allowing some expenses to be deducted I find that the Canada Revenue Agency is acknowledging that the accused was required to pay his own expenses. The issue really was the reasonableness of the expenses which the accused is entitled to contest before another forum. He has testified that he actually incurred expenses that he believed to be reasonable and proper and which were for the purpose of him earning an income. These expenses that could affect his tax liability, I understand, are the basis of objections that he has filed and has yet to be determined. It may yet be determined in his favour.

Digitized by Google

[19] Therefore, I do not think that the Crown, has laid the proper foundation for me to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the taxes are indeed payable and that, criminally, he wilfully avoid payment by showing factors from which I could draw a reasonable inference that there existed, in fact, elements of an artifice, craft or strategy. I find support for this view in the words of Bergeron J., in R v. Redpath Industries Ltd., et al (1984) 84 D.T.C. 6349 (Q.S.C.), at 6351:

A criminal court is not the forum to determine income taxability and to make determinations as to rights to tax assessment or absence of rights of assessment involved. In a tax evasion charge, it must appear prima facie from the evidence that the taxability is clear-cut, obvious, indisputable, unquestionable from lack of reporting, before entering the examination of the other facts of the charge, e.g. whether the undisputable taxability, based on income gained proven and undeclared, leads to a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that it was wilfully omitted by a taxpayer in his tax returns. If such basis is not present and there exists an obligation to enter into the examination of the merit of a possible assessment in respect of a declared income in order to weigh whether a taxpayer is susceptible to taxation or not, may or may not take advantage of claimed exemptions a criminal court usurps its function and appropriates itself of a jurisdiction which it does not possess.

[20] However, in considering the accused manner of operating, particularly his failure to have supporting vouchers for his expenses and inadequate bookkeeping concerning his income, I find him to be negligent but not grossly negligent. Even so, I find him to be genuinely at a loss concerning how to report properly his income and expenses and that he arranged his affairs in a manner so as to attract the least tax liability by what he thought to be lawful means.

[21] Furthermore, even though, as he argued, that this was a case that could have been dealt with by way of reassessment rather than the laying of criminal charges which is undoubtably correct, there is the questionable method of calculation of income and expenses that over the subject period made it understandable why the Canada Revenue Agency would have decided to proceed in the manner as they have. However, this is a case, where in my analysis of the evidence, and on hearing the accused, I have some doubts that malicious intent, or deliberate planning, was present in his overall behaviour. See: R.v. Hefler, [1980] N.S.J. No. 111. (Co.Ct.), R.v. Baker (1973), 16 C.C.C. (2d) 126 at 131 (N.S. Co.Ct.), R.v. Coffen, [1993] O.J. N). 4157 (O.C.J. (Prov.Div.)).

Conclusion

[22] Consequently, I am not satisfied that the Crown has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused wilfully evaded the payment of taxes as alleged. In the result, I find him guilty of the four counts of filing false and deceptive statements as alleged but not guilty of wilfully evading the payment of taxes as alleged.

Honest Mistake as Defence

Digitized by Google

In R. v. Sydel[118] a taxpayer charged attempted to argue that she had availed herself of what she thought was insight to reduce her taxes legally and that she had made an honest mistake in interpreting how the ITA applied to her structuring. The Provincial Court Of British Columbia provided however:

> The Lack of Mens Rea and Mistake of law or Mixed Fact and Law Argument
> [11] These two defences are unique to this case. Of course, every individual Accused person is different and the facts of every case are different. These defences have to be analysed in light of Dr. Sydel's personal background, her actions and her intentions, in order to decide whether the Crown have proven beyond a reasonable doubt, the required Mens Rea and wilful intent required to find her guilty of any or all of the charges against her.
> [12] Defence counsel argued that Dr. Sydel did not "wilfully" make false statements in her T1 filings, nor did she wilfully evade the payment of income tax. Counsel argued that using due diligence, Dr. Sydel engaged in extensive study and then honestly concluded, that if she arranged her business affairs so that income came to her as "a natural person", as opposed to as a "taxpayer" or as "the legal representative of the taxpayer", she would not be obliged to pay income tax under the provisions of the Income Tax Act. Counsel argued that the Accused simply engaged in the lawful activity of income tax avoidance, as opposed to income tax evasion. Counsel argued that when the Accused filed her T1 Reports with Canada Customs and Revenue, she declared that neither the taxpayer nor any legal representative of the taxpayer received income, "to the best of my knowledge" and "without understanding". Counsel argued that was not intentionally deceitful, nor was it the result of "wilful blindness" on her part. Counsel argued that the Accused came to the honest belief that no income was earned by the taxpayer or their legal representative after she had structured her affairs based upon her studies and a variety of reasonable sources of information. She studied, she questioned and thought long and hard about the subjects of income tax, natural persons, taxpayers, historical legislation, and comparative legislation and the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the laws of Canada.
> [13] Counsel argued that if the Accused were mistaken, it was an honest mistake of law or mixed fact and law, based upon reasonable inquiries that she had made in order to ascertain what exactly were her legal obligations to pay or not to pay income taxes.
> [14] The Crown argued that even if she honestly believed what she did (and the Crown did not concede this), she was "wilfully blind". The Crown argued that she started out to find a way to evade paying taxes and purposefully shut her eyes to all the obvious clues indicating that the theory she was studying was a sham – an illogical and misinformed method of evading the payment of income taxes. The Crown argued that filing T1 Reports, stating that no taxes were payable by the Accused as "a natural person" or as "the taxpayer" or "the legal representative of the taxpayer", were deliberate false and deceptive statements that she made for the sole purpose of tax evasion. Between the years 1998 to 2002, the Accused earned close to three quarters of a million dollars and paid no income tax. The case of Kennedy v. CCRA [2000] OJ No. 3313, stands for the proposition that the required element of the Accused's "knowledge" that income tax was payable, can be shown by proof that the Accused was "wilfully blind".
> [15] The cases of R. v. Klundert (2004) 187 CCC (3rd) 417 (Ont. CA; leave to appeal to the SCC refused, [2004] SSCA No. 463) and R. v. Kennedy (supra) stand for these statements of the law:
> "1. a person's mistaken belief that a statute is invalid or is otherwise not applicable to their conduct, is a mistake of law;
> their mistake of law is irrelevant to the fault requirement required by s. 239(1)(d) of the

[118] 2006 BCPC 0346

Digitized by Google

Income Tax Act; a mistake of law cannot provide a free standing excuse for the commission of a crime (also see:
R. v. Jones (1991) 66 CCC (3rd) 512 (SCC); R. v. Watson (1999) 137 CCC (3rd) 422 (Nfld. CA); and a mistake of law, however in very limited circumstances, can provide a defence to tax evasion. That very limited circumstance is set out by Doherty, J.A.A in R. v. Klundert (supra) at page 11:
[54] As the above cases demonstrate, ignorance, or mistake of law can negate the requisite culpable state of mind. Nothing said above should, however, be taken as suggesting that ignorance, or mistake of law will routinely negative the fault element in criminal offences. Most crimes do not require knowledge of the illegality, or certainly the criminality, of the conduct in issue to establish the requisite fault: see R. v. Molis, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 355; R. v. Théroux (1993), 79 C.C.C. (3d) 449 at 459 (S.C.C.). The extent to which any mistake, including a legal mistake, can negate the fault requirement turns on an interpretation of the language of the statute in the legislative context in which it is used.
[55] Section 239(1)(d) is part of an Act which is necessarily and notoriously complex. It is subject to ongoing revision. No lay person is expected to know all the complexities of the tax laws. It is accepted that people will act on the advice of professionals in the Act that are open to various interpretations. Furthermore, it is accepted that one may legitimately structure one's affairs so as to minimize tax liability. Considered in this legislative context, I have no difficulty in holding that a mistake or ignorance as to one's liability to pay tax under the Act may negate the fault requirement in the provision, regardless of whether it is a factual mistake, a legal mistake, or a combination of both.
[56] Crown counsel accepts that an error in law may lead to a reasonable doubt as to whether an individual wilfully evaded tax. That concession is consistent with authority from this court, R. v. Sihler (1976), 31 C.C.C. (2d) 73 at 79 (Ont. C.A.), and authority from other jurisdictions: see Donnelly v. Commissioner of Inland Revenue, [1960] N.Z.L.R. 469 at 472 (S.C.); Hefler, supra.
[57] A strong line of American authority is also consistent with the concession made by the Crown. That authority defines "wilfully" in the provision creating the crime of tax evasion as meaning: "a voluntary intentional violation of a known legal duty". U.S. v. Bishop, 93 S. Ct. 2008 at 2017 (1973); U.S. v. Pomponio, 97 S. Ct. 22 at 23 (1976); U.S. v. Cheek, 111 S. Ct. 604 at 610- 611 (1991). In Cheek, White J., at pp. 610-611, described the relevance of legal error to the required mental state in this way:
But carrying this burden requires negating the defendant's claim of ignorance of the law or a claim that because of a misunderstanding of the law he had a good faith belief that he was not violating any of the provisions of the tax laws. This is so because one cannot be aware that the law imposes a duty upon him and yet be ignorant of it, misunderstand the law, or believe that the duty does not exist. In the end, the issue is whether based on all the evidence, the Government has provided that the defendant was aware of the duty at issue, which cannot be true if the jury credits a good-faith misunderstanding and belief submission, whether or not the claimed belief or misunderstanding is objectively reasonable [emphasis added]."
[16] In the R. v. Jones and Pamajewon [1991] 3 S.C.R. 110 case, the appellants argued that they should not be convicted because they believed that the laws in relation to conducting gaming operations did not apply to casinos. The Supreme Court of Canada stated: "The Appellants mistaken belief that the Code did not apply to them is no answer to the charges".
[17] The defence raised in the R. v. Ricci, Oct 14, 2004 (Ont. CA) case, was similar to Dr. Sydel's defence in the case at bar. The Ontario Court of Appeal, in dismissing the defence, stated at pages 1 and 2:

Digitized by Google

"The facts in relation to the second issue, whether the appellant lacked the necessary mens rea for the offence of tax evasion, can be briefly stated. The appellant was a sales representative. Between the years 1995 and 1998 he had income tax deducted at source and filed a tax return with respect to commission income in Canada. He did not report income he received from certain commissions in the United States during this period. He also did not file a tax return for the years 1999 and 2000 when he operated as a self-employed person. When the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) informed the appellant that he was under criminal investigation, he wrote the a letter saying that he was not a person included in the Income Tax Act but a "natural person of commoner status" and not subject to payment of income tax. The appellant did not testify at trial.

The appellant submits that he did not attempt to evade income tax. He was open and forthright in what he was doing. He submits he held an honest belief that he was not a person subject to the Income Tax Act. Even if the appellant was mistaken, it was his honestly held belief that he was not a "person" under the Act and therefore could not have had the mens rea required for the offence.

The trial judge concluded that the appellant intentionally disregarded his obligations under the Act thereby finding that the requisite mens rea for the offence had been made out. In our opinion it was open to him to do so. R. v. Klundert made it clear that a person is not exempt from paying taxes based on his political, religious, philosophical or moral beliefs. Doherty J.A., on behalf of the court, stated at para. 59: A person's mistaken belief that a statute is invalid or is otherwise not applicable to that person's conduct is a mistake of law. It is, however, a mistake of law that is irrelevant to the existence of the fault requirement in s. 229(1)(d). Nor can that kind of mistake of law provide a freestanding excuse for the commission of a crime: Criminal Code, s. 19; R. v. Jones (1991), 66 C.C.C. (3d) 512 at 516-517 (S.C.C.); R. v. Watson (1999), 137 C.C.C. (3d) 422 at 431-33 (Nfld. C.A.).

We would dismiss this ground of appeal."

[18] It is my finding, that the Accused's mistake was the direct result of her own wilful blindness. The Accused's mistake was not a result of the "notoriously complex" nature of the Income Tax Act, but rather, from a very basic mistaken belief about one of the most basic, straightforward and uncomplicated features of the Income Tax Act – that human beings are "persons" and persons who earn income, have to pay income taxes. I also find that the Accused did not use the procedures which were available to her under the Income Tax Act, to test and determine the validity of her beliefs. Procedures for appealing her Tax Assessments were available to her to use. Instead of using these procedures, she decided to simply refuse to pay the taxes, be criminally charged and then raise the defence of mistake of law or mistake of mixed fact and law at her criminal trial. She deliberately chose her route.

[19] In my view, Dr. Sydel was clearly "wilfully blind" and the defences of lack of Mens Rea, lack of wilful intent and mistake of law or mixed fact and law, cannot succeed. The Accused must be convicted of all nine charges.

[20] These are the reasons that lead me to the conclusion that the Crown had proved beyond a reasonable doubt, that Dr. Sydel was wilfully blind:

Dr. Sydel is an intelligent and well educated 39 year old woman. As early as junior high school, she excelled and received an International Baccalaureate standing (Edmonton, Alberta). She went on to obtain a Bachelor of Arts degree at the University of Alberta. Following her B.A. she enrolled in the School of Dentistry at the University of Alberta. She graduated with a DDS degree in 1991.

Dr. Sydel is not a naïve or unworldly person. She was brought up in Austria, Germany and Canada. She has travelled throughout two continents over the years. As an adult, she resided in both Germany and Canada. She speaks several languages. As a child, family conversations and discussions frequently revolved around world politics, the discussions being led by her father, who was also an educated professional person (a Master Electrician).

Digitized by Google

Dr. Sydel had years of experience operating as an independent business woman. After becoming a dentist in 1991, she worked almost continuously, as an independent contractor for seven different dentists. Her arrangements in each of those dental offices, was as an independent contractor who would be paid a percentage of the fees she billed and collected for the dental work she did. The idea to be an independent contractor as opposed to an employee, originally came from discussions with her father and a chartered accountant friend with whom she had consulted early in her career. Being an independent contractor of course means running your own business. In her case, Dr. Sydel's business was a high volume dental practice, she was responsible for paying her own insurance fees, buying her own expensive dental equipment, paying for her own dental supplies, submitting and checking invoices, and managing everything else typically involved in running one's own business.

Dr. Sydel had experience in corporate and tax matters above and beyond her dental businesses. During the early 90's when she was married to her first structure their personal tax affairs. A tax accountant assisted them with this "off shore" method of tax planning. When she worked in Germany or in Canada, at least during 1991 to 1997, she had consultations with at least three different accountants, seeking advice as to how best to structure her business and financial affairs. Between 1991 to 1997, she also consulted with at least two different lawyers, one with respect to the off-shore company and one with respect to her Petition for Bankruptcy in British Columbia in 1997. There was no evidence one way or the other, whether she had consulted with yet another lawyer in connection with her divorce.

Dr. Sydel testified that she first became aware of the concepts of "natural persons", "artificial persons", "corporate soles" and "taxpayers", when she read an article in a naturalist magazine called "Shared Visions". By coincidence, the author came into her office as a patient a short while later. She spoke with him about his concepts and theories and then began attending a variety of seminars on the topic of not having to pay income tax. She attended approximately five to seven full day seminars, at a cost of $20.00 per seminar. She testified that she was intrigued by the author and the seminar leaders' philosophy as to why governments did not have the right to interfere with a person's privacy, human rights or their basic freedoms. Two matters struck me: (1) the only human "right" that either Dr. Sydel or her lecturers were concerned about, was the right not to pay income taxes. Neither Dr. Sydel nor any of the lecturers seemed at all concerned with the other types of rights listed as inalienable rights in our Chart of Rights legislation – the right to freedom of religion, expression, press, peaceful assembly, association, just to name a few; and (2) Dr. Sydel's sudden interest in tax matters arises, by coincidence, just one year after her Petition for Bankruptcy, which involved writing off a considerable past indebtedness to Revenue Canada ($25,000).

Dr. Sydel testified that between 1998 and 2003, she did not consult tax lawyers or tax accountants for four reasons: (1) she viewed them all as part of the (tax) establishment who had vested interests in maintaining the status quo interpretations of income tax laws and would therefore be disinclined to think "outside of the box", so to speak; (2) in the past, on one occasion she had received what she believed to be incorrect tax advice from an accountant and also, previously two accountants had given her conflicting advice; (3) the lecturers at the seminars struck her as extremely knowledgeable, well researched and credible; and (4) in 1996 and 1997, when she began practicing dentistry with Dr. Peter Brawn, she came to realize that her dental college professors either withheld or were ignorant of "alternative" and more natural ways to do dental work. This led her to distrust all professionals. Her reasons are not believable when one considers her testimony that she was intrigued, curious and really wanted to truly understand both the logic and validity of the lecturer's opinions and that is what kept her going to the seminars. The reasons she gave for refusing to seek out professional opinions from tax accountants or tax lawyers, who are the only people allowed by Canadian law, to provide tax advise, are spurious. To avoid consultation and hearing opinions from such professionals would be akin to a dentist refusing to seek instruction from qualified dentists and insisting on taking classes and instructions, only from lay persons. I should point out that on three separate occasions in her testimony, she did comment that she had put some weight on what she believed to be tax law opinions from both Dr. Elmajian's lawyer and his accountant. She and Dr. Elmajian testified that Dr. Elmajian's lawyer apparently had said that the written contract for services between Dr. Sydel as a "natural person" and Dr. Elmajian, appeared "different but was okay to sign". She regarded this as a seal of legal approval for the concept of "a natural person" and the content of her contract. She also asked Dr. Elmajian's accountant during a short meeting with him, Dr. Elmajian and others (concerning disclosure of privileged information to CCRA) if he knew much about structuring one's affairs as "a natural person" so as to avoid paying taxes. He responded with words to the effect, if you find out a way not to pay taxes, let me know! Dr. Sydel also told the Court that one time, she casually and in passing, did ask a chartered accountant attending one of the seminars, what he thought about the whole thing. He apparently told her that the ideas seemed intriguing and that he didn't think it was illegal. These three incidents simply represent small opportunities to seek tax opinions and or advice, from tax professionals, albeit not independent ones, but on those occasions, she only dared ask casual one line questions and avoided making any in depth inquiries of these accredited tax professionals.

Digitized by Google

At the tax seminars most of the lecturers used aliases, as opposed to their real names. Dr. Sydel said that anyone was free to use whatever name they chose. She testified that the reason given by the lecturers for using aliases was to protect their privacy. She did not regard this as suspicious or unusual, even though one of the lecturers went by the alias, "Sir Larry Loophole". How could an intelligent, well educated, worldly, 39 year old professional, not be suspicious?

At the beginning of each of the five lectures presented by Mr. Porisky, the following caution was given: "In no way should this be construed as either legal or financial advice. You should consult a competent expert". Mr. Porisky frankly told the attendees at his lectures that "I am in the building trade. I am not a lawyer. I can't give legal advice. I am not an accountant. I can't give accounting or financial advice. I am just a guy banging nails". He also said, 'I strongly recommend you consult a competent expert on this subject matter". Dr. Sydel chose to ignore Mr. Porisky's advice, even though it was loud and clear. She decided not to seek out a professionally trained tax lawyer or tax accountant. She chose to remain wilfully blind.

Dr. Sydel knew that each and every lecturer was not a tax lawyer or tax accountant. Every lecturer was "up front" about their lack of accreditation. Nonetheless, they talked about the law, the statutes, the interpretation of the law and the statues, they discussed court cases and reported court judgments. Dr. Sydel accepted their views as "experts" who were imparting accurate information and opinions as to what the Canadian law was. She said that she could not recall if she questioned any of the lecturers during the seminars, she said that she did not research any court cases they referred to, she did not go "on line" or to the law library. She was told that there were decided and reported legal cases throughout Canada relating to the issues under discussion. To not have read any of these cases for herself, or even so much as to ask the lecturers for copies of the cases they said were directly on point, is evidence of her wilful blindness.

Digitized by Google

At the early lectures by Detax and Untax, Dr. Sydel was asked why, if the Lt. Governor of British Columbia, The Queen and the Bishop of Victoria, had all established themselves as "corporation soles" and thereby avoided the payment of taxes, why wouldn't any other resident of Canada be able to do so, also? She accepted this rhetorical question and answer and placed an advertisement in the Westender newspaper, announcing that she now was a "corporate sole". How could an intelligent, educated person not seriously question this rhetorical question? The answer is: she was being deliberately blind. Later on, after attending the Porisky lectures, she realized that this hypothesis had no legitimate basis. However, this realization still failed to motivate her to obtain some tax advice from traditional, accredited and qualified tax specialists. Instead, she continued only to attend more seminars given by Mr. Porisky, who you recall, had clearly cautioned her and the others to seek qualified tax advice, before relying or acting on what he was saying.
Dr. Sydel asked her father to attend one of the tax lectures with her. He walked out in the middle of the lecture. She testified that she didn't ask him why. She did say though, that her father and her sister became "estranged" as a result of disagreements over her views regarding taxation. Dr. Elmajian testified that he had told Dr. Sydel on one occasion that he thought that "she was being brainwashed by a bunch of losers who don't work". These were two or three key people in her life and yet, their contrary views still did not cause her to seek some independent tax advice. As far back as January of 2000, Mr. Morrison of the CCRA, told Dr. Sydel, that if she refused to file tax returns she would be prosecuted. I see each of these instances, as examples of Dr. Sydel's wilful blindness. She chose to ignore each of these people when they gave her direct or implied warnings. In addition, Mr. Miller, an Assistant Commissioner for Revenue Canada, wrote to Dr. Sydel in December 1999, telling her that she was receiving incorrect and misleading advice as to the validity of the "natural person argument". She ignored his letter. She didn't take it to a tax professional, nor did she take it to her father or her sister, who were not yet estranged from her. She basically chose to ignore the caution from a person whom she knew to be in a high level position at the CCRA.
In addition, some specific troublesome contradictions arose during Dr. Sydel's testimony. They were as follows:
she testified that each year she wrote approximately $120,000 in cheques to her husband because she was too busy to go to the bank during the work day and because she didn't think that one was able to write a cheque with the payee being "CASH". The Crown then produced four cheques which she had written to "CASH" as the payee. The cheques were for $6,013.80, $7,762.50, $15,000 and $3,000. It was also brought out that the Canada Trust / TD Bank just down the street from her practice, was usually open until 8:00 p.m. week days; (2) when she filed her Notice of Objections, she never mentioned anything at all about being a "natural person" or that she was "the legal representative of the taxpayer / artificial person", yet that is what she testified was always behind her actions in the year 1998 to 2003; (3) she testified that she preferred to use a post office box number for receiving mail, rather than her office or home. She said that decision was made purely for the convenience of having all her mail delivered to one place. The logic as to why a post office box down the street would be more convenient than having mail delivered either to her home or office only, escapes me; (4) she testified that she did not pursue her case in the Tax Court, to challenge CCRA's views, because she did not want to waste the court's valuable time. She rejected the Crown's suggestion that perhaps her decision to avoid the courts, was because she didn't want to allow a court to specifically have the opportunity to say that her beliefs were incorrect and ill founded; (5) Dr. Sydel was taken through some definitions in several statutes, some of which had been mentioned at the seminars. For example, she was asked about the definition of "person" in section 2 of the Criminal Code which outlines who can be convicted of crimes and section 229 of the Criminal Code (the murder section) which uses the word, "includes". "Includes" was a word that her lecturers said was important to their theory as to why "natural persons" were not subject to the Income Tax Act. The absurdity of the lecturer's analysis of the word "includes", became obvious. Similar demonstrations were presented to Dr. Sydel with respect to the definition of "animal" in the Health of Animals Act. The definition of "animal" was that it "includes an embryo and a fertilized egg or ovum". The definition of "animal", did not specifically mention dogs, cats, pigs, etc. Once again, the interpretation of the word "includes", as opined by the lecturers, became absurd; (6) Dr. Sydel insisted that her original purpose for attending the seminars, was not to avoid or evade paying taxes, but rather, to be educated, expand her mind and learn more about her human rights. The "human rights" which were discussed however, rarely ventured into any area beyond the human right not to have to pay taxes. She said, that not having to pay income taxes was a "side effect" of her quest for knowledge, as opposed to being the goal of the quest; (7) Dr. Sydel testified that she and her husband spent all the money that she earned as a dentist. She said that "they lead a very expensive lifestyle". She kept nothing in reserve, as if there could not even be a remote chance, that she might be wrong in her tax beliefs and would eventually have to pay taxes. This clearly was more evidence of her being wilfully blind.

Digitized by Google

[21] In conclusion, I find that Dr. Sydel was wilfully blind. The finding of wilful blindness precludes a successful argument that the Crown failed to prove the required Mens Rea. It also defeats the argument that she did not wilfully commit the nine offences charged in the Information.

[22] When she made the false and deceptive statements in her T1 Forms (the subject of counts 1 to 4), they were made due to her choice to be wilfully blind. Her addition of the words, "to be best of my knowledge" and "without understanding" actually adds to the evidence of her being wilfully blind. She need not have remained "without understanding". She need not have left herself in the position of having to qualify her state of knowledge about the tax issues, as being "to the best of my knowledge". She could have and she should have, chosen to clear up any concerns or misunderstandings that she had, by seeking independent professional tax accounting and / or legal advice. For Dr. Sydel to say that it was up to CCRA to provide her with detailed written arguments as to how they justified taxing people, is a totally unreasonable position for her to have taken. Had she not been operating from a position of wilful blindness, she would have sought her own independent advise or utilized the methods of dispute and appeals available within the tax department and thereafter in the Tax Courts. The Income Tax Act outlines the legal procedures to be taken by people who disagree with the CCRA Assessments. Dr. Sydel, it appears, never even looked at the Income Tax Act to see if there were appeal procedures and she never inquired of anyone (professional or not), as to whether such procedures existed as part of a person's rights under Canadian law. She chose instead to be willfully blind and must be found guilty on Counts 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Information.[119]

Natural Person and "Right to Enjoy Property" as Defence

In ancient ITAs there was an exemption granted to natural persons that allowed them to be exempt from tax on their income. It was legislated out of existence years ago. The case of R. v.

[119] See also R. v. Thompson, 2008 BCPC 0022, for another less commented on argument of honest mistake, again, all in one direction, that didn't prevent conviction.

Digitized by Google

Douglas Preston Amell, Heidi Lynne Keyzer and Robert Lawrence Amell[120] it was held:

The Natural Persons Defence

[152] At the outset of the trial, each of the Defendants claimed to be a "natural persons" and claimed the rights of natural persons. In argument, Mr. Amell asserted that the income of natural persons was not caught by the Income Tax Act, and that natural persons were not taxable. I gather that this argument is based upon some interpretation of provisions of a prior income tax act. However, I need not go further into the history of these provisions or further elaborate upon the argument. If there ever was a natural persons exemption from income tax, that exemption has long since been abolished by Parliament, and any such exemption is now dead. The following cases all stand for the proposition that there is no natural persons exemption.

[153] Because there are so many of these decisions, I did not know what order to put them in. I have arranged them in chronological order:

Kennedy v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), [2000] O.J. No 3313 (Ont. S.C.)
R. v. Dick, 2003 BCPC 13
~~R. v. Sargent, [2004] O.J. No~~. 5389 (Ont. Court of Justice)
R. v. Nagora, [2004] O.J. No. 6039 (Ont. Court of Justice)
R. v. Sydell, 2006 BCPC 346
R. v. Turnnir, 2006 BCPC 460
M.N.R. v. Camplin, 2007 DTC 5165
Hovey Ventures Inc. v. Canada, 2007 DTC 617
R. v. Lindsay, 2008 BCPC 203
R. v. Loosdrecht, 2008 BCPC 400
Canada (M.N.R.) v. Stanchfield, 2009 FC 72 and 2009 FC 99
Kion v. Canada, 2009 DTC 1304

[154] In addition there is a trio of decisions in the case R. v. Gavin Lemieux and Lemieux Trenching Ltd., 2007 SKPC 135; affirmed on appeal at Estevan QB 36/07; further affirmed on appeal at C.A. No. 1573 on November 6, 2007.

[155] In addition, there is a trio of decisions in the case of R. v. Klundert, cited as follows: 1) R. v. Klundert, [2004] O.J. No. 3515 (CA)
2) R. v. Klundert, [2008] O.J. No. 4522 (CA) affirmed at [2008] S.C.C.A. No. 522

The Canadian Bill of Rights

[156] Mr. Amell argues that the Canadian Bill of Rights guarantees him the right to enjoyment of property. Further, that the Income Tax Act cannot contravene the Bill of Rights. Further, that the Income Tax Act deprives him of his right to property contrary to the Bill of Rights.

[157] The simple answer to this argument is contained by reading the entire provision contained in the Bill of Rights. That provision reads as follows:

It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and continue to exist...the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof, except by due process of law...

The Income Tax Act is valid federal legislation, passed by the Canadian Parliament. That legislation establishes what is to be taxed, the rate of taxation, the process for collection, and processes for appeals. In short, it establishes an entire legal process for the assessment and collection of taxes. The result is that to the extent that taxation deprives an individual of his property, the individual is so deprived by due process of law. This legislation does not breach or infringe upon the Canadian Bill of Rights, and this defence must fail.[121]

---

[120] 2010 SKPC 107

[121] On the issue of whether the Federal Government has the authority to collect an income tax you merely has to examine Sandra June Gibbs v. Regina, 2006 BCSC 481, where it was provided:
Did the trial judge err in finding the Act intra vires the federal government?

Digitized by Google

R. v. Porisky & Gould, 2012 BCSC 67 (CanLII), Another Person Trying to Argue the Natural Person Argument – It's Amazing in Canada What Some will Try and Develop Argument Not to Pay Tax

Related decisions Court of Appeal
R. v. Gingras, 2012 BCCA 522 (CanLII) - 2012-12-17
R. v. Gingras, 2012 BCCA 467 (CanLII) - 2012-11-20
R. v. Porisky, 2012 BCCA 371 (CanLII) - 2012-09-19
R. v. Gingras, 2012 BCCA 370 (CanLII) - 2012-09-05
R. v. Porisky, 2012 BCCA 309 (CanLII) - 2012-07-12
R. v. Gould, 2012 BCCA 308 (CanLII) - 2012-07-12
Supreme Court of British Columbia
R. v. Porisky, 2012 BCSC 771 (CanLII) - 2012-05-10
R. v. Porisky, 2012 BCSC 68 (CanLII) - 2012-01-18
R. v. Gingras, 2012 BCSC 230 (CanLII) - 2012-01-09
Thomas v. British Columbia, 1999 CanLII 5274 (BC SC) - 1999-11-12
Wageman, Bailey v. Cardinal Management Ltd., 1997 CanLII 4413 (BC SC) - 1997-12-17
Legislation cited (available on CanLII)
Constitution Act, 1982, The, Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 Criminal Code, RSC 1985, c C-46 — 21(1);368(1);380;380(1);464
Excise Tax Act, RSC 1985, c E-15 — 327(1);332(3)
Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp) — 3;231.2;239;239(1);244(3)
Decisions cited
Lewis v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 19 (SCC)
R. v. Alexander Street Lofts Development Corporation Inc., 2007 ONCA 309 (CanLII)
R. v. Amell, 2010 SKPC 107 (CanLII)
R. v. Cancor Sorftware Corp.,
R. v. Cormier, 1986 CanLII 1178 (BC CA)
R. v. De Wolf, 1982 CanLII 347 (BC CA)
R. v. Gonzague,
R. v. Hamilton, 2005 SCC 47 (CanLII)

---

[31] The appellant submits that the Act is ultra vires the federal government, and that income tax in Canada is a provincial matter. She submits that income tax is only a matter under federal jurisdiction when it is the subject of a special tax or levy pursuant to the War Measures Act.

[32] The legislative authority to levy income tax is conferred on the federal government by s. 91(3) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This section confers jurisdiction on the federal government to enact laws relating to the "raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation".

[33] The authority of the federal government to levy income tax has been clearly established by our courts. This issue was considered by the Court of Appeal in Bruno v. Canada Customs and Revenue (2002), 162 B.C.A.C. 293, 2002 BCCA 47 at para. 14:

The argument now advanced on behalf of Mr. Bruno is substantially the same argument as was rejected by the Privy Council in the Caron decision. At p. 108 of that decision (D.L.R.), Lord Phillimore said as follows:

Upon my view there is nothing in s.92 to take away the power to impose any taxation for Dominion purposes which is prima facie given by s.91(3). It is therefore not ultra vires on the part of The Parliament of Canada to impose a Dominion Income Tax for Dominion purposes; and the first point must therefore be decided against the appellant.

Mr. Bruno is not the only litigant to attempt to argue against the Caron decision. Of course, that decision is binding on this Court until such time as the issue might be revisited by the Supreme Court of Canada with a differing result. Therefore, I find it unnecessary to refer to the several cases that followed and applied the Caron decision.

This court is similarly bound by this authority.

Digitized by Google

R. v. Jeffers, 2012 ONCA 1 (CanLII)
R. v. Kelly, 2004 ONCJ 320 (CanLII)
R. v. Kennedy, 2004 BCCA 638 (CanLII)
R. v. Klundert, 2004 CanLII 21268 (ON CA)
R. v. Klundert, 2008 ONCA 767 (CanLII)
R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2 (CanLII)
R. v. Sydel, 2006 BCPC 346 (CanLII)
R. v. Thatcher, 1987 CanLII 53 (SCC)
R. v. Théroux, 1993 CanLII 134 (SCC)
R. v. Turnnir, 2006 BCPC 460 (CanLII)
United States of America v. Dynar, 1997 CanLII 359 (SCC)

Editor's Note: Corrigendum released on January 25, 2012. Original judgment has been corrected with text of corrigendum appended.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Citation: R. v. Porisky & Gould, 2012 BCSC 67

Date: 2012 01 18

Docket: 25339-8 Registry: Vancouver Regina

v.

Russell Anthony Porisky Elaine Gould

Before: The Honourable Mr. Justice Myers

Corrected Judgment: The judgment was corrected at paragraph 80 on January 25, 2012

Reasons for Judgment

Table of Contents Paragraph Range

THE CHARGES [1] - [8]

COUNT 1 – TAX EVASION BY MR. PORISKY RE: HIS OWN INCOME [9] - [72]
Legal principles regarding tax evasion [11] - [18]
Jurisdiction [19] - [19]
Identification [20] - [21]
Actus reus [22] - [69]
The Crown's Evidence [22] - [36]
Mr. Porisky's Evidence [37] - [41]
Mr. Porisky's Argument [42] - [56]
Analysis – Did Mr. Porisky commit the act of tax evasion? [57] - [69]
E. Intent [70] - [72]
COUNT 2 – TAX EVASION BY MS. GOULD RE: HER OWN INCOME [73] - [76]
COUNTS 1 AND 2 – TAX EVASION BY MS. GOULD AND MR. PORISKY THROUGH AIDING AND ABETTING
COUNT 3 – EVASION OF GOODS AND SERVICES TAX BY MR. PORISKY AND MS. GOULD[77] - [79]

[80] - [82]
COUNT 4 – COUNSELLING BY MR. PORISKY [83] - [125]
Is income tax evasion fraud? [86] - [91]
The conduct and mental elements of counselling [92] - [95]
Actus reus - did Mr. Porisky counsel income tax evasion and therefore fraud? [96] - [115]
Mr. Porisky's Evidence [99] - [109]

Digitized by Google

The Canadian Illusion books and DVDs [110] - [111]
Analysis re: the conduct of counselling [112] - [115]
D. Intent [116] - [124]
E. Conclusion on counselling [125] - [125]
SUMMARY [126] - [130]
APPENDIX
QUOTES FROM THE CANADIAN ILLUSION BOOKS AND DVDS
Part 1 – It's All About You
Part 2 – The Illusion
Part 3 – The Tax Game -
Part 4 – Your Right to Contact -
Part 5 – Freedom-Free-For-All -
The Canadian Illusion DVDs – PowerPoint Slides -

The charges

[1] The Crown alleges that Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould conducted business under the name The Paradigm Education Group, which gave seminars and sold materials urging others to structure their affairs as a "natural person, working in his own capacity, under a private contract, for his own benefit". Paradigm taught that money earned under this arrangement was exempt from income tax.

[2] Between December 31, 2003 and December 4, 2008, the business is alleged to have earned a net income of $1,127,185 in respect of which no income tax was paid by either of the accused. Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould each stand charged with evading both their own income taxes and those of the other, contrary to
s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (5thSupp.). The income tax evasion counts read as follows:

Count 1

Russell Porisky and Elaine Gould, being of the City of Chilliwack, Province of British Columbia, between December 31, 2003 and December 4, 2008, did wilfully evade or attempt to evade the payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act, by failing to report taxable income of Russell Porisky in the amount of $555,782.00, and did thereby evade the payment of $112,611.00 in income tax, contrary to section 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act.

Count 2

Russell Porisky and Elaine Gould, being of the City of Chilliwack, Province of British Columbia, between December 31, 2003 and December 4, 2008, did wilfully evade or attempt to evade the payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act, by failing to report taxable income of Elaine Gould in the amount of $555,782.00, and did thereby evade the payment of $112,611.00 in income tax, contrary to section 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act.

[3] Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould have lived together since March 1998.

[4] The charges apportion the income of Paradigm equally between Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould. In particulars, the Crown further explained these counts as follows:

In Count 1, Porisky is charged as a principal (the taxes evaded were on his income). Gould is charged as a party to that offence, both by not filing her own tax returns (which would alert the Canada Revenue Agency to the existence of Porisky's income) and by other means.

Digitized by Google

Similarly, in Count 1 (sic), Gould is charged as a principal (the taxes evaded were on her income) and Porisky is charged as a party to that offence, both by not filing his own tax returns and by other means.
Although the second paragraph refers to Count 1, I take it to actually refer to Count 2.
[5] Ms. Gould and Mr. Porisky are also charged under s. 327(1)(c) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E- 15, for failing to collect and remit Goods and Services Tax on sales for the same period. The amount of GST that the Crown says should have been remitted is $66,133.45.
[6] Finally, Mr. Porisky (alone) is charged under s. 464(a) of the Criminal Code with counselling others to commit fraud by evading the payment of income tax. The period encompassed in the charge is between December 31, 2000 and December 4, 2008.
[7] The charges were laid in December 2009 after a search of the accuseds' residence on December 3, 2008. Up until June 2, 2011 Mr. Porisky was represented sequentially by two counsel, with a short gap between them. Ms. Gould was represented by counsel up until October 12, 2011. Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould represented themselves at the trial.
[8] Mr. Porisky testified on his own behalf. He acknowledged that Paradigm was his alter-ego (his "representative", to use his own word), so that is not in issue. Ms. Gould did not testify or call any other evidence.

Count 1 – Tax evasion by Mr. Porisky re: His Own Income [9] Section 239.(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act states:
239.(1) Every person who has…
wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act…
is guilty of an offence…
With respect to the GST count, s. 327(1)(c) of the Excise Tax Act is similarly worded:
Every person who has
(c) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Part or payment or remittance of tax or net tax imposed under this Part,
is guilty of an offence…
[10] The Crown acknowledges that these offences are true criminal offences and that it is required to prove all the elements of the offences beyond a reasonable doubt. For both income tax and GST evasion, the elements are jurisdiction, identification, the requisite conduct (actus reus) and the requisite mental element or intent (mens rea).

Legal principles regarding tax evasion
[11] I start by setting out some of the relevant legal principles with respect to the charge of tax evasion.
[12] Although the exact amount of tax evaded is relevant to sentencing, the courts have noted that it is not an essential element of the offence: see R. v. Alexander Street Lofts Development Corporation Inc., 2007 ONCA 309 (CanLII), 2007 ONCA 309; R. v. Cormier 1986 CanLII 1178 (BC CA), (1986), 29 C.C.C. (3d)
481(B.C.C.A.); and R. v. Kelly, 2004 ONCJ 320 (CanLII), 2004 ONCJ 320.
[13] The conduct which the Crown is required to prove is:
… that the accused voluntarily performed an act or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid payment of tax owing under the [Income Tax] Act.
R. v. Klundert 2004 CanLII 21268 (ON CA), (2004), 187 C.C.C. (3d) 417, 242 D.L.R. (4th) 644 (Ont. C.A.) at

Digitized by Google

654 (“Klundert #1”).
[14] Turning to intent, the Ontario Court of Appeal in Klundert #1 stated, at para. 46:
Although I would avoid the use of the phrase "ulterior motive", I agree with Bayda J.A. that the word "wilfully" in s. 239(1)(d) signals that culpability will follow only where the accused engages in conduct intended to avoid the payment of tax owing under the Act. More precisely, I think the fault component in s. 239(1)(d) is twofold. First, the accused must know that tax is owing under the Act and second, the accused must intend to avoid or intend to attempt to avoid payment of that tax. An accused intends to avoid, or intends to attempt to avoid, payment of taxes owing under the Act where that is his purpose, or where he knows that his course of conduct is virtually certain to result in the avoiding of tax owing under the Act: see Buzzanga, supra, at 383-385.
In the following paragraph the Court of Appeal set out a jury charge for both the actus reus and mens rea:
In most cases of tax evasion, the trial judge will adequately describe the elements of the offence by instructing the jury that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused:
did something or engaged in a course of conduct that avoided or attempted to avoid the payment of tax imposed by the Act;
knew there was tax imposed by the Act; and
engaged in the conduct for the purpose of avoiding or attempting to avoid payment of tax imposed by the Act or knowing that avoiding payment of tax imposed by the Act was a virtual certain consequence of his actions.
[15] The Court of Appeal in Klundert #1 held that an incorrect belief that the Income Tax Act was constitutionally invalid does not negate intent.
[16] The British Columbia Court of Appeal applied Klundert #1 in R. v. Kennedy, 2004 BCCA 638 (CanLII), 2004 BCCA 638. At para. 14 of Kennedy, Hall J.A. stated:
The Provincial Court judge found that although the appellant had received advice from his accountants that he owed tax, the appellant still decided to file nil returns because of his belief that the Income Tax Act was constitutionally invalid. The Provincial Court judge found that the appellant intentionally stated in his 1996 and 1997 personal income tax returns that he had nil income knowing that he did in fact have income in each of those years. In my opinion, Klinger P.C.J. correctly held that the appellant was required to disclose that income tax in his return regardless of any belief he may have had as to the constitutional right of the federal government to levy or collect income taxes. Having reached this conclusion about the appellant's duty to report income, it seems to me that the trial judge was bound to find the appellant guilty on count 3 in the Information. No additional mental element was required: R. v. Paveley (1976), 30 C.C.C. (2d) 483, 70 D.L.R. (3d) 237 (Sask. C.A.); R. v. de Wolf 1982 CanLII 347 (BC CA), (1982), 67 C.C.C. (2d) 43, 84 D.T.C. 6033
(B.C.C.A.). I consider that the trial judge fell into error by requiring the Crown to prove some additional element against the appellant.
[17] Mr. Klundert came back before the Ontario Court of Appeal after a second trial: 2008 ONCA 767 (CanLII), 2008 ONCA 767 (“Klundert #2”). At his second trial, Mr. Klundert argued that he did not have the requisite mens rea because he believed that the Act did not apply to him since he was a “natural person”. The Court of Appeal held that this was a mistake of law that did not vitiate intent. I will refer to this decision in greater detail later, together with other cases that have reached the same conclusion.
[18] I will now review each of the elements as they apply to the case at bar.

Jurisdiction

Digitized by Google

[19] The jurisdiction of the Court is provided by s. 244(3) of the Income Tax Act and s. 332(3) of the Excise Tax Act. The evidence establishes that the accused were resident and found within British Columbia.

Identification

[20] There is no issue as to identification. A number of Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") officers identified both accused while searching the accuseds' residence at 45354 Creekside Drive, Chilliwack, British Columbia. In addition, Mr. Porisky acknowledged that Paradigm was a name he used to carry on his activities which are the subject of the charge. Jumping out of sequence to the counselling charge, Mr. Porisky appears in almost all of the DVDs which are the subject of that charge and he acknowledged that he was the author of the written material which I will discuss when I come to deal with that charge.

[21] These findings on jurisdiction and identification also apply to the other counts.

Actus reus

The Crown's Evidence

[22] The vast bulk of the evidence in this case results from a search which the CRA executed on December 3, 2008 at the accuseds' residence. With respect to the tax evasion charges, that evidence consists of financial and business records, including contracts with Paradigm "educators", bank records and invoices. [23] Neither Paradigm nor Mr. Porisky kept any books or accounting records. Therefore, a CRA investigator, Mr. Brunke, reviewed the records retrieved from the house and reconstructed the financial statements of Paradigm. Although Mr. Brunke is a Certified General Accountant, he gave his evidence not as expert opinion but, rather, as a fact witness summarising the financial evidence and applying the tax tables to the numbers.

[24] An early and often-cited case on the admissibility of summary evidence is R. v. Scheel (1978), 42 C.C.C. (2d) 31 (Ont.C.A.). In this case, summaries were prepared by a chartered accountant, based on exhibits, an agreed statement of facts, testimony at trial, and evidence given at the preliminary hearing read in at the trial. Martin J.A. found that the summaries were properly admissible to assist the jury in understanding the entire picture represented by the voluminous documentary evidence. At pp. 35-36 he said:

The introduction of the summaries did not offend against the rule that requires the production of original documents, since the documents which were the primary source of the summaries were in evidence. It is accordingly unnecessary in this case to invoke the exception to the rule referred to by Wigmore in the following passage:

"Where a fact could be ascertained only by the inspection of a large number of documents made up of very numerous detailed statements—as, the net balance resulting from a year's vouchers of a treasurer or a year's accounts in a bank ledger—it is obvious that it would often be practically out of the question to apply the present principle by requiring the production of the entire mass of documents and entries to be perused by the jury or read aloud to them. The convenience of trials demands that other evidence be allowed to be offered, in the shape of testimony of a competent witness who has perused the entire mass and will state summarily the net result. Such a practice is well established to be proper.

Most courts require, as a condition, that the mass thus summarily testified to shall, if the occasion seems to require it, be placed at hand in court, or at last be made accessible to the opposing party, in order that the correctness of the evidence may be tested by inspection if desired, or that the material for cross-examination may be available:" (Wigmore 4th ed. Vol. IV at p. 535).

[25] The accused were provided with Mr. Brunke's spreadsheets ahead of his testimony.

Digitized by Google

The alternative to admitting the summary evidence in this case would have had Mr. Brunke referring line by line to each bank statement and doing the arithmetic "real-time" on the witness stand. That would have taken a good many days and would have been almost impossible to absorb.

[26] Mr. Brunke first reviewed the bank statements and determined that a total of $1,843,298 was deposited into Mr. Porisky's and Ms. Gould's bank accounts from December 31, 2003 to December 31, 2008. He then deducted from this:

all cash deposits, other than those that could be matched to a seized Paradigm document that confirmed that the deposit was income;

all deposits for which no cheque was available; and payments from the accuseds' family.

Mr. Brunke treated the balance of $1,415,127 as Paradigm's gross revenue for 2004-2008.

[27] Included in the above revenue were deposits by cheque made out to Mr. Porisky which did not contain any reference to Paradigm material or services and could not be cross-referenced to a seized document, from payees who were not known to be Paradigm educators or students. Mr. Brunke included this because there was no indication that Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould had any other source of income other than Paradigm. He estimated that less than 5% of the cheques fell into this category.

[28] Mr. Brunke then deducted the expenses of Paradigm which are summarised as follows:

Category of Expense	2004-2008 total
Meals & Entertainment (50%)	$7,252.29
Business Use of Home (20%)	$10,430.87
Motor Vehicle (100%)	$56,327.89
Office Supplies - General	$43,352.55
Office Supplies - Minuteman Press	$76,934.09
Professional Fees - Legal	$15,000.00
Subcontract - Sherri Adams	$5,910.44
Unaccounted Credit Card Payments	$14,019.71
Hotel / Conference	$51,892.66
Travel	$3,798.73
Bank Fees	$1,500.23
Interest	$1,523.17
Total Allowed Expenses	$287,942.63

Expenses which were obviously personal, such as fitness memberships and groceries, were not included. [29] None of the above evidence was challenged by Mr. Porisky in cross-examination or in his own evidence. [30] Neither Ms. Gould nor Mr. Porisky was paid a salary from Paradigm. Rather, all of the money received from the operation of Paradigm was deposited into two bank accounts in the joint names of both the accused, and two accounts in Mr. Porisky's name.

[31] The above resulted in a net business income of $1,127,185 for the 2004 to 2008 taxation years.

[32] Mr. Brunke allocated the netincome evenly between the accused and then reduced the amount to factor in Canada Pension Plan contributions. This resulted in the following net taxable income for each of the accused:

	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	Total
Taxable Income	$37,202.76	$123,762.00	$169,976.72	$137,226.79	$87,613.32	$555,781.58

[33] Finally, Mr. Brunke applied the tax rates set out in the Income Tax Act and calculated that Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould each owed $112,611 in federal income tax for the 2004 to 2008 taxation years.

[34] With respect to GST, Mr. Brunke assumed that every expense would result in an input credit and calculated that $66,133 GST was payable.

Digitized by Google

[35] I accept Mr. Brunke's calculation of the gross and net revenue of Paradigm; if anything it underrated the gross revenue and overrated deductible expenses and input credits, and that would benefit the accused.
[36] The CRA records show that:
Mr. Porisky failed to file income tax returns for the 2005 to 2008 taxation years.
Ms. Gould failed to file income tax returns for the 2004 to 2008 taxation years.
Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould failed to report any income from 2004 to 2008.
Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould failed to remit any GST from 2004 to 2008.
Mr. Porisky did file a return for 2004 in which he disclosed a nil income.
Mr. Porisky's Evidence
[37] As stated above, Mr. Porisky acknowledged that Paradigm was the name he used to conduct his endeavour, and the evidence is overwhelming in that regard. In his testimony, he minimised Ms. Gould's involvement, saying that she provided minor services and accompanied him on the seminars to keep him company. Apart from that she was a stay-at-home mother. I will deal with Ms. Gould separately, after I reach my conclusions with respect to Mr. Porisky.
[38] Since 1999, Mr. Porisky has dedicated himself to finding out, to use his words, "what the tax system was about". He founded what he eventually called The Paradigm Education Group to "create a structure that everyone could work together in to save the country from a foreign parasite". The foreign parasites were the international bankers who were, directly or indirectly, responsible for the income tax system. I will explain the teachings of Mr. Porisky more fully later in these reasons.
[39] Paradigm sold books, written materials and instructional DVDs on its web site, Naturalperson.com. Mr. Porisky acknowledged that he was the author of the materials. Mr. Porisky conducted seminars which were fee-based. The DVDs feature him lecturing at the seminars. The books and DVDs largely overlap in content. [40] Mr. Porisky qualified "educators "to teach the Paradigm materials. Those educators, including Mr. Porisky, offered consulting services to assist people in setting themselves up as natural persons, working in their own capacity, under a private contract, for their own benefit, and thereby – supposedly – be exempt from tax. I will deal with the legal validity of that position later. The educators generally charged 7% of a contracting party's income over two years for the consulting service, and a portion of that revenue was remitted to Paradigm.
[41] The balance of Mr. Porisky's evidence primarily concerned the charge of counselling, and I therefore deal with it in that section.
Mr. Porisky's Argument
[42] On its face, the net revenue earned by Paradigm and Mr. Porisky was, under s. 3 of the Income Tax Act, income which should have been reported and which would have resulted in taxes being payable.
[43] Mr. Porisky argues otherwise. It is difficult to set out his line of argument with cogency because it lacks logic, coherence and consistency. His oral closing argument was a political statement.
[44] I will start with Mr. Porisky's brief written argument. He says he was not obliged to file tax returns because:
I had no taxable income
I did not want to apply for the available benefits associated with filing a T1 General Income Tax Return.
I did not receive a request to file T1 General Income Tax Return from the Canada Revenue Agency. It continues:
I respectfully submit that the evidence supports my submission that the particular activity I carried on in a business-like manner as Paradigm Education Group, as well as other related particular activities, be it as a mentor, presenter, author, etc., were, with conscious awareness, carried on with no intent to profit, as personal endeavours and non-commercial activities.

Digitized by Google

[45] Although not referred to specifically in the written argument, the first two of the above points seem to hinge on Mr. Porisky's "natural person" theory or argument, which is one of the keystones of what, for lack of a better word, I will refer to as the "Paradigm view".

[46] The law has long recognised the distinction between a natural person and an artificial person, such as a corporation. And it has recognised a corporation sole which applies to an office, such as a bishop. However, Mr. Porisky twists that into something that the law does not recognise. The Paradigm view is that an individual person may be either a natural person or an artificial person. If one is a natural person, one can act for one's own benefit and not for profit.

[47] The Paradigm materials make frequent references to the definitions of "person", "taxpayer" and "legal representative of a taxpayer" in the Income Tax Act. The definitions in s. 248 of the Act are:

"person", or any word or expression descriptive of a person, includes any corporation, and any entity exempt, because of subsection 149(1), from tax under Part I on all or part of the entity's taxable income and the heirs, executors, liquidators of a succession, administrators or other legal representatives of such a person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends;

"taxpayer" includes any person whether or not liable to pay tax;

"legal representative" of a taxpayer means a trustee in bankruptcy, an assignee, a liquidator, a curator, a receiver of any kind, a trustee, an heir, an administrator, an executor, a liquidator of a succession, a committee, or any other like person, administering, winding up, controlling or otherwise dealing in a representative or fiduciary capacity with the property that belongs or belonged to, or that is or was held for the benefit of, the taxpayer or the taxpayer's estate;

[48] From this, Mr. Porisky concludes that the following theory has been proven:

A person as defined in the Act is not the "taxpayer" but has some kind of legal relationship to the "taxpayer" requiring the "person" to fulfill certain obligations for the "taxpayer", such as filing tax forms and paying the income tax on the "taxable income" of the "taxpayer" from the "income of the taxpayer".

The Canadian Illusion – The Tax Gamep. 106

[49] It then follows, according to the Paradigm view, that:

A "person" is a "legal representative", and a "legal representative" is of a "taxpayer". Therefore, the "person" is not the "taxpayer".

and:

That only the "taxpayer's income" is taxable. Ibid.

Supposedly, a taxpayer is an artificial person. If one takes care to not establish oneself as an artificial person, such as by not taking government benefits, then one does not have to pay taxes, because natural persons are not taxed under the Income Tax Act.

[50] What underlies the "not for profit" argument is Mr. Porisky's use of the concept that, to use his words, "a man is worth his labour". A natural person can value his labour at whatever he wishes. Profit is first considered without the deduction of the person's own labour; when the value of the labour is factored in, the profit is reduced to zero. There is therefore no net income or profit to report and no taxes are payable; money earned by a natural person is supposedly not income and therefore not subject to tax.

[51] On the other hand, if one does not structure themselves as a natural person working for their own benefit and not for profit, then they are the "legal representative of a federally created artificial person known as a taxpayer". It is only the latter who must pay income taxes.

Digitized by Google

[52] The natural person does not earn salary; rather, he earns "private compensation".
[53] The distinction, to Mr. Porisky, is one of choice or intent. I canvassed an example with Mr. Porisky in which two people get the identical job with the same employer at the same hourly rate. Person A states that he is taking the job in his capacity as a natural person acting for his own benefit and without intent to profit; Person B does not. According to Mr. Porisky, what is paid to Person A is not income and is not taxable. It is the opposite for Person B.
[54] Acting as a natural person is referred to as "the forgotten option". Not doing so is referred to as the "common option for the disadvantaged". A natural person's identification requires his name; a non-natural person's identification requires a social insurance number: Your Right to Contract, p. 99.
[55] In one of the Canadian Illusion DVDs, Mr. Porisky teaches that "only humans have first names and last names. Artificial persons have last names and first names". He says:
If they get us to use our artificial person name in applications they are – through the legal concept of joinder – joining the two.
Joinder must be voluntary; otherwise it is enslavement [56] Ms. Gould adopted Mr. Porisky's arguments.
Analysis – Did Mr. Porisky commit the act of tax evasion?
[57] When I express my opinion of Mr. Porisky's argument and the Paradigm view – as I am about to do – I do not mean any disrespect to him. However, since he has taught this theory over many years and there have been several convictions of Paradigm students for following it, I think it is important to state the view of the Court in the clearest possible terms so that current and potential future students of Mr. Porisky know what they are or might be dealing with.
[58] Mr. Porisky's theory not only does not bear any legal logic but it also fails to accord with common sense. It is a failed attempt at word magic and has no validity.
[59] The absurdity of the supposed distinction between a natural person and a non-natural person (and I do not mean to refer to a corporation here) was shown by several things that arose during the course of the trial. [60] At the close of the Crown's case I asked Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould whether they wished to call any evidence. Mr. Porisky said he could not make that decision unless he understood whether he was to give evidence in his "inherent personality as a natural person with no intent to profit". He wanted to tell the truth in the stand but the capacity he was to testify in would make a difference to his evidence. A few minutes later in the dialogue he said:
I need to know if I make the decision to get into the stand, from which perspective can I speak? Like therefore I need to know, in the eyes of the law, if one man is two persons, the natural or the legal, okay, which one can I speak as, or does it matter -- am I have the liberty to speak the truth and qualify it so I can speak to everything? Because what it -- they have commingled a lot of stuff, and for me to properly address it, I'm going to have to be able to speak to everything to properly address it.
And later:
Again, I feel like I'm being railroaded because I'm asking for clear answers. I came here with a full intention on defending my -- my rights and -- and not having things being converted into something they're not, and I don't know how to do that if nobody's going to give me a straight answer. I thought Crown had a duty -- I read their web page and they talk about honour and integrity, and now I'm been led one thing -- and for me to speak to everything, I'm going to need to be able to speak to it from my starting point of my existence.

Digitized by Google

I didn't make it up. Sir John Salmond I think is a highly respected man. The Supreme Court relies on him. I didn't make it up that one man's two persons in the eyes of the law. And so from that perspective, I need -- that's why I tried to be as honourable and as open in the development of this, so that I could speak the truth and the whole truth from the proper perspective, so it does not get misconstrued or mislabelled or presumed to be something it's not. And that's what I need to know. If I make the decision and I go in that box, which person, in the eyes of the law am I?
THE COURT: You are Mr. Porisky.
THE ACCUSED PORISKY: Am I Russell Anthony Porisky in my inherent personality as a natural person, or am I a sovereign-granted personality?
THE COURT: You're Russell Porisky.
THE ACCUSED PORISKY: That's fairly misleading because that's not clear enough for me, Your Honour.
....
THE COURT: ... Let's assume you get into the stand... and the Crown asks you, "What did you have for breakfast today?" Would it make a difference as to what capacity you were in?
THE ACCUSED PORISKY: For me, it would, Your Honour, yes.
[61] A final example will suffice. When asked by the Crown to confirm the identity of a Paradigm educator in the public gallery, Mr. Porisky said it depended on the capacity the Crown was asking about.
[62] The courts have rejected the natural person argument in several tax evasion cases. In R. v. Klundert (No. 2), 2008 ONCA 767 (CanLII), 2008 ONCA 767; leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada refused ([2004] S.C.C.A. No. 463), MacFarland J.A., stated:
[11] ... he [the accused] explained his failure to pay taxes as arising from his belief that he was not obligated to pay taxes. Klundert took the position that he was not obligated to pay income tax because he believed the Act does not apply to him. Klundert testified that he is neither a “person” nor a “taxpayer” as defined in the Act.
...
[15] In essence, Klundert’s evidence was that as a natural person he had no obligation to pay taxes because he didn’t owe any. The respondent did not consider himself to meet the definition of “person” as that term is defined in the Act. According to the respondent, he had the option to act as a natural person – to whom the Act does not, in his view, apply, or to submit to the Act as a taxpayer. Because the respondent considered himself to be earning income in his individual capacity for himself as a natural person and not as a taxpayer, he did not believe he was under any obligation to pay income tax.
...
[19] Unfortunately for the respondent, the Act does not distinguish between persons and natural persons. The definition of “person” in the Act includes human beings of which specie the respondent belongs.
[63] The courts have rejected similar “natural person” arguments and rendered convictions in three other cases where the accused have taken courses from Mr. Porisky: R. v. Sydel, 2006 BCPC 346 (CanLII), 2006 BCPC 346; R. v. Turnnir, 2006 BCPC 460 (CanLII), 2006 BCPC 460; and R. v. Amell, 2010 SKPC 107
(CanLII), 2010 SKPC 107.
[64] In Kennedy v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency), [2000] O.J. No. 3313; 2000 D.T.C. 6524 (Ont. S.C.J.), Sedgwick J. also rejected this argument in the context of a challenge to a CRA Requirement to Pay. [65] The argument that Mr. Porisky makes under the rubric that “a man is worth his labour” is fundamentally flawed. At the end of a year, money is left in the hands of a person and that is taxable. The argument comes down to what the Ontario Court of Appeal in Klundert No. 2, at para. 20, characterised as: "the Act does not apply to me because I choose to have it not apply to me."

Digitized by Google

[66] Also woven into the Paradigm view is the notion that benefits such as the Canada Pension Plan are not mandatory: because natural persons choose not to participate in any government benefit programmes, they are not subject to income tax. Apart from various programmes being mandatory, the flaw in that reasoning is that there is no linkage in the Income Tax Act between being eligible for the benefits and the obligation to pay income tax.
[67] Mr. Porisky's analysis picks and chooses snippets from various statutes and cases, and attempts to create logical links where none exist. It is, in effect, legal numerology.
[68] In short, there is no legal merit to any of Mr. Porisky's arguments.
[69] There can be no doubt that Mr. Porisky earned income from his endeavours as Paradigm – the only issue is what share is his and what, if any, is Ms. Gould's. That income was taxable and Mr. Porisky chose not to report it or to pay taxes on it. The Crown has made out the actus reus of the offence.

Intent
[70] Mr. Porisky's views are, at best, a mistake of law. The cases I have referred to previously establish that that does not vitiate what would otherwise be an intention to evade taxes on it.
[71] It is not necessary for me to find that Mr. Porisky was wilfully blind in coming to his views. Nevertheless I find that to be the case. Mr. Porisky was well-aware of prior decisions in which the natural person argument was rejected. Kennedy v. Canada (Customs and Revenue Agency) was the subject of comment by Mr. Porisky in The Canadian Illusion – The Tax Game (p. 46). Mr. Porisky also published a lengthy commentary on the Sydel decision, which I discuss below at para. 118. Mr. Porisky attempted to distinguish these cases out of existence.
[72] I therefore find Mr. Porisky guilty of Count 1, namely tax evasion with respect to his own income.

Count 2 – Tax Evasion by Ms. Gould re: Her Own Income
[73] The extent of Ms. Gould's involvement in Paradigm is not as clear as that of Mr. Porisky's; nevertheless, what is clear is that she did perform services for the endeavour. As argued by the Crown, Ms. Gould dealt with or assisted in administrative matters such as making payment arrangements with students or educators and processing orders for educational materials.
[74] Ms. Gould also accompanied Mr. Porisky on a number of his seminars. Mr. Porisky says that was just to keep him company, but I do not accept that evidence. In any event, Mr. Porisky acknowledges she did minor organisational tasks.
[75] As I said earlier, funds generated by the Paradigm activities were deposited into four bank accounts, two of which were in the joint names of Ms. Gould and Mr. Porisky. In 2005 Mr. Porisky gave Ms. Gould money to purchase a townhome in Chilliwack. In 2007 Mr. Porisky gave Ms. Gould money to purchase another property.
[76] It was certainly open to Mr. Porisky to give gifts to Ms. Gould, and no doubt some of these transactions can be explained on that basis. Nevertheless, given the fact that Ms. Gould worked in the endeavour, the only logical inference is that some of the money she received was compensation for those services and was taxable income which she failed to report. In order to convict, it is not necessary for me to determine the exact amount of that income or taxes avoided. I therefore find Ms. Gould guilty of tax evasion with respect to her own income.

Digitized by Google

Counts 1 and 2 – Tax Evasion by Ms. Gould and Mr. Porisky through aiding and abetting

[77] I previously set out the nature of these charges and the Crown theory underlying them. In its argument, the Crown says:

The means by which each accused was a party to the other's evasion was by not filing his or her own tax returns, in order to avoid alerting the Canada Revenue Agency to the existence of the other's income, and by engaging in a common design to earn income and evade tax on that income.

[78] Section 21(1) of the Criminal Code provides: Parties to offence

21. (1) Every one is a party to an offence who actually commits it;

does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it; or abets any person in committing it.

In R. v. Thatcher, 1987 CanLII 53 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 652 at p. 690, the Supreme Court pointed out that this section makes the distinction between the direct commission of a crime and the aiding or abetting a crime irrelevant.

[79] Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould were each responsible for filing their own income tax returns, and I have held that they are both criminally responsible for failing to do so. However, I do not think that there is sufficient evidence to convict them of aiding and abetting each other in that crime. The evidence is equally consistent with two possible alternatives, the first being that they each held similar views as to their obligations and the second being that Mr. Porisky counselled Ms. Gould to evade her taxes. Neither of these is sufficient to convict either Ms. Gould or Mr. Porisky as a party to the other's offence. There is certainly no evidence that they did not file their own returns so as to not alert the CRA to the other's activities.

Count 3 – Evasion of Goods and Services Tax by Mr. Porisky and Ms. Gould

[80] The services and goods sold by Paradigm were subject to GST under the Part IX of the Excise Tax Act. The GST should have been charged and remitted, less applicable input credits. That was not done. Once again, the only reason for that can be Mr. Porisky's "natural person" theory.

[81] Both the facts and the analysis that I have applied to Mr. Porisky's income tax evasion are equally applicable to this count, and I find Mr. Porisky guilty of this offence.

[82] While it is clear that Paradigm is Mr. Porisky's alter-ego, there is insufficient evidence to come to the same conclusion regarding Ms. Gould. The fact that she received payment for services performed for Mr. Porisky does not go so far as to show that she was responsible for the failure to report and remit GST. Whereas there is no doubt that Mr. Porisky was the guiding mind of Paradigm, that is not the case for Ms. Gould. Accordingly, I acquit her of this count.

Count 4 – Counselling by Mr. Porisky

[83] Mr. Porisky is charged with counselling others to commit fraud in excess of $5,000 between December 31, 2000 and December 4, 2008. The fraud being counselled was the evasion of income taxes. The counselling is alleged to have been done by Mr. Porisky in his Paradigm lectures, books and videos.

[84] The offence of counselling is set out in s. 464 of the Criminal Code:

464. Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, the following provisions apply in respect of persons who counsel other persons to commit offences, namely, every one who counsels another person to commit an indictable offence is, if the offence is not committed, guilty of an indictable offence and liable to the same punishment to which a person who attempts to commit that offence is liable; and every one who counsels another person to commit an offence punishable on summary conviction is, if the offence is not committed, guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Digitized by Google

[85] Counselling is defined inclusively in s. 22(3) of the Code:
22.(3) For the purposes of this Act, “counsel” includes procure, solicit or incite.

Is income tax evasion fraud?
[86] The first question that arises is whether income tax evasion is equivalent to fraud.
[87] I have already set out the elements of the offence of tax evasion when dealing with the tax evasion charges. The indictable offence of fraud is set out in s. 380 of the Criminal Code:
380. (1) Every one who, by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means, whether or not it is a false pretence within the meaning of this Act, defrauds the public or any person, whether ascertained or not, of any property, money or valuable security or any service,
(a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a term of imprisonment not exceeding fourteen years, where the subject-matter of the offence is a testamentary instrument or the value of the subject-matter of the offence exceeds five thousand dollars; …
[88] The elements of fraud were set out in R. v. Théroux, 1993 CanLII 134 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 5, by McLachlin J. (as she then was) at p. 20:
These doctrinal observations suggest that the actus reus of the offence of fraud will be established by proof of:
the prohibited act, be it an act of deceit, a falsehood or some other fraudulent means; and deprivation caused by the prohibited act, which may consist in actual loss or the placing of the victim's pecuniary interests at risk.
Correspondingly, the mens rea of fraud is established by proof of:
subjective knowledge of the prohibited act; and subjective knowledge that the prohibited act could have as a consequence the deprivation of another (which deprivation may consist in knowledge that the victim's pecuniary interests are put at risk).
[89] In an extradition application, Watt J. concluded that if the elements of tax evasion have been made out, then the elements of fraud are also satisfied. He said, at para. 172:
The submission of a tax return that is false in a material particular, the amount of income received, is an act of deceit and a falsehood. At the very least, the pecuniary interests of the tax collector are put at risk by the falsehood and deceit of the taxpayer. The taxpayer who knows of this prohibited conduct and that it will put the economic interests of the collector at risk has the mens rea of fraud.
Germany (Federal Republic) v. Schreiber, 184 C.C.C. (3d) 367 (Ont. S.C.J.). [90] The Ontario Court of Appeal agreed. Sharpe J.A. said:
The extradition judge further found that the evidence of fraud, deception and falsification was sufficient to support domestic committal not only on the offence of income tax evasion contrary to s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act but also on the offences of making false or deceptive statements in an income tax return contrary to s. 239(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act, defrauding the government of income tax revenues contrary to s. 380(1)(a) of the Criminal Code, and uttering a forged document contrary to s. 368(1)(b) of the Criminal Code. It has been held that the offence of income tax evasion may also constitute fraud contrary to the Criminal Code: see R. v. Cancor Software Corp. et al. reflex, (1990), 58 C.C.C. (3d) 53 (Ont. C.A.)...
Germany (Federal Republic) v. Schreiber, 264 D.L.R. (4th) 211 at para. 57.
[91] It is open to the Crown to charge an accused under the Income Tax Act or the Criminal

Digitized by Google

Code. In R. v. White, 32 O.R. (3d) 722 (C.A.), the Court of Appeal dismissed appeals against the appellants' convictions for defrauding the public of income tax owing to Revenue Canada by making false claims on their tax returns. Dismissing the appellants' argument that the Crown's decision to substitute charges of fraud under the Criminal Code for charges of tax evasion under the Income Tax Act was an abuse of process, the Court said at pp. 753-754:

In R. v. Cancor Software Corp. reflex, (1990), 40 O.A.C. 122, also a case in which the accused defrauded Revenue Canada using the SRTC program, this court approved adding Criminal Code fraud and forgery charges to income tax evasion charges at the end of the preliminary inquiry, 19 months after the original tax charges were laid, in order to expose the accused to more severe penalties if convicted.

Like the accused in Cancor, White faced a more serious sentence under the Criminal Code than under the Income Tax Act. But as McKinlay J.A. observed in Cancor at p. 128:

The major complaints of the appellants are the more severe penalties possible on conviction on the Criminal Code charges, and their contention that the Crown pursued the Criminal Code charges for an improper purpose, i.e., to make an example of the accused. If it was otherwise proper to commit the accused on the Criminal charges, the nature of the penalty is surely not a complaint available to them - although the laying only of charges with possibly inadequate penalties, given the nature of the Crown's allegations against the accused, might raise public criticism against the Crown.

In short, the Crown's exercise of its prosecutorial discretion in substituting fraud charges did not amount to an abuse of process.

The conduct and mental elements of counselling

[92] The Supreme Court of Canada most recently dealt with counselling in R. v. Hamilton, 2005 SCC 47 (CanLII), 2005 SCC 47. The accused in that case offered software for sale on the internet, the purpose of which was to generate credit card numbers. The trial judge concluded that Mr. Hamilton committed the act of counselling, but acquitted him on the basis that he did not have the requisite intent. Although only the ruling on intent was appealed, the Court did address what conduct must be proved for counselling. As in the present case, the Crown did not adduce evidence that someone committed a crime as a result of the counselling.

[93] At para. 29, Fish J. summarised the actus reus and mens rea components of counselling:

In short, the actus reus for counselling is the deliberate encouragement or active inducement of the commission of a criminal offence. And the mens rea consists in nothing less than an accompanying intent or conscious disregard of the substantial and unjustified risk inherent in the counselling: that is, it must be shown that the accused either intended that the offence counselled be committed, or knowingly counselled the commission of the offence while aware of the unjustified risk that the offence counselled was in fact likely to be committed as a result of the accused's conduct.

[Emphasis in original]

[94] Earlier in his judgment, at para. 22, Fish J. provided further guidance as to the act of counselling:

In their relevant senses, the Canadian Oxford Dictionary (2nd ed. 2004) defines "counsel" as "advise" or "recommend (a course of action)"; "procure" as "bring about"; "solicit" as "ask repeatedly or earnestly for or seek or invite", or "make a request or petition to (a person)"; and "incite" as "urge". "Procure" has been held judicially to include "instigate" and "persuade": R. v. Gonzague reflex, (1983), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 505 (Ont. C.A.).

Those who encourage the commission of crimes in any of these ways are criminally responsible for their conduct by way of "secondary liability".

Digitized by Google

[95] Charron J., for the minority, addressed the conduct component of the offence, referring to the Court's earlier judgment in R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2 (CanLII), [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45. She said, at para. 74:

Hence, as held in Sharpe, nothing short of active inducement or encouragement will suffice to make out the actus reus of the offence of counselling. In other words, when viewed objectively, the communication must be one that actively seeks to persuade the person counselled to commit the crime. In this way, the scope of targeted activity is not extended to the mere possibility of planting a seed in the recipient's mind; it is limited to those communications that are likely to cause that seed to sprout, creating a resolve to commit the crime. It is only then that the potential risk justifies the criminal prohibition. However, it is well established that it is not necessary that the person counselled be in fact persuaded: R. v. Walia (No. 1) (1975), 9 C.R. (3d) 293 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 293-95; R. v. Glubisz (1979), 47 C.C.C. (2d) 232 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 235 and 241-42; R. v. Gonzague reflex, (1983), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 505 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 508-9. The focus on a prosecution for counselling is on the counsellor's conduct and state of mind, not that of the person counselled.

Actus reus - did Mr. Porisky counsel income tax evasion and therefore fraud?

[96] The materials seized at Mr. Porisky's home and which were entered into evidence were voluminous. They included DVDs of Mr. Porisky's lectures and written materials sold by him. I advised the parties that I would review what they drew my attention to and that I should not be expected to review every other exhibit entered into evidence. By agreement of the parties I reviewed this material on my own outside of the courtroom.

[97] Because of the volume of materials and the difficulty in knowing which students read which material, I will base my judgment on Paradigm's core work – The Canadian Illusion –which formed the basis of the courses conducted by Mr. Porisky. The complete set of these were sold to individuals. The Canadian Illusion consisted of five written volumes titled:

It's All about You
The Illusion
The Tax Game
Your Right to Contract
Freedom-Free-For-All

Each of these was accompanied by a DVD of the same title, showing Mr. Porisky delivering a seminar to a live audience. There is a substantial overlap amongst all of the written and video material.

[98] Each of the books and DVDs begin with the following disclaimer:

Disclaimer: I, Russell Anthony Porisky, present this information in my capacity as a natural person, as an exercise of my rights and freedoms. As such the information contained herein is for educational purposes only and should, in no way, be construed as either legal or financial advice. Therefore, before relying on any conclusions expressed herein or applying any of the information in your own life, I strongly recommend that in addition to thoroughly studying the information yourself you consult a competent expert on this subject matter to determine the veracity of what has been presented.

I will deal with this disclaimer when I discuss Mr. Porisky's intent, although it is also potentially relevant to the conduct component of the counselling charge.

Mr. Porisky's Evidence

[99] Mr. Porisky worked in the construction industry beginning in approximately 1982. In the early 1990s he began to study the taxation system. By 2001 he had decided to dedicate himself full time to studying and propagating his theories. He found he could not "educate every person one at a time", and that a structure was needed to "save the country from a foreign parasite". He therefore established The Paradigm Education Group in 2000-2001.

Digitized by Google

[100] In 2002 Mr. Porisky met with a nucleus of people, some of whom later became Paradigm educators. [101] Students heard of Paradigm though its website or word of mouth. In addition, Mr. Porisky did some advertising for his seminars. If someone wanted to do more than attend a seminar, Mr. Porisky referred them to the closest educator. If the student wished, he or she would meet with the educator, discuss the Paradigm view, buy materials and perhaps sign an agreement with the educator to engage in further study and obtain Paradigm support to "restructure" their affairs.
[102] Eventually Mr. Porisky set up a structure to the Paradigm courses. First, a student would take the Paradigm Introductory Course, which involved taking initial tests, purchasing printed materials and DVDs, and participating in study groups or pursuing home study.
[103] Next, a student could take the Intermediate Course, for which there was a manual and a DVD. The manual contained questions that the student was expected to answer. Educators used teacher's manuals supplied by Mr. Porisky that contained the answers to the questions in the student manual to both mark the students' answers and guide the students.
[104] Students took an Intermediate Exam. This was designed so that students had to take the "data" they had learned and write longer paragraph or essay-length answers. Mr. Porisky stated that this was intended to introduce them to the advanced materials.
[105] After passing the Intermediate Course, students wishing to take the Advanced Course bought the five- volume Canadian Illusion set and the corresponding five-DVD set.
[106] After completing The Canadian Illusion, a student became an alumni student. Alumni could apply to become an educator, although for a period of time Mr. Porisky imposed a "moratorium" on new educators as he had discovered that some educators were attempting to pass off Paradigm material as their own or were trying to sell their own material using the Paradigm name. These educators were either "terminated" by Mr. Porisky or agreed to stop their offending practices.
[107] In cross-examination, Mr. Porisky was asked what would happen if a student or educator reviewed the materials and came to the conclusion that they had to pay their taxes. He responded that this had never happened.
[108] Crown counsel showed Mr. Porisky a hand drawn diagram (Binder 13, Tab 2, pg 2). He agreed he had drawn this as an example of the Paradigm view. The diagram showed an "AP" ("artificial person") on the upper left side and the steps that Mr. Porisky and Paradigm recommended a person should take to restructure their affairs (quit their job and be re-hired using a Paradigm Contract for Hire) so that they became a "NP" ("natural person") who did not have to pay income tax.
[109] The Paradigm materials contained precedents of Contracts of Hire for someone as a "natural person". Mr. Porisky stated that Paradigm did not draft the contract for the students; rather, the students were to educate themselves to the point where they could do it on their own.

The Canadian Illusion books and DVDs
[110] In the Appendix to this judgment, I set out extensive quotes from The Canadian Illusion books along with two examples of PowerPoint slides used by Mr. Porisky in his lectures captured on DVD.
[111] By way of broad summary, these materials make the following points:
Payment of tax is voluntary, because if one arranges one's affairs as a natural person, no tax is payable;
The tax and benefit systems are illusions;

Digitized by Google

A contract should be drawn up to document that one is earning money in the capacity of a natural person;
The underground economy is not illegal;
Bureaucrats working for the CRA are deceiving the public into believing that benefit programmes are mandatory;
It is unlikely that someone following the Paradigm recommendations will be prosecuted for tax evasion;
In any event, a conviction for tax evasion is unlikely because the required mens rea will not be found;
Payment of tax is tantamount to slavery or serfdom;
The taxation system is contrary to the Bill of Rights;
Why would anyone want to pay taxes when they have the option not do so?;
Paradigm offers education and services to further enable people to avoid taxes though structuring their affairs as"natural persons";
"quit working for the taxpayer" (from "The TaxGame" DVD).

Analysis re: the conduct of counselling
[112] The Canadian Illusionsets out a legal view that I, and other courts, have concluded is incorrect. That does not in itself amount to counselling fraud. It further sets out a political view about the income tax system. That is something that anyone is at liberty to advocate, and is, of course, protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, beingSchedule B to the Canada Act, 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11. Mr. Porisky's political views are not on trial. There must, as described by Fish J. in Hamilton, be an encouragement to commit the offence. As noted in Sharpe (a case which dealt with the constitutionality of the offence of possession of material that counsels sexual activity with persons under 18) at para. 56:
The mere description of the criminal act is not caught. Rather, the prohibition is against material that, viewed objectively, sends the message that sex with children can and should be pursued.
[113] To paraphrase the test in Sharpe, does The Canadian Illusion send the message that the Paradigm view should be followed, or does it merely state a valueless legal opinion or a legitimate political viewpoint? I think it is the former: it exhortsand goads people to free themselves from the shackles of "serfdom" and"slavery" supposedly imposed by the income tax system. It instructspeople to do this by exercising the "forgotten option" of structuring their arrangements as so-called natural persons and thereby consider their income as nil. Those who do not do this have chosen the "Common Option for the Disadvantaged". Paradigm and Mr. Porisky offer further education, mentoring and counselling to achieve this result. The Canadian Illusion does not urge people to act by lobbying for a change in the taxsystem; rather, it encourages them to illegally avoid the system altogether. The audience in "The Tax Game" DVD is urged to "quit working for the taxpayer" – namely, in their capacity as a natural person, to not pay taxes.
[114] In Hamilton, the accused was found guilty of counselling for offering, in a "teaser" e-mail, the sale of software that could fraudulently generate credit card numbers. The e-mail contained statements such as: IMAGINE THE THINGS THAT YOU COULD DO WITH THIS PROGRAM, AND THE VALID CREDIT CARD NUMBERS IT GENERATES!!
As characterised by Fish J., at para. 1, this and similar statements "extolled"the software's use for fraudulent purposes. The Canadian Illusion goes as far as this does and at greater length and depth. Anyone reading the materials or attending the lectures would take it that they were being urged to declare themselves as "natural persons"and treat their income as nil.

Digitized by Google

[115] Looking at the materials as an objective observer, I am not left with any reasonable doubt that The Canadian Illusion and, therefore, Mr. Porisky encouraged the fraud of incometax avoidance.

Intent

[116] It is clear to me that Mr. Porisky fully intended that Paradigm students follow his teachings by arranging their affairs as natural persons and avoid paying income tax. Given the offering of Paradigm's consulting and mentoring services it would be impossible to conclude otherwise.

[117] The books and DVDs began with the disclaimer that I set out above at para. 98. I do not think this detracts from my conclusions on either the conduct or the intent components, because it is lost in a sea of material that is presented with 100% certainty.

[118] Further, the disclaimer was qualified in a later publication. I referred above to R. v. Sydel, a decision of Judge Meyers of the Provincial Court. Dr. Sydel was a Paradigm student. In his evidence, Mr. Porisky said that he prepared Dr. Sydel's legal argument. Dr. Sydel was convicted of income taxevasion and Mr. Porisky prepared a detailed "analysis" of the judgment in which he referred to the disclaimer which had been mentioned in the judgment. It stated, at p. 33:

Apparently, Judge Meyers has made a few assumptions of his own in regards to the intended meaning of the words I deliberately chose to use in the disclaimer that appeared at the bringing [sic] of each of the five videos of the original version of the "Canadian Rights and Freedom Foundation" course, which is now more commonly known as the "Intermediate"course since the release of the second edition.

Although Judge Meyers is correct in stating I provided the following caution, "In no way should this be construed as either legal or financial advice. You should consult a competent expert", his assumption that my deliberate use of the words "competent expert" included, or was even limited to, professionally trained tax lawyers or tax accountants is simply that, an assumption, or more appropriately, a false assumption.

Mr. Porisky then set out some dictionary definitions and continued:

… unless someone, be it a tax professional or not, was willing to spend the time to study the theory presented throughout Paradigm's educational material enough to be adequately capableof either confirming the theory with additional insight or disproving the theory with a parallel theory of their own, or someone, especially a taxprofessional, who was not even willing to even consider the theory in its entirety, would not qualify as a "competent expert" in regards to consulting on the subject matter for which these words were deliberately used.

…

The main reason being is because I personally believe, and as time has shown, that regardless of whether the issue at hand relates to the topic of income taxes or not, when someone spends the time to fully understand who they really are, and how that relates to this legal system and to their private life as a whole, they will undoubtedly realize that the only one they can truly rely on as a "competent expert" is their self. After all, isn't that why we've been given the ability to think?

[119] This conveys the message that if someone gets a legal or accounting opinion that contradicts the Paradigm view, then the opinion is worthless.

[120] I also agree with the following comment of Judge Kovatch in Amell, at para. 176:

It is interesting to note that in the materials, Mr. Porisky has a disclaimer that he is not a lawyer or an accountant, and that an individual should seek expert advice. It seems to me however, that these individuals are attempting to have matters both ways. By advancing this disclaimer, they are clearly attempting to avoid being held liable or accountable for the advice they are providing. However, if they are not to be held liable or accountable for such advice, then why are they selling it? Why did these three accused pay Mr. Lewry [the Paradigm educator] $15,499.85 to act as a consultant and provide advice? Why did the accused pay Mr. Porisky to prepare contracts for hire that were utilized and relied upon in this case? These individuals were clearly selling their advice as professional advice. I have already commented on how bad and ridiculous that advice was. …

Digitized by Google

The judge's comment on the advice, at para. 169, was:

The Paradigm materials and the teachings of Mr. Porisky have no credibility. In my view, they are nothing more than the proverbial "snake oil salesmen".

[121] It is significant to both the conduct and intent components, that, as acknowledged by Mr. Porisky in his evidence, he did not change his teaching or materials after Dr. Sydel's conviction. In fact, to the contrary, the analysis he prepared essentially disagreed with the judgment, misinterpreted it, and found ambiguity where none existed. As the following passages from the conclusion indicate, the analysis was a further exhortation for people to follow the Paradigm view:

My Conclusion

So where does this leave us? I guess we now have to make a choice. Do we accept his Reasons for Judgment at face value, albeit grossly ambiguous, merely because it came from a Judge and therefore must be true, as our social programming has taught us?

Or do we accept the possible reality that when it comes to dealing with such a socially sensitive subject as income taxat the lowest level of court in this country, we shouldn't have expected any other conclusion than the one that has presented itself?

…

Or, were there enough questionable ambiguities to consider the fact that maybe we are free, living in an Illusion of slavery, and his Reasons for Judgment, as many suggest, is just another desperately needed bowl of propaganda pabulum for public consumption, to keep the masses asleep and enslaved to the belief that what ever they earn in their natural capacity for their own benefit, the government has a higher inalienable right to take what ever portion they feel is appropriate at the time?

Ultimately, this question is one each we each are going to have to answer for ourselves, and we have a choice. We can take the easy road, and remain blanketed in programmed fear waiting for headlines from mainstream media or the bottom-line of ambiguous court cases to tell us how and what to think.

Or we can think for ourselves and release this programmed fear …

[122] Neither side put motive in issue. In Hamilton, Fish J. found that the trial judge erred in confounding motive with intent. He quoted the following passage from United States of America v. Dynar, 1997 CanLII 359 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 462, at para. 43:

It does not matter to society, in its efforts to secure social peace and order, what an accused's motive was, but only what the accused intended to do. It is no consolation to one whose car has been stolen that the thief stole the car intending to sell it to purchase food for a food bank".

Two paragraphs later Fish J. continued:

The trial judge's conclusion that Mr. Hamilton did not intend to induce the recipients to use those numbers is incompatible with the plain meaning of the "teaser" e-mail and with her other findings of fact, including her finding that Mr. Hamilton well understood that use of the generated numbers was illegal. Her assertion that "[h]is motivation was monetary" immediately after her reference to these facts demonstrates an error of law as to the mens rea for counselling the commission of a crime, and warrants a new trial.

[123] However, in a recent decision on counselling to commit murder (by way of publishing posters), the Ontario Court of Appeal said that the trial judge incorrectly determined that motive was irrelevant. The Court said, at para. 35:

Digitized by Google

However, as evidence motive is always relevant to the issue of intention and this case is no different: see Lewis v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 821. The existence of a motive makes it more likely that a person committed the crime. Persons do not usually act without a motive. Mr. Jeffers had no motive to want Councillor Thompson murdered. The councillor had helped him in the past and had never done him any harm. Mr. Jeffers lack of motive to want Councillor Thompson killed is a strong piece of circumstantial evidence that he never intended to encourage his murder.
R. v. Jeffers, 2012 ONCA 1 (CanLII), 2012 ONCA 1.
[124] Given the clarity of the written materials in this case and my findings of fact, I do not think motive is relevant. However, for the sake of completeness, Mr. Porisky made it clear that one of his motives for encouraging and teaching people to not comply with their tax obligations was his antipathy to the tax system. A second motive was monetary.

Conclusion on counselling
[125] I find Mr. Porisky guilty of counselling as charged.

Summary
[126] On Count 1 (evasion of taxes on Mr. Porisky's income), I find Mr. Porisky guilty and Ms. Gould not guilty.
[127] On Count 2 (evasion of taxes on Ms. Gould's income), I find Ms. Gould guilty and Mr. Porisky not guilty. [128] On Count 3, evasion of GST, I find Mr. Porisky guilty and Ms. Gould not guilty.
[129] On Count 4, counselling, I find Mr. Porisky guilty. Ms. Gould was not charged with that offence.
[130] I have not dealt with the allocation of income between Ms. Gould and Mr. Porisky. I will deal with that at the sentencing stage after hearing submissions on it.
E.M. MYERS, J.

Net Worth Evidenced Evasion

Net worth assessments leading to evasion cases are difficult to prove due to the jurisprudence on the ability of the taxpayer to provide alternative answers to increases in wealth that are not derived from hidden income.

In R. v. Derose[122] the Trial Court held concerning net worth assessment based s. 239(1) prosecutions that:

Net Worth Assessments
[112] In simple terms a net worth assessment for unreported income tax is an indirect method whereby the unreported taxable income is identified. For each taxation year the net assets and expenditures of an individual are determined. The net assets are calculated by determining the value of an asset and subtracting any liability to determine that income, e.g. a loan or mortgage. Once the net assets and expenditures are determined for any taxation year certain types of deductions must be made so that items not subject to taxation are removed. The first is the net assets on hand at the beginning of the period. The second are gains not subject to taxation. Assets that gain in value for market reasons such as stocks or residences are not subject to income consideration until sold. A gain in the value of a principal residence is not subject to taxation. A gain in the value of a rental property or certain stock is subject to capital gains. The third type of deduction is income not subject to taxation. These would include G.S.T. rebates, gifts and lottery winnings. The fourth type of deduction are those resulting from the conversion of the opening assets to other assets. An example is a loan repayment. An unpaid loan is an asset. When it is paid the loan has simply changed form. It is also important to remember that loans in the hands of the borrower are not taxable income. Finally, the income tax reported by the taxpayer must be deducted. Once all of the deductions are made then the income subject to prosecution can be calculated.

[122] 2001 ABPC 146

Digitized by Google

Use of Net Worth Assessments in Income Tax Prosecutions

[113] The use of net worth assessments as a basis for prosecution of income tax offences including income tax evasion has been judicially recognized in both Canada and the United States: Holland v. United States (1954) 348 U.S. 121 (U.S. Sup. Ct.); R. v. Lowe (1976), 26 C.C.C. (2d) 346 (Ont. Prov. Ct.); R. v. Nicholson
(1975) 75 D.T.C. 5095; R. v. McCallum (unreported) April 1983 (N.S. Prov. Ct.); R. v. Adams (1992) B.C.J. No. 2553; R. v. Ross (1997) N.S.J. No. 370 (N.S. Prov. Ct.).

[114] The leading case in the United States is Holland v. United States, supra. Clarke J. noted that although net worth assessments could be used for income tax purposes the limitations of the methodology must be carefully considered so as to maintain the onus of proof on the prosecution. Let me refer to some of the comments of Clarke J. which are applicable to the case at bar:

"¶23 In a typical net worth prosecution, the Government, having concluded that the taxpayer's records are inadequate as a basis for determining income tax liability, attempts to establish an "opening net worth" or total net value of the taxpayer's assets at the beginning of a given year. It then proves increases in the taxpayer's net worth for each succeeding year during the period under examination and calculates the difference between the adjusted net values of the taxpayer's assets at the beginning and end of each of the years involved. The taxpayer's nondeductible expenditures, including living expenses, are added to these increases, and if the resulting figure for any year is substantially greater than the taxable income reported by the taxpayer for that year, the Government claims the excess represents unreported taxable income. In addition, it asks the jury to infer willfulness from this understatement, when taken in connection with direct evidence of "conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or to conceal." ...

¶24 Before proceeding with a discussion of these cases, we believe it important to outline the general problems implicit in this type of litigation. In this consideration we assume, as we must in view of its widespread use, that the Government deems the net worth method useful in the enforcement of the criminal sanctions of our income tax laws. Nevertheless, careful study indicates that it is so fraught with danger for the innocent that the courts must closely scrutinize its use.

¶25 One basic assumption in establishing guilt by this method is that most assets derive from a taxable source, and that when this is not true the taxpayer is in a position to explain the discrepancy. The application of such an assumption raises serious legal problems in the administration of the criminal law. Unlike civil actions for the recovery of deficiencies, where the determinations of the Commissioner have prima facie validity, the prosecution must always prove the criminal charge beyond a reasonable doubt. This has led many of our courts to be disturbed by the use of the net worth method, particularly in its scope and the latitude which it allows prosecutors...

…

¶34 While we cannot say that these pitfalls inherent in the net worth method foreclose its use, they do require the exercise of great care and restraint. The complexity of the problem is such that it cannot be met merely by the application of general rules... Trial courts should approach these cases in the full realization that the taxpayer may be ensnared in a system which, though difficult for the prosecution to utilize, is equally hard for the defendant to refute. Charges should be especially clear, including, in addition to the formal instructions, a summary of the nature of the net worth method, the assumptions on which it rests, and the inferences available both for and against the accused. Appellate courts should review the cases, bearing constantly in mind the difficulties that arise when circumstantial evidence as to guilt is the chief weapon of a method that is itself only an approximation...

Digitized by Google

…

¶40 Establishing a Definite Opening Net Worth.

¶41 We agree with petitioners that an essential condition in cases of this type is the establishment, with reasonable certainty, of an opening net worth, to serve as a starting point from which to calculate future increases in the taxpayer's assets. The importance of accuracy in this figure is immediately apparent, as the correctness of the result depends entirely upon the inclusion in this sum of all assets on hand at the outset...

…

¶43 The Government's Investigation of Leads.

¶44 ...When the Government fails to show an investigation into the validity of such leads, the trial judge may consider them as true and the Government's case insufficient to go to the jury. This should aid in forestalling unjust prosecutions, and have the practical advantage of eliminating the dilemma, especially serious in this type of case, of the accused's being forced by the risk of an adverse verdict to come forward to substantiate leads which he had previously furnished the Government. It is a procedure entirely consistent with the position long espoused by the Government, that its duty is not to convict but to see that justice is done...

…

¶46 Net Worth Increases Must be Attributable to Taxable Income.

…

¶49 ...Increases in net worth, standing alone, cannot be assumed to be attributable to currently taxable income. But proof of a likely source, from which the jury could reasonably find that the net worth increases sprang, is sufficient. ...here the disclosed business of the petitioners was proven to be capable of producing much more income than was reported and in a quantity sufficient to account for the net worth increases."

[115] In R. v. Ross, supra Stroud P.C.J. adopted many of the passages as authoritative.

[116] Subsequently, the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Massei [1958] 355 U.S. 595 (U.S. Sup. Ct.) clarified that a likely source of income need not be proven in all cases as they had said in Holland v. United States:

"¶1 In a tax-evasion prosecution based on the net-worth method of proof sustained in Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121, proof of a likely source of the defendant's net-worth increases is not essential if all possible sources of nontaxable income are negatived by the evidence.

¶2 The Court of Appeals has based its remand in part on the absence of "proof of likely source," which it regards as an "indispensable" element of the net worth method, citing Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121, in support of its conclusion. In Holland we held that proof of a likely source was "sufficient" to convict in a net worth case where the Government did not negative all the possible nontaxable sources of the alleged net worth increase. This was not intended to imply that proof of a likely source was necessary in every case. On the contrary, should all possible sources of nontaxable income be negatived, there would be no necessity for proof of a likely source. The above explanation must be taken into consideration in applying the Holland doctrine to this case. A new trial being permissible under the terms of the order of the Court of Appeals, we affirm its judgment."

Digitized by Google

[117] Therefore, I am mindful of the dangers inherent in net worth assessments. Ms. Bottcher acting for the Crown has submitted that net worth assessments are a last resort for tax officials. That may be so; however, in using the net worth methodology the court must be careful not to ignore the dangers of that methodology thereby placing the onus upon the taxpayer to prove his or her innocence. The evidence must be of sufficient cogency to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the excess money attributed to the taxpayer is accurate. I realize that the Crown need not prove a likely source for that income beyond a reasonable doubt. However, the Crown must negative all possible nontaxable sources beyond a reasonable doubt.

…

Findings

[154] The standards applicable to the prosecution of these offences is the ordinary criminal standard. That is, the Crown must prove each element of the offences charged beyond a reasonable doubt. The standard is inextricably intertwined with the presumption of innocence. The burden of proof in criminal prosecutions rests upon the prosecution; it never shifts to the defence. A conclusion that the taxpayers are probably guilty or a civil standard of proof to the balance of probabilities would not be sufficient: R. v. Lifchus, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 320 (S.C.C.) at p. 335.

[155] Where the evidence of the prosecution is insufficient to prove the case beyond a reasonable doubt the accused taxpayers must be acquitted.

[156] This standard of proof is applicable to each and every element of the offences the taxpayers face.

[157] To prove the offence contrary to s. 239((1)(a) of the Income Tax Act, the Crown is required to prove that the taxpayers "made, acquiesced, participated in, assented to, or acquiesced in the making of a false statement or deceptive statement in an income tax return for the years specified. Also, the Crown would have to prove that they did these acts deliberately or with wilful blindness. [158] The elements of the offence of s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act the Crown would need to prove that the taxpayers failed to report income in their income tax returns for the years specified in the information and they did so to wilfully evade or in an attempt to wilfully evade the payment of taxes. Wilful evasion can be proven by the Crown showing that the taxpayers did this deliberately with intent to avoid taxes or the taxpayers were wilfully blind as to supplying that information in their tax returns.

[159] The Crown's evidence to prove these allegations is circumstantial. It is based upon a net worth as an indirect method of proof. The classic formula applicable to circumstantial evidence was from Hodge's case that the evidence needs to prove the accused's guilt and be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion: R. v. Comba [1938] S.C.R. 396 (S.C.C.); R. v. McIver (1965), 4 C.C.C. 182 (Ont. C.A.). However, in 1977 the Supreme Court held that the rule in Hodge's case was not a necessary jury instruction: R. v. Cooper (1977), 34 C.C.C. (2d) 18 (S.C.C.). In reality the rule in Hodge's case is simply another manner of expressing the need to prove the Crown's case beyond a reasonable doubt. In a circumstantial case the evidence is to be examined in its totality and not in a piecemeal fashion. The inferences to be drawn are from proven facts. An inference is a deduction that may be reasonably drawn from a fact or group of facts established in a proceeding. The trier of fact must be careful to separate permissible inference from impermissible speculation.

[160] Here, Revenue Canada began with a theory that Sam and Maria Derose were living a lifestyle incompatible with their reported income. Mr. Niven did some preliminary inquiries and decided that their lifestyle ought to be examined in detail and sought an audit. Mr. Tees was given carriage of the audit and did some preliminary investigation that led to his belief that the suspicions of Mr. Niven were warranted. He sought answers to his inquiries. In the words of Mr. Fazackerley, the accountant to whom he was referred by the taxpayers, he had thousands of questions. Eventually, Mr. Tees obtained bank documents which still did not explain the discrepancies between the taxpayers' lifestyle and their reported income. He did an initial net worth assessment that led him to believe that the taxpayers in which he attributed hundreds of thousands of dollars of income had not been reported in their income tax returns. Pursuant to policy he referred the matter to Special Investigations and Ms. Prudhomme for investigation for tax evasion. Ms. Prudhomme reviewed Mr. Tees' work and believed an investigation was warranted. After a lengthy audit and even lengthier investigation, both the auditor, Mr. Cameron Tees, and Ms. Prudhomme concluded that the sole source of the income attributed to the taxpayers in their net worth assessments was the cash businesses operated by them in the tax years in question. The sole source then would have been the Pasta Deli operation at West Edmonton Mall for Sam and Maria Derose. The sources of the income attributed to Antonio Derose were from his management of a Fila outlet at West Edmonton Mall, and his Pasta Deli business at Kingsway Garden Mall. Much of the Crown case was led to prove that theory. Proof of the theory is based upon certain observations made by Ms. Prudhomme and Revenue Canada in 1997 and 1998. The net worth assessment attributed hundred of thousands of dollars of undeclared income to the Derose family members.

Digitized by Google

[161] I have no doubt of the sincerity of the belief of Ms. Prudhomme and her colleagues in the discrepancy between the lifestyle of the taxpayers and their declared income. Nor do I have any doubt that they believe that the income was from only one source, the cash businesses operated by the Derose family members. Certainly considerable time and effort was expended by Revenue Canada auditors and investigators here. In the same vein, a great deal of effort was expended by the Crown in marshalling the evidence and providing written material. While one may admire these efforts, the issue to be determined is whether the Crown has proven the elements of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt.

[162] However, the theory has not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt. I have set out those reasons in great detail earlier in this judgment.

[163] Ms. Bottcher properly submitted that the failure to prove a likely source of the income attributed to a taxpayer is not fatal. This had been thought to have been the effect of the United States Supreme Court decision in Holland v. the United States, supra. Massei v. the United States, supra clarified that if all possible sources of nontaxable income are negatived there is no necessity for proof of a likely source.

[164] When the Crown relies upon a net worth assessment the trier of fact must realize that there any many pitfalls involved in the use of the net worth assessment. The calculations which attribute income must be carefully assessed. Net worth assessments are both difficult for the prosecution to utilize and the taxpayer to refute. The difficulties of its utility for the prosecution cannot relieve the prosecution of the fundamental requirement of proving a charge beyond a reasonable doubt.

[165] The determination whether the Crown has met its burden to negative all sources of nontaxable income and has proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt are factual matters to be determined in the circumstances of the individual case.

[166] I have examined the evidence in its totality to determine if the Crown has led the proof to find the taxpayers guilty of any of the offences.

[167] The proof of the guilt of the taxpayers is dependent upon the reliability of their net worth assessments. [168] The defence takes issue with the joint net worth assessments set out in exhibits 346B (Sam and Maria Derose) and exhibit 450 (Antonio and Kerry Derose). The issues relate to the opening net worth attributed to those families on December 31, 1992 and the particulars of the monies acquired in the income tax years attributed by the increase in the value of net assets. I have outlined these at some length in my judgment to this point.

Digitized by Google

[169] When the evidence is considered in its totality, a reasonable doubt exists that the Crown has negatived all nontaxable sources of income available to Sam and Maria Derose. The failure to prove this opening net assets with reasonable certainty is fatal to the Crown case against Maria and Sam Derose. Because assets were not captured by Revenue Canada with a reasonable degree of certainty, then a doubt exists that assets of some nature were available for the Deroses to use in subsequent years. The conversion of these assets would not give rise necessarily to taxable income in those subsequent years.

[170] Moreover, the method of calculating the personal expenditures and assets obtained by income of Maria and Sam Derose is also suspect. The calculations of the cost to build the house at Wilson lane are especially troublesome. The amount for that construction has not been proven with any degree of certainly. The expenditures for real estate have not been properly removed from the personal expenditures so that there is a reasonable doubt that there has been double counting. Loan payments may have been made by Antonio Derose by his father and this attributed to Maria and Sam Derose as income. At the end of day, I cannot be certain that any of the calculations made in the net worth assessment of Sam and Maria Derose are reliable so that they represent proof beyond a reasonable doubt. On all of the evidence it is my view that the Crown has failed to prove Maria and Sam Derose guilty of the offences.

[171] The methodology of Revenue Canada in relation to Antonio Derose also leaves me with a reasonable doubt that the income attributed to him in exhibit 450 are accurate. I have outlined the difficulties in some length above.

[172] At the end of the day I am left in a state whereby I am left with some suspicion that the Deroses might have been living above their means. A suspicion of this nature does not amount to proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

This method of proving s. 239(1) offences was commented on in R. v. Zuk[123] where the taxpayer was again charged under s. 239(1)(a) and (d) and the Trial Ct. held:

In this case, the Crown has attempted to prove the offences by means of a net worth assessment. The United States Supreme Court in Holland v. United States [1954] 348 U.S. 121 (l954), and again in United States v Massei [1958] 355 U.S. 595, has set out the basic principles applicable to net worth assessments in tax evasion cases. These principles can be summarized as follows:

Increases in net worth, standing alone, cannot be assumed to be attributable to taxable income. But proof of a likely source, from which the jury could reasonably find that the net worth springs, is sufficient.

The government may not disregard explanations of the defendant reasonably susceptible of being checked, but where relevant leads are not forthcoming, the government is not required to negate every possible source of nontaxable income, a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant.

Proof of a likely source of the net worth increases is not essential if the evidence negates all possible sources of non-taxable income.

These principles have been adopted in Canada, in R. v. Derose [2001] A.J. No. 1117 (Allen Prov. J), and R. v. Akl [1991] O.J. No. 3524 (Belanger Prov. J.) The use of net worth assessments has also been approved as an accepted method for supporting income tax prosecutions in other cases including: R. v. Ross [1998] N.S.J. No. 62 (N.S.S.C.) and R. v

[123] 2005 ONCJ 428

Digitized by Google

Lowe (1975) 26 C.C.C. (2d) 345 (Ont. Prov. Ct.)

...

The allegations against Mr. Zuk are derived from a net worth assessment of Mr. Zuk's assets and liabilities from December 31, l996 to December 31, l997 performed by Revenue Canada investigator Peter Zisis. A net worth assessment is an indirect method to estimate the net income an individual should have declared on their income tax based on a review of their financial circumstances during a particular point in time. There is no dispute that the correct net worth methodology is as described by forensic accountant Bruce Webster, the defence expert, as follows: 1) Estimate the individual's net worth at the beginning of the period (ensuring that all assets and liabilities are included); 2) Estimate the individual's net worth at the end of the period; 3) Calculate the change in net worth during the period by subtracting the net worth at the start of the period from the net worth at the end of the period; 4) Add any expenses not deductible for income tax purposes (eg. personal living expenses) to the change in net worth during the period; 5) Subtract any amounts received during the period that are from non-taxable sources (eg. gifts, loans, inheritance); and 6) Review whether the increase in the individual's net worth during the period is consistent with the level of income reported on their income tax return for the same period.

…

b) Onus on the Crown

In civil tax matters, if Revenue Canada does an audit and a reassessment, the onus shifts to the taxpayer to disprove the government's conclusions about the amount of tax owing. The self-reporting system that is the basis of the income tax scheme imposes a duty on the taxpayer to keep records to substantiate claims. There is an obligation on the taxpayer to come forward with documentation to rebut any government reassessment. Mr. Frost submitted that, in this case, there was little if any evidence of the type of "cogent leads furnished by the taxpayer," that would impose upon Revenue Canada the duty to investigate. In his view, suggestions made to witnesses during the course of the trial would not meet the standard set by the United States jurisprudence. He relied on U.S. v. Potts (1971) 321 F. Supp 717 (Wisconsin Dist Ct.), and U.S. v. Mackey (l965) 345 F. 2d 499 (U.S.C.A. 7th Cir.). In the former case, the only issue was that the opening net worth failed to include the value of a cheese inventory stored elsewhere because the prosecution failed to check the "lead." The court found, however, that the "leads" were "remote, vague and indefinite" and that the defendant had not introduced sufficient evidence to refute the government's opening net worth. In Mackey, the court held that whether the defendant had substantial sums of cash at the starting point is a matter within his knowledge and, where the government conducts a thorough investigation and fails to uncover evidence of cash on hand, the burden is on the defendant to come forward with evidence of cash or he remains quiet at his peril. The court went on to say that the government is required to investigate and negate "reasonable explanations by the taxpayer inconsistent with guilt" but where the defendant did not furnish any explanation which would attribute his increased net worth to other than taxable income, the defendant has a right to remain silent but he did so "at his peril." Mr. Frost provided no Canadian jurisprudence that takes the position adopted by the American courts above. He did rely on R. v. McIver (1965), 4 C.C.C. 182 (Ont. C.A.), aff'd (1966), 2. C.C.C. 289 (S.C.C.) that in a case founded in whole or in part upon circumstantial evidence the Crown is not required to negative suggestions or hypotheses of innocence which are not founded on proven facts. In his view, the "leads" upon which Mr. Murphy relied were not "evidence" upon which the court could make the finding that Mr. Zuk received income from non-taxable sources. He further submitted that where there is no evidence that the accused received any non-taxable income during the relevant period of time, the Crown need not negative any or all speculations and conjectures that some of the unreported income as disclosed by the net worth analysis was from a non- taxable source.

Digitized by Google

In my view, however, there is a distinction to be made between a careless driving case (as in McIver) and the case before this court. In McIver, the appeal court upheld the conviction where there was evidence upon which the inference could be drawn that the accused was driving carelessly, and no explanation for the accident. In a tax evasion case where the Crown seeks a conviction based on the circumstantial evidence of a net worth assessment, the Crown bears the special burden set out in Holland and Massei supra, including the burden to investigate "any explanations reasonably susceptible of being checked…." Where the Crown puts into evidence documents that raise questions on their face and where there are means available for further investigation, the Crown cannot assume that the income is taxable and expect that to be sufficient for proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

This is particularly true when the defence calls an expert forensic accountant who testified that the net worth analysis done by Revenue Canada was incomplete, and that neither he nor the Crown could determine if particular transactions into the accounts are from a taxable or nontaxable source. In Mackey, there was an expert witness for the government and the court found that "such evidence and explanatory testimony is admissible in cases of this type to aid the jury in understanding a complex fact situation." In this case, the fact situation was exceedingly complex, and the lack of an expert witness for the Crown a significant lacuna in the evidence. I agree with Allen Prov. Ct. J. in Derose, supra, para 108-111 that

The application of net worth assessments are generally technical in nature. In many circumstances, ordinary persons would be unlikely to form a correct judgment without the assistance of persons with specialized knowledge. There may be prosecutions where ordinary persons would be likely to form a correct judgment without expert assistance; this is not such a case.

…. Where the Crown is met with expert testimony that attacks the methodology used by its witnesses in the application of a net worth assessment, it may be put to a distinct disadvantage if the expert witness is credible.

Mr. Frost also submitted that "many of the alleged leads were only capable of investigation by questioning the accused" and "a defendant who chooses to remain quiet does so at his peril." With respect, I disagree. It is a fundamental principle of Canadian criminal law and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that the onus of proof in a criminal matter lies with the Crown. The defendant has a right to remain silent and require the Crown to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt: R. v. Chusid, [2002] O.J. No. 4644 para 20 (Ont. S.C.J.). In the civil tax context, the onus shifts to the taxpayer.

In the criminal context, the onus never shifts. The defendant has to prove nothing: R. v. Campbell (1977) 38 C.C.C. (3d) 6 at p. 22 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Robert [2000] O.J. No. 688 paras.14-25(Ont. C.A.). Any evidence called by the defence need only raise a reasonable doubt, and no adverse inference can be drawn from a defendant who asserts his right to remain silent. In certain situations, there may be an evidentiary burden on the defendant to call some evidence. In this case, the forensic accountant called by Mr. Zuk met that burden. His function was not to prove that Mr. Zuk obtained the disputed transactions from a non-taxable source, but only to raise a doubt about the reliability of the assumptions underlying the Crown's net worth assessment. Requiring Mr. Zuk to provide an explanation would be to shift the onus, such that his position before the criminal court would be no different than it would be in civil tax litigation. For these reasons, I decline to follow the rather dated jurisprudence from the United States that, in my view, may well be inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice protected by s. 7 of our Charter.

Digitized by Google

The quality of the net worth analysis.

Revenue Canada investigator Peter Zisis prepared the net worth analysis of Robert Zuk based on original evidence obtained from all his banks, brokerage houses, government filings, and from materials seized upon execution of search warrants at his residence, business premises, and the office of his accountant. Mr. Zisis prepared thirteen binders of exhibits and the index of their contents. James Locke, the original investigator, had initiated a series of working papers that Mr. Zisis completed as schedules to his net worth analysis. Mr. Zisis reviewed all his bank accounts, brokerage accounts, real properties, credit card accounts, everything seized under the search warrants, to determine if there were any other assets and liabilities. On the basis of this material, he was satisfied that he has sufficient information to do a net worth analysis. With the significant qualification I will discuss later, I agree.

The investigation of Robert Zuk had been a spinoff of an earlier investigation initiated into the affairs of James Hunter, and the Revenue Canada decision to do a net worth analysis had been made before Mr. Zisis was assigned the file. He testified that the net worth analysis was necessary because Mr. Zuk's increase in assets was not consistent with the income reported that year, and there were too many shares coming in and out of the accounts for which there was no value assigned. As the cost base for so many of the shares was missing, he lacked the documentation necessary to compute income using the direct method. I agree.

In doing his analysis, Mr. Zisis also considered the assets and accounts of Mr. Zuk's spouse and company. As well as the banking and brokerage records, Mr. Zisis had access to her income tax returns, and to the tax returns and financial statements of his company. The total body of documentation allowed Mr. Zisis to trace the movement of stocks and funds in and out of all the accounts. There is evidence that the affairs of Mr. Zuk and his spouse were commingled, that the proceeds of her personal investment accounts were transferred to his corporation, and that payments and stocks from the corporation went to their personal accounts. Mr. Zisis indicated that each brokerage account maintained in the name of Louise Zuk (L'Abbe) was treated as a Chinggis corporate account during the filing of the corporate tax return, and he treated her accounts the same way. Ultimately, Mr. Zisis made adjustments to accommodate her personal holdings and to reduce the liability attributed to Mr. Zuk.

Joint assets (house and bank accounts) were attributed to Robert Zuk, as were all the expenses of the household. He did, however, exclude from the opening net worth the value of Louise Zuk's cottage which she had been purchased several years previously, just as he excluded the value of the cottage from the net worth at the end. He did include as expenses the property taxes on the cottage, the mortgage payments and the over $85,000 used to pay off the outstanding balance of the mortgage in l997 from their joint credit line. Although there were concerns expressed by Mr. Murphy during the course of the trial about how Mr. Zisis dealt with the assets and accounts of Mr. Zuk's spouse, the defence expert took no issue with Mr. Zisis' approach to the income of Louise Zuk. Mr. Zisis also had available Mr. Zuk's records seized from the offices of his accountants. These documents are the contents of the accountant's file for Mr. Zuk's company, Chinggis Capital Corporation. As I indicated previously, the importance of these working papers from his accountant increased as the trial evolved.

Much of the evidence about the nature of Mr. Zuk's assets is uncontroverted. During the l997 tax year, Robert Zuk was able to purchase a $1.2 million house, pay Land Transfer

Digitized by Google

Tax of $20,525.00 and payments on a mortgage of $680,000. He paid $62,684.94 as a down payment on the lease of a Mercedes Benz 610V automobile. He made a R.R.S.P. contribution of $27,145.00. Without even incorporating standard estimates of personal expenditures, Mr. Zisis was able to document actual expenditures of $290,051.25. Mr. Zuk's shareholders account at Chinggis Capital Corporation changed from a deficit of $(208,077.41) to a balance in his favour of $41,794.19. Mr. Zisis did an exhaustive analysis of the accounts and records he reviewed. He developed schedules for each account based on the original documentation at his disposal, was able to cross-reference transfers in and out of all the accounts, and was able to develop a picture based on a correlation between sets of documents from different sources. I found that he was very careful about his calculations, alert to double counting and discrepancies, and very knowledgeable about the details of records he had reviewed.

Bruce Webster, the defence expert, agreed that a net worth analysis is a reliable method that he had used in several contexts where there was a lot of money at stake. He agreed that if the net worth at the beginning and the end were different, it is possible to conclude that the amount reported could be wrong, if the assumptions are 100% correct and the methodology accurate. He also generally approved of the methodology undertaken by Mr. Zisis in doing his analysis. He also acknowledged that he had not seen any accounts that Revenue Canada had not included. His one concern was that there were numerous transactions where there was nothing in the record to indicate the source, and more investigation was needed to determine if the deposit or transaction was taxable or not. It is this concern that is the basis for the defence.

The most significant difficulty is that Mr. Zisis relied on the documentation at his disposal and did no follow up investigation about particular problems or issues that arose in his review of the materials, or in the course of the trial. Michael Zuk, the brother of Robert Zuk, testified at trial about loans he and others were alleged to have to Robert Zuk. Mr. Zisis did no investigation about those alleged loans. Nor did he investigate the cash deposit of $400,000. from a Lance Dunlop into the Canaccord brokerage account of Mr. Zuk in October 1997 notwithstanding there was a direction in the file from Mr. Dunlop providing the name of his company and a phone number. Although he had a copy of share certificates for 300,000 Dura shares in the name of Swallowdale Investments that came into Mr. Zuk's Action Direct account in June l997, he did not investigate to determine what Swallowdale was, nor the nature of the transaction. These lapses in the investigation, and others which Mr. Webster identified, provided fodder for the defence claim that the Crown has not negated all possible sources of non-taxable income. I will discuss the evidence relating to these particular issues later.

Another difficulty is the fact that Mr. Zisis was unable to assess the value of certain shares coming into Mr. Zuk's accounts from unknown sources, for the purposes of determining their value at December 31, l996. In these circumstances, Mr. Zisis saw that the accountant had given them a zero value, and he did the same. He said that he gave them a "$1.00" value for the sole purpose of indicating that they existed. He did this with the 68,000 World Wise Shares held in Mr. Zuk's Canaccord 419-584A-7 account on December 31, l996, and also the 10,000 Dura shares held in Robert Zuk's Nesbitt Burns account 410-89239-2 on the same date. Mr. Murphy contended that the opening net worth of Mr. Zuk is incorrect because Mr. Zisis failed to include in Mr. Zuk's opening assets the actual value of these shares. Mr. Zisis agreed that had he been able to determine the actual cost of these shareholdings, the calculation of Mr. Zuk's assets in his brokerage accounts at the time would have to be adjusted upward, thereby lowering to the same extent the increase attributed in his unreported income. Mr. Webster testified that, as the cost of these shares is unknown, the upward adjustment necessary in the opening net worth is also unknown.

Digitized by Google

There is a similar concern with respect to the value of share certificates that Mr. Zuk may have been holding in street form on December 31, l996. Mr. Zisis had no knowledge of any such share certificates, and there is no evidence before the court that Mr. Zuk actually held any share certificates in street form on that date. The entire prosecution, however, is based on the fact that multiple transactions went through his brokerage accounts during l997 in which large blocks of shares came into his accounts with no indication as to any cost paid, and with no identifiable source. As I will discuss more fully hereafter, the Crown's theory of the case is that he must have been holding share certificates for Transway/Dura in street form which he then deposited into his brokerage accounts as the value of the shares climbed.

If the Crown's theory is correct, the issue becomes the value of those share certificates for the purposes of determining his true opening net worth. Mr. Frost asserts that, if any such certificates existed, they properly had no value because they were shares gifted to Mr. Zuk in previous years. Mr. Murphy submits that these gifted shares would have been out of his portfolio by December 31, l996, and any share certificates he held then must be valued at the cost he paid to purchase them. As I will discuss more fully later, on the evidence before me, I cannot determine this issue either way.

Mr. Webster indicated that neither he nor Mr. Zisis knew that cost, but that it could have been ascertained by further investigation. He said that, had all the l996 records been available, they might have indicated if Robert Zuk held stock certificates in street form, but "if he received them over the counter" they may not show up in his brokerage accounts. Apart from asking Robert Zuk or his accountant, he said that an investigator looking into the issue of whether Robert Zuk held stock certificates in street form at the end of l996 may have gleaned information from the records or officers of Transway/Dura Products. Mr. Webster agreed that when someone is in the business of stock promotion as a livelihood, it is reasonable to investigate if he held shares in certificate form. As a layperson, it also strikes me that the brokerage houses which issued particular share certificates (eg. Midland Walwyn) may have had information relevant to actual sources and prices. The papers and records of James Hunter and Michael Zuk, witnesses in this trial and before the courts on similar charges, may have had relevant information. None of this investigation was done in this case.

Mr. Zisis had never done a net worth prosecution previously, and knew no one who had done so. He was totally candid in his cross-examination, admitting quite openly problems identified by Mr. Murphy and later confirmed by Mr. Webster. After all his very extensive analysis of Mr. Zuk's affairs, Mr. Zisis ultimately admitted that he could not say how much taxable income Mr. Zuk received from the buying and selling of shares in l997. He also admitted that the inference of unreported income would be stronger if Revenue Canada had investigated the unidentified transactions and the potential loans.

Although the court retains the capacity to adjust the net worth to what is actually proven by the Crown beyond a reasonable doubt: R. v. Century 21 Ramos Realty Inc. (1987), 32 C.C.C. (3d) 353 (Ont. C.A.), this concession by the Revenue Canada investigator has to be given great weight. If he who knows the file better than anyone else cannot say how much taxable income has been misreported, and therefore how much tax has been evaded, how is a trier of fact, without any expertise in accounting or taxation, to find otherwise beyond a reasonable doubt?

Has the Crown proven a likely source of his unreported income?

The theory of the Crown's case is that the increase in wealth evident from the net worth analysis of Mr. Zuk is attributable to a taxable source, his business of stock promotion. To be more specific, the Crown asserts the Mr. Zuk received approximately 200,000 shares, and later a portion of 3.3 million more shares, from James Hunter in a company called Transway (known later as Dura Products). He also received warrants to purchase several million more shares at 20 cents per share to be exercised before December 31, l996 These shares and the warrants to purchase more shares were given to Mr. Zuk as part of a merger in l995 between Mr. Hunter's public company and another company owned by Mr. Zuk's sister-in-law. In exchange for the Transway shares, Mr. Robert Zuk was to promote the shares and the company. There is evidence that Robert Zuk was very successful in his efforts, and that the shares increased in value from under 20 cents to more than $5.00 per share. There is also evidence that he was never paid by Transway/Dura Products for his services, and that his remuneration for promoting the stock was to be the increase in the value of the shares. It is this increase in the value of these shares which the Crown asserts accounts for the increase in Mr. Zuk's assets. Much of the Crown's case consisted of Mr. Zisis' evidence about his net worth analysis and the documentation on which it was based. Other Revenue Canada investigators gave evidence of statements made by Mr. Zuk, which were admitted in evidence after a voir dire, and also of documents obtained through execution of search warrants on Mr. Zuk's home, business premises, and the offices of his accountant.

Digitized by Google

Several officials of stock brokerage firms gave evidence of practices in the industry and of the specific nature of Mr. Zuk's accounts. In addition, the Crown called under subpoena two individuals facing similar charges: Michael Zuk, the brother of Robert Zuk, and James Hunter, a business associate of the Zuks.

On February 7, l998 Robert Zuk told Revenue Canada investigator Michael Arthur that James Hunter had gifted 200,000 Transway shares to him, as he was acting as promoter of the company, to assist in maintaining the share price of the company. Mr. Zuk also told the investigator that Mr. Hunter "had made quite a bit of money from his shares in Transway." After further review of T5008 information filed with the department identifying a high volume of Transway share sales, Mr. Arthur wrote Robert Zuk on June 1, 1998 to advise that he too was under investigation. Robert Zuk called him three days later, and again said that Hunter "had made a lot of money" on the Transway stock.

At the time of this conversation, Revenue Canada was conducting an investigation of James Hunter. Robert Zuk's statements do establish that he had received 200,000 Transway shares at no cost to himself, and with the expectation that the remuneration for his efforts in promoting the stock would come from the increase in the value of the shares. It is a reasonable inference that if Mr. Hunter "made a lot of money" on the Transway stock, Robert Zuk did as well. The admission, however, only extends to 200,000 shares. Robert Zuk said nothing to the investigators about millions of other Transway shares other witnesses said he had also acquired from Mr. Hunter. James Hunter, as President of Transway in March 1994, testified that he held more than five million Transway common shares and five million share purchase warrants. He testified that when Transway acquired Cantech in November l995, he needed help to promote the company, and, to that end, he entered into an unwritten agreement with "the Zuks" whereby Robert was to promote the stock and bring in shareholders, while his brother Michael arranged financing. Hunter testified that the agreement with Robert Zuk "as to how he would be retained" was that Hunter "delivered some stock freely, I think …about two 500,000 shares, I don't recall exactly, just to get him started, and then later I delivered, I think about 3.3 million shares." He then said that "the first batch he got was about two to 500,000" which Hunter "gave to (them)…he didn't pay anything." Hunter said that he gave the initial batch of shares to Robert Zuk before November 7, 1995. He later said that he "gave about 3.3 million (of his initial shares) to the Zuks…and I think I gave them an extra two or five, I don't recall exactly…." He insisted that that he "delivered them…to both of them I just gave them to the Zuks. I don't know how they split them up, I didn't care." He again reiterated that "they didn't pay anything" but "later" he received some remuneration for those shares as "I had about a million two left, and as a result when they appreciated in value, that's the remuneration that I received." As he indicated, the incentive to promoting the stock was the appreciation in its value.

Digitized by Google

James Hunter also testified that he delivered to the Zuks in November 1995 the right to exercise the warrants. He said that he delivered five million warrants to the Zuks and "they must have exercised them by December 31st, 1996 at 20 cents per share." He indicated that he never exercised the warrants himself.

In cross-examination, Mr. Hunter said that when he gave the 3.3 million shares to the Zuks, the price was "around 25 cents, 30 cents, something like that." At the time, he said the warrants "had no intrinsic value." He indicated that he was happy with Mr. Zuk's later performance as "the stock went from 25 cents up to five dollars." He testified that his own adjusted cost base for the 1.6 million shares he had remaining "comes out to about 97 cents." Mr. Hunter indicated that Transway "morphed into Dura Products" and was "one of the busiest trading vehicles on the stock exchange." He testified that "all the directors made a lot of money…A lot of individuals, people that had options, had the warrants and they sold them, they got out of it" and when people had stock to sell, they called Robert Zuk "because you made it liquid. You'd pick up all the stock, you'd buy it all."

The Crown relies on this evidence from James Hunter to establish that Mr. Zuk was given millions of shares, at no cost, in exchange for his services promoting the stock and for which he would be paid by the increase in the value of the stock. There are, however, significant difficulties with Hunter's testimony. He also is currently facing tax evasion charges in the Superior Court. It was the investigation of his affairs that led to the investigation and charges against Robert Zuk. Although James Hunter enjoys the presumption of innocence, Mr. Hunter's credibility is a concern. There is also evidence from other statements attributed to Robert Zuk by Mr. Arthur that there are hard feelings between Mr. Zuk and Mr. Hunter. This animosity between them may well affect Hunter's credibility before this court. More important, Mr. Hunter's evidence is decidedly vague and contradictory. He is not certain about how many shares he originally gave to Robert Zuk. He says that he gave the much larger block of shares to "the Zuks" and he didn't know how they divided them between them. On the basis of this evidence, it is impossible for this court to determine how many shares James Hunter actually gave to Robert Zuk. There is also no evidence whether Mr. Hunter gave these shares to Robert Zuk in his personal capacity, or to Robert Zuk's corporation, Chinggis Capital. Michael Zuk confirmed that James Hunter was originally the largest shareholder in Transway (with five million shares and five million warrants), but his evidence as to what happened to those shares differed markedly from that given by Hunter. He said that he received 500,000 shares and 250,000 purchase warrants in the name of his wife. He said Transway was not actively traded in l996 and was valued at eight to fifteen cents, less than the warrants. He said that Robert Zuk "may have had a few hundred thousand shares" as he was engaged by Hunter to do investor relations. He also indicated that Hunter transferred three million shares in street form to him and other investors who promised additional funding down the road. He said he retained approximately "a half a million" of those shares. He later said that he had "no idea" if Robert received any other shares from Hunter "I would suspect not," and, at this point, he wasn't even "sure" about the couple thousand he had spoken of previously. He insisted that he "never received any shares for free or otherwise, all of which I paid for."

He agreed, however, that the expectation that the value of his shareholdings would improve was an important consideration in the work he was doing. He indicated that when Transway took over Cantec, there were maybe 500 to 1000 shareholders, "all small…like 100, 200 share lots." "By the end of l997, we had approximately…5000 shareholders, of which half were in the US, 40 percent Canada, 10 percent elsewhere....we had four or five major investors that the company did not have before....and we were probably one of the most admired little companies out there for what we have done and, in fact, probably begat Robert a number of jobs." Michael Zuk confirmed that Hunter had given him and his brother the option of exercising four million warrants at 20 cents a share. Both he and Robert exercised those warrants in July or August 1996. He gave several different renditions of how Robert Zuk could afford to exercise the warrants. He first said Chinggis had put money into the company and "I would have topped that up, so he could have bought his shares and then he would have repaid me later on." First, he said that this "topping up" loan was repaid within six months (before the end of l996). Later he testified that there was still "$10,000, $15,000, so 210, 205, 200" cash still owing on this loan on January 1, 1997. Still later, he returned to his position that this loan had been "paid back, sometime...relatively close, close proximity." Ultimately, he said that "in fact, the full amount might have been my money, I'm not sure at that point in time because Robert owed me money from time to time, and other things." He testified that "those shares might have been in street form." Michael Zuk is also charged with similar offences in another proceeding before this court. In my view, he was a poor witness, inconsistent and contradictory in his rendition of what occurred, and vague about times and details. I do not accept his evidence about the quantity of shares initially given to Robert Zuk by James Hunter, nor about the three million additional shares transferred to him "and other investors," nor that he paid for all these shares. Although Mr. Hunter Michael Zuk differed as to the actual number of warrants the Zuks received, I do accept that James Hunter gave Robert Zuk, and his brother, warrants to purchase at least four million shares of Transway at a cost of twenty cents, and that these options were exercised in July or August l996. Michael Arthur testified that the sales of Transway shares he was investigating in early l998 "were as a result of options that were exercised at 20 cents a share...and sold at significantly higher than 20 cents." Both James Hunter and Michael Zuk readily testified about the existence of the warrants, although Mr. Hunter had no first hand knowledge of when they were exercised.

Digitized by Google

Michael Zuk's contradictory renditions of how the options was financed do not detract from the essential fact that the options were exercised for each to acquire at least two million more Transway common shares in l996. It is a reasonable inference from the evidence of Michael Zuk generally that these options were transferred to the Zuks in street form, although there is no direct evidence before the court to confirm this.

The Crown relies on this evidence to establish that Robert Zuk obtained two million Transway shares at twenty cents per share in l996 that he later sold at a substantial profit that was part of his unreported income. There are two difficulties with this theory. The first is that I cannot find, on the evidence before this court, whether Robert Zuk acquired the two million shares in his personal capacity, or whether the shares went into his Chinggis accounts. Secondly, to the extent Robert Zuk still retained "cheap" shares at the end of 1996 in his personal capacity, the cost of these shares at twenty cents per share should have been included in his opening net worth. Mr. Zisis testified that he never spoke to Mr. Hunter about the matter, and he didn't conduct any investigation to find out if Robert Zuk still had any of the Hunter shares on December 31, l996.

He indicated, in cross-examination, that he was not aware of how many shares Mr. Zuk had disposed of in l996 because the records were not complete. Only at the conclusion of the trial did both counsel agree to the admission of a chart tracing pre-l997 Transway sales (Exhibit 24) taken from the brokerage firm records filed with the court previously.

Although there was no witness to explain the chart or to answer questions about its use, the chart provided the court with useful information. The parties agree that, based on the available records, Mr. Zuk sold over 2.7 million Transway shares prior to 1997. One inference Mr. Murphy urged me to draw from this material is that all the free shares Mr. Zuk would have acquired from James Hunter in l995 and l996 would have been sold before the beginning of the 1997 tax year. Mr. Frost, by contrast, submitted that, since the total number of Transway shares sold included Transway shares Mr. Zuk would have bought during that period, there remained many million more free or cheap shares unaccounted for which remained in his possession.

Digitized by Google

The difficulty is that the great bulk of the sales shown in Exhibit 24 related to Transway sales by Chinggis and by Louise Zuk (treated as Chinggis), a total of 2,286,100 shares sold. Transway sales by Robert Zuk, apart from those of his company, pre-l997 amounted to 449,800 shares, only 16.4% of the total. As the income and tax liability of Chinggis is not before this court, it is hard to know what inferences can properly be drawn from this evidence. The issue is whether Robert Zuk (in his non-corporate capacity) had disposed of all (or most of) his free or cheap shares before 1997. Since I do not know how many shares he actually received, and whether these shares went into his company or to him personally, it is impossible to draw any conclusions at all from this material except that Mr. Zuk did sell very substantial numbers of Transway shares during the period.

Mr. Zisis admitted he conducted no other investigation than that which was apparent in the brokerage records provided to Revenue Canada. Nor did he investigate whether Mr. Zuk held any share certificates or cashed in any shares in certificate form.

He acknowledged that it was possible Mr. Zuk still held Transway shares in street form from Mr. Hunter, or from the exercise of his warrants, on December 31, l996. If so, he agreed, they would be an asset valued at their historical cost that should be included as an asset in the net worth analysis as of December 31, l996. If the shares were a gift, they would be valued at zero. If Mr. Zuk had paid for them, even at 20 cents per share on the exercise of the warrants, that cost would need to be reflected in the value. Several witnesses from Mr. Zuk's brokerage houses gave evidence substantiating the large number of Transway/Dura transactions by Mr. Zuk, his wife and his company during the relevant time, and the pattern of share certificates coming into Mr. Zuk's personal and corporate accounts with no value attached and no indication as to source. Stephen Leacock identified accounts held by Merit Investments. At December 31, 1996, Transway shares were trading at 85 cents a share. During l997, the market value of those shares fluctuated from $1.70 in January to $3.70 in December l997. In his view, the accounts indicated that Mr. Zuk was doing a "fair amount of free riding." This means that Mr. Zuk had trades of substantial amounts without actually settling his trades with cash.

James Doyle had worked at C.M. Oliver in l997. He gave evidence about the activity of Mr. Zuk's Chinggis Capital Corp account. Again the account indicates substantial activity in Transway/Dura shares, and the significant increase in the value of the shares during the l997 year. These accounts show clearly the extent to which share certificates were moved into Mr. Zuk's accounts with no value attached. Mr. Doyle also testified that, in l997, third parties were allowed to deliver stocks into accounts and clients were under no obligation to inform their broker where the stocks came from. Similarly, a third party could lend stocks to the account holder. Mr. Doyle testified that this account indicated Robert Zuk was trading on equity in his account and was engaging in "very high risk" trading practices.

Chris Schaule identified and produced the records of Taurus Capital Accounts held by Robert Zuk, his wife Louise L'Abbe and by Chinggis. It is unnecessary for me to relate here the details of these accounts. Having reviewed them in detail, however, I conclude that they well illustrate the complexity of this prosecution as it was originally conceived and presented by the Crown. It is clear that Robert Zuk was the directing mind for his corporation, for his wife, and on his own behalf. For the purpose of tracing the movement of transactions between the accounts, Mr. Zisis looked at all the accounts Robert Zuk controlled. For the purpose of the net worth analysis, however, Mr. Zisis only considered those accounts in Robert Zuk's name. It is clear from this evidence of how these particular accounts operated that Transway/Dura shares (and other shares as well) came into the accounts at no cost and from no recorded source, were sold for substantial profit, and the proceeds channeled back primarily to the corporation or to Louise L'Abbe (treated as the corporation for tax purposes).

Digitized by Google

Given this pattern of activity in late l996 and in l997, I consider it a reasonable inference that Robert Zuk was holding share certificates in Transway/Dura at the end of l996 that he subsequently deposited into his accounts. On Michael Zuk's evidence, as corroborated by at least one copy of a direction for the transfer, some share certificates also came into his trading accounts from his brother. On the evidence before me, and given my findings of credibility with respect to Michael Zuk, I cannot determine which when. It strikes me, however, that the great bulk of those certificates were deposited into his corporate accounts or the accounts of his wife. On the evidence before me, it is impossible to know how many share certificates Robert Zuk held in his personal capacity on December 31, l996, how many he actually deposited into his personal accounts, and what values should be attached to them.

The l997 income tax returns of Louise L'Abbe (Zuk) and the corporation were entered as exhibits before the court without commentary or explanation. According to Mr. Zisis, there are no problems with those returns. With respect to the Chinggis return, however, he only looked at the shareholders account, and the year end financial statements for Chinggis in September l997 and September l998. Those financial statements show that the assets of Chinggis more than doubled between 1996 and l997, and more than doubled again between l997 and l998. According to the corporate balance sheet, $1,243,840 was due to Robert Zuk in his shareholder account on September 30, l998, compared to $184,000 the previous year.

It is clear that Mr. Zuk made a substantial profit from his business of buying and selling shares in l997 and l998. It is also clear that he made a significant profit from the sale of Transway/Dura shares. Since so much of the activity relating to Transway/Dura shares, however, was conducted through the accounts of his business (including those of his spouse), I am not satisfied that the Crown has proven that his alleged unreported income came from his personal business of buying and selling Transway/Dura shares in l997. Evidence that 1.7 to 1.9 million shares of Transway/Dura were deposited into his accounts in l997 does not differentiate between accounts he held personally, and accounts of his corporation. The fact that Mr. Webster knew nothing about Robert Zuk's corporation, looked at none of his corporate accounts, and identified in his personal accounts only a relatively few (sixteen) share transactions where the source was not known suggests that the great bulk of the transactions involving Transway/Dura share certificates, unknown sources, and unknown values were in the context of his corporate activities. Again, the assistance of an expert forensic accountant for the Crown would have been useful.

The theory of the Crown is that Mr. Zuk made a much higher income than he reported from the sale of Transway/Dura shares at increasingly higher values. Although this is likely, or even highly probable, the Crown has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Mr. Zuks increased income in l997 was from the sale of Transway/Dura shares, nor how much he failed to report.

I cannot find beyond a reasonable doubt exactly how many Hunter shares were given to Robert Zuk, how many of those shares were sold through his corporate accounts, and how many he retained for himself. That large proportion of shares that went into his corporate accounts were presumably dealt with in the books of his corporation; the tax liability of his corporation is not the subject of this prosecution. If he did retain Transway/Dura shares in street form as of December 31, l996, an inference that I can reasonably draw on the evidence before me, it cannot be assumed that these shares were the "gifted" shares (having a zero) value as opposed to "cheap shares" he obtained through exercising the Hunter warrants at twenty cents per share earlier in l996. If the latter case, the actual cost of these "cheap shares" would need to be added to his assets in December 31, l996, thereby reducing the amount of the unreported income he is alleged to have made that year. On the other hand, the fact that his accountant dealt with all his brokerage accounts, and assigned a zero value to most of the unidentified share deposits into the accounts, and a value of $1.18 to others, means that the profits and losses from the purchase and sale of those transactions were included in the income tax return he filed with Revenue Canada. Mr. Zisis and Mr. Webster agreed that all the accounts were included in the Revenue Canada analysis, and transactions between the accounts of Mr. Zuk, his spouse and his company did not change Mr. Zuk's net worth, as they were shuffles between accounts. On the evidence before me, without the assistance of an expert forensic accountant for the Crown, the Crown has not proven beyond a reasonable doubt the source of his alleged unreported income.

Digitized by Google

Has the Crown negated all sources of non-taxable income?

The only evidence tendered by the defence was a report and viva voce evidence of Mr. Bruce Webster, a forensic accountant whose qualifications were conceded by the Crown. Mr. Webster reviewed five of thirty accounts in this matter, those making up 85% of the cash assets and share holdings of Mr. Zuk at the end of l997. Mr. Webster did a spreadsheet of all transactions in these accounts, compared his spreadsheets with similar spreadsheets prepared by Mr. Zisis, and compared both to the work product of Mr. Zuk's accountant.

.

He concluded that apart from one transaction on December 4, l997 (involving Galavu shares sold for $9,618.00), he was unable to identify any l997 sale or purchase transaction on the Revenue Canada working papers that was not included in Mr. Zuk's personal income tax return. He indicated that the one exception, coming late in the year, could possibly have been reported in l998, but that could not be checked without seeing his l998 tax return. Mr. Webster concluded that this fact suggests that Robert Zuk did not intentionally withhold documents with respect to share sales and purchases from his accountant for the purpose of underreporting.

As I indicated previously, Mr. Webster's primary concern with the net worth statement related to transfers of cash or shares in and out of Mr. Zuk's accounts with no indication as to source or purpose. With respect to these transactions, he concluded that the Canada Revenue Agency followed, but did not complete, the net worth analysis methodology, and, without further information, neither he nor they could conclude that the entire increase in Mr. Zuk's holdings came from a taxable source. Without further information, he indicated that he could not say what amount should be attributed to Robert Zuk's taxable sources, and what should be attributed to non-taxable sources. In all, he identified twenty-two transactions where further information was necessary. I shall deal hereafter with the transactions identified by Mr. Webster as problematic (including his concern about Mr. Zuk's shareholder account which arose at trial). I will then discuss other sources of potential non-taxable income raised by the defence: loans of share certificates and personal loans from Michael Zuk, other potential personal loans, and other potential non-taxable sources.

Digitized by Google

Deposit into Canaccord account

A deposit of $400,000 into the Canaccord account (#419-584A-7) on October 7, 1997 was the primary reason for the increase in the value of this account (as calculated by Revenue Canada) from $34,236. at the start of l997 to $438,925 at the end of the year. The account statement indicates that this payment was used to purchase 119,300 Dura shares at values from $2.80 to $3.00. This substantial cash infusion into the account is reflected in the increased value of the Dura share holdings in this account on the net worth statement as of December 31, 1997.

Mr. Webster testified that the CRA working papers do not indicate what work was performed, if any, to verify the source of this deposit, and whether it was taxable or nontaxable. Using the information available to him, he was unable to say one way or the other. From a direction included in the exhibits, this amount appears to be a transfer from a Lance Dunlop who wrote on the letterhead of Land Mining Res., a Division of 741204 Ont. Ltd., with an address in Longford Mills Ontario and telephone number (705) 327- 2697. Mr. Zisis testified that "we assumed it was income" as it had come into his business account, Robert Zuk treated it as his own, and there was no evidence of any loan agreement, any repayment or reciprocal transfer of those funds or shares back to Dunlop during the year. He admitted that no one called Lance Dunlop and that he personally did not verify why the funds came into the account.

Mr. Zisis and Mr. Webster agree that the $400,000 did not show up in the working papers of the accountant, nor in his income tax return, except indirectly through the subsequent sale of shares. Both agreed that it also did not show up as a loan. Mr. Webster noted, however, that the fact the accountant did not include it in Mr. Zuk's income is consistent with the amount being a loan, as for the purposes of a tax return, the proper approach is that his accountant not list his liabilities.

Since this one transaction accounts for more than one half of Mr. Zuk's brokerage holdings in the concluding net worth, it is incomprehensible why further investigation of this transaction was not undertaken. Mr. Frost submitted that the absence of any documentation or paper trail that is customary in loan transactions is evidence that the deposit was income. There is a certain appeal to this submission, particularly in the face of substantial documentation in the seized records indicating that there was an ongoing business relationship between Robert Zuk and Lance Dunlop. There is, for example, a share purchase agreement dated March 12, l997, with a payment schedule, and signed by both Robert Zuk as the purchaser and Lance Dunlop as the seller. There is a memo from Lance Dunlop to Robert Zuk dated August l997 re a wire transfer of funds to a Barklays Bank in the Bahamas. There are two Chinggis Corp. cheques to Lance Dunlop signed by Robert Zuk, presumably for payments on the share purchase agreement. In the face of such a track record of documentation, one would expect that any loan transaction between Robert Zuk and Lance Dunlop would be supported with some documentation. There is, however, no documentation whatsoever about the purpose of this very large $400,000 deposit.

In the circumstances, the onus remains on the Crown to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that its "assumption" that this was income is correct. Where there has been no investigation, notwithstanding information readily available as to the source, the benefit of the doubt must go to Mr. Zuk. In oral argument, Mr. Frost conceded as much, indicating that if the court was not satisfied that this amount was income, then it should be deducted from the closing net worth. In my view, this is the correct approach to this particular amount.

Deposits of $110,000 into Royal Bank account

On July 31, 1997, Mr. Zuk and his wife purchased a residence at 13 Queen Mary's Drive valued at $1.2 million. Mr. Zisis testified that the house purchase was financed by a mortgage for $680,000 to the Royal Bank that shows up in the liabilities on his net worth. Mr. Zisis also testified that more than $500,000 came into Robert and Louise Zuk's account for the purchase of their house which he could not account for from the materials available. More precisely, he noted that there were two deposits on July 31, l997 into the Royal Bank account of Louise and Robert Zuk, one for $165,000 and the other for $591,000, for which he could not identify the source of $523,000. Mr. Webster reviewed the same brokerage accounts and bank accounts. With respect to the deposit of $165,000, he could not determine the source of three cheques totaling $70,000. Of the four cheques totaling $591,495, he was unable to trace only one cheque for $40,000. Given his professional qualifications, I would accept Mr. Webster's evidence on this issue over that of Mr. Zisis. Again, Mr. Webster found that the CRA working papers do not indicate what work was performed, if any, to verify whether the source of these deposits was taxable and, using the information available to him, he was unable to identify whether these deposits were taxable or not. When asked what else could have been done to determine where these amounts came from, his response was to ask Robert Zuk or his accountant. Robert Zuk did not testify, and there is no evidence how his accountant treated these transactions for tax purposes. As the court cannot determine whether these amounts are from a taxable or nontaxable source, the court is left with a doubt that must be resolved in favour of Mr. Zuk. Again, as Mr. Frost conceded in oral argument, if there is any doubt the $110,000. would need to be deducted from his closing net worth.

Digitized by Google

Payment to Dura Products

Mr. Webster also identified a payment of $55,022.50 to Dura Products on October 22, l997 from Mr. Zuk's Canaccord account (#419-58A-7). He indicated again that the CRA working papers do not indicate what work was performed, if any, to verify the use of this payment, and he could not identify whether this payment relates to a taxable or non-taxable use. He acknowledged that CRA treated this payment as a reduction in Mr. Zuk's net worth (a position favourable to the taxpayer), but he could not say if this approach is correct or not. Neither can I.

300,000 Transway shares and 250,000 Galavu shares into Action Direct

Two deposits of large shareholdings came into the Royal Bank Action Direct account in the name of Mr. Zuk and Louise l'Abbe in June l997 with no indication of any source or cost. These were 300,000 Transway shares on June 4, l997, and 25,000 Galavu shares on June 9, l997. The source and cost of these shares became key issues. As Mr. Zisis had given no value to these shares and Mr. Zuk's accountant gave both blocks of shares a cost of $1.18 per share, Mr. Murphy asserted that the combination of the two blocks of holdings would account for $649,000 of the alleged unreported income. As Revenue Canada did not investigate the source of these shares, it could not be assumed that the shares came from a taxable source, and the cost of the shares should be deducted from Mr. Zuk's net worth. Mr. Frost submitted that the accountant's treatment of the shares was evidence that they came from a taxable source. As there was no evidence indicating how the accountant arrived at his valuation, Mr. Frost also insisted that the effect of assigning those stock holdings that value was to reduce the capital gain that would have otherwise accrued by $649,000. In my view, they are both wrong.

I will deal first with the issue of whether the shares were from a taxable source. Mr. Webster initially found that as the CRA working papers did not indicate what work was performed, if any, to verify the source of these share transfers or the assigned value, he could not determine whether these shares were from a taxable or non-taxable source. Mr. Webster initially testified that, if the investigator did not know where those shares came from, the conservative approach would have been to reduce Mr. Zuk's net worth by their value. He also testified that further investigation should have been done, through discussions with Mr. Zuk, his accountant, or reviewing his income tax return to see how the transfer was handled for income tax purposes. At trial, Mr. Webster learned that copies of the Transway share certificates from Swallowdale Investments had been found at Mr. Zuk's business address. He acknowledged that Mr. Zuk's accountant had treated these blocks of shares as from a taxable source, given them a value of $1.18, and included them in Mr. Zuk's l997 income tax return. When confronted in cross-examination with these circumstances, Mr. Webster then changed his position. Then, he testified that if Robert Zuk spent $649,000 in actual expenditures for these shares, the effect on the net worth analysis would depend on when he bought them, and their actual cost. lf before the beginning of year, the opening net worth should include an asset of that value. lf bought earlier in the year, one would need an explanation for how he afforded that purchase; either something was missed in the opening balance, or from extra income, or he got them at no cost. lf he sold them, they would not be in the ending net worth unless he used them to purchase an asset, in which case they would be included in his assets and expenditures. Later, he said that the values put on these shares by the accountant are consistent with how the accountant might have treated a potential short selling transaction.

Digitized by Google

The absence of documentation in the records led Mr. Zisis to believe that this Action Direct account did not exist in December l996. The records indicated there were no share holdings in the account on December 31, l997. Since this was the case, Mr. Zisis had no need to put any value on these shares, nor to investigate the account further, and he did not. Mr. Zisis candidly admitted that, apart from the fact that copies of the 300,000 Transway share certificates from Swallowdale Investments Ltd. were seized from Mr. Zuk's Chinggis Capital office, he had no idea where they came from. He noted, however, that the accountant had given them a value of $1.18 a share and that the accountant found that Mr. Zuk had made money on the Dura shares and lost money on the Galavu shares. He assumed that, as the accountant had included the Action Direct account in Mr. Zuk's brokerage summary, funds within that account were considered part of his business income. The records of that account indicates that these shares were traded and sold, with significant funds transferred out to an RBC account which Mr. Zisis testified was used to purchase Mr. Zuk's home, furniture and the leased car.

As for the cost attributed to the shares, there is no evidence to show how the accountant arrived at the value. Ex. 12-9 p. 80 of the accountant's working papers is a note that, on its face, the person who made the note (Mr. Zuk's accountant?) indicates that he is to "discuss with Robert and determine share unit price with him for those shares directly purchased from companies and received by brokers without cost." It is not clear whether this is reference to the Swallowdale shares, or others, or all the shares without identifiable sources and costs. The implication of Mr. Frost's submissions is that Mr. Zuk provided his accountant with an inflated value, which the accountant used to reduce his reportable taxable income.

On the evidence before me, I make the following findings. 1. Prima facie, the fact that the accountant treated them as from a taxable source and gave them a value is evidence that they were considered part of his taxable income. Subject to my caveat earlier about the weight to be given to the accountant's papers, it is a reasonable inference that they were from a taxable source but, absent investigation, the court cannot be certain. 2. Mr. Zisis testified that he had no evidence that the value assigned to the shares by the accountant was incorrect, and admitted it was "possible his treatment was correct." There is absolutely no evidence from the Crown to prove any other cost, notwithstanding the implication of Mr. Frost's submission that the actual cost must have been zero. The Crown relied on values used by the accountant in other contexts. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If there is "a possibility" that the share value is accurate, the benefit of the doubt must go to Mr. Zuk.

Digitized by Google

Ex. 1-30 is an itemized listing of all the transactions in and out of this account. Five hundred and fifty thousand shares were transferred into this account in early June l997 and, on a rough calculation, over $650 thousand were transferred out of the account in the next seven months to various bank accounts of Robert and Louise Zuk. It strikes me that this account may well have been a key source of how Mr. Zuk accumulated the assets he did during the year. That being the case, the account is highly relevant to the issue of a likely source of Mr. Zuk's alleged unreported income. Yet Revenue Canada the Crown did no investigation of the source of these large blocks of shares and has no evidence to prove that they had any value other than that assigned by Mr. Zuk's accountant.

This is particularly concerning as Revenue Canada had true copies of the three 100,000 Transway share certificates from Swallowdale Investments Ltd. that were seized from Mr. Zuk's Chinggis office on execution of the search warrant. These were found in a file labelled "Action Direct: Zuk, L'Abbe." In the file was a yellow post it note directing that these share certificates be deposited "in our action direct account." On the face of the Swallowdale share certificate (Ex. 11-12 p. 126) there is an indication that these shares were the property of Swallowdale Investments Ltd. on February 12, 1997. There is also the notation that the Transfer Agent and Registrar of the Corporation was the R-M Trust Company, Toronto Ontario. Given the ultimate importance of this account to the prosecution, it is incomprehensible why Revenue Canada did not investigate the nature of Swallowdale Investments, the provenance of the shares, when Mr. Zuk acquired them (presumably after February l997), and at what cost. On its face, these shares do not come from James Hunter as part of the package of gifted shares or options acquired in 1995 and l996. Swallowdale Investments is another source that remains unidentified. Galavu shares were not part of the original transactions. As Mr. Wilson testified, the effect on the net worth analysis depends on when these shares were acquired, and the actual cost. In the absence of investigation by the Crown, the benefit of the doubt must go to Mr. Zuk.

Other Schedule I Transactions

There were other transactions in Mr. Webster's Schedule I for which he was unable to identify whether from a taxable or nontaxable source, or for a taxable or nontaxable use. Two of those transactions were transfers into Mr. Zuk's accounts of numbered certificates totaling 80,000 Dura/Transway shares registered to Midland Walwyn. As Michael Zuk testified he used Midland Walwyn, these transactions could be some of the share certificates he said he lent to his brother (see discussion to follow). As the actual certificate numbers are in the records, Revenue Canada could have investigated the source of these certificates through Midland Walwyn and did not do so. The remaining eleven transactions identified in Mr. Webster's Schedule I were a substantial number of shares going out (171,000) with no indication of where they went or what Mr. Zuk was paid for them. The August 14 Intel Action account was not included in accountant's schedule in his working papers, nor was it identified by Revenue Canada as owned or operated by Robert Zuk. He testified that Mr. Zuk's accountant treated these shares going out with a value of zero. Mr. Webster indicated that it is important to know where the shares went and why. If the shares were valued at zero, they would be worth zero. If shares were paid for, the net worth would have to be increased by that cost. If Mr. Zuk held shares in his pocket, they are not taxable yet because he hasn't sold them. Mr. Webster couldn't say what adjustment should be made in the net worth unless he knew what the shares were used for and where they went. If the shares were lent to someone else, they would become a receivable asset that, if still current at end of year, would be added to his net worth. If Mr. Zuk gave them away, they are no longer his and there would be a deemed disposition at fair market value if non arm's length. If sold, one would expect to see money coming in. Ultimately, Mr. Webster admitted that by not making adjustments for these 171,000 shares that left in the course of the year, possibly Revenue Canada may have undervalued his net worth. Again, however, the lack of further investigation about these transactions makes it impossible for this court to know how to deal with these transactions.

Digitized by Google

Shareholder Account

Mr. Webster had not been asked to review the shareholders account prior to his testimony in court. He looked at the Ex 12-8 spreadsheet with respect to Chinggis for the year end September 30, l997, and noted that the shareholders account was credited with $115,000 which Robert Zuk reported to Revenue Canada as his dividend from the corporation that year. Mr. Webster also identified that two deposits in September l997 into the Chinggis bank account, in the amounts of $140,000 and $187,000 from a Augustino Capista, that were credited to Robert Zuk's shareholders account. Mr. Webster testified that he would add these deposits to his Schedule l of transactions where neither he nor Revenue Canada can determine whether the source is taxable or not. I put no weight on this evidence that arose as an afterthought at trial. As Mr. Webster did not know anything about Chinggis and did not review any of the Chinggis accounts, he does not know the context and can say nothing about Mr. Capista. Mr. Frost, in his written submissions, directed me to documents before the court that he said would suggest that Mr. Capista was a client of Chinggis. Without explanation from a witness, however, I decline to make any finding one way or another. As I indicated previously, the relationship between Mr. Zuk and Chinggis is very complex, and I am not satisfied that Revenue Canada has dealt with it with the precision and clarity it requires.

Loans from Michael Zuk

Michael Zuk testified that he had loaned shares to his brother during l997, and that those loans were still outstanding at the end of that year. Echoing his evidence, Mr. Murphy submitted that Michael Zuk lent Robert Zuk 1,075,000 shares in l997 that were not paid back by the end of the year, and that these shares were valued at $2.00 to $2.20 a share in March l997. In his view, in December l997 Robert Zuk had a liability of over $2 million to Michael Zuk that Revenue Canada did not consider in doing their net worth assessment. As I indicated previously, I did not find Michael Zuk to be a precise or accurate witness. Such was also the case with respect to his evidence of these loans. Initially, he testified that "on one or two occasions" he loaned securities to his brother Robert, on the understanding that he would give those shares back to him in kind at a later date. Then he testified that that he lent his brother shares from time to time, "probably some small transfers in '96….and (in) March or April (1997)…"a larger chunk of shares." Later, he testified that he transferred 75,000 shares from his account to Chinggis on July 31, l997….he didn't differentiate between Robert and Chinggis…." Later, he testified that he lent Robert one million Dura shares in March l997 "That would have been one or two share certificates, I think or maybe five times 200,000….They were in street form, (or) if they weren't in street form, I would have put a power of attorney on them." He testified that these shares would have been "a small amount from Levesque Beaubien…what Hunter gave…and the other ones would either have been in Midland Walwyn, or Levesque. I can't remember." When he lent these shares to Robert, the shares would have been valued "about two dollars to $2.2 per share In total, Michael Zuk said he loaned Robert "maybe, well a million, plus 75 and there might have been some others." Michael Zuk also indicated that there would be a record "to the extent some of them would have come out of the brokerage account. To the extent of me going to my drawer, pulling them out, handing them to him, none…other than, a quick handshake and I do my accounting on an ongoing basis with him." He was inconsistent as to whether these share loans were repaid. He said Robert never paid these shares back and the loans remain outstanding. Earlier he said that these loans were "paid back….probably closer to 24 months (later)." He was consistent, however, that he "did not want to be paid back in cash. He wanted the stock."

Digitized by Google

There is documentation in the exhibits indicating that Michael Zuk did direct C.M. Oliver to deliver 75,000 Dura shares from his account to Robert Zuk's Chinggis Capital account. These shares are shown as coming into the Chinggis account on August 1st at no cost. The Chinggis Capital Corp accounts with C.M. Oliver and Taurus Capital that I discussed previously show a significant number of transfers into the accounts from Midland Walwyn with no indication from whom. These could well substantiate some of Michael Zuk's testimony. The difficulty, however, is that these are Chinggis corporate accounts and have no relevance to Robert Zuk's personal business accounts and to his net worth. Michael Zuk testified that he treated Robert Zuk and Chinggis Capital as one and the same. Any shares loaned to Robert Zuk's corporation are not liabilities to be subtracted from Robert Zuk's personal net worth.

The only share loans that could have any potential relevance are transfers into Robert Zuk's personal trading accounts. The two share certificates from Midland Walwyn identified by Mr. Webster in his Schedule I could be from Michael Zuk. If so, they may create a liability. Mr. Zisis admitted that he did not investigate the source of these transfers into these accounts, and therefore he has no evidence to contradict that of Michael Zuk. Without investigation, it cannot be assumed that these came from a nontaxable source. Mr. Webster testified that the practice of loaning large blocks of shares with the expectation that the shares will be returned in kind is called short selling. In these circumstances, the shares are valued at their fair market value on the day of the loan. The person who obtains the loaned shares has a liability for that value but, as he is obligated to return the shares in kind, what he actually pays for them on return of the shares will determine if he makes a profit or loss on the short selling transaction. In my view, this discussion of short selling was a red herring. Michael Zuk testified that he would transfer shares to his brother when Robert Zuk was undermarginalized or under-collateralized. He made no mention of short selling. On the evidence of the witnesses from the brokerage houses, Robert Zuk was frequently engaging in "high risk" trading practices, consistent with the reason Michael Zuk gave for any loans to his brother. Mr. Webster also testified that short selling is only advantageous if there is an expectation that the stock would decline in value. During the period at issue, Robert Zuk was actively engaged in promoting the shares, and, on all the evidence, he did so successfully. It was their joint expectation that the value of the Transway/Dura shares would increase. In these circumstances, it makes no sense that Michael Zuk loaned shares to his brother for the purpose of short selling Mr. Webster, on cross-examination, initially testified that he saw nothing in the accountant's papers to indicate that the accountant was aware of any short selling transactions. Later he testified that the accountant's treatment of the June 1997 Transway/Galavu share transactions is consistent with short selling. Without more explanation, however, I put no weight on Mr. Webster's changed position.

Other personal loans?

Michael Zuk also testified that he had loaned Robert money over the years and that Robert had always paid him back. When Robert bought his first house in l995, Michael said he provided $125,000 to $135,000 for the closing. It was an unsecured interest-free loan for which "there may or may not be (a record)." He initially said that Robert had not repaid any of that loan by January 1, 1997. Later he said that he "may have paid me $5,000 or $10,000 or something....I don't know....possibly." Michael Zuk also testified that Robert bought a lot of shares from people who were leaving. As employees exercised their options, Robert bought them. Although he said he "was not aware of (Robert's) trading activities, except when he "asked for a loan," he testified that he was aware of three to five loans from Lance Dunlop (worth $400-500 thousand); a loan from Mike Palermo for $75,000; $500,000 U.S. owed to David Siegel from Florida (the subject of a lawsuit in l998), and another $75-100 thousand to Max Berletta. On his evidence, Robert Zuk owed in excess of $4 million in loans at the end of l997 (including the 1,075,000 shares Robert owed to him "valued at $3.70 a share") In re-examination, Michael Zuk admitted that he really knew "nothing" about the loan to Lance Dunlop except that it was for $400 thousand or more. He also indicated that he "didn't know" what the loan from Mr. Palermo was for, nor when it was incurred, nor what were the terms of repayment. He denied any knowledge about the claim from David Siegel as "it had nothing to do with me." The loan from Max Berletta he learned about at the race track. Ultimately, he could not say whether these were "about a loan, or about a bad business deal."

Digitized by Google

I put no weight on any of this evidence. As I indicated previously, Michael Zuk was an unreliable witness, imprecise and vague. His evidence with respect to his brother's loans from third parties is clearly based on hearsay and of no evidentiary value. I am also not satisfied that there is any credible evidence that Robert Zuk owed his brother personal loans during l997.

Mr. Zisis testified initially that neither he nor the previous investigator found evidence of any loans, so they felt no need to investigate cheques found in the files. Mr. Zisis did follow up with Robert Zuk's trustee in bankruptcy and received a list of creditors. He did not recall, however, if any of the claims extended back to l997, nor if there was any letter from Michael Zuk to the trustee (as Michael Zuk said in his testimony). . He did not conduct any further examination to determine if anyone on the list of creditors had debts dating from l997.

Although I put no weight on the evidence of Michael Zuk about these loans, the failure of Revenue Canada to follow up on the information it had at its disposal is a lacuna in the evidence. This is particularly true as there is some evidence in the accountant's working papers and in the corporate documentation that Mr. Zuk's company did have outstanding loans, from the bank and from other sources. These loans are not relevant to the proceedings unless the corporate loans could be traced to the individuals mentioned above, in which case that evidence could perhaps have been used by the Crown to negative this potential source of non-taxable income.

Other Non-Taxable Sources to explain increased assets?

Peter Zisis readily admitted that he did not investigate other sources that could have contributed to Robert Zuk's increase in assets. He admitted that he had "no idea" if Robert Zuk had received any gifts, inheritances, lottery or gambling winnings, or transfers from abroad. In my view, these sources are distinguishable from the unidentified transfers in and out of his brokerage accounts that are fundamental to the Crown's case, and from the "leads" that were available in the documents which were not followed up by Revenue Canada. Where there was no evidence to suggest any of these other potential sources, and no leads from the defendant, there is no obligation on the Crown to investigate: Holland, Massei, supra.

Ultimately, with the assistance of a forensic accountant expert in net worth analyses, it strikes me that this case became much less complex than originally conceived and presented by the Crown. Mr. Webster found relatively few transfers in and out of Mr. Zuk's personal accounts where the source could not be identified. The evidence indicates that a very substantial portion (but not all) of the increase in Robert Zuk's assets in l997 could be traced to a few very large cash and share transactions into his brokerage accounts. That this was not recognized ab initio meant that Revenue Canada may have misidentified the source of his unreported income, and became diverted attempting to prove a source (the Hunter shares) that ultimately may not have been so relevant to his personal holdings. The failure of Revenue Canada to investigate the transactions which became the focus of the trial means that the Crown has not negated other potential nontaxable sources of income that are highly relevant to the increase in assets. When at the conclusion of the trial the court knows nothing about key transactions, it cannot be said that the Crown has identified a likely source and/or investigated to establish that the entries are from a taxable source and the values are otherwise than as Mr. Zuk reported in his income tax return.

Digitized by Google

Has the Crown proven the mens rea?

There is no dispute that the taxpayer is responsible for the information included in his income tax return, even though he may rely on his accountant to determine what tax is owing. The courts have recognized that the Income Tax Act is "necessarily and notoriously complex…(such that) no lay person is expected to know all the complexities, … (and) will act on the advice of professionals:" Klundert, supra. para. 55. Clearly, Robert Zuk relied on his accountant to determine what taxes he owed in 1997. The issue is whether there is any evidence that Mr. Zuk failed to provide all the information his accountant needed to prepare an accurate return. Evidence that he failed to do so could lead to the inference that he had the mens rea necessary for these charges. . Mr. Webster agreed that, if information is missing, it is appropriate for the accountant to ask his client, and that the person responsible for the figures is the taxpayer who files the return. He agreed that the accountant relies on information from the taxpayer or his own enquiries including from source documents, publicly available information, and professional judgments. Mr. Webster's expert opinion was that Revenue Canada was working from the same brokerage accounts as was Mr. Zuk's accountant and he was unable to identify any other accounts. With the one exception I discussed previously, he was unable to identify any l997 share transaction in the Revenue Canada working papers that was not included in Mr. Zuk's income tax return. Mr. Zisis agreed that he did not think Mr. Zuk had failed to provide anything to his accountant. Mr. Webster concluded that these circumstances were an indication that Mr. Zuk did not have the mens rea to commit the offences. There is no evidence upon which I could come to any other conclusion. The Crown tendered client account applications Mr. Zuk provided to various brokerage houses to indicate Mr. Zuk's perceptions of his own increasing net worth. These self declarations increased from $50,000 on June 31, l996, to $500,000 (excluding real estate) in February and March l997, to $700,000 in June 1997, to $1.8 million on January 21, l998. The Crown has tendered these self-assessments, presumably to show that Mr. Zuk knew his income was considerably higher than what he reported to Revenue Canada. Presumably, the court is to draw the inference that Mr. Zuk did not provide all the relevant information to his accountant. As Mr. Murphy submitted, however, in the Taurus Capital New Client Application Form dated August 1, l995, Mr. Zuk indicated that his net worth at that time was an estimated $1.1 million. Clearly, that is not a figure that would support the opening net worth determined by Revenue Canada. In the circumstances, I give little weight to the self-reports on the brokerage applications. These would have been provided for another purpose unrelated to Robert Zuk's tax liability, and, in my view, are of questionable reliability.

Conclusion

Digitized by Google

> Common sense would dictate that, given his asset position at the end of l997, Robert Zuk must have earned income in excess of that reported in his l997 income tax return. Common sense, however, is not proof beyond a reasonable doubt. A conviction on these offences requires that the Crown prove Mr. Zuk earned taxable income that he knew was taxable and that he failed to report to Revenue Canada. When a net worth analysis is the tool for the prosecution, the jurisprudence requires that the Crown prove beyond a reasonable doubt either a likely source of the alleged unreported income or disprove beyond a reasonable doubt all non- taxable sources. In this case, I find that the Crown has not met its onus on either head of the required test.
>
> Decision
> For these reasons, Mr. Zuk will be acquitted on both charges.

In the Ontario Appeal case of R. v. Hunter[124] the taxpayer was not successful in maintaining a net worth based acquittal when he was not able to prove that the opening balances were grossly miscalculated. The court held:

> [3] The trial judge acquitted the respondent, however, because she was not able to calculate the amount of income tax that the respondent had not paid. At para. 39 of her reasons, she inferred that the opening net worth statement understated the respondent's assets because no amount was attributed to take into account the possibility that the value of the shares owned by the respondent in December 1995 exceeded the $8,005 indicated.
> [4] While the burden of proof remains on the Crown, the taxpayer is required to keep proper books and records. The opening net worth statement represented all of the tax payor's existing assets based on the documentation that had been seized. The statement was an approximation because the respondent did not keep proper records and did not testify as to his net worth. The appellant submits that it is only if a net worth statement was so inaccurate that it totally undermined the conclusion that any tax was owed that the respondent should have been acquitted on the evidence. We have no evidence that the net worth statement here are is grossly inaccurate.
> [5] The Crown tendered evidence that the taxpayer had a certain amount of assets as of a particular date and had increased his net worth as a result of taxable income that had not been disclosed. The taxpayer offered no evidence by way of explanation. In these circumstances, the Crown is not required to negate every possibility respecting the amounts put forward especially when the matters in issue are peculiarly within the knowledge of the taxpayer.
> [6] Accordingly, the appeal is allowed, the acquittals are set aside and convictions entered. The matter is remitted to the trial judge for sentencing.

In the Ontario Court of Appeal case of R. v. Valovic[125] the Court held:

> No broader significance to the administration of justice
> [6] The appellants claim that the proposed appeal would be the first time a provincial appellate court in Canada has specifically dealt with the issue of what sort of evidence, in addition to a discrepancy demonstrated by a net worth analysis, is required to prove the actus reus of tax evasion. A net worth analysis calculates the taxpayer's net worth at the beginning and at the end of the period under review. Where the taxpayer's declared income and other sources of money cannot account for the increase in the taxpayer's net worth, a discrepancy is demonstrated and may lead to the inference that the taxpayer earned income that was not reported to the tax authorities.

[124] 2005 ONCJ 428
[125] 2011 ONCA 320

Digitized by Google

[7] We do not give effect to this submission. That issue was recently addressed in R. v. Hunter, 2008 ONCA 103, where this court held at paras. 4-5 that in the appropriate case, a discrepancy alone is sufficient to prove the actus reus. In the present case, this is precisely what the trial judge concluded. The conclusion was open to him based on the extent of the discrepancy, the appellants' failure to keep proper books and records, the absence of any evidence explaining the discrepancy, and the evidence as to the accuracy of the net worth calculations relied on by the Crown.

Régent Lacroix v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2008 FCA 241, Net Worth Assessments with 'Civil' Penalties for Incredible Assertions – Not Statute Barred for Reassessment When No Evidenced Support

INTRODUCTION

[1] In the case of any reassessment beyond the normal reassessment period (the statutory period), as in the case of the assessment of a penalty, the Income Tax Act requires that the Minister prove that there was misconduct on the part of the taxpayer in filing his or her tax return. How does the Minister discharge this burden of proof where the reassessment, or the assessment of the penalty, results from the application of the net worth method? Can the Minister conclude, based on the discrepancy between a taxpayer's assets and the income reported in his or her tax return, on the one hand, and on the lack of a credible explanation for this discrepancy, on the other hand, that there is an error warranting an out-of-time reassessment or the assessment of a penalty? The Tax Court of Canada judge concluded that the Minister could. Was the judge correct?

THE FACTS

[2] In the year 2001, the Canada Revenue Agency (the Minister) asked Régent Lacroix and his spouse to prepare their personal balance sheets for each taxation year from 1995 to 2000. Mr. Lacroix's balance sheet reported liquid assets totalling $500,000 from the 1995 taxation year. This led to a more in-depth review of Mr. Lacroix's affairs. The Minister conducted this review using the net worth method, which revealed a significant discrepancy between the Mr. Lacroix's opening balance and closing balance. This discrepancy was deemed to be income. The Minister concluded that Mr. Lacroix had unreported income totalling $145,667 for the 1997 taxation year, $231,570 for the 1998 taxation year, $156,333 for the 1999 taxation year and $26,103 for the 2000 taxation year. The Minister made reassessments for the taxation years in question, adding these amounts to Mr. Lacroix's income. However, two of these reassessments were made outside the statutory period. Furthermore, the Minister did not confine himself to simply increasing Mr. Lacroix's income; he assessed penalties against him because Mr. Lacroix, it would appear, knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, filed false tax returns.

[3] In so doing, the Minister rejected Mr. Lacroix's explanation as to the source of the $500,000 in cash appearing in his balance sheet. According to Mr. Lacroix, the cash came from a loan made to him by Gilles Pronovost. The two men first met when Mr. Lacroix saved Mr. Pronovost 's son from drowning. This was the beginning of a friendship between the two men. In the course of this relationship, Mr. Lacroix told Mr. Pronovost about his dream of setting up a real estate investment portfolio for himself. Feeling ever grateful to Mr. Lacroix for having rescued his son, Mr. Pronovost agreed to loan him $500,000, which he gave him in several instalments over a period of two or three years beginning in 1993. All of these payments were made in cash. Mr. Lacroix states that he kept the money locked in a safe at his home. According to his balance sheet for 1995, Mr. Lacroix let this cash build up for several years before he began setting up his real estate portfolio. In 1996, he started acquiring properties, becoming the owner of 20 buildings, according to his personal balance sheet for the year 1999.

Digitized by Google

[4] The Minister reassessed Mr. Lacroix's tax returns, and Mr. Lacroix wasted no time in contesting those reassessments. When the Minister confirmed the reassessments, Mr. Lacroix filed a notice of appeal for each of the taxation years in question, namely 1997, 1998, 1999 and 2000. All of those appeals were brought to trial before Justice Bédard of the Tax Court of Canada, who dismissed each appeal: see Lacroix v. Canada, 2007 TCC 376, [2007] T.C.J. No. 216. After setting out the evidence and citing long passages from the testimonies of Mr. Lacroix and Mr. Pronovost in support, the judge stated his findings with regard to credibility:

> 12. The assessment of the credibility of the appellant and of Mr. Pronovost have played an important role in my decision, given the almost complete lack of documentary or objective evidence as to how the appellant used the $500,000 in cash or where the $500,000 in cash allegedly held by Mr. Pronovost came from. I would like to point out that I attach little probative value to the testimonies of the appellant, his spouse and Mr. Pronovost . . . .

[5] The judge listed, one after the other, the numerous implausibilities supporting his findings with regard to the witnesses' credibility. Finally, the judge writes the following:

> 20. My analysis of the evidence leads me to find that it is more likely than not that these loans never existed and that the notes (Exhibit A-4), the request for repayment (Exhibit A-8) and the cheques made out to Mr. Pronovost were merely a sham to hide the truth. Accordingly, it is difficult to arrive at any other conclusion than that the appellant deliberately failed to report $516,000 in income. In my opinion, the Minister has discharged the burden of proof on him and was therefore entitled to impose penalties under subsection 163(2) of the Act on the appellant's unreported income. Since the Minister's burden of proof is less under subsection 163(2) of the Act than under subsection 152(4), I am also of the opinion that the Minister was entitled to make reassessments. Finally, I note that the Minister does not, in my opinion, have to identify the source of the appellant's unreported income when this income is established using the net worth method.

[6] The appellant challenges the judge's conclusions, which are merely findings with regard to the credibility of the witnesses who appeared before him. The judge never determined the true source of the funds in question or how they were applied, nor did he determine the true nature of the relationship between Mr. Lacroix and Mr. Pronovost. He simply stated that he did not believe their testimony and that the evidence they submitted had been fabricated. Therefore, there was no evidence before the judge that would have allowed him to conclude that the discrepancy detected using the net worth method was not income.

Digitized by Google

[7] The appellant submits that, notwithstanding the great deference that a court of appeal must afford to a trial judge's findings of fact, we must intervene because the judge rejected out of hand all of the evidence supporting the appellant's version of the facts. The appellant notes, for example, that there is evidence of a number of certified cheques made to the order of Mr. Pronovost from a trust controlled by Mr. Lacroix. According to the appellant, this proves that there was a loan and that it was repaid, except for $70,000. The appellant draws the Court's attention to other evidence that the judge wrongly failed to consider or to which he did not give appropriate weight in assessing the appellant's credibility.

[8] The assessment of credibility is the task of the trial judge. There is nothing surprising in the fact that some evidence supports the version of the facts proposed by one party while other evidence undermines it. The trial judge is in a better position to assess the true value of these disparate elements and draw the proper conclusions. In the case at bar, the judge duly noted the evidence which the appellant raises but deemed it to be fabricated and dismissed it. There is nothing in the evidence or in the I*ncome Tax Ac*t, R.S. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), (the Act) that would warrant this Court's intervention. The debate in this appeal is at another level.

ANALYSIS

[9] The rejection of Mr. Lacroix's explanation for the discrepancy between his reported income and his net worth does not in itself justify a reassessment beyond the statutory period or warrant the assessment of a penalty. There are therefore two issues that remain to be decided:

> 1. Was the Minister required to prove the source of the income detected through the application of the net worth method to justify the inclusion of this income in the taxable income of Mr. Lacroix?
>
> 2. Did the Minister discharge the burden of proof on him under subparagraph 152(4)(a)(i) and subsection 163(2) before, first, making a reassessment beyond the statutory period and, second, assessing a penalty against the taxpayer?

[10] It should be noted that these are two distinct questions. The question of the source of the income attributed to Mr. Lacroix in applying the net worth method must be raised even when the Minister attempts to make a reassessment within the statutory period. The first question therefore cannot be answered by relying on case law that only addresses the second.

1- Was the Minister required to prove the source of the income detected through the application of the net worth method to justify the inclusion of this income in the taxable income of Mr. Lacroix?

[11] Mr. Lacroix contests the judgment of the judge of the Tax Court of Canada on the basis of case law of that court holding that the Minister, in applying the net worth method, must not only show that the discrepancy between the taxpayer's assets and his reported income leads to the conclusion that the taxpayer earned unreported income, but also demonstrate that the source of this income can be determined:

> 77. The Minister has the initial onus of proving that a taxpayer made a misrepresentation in filing the tax return. It is insufficient for the Minister to refer to a net worth statement showing discrepancies between available income and reported income. The Minister must prove that this additional income was from a source that should have been included in the taxpayer's return. The onus on the Minister will be greater if the taxpayer presents plausible explanations showing a non-taxable source of this additional income.

Digitized by Google

[Emphasis added]
[Dowling v. Canada, [1996] T.C.J. No. 301, [1996] 2 C.T.C. 2340, at paragraph 77 (Dowling).]

[12] In Dowling, a professional golfer's tax returns for a number of taxation years were reassessed using the net worth method. Two of the years reassessed by the Minister fell outside the statutory period. The passage cited above, upon which Mr. Lacroix relies, is taken from the analysis of the burden of proof on the Minister where the Minister attempts to make a reassessment beyond the statutory period.

[13] Just as in the instant case, Mr. Dowling had an explanation for the discrepancy detected using the net worth method. The Court rejected this explanation but also considered the Minister's theory as to the source of the unreported income, namely an underestimation of the income generated by Mr. Dowling's golf pro shop. The Court conducted this analysis to determine whether the Minister had proven that Mr. Dowling had knowingly misrepresented the facts in his tax return. The Court then scrutinized the evidence with great care and concluded that Mr. Dowling's golf pro shop had a profit margin of 60%, not 15% as he claimed. From this, the Court concluded as follows at paragraph 95:

95. Since the respondent (the Crown) showed that the appellant misrepresented his income from his business, the next step was to show that this misrepresentation was due to negligence, carelessness, or wilful default. A number of cases have held that a failure to keep adequate business records will constitute negligence. In the present case, the appellant failed to keep the cash register tapes as supporting documentation of his sales. As well, the appellant combined his personal finances with those of his business in one bank account. These actions amounted to negligence on the part of the appellant . . . .

[14] Upon reading the reasons of the Court, it becomes clear that the Court had considered the question of the source of the income in order to decide if the taxpayer had been negligent in respect of this source, or if had acted knowingly or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence. The question of the income's source was raised in the context of evidence of misconduct on the part of the taxpayer.

[15] The same problem arose in Corriveau v. Canada, 97-767 (IT)I, [1998] T.C.J. No. 1112. The net worth method did not reveal a significant discrepancy between the income reported in the taxpayer's tax return and the additions to his assets during the period in question. The Tax Court of Canada was not satisfied with the evidence adduced by the Minister regarding the source of this income, in that the Court still had doubts as to whether the taxpayer's conduct amounted to negligence, carelessness or wilful omission:

31. If I cannot be specific as to Mr. Corriveau's gross negligence, I cannot find that the conditions for the application of section 163 of the Act have been met.

[Corriveau, at paragraph 31.]

[16] Again, the question of the source of the unreported income was raised wholly in the context of evidence of the taxpayer's misconduct in filing his tax return.

Digitized by Google

[17] The Court conducted the same analysis in Léger v. Canada, 96-4799 (IT)G, [2000] T.C.J. No. 911, at paragraphs 48 to 51.

[18] In my view, this jurisprudence does not establish a rule to the effect that the Minister may not use the net worth method to add unreported income to a taxpayer's income unless the Minister can establish the source of the unreported income. Our tax collection system is based on the taxpayer's self-reporting of the income he or she has earned during a taxation year. Should the Minister doubt, for whatever reason, the accuracy of the taxpayer's return, the Minister may conduct an investigation in such manner as deemed necessary. The Minister may then make a reassessment. If the taxpayer appeals the reassessment, the Minister does not have to prove the facts giving rise to the reassessment. In the reply to the notice of appeal, the Minister need only set out the presumptions of fact used in the reassessment. The onus is on the taxpayer, who knows everything there is to know about his or her own affairs, to "demolish" the Minister's assumptions; otherwise, they are presumed to be true.

[19] The Supreme Court has endorsed this approach on a number of occasions, including in Hickman Motors Ltd. v. Canada, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 336, to name just one example. In that case, the Court stated the following at paragraphs 92-93:

> 92 . . . The Minister, in making assessments, proceeds on assumptions (Bayridge Estates Ltd. v. M.N.R., 59 D.T.C. 1098 (Ex. Ct.), at p. 1101) and the initial onus is on the taxpayer to "demolish" the Minister's assumptions in the assessment (Johnston v. Minister of National Revenue, [1948] S.C.R. 486; Kennedy v. M.N.R., 73 D.T.C. 5359 (F.C.A.), at p. 5361). The initial burden is only to "demolish" the exact assumptions made by the Minister but no more: First Fund Genesis Corp. v. The Queen, 90 D.T.C. 6337 (F.C.T.D.), at p. 6340.
>
> 93 This initial onus of "demolishing" the Minister's exact assumptions is met where the Appellant makes out at least a prima facie case: Kamin v. M.N.R., 93 D.T.C. 62 (T.C.C.); Goodwin v. M.N.R., 82 D.T.C. 1679 (T.R.B.) . . . . The law is settled that unchallenged and uncontradicted evidence "demolishes" the Minster's assumptions: see for example MacIsaac v. M.N.R., 74 D.T.C. 6380 (F.C.A.), at p. 6381; Zink v. M.N.R., 87 D.T.C. 652 (T.C.C.) . . . .

[20] Applying the net worth method changes nothing in this method of proof. Where the Minister presumes that the income detected using the net worth method is taxable income, the onus is on the taxpayer to demolish this presumption. If the taxpayer presents credible evidence that the amount in question is not income, the Minister must then go beyond these assumptions of fact and file evidence proving the existence of this income.

[21] In the case at bar, the assumptions of fact on which the Minister relied included the following:

> [TRANSLATION]
> 22. . . .
>
> (l) The appellant did not report all of his income in his tax returns for the years 1997, 1998, 1999 and 2000;

Digitized by Google

(m) After conducting an audit using the net worth method, the Minister found that the appellant had underestimated his taxable income, in the following amounts . . .

1997	$145,667
1998	$231,570
1999	$156,333
2000	$26,103

[Emphasis added]

[22] The amount and the nature of the unreported income having been alleged by the Minister in his assumptions of fact, the onus was on the taxpayer to prove to the judge of the Tax Court of Canada that the amounts detected using the net worth method were not taxable income.

[23] In the case at bar, Mr. Lacroix did not deny that he had access to a source of funds in addition to his reported income; however, he argued that these funds were not income because they were merely loans that had been extended to him by his friend, Mr. Pronovost. The judge of the Tax Court of Canada rejected this explanation, which means that the Minister's assumptions of fact, including the one regarding the taxable nature of the income earned by Mr. Lacroix, are presumed to be true. The Court could therefore conclude that Mr. Lacroix had underestimated his taxable income in the amounts set out in the reply to the notice of appeal for each of the taxation years in question.

[24] This reasoning in no way places an unfair burden on the taxpayer. The taxpayer is aware of the facts and has the means to prove them. It would be most unrealistic to have the Minister bear the onus of uncovering a source of income whose existence can be detected only indirectly, that is, using the net worth method.

2. Did the Minister discharge the burden of proof on him under subparagraph 152(4)(a)(i) and subsection 163(2) before, first, making a reassessment beyond the statutory period and, second, assessing a penalty against the taxpayer?

[25] The provisions in question read as follows:

152.(4) The Minister may at any time make an assessment, reassessment or additional assessment of tax for a taxation year, interest or penalties, if any, payable under this Part by a taxpayer or notify in writing any person by whom a return of income for a taxation year has been filed that no tax is payable for the year, except that an assessment, reassessment or additional assessment may be made after the taxpayer's normal reassessment period in respect of	152.(4) Le ministre peut établir une cotisation, une nouvelle cotisation ou une cotisation supplémentaire concernant l'impôt pour une année d'imposition, ainsi que les intérêts ou les pénalités, qui sont payables par un contribuable en vertu de la présente partie ou donner avis par écrit qu'aucun impôt n'est payable pour l'année à toute personne qui a produit une déclaration de revenu pour une année d'imposition. Pareille cotisation ne peut être établie après l'expiration de la période normale de nouvelle

Digitized by Google

the year only if	cotisation applicable au contribuable pour l'année que dans les cas suivants:
(a) the taxpayer or person filing the return	a) le contribuable ou la personne produisant la déclaration:
(i) has made any misrepresentation that is attributable to neglect, carelessness or wilful default or has committed any fraud in filing the return or in supplying any information under this Act, or	(i) soit a fait une présentation erronée des faits, par négligence, inattention ou omission volontaire, ou a commis quelque fraude en produisant la déclaration ou en fournissant quelque renseignement sous le régime de la présente loi,
…	[…]
163.(2) Every person who, knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, has made or has participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, a false statement or omission in a return, form, certificate, statement or answer (in this section referred to as a "return") filed or made in respect of a taxation year for the purposes of this Act, is liable to a penalty of the greater of $100 and 50% of the total of…	163.(2) Toute personne qui, sciemment ou dans des circonstances équivalant à faute lourde, fait un faux énoncé ou une omission dans une déclaration, un formulaire, un certificat, un état ou une réponse (appelé «déclaration» au présent article) rempli, produit ou présenté, selon le cas, pour une année d'imposition pour l'application de la présente loi, ou y participe, y consent ou y acquiesce est passible d'une pénalité égale, sans être inférieure à 100 $, à 50 % du total des montants suivants:…
	[…]
…

[26] Although the Minister has the benefit of the assumptions of fact underlying the reassessment, he does not enjoy any similar advantage with regard to proving the facts justifying a reassessment beyond the statutory period, or those facts justifying the assessment of a penalty for the taxpayer's misconduct in filing his tax return. The Minister is undeniably required to adduce facts justifying these exceptional measures.

[27] In Richard Boileau v. M.N.R., 89 D.T.C. 247, Judge Lamarre Proulx stated as follows, at page 250:

> Indeed, the Appellant was unable to contradict the basic elements of the net worth assessments. However, in my view, this is not sufficient for discharging the burden of proof which lies on the Minister. To decide otherwise would be to remove any purpose to subsection 163(3) by reverting the Minister's burden of proof back onto the Appellant.

Digitized by Google

[28] In a similar vein, in Farm Business Consultants Inc. v. Her Majesty the Queen, [1994] 2 C.T.C. 2450, 95 D.T.C. 200, Judge Bowman wrote the following at paragraph 27:

> 27 A court must be extremely cautious in sanctioning the imposition of penalties under subsection 163(2). Conduct that warrants reopening a statute-barred year does not automatically justify a penalty and the routine imposition of penalties by the Minister is to be discouraged . . . . Moreover, where a penalty is imposed under subsection 163(2) although a civil standard of proof is required, if a taxpayer's conduct is consistent with two viable and reasonable hypotheses, one justifying the penalty and one not, the benefit of the doubt must be given to the taxpayer and the penalty must be deleted . . . .

[29] This last passage highlights the dialectic specific to certain reassessments made using the net worth method. In the case at bar, the Minister found undeclared income and asked the taxpayer to justify it. The taxpayer provided an explanation that neither the Minister nor the Tax Court of Canada found to be credible. Accordingly, there is no viable and reasonable hypothesis that could lead the decision-maker to give the taxpayer the benefit of the doubt. The only hypothesis offered was deemed not to be credible.

[30] The facts in evidence in this case are such that the taxpayer's tax return made a misrepresentation of facts, and the only explanation offered by the taxpayer was found not to be credible. Clearly, there must be some other explanation for this income. It must therefore be concluded that the taxpayer had an unreported source of income, was aware of this source and refused to disclose it, since the explanations he gave were found not to be credible. In my view, given such circumstances, one must come to the inevitable conclusion that the false tax return was filed knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence. This justifies not only a penalty, but also a reassessment beyond the statutory period.

[31] Paragraph 20 of Justice Bédard's reasons for decision, cited above, sets out precisely this situation, which amply justifies his conclusions with regard to the penalties and the reassessment beyond the statutory period.

[32] What, then, of the burden of proof on the Minister? How does he discharge this burden? There may be circumstances where the Minister would be able to show direct evidence of the taxpayer's state of mind at the time the tax return was filed. However, in the vast majority of cases, the Minister will be limited to undermining the taxpayer's credibility by either adducing evidence or cross-examining the taxpayer. Insofar as the Tax Court of Canada is satisfied that the taxpayer earned unreported income and did not provide a credible explanation for the discrepancy between his or her reported income and his or her net worth, the Minister has discharged the burden of proof on him within the meaning of subparagraph 152(4)(a)(i) and subsection 162(3).

[33] As Justice Létourneau so aptly put it in Molenaar v. Canada, 2004 FCA 349, 2004 D.T.C. 6688, at paragraph 4:

> 4. Once the Ministère establishes on the basis of reliable information that there is a discrepancy, and a substantial one in the case at bar, between a taxpayer's assets and his expenses, and that discrepancy continues to be unexplained and inexplicable, the Ministère has discharged its burden of proof. It is then for the taxpayer to identify the source of his income and show that it is not taxable.

Digitized by Google

[34] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

"J.D. Denis Pelletier"
J.A.

"I concur.
M. Nadon J.A."

"I concur.
Johanne Trudel J.A."

Michel Guibord v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2011 FCA 344, Net Worth Argument and an Issue of Credibility REASONS FOR JUDGMENT MAINVILLE J.A.

[1] This concerns five appeals from five judgments of V. Miller J. of the Tax Court of Canada (the "Judge"):

The individual appellants Michel Guibord (appeal file A-351-10), Mei Guibord (appeal file A-352-10) and George Szeto (appeal file A-354-10) seek to overturn the judgments of the Tax Court of Canada which partially allowed their appeals from reassessments issued by the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.) for the 1995, 1996 and 1997 taxation years.

The corporate appellant, George S. Szeto Investments Ltd., seeks to overturn a judgment of the Tax Court of Canada which allowed in part its appeal from reassessments issued by the Minister under the Income Tax Act for its taxation years ending October 31, 1995, October 31, 1996 and October 31, 1997 (appeal file A-353-10)

Finally, the corporate appellant George S. Szeto Investments Ltd. also seeks to overturn a decision of the Tax Court of Canada which allowed in part its appeal from reassessments issued under the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 in respect to GST for the period of November 1, 1994 to October 31, 1997 (appeal file A-360-10).

All these appeals were consolidated by order of this Court dated December 17, 2010.

[2] Siblings Mei Guibord and George Szeto are the sole shareholders of George S. Szeto Investments Ltd. which itself owns and operates the Ruby King Restaurant. The corporate appellant shall be referred to in these reasons as "Ruby King". Mei Guibord is also the spouse of Michel Guibord. During the years reassessed, Mei Guibord and George Szeto were salaried employees of Ruby King. Michel Guibord was not directly employed by Ruby King. Rather, he worked for the Department of National Defence as a computer specialist. However, until February 1997, he was the bookkeeper for Ruby King. In that capacity, he received the daily sales receipts for Ruby King and he periodically made deposits to Ruby King's bank account.

[3] In 1995, 1996 and 1997, Michel Guibord reported employment income of $43,933, $49,111 and $48,779 respectively; Mei Guibord reported employment income of

Digitized by Google

$10,600, $10,400 and $10, 400 respectively; and George Szeto reported income of $10,600, $10,400 and $10,400 respectively. Ruby King reported losses for all relevant periods; however, in each of the relevant years, the financial statements prepared for Ruby King indicated large amounts as "Due to Shareholders".

[4] The Minister audited Ruby King and found its records to be unreliable and incomplete. This resulted in additional investigations by the Minister into the income reported by the individual appellants. A net worth method was finally used by the Minister to reassess Ruby King and the three individual appellants. The Minister further relied on subsection 152(4) of the Income Tax Act to reassess the appellants beyond the three-year limitation period. In addition, he assessed all of the appellants with penalties under subsection 163(2) of the Income Tax Act and Ruby King with additional penalties under subsection 298(4) of the Excise Tax Act.

[5] The appellants appealed to the Tax Court of Canada. Their appeals were decided on common evidence following thirteen days of hearings. The Judge was satisfied that the Minister was justified in opening the three statute barred taxation years for all the appellants because she found that they had made misrepresentations relating to their income which, at minimum, were attributable to neglect and carelessness. The Judge went on to make various corrections to the appellants' net worth statements. She then set aside the penalties imposed upon the individual appellants while confirming the penalties assessed on Ruby King. The issue of costs was reserved. After receiving written submissions on costs, the Judge issued reasons and an order with respect to costs. That order is the subject of separate appeals, and is not dealt with in these reasons.

[6] The appellants appeal to this Court on various grounds. The principal grounds of appeal may be restated as follows:

The Judge erred when failing to put her mind as to whether or not, in the circumstances, the net worth reassessments should be vacated because they were not completed in a principled and rational manner and because they were done in an arbitrary fashion.

The Judge erred by (i) failing to identify the legal test which the appellants had to meet in order to demolish the Minister's assumptions, (ii) failing to determine whether the facts satisfied the legal test for each of the appellants, and (iii) failing to consider all the relevant evidence when considering the test for each of the appellants.

The Judge erred in apportioning a part of the income of Michel Guibord to his spouse Mei Guibord.

The Judge erred when she failed to vacate George Szeto's reassessment on the principle of de minimus.

[7] Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235 sets out the standard of review in an appeal from a judgment of the Tax Court of Canada. The standard of review on a question of law is correctness, while findings of fact are not to be disturbed unless it can be established that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error. The application of a legal standard to a set of facts is a question of mixed fact and law which is also subject to deference unless an extricable question of law can be identified. The appellants' grounds of appeal challenge the Judge's findings of fact or the application by the Judge of a legal standard to a set of facts. Consequently, unless an extricable question of law can be identified, the standard of review which applies in these appeals is that of a palpable and overriding error.

Did the Judge err by failing to put her mind as to whether or not, in the circumstances, the net worth reassessments should be vacated because they were not completed in a principled and rational manner and because they were done in an arbitrary fashion?

[8] In certain appropriate circumstances, the Minister may use the net worth

Digitized by Google

methodology to assess a taxpayer. This methodology has been described as follows by Bowman J. in Bigayan v. R. (1999), 2000 D.T.C. 1619:

The net worth method, as observed in Ramey v. The Queen, 93 D.T.C. 791, is a last resort to be used when all else fails. Frequently it is used when a taxpayer has failed to file income tax returns or has kept no records. It is a blunt instrument, accurate within a range of indeterminate magnitude. It is based on an assumption that if one subtracts a taxpayer's net worth at the beginning of a year from that at the end, adds the taxpayer's expenditures in the year, deletes non-taxable receipts and accretions to value of existing assets, the net result, less any amount declared by the taxpayer, must be attributable to unreported income earned in the year, unless the taxpayer can demonstrate otherwise. It is at best an unsatisfactory method, arbitrary and inaccurate but sometimes it is the only means of approximating the income of a taxpayer.

[9] Though it is an arbitrary and imprecise approximation of a taxpayer's income, the perceived unfairness of a net worth assessment is somewhat resolved by the fact the taxpayer is in the best position to know his or her own taxable income. Where a factual basis of the Minister's estimation is inaccurate, it should be a simple matter for the taxpayer to correct the Minister's error to the satisfaction of the Court: Hsu v. The Queen, 2001 FCA 240; [2001] 4 C.T.C. 1; 2001 D.T.C. 5459, at paragraph 30.

[10] The appellants assert that the use of the net worth method was arbitrary in that the Minister could have used another audit method. They add that the Minister's net worth reassessments were unprincipled since the CRA auditor responsible for the audits attributed the "Due to shareholders" in Ruby King to the individual appellants - rather than as unreported earnings of Ruby King - when he knew (and later acknowledged) that this assumption was questionable. The appellants thus conclude that their reassessments should be vacated on this basis.

[11] In my view, this ground of appeal should fail.

[12] The Judge found that the systems used by the appellants for sales and daily cash reconciliations in Ruby King were haphazard and questionable: Reasons at paragraphs 31 and 64. She further found that large amounts attributable to sales at Ruby King's were not rung into the cash register, and that Michel Guibord treated his duties as bookkeeper and the Ruby King's monies "in a cavalier and frivolous manner": Reasons at paragraph 64. She further did not believe Michel Guibord's explanation that any discrepancies between declared revenues and his and his spouse's net worth assessments were attributable to his alleged large casino gambling gains: Reasons at paragraphs 55 to 58. All these findings support the position of the Minister that a net worth method was justified in these circumstances.

[13] Moreover, the financial statements of Ruby King set out large amounts as "Due to shareholders". Though these amounts were subsequently found by the Judge to relate to unreported sales in Ruby King, the appellants cannot take issue with the fact that the Minister used an assumption which they themselves set out in the financial statements they submitted to the Minister.

Did the Judge err by (i) failing to identify the legal test which the appellants had to meet in order to demolish the Minister's assumptions, (ii) failing to determine whether the facts satisfied the legal test for each of the appellants, and (iii) failing to consider all the relevant evidence when considering the test for each of the appellants?

[14] Under subsection 152(7) of the Income Tax Act, the Minister is not bound by a return or information supplied by a taxpayer and may assess the taxpayer using any method that is appropriate in the circumstances. Subsection 158(8) of the Income Tax Act sets out that these assessments are deemed to be valid. The onus is therefore upon the taxpayer to disprove the assumptions of the Minister by making out a prima facie case. Once the Minister's assumptions have been "demolished", the onus shifts to the Minister to rebut the prima facie case made out by the taxpayer and to prove the assumptions.

Digitized by Google

Ruby King

[15] Ruby King asserts that since the Judge found that there was no evidence that its sales exceeded the deposits in its bank accounts (Reasons at paragraph 64 in fine), this finding "demolished" the Minister's net worth assumptions, and its appeals should thus be granted. It further argued that it was improper for the Judge to refer the matter back to the Minister for reassessment on a net worth basis.

[16] I find this argument somewhat disingenuous in light of the findings of the Judge that Ruby King maintained a deficient and frivolous accounting system resulting in hundreds of thousands of dollars in unreported sales during the three years in question. There is consequently no merit to this argument.

Mei and Michel Guibord

[17] Mei and Michel Guibord assert that the Judge failed to consider that they had "demolished" the Minister's assumption that the increase in their net worth came from undeclared cash revenues in Ruby King. They say that this assumption was "demolished" when the Judge found that the amounts "Due to shareholders" reported in the financial statements were in fact unreported sales in Ruby King, and that only these amounts had been unreported as revenues in Ruby King. In their view, had the Judge considered the evidence, she would have been compelled to conclude that the onus had shifted to the Minister to prove the source of their income which explained their net worth. Since the Minister did not present any such evidence, they claim that their appeals against the reassessments should have been allowed.

[18] They add that in any event, their testimony and the other evidence they tendered demonstrated at least on a prima facie basis that Michel Guibord was a very lucky "slot machine" gambler.

Consequently, his gains from "slot machine" gambling explained prima facie the discrepancies between their net worth and their declared taxable incomes.

[19] This ground of appeal fails to consider that the Minister's assumptions were not necessarily tied to revenues obtained by Mei and Michel Guibord in Ruby King. The proceedings in the Tax Court show that the Minister's assumptions were that Mei and Michel Guibord had undeclared taxable revenues from a source other than their declared income. Moreover, this ground of appeal is largely predicated on the assumption that the evidence submitted in support of the gambling revenue source was uncontroversial and credible. It was not.

[20] The Judge found Michel Guibord's testimony on this issue not to be reliable, his recollection to be incorrect and self serving, and the evidence submitted to be unpersuasive. She further found that much of the evidence simply did not support his version of events: Reasons at paragraphs 55 to 58. [21] I have not been persuaded that the Judge made a palpable and overriding error in reaching these findings. The record before us shows that there was ample evidence before the Judge to allow her to conclude as she did. There was clear evidence of substantial withdrawals from bank accounts and credit cards which contradicted the assertion that all large US dollar deposits by the couple were from gambling wins. Moreover, no record or tracking of the gambling wins or losses was supplied. Nor was any evidence tendered as to the amounts spent to make the alleged gambling wins.

Digitized by Google

[22] The issue here is simply one of credibility. The Judge did not find the testimony as to the extent of the claimed gambling wins either reliable or credible. Consequently, neither Mei nor Michel Guibord made out a prima facie case disputing the Minister's assumptions. Barring a palpable and overriding error, this Court should not intervene.

Did the Judge err in apportioning a part of the income of Michel Guibord to his spouse Mei Guibord?
[23] The Minister applied the net worth assessment analysis to the family unit comprised of both Mei and Michel Guibord, and apportioned as taxable income the unexplained increases in the net worth equally between Mei and Michel Guibord. Mei Guibord asserts as an additional ground of appeal that the Judge erred in confirming this apportionment when the evidence showed that the additional income was essentially attributable to Michel Guibord.
[24] The parties confirmed at the oral hearing before this Court that this ground of appeal had not been raised in the Tax Court of Canada. Consequently, the Judge did not address it in her Reasons. Since the issue was not pleaded and put in issue before the Tax Court, it is now too late to raise the issue.

Did the Judge err when she failed to vacate George Szeto's reassessment on the principle of de minimus?
[25] Under the doctrine of de minimus, a fact or thing may be so insignificant that a court may overlook it in deciding an issue or case: Black's Law Dictionary, Eight Edition.
[26] George Szeto asserts that since the results of the Minister's net worth analysis were substantially reduced by the Judge, she should have accordingly found - on the de minimus doctrine - that the Minister had not established that he had made misrepresentations that were attributable to neglect, carelessness or wilful default. Accordingly, the Judge erred when she found that the Minister was justified in reassessing Mr. Szeto for the statute barred years.
[27] The Crown contends that the de minimus doctrine does not apply in the Tax Court of Canada in light of the limited statutory jurisdiction of that Court. We need not decide this issue.
[28] Indeed, whether the doctrine applies or not, there was ample evidence before the Judge demonstrating that George Szeto was grossly negligent in regard to his and Ruby King's tax returns. I note in particular the findings of the Judge at paragraph 26 of her reasons that Mr. Szeto "signed both his and Ruby King's income tax returns without asking any questions" and that he did not review the financial statements. In addition, the Judge further found at paragraph 38 of her reasons that the "evidence submitted at the hearing does not totally support George's testimony with respect to the bank accounts". The Judge also noted discrepancies in his testimony concerning the net worth statement items relating to a Honda Civic and certain household goods. There were consequently ample reasons and evidence for the Judge to conclude that the Minister was justified in reassessing George Szeto for the concerned years.

Other grounds of appeal
[29] Though not emphasizing these issues in their oral arguments, the appellants have also raised numerous other grounds of appeal concerning notably the cash on hand which the Guibord couple held, certain personal assets and personal expenditures of Mr. Szeto,

Digitized by Google

the ownership of certain bank accounts, etc. All these grounds seek to challenge the assessment of the evidence by the Judge. The appellants have not convinced me that the Judge committed a palpable and overriding error on any of the challenged findings.

Conclusions

[30] I would consequently dismiss these appeals. I would also award the costs of these appeals to the respondent. However, there should be only one set of costs for the appeal files A-351-10, A-352-10, A-353- 10, A-354-10 and A-360-10.

"Robert M. Mainville"

J.A.

"I agree.
Eleanor R. Dawson
J.A."

"I agree.
Johanne Trudel J.A."

The Charter, Special Investigations and Disclosures/RFIs and Warrants

Based on Jarvis there are considerable instances that limit CRA's power to obtain, and have qualified for court admissibility, evidence from the taxpayer. The Jarvis precedent is a high mark for distinguishing when a taxpayer does not have to respond to questioning when a regulatory audit turns into a special investigation leading to penal processes described in s. 238-9.

When the audit function starts to be used as an aspect of the criminal investigation "the music stops" and counsels can argue that Charter s. 7 – 8 protections against self-incrimination come into effect. Where that line is was commented on in Jarvis when the Supreme Court held:

> Where the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability, there exists an adversarial relationship between the taxpayer and the state. To determine whether the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability, one must look to all factors that bear upon the nature of the inquiry. Apart from a clear decision to pursue a criminal investigation, no one factor is determinative. Even where reasonable grounds to suspect an offence exist, it will not always be true that the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability. The following factors assist in ascertaining whether an inquiry's purpose is to investigate penal liability:
>
> Did authorities have reasonable grounds to lay charges or could a decision have been made to proceed with a criminal investigation?
>
> Was the general conduct of the authorities consistent with a criminal investigation?
>
> Did the auditor transfer his or her file to the investigators?
>
> Was the auditor's conduct such that he or she was acting as an agent for the investigators?
>
> Does it appear that the investigators intended to use the auditor as their agent?
>
> Is the evidence relevant to taxpayer liability generally or only to penal liability? and,
>
> Do other circumstances or factors suggest that an audit became a criminal investigation?

Digitized by Google

R. v. Alberta Hot Oil Services Ltd., 2007 ABQB 155, Small Owner-Operations and Close-Knit Environments that Give Rise to Tax Evasion on Personal Expenses (it just doesn't happen with NYC hotel magnates)

Overview Facts Issues
Standard of Review Analysis
Did the trial Judge apply the wrong test to Joe Rinas's application for non-suit?
Did the trial Judge misdirect himself when he stated "[t]his is not a complex conspiracy"?
Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to the rule in Hodge's Case? 4. Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to wilful blindness5. Did the trial Judge err by taking judicial notice that the purpose of some of the items claimed was a personal purpose?
Did the trial Judge err by failing to consider all of the defences available to Joe Rinas and the Corporation, particularly that Joe Rinas and the Corporation were victims of Darlene Rinas?
Did the trial Judge err by failing to provide reasonably intelligible reasons to permit meaningful appellate review of his decision
Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to shareholder's benefits under the Income Tax Act?
Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to input tax credits under the Excise Tax Act?
Conclusion

Overview
[1] At the time of trial the corporate appellant Alberta Hot Oil Services Ltd. [the "Corporation"] was a tightly held corporation. The individual appellants Ronald Rinas ["Joe Rinas"] and Darlene Rinas were the sole shareholders, directors and officers of the Corporation and each had signing authority for the corporate bank account. The Corporation and the two individuals were all convicted of tax related offences relating to the taxation years 2001 and 2002. All three appeal their convictions.

Facts
[2] The Corporation's business was primarily the provision of hot oil services to the petroleum industry in Alberta. In addition to filing corporate T2 tax returns and financial statements for each year, the Corporation was a registered collector of GST and reported its net GST on a quarterly basis based on its year end.
[3] Joe Rinas was a 50% shareholder of the Corporation and the president of the company. His role in the operations of the Corporation was to oversee the work of employees, to look after equipment and to run the external work of the Corporation. Darlene Rinas was the other 50% shareholder of the Corporation. She was the secretary-treasurer of the Corporation and maintained the books of the company. There were no other directors or officers of the Corporation.
[4] In May of 2003 the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") conducted an audit on the Corporation for the taxation years 2001 and 2002 and concluded that several expenses of a personal nature had been deducted in the corporate records, including expenses of the Rinas's two adult children, Ryan and Liberty Rinas. In July of 2003 the Special Investigation Division of the CRA became involved and commenced a further investigation, finally determining to proceed with prosecution.
[5] In February, 2006 Judge H.W.A. Fuller of the Alberta Provincial Court convicted the appellants of a total of 18 tax offences including tax evasion and making false statements on tax returns.

Digitized by Google

Issues

[6] The following issues arise on appeal:

Did the trial Judge apply the wrong test to Joe Rinas's application for a non-suit?

Did the trial Judge misdirect himself when he stated "[t]his is not a complex conspiracy"?

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to the rule in Hodge's Case?

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to wilful blindness?

Did the trial Judge err by taking judicial notice that the purpose of some of the items claimed was a personal purpose?

Did the trial Judge err by failing to consider all of the defences available to Joe Rinas and the Corporation, particularly that Joe Rinas and the Corporation were victims of Darlene Rinas?

Did the trial Judge err by failing to provide reasonably intelligible reasons to permit meaningful appellate review of his decision?

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to shareholder's benefits under the Income Tax Act?

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to input tax credits under the Excise Tax Act?

Standard of Review

[7] For questions of law, the standard of review is correctness and no deference is given to the trial Judge's decision: Housen* v. *Nikolaisen, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235 at para. 8. However, appellate courts must give deference to a trial Judge's findings of fact. The standard of review for findings of fact is whether the trial Judge made a "palpable and overriding error": ibid at para. 10. This standard requires an appellate court to provide a high level of deference to the trial Judge's findings and not to re-try the matter. Where there is a question of mixed law and fact, the standard of palpable and overriding error applies unless there is an extricable principle of law which will require the standard of correctness: Murphy Oil Company Ltd.* v. Predator Corporation Ltd., 2006 ABCA 69 at para. 23; Double N Earthmovers Ltd. v. *Edmonton, 2005 ABCA 104 at para. 17.

[8] In this case, issues 1-6 are questions of law. Issues 8 and 9 are questions of mixed law and fact. Issue 8 is more factually driven since it required a finding that the Corporation conferred a benefit on Joe Rinas and Darlene Rinas. Issue 9 is a question of mixed law and fact in which there is an extricable principle of law.

[9] Therefore, I apply the standard of correctness to the trial Judge's decision for issues 1-6 and 9. Where findings of fact are disputed as a sub-issue within these issues, I give considerable deference to the findings of the trial Judge unless there is a palpable and overriding error. Likewise, I give deference to the trial Judge's findings in issue 8 in the absence of a palpable and overriding error.

[10] Issue 7 relates to the adequacy of reasons in a judgment. This issue was addressed thoroughly by the Supreme Court of Canada in R.* v. *Shepperd, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869. The standard of review for adequacy of reasons is whether the reasons are reasonably intelligible to the parties and provide the basis for meaningful appellate review of the correctness of the trial Judge's decision, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case: ibid at 897. I apply this standard to Issue 7.

Analysis

Did the trial Judge apply the wrong test to Joe Rinas's application for non-suit?

Digitized by Google

[11] At the conclusion of the Crown's case at trial, Joe Rinas brought a motion for a directed verdict on the basis there was insufficient evidence against him upon which a properly instructed jury could convict. He suggested there was no evidence of his knowledge of the Corporation's understatements of revenue and overstatements of deductions. The trial Judge rejected this submission and observed: On the principles set forth in the Charemski and McCullough cases, the Court has to determine in the motion for non-suit, whether the prosecution has established some evidence on all essential elements of each count before the Court. The Crown is not required to establish beyond a reasonable doubt on a non-suit motion. The argument which was very ably put forward by Mr. Forer, is in my view, premature, as I would have to weigh the evidence and consider various matters which at this stage of the trial would not be proper. I have concluded that the Crown has met this test and accordingly the application for non-suit is dismissed.

[12] Joe Rinas submits this direction amounted to an error of law. The test for non-suit was outlined by the Supreme Court of Canada in R.* v. *Charemski, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 679. At paras. 19- 21 the Supreme Court observed:

¶ 19 The test on a motion for a directed verdict has been clear for over a century...The test is whether a properly instructed jury could reasonably convict on the evidence...

¶ 20 ...To determine whether this could occur, the Judge on the motion for a directed verdict must ask whether some or all of the admissible evidence is legally sufficient to permit the jury to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In doing so, the trial Judge is determining the sufficiency of the evidence.

¶ 21 While some Judges have referred to a distinction between "no evidence" and "some evidence", this distinction is nonsensical. The question on a motion for a directed acquittal always relates to the ability of the evidence to support a verdict of guilt, that is, whether there is sufficient evidence to permit a properly instructed jury to reasonably convict...

[13] In a directed verdict motion or non-suit application the trial Judge is not required to determine that the Crown has established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt since the final determinations with respect to actual inferences to be drawn from the evidence or assessments of credibility of witnesses are determinations left to the jury. Rather, the trial Judge must determine whether the evidence, if proven, could support a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In circumstantial cases this will require determination whether , "...assuming the circumstantial facts are proved, it would be reasonable to make the inference necessary to establish the facts in issue": Charemski at para. 22.

[14] In this sense the trial Judge must perform a limited weighing of the evidence: Charemski at para. 23; R.* v. *Arcuri, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 828 at para. 23. In Arcuri at para. 23 McLachlin C.J.C. explained:

... The question then becomes whether the remaining elements of the offence -- that is, those elements as to which the Crown has not advanced direct evidence -- may reasonably be inferred from the circumstantial evidence. Answering this question inevitably requires the Judge to engage in a limited weighing of the evidence because, with circumstantial evidence, there is, by definition, an inferential gap between the evidence and the matter to be established... The Judge must therefore weigh the evidence, in the sense of assessing whether it is reasonably capable of supporting the inferences that the Crown asks the jury to draw. This weighing, however, is limited. The Judge does not ask whether she herself would conclude that the accused is guilty. Nor does the Judge draw factual inferences or assess credibility. The Judge asks only whether the evidence, if believed, could reasonably support an inference of guilt.

Digitized by Google

[15] In this case, the evidence against Joe Rinas was entirely circumstantial evidence. Therefore, the trial Judge was required to assess whether the circumstantial evidence, if proven, could lead a properly instructed jury to a reasonable inference that Joe Rinas had knowledge of the reporting deficiencies. He was required to weigh the evidence to a limited degree.

[16] In this case the trial Judge correctly directed that the Crown must establish "...some evidence on all essential elements of each count before the Court." Later in that same paragraph he concluded that "the Crown has met this test". However, the trial Judge also suggested it was improper to weigh the evidence. It is this aspect that is troubling. Although the trial Judge should not weigh the evidence to determine the ultimate outcome of the trial, he must consider the circumstantial evidence to determine whether a reasonable inference of guilt could be drawn in a limited weighing of the evidence. It is unclear from the reasons of the trial Judge whether he correctly directed himself not to predetermine factual findings or whether he misdirected himself against any weighing of the evidence whatsoever.

[17] The Crown concedes in oral argument that the reasons of the trial Judge on this point are deficient. Nevertheless, I accept the Crown's submission that even if the trial Judge misdirected himself there was no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice which should result in a new trial or an acquittal. There was evidence before the Court which could give rise to a reasonable inference that Joe Rinas had the requisite knowledge to meet the requirements of the specific intent offences so alleged.

[18] Joe Rinas was the president and one of two sole shareholders of the Corporation. He and his wife were the deciding minds of the Corporation; they were the owners; they were the directors; they were the officers; they were the shareholders. In short, they were the Corporation. Similarly, Joe Rinas had signing authority on the Corporation's bank account and was the recipient of considerable benefits from the Corporation. Further, there was evidence that Joe Rinas engaged in the purchase of some of the personal items deducted as expenses from the income of the Corporation. Several examples show this active involvement in the acquiring of personal items. First, there are three half day rentals of skidoos when family came to visit during the Christmas season. Second, there are flowers sent on Mother's Day to Joe Rinas's mother. Third, Joe Rinas purchased a washer and dryer on the corporate account. Further, there was evidence that Joe Rinas attended meetings with the Corporation's accountants.

[19] While these pieces of evidence on their own might not be sufficient to support an inference that Joe Rinas had knowledge, together this circumstantial evidence does create a web of information which would allow the trier of law to determine that a properly instructed jury could conclude that an inference may be drawn that Joe Rinas knowingly participated in the misconduct alleged by the Crown.

Did the trial Judge misdirect himself when he stated "[t]his is not a complex conspiracy"?

[20] Near the beginning of the trial decision at para. 8 the trial Judge observed: This is not a complex conspiracy and the main issue before the Court is whether the accused knowingly understated income and overstated expenses.

[21] The appellants submit that the trial Judge made an error in characterizing the issues before him as a conspiracy. The appellants argue this error is revealed throughout the judgment wherever the trial Judge refers to a scheme or schemes. Further, they contend that the trial Judge's alleged conclusion that this was a conspiracy caused him to lump together the appellants rather than consider their individual guilt. The Crown, on the other hand, submits the trial Judge did not characterize the issues before him as a conspiracy but rather distinguished between a complex conspiracy to which special rules apply and the relatively simple issues in this case. The Crown also argues that the trial Judge's references to schemes throughout the judgment do not reflect that the trial Judge considered this to be a conspiracy case. I accept the position of the Crown on this issue.

Digitized by Google

[22] The main issue before the trial Judge was whether the appellants knowingly understated income and overstated expenses. Essentially, the issue boiled down to, "did the Corporation claim its shareholders' personal expenses as business expenses"? When the trial Judge made this statement about a complex conspiracy, he did so to describe the relative ease with which the trial issues could be appreciated. This was a relatively simple case as opposed to a complex conspiracy prosecution which involves specialized procedures and evidentiary rules. Conspiracy was never raised by the Crown or by the appellants at trial.

[23] Although the plain meaning of the word "scheme" does have some similarity to the concept of a conspiracy, "scheme" is a word used to describe the essential elements of the crime of tax evasion in the relevant jurisprudence: see for example R.* v. *Klundert (2004), 242 D.L.R. (4th) 644 (Ont. C.A.) at paras. 36,

39. Therefore, the use of the word "scheme" throughout the reasons of the trial Judge was simply a way of using language consistent with applicable case law and nothing more. It was not an implicit attempt to infer that there was a conspiracy. The trial Judge did not apply the co-conspirator's exception to the hearsay rule. [24] The trial Judge was aware of the need to consider each appellant separately in determining guilt. At para. 77 the trial Judge addressed the reasons for finding that both Joe Rinas and Darlene Rinas "knowingly made false statements in their respective Income Tax Returns and GST Return." Although he dealt with the individual appellants collectively, the language in para. 77(3) in particular suggests he considered their culpability separately. The trial Judge articulated at para. 77(3) that both Joe Rinas and Darlene Rinas were actively engaged in acquiring personal items through the corporate account. Further, at para. 77(3) he distinguished Joe Rinas's role in the Corporation from Darlene Rinas's bookkeeping role but nevertheless found that Joe Rinas's "involvement and personal knowledge" created the requisite knowledge and intent for the alleged offences.

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to the rule in Hodge's Case?

[25] The appellants contend the trial Judge misstated the law established in Hodge's Case (1838), 2 Lewin 227, 168 E.R. 1136 by suggesting a reversal of the onus of proof such that each of the appellants had to prove an absence of knowledge rather than the obligation of the Crown to prove knowledge or wilful blindness. The appellants refer to paragraph 60 of the trial judgment in this regard: In dealing with circumstantial evidence one must be mindful that the Court cannot make a finding of reasonable doubt on non-existent evidence.

[26] The Crown submits this statement must be taken in context and that there was no error of law. I agree. The trial Judge properly articulated and applied the law relating to circumstantial evidence. [27] The rule in Hodge's Case developed to deal with the differences between direct and circumstantial evidence. A Court faced with direct evidence must only address whether that evidence is to be believed. In contrast, circumstantial evidence requires a multi-layered approach since the Court must ask both whether the evidence is to be believed and what inferences may be drawn from the evidence. The rule in Hodge's Case addresses a potentially latent danger in circumstantial evidence by requiring that in convictions based on circumstantial evidence alone that guilt must be the only rational inference from the evidence.

Digitized by Google

[28] The trial Judge explained the rule in Hodge's Case by reference to the Ontario Court of Appeal decision R.* v. *McIver, [1965] 1 O.R. 306. The quoted passage from McIver in the trial judgment accurately reflects the notion that all rational inferences must be fully supported by the evidence. The trial Judge then goes on to state that "the Court cannot make a finding of reasonable doubt on non-existent evidence." He cites R. v. Torrie (1967), 3 C.C.C. 303 (Ont. C.A.) at 306 for this proposition. The appellants suggest the trial Judge erred in instructing himself on this point since a reasonable doubt can always be found on the basis that there was an absence of evidence: R.* v. *P.C.W., 1998 ABCA 180 at para. 12. [29] The rule in Hodge's Case was aptly explained in McIver: Before you can find the prisoner guilty you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the circumstances are consistent with the prisoner having committed the act and you must also be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the facts are such as to be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that the prisoner was the guilty person. The trial Judge had that before him and was aware of the rule. He explained that the rule was summarised in McIver: trial decision at para. 60. He then proceeded to explain a further aspect of the rule. His comment at para. 60 of the trial decision reflects some of the discourse in McIver following that Court's explanation of the rule in Hodge's Case.

[30] In McIver the Court emphasized that inferences must be rational conclusions based upon proven facts, not speculative suggestions. The Court provided examples in the context of a motor vehicle accident such as the possibility that a passenger in the vehicle touched the steering wheel, causing the vehicle to swerve, or that a child was playing in the road and the driver swerved to miss the child. Since there was no evidence to suggest that either of those possibilities occurred, both of these possibilities are entirely speculative; inferences that either of these situations occurred cannot be drawn in the absence of evidence. This conclusion is in line with the Torrie case which the trial Judge cited.

[31] Had the trial Judge's comment at para. 60 of his decision been made in isolation it would amount to an error of law. However, given this context, there was no error of law. The trial Judge clearly recognized the correct burden of proof at para. 76. His statement with respect to the law regarding circumstantial cases does not detract from the fundamental principle that the Crown must establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial Judge correctly pointed out that an inference to support a conclusion alternative to the guilt of the accused must be a rational inference drawn from proven facts. In the context as outlined above, the trial Judge did not suggest that guilt could be found where the Crown has not met its burden of proof.

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to wilful blindness?

[32] At para. 77(3) of the trial decision, the trial Judge observed: Joe and Darlene Rinas:...

[w]ere both engaged in acquiring personal articles or incurring personal expenses or allowing such expenses to be paid by the Corporation if incurred by a third party. Although Joe Rinas was not actively involved in maintaining the corporate records, his involvement and personal knowledge made him an intrinsic part of the three schemes. At the very least he was wilfully blind and this is the legal equivalent of knowledge.

[33] Joe Rinas argues the trial Judge erred in his application of the law concerning wilful blindness since, he submits, there were no triggering events that should have called for further inquiry. Joe Rinas further contends the trial Judge may have applied a standard of vicarious liability to him rather than consider his individual mens rea.

[34] The Supreme Court of Canada explained the doctrine of wilful blindness in R.* v.

Digitized by Google

Sansregret, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 570 at para. 22: ...
[W]ilful blindness arises where a person who has become aware of the need for some inquiry declines to make the inquiry because he does not wish to know the truth...The culpability in...wilful blindness...is justified by the accused's fault in deliberately failing to inquire when he knows there is reason for inquiry.
[35] Similarly, the Quebec Court of Appeal observed that wilful blindness requires more than that the accused should have known; rather, the accused's suspicions should have been actually aroused: R.* v. *Barbeau (1996), 110 C.C.C. (3d) 69 (Que. C.A.) at 95. There are therefore two aspects to the doctrine of wilful blindness. First, the person must become aware of some need to make an inquiry, and, second, the person deliberately does not make the inquiry. The first step is what the defence refers to as a "triggering event".
[36] In this case the trial Judge correctly set out the law respecting wilful blindness at para. 57 of the trial decision by reference to R.* v. *Harding (2001), 160 C.C.C. (3d) 225 (Ont. C.A.). That citation clearly reveals that wilful blindness has a high standard of proof including that "[a] Court can properly find wilful blindness only where it can almost be said that the defendant actually knew": Harding at para. 62.
[37] Counsel for Joe Rinas submits there was insufficient evidence before the trial Judge to convict Joe Rinas of having actual knowledge or of having had actual suspicions and deliberately not making further inquiries. I do not agree. The following summary of the evidence before the trial Judge confirms that the trial Judge had sufficient evidence to convict Joe Rinas on the basis of actual knowledge or on the basis of wilful blindness:
Joe Rinas is listed as the purchaser of personal items identified at trial, which personal items were purchased through the corporate account. As stated above, these include invoices for ski-doos and a washer and dryer set.
Joe Rinas was present for and actively participated in yearly meetings with the Corporation's accountant who confirmed that he advised that personal items expensed through the Corporation should not be deducted by the Corporation.
Joe Rinas signed his Information Return for Electronic Filing, thereby confirming a full disclosure of income from all sources. He signed the engagement letter with the firm of accountants which confirmed the completeness and accuracy of all information provided.
Joe Rinas was the president of the Corporation and one of two shareholders and directors. He was listed as management on the corporate ledger. With his wife he controlled the affairs and operations of the Corporation.
[38] The triggering events in this case were Joe Rinas's involvement in the purchase of personal items by the Corporation. At that point Joe Rinas must have been aware of the need to make an inquiry to ensure that the expenses were not being deducted in the books of the Corporation. He did not make such an inquiry and later signed tax returns confirming the accuracy of the information contained therein. He was also involved in the review of the shareholders' loan accounts but did not inquire about the absence of certain expenses. The only inference that can be drawn is that he deliberately did not inquire because he did not want to know how the personal expenses would be recorded in the books of the Corporation.
[39] Accordingly, I conclude that the trial Judge did not err in his application of law relating to wilful blindness. [40] Joe Rinas also suggests that the trial Judge erred by reversing the onus of proof on the issue of wilful blindness when he stated at para. 77(12) of the trial decision that there "was no evidence before the Court which gave any indication or explanation as to why or how the items under review should or could be regarded as an appropriate corporate expense". Although no adverse inference can be drawn where an accused does not call evidence, an accused may wish to contradict strong circumstantial evidence as part of the defence's strategy or tactics: Steinberg* v. *The King (1931), 56 C.C.C. 9 (S.C.C.). In this case there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to convict and no offer of explanation provided. This was not a matter of a shifting onus, it was simply a matter of tactics. The appellants made a tactical decision to call no evidence and that is all there is to it. This was not an instance where the trial Judge erred by reversing the onus of proof on that issue.

Digitized by Google

Did the trial Judge err by taking judicial notice that the purpose of some of the items claimed was a personal purpose?

[41] Section 18 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 ["ITA"] provides the general limitation against deducting certain expenses. Section 18(1)(a) provides that only expenses that are incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from the business are deductible. Similarly, s. 18(h) prohibits taxpayers from deducting personal or living expenses.

[42] In convicting all three of the appellants, the trial Judge concluded that numerous expenses deducted in the Corporation's ledger were personal expenses rather than legitimate business expenses. The appellants submit it was improper for the trial Judge to come to this finding in the absence of expert evidence.

[43] The characterization of an expense is a question of fact to be determined considering all the circumstances. Before making the findings of fact that the expenses were personal in nature, the trial Judge heard 15 witnesses testify over several days and he reviewed seven binders of documents. The trial Judge was careful to note in his reasons that all of the extensive evidence before him was considered in coming to his conclusions.

[44] At para. 66 of the trial decision the trial Judge observed that he "considered all of the testimony and reviewed the supporting documentation in light of the guidelines in Symes* v. *Canada, supra, and particular the nature of the business carried on by [the Corporation]." Although a civil case, Symes* v. *Canada, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695 provides important guidance with respect to the purpose of expenditures. The factors the Supreme Court of Canada considered in Symes with respect to the question of whether child care was an allowable business deduction align with the considerations of the trial Judge in this case. At para. 63 the trial Judge outlined his thorough considerations: The Court was required to objectively and fairly assess each individual item presented by the Crown to determine if it was an expense which properly related to the nature of the business operated by AHOSL. The Court took into consideration what are regarded as relevant factors which, without restriction to the generalities of the foregoing, included:

Whether the Expense is Deductible According to Generally Accepted Accounting Principles.

Whether the Expense is Normally Incurred by Others in the Particular Business.

Whether the Expense Would Have Been Incurred by The Taxpayer if He or She Had Not Been Earning Income From a Business.

Whether the Taxpayer Could Have Avoided the Expense Without Affecting Gross Income.

Other Facts and Circumstances From Which to Infer the Taxpayer's Purpose in Incurring an Expense.

Dual Purpose Expenses.

[45] The trial Judge heard detailed evidence regarding the business activities of the Corporation. This assisted him in characterizing expenses as legitimate business expenses or as personal expenses based on the Symes criteria. An accountant testified whether certain deductions were ordinarily allowed as business expenses. This evidence supported the trial Judge's characterization of the disputed expenses. Similarly, former employees of the Corporation testified regarding the nature of the business premises, the daily activities and employee appreciation initiatives. This evidence further supported the trial Judge's characterization of the disputed expenses. Additionally, vendors testified of the reason for certain purchases if it was known. By way of example, a retailer testified that a wedding cake and flowers were purchased on the Corporation's account for the wedding of Joe and Darlene Rinas's daughter, Liberty Rinas.

Digitized by Google

[46] Given the extensive testimony of the numerous witnesses regarding the nature of the business, accounting practices generally, and particular purchases in addition to the careful considerations of the Symes criteria for each allegedly personal item, the trial Judge did not require expert testimony to establish whether certain items were personal or business related. Further, the trial Judge correctly set out the legal test respecting judicial notice and properly applied that test to the source documents in evidence. He engaged in a detailed analysis of the evidence in characterizing each expense.

[47] Although the trial Judge notes that he had to take judicial notice of the purpose of some items, he only did so after considering all of the evidence and the considerations in Symes. At para. 64 of the trial decision, the trial Judge explained: The Court has reviewed the various authorities and the arguments put forth by Defence counsel. The actus reus or the "purpose test" contained in s. 18(1)(a) ITA does require further comments and in particular the criteria set forth in the Supreme Court of Canada in Symes, supra. These principles are well summarized in Hogg, Magee and Li, (Fifth Edition), Principles of Canadian Income Tax, at ch. 8.3(b)(i). The Court has carefully considered theses principles in reaching its decision and was particularly mindful of the overlap between the "personal circle" and the "income producing circle." On any given item the Court has been generous in its interpretation of the "income producing circle" and also disallowed any items where the Crown failed to satisfy their burden of proof. In the final analysis, "purpose" is really a question of fact determined after considering all relevant factors. It is really a test of "logic and experience." This was the proper approach to assessing the evidence. [48] The appellants assert that although some of the items are normally considered personal expenses, it is possible that a normally personal expense can be a business expenditure in certain circumstances. Darlene Rinas presented two examples to illustrate this point. In one example toilet paper could be construed as a personal expense. However, since toilet paper is requisite in the effective running of an office it can be a legitimate business expense. Likewise, the purchase of an ice cream cone would normally be seen as a personal expense. Nevertheless, when it is used as business promotion to sweeten the tooth of Bill Gates as a potential client, it may be deductible.

[49] While I accept that there may be apparently personal expenses which are in actuality valid business expenditures and that a trial Judge should approach the characterization of these items with caution, I do not accept that the trial Judge in this case was not alive to the issue. He carefully considered all of the extensive evidence in light of the Symes criteria. The trial Judge did not accept all of the assessments of the Crown witnesses blindly. Rather, he engaged in his own analysis of the true character of each expense. This is clear from his determination that the Crown failed to establish its burden of proof regarding some of the questioned expenses.

[50] It is clear from the reasons of the trial Judge that he performed an analysis for each expenditure pursuant to the criteria identified in Symes and in light of the evidence of numerous witnesses. To the extent that he took judicial notice of any particular matter, it was in light of these considerations and I do not find an error.

Did the trial Judge err by failing to consider all of the defences available to Joe Rinas and the Corporation, particularly that Joe Rinas and the Corporation were victims of Darlene Rinas?

Digitized by Google

[51] Joe Rinas and the Corporation submit the trial Judge failed to consider their possible defences that Darlene Rinas committed a fraud against them when she deducted improper expenses in the Corporation's books. I do not agree and accept the position of the Crown on this point. The defence that Joe Rinas and the Corporation were victims of bookkeeping fraud was referred to at trial. The trial Judge rejected this possibility for each of these appellants.

[52] The trial Judge rejected the defence that Joe Rinas was a victim of fraud when he found that Joe Rinas knowingly made false statements and evaded tax beyond a reasonable doubt. He clearly set out in his reasons that Joe Rinas was an integral part of the three schemes of tax evasion alleged by the Crown. The trial Judge did not fail to consider the defence but rather rejected it outright.

[53] Similarly, the trial Judge rejected the argument that the Corporation was a victim of fraud when he found that the Corporation knowingly made false statements and evaded tax beyond a reasonable doubt. He set out 5 factors in support of that finding. This was not an issue that the trial Judge missed but rather one that he considered and dismissed.

[54] Further, where an individual offender is a directing mind of a corporation, the Corporation will be liable as an offender: R. v. Hwang, 2007 BCCA 68 at para. 6; R. v. Canadian Dredge & Dock Co., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 662. This liability arises since the individual and the Corporation are considered to be one and the same when the directing mind acts within the scope of his or her authority, was not totally in fraud of the Corporation and the acts were at least partly for the benefit of the company: Canadian Dredge. The trial Judge found that Darlene Rinas was a directing mind of the Corporation: see for example trial decision at para. 44. Therefore, the Corporation's criminal liability coincides with Darlene Rinas's culpability.

Did the trial Judge err by failing to provide reasonably intelligible reasons to permit meaningful appellate review of his decision?

[55] Joe Rinas submits the trial Judge's reasons are deficient with respect to the finding that "at the very least [Joe Rinas] was willfully blind". He contends the trial Judge does not identify any evidence that is or can be capable of supporting this conclusion. To a large extent this is a repetition of issue 4 discussed above. In paragraph 37 of my reasons above I outline the evidence against Joe Rinas as explained in the trial decision.

Clearly there was evidence and the trial Judge considered all of it. I am satisfied that the reasons of the trial Judge allow for meaningful appellate review as was contemplated by R.* v. *Sheppard, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 869 at paras. 46, 52 and 55.

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to shareholder's benefits under the Income Tax Act?

[56] Section 15(1) of the ITA requires that where a corporation confers a benefit on a shareholder in a given year, the shareholder must include that benefit in his, her or its income for the year. The trial Judge held that both Darlene Rinas and Joe Rinas failed to compute significant benefits they received from the Corporation in their income.

[57] Darlene Rinas submits that at trial the Crown did not adduce any evidence that the Corporation did not resort to an alternative treatment of the questioned expenses. Therefore, she submits, the trial Judge erred by concluding that the personal items were conferred as benefits to Joe and Darlene Rinas. Specifically, Darlene Rinas submits there was a possibility expenses could have been reported by way of employee T4. In my view, there was no evidence to suggest this was a possibility.

Digitized by Google

[58] Section 15(1) of the ITA requires a two-part analysis asking first whether the benefit was conferred and, second, whether the benefit was conferred upon the shareholders by reason of their being a shareholder: Del Grande* v. *Canada, [1993] 1 C.T.C. 2096 (T.C.C.) at 2101. The trial Judge clearly set out this test at para. 72 of the trial decision. Although this is a question of mixed law and fact since it involves the application of a statutory provision, the question raised by Darlene Rinas is essentially a factual one respecting the trial Judge's findings. At paras. 72 and 75 the trial Judge found as facts both that the Corporation conferred benefits on Joe and Darlene Rinas and that the benefit was conferred by virtue of their role as shareholders. In the absence of palpable and overriding error I decline to interfere in the factual findings of the trial Judge.

Did the trial Judge err in his application of the law relating to input tax credits under the Excise Tax Act?

[59] The trial Judge held that the Corporation overstated input tax credits in its GST returns which returns were signed by Darlene Rinas on behalf of the Corporation. The result was that GST payments were evaded. Pursuant to s. 221(1) of the Excise Tax Act, R.S. 1985, c. E-15 ["ETA"], the Corporation was required to collect GST on taxable supply. Similarly, s. 169(1) of the ETA allowed the Corporation to claim input tax credits on property or services used in the course of commercial activities. However, these input tax credits had to be reasonable given the nature of the commercial activities of the GST registrant: ETA s. 170(2). The trial Judge held that the Corporation used personal expenses as input tax credits on its GST return contrary to s. 169(1).

[60] The appellants suggest that had the trial Judge applied s. 170(1)(c) of the ETA , the trial Judge may not have come to this conclusion. Section 170(1)(c) of the ETA is a restriction which applies "where input costs that would ordinarily give rise to an input tax credit have a significant personal consumption element": Peter H. Wood, The Complete Guide to the Goods and Services Tax, vol. 1, 14th ed. (Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, 2006) at 179. I accept the Crown's submissions that this section does not apply to this matter. The personal expenses claimed by the Corporation would not ordinarily give rise to an input tax credit.

[61] Similarly, s. 170(1)(c) does allow for input tax credits of personal expenditures but only if certain conditions are met. One of those conditions is where an expense is supplied to a shareholder or relative of a shareholder, the recipient of the expense must pay fair market value for the expense to the Corporation. In this case the personal expenses were benefits conferred by the Corporation to Joe Rinas and Darlene Rinas for no consideration. Therefore, the Corporation would be unable to claim input tax credits for the personal expenses incurred by its shareholders under s. 170(1)(c).

Conclusion

[62] The appeals are dismissed.

Heard on the 25th - 30th day of January, 2007

Dated at the City of Edmonton, Alberta this 26th day of March, 2007.

D.R.G. Thomas J.C.Q.B.A.

ITA Sec. 231.2 Requirement or C.C. Sec. 487.01 Warrant to Obtain Evidence?

ITA Sec. 231.2 allows CRA to approach and get a production order from a judge of a Superior Ct, while Canadian Criminal Code Sec. 487.01, allows for the same.

The route the tax authorities take to realize evidence is important in this setting since a s. 231.1-.2 request for documents cannot be used if the instance has been handed over to Special Investigations and a charge of tax evasion is being evaluated, rather than mere audit. And the taken will then relate to whether the documentary evidence realized is admissible in the face of Charter infringements.

Digitized by Google

An important case to consider in this regard is R. v. Zuk[126] where CRA sent s. 231.2 RFIs (Request for Information) to numerous 3rd parties in respect of a taxpayer, without using s. 487.01 CC search warrants for additional documentary evidence in his control/possession. On the question of whether Charter rights had been violated the Ontario Court Of Justice held:

> Evidence Heard on the Voir Dire
>
> Mr. Zuk first came to the attention of Revenue Canada in the context of an investigation of another third party, Jonathan James Hunter, in l997-l998. In February l998, Michael Arthur, a Revenue Canada investigator, first met with Mr. Zuk to enquire about his relationship with Mr. Hunter and, more particularly, about the transfer of 200,000 Tramway shares from Mr. Hunter to Mr. Zuk. On June 1st, l998, Revenue Canada advised Mr. Zuk that his own income tax affairs were under investigation. By August l3, 1999, Revenue Canada had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that Mr. Zuk had committed offences contrary to the Income Tax Act. That day, Justice Paris authorized Criminal Code search warrants on four addresses related to Mr. Zuk. These warrants were executed on August l8, 1999 against his personal residence, the personal residence of his former wife, his business premises, and the business premises of his accountant. Investigator James Locke of Revenue Canada reviewed all the material seized pursuant to the search warrants. In order to fill gaps in the information obtained pursuant to the search warrants and to get a complete picture of Mr. Zuk's affairs, Mr. Locke thereafter issued a series of Requirements to Provide Information and Documents to brokerage houses, banking institutions and other agencies known to have had accounts with Mr. Zuk, his wife, and his companies. The Requirements were issued pursuant to the powers set out in s. 231.2(1)(a) and (b) of the Income Tax Act "for purposes related to the administration and enforcement of the Act."
>
> On October 22, l999, twenty-four Requirements were sent to stock brokerage houses and banking institutions. On December 7, l999, eight further Requirements were sent, several to the same institutions as previously under a different name. On April 28, 2000, Mr. Locke sent two further Requirements. Peter Zisis who assumed carriage of the investigation in November 2000 issued three further Requirements on which the crown relies to Visa Centres on April 26, 2001.
>
> Peter Zisis used information obtained from these Requirements to prepare the Net Worth Statement upon which the crown relies to prove its case against Mr. Zuk. The fruits of the Requirements go both to his income and to his expenses during the period under investigation. Without this evidence, it is not clear that the prosecution could proceed.
>
> The Revenue Canada investigators testified that these Requirements were used in accordance with policies and procedures defined by Revenue Canada on the advice of the federal Department of Justice. A Communique issued by the Investigations Directorate on June 27, l997 about obtaining information from third parties specified that
>
> "Requirements will not be used where a person under investigation has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the information or documents held by a third party once an investigator has reasonable grounds to believe that an offence has been committed. At that point, a search warrant or general warrant should be obtained to seize such evidence from a third party.
>
> That policy changed. On April 9, l999, the Assistant Director of Investigations issued a further Memorandum on obtaining information from third parties. That Memorandum provided that
>
> As a result of advice received from the Department of Justice following the Supreme

[126] 2004 ONCJ 246

Digitized by Google

Court of Canada decision in the Del Zotto case, the practice of using section 487 and s. 487.01 warrants under the Criminal Code can be discontinued and replaced with the use of requirements under s.
231.2 of the Income Tax Act. S. 289, s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act or s. 43 of the Customs Act, as appropriate. Requirements can be used with respect to all third parties and may be used at any stage of an audit or an investigation but only up to the point where charges are laid.
Any warrants that have been served upon a financial institution or other third party and are currently outstanding should be completed. All new applications for warrants should be replaced with requirements. The requirements should be served on the bank branch where the accounts for which information is sought are located, in the same manner as existed for warrants.
This was the policy in effect when the majority of requirements in the matter before this court were issued. The Revenue Canada Manual dated March 30, 2001 set out detailed instructions for the use of Requirements to obtain information and the production of documents from third parties. The Chapter relating to these instructions is over fifty pages in length. It provided details of procedures with respect to different types of third party institutions and individuals, and reiterated what had been set out in the April l999 Memorandum. This was the policy in effect at the time the last requirements in the matter before this court were issued.
Apart from the policy directives, the evidence also indicates that the use of requirements was subjected to internal checks and controls. Investigators seeking to use requirements were required to prepare Case Profiles and a Director's Summary indicating why the requirements were necessary, and to obtain the approval of their team leader and the Assistant Director. The Requirements went out under the signature of the Director of the Toronto Office.
James Locke, the investigator who issued the majority of the requirements before me, testified that, at the time the search warrants were executed, in August l999, he had reasonable and probable grounds to believe the Mr. Zuk had committed offences. At the time he issued the requirements, he also had reasonable and probable grounds to secure search warrants to obtain the same information. Pursuant to the prevailing policy at Revenue Canada, however, he used the requirements, and did not consider using search warrants. He testified that, had the l997 Communique still been in effect, he would have used Criminal Code search warrants or general search warrants. He also testified that, as judicial approval had been obtained already to enter Mr. Zuk's dwelling house, it would have been his expectation that search warrants for the banking institutions and brokerage houses would have received judicial approval as well.
He had done a "down and dirty" net worth analysis to provide the grounds to obtain the search warrants in August. Notwithstanding what had been obtained through the search warrants, and from his own investigations of public filings and third party calls, he needed the additional information available from the banks and stock brokerage houses to prepare a formal net worth statement upon which the prosecution could proceed. He was looking for information to determine the adjusted cost base of shares, and the income and expenditures of Mr. Zuk. In cross-examination, he indicated that a search warrant was used to get the information from Mr. Zuk's accountant for several reasons. Unlike the banks and financial institutions, he wanted to secure the originals of any documents and working papers that the accountant may have had on hand. The search warrant provides an element of surprise, and enables the investigator to seize the documents and take them away. Requirements are issued to large institutions with complex archiving systems. In the case of requirements, originals are not important. Copies of the accounts are sufficient. Generally, it takes some time for the institutions to comply.

Digitized by Google

Analysis

Mr. Frost conceded that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Jarvis, supra and R. v. Ling, supra, both rendered November 21, 2002, indicated that Revenue Canada's prevailing policy about using requirements in criminal investigations violated the Charter. He agreed that the use of the requirements in the criminal investigation against Mr. Zuk was a breach of his s. 7 and s. 8 Charter rights. He also conceded that there was a sufficient relationship between the Charter infringement and the evidence that the crown seeks to tender in this voir dire. He further indicated that, as the requirements were also directed to the accounts of Mr. Zuk's wife and his companies, ordinarily he might argue that Mr. Zuk has no standing to assert his wife's Charter rights, and that companies have no rights under the Charter. Mr. Frost conceded, however, that I need not consider these arguments as the case for the crown cannot proceed on the evidence obtained relating only to Mrs. Zuk or the corporation.

The sole issue for my determination is whether the evidence obtained as a result of the requirements should be excluded under s. 24(2) of the Charter. The mere fact that a breach of the Charter exists does not mean that the evidence obtained pursuant to the Charter breach must automatically be excluded. In Jarvis supra para. 105, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the evidence obtained from unconstitutional use of requirements was to be excluded. I agree with Mr. Justice Romilly in R. v. Wilder [2003] B.C.J. No. 3081 (B.C. S.C.) paras 25, 32 and 29-23, however, that the Supreme Court in Jarvis followed its traditional position of deferring to the s. 24(2) analysis of the trial judge and cannot be taken to have held that a Charter breach based on the unconstitutional use of requirements mandated exclusion in all cases. This interpretation of Jarvis is consistent with what the Supreme Court did in Ling, supra, para. 32, where it indicated that the s. 7 and s. 8 breaches in that case would need to be considered in light of a s. 24(2) analysis at the new trial.

It is well established that a s. 24(2) analysis requires consideration of three factors:

trial fairness,

the seriousness of the Charter breach, and the effects of the admission of the evidence on the administration of justice:

R. v. Collins (l987), 33 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (S.C.C.).

Trial Fairness

The Supreme Court of Canada in R. v Stillman (l997), 113 C.C.C. (3d) 321, para 119 set out the steps required in the analysis of trial fairness:

Classify the evidence as conscriptive or non-conscriptive based upon the manner in which it was obtained. If the evidence is non-conscriptive, its admission will not render the trial unfair and the court will proceed to consider the seriousness of the breach and the effect of the exclusion on the repute of the administration of justice.

If the evidence is conscriptive and the Crown fails to demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that the evidence would have been discovered by alternative nonconscriptive means, then its admission will render the trial unfair. The Court, as a general rule, will exclude the evidence….

If the evidence is found to be conscriptive and the Crown demonstrates…that it would have been discovered by alternative non-conscriptive means, then its admission will generally not render the trial unfair. However, the seriousness of the Charter breach and the effect of exclusion onf the repute of the administration of justice will have to be considered.

Evidence is said to be conscriptive when an accused is compelled to incriminate himself at the behest of the state by means of a statement, the use of the body or the production of bodily samples*: Stillman, supra para.*

Digitized by Google

80. Evidence cannot be conscriptive unless it is compelled by the unconstitutional conduct of a state agent; there is no conscription of it is given voluntarily. Evidence is otherwise discoverable if there were alternative nonconscriptive means compliant with the Charter through which the state would have obtained the evidence, or the evidence would inevitably have been discovered.

The evidence obtained by the requirements at issue are the personal banking and brokerage records of Mr. Zuk secured from banking institutions and stock brokerage firms. These are the types of records in which Mr. Zuk has a reasonable expectation of privacy. It is well-established that a reasonable expectation of privacy attaches to the banking records of an individual. Presumably, brokerage accounts also are of a "personal and confidential nature," going to the "biographical core of personal information", including information about "intimate details of lifestyle and personal choices of the individual" which the s. 8 right to privacy is intended to protect: R. v. Plant (1993), 84 C.C.C. (3d) 203 (S.C.C.) at para. 19.

They are, however, pre-existing documents which were created voluntarily by Mr. Zuk and the institutions with whom he did business, independent of any state compulsion. These are not the type of documents which generally attracts the principle against self-incrimination: Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (1990), 54 C.C.C. (3d) 417, pp 554-556, pp.538-539; R. v. D'Amour (2002), 166 C.C.C. (3d) 477 (Ont. C.A.), 477, pp. 489-91.

Mere use by authorities of documents created by the defendant prior to a Charter violation is not the kind of compelled participation that will render the after-acquired evidence conscriptive: R. v. Church of Scientology of Toronto (l997), 116 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused.

The Supreme Court of Canada confirmed in R. v Law (2002), 160 C.C.C. (3d), 449 at p. 465 that business records are not conscriptive evidence, as they neither emanate directly from the defendant, nor are they derived from the defendant's compelled cooperation with the state. The originals exist independently of any Charter violation and were reproduced without any participation by the defendant. Other courts dealing with the use of requirements to obtain banking records in cases similar to that before this court have concluded that banking records are non-conscriptive evidence: R. v. Chusid (2001), 57 O.R. (3d) 20 at para 65 (Ont. S.Ct.); R. v. Wilder supra at paras 252-255; Dwyer v. R. (2003) 110 C.R.R. (2d) 114 at para 95 (Fed C.A.) .

I find that Mr. Zuk's banking and brokerage records obtained pursuant to the requirements before me are non-conscriptive, and they were otherwise discoverable by legal means. It follows that admission of these records as evidence in this trial does not affect trial fairness.

Seriousness of the Breach

The second step in the s. 24(2) analysis concerns the seriousness of the Charter breach. Factors to be considered include:

good or bad faith? deliberate, willful or flagrant?

an isolated incident or a larger pattern of disregard for Charter rights? the availability of other lawful, investigatory techniques?

which Charter right or rights were breached?

was it a significant departure from the Charter standard?

the justification for the breach? the evidentiary basis for the justification? any reliance on earlier judicial precedent or statutory provisions?

any abuse of process or breach of statute? any urgency or imminent danger?

Breach minimally intrusive.

Clearly Mr. Zuk did have a reasonable expectation of privacy in these types of records. Nevertheless, the jurisprudence indicates that an order for the production of banking records and business records is minimally intrusive. The jurisprudence indicates that a demand to a third party for production of documents is considered by the courts as one of the least intrusive methods to obtain information: MacKinlay Transport, supra. p 648; Levitt and Branch, supra. para 40; Del Zotto, supra p. 147 (Strayer J.A.)

Digitized by Google

The Existence of Reasonable and Probable grounds

I am satisfied that the documents were otherwise discoverable by constitutional means. These records existed independently of Mr. Zuk in a usable form independent of any Charter violation. They could have been obtained by subpoena and affidavit and admitted into evidence pursuant to the provisions of s. 29 of the Evidence Act relating to records of financial institutions, and s. 30 of the Evidence Act relating to business records made in the ordinary and usual course of business.

There was no dispute during this voir dire that these requirements were issued long after the Revenue Canada officials had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that Mr. Zuk had committed offences. Mr. Locke obtained judicial authorization for search warrants to enter and search Mr. Zuk's home, his place of business, the residence of his first wife, and the business premises of his accountant in August 1998, well before these requirements were issued. I agree with investigator James Locke who testified that a judge who authorizes a search warrant for entry into a dwelling house would likely approve a search warrant for banking and brokerage records. I am satisfied that had Revenue Canada investigators thought search warrants were necessary to obtain these records in this case, search warrants would have been secured to obtain the records and documents at issue before this court.

I agree with Romilly J. in Wilder supra that the situation in the case before me, as in Wilder, is analogous to that in R. v. Sieben [1987] 1. S.C.R. 295 where the police used a writ of assistance instead of a search warrant to search the dwelling house of the accused. Lamer J. for the Supreme Court ruled that the evidence should not be excluded because "one of the police officers had reasonable grounds to enter and search the premises, thus satisfying an obviously desirable requirement of the statute. The only reason that they did not obtain a search warrant is that they believed in good faith that a writ of assistance was sufficient. At that time, the statute authorizing a search under a writ of assistance had not been declared to be inconsistent with the Charter."

Good Faith of Investigators

The evidence clearly establishes that the Revenue Canada investigators used requirements instead of search warrants to obtain the information they desired because the policies and procedures then prevailing at Revenue Canada dictated that procedure. The June l997 Communique indicated that requirements were not to be used in these circumstances. That policy changed on April 9, 1999.

Thereafter, the departmental Memorandum provided that requirements could be used with respect to all third parties at any stage of an audit or investigation but only up to the point when charges are laid. That policy was codified in Manual Chapter 11 dated March 31,2001, with the added proviso that requirements were to be used only up to the point when the case is referred to the Department of Justice or charges are laid. These were the policies in effect at Revenue Canada at the time the requirements in this matter were issued. There is no evidence before the court as to when the case was actually referred to the Department of Justice. A Memo to File from Patrick Cowley, Senior Investigations Officer, Ottawa dated June 20, 2001, indicates that he called the investigator Peter Zsis to indicate that Headquarters could not support his request for an Indictment letter to Justice on Mr. Zuk's file as his case did not meet the criteria for indictment. The Prosecution Report dated July 20, 2001 was a recommendation from the Investigation unit that charges be laid summarily against Mr. Zuk. The charges before this court were laid on August 10, 2001. On the basis of this evidence, I find that the case was not referred to the Department of Justice prior to April 26, 2001 when the last requirement the crown is tendering in this voir dire was issued. I find, therefore, that the use of requirements rather than search warrants to obtain the banking and brokerage information was done in good faith conformity with Revenue Canada policy as it existed at that time.

Digitized by Google

Good faith of Revenue Canada and the Department of Justice.

Throughout this period, the Investigation branch of Revenue Canada was relying on advice provided to them by the Department of Justice. It was the Department of Justice that, on the basis of the Supreme Court of Canada decision in R. v. Del Zotto (l999) 131 C.C.C, (3d) 353 (January l999), advised that requirements could again be used. The Supreme Court decision in Del Zotto dealt with s. 231.4 of the Income Tax Act, authorizing inquiries into the administration or enforcement of the Act with the power to subpoena witnesses and require the production of documents. The Supreme Court adopted the dissenting reasons of J.A. Strayer of the Federal Court of Appeal (l997), 116 C.C.C. (3d) 123 without elaboration. Justice Strayer's judgment relied heavily on the previous Supreme Court decisions in Thompson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (1990), 54 C.C.C. (3d) 417 and R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd. (l990), 55 C.C.C. (3d) 530. Both decisions had emphasized the regulatory nature of the Income Tax Act, the minimally intrusive nature of a demand to produce documents, and the reduced expectation of privacy connected with the administration of the Income Tax Act.

The Supreme Court of Canada decision in Del Zotto did not deal with the requirement power under s. 231.2 of the Income Tax Act. Mr. Zuk submitted that the decision should be limited to its facts, a preemptive challenge to the inquiry power in the context of gathering evidence for regulatory administration, compliance and enforcement before the establishment of any reasonable grounds to believe by the investigators that an offence had been committed. The import of Mr. Zuk's submission is that it was unreasonable for the Department of Justice to assume that the Supreme Court endorsement of Justice Strayer's decision necessarily extended to analogous powers under the rest of the Income Tax Act after reasonable and probable grounds existed. He characterized their broad interpretation of Del Zotto, as incorporated in the April l999 Memorandum, as a rash expedient for the convenience of Revenue Canada to extend their powers notwithstanding a trend in the courts to enhancing Charter protections at earlier stages in the audit/investigation process. He submitted that their interpretation was an example of institutional bad faith that "creates a recipe for repeated violations of the Charter."

Mr. Zuk tendered a transcript from submissions of crown counsel in the 2001 case of R. v Chusid to show that, notwithstanding Revenue Canada's official policy, that particular counsel from the Department of Justice was already advising investigators to use search warrants instead of requirements after they had reasonable and probable grounds to believe an offence had been committed. Mr. Zuk submitted that this crown's advice to use search warrants was of probative value for two reasons: 1) it showed that the official Revenue Canada policy was unreasonable and perhaps contrary to the law, and 2) it showed that the Department of Justice was applying its policy inconsistently. Mr. Frost submitted that there can be no finding of bad faith when the investigators were acting pursuant to Revenue Canada policies, and where there is nothing patently unreasonable about the advice they were getting from their superiors or from the Department of Justice. The issue is whether the advice of the Department of Justice following Del Zotto was patently unreasonable, or whether it contravened what the Department of Justice and Revenue Canada might have expected the law to be at the time.

It is clear that, when the Supreme Court of Canada decided Del Zotto and thereafter, there had been a plethora of cases before the courts which were attempting to deal with the Charter consequences of drawing the line between audits and investigations for income tax purposes. In the wake of Del Zotto, many jurists required to interpret the Supreme Court decision disagreed with the interpretation of that case provided by the Department of Justice: R.v Bjellebo [l999] O.J. No. 965 (Ont. Gen. Div. Chapnick J.) April 1999; Gorenko et. al. v. The Queen et. al, unreported July l7, 1997 (Que. Sp. Ct.), appeal dismissed by the Quebec Court of Appeal (unreported February 23, l999); R. v. Pheasant [2001} G.S.T.C. 8 (Ont. C. J. Lane J.) November 2000; R. v. Saplys (l999), 132 C.C.C. (3d) 515 at p. 527 (Ont. C. Gen. Div., McKenzie J.); R. v. Dial Drug Stores Ltd. (2001), 52 O.R. (d) 367 (Ont. C.J., Lenz J.); R. v. Chusid (2002) 57 O.R. (3d) 20 (Ont. S. Ct., Beaulieu J.) at para. 28 November 2001 Counsel for the Department of Justice, however, interpreted Del Zotto and, its reaffirmation of the principles discussed in McKinlay Transport, to conclude that "Requirements survive the (Del Zotto) tripartite analysis. It is clear that there should not be a reasonable and probable grounds precondition for the use of Requirements. Similarly, on our reading of McKinlay and Del Zotto we conclude that reasonable and probable grounds is not an appropriate cut-off point for the use of Requirements. A reasonable and probable grounds limitation is inconsistent with the analysis in McKinlay and is not mandated by the tripartite test in Del Zotto." "Warrantless Techniques of Compelling Evidence: The Unique Rules of the Regulatory Universe" by Ivan Bloom Q.C., Steve Aubin, Gordon Campbell and Scott McCrossin, National Journal of Constitutional Law, Vol 13, No. 1, September 2001, p. 79-116, at p. 93. .

Digitized by Google

This opinion is different from that which I had had in Pheasant, supra. and which other trial jurists also articulated. The difference may be attributed to our differing interpretations of the meaning of "the availability of judicial supervision," the third factor in the test articulated by Strayer J.A. in Del Zotto. Whereas I thought that the words referred to the availability or not of reasonable and probable grounds, the Department of Justice lawyers interpreted these words to refer to the fact that judicial review procedures in the Federal Court of Canada were available to challenge Requirements. As it ultimately turned out, both interpretations were wrong. Until the Supreme Court released their decisions in Jarvis, supra and Ling, supra, in November 2002, the law was not clear.

In this context, it cannot be said that the interpretation of the Department of Justice was unreasonable. Del Zotto was the most recent Supreme Court decision dealing with a controversy that had been raging in the lower courts for many years. At the time, it appeared as if the Supreme Court had returned to the principles it itself had articulated nine years previously in Thompson Newspapers, supra. and McKinlay Transport, supra. Notwithstanding the decisions emanating from the lower trial courts, it was not unreasonable for the Department of Justice to consider that their position had the stamp of approval of the Supreme Court of Canada. In the hierarchy of Canadian courts, a Supreme Court of Canada decision trumps all others.

In this context, the broad interpretation of the Department of Justice as it manifest itself in the Revenue Canada policy statement with respect to requirements is not unreasonable nor is it any evidence of institutional bad faith. The fact that a particular crown attorney recommended that investigators use search warrants after they have reasonable and probable cause, notwithstanding departmental policy saying that such warrants were unnecessary, is not evidence of unequal treatment before the law nor that the policy was incorrect. Mr. Goldstein as counsel for the Department of Justice in both Pheasant, supra. and Chusid supra., provided written argument to the court consistent with the departmental policy (see Chusid, supra. para 28). That he recommended the use of search warrants as a practical matter was perhaps a conservative counsel of caution that reflected his personal experience before these lower trial courts. This is yet another illustration of the fact that, prior to the Supreme Court of Canada decisions in Jarvis, supra and Ling, supra, the law was not clear.

Digitized by Google

The jurisprudence is clear that where a state agent acts in accordance with what he or she reasonably believes to be the law at the time of the action, good faith will be established: R. v. Jacoy (l988), 45 C.C.C. (3d) 46, p. 55. Put another way, police do not act in bad faith when they mistakenly believe that they were relying on statutory or other legal authority for their actions*: R. v. Wiley (1993), 84 C.C.C. (3d) 161 (S.C.C.); R. v. Plant (1993), 84 C.C.C. (3d) 203 (S.C.C.); R. v. Duarte (1990), 53 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (S.C.C.).* In Duarte, the evidence gathered in violation of s. 8 was nevertheless admitted because the breach "stemmed from an entirely reasonable misunderstanding of the law by the police officers who would otherwise have obtained the necessary evidence to convict the accused in any event." R. v. Fliss (2002), 161 C.C.C. (3d) 225 (S.C.C.) It also does not constitute bad faith on the part of the police when they act under a bona fide misunderstanding of an unclear legal principle. An honest though mistaken belief may not show good faith but it will generally refute a finding of bad faith: R. v. Chau (2000), 150 C.C.C. (3d) 504 (Ont. C.A.)

For these reasons, I find that the seriousness of the breach in this case was not such as to compel exclusion of the evidence obtained by the requirements.

Effect of admission on the administration of justice

Under the third branch of the Collins test, the onus is on the applicant to show on a balance of probabilities that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The purpose of s. 24(2) is not to sanction state misconduct, but to prevent having the administration of justice brought into further disrepute by the admission of the evidence in this proceeding. It is the long-term consequences of the regular admission or exclusion of such evidence on the repute of the administration of justice which must be considered. The standard to be applied is that of the "reasonable man" as defined by Lamer J. in Collins, supra: "Would the admission of the evidence bring the administration of justice into disrepute in the eyes of a reasonable man, dispassionate and fully apprised of the circumstances of the case?" In addition to the factors I have discussed previously, I must consider the fact that income tax evasion and making false statements on income tax returns are very serious charges that, if proven, strike at the heart of the self-reporting income tax system on which the government relies. As Beaulieu J. noted in *Chusid, supra, p. 4*5, "given the tremendous burden of monitoring a system that depends on self-assessment and voluntary reporting, prosecutions under the Act take on special significance as statements of our society's values." As he indicated, "the administration of justice demands enforcement of the Canadian income tax regime, so that citizens will honour their responsibilities to society as a whole, and will rest assured that those who choose to evade their responsibilities are held accountable."

On balance, I find that a reasonable man apprised of all the circumstances in this case would conclude that admission of the evidence would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute. On the contrary, greater harm would be done to the administration of justice if the evidence obtained by the use of the requirements in this case were excluded, and the crown were precluded from pursuing this prosecution on its merits. The non-conscriptive nature of the evidence, that it could have been obtained by means which did not violate the Charter, that it was obtained in good faith at a time when the law was uncertain, that the breach was minimally intrusive, that there is no reason to expect, post-Jarvis and Ling, that Revenue Canada will use such procedures in similar circumstances in the future, the seriousness of the charges, and the deleterious effect on the administration of justice and on society at large if such charges are not heard on their merits: all these factors lead me to conclude that admission of the evidence obtained by use of the requirements would not bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Ruling

For these reasons, I find that the applicant has not met his onus under s. 24(2) of the Charter of showing that the evidence obtained by use of the requirements at issue in this proceeding ought to be excluded. Accordingly, the evidence obtained by use of the total of thirty-seven requirements sent October 22, 1999, December 7, 1999, April 28, 2000, and April 21, 2001 will be admitted.

Digitized by Google

In R. v. Bath[127], on an issue of the Excise Act realization of evidence through a production order almost identical to s. 231.2 of the ITA, through instituted contemporarily to the pronouncement of Jarvis the court further provided:

INTRODUCTION

[1] The Canada Revenue Agency (the CRA[128]) has broad powers to require any person to produce any information or document for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. During its investigation of the accused persons and others for large-scale frauds relating to GST credits, the CRA used those powers dozens of times, including in September and December, 2001 when it issued three Requirement Notices to require three financial institutions to produce numerous banking records which the Crown now proposes to tender in the trial.[164]

[2] Later, in November 2002, the Supreme Court of Canada released its decisions in R. v. Jarvis, 2002 SCC 73, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757, and R. v. Ling, 2002 SCC 74, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 814, and made clear that the CRA cannot lawfully use its requirement powers when its predominant purpose in doing so is to further a criminal investigation, rather than to conduct an audit.

[3] It is common ground that the CRA's predominant purpose, in issuing the three Requirement Notices, was to further the criminal investigation which led to the present Criminal Code charges. With Jarvis and Ling, it is clear that the seizures, through the Requirement Notices, were unlawful, violating Mr. Khangura's privacy rights as guaranteed by s. 8 of the Charter.

[4] The voir dire concerned only whether the evidence obtained should be excluded under s. 24(2) of the Charter on the basis that its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[5] I announced on December 11, 2009 my decision that the evidence will not be excluded on that basis, and indicated that reasons would follow. These are the reasons.

THE APPROACH TO THE APPLICATION OF s. 24(2) OF THE CHARTER

[6] The Supreme Court of Canada reformulated the approach to the exclusion of evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter in R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353. Section 24(2) of the Charter provides as follows: 24(2) Where . . . a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[7] The Court in Grant noted that fundamentally s. 24(2) protects the justice system's overall and long-term repute. The inquiry under s. 24(2) is objective, and asks whether a reasonable person, informed of all relevant circumstances and the values underlying the Charter, would conclude that the admission of the evidence in issue would bring the administration of justice into disrepute (Grant, para. 68).

[8] The reformulated approach to the application of s. 24(2) thus rests on the assessment of the

---

[127] 2011 BCSC 251

[128] The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency was previously Revenue Canada and is now the Canada Revenue Agency (commonly called the CRA). Although the changes involved more than name and took place over the course of the events under discussion, the changes are not material to the issues in the voir dire. For convenience and brevity I will use "the CRA" to refer to all three bodies.

Namely, Requirement Notices issued to: (1) the State Bank of India, on September 4, 2001; (2) the Bank of Montreal, on December 12, 2001; and (3) the Khalsa Credit Union, on December 12, 2001.

Digitized by Google

public interests engaged by s. 24(2), as viewed in long-term perspective. It engages three avenues of inquiry, concerning:
the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused, and society's interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits.
[9] A court applying s. 24(2) will balance the assessments it makes in relation to each of these lines of inquiry, in order to determine whether unlawfully obtained evidence will nonetheless be admitted. The analysis therefore requires, first, the consideration of each of the three areas of concern, in light of the circumstances of this case, and then a balancing of the assessments made in relation to each. That is the approach that these reasons will take.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF THE CHARTER-INFRINGING STATE CONDUCT
[10] This line of inquiry requires the court to assess whether the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute by sending the message to the public that the courts "effectively condone state deviation from the rule of law by failing to dissociate themselves from the fruits of that unlawful conduct" (Grant, para. 72).
[11] It follows that the more severe or deliberate the state conduct that led to the breach, the greater the need for the courts to dissociate themselves from it in order to preserve public confidence in and ensure state adherence to the rule of law (Grant, paras. 72-74):
[74] State conduct resulting in Charter violations varies in seriousness. At one end of the spectrum, admission of evidence obtained through inadvertent or minor violations of the Charter may minimally undermine public confidence in the rule of law. At the other end of the spectrum, admitting evidence obtained through a wilful or reckless disregard of Charter rights will inevitably have a negative effect on the public confidence in the rule of law, and risk bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.
[12] The parties' positions, concerning the seriousness of the CRA's Charter offending conduct, requires the consideration of three issues:
whether the national policy under which the CRA acted was based on a reasonable interpretation of the law at the time whether the availability of lawful means to seize the documents made the conduct less serious, and whether the CRA improperly issued the Requirement Notices without regard to the particular circumstances.
[13] Each of these issues requires some detailed discussion. I will address them in turn.

Did the CRA Rely on a Reasonable Interpretation of the Law at the Time?
[14] Mr. Greenbank submits in part that the state conduct that led to the breach of Mr. Khangura's s. 8 rights was not particularly serious, because in issuing the Requirement Notices the CRA acted under a written national policy based on an interpretation of the law that, though now known to be erroneous, was reasonable given the state of the law at the time.
[15] Mr. Enright responds that the CRA's national policy was not reasonable, as originally made and as maintained over time, because it overstated the effect of the law on which it purported to be based, and was blind to developments in the law that warned of the eventual result in Jarvis/Ling.
[16] When the CRA served the three Requirement Notices, it did so under its national policy issued in April 1999. The policy is entitled "Obtaining Information From Third Parties" and reads, in its material portion, as follows:
This is further to Communiqué SI 97-02 and the series of E-Mails concerning the use of either a s. 487 or 487.01 warrant under the Criminal Code to obtain records from financial institutions and other third parties. The Communiqué stated that warrants should be used where a person under investigation has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the information held by third parties and an investigator has reasonable grounds to believe that an offence has been committed. As a result of advice received from the Department of Justice following the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Del Zotto case, the practice of using section 487 and section 487.01 warrants under the Criminal Code can be discontinued and replaced with the use of requirements under s. 231.2 of the Income Tax Act, s. 289.(1) of the Excise Tax Act or s. 43 of the Customs Act, as appropriate. Requirements can be used with respect to all third parties and may be used at any stage of an audit or an investigation but only up to the point when charges are laid.

Digitized by Google

[17] The April 1999 policy significantly relaxed the CRA's previous policy about obtaining documents from third parties because it authorized the use of Requirement Notices at any stage of an audit or investigation before charges are laid. The previous policy, issued in June 1997, had directed investigators to seek a search warrant or a general warrant, and not to issue Requirement Notices, once investigators had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed.

[18] As the evidence and the policy itself (as quoted above) indicated, the April 1999 policy allowed for an increased use of Requirement Notices because of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Del Zotto v. Canada, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 3, released in early 1999. There, the Supreme Court of Canada had adopted without additional commentary the dissenting reasons of Strayer J.A. of the Federal Court of Appeal in Del Zotto v. Canada (C.A.), [1997] 3 F.C. 40 at paras. 1-35 (F.C.A.) concluding that there was no basis for declaring constitutionally invalid the CRA's powers under s. 231.4 of the Income Tax Act to conduct an inquiry, including by summoning witnesses and requiring them to provide oral and documentary evidence.

[19] The parties disagree first about whether, as the April 1999 policy appears to assume, the reasoning in Del Zotto applied also to the exercise of others of the CRA's administrative powers (namely its requirement powers to compel third parties to produce evidence); and second, if it did, whether it indicated that Charter privacy interests necessarily merit little consideration even where the CRA exercises those powers for a criminal investigation.

[20] Mr. Greenbank submits that Del Zotto was reasonably read as supporting both propositions, because of its key determinations that offences under the Income Tax Act are regulatory in their essential character, and therefore that the protections of s. 7 and s. 8 of the Charter had less application in the CRA's investigations of offences under that Act than they have in the investigation of true criminal charges. He submits that Del Zotto was therefore reasonably interpreted to mean that the exercise of the CRA's investigative powers, including its requirement powers, under that Act would not trigger an "unreasonable search or seizure" contrary to s. 8.

[21] Mr. Greenbank submits that this interpretation derived naturally from Strayer J.A.'s reliance (see paras. 10-11) on Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425 and R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, where the Supreme Court of Canada found the compelled production of documents and testimony not to infringe s. 8 of the Charter because, in the regulatory contexts of those compulsions, the expectation of privacy and the intrusiveness of the investigative procedures were relatively low.

[22] Mr. Greenbank submits that this reading is supported by the fact that numerous courts in several cases after Del Zotto evidently read Strayer J.A.'s reasons similarly: see, for example, R v. Viccars (2000), 259
A.R. 48, [2000] 7 W.W.R. 90, R. v. Wilder, 2000 BCCA 29 and the B.C. Court of Appeal's reasons in Ling at 2000 BCCA 562. He submits that, indeed, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in R. v. Wilcox, 2001 NSCA 45 at paras. 101-102 expressly doubted the survival, after Del Zotto, of an analysis that measures the constitutionality of investigative measures, in a regulatory context, according to whether the investigator was engaged in an auditing function or, rather, in criminal investigation; as we now know, that impugned analysis ultimately prevailed in Jarvis and Ling, [23] In my view, Strayer J.A's reasons are more nuanced than Mr. Greenbank's submission suggests. The challenge in Del Zotto was based on s. 24(1) of the Charter, and not on s. 24(2). It impugned the constitutionality of the statutory provision that authorized inquiries, and not the exercise of the inquiry powers or, more pertinently to the present analysis, the later use in criminal proceedings of evidence obtained by means of those powers. Strayer J. A. declined to declare, under s. 24(1), that the inquiry and its statutory basis were constitutionally invalid, because, he concluded, the statutory powers under attack were capable of constitutional exercise; however, he repeatedly allowed for later challenges based on particular uses of evidence obtained through the challenged powers.

Digitized by Google

[24] This distinction permeates Strayer J. A.'s analysis (see, for example, paras. 2, 28, 30-1), and appears perhaps the most explicitly in the following (at paras. 3 and 34:

[3] ... If particular uses of the subpoena power by such an inquiry, or particular subsequent uses of evidence obtained through such subpoenas threaten to endanger section 7 or 8 rights, it is only then that those rights should be invoked.

. . .

[34] In short if there are circumstances in which the use of this inquiry power, or the subsequent use of evidence derived from it, may impinge on constitutional rights there will be opportunities to assert those rights at the time when an intrusion is imminent and demonstrable. ...

[25] Mr. Enright submits also that in any event, legal developments following Del Zotto but before the Supreme Court of Canada's decisions in Jarvis and Ling ought to have led the CRA to reconsider its policy, and to exercise more caution than it did when applying the policy to issue the Requirement Notices in question.

[26] For example, shortly after Del Zotto the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Saplys (1999), 132 C.C.C. (3d) 515, 60 C.R.R. (2d) 272 concluded that the CRA had breached the accused's rights under sections 7 and 8 of the Charter when it conducted an audit at the behest of a CRA investigator and relied on the result of the audit as grounds for search warrants. The decisions in R. v. Chen, 2007 ONCJ 177 and R. v. Tiffin, 2008 ONCA 306 (per Laforme J.A. in minority reasons at para. 80) similarly recognized potentially serious constitutional implications to the exercise of the CRA's inquiry powers.

[27] And, the successive decisions in the Ling case itself, as it proceeded toward the Supreme Court of Canada, spoke both of the perceived effect of Del Zotto and of an increasing need for caution in relying on the interpretation the CRA gave to that decision in issuing its April 1999 policy. In its decision in Ling, issued on October 19, 2000, well before the CRA issued the Requirement Notices, the B.C. Court of Appeal confirmed the order of the Summary Conviction Appeal court ([1999] 3 C.T.C. 386) remitting the Ling case to trial for an assessment of the application of s. 24(2) of the Charter (at para. 82): this surely indicates that the Court considered Charter protections potentially to apply, even in the regulatory context. Moreover, in its submissions to the Court of Appeal in Ling, the Crown relied on Del Zotto only to support its submission that the Income Tax Act was regulatory in character, and did not rely on it to dispute the analysis (which was ultimately applied by both the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada) by which Charter rights constrain the exercise of the CRA's regulatory powers as soon as the CRA predominant purpose moves from audit into investigation.

[28] The evidence in the voir dire established that most of the senior CRA officials who formulated the national policy or who acted under it were aware of the growing body of law by which the CRA could not lawfully use its requirement powers once it moved from audit to investigation.

[29] We all know that hindsight may distort our perception of what must have been recognized and what was reasonable at an earlier time. With the Jarvis/Ling analysis now firmly entrenched in our constitutional law, one must be wary of viewing past jurisprudence as either inevitably or obviously moving in that direction. For all the signs that it was doing so, some of which are discussed above, there were signs that it was not.

Digitized by Google

[30] This is evident from a review of the academic literature published between Del Zotto and the Supreme Court of Canada's decisions in Jarvis and Ling. The academic literature provides some indication of how the law between Del Zotto and Jarvis/Ling may reasonably have been understood at the time by those well informed in the area.

[31] Some of the literature supports Mr. Enright's position that the CRA's interpretation of Del Zotto overreached in taking Del Zotto as having given carte blanche to the use of the CRA's administrative powers to gather evidence for possible prosecution.

[32] For example, David M. Porter, in "A Contextual Analysis of Section 8 Charter Rights in Regulatory Audits"[129], predicted (at p. 359) that the Supreme Court of Canada would "likely apply a contextual analysis of the section 7 and 8 Charter rights of taxpayers during regulatory audits . . . [to conclude] that tax audits should be restricted to the limited purpose for which they were upheld in McKinlay Transport – the regulation of taxpayers through audit inspection and possible subsequent civil reassessment of tax liability". He argued persuasively that "a proper contextual analysis, which places an appropriate emphasis on the serious individual liberty interests at stake in the investigation of criminal offences under the Income Tax Act, supports the view that administrative audit powers of search and seizure cannot be used to assist in a criminal investigation" (at p. 343).

[33] Mr. Porter evidently did not read Del Zotto as making that analysis unnecessary. He mentioned Del Zotto only in passing (footnote 25, p. 349-50), in order to note that Strayer J.A.'s reasons and other authorities distinguished "regulatory" offences under the Income Tax Act from true crimes, without, he wrote, apparent regard for Cory J.'s majority reasons in Knox Contracting Ltd. v. Canada, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 338. In Knox, Cory J. found that the Income Tax Act and many other "regulatory" statutes create indictable (or at least hybrid) offences with full mens rea and liability for substantial fines or imprisonment, thus requiring Charter s. 8 privacy interests to be assessed in that light.

[34] However, other writings lend support to the Crown's position that the CRA reasonably understood Del Zotto as holding that taxpayers have little or no expectation of privacy in documents held by third parties, such that the CRA may lawfully exercise its administrative powers even to gain evidence in a criminal investigation.

[35] For example, the authors of "Taxpayer Information: Administration and Enforcement Procedure under the Income Tax Act (Canada)"[130] read Strayer J.A.'s reasons in Del Zotto as indicating that the taxpayer could have no reasonable expectation of privacy in the information held on his behalf by the third party (see p. 122). The authors therefore appear to have read Strayer J.A.'s reasons as foreclosing reliance on s. 8 of the Charter as a basis for excluding, from the subsequent trial of the taxpayer, evidence obtained in the course of an inquiry.

[36] The authors therefore concluded that Del Zotto had broad effect (at p. 120):

"[i]n the wake of [Del Zotto] . . . it would be reasonable to assume that the inquiry provisions will be resorted to by the [CRA] more readily than in the past, since the use of the procedure without prior judicial authorization in the criminal context has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court of Canada".

[37] The analysis in "Warrantless Techniques of Compelling Evidence: The Unique Rules of the Regulatory Universe"[131] was similarly encouraging to the position the CRA professes. The authors described Strayer J.A.'s reasons as applying a tripartite test to assess whether the inquiry powers infringed s. 8 of the Charter,

---

[129] (2002) 46 Crm L.Q. 341

[130] Susan Van Der Hout, Robert Goldstein & Angelina Fisher, (2000) 23 Advoc. Q. 84. 167 Ivan S. Bloom, Q.C. et al., (2001) 13 Nat'l J. Const. L. 79

[131] Robert W. Hubbard & Peter DeFreitas, (1999) 42 Crim. L.Q. 412

Digitized by Google

examining: (1) the legislative scheme, which, in the case of the Act is regulatory; (2) the intrusiveness of the powers, which is not major because "taxpayers have a low expectation of privacy vis-à-vis the Minister of National Revenue" (see p. 86); and (3) the availability of judicial supervision. They concluded that the requirement powers will survive the first two parts of that test, for the same reasons as did the inquiry powers. They concluded that the third part of the test is met through the availability of judicial supervision, through judicial review, to challenge requirements.

[38] In their discussion of Del Zotto, the authors draw no distinction between the analysis of the constitutional (s. 8) validity of the inquiry (and requirement) powers themselves, and the use in criminal proceedings of evidence obtained through the use of those powers. Hence their conclusion (at p. 92):

Inquiry subpoenas are similar in effect to Requirements. Accepting these similarities between Inquiries and Requirements, we assert that the analysis fo the Inquiry power by Strayer J.A. in Del Zotto is applicable to the use of Requirements even when prosecutions are contemplated. Indeed, the reasons of Wilson J. in McKinlay explicitly support that proposition. Del Zotto does not change the conclusion in McKinlay that Requirements are a form of discovery that does not infringe on section 8 of the Charter; Del Zotto builds on that conclusion. [footnote references omitted]

[39] The authors of "Administrative Revenue Searches: Can They Be Utilized in Aid of Criminal Investigations and Prosecutions?"[168] recognized a role for determinations under s. 24(2) of the Charter as to whether evidence obtained through the use of administrative powers will be admissible in a criminal trial (see p. 441). However, any such determination would, as the authors read Del Zotto, recognize only a "minimal, if any, expectation of privacy in connection with investigations and searches under the revenue collection statutes" (p. 441).

[40] It is clear from this brief review that some, though not all, of the academic literature following Del Zotto and before Jarvis and Ling shared the CRA's stated understanding of the law at that time. The CRA's April 1999 policy, which was based on that understanding, therefore cannot be characterized as an unreasonable one at the material time.

[41] This conclusion will bear on the overall seriousness of the Charter-infringing conduct.

Does the Option of a Search Warrant Make the Breach Less Serious?

[42] Mr. Greenbank submits that CRA's Charter-infringing conduct is less serious also because the CRA had ample grounds to support search warrants for the same records as were sought and seized under the Requirement Notices, and could therefore have overcome Mr. Khangura's rights under s. 8 of the Charter by unquestionably lawful means.

[43] Mr. Enright does not disagree that the CRA had the necessary grounds to support warrants for the records in issue, but submits that this fact cuts two ways. The situation was not urgent, and the CRA demonstrated little regard for Mr. Khangura's privacy rights, Mr. Enright submits, by avoiding the higher demands of the judicial authorization process.

[44] Mr. Enright's submission would carry more weight had the Requirement Notices not been based on a written national policy grounded, I have concluded, in a reasonable, if erroneous, understanding of the law. It was not unreasonable for the CRA to have relied on that policy and to have thereby avoided the more demanding requirements of the search warrant procedures. I note also that the CRA did seek and obtain search warrants, in the course of this investigation, in numerous circumstances that fell outside the scope of the national policy.

[45] Nor am I persuaded that Jim Lawson, who issued the Requirement Notices, should be held to a higher standard because he was personally aware of conflicting legal views and case authorities about whether the CRA policy was constitutionally sound. Within the CRA's administrative structure, as it was described in the evidence, Mr. Lawson, even with delegated authority to exercise the requirement powers, was properly expected to act in accordance with the CRA's national policy. Responsibility to review or remake that policy lay at CRA headquarters, and not with particular officials, such as Mr. Lawson, in the field.

Digitized by Google

[46] I therefore agree with Mr. Greenbank that the existence of grounds sufficient to support search warrants to seize the material for which the Requirement Notices issued makes the Charter-infringing conduct less serious than it would otherwise have been.

Did the CRA Improperly Issue The Requirement Notices Without Regard to the Particular Circumstances?

[47] But Mr. Enright submits that the seriousness of the Charter-infringing conduct increased through the fact that Mr. Lawson applied the written policy in a "rubber stamp" fashion, and issued the Requirement Notices without any real exercise of discretion.

[48] Subsection 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act confers authority to issue requirement notices "for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of . . . [the Act]":[132]

(1) Despite any other provision of this Part, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of a listed international agreement or this Part, including the collection of any amount payable or remittable under this Part by any person, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide the Minister, within any reasonable time that is stipulated in the notice, with any information or additional information, including a return under this Part; or any document.

[49] The purpose for which requirement powers may be used is thus very broad. However, it does not follow that Requirement Notices may issue without regard for whether, as drafted, they respond logically and appropriately to such a purpose. The very fact that requirement powers are conferred only on the Minister, (and are available only to officials, such as Mr. Lawson, if the Minister delegates the authority) implies that the Act contemplates their careful exercise, with due attention to the scope of the statutory authority and the circumstances of the particular situation.

[50] The evidence and the face of the Requirement Notices themselves disclose no consideration of the particular circumstances of each Requirement Notice. There are some indications in the evidence that little, if any, such consideration was given.

[51] Understandably, Mr. Lawson had no specific recollection of individual requirement notices, and could testify only in general terms about his practice and his state of knowledge at the time of the three Requirement Notices now in issue. Nonetheless, from the evidence as a whole in the voir dire, I agree with Mr. Enright that in issuing numerous requirement notices during the course of the investigation, Mr. Lawson relied largely on his general knowledge of the investigation as a whole, and did not usually consider the individual merits of the situations in which he was asked to exercise the requirement powers. He relied heavily on the investigator, Donna MacMillan, and to some extent her team leaders, to have determined that the preconditions applied and that the particular requirement notice should properly issue.

[52] But it is not clear that those people made any such determinations on which Mr. Lawson could rely. On many occasions – and it was not entirely clear from the evidence whether this was true of the three Requirement Notices in issue – the scope of the requirement notice (as to the information and documents sought, and the list of people and bodies about which they were sought) as sought and issued was repeated from previous requirement notices without regard to whether or how they might apply in the next situation. Also, the various CRA investigators who sought and issued the Requirement Notices held rather different understandings about the

---

[132] Section 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act provides almost identical authority for purposes related to that Act. Although the Requirement Notices refer to that authority, as well as to the authority in s. 289(1) of the Excise Tax Act, the Crown appears not to rely on it and I will confine the following discussion to the authority in the Excise Tax Act unless I indicate differently.

Digitized by Google

preconditions for the issue of such notices.
[53] As I find, Mr. Lawson appears to have issued requirement notices relating to this case without attention to the features and circumstances of the particular situation. I therefore agree with Mr. Enright that the CRA's somewhat cavalier approach to the exercise of its far-reaching coercive powers adds to the seriousness of the breach.

Conclusion (Seriousness of the Charter-Infringing Conduct)
[54] On one hand, the CRA did not deliberately or knowingly set about to violate taxpayers' s. 8 Charter rights through the April 1999 policy, or in acting under it to issue the Requirement Notices in issue here. The national policy on which it acted was based on a reasonable – albeit now known to be erroneous – understanding of the law at the time.
[55] Also, grounds existed to support warrants to seize the material for which the Requirement Notices issued. The seizures that since Jarvis/Ling have been known to be unlawful could in any event have been lawfully seized.
[56] These conclusions reduce the seriousness of the CRA's Charter-infringing conduct.
[57] But on the other hand, in issuing the Requirement Notices the CRA was aggressive and cavalier toward even the modest statutory preconditions to the exercise of the requirement powers. This increases the seriousness of the Charter infringing conduct.
[58] Overall, I would describe the CRA's Charter-infringing conduct as more than minimally serious.

THE IMPACT OF THE BREACH ON THE ACCUSED'S CHARTER PROTECTED INTERESTS
[59] This inquiry calls for an evaluation of the extent to which the breach actually undermined the interests protected by the right infringed: "[t]he more serious the impact on the accused's protected interests, the greater the risk that admission of the evidence may signal to the public that Charter rights, however high- sounding, are of little actual avail to the citizen, breeding public cynicism and bringing the administration of justice into disrepute" (Grant, para. 76).
[60] The inquiry thus requires an examination of the Charter interest protected, and the degree to which the violation impacted on those interests (Grant, para. 77). In relation to breaches of s. 8 of the Charter, an unreasonable search that intrudes on an area in which the individual reasonably enjoys a high expectation of privacy, or that demeans his or her dignity, will be more serious than one that does not (Grant, para. 78).
[61] The records produced in response to the Requirement Notices include banking records such as account-opening documents, monthly statements, deposit slips, cheques, and debit memos, and included both biographical and financial information. It is common ground that Mr. Khangura enjoyed a right of privacy in them, regardless of the facts that the records were in the hands of "third parties" and that, at the time of the Requirement Notices, the CRA was already aware of much of their content.
[62] However, the privacy interest in the records is not as strong as that which obtains in many other circumstances where s. 8 of the Charter is at play. The Requirement Notices were considerably less intrusive of Mr. Khangura's privacy rights than would have been, for example, a bodily search, a residence search, or wiretap interceptions.
[63] Also, Mr. Khangura's privacy interest in the records could in any event have been lawfully overridden to allow seizures by way of search warrant, because the CRA had the necessary grounds to support judicial authorization. And, had the CRA been engaged only in an audit, and not an investigation, the Requirement Notices could have compelled the financial institutions to produce the records for the audit, with no constitutional violation at all.
[64] In all of these circumstances, the intrusion into Mr. Khangura's right of privacy was real, but not major.

SOCIETY'S INTEREST IN THE ADJUDICATION OF THE CASE ON ITS MERITS

Digitized by Google

[65] This line of inquiry asks whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal trial process would be best served by admission of the evidence, or by its exclusion. The court must consider not only the negative impact of admission of the evidence on the repute of the administration of justice, but also the impact of failing to admit the evidence (Grant, para. 79).
[66] The reliability of the evidence is an important factor in this line of inquiry, because to admit unreliable evidence serves neither the accused's interest in a fair trial, nor the public interest in uncovering the truth (para. 81). Conversely, to exclude relevant and reliable evidence tends to undermine the truth-seeking function of the justice system (Grant, para. 81). The evidence obtained through the Requirement Notices is relevant and is entirely reliable, in the sense that it existed independently of the Charter breach and was unaffected by it.
[67] In this line of inquiry, the seriousness of the alleged offence may be a valid consideration, but it has the potential to cut both ways (Grant, para. 84):
… Failure to effectively prosecute a serious charge due to excluded evidence may have an immediate impact on how people view the justice system. Yet, as discussed, it is the long-term repute of the justice system that is s. 24(2)'s focus. As pointed out in Burlingham, the goals furthered by s. 24(2) "operate independently of the type of crime for which the individual stands accused" (para. 51). And as Lamer J. observed in Collins, "[t]he Charter is designed to protect the accused from the majority, so the enforcement of the Charter must not be left to that majority" (p. 282). The short-term public clamour for a conviction in a particular case must not deafen the s. 24(2) judge to the longer-term repute of the administration of justice. Moreover, while the public has a heightened interest in seeing a determination on the merits where the offence charged is serious, it also has a vital interest in having a justice system that is above reproach, particularly where the penal stakes for the accused are high.
[68] Mr. Enright notes in this regard that, unlike in many of the case authorities involving Charter violations during urgent or developing police investigations "on the street", nothing here required an aggressive or risk- taking approach: the CRA investigators had the luxury of time and the support of teams of lawyers and other expert advisers at its headquarters to monitor both individual investigations and to revise the CRA's national policy as necessary. He submits that, as Grant makes clear, the court should recognize the serious implications of allowing the state to push the boundaries of the Charter, especially when, as is the Crown's own position, alternative and lawful means were available to the CRA.
69] The charges arise from very serious allegations of huge frauds on the public. With others, Mr. Bath and Mr. Khangura are said to have created twenty companies falsely purporting to export shake and shingle products between about 1994 and 1997, and to have fraudulently claimed and received GST refunds totaling more than $23 million on the companies' behalf. Although the case will continue even if the proposed evidence is excluded, the evidence is significant to the Crown as it is said to link Mr. Khangura to the proceeds of the frauds and to the companies by which the frauds are said to have taken place.
[70] In my view the seriousness of the charges weighs heavily in the assessment of the long-term implications of exclusion. The potential countervailing effect, discussed above, has less application than it might in other circumstances because, as I have found, the breach did not have a significant impact on Mr. Khangura's privacy.
[71] Society's interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits thus strongly favours the admission of the evidence.

CONCLUSION

[72] The CRA's Charter-infringing conduct was more than minimally serious. The effect on Mr. Khangura's constitutional right to privacy, though a real effect, was not a major one. But to the extent that these factors favour exclusion of the evidence, their effect is outweighed, in my assessment, by society's strong interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits. Given, in particular, the nature and gravity of the charges, and the reliability (in the sense I have described) of the evidence, a reasonable person, informed of all the relevant circumstances and the values underlying the Charter, would not conclude that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Digitized by Google

[73] In all the circumstances, it is not established that the admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[74] The application to exclude the evidence therefore fails.

Digitized by Google

R. v. Ling, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 814, 2002 SCC 74, The Jarvis Principles Applied on Audit realized Evidence Before, and After, Interrogation and Advice of Rights to Counsel

2002: June 13; 2002: November 21.
Present: McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ.
on appeal from the court of appeal for british columbia

Income tax — Administration and enforcement — Audits and investigations — Whether distinction can be drawn between audit and investigation under Income Tax Act — If so, circumstances in which tax official's inquiry constitutes penal investigation — Whether evidence obtained during audit pursuant to ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) of Income Tax Act can be used to further investigation or prosecution of offences under s. 239(1) of the Act without violating taxpayer's Charter rights — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8 — Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), ss. 231.1, 231.2.

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Exclusion of evidence — Tax evasion — Statements and documents obtained during inquiry by tax auditors pursuant to ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) of Income Tax Act transferred to investigator — Investigator obtaining further information with requirement letters to various banks — Taxpayer charged with tax evasion — Whether evidence against taxpayer obtained in violation of his rights under Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — If so, whether evidence should be excluded — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 24(2).

Revenue Canada audited the appellant taxpayer with respect to his claim for farm losses for the taxation years 1990 through 1993. The auditors met the taxpayer's accountant and examined books and records. They also met the taxpayer and obtained receipt books from which they deduced that income had not been reported. More meetings and further requests by the auditors led to the production of more information, including financial records and bank documents. On December 18, 1995, the auditors questioned the taxpayer extensively and he admitted to mistakenly failing to report income. A month later, the taxpayer's file was transferred to the Special Investigations Section of Revenue Canada, which is responsible for criminal enforcement. Special investigations officials carried out further inquiries, interviewing witnesses and sending requirement letters to four banks and the taxpayer's accountant. They then met the taxpayer, informed him that he was under investigation and cautioned him as to his rights. The taxpayer declined to answer any questions. He was later charged under s. 239(1) of the Income Tax Act with tax evasion and making false or deceptive statements in income tax returns. The trial judge found that the evidence gathered by the auditors was not obtained in violation of the taxpayer's rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and denied a motion to exclude the evidence under s. 24(2) of the Charter. The taxpayer was convicted. The summary conviction appeal judge set aside the convictions. He held that the investigation began after the December 18 meeting and ordered a new trial in which the court would consider whether the auditors' evidence gathered after that meeting should be excluded under s. 24(2). The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision.

Digitized by Google

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

In light of the principles set out in R. v. Jarvis, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757, 2002 SCC 73, Revenue Canada did not commence an investigation into the taxpayer's penal liability until after the December 18 meeting. The evidence gathered prior to and during that meeting in the proper exercise of an audit function could be shared with the Special Investigations Section and used in the subsequent prosecution of the taxpayer for s. 239(1) offences. After the December 18 meeting, the predominant purpose of the inquiry was the determination of the taxpayer's penal liability. All evidence gathered after that meeting pursuant to the requirement powers was obtained as part of an investigation and in violation of the taxpayer's Charter rights. The admissibility of this evidence, and the evidence derived therefrom, will have to be considered in light of s. 24(2) of the Charter.

Cases Cited

Followed: R. v. Jarvis, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757, 2002 SCC 73.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 7, 8, 24(2).

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), ss. 231.1(1), 231.2(1), 239(1), (2).

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (2000), 149 C.C.C. (3d) 127, 144 B.C.A.C. 92, 236 W.A.C. 92, [2000] B.C.J. No. 2082 (QL), 2000 BCCA 562, affirming a judgment of Millward J., [1999] 3 C.T.C. 386, [1998] B.C.J. No. 1512 (QL), setting aside the taxpayer's convictions for tax offences and ordering a new trial. Appeal dismissed.

Craig C. Sturrock and Thomas M. Boddez, for the appellant.

S. David Frankel, Q.C., Bruce Harper and Janet Henchey, for the respondent.

Trevor Shaw, for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario.

Gilles Laporte and Monique Rousseau, for the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec.

Scott K. Fenton, for the intervener the Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario).

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

IACOBUCCI AND MAJOR JJ. —

I. Introduction

1 This appeal is determined by the principles set out in R. v. Jarvis, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757, 2002 SCC 73, an appeal heard concurrently. It raises a similar question, namely, in what circumstances an inquiry by an official of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency ("CCRA"), formerly Revenue Canada, constitutes an investigation that implicates the Charter rights of the taxpayer. In Jarvis, we describe the circumstances in which an inquiry constitutes a criminal investigation as those that engage the adversarial relationship between the individual and the state, and we will use that phrase in the same context here. Jarvis establishes that this relationship is engaged where the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of a taxpayer's penal liability under s. 239 of the Income Tax Act, R.C.S. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "Act").

2 In performing an audit, the auditor may use the requirement powers, pursuant to ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) of the Act. These sections give the auditor the power to: (a) enter a taxpayer's place of business or place of record keeping; (b) require the taxpayer and third parties to answer questions put to them; and (c) require the taxpayer and third parties to furnish information and documents upon request.

Digitized by Google

3 If the audit reveals that the taxpayer has filed an incorrect tax return, he or she may be subject to reassessment and civil penalties. In cases where the taxpayer has wilfully made false or deceptive statements or entries or attempted to evade the payment of a tax, he or she may be guilty of an offence pursuant to s. 239(1) of the Act for which the punishments include fines and imprisonment for a maximum of five years.

4 The issue here as in Jarvis is when, if ever, can evidence obtained pursuant to the requirement powers of an audit be used to further an investigation or prosecution for a s. 239(1) offence without violating the suspect's Charter rights? This question is answered by Jarvis.

5 Though the factual circumstances and issue raised in the present appeal are less complicated than in Jarvis, the question of law is the same. Evidence gathered by the CCRA pursuant to ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1), in the proper exercise of its audit function, may be used in a subsequent investigation or prosecution for a s. 239(1) offence. However, where the predominant purpose of a question or inquiry is the determination of penal liability, CCRA officials relinquish the authority to use ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1). Obtaining evidence under the requirement powers for such a purpose is a violation of a suspect's Charter rights. Such evidence may thus be excluded from the prosecution of an offence.

6 The question, then, is in what circumstances is the predominant purpose of a question or inquiry the determination of penal liability? In Jarvis, at para. 93, we held that no one factor is determinative but that the trial judge must assess the totality of the circumstances. Applying the Jarvis test, we agree with Millward J. that the CCRA did not exercise its investigative function until after the meeting between Revenue Canada officials and the appellant on December 18, 1995.

7 Once the CCRA began to exercise its investigative function, the parties were put in an adversarial relationship. The appellant is not entitled to immunity from evidence obtained pursuant to the requirement power prior to and during the December 18 meeting, or evidence derived therefrom. However, the appellant is entitled to a new trial in which the court will consider the admissibility of evidence obtained under the requirement power for the predominant purpose of determining penal liability, and evidence derived therefrom, in accordance with s. 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The appeal is dismissed and the order for a new trial is confirmed.

II. Facts

8 Following an audit, Revenue Canada disallowed the appellant taxpayer's claimed farm losses for the years 1987 through 1989. The appellant's taxes for those years were reassessed on the basis that his farming operations were a personal endeavour, not a business. In 1994, James Edward Thatcher, a technical advisor with the Business Audit Section of Revenue Canada in Vancouver, conducted a computer check which revealed that the appellant claimed the same farming losses for the taxation years 1990 through 1993. As a result, Thatcher selected those returns for a routine follow-up audit.

Digitized by Google

9 In November 1994, Thatcher informed the appellant, who was a doctor in Kitimat, B.C., that he was conducting an audit and would be there in the spring of 1995 to review his farming operations and medical practice. Arvind Pacheco, of the Verification and Enforcement Division of Revenue Canada, was assigned to work on the audit with Thatcher.

10 On June 5, 1995, Pacheco and Thatcher met with the appellant's accountant, Carlyle Shepherd, at Shepherd's office to examine the appellant's books and records. In reviewing those records, Thatcher determined that fees paid by the Medical Service Plan ("MSP") were deposited directly to the appellant's accounts twice each month. There were other deposits into the same accounts which could not be identified by them.

11 On June 7, 1995, Pacheco and Thatcher met with the appellant at the appellant's office in the Kitimat General Hospital. Complying with a request by the auditors, the appellant produced two receipt books. Comparing the receipt books to the bank records, the auditors deduced that office income had not been reported.

12 Pacheco wrote to the appellant on June 21, 1995, requesting additional information and, on July 27, 1995, he wrote again stating that if the information was not forthcoming, requirements demanding it or a reassessment based on the information currently available would be issued.

13 Pacheco met with the appellant at his farm in Delta, British Columbia on August 9, 1995. On September 5 and 19, Shepherd provided further information to Pacheco on behalf of the appellant.

14 On November 20, 1995, Pacheco telephoned the appellant to set up a meeting for December 18, 1995. He also questioned the appellant about the unidentified deposits that he had proposed to include in income. The appellant responded that they were loans.

15 Pacheco wrote to the appellant on December 7, 1995, asking him to provide further information and asking him to identify certain deposits before the December 18 meeting.

16 The auditors met with the appellant on December 18 at the Vancouver District Office of Revenue Canada for over three hours. The appellant was questioned extensively about the unidentified deposits and unreported income. In the course of this meeting, the appellant admitted that he had mistakenly failed to report certain amounts as income.

17 At no point did the auditors inform the appellant of any concern about tax evasion or about any rights he might have under the Charter in relation to the inquiries being made of him. The following documents and information had been obtained in the course of the audit:

(a) the appellant's filed income tax returns;
(b) the working papers of the Revenue auditor who had previously examined the appellant's farming loss claim for 1987-89;
(c) two boxes of financial records at the appellant's accountants;
(d) a receipt book kept at the appellant's office;
(e) a journal recording cheques and cash received and petty cash, kept at the appellant's office;
(f) bank statements and bank deposit slips, some kept by the appellant and some obtained from the banks;
(g) cheques from the Workers' Compensation Board to the appellant, obtained from the Board;
(h) oral and written responses by the appellant's accountants to specific

Digitized by Google

queries and requests for documents, including handwritten income and expense statements;

(i) statements made by the appellant to the auditors in telephone conversations and in interviews on June 7 and December 18, 1995.

18 Following a meeting on December 29, 1995, the auditor, with the appellant's consent, obtained documents from certain brokerage firms and chartered banks.

19 After December 18, 1995, but before January 18, 1996, Pacheco met with Mr. Fleming, his group head, and Mr. Richard Olney, of Special Investigations, the criminal enforcement branch of Revenue Canada. The outcome of the meeting was a referral of the appellant's file to Special Investigations on January 18, 1996, pursuant to instructions of Pacheco's supervisor.

20 On February 26 and 27, 1996, Olney and Fleming interviewed two witnesses who had previously been interviewed by the auditors. Requirement letters were served on four banks and on the appellant's accountant. On February 28, 1996, Olney and Fleming met the appellant at his office. They read him a caution from a card advising him generally that he was not obliged to make any statements but if he did so they might be used in evidence and that he had a right to retain and instruct a lawyer. The appellant declined to answer any questions. On February 28, 1996, a Prosecution Report was prepared. The appellant was charged with six counts of committing an offence contrary to s. 239(1) of the Act on August 26, 1996.

III. Relevant Statutory and Constitutional Provisions

21 Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)

231.1 (1) An authorized person may, at all reasonable times, for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act,

(a) inspect, audit or examine the books and records of a taxpayer and any document of the taxpayer or of any other person that relates or may relate to the information that is or should be in the books or records of the taxpayer or to any amount payable by the taxpayer under this Act, and

(b) examine property in an inventory of a taxpayer and any property or process of, or matter relating to, the taxpayer or any other person, an examination of which may assist the authorized person in determining the accuracy of the inventory of the taxpayer or in ascertaining the information that is or should be in the books or records of the taxpayer or any amount payable by the taxpayer under this Act, and for those purposes the authorized person may

(c) subject to subsection (2), enter into any premises or place where any business is carried on, any property is kept, anything is done in connection with any business or any books or records are or should be kept, and

(d) require the owner or manager of the property or business and any other person on the premises or place to give the authorized person all reasonable assistance and to answer all proper questions relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act and, for that purpose, require the owner or manager to attend at the premises or place with the authorized person.

Digitized by Google

. . .

231.2 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Minister may, subject to subsection (2), for any purpose related to the administration or enforcement of this Act, by notice served personally or by registered or certified mail, require that any person provide, within such reasonable time as is stipulated in the notice,

(a) any information or additional information, including a return of income or a supplementary return; or

(b) any document.

. . .

239. (1) Every person who has

(a) made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive statements in a return, certificate, statement or answer filed or made as required by or under this Act or a regulation,

(b) to evade payment of a tax imposed by this Act, destroyed, altered, mutilated, secreted or otherwise disposed of the records or books of account of a taxpayer,

(c) made, or assented to or acquiesced in the making of, false or deceptive entries, or omitted, or assented to or acquiesced in the omission, to enter a material particular, in records or books of account of a taxpayer,

(d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act, or

(e) conspired with any person to commit an offence described in paragraphs (a) to (d), is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to

(f) a fine of not less than 50%, and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or

(g) both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

(2) Every person who is charged with an offence described in subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted on indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to

(a) a fine of not less than 100% and not more than 200%, of the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded; and

(b) imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years.

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

8. Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

Digitized by Google

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

IV. Judicial History

A. Provincial Court of British Columbia — July 21, 1997

22 Graham Prov. Ct. J. denied the appellant's motion for a stay of proceedings, or, in the alternative, for an order under s. 24(2) of the Charter that evidence obtained from the appellant by auditors of Revenue Canada be excluded because the appellant's Charter rights had been breached.

23 The trial judge found that the audit was continued throughout Pacheco's involvement with the file and that he had not reached any conclusion that the appellant had evaded taxes before he was told by his supervisor to refer the file to Special Investigations after the December 18 meeting. The appellant was found guilty of each count of tax evasion.

B. Supreme Court of British Columbia, [1999] 3 C.T.C. 386

24 The appellant sought an order under s. 24(2) that all evidence obtained directly or indirectly through an audit conducted under the Income Tax Act was inadmissible in a criminal proceeding.

25 The summary conviction appeal judge found that there was no direct adversarial relationship between the taxpayer and the state prior to December 18, 1995 and that the information requested by Revenue Canada up to that date was pre-existing business documents to which little Charter protection applied. He pointed out that, if information gathered in an audit could not be used in a later prosecution, the tax evasion provisions would be ineffective to the point that even a search warrant might not be obtained.

26 On the issue of whether the actions of Revenue Canada were part of an audit or an investigation, Millward J. noted that the parties were in agreement, supported by case law, that the appropriate test to apply was whether the predominant purpose of Revenue Canada's actions was to further an audit or an investigation but he found the test to be artificial and inappropriate in these circumstances.

27 Millward J. disagreed with the trial judge's finding that an investigation had not commenced even after the December 18 meeting because Thatcher thought it was premature to refer the file to Special Investigations until the audit was completed. Instead, Millward J. found that the predominant purpose of the auditor's actions after the December 18 meeting was to gather information to be used in their criminal investigation. He allowed the appeal, set aside the convictions and ordered a new trial on all counts and in particular to consider the evidence obtained after the December 18 meeting in light of s. 24(2) of the Charter.

C. Court of Appeal for British Columbia (2000), 149 C.C.C. (3d) 127

28 Rowles J.A., for the court, dismissed the appellant Ling's appeal that Millward J. had erred in failing to make an order excluding all evidence obtained pursuant to the Income Tax Act requirement power for use in criminal proceedings against the appellant.

Digitized by Google

V. Issue

29 This appeal raises a single issue:

> Can the appellant claim use immunity for the compelled statements and derivative use immunity for the "product" of his compelled testimony?

VI. Analysis

A. Application of Jarvis Principles

30 The answer to the above question hinges on whether Revenue Canada was conducting an investigation into the commission of an offence under the Act when it gathered evidence from the appellant pursuant to the requirement power. At what point did the adversarial relationship crystallize? As stated in Jarvis, an audit and an investigation are not mutually exclusive. Revenue Canada may conduct both concurrently. Revenue Canada must be careful, however, not to use the requirement power of the audit to gather further evidence for an investigation after it has commenced. If it does so it violates the Charter rights of the investigated taxpayer.

31 Applying the factors set out in Jarvis to determine the commencement of an investigation, we come to the following conclusions based on the trial record:

(a) The authorities did not have reasonable grounds to lay charges before December 18, 1995.

(b) It did not appear prior to the December 18 meeting that a decision to proceed with a criminal investigation could have been made.

(c) The general conduct of the tax authorities was not such that it had decided the taxpayer was under investigation for s. 239 offences.

(d) The auditors had not transferred their files and materials to the investigators until January 18, 1996.

(e) The decision to proceed with a criminal investigation had only been made after December 18, 1995.

(f) The conduct of the auditors was not such that they were effectively acting as agents for the investigators.

(g) It does not appear that the investigators intended to use the auditors as their agent in the collection of evidence.

B. Conclusion

32 We conclude, as did Millward J., that the audit was conducted properly as an audit and not as an investigation up to and including the December 18 meeting. However, after that meeting the officials began to investigate the appellant's penal liability. The information gathered pursuant to the requirement power on December 29, 1995 was gathered as part of an investigation and in violation of the appellant's ss. 7 and 8 Charter rights. All evidence gathered prior to and during the meeting of December 18 was properly obtained as part of the audit process and could be shared with the Special Investigations Section. All evidence gathered subsequent to that meeting from the appellant prior to warning him that he was the subject of an investigation for the purpose of furthering the investigation or prosecution for s. 239(1) offences violates the appellant's Charter rights and will have to be considered in light of s. 24(2) in the new trial as ordered by Millward J. and confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Digitized by Google

VII. Disposition

33 The appeal is dismissed and the order for a new trial is confirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Thorsteinssons, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the respondent: The Department of Justice, Vancouver.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario: The Ministry of the Attorney General, Toronto.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec: The Department of Justice, Sainte-Foy.

Solicitor for the intervener the Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario): Scott K. Fenton, Toronto.

R. v. Caul, 2008 ONCJ 353, A Proper Audit that Caused Proper Auditor Disengagement, that Promptly Caused SI to Act

MCKAY J.:

Background

[1] Kelvin and Shelly Caul are husband and wife. They reside in the Fort Frances area. Kelvin Caul operates a sole proprietorship known as Kelvin Caul Logging. Shelly Caul has some involvement in that business in terms of record keeping. Mr. and Mrs. Caul are charged with a variety of offences under the Income Tax Act and Excise Tax Act related to the evasion of payment of taxes and the making of false and deceptive statements in income tax returns and goods and services tax returns. The charges are a result of an investigation by Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA"). CRA interacts with taxpayers with respect to both civil penalties and criminal proceedings. Accordingly, there is an audit section of the CRA, and an investigation section of the CRA. The audit section deals with compliance with the legislation and the civil scheme of a taxpayer's obligations. The investigative section deals with criminal investigations which may lead to charges under the legislation.

[2] Certain powers are bestowed upon the CRA for purposes of administration of both the Income Tax Act and Excise Tax Act. Taxpayers are bound to cooperate with CRA auditors for tax assessment purposes. Sections of the legislation allow CRA employees performing audits for compliance to have access to a wide range of information related to the taxpayer. The taxpayer is required to cooperate, and in essence to provide any information required to justify the accuracy of the return filed by the taxpayer. An unfavourable audit may result in the imposition of regulatory penalties on the taxpayer.

[3] The powers available to the auditor are not available to investigators pursuing possible criminal charges. Once an authorized agent of CRA has reasonable grounds to believe that an offence has been committed under the legislation, an application can be made for a search warrant to obtain evidence for the prosecution of offences. Similarly, production orders can be obtained. However, judicial authorization, upon proof of reasonable grounds to believe an offence has been committed, is a requirement faced by investigators.

[4] In this case, as is often the case, the examination of the Cauls' tax situation began with an audit. The auditor involved eventually referred the file to the investigations section. It was accepted for investigation and the investigator subsequently swore Informations to obtain search warrants on the Caul residence and two other locations where there was information related to their tax returns. Documentation was subsequently seized pursuant to the warrants and production orders. Many of the details contained in the Information to obtain the search warrant were obtained from the auditor.

Digitized by Google

[5] Prior to the trial in this matter, the defence filed an application pursuant to the Charter alleging violations of Sections 7 and 8 of the Charter of Rights. Such an application is known as a Jarvis application, so named after the leading Supreme Court of Canada decision on the issue, R. v. Jarvis [2002] 3 S.C.R. 757. The defence asks that the evidence obtained pursuant to the search warrants and production orders be excluded from a trial. This is a ruling on the Charter application.

Evidence

[6] Jodi Case was the auditor that the Caul matter was originally referred to. She received the file from her team leader. A full audit was to be conducted because losses shown on tax returns resulted in a net income so low that the obvious question was how this family sustained itself from an economic perspective. For example, for the 2002 tax year, without any capital cost allowance claimed, the tax return showed a loss of approximately $100,000.00. For 2003, again before any capital cost allowance claimed, the tax returns showed a loss of $27,000.00.

[7] Ms. Case initially made contact with Mr. and Mrs. Caul by telephone on April 13, 2005. She informed them that a full audit was being conducted. A little more than a week later she telephoned them again and set up a meeting on May 9. She advised that a letter would be forwarded by her which would outline the documents which needed to be provided to her. She indicated that it was a standard request for documentation.

[8] She met with Mr. and Mrs. Caul on May 9, 2005, for approximately an hour. She obtained some of the documents and discussed many of the documents which had not been provided by Mr. and Mrs. Caul. She completed a questionnaire with Mr. and Mrs. Caul.

[9] Fairly quickly, Ms. Case noted what she referred to as “gross discrepancies”. There were additional deposits to the business bank account that she could not confirm a source for. She requested additional information in order to complete the bank deposit analysis. There was further interaction in which she requested by fax responses to questions which she had regarding bank transactions. Those responses were subsequently provided by Cauls.

[10] Ms. Case then completed the bank deposit analysis and noted large unexplained cash deposits. On February 1, 2006, she prepared a referral to the investigation section. After that point she had no further contact with Mr. and Mrs. Caul.

[11] It should be noted that a referral to investigators is not the norm for an auditor to follow. Ms. Case testified that she has done more than 100 audits as an employee of CRA. From that number she has referred six to the investigation section. Only two of those, including the referral related to Mr. and Mrs. Caul, were actually accepted for investigation.

[12] Lawrence Stroud also gave evidence. He has worked with Canada Revenue Agency since 1991. In 1993 he began working as an auditor. In 2003 he moved to the investigation section. He received the referral for investigation related to the Cauls in late February or early March. As a result, he interviewed Ms. Case on March 8,

Digitized by Google

2006, to obtain an understanding of the file. That was his first contact with Ms. Case regarding Mr. and Mrs. Caul. The Caul file was actually accepted for investigation on April 14, 2006.

[13] Once the Caul file was accepted for investigation, Mr. Stroud reviewed Ms. Case's file notes, and the Cauls' tax returns. Based upon what he saw, he decided to expand the investigation to include the taxation year 2004. In May of 2006, he prepared his primary report. In June of 2006, his supervisor "signed off" on his report. Accordingly, he prepared the documentation required to obtain the search warrants and production orders.

[14] Mr. Stroud did his own bank analysis for the years 2002 to 2004. He also forwarded correspondence to the sources of deposits to the Cauls' bank account to determine whether the deposits were income. The civil side of the audit was finalized. The search warrants were executed on July 11, 2006. At the time the warrant was executed, Mr. and Mrs. Caul were cautioned and their right to counsel was provided to them. There were no statements made by them at that point. The charges were subsequently laid.

The Law

[15] As indicated, the Jarvis decision is the leading decision in this area of the law. In that decision, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the taxing authority's audit function gave way to an adversarial role at the point that the inquiry becomes a penal investigation. The difficulty, of course, is determining at what point that happens. In paragraph 88 of the decision the court in Jarvis indicated the following:

"In our view, where the predominant purpose of a particular inquiry is the determination of penal liability, CCRA officials must relinquish the authority to use the inspection and requirement powers under Section 231.1(1) and 231.2(1). In essence, the officials "cross the Rubicon" when the inquiry in question engages the adversarial relationship between the taxpayer and the State…"

[16] The court made it clear that an auditor who merely suspects wrongdoing has not crossed the threshold into criminal investigation for that reason alone. At paragraph 89 of the decision, the court noted:

"To begin with, the mere existence of reasonable grounds that an offence may have been committed is in itself insufficient to support the conclusion that the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability. Even where the reasonable grounds to suspect an offence exists, it will not always be true that the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability. In this regard, courts must guard against creating procedural shackles on regulatory officials; it would be undesirable to "force the regulatory hand" by removing the possibility of seeking the lesser administrative penalties on every occasion in which reasonable grounds existed of more culpable conduct…"

[17] The court in Jarvis also noted that the mental element, intent, is a necessary aspect of evidence before charges can be laid. Paragraphs 90 and 91 of the judgment the court indicated the following:

"…the test cannot be set at the level of mere suspicion that an offence has occurred. Auditors may, during the course of their inspections, suspect all manner of taxpayer wrongdoing, but it certainly is not the case that, from the moment such suspicion is formed, an investigation has begun. On what evidence could investigators ever obtain a search warrant if the whiff of suspicion were enough to freeze auditorial fact

Digitized by Google

finding. The state interest in prosecuting those who wilfully evade their taxes is of great importance, and we should be careful to avoid rendering nugatory the State's ability to investigate and obtain evidence of these offences.
The other pole of the continuum is no more attractive. It would be fiction to say that the adversarial relationship only comes into being when charges are laid. Logically this will only happen once the investigators believe that they have obtained evidence that indicates wrongdoing. Because the Section 239 offences contain an element of mental culpability, the state will, one must presume, usually have some evidence that the accused satisfied the mens rea requirement before laying an Information or preferring an Indictment. The active collection of such evidence indicates an adversarial relationship has been engaged, since it is irrelevant to the determination of tax liability…"

Submissions of the Parties

[18] The defence takes the position that by May 9, 2006, CRA had all of the documents which it needed for reasonable and probable grounds to obtain a search warrant. The argument is that this was a simple business, and the CRA commenced a full audit looking for sources of income while wondering how people existed with negative income. By May 9, 2006, they were looking for an explanation regarding $300,000.00 worth of deposits over a period of two years. Given the large amounts of money involved, it was a large red flag, and sufficient information was in their hands that charges could have been laid. The defence position is that, given an assessment of the factors enunciated in paragraph 94 of Jarvis, the relationship had become adversarial, the reality of what was occurring was an investigation into criminal charges.

[19] The Crown argues that until the auditor obtained all the bank statements involved, and the explanation of some of the banking transactions which was provided in December of 2005, the auditor not have any knowledge of what the deposits related to, and whether they would have anything to do with business income. Essentially, the auditor provided the taxpayers with an opportunity to explain the transaction s. The Crown's argument is that reasonable and probable grounds would only exist if the taxpayers were unable to explain the transactions. Mens rea would not be an issue until an auditor became aware that there was no explanation for the transactions.

[20] The Crown further takes the position that the predominant purpose of the auditor was determining tax liability and determining whether there was an explanation for the bank deposits in question. The Crown pointed out that the auditor did not pass the documentation which she obtained onto the investigator. The investigator eventually obtained those documents pursuant to the search warrant.

Decision on the Application

[21] In my view, the Crown has correctly pointed out that the predominant purpose of the audit was to determine tax liability, and not to investigate criminal charges. Very early in the audit, it was obvious that there was a question about significant bank deposits. However, bank deposits can come from any number of sources. At that point, in my view, CRA would not be in a position to obtain a search warrant simply because it could show that there were significant deposits to a bank account which were not reported as income. Deposits do not necessarily always relate to income. An auditor is entitled to find out the source of those deposits, whether they relate to income, and whether there would be any tax liability for those deposits. Even if there was suspicion of wrongdoing, that would not change the predominant purpose of the auditor's inquiries.

Digitized by Google

[22] In this case, the auditor used the powers available to an auditor under the legislation for the predominant purpose of obtaining an explanation as to the source of the bank deposits, and determining whether there was tax liability. At the point that she received an explanation which was unsatisfactory to her, she ceased having contact with Mr. and Mrs. Caul, and referred the file to the investigation section. The investigation section then reviewed the matter, accepted the file for investigation, met with Ms. Case to obtain an understanding of the file, and then conducted their own investigation, using the legislative provisions to obtain search warrants and production orders.

[23] The Jarvis decision notes that a taxpayer has very little privacy interest in records required to be kept pursuant to taxation legislation. The court also noted that there is nothing preventing auditors from passing to investigators files containing validly obtained audit information.

[24] In this case, the evidence has not established a breach of either Section 7 or Section 8 of the Charter, and accordingly the application is dismissed. The evidence obtained pursuant to the search warrants and production orders is admissible.

Released: August 5, 2008.

Signed:

"Justice McKay"

Her Majesty The Queen v. Ostrowski, Ontario Superior Court Of Justice, CR-06-0309, 2008 CanLII 35698 (ON SC), Another Clear Cut Between Auditor and Investigator with Jarvis Interpreted

Madam Justice H.M. Pierce Reasons On Appeal

Introduction

[1] The respondent, Arnold Ostrowski, was charged with offences under the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act. Specifically, he was alleged to have made false or deceptive statements in his tax returns for 2000, 2001, and 2002 by understating his income for those years. In addition, he was charged with wilfully evading the payment of tax by failing to report business income for the same years. Finally, he was charged with wilful evasion of the payment of GST by failing to report taxable supplies for periods encompassed by 2000 – 2002.

[2] The Public Prosecution Service of Canada, which I will refer to as the Crown, appeals from a decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice R. Clarke of the Ontario Court of Justice dated November 19, 2007. The learned trial judge ruled inadmissible evidence obtained by auditors for Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) pursuant to search warrants and third party requirements for information. He found that the respondent's right to remain silent, as encompassed by s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and his right not to be subjected to unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter were violated. Upon that finding, the Crown had no further evidence to offer. As a result, the charges against Mr. Ostrowski were dismissed.

[3] On this summary conviction appeal, the appellant seeks an order that the evidence be admitted and a new trial ordered. In support of its argument the Crown relies on the reasoning in R. v. Jarvis [2002] S.C.J. No. 76 (S.C.C.). In Jarvis, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the demarcation between audit and investigative functions of the tax authorities. The application of those principles to the facts of this case is the issue on appeal.

Digitized by Google

[4] As the court noted at para. 100 of Jarvis, whether an inquiry constitutes an audit or an investigation is a question of mixed fact and law. Accordingly, a degree of deference to the trial judge is required.

The Facts

[5] In 2003, Ms. Yvonne Franzen, an auditor with CCRA, was assigned to do a limited scope audit of the respondent to verify payments made to subcontractors between 1999 and 2001. Mr. Ostrowski was then the sole proprietor of A.J. Garages. When the respondent's expenses did not match amounts claimed, Franzen noted discrepancies between the expenses reported on the respondent's tax return and the records he provided the auditor. She recommended a full scope audit for 2001 – 2002.

[6] In a full scope audit, all revenue and expenses are examined. This expanded audit was assigned to Mona Klein who was then part of the underground economy section of the audit department. The underground economy auditors focus on businesses involved in cash transactions and unreported income.

[7] The audit department is separate from the investigative arm of the CCRA.

[8] When the scope of the audit was expanded, Ms. Franzen advised Ms. Klein that the respondent had few books or records, and that there were discrepancies in his expenses, though not in income.

[9] When she began the audit in October of 2003, Ms. Klein had no suspicion that the respondent had filed a fraudulent tax return.

[10] Mr. Ostrowski advised Klein that he did not always charge customers GST as some of his competitors did not. However he could not recall whether he remitted GST. Consequently, she could not reach any conclusions about his compliance with GST regulations.

[11] Ms. Klein examined the respondent's business bank statements and noted that most of the bank deposits were for even amounts. She determined that he had no listing of revenue. When the deposits in the respondent's business account were tallied, they were less than the declared income. The respondent could not explain the difference.

[12] Next, Ms. Klein decided to do an analysis of the respondent's personal bank statements in keeping with audit procedure for sole proprietorships or partnerships with gross revenue less than one million dollars.

[13] The respondent had no books and incomplete records. All the contracts the respondent provided totalled less than the reported income, which led Klein to believe the list of contracts provided was incomplete.

[14] As a result of these deficiencies, Klein embarked on a net worth analysis. A net worth audit is a determination of a taxpayer's assets less liabilities at the end of the audited period as compared to the beginning. The auditor must compare the taxpayer's personal expenses with income. It was Ms. Klein's practice not to draw conclusions about a net worth audit until she was certain that all assets, liabilities and all personal expenditures were accounted for. She commented that if one asset or liability were missing, the conclusion would be inaccurate.

[15] Ms. Klein testified that she did not have suspicion with respect to the respondent's income, though she had some indication that it may not have been correct. She stated that she could not verify his income or expenses on a factual basis as would normally be done. Consequently, she conducted a global analysis rather than an audit where income and expenses are each verified. Klein did not note any apparent discrepancies between the taxpayer's lifestyle and the income claimed.

Digitized by Google

[16] Klein also examined cancelled business cheques. In the course of her analysis, she noted cash expenditures of about $30,000 in 2002. Klein testified that she probably had some suspicion on June 14, 2004 after she examined bank withdrawals and found a discrepancy of $30,000 for 2002. She explained that a discrepancy meant the difference between all cash withdrawn and any business and personal expenses paid in cash.

[17] On June 18, 2004, Ms. Klein asked Ms. Ostrowski to identify the cash expenditures. At this point, she had some suspicion of criminal activity but was hoping for an explanation. The explanation given was that the money was used to pay subcontractors in cash; however, Mr. Ostrowski refused to provide a list of those paid or other supporting documentation.

[18] On July 5, 2004, Ms. Klein advised Ms. Ostrowski that without particulars, the $30,000 in unexplained cash would be disallowed as a business expense. The file was referred to the investigations unit that day when there was no explanation for the cash expenses claimed. Klein testified that until this point, she had no suspicion of tax evasion on Mr. Osteowski's part.

[19] The audit report was completed on July 7, and the penalty recommendation report on July 8, 2004. There was no further audit activity after this time.

[20] Ms. Klein testified that she had no contact with the investigations unit while her audit was ongoing. She also stated that when she took over the file, she was not suspicious of the taxpayer simply because of the lack of books and records. She stated it is common for auditors to find discrepancies, but these files are not all referred for investigation. For example, she stated that over a three year period, the underground economy audit department would have conducted 135 audits. Of that number, 24 cases were referred to the investigation department, and 5 were accepted for investigation.

[21] Klein also explained that an investigator looks for intent and the amount in question when conducting an investigation. She may rely on third party information to support intent, altered or fabricated documents, or conduct of the taxpayer. However she stated that to an auditor, intent is irrelevant. The auditor is only interested in the taxable income, compared with reported income and revisions to reported income. A lie by the taxpayer might however be relevant in penalty recommendations.

[22] The investigator, Helena Strandberg, testified. The Ostrowski file was accepted for investigation on November 15, 2004.

[23] She prepared an information to obtain a search warrant for the taxpayer's records. The warrant was executed on January 5, 2005. Mr. Ostrowski was cautioned at that time. She stated she did not look at the documents in the audit file at the time she swore an information for a search warrant. Her information derived from Klein's notes in the audit file, information from Ms. Franzen, and the tax return filed. The two auditors, Franzen and Klein audited the period from January 28, 2003 to July 5, 2004.

[24] It was only after the execution of the search warrant that Strandberg examined the documents obtained in the audit, which were by then subject to seizure pursuant to the search warrant. Strandberg interviewed the respondent after the warrant was executed and again cautioned him and gave him his rights to counsel before interviewing him. She added that she cautioned him before each subsequent contact.

Digitized by Google

[25] Ms. Strandberg stated that the charges against Mr. Ostrowski were laid based on an analysis of the documents seized, third party interviews, and information she obtained from the bank accounts. It was her evidence that the Klein audit covered only two years, 2001 and 2002. However, Strandberg expanded the scope of the investigation to include 1999 and 2000. Accordingly, it was necessary to do additional analysis as part of the investigation.

The Decision Under Appeal
[26] The trial judge summarized the issue before him as follows: "The question to be asked in this case is whether the audits conducted by Ms. Franzen and Ms. Klein became an investigation and if so, when?"
[27] He held that Mr. Ostrowski's right to silence under s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was violated because he was not cautioned before being interviewed during the audits. He also determined that the respondent's right to be free from unreasonable search or seizure as guaranteed by s. 8 of the Charter was violated, as he supplied documents and made statements to the auditor without being cautioned.
[28] The judge cited the principles enunciated in R. v. Jarvis and concluded that inculpatory statements and admissions made by the respondent during the audit without being cautioned; the evidence of the auditors; the audit report of Ms. Klein; and her penalty recommendation report were obtained illegally and must be excluded.
[29] He also found that the information to obtain the search warrant was based on all of the information that the auditors obtained. After excising that information, the judge concluded that the remainder did not form the basis for reasonable and probable grounds to issue the warrant. Therefore, he ruled inadmissible any evidence obtained pursuant to the search warrant.
[30] The trial judge decided that an adversarial relationship crystallized between the respondent and CCRA as of July 7, 2004. However, he concluded that the adversarial relationship existed throughout the audits by Klein and Franzen, "and was based on their findings or lack thereof." As proof of the adversarial relationship, the judge pointed to the audit team leader's direction to Franzen in September of 2003 to expand the scope of the previously limited audit.
[31] Referring to the CCRA, the judge observed, "Its use of the audit power to obtain incriminating evidence, which it did in this case, in my judgment, is an unjustifiable use of its audit powers…."
[32] The appellant argues that the trial judge erred in two ways: • By finding that the auditors were conducting a criminal investigation, such that their evidence should be excluded; and • By applying a dictionary definition of "investigation' instead of applying the Jarvis test.
[33] The respondent submits that the Jarvis test was appropriately applied, and that in any event, the trial judge is owed deference.

The Jarvis Case
[34] In R. v. Jarvis, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the distinctions between audit and investigative functions under the Income Tax Act. Particularly, the court discussed the extent to which information obtained about a taxpayer during an audit under the Act can be used to investigate the taxpayer.

Digitized by Google

[35] The Jarvis case involved an audit of a taxpayer based on a tip that he had not declared income from the sale of his late wife's paintings. The taxpayer was informed of the planned audit by letter and was requested to produce his records. Before he did so, the auditor identified certain art galleries that had purchased works from the taxpayer created by his late wife. Her inquiries confirmed the amount of these sales in two calendar years, as well as the taxpayer's banking arrangements.
[36] Subsequently, the taxpayer's accountant spoke with the auditor, explaining that the taxpayer's books and records were likely in disarray. The taxpayer preferred to deal with the auditor directly, and a meeting was arranged at which the auditor interviewed him. She did not caution him; nor did she disclose that she had made inquiries of the art galleries as to his sales.
[37] The taxpayer answered the auditor's questions about the sale of art and, to a lesser extent, about his farming operations. One of the documents she requested was an inventory of art at the date of the artist's death; her purpose was to compare the taxpayer's records with the information from her earlier inquiries at the art galleries.
[38] In due course, the taxpayer supplied many of the records the auditor requested. The auditor calculated whether all income related to art sales had been reported. She concluded there was a discrepancy of approximately $700,000.
[39] Rather than complete the audit, the auditor immediately referred the case to the investigative unit of what was then Revenue Canada. Along with the referral, she sent her entire file, which included records of contacts made, interviews conducted, and calculations. The taxpayer was unaware that the file had changed its status from audit to investigation, and forwarded additional bank statements that had been requested.
[40] The investigator met with the auditor concerning the file. Later, she reviewed the auditor's file, performed her own analysis, and gathered further information from internal sources to determine whether there were reasonable and probable grounds for a search warrant related to charges of tax evasion.
[41] The auditor misled the accountant when he asked about the status of the file and did not reveal for several months that the file had been referred to the investigative unit.
[42] Before the taxpayer was advised about this turn of events, the investigator obtained a search warrant based on information in the audit file and the investigator's own analysis. The search warrant covered the taxpayer's residence, his accountant's records, and the records in possession of the tax authorities as a result of the audit. After the warrant was executed, requirement letters were issued to the taxpayer's banking institutions to obtain records.
[43] In due course, the taxpayer was prosecuted for making false or deceptive statements in an income tax return and tax evasion.
[44] On appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that, notwithstanding the auditor's deception in failing to advise that the file had been referred for investigation, information obtained by the auditor did not violate the taxpayer's s. 7 rights under the Charter, with the exception of information obtained after the case had been referred for investigation. The latter could not be admitted on the trial.

The Law
[45] As the court noted in Jarvis, the taxing authority's auditory function gives way to an adversarial role when the inquiry becomes a penal investigation. At par. 84, the court observed:

Digitized by Google

"Although the taxpayer and the CCRA are in opposing positions during an audit, when the CCRA exercises its investigative function they are in a more traditional adversarial relationship because of the liberty interest that is at stake.... It follows that there must be some measure of separation between the audit and investigative functions within the CCRA...."
[46] The court concluded, at par. 88, that the test is whether the predominant purpose of the taxing authority's inquiry is penal liability: "In our view, where the predominant purpose of a particular inquiry is the determination of penal liability, CCRA officials must relinquish the authority to use the inspection and requirement powers under ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1). In essence, officials "cross the Rubicon" when the inquiry in question engages the adversarial relationship between the taxpayer and the state...."
[47] The court commented at length on the nature of the auditor's role in ensuring compliance with self- reporting by taxpayers. Specifically, the court cautioned about setting the bar too low - at the level of mere suspicion – in deciding when an offence had been committed. At par. 89, the court noted:
"To begin with, the mere existence of reasonable grounds that an offence may have occurred is by itself insufficient to support the conclusion that the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability. Even where the reasonable grounds to suspect an offence exist, it will not always be true that the predominant purpose of an inquiry is the determination of penal liability.
In this regard, courts must guard against creating procedural shackles on regulatory officials; it would be undesirable to "force the regulatory hand" by removing the possibility of seeking the lesser administrative penalties on every occasion in which reasonable grounds existed of more culpable conduct...."
[48] In describing the adversarial relationship between taxing authority and taxpayer, the court observes that mental culpability is a necessary component of the evidence before charges can be laid. The contrast between audit and investigation is set out at pars. 90 – 91 of the judgment:
"...the test cannot be set at the level of mere suspicion that an offence has occurred. Auditors may, during the course of their inspections, suspect all manner of taxpayer wrongdoing, but it certainly not be the case that, from the moment such suspicion is formed, an investigation has begun. On what evidence could investigators ever obtain a search warrant if the whiff of suspicion were enough to freeze auditorial fact-finding? The state interest in prosecuting those who wilfully evade their taxes is of great importance, and we should be careful to avoid rendering nugatory the state's ability to investigate and obtain evidence of these offences. The other pole of the continuum is no more attractive. It would be a fiction to say that the adversarial relationship only comes into being when charges are laid. Logically, this will only happen once the investigators believe that they have obtained evidence that indicates wrongdoing. Because the s. 239 offences contain an element of mental culpability, the state will, one must presume, usually have some evidence that the accused satisfied the mens rea requirements before laying an information or preferring an indictment. The active collection of such evidence indicates an adversarial relationship has been engaged, since it is irrelevant to the determination of tax liability...."
[49] At par. 94, the court suggested some factors to guide the trial judge's inquiry. These factors were recited in this case:
"Did the authorities have reasonable grounds to lay charges? Does it appear from the record that a decision to proceed with a criminal investigation could have been made?

Digitized by Google

Was the general conduct of the authorities such that it was consistent with the pursuit of a criminal investigation?
Had the auditor transferred his or her files and materials to the investigator?
Was the conduct of the auditor such that he or she was effectively acting as an agent for the investigators?
Does it appear that the investigators intended to use the auditor as their agent in the collection of evidence?
Is the evidence sought relevant to taxpayer liability generally? Or, as is the case with evidence as to the taxpayer's mens rea, is the evidence relevant only to the taxpayer's penal liability?
Are there any other circumstances or factors that can lead the trial judges to the conclusion that the compliance audit had in reality become a criminal investigation?"

Analysis
[50] In view of the principles set out in R. v. Jarvis, I have concluded the learned trial judge's ruling excluding the auditors' evidence from the information to obtain a search warrant, and thus the information obtained under the search warrant, is unreasonable. The following are the reasons.
[51] In making his ruling, the learned trial judge compared an audit to an investigation by referring to their dictionary definitions. In doing so, he overlooked that an audit is a type of investigation mandated by ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act. By this analysis, the trial judge diluted the test to be applied. [52] The logical extension of the judge's reasoning is that the CCRA would be deprived of its audit powers prescribed by the Income Tax Act. In effect, each audit would constitute a criminal investigation requiring Charter protections because the tax regulator and the taxpayer would be in an adversarial role from the outset of an audit. This interpretation of the test effectively insulates each taxpayer from audit verification by the tax authorities. This is the notional "shackling of the regulator" referred to in Jarvis.
[53] The trial judge also overlooked the direction of the Supreme Court in Jarvis that suspicion by an auditor that an offence has been committed is not enough to halt an audit or trigger Charter protections.
[54] The evidence before the trial judge did not establish that the auditor had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed until July 5, 2004 when the taxpayer refused to disclose the names of the persons receiving cash payments. That is the first occasion when the evidence might suggest mens rea by the taxpayer in relation to tax evasion. Until that time, there was merely a discrepancy in figures that was capable of explanation. The explanation could include arithmetic error, or legitimate expense, or a failure to report income. See: R. v. Dial Drug Stores
[2003] O.J. No. 754 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), paras 57 and 58.
[55] Until an explanation for the discrepancy was called for, auditors Klein and Franzen were engaged in an examination of Mr. Ostrowski's books and records to determine his tax liability. This is a function mandated by ss. 231.1(1) and 231.2(1) of the Income Tax Act. The predominant purpose was to determine tax payable, not penal liability. Without some evidence of mens rea, commencement of a prosecution would have been improper. As Klein put it, the intention of the taxpayer with respect to tax evasion is irrelevant to the auditor. [56] The general conduct of the authorities before July 5, 2004 was consistent with an audit, not a criminal investigation. At first, a limited scope audit was undertaken. It was inconclusive. Then the scope of the audit was expanded due to the lack of books and records of the taxpayer. The audit consisted of an analysis of the taxpayer's books and records. There was no attempt to question third parties.

Digitized by Google

[57] When the conventional audit could not be conducted because of the lack of records, the auditor embarked upon a net worth audit to approximate the taxpayer's income and expenses. Klein testified that she could not reach a conclusion on the audit until she had all the numbers as it would be inaccurate.

[58] With respect to GST, Ms. Klein reached no conclusion about Mr. Ostrowski's compliance.

[59] Auditor Klein forwarded a report to the investigative branch for consideration after her last contact with the taxpayer in July of 2004. There was no overlap between audit and investigation. Klein's report and some limited investigation by the investigator formed the basis of the information to obtain a search warrant. The investigator did not review the auditor's file or the taxpayer's documents until they were seized pursuant to the search warrant.

[60] It cannot be said that either auditor acted as an agent for the investigator. There was no request for an investigation until the audit was completed. The investigation branch would have been wholly unaware of the file until it received Klein's request at the conclusion of her audit. Indeed, it did not accept the Ostrowski file for investigation until November of 2004. Only a fraction of requests for investigation are accepted.

[61] The information to obtain a search warrant was not prepared until December of 2004. The investigator did not ask the auditor to obtain materials or conduct interviews or otherwise act on her behalf after the auditor made her request for an investigation.

[62] The conduct of the limited scope audit and the expanded audit was consistent with determining tax liability generally. In the course of examining the tax payer's business operation, the auditors did not seek information as to the taxpayer's intention to evade tax. Ms. Klein testified that she did not have suspicion with respect to whether additional tax was owed until she completed her audit, but that an explanation might be forthcoming. She stated that a discrepancy discovered during the audit must be material: not insignificant.

[63] The trial judge failed to consider that the investigator expanded the scope of her investigation to encompass two years that were not examined by either auditor. In my view, the expanded scope of investigation supports the appellant's contention that the audit process operated distinctly from the investigative branch. The auditor formulated charges based on the documents seized, interviews with third parties and information from the taxpayer's bank accounts.

[64] For all of these reasons, the appeal must be allowed. A new trial is ordered with the excluded evidence to be admitted.

_"original signed by"

The Hon. Madam Justice H.M. Pierce

Released: May 23, 2008

Ciglen v. R., [1970] S.C.R. 804, The Recognition of what Income has to be evaded (characterization) and other Issues on Errors in Law

Digitized by Google

Date: 1970-03-20
Samuel Ciglen (Plaintiff) Appellant;
and
Her Majesty the Queen (Defendant) Respondent.
1969: October 21, 22, 23, 24, 27; 1970: March 20.
Present: Cartwright C.J. and Fauteux, Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, Spence and Pigeon JJ.
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO.
Criminal law—Conspiring to evade payment of tax—Suppression of profits—Allocation of appellant's transactions to company—Duty of determining whether transactions resulted in taxable income or capital gain—Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, s. 132.
Appeal—Criminal law—Jurisdiction—Appeal by Crown to Court of Appeal—Question of law alone—Criminal Code, 1953-54 (Can.), c. 51, ss. 584(1)(a), 597(2)(a).

The appellant was acquitted at trial on a charge of conspiring to wilfully evade payment of taxes by suppressing taxable income, contrary to s. 132(1)(e) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148. The reasonable doubt which the trial judge expressed as giving rise to his acquittal of the appellant was based on three questions: (1) his view as to the proper definition of the word "suppressing" appearing in the indictment; (2) that the Minister had not made any decision fixing the character of the profits as being income and that unless such decision has been made the accused could not be convicted of conspiracy to evade the payment of tax on income; and (3) on his view of the auditors' reports. On appeal by the Crown, the Court of Appeal directed a conviction of the appellant. He appealed to this Court and submitted that the Court of Appeal had gone beyond its jurisdiction.

Held (Cartwright C.J. and Hall J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Fauteux, Abbott, Martland and Judson JJ.: The trial judge erred in law in his interpretation of the meaning of the word "suppression" when he held that a falsification of the true facts, by attributing transactions which were the appellant's to a company would not be sufficient; only a total failure to account would be enough. He also erred in law in holding that the determination as to whether the profits were income or capital gains was for the Minister, and beyond the purview of the Court. While the judge has stated that he was unable to establish, by inference from the evidence, an agreement to conspire as charged in the indictment, he has, in his own reasons, shown that what he considered to be necessary to establish such an agreement was based upon an erroneous conception of the law. This was an error of law and therefore subject to appeal by the Crown.

Per Ritchie and Pigeon JJ.: The trial judge's finding of reasonable doubt was founded in error at law and on a misapplication of the law to the evidence. His judgment was therefore the proper subject of an appeal under s. 584(1) (a) of the Criminal Code.

Per Spence J.: The Court of Appeal, in considering the three questions upon which the trial judge had professed to have based his reasonable doubt, were considering questions of law alone and they had jurisdiction to come to their own decision on those questions of law and to differ from the trial judge, using alone his findings of fact. The meaning in law to be given to a word which appears in an indictment or in a section of the Code is purely a question of law and the Court of Appeal had the jurisdiction to differ from the opinion of the trial judge as to the meaning in law of the word "suppressing". To hold that the decision that the payments received by the appellant were income was a decision necessary for the trial judge himself to make and was not a decision to be made by the Minister is certainly a decision upon a question of pure law. Again the Court of Appeal has the jurisdiction to come to such a decision in law. The Court of Appeal found that the reports upon which the trial judge based his finding of reasonable. doubt could not, in evidence, supply a reasonable doubt. This was a finding on pure law and was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal.

Digitized by Google

One may not rely on such vague words as "for these and other reasons" to determine that the trial judge relied on any general presumption of innocence which favoured the accused. The trial judge found that general presumption of innocence had been rebutted apart from the three reasons in law for which he, in error, assigned his reasonable doubt.

Per Cartwright C.J. and Hall J., dissenting: The judgment of the trial judge was based on one or more distinct grounds that do not involve questions of law alone. The Court of Appeal should have dismissed the Crown's appeal. A ground which is ex facie one of fact or mixed fact and law may prove to be vitiated by an error in law in the strict sense, for example, if the trial judge acquits because the evidence does not satisfy him beyond a reasonable doubt and he has mistakenly excluded a piece of vital and legally admissible evidence duly tendered by the Crown. In such a case the Court of Appeal would have jurisdiction to set aside the judgment of acquittal.

In the case at bar, it was essential for the prosecution to prove that the moneys were taxable income. The trial judge did not base his finding that he was not satisfied that the moneys in question were taxable income on the failure of the Minister to assess the profits as income but on the view which he took of the evidence as a whole. The question whether his conclusion was right or wrong is not one of law alone.

It appears from the reasons of the trial judge read as a whole that he based his decision on the following two grounds amongst others (i) that he was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellant acted with a guilty mind and (ii) that he was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the moneys were taxable income. These were distinct grounds for his decision and in neither was the question whether his view was right or wrong a question of law alone.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[1], setting aside a verdict of acquittal and directing a conviction of the appellant. Appeal dismissed, Cartwright C.J. and Hall J. dissenting.

George D. Finlayson, Q.C., and Burton Tait, for the appellant.
W.B. Williston, Q.C., P.A. Hess, Q.C., and W.C. Graham, for the respondent.

The judgment of Cartwright C.J. and of Hall J. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)—The wording of the indictment charging the appellant and Morris Black and the course of the proceedings in the Courts below are set out in the reasons of my brother Spence, which I have had the advantage of reading, and as far as possible I will refrain from repetition.

On December 26, 1966, at the end of a trial before His Honour Judge Rogers without a jury which lasted 115 days judgment was reserved. On February 28, 1967, His Honour delivered oral judgment as follows:

> In the matter of Samuel Ciglen and Morris Black, as set out in my Reasons for Judgment, which consist of one hundred and seventeen pages, and which are available at the Judges' Secretary's office, I am unable to establish, by inference from the conduct of the accused and the cumulative effect of the evidence, any agreement to conspire as charged in the indictment. The accused Ciglen and Black are acquitted.

Digitized by Google

Early in his reasons the learned Judge summarized the Crown's case as follows:

> The charge is against Ciglen and Black, they are the only persons charged in the indictment and the charge is a single conspiracy to commit one offence, that is to evade the payment of income tax for the year 1956 by suppressing taxable income of the said Samuel Ciglen and Morris Black. The Crown alleges that the accused made substantial profits in the sale of Great Sweet Grass and Kroy shares as a result of obtaining shares in the following deals:
>
> (a) The Pitt Deal.
> (b) The Depositors Mutual Deal.
> (c) The Kroy-Fulton Deal.
> (d) The Kroy-Coronet Deal.
>
> The basis of the Crown's case is that the profits made in the sale of the shares belonged to the accused and that to evade payment of taxes thereon, they designated the corporations and the trusts as the persons entitled to the bulk of the profits, and then contrived to retain the profits for themselves and any profits not so designated were suppressed.

The phrase "the corporations and the trusts" refers to some of those named as co-conspirators in the indictment or in the particulars given by the Crown.

The Court of Appeal[2] upheld the acquittal of Black and found itself unable to reverse the conclusions arrived at by the learned trial Judge in regard to the Pitt Deal, the Depositors Mutual Deal and the Kroy-Coronet Deal. It based its allowance of the Crown's appeal and the entering of a verdict of guilty against Ciglen on the findings of the learned trial Judge in regard to the transactions involved in the Kroy-Fulton Deal and the disposition of the profits arising therefrom. In the view of the Court of Appeal the reasons of the learned trial Judge dealing with this phase of the matter contained serious errors in law and when these errors were corrected the facts as found by him led inevitably to the conclusion that Ciglen was guilty as charged.

This Court in The Queen v. Warner[3] decided that when a judgment of acquittal is based on distinct grounds, one of which involves a question which is not one of law alone, an appellate court whose jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from an acquittal is limited to grounds of appeal that involve a question of law alone is powerless to interfere with the judgment of acquittal although other of the distinct grounds on which that judgment was based do involve questions of law alone. In applying this rule it must be borne in mind that a ground which is ex facie one of fact or mixed fact and law may prove to be vitiated by an error in law in the strict sense. To give a simple example, a decision worded "I acquit the accused because the evidence does not satisfy me of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt" may be successfully attacked on the ground that the trial Court had mistakenly excluded a piece of vital and legally admissible evidence duly tendered by the Crown. In such a case no doubt the Court of Appeal would have jurisdiction to set aside the judgment of acquittal and direct a new trial. The differences of opinion in this Court in The Queen v. Warner were not as to the scope of the rule but as to the interpretation of the judgment of the Court below.

In the case at bar counsel for the appellant contends that the decision of the learned trial Judge was based on several distinct grounds of fact or of mixed fact and law and that for this reason the Court of Appeal should have dismissed the appeal. Whether or not this contention is well founded is, of course, a question of law on which an appeal to this Court lies under s. 597 (2) (a) of the Criminal Code.

In view of the wording of the charge, to establish the guilt of the accused it was incumbent upon the Crown to prove beyond a reasonable doubt (i) that the profits from the sale of shares of Great Sweet Grass Oils Limited and Kroy Oils Limited for the taxation year 1956 were properly attributable to the accused, (ii) that such profits were taxable income, (iii) that Ciglen conspired to suppress this taxable income and (iv) that he did so to evade payment of taxes imposed in respect of such income by the Income Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

If it were proved that Ciglen agreed with another or others to wilfully evade payment of such taxes the offence charged would be complete even though the carrying out of the agreement was thwarted; but to support a conviction it was necessary for the Crown to establish that the agreement if carried out would have resulted in the commission of the offence created by s. 132(1) (d) of the Income Tax Act. As is often the case in the trial of a charge of conspiracy, there is no direct evidence of the making of the agreement charged in the indictment. The Crown asks that its making be inferred from the fact that, as it alleges, the offence contemplated was actually committed.

At p. 106 of his reasons the learned trial Judge makes the following statement:

> …If I am to look at this case in its broadest terms from the standpoint of a conspiracy to do an illegal act, in my view, it would be incumbent upon the Crown to demonstrate that there would be an evasion of a tax liability. On the evidence I am unable to say whether the moneys are subject to tax.

He expresses the same conclusion elsewhere in his reasons; at p. 102:

> …Under the circumstances, this Court is unable, on the evidence before it, and taking the case for the Crown at its highest, to determine whether the profits so derived are, beyond a reasonable doubt, income in the hands of the two accused as opposed to capital gains.

and at p. 114:

> …It seems to this Court that it would be incumbent upon the Crown to demonstrate that there would be an evasion of tax liability by suppression. I am, however, unable to determine on all of the evidence whether the moneys are subject to tax and for this reason, amongst others, I can draw no conclusive inference.

As has been pointed out above it was essential for the prosecution to prove that the moneys in question were taxable income and the finding of the learned trial Judge that the evidence does not satisfy him of this is on its face fatal to the Crown's case.

In the view of the Court of Appeal, however, this finding was vitiated by an error of law in that the learned trial Judge in effect directed himself that it was necessary that there should be a determination by the Minister of National Revenue as to whether the profits were capital gains or income subject to tax before a prosecution could proceed successfully. Had the learned trial Judge so directed himself it would clearly have been an error in law, but, as I read his reasons, he did not do so. He does seem to say that had there been an assessment by the Minister treating the profits as taxable income the onus of proving the contrary would have fallen upon the accused. While that would be true in civil proceedings it would not be true in a criminal prosecution but since there was in fact no assessment the question need not be pursued.

In my opinion the following passage at pp. 82 and 83 in the reasons of the learned trial Judge makes it clear that he rejected the submission of counsel for the accused that it was necessary for the Crown to show that an assessment had been made:

> Counsel for the accused Ciglen advanced an argument that there could be no offence under Section 132(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act of wilfully evading the payment of taxes imposed by the Act unless an assessment had been made,

Digitized by Google

> i.e. that the only crime envisioned by the Income Tax Act was one of evading payment of taxes which had been actually assessed. The two words 'taxes imposed' are not defined in the Income Tax Act and consequently their meaning must be found elsewhere. Section 139(1)(ba) defines the term "tax payable by taxpayer" as meaning the tax payable by him as fixed by assessment or re-assessment subject to variation on objection or on appeal, if any, in accordance with the relevant appeal provisions of the Act.
>
> The facts in this case are that at no time were Ciglen and Black assessed for the profits from the sale of Kroy and Great Sweet Grass shares in issue herein and, in my view, the ordinary meaning of "imposed" does not necessarily carry with it the connotation or ingredient of "assessment" or calculation of amount. It is simply the liability to taxation.

It is obvious that if the learned trial Judge had accepted the submission of counsel for Ciglen on this point he would have dismissed the charge and reasons of over one hundred pages would have become unnecessary. As I read his reasons, the learned trial Judge did not base his finding that he was not satisfied that the moneys in question were taxable income on the failure of the Minister to assess but on the view which he took of the evidence as a whole. The question whether his conclusion was right or wrong is not one of law alone.

Another ground on which the learned trial Judge based his decision to acquit appears in his reasons at p. 114, where he says:

> Having dealt with the P.O.G.N. reports, which in law are evidence both for and against the accused Ciglen, I am of the opinion that these reports have raised a reasonable doubt in my mind as to the guilt of the accused Ciglen for the offence of conspiracy as charged.

The Court of Appeal criticized this finding on the ground that having found that Ciglen had a beneficial interest in the shares from which the profits realized in the Kroy-Fulton deal were derived and had used those shares as his own property, the learned trial Judge could not rely on the POGN reports allocating such profits to Torny Financial Corporation Ltd. as raising a doubt as to the guilt of the accused. If it be agreed that the POGN reports could not be relied on to raise a doubt as to Ciglen's beneficial interest in the shares in question they might yet raise a doubt as to Ciglen's guilty intention to evade payment of tax. In the view of the learned trial Judge the allocation of the profits to Torny was not necessarily inconsistent with the existence of a noncriminal intention on the part of Ciglen and was as consistent with an intention to avoid tax, that is lawfully to so arrange matters as not to attract tax, as with an intention to evade tax. Once again the question whether this view was erroneous is not a question of law alone. The "well known and very important distinction between avoidance and evasion in relation to the law of taxation" has recently been emphasized in the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal for the Yukon Territory, delivered by MacFarlane J.A., in The Queen v. Regehr[4], in which it was held that a count charging that the accused "did wilfully avoid a payment of taxes imposed by the Income Tax Act in that he failed to report all of his income contrary to para. (d) of Subsection (1) of Section 132 of the said Act" did not charge an offence known to the law, and leave to amend by changing the word "avoid" to "evade" was refused.

The Court of Appeal was further of opinion that the learned trial Judge erred in law in defining "suppression" as a total failure to account. The passage criticized appears at pp. 109 and 110 of the reasons of the learned trial Judge. It is as follows:

> …The Crown has clearly made out a prima facie case of an agreement betwen

Digitized by Google

> Samuel Ciglen and Torny Financial Corporation Limited to treat these matters as having been Torny transactions. Whether such an allocation can be equated with an intention to evade tax payable through suppression or in the light of its disclosure in the P.O.G.N. reports albeit as a Torny transaction as an attempt to attract no tax is open to serious doubt. In my view, suppression denotes something more than an allocation and is a total failure to account. It is for this reason that the explanations put forth in the P.O.G.N. reports by way of adjusting entries must be shown as false.

Proof that an accused allocated income of his own to a third party if shown to be done with the intention of evading payment of income tax imposed upon him by the Income Tax Act would support a finding that he was guilty of a breach of s. 132(1)(d); but when the passage quoted is read in the light of the reasons as a whole it appears that the learned trial Judge in distinguishing between "allocation" and "total failure to account" was pointing out that the former is more consistent with an innocent intention than is the latter. I cannot find in the passage quoted an error of law which vitiates the judgment of acquittal.

It is clear that mens rea is an essential element of an offence against s. 132(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act; the use of the word "wilfully" in the clause puts this beyond question. It is trite law that a taxpayer is free to so arrange his affairs as to attract as little liability to tax as possible provided that in so doing he does not employ unlawful means. Of course guilty intent may be inferred from the actions of an accused but the question whether or not the guilty intent exists is one of fact. This is expressly stated in the judgment of this Court in Lampard v. The Queen[5].

The learned trial Judge ended his reasons as follows:

> Since a taxpayer is entitled to adopt a position that will not attract any tax as opposed to wilfully evading payment of tax imposed by the Act, and if such a course of conduct is open to a taxpayer, it has a direct bearing on the issue of a guilty mind.
>
> I am unable to establish by inference from the conduct of the accused and the cumulative effect of the evidence herein, any agreement to conspire as charged in the indictment, the accused Samuel Ciglen is acquitted.

It appears from the reasons of the learned trial Judge read as a whole that he based his decision on the following two grounds amongst others (i) that he was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Ciglen acted with a guilty mind and (ii) that he was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the moneys in question were taxable income. In my opinion these were distinct grounds for his decision and in neither was the question whether his view was right or wrong a question of law alone.

The right of appeal given by s. 584(1) (a) of the Criminal Code to the Attorney General or counsel instructed by him, was unknown to the Common Law. No similar right exists in England although it does exist in some other jurisdictions in the Commonwealth. It is the creature of statute and is strictly limited in scope. The power of the Court of Appeal to set aside a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction acquitting an accused of an indictable offence extends only to grounds of appeal that involve questions of law alone. It is, I suggest, of the utmost importance that the Courts should guard against extending this power by judicial decision to cases, not falling strictly within the terms of the statute creating it, in which the Court of Appeal is satisfied that the judgment of acquittal is clearly wrong. When an appeal is brought from a conviction of an indictable offence the Court of Appeal has power to allow the appeal if "it is of the opinion that the verdict should be set aside on the ground that it is unreasonable or cannot be supported by the evidence"; but that Court has no corresponding power in an appeal from an acquittal; such a power could be conferred only by Parliament; its creation would be without precedent in the Commonwealth.

Digitized by Google

For the reasons set out above it is my opinion that the judgment of the learned trial Judge acquitting the appellant was based on one or more distinct grounds that do not involve questions of law alone and that this case is governed by our decisions in The Queen v. Warner, supra, and Lampard v. The Queen, supra. It follows from this that the Court of Appeal should have dismissed the Crown's appeal.
I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment at trial acquitting the appellant.
The judgment of FAUTEUX, ABBOTT, MARTLAND and JUDSON J.J. was delivered by MARTLAND J.—I am in agreement with the view expressed by Aylesworth J.A., who delivered the reasons for judgment of the Court of Appeal[6], that the trial judge erred in law in his interpretation of the meaning of the word "suppression", which appeared in the indictment in the phrase "by suppressing taxable income of the said Samuel Ciglen." I agree with him, also, that there was error in law in attributing to the Minister the duty of determining whether the impugned transactions resulted in taxable income or capital gain.
The trial judge found as a fact, in connection with the "Kroy-Fulton deal":

> At this point, however, I would find as a fact that, at the time of the delivery of the shares to the Bank of Nova Scotia, March 19th, 1956, Ciglen exercised such control over the said shares that it is a reasonable inference he had a beneficial interest in the same. He used the shares as if they were his own property. I would also find as a fact that the rewritten General Ledger of Torny was a falsification of the facts as they occurred at the time of the Fulton deal.

Later in his reasons he said this:

> …the Crown has clearly made out a prima facie case of an agreement between Samuel Ciglen and Torny Financial Corporation Limited to treat these matters as having been Torny transactions. Whether such an allocation can be equated with an intention to evade tax payable through suppression or in the light of its disclosure in the P.O.G.N. reports albeit as a Torny transaction as an attempt to attract no tax is open to serious doubt. In my view, suppression denotes something more than an allocation and is a total failure to account. It is for this reason that the explanations put forth in the P.O.G.N. reports by way of adjusting entries must be shown as false.

This is a statement of the understanding of the trial judge as to what evidence was necessary to establish a suppressing of taxable income. A falsification of the true facts, by attributing transactions which were his own, to Torny, would not be sufficient. Only a total failure to account would be enough.
This was an error in law, and his conclusion as to the guilt of the appellant has to be considered in the light of that error. That conclusion is expressed later, as follows:

> Having dealt with the P.O.G.N. reports, which in law are evidence both for and against the accused Ciglen, I am of the opinion that these reports have raised a reasonable doubt in my mind as to the guilt of the accused Ciglen for the offence of conspiracy as charged.

As Aylesworth J.A. has pointed out, the P.O.G.N. reports, which were auditors' reports, were based, and had to be based, on Torny's ledger, which, the trial judge had already found, had been rewritten and was a falsification of the facts of the Kroy-Fulton deal.
They did disclose an allocation of income to Torny. The trial judge, even though they disclosed an allocation which he himself had found to be false, felt that they created a reasonable doubt as to the appellant's guilt. But in so holding he was applying an erroneous concept as to what evidence was necessary to establish suppression.

Digitized by Google

The trial judge also erred in law when considering whether the impugned transaction resulted in taxable income to the appellant. I cite the following passages from his judgment:

> Traditionally, profits derived from the sale of stocks and bonds have not been treated as income by the Department of National Revenue even though it is conceded that this is an anomaly under the law relating to the distinction between capital gains and income. It does not appear to me to be within the purview of this Court to determine whether the profits received here are income as proceeds of a business or a capital gain.

It is in the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue and he has not seen fit to make such a designation in this case. Were he to do so, this issue would be subject to review by the Income Tax Appeal Board and/or the Exchequer Court in the manner provided for in the Income Tax Act. Under the circumstances, this Court is unable, on the evidence before it, and taking the case for the Crown at its highest, to determine whether the profits so derived are, beyond a reasonable doubt, income in the hands of the two accused as opposed to capital gains.

* * *

If I am to look at this case in its broadest terms from the standpoint of a conspiracy to do an illegal act, in my view, it would be incumbent upon the Crown to demonstrate that there would be an evasion of a tax liability. On the evidence I am unable to say whether the moneys are subject to tax.

* * *

However, I am of the view that, unless there is a statutory onus, and there is none in the Income Tax Act, nothing displaces the ordinary law in relation to a criminal case, which is that the Crown must establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt and whether these transactions are capital gain or not are matters that should be determined by the Minister, and are not facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused. Had the Minister made an assessment, then the duty of explanation would arise.

The trial judge erred in law in holding that the determination as to whether the profits were income or capital gains was for the Minister, and beyond the purview of the Court, and that he was unable to make a decision on the evidence before him.

As Aylesworth J.A. points out, the trial judge had actually made a finding of fact on this point, when he said:

> There does not seem to be much doubt on the evidence that both Ciglen and Black, through the assistance of various individuals and companies, actively engaged in the promotion and sale and thus in the trading of shares of Great Sweet Grass and Kroy.

In the penultimate paragraph of his judgment, the trial judge, dealing with the issue of a guilty mind, said this:

> Since a taxpayer is entitled to adopt a position that will not attract any tax as opposed to wilfully evading payment of tax imposed by the Act, and if such a course of conduct is open to a taxpayer, it has a direct bearing on the issue of a guilty mind.

He approaches that issue by relying upon the proposition which was stated by Lord Tomlin in The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. The Duke of Westminster[7]:

> Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching > under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be.

Digitized by Google

But in relation to the Kroy-Fulton deal, that can have no relevance, when, on the trial judge's own finding, records were deliberately falsified in order to allocate profits accruing to the appellant to Torny.

The trial judge concluded his reasons by saying, immediately after the paragraph above quoted:

> I am unable to establish by inference from the conduct of the accused and the cumulative effect of the evidence herein, any agreement to conspire as charged in the indictment, the accused Samuel Ciglen is acquitted.

For the appellant it is urged that this is a finding of fact or of mixed fact and law, and, therefore, not subject to appeal by the Crown. But when the trial judge reached that conclusion, for the reasons already outlined, he was considering the evidence under a misconception of law as to what was necessary to be proved in order to establish the Crown's case. The error in this case was as to the legal effect of facts which he had found, and that is an error of law. Chief Justice Anglin, in Belyea v. R.[8], said this:

> The right of appeal by the Attorney-General, conferred by s. 1013 (4), Cr. C., as enacted by c. 11, s. 28, of the Statutes of Canada, 1930, is, no doubt, confined to "questions of law." That implies, if it means anything at all, that there can be no attack by him in the Appellate Divisional Court on the correctness of any of the findings of fact. But we cannot regard that provision as excluding the right of the Appellate Divisional Court, where a conclusion of mixed law and fact, such as is the guilt or innocence of the accused, depends, as it does here, upon the legal effect of certain findings of fact made by the judge or the jury, as the case may be, to enquire into the soundness of that conclusion, since we cannot regard it as anything else but a question of law,—especially where, as here, it is a clear result of misdirection of himself in law by the learned trial judge.

I do not regard the judgment of this Court in Warner v. R.[9], as affecting the application of that principle to the circumstances of this case. In that case, on an appeal by the accused from a conviction of murder, the Chief Justice of Alberta, delivering the unanimous reasons of the Appellate Division, on appeal, said:

> I am strongly of the opinion that the verdict of murder cannot be supported by the evidence. But I feel I must go further, and set out other reasons for setting aside the conviction.

The majority of this Court, on a five to four division, dismissed the Crown's appeal from this judgment.

Chief Justice Kerwin said, at p. 147:

> I read the first sentence as meaning that the Chief Justice considered that the evidence was not sufficient to support a conviction,—which is a question of fact.

Cartwright J., as he then was, delivering the reasons of himself and two other members of the Court, held that this first ground of decision was a distinct ground, upon which the judgment was based, and was a ground raising no question of law in the strict sense.

Under s. 592 (1) of the Criminal Code the Appellate Division, on an appeal against conviction, was empowered to allow the appeal where the verdict could not be supported by the evidence, as well as where the verdict, at trial, involved a wrong decision on a question of law. Under s. 597, on appeal from the Appellate Division, this Court was only empowered to allow an appeal from the decision of the Appellate Division on a question of law.

Digitized by Google

Cartwright J. said, at p. 149:

> So far as the judgment of the Appellate Division is based on the first ground mentioned, this Court is powerless to interfere with it. The question whether the Appellate Division was right in proceeding on this ground is not a question of law in the strict sense. It is a question of fact or, at the best from the point of view of the appellant, a mixed question of fact and law.

At p. 152 he said:

> I conclude that the Appellate Division quashed the conviction on the ground inter alia that it cannot be supported by the evidence, that this was a distinct ground on which its judgment was based, that it is a ground raising no question of law in the strict sense and that it is nihil ad rem that the judgment was based also on other grounds raising such points of law.

No opinion was expressed by the majority of the Court as to what the situation would have been if the decision expressed by the Appellate Division that the verdict could not be supported by the evidence had been based upon a mistaken view as to the law applicable. That issue did, however, arise in R. v. Lemire[10], a case in which, on an appeal from conviction, the appellate court had held that certain evidence created a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused. At p. 192, the view of the majority of this Court on that issue was expressed as follows:

> In my opinion, on an appeal from a conviction, if an appellate court allows the appeal on the ground that certain specified evidence creates a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, when, on a proper view of the law, that evidence is not capable of creating any doubt as to his guilt, there is an error in law.

In the present case, the situation is that, while the trial judge has stated that he was unable to establish, by inference from the evidence, an agreement to conspire as charged in the indictment, he has, in his own reasons, shown that what he considered to be necessary to establish an agreement to conspire, as charged in the indictment, was based upon an erroneous conception of the law.

I would dismiss the appeal.

The judgment of Ritchie and Pigeon J.J. was delivered by RITCHIE J.—I share the opinion, as expressed in the reasons for judgment of my brothers Martland and Spence, that the learned trial judge's finding of reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the appellant was founded in error at law and on a misapplication of the law to the evidence; his judgment was therefore in my view the proper subject of an appeal by the Attorney General of Canada under the provisions of s. 584 (1)(a) of the Criminal Code.

I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

SPENCE J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[11] pronounced on January 7, 1969. By that judgment, the Court of Appeal for Ontario allowed an appeal from the judgment of Rogers, Co. Ct. J., pronounced on February 28, 1967, in which he acquitted the appellant and his co-accused Morris Black, and directed a conviction of Ciglen in lieu thereof.

The Attorney General for Canada had appealed to the Court of Appeal from the acquittal of both accused. The Court of Appeal, in its judgment, confirmed the acquittal as to the accused Black and there is no further appeal as to that accused.

The appellant and his co-accused, Morris Black, were charged in the indictment as follows:

> That during the years 1955, 1956 and 1957, at the said Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, and at other divers places, did, unlawfully, conspire > together, the one with the other and with Torny Financial Corporation Ltd., Compania de Inversiones Amcub, S.A., otherwise known as Amcub Investment Company Incorporated, Ontario Cobalt Mines Limited, Glenrich Uranium Mines Limited, Albontec Development Company Limited and Americana Trading Company Limited and with persons unknown or with someone or more of them, to wilfully evade payment of taxes imposed on the said Samuel Ciglen and the said Morris Black by the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, by suppressing taxable income of the said Samuel Ciglen and the said Morris Black from the sale of common shares of Great Sweet Grass Oils Limited and Kroy Oils Limited for the taxation year 1956, in violation of Section 132(1) (d) of the said Act, contrary to Section 132(1) (e) of the said Act.

Digitized by Google

The charges were based upon an exceedingly complicated series of transactions in reference to the shares in two corporations, Great Sweet Grass Oils Limited et Kroy Oils Limited. A la suite abortive trial, lasting 68 days and terminated by the unfortunate death of the first trial court judge, the second trial took 115 days before His Honour Judge Rogers in the County Court of the County of York. The accused called no evidence. At the first trial, in response to a demand for particulars of the "persons unknown" referred to in the indictment, the Crown named 32 co-conspirators. At the new trial, 14 additional co-conspirators were named. The argument on appeal required 24 days. The material is most voluminous—over 1500 exhibits, several of them consisting of many documents, were filed.

At trial, four different so-called deals or series of transactions were examined. Those deals were known as the Pitt deal, the Depositors Mutual Deal, the Kroy-Fulton Deal, and the Kroy-Coronet Deal. As I have said, the learned trial judge acquitted both accused in reference to all four deals. The judgment in the Court of Appeal for Ontario was given by Aylesworth J.A. in a very detailed and carefully worked out set of reasons which cover 39 printed pages. In those reasons, Aylesworth J.A. affirmed the acquittal of the accused Black and accepted the trial judge's acquittal of the accused Ciglen as to the Pitt deal, the Depositors Mutual deal, and the Kroy-Coronet deal, although the learned justice in appeal was very puzzled by the learned trial judge's findings of fact involved in the acquittal of the accused Ciglen as to any one of those three deals. Aylesworth J.A. said:

> There remains for consideration the effect of the evidence and findings made by the trial Judge with respect to the Kroy-Fulton deal so far as they affect Ciglen and the position in law of the respondent Black in the appeal as a whole. I have quoted earlier the finding of the trial Judge that the Kroy-Fulton deal was Ciglen's own deal and that ex post facto by falsification of records an attempt was made in agreement with Torny to treat the deal as a Torny deal. Moreover, as the trial Judge found, Ciglen, in his personal amended income tax return for 1956, claimed as a deduction bank interest on an overdraft he had been allowed by his bank in connection with his financing of the deal. The trial Judge found that—
>
> > Insofar as the back-dating is concerned, I have already dealt with this and it is not a piece of evidence from which I can infer the guilt of the accused as inconsistent with his innocence and that such is not an unusual practice in any office when the purpose of it is to document what in fact has occurred so that back-dating in itself is a neutral piece of evidence.
>
> I should not like to think that in these observations the trial Judge was directing his mind to the falsification of documents which he found to have occurred with respect to the Kroy-Fulton deal. Falsification of documents for one's own benefit surely is the most cogent evidence of the existence of the benefit itself—in this case, the existence of profits and profits in "trading in shares" as found by the trial Judge—and the suppression of those profits as personal to the accused Ciglen.

Digitized by Google

Again, I find it difficult in the extreme to follow the trial Judge's reasoning in acquitting Ciglen. Given the finding he made, what possible inference can be drawn other than Ciglen's guilt as charged? He is shown to have been engaged in the business of trading in the Great Sweet Grass and Kroy shares, to have made a profit, to have conspired with Torny wilfully to evade payment of taxes for which he personally became liable by depicting the profits as those of Torny; the profits as profits of Torny would be subject to different rates and tax considerations than would be the case relative to taxation of Ciglen's personal profits. He "suppressed" his taxable income in conspiracy with Torny by falsely attributing that income to Torny. The trial judge expressed his views in part thus:

> Whether such an allocation can be equated with an intention to evade tax payable through suppression or in the light of its disclosure in the P.O.G.N. reports albeit as a Torny transaction, as an attempt to attract no tax is open to serious doubt. In my view, suppression denotes something more than an allocation and is a total failure to account. It is for this reason that the explanation put forth in the P.O.G.N. reports by way of adjusting entries must be shown as false.

He also declared:

> However, I am of the view that, unless there is a statutory onus, and there is none in the Income Tax Act, nothing displaces the ordinary law in relation to a criminal case, which is that the Crown must establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt and whether these transactions are capital gain or not, are matters that should be determined by the Minister, and are not facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused. Had the Minister made an assessment then the duty of explanation would arise.

And finally:

> It seems to this Court that it would be incumbent upon the Crown to demonstrate that there would be an evasion of tax liability by suppression. I am, however, unable to determine on all of the evidence whether the moneys are subject to tax and for this reason, amongst others, I can draw no conclusive inference.
>
> Having dealt with the P.O.G.N. reports, which in law are evidence both for and against the accused Ciglen, I am of the opinion that these reports have raised a reasonable doubt in my mind as to the guilt of the accused Ciglen for the offence of conspiracy as charged.

The finding of fact made by the trial judge as to the Kroy-Fulton deal, which Aylesworth J.A. refers to in the portion of the judgment I quoted above, was also quoted by Aylesworth J.A. in his reasons for judgment and is as follows:

> I think it necessary to indicate that if certain shares were alleged by Ciglen to have been purchased by various individuals from Torny, then one would expect the purchaser would be entitled to the difference between the cost and the sale. However, the evidence does not bear this out with respect to some of the purchasers who as mentioned were very vague, and in some instances, the purchasers did not seem to know what it was all about. In my view this is > evidence of an agreement between S. Ciglen and Torny to treat the Fulton deal as being a Torny deal, which agreement was made after December, 1956 and before November 5th, 1957, and while it is cogent evidence of an attempt to allocate the proceeds of a deal to diminish the incidents of tax liability as it is to evade tax, since it is set forth in the P.O.G.N. reports I shall deal with it in relation to these reports as evidence for and against the accused Ciglen. At this point, however, I would find signé ce fait, je le traiterai à la lumière de ces rapas a fact that, at the time of the delivery of the shares to the Bank of Nova Scotia, March 19, 1956, Ciglen exercised such control over the said shares that it is a reasonable inference that he had a beneficial interest in the same. He used the shares as if they were his own property. I would also find as a fact that the re-written general ledger of Torny was a falsification of the facts as they occurred at the time of the Fulton deal.

Digitized by Google

It will be seen therefore that the reasonable doubt which the learned trial judge expressed as giving rise to his acquittal of the accused Ciglen was based on three different questions. The first of those questions dealt with the learned trial judge's view as to the proper definition of the word "suppressing" appearing in the indictment. It was the view of Aylesworth J.A., with which I agree, that there could be no such limitation on the allocation of income to another person, in the present case, one of those associated, to avoid the payment of income tax by attributing income which the taxpayer has received merely as receipts by a trustee or agent for another person. When that attribution is false, it is a suppression of the taxpayer's income for the purpose of evading tax.

The second reason for expressing reasonable doubt was that the Minister had not made any decision fixing the character of the profits on these shares as being income and that unless such decision has been made the accused could not be convicted of a conspiracy to evade the payment of tax on income. As to that view, Aylesworth J.A. said, and again, with respect, I agree with him:

> Likewise, he erred in law in attributing to the Minister the duty of determining whether the impugned transactions resulted in taxable income or capital gain. This was for the trial Judge himself and he does not seem to realize that he did determine it when he found as a fact—
>
> > There does not seem to be much doubt on the evidence that Ciglen and Black, through the assistance of various individuals and companies, actively engaged in the promotion and sale and thus in the trading of shares of Great Sweet Grass and Kroy.

The third question upon which the learned trial judge based his finding of a reasonable doubt was the position of the auditors' report filed by the accused with the Department in the year 1960, that is, many months after the end of the conspiracy charged. Those reports were known throughout the trial as P.O.G.N. reports. The trial judge had already found that the Crown bad proved that Ciglen had conspired with the Torny Financial Corporation Limited to show that Ciglen's Kroy-Fulton profits were those of the Torny Corporation and had done so even by falsification of the books of the Torny Corporation. That falsification of books by reason of such a conspiracy then provided the working material on which the auditors drew up the auditors' reports, i.e., the P.O.G.N. reports. As Aylesworth J.A. notes, "under such circumstances those reports merely echo the result of the conspiracy as found and, in law, could not be relied upon to raise a reasonable doubt". (The underlining is my own.) Aylesworth J.A. concluded his consideration of the guilt of the accused in reference to the Kroy-Fulton deal in these words:

Digitized by Google

> When the serious errors in law to which reference has been made are corrected, the facts as found by the trial Judge in the Kroy-Fulton deal lead inevitably to one conclusion—the guilt of the accused Ciglen as charged.

(The underlining is my own.)

All the members of the Court of Appeal concurred in the reasons given by Aylesworth J.A., McLennan J.A. having expressed his concurrence in conference although his unfortunate death occurred prior to the delivery of the reasons. It is submitted on behalf of the appellant in this court that in making the finding of guilt as to the accused Ciglen in reference to the Kroy-Fulton deal the Court of Appeal for Ontario went beyond the jurisdiction conferred upon it. The appellant cites the two recent decisions in this court: Regina v. Sunbeam Corporation of Canada Limited[12] and Lampard v. The Queen[13].

The appeal by the Crown to the Court of Appeal for Ontario is governed by the provisions of s. 584 (1) of the Criminal Code. Subsection (1)(a) of that section provides:

> 584. (1) The Attorney General or counsel instructed by him for the purpose may appeal to the Court of appeal
>
> (a) against a judgment or verdict of acquittal of a trial court in proceedings by indictment on any ground of appeal that involves a question of law alone,

It will be seen, therefore, that the right of appeal given to the Crown is limited to a question of "law alone". I am of the opinion that the three questions which the Court of Appeal was called upon to consider as to the guilt of the accused in reference to the Kroy-Fulton deal were all questions of law and that, therefore, when Aylesworth J.A. said, "when the serious errors in law to which reference has been made are corrected, the facts as found by the trial Judge in the Kroy-Fulton deal lead inevitably to one conclusion—the guilt of the accused as charged" he was giving a conclusion on questions of law. The first of those three questions was as to the meaning of the word "suppressing" as it appeared in the indictment. Surely the meaning in law to be given to a word which appears in an indictment or in a section of the Code is purely a question of law and the Court of Appeal had the jurisdiction to differ from the opinion of the learned trial judge as to the meaning in law of the word "suppressing". The second question considered by the Court of Appeal for Ontario was the argument that it was impossible to convict the accused of an attempt to evade the payment of income tax without demonstrating that income tax was due by having the Minister declare that the payments received by the accused on the profits from trading in these shares were income. The view that such a decision was a decision necessary for the trial judge himself to make and was not a decision to be made by the Minister is certainly a decision upon a question of pure law and again the Court of Appeal has the jurisdiction to differ from the opinion of the learned trial judge thereon.

In Belyea & Weinraub v. The King[14], this court considered an appeal by an accused person from a conviction rendered in the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario after an acquittal at trial. The appellants and others had been charged with conspiracy contrary to the provisions of the then s. 498, subs. (1) (a), (b) and (e) of the Criminal Code, and the trial judge had found that the conspiracy existed but he had refused to convict these two appellants on the ground that no overt acts following the making of the agreement had been proved against them. The Appellate Division and this Court were both of the opinion that the Crown need not prove such overt acts. Anglin C.J.C. said at p. 296:

> But we cannot regard that provision as excluding the right of the Appellate Divisional Court, where a conclusion of mixed law and fact, such as is the guilt > or innocence of the accused, depends, as it does here, upon the legal effect of certain findings of fact, made by the judge or the jury, as the case may be, to enquire into the soundness of that conclusion, since we cannot regard it as anything else but a question of law,—especially where, as here, it is a clear result of misdirection of himself in law by the learned trial judge.

Digitized by Google

I am of the opinion that the statement of the Chief Justice in that case applies exactly to the question as to the necessity of first obtaining a declaration from the Minister that the profits accruing to the accused on the trading in these shares were, in law, income.

The third question considered by the Court of Appeal was the professing to find a reasonable doubt based on the P.O.G.N. reports. These reports, as pointed out by Aylesworth J.A., were simply the echo of the conspiracy which the learned trial judge had found and, therefore, those reports could not, in evidence, supply a reasonable doubt. Again, I am of the opinion that this was a finding on pure law and was within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal under s. 584(1) (a) of the Code.

For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the Court of Appeal, in considering the three questions upon which the learned trial judge had professed to have based his reasonable doubt, were considering questions of law alone and that they had jurisdiction to come to their own decision on those questions of law and to differ from the learned trial judge, using, of course, alone his findings of fact.

One other problem arises which does not seem to have been considered in the Court of Appeal. In The Queen v. Warner[15], this court considered an appeal by the Crown. The accused had been found guilty of murder at trial, but the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta reversed that conviction and substituted therefor a conviction for manslaughter. In coming to this conclusion, the Appellate Division had assigned two reasons for allowing an appeal: firstly, that the verdict of guilty of murder should be set aside on the ground that it could not be supported by the evidence; and, secondly, that there had been errors in law in the charge of the learned trial judge. This court, by a majority judgment, refused to consider the appeal holding that the Appellate Division had the power to make the first finding, which is undoubtedly a finding of fact, by virtue of s. 592(1) (a) of the Criminal Code but that no such power existed in this Court and, therefore, were this Court to have found that the errors in law in the charge of the learned trial judge, which had been found by the Appellate Division, did not, in fact, exist, the result would still have been the dismissal of the Crown's appeal. It was, of course, sufficient to justify the decision of the Appellate Division reducing the conviction to one for manslaughter to have found the first ground of appeal alone.

So, in the present case, it is submitted that the learned trial judge had expressed a reasonable doubt not only on the three propositions of law, with which I have dealt, but for other reasons and that reasonable doubt was not within the consideration of the Court of Appeal, it not being a question of law alone.

It is true that the learned trial judge said in one portion of his judgment:

> It seems to this Court that it would be incumbent upon the Crown to demonstrate that there would be an evasion of tax liability by suppression. I am, however, unable to determine on all of the evidence whether the moneys are subject to tax and for this reason, amongst others, I can draw no conclusive inference.

(The underlining is my own.)

It is also true that on the immediately preceding page of his reasons for judgment the learned trial judge said:

Digitized by Google

> That the burden of proof rests and remains upon the Crown and never shifts is trite law yet if the Crown produces evidence which, if unanswered, and believed, is sufficient to raise a prima facie case, the Crown has discharged its burden and the accused may be convicted unless he counteracts the effect of that evidence, and the presumption of innocence cannot be displaced by evidence which merely tends or inclines in the direction of guilt. The making out of a prima facie case against the accused does cast a burden upon him to the extent that, if no further evidence is given, the jury will be entitled to convict him but the extent of that burden is not to prove his innocence but merely to raise a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury.

Therefore, in my view, the learned trial judge has recognized the general presumption of evidence of innocence in favour of the accused but he did, in fact, deal with it when he made the finding of fact that the evidence showed that there was an agreement between the accused and Torny Financial Corporation Limited to treat the Fulton deal as being a Torny deal although it was a deal solely for the benefit of the accused and the profits therefrom were the property of the accused. In short, the learned trial judge did find there was a prima facie case adduced by the Crown which rebutted the general presumption of innocence in favour of an accused. Since no evidence was given on behalf of the defence, there was nothing to discharge the burden which, as the learned trial judge pointed out, was, under such circumstances, put on the defence. I, therefore, have concluded that one may not rely on such vague words as "for these and other reasons" to determine that the learned trial judge relied on any general presumption of innocence which favoured the accused. On the other hand, I am of the opinion that he found that general presumption of innocence had been rebutted apart from the three reasons in law for which he, in error, assigned his reasonable doubt.

I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed, CARTWRIGHT C.J. and HALL J. dissenting.

Solicitors for the appellant: McCarthy and McCarthy, Toronto.

Solicitor for the respondent: The Attorney General of Canada, Ottawa.

---

[1] (1969), 69 D.T.C. 5045.
[2] (1969), 69 D.T.C. 5045.
[3] [1961] S.C.R. 144, 34 C.R. 246, 128 C.C.C. 366.
[4] (1967), 68 D.T.C. 5078, [1968] 3 C.C.C. 72, 3 C.R.N.S. 163, 66 D.L.R. (2d) 78.
[5] [1969] S.C.R. 373, 3 C.C.C. 249, 4 D.L.R. (3d) 98.
[6] (1969), 69 D.T.C. 5045.
[7] [1936] 1 A.C. 1 at 19.
[8] [1932] S.C.R. 279 at 296, 57 C.C.C. 318, 2 D.L.R. 88.
[9] [1961] S.C.R. 144, 34 C.R. 246, 128 C.C.C. 366.
[10] [1965] S.C.R. 174, 4 C.C.C. 11, 51 D.L.R. (2d) 312.
[11] (1969), 69 D.T.C. 5045.
[12] [1969] S.C.R. 221, 2 C.C.C. 189, 1 D.L.R. (3d) 161.
[13] [1969] S.C.R. 373, 3 C.C.C. 249, 4 D.L.R. (3d) 98.
[14] [1932] S.C.R. 279, 57 C.C.C. 318, 2 D.L.R. 88.
[15] [1961] S.C.R. 144, 34 C.R. 246, 128 C.C.C. 366.

Digitized by Google

R. v. Alberta Hot Oil Services Ltd., 2009 ABQB 11 (CanLII), 2009-01-22, [2009] 4 CTC 38, Sentencing Issues on Straight-Forward Evasion

Reasons for Decision- Sentencing Appeal of the Honourable Mr. Justice D.R.G. Thomas

A. Introduction..... Page: 3
B. Facts..... Page: 3
C. Standard of Review..... Page: 5
D. Issues on Appeal..... Page: 5
Issue 1 - Alleged error in principle - no distinction between Joe and Darlene Rinas..... Page: 6
Issue 2 - Alleged error in principle - failure to consider a non-custodial sentence..... Page: 6
Issue 3 - Alleged failure to consider relevant factors, namely the good character of Joe and Darlene Rinas.....Page: 8 Issue 4 - Alleged failure to consider the totality principle..... Page: 9 Issue 5 - Were the sentences imposed demonstrably unfit?..... Page: 9
F. Disposition..... Page: 11

Introduction

[1] After a lengthy trial in the Alberta Provincial Court, the two individual appellants ("Joe and Darlene Rinas") and the corporate appellant Alberta Hot Oil Services Ltd. ("the Corporation") were found guilty of 18 tax offences, including tax evasion and the making of false statements in tax returns. The Corporation was sentenced on one count of income tax and G.S.T. evasion and ordered to pay a fine totalling 125% of the tax evaded. Joe and Darlene Rinas were each sentenced on one count of tax evasion and ordered to pay a fine totalling 125% of the tax sought to be evaded and a 6 month Conditional Sentence Order ("the C.S.O.") was imposed. Judicial stays of proceeding were entered on all of the remaining counts.

[2] All of the Appellants appealed both their convictions and sentences. The appeals from conviction were dismissed in R.* v. *Alberta Hot Oil Services Ltd., 2007 ABQB 155 (CanLII), [2007] A.J. No. 352 (Alta. Q.B.); 2007 ABQB 155. The sentence appeals were deferred for further written submissions and oral argument.

Facts

[3] I repeat the background facts from my decision on the unsuccessful appeals against conviction as found in R.* v. *Alberta Hot Oil Services, supra.

The Corporation's business was primarily the provision of hot oil services to the petroleum industry in Alberta. In addition to filing corporate T2 tax returns and financial statements for each year, the Corporation was a registered collector of G.S.T. and reported its net G.S.T. on a quarterly basis based on its year end.

Joe Rinas was the president, a director and 50% shareholder of the Corporation. His role in the operations of the Corporation was to oversee the work of its employees, to look after equipment and generally run the external activities of the Corporation. Darlene Rinas was the other 50% shareholder, a director and the secretary-treasurer of the Corporation. Her role was to maintain the books of the company. There were no other directors or officers.

Digitized by Google

In May, 2003 the Canada Revenue Agency ("C.R.A.") conducted an audit on the Corporation for the taxation years 2001 and 2002 and concluded that several expenses of a personal nature had been deducted from the income of the Corporation, including expenses of their two adult children, Ryan and Liberty Rinas. In July, 2003 the Special Investigation Division of the C.R.A. became involved, commenced a further investigation and finally proceeded with prosecutions of the three parties.
In February, 2006 Judge H.W.A. Fuller of the Alberta Provincial Court convicted the Appellants of a total of 18 tax offences including tax evasion and making false statements on tax returns.
[4] Convictions for income tax evasion, on summary conviction, require a minimum fine of 50% of the tax evaded to a maximum of 200% of the tax evaded. Imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years may also be imposed. Convictions for excise tax evasion, on summary conviction, also require a minimum fine of 50% of the tax evaded to a maximum of 200% of the tax evaded. Imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years may also be imposed.
[5] The Crown sought sentences of a fine totalling 125% of the tax evaded for each Appellant and a
C.S.O. ranging from 6 - 12 months for the individuals Joe and Darlene Rinas.
[6] The Appellants requested imposition of fines totalling no more than 75% of the tax evaded by the three parties.
[7] The amount of income tax evaded was $14,780.38 for Joe Rinas and $14,088.50 for Darlene Rinas. The Corporation evaded $29,136.00 in income tax and $8,934.12 in excise tax, for a total tax evaded of $38,070.12.
[8] On count 17 (income tax evasion) Joe Rinas was sentenced to pay a fine totalling 125% of the tax evaded ($18,475.47) and a 6 month C.S.O was imposed. In addition to the mandatory conditions, the
C.S.O. required Joe Rinas to abide by a curfew, complete 50 hours of community service work and carry a copy of his C.S.O. on his person when away from his residence.
[9] In respect to Joe Rinas a judicial stay of proceedings was entered on counts 13 and 14 (making false statements).
[10] On count 18 (income tax evasion), Darlene Rinas was sentenced to pay a fine totalling 125% of the tax evaded ($17,610.62) and a 6 month C.S.O. was imposed. In addition to the mandatory conditions, the
C.S.O. required Darlene Rinas to abide by a curfew, complete community service work and carry a copy of her C.S.O. on her person when away from her residence.
[11] In respect to Darlene Rinas a judicial stay of proceedings was entered on counts 15 and 16 (making false statements).
[12] On count 1 (income tax evasion) and count 12 (excise tax evasion) the Corporation was sentenced to pay a fine totalling 125% of the tax evaded, $36,420.00 for income tax evasion and $11,167.65 for excise tax evasion for a total of $47,587.65.
[13] In respect to the Corporation a judicial stay of proceeding was entered on counts 2 and 4 to 11 inclusive. [14] None of the Appellants had prior criminal records.

Standard of Review

Digitized by Google

[15] An appellate court may intervene to vary a sentence imposed at trial where the sentence is demonstrably unfit, or where there has been an error in principle, a failure to consider a relevant factor, or an overemphasis of the appropriate factors. This standard of review applies to both the length and the type of sentence imposed. R. v. *M.(C.A.)*1996 CanLII 230 (SCC), (1996), 105 C.C.C. (3d) 327 (S.C.C.) at 374; R. v. McDonnell(1997), 114 C.C.C. (3d) 437 (S.C.C.) at para. 46.

[16] The approach to be taken in reviewing the fitness of a sentence is one of deference. An appellate court cannot modify a sentencing order "... simply because it feels that a different order ought to have been made". The sentencing order must be found to be demonstrably unfit; i.e. "clearly unreasonable", " clearly excessive or inadequate", "falling outside the ' acceptable range' of orders", etc. as stated by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. M. (C.A.):

... a court of appeal should only intervene to minimize the disparity of sentences where the sentence imposed by the trial judge is insubstantial and a marked departure from the sentences customarily imposed for similar offenders committing similar crimes. R. v. Shropshire, 1995 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 227 at 429-50

R.* v. M.(C.A.), supra at 375; R. v. McDonnell, supra at para. 16.

Issues on Appeal

[17] The questions raised on appeal are:

Did the sentencing Judge err in principle by failing to distinguish between Joe and Darlene Rinas in determining the appropriate sentence?

Did the sentencing Judge err in principle by failing to consider lesser forms of punishment prior to imposing a custodial sentence upon Joe and Darlene Rinas?

Did the sentencing Judge fail to give sufficient emphasis to the evidence of the prior good character of Joe and Darlene Rinas?

Did the sentencing Judge fail to consider the totality principle?

Did the sentencing Judge impose a sentence which was demonstrably unfit? (Emphasis added.)

[18] The errors alleged fall into three of the categories described in R.* v. *M. (C.A.), supra, namely that the sentences are demonstrably unfit (Issue No. 5), there are errors in principle (Issue Nos. 1, 2 and 4) and there has been a failure to consider a relevant factor (Issue No. 3).

Analysis

Issue 1 - Alleged error in principle - no distinction between Joe and Darlene Rinas

[19] Joe and Darlene Rinas argue that the sentencing Judge failed to distinguish between them as individuals.

[20] Joe and Darlene Rinas were fined for evading income tax on their personal 2001 and 2002 income tax returns by understating taxable incomes. They were each solely responsible for the completion and submission of these personal tax returns.

[21] Both Joe and Darlene Rinas were fined an amount equal to 125% of the income tax evaded on their respective personal income tax returns. Given that their respective degrees of responsibility and culpability for their own personal income tax returns is the same, the sentencing Judge did not make an error in imposing similar sentences upon these individual Appellants.

Digitized by Google

[22] In addition, the quantum of understated income on their personal income tax returns was based upon the amount of personal benefits improperly conferred on them as per section 15(1) of the Income Tax Act ("I.T.A.") and added as taxable income to their respective personal income tax returns. This attribution was correct and the sentencing Judge properly treated the individual Appellants in imposing sentence on them as the sole and equal shareholders of the Corporation pursuant to this provision of the I.T.A.

Issue 2 - Alleged error in principle - failure to consider a non-custodial sentence

[23] The sentencing Judge was on solid legal ground in imposing the equivalent of a custodial sentence through the imposition of a C.S.O. Offences involving the evasion of tax and the making of false statements are serious offences which should attract terms of imprisonment. In that regard, I adopt and endorse the comments of Hope, J. in R.* v. *Kresanowski(1982), 83 D.T.C. 5393 at p. 5398:

… The effect of false returns is visited upon all taxpayers in Canada. To put it bluntly, a person who is instrumental in reducing the income tax of one person is simply not only being unfair to his fellow Canadians, because he is not acting honestly, but he is making those other Canadians, perhaps his neighbours and friends, pay more than their fair share. Certainly tax evasion is to be punished to an extent that it will deter others from acting likewise.

It is in my view almost a certainty that tax evasion will be visited by a term of prison. Perhaps the only matter that is really to be decided is how long that prison term will be.

[24] This view is reinforced by the comments of the Alberta Court of Appeal in R.* v. *Howe,[2002] A.J. No. 1443 at para. 3. Therefore, from a legal perspective, the sentencing Judge was on solid legal ground in imposing the equivalent of a custodial sentence.

[25] Further, a review of his reasons indicates that the sentencing Judge both considered and rejected the appropriateness of lesser forms of punishment, i.e. a fine alone, prior to sentencing Joe and Darlene Rinas to each pay a fine and abide by a 6 month C.S.O. He recognized the need for a fine and a custodial term to properly implement the primary sentencing principles of deterrence and denunciation:

... the principles of denunciation and deterrence are of paramount importance in the offences of tax avoidance and evasion and sentencing must focus on the circumstances of each case and the particular offender.

To send a clear, unequivocal, message to the public, who might be tempted to defraud the government by a similar scheme, or any other fraudulent mechanism, a fine alone cannot send that message.

(Emphasis added.)

I am satisfied, considering all the factors, that a six month gaol term in addition to the fine, is required, to reflect and reinforce the principles of deterrence and denunciation.

Having decided that a gaol term is required I must now consider if this case is one where the sentence could be served in the community. In this regard I refer to section 743(1) of the Code which provides in such instances as this the sentence could be served in the community.

I am therefore satisfied that a conditional sentence order would be appropriate in these instances. Joseph and Darlene Rinas could serve their gaol sentence in the community and they would not cause any danger to the safety of the community.

[26] Counsel for Darlene Rinas referred to many decisions in the tax jurisprudence in Canada over many years to demonstrate that punishments short of imprisonment could and should be imposed on offenders under tax statutes. While this presented an interesting catalogue of decisions, all they demonstrated is that there have been many different sentences customized to the particular circumstances of the offences and the offenders listed. This is common to all sentences in the criminal law field. In any event, a review of these many decisions does not detract from the overarching legal principle that denunciation and deterrence are a core principle in determining sentences for cheating on the reporting of personal and corporate tax liabilities.

Digitized by Google

[27] Finally, Joe Rinas argued that denunciation and deterrence would be achieved by a suspended sentence and a monetary penalty. I agree with the Crown that such a sentence would be illegal and, in the circumstances of this case, inappropriate.

Issue 3 - Alleged failure to consider relevant factors, namely the good character of Joe and Darlene Rinas

[28] Joe and Darlene Rinas allege that the sentencing Judge failed to fully consider a relevant factor, namely their prior good character. Upon my review it is clear that the sentencing Judge considered and gave weight to the good character of both of the individual Appellants as a mitigating factor and articulated this during an exchange with counsel during sentencing submissions and also in his reasons for decision.

[29] He made specific reference to the several "character references" filed on behalf of Joe and Darlene Rinas and stated that there was "no doubt that both of these parties were active and well regarded members of their community." During the course of submissions on behalf of Darlene Rinas, the sentencing Judge stated, "Counsel, I can assure you that those letters of reference have an impact here."

[30] Darlene Rinas argued that the sentencing Judge did not properly consider a neuropsychological report and her personal and emotional difficulties. The fact is that the sentencing Judge did have the particular report in mind and, in his reasons, made numerous references to the clinical findings in that report. While he did speculate on the cause of her depression ultimately he said this:

... her emotional stress is only a factor as it relates to sentencing as it offers no explanation or excuse for the offence of tax avoidance or tax evasion.

[31] The long and the short of all of these reasons is that he did consider the expert's report and her emotional distress in reaching a conclusion on an appropriate sentence. The issue of the previous good character of both Joe and Darlene Rinas and the materials bearing on this issue were squarely before him and he took them into account and his reasons reflect that he did so.

[32] Accordingly, there is no error made out on this ground.

Issue 4 - Alleged failure to consider the totality principle

[33] The totality principle ensures that the cumulative sentence of an offender ordered to serve consecutive sentences for multiple offences does not exceed the overall culpability of the offender. The aggregate sentence must be just and appropriate.

[34] Here each of the parties were convicted as a separate offender for separate offences. The totality principle does not apply to reduce the cumulative sentence of separate offenders. The Corporation was convicted in relation to tax evaded on specific corporate T2 income tax returns and G.S.T. returns. Joe and Darlene Rinas were convicted in relation to tax evaded on their individual and personal income tax returns. Those returns had nothing to do with the Corporation, they were personal returns which they had falsified. In the result, the totality principle does not apply to reduce the cumulative sentence of separate offenders and no error was committed by the sentencing Judge in respect to the application of the totality principle.

Digitized by Google

Issue 5 - Were the sentences imposed demonstrably unfit?

[35] In reviewing the appropriateness of the sentences imposed here I must examine whether the purpose and principles of sentencing as set out in s. 718.2 of the Criminal Code of Canada were respected, the nature of the offences committed and the personal circumstances of the offenders. In addition, I must examine the fitness of a sentence for a particular offender in relation to all aggravating and mitigating factors considered by the sentencing Judge. To ensure just proportion, "a sentence should be similar to sentences imposed on similar offenders for similar offences committed in similar situations."

[36] The paramount sentencing principles which must be considered when sentencing for tax evasion offences are denunciation and deterrence. As was stated in R.* v. *J.I.L.M. Enterprises and Investments Ltd., [2004] G.S.T. C. 20 at paras. 29 and 30:

The Canadian taxation system relies on self-reporting by taxpayers. The honesty and integrity of those taxpayers is critical to the assessment and collection of taxes. In any self-reporting system, there will be a temptation to take advantage of the system for financial gain.

The sentencing provision of the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act proscribe a significant penalty that will denounce such conduct and deter not only the offender, but others who would behave in a like fashion.

[37] I have considered the summaries of the facts of the following cases which were referred to by counsel for the Respondent, namely R.* v. Sawatsky, also known as Florence Elizabeth McLeod (24 February 2005), Vancouver 132641-1 (B.C. Prov. Ct.), R. v. Schatz, Information and Endorsements (March 8, 2005 in Alberta Provincial Court - no transcript available), R. v. Poon, Information and Endorsements (April 18, 2005 in Alberta Provincial Court - no transcript available), R. v. Boule, Certificate of Conviction (September 4, 2007 in Alberta Provincial Court -no transcript available), Re Hanna, [2005] BCPC 240, and R. v. *Brown, [2003] BCPC 537.

[38] A review of these summaries provides some guidance as to the type and range of sentences to be imposed intax evasion cases in Canada, including the imposition of terms of probation and conditional sentence orders. The application of the principles of denunciation and deterrence underlies all of these decisions.

[39] I agree with the Respondent that there were a number of aggravating factors which weighed in favour of the imposition of a greater punishment in this case and those factors include:

The tax evasion schemes were planned and deliberate and involved all of the Appellants. The schemes were not impulsive or isolated and required some time to arrange in an effort to avoid detection. (R.* v. *Bracegirdle, [2004] A.J. No. 827 at para. 40 (Alta. C.A.)).

The offences were of a continuing nature over 3 years and involved the filing of 14 tax returns, all of which included false statements. There was a conscious and deliberate choice to engage in serious misconduct by all of the Appellants.

The commission of the offences conferred a personal benefit on the individual Appellants through payment of a number of their personal expenses. The schemes resulted in the evasion of over $66,000.00 in tax by all three of the Appellants and these factors heighten the gravity of the offence. (R.* v. *Whale, [2005] O.J. No. 3946 at para. 15 (Ont. Ct. Jus.)).

The evasion of the excise tax by the Corporation, a registered collector of G.S.T., equates to a breach of trust. Once collected G.S.T. is to be remitted to the

Digitized by Google

C.R.A. and upon collection is impressed with a trust to that effect. Therefore, failure to remit G.S.T. collected amounts to a breach of trust. This factor is aggravating as the administration of justice depends upon fidelity and honesty by those in positions of trust. (R.* v. Onkar Travels Inc.,[2003] O.J. No. 2939 at paras. 18-20, 34 (Ont. S. Ct.) and R. v.*McIvor, 1996 ABCA 154 (CanLII), (1996), 106 C.C.C. (3d) 285 at p. 2 (Alta. C.A.)).

[40] It is the Respondent's position that the only mitigating factor to be considered is the payment by the Appellant of their civil assessments provided to them by the C.R.A.

[41] Upon a review of the reasons of the sentencing Judge it is apparent that he was aware of all mitigating factors, including the payment by the Appellants of their civil assessments. In addition, the sentencing Judge also took into account the prior good character and absence of any criminal record on the part of the individual Appellants. All appropriate mitigating factors were taken into account by the sentencing Judge.

[42] Considering the nature and gravity of the offences committed by all of the Appellants over several years, the paramount sentencing principles and the aggravating and mitigating factors, it is my view that the sentences imposed were fit, proper and not outside the range of sentences for similar offences.

Disposition

[43] All of the sentence appeals are dismissed. The sentences imposed by the sentencing Judge are confirmed and shall commence as of the date of this judgment.

Heard on the 17th day of January, 2008.

Dated at the City of Edmonton, Alberta this 22nd day of January, 2009.

D.R.G. Thomas J.C.Q.B.A.

R. v. Leo-Mensah, 2010 ONCA 139 (CanLII), 2010-02-24, Too Light a Sentence for Considerable Tax Evasion Appealed and Granted

[1] Mr. Leo-Mensah operated a business through which he, or those whom he employed, prepared and submitted his clients' income tax returns. As part of the tax services that he provided, Mr. Leo-Mensah provided false charitable donation receipts to his clients. He either submitted the receipts to the CRA upon request or provided them to his clients.

[2] In 2003, 2004 and 2005, he submitted 801 tax returns claiming approximately $11.7 million in false charitable donations. As a result of these false claims, tax refunds in the amount of approximately $3.28 million were paid out by the CRA to Mr. Leo-Mensah's clients.

[3] Mr. Leo-Mensah failed to report the income that he derived from his fraudulent activity. As a result, he evaded income tax of $42,457.00 in 2004 and $103,309.00 in 2005. He failed to file an income tax return for 2006.

[4] Mr. Leo-Mensah pleaded guilty to one count of fraud (Criminal Code, s. 380(1)(a)) and two counts of income tax evasion (Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1, s. 239(1)(d)). After being given credit on a two-for-one basis for 11 months of pretrial custody, he was sentenced to one day in jail and fined $145,766.00, concurrent on all charges (the "global fine").

Digitized by Google

[5] The Crown seeks leave to appeal sentence and, if leave is granted, asks that the sentence be increased. It argues that the sentence imposed was manifestly unfit given the seriousness of the offences.
[6] Mr. Leo-Mensah responds by arguing that he was not the mastermind behind the scheme, that others participated in it and should be held accountable, and that he was duped by pastors into believing that the scheme resulted in money being given to needy children in Africa.
[7] For the reasons that follow, I would grant leave to appeal and allow the appeal.

ANALYSIS
[8] In my view, the sentencing judge erred in three respects.
[9] First, it appears that she failed to consider, as an aggravating factor, that the value of the fraud committed exceeded $1,000,000. This she was obliged to do pursuant to s. 380.1(1)(a) of the Criminal Code.
[10] Second, the sentencing judge appears to have placed significant emphasis on Mr. Leo-Mensah's childcare obligations when determining his sentence. She likened his circumstances to those of the accused in R. v. Pierce 1997 CanLII 3020 (ON CA), (1997), 32 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [1997] 3 S.C.R. xiii. Unlike the situation in Pierce, however, in the present case there was no evidence before the court on the extent of the respondent's childcare obligations. At the time of his arrest, the respondent was separated from his spouse and his four children continued to live with their mother.
[11] Third, given the magnitude of the fraud, the breach of trust, blatant abuse of the charitable donations scheme under the Income Tax Act and Mr. Leo-Mensah's pivotal role in the scam, the sentence imposed falls below the range that has been established by this court for large-scale fraud cases. The amount and duration of the fraud perpetrated by the respondent is significant, amounting to almost $3.28 million over a three-year period and involving hundreds of fraudulent tax returns. In v. Bogart* 2002 CanLII 41073 (ON CA), (2002), 61 O.R. (3d) 75 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [2003] 1 S.C.R. vi, this court established that a penitentiary sentence is the norm, not the exception, in cases of large-scale fraud and in which there are no extraordinary mitigating circumstances.
[12] I would note, as well, that in accordance with R. v. Ward reflex, (1980), 56 C.C.C. (2d) 15 (Ont. C.A.), separate fines are to be imposed for each offence and such fines are not to be made concurrent.
[13] It will be apparent that I do not accept that Mr. Leo-Mensah was but a dupe in this matter. The sentencing judge found that he planned and organized the scheme in order to defraud the government of Canada. She stated that Mr. Leo-Mensah "was the instigator and the primary participant in this scheme and his degree of moral culpability or responsibility for the offences is very high".
[14] I see no reason to interfere with these findings. If there are other people who participated in the fraudulent activity, the respondent is free to provide that information to the authorities who may take legal action against them. The fact that others may also be guilty of offences does not diminish the respondent's culpability, however. There is an inadequate record to determine the veracity of the respondent's claim that he was motivated by a desire to help needy children in Africa. Assuming that to be the case, however, it does not justify or excuse the wrongdoing that he committed.

Digitized by Google

[15] While this court has been reluctant to re-incarcerate an offender who has served the sentence originally imposed and been released into the community, reincarceration is warranted where the original sentence was so far below that which was required that the interests of justice require the court intervene: see R. v. D.G.F., 2010 ONCA 27 (CanLII), 2010 ONCA 27 at paras. 33-34. In my view, this is such a case and a period of reincarceration is necessary.

DISPOSITION
[16] Accordingly, I would grant leave to appeal sentence and allow the appeal. I would sentence the respondent to a further two year period of incarceration and substitute for the global fine, separate fines for each of the two income tax offences, namely, a fine of $42,457.00 for the conviction for income tax evasion in 2004 and a fine of $103,309.00 for the conviction for income tax evasion in 2005.
RELEASED: February 24, 2010 (“E.E.G.”)

“E.E. Gillese J.A.”
“I agree K.M. Weiler J.A.”
“I agree J. MacFarland J.A.”

Her Majesty The Queen v. Norman Jurchison et al, 2001 FCA 126, Discoverability on Charter-Excluded Evidence for Civil Penalties

SEXTON J.A.REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

The individual respondent, Norman Jurchison is the principal shareholder and operator of the corporate respondent, Norway Insulation Inc. In 1991, during a routine audit, a Revenue Canada auditor discovered what he believed to be evidence that both taxpayers had unreported income for the 1990 taxation year and that offences under the Income Tax Act might have been committed. The auditor referred the file to the Special Investigations Unit. Following a preliminary review, the SIU referred the matter back to the Audit Section with requests for further information. This information formed the basis upon which a number of search warrants were obtained and searches conducted. Eventually, the taxpayers were reassessed for unreported income in the 1990 taxation year and charged with tax evasion under the Income Tax Act.
The criminal charges came before the courts first. Prior to the commencement of the trial, the taxpayers brought applications for the exclusion of evidence, alleging breaches of s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Whetung J. of the Ontario Court (Provincial Division) held that Mr. Jurchison's right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure had been infringed by the additional investigation by the Audit Section. He excluded the evidence obtained by the additional investigation for the purposes of the criminal trial and quashed the search warrants. In the result, the taxpayers were acquitted, although it is not clear whether any of the evidence developed in the initial audit was placed before the Court or not. The Crown's appeal was dismissed by the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division). The reasons for judgment in those Courts do not clearly set out the nature of the evidence obtained in breach of the Charter.

Digitized by Google

The current appeals arise out of preliminary motions brought in the taxpayers' appeals of their reassessments. The taxpayers brought motions under Rule 58 of the Tax Court of Canada Rules (General Procedure), which allows the Court to determine a question of law raised by a pleading in a proceeding where the determination of the question may lead to more efficient use of the Court's resources. They relied upon the Charter rulings of Whetung J. upheld on appeal by La Forme J. and moved for orders vacating the reassessments or, in the alternative, excluding the evidence collected following the initial audit. The Crown brought motions for orders compelling Mr. Jurchison to attend for discovery with respect to both appeals.

The Tax Court Judge considered the motions together. He held that he could entertain the taxpayers' motions under Rule 58. On the basis of the reasons for judgment of the Ontario Courts, he concluded that the evidence tainted by the breaches to Mr._Jurchison's Charter rights should be excluded. He refused, however, to vacate the reassessments entirely, noting that there remained untainted evidence developed from the initial audit that might support Revenue Canada's assessment. Under the circumstances, he held that the usual presumption at trial that the reassessments were correct was no longer appropriate and ordered that the onus be placed on the Crown to establish their validity.

With respect to the Crown's motions to compel Mr. Jurchison to attend for discovery, the Tax Court Judge held that:

... an examination of Mr. Jurchison would almost certainly have the result of compelling him to respond to a line of inquiry whose genesis lies in inadmissible evidence ... that evidence would be a road map to guide the examination of Mr. Jurchison.

He ordered that Mr. Jurchison was not to be examined for discovery.

The various appeals and cross-appeals to this Court can be divided into two areas: First, the Crown appeals the orders excluding the evidence of all but the initial audit. The taxpayers cross-appeal, arguing that the judge below erred in not going further and vacating the assessments. Second, the Crown appeals from the Tax Court Judge's order that Mr Jurchison not be examined for discovery. I will deal with the two areas in sequence.

The issue of the admissibility of evidence and the impact of this evidence upon the validity of the reassessments came before the Court on the motions of the taxpayers. As I have noted above, these motions were brought under Rule 58 of the General Procedure. The relevant portion of the Rule reads as follows:

58(1): A party may apply to the Court, for the determination, before hearing, of a question of law raised by a pleading in a proceeding where the determination of the question may dispose of all or part of the proceeding, substantially shorten the hearing or result in a substantial saving of costs ...

There are certainly sound policy reasons for the existence of this rule. However, as the Tax Court noted in Carma Developers Ltd. v. The Queen, 96 D.T.C. 1803, the Rule "is not intended as an easily accessible alternative to a trial for the disposition of complex and contentious disputes about the rights and liabilities of litigants." Thus, the rule is only applicable if a number of conditions are met. Of specific relevance to this case is the requirement that the question of law to be determined be one that is raised by the pleadings.

In the case at bar, the Tax Court judge below found that "The Charter violation and its consequences are not referred to in the notices of appeal in either of [the] appeals" before him. Nor were those issues raised in the Crown's replies. Even so, he decided to deal with the motions. In doing so, he erred. The questions were not raised by the pleadings of either party. As a result, he was without authority to determine them pursuant to Rule 58.

Digitized by Google

Normally, the admissibility of evidence is a matter best left to the Trial Judge who, having all the circumstances and evidence before him can make the most informed decision. Of course, there are situations such as that before Bowman J. in O'Neill Motors Ltd. v. The Queen, 96 D.T.C. 1486, which particularly lend themselves to such determination before trial. It must be kept in mind, however, that in that case, the question to be determined came before the Court by agreement of the parties under s. 173 of the Income Tax Act which provides for determination of questions of law, fact or mixed law and fact upon agreement between the Minister and the taxpayer. Unlike the present case, there was an agreed statement of fact by the parties.

It is necessary in deciding whether the evidence obtained in breach of the taxpayers' Charter rights in the present case is admissible, to consider the different standards for search and seizure for the purposes of criminal prosecution and for the purpose of civil enforcement of the Income Tax Act as set forth by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. McKinlay Transport, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627. It is conceivable that the evidence might be inadmissible for purposes of a criminal prosecution, but admissible for purposes of a civil trial. See Donovan v. The Queen, [2000] 4 F.C. 373 (C.A.). Such a determination would require an examination of the impugned evidence and the method by which it was obtained, an inquiry into the seriousness of any Charter breach and a consideration of whether the evidence was already in possession of the Crown or would have been discovered in any event. See R. v. Stillman, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 607 at 664. It would appear impossible to make such a determination in the absence of a factual base. In the present case, there is no agreement between the parties as to the relevant facts.

Thus, I would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal with respect to the motions brought under Rule 58. The questions regarding the admissibility of evidence and upon whom the onus rests with respect to the validity of the assessments are to be left to the judge hearing the appeals of the reassessments.

I would, however, express the view that, in any event, the Tax Court Judge did not err in refusing to vacate the assessments entirely, correctly noting that the Crown was to be given the opportunity to make its case with the untainted evidence collected by the initial audit.

I turn now to the Crown's appeal of the Order disallowing the examination for discovery of Mr. Jurchison. The material in the record before us, including the judgments with respect to the tax evasion charges, demonstrates the strong possibility that the judge in the reassessment appeal may exclude at least some of the evidence collected by Revenue Canada auditors and investigators. It is impossible to know at this point exactly what that evidence might be. The details of the evidence obtained in breach of the taxpayers' rights is not before us, nor is the evidence which the Crown already had in its possession. It may well be that certain questions on discovery could be seen to have a genesis in the evidence taken in breach of the taxpayers' rights. However, until such questions are asked no such determination can be made. The Crown has the right to discovery and this right should not lightly be extinguished. In my view, it is preferable to allow the discovery to proceed with the taxpayer being given the right to object to any questions which are felt to have their genesis in the impugned evidence. Then a Motions Judge will be in a better position to assess the propriety of the question.

Digitized by Google

It is worth noting that counsel for the taxpayer had indicated in a letter to the Crown, prior to the hearing of the motions in question, that he was prepared to have his client examined for discovery in the event he failed in his Rule 58 motion. Thus, the Crown did not call the evidence it might have in order to meet a claim that the Crown had lost its right to discovery because of a Charter breach. In these circumstances, it would be unfair to deprive the Crown of its right to discovery.

Therefore, I would allow the Crown's appeal with respect to the order that Mr. Jurchison not be examined for discovery subject to the right of the taxpayer to object to any questions which are felt to have their genesis in evidence if taken in breach of their Charter rights.

It is clear that the Tax Court Judge had the highest of motives in disposing of the case as he did. As case management judge, he was concerned about unnecessary delays and obviously wished to have settled before trial some very contentious issues. These are laudable motives and it may well be that in the end that the Trial Judge will consider that the remedies imposed by the Tax Court Judge were appropriate. We do not want to be taken as expressing any view to the effect that the taxpayer does not have a legitimate complaint with respect to breach of his Charter rights.

In the result, the appeal with respect to the motions brought under Rule 58 is allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed. The appeal with respect to the order that Mr. Jurchison not be examined for discovery is allowed. The Crown will have one set of costs for these appeals.

"J. E. Sexton" J.A.

George Alexander Madraga v. Her Majesty The Queen In Right Of Canada, 2001 SKQB 53, Non-Payment of Fine Leads to Committal with Consideration

Milliken J.

[1] This is an appeal by George Alexander Madraga of the order of His Honour Judge H. W. Goliath made on February 18, 2000, that Warrants of Committal under s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-46, should issue for the failure of Madraga to pay two fines levied under the provisions of s. 239.1 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.); and also an appeal of Goliath P.C.J.'s refusal to exercise his discretion under s. 734.3 of the Criminal Code to change the terms of the order made by His Honour Judge R. C. Finley on March 14, 1996, in which Finley, P.C.J. ordered that Madraga in respect to count 1 in Information 43981013 pay a fine of $72,700 with a default of 18 months if the fine was not paid by April 15, 1996, with the right to apply for payment by installments if no appeal was taken and in respect to count 5 of the Information to a fine of $18,700, to be paid by April 15, 1996, with a default of 18 months, consecutive to the default under count 1 with a right to apply for payment by installments if no appeal was taken.

[2] An appeal was taken of both the conviction and the sentence but the appeal was dismissed for want of prosecution on November 25, 1997, and no application was made for payment by installments of either fine to the Provincial Court.

[3] An application was made by the Crown on February 23, 1999, under the provisions of s.734.7 of the Criminal Code, to Provincial Court at Prince Albert for issuance of warrants of committal for default of payment of the fines imposed.

Digitized by Google

[4] Counsel for Madraga, before Goliath, P.C.J. contended that the Crown had not complied with the provisions of s. 734.5 and s. 734.6 of the Criminal Code, therefore warrants of committal should not be issued. In the alternative counsel for Madraga requested that the Provincial Court Judge under the provisions of s.734.3 change the default provision from incarceration in jail to a conditional sentence under the provisions of s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code, and if this was not possible then to reduce the 18 month default period, and the consecutive requirement to conform with other default time sentences imposed under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.).

[5] The Crown submitted evidence by an affidavit filed by Ellen Griffin that after Madraga's appeal had been dismissed for want of prosecution on November 27, 1997, that a demand letter was sent to him on February 27, 1998, demanding payment of the outstanding fine. That on October 14, 1998, certificates of convictions were registered in the Court of Queen's Bench Judicial Centre of Prince Albert and writs of execution were issued on October 19, 1998.

[6] Madraga testified before Judge Goliath, on June 11, 1999, at which time Madraga stated he had started business in 1986 under the name of Madraga's Deals on Wheels which later was incorporated under the name of Madraga Distributors Ltd. with Madraga and his uncle, Stanley, as shareholders. The business operated at civic address 4189 2nd Avenue West, in Prince Albert and was involved in the sale of recreational vehicles and used cars. In 1993 Madraga and his uncle got into a dispute and Madraga bought out Stanley Madraga for $35,485. The land upon which Madraga Distributors operated was owned by Madraga's father, George Madraga Sr. The buildings and inventory were owned by the company.

[7] Madraga stated the reason the appeal of his conviction under the Income Tax Act was not carried through was that he could not pay the costs of the transcripts in the amount of $20,000.

[8] Madraga stated that he had separated from his wife in 1995 and he had been ordered to pay her $1,000 per month for support and $750 per month support for his daughter on September 26, 1996, which amounts he is still paying each month.

[9] Madraga stated he had been sued by his uncle after the conviction under the Income Tax Act in March of 1996 and his father George Madraga Sr. paid out Stanley Madraga and obtained a judgment against Madraga for $40,502 and against Madraga Distributors for $121,955.

[10] Madraga continued to operate Madraga Distributors until October, 1997, at which time he sold the buildings to his father for $150,000 and Madraga sold the inventory to 620357 Saskatchewan Ltd., a company owned by his father. Madraga stated the monies received by the company were used to pay off creditors, other than Revenue Canada. It appears that the value of the inventory was $185,000.

[11] In March of 1998, Madraga sold all his farm lands to his father for $326,934.00, in the agreement Madraga acknowledges he owes his father a total of $185,000 which reduced the balance owing to $141,934, which was to be paid off in ten installments commencing April 1st, 1999, with interest at 7.8%.

[12] In July of 1998, Madraga voluntarily filed an assignment in bankruptcy showing the only assets as $276,932 and his debts at $671,057.00. Which debts were in respect to income tax payable and his fines owing to the Crown. Madraga was discharged from bankruptcy

Digitized by Google

in April, 1999.
[13] Madraga stated his monthly income is $3500 and has been since he sold the inventory and building to his father. Madraga acts as a sales person for his father's company and his daughter, Carrie, is the general manager.
[14] Madraga stated he did not believe he had evaded any income tax and if he had the funds he would pay the fines rather than going to jail.
[15] Madraga stated that he had made no attempt to work off the fines as he was working six days a week and he had no time available to work off his fines.
[16] Section 734.7(1) of the Criminal Code which states as follows: 734.7 (1) Warrant of Committal -- Where time has been allowed for payment of a fine, the court shall not issue a warrant of committal in default of payment of the fine (a) until the expiration of the time allowed for payment of the fine in full; and (b) unless the court is satisfied (i) that the mechanisms provided by sections 734.5 and 734.6 are not appropriate in the circumstances, or (ii) that the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736.
[17] Judge Goliath in his judgment decided that in view of the fact Madraga had devised himself of all his assets and gone bankrupt, he had wilfully without a reasonable excuse refused to pay fines and therefore the mechanisms provided under s. 734.5 and 734.6 were not appropriate in the circumstances to collect the fines.
[18] It is clear from a reading of the transcript of Madraga's testimony before Judge Goliath that Madraga feels no remorse for the taxation evasion for which he has been found guilty.
[19] In my opinion the only conclusion that can reasonably be drawn from Madraga's actions is that he has without reasonable excuse refused to pay the fines, which in my opinion i s sufficient under the provisions of
s. 734.7(1) (ii) to allow an order for the issuing of a warrant of committal under s. 734.7 as the time for payment has expired and therefore the appeal, in respect to issuing of warrants of committal, is dismissed. [20] Now in respect to the appeal from the ruling of Goliath, P.C.J. that he did not have the jurisdiction under to change the terms of the order of Finley, P.C.J. of March 14, 1996, and his refusal to make any order under s.734.3 [21] Judge Goliath in his judgment held that Madraga was not fined under section 734.1 as this section was not in force in March of 1996, and that s. 734.3 cannot refer to changes to periods of imprisonment since the fine orders under the new regime do not contain default sentences. Judge Goliath also held that while a sentence of imprisonment which was imposed prior to the coming into force of the new sentencing provisions, may be varied on appeal, to be served in the community. However, in his opinion, a judge of the same court cannot deal with the matter as it is tantamount to an appeal of the sentence.
[22] The applicable sections of the Criminal Code are as follows:
734.(1) Power of court to impose fine -- Subject to subsection (2), a court that convicts a person, other than a corporation, of an offence may fine the offender by making an order under section 734.1
if the punishment for the offence does not include a minimum term of imprisonment, in addition to or in lieu of any other sanction that the court is authorized to impose; or if the punishment for the offence includes a minimum term of imprisonment, in addition to any other sanction that the court is required or authorized to impose.
Offender's ability to pay -- Except when the punishment for an offence includes a minimum fine or a fine is imposed in lieu of a forfeiture order, a court may fine an offender under this section only if the court is satisfied that the offender is able to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736.

Digitized by Google

Meaning of default of payment -- For the purposes of this section and sections 734.1 to 737, a person is in default of payment of a fine if the fine has not been paid in full by the time set out in the order made under section 734.1.

Imprisonment in default of payment -- Where an offender is fined under this section, a term of imprisonment, determined in accordance with subsection (5), shall be deemed to be imposed in default of payment of the fine.

Determination of term -- The length, in days, of the term of imprisonment referred to in subsection (4) is the lesser of a fraction, rounded down to the nearest whole number, of which the numerator is the unpaid amount of the fine plus the costs and charges of committing and conveying the defaulter to prison, calculated in accordance with regulations made under subsection (7), and the denominator is equal to eight times the provincial minimum hourly wage, at the time of default, in the province in which the fine was imposed, and the maximum term of imprisonment, expressed in days, that the court could itself impose on conviction. . . .

Application to other law -- This section and sections 734.1 to 734.8 and 736 apply to a fine imposed under any Act of Parliament, except that subsections (4) and (5) do not apply if the term of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine provided for in that Act or regulation is calculated by a different method; or specified, either as a minimum or a maximum.

Terms of order imposing fine -- A court that fines an offender under section 734 shall do so by making an order that clearly sets out the amount of fine;

the manner in which the fine is to be paid;

the time or times by which the fine, or any portion thereof, must be paid; and such other terms respecting the payment of the fine as the court deems appropriate. . ..

734.3 Change in terms of order -- A court that makes an order under section 734.1, or a person designated, either by name or by title of office, by that court, may, on application by or on behalf of the offender, subject to any rules made by the court under section 482, change any term of the order except the amount of the fine, and any reference in this section and sections 734, 734.1, 734.2, and 734.6 to an order shall be read as including a reference to the order as changed pursuant to this section. . . .

734.8(2) Reduction of imprisonment on part payment -- The term of imprisonment in default of payment of fine shall, on payment of a part of the penalty, whether the payment was made before or after the execution of a warrant of committal, be reduced by the number of days that bears the same proportion to the number of days in the term as the part paid bears to the total penalty.

[23] It is my opinion that section 734 clearly replaces 718 of the Criminal Code which section was in force in March of 1996, and that section 734 provides under 734(8) that s. 734 and s. 734.1 to 734.8 and 736 apply to a fine imposed under any Act of Parliament, except that subsections (4) and (5) do not apply if the term of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine provided for in that Act is calculated by a different method, or specified, either as a minimum or maximum.

[24] Section 734.3 allows the court which imposed a fine to change any terms of the order except the amount of the fine. In my opinion Goliath, P.C.J. erred in law by refusing to consider any changes to the terms of Judge Finley's order. There were two requests made by Madraga that Goliath, P.C.J. failed to consider, firstly, the request to change the period of imprisonment to a conditional sentence under s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code; secondly, the request to change the period of imprisonment from 18 months to a lesser amount on the basis that a period of 36 months imprisonment for the non-payment of fines totalling $81,400 was well beyond the range of defaults for offences under s.239.1 of the Income Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

[25] Now dealing firstly with the request to have the default changed to a conditional sentence to be served in the community under s.742.1. The cases seem to indicate that when a time to pay a fine is given, that a conditional sentence cannot be used for a period of default. (See: R. v. Savard, (Qué. C.A.) 500-10-001619-996, September 14, 2000; R. v. Lazare [2000] Q.J. No. 4701; and R. v. Noseworthy [2000] N.J. No. 255.

[26] Even if a conditional sentence could be substituted for default of imprisonment, I am of the view in this case that the actions of Madraga, since the fines were imposed, are a deliberate attempt to deplete his resources so that he is unable to pay any of the fines, such behaviour must be taken into consideration by the courts and therefore a term of imprisonment upon default of payment of the fines is necessary.

[27] I have reviewed the material submitted to me by counsel and I come to the conclusion that the default imposed of 18 months consecutive is beyond the range of defaults for offences under the Income Tax Act. A default in respect to both fines should, in my view, in total equal 12 months. (See: Regina, v. Artinian, (1995) 26 (O.R.) 640). While I could send the matter of the 734.3 order back to the Provincial Court, I have decided that I have the power to make such and order and I therefore order that the order of Finley, P.C.J. in respect to the default in respect to both counts, be changed as follows:

Count 1 a fine of $62,700 to be paid by April 15, 1996, in default of payment 9 months consecutive to count 5;

Count 5 a fine of $18,700 to be paid by April 15, 1996, in default of payment 3 months consecutive to count 1.

[28] I would like to point out that the Certificate of Conviction issued in 1998 does not comply with the wording of the offences contained in counts 1 and 5. Those counts were amended at trial, and the wording of the certificates does not comply with the finding of the trial judge as contained in his judgment date March 14, 1996, nor does it comply with the amendments as shown on the Information.

[29] I would also like to point out the material before me indicates that Revenue Canada has received the sum of $8,911.70 from Madraga's trustee in bankruptcy and this amount I find should be allocated to payment of the fines and therefore the period of default should be reduced under the provisions of s.734.8(2) of the Criminal Code.

J.

THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN, 2001 SKCA 98,

CAMERON J.A. (Orally)

[1] Following a lengthy trial in early 1996, George Madraga was convicted of two counts of income tax evasion, contrary to section 239 of the Income Tax Act. In consequence he was fined $62,000 in relation to the first count, and $18,700 in relation to the second. The trial judge went on to impose a term of imprisonment of 18 months in default of payment of each of the fines. Mr. Madraga then appealed, appealing his conviction and sentence, but abandoned his appeal a year and a half later.

Digitized by Google

[2] In the meantime, he did not pay the fines. Nor did he do so for several months after that, prompting the Crown to attempt to collect them. During its attempts Mr. Madraga declared bankruptcy, and the Crown, while ultimately recovering $8,911.70 toward outstanding taxes (amounting by then to some $500,000), failed to collect the fines. Mr. Madraga, it was later found, had simply refused to pay them.

[3] Having failed in its attempts to collect the fines, the Crown then applied in early 1999 for a warrant of committal pursuant to section 734 of the Criminal Code. Mr. Madraga opposed the application, and following a hearing which extended over several months, His Honour Judge H.W. Goliath, decided to issue the warrant. In doing so, he declined to alter the sentences imposed by the trial judge, either by varying the amount of the fines or by reducing the periods of imprisonment in default of payment. Neither he, nor the trial judge, it might be noted, were much impressed by Mr. Madraga. He was taken to have been calculating and manipulative.

[4] Mr. Madraga then appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench. The appeal was heard by Mr. Justice Milliken, who decided to alter the sentences by reducing the periods of imprisonment in default of payment of the fines, reducing the periods to nine months in the case of the first, and three months in the case of the second. In addition, he directed that the sum of $8,911.70 recovered by the Crown in the bankruptcy proceedings be allocated toward payment of the fines. The effect was to reduce the total amount of the fines to $71,788.70.

[5] The Crown then sought leave to appeal to this Court, contending as a matter of law that Milliken J. was not empowered to so alter the sentences and, even if he was, that no tenable basis for the exercise of such power existed. Mr. Madraga cross-appealed, taking issue with a number of findings of fact or of mixed fact and law. In the meantime, Mr. Madraga paid the fines in the reduced amount of $71,788.70.

[6] This is but a mere sketch of the circumstances underlying the matter, but it will suffice for the purposes at hand.

[7] We may say at the outset that we are persuaded to grant the Crown's application for leave to appeal, as raising qualifying questions of law, but not that of Mr. Madraga. His proposed grounds of appeal, as set forth in his notice of appeal, are largely factual in nature and in our view do not qualify for, or warrant, leave to appeal.

[8] Turning, then, to the Crown's appeal, we are all of the opinion Milliken J. erred in altering the sentences as he did. Even if he had the power to vary the terms of imprisonment imposed in default of payment of the fines, which is highly doubtful, there was, in our judgment, no tenable basis for doing so. Neither the amount of the fines, nor the periods of imprisonment in default exceeded the powers of the trial judge. They fell within the scope of his power, which constituted a discretionary power of punishment. And he exercised that power with the advantage—a concrete and distinct advantage in the circumstances of this case—of having presided over a lengthy trial during which he had the opportunity of hearing and seeing from all concerned, including Mr. Madraga. In exercising his power, including his power to prescribe periods of imprisonment in default of payment of the fines, he was no doubt moved by the scale and nature of the accused's evasion of tax. To second guess him, in the circumstances of this case, was to interfere with the exercise of his discretion without an adequate basis in law or fact to do so.

[9] Moreover, Mr. Madraga had appealled the sentence, as well as his conviction, immediately following its imposition, only to later abandon the appeal. That being so, it was as though the proceedings in the Queen's Bench were treated as a revival of that appeal, long after it lay dead.

Digitized by Google

[10] In making the order he did, Mr. Justice Milliken not only varied the periods of imprisonment in the event of default in the payment of the fines, he effectively varied the amount of the fines by allocating the amount of outstanding tax recovered in the bankruptcy proceedings toward the payment of the fines. This was misconceived, in the sense the tax owing was one thing, the fines quite another. More importantly, perhaps, this was beyond the power of the Court. There is no power in the Court in proceedings under section 734 of the Criminal Code to alter the amount of a fine. Indeed this is expressly prohibited.

[11] For essentially these reasons, then, we have decided to allow the Crown's appeal and to set aside the order made in the Court of Queen's Bench.

[12] We may add in closing that, even though we have denied leave to appeal in relation to the cross- appeal, we considered the one question of law that was raised in the notice of appeal, namely that Milliken J. erred in finding that he had no authority in law to substitute a conditional sentence for that imposed in the first instance. In fact, Milliken J. did not decide this issue on that basis. He made it clear that even if empowered to do so, he would not turn the sentence into a conditional one in light of all of the circumstances.

Her Majesty The Queen v. Yu Wu, Court Of Appeal For Ontario C35987, 2001 12 12, Imprisonment on Inability to Pay Fine (Excise Act) – Certain Considerations

On appeal from the order of Justice Cheryl Robertson dated February 16, 2001, dismissing a summary conviction appeal from the sentence imposed by Judge Gilles Renaud dated March 9, 2000.

SHARPE J.A.:

[1] The respondent was convicted of possession of contraband tobacco contrary to s. 240(1) of the Excise Act, R.S. 1985, c. E-14. Parliament has prescribed a minimum fine for this offence. The trial judge imposed the minimum fine, in this case $9,600, gave the appellant no time to pay the fine, and imposed a 75-day conditional sentence in default of payment. The Crown's summary conviction appeal against the sentence was dismissed. The Crown seeks leave to appeal and, if leave is granted, appeals the sentence on the ground that a conditional sentence is not available in default of payment of a fine.

FACTS

[2] After a three-day trial, the respondent was convicted of possessing 300 cartons of contraband tobacco contrary to the Excise Act, s. 240(1). The trial judge sentenced the respondent to the minimum fine calculated pursuant to s. 240(1.1) and totalling $9,600. Although no evidence was called at the sentencing stage concerning the respondent's ability to pay the fine, the trial judge found that the respondent did not have sufficient means to pay it. The respondent had testified during the trial that he was unemployed due to an injury, that he received $965.00 a month in benefits, and that he was responsible for the support of his sixteen year-old daughter.

[3] In his reasons for sentence, the trial judge stated that but for the minimum fine, he would have imposed a suspended sentence. The respondent, he noted, was "a first offender having been involved in very minimal behaviour." However, in view of the statutory minimum fine, the trial judge held that he had no option but to impose a fine, stating that "that is Parliament's wish and I have to give effect to that wish." The trial judge explicitly regretted the fact that Ontario did not make provision for offenders to "work off" fines and observed that even if he did impose a short custodial sentence, it was likely that the respondent would be released "within a matter of days" due to the limited availability of custodial resources.

Digitized by Google

[4] The trial judge concluded that given the circumstances of the offence and the offender, a custodial sentence was not required and that a conditional sentence would be the appropriate penalty. The respondent, he held, was not a danger to the community. On the other hand, the trial judge felt that the sentence should reflect the fact that the community was "bedevilled" by smuggling, an activity arising from a "criminal undercurrent which attacks our respect for law and order and which attacks the community itself." The trial judge noted that "a conditional sentence with appropriate, severe conditions is a significant deterrent and denunciatory penalty", echoing the words of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61. Accordingly, the trial judge imposed the mandatory fine but gave the respondent no time to pay. In default of payment, the trial judge imposed a 75-day conditional sentence that included house arrest between the hours of 6:00 p.m. and 6:00 a.m. subject to narrowly defined exceptions for employment, medical care or religious observance.

[5] The Crown's appeal to the Superior Court of Justice was dismissed on the ground that the trial judge's disposition of the matter was in accord with the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in R. c. Savard (2000), 38 C.R. (5th) 152, discussed below.

ISSUE

[6] The following issue arises on this appeal:

Is there a discretion to impose a conditional sentence in default of payment of the minimum fine prescribed by s. 240(1) of the Excise Act where no time is provided for payment of the fine?

LEGISLATION

Excise Act, R.S. 1985, c. E-14

Unlawful sale or possession of manufactured tobacco or cigars

240. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), every person who sells or offers for sale or has in the person's possession any manufactured tobacco or cigars, whether manufactured in or imported into Canada, not put up in packages and stamped with tobacco stamps or cigar stamps in accordance with this Act and the ministerial regulations, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of not less than the amount determined under subsection (1.1) and not more than the amount determined under subsection (1.2), or both the fine described in subparagraph (i) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years; or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable to a fine of not less than the amount determined under subsection (1.1) and not more than the lesser of $500,000 and the amount determined under subsection (1.2), or both the fine described in subparagraph (i) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

Digitized by Google

Minimum amount
(1.1) The amount determined under this subsection for an offence under subsection (1) in relation to manufactured tobacco or cigars is the greater of
The total of
$0.16 multiplied by the number of cigarettes, if any, to which the offence relates,
$0.11 multiplied by the number of tobacco sticks, if any, to which the offence relates,
$0.11 multiplied by the number of grams of manufactured tobacco, if any, other than cigarettes or tobacco sticks, to which the offence relates, and
$0.16 multiplied by the number of cigars, if any, to which the offence relates, and
$1,000 in the case of an indictable offence and $500 in the case of an offence punishable on summary conviction.
Maximum amount
(1.2) The amount determined under this subsection for an offence under subsection (1) in relation to manufactured tobacco or cigars is the greater of
The total of
$0.24 multiplied by the number of cigarettes, if any, to which the offence relates,
$0.16 multiplied by the number of tobacco sticks, if any, to which the offence relates,
$0.16 multiplied by the number of grams of manufactured tobacco, if any, other than cigarettes or tobacco sticks, to which the offence relates, and
$0.50 multiplied by the number of cigars, if any, to which the offence relates, and
$1,000 in the case of an indictable offence and $500 in the case of an offence punishable on summary conviction.
…
Imprisonment in default of payment
Where a fine is imposed under subsection (1), a term of imprisonment may be imposed in default of payment of the fine, but no such term shall exceed where the fine is imposed under paragraph (1)(a), five years in addition to any other term of imprisonment imposed on the person under that paragraph; and where the fine is imposed under paragraph (1)(b), two years in addition to any other term of imprisonment imposed on the person under that paragraph.
Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.
Imposing of conditional sentence
Where a person is convicted of an offence, except an offence that is punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment, and the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years, and is satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community and would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing set out in sections 718 to 718.2, the court may, for the purpose of supervising the offender's behaviour in the community, order that the offender serve the sentence in the community, subject to the offender's complying with the conditions of a conditional sentence order made under section 742.3.

ANALYSIS
[7] The Quebec Court of Appeal has considered the use of conditional sentences in default of mandatory minimum fines in three recent decisions. In R. v. Giroux (1999), 141 C.C.C. (3d) 67, the accused was convicted of offences under the Customs Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (2nd Supp.) and under the Excise Act. The mandatory minimum fine of $369,620 was imposed and in default of payment, the accused was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment followed by another six months less a day. The Court allowed a sentence appeal and substituted a conditional sentence pursuant to which the appellant would serve the sentence of imprisonment in default of payment in the community under relatively strict conditions. The Court observed at p. 73 that "while providing for substantial fines, [the legislation] did not provide for minimum sentences in default of payment of those fines." The Court held that a conditional sentence was appropriate as the appellant, who had no criminal record, was "a small cog in the operation" and there appeared to be little danger that he would re-offend.

Digitized by Google

[8] The Quebec Court of Appeal revisited the issue in R c. Savard, supra. There, the accused was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, together with the minimum fine of $967,919. The accused was given 12 months' to pay the fine, and in default of payment, was sentenced to an additional 20 months imprisonment. He appealed the sentence, arguing that both the 18-month term of imprisonment and the 20-month term in default of payment should be changed to a conditional sentence. The appeal was allowed, and given the circumstances of the appellant, the Court substituted a conditional sentence for the 18-month term of imprisonment and set aside the period of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine.

[9] Savard qualified the availability of conditional sentences in default of payment of a fine. Proulx J.A., writing for the Court, referred to a long line of authority holding that where a fine is imposed, the fine is the punishment, not the sentence of imprisonment in default of payment which merely serves as a mode of enforcement of the fine: see Regimbald v. Chong Chow (1925), 38 Que. K.B. 440; R. v. Steeves (1914), 24 C.C.C. 183 (N.B.C.A.); R. v. Tomlinson (1971), 2 C.C.C. (2d) 97 (B.C.S.C.). It followed, held Proulx J.A., that when a court imposes a term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine, it does not actually impose a "sentence of imprisonment" within the meaning of s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code, and accordingly the court does not have the option of imposing a conditional sentence as an alternative to imprisonment. Proulx J.A. thus stated at p. 161 that

> [q]uand le législateur prévoit … une amende minimale, soit-elle exagérée ou non et au-delà les moyens du contrevenant, le tribunal doit considérer le délai de paiement, les modalités et, les cas échéant, la clause d'emprisonnement à défaut de paiement." [1]

[10] Savard distinguished, however, between two classes of conditional sentences in default of payment of a fine: those where the offender is given time to pay the fine and those where the offender is given no time to pay. Proulx J.A. observed that s. 734.7(2) of the Criminal Code allows for "immediate committal" of an offender in default of payment of a fine where no time is given to pay the fine, provided that the court states its reasons for immediate commital. Proulx J.A. noted that the court's reasons for preferring immediate committal were significant, since they directly affected the character of the sentence imposed. In particular, he stated at p. 159 that

> dans la hypothèse où … il apparaîtrait au tribunal que l'inculpé ne pourrait pas acquitter l'amende considérable imposée, il serait difficile de considérer que l'imprisonnement ordonné à défaut de paiement soit « une mesure incitative de paiement »: dans la réalité des choses, cet imprisonnement constituterait la « peine » infligée. [2]

[11] Proulx J.A. held that since in these circumstances the decision not to give an offender any time to pay a fine amounts to an immediate sentence of imprisonment, the availability of a conditional sentence under s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code had to be considered. As Proulx J.A. stated at p. 163:

Digitized by Google

Il me paraîtrait conforme au principe général d'interprétation des lois … que cette periode d'incarcération immédiate à laquelle est condamné le delinquant incapable de payer, puisse être couverte par l'art. 742.1 C.cr: il ne serait pas contraire aux principes directeurs de la détermination de la peine que la personne condamnée de fait à l'emprisonnement puisse bénéficier de cette mesure. [3]
[12] He thus held that R. v. Giroux, supra, a case in which the offender was unable to pay the fine and the conditional sentence in default of payment of the fine was imposed immediately, was rightly decided.
[13] A subsequent decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, R. c. Bisson, [2000] J.Q. No. 3273 followed this line of reasoning and affirmed that a conditional sentence may be imposed in default of payment of a mandatory minimum fine where the convicted party is given no time to pay the fine.
[14] In this province, the availability of conditional sentences in default of payment of fines was considered by Blenus Wright J. in R. v. Lettroy (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 517. The accused pleaded guilty to income tax evasion. He was fined $218,678, an amount equivalent to the tax evaded, more than the minimum fine but less than the maximum stipulated by s. 239(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.). He was given no time to pay and sentenced to 12 months in default of payment, to be served conditionally, together with 12 months probation. The Crown appealed on the ground that the accused should have been given time to pay and that a conditional sentence was not available for a term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine. Blenus Wright J. allowed the Crown's appeal on the ground (at p. 520) that "[b]y giving no time to pay the fine the judge effectively wiped out the mandatory fine provisions" of the Income Tax Act.
[15] Blenus Wright J. held at p. 521 that a conditional sentence was not available: The term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is made with reference to the future and in relation to the possibility that the fine will not be paid. The imprisonment in default of payment of the fine does not relate to the conviction for the offence of tax evasion but relates to the failure to pay the sentence of a fine. Therefore, in my view the imprisonment in default of payment of the fine was not part of the sentence.
[16] Blenus Wright J. allowed the Crown's appeal, but in view of the respondent's lack of means to pay the fine, he substituted a reduced fine of 50% of the amount of tax evaded, gave the respondent a year to pay the fine, and set aside the term of imprisonment in default, expressly noting that the Crown should be left to its civil remedies to collect the fine if it were not paid.
[17] In my view, in the circumstances of the present case, the trial judge did have the discretion to impose a conditional sentence in default of payment of the mandatory minimum fine. I would adopt the analysis of the Quebec Court of Appeal that it is legally possible to impose a conditional sentence in default of payment of a fine where the offender is given no time to pay.
[18] I agree with the Quebec Court of Appeal that there is a difference between imposing an immediate sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine with no time to pay the fine, and imposing a conditional sentence in default of payment where the offender is given time to pay. Where no time is given to pay the fine, the court has determined, then and there, that the appropriate sanction for the offender's conduct is either immediate payment or immediate imprisonment. As the legal and practical effect of the sentence is to send the offender directly to jail, it seems to me that the court is imposing a sentence of imprisonment and I see no reason in law to eliminate the possibility of ordering that the sentence be served in the community pursuant to the terms of s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code.

Digitized by Google

[19] As well as being supportable in law, this analysis also has the practical advantage of affording judges a desirable measure of flexibility to arrive at an appropriate sentence. The circumstances of the present case prove the point. The trial judge concluded that in view of his limited means, the respondent was unable to pay the required fine. The trial judge also concluded that given the respondent's minimal level of involvement in smuggling and his personal circumstances, a sentence of incarceration was not appropriate. The trial judge was required to impose a fine, but he was not required to impose a term of imprisonment in default of payment as s. 240(4) of the Excise Act is discretionary. The imposition of a fine of $9,600 that could not and would not be paid would amount to a hollow sentence that would fail to adequately sanction the respondent's wrongful conduct. The imposition of a conditional sentence in default of immediate payment of the fine allowed the trial judge to arrive at a sentence that respected the letter of the law, was closely tailored to the circumstances of the offender, and gave appropriate emphasis to the goals of deterrence and retribution.

[20] I would, however, add the following caveat. I agree with the views expressed by Blenus Wright J. in Lettroy to the following extent. First, it is well established that ordinarily, a convicted party should be given time to pay a fine. The circumstances in which no time is given to pay a fine are bound to be exceptional. Second, sentencing judges should avoid dispositions that in effect evade Parliament's direction that for certain offences, mandatory fines must be imposed. It hardly needs to be said that sentencing judges must respect the will of Parliament. If a sentencing judge were to impose a fine, give no time to pay and impose a conditional sentence in default of payment as a means of avoiding the impact of the mandatory fine, such a sentence would amount to an improper exercise of the sentencing judge's discretion. Where it is doubtful that the mandatory fine will be paid, and where the circumstances of the offence or the offender do not justify a period of imprisonment in default, imposition of the fine with time to pay and without a period of imprisonment in default will often be the appropriate sentence.

[21] For the reasons I have given, I cannot accept the appellant's submission that the sentence imposed here effectively defeated Parliament's intention that a minimum fine be imposed. In my view, the trial judge did his best to impose a sentence that appropriately sanctioned the respondent's wrongful conduct in keeping with the statutory scheme and applicable legal principles and in a manner consistent with the respondent's level of criminal involvement and personal circumstances.

[22] Finally, I note that s. s. 734 of the Criminal Code, providing for the calculation of the term of imprisonment to be imposed in default of payment of a fine, has no application to the circumstances of this case. Accordingly, I do not address here the relevance or applicability of conditional sentences under that scheme, leaving that question to another day when the issue does arise.

CONCLUSION

[23] For these reasons, I would grant leave to appeal and dismiss the appeal. "Robert J. Sharpe J.A."

Digitized by Google

"I agree
J.M. Simmons J.A."

DOHERTY J.A. (Dissenting):
[24] I have read the persuasive reasons of my colleague, Sharpe J.A. I come to a different conclusion. As I read s. 742.1 of the Criminal Code, a conditional sentence is not available where a term of imprisonment is imposed upon default of the payment of a fine.

I
[25] The respondent was convicted under the Excise Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-14. Section 34(2) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21 makes the provisions of the Criminal Code applicable to prosecutions under the Excise Act "except to the extent that the enactment otherwise provides". There is nothing in the Excise Act about conditional sentences. Section 742.1 of the Criminal Code, therefore, governs the availability of conditional sentences for persons convicted under the Excise Act.
[26] Section 742.1 reads:
742.1 Where a person is convicted of an offence, except an offence that is punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment, and the court
imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years, and is satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community and would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing set out in sections 718 to 718.2, the court may, for the purpose of supervising the offender's behaviour in the community, order that the offender serve the sentence in the community, subject to the offender's complying with the conditions of a conditional sentence order made under section 742.3. [Emphasis added.] [27] In R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61 at 93, Lamer C.J.C. identified three prerequisites to the availability of a conditional sentence:
the offender must be convicted of an offence that is not punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment;
the court must impose a term of imprisonment of less than two years;
the safety of the community would not be endangered by the offender serving the sentence in the community; …
[28] It is the second of these prerequisites which is germane to this appeal. That requirement flows directly from the words of s. 742.1(a). A conditional sentence is only available where the court "imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years".
[29] Section 742.1(a) sets the standard by which those offenders who are not candidates for a conditional sentence are identified: R. v. Proulx, supra, at pp. 96-98. Offenders for whom imprisonment is an inappropriate punishment and offenders for whom a penitentiary term is an appropriate punishment are not eligible for conditional sentences. Offenders who fall between these two categories, that is, offenders for whom a term of imprisonment of less than two years is an appropriate punishment are candidates for a conditional sentence. If the offender is eligible for a conditional sentence, the court must go on to determine, according to s. 742.1(b), whether a conditional sentence should be imposed.

Digitized by Google

[30] In R. v. Proulx, supra, at p. 98, the Chief Justice referred to the drawing of the distinction between offenders who were eligible for a conditional sentence and those who were not eligible as a "preliminary determination" to be made upon a consideration of the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing to the extent necessary to "narrow the range of sentence" by placing the offender in one of the three categories described above.

[31] When the "preliminary determination" described by the Chief Justice is made in this case, the respondent falls into one of the categories of offenders for whom a conditional sentence is not available. The trial judge found, and it is not challenged on appeal, that imprisonment was not an appropriate punishment. He indicated that but for the minimum fine, he would have imposed a suspended sentence. Once the trial judge decided that a minimum fine was the appropriate sentence and that imprisonment was an inappropriate disposition, s. 742.1 was no longer a sentencing option.

[32] I cannot agree that the imposition of a term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is the same thing as the imposition of a term of imprisonment as a sanction for the commission of an offence. Imprisonment as punishment for the commission of an offence is appropriate only where a blending of the principles of sentencing to achieve the fundamental purpose of sentencing described in s. 718 of the Criminal Code compels the conclusion that imprisonment is the correct sanction. Imprisonment imposed for failure to pay a fine is not determined by reference to those principles of sentencing or the fundamental purpose of sentencing, but rather by reference to the need to enforce payment of the monetary penalty imposed by the court. It has long been recognized that imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is not punishment for the offence, but is a means of enforcing the punishment which is the fine: R. c. Savard (2000), 38 C.R. (5th) 152 at paras. 19, 36 (Que. C.A.); R. v. Lettroy (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 517 at 522 (Ont. S.C.J.); R. v. Tomlinson (1971), 2 C.C.C. (2d) 97 at 98 (B.C.S.C.); Regimbald v. Chong Chow (1925), 38 Que. K.B. 440 at 445 (K.B.).

[33] The enforcement nature of a term of imprisonment imposed for nonpayment of a fine is made clear by several provisions of the Criminal Code. Sections 734(4) and 734(5) provide that the period of incarceration to be served for default in payment of a fine is determined by the unpaid amount of the fine. [4] Section 734.7 provides that except where no time is allowed to pay a fine, the offender should be imprisoned for non-payment of the fine only where the other enforcement mechanisms set out in the Criminal Code (s. 734.5, s. 734.6) are inappropriate, or the offender has refused without reasonable excuse to pay the fine. [5] Section 734.8 directs that an offender who has been imprisoned for not paying a fine may have that term of imprisonment reduced or eliminated entirely by paying part or all of the fine. Finally, s. 787(2) and s. 809 recognize that imprisonment may be imposed for non-payment of monetary orders other than fines (eg. costs). Clearly, imprisonment in these circumstances has nothing to do with sentencing the offender for an offence and everything to do with enforcing court orders.

[34] The enforcement purpose behind the imposition of a jail term for nonpayment of a fine does not change depending on whether the offender is given time to pay the fine. In either situation, the punishment deemed appropriate for the offence is the fine. Where no time is given to pay the fine, that is because it is deemed appropriate to enforce immediate payment of the fine with the threat of a jail term. Because imprisonment is a means of enforcing the fine and not an alternative sanction for the commission of the crime, it is wrong in principle to impose a default prison term with no time to pay the fine absent proof that an offender has the ability to pay the fine immediately: R. v. Natrall (1972), 9 C.C.C. (2d) 390 at 397 (B.C.C.A.); R. v. Zink (1992), 13 B.C.A.C. 241 (C.A.).

Digitized by Google

[35] Counsel for the respondent referred to s. 732 of the Criminal Code in support of her submission that a sentence of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is still "a sentence of imprisonment" and, therefore, one for which a conditional sentence may be imposed under s. 742.1. Section 732 provides for intermittent sentences and reads in part:

Where the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of ninety days or less on an offender convicted of an offence, whether in default of a payment of a fine or otherwise, …

[36] I think the presence of the phrase "whether in default of payment of a fine or otherwise" in s. 732 and the absence of that phrase in s. 742.1(a) supports the conclusion that conditional sentences are not available when imprisonment is imposed for failure to pay a fine.

II

[37] My colleague writes that his interpretation of s. 742.1 affords judges "a desired measure of flexibility to arrive at an appropriate sentence". I agree wholeheartedly that flexibility is important when judges are trying to tailor a sentence to the offence and the offender. With respect, however, I think that my colleague's interpretation of s. 742.1 will lead to inappropriate sentences.

[38] A conditional sentence is a term of imprisonment, albeit one which is served in the community. Most offenders who are subject to a conditional sentence undergo substantial deprivation of their liberty. The relatively recent overhaul of the Criminal Code provisions relating to fines recognizes that as a matter of principle imprisonment for non-payment of fines should be used as a last resort, or where there is no reasonable excuse for non-payment. Parliament envisioned resort to imprisonment primarily, if not exclusively, in situations where the offender who had defaulted on payment had the means to pay. The slamming of the jail door was seen as an incentive to make the offender who had the means to pay the fine do so.

[39] I think the principle that limits resort to imprisonment as a means of enforcing fines has equal application to imprisonment served in custody or in the community. In either case, the offender should not suffer a deprivation of his or her liberty for non-payment of a fine except where other enforcement techniques are inappropriate or the offender has wilfully refused to pay the fine. As I see it, the real danger in reading s. 742.1 to permit conditional sentences for nonpayment of fines is that trial judges will resort to conditional sentences in circumstances where they would not impose a custodial term of imprisonment for non-payment of fines. This will result in unwarranted reliance on imprisonment as a means of enforcing the payment of fines.

[40] This case provides an example of the inappropriate use of imprisonment to enforce the payment of a fine. The trial judge was satisfied that the crime committed by the respondent did not call for imprisonment.

He was also satisfied that the respondent did not have the ability to pay the minimum fine. Despite these two findings, the trial judge imposed a conditional sentence, which included a "house arrest" provision, for non- payment of the fine and required that the fine be paid immediately. [6] By doing so, he effectively imposed a term of imprisonment, albeit within the community, not as punishment for the crime, but because the respondent did not pay a fine that he was unable to pay. I think it is just as much an error in principle to impose a conditional sentence in these circumstances as it would have been to impose a custodial sentence. Both amount to deprivation of liberty, not as a fit sanction for the offence committed, but because the offender is unable to pay a fine. Economic imprisonment whether in jail or in the community is offensive to the present provisions of the Criminal Code relating to fines. The judge's interpretation of s. 742.1 led him to impose an inappropriate sentence in this case. I do not think he would have imposed a custodial term of imprisonment had that been the only imprisonment option open to him.

Digitized by Google

[41] The absence of any reference to imprisonment upon default of payment of the fine in s. 742.1 is consistent with Parliament's determination that imprisonment should not be used as a means of enforcing fines save in very limited circumstances. In those limited circumstances, custodial imprisonment is better suited to achieve the enforcement purpose than non-custodial imprisonment.

III

[42] The trial judge was faced with a difficult sentencing problem. As he observed, his difficulty stemmed in large measure from the absence of any approved fine option programs in Ontario. Those programs permit an offender to discharge his fine obligation by performing work in programs authorized by the Lieutenant Governor in Council and are clearly aimed at offenders of limited means for whom a fine is the appropriate disposition: Criminal Code, s. 736.

[43] In the absence of a fine option program, the trial judge had two options. He could have declined to make any order for imprisonment upon default of payment of the fine and left it to the Crown to enforce the fine through other enforcement mechanisms available to it. This is an appropriate disposition where there is no realistic possibility that an offender can pay the appropriate fine within a reasonable time: R. v. Natrall, supra, at pp. 397-98. [7]

[44] The trial judge also could have imposed a term of imprisonment upon default of payment of the fine, but allowed the respondent a reasonable time to pay that fine. Had he chosen this option, the trial judge could have provided that certain modest minimum payments were to be made within the allotted time: Criminal Code, s. 734.1. If the fine was not paid in the allotted time, the trial judge could have considered an application to extend the time for payment: Criminal Code, s. 734.3. If the respondent did not seek an extension and defaulted on the payment of the fine, the trial judge would then have had to determine whether to issue a warrant for the committal of the respondent. In making that decision, he would have looked at s. 734.7 which makes imprisonment the enforcement mechanism of last resort. If the respondent had made genuine efforts to pay as much of the fine as he reasonably could and was not able to pay the remainder of the fine, imprisonment would be an inappropriate order under s. 734.7.

[45] At the sentencing proceedings, the trial judge did not make any specific inquiry into the respondent's ability to pay the minimum fine. On appeal, the Crown counsel argued that the evidence did not support the conclusion that the respondent was unable to pay the fine. While a more detailed inquiry into the respondent's financial means would have been helpful, the evidence at trial did establish that the respondent had a very limited income and was raising a teenaged daughter.

[46] As the conditional sentence has been served, I do not think that anything would be gained at this late juncture by a more detailed inquiry into the respondent's ability to pay the fine. Justice is best served by accepting the trial judge's conclusion that the respondent did not have the ability to pay the fine in the reasonably foreseeable future. Considered in that light, there should have been no order for imprisonment upon default of payment of the fine. I would vary the sentence by deleting the term of imprisonment imposed on default. The Crown may resort to the other enforcement mechanisms available to it to try to collect the fine.

Digitized by Google

"D.H. Doherty J.A."

RELEASED: December 12, 2001

[1] [TRANSLATION] "[w]hen the law prescribes a minimum fine … be it appropriate or excessive and beyond the means of the offender, the court must consider the period allotted for payment, the terms of payment, and if necessary, the provision for imprisonment in default of payment."

[2] [TRANSLATION] "in the event … that it seemed to the court that the accused could not pay the heavy fine, a custodial sentence imposed in default of payment could hardly be regarded as 'encouragement to pay the fine', for in reality, this imprisonment would constitute the 'penalty'".

[3] [TRANSLATION] "[It] would be compatible with the general principle governing the interpretation of statutes … that the immediate committal of the offender who is incapable of paying the fine may be covered by s. 742.1 CC; it would not be inconsistent with general sentencing principles for the person who has in effect been sentenced to a term of imprisonment to be able to benefit from this measure."

[4] As my colleague points out, these sections of the Criminal Code are not applicable to a fine imposed under the Excise Act because that Act provides for a maximum term of imprisonment upon default of payment of the fine: See s. 734(8). However, I think it is helpful to look at these sections as informing the enforcement purpose underlying the imposition of imprisonment upon failure to pay a fine.

[5] Presumably, if no time is allowed to pay the fine, the determination has been made that the offender has the ability to pay the fine immediately. Imprisonment for non-payment is, therefore, appropriate.

[6] In fairness to the trial judge, he ordered the fine paid immediately at the request of counsel for the respondent.

[7] Under the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code, the term of imprisonment, if any, to be served is fixed by a formula at the time of committal and not when the sentence is imposed. These provisions do not apply here. See supra, note 1.

R. v. Wu, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 530, 2003 SCC 73, Supreme Court Conditional Sentencing Issues Pronouncement when Fines Not Paid

Her Majesty The Queen Appellant v.
Yu Wu Respondent
and
Charter Committee on Poverty Issues Intervener
Indexed as: R. v. Wu
Neutral citation: 2003 SCC 73.
File No.: 29053.
2003: June 4; 2003: December 18.
Present: McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour,

Digitized by Google

LeBel and Deschamps JJ.
on appeal from the court of appeal for ontario

Criminal law — Sentencing — Conditional sentence —Possession of contraband cigarettes — Accused unable to pay minimum financial penalty mandated by Excise Act — Whether prison appropriate — Whether trial judge erred in imposing conditional sentence — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 742.1 — Excise Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-14, s. 240(1).

The accused was convicted of possession of 300 cartons of contraband cigarettes. Section 240(1.1)(a)(i) of the Excise Act carried a minimum penalty of $0.16 per cigarette, which amounted to $9,600. The trial judge concluded that the accused was not now and would not in the foreseeable future be able to pay such a heavy fine. The trial judge was also of the view that imprisonment for any length of time would not be a fit sentence in this case. He said he was "satisfied that, but for the minimum fine provisions [in the Excise Act], this would be a case for a suspended sentence". In the absence of a regime in Ontario "permitting offenders to work off the fines", and believing that incarceration of the accused in default of paying the fine would not be just, he concluded that a conditional sentence would be appropriate. Accordingly, the accused was fined $9,600, given no time to pay, and in default of payment was immediately given a conditional sentence of 75 days to be served in the community (i.e., at home) subject to a curfew from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. every day except for absences required"for employment, medical, dental or worship". He was allowed two hours extra liberty on either Saturday or Sunday.

Both the summary conviction appeals judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal upheld the sentence. At issue in this appeal is whether the conditional sentence was validly imposed.

Held (Deschamps J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ.: The trial judge erred in law in imposing a conditional sentence. Conditional sentences are not "probation under a different name" but rather sentences of imprisonment served in the community. In this case, the statutory conditions precedent to a conditional sentence were not met in two important respects. First, the trial judge's explicit finding that this was a proper case for a suspended sentence and probation, and that imprisonment was not warranted, puts this case outside the scope of a conditional sentence. Second, nowhere in the Criminal Code is it suggested that conditional sentences are available to enforce unpaid fines.

The purpose of imposing imprisonment in default of payment is to give serious encouragement to offenders with the means to pay a fine to make payment. Genuine inability to pay a fine is not a proper basis for imprisonment. A conditional sentence is a form of imprisonment. Unless, in the terms of s. 734.7(1), the Crown can establish that such a defaulter has "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay", a warrant of committal should not be issued.

If an offender does not have the means to pay a fine immediately, he or she should be given a reasonable time to pay. The offender may also be eligible for provincial fine option programs in which the fine may be discharged "in whole or in part by earning credits for work performed during a period not greater than two years" (s. 736). In the event of default, the Crown can resort to a number of civil remedies such as suspending licences or other instruments until the fine is paid in full or registering the fine owing with the civil courts. The option of jail for default is fenced in with important restrictions. A fine default is not punishable by committal unless the other statutory remedies, including licence suspensions and civil proceedings, are not appropriate in the circumstances (s. 734.7(1)(b)(i)), or the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under s. 736 (s. 734.7(1)(b)(ii)). Where the offender's reasonable excuse for failure to pay a fine is simple poverty, it is not open to a court to jail him or her under s. 734.7(1)(b)(i). Here, a functioning fine option program was not available in Ontario and there was no evidence as to what, if any, federal permits or licences were held by the accused.

Digitized by Google

It cannot be assumed that the financial circumstances of an offender at the date of the sentencing will necessarily continue into the future. An immediate committal order should only be made in exceptional circumstances, which did not exist here. The facts were simply that the accused was on welfare and lacked the ability to pay. An offender's inability to pay is precisely the reason why time is allowed, not a reason why it should be altogether denied. While it would have been appropriate to impose the minimum fine plus time to pay plus 30 days in jail in default of payment, the trial judge erred in jumping directly from imposition to committal without passing through the intermediate stages of alternative collection procedures, default, and, only if the Crown thinks it has grounds to proceed, a s. 734.7(1) committal hearing.

The conditional sentence should therefore be set aside. However, since the accused has served his conditional sentence, which, if properly imposed, would bar all further collection procedures, further collection procedures are stayed.

Per Deschamps J. (dissenting): The trial judge did not err in imposing a conditional sentence in default of the payment of a fine. It is impossible to reconcile, in the case of an impecunious person, all of the sentencing principles contained in the Criminal Code with a provision prescribing a minimum fine. In principle, a sentence must take into account all aggravating and mitigating circumstances relating to the offender's situation. The judge must consider that an offender should not be deprived of liberty if less restrictive sanctions may be appropriate in the circumstances. A minimum fine does not allow the particular circumstances of the offender to be taken into account. Given that in Ontario there is no organized scheme for community service, the judge who seeks an alternative solution, or even a means of encouraging payment of the fine, has little room to manoeuvre. The Criminal Code confers discretion on the judge to impose imprisonment in default of payment of a fine when he or she knows that imprisonment is, in practice, the sanction actually imposed for the offence committed. The judge is not obliged to allow time for payment. In this case, the trial judge did not really ever contemplate imposing the minimum fine along with a time for payment and a period of imprisonment in the event of default. He wanted to impose a realistic and suitable punishment and did not believe that incarceration was necessary. His decision to impose a conditional sentence in default of payment was enlightened and sensitive to the particular circumstances of the case. It also respected the principles of gradation of sentences and properly balanced the relevant penological goals.

Knowing that the offender did not have any money, the judge could order imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. While such an order, at first glance, seems to punish the poor more severely and appears contrary to Parliament's intent, the adjustment required in the sphere of sentencing to take into account the poverty of an offender cannot be reduced to a concern for ensuring that absence of means does not become a reason for imprisonment. All of the effects of a sentence and the different impact that certain sentences may have on different individuals must be taken into account. In this case, a conditional sentence could not be ruled out on any policy grounds.

Digitized by Google

Cases Cited
By Binnie J.

Considered: R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5; referred to: R. v. M. (C.A.), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 500; R. v. R.A.R., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 163, 2000 SCC 8; R. v. Snider (1977), 37 C.C.C. (2d) 189; Regimbald v. Chong Chow (1925), 38 Que. K.B. 440; R. v. Andrews, [1974] 2 W.W.R. 481; R. v. Brooks, [1988] N.S.J. No. 94 (QL); R. v. Beaton (1984), 49 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 15; R. v. Tessier (1957), 21 W.W.R. 331; Attorney General of Canada v. Radigan (1976), 33 C.R.N.S. 358; R. v. Natrall (1972), 9 C.C.C. (2d) 390; R. v. Zink (1992), 13 B.C.A.C. 241; R. v. Gladue, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688; R. v. Hebb(1989), 69 C.R. (3d) 1; R. v. Zachary, [1996] R.J.Q. 2484; R. v. MacFarlane (1997), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 211; Clergue v. H. H. Vivian and Co. (1909), 41 S.C.R. 607; Re International Woodworkers of America, Local 2-306 and Miramichi Forest Products Ltd. (1971), 21 D.L.R. (3d) 239.
By Deschamps J. (dissenting)
R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5; R. v. Gladue, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688.
Statutes and Regulations Cited
Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 [am. 1995, c. 22], ss. 718, 718.2(a), (d), (e), 718.3, 734, 734(2) [repl. 1999, c. 5, s. 33], 734.5 [idem, s. 34], 734.6, 734.7, 736 [am. 1997, c. 18, s. 107], 738, 742, 742.1 [am. 1997, c. 18, s. 107.1].
Excise Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-14, s. 240(1) [repl. 1994, c. 29, s. 15], (1.1)(a)(i) [ad. idem; am. 1999, c. 17, s. 144(1)(z.20)].
O. Reg. 925/93.
Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.33.
Provincial Offences Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. P-31.1, s. 38.
R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 948 (Fine Option Program).
Authors Cited
Ashworth, Andrew. Sentencing and Criminal Justice, 3rd ed. Markham: Butterworths, 2000.
Canada. Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics. Adult Correctional Services in Canada 2000-2001. Ottawa: Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, 2002.
Canada. Canadian Sentencing Commission. Sentencing Reform: A Canadian Approach Report of The Canadian Sentencing Commission. Ottawa: The Commission, 1987.
Canada. House of Commons Debates, vol. 133, 1st Sess., 35th Parl., September 20, 1994, p. 5873. Canada. National Council of Welfare. Justice and the Poor. Ottawa: The Council, 2000.
Elliott, Robin, and Jennifer Airs. New Measures for Fine Defaulters, Persistent Petty Offenders and Others: The Reports of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 Pilots. London: Home Office, 2000.
Hudson, Barbara. “Punishing the Poor: Dilemmas of Justice and Difference”, in William C. Heffernan and John Kleinig, eds., From Social Justice to Criminal Justice: Poverty and the Administration of Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000, 189.

Digitized by Google

Innes, Joanna. "The King's Bench prison in the later eighteenth century: law, authority and order in a London debtors' prison", in John Brewer and John Styles, eds., An Ungovernable People: The English and their law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1980, 250.
Manson, Allan. The Law of Sentencing. Toronto: Irwin Law, 2001. Ontario. Ministry of Transportation. Driver Control Statistics, 2003.
Pettit, Philip. "Indigence and Sentencing in Republican Theory", in William C. Heffernan and John Kleinig, eds., From Social Justice to Criminal Justice: Poverty and the Administration of Criminal Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000, 230.
Sullivan, Ruth. Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed. Markham: Butterworths, 2002. APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (2001), 160 C.C.C. (3d) 321, 48 C.R. (5th) 183, 152 O.A.C. 300, [2001] O.J. No. 4885 (QL), affirming a judgment of the Superior Court of Justice affirming a judgment of the Ontario Court of Justice. Appeal allowed, Deschamps J. dissenting.

Peter DeFreitas and Marie Comiskey, for the appellant.
Lawrence Greenspon, Blair Crew and Trevor Brown, for the respondent.
Vincent Calderhead and Roger Burrill, for the intervener.

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache, Binnie, Arbour and LeBel JJ. was delivered by BINNIE J. — In this appeal we are asked to consider whether a conditional sentence was validly imposed on the respondent offender for possession of contraband cigarettes. The offender might otherwise have been sent to jail for 30 days for non-payment of a mandatory $9,600 fine. In the trial judge's view, jail was not appropriate for this offender. On the other hand, the offender simply had no means to pay the fine. The trial judge thought a conditional sentence to be served by the offender in his home offered a way to avoid jail. I agree with the trial judge's initial conclusion that this was not an appropriate case for jail. I disagree with his sentencing solution. The Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, properly interpreted, offered the sentencing judge a range of alternative solutions for this offender but a conditional sentence was not amongst them.

Debtors' prison for impoverished people is a Dickensian concept that in civilized countries has largely been abolished. Imprisonment for civil debt was abolished in Ontario by the end of the 19th century. In its 1996 sentencing reforms, Parliament decreed that jail should be reserved for those whose conduct deserves to put them there. Here, the trial judge thought a fit sentence would be a suspended sentence with probation, but this was not possible under the Act. Yet debtors' prison "in the community", which is what a conditional sentence amounts to, is repugnant in the case of an individual who is undeserving of jail yet who simply cannot pay.
As will be seen, the purpose of imposing imprisonment in default of payment is to give serious encouragement to offenders with the means to pay a fine to make payment. Genuine inability to pay a fine is not a proper basis for imprisonment. A conditional sentence is a form of imprisonment. Therefore, a conditional sentence is not an appropriate sentence to impose on an offender simply because he or she has no means to pay a fine. Nothing in the Code authorises a conditional sentence to be used for collection purposes. Unless, in the terms of s. 734.7(1), the Crown can establish that a defaulter has "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay", a warrant of committal should not be issued.

Digitized by Google

The conditions precedent to the imposition of a conditional sentence were accordingly not met. The sentencing judge commented that "hard cases make bad law and this is a hard case". In my view, with respect, it also made bad law. I would allow the appeal.

Facts

The respondent, Yu Wu, was convicted of possession of 300 cartons of contraband cigarettes. The Excise Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-14, s. 240(1.1)(a)(i), carried a minimum penalty of $0.16 per cigarette, which amounted to $9,600. The circumstances, as related by the accused, were curious. He explained that he had injured his back in 1994, had been unemployed since then, and was supporting himself and his 16-year-old daughter in Toronto on welfare payments of $965 per month. He went to gambling casinos three to five times a week. At the Niagara Falls Casino in late May or early June 1998, he had struck up an acquaintance with a man he identified only as "Mike". In July 1998, he agreed to help "Mike" drive to Montreal to gamble. They took Mike's car. Along the way, Mike pulled into a house in Cornwall. In this stranger's house, Mr. Wu waited for almost 8 hours. Finally, the owner of the house told Mr. Wu that Mike had left and that he should drive Mike's car back to Toronto. On the way home to Toronto in Mike's car, the respondent was stopped by police. He testified that it was only when the police pulled him over that he realized that the back seat of the car contained 300 cartons of contraband tobacco.

Mr. Wu conceded that he did not know "Mike's" last name, phone number, or address. The only way that he could contact Mike would be if he happened to run into Mike at an Ontario casino. Otherwise, Mr. Wu would have to wait for Mike to call Mr. Wu's pager or come to Mr. Wu's home. Apparently, they did not meet and "Mike" never did call.

The accused was prosecuted under s. 240(1) of the Excise Act for possession of contraband tobacco.

Court Proceedings

Ontario Court of Justice — Renaud J.

After considering the facts, the trial judge stated that imprisonment for any length of time would not be appropriate in this case. He was "satisfied that, but for the minimum fine provisions [in the Excise Act], this would be a case for a suspended sentence". The accused "is an individual with very little to be said of him, positive or negative. [He] is someone who has not demonstrated a tendency to engage in any [anti]-social behaviour and [he] is someone who should respond positively to a period of probation." However, in view of the minimum fine provisions of the Excise Act, the trial judge concluded that probation or a conditional discharge were not available sentencing options.

Referring to the decision of this Court in R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5, the trial judge commented that it was clear that "jail should be reserved for those individuals who are a danger to the community. This individual is not a danger to the community".

That said, the mandatory fine scheme "evidences Parliament['s] wish that smuggling be deterred". The Cornwall area "is plagued by smuggling" and the Court of Appeal had warned trial judges "to steel themselves to be harsh in imposing sentences on very sympathetic individuals" because the smuggling rings deliberately recruited runners who would be seen by the courts as sympathetic people.

Digitized by Google

The sentencing judge concluded that the respondent was not now and would not in the foreseeable future be able to pay such a heavy fine. In the absence of a regime in Ontario "permitting offenders to work off the fines", and believing that incarceration of the accused in default of paying the fine would not be just, he concluded that a conditional sentence would be appropriate.
Accordingly, the accused was fined $9,600, given no time to pay, and in default of payment was immediately given a conditional sentence of 75 days to be served in the community (i.e., at home) subject to a curfew from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. every day except for absences required "for employment, medical, dental or worship". He was allowed two hours extra liberty on either Saturday or Sunday.
Superior Court of Justice — Robertson J.
The summary conviction appeals judge concluded that the trial judge had not erred in imposing a sentence "particular to the specific facts of this case". The Crown's appeal was dismissed.
Ontario Court of Appeal (2001), 160 C.C.C. (3d) 321
Sharpe J.A. for the majority
The trial judge had given the accused no time to pay, which indicated that he "ha[d] determined, then and there, that the appropriate sanction for the offender's conduct is either immediate payment or immediate imprisonment"(para. 18). As the "legal and practical effect of the sentence is to send the offender directly to jail" (para. 18), Sharpe J.A. concluded that the conditions precedent to a conditional sentence were satisfied. While the trial judge was required to impose a fine, he was not required to impose a term of imprisonment in default of payment. However, "[t]he imposition of a fine of $9,600 that could not and would not be paid would amount to a hollow sentence that would fail to adequately sanction the respondent's wrongful conduct"(para. 19). Accordingly, in the majority view, the imposition of a conditional sentence in default of immediate payment of the fine allowed the trial judge to arrive at a sentence that "respected the letter of the law, was closely tailored to the circumstances of the offender, and gave appropriate emphasis to the goals of deterrence and retribution" (para. 19).
Doherty J.A., dissenting
Doherty J.A. took the view that once the trial judge had decided that imprisonment would not be an appropriate sentence, the statutory conditions precedent for a conditional sentence were not met. Further, the conditional sentence was imposed here not by reason of the offence, but to enforce the non-payment of the fine (at para. 40):
I think it is just as much an error in principle to impose a conditional sentence in these circumstances as it would have been to impose a custodial sentence. Both amount to deprivation of liberty, not as a fit sanction for the offence committed, but because the offender is unable to pay a fine. Economic imprisonment whether in jail or in the community is offensive to the present provisions of the Criminal Code relating to fines.
He would therefore have allowed the Crown's appeal.

Analysis
The principles of sentencing include Parliament's direction that "an offender should not be deprived of liberty, if less restrictive sanctions may be appropriate in the circumstances", and "all available sanctions other than imprisonment that are reasonable in the circumstances should be considered for all offenders" (s. 718.2(d) and (e) of the Code(emphasis added)).

Digitized by Google

Applying these principles, the trial judge concluded very firmly that the respondent should not go to jail for what was seen as a relatively minor role in this cigarette smuggling operation. The respondent did not bring the goods across the border. He had no previous record for such an offence. He was no danger to the community. He was the sole support for his teenage daughter. Yet, in default of payment of a mandatory minimum $9,600 fine, which the judge believed the respondent had no ability to pay, he felt obliged to consider a significant period of incarceration. Indeed, the Crown Attorney at trial calculated that under s. 734(5) the statutory formula would "deem" the period of imprisonment in default of payment of a $9,600 fine to be 174 days. (The Crown conceded the formula was inapplicable to a fine imposed under the Excise Act.) The judge found he retained a discretion to order a shorter sentence and would have sentenced the respondent to 30 days in jail in default of payment were a conditional sentence not an available option.

That said, the trial judge concluded that a conditional sentence *was*available. The following exchange occurred at the sentencing hearing:

[DEFENCE]: So it would make sense to me, if I can just get this off my chest, it would make sense to me that if you can give a conditional sentence . . .

THE COURT: For a manslaughter

[DEFENCE]: . . . for a manslaughter or for anything else when jail is an appropriate sentence, surely on a fine situation, for a tax [evasion], surely, it would be logical to say that you can give a conditional sentence in that circumstance.

. . .

THE COURT: . . . Why would a non-violent offender actually be detained in a custodial facility while a violent offender does not, if [he or she] doesn't threaten the safety of the community. . .

Ordinarily, of course, the appellate courts will defer to the sentence considered appropriate by the trial judge, who "possesses the unique qualifications of experience and judgment from having served on the front lines of our criminal justice system": R. v. M. (C.A.), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 500, at para. 91; see also R. v. R.A.R., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 163, 2000 SCC 8, at para. 19. Moreover, "the sentencing judge will generally have a better knowledge of the community in which the offences occurred and is therefore in a better position to craft an appropriate sentence" (R.A.R., supra, at para. 19). In this case, however, the Crown argues that the trial judge made an error of law in concluding that a conditional sentence was an available option. I agree.

The Crown has a very practical interest in the subject matter of this appeal. Imprisonment terminate s the Crown's power to pursue civil enforcement remedies to collect the money (s. 734.7(4) of the Code). Some individuals with savings in the bank might prefer spending 75 days under house arrest rather than paying $9,600. In this case, however, the evidence is that the respondent's poverty left him with no choice in the matter.

The Mandatory Minimum Fine

Parliament is quite specific about the range of penalties in s. 240 of the Excise Act:

240. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), every person who sells or offers for sale or has in t he person 's possession any manufactured tobacco or cigars, whether manufactured in or imported into Canada, not put up in packages and stamped with tobacco stamps or cigar stamps in accordance with this Act and the ministerial

Digitized by Google

regulations

. . .

is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction and liable to a fine of not less than the amount determined under subsection (1.1) and not more than the lesser of $500,000 and the amount determined under subsection (1.2), or both the fine described in subparagraph (i) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. [Emphasis added.]

The trial judge could, in a proper case, have concluded that a fit sentence would include both the mandatory minimum fine and a period of imprisonment. He emphatically decided that imprisonment was not a fit punishment. Indeed, as stated, his preference would have been to impose no more than a suspended sentence with probation. Yet in Proulx itself, Lamer C.J. stated, at para. 55:

At one end of the range, Parliament denied the possibility of a conditional sentence for offenders who should receive a penitentiary term. At the other end, Parliament intended to ensure that offenders who were entitled to a more lenient community measure — such as a suspended sentence with probation — did not receive a conditional sentence, a harsher sanction in this legislative scheme. [Emphasis added.]

A mandatory minimum fine of $9,600 imposed irrespective of the offender's means to pay is a legislated exception to the usual sentencing principles. Even before the 1996 sentencing reforms, the correct rule was that a fine should be assessed having regard to "the offender's ability to pay" (R. v. Snider (1977), 37 C.C.C. (2d) 189 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 190). It was quite open to Parliament to impose a minimum fine, but Parliament's amendments did not require that inability to pay should necessarily land the offender in jail. Indeed, the 1996 amendments show that Parliament did not intend to send the impoverished to jail by reason only of their inability to pay.

Availability of Conditional Sentences

Conditional sentences were introduced with the 1996 sentencing reforms of the Code. The Minister of Justice explained the purpose of his bill as follows:

A general principle that runs throughout Bill C-41 is that jails should be reserved for those who should be there. Alternatives should be put in place for those who commit offences but who do not need or merit incarceration.

(House of Commons Debates, vol. 133, 1st Sess., 35th Parl., September 20,1994, p. 5873) The conditional sentencing regime is dealt with in s. 742.1 of the Code which provides as follows:

742.1 Where a person is convicted of an offence, except an offence that is punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment, and the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years, and is satisfied that serving the sentence in the community would not endanger the safety of the community and would be consistent with the fundamental purpose and principles of sentencing set out in sections 718 to 718.2, the court may, for the purpose of supervising the offender's behaviour in the community, order that the offender serve the sentence in the community, subject to the offender's complying with the conditions of a conditional sentence order made under section 742.3.

In Proulx, supra, it was held that the requirement that the court impose "a sentence of imprisonment of less than two years" was intended to identify the type of offenders who could be entitled to a conditional sentence (para. 55). Specifically,

Digitized by Google

Parliament did not intend conditional sentences to be "probation under a different name" (para. 28). A conditional sentence is a sentence of imprisonment, albeit the sentence is served in the community. It is imprisonment without incarceration. Only when the sentencing judge has rejected other sentencing options, such as a conditional discharge, a suspended sentence, probation or a fine, and has concluded that a term of imprisonment of less than two years is required by the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of the offender, does a conditional sentence arise for consideration. At that point, the question is where the term of imprisonment is to be served, in a penal institution or, under punitive conditions, in the community. "It is this punitive aspect that distinguishes the conditional sentence from probation" (Proulx, supra, at para. 22).

The trial judge's explicit finding that this was a proper case for a suspended sentence and probation, and that imprisonment was not warranted, puts this case outside the scope of a conditional sentence. As stated in Proulx, at para. 37: "Sentencing judges should always be mindful of the fact that conditional sentences are only to be imposed on offenders who would otherwise have been sent to jail" for the offence that gave rise to the conviction.

The statutory conditions precedent to a conditional sentence were not met in two important respects:

The trial judge, with the best of intentions, stood the Proulx reasoning on its head. He was searching for a mechanism to deal with an offence that in his view did not warrant imprisonment at all. He thought justice would be served by keeping the respondent, if at all possible, out of jail entirely. But the conditional sentencing regime is predicated on a finding in a particular case that jail for less than two years would be a fit sentence. The effect of the trial judge's approach would be to widen the net of the conditional sentencing regime to imprison in their homes offenders under punitive conditions purely on the basis of their inability to pay a fine. Net widening is repugnant to the conditional sentence regime: Proulx, supra, at para. 56. What is more, if the punitive conditions are breached, the offender would face the prospect of serving the balance of the sentence in an institution without possibility of parole (Proulx, at paras. 42-44), thereby adding further to the high rates of incarceration that the 1996 sentencing reforms were designed to alleviate.

Conditional sentences are presented in s. 742.1 of the Code as a sentencing option, if the conditions precedent are met, for the original offence, as Doherty J.A. emphasized in the present case. The distinction between sentencing provisions and enforcement of sentences is of long standing: Regimbald v. Chong Chow (1925), 38 Que. K.B. 440, at p. 445. Section 240 of the Excise Act permits the sentencing judge to send an offender to jail on summary conviction for up to two years. The trial judge rejected jail as a fit punishment for this offence. Jail only entered his calculation as a default provision for non-payment. As such, jail was triggered by the default, not the offence. No default, no jail. The decision of the judge to collapse the sentencing hearing into a default of payment hearing was done for administrative convenience, apparently, but it did not eliminate the fact that legally there was a shifting of gears from sentence to default to consideration of the appropriate sentence for default to committal. The conditional sentence is a creature of statute and nowhere in s. 742.1 or elsewhere in the Code is it suggested that conditional sentences are available to enforce unpaid fines.

Digitized by Google

The Trial Judge's Dilemma

The trial judge's dilemma was that he was required by the Excise Act to impose a minimum fine of $9,600, rising to a maximum of $14,400 based on a mechanical formula applied to the quantity of contraband cigarettes found in the offender's possession. The trial judge did not dispute the logic of the minimum mandatory fine because in his view contraband is a serious problem in the community. His concern was the perceived inevitability of incarceration that would arise from enforcement action consequent on the respondent's inability to pay.

The error in the trial judge's approach, with respect, was his conclusion that, in the case of this respondent, the only alternative to a conditional sentence was actual jail time.

As a matter of law, there was nothing inevitable about incarceration in the event the respondent was simply unable to pay the $9,600 fine by reason of his poverty.

No Time Given for Payment

As stated, the trial judge gave the respondent no time to pay. This was in accordance with a request from the defence, which sought to lay the basis for a conditional sentence. But it was an error. If it is clear that the offender does not have the means to pay immediately, he or she should be given time to pay: see R. v. Andrews, [1974] 2 W.W.R. 481 (B.C.S.C.), and R. v. Brooks, [1988]
N.S.J. No. 94 (QL) (C.A.). The time should be what is reasonable in all the circumstances: R. v. Beaton (1984), 49 Nfld.& P.E.I.R. 15 (P.E.I.C.A.), and R. v. Tessier (1957), 21 W.W.R. 331 (Man. Co. Ct.). In Attorney General of Canada v. Radigan(1976), 33 C.R.N.S. 358, the Quebec Court of Appeal allowed the offender to pay a fine of $5,000 through semi-annual instalments of $625. The courts have considerable flexibility to respond to the particular facts of an offender's situation. It is wrong to assume, as was done in this case, that the circumstances of the offender at the date of the sentencing will necessarily continue into the future.

Here, the trial judge issued a committal order forthwith. The Code provides that "[w]here no time has been allowed for payment of a fine and a warrant committing the offender to prison for default of payment of the fine is issued, the court shall state in the warrant the reason for immediate committal" (s. 734.7(2)). This language suggests that only in exceptional circumstances that call for judicial explanation should an immediate committal order be made. Here there were no exceptional circumstances. The reason given was simply that the respondent was on welfare and lacked the ability to pay.

An offender's inability to pay is precisely the reason why time is allowed, not a reason why it should be altogether denied: R. v. Natrall(1972), 9 C.C.C. (2d) 390 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 397; R. v. Zink (1992), 13 B.C.A.C. 241. It is true that the fine could not have been paid immediately, and perhaps never in full, but the mandatory minimum fine scheme imposed by Parliament was effectively nullified by immediately shifting the penalty from the respondent's financial interest to his liberty interest. Parliament clearly intended that an economic punishment be imposed for an economic offence. The Crown in its factum says that tobacco smuggling results in an estimated $1 billion loss in tax revenue per year. As noted, committal of an offender for default of payment terminated the operation of all other enforcement mechanisms to collect the fine (s. 734.7(4)). It is often difficult to predict with certainty whether an offender will in future acquire the means to pay the fine, whether through his or her own labour, or perhaps a windfall.

Digitized by Google

Imprisonment for Debt

The trial judge of course put his finger on a serious problem. Debtors'prison, a dreadful institution excoriated by Charles Dickens in Little Dorrit, is no longer with us. But according to the most recent report from Statistics Canada, 17 percent of all people in custody in provincial or territorial institutions in 2000-2001 were jailed for default on unpaid fines, i.e., at least one of the causes for their committal arose from a fine default: see Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, Adult Correctional Services in Canada, 2000-2001 (2002), at Table 7. The numbers are fairly steady, if in slight decline, from 20 percent in 1998-1999 to 19 percent in 1999-2000.

A similar picture was presented by the National Council of Welfare in its report Justice and the Poor (2000), at p. 76. The Council says that in 1989-1990, fine default "played a major role" in the imprisonment of women, especially of Aboriginal women in the Prairie provinces. At the time, 47 percent of female prisoners in Saskatchewan were admitted for fine default. On a provincial basis, the Council noted of the Quebec system, at pp. 76-77, for example:

A 1994 Quebec survey found that 35 percent of the imprisoned defaulters had been fined for offences under the Criminal Code or other federal criminal laws (average fine of $262 or, in case of default, average of 26 days in prison), 10 percent for both federal and provincial offences (average $1,366 or 50 days), and 55 percent for violations of provincial laws (average $342 or 13 days) or municipal bylaws (average $116 or 8 days). The vast majority (65 percent) of the fines had been issued for driving/traffic offences, mostly under provincial laws (45 percent). The rest of the fines were for thefts and other property offences under the Criminal Code (5 percent), violations of drug laws and other federal statutes (3 percent), assaults and other offences against the person (2 percent), illegal hunting, poaching and other violations of provincial laws (2 percent), failure to appear in court and other Criminal Code violations (15 percent) as well as unspecified municipal offences (8 percent).

It is curious that, while a force behind the 1996 sentencing reforms to the Code was a reaction to the overuse of prison as a sanction (R. v. Gladue, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688, at para. 57), prison as an enforcement mechanism for unpaid fines remains at such a high level. In its 1987 report, the Canadian Sentencing Commission had observed that "[t]he imposition of a 'semi-automatic' prison term for fine default has been the subject of relentless criticism in the sentencing literature. There is statistical evidence to support the conclusion that the imprisonment of fine defaulters without reference to their ability to pay discriminates against impoverished offenders": Sentencing Reform: A Canadian Approach — Report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission (1987), at p. 380. The Commission recommended that "a quasi-automatic prison term not be imposed for fine default and that offenders only be incarcerated for wilful breach of a community sanction" (p. 381), meaning probation or fines (p. 347). In its 1996 sentencing reforms, Parliament took these views into account.

I do not overlook the corollary problem that poverty should not become a shield against any punishment at all. Otherwise, smugglers will simply be encouraged to redouble their efforts to recruit impoverished people as runners. Nor is it suggested that jail is never a fit sentence for people in the respondent's position. In this case, however, we are confronted with a specific finding by the sentencing judge, not unreasonable in the circumstances, that jail was not a fit sentence for this offender.

Digitized by Google

It is one thing if the judge forms the view that jail is a fit sentence, albeit one from which the offender can extricate him- or herself by payment of a fine. It is another thing altogether where the judge, as here, concludes that jail time is not appropriate.

Encouragement to Pay

The appellant Crown states in its factum on the present appeal, "[t]he purpose of a term of imprisonment in default is to encourage fine payment; it is not punishment for an offence." "Encouragement" presupposes the offender has the wherewithal to somehow organize payment. If, as the collection lawyers say, you cannot get blood from a stone, no amount of "encouragement" is going to cause the stone to bleed.

The Crown's submission finds an echo in late 18th century England. A leading scholarly study of the King's Bench debtors' prison points out that what creditors wanted was, above all, the power to threaten imprisonment. A debtor who was brought to court, even if he could put up bail, received a forceful reminder of his perilous situation. Court appearance might well induce a debtor with resources to re-order his priorities and settle outstanding claims. Even a debtor without resources might find himself able, under the shadow of the law, to dredge up sufficient funds from friends and relatives. [Emphasis in original.]

(J. Innes, "The King's Bench prison in the later eighteenth century: law, authority and order in a London debtors' prison", in J. Brewer and J. Styles, eds., An Ungovernable People: The English and their law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (1980), 250, at p. 254)

Debtors' prison was used to enforce civil debts. In this case, we are dealing with debts owed to the Crown. One of the ideas underlying the 1996 sentencing reforms is that it was no more appropriate to use jail as a general collection agency for debts owed to the Crown than it is for debts owed to ordinary citizens.

It is true, of course, that some of those serving jail time in default of payment even today are doing so for reasons of personal preference, a matter of choice, as documented in a recent study for the British Home Office: R. Elliott and J. Airs, New Measures for Fine Defaulters, Persistent Petty Offenders and Others: The Reports of the Crime (Sentence) Act 1997 Pilots (2000), at pp. 32-35, 44 and 68- 69.

However, the illusory nature of the "choice" between fine or imprisonment in many situations was noted by Kelly J. in R. v. Hebb(1989), 69 C.R. (3d) 1 (N.S.S.C. (T.D.)), at p. 13:

It is irrefutable that it is irrational to imprison an offender who does not have the capacity to pay on the basis that imprisonment will force him or her to pay. If the sentencing court chooses a fine as the appropriate sentence, it is obviously discarding imprisonment as being unnecessary under the particular circumstances. However, default provisions may be appropriate in circumstances where the offender may choose not to pay, presumably on principle, and would elect to spend time incarcerated rather than make a payment to the state. For the impecunious offenders, however, imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is not an alternative punishment — he or she does not have any real choice in the matter. At least this is the situation until fine option programs or related programs are in place. In effect, imprisonment of the poor in default of payment of a fine becomes a punishment that would not otherwise be imposed except for the economic limitations of the convicted person. [Underlining added.]

It was to address some of these weaknesses in the sentencing options that the

Digitized by Google

Minister of Justice subsequently introduced Bill C-41, proclaimed in force on September 3, 1996.

No Constitutional Question Raised

Both the respondent and the intervener Charter Committee on Poverty Issues expressed the view that a Charter challenge ought to have been taken against the mandatory fine provision of the Excise Act. In particular, the Charter Committee on Poverty Issues contended that the law operates unequally as between the rich and the poor. A similar *Charter*challenge was made and rejected in R. v. Zachary, [1996] R.J.Q. 2484 (C.A.), and R. v. MacFarlane (1997), 121 C.C.C. (3d) 211 (P.E.I.C.A.).

In the absence of a successful Charter challenge, we take the law as Parliament has passed it. This was accepted by the trial judge who rightly felt he had no option but to impose a $9,600 fine.

The 1996 Sentencing Reforms

The 1996 amendments made a number of important clarifications in this area of the law.

Firstly, Parliament rejected in general the notion that a fine should be set without regard to an offender's ability to pay. A means inquiry is now a condition precedent to the imposition of a fine except where otherwise provided by law. Section 734(2) of the Code now provides:

734. . . .

(2) Except when the punishment for an offence includes a minimum fine or a fine is imposed in lieu of a forfeiture order, a court may fine an offender under this section only if the court is satisfied that the offender is able to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736.

In this case, of course, Parliament did impose a minimum fine which, in his present circumstances, the respondent was unable to pay.

Secondly, in s. 734(2), Parliament cross-referenced s. 736 which introduced into the Code recognition of provincial "fine option programs" in which, assuming such a plan exists and the offender is eligible for it, the fine may be discharged "in whole or in part by earning credits for work performed during a period not greater than two years".

Thirdly, Parliament provided that a defaulting offender should not be sent to jail unless he or she has "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under s. 736" (see s. 734.7(1) of the Code).

The Court of Appeal expressed concern that a fine that is not backed up with the threat of jail might be seen as a "hollow" sentence. The 1996 amendments make it clear, however, that while impoverished offenders are not to be jailed simply because of an inability to pay, they are nevertheless subject to available collection methods short of jail, including an obligation to work off their debts where a fine option program is in place. Moreover, the sentencing judge can certainly impose a fine plus a period of jail in default of payment to encourage payment. The problem here was that the sentencing judge moved directly from imposition to committal without passing through the intermediate stages of default and a s. 734.7(1) committal hearing.

If no "fine option program" is in place and the offender defaults, the Crown has a number of civil remedies, including refusal to "issue or renew or may suspend [any] licence, permit or other instrument until the fine is paid in full" (s. 734.5 of the Code), or the criminal court order may be filed as a judgment in a court of civil jurisdiction, with all the usual civil law collection remedies (s. 734.6). A third option is committal to jail for default, but, as will be seen, this option is fenced in with important restrictions.

Digitized by Google

The Lack of a Functioning Fine Option Program in Ontario

The trial judge in this case made it clear that if a fine option program had been available in Ontario, he would have enrolled the respondent to work off the debt over a period of time through community service. "[I]f there was a regime in this province permitting offenders to work off the fines", he said, "this entire discussion would be obviated".

All provinces and territories have a fine option program in place except for British Columbia, Newfoundland and Labrador, Nunavut and Ontario. Of these four jurisdictions, Newfoundland and Labrador has enabling legislation in place to allow the program, but has not promulgated a regulation to create the program: see Provincial Offences Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. P-31.1, s. 38. Nunavut is in the process of drafting legislation to create a program. British Columbia does not at present have a statute that allows for the creation of such a program.

Ontario has a regulation in place that establishes such a program in designated areas, but, as part of budget cuts, it has dismantled the administrative apparatus required to support it. Specifically, the Fine Option Program, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 948, made pursuant to the Provincial Offences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.33, contemplated a fine option program in Ontario, but while the regulation has never been repealed, the administrative apparatus essential to administer the program was eliminated in 1994: see O. Reg. 925/93.

Licence Suspension and Revocation

Enforcement options available to the Crown include the suspension or revocation of licences and permits held by the respondent. In the present case, the fine was imposed under the federal Excise Act. There is no evidence of what federal permits or licences, if any, were held by the respondent. It is possible that he possessed a Canadian passport.

In most cases, revocation or suspension of permits is a potent collection tool, especially where the fine is owed to the provincial Crown. Anyone who has tried to renew a driving licence despite an unpaid fine is familiar with the procedure. While suspension or revocation do not themselves produce payment of the fine, they put pressure on the offender to find the money. This remedy is frequently resorted to. It appears that in 2002 there were 95,909 driving permits in Ontario suspended as a result of default in the payment of fines: Ontario, Ministry of Transportation, Driver Control Statistics (2003). Apart from driving licences, suspension or revocation would be available provincially in respect of registration of vehicles, taxicab licences, hunting permits, work permits, timber cutting permits, mineral exploration licences, building permits and the full range of activities touched by the apparatus of the regulatory state.

It may be that suspension of federal permits and licences would not have produced any significant payment in the respondent's case, but nevertheless, where applicable, it would be a punishment less restrictive of his liberty than house arrest.

Civil Enforcement

Governments use collection agencies. If there is money to be found, these people are nothing if not persistent.

Under s. 734.6, the Crown can register the unpaid sentence as a civil judgment. Providing the civil judgment is renewed at appropriate intervals, it carries on indefinitely. The fact the respondent was impoverished on the day of his sentencing does not mean he will be ever thus.

Digitized by Google

Committal Proceedings

Under the Code, a fine default is not punishable by committal unless the other statutory remedies, including licence suspensions and civil proceedings, are "not appropriate in the circumstances", or "the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736 [fine options program]" (emphasis added). Section 734.7(1) of the Code provides:

734.7 (1) [Warrant of committal] Where time has been allowed for payment of a fine, the court shall not issue a warrant of committal in default of payment of the fine until the expiration of the time allowed for payment of the fine in full; and unless the court is satisfied that the mechanisms provided by sections 734.5 and 734.6 are not appropriate in the circumstances, or that the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736.

Where the offender's "reasonable excuse" under subpara. (ii) for failure to pay a fine is poverty, the question is whether it is nevertheless open to a court to jail him or her under subpara. (i) because the self-same poverty makes it "not appropriate", i.e., futile, to resort to civil collection methods or permit suspensions. In my view, such a reading of s. 734.7, despite the drafter's use of the word "or" at the end of s. 734.7(1)(b)(i), would be absurd.

Courts have not infrequently read "or" as "and" where the legislative context so requires: Clergue v. H. H. Vivian and Co. (1909), 41 S.C.R. 607, Re International Woodworkers of America, Local 2-306 and Miramichi Forest Products Ltd. (1971), 21 D.L.R. (3d) 239 (N.B.C.A.), and Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (4th ed. 2002), at pp. 66-69. See also, on this specific point, A. Manson, The Law of Sentencing (2001), at p. 249.

If poverty were to be upheld as a stand-alone justification for a committal court to find collection methods other than jail "not appropriate",then the "without reasonable excuse" limitation in s. 734.7(1)(b)(ii) would afford poor people no protection at all. Yet it was the concern about overuse of jail for poor people for unpaid fines that was an important impetus behind the 1996 sentencing reforms.

Use of the word "refused" in s. 734.7(1)(b)(ii) indicates a parliamentary expectation that the offender's particular circumstances allow him or her a choice. In this case, at least at the date of the sentencing, the respondent had no choice.

The Crown, in its factum, fully accepted that committal proceedings are governed by the principle in s. 734.7(1)(b)(ii) that "the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge [the debt]" (emphasis added). For example, the Crown argues:

By operation of the warrant of committal provisions in s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code, there must be a judicial determination that an offender has "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine" before he or she is ordered into custody.

. . .

. . .

. . .

While the "slamming of the jail door" is the incentive to make offenders with means pay their fines, no one will go to jail for their genuine inability to pay.

Digitized by Google

However, as will be discussed below, where a sentencing judge chooses to impose a default term of imprisonment, the warrant of committal provision in s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code operates to ensure that only those who wilfully evade payment will be incarcerated.

If the judge was satisfied that the Respondent was not wilfully evading the payment of the fine, there would be no basis for issuing a warrant of committal and the Respondent would not go to jail. [Emphasis in original.]

Parliament has imposed a mandatory minimum fine in s. 240 of the Excise Act, but it has with equal authority provided in s. 734.7(1) of the Code that the offender should not go to jail for failure to pay it unless it is shown that he or she has "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay". That was not the position of the respondent when he was sentenced. He ought not to have been sentenced to serve a "term of imprisonment" in an institution or in the community.

I. The Proper Order

In my view, the trial judge ought to have proceeded with his initial instinct to impose the mandatory minimum fine of $9,600 plus a reasonable time to pay and 30 days in default. If, as the trial judge expected, the respondent went into default despite the Crown's resort to available remedies short of committal, the Crown would then have had the choice whether to proceed further or not.

If, as the trial judge anticipated, the respondent had continued simply to be unable to pay, the Crown, on its own acknowledgement to this Court, would not have sought such a committal.

If, on the other hand, the respondent had come into money to pay all or part of the debt, he should quite properly have been required to do so.

IV. Disposition

The appeal is allowed. As the respondent has served his conditional sentence, which would bar all further collection procedures under s. 734.7(4) of the Code, the Crown ought not to take any further collection procedures as a result of the conditional sentence's being set aside. A stay is therefore entered against any further collection procedures. As the appeal was brought by the Crown as a test case, the respondent should have his costs in this Court.

English version of the reasons delivered by DESCHAMPS J. (dissenting)— I can appreciate the Cartesian logic of my colleague Binnie J., but in my opinion, a more nuanced approach is necessary.

The difficulty of this case arises from the impossibility of reconciling, in the case of an impecunious person, all of the sentencing principles contained in the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, with a provision prescribing a minimum fine. In principle, according to s. 718.2(a) and (d), a sentence must take into account all aggravating and mitigating circumstances relating to the offender's situation. The judge must consider that an offender should not be deprived of liberty if less restrictive sanctions may be appropriate in the circumstances. A minimum fine does not allow the particular circumstances of the offender to be taken into account. Given that in Ontario there is no organized scheme for community service, the judge who seeks an alternative solution, or even a means of encouraging payment of the fine, has little room to manoeuvre. I therefore propose a purposive sentencing approach, like the one adopted by the Court in R. v. Proulx, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, 2000 SCC 5, at paras. 55 and 127, in order to determine if imposing a conditional sentence in default of the payment of a fine is an error in principle. As the following reasons will make clear, I find that it is not.

Digitized by Google

Comparison Between Fines and Conditional Sentences

In Proulx, supra, the Court established a gradation of sentences. At one end of the spectrum are restorative sentences and at the other, punitive sentences. Lamer C.J. described restorative justice as follows (at para. 18):

A restorative justice approach seeks to remedy the adverse effects of crime in a manner that addresses the needs of all parties involved. This is accomplished, in part, through the rehabilitation of the offender, reparations to the victim and to the community, and the promotion of a sense of responsibility in the offender and acknowledgment of the harm done . . . .

Thus, in R. v. Gladue, [1999] 1 S.C.R. 688, at para. 43:

Restorative sentencing goals do not usually correlate with the use of prison as a sanction.

Releases and suspended sentences are therefore classified as restorative sentences.

In Proulx, supra, the Court discusses two punitive sentences, namely, incarceration and conditional sentences, insisting that the latter form of sentence is also consistent with the objectives of restorative justice (at para. 22):

The conditional sentence incorporates some elements of non-custodial measures and some others of incarceration. Because it is served in the community, it will generally be more effective than incarceration at achieving the restorative objectives of rehabilitation, reparations to the victim and community, and the promotion of a sense of responsibility in the offender. However, it is also a punitive sanction capable of achieving the objectives of denunciation and deterrence. [Emphasis omitted.]

The analysis developed in Proulx did not concern fines, but it seems obvious to me that the imposition of a fine has little in common with restorative justice. In fact, while the offender is allowed to go free, and while this type of sentence promotes a sense of responsibility in the offender, fines do not help to repair the harm caused to the victim. In contrast, when an offender is subject to a probation order in the context of a remedial order, the court can order that he or she make restitution to the victim on one or a number of counts (s. 738 Cr. C.). Furthermore, there is no follow up that can ensure that an individual ordered to pay a fine will develop a sense of his or her responsibility. Finally, in the case of an impecunious offender, the restorative objective of rehabilitation will perhaps never be achieved if he or she does not manage to pay the fine. A fine imposed on the offender, especially on one of limited means, is therefore nothing other than a punishment.

A fine is, nevertheless, the least severe sanction to qualify as punitive justice, just like conditional sentences. In the Criminal Code, the provisions concerning fines (s. 734) are found before those dealing with conditional sentences (s. 742). In terms of the gradation of sentences, and if all the necessary nuances are made to take into consideration the offender's wealth or poverty and the terms that can be imposed on conditional sentences, these two forms of punishment, when combined, give the judge the latitude necessary to tailor the sentence when a punitive order must be given. Thus they naturally coalesce.

The issue raised in this case is whether a judge can use the discretion at his or her disposal (s. 718.3(1) Cr. C.) in sentencing to order a conditional sentence in default of payment of a fine.

Digitized by Google

Conditional Sentences in Default of Payment of Fines

It is accepted that the sentencing judge has the discretion to impose imprisonment in default of payment of a fine (ss. 718.3 and 734.7 Cr. C.). It is just as indisputable that the judge is not obliged to allow time for payment (s. 734.7(2) Cr. C.). The issue is thus limited to determining the power of the judge to impose imprisonment in default of payment when he or she knows that imprisonment is, in practice, the sanction actually imposed for the offence committed.

If this were a well-to-do smuggler who had concealed his assets beyond the reach of justice and who had informed the court of his intention not to pay, I believe that the judge could, without risk of criticism, make such an order. There are circumstances in which imprisonment in default of payment of a fine is, in practice, the only way to punish an offender. Such an order does not therefore amount to a travesty of Parliament's intent.

The sentencing options given by Binnie J. in his opinion are not alternative solutions to payment of the fine. They are but methods for encouraging payment. A refusal to issue or renew a licence or a permit, or a decision to suspend them, remains in force "until the fine is paid in full". They do not, therefore, replace the fine (s. 734.5 Cr. C.). Similarly, civil enforcement of a debt (s. 734.6 Cr. C.) is often impossible when the offender is, as in this case, impecunious. In such a case, repeated visits by the bailiffs are only incentives, admittedly oppressive ones, but serve no truly penological purpose.

The court can always order the offender to submit to an organized community service scheme enabling him or her to repay the fine (s. 736 Cr. C.). However, no scheme of this kind exists here. Further, just as with the refusal or suspension of licences and civil enforcement, this option could restrict the offender's liberty even more than a conditional sentence that is flexible and tailored to the circumstances, such as the one imposed in this case, at least from the offender's point of view.

The Criminal Code therefore confers discretion on the judge to impose imprisonment in default of payment of a fine when he or she knows that imprisonment is, in practice, the sanction actually imposed for the offence committed. With the existence of this discretion established, it must now be asked if it could be used here to tailor the sentence imposed on an indigent offender.

The Judge's Order

First, one might object that a judge who rules out imprisonment cannot then order a conditional sentence. It is also submitted that a conditional sentence can only be ordered when the offender is sentenced to a term of imprisonment of less than two years.

Contrary to what Binnie J. seems to suggest, the trial judge did not really ever contemplate imposing the minimum fine of $9,600 along with a time for payment and a period of imprisonment in the event of default. In my view, he would have preferred to impose a suspended sentence: "I am satisfied that, but for the minimum fine provisions, this would be a case for a suspended sentence." The law, however, did not authorize him to pass such a sentence. Moreover, he was authorized to impose a term of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. In the context of his judgment, I believe that the distinction between imprisonment and incarceration made by Lamer C.J. in Proulx, supra, at paras. 21 and 40, must apply:

Digitized by Google

The conditional sentence . . . is a meaningful alternative to incarceration for less serious and non-dangerous offenders.

. . .

Although a conditional sentence is by statutory definition a sentence of imprisonment, this Court, in R. v. Shropshire, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 227, at para. 21, recognized that there "is a very significant difference between being behind bars and functioning within society while on conditional release". See also Cunningham v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 143, at p. 150, per McLachlin J. These comments are equally applicable to the conditional sentence. Indeed, offenders serving a conditional sentence in the community are only partially deprived of their freedom. Even if their liberty is restricted by the conditions attached to their sentence, they are not confined to an institution and they can continue to attend to their normal employment or educational endeavours. They are not deprived of their private life to the same extent. Nor are they subject to a regimented schedule or an institutional diet.

When the trial judge states that the offender is not a candidate for imprisonment, I believe that he means that he does not think it necessary to incarcerate him. The trial judge is the one on the front lines. Even if some of his reasons could be perceived as interfering with the domain of prison authorities, and as such debatable as a strict matter of law, they denote a keen awareness of reality and a pragmatism that often eludes the appellate courts. In giving reasons for the conditional sentence, the judge expresses himself clearly:

Here, I have to impose much more than that [the judge is referring here to a case where he imposed a lesser fine for a more serious crime] and that is Parliament's wish and I have to give effect to that wish. On the other hand, I cannot blind myself to two circumstances. Firstly, if there was a regime in this province permitting offenders to work off the fines, this entire discussion would be obviated. Secondly, there is a very difficult tendency where sentences do not end up being translated within the system in the appropriate fashion. . . . It is one thing to impose an eight-year sentence. It's another thing to understand that the person is within the community on day parole within a fraction of that period. If I impose a 90-day sentence, for example, it may well be that Mr. Wu will be released within a matter of days through a work program. If I impose a 90-day sentence, it may well be that Mr. Wuwill be released within a matter of days with a bracelet. It may be that Mr. Wu will be released simply because they only have so many rooms at the inn, so to speak, and he is not a dangerous individual and it's a revolving door situation. I have to be mindful of the fact that if I incarcerate someone for a non-violent offence, that it is also a great tax and concern to the community.

At the end of the day, I don't see that this individual needs to be detained or confined in a correctional facility. I am satisfied that a conditional sentence is appropriate in light of the instructions of the Supreme Court that a conditional sentence with appropriate, severe conditions is a significant deterrent and denunciatory penalty. There is an element of public education. But this is for a first offender having been involved in very minimal behaviour and, of course, nothing that occurred during the defence is at all relevant.

The factual circumstances in this case do not lead to the conclusion that the judge did not want to impose imprisonment in default of payment. The judge wanted to impose a realistic and suitable punishment. He was aware that a warrant of committal would perhaps, in practice, not be executed and, above all, did not believe that incarceration was necessary. I would not, therefore, regard the reasons given by the judge as a justification for concluding that the judge could not order imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. In practice, a judge who does not give time for payment orders imprisonment. In this case, the trial judge was entirely aware of this when he made his decision.

Digitized by Google

The important issue, rather, is whether, knowing that the offender did not have any money, the judge could order imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. There is nothing in the text against it, but such an order, at first glance, seems to punish the poor more severely and appears contrary to Parliament's intent. In his opinion, Binnie J. explains this aspect of the matter very well, and I will not dwell on it. I do not dispute that incarceration for civil debts does not befit a civilized society.

Having recognized the principle, I believe it necessary to bring its limits to light. First, poverty is a complex situation. It has consequences on every aspect of the lives of those it afflicts. In the sphere of sentencing, the adjustment required to take into account the poverty of an offender cannot be reduced to a concern for ensuring that absence of means does not become a reason for imprisonment. Numerous authors emphasize the necessity of considering all of the effects of a sentence. B. Hudson states her point of view as follows ("Punishing the Poor: Dilemmas of Justice and Difference", in W. C. Heffernan and J. Kleinig, eds., From Social Justice to Criminal Justice: Poverty and the Administration of Criminal Law (2000), 189, at pp. 205 and 209):

. . .

"[E]quality"of penal treatment is not a simplified sameness of treatment, but punishment of equivalent severity for offences of equal culpability with regard to all relevant circumstances.

Equality can be approached only if a system of sanctions for crimes most strongly correlated with poverty is instituted and which has as key principles not only commensurability of penalty and offense seriousness, but also appropriateness and feasibility of penalty to offender. [Emphasis in original.]

See also P. Pettit, "Indigence and Sentencing in Republican Theory", in Heffernan and Kleinig, supra, 230; A. Ashworth, Sentencing and Criminal Justice(3rd ed. 2000), at pp. 82-83.

Admittedly, not all types of offences lend themselves to conditional sentencing. I do not, however, see any policy grounds that would rule it out in this case. The conditional sentence could and should remain an option open to the sentencing judge so that he or she has the broadest possible range of options for tailoring the sentence.

It is possible that certain offenders with the means to pay their fine might opt to stay in prison rather than pay a fine. It is also conceivable that individuals might choose, for show or on principle, to be put in jail rather than pay the fine. While we are faced with a different situation in the present case, it is not all that different.

The respondent, through his counsel, has supported the judge's decision as far as this Court. Some would argue that this was not by choice, but I believe that the adoption of a paternalistic attitude must be avoided for a number of reasons.

Firstly, a prison term, once served, extinguishes the debt (s. 734.7(4) Cr. C.). An offender, even an impoverished one, should not be deprived of an avenue that is available to those who are more well-to-do. The greater the debt is, the more an offender will be tempted to choose this avenue. Even if, in principle, imprisonment in default of payment is supposed to encourage the payment of fines, in reality, certain offenders use it as a way to pay their debt. I cannot imagine that the most indigent offenders would be excluded simply because they are poor.

Digitized by Google

Secondly, a judge can adjust the conditions of a conditional sentence to take the particular circumstances and essential needs of an impecunious person into account, exercising a flexibility that he or she does not have where the law prescribes a minimum fine. In this case, the terms of the curfew are flexible and are minimal restrictions on the liberty of the respondent (i.e., daily curfew from 6:00 p.m. to 6:00 a.m. for 75 days, except for employment, health or worship reasons and two additional hours of freedom on the weekend).

Thirdly, in order to have a deterrent effect on the general public and on offenders who might not care about their rehabilitation, the fine must be accompanied by an incentive measure, or at least a sanction serving as an alternative measure. The sentence must contribute to respect for the law and to the maintenance of a just and safe society (s. 718 Cr. C.) and cannot therefore be perceived as an order with no real teeth.

Fourthly, the potential end result of a warrant of committal cannot be left to the discretion of the Crown prosecutor.

Fifthly, I believe that the contemporary philosophy of criminal law, which seeks the rehabilitation of offenders, is better served by measures that enable the offender to pay his or her debt to society within a reasonable period after sentencing. Counting on a windfall making it possible to pay the fine does not seem to be the solution. To compensate for the more significant effect of a fine on an impoverished person, the law must be flexible and accept that the less fortunate find themselves in special circumstances.

Conclusion

It is sometimes more prudent for the courts to defer to Parliament in cases of doubt. In this case, however, Parliament cannot, unless it abandons minimum fines, show more flexibility towards the poor. It therefore serves no purpose to disregard the latitude clearly given by the Code.

In my view, the imposition of a fine along with an assurance that the prosecution will not be able to ask for the issuance of an arrest warrant does not constitute a just sanction. This sanction either does not allow an impoverished offender to see the end of his or her sentence in a reasonable time or, for those offenders for whom indebtedness is not a source of constraint, allows the offence to go unpunished. The sentence proposed by my colleague would be, in his opinion, more respectful of the respondent's liberty and of Canadian penological principles. The proposed sentence does not seem to be tailored to the circumstances of the case or respectful of the fundamental principles of the 1996 reforms. The concept of liberty must not be interpreted in an abstract manner. It must be the object of a personalized evaluation that takes the particular circumstances of each case into account and that does not disregard the different impact that certain sentences could have on different individuals.

The sentence handed down by the trial judge is not a panacea. Admittedly, it would have been preferable that the respondent benefit from a fine option program. Unfortunately, no such program was available. The trial judge had to work with the tools at his disposal. In my opinion, his decision was enlightened and sensitive to the particular circumstances of the case. It respected the principles of gradation of sentences and properly balanced the relevant penological goals.

For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

Digitized by Google

Appeal allowed with costs to the respondent, DESCHAMPS J. dissenting. Solicitor for the appellant: Attorney General of Canada, Toronto.

Solicitors for the respondent: Karam, Greenspon, Ottawa. Solicitor for the intervener: Nova Scotia Legal Aid, Halifax.

Her Majesty The Queen v. Pierre Bourque, Court Of Appeal For Ontario, Docket: C40814, Date: 2005 02 18, Application of C.C. Sentencing Retroactively

On appeal from the judgment of Justice W. Dan Chilcott of the Superior Court of Justice dated October 9, 2003.
MACPHERSON J.A.:

INTRODUCTION

[1] Section 734.7 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, as amended by S.C. 1995, c. 22, permits the imprisonment of a person for default in payment of a fine in certain circumstances.

[2] Section 734.7 came into force on September 3, 1996. The issue in this appeal is whether s. 734.7 applies to fines imposed after September 3, 1996, but in relation to offences committed before that date. The question of potential retrospective operation turns on whether s. 734.7 is characterized as a procedural or substantive provision. If it is procedural, retrospective operation is permitted; if it is substantive, such operation is forbidden.

FACTS

[3] The appellant, Pierre Bourque, did not declare $332,000 in income for the taxation years 1989 to 1993, thereby evading federal taxes of $95,212.70. On January 10, 2000, in a summary conviction proceeding, the appellant pleaded guilty before Justice B. T. Ryan of the Ontario Court of Justice to one count of tax evasion contrary to s. 239(1)(d) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.).

[4] On January 31, 2000, Ryan J. imposed a fine of $100,000, to be paid within one year. Ryan J. stated that if the appellant had difficulty paying the fine, he could apply for an extension of time. He cautioned, however, that he would not entertain such an application unless half the fine was paid.

[5] The appellant did not pay the fine. Nor did he apply for an extension of time to pay.

[6] The Crown applied for a warrant of committal to have the appellant incarcerated in default of payment. The application was based on s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code, which provides:

734.7(1) Where time has been allowed for payment of a fine, the court shall not issue a warrant of committal in default of payment of the fine until the expiration of the time allowed for payment of the fine in full; and unless the court is satisfied that the mechanisms provided by sections 734.5 and 734.6 are not appropriate in the circumstances, or that the offender has, without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine or discharge it under section 736.

[7] The matter returned before Ryan J. on June 13, 2003. The appellant argued that Ryan J. had no jurisdiction to entertain the committal proceedings because s. 734.7 could not apply to an offence committed before it came into force. Ryan J.

Digitized by Google

ruled in favour of the Crown, but agreed to adjourn the committal proceedings to permit the appellant to take the matter to a higher court.

[8] The appellant applied to the Superior Court of Justice for an order enjoining Ryan J. from hearing the committal application. In a decision dated October 9, 2003, Chilcott J. dismissed the appellant's application. He concluded:

In my view, s. 734.7 deals with procedure upon default of payment of a fine and, therefore, applies to such proceedings on and after the date of the enactment of the section, regardless of when the offences took place that spawned the default proceedings.

[9] The appellant appeals Chilcott J.'s judgment.

ISSUE

[10] The only issue on the appeal is whether Chilcott J. erred in holding that a warrant of committal issued under s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code can apply to offences committed before s. 734.7 came into force.

ANALYSIS

[11] Statutes that affect substantive rights and liabilities presumptively apply only prospectively. Statutes that change procedure, and do not affect substantive rights and liabilities, apply retrospectively: see Gustavson Drilling (1964) Ltd. v. M.N.R., [1977] 1 S.C.R. 271; Brosseau v. Alberta Securities Commission, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 301; and Re Application Under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248.

[12] The appellant contends that s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code is a substantive provision. It creates a regime in which a punishment of imprisonment can replace a punishment of fine. This change, the appellant submits, imposes a different substantive liability on him. Such a result would be inappropriate in the appellant's case because the offence for which he received the fine (tax evasion) was committed several years before s. 734.7 came into force.

[13] I do not accept this submission. In my view, it is inconsistent with the interpretation of s. 734.7 enunciated in R. v. Wu, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 530.

[14] In Wu, a sentencing judge imposed a fine and, in default of payment, a conditional sentence. The Supreme Court of Canada struck down the conditional sentence component of the punishment. In doing so, the court stated clearly that s. 734.7 did not impose an automatic term of imprisonment for default in payment of a fine. Rather, the proper interpretation of s. 734.7, taking into account its own explicit wording and the important contextual fact of the other changes to the sentencing regime made in the 1995 amendments to the Criminal Code, was that it was designed as a mechanism to encourage an offender to pay a fine. In other words, s. 734.7 serves to enforce a fine, not to impose imprisonment.

[15] In his reasons, Binnie J. examined the history of s. 734.7 and related provisions enacted at the same time and concluded that the purpose of the amendments was to separate inability to pay a fine and a punishment of imprisonment. He also emphasized the words "without reasonable excuse, refused to pay the fine" in s. 734.7(1)(b)(ii). These components of his analysis, taken together, led him to a conclusion which he had presaged early in his reasons, at para. 3:

As will be seen, the purpose of imposing imprisonment in default of payment is to give serious encouragement to offenders with the means to pay a fine to make payment. Genuine inability to pay a fine is not a proper basis for imprisonment. A conditional sentence is a form of imprisonment. Therefore, a conditional sentence is not an appropriate sentence to impose on an offender simply because he or she has no means to pay a fine.

Digitized by Google

[16] This reasoning is applicable in the present case. The appellant will not automatically go to jail for non- payment of his fine. He will have the opportunity to contend that he is unable to pay the fine. If he establishes this, it will constitute a "reasonable excuse" and a warrant of committal will not be issued. On the other hand, if the appellant has the ability to pay the fine, the possibility of imprisonment will provide an incentive to him to pay the fine. In other words, in this second scenario, the possibility of imprisonment is a mechanism − a legitimate one − for enforcing the fine penalty that has already been imposed on him. As an enforcement mechanism, s. 734.7 is a procedural provision that can be applied retrospectively, by virtue of both the canons of statutory interpretation and s. 44(d)(i) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21.

[17] The appellant advances a second argument on the appeal, which his previous counsel appears not to have raised before Ryan and Chilcott JJ. He submits that s. 734.7 of the Criminal Code applies only to indictable offences and that s. 787 is the only provision relating to imprisonment in default of payment of a fine for summary conviction offences.

[18] A complete answer to this submission is that Wu was a summary conviction case.

[19] Finally, the appellant makes an alternative argument based on s. 787(2) of the Criminal Code, which authorizes that "the court may order that in default of payment of the fine … the defendant shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months". The appellant submits that since a term of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine under s. 734.7 can be up to two years, he should be entitled to the benefit of the "lesser" punishment in s. 787 because of s. 11(i) of the Charter and s. 44(e) of the Interpretation Act.

[20] In my view, this argument is misconceived. Although a period of imprisonment for default in payment of a fine imposed as part of an initial sentence under s. 787 is a true punishment, Wu makes it clear that a subsequent imprisonment imposed for a default in payment of a fine imposed under s. 734.7 is not a punishment; rather it is an enforcement mechanism designed "to give serious encouragement to offenders with the means to pay a fine to make payment". In short, the provisions for imprisonment in default of payment of fines in ss. 734.7 and 787 of the Criminal Code are not of the same genus.

DISPOSITION

[21] I would dismiss the appeal.

RELEASED: February 18, 2005 ("JCM")

"J. C. MacPherson J.A."

"I agree Robert J. Sharpe J.A." "I agree E. A. Cronk J.A."

Prosecution on indictment – 239(2)

Every person who is charged with an offence described in subsection 239(1) or 239(1.1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted on indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to a fine of not less than 100% and not more than 200% of where the offence is described in subsection 239(1), the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, and where the offence is described in subsection 239(1.1), the amount by which the amount of the refund or credit obtained or claimed exceeds the amount, if any, of the refund or credit to which the person or other person, as the case may be, is entitled; and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Indictment or Summary Proceedings

Smythe, reproduced following, illustrates that the Crown is in no way limited to one or the other in ways to proceed against an instance of s. 239(1) tax evasion. While it applied only in respect of the Bill of Rights it is also applicable in case of the Charter.

> Conn Stafford Smythe Appellant;
> and
> Her Majesty The Queen Respondent.
> 1971: June 14; 1971: June 28.
> Present: Fauteux C.J. and Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Hall and Spence JJ. ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO
> Taxation—Civil rights—Equality before the law—False and deceptive income tax return—Attorney General electing to proceed by indictment instead of summary conviction—More severe penalties—Canadian Bill of Rights, 1960 (Can.), c. 44, ss. 1, 2—Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, s. 132.
> The appellant was charged with evading income tax payments and with having made false and deceptive statements in his income tax returns, contarary to ss. 132(1) (d) and 132(1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148. Pursuant to s. 132(2), the Attorney General elected that these charges be prosecuted upon indictment, thereby rendering the appellant liable to more severe penalties than if prosecuted by way of summary convicition pursuant to s. 132(1). A judge of the County Court held that he had no jurisdiction to try the charges because s. 132(2) was inoperative by reason of the provisions of ss. 1 and 2 of the *Canadian Bill of Rights, 1*960 (Can.), c. 44. An application by the Attorney General for an Order of mandamus was granted by the High Court of Ontario. This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The appellant appealed to this Court where his fundamental submission is that s. 132(2) is made inoperative because it violates the principle established under s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights of the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law.
> Held: The appeal should be dismissed.
> The provisions of s. 132(2) of the Act are not discriminatory and do not offend the principle of equality before the law. They do not, by themselves, place any particular person or class of persons in a condition of being distinguished from any other member of the community. They are applicable without distinction to everyone. The manner in which a Minister of the Crown exercises a statutory discretionary power conferred upon him for the proper administration of a statute is irrelevant in the consideration of the question whether the statute, in itself, offends the principle of equality before the law. Enforcement of the law and especially of the criminal law would be impossible unless someone in authority be vested with some measure of discretionary power. If an authority such as the Attorney General can have the right to decide whether or not a person shall be prosecuted, surely he may, if authorized by statute, have the right to decide what form the prosecution shall take. The situation is not altered because s. 132(2) provides for a minimum term of imprisonment. Before the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights, the discretion of the Attorney General to elect the mode of prosecution as he saw fit was part of the British and Canadian conception of equality before the law. It is not possible to infer from the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights any suggestion that Parliament diferred from that view or had any intention to depart so radically from that state of law. The appellant's submission is tantamount to a recognition that Parliament has used an oblique method to paralyse the administration of the law.

Digitized by Google

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[133], affirming a judgment of the High Court which had granted an Order of mandamus. Appeal dismissed.
John J. Robinette, Q.C., for the appellant.
Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., and N.A. Chalmers, Q.C., for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by
THE CHIEF JUSTICE—This is an appeal from a unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[1] refusing to set aside an Order of Mandamus issued by Chief Justice Wells of the High Court, whereby he directed His Honour Judge Joseph P. Kelly, a judge of the County Court Judge's Criminal Court for the County of York or some other judge of that court, to proceed with the trial of the appellant on an indictment presented in that court.
The circumstances leading to this appeal may be stated briefly. By information, sworn to on July 9, 1969, the appellant was charged to have, between April 28, 1965 and March 2, 1968, evaded income tax payments in the amount of $289,372.33 and also to have made false and deceptive statements in his income tax returns for taxation years 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1967, committing thereby infractions respectively described in s. 132(1) (d) and in s. 132(1) (a) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, as amended.
Pursuant to s. 132(2) of the Act, the Attorney General of Canada elected that these charges be prosecuted upon indictment. The accused elected trial by a county court judge alone and, after a preliminary inquiry, was committed for trial on February 18, 1970. An indictment was then preferred with respect to these charges by the agent of the Attorney General of Canada. On October 5, 1970, the accused appeared before His Honour Judge Kelly and after being arraigned on the indictment, without any plea having been taken, his counsel moved to quash the indictment on the ground that s. 132(2) of the Income Tax Act was inoperative by reason of the provisions of ss. 1 and 2 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, 1960 (Can.), c. 44, and that the presiding judge had therefore no jurisdiction to try the charges for the alleged infractions of s. 132(1) of the Income Tax Act. The learned judge allowed this motion to quash. He held that the provisions of s. 132(2) permitting the Attorney General of Canada to proceed by indictment at his election,—in which event the accused is liable to more severe penalties than if prosecuted by way of summary conviction pursuant to s. 132(1),—were repugnant to the requirement of s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights that every law of Canada be construed and applied so as not to abrogate the right to equality before the law. The learned judge relied on the decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon in State of Oregon v. Pirkey[134] which was subsequently applied by the Supreme Court of the State of Washington in Olsen v. Delmore[135] and he declined to follow the unanimous judgment rendered in Regina v. Court of the

[133] [1971] 2 O.R. 209, 13 C.R.N.S. 33, [1971] 3 C.C.C. (2d) 97, 17 D.L.R. (3d) 389
[134] (1955), 281 P. (2d) 698
[135] (1956), 295 P. (2d) 324

Digitized by Google

Sessions of the Peace et al., ex parte Lafleur[136]

where the Court of Appeal for the province of Quebec had rejected as ill founded a similar argument made in a case similar to the present.

The Attorney General of Canada then applied to the High Court for an Order of Mandamus. The application was heard and ultimately granted by Chief Justice Wells. In lengthy reasons for judgment, the Chief Justice of the High Court reviewed the history of the Office of the Attorney General, found that the discretion of the latter to conduct criminal proceedings as he saw fit was, at the time of the coming into force of the Canadian Bill of Rights, part of the British and Canadian conception of equality before the law, held that in view of the existing difference in the system of Government in Canada and that of the United States of America, the cases decided in the American State Courts had no application in Canada notwithstanding any similarity of wording between the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America and the relevant provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights and, finally, he held that the refusal of the Supreme Court of Canada to grant leave to appeal from the judgment in the Lafleur case, supra, made that judgment binding upon him. The appeal of Smythe from this judgment of the High Court was dismissed at the conclusion of the argument. Delivering orally the judgent for the Court of Appeal, Chief Justice Gale referred to the decision in Lafleur, supra, and the refusal of this Court to grant leave to appeal from the same; and the learned Chief Justice also pointed out that in Regina v. Drybones[137] there was no suggestion in any of the reasons for judgment that the correctness of the decision in the Lafleur case was in doubt. Hence the present appeal to this Court.

It is convenient, at the outset, to reproduce the provisions of s. 132(2) of the Income Tax Act and state the substance of appellant's submissions expressed in the concluding paragraphs of his factum.

132. (2) Every person who is charged with an offence described by subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted upon indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years and not less than 2 months.

In appellant's views, s. 132(2) is made inoperative by the Canadian Bill of Rights because:

the section violates the principle established under s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights., that is "the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law";

in the alternative, the section violates s. 2(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights in that it authorizes the Attorney General to decide in advance, when at the highest he can only have prima facie evidence before him, that the sentence must be at least two months should the accused be convicted;

in the further alternative, the section violates s. 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights in that the Attorney General can decide in advance without any hearing at all, much less a fair hearing, that the sentence must be at least two months if the accused is convicted and this at a time when the Minister of Justice can at the highest only have prima facie evidence before him.

In essence, appellant's basic submission is that the unfettered discretionary power, conferred by s. 132(2) upon the Attorney General of Canada, to decide whether

---

[136] [1967] 3 C.C.C. 244, [1967] Que. Q.B. 405, 49 C.R. 333, 66 D.T.C. 5441

[137] [1970] S.C.R. 282, 10 C.R.N.S. 334, [1970] 3 C.C.C. 355, 9 D.L.R. (3d) 473

Digitized by Google

a person charged of an offence under s. 132(1) should be prosecuted by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment,—and thus be subjected, if convicted, to more severe mandatory penalties in the latter than in the former case,—constitutes a disparity or discrimination completely destructive of the concept of equality before the law. It is argued that there being no standard whatsoever set out or even indicated in s. 132(2) to guide or control this unfettered discretionary power, the Attorney General of the day is empowered to treat differently persons charged under s. 132(1) or to treat differently cases which are similar, or to require less serious cases to proceed by indictment or to adopt a policy which differs from that of another Attorney General and which may even vary, in its application, from province to province and from city to city.

In my opinion, appellant's views fail to recognize that the provisions of s. 132(2) do not, by themselves, place any particular person or class of persons in a condition of being distinguished from any other member of the community and that, applicable without distinction to everyone, as indeed they are, these provisions simply confer upon the Attorney General of Canada the power of deciding, according to his own judgment and in all cases, the mode of prosecution for offences described in s. 132(1). Appellant's arguments also fail to recognize that the manner in which a Minister of the Crown exercises a statutory discretionary power conferred upon him for the proper administration of a Statute is irrelevant in the consideration of the question whether the Statute, in itself, offends the principle of equality before the law. Obviously, the manner in which the Attorney General of the day exercises his statutory discretion may be questioned or censured by the legislative body to which he is answerable, but that again is foreign to the determination of the question now under consideration. Enforcement of the law and especially of the criminal law would be impossible unless someone in authority be vested with some measure of discretionary power. The following statements made in the Lafleur case, supra, at page 248, by Montgomery J., with the concurrence of Chief Justice Tremblay and Pratte J., are to the point and I adopt them.

I cannot conceive of a system of enforcing the law where some one in authority is not called upon to decide whether or not a person should be prosecuted for an alleged offence. Inevitably there will be cases where one man is prosecuted while another man, perhaps equally guilty, goes free. A single act, or series of acts, may render a person liable to prosecution in more than one charge, and someone must decide what charges are to be laid. If an authority such as the Attorney-General can have the right to decide whether or not a person shall be prosecuted, surely he may, if authorized by statute, have the right to decide what form the prosecution shall take. I cannot see that the situation is altered because s. 132(2) provides for a minimum term of imprisonment.

I am also in complete agreement with the view expressed in the present case by Chief Justice Wells who concluded that before the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights, the discretion of the Attorney General to elect the mode of prosecution as he saw fit was part of the British and Canadian conception of equality before the law. And I am unable to infer from the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights any suggestion that Parliament differed from that view or had any intention to depart so radically from that state of the law. Indeed, if appellant's fundamental submission was acceded to, some thirty sections of the Criminal Code and others in some forty Canadian statutes where, as in s. 132(2), the power to elect to proceed by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment is conferred, would be rendered inoperative. In brief, appellant's submission is potentially destructive of statutory ministerial discretion conferred upon a Minister of the Crown for the administration of the law in Canada and tantamount to a recognition that Parliament has used an oblique method to paralyze the administration of the law.

Digitized by Google

With respect to the decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon in the Pirkey case, supra, as well as that of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington in Olsen v. Delmore, supra, I agree that these decisions are of no assistance in view of the differences existing between the systems of Government obtaining in Canada and in the United States of America. And I may, incidentally, point out that, as appears by the following extract of the reasons for judgment delivered by Brand J., in the Pirkey case, this decision rests mainly on the fact that, contrary to what is the case in Canada, the distinction between a felony and a misdemeanor still obtains in the United States of America. The extract can be found at p. 703 of the report:

Since the provision for punishment constitutes one element in the definition of a crime, it would appear that this statute, in effect, defines two crimes as a matter of substantive law; one a felony, and the other a misdemeanor. And since the statute itself furnishes no criterion by which to determine when an accused is to be charged with felony, and when with a misdemeanor, the statute, at least insofar as it provides for alternative charges, must be void by reason of constitutional mandate, unless a criterion not set forth in the statute can be implied therefrom, and unless the power to apply it can be delegated to the grand jury or magistrate.

In my opinion, the provisions of s. 132(2) of the Income Tax Act are not discriminatory and do not offend the principle of equality before the law. It follows that appellant's basic submission must be rejected as ill founded.

In these views, I find it unnecessary to say more with respect to the appellant's two alternative submissions, than that I am unable to find any substance in either. Suffice it to say that prima facie evidence tendered in an ex parte application before a justice of the peace is sufficient to permit him to compel, either by summons or warrant, the appearance before the court of the person charged and that prima facie evidence may also permit a justice of the peace to commit the person charged for trial at the end of the preliminary inquiry. To invite a person to be charged to make representations to the Attorney General before an information is laid before a justice of the peace would, in many cases and surely in most of the important ones, be tantamount to an invitation to that person to abscond. The following comments made by Kerwin J., as he then was, in

Dallman v. The King[138], at the bottom of page 344, is here relevant:

However, the gist of this ground of appeal is that the appelant is the. only one entitled to exercise the option as to the mode of trial. It would be strange if that were so as it would mean that a person against whom it was decided to prefer charges would first have to be found in order to ascertain his wishes in that regard; and we are clearly of opinion that this contention cannot prevail.

I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

In R. v. Century 21 Ramos Realty Inc.[139] on the issue of equality of pretence of proceedings the Ontario Appeal Court held:

Whether Subsection 239(1) of the Income Tax Act Conferring on the Attorney

[138] [1942] S.C.R. 339, 77 C.C.C. 289, [1942] 3 D.L.R. 145.
[139] 1987 CanLII 171 (ON CA)

Digitized by Google

General of Canada the Right to Elect to Proceed by Indictment or by Summary Conviction Contravenes Section 15 of the Charter The appellant challenges the constitutional validity of sections 613(4), 748, 755 and 771 of the Criminal Code on the ground that these provisions violate sections 7, 11(h), 11(h) and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In fact, his challenge must be taken to be to section 239 of the Income Tax Act, under which he was charged and convicted, because it is a hybrid offence provision.

His submissions that section 15 of the Charter is violated by the Criminal Code sections mentioned are not based, per se, on the procedures therein set out, but rather on those procedures as compared to procedures that would have applied if the election provided for in section 239 for prosecuting upon indictment had been taken. Subsection (1) of section 239 provides:

Every person who has

. . . . .

...

d) wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade, compliance with this Act or payment of taxes imposed by this Act,

is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to a fine of not less than 25% and not more than double the amount of the tax that was sought to be evaded, or both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years.

However, subsection (2) permits the Attorney General of Canada to choose an alternate proceeding:

Every person who is charged with an offence described by subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted upon indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years and not less than 2 months.

In the present case the Attorney General did not elect to prosecute upon indictment, thereby proceeding under subsection (1) and the relevant provisions in Part XXIV of the Criminal Code. Thus the appeal provisions in sections 613(4), 748, 755 and 771 of the Criminal Code came into operation and it is these provisions to which the appellant objects as compared to the procedures that would have been applicable if the prosecution had proceeded upon indictment. The question to be addressed, therefore, is whether the distinctions between the rights of appeal in summary conviction offences, which applied to the appellant, and those in indictable offences, which did not, violate sections 7, 11(h) and 15 of the Charter.

Section 15 of the Charter provides:

"Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination, and in particular without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability."

Perhaps the best way to discuss the possible meaning of the equality rights in section 15 of the Charter is to start with the first opinion expressed on the issue by this Court in Re McDonald and The Queen (1985), 21

C.C.C. (3d) 330. At 349 Morden, J.A. put forth the basic proposition that:

"... [T]he purpose of s. 15 is to require "that those who are similarly situated be treated similarly": Tussman and tenBroek, "The Equal Protection of the Laws", 37 Cal. L. Rev. 341 (1948), at p. 344."

Digitized by Google

In the subsequent case of R. v. R.L. (1986), 26 C.C.C. (3d) 417, Morden, J.A. added a second observation as to the "essentially relational nature of equality". His two propositions were stated thus at 424-25:

"... The essentially relational nature of equality has been described as follows. "The concept of equality is, by definition, relational or comparative. A person can only be found to be equal in relation to or in comparison with some other person who serves as a standard or criterion." Monroe H. Freedman, "Equality in the Administration of Criminal Justice", Nomos IX (1967) 250 at pp. 253-4. The concern for equality is that those who are similarly situated with respect to the purpose of the law be treated similarly: see Tussman and tenBroek ... and Re McDonald and The Queen ... referring to the Tussman and tenBroek article."

The views of Morden, J.A. in Re McDonald were subsequently referred to with approval by Howland, C.J.O. and Robins, J.A. in their dissenting opinion in Reference re an Act to Amend the Education Act (1986), 53 O.R. (2d) 513 at 554-55, and by Dubin, J.A. in Re Blainey and Ontario Hockey Association (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 513 at 524-25. It was applied by this court in Bregman and Bregman v. Attorney General for Canada (unreported, released 29, November 1986) to hold that someone who was a member of an allied force at a time when he had no connection with Canada, even though he subsequently became a citizen, is not "similarly situated" to someone who was domiciled in Canada when he joined an allied force for the purpose of the war.

Applying this approach, the determination of whether two or more particular classes of persons are in fact similarly situated becomes the analytical point of departure in any section 15 analysis. It would seem that if persons are held not to be similarly situated, then no further analysis is required. However, it is not always clear whether persons are or are not similarly situated, and whether, even if they are not, this is relevant to a section 15 inquiry. It is necessary to be cautious in this classification. It is usually possible to find differences between classes of persons and, on the basis of these differences, conclude that the persons are not similarly situated. However, what are perceived to be significant "differences" between persons or classes of persons could be the result of stereotypes based on existing inequalities which the equality provisions of the Charter are designed to eliminate, not perpetuate. The effects of past discrimination between classes of persons can result in these classes in fact not being similarly situated. Certain differences, such as the biological ones between the sexes, result in there being no actual comparable class, as with respect to reproductive issues. While some of these situations may well require differential treatment in the interests of equality, it is important that some differences between the classes of persons not operate to prevent a valid section 15 equality analysis by concluding that classes are not similarly situated. Rather, the determination of whether persons are similarly situated must also consider the relevance of the differences and, thus, the question ought to be whether the differences among those being treated differently by the legislation in question are relevant for the purposes of that legislation.

In the present case, the two relevant classes of persons are those persons whose acquittals for indictable offences are being appealed and those persons whose acquittals for summary conviction offences are being appealed. It is not clear, however, that these are the types of classifications contemplated by section 15 of the Charter. In considering whether the Crown's discretion to proceed either by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment violated the equality provision of the Canadian Bill of Rights, Fauteux, C.J.C. in R. v. Smythe, [1971] S.C.R. 680; 3 C.C.C

Digitized by Google

(2d) 366, stated at 685 (C.C.C. 370):
"In my opinion, appellant's views fail to recognize that the provisions of s. 132(2) [present s. 239] do not, by themselves place any particular person or class of persons in a condition of being distinguished from any other member of the community and that, applicable without distinction to everyone, as indeed they are, these provisions simply confer upon the Attorney-General of Canada the power of deciding, according to his own judgment and in all cases, the mode of prosecution for offences described in s. 132(1)."
A similar issue was addressed by the Oregon Supreme Court in State v. Clark, 630 P. 2d 810 (1981), in considering whether the distinction between those persons accorded a preliminary hearing because charged by information, and those persons denied such a hearing because indicted, violated the equal protection guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. With regard to the term "class", the court held, at p. 816:
"The terms "class" and "classification" are invoked sometimes to mean whatever distinction is created by the challenged law itself and sometimes to refer to a law's disparate treatment of persons or groups by virtue of characteristics which they have apart from the law in question. Familiar examples of the latter kind of "class" are personal characteristics such as sex, ethnic background, legitimacy, past or present residency or military service. On the other hand, every law itself can be said to "classify" what it covers from what it excludes. For instance, the rule of this court that limits the time for filing a petition for review ... "classifies" persons by offering the "privilege" of review to those who file within 30 days and denying it to those who file later. Similarly, a law that licenses opticians and optometrists to perform different functions. See Williamson v. Lee Optical, 348 U.S. 483 ... (1955), does not grant or deny privileges to classes of persons whose characteristics are those of "opticians" and "optometrists"; rather, the law creates these classes by the licensing scheme itself. Attacks on such laws as "class legislation" therefore tend to be circular and, as the above quotations from early decisions show, have generally been rejected whenever the law leaves it open to anyone to bring himself or herself within the favoured class on equal terms ..." With respect to the classification suggested by the defendant, that is, those persons who are indicted, and those persons who are charged by information, the court held, at 817-18:
"... [W]e think this is an example of the "circular" use of the concept of "class" mentioned above. The distinction to be tested is the use or nonuse of preliminary hearings. The "classes" said to fail the test of equal protection are the "class" of those defendants who receive preliminary hearings (because charged by information) and the "class" of those who do not (because indicted). But these defendants do not exist as categories or as classes with distinguishing characteristics before and apart from a prosecutor's decision who to charge — one, or some, or all defendants. Aside from the manner in which the decision is made, see City of Klamath Falls, ... 619 P. 2d 217..., defendants charged under either procedure are "classes" only as an effect of the dual procedural scheme itself ..."
Similarly, the intervenant submits, it is not so much the provisions of the Criminal Code that distinguish any particular person or class of persons from any other member of the community, as that all members of the community are equally subject to the dual procedure. He argues that there are no personal characteristics or attributes of an individual person or class of persons upon which the distinction is drawn. Rather, the distinction is based on the Attorney General's judgment with regard to the act allegedly committed by the accused. As in Clark, the categories of accused persons do not exist as categories or classes with distinguishing characteristics before and apart from the Attorney General's decision of how to charge them.

Digitized by Google

We would not be prepared to accept the proposition that it is necessary, if the persons alleging a section 15 infringement are to succeed, that these persons constitute categories or classes with distinguishing characteristics before and apart from the prosecutor's decision. It is true that there are no personal characteristics or attributes of an individual person or class of persons upon which the distinction in this case is drawn. However, in a section 15 case the question is not whether those alleging a violation of their equality rights have differences which exist independently of the law, but rather, whether the law treats those persons differently. Nonetheless we would be wise to heed the caution of the Court in Clark about avoiding the circular use of the term "class" in an analysis of equality.

However, assuming that persons charged with indictable offences and persons charged with summary conviction offences can be considered classes for the purpose of a section 15 analysis, it must then be determined whether these classes are similarly situated.

In the context of offences which are classified exclusively as indictable offences, such as murder, on the one hand, and those classified exclusively as summary conviction offences, such as fraudulently obtaining food or lodging, on the other hand, it is not difficult to conclude that persons charged with these indictable offences are not in the same class as persons charged with these summary conviction offences. The differences between these classes of persons, namely, the seriousness of the offence committed, can be seen to be relevant to the general purpose of the criminal procedure provisions of the Criminal Code, that is, providing the accused with a fair trial and appeal. Since the indictable offences carry with them harsher penalties, that is, greater threats to the liberty of the accused, the legislation demands that greater safeguards be provided.

However, this distinction becomes somewhat less clear in the context of hybrid offences. The choice of procedure in hybrid offences could also be seen to be based on the degree of seriousness of the offence. This choice is not made on an a priori basis, but rather, is left to the discretion of the Attorney General to determine according to the particular circumstances of the case. However, where a hybrid offence is involved two virtually identical cases may nevertheless be treated differently if the Attorney General elects to proceed by indictment in one, and by summary conviction in the other. While the differential treatment thereby accorded these persons may well be justifiable in some cases, it may be difficult to conclude that two persons who have committed the same offence are not in fact similarly situated for the purpose of a section 15 analysis. It would appear that the appellant is attempting to compare either the general class of the persons charged with indictable offences with the general class of persons charged with summary conviction offences, or the somewhat narrower class of persons involved in an appeal concerning summary conviction offences with persons involved in an appeal concerning indictable offences. Nevertheless, it is necessary to proceed to the next step of a section 15 analysis, namely, whether differential treatment within the context of hybrid offences constitutes "discrimination" within the meaning of section 15. There are at least two approaches to the meaning of the term "without discrimination" in section 15, whether it prohibits any distinction or only such distinctions as are invidious, unreasonable or unjustifiable. These two approaches were set out by Morden, J.A. in the McDonald case, supra, at 348-49:

Digitized by Google

"... On the one hand, the section can be read as providing that there is no infringement unless there is unequal treatment resulting from discrimination, that is, discrimination in the sense of invidiousness — unjustifiability, unreasonableness or irrelevance. On this approach, putting it in its simplest terms, there would be no infringement unless the person alleging infringement could show an inequality that was unreasonably imposed: see Gold, "A Principled Approach to Equality Rights", 4 Supreme Court L.R. 131 (1982), at pp. 151-3, where this approach discussed on the basis that "the equality rights ... in the Charter contain within them a non-absolutist conception" without reference in this part of the article to the words "without discrimination". On the other hand, it has been argued that discrimination should be read in a neutral sense, as meaning merely distinction or classification, with the result that "s. 15 should be interpreted as providing for the universal application of every law. Where a law draws a distinction between individuals, on any ground, that distinction is sufficient to constitute a breach of s. 15, and to move the constitutional issue to s. 1 [to consider whether the law is justified]": Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 2nd ed. (1985), pp. 799- 801."

Chief Justice Howland and Robins, J.A., in their dissenting opinion in the Education Act Reference, supra, at 554-55, although also not needing to choose between the two approaches, clearly recognized that more than just the making of distinctions is necessary before finding that section 15 is infringed;

"... There is no infringement of the section unless the unequal treatment is discriminatory. Most laws provide for distinctions and prescribe different results based on those distinctions. Indeed, a State could not function without classifying its citizens for various purposes and treating some differently from others. As Mr. Justice Stewart pointed out in his discussion of the equal protection clause of the U.S. Fourteenth Amendment in San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez (1973), 411 U.S. 1 at p. 60: "There is hardly a law on the books that does not affect some people differently from others." Similarly, although spoken in a different context, Chief Justice Dickson said at p. 347 S.C.R., p. 362 D.L.R. of Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, "... the interests of true equality may well require differentiation in treatment" ..."

We agree. The reasons for rejecting the neutral approach, which would hold any distinction to be in violation of section 15, were persuasively summarized by McLachlin, J.A. for the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1986] 4 W.W.R. 242 at 249-50:

"It cannot have been the intention of Parliament to guarantee a general right against unequal treatment. Almost all statutes draw distinctions between individuals. It cannot be supposed that in all such cases the individual's constitutional rights are infringed. To call every legislative distinction between people an infringement of s. 15 is to trivialize the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Charter.

Second, such an approach deprives the phrase "without discrimination" of content:

provided the treatment is unequal, one passes immediately to s. 1 of the Charter. That would run counter to accepted canons of statutory interpretation. Hogg, p. 800 acknowledges this problem, but says, because "discrimination" is ambiguous and can be read in a "neutral sense", it should be taken to remit the entire question of justification to s. 1. I cannot accept that view. "Discrimination" must be taken to have meaning within s. 15 itself.

Digitized by Google

Third, it cannot have been the intention of Parliament that the government be put to the requirement of establishing under s. 1 that all laws which draw distinction between people are "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". If weighing of the justifiability of unequal treatment is neither required nor permitted under s. 15, the result will be that such universally accepted and manifestly desirable legal distinctions as those prohibiting children or drunk persons from driving motor vehicles will be viewed as violations of fundamental rights and be required to run the gauntlet of s. 1."

Although we find her fourth reason for rejecting a neutral interpretation of section 15 less persuasive than the three quoted above, it adds a caution worth contemplating (at 250-1):

"Finally, it may further be contended that to define "discrimination" under s. 15 as synonymous with unequal treatment on the basis of personal classification will be to elevate

s. 15 to the position of subsuming the other rights and freedoms defined by the Charter ... That, however, may be what will become of s. 15 if it is interpreted as being violated by any distinction or unequal treatment. Section 15, like the 14th Amendment in the United States Constitution will dwarf the other provisions of the Charter and be the central issue in virtually all Charter litigation. Laws which do not violate any other fundamental right or freedom will almost always (if the United States experience is any guide) be alleged to violate s. 15 because the legislature classified or failed to classify. Even though legislation does not violate any other sections, it will always be required to run the gauntlet of ss. 15 and 1. In my view, this cannot have been the intention of the enactors of the Charter. To interpret s. 15 as other than a section guaranteeing equal protection and benefit without discrimination in the sense of unequal treatment that is unfair or unjustified is to quote Dickson J. [now C.J.C.] "to overshoot [its] actual purpose": Big M Drug Mart, supra, at p. 344."

Without a detailed and definitive analysis of what would be a proper test for the pejorative view of the words "without discrimination" in section 15, we are content for the purposes of this case to adopt that of Madam Justice McLachlin in the Andrews case, supra, at 253:

"... The ultimate question is whether a fair-minded person, weighing the purposes of legislation against its effects on the individuals adversely affected and giving due weight to the right of the legislature to pass laws for the good of all, would conclude that the legislative means adopted are unreasonable or unfair."

In the more recent case of R. v. LeGallant (1987), 54 C.R. (3d) 46 at 55, Hinkson, J.A., also for the British Columbia Court of Appeal, expressed it in these terms:

"... [D]iscrimination involves the drawing of an unreasonable or unjustifiable distinction. The question to be answered in determining whether or not law is discriminatory is whether the law is reasonable or fair, having regard to its purpose and effect. Involved in this approach there is the consideration that a law may be discriminatory if it treats some persons unduly prejudicially."

On this point it is interesting to note that although the French version of the equality rights provision in the European Convention on Human Rights (art. 14) uses the words "sans distinction aucune", the European Court of Human Rights, in the Belgian Linguistic case (1968), 1 E.H.R.R. 252 at 284, decided that the pejorative implication of the English words "without discrimination" was more appropriate:

Digitized by Google

"... [T]he principle of equality of treatment is violated if the distinction has no objective and reasonable justification. The existence of such a justification must be assessed in relation to the aim and effects of the measure under consideration, regard being had to the principles which normally prevail in democratic societies. A difference of treatment in the exercise of a right laid down in the convention must not only pursue a legitimate aim:

Article 14 is likewise violated when it is clearly established that there is no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised."

To apply the pejorative or adverse test to this case, we have to ask whether the different rights of appeal in a summary conviction offence, as against those in an indictable offence, do pose an inherent disadvantage. The appellant submits that he is disadvantaged because in summary conviction procedures the Crown has a right of appeal from an acquittal on questions of fact, which it does not have on appeals in proceedings by indictment. In determining this issue it is useful to consider the decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon in City of Klamath Falls v. Winters, 619 P. 2d 217 (1980).The court, at 225, considered whether the differences in appeal rights available to defendants prosecuted in district court as compared with those available to defendants prosecuted in municipal court or the discretion to prosecute defendants in municipal court rather than district court, violated the constitutional guarantees to the equal protection of the law:

"To convicted defendants seeking appeal, there are advantages inherent in each of these systems. Persons convicted in municipal court have the advantage of a complete new trial, including the right to a new jury. Thus, they have the opportunity to seek review not only of legal questions, but they may also seek new factual determinations as well. They also have an advantage resulting from possible use of the trial in municipal court for the purpose of "discovery" and prior to trial de novo in the circuit court. Further appeal to the Court of Appeals, however, is limited to questions of the constitutionality of Charter provisions or ordinances. Persons convicted in district court have the advantage of appellate review before a multi-judge court. That review, however, is limited to errors of law appearing on the record ..., and such persons do not have the advantages resulting from a review by trial de novo in the circuit court. It would be difficult to state categorically which system offers greater advantages to defendants. Whether one or the other system is to the advantage of a particular defendant depends on whether his defence rests only on factual contentions or also on legal contentions."

As in Klamath Falls, in the present case there are advantages inherent in each of the two procedures, and whether one or the other is to the advantage of a particular individual may depend at least partly on whether his or her defence rests on factual contentions or legal ones. In the present case, the appellant simply asserts that the distinctions between indictable and summary conviction procedures should end once a trial is concluded, and that there is no justification for the distinction in the rights of appeal. He submits, further, that there is no justification to permit an appellate court on an appeal by the Crown in summary conviction cases to review findings of fact. Since the burden of proof is on the appellant to demonstrate that the distinction is unreasonable and thus contrary to section 15 we consider that the appellant has failed to meet this burden.

The intervenant, the Attorney General of Ontario, directly addresses the question of the reasonableness of the distinction in the rights of appeal. He submits in his factum that:

Digitized by Google

"... [T]he provisions of the Code relating to summary conviction procedure are aimed at providing what is generally a simpler, more expeditious mode of criminal procedure for those matters which do not call for the significant punishments available upon conviction by way of indictment. The provision of an intermediary appeal, in such cases, to a local court broad in scope, is a rational method of ensuring that the summary nature of the procedure set out in part XXIV does not give rise to miscarriages of justice, whether they arise out of questions of law or fact."

In addressing this question, useful reference can be made to another decision of the Supreme Court of Oregon — State v. Jones, 569 P. 2d 19 (1977).The defendant challenged, inter alia, the constitutionality of the procedure requiring a preliminary hearing or a grand jury indictment when a felony charge was laid, but not when it was a misdemeanour, on the ground that it denied him equal protection of the law. However, the court held, at 24, that there is a rational basis for the difference in treatment because of the distinction between felonies and misdemeanours:

"The greater penalties and more onerous consequences of a felony conviction form a rational basis for requiring a probable cause determination via preliminary hearing or grand jury indictment in order to try an accused for a felony. It is not a denial of equal protection to not accord a misdemeanant the same treatment. A misdemeanant charged in circuit court by information is subjected to the same statutory penalty provisions and is accorded the same procedural safeguards associated with arraignment and trial as any other misdemeanant charged in a court of limited jurisdiction. See State v. Belt, 16 O.R. App. 213, 517 P. 2d. 1219, Sup. Ct. review denied (1974). In other words a misdemeanant charged in circuit court is treated no differently than any other misdemeanant with the exception that the forum is different."

The court thus concluded that there was no violation of the equality guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.

One of the main purposes of the summary conviction procedure is to provide, as submitted by the intervenant, for a simpler, more expeditious mode of criminal procedure for those less serious offences which carry less significant punishments than for indictable offences. Indictable offences, on the other hand, in carrying greater penalties and more onerous consequences for the liberty of the accused, are thus provided with more complex procedural requirements to safeguard the liberty of the accused. The different purposes provide a rational basis for the difference in the right of appeal. As noted by the intervenant, the provision of an intermediate appeal in summary conviction offences by the Crown on questions of fact, as set out in the case law, provides what appears to be a rational method of ensuring that the summary nature of the procedure does not give rise to miscarriages of justice. The limitation of the Crown's right to appeal in indictable offences to grounds of law alone, on the other hand, appears to be a rational method of protecting the liberty of the accused.

The very purpose of a hybrid offence provision is to allow for a variation in the differing circumstances that are to be found from one case to another. An offence like tax evasion is such that in one case it will be appropriate, due to the greater seriousness of the act committed, to proceed by indictment, whereas in another less serious case, it will be appropriate to proceed by way of summary conviction. The hybrid offence provision in the Income Tax Act is thus a means by which the criminal law provides the Attorney General with sufficient flexibility to take the specific circumstances of each case into account and ensure that, in each case, the interests of justice are served. In fact, lack of such choice could lead to a contravention of section 15 in that persons who are not similarly situated would get the same treatment and, thereby be treated unfairly.

Digitized by Google

It should be emphasized that we do not come to our conclusion because of any doubts that may have arisen, concerning judicial review of the Attorney General's discretion, in such older cases as Florence Mining Co. v. Cobalt Lake Mining Co. (1909), 18 O.L.R. 275 (Ont. C.A.), affd. 43 O.L.R. 474 and Cripen v. Attorney General for Ontario (1925), 56 O.L.R. 327, affd. 56 O.L.R. 530, or such Canadian Bill of Rights cases as R. v. Court of Sessions of the Peace et al., ex parte Lafleur, [1967] 3 C.C.C. 244, (Que.C.A.), R. v. Smythe, supra, (S.C.C.), Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1975] S.C.R. 616, 20 C.C.C. (2d) 449 and Re Saikaly and The Queen (1979), 48 C.C.C. (2d) 192 (O.C.A.). These are all pre-Charter cases and any doubts as to judicial review of ministerial discretion in such early Charter cases as Stolar v. The Queen (1983), 4 C.R.R. 252 (B.C.C.A.), and R. v. Taylor (1983), 8 C.R.R. 29 (B.C.S.C.) were laid to rest in the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Operation Dismantle v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441. It is now clear that a decision of the Attorney General, like a decision of Cabinet, is reviewable, not on the ground of whether it was sound, but rather on the ground of whether or not it violates the accused's rights under the Charter. See Re Regina and Arviv (1985), 19 C.C.C. (3d) 395, a decision of this court which preceded Operation Dismantle, and R. v. Kworak, Balian and Ghara Khanian (1986), 20 C.R.R. 325, a decision of Smith, J. of the Ontario High Court which followed the Supreme Court decision. If the Attorney General's election were otherwise discriminatory, it could be found violative of section 15, but not merely on the ground of exercise of ministerial discretion. Thus, we conclude that section 239 of the Income Tax Act and the choice made in this case of proceeding by way of summary conviction do not contravene section 15 of the Charter.

Because of that conclusion, we do not need to consider the application of section 1 of the Charter.

It follows from these reasons that the Attorney General's right of election, pursuant to section 239 of the Income Tax Act, does not contravene paragraph 11(f) of the Charter providing for a right to a jury in the circumstances specified in that subsection.

Providing incorrect tax shelter identification number – 239(2.1)

(2.1) Every person who wilfully provides another person with an incorrect identification number for a tax shelter is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to a fine of not less than 100%, and not more than 200%, of the cost to the other person of that person's interest in the shelter; imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years; or both the fine described in paragraph 239(2.1)(a) and the imprisonment described in paragraph 239(2.1)(b).

Offence with respect to confidential information – 239(2.2) (2.2) Every person who contravenes subsection 241(1), or knowingly contravenes an order made under subsection 241(4.1) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to both.

Idem – 239(2.21)

Digitized by Google

(2.21) Every person to whom taxpayer information has been provided for a particular purpose under paragraph 241(4)(b), (c), (e), (h), (k), (n), (o) or (p).

who is an official to whom taxpayer information has been provided for a particular purpose under paragraph 241(4)(a), (d), (f), (f.1), (i) or (j.1)

Digitized by Google

and who for any other purpose knowingly uses, provides to any person, allows the provision to any person of, or allows any person access to, that information is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to both.

Definitions – 239(2.22)

(2.22) In subsection 239(2.21), "official" and "taxpayer information" have the meanings assigned by subsection 241(10).

Offence with respect to an identification number – 239(2.3)

(2.3) Every person to whom the Social Insurance Number of an individual or to whom the business number of a taxpayer or partnership has been provided under this Act or a regulation, and every officer, employee and agent of such a person, who without written consent of the individual, taxpayer or partnership, as the case may be, knowingly uses, communicates or allows to be communicated the number (otherwise than as required or authorized by law, in the course of duties in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act or for a purpose for which it was provided by the individual, taxpayer or partnership, as the case may be) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to both.

Penalty on conviction – 239(3)

) Where a person is convicted under this section, the person is not liable to pay a penalty imposed under section 162, 163 or 163.2 for the same contravention unless the penalty is assessed before the information or complaint giving rise to the conviction was laid or made.

Stay of appeal – 239(4)

) Where, in any appeal under this Act, substantially the same facts are at issue as those that are at issue in a prosecution under this section, the Minister may file a stay of proceedings with the Tax Court of Canada and thereupon the proceedings before that Court are stayed pending final determination of the outcome of the prosecution.

Offence and punishment without reference to subsection 120(2.2) – 239(5)

) In determining whether an offence under this Act, for which a person may on summary conviction or indictment be liable for a fine or imprisonment, has been committed, and in determining the punishment for such an offence, this Act is to be read without reference to subsection 120(2.2).

Information for general warrant – CC Sec. 487.01

(1) A provincial court judge, a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction or a judge as defined in section 552 may issue a warrant in writing authorizing a peace officer to, subject to this section, use any device or investigative technique or procedure or do any thing described in the warrant that would, if not authorized, constitute an unreasonable search or seizure in respect of a person or a person's property if the judge is satisfied by information on oath in writing that there are reasonable grounds to believe that an offence against this or any other Act of Parliament has been or will be committed and that information concerning the offence will be obtained through the use of the technique, procedure or device or the doing of the thing;

the judge is satisfied that it is in the best interests of the administration of justice to issue the warrant; and there is no other provision in this or any other Act of Parliament that would provide for a warrant, authorization or order permitting the technique, procedure or device to be used or the thing to be done.

Digitized by Google

Marginal note: Limitation

Digitized by Google

Nothing in subsection (1) shall be construed as to permit interference with the bodily integrity of any person.

Marginal note: Search or seizure to be reasonable
A warrant issued under subsection (1) shall contain such terms and conditions as the judge considers advisable to ensure that any search or seizure authorized by the warrant is reasonable in the circumstances.

Marginal note: Video surveillance
A warrant issued under subsection (1) that authorizes a peace officer to observe, by means of a television camera or other similar electronic device, any person who is engaged in activity in circumstances in which the person has a reasonable expectation of privacy shall contain such terms and conditions as the judge considers advisable to ensure that the privacy of the person or of any other person is respected as much as possible.

Marginal note: Other provisions to apply
The definition "offence" in section 183 and sections 183.1, 184.2, 184.3 and 185 to 188.2, subsection 189(5), and sections 190, 193 and 194 to 196 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to a warrant referred to in subsection (4) as though references in those provisions to interceptions of private communications were read as references to observations by peace officers by means of television cameras or similar electronic devices of activities in circumstances in which persons had reasonable expectations of privacy.

Marginal note: Notice after covert entry
(5.1) A warrant issued under subsection (1) that authorizes a peace officer to enter and search a place covertly shall require, as part of the terms and conditions referred to in subsection (3), that notice of the entry and search be given within any time after the execution of the warrant that the judge considers reasonable in the circumstances.

Marginal note: Extension of period for giving notice
(5.2) Where the judge who issues a warrant under subsection (1) or any other judge having jurisdiction to issue such a warrant is, on the basis of an affidavit submitted in support of an application to vary the period within which the notice referred to in subsection (5.1) is to be given, is satisfied that the interests of justice warrant the granting of the application, the judge may grant an extension, or a subsequent extension, of the period, but no extension may exceed three years.

Marginal note: Provisions to apply
Subsections 487(2) and (4) apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to a warrant issued under subsection (1).

Marginal note: Telewarrant provisions to apply
Where a peace officer believes that it would be impracticable to appear personally before a judge to make an application for a warrant under this section, a warrant may be issued under this section on an information submitted by telephone or other means of telecommunication and, for that purpose, section 487.1 applies, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the warrant.

Digitized by Google

There was a time whereby our Justice Dept. had advised CRA to use the ITA s. 231.2 warrant to obtain evidence of tax evasion.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Provision of information - S. 241
241. (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or other representative of a government entity shall

(a) knowingly provide, or knowingly allow to be provided, to any person any taxpayer information;

(b) knowingly allow any person to have access to any taxpayer information; or

(c) knowingly use any taxpayer information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act or for the purpose for which it was provided under this section.

Evidence relating to taxpayer information
(2) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament or other law, no official or other representative of a government entity shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information.

Communication where proceedings have been commenced
(3) Subsections 241(1) and 241(2) do not apply in respect of

(a) criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, under an Act of Parliament; or

(b) any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act or any other Act of Parliament or law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty.

Digitized by Google

Circumstances involving danger

(3.1) The Minister may provide to appropriate persons any taxpayer information relating to imminent danger of death or physical injury to any individual.

Where taxpayer information may be disclosed

(4) An official may

(a) provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act, solely for that purpose;

(b) provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of determining any tax, interest, penalty or other amount that is or may become payable by the person, or any refund or tax credit to which the person is or may become entitled, under this Act or any other amount that is relevant for the purposes of that determination;

(c) provide to the person who seeks a certification referred to in paragraph 147.1(10)(a) the certification or a refusal to make the certification, solely for the purposes of administering a registered pension plan;

(d) provide taxpayer information

(i) to an official of the Department of Finance solely for the purposes of the formulation or evaluation of fiscal policy,

(ii) to an official solely for the purposes of the initial implementation of a fiscal policy or for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of an Act of Parliament that provides for the imposition and collection of a tax or duty,

(iii) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty,

(iv) to an official of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the formulation or evaluation of fiscal policy,

(v) to an official of the Department of Natural Resources or of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a program of the Government of Canada or of the province relating to the exploration for or exploitation of Canadian petroleum and gas resources,

(vi) to an official of the government of a province that has received or is entitled to receive a payment referred to in this subparagraph, or to an official of the Department of Natural Resources, solely for the purposes of the provisions relating to payments to a province in respect of the taxable income of corporations earned in the offshore area with respect to the province under the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act, chapter 28 of the Statutes of Canada, 1988, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, chapter 3 of the Statutes of Canada, 1987, or similar Acts relating to the exploration for or exploitation of offshore Canadian petroleum and gas resources,

(vi.1) to an official of the Department of Natural Resources solely for the purpose of determining whether property is prescribed energy conservation property or whether an outlay or expense is a Canadian renewable and conservation expense,

Digitized by Google

(vii) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act or a similar law of a province,

(vii.1) to an official solely for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Canada Education Savings Act or a designated provincial program as defined in subsection 146.1(1),

(vii.2) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of Part 1 of the Energy Costs Assistance Measures Act,

(vii.3) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Children's Special Allowances Act or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act,

(vii.4) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Universal Child Care Benefit Act or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act,

(vii.5) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Canada Disability Savings Act or a designated provincial program as defined in subsection 146.4(1),

(viii) to an official of the Department of Veterans Affairs solely for the purposes of the administration of the War Veterans Allowance Act, the Canadian Forces Members and Veterans Re-establishment and Compensation Act or Part XI of the Civilian War-related Benefits Act,

(ix) to an official of a department or agency of the Government of Canada or of a province as to the name, address, occupation, size or type of business of a taxpayer, solely for the purposes of enabling that department or agency to obtain statistical data for research and analysis,

(x) to an official of the Canada Employment Insurance Commission or the Department of Human Resources and Skills Development, solely for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Employment Insurance Act, an employment program of the Government of Canada or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act or program,

(x.1) to an official of the Department of Human Resources and Skills Development solely for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of a program established under the authority of the Department of Human Resources and Skills Development Act in respect of children who are deceased or missing as a result of an offence, or a probable offence, under the Criminal Code,

(xi) to an official of the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food or of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a program of the Government of Canada or of the province established under an agreement entered into under the Farm Income Protection Act,

(xii) to an official of the Department of Canadian Heritage or a member of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board solely for the purposes of administering sections 32 to 33.2 of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act.

Digitized by Google

(xiii) to an official solely for the purposes of setting off against any sum of money that may be due or payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada a debt due to

(A) Her Majesty in right of Canada, or

(B) Her Majesty in right of a province, or

(xiv) to an official solely for the purposes of section 7.1 of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post- Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act;

(e) provide taxpayer information, or allow the inspection of or access to taxpayer information, as the case may be, under, and solely for the purposes of,

(i) subsection 36(2) or section 46 of the Access to Information Act,

(ii) section 13 of the Auditor General Act,

(iii) section 92 of the Canada Pension Plan,

(iv) a warrant issued under subsection 21(3) of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act,

(v) an order made under subsection 462.48(3) of the Criminal Code,

(vi) section 26 of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act,

(vii) section 79 of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, (viii) paragraph 33.1(a) of the Old Age Security Act,

(ix) subsection 34(2) or section 45 of the Privacy Act,

(x) section 24 of the Statistics Act,

(xi) section 9 of the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, or

(xii) a provision contained in a tax treaty with another country or in a listed international agreement;

(f) provide taxpayer information solely for the purposes of sections 23 to 25 of the Financial Administration Act;

(f.1) provide taxpayer information to an official for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Charities Registration (Security Information) Act, and where an official has so received taxpayer information, the official may provide that information to another official as permitted by subsection (9.1);

(g) use taxpayer information to compile information in a form that does not directly or indirectly reveal the identity of the taxpayer to whom the information relates;

(h) use, or provide to any person, taxpayer information solely for a purpose relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person by Her Majesty in right of Canada in respect of a period during which the authorized person was employed by or engaged by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada to assist in the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act, to the extent that the information is relevant for the purpose;

(i) provide access to records of taxpayer information to the Librarian and Archivist of Canada or a person acting on behalf of or under the direction of the Librarian and Archivist, solely for the purposes of section 12 of the Library and Archives of Canada Act, and transfer such records to the care and control of such persons solely for the purposes of section 13 of that

Digitized by Google

Act;

(j) use taxpayer information relating to a taxpayer to provide information to the taxpayer;

(j.1) provide taxpayer information to an official or a designated person solely for the purpose of permitting the making of an adjustment to

(i) a social assistance payment made on the basis of a means, needs or income test, or

(ii) a payment pursuant to a prescribed law of a province in respect of a child within the meaning of the prescribed law, where the purpose of the adjustment is to take into account the amount determined for C in subsection 122.61(1) in respect of a person for a taxation year;

(k) provide, or allow inspection of or access to, taxpayer information to or by any person otherwise legally entitled to it under an Act of Parliament solely for the purposes for which that person is entitled to the information;

(l) subject to subsection (9.2), provide to a representative of a government entity the business number of, the name of (including any trade name or other name used by), and any contact information, corporate information and registration information in respect of, the holder of a business number (other than an excluded individual), if the information is provided solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of

(i) an Act of Parliament or of a legislature of a province, or

(ii) a by-law of a municipality in Canada or a law of an aboriginal government;

(m) provide taxpayer information to an official of the government of a province solely for use in the management or administration by that government of a program relating to payments under subsection 164(1.8);

(n) provide taxpayer information to any person, solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a law of a province that provides for workers' compensation benefits;

(o) provide taxpayer information to any person solely for the purpose of enabling the Chief Statistician, within the meaning assigned by section 2 of the Statistics Act, to provide to a statistical agency of a province data concerning business activities carried on in the province, where the information is used by the agency solely for research and analysis and the agency is authorized under the law of the province to collect the same or similar information on its own behalf in respect of such activities;

(p) provide taxpayer information to a police officer (within the meaning assigned by subsection 462.48(17) of the Criminal Code) solely for the purpose of investigating whether an offence has been committed under the Criminal Code, or the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, where

(i) such information can reasonably be regarded as being necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the circumstances in which an offence under the Criminal Code may have been committed, or the identity of the person or persons who may have committed an offence, with respect to an official, or with respect to any person related to that official,

(ii) the official was or is engaged in the administration or enforcement of this Act, and

(iii) the offence can reasonably be considered to be related to that

Digitized by Google

administration or enforcement; or

(q) provide taxpayer information to an official of the government of a province solely for the use in the management or administration by that government of a program relating to earning supplementation or income support.[140]

The Queen v. Snider, [1954] S.C.R. 479, The Historic Decision on Society's Privilege to A Criminally Accused Tax Returns

In The Matter of A Reference Under The Constitutional Questions Determination Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 66.
and
In The Matter of Regina v. Snider.
1953: December 3, 4, 7; 1954: June 21.
Present: Rinfret C.J. and Kerwin, Taschereau, Rand, Kellock, Estey, Locke, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ.
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA
Privileged documents—Evidence—Production of income tax returns sought in a criminal prosecution—Objection by Minister—Whether contrary to public policy—Income War Tax Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 97, s. 81.—Income Tax Act, 1948, S. of C. 1948, c. 52, s. 121.—Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, S. of C. 1940.

At a trial under the Criminal Code, the Crown in the right of the Province subpoenaed the Director of Taxation of the District of Vancouver requiring him to give evidence and to produce the income tax returns of the accused. The Minister of National Revenue, in an affidavit, objected to the production of the documents and to the giving of oral evidence, basing his claim that it would be prejudicial to the public interest on s. 81 of the Income War Tax Act and on s. 121 of the Income Tax Act, which prohibit such communications to any person other than a person "legally entitled thereto".

Consequent to the ruling of the trial judge that the returns must be produced and, if relevant, given in evidence, the following questions were submitted for the opinion of the Court of Appeal for British Columbia pursuant to the Constitutional Questions Determination Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 66:

1. On the trial of a person charged with an indictable offence, where a subpoena duces tecum has been served on the appropriate Income Tax official to produce before the Court on such trial returns, reports, papers and documents filed pursuant to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, and the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to give evidence relating thereto, and where the Minister of National Revenue has stated on oath that in his opinion such evidence and the production of such returns, reports, papers and documents would be prejudicial to the public interest; ought such Court to order the production of such returns, reports, papers and documents and the giving or oral evidence relating thereto: (a) when such subpoena is served at the instance or on behalf of the Attorney General of the Province; (b) when such subpoena is served at the instance or on behalf of the accused?

2. Are the documents hereinbefore mentioned in Question 1, for the [140] See The Requirement of Confidentiality Under the Income Tax Act and Its Effect on the Conduct of Appeals Before the Tax Court of Canada by Patrick Bendin, in the Canadian Tax Journal, (1996), Vol. 44, No. 3 / no 3, Pg 680. for an elaboration of the issues and how they are handled by Crowns.

Digitized by Google

purposes of a subpoena duces tecum directed to an Income Tax Official of the Income Tax Department, in the possession of the said official to the extent that the Court may order them produced in Court pursuant to the said subpoena, or are the said documents in the possession of the Crown?

3. Do Sections 81 and 121 of the Income War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, 1948, respectively affect the right of the Minister of National Revenue to object on the ground of prejudice to the public interest to the production of the documents hereinbefore mentioned in Question 1 and to the giving of oral evidence by an Income Tax official relating to returns made under the said Acts?

On appeal to this Court, it was held:

1. (Per Rinfret C.J., Kerwin, Taschereau, Rand, Kellock, Estey and Fauteux JJ.) That the Court may order the production of the documents in question and the giving of oral evidence relating thereto, unless special facts or circumstances appearing in the Minister's affidavit make it clear to the Court that there might be prejudice to the public interest in the disclosure, but only to the extent of the document or documents within the special facts or circumstances.

2. (Per Locke J.) That the Court may order the production of the documents in question and the giving of oral evidence relating thereto to enable the Court to determine whether the facts discoverable by the production of the documents would be admissible, relevant or prejudicial or detrimental to the public welfare in any justifiable sense.

3. (Per Cartwright J.) That the Court may order the production of the documents in question and the giving of oral evidence relating thereto, limited however to a case in which the objection of the Minister is to the production of any documents belonging to the class consisting of returns, reports, papers and documents filed pursuant to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, on the ground that they belong to that class.

4. (Per Curiam) That for the purposes of a subpoena duces tecum directed to an Income Tax Official of the Income Tax Department, the documents in question are in the possession of such official to the extent that the Court may order them produced in Court pursuant to a subpoena.

5. (Per Rinfret C.J., Kerwin, Taschereau, Rand, Kellock, Estey, Cartwright and Fauteux JJ.) That the Minister has no right to object to the production of the documents in question.

6. (Per Locke J.) That neither s. 81 of the Income War Tax Act or s. 121 of the Income Tax Act, 1948, affect the right of the Minister to object on the ground of public interest to the production of such documents in criminal proceedings and the giving of evidence relating thereto, but the effect of the sections is to render the objections subject to the discretionary jurisdiction and consequent order of the trial judge as set forth in the answer to Question 1.

APPEAL from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for British Columbia[1] in the matter of a reference under the Constitutional Questions Determination Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 66, in respect of the production in Court of Dominion Income Tax returns in a criminal prosecution.

F. P. Varcoe, Q.C. and D. H. W. Henry for the Attorney General of Canada.

L. Kelley, Q.C. and J.J. Urie for the Attorney General of British Columbia.

The judgment of Rinfret C.J. and of Rand J. was delivered by:—

RAND J.:—This reference raises an important question of the right of the Minister of National Revenue to object to the production before a court of the income returns of a person charged in criminal proceedings; and since there are many aspects to the general question of privilege claimed by the Crown in relation to which different considerations must be taken into account, I think it desirable to keep within the boundaries which the facts in this case have set for us. As the matter relates to evidence sought by either the Crown or the accused in a criminal prosecution, it is to be distinguished formally from a similar step in civil proceedings.

Digitized by Google

As Mr. Varcoe seemed to put it, any document coming into the hands of persons engaged in the work of any branch of the Executive, is ipso facto, on the ground of public policy, exempt from production on the objection of the departmental minister and for that proposition he cited many authorities concluding with that of Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Company[2]. When these authorities are closely examined, however, it will be found that they cannot be taken to proceed on any principle so broadly stated, and it becomes necessary, then, to enquire into the nature of testimonial privilege against disclosure and the grounds on which it is made effective in legal proceedings.

What is in debate are confidential communications and, for a better understanding of the question, the distinction is to be kept in mind between them and the matter which they deal with or express, that is, there may be confidential or secret matter apart from that of the communications themselves but to which they relate, or the secrecy may exist as to the matters which the communications themselves create or indeed to the fact of the communication alone. It requires as its essential condition that there be a public interest recognized as overriding the general principle that in a court of justice every person and every fact must be available to the execution of its supreme functions. As Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, in speaking against the Bill For Indemnifying Evidence, Cobbett's Parliamentary History 12, 675, 693, 1742, declared:—

> It has, my lords, I own, been asserted by the noble duke that the public has a right to every man's evidence—a maxim which in its proper sense cannot be denied. For it is undoubtedly true that the public has a right to all the assistance of every individual.

And this applies as fully to the private suitor or an accused as to the public. The privilege is one to be asserted by or on behalf of a person or persons including the Crown to whose benefit it enures, and it may be waived only by the beneficiary; if the disclosure is proposed in a proceeding between third parties, the court itself must interpose to safeguard the privilege.

It springs, then, from a confidential communication coupled with a paramount public interest in permitting the secrecy surrounding the communication or its contents to be maintained. This is perhaps best illustrated by the privilege relating to communications between husband and wife or between solicitor and client. The public interest in the latter relationship lies in securing to every citizen the skill and ability of a professional class to enable him to protect his own interest in life, liberty and property within the law and before its tribunals. If that means were not, in the widest sense, made available to him he would be denied that justice which it is a fundamental object of our political organization to secure to him. The client may, therefore, in absolute freedom, disclose to his solicitor the details of his business or personal matters on which he seeks legal advice or action, and upon that communication the law places the seal of confidence which only the client himself can remove. Of a similar nature are communications by an informer to public enforcement officers and those between officers of state on national or international matters expressing views or making proposals on governmental policy which may affect the peace or safety of the country and which the ministers of the Crown may even be sworn not to disclose. There may also be external matters such as of defence which equally, for the same reasons, must be held to be within that safeguard, the facts of which may, in the discretion of ministers or government, be disclosed as considered desirable. Is there, then, a privilege of that nature here? If so, to whom does it run and what is the public policy supporting it?

Digitized by Google

It is claimed that the circumstances give rise to such a privilege in the Crown and that the public interest emanates from an undertaking on its part, implied by the Income Tax Act, toward all income taxpayers that the contents of the returns of none of them will be revealed beyond the circle of officials concerned in administering the statute. Sec. 121 of that Act forbids the disclosure of and information obtained under it to any person "not legally entitled thereto". For the purposes of his argument, however, Mr. Varcoe puts that aside as being irrelevant to the proposition urged.

I am unable to agree with either of these contentions. I can find nothing in the statute indicating such an undertaking. The disclosure of a person's return of income for taxation purposes is no more a matter of confidence or secrecy than that, say, of his real property which for generations has been publicly disclosed in assessment rolls. It is in the same category as any other fact in his life and the production in court of its details obtained from his books or any other source is an everyday occurrence. The ban against departmental disclosure is merely a concession to the inbred tendency to keep one's private affairs to one's self. Now that, in this competitive society, is a natural and unobjectionable tendency but it has never before been elevated to such a plane of paramount concern. The most confidential and sensitive private matters are daily made the subject of revelation before judicial tribunals and it scarcely seems necessary to remark on the relative insignificance to any legal or social policy of such a fact as the income a man has been able to produce. I should say, therefore, that the only privilege furnished is that given by the statute and that it is a privilege for the benefit of the individual and not the Crown.

The prohibition of the statute is against disclosure to others than the departmental staff charged with the assessment but since the public interest in the administration of justice transcends that of any individual in the details of his ledger account, the ban is to be taken to be directed against a voluntary disclosure only and has no application to judicial proceedings. The intervention of the minister, as would be that of the person himself, is therefore ineffectual.

The second question of the reference suggests a distinction between possession of the Crown and by departmental officials administering the Act. The "Crown" as used in this sense is assumed to carry with it some mystical character which removes the case from the level on which taxation takes place. Where in constitutional or high governmental functions the prerogative or even statutory power is exercised in relation to the possession of a document whether personally by the Sovereign or by means of secretaries, ministers, or other high officers of state acting themselves or through subordinate officers, there are or may be undoubtedly elements that give the possession a special character. But here is a statute providing for the assessment and collection of taxes by an administrative department which the statute itself sets up. The subject is placed in communication with the officials of that department in immediate relation to a function that directly and individually affects his private financial affairs. Neither the prerogative nor any constitutional or political function is involved. To suggest that either in the case of protecting or attacking the private interest of the taxpayer the custody of tax returns rendered to the department can be refused production on the ground of the nature of the possession is to attract some vague magic sensed or associated with the prerogative to the routine of administrative government. All governmental and administrative activity may be said to be carried out by the Executive but it is not in these levels of administration, which might extend to every clerk, say, of a government railway, that any degree or shade of possession in the course of executive action is, by a reference to the Crown, to be placed beyond the reach of the courts.

Digitized by Google

Once the nature, general or specific as the case may be, of documents or the reasons against its disclosure, are shown, the question for the court is whether they might, on any rational view, either as to their contents or the fact of their existence, be such that the public interest requires that they should not be revealed; if they are capable of sustaining such an interest, and a minister of the Crown avers its existence, then the courts must accept his decision. On the other hand, if the facts, as in the example before us, show that, in the ordinary case, no such interest can exist, then such a declaration of the minister must be taken to have been made under a misapprehension and be disregarded. To eliminate the courts in a function with which the tradition of the common law has invested them and to hold them subject to any opinion formed, rational or irrational, by a member of the executive to the prejudice, it might be, of the lives of private individuals, is not in harmony with the basic conceptions of our polity. But I should add that the consequences of the exclusion of a document for reasons of public interest as it may affect the interest of an accused person are not in question here and no implication is intended as to what they may be.

What is secured by attributing to the courts this preliminary determination of possible prejudice is protection against executive encroachments upon the administration of justice; and in the present trend of government little can be more essential to the maintenance of individual security. In this important matter, to relegate the courts to such a subserviency as is suggested would be to withdraw from them the confidence of independence and judicial appraisal that so far appear to have served well the organization of which we are the heirs. These are considerations which appear to me to follow from the reasoning of the Judicial Committee in Robinson v. South Australia [3].

I would therefore answer the questions as follows:—

Question I: (a) and (b) Yes, unless special facts or circumstances appearing on the minister's affidavit make it clear to the court that there might be prejudice to the public interest in the disclosure, but only to the extent of the document or documents within the special facts or circumstances.

Question II: The documents are in the custody of officials to the extent that the court may order them produced in court pursuant to subpoena.

Question III: The minister has no right to object to the production of the documents.

Subject to the variation indicated, the appeal must be dismissed.

The judgment of Kerwin,Taschereau, Kellock and Fauteux JJ. delivered by:—

Digitized by Google

KELLOCK J.:—In support of the appeal Mr. Varcoe relied heavily upon the decision of the House of Lords in Duncan v. *Cammell Laird[4]: The present questions, however, relate exclusively to criminal proceedings, and it is stated by Viscount Simon L.C., in the above case at p. 591 that

> The judgment of the House in the present case is limited to civil actions and the practice, as applied in criminal trials where an individual's life or liberty may be at stake, is not necessarily the same.

Even in criminal proceedings it has been held, for example, that the usual rule that the channel of information giving rise to a prosecution is not to be disclosed upon the ground of public interest, is not an absolute rule. In Hardy's case[5], Eyre C.J. said:

> …there is a rule which has universally obtained on account of its importance to the public for the detection of crimes, that those persons who are the channel by means of which that detection is made, should not be unnecessarily disclosed: if it can be made to appear that really and truly it is necessary to the investigation of the truth of the case that the name of the person should be disclosed, I should be very unwilling to stop it.

In referring to the above statement and to others of the same character, Viscount Simon said at the above page:

> Indeed, Eyre, C. J., in the passage referred to appears only to be restricting needless cross-examination.

There is, accordingly, not only a public interest in maintaining the secrecy of documents where the public interest would otherwise be damnified, as, for example, where disclosure would be injurious to national defence or to good diplomatic relations, or where the practice of keeping a class of document is necessary for the proper functioning of the public service, but there is also a public interest which says that "an innocent man is not to be condemned when his innocence can be proved"; per Lord Esher M.R., in *Marks v. Beyfus[6]. It cannot be said, however, that either the one or the other must invariably be dominant.

In considering the applicability of the rule as to secrecy of documents in the public interest, it is to be remembered that where it does apply, not even a copy of a document, no matter from what source it may be forthcoming, nor any oral evidence as to its contents are admissible.

In *Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India[7], A. L. Smith, L.J., laid down the rule at p. 195 as follows:

> The cases have gone the length of holding that, even if no objection were taken to the production of such a document by the person in whose custody it was, it would be the duty of the judge at the trial to intervene, and to refuse to allow it to be produced: and it has further been held that, if an attempt were made to get round that difficulty by giving secondary evidence of its contents, the judge ought also to prevent that from being done.

Viscount Simon, L.C., referred to the above with approval in the Cammell Laird case at p. 595, where he said:

> The present opinion is concerned only with the production of documents, but it seems to me that the same principle must also apply to the exclusion of verbal evidence which, if given, would jeopardize the interests of the community.

In 1888, in *Hennessy v. Wright[8], Wills J. had said:

> I think the above cases abundantly show that no sound distinction can be > drawn between the duty of the judge when objection is taken by the responsible officer of the Crown, or by the party, or when, no objection being taken by anyone, it becomes apparent to him that a rule of public policy prevents the disclosure of the documents or information sought.

Digitized by Google

It follows that if, in any case, the nature of the information sought to be placed before the court is not of such a nature that by no person or by no means may evidence be given of it, there is no public interest attaching to its nondisclosure. Moreover, as observed by Lord Blanesburgh in Robinson's case[9]

> ...the privilege, the reason for it being what it is, can hardly be asserted in relation to documents the contents of which have already been published.

The documents which are involved in the questions presently before the court are all documents which have been "filed" pursuant to the provisions of one or other of the designated statutes, that is, they are all documents emanating from a taxpayer or a person required by the lgislation to furnish information. As pointed out by Viscount Simon in the Cammell Laird case at p. 592, the question as to what documents are non-producible on the ground of public interest, may arise with respect to the contents of a particular document or with respect to a class of document. The questions presently before the court relate exclusively to a class of document and not to the contents of any particular document within that class.

In considering the proper answers to be given to the questions asked, it is pertinent to consider whether in the legislation itself, Parliament has indicated whether or not any secrecy, from the standpoint of the state, is to attach to documents of this class. The situation will sufficiently appear if I refer only to the provisions of the Income Tax Act (1948) 11-12 Geo. VI, c. 52.

By s. 82(2), which deals with appeals by a taxpayer to the Income Tax Appeal Board from the decision of the Minister, it is not the Crown but the appellant who is given the right to require a hearing in camera. The present form of the section emphasizes the intention of Parliament in that the right formerly given by the previous s. 68 to the Crown to require the hearing to be in camera, no longer exists. It would seem difficult to contend in the light of this legislation that any state secrecy was intended by Parliament to surround the class of document here in question. S. 93, which deals with appeals to the Exchequer Court, is similar to s. 82(2). These provisions, in my view, indicate that any secrecy which is in contemplation of the statute is for the benefit of the taxpayer only.

Nor do the sections just referred to stand alone. By s. 120(1) it is made an offence to make, participate in or assent to the making of a false or deceptive statement in a return. Proceedings to enforce the penalty provided for such an offence necessarily involve the production of the offending return in evidence. In fact, by s. 124(8) provision is made for the admission of a sworn copy of any document made by or on behalf of a taxpayer as prima facie evidence of the nature and contents of the document. In Snell v. Haywood (No. 2)[10], it was held by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta that proceedings of this character by way of summary conviction must be in public.

I respectfully agree with the decision in Ship v. The King[11], where it was held by the Court of King's Bench, Appeal Side, that s. 121, which deals with the subject-matter of secrecy as to "any information obtained under this Act", or "any written statement furnished under this Act", and which prohibits communication by employees of Her Majesty to anyone except a person "legally entitled thereto", applies in the administrative field only. The statute itself has nothing to say as to the identity of the persons so entitled but leaves that to be determined by the general law. In my opinion, a court of competent jurisdiction issuing its subpoena would, in any event, be within the language of the exception and entitled to enforce the production of any returns or statements filed. It may be observed that in Ship's case the Crown did not, on that occasion, even object to the production of such documents.

Digitized by Google

The decision reached by a divided court in British Columbia in the case of *Weber v. Pawlik[12], is one with which, with respect, I cannot agree. That was a partnership action in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, by concealing and mis-stating to him the firm's earnings, had deprived him of his proper share of the profits and eventually induced him to sell his interest at an undervalue. The plaintiff had left the management of the partnership business to the defendant, the latter making the income tax returns on its behalf, while furnishing the plaintiff with statements as to profits.

After the plaintiff had sold out his interest to the defendant, he was assessed for taxes in respect of periods during which the partnership was in existence, on profits substantially in excess of those which had been reported to him by the defendant. On application to the Income Tax authorities, the plantiff was given full particulars of the returns the defendant had filed, which were, of course, fully as much those of the plaintiff as of the defendant, but at the trial, on objection of the Minister, the returns were excluded. The objection appears to have involved the contention that the returns were not producible in the public interest because "confidential".

This decision, with respect, involves a misconception not only of the effect of the statute itself but also of the scope of the rule purported to be invoked, as, if applicable, no evidence of the contents of the returns could have been given either by production of a copy or by oral evidence. This could scarcely have been contended in such a case as the defendant would be obligated to make full disclosure of the income of the partnership.

Mr. Varcoe refused to take any such position in the case at bar but based the appeal upon the ground of an undertaking on the part of the Crown that tax returns will be kept confidential by the department. Neither in criminal nor in civil proceedings are documents which are merely "official" or "confidential" within the rule as to nondisclosure on the ground of public interest. In Asiatic Petroleum Company v. *Anglo-Persian Oil Company Limited[13], Swinfen Eady, L.J., (with the subsequent approval of the Privy Council in Robinson v. *South Australia[14], said p. 830 that the foundation of the rule > is that the information cannot be disclosed without injury to the public interests, and not that the documents are confidential or official, which alone is no reason for their non-production: Smith v. East India Co., 1 Ph. 60; Hennessy v. Wright, 21 Q.B.D., 509.

In my view of the statute, there is no provision as to the confidential character of returns filed except that provided for by ss, 82(2), 93 and 121, with which I have already dealt.

It only remains, in this aspect of the matter, to refer to the decision in re *Hargreaves[15]. That case arose under s. 115 of the Imperial Companies Act, 1862, which gives the court a discretion as to making an order for production of documents. The liquidator of the company there in question, in order to obtain evidence in support of a misfeasance summons against the directors, applied for an order that the surveyor of taxes should attend for examination and produce certain balance-sheets of the company which had been delivered to him for the purpose of assessment for income tax. The surveyor, who objected to produce on the ground that it would be contrary to the oath he had taken, was supported in his objection to production of the documents by the Board of Inland Revenue on the ground that to do so would be "prejudicial and injurious to the public interests and service".

Digitized by Google

Wright J., the judge of first instance, referred to the discretionary nature of the jurisdiction conferred by s. 115 and said that if he had sufficient evidence that in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue the Public service would suffer by the production of the documents, very strong ground ought to be shown before he would be justified in going behind the certificate of the Board and he refused to do so. His order was upheld on appeal, the court refusing to reverse the exercise of discretion below.

There is no such discretionary statutory provision applicable to the case at bar, but apart from that consideration, there are two matters to be noted. The first is the observation of Romer L.J., at p. 353:

> The question now before us is not necessarily the same as that which may possibly arise upon the hearing of the misfeasance summons if the judge has then to consider the question of a subpoena for the production of these documents.

The other is that the provisions of the statute there in question, namely, the Income Tax Act of 1842, 5-6 Victoria, c. 35, are not the same as those of the Canadian statute. Sections 38 and 189, unlike s. 121 of the Canadian statute, contain no exception with respect to communication.

Apart from the statutory provisions to which I have referred, our attention was not called to any others, federal or provincial, having any relevancy.

For these reasons therefore, I would answer question 1(a) and (b) in the affirmative, unless special facts or circumstances appearing on the minister's affidavit make it clear that there might be prejudice to the public interest in the disclosure, but only to the extent of the document or documents within the special facts or circumstances.

As to question 2, it was held by Wills J. in Hennessy v. Wright, ubi cit, at p. 523, that whether documents with respect to which the privilege on the ground of public policy exists are the property of the Crown rather than the property of the witness is immaterial. The question remains the same. This is indicated also by Viscount Simon in the Cammell Laird case at p. 591, where he said:

> The question which we have to decide can only arise as a matter of law in England in cases where a subpoena is issued to a minister or department to produce a document (usually, but not necessarily, in a suit where the Crown is not a party), or where it intervenes in a suit between private individuals (as is the present case) to secure, on the ground of public interest, that documents in the hands of one of the litigants should not be produced. A similar situation might conceivably arise in litigation between the Crown and a subject where it was considered necessary to prevent the subject from producing a document in his possession on the ground that this would be injurious to public interests.

I would therefore answer that the documents are in the possession of the official to the extent that the court may order them produced in court pursuant to subpoena.

As to question 3, the minister has no right to object to the production of the documents.

Digitized by Google

Subject to the variations involved in these answers, the appeal should be dismissed.

ESTEY, J.:—The questions are restricted to a trial of an indictable offence, where a subpoena duces tecum has been served on the appropriate income tax official to produce before the court returns, reports, papers and documents filed pursuant to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to give evidence relating thereto as to which the Minister of National Revenue has stated on oath that in his opinion such evidence and the production of such returns, reports, papers and documents would be prejudicial to the public interest (a) when such subpoena is served at the instance or on behalf of the Attorney-General of a province and (b) when such subpoena is served at the instance or on behalf of the accused.

That considerations of public safety and security require that the utmost secrecy be maintained with respect to certain documents and information in relation thereto in the possession of the Crown has long been recognized. The courts, in the administration of justice, have accepted, as part of their duty, the maintenance of that secrecy and have not required either be adduced in evidence. The basis of the rule is stated by Lord Blanesburgh in Robinson v. State of South Australia[16]:

> As the protection is claimed on the broad principle of State policy and public convenience, the papers protected, as might have been expected, have usually been public official documents of a political or administrative character. Yet the rule is not limited to these documents. Its foundation is that the information cannot be disclosed without injury to the public interests and not that the documents are confidential or official, which alone is no reason for their non-production.

and by Viscount Simon in Duncan v. Cammell, Laird & Co.[17]:

> The principle to be applied in every case is that documents otherwise relevant and liable to production must not be produced if the public interest requires that they should be withheld.

We are here concerned only with documents and information associated therewith filed pursuant to the requirements of the above-named statutes. Issues are constantly being tried before our courts relative to the liability of the taxpayer as well as prosecutions for the failure to perform duties imposed by these statutes. Accordingly, such documents and information in relation thereto have been repeatedly before the courts without any suggestion that the public safety or security has been at all imperilled; nor does there appear to be any reason in principle why these documents and information in relation thereto should, under ordinary circumstances, not be disclosed. It must follow that as a class these documents, in the ordinary course, do not involve questions of safety or security and as such their production would not be prevented upon the basis of public interest.

There may, however, with respect to one or more of these documents and information in relation thereto, be special circumstances which the minister may consider such as to require his taking the objection in respect of these particular documents. It is, therefore, pertinent to consider, in that event, the procedure to be followed.

We were referred to a great many authorities under which the rule has long been recognized but in which there has been much difference of judicial opinion as to the manner in which the objection to produce such documents ought to be made and the respective functions of the minister and the judge. More recent authorities appear to have established that the objection must be made by the minister presiding over the department, commission, board or other body in whose custody the documents, the production of which is requested, are held. Before making the objection the minister should acquaint himself with the facts and, as a responsible minister of the Crown, decide whether the production of these documents, or evidence in relation thereto, would or would not be detrimental to the public interest. If he comes to the conclusion that their disclosure would be detrimental, it would appear that the more convenient procedure would be that he embody in an affidavit sufficient of the facts to indicate the nature of his objection and that he, as a responsible minister of the Crown, has concluded that their production, or information in relation thereto, in a court of law would be detrimental to the public interest.

Digitized by Google

The presiding judge, who, upon the affidavit, is satisfied that the production of these documents and information in relation thereto might be detrimental to the public interest, would give effect to the minister's objection.

The different opinions expressed by the authorities as to the right of a presiding judge to examine the documents appear to have been resolved by the observations of Viscount Simon in the Cammell, Laird case, supra. There the House of Lords expressly disapproved of the practice followed in Robinson v. State of South Australia, supra, where the Judicial Committee "remitted the case to the Supreme Court with the direction that it was one proper for the exercise of the court's power of inspecting documents to determine whether their production would be prejudicial to the public welfare". This view but emphasizes the fact that the documents and information in relation thereto to which the rule applies are such that neither should, by order of a court, be required to pass out of the possession of those officials of Her Majesty who are charged with their custody.

The Cammel, Laird was a civil case, but it would appear that the foregoing quotations and observations taken from or founded upon this case are relevant to the trial of an indictable offence.

Sections 81 of the Income War Tax Act and 121 of the Income Tax Act, 1948 would appear to have been placed in the statutes to assure that those charged with the administration of the foregoing statutes would treat as confidential the information contained in or filed in relation to these documents. The reason and basis therefor is quite different and has no bearing on or relation to the above-discussed rule founded upon the necessity of public safety and security.

In my opinion the questions submitted should be answered as phrased by the majority of the Court and set forth in the reasons of my brothers Rand and Kellock.

LOCKE J.:—I respectfully agree with the opinion of the learned Chief Justice of British Columbia and with the answers made by him to the questions referred to the Court of Appeal and would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

CARTWRIGHT J.:Question No. 1 may, at a first reading, appear to be ambiguous; but when it is considered in the light of the arguments addressed to us by both counsel it becomes clear that it is directed to a case in which the objection to the production of the documents called for in the subpoena duces tecum is based not upon any apprehended danger to the public interest from disclosure of the matter contained in the particular returns and other documents of which production is sought but upon the view entertained by the Minister that as a matter of public or departmental policy he ought to object to the production from the custody of the department of any income tax returns or correspondence relating thereto. The reason assigned in support of this view is that, while the returns are made under statutory compulsion, the taxpayers rely in making them upon an implied undertaking that the department will treat them as confidential communications and that it would be prejudicial to the public interest that this implied undertaking should be dishonoured.

Digitized by Google

In my view there is nothing in the acts referred to in the question which affirms the existence of any representation or undertaking on the part of the department that its officials will not produce the returns if called upon to do so by regular process issued from a court in which the trial of an indictable offence is pending. Sections 81 and 121 of the Income War Tax Act do not assist the appellant on this point. I agree with the view expressed by Barclay J. in Ship v.The King[18] that the judicial officer presiding at the trial of a person charged with an indictable offence is a person legally entitled to the information referred to in those sections if the production of such information is duly called for by subpoena and is relevant to the pending charge. For the purposes of the question before us, such relevance is assumed.

It is said for the appellant, however, that once the Minister has stated on oath that in his opinion the production of such returns would be prejudicial to the public interest while it is still the function of the court out of which the subpoena issued to decide whether or not production shall be ordered that court must decide the question by accepting the objection of the Minister as conclusive and giving effect to it. It is argued that this conclusion flows irresistibly from the judgment of the House of Lords in Duncan v*. Cammell Laird and Company*[19]. In approaching this argument it is necessary to bear in mind the often quoted words of Lord Halsbury in Quinn v.Leathem[20]:

> …Now, before discussing the case of Allen v. Flood and what was decided therein, there are two observations of a general character which I wish to make, and one is to repeat what I have very often said before, that every judgment must be read as applicable to the particular facts proved, or assumed to be proved, since the generality of the expressions which may be found there are not intended to be expositions of the whole law, but governed and qualified by the particular facts of the case in which such expressions are to be found. The other is that a case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it Such a mode of reasoning assumes that the law is necessarily a logical code, whereas every lawyer must acknowledge that the law is not always logical at all.

It is at once apparent that the facts with which the Law Lords were dealing in Duncan v*. Cammell Laird and Company* were altogether different from the assumed facts upon which the questions before us are based. Moreover, as is pointed out by my brother Kellock, Viscount Simon L.C. was careful to state (at page 633) that the judgment of the House was limited to civil actions.

In the case at bar, in the supposed state of facts, the Minister has not only asserted his objection but has fully informed the Court as to the grounds upon which it is founded and these appear to me to be grounds of the sort which Viscount Simon indicated (at page 642) "would not afford to the Minister adequate justification for objecting to production".

Perhaps unnecessarily, I wish to emphasize that any opinion which I have expressed in the course of these reasons is strictly limited to the supposed state of facts upon which the first question, as I have interpreted it above, is based.

Digitized by Google

Particularly, I do not think we are called upon to express any opinion as to what would have been the result if the objection of the Minister had been based on any other grounds than those indicated above or as to whether, as the answer to Question 1 given by the majority of the Court of Appeal in British Columbia might be thought to suggest, there may be circumstances in which the judge presiding at the trial of a person charged with an indictable offence may privately examine a document sought to be introduced in evidence.

I would answer Question 1 (a) and (b) as follows: Yes. This answer is however limited, as I have interpreted the question to be limited, to a case in which the objection of the Minister is to the production of any documents belonging to the class consisting of returns, reports, papers and documents filed pursuant to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, the Income War Tax Act or the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940 on the ground that they belong to that class.

I would answer Questions 2 and 3 as proposed by my brother Kellock.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the Attorney General of Canada: F. P. Varcoe.

Solicitor for the Attorney General of British Columbia: E. Pepler.

---

[1] [1953] 2 D.L.R. 9; 8 W.W.R. (N.S) 1; C.T.C. 136.
[2] [1942] A.C. 624.
[3] [1931] A.C. 704.
[4] [1942] 1 A.E. 587; [1942] A.C. 624.
[5] (1794) 24 State Trials 199 at 808.
[6] (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 494 at 498.
[7] [1895] 2 Q.B. 189.
[8] (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 509 at 521.
[9] [1931] A.C. 704 at 718.
[10] [1947] 3 D.L.R. 586.
[11] (1949) 95 C.C.C. 143.
[12] [1952] 5 W.W.R. (N.S) 49.
[13] [1916] 1 K.B. 822.
[14] [1931] A.C. 704 at 714.
[15] [1900] 1 Ch. 347.
[16] [1931] A.C. 704 at 714.
[17] [1942] A.C. 624 at 636.
[18] (1949) 95 C.C.C. 143 at 155.
[19] [1942] A.C. 495 at 506.
[20] [1901] A.C. 495 at 506.

R v. Wilder, 2000 BCCA 29 (CanLII), 2000-01-14, 142 CCC (3d) 418; 70 CRR (2d) 259, Confidentiality Provision not Bar to Admissibility of Evidence on Alternative Criminal Code Charge in face of Charter Self- Incrimination

Written Reasons by:
The Honourable Mr. Justice Esson
Concurred in by:
The Honourable Madam Justice Ryan The Honourable Mr. Justice Mackenzie

Digitized by Google

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Esson:

[1] The Crown appeals against the acquittal of Mr. Wilder on 7 counts of fraud and one of possession of money and property obtained by crime. The charges were laid under what are now Code ss.380(2)(a) and 354. The acquittal was entered after the trial judge ruled that a large body of evidence introduced by the Crown, which had previously been ruled admissible, was inadmissible as being in breach of the privilege against self-incrimination embodied in s.7 of the Charter.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[2] The charges arose out of Mr. Wilder's participation in the Scientific Research Tax Credit ("SRTC") program in 1984-85. The essence of the alleged fraud is that Mr. Wilder and others claimed to have incurred expenses for research far in excess of the amount of research actually done and that the inflated research claims led to the fraudulent creation of tax credits which deprived the Crown of tax revenue in many millions of dollars.

[3] Mr. Wilder was president of Canadian Biomass Research Inc. and Coastal Natural Resources Research Inc. Those companies filed a number of "designations" on behalf of investors pursuant to s.194(4) of the Income Tax Act ("the Act"). The Crown alleges that, as a result, investors in the two companies received tax credits of about $38 million which triggered a tax liability of the same amount under the Act.

[4] The two companies deposited funds to meet their tax obligations in escrow accounts with a bank. That money was not to be released without certificates from Mr. Wilder as president of the two companies, Michael Richards, an accountant, and Gerald Byerlay, an engineer. The certificates were intended to confirm that sufficient qualified scientific research expenditures had been incurred by the companies to extinguish the tax liability. In late 1984 and early 1985, a number of certificates were filed with the bank which then released the escrow monies to the companies.

[5] The Crown alleges that the certificates were fraudulent in that the research expenditures were in one case inflated, that in a second no expenditures were incurred and, in a third, that there actually was no research project and that the escrow funds ought therefore have been used to satisfy the tax liability.

HISTORY OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST CO-ACCUSED

[6] An audit review was launched in 1985, in the course of which Revenue Canada personnel obtained information under s.231(1) of the Act. In October, 1985, Revenue Canada's special investigation unit began an investigation to determine whether there was a basis for charges under the Act or the Criminal Code. In 1985, bank records were obtained from various financial institutions pursuant to powers under the Act. In 1986 potential witnesses were interviewed. In May, 1987 search warrants issued under the Act were executed, as a result of which records and documents were seized from the business premises of various corporations and private residences, including a house owned by Mr. Wilder's wife. Some of the grounds for the searches were based on information obtained during the audit review.

[7] The investigation culminated in November, 1990 with Mr. Wilder, seven other individuals and a company owned by one of the seven (Lawrence) being charged in a direct indictment with eight counts of fraud and two of possession of money and property obtained by crime. One count of each charge was stayed against Mr. Wilder before his trial began.

Digitized by Google

[8] In February, 1993 a trial before Mr. Justice Wong and a jury of the charges against four of the accused (Lawrence, Richards, Johnson and Byerlay) began. Mr. Wilder had been severed from them a few days before that. That trial ended on September 30, 1993 with all four being convicted on five counts of fraud and some other charges. Lawrence and Johnson were sentenced to seven years imprisonment, Richards to six years imprisonment and Byerlay to one year. The convictions and sentences of Lawrence, Richards and Johnson were upheld by this court in January, 1996. A new trial was ordered for Byerlay: R. v. Richards (M.B.) et al (1996), 70 B.C.A.C. 161. Lawrence's application to the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal that decision was refused on October 1, 1998. For various reasons, the charges were never proceeded with against the accused Attrill, Vaz and Seona Wilder.

HISTORY OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST MR. WILDER

[9] Mr. Wilder elected trial before judge alone. The hearing of pretrial motions began in September, 1995 and continued with some interruptions until March, 1997. On October 27, 1995, the trial judge ruled that the transmission of taxpayer information from Revenue Canada investigators to Crown counsel, and the use of that information to lay Criminal Code fraud charges, did not contravene the confidentiality provisions in s. 241(1) of the Act and therefore did not breach Mr. Wilder's s. 7 Charter rights.

[10] In a ruling delivered on January 30, 1996, the trial judge decided an issue which arose out of amendments made to the confidentiality provisions of the Act during the time this proceeding was on foot. It will be convenient here to reproduce a chart prepared by Crown counsel which sets out the language of s.241 during the three relevant periods.

Pre-February 18, 1987	February 18, 1987 - June 10, 1993	Post-June 10, 1993

Digitized by Google

241(1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or authorized person shall (a) knowingly communicate or knowingly allow to be communicated to any person any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue	241(1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or authorized person shall (a) knowingly communicate or knowingly allow to be communicated to any person any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue	241 (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official shall knowingly provide, or knowingly allow to be provided, to any person any taxpayer information; knowingly allow any person to have access to any taxpayer information; or knowingly use any taxpayer
Tax Act; knowingly allow any person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act; or knowingly use, other than in the course of the duties of the official or authorized person in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act any	Tax Act; knowingly allow any person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act; or knowingly use, other than in the course of the duties of the official or authorized person in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act any	information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act or for the purpose for which it was provided under this section.

Digitized by Google

Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings. to give evidence relating to any information obtained by or behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum, and Gas Revenue Tax Act; or to produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the	Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings. to give evidence relating to any information obtained by or behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum, and Gas Revenue Tax Act; or to produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the	(2) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament or other law, no official shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information.
(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.	(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information, under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.	Subsection (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, under an Act of the Parliament; or any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment
		241(4) An official may

Digitized by Google

provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act, solely for that purpose;

The scheme of the section is that the confidentiality rights created by s-ss. (1) and (2) do not apply in those court proceedings described in s-s.(3). That subsection was amended twice during the period starting in 1985 when the audit investigation began and up to the time of the trial. The first amendment resulted in the words "that have been commenced by the laying of an information" being added. Undoubtedly, that change was made to overcome the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in A.G. (Canada) v. Thibault, reflex, [1987] 1 C.T.C. 156 (Que. C.A.) which held that a search warrant issued before any charges were laid was part of a criminal proceeding for the purpose of that section. The words "that have been commenced by the laying of an information "did not, of course, cover the circumstances of this case which was commenced by direct indictment. That difficulty, which presumably resulted from an oversight in drafting the amendment, was removed by the 1993 amendment which added the words "or the preferring of an indictment". At the same time, the subsection was amended by dividing the reference to criminal proceedings and to administration or enforcement of the Act into separate sub-subsections.

[11] The word "suspended" has been used throughout this proceeding to describe the effect of s.241(3) in rendering the confidentiality provisions inapplicable to certain proceedings.

[12] The ruling delivered on January 30, 1996 provided that the confidentiality provisions were, by reason of the wording in effect from 1987 to June 10, 1993, not suspended prior to the latter date. By a further ruling delivered a few days later the trial judge "clarified" that ruling to hold that the confidentiality provisions were suspended prior to February 18, 1987.

[13] I will mention here that the Crown's position throughout has been that the confidentiality provisions have been suspended at all relevant times because they are "proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act", which language which has been in s.241(3) at all relevant times. That view, as I understand it, was accepted by Wong J. in the first trial but the trial judge on the trial of Mr. Wilder appears to have acted on the view that the confidentiality provisions could be suspended only if they were criminal proceedings of the kind described in s.241(3).

[14] On March 21, 1997 the trial judge held that information obtained from the accused under the provisions of the Act prior to the beginning of a criminal investigation could be used in prosecuting the accused for fraud under the Code without offending his s. 7 Charter rights. In giving that ruling, he said:

With respect, I agree with the Crown's submission that the Income Tax Act is a regulatory statute backed by penal sanctions found either in that Act or the Criminal Code. Those sanctions, the Crown says, can be found in the Income Tax Act or the Criminal Code. "The existence of the sanctions does not affect the constitutional legitimacy of the provisions of the Income Tax Act which compel the production of information and documents, and the use of such information in subsequent criminal proceedings is not constitutionally barred by section 7 of the Charter. In this case the obtaining of the information for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act was unrelated to the subsequent criminal investigation, and use of that information in the prosecution of the accused for offences under the Criminal Code for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act is proper."

The conclusion I have reached is that the use of the information in this prosecution does not violate s.7 of the Charter.

Digitized by Google

After that ruling was given, the accused was arraigned and the trial began.

[15] On January 20, 1998 this court delivered its decision in R. v. White 1998 CanLII 5519 (BC CA), (1998), 122 C.C.C. (3d) 167 holding that accident reports given by the accused under the statutory compulsion of the provincial Motor Vehicle Act could not be used against her in a prosecution for "hit and run" under the Code. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Wilder applied for a reversal of the judge's decision of March 21, 1997 on the ground that the law had been changed by R. v. White. On August 25, 1998 the trial judge granted that application. He delivered lengthy reasons for concluding that:

[60] ... [T]he information obtained by Revenue Canada auditors from the accused by Mr. Wilder under the compulsion provisions of the Income Tax Act prior to the commencement of the criminal investigation is, on the authority of R. v. White, inadmissible as evidence in the prosecution of Mr. Wilder for the Criminal Code offences set out in the indictment.

[16] The trial judge did not decide at that point whether that ruling applied to information obtained from persons or institutions other than Mr. Wilder. After further hearings, he gave rulings on October 13 and November 4 which resulted in all of the "taxpayer information" relied upon by the Crown being ruled inadmissible. The Crown then closed its case and the "no evidence" application of the accused was granted. It is common ground that the evidence derived from taxpayer information is essential to proving the Crown's case although it cannot, by itself, prove the whole of that case.

[17] I will note here that the decision excluding taxpayer information from sources other than the accused depends in part upon the trial judge's view as to the scope of the decision in R. v. White but also upon his interpretation of s. 241 of the Act and certain factual conclusions made by him.

[18] The evidence excluded by the trial judge was all "taxpayer information" within the statutory definition in s.241(1) of the Act.

"taxpayer information" means information of any kind and in any form relating to one or more taxpayers that is obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, or prepared from information referred to in paragraph (a),

but does not include information that does not directly or indirectly reveal, the identity of the taxpayer to whom it relates.

The trial judge described the evidence thus:

[35] In the case at bar the taxpayer information (documents and statements) in issue was obtained by Revenue Canada auditors prior to the commencement of a criminal investigation and thus was not produced in response to or in furtherance of a criminal investigation.

...

[46] The information demanded by the Revenue Canada auditors of Mr. Wilder consisted at least in part of the 'ordinary' records kept by him and others in the usual course of their businesses. Some of the documents were, however, created in response to the auditors' requests. But essentially the information obtained by Revenue Canada took the form of pre-existing records or documents which merely had to be 'located' by the accused or were created prior to any criminal investigation taking place.

[19] Much of the excluded taxpayer information did not come directly from Mr. Wilder. It also came from the other indicted individuals, from the three corporations, and from other persons not charged.

[20] The trial judge's reasons, as I have said, are lengthy but the essence of the decision is in these paragraphs:

[1] The distinction between the nature of the documents and statements in this case and White is not of significance, in my view, in deciding whether the information compelled by the auditors here can be used in a prosecution of Criminal Code offences. The critical question in whether the information obtained under the compulsion provisions of the regulatory statute is being used as an integral part of the regulatory scheme.

Digitized by Google

[2] In my judgment White stands for the proposition that information obtained under the compulsion provisions of a regulatory statute for the purposes of carrying out the regulatory scheme of that statute can be used in a prosecution for a breach of a provision of that statute and not in proof of a charge under the Criminal Code. That principle, in my view, is supported by the reasoning in Fitzpatrick and Ling.

The reference to Fitzpatrick is of course to R. v. Fitzpatrick, 1995 CanLII 44 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 154, a leading decision on the issue of what evidence may be excluded as self-incriminatory. The reference to Ling is to R. v. Ling, an unreported decision of Millward J. to which, without disrespect, I will make no further reference.

THE EFFECT OF R. v. WHITE

[21] Subsequent to the decision now under appeal, the majority decision of this court in R. v. White was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada 1999 CanLII 689 (SCC), (1999), 174 D.L.R. (4th) 111. As the issues are dealt with much more completely and authoritatively in the reasons of Iacobucci J. for the majority, I need not try to explain whatever language in my reasons for the majority in this court led the trial judge into error. I will say now that nothing in the reasons of Iacobbuci J. supports the broad proposition that no information obtained by statutory compulsion for the purposes of the statute's regulatory scheme can be used in proof of a charge under the Criminal Code.

[22] In para. 44 of his reasons, Iacobucci J. described the rule against self-incrimination as "an overarching principle within our criminal justice system". He then went on under the heading "The Importance of Context" to say:

[45] That the principle against self-incrimination does have the status as an overarching principle does not imply that the principle provides absolute protection for an accused against all uses of information that has been compelled by statute or otherwise. The residual protections provided by the principle against self- incrimination as contained in s.7 are specific, and contextually sensitive. ... The principle against self-incrimination demands different things at different times, with the task in every case being to determine exactly what the principle demands, if anything, within the particular context at issue.

[46] In Fitzpatrick, supra, at paras. 21-25, La Forest J., speaking on behalf of the full Court, confirmed that this Court has always expressly limited the application of the principle against self-incrimination to cover only the specific circumstances raised by a given case. He stressed, at para. 25, that a court must begin "on the ground", with a concrete and contextual analysis of the circumstances, in order to determine whether the principle against self-incrimination is actually engaged on the facts.

And, in para. 48:

[48] It is the balancing of principles that occurs under s. 7 of the Charter that lends significance to a given factual context in determining whether the principle against self-incrimination has been violated. In some contexts, the factors that favour the importance of the search for truth will outweigh the factors that favour protecting the individual against undue compulsion by the state. ... In every case, the facts must be closely examined to determine whether the principle against self-incrimination has truly been brought into play by the production or use of the declarant's statement.

[23] Those statements are consistent with what was said in Thomson Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada (Director of Investigation & Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), 1990 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 425, 54 C.C.C. (3rd) 417, in a passage quoted by La Forest J. in R. v. Fitzpatrick, supra, at pp.166-167:

Digitized by Google

[O]ne should not automatically accept that s.7 comprises a broad right against self-incrimination on an abstract level or, for that matter, on the American model, complete with all its residual doctrines. If that had been intended, it would have been very easy to say so. That is not what the Charter does, and the Charter must be read in its own terms. Accordingly, while I am prepared to accept that s.7 can protect the individual from fundamental unfairness arising out of self-incriminatory statements in circumstances not covered by ss.11(c) and 13, an assessment of what this means must be made in accordance with the spirit of those provisions.

[24] In my view, the trial judge erred in failing to have sufficient regard to the factual context of the case before him and, more specifically, in failing to weigh in the balance, in the words of Iacobucci J., supra, "the factors that favour the importance of the search for truth". I do not say that the judge overlooked those factors in the sense of making no reference to them. Indeed, at one point or another in his reasons, he mentioned most of the relevant factors but in the end dismissed them from consideration on the basis of an overly broad interpretation of what was held in White.

[25] It may be, as Mr. Harper for the Crown suggests, that that interpretation was based upon a comment in para. 21 of my reasons in White to the effect that the reasoning in Fitzpatrick did not support the Crown's position in White. In that case, the Crown's submissions in this Court and in the Supreme Court of Canada were primarily based on Fitzpatrick. In White,Fitzpatrick was accepted as authoritative but was distinguished because of the wholly different circumstances in which the statutory compulsion arose. White cannot be confined entirely to its own facts, but it does not support the broad proposition which the trial judge took from it. The facts and circumstances on which it depends are so different from those in the case at bar as to render it of no direct application. The facts and circumstances of Fitzpatrick, on the other hand, have important points of similarity with those in the case at bar.

[26] A number of the factors upon which the decision in Fitzpatrick was based are summarized by Iacobucci in R. v. White at pp. 134-139 (D.L.R.).

Absence of Coercion

... [T]he obligations created by the provincial fisheries regulations at issue in [Fitzpatrick] ... were imposed upon the accused with his free and informed consent. The accused had a free choice whether or not to participate in the commercial fishery. (para. 53)

Nature of the Records

The hail reports and fishing logs could not properly be characterized as "confessions". Even if they were, their use as evidence in regulatory proceedings for over-fishing did not increase the likelihood of their being falsified. (para. 61)

The hail reports and fishing logs were comparable to business records in that they were impersonal lists in which the declarant had little expectation of privacy. (para. 66)

Use of the Records in Context of the Regulatory Scheme

The reports were "essential to the integrity of the entire regulatory regime - a regime that was beneficial to both the state and the accused...". (para. 60)

[27] A comparison of the factors identified in Fitzpatrick to the facts of the case at bar supports the Crown's position. In terms of the nature of the records, the records in this case were not merely "like" business records, but appear, for the most part, to be business records in the ordinary sense. As to the Crown's purpose in using the records, s. 241 expressly provides for the use of taxpayer information in litigation including criminal proceedings. This accords with Fitzpatrick where it was held that the intended use of the records in the prosecution of over-fishing was contemplated by, and indeed essential to, the regulatory scheme. This is, however, in sharp contrast to the language of s. 61 of the Motor Vehicle Act (at issue in White) which extended use immunity to the contents of an accident report and thus revealed a legislative intent to use such reports only for "non-litigious purposes".

Digitized by Google

[28] Two other factors should be noted. First, the records in question here are not remotely like "confessions". That is one of the more obvious distinguishing features from White where the statement was made after the events which gave rise to the charge. A related consideration is that a true confession (as was the accident report in White) is generally tendered to prove the truth of what is said therein. These business records may not serve that purpose but any falsity in them may constitute the essence of the offence. Secondly, in Fitzpatrick there was emphasis on the consideration that the obligation to file the reports was one voluntarily assumed by the persons engaged in fishing because that was an activity they voluntarily entered into. That applies a fortiori to those who engaged in the SRTC scheme. They were necessarily persons of some sophistication in matters of business who had the constant assistance of lawyers, accountants and other advisors. They knew that they had to keep records. They knew that they had to produce them to the tax authorities and they knew, or should have known, that s.241, while creating a right of confidentiality had a clear exception in s.241(3) for proceedings such as these.

[29] There is a significant distinction between this case and Fitzpatrick in that the latter was not a case where the Crown sought to use the statutorily compelled information in proof of a criminal charge. In this regard, Fitzpatrick does not directly support the Crown's position. On the other hand, I see nothing in the Supreme Court's decisions in either Fitzpatrick or White which would preclude the use of such information in criminal cases. The fact that the accident report in White was sought to be used in a criminal prosecution was of course significant in the particular circumstances of that case. As Iacobucci J. said in para. 60:

The fact that the statements in this case are sought to be introduced in criminal rather than regulatory proceedings simply serves to accentuate the fact that the Crown seeks to use the statement for a purpose that was never contemplated as being a component of the regulatory regime.

In this case, however, the compelled information is sought to be used in proof of a charge of fraud against the regulatory scheme. The evidence sought to be introduced is, in large part, the records maintained by the accused in availing themselves of the statutory scheme and, the Crown alleges, in obtaining fraudulent benefits from that scheme. That circumstance, combined with the fact that Parliament expressly sanctions the use of the records in proof of such charges, makes it clear that this case is well outside any protection which could be provided by s. 7.

[30] The most recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada dealing with enforcement of the Act is Del Zotto v. Canada, 1999 CanLII 701 (SCC), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 3. While not directly on point, that case is entirely consistent with the view that s. 7 has no application to this case. Del Zotto dealt with the question whether s.

of the Act is in conflict with ss. 7 and 8 of the Charter. That section provides for the appointment by the Tax Court of a hearing officer to "make such inquiry as the officer may deem necessary with reference to anything relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act." Mr. Del Zotto, having been suspected of tax evasion following an audit, was made the subject of such an inquiry. He challenged the constitutional validity of the section on the basis of ss. 7 and 8 of the Charter. The Supreme Court, in upholding the validity of s.231.4, adopted the dissenting reasons of Mr. Justice Strayer in the Federal Court of Appeal: 147 D.L.R. (4th) 457.

Digitized by Google

[31] In the course of his reasons, Strayer J.A. commented tartly on the somewhat overblown rhetoric indulged in by Mr. Del Zotto's counsel in expounding his view of the necessity for a broad application of Charter rights. Strayer J.A. said at p. 475:

Briefly put I am unwilling to accept that because some might characterize this as a criminal process the preconditions for a search as proclaimed by the Supreme Court in Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 641, 14 C.C.C. (3d) 97, must automatically be met before an inquiry under section 231.4 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, can be commenced. If particular uses of the subpoena power by such an inquiry, or particular subsequent uses of evidence obtained through such subpoenas threaten to endanger section 7 or section 8 rights, it is only then that those rights should be invoked.

The appellants' case suffers from verbal excess: the inflation of language which detracts from precise consideration of what is involved here. The factum tells us that

Such Inquiries are a hallmark of the worst of the police states that the world has seen. [Appellants' factum paragraph 150.]

Much was heard of the Star Chamber, now dead some 350 years but still the stuff of legal rhetoric. Revenue Canada was said to have "passed"(sic) the Rubicon (Appellants' factum, paragraph 50). Counsel argued that this whole process would destroy the "Golden Thread" of the common law, a familiar but unhelpful metaphor in the application of finely balanced Charter guarantees.

[32] In this case, as in many others in which Charter issues are raised, we were treated by the respondent to similar verbal excess. That approach gives no weight to what Iacobucci J. in White called "the factors that favour the importance of the search for truth".

[33] For these reasons, I conclude that the trial judge erred in holding that taxpayer information given by Mr. Wilder is not admissible against him in proof of the charges laid in this case. That being so, it almost goes without saying that the trial judge erred in holding that taxpayer information provided by others could not be used against Mr. Wilder. However, as the broader exclusion did not depend entirely on the self-incrimination principle, I find it necessary to explain why that aspect of the decision should also be reversed.

[34] This issue turns in part on the interpretation which should be given to s. 241(3) of the Act which, as it now stands, reads as follows:

241(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, under an Act of the Parliament; or any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan or the Unemployment Insurance Act or any other Act of Parliament or law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty.

[35] Subsections (1) and (2) are of course the confidentiality provisions. The Crown submits that s. 241(3)(b) applies both to civil and criminal proceedings which relate to the administration or enforcement of the Act. This prosecution, the Crown submits, is a proceeding "relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act" and is therefore not one to which s. 241(3)(a) applies. The submission is that that subsection applies to all criminal proceedings other than those relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act. If that is so, it follows that there is no need to refer to s. 241(3)(a) to determine whether the confidentiality provisions are suspended. The significance of that is that, if the confidentiality provisions are suspended in this case under s. 241(3)(b), the suspension continued during the period from 1987 to 1993 when prosecutions brought by direct indictment were not included in s. 241(3). That, as I understand it, is the position which was taken by Wong J. on the trial of the co-accused. It does not appear that that was an issue on appeal.

Digitized by Google

[36] The trial judge in this case, perhaps in an effort to reconcile the language of the section with his view of the scope of R. v. White, held that subsection (a) applies only to criminal proceedings which relate to the administration or enforcement of the Act and that subsection (b) applies only to civil proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act.

[37] That view of the matter would result in the confidentiality provisions not being suspended for any criminal proceedings other than those which relate to the administration or enforcement of the Act. That conclusion, in my view, is entirely at odds with the plain language of s-s. (a) and, for the reasons I have already given, is not supported by the decision in R. v. White.

[38] Nor is it supported by the legislative history. I referred earlier to the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in R. v. Thibault which had extended the words "criminal proceedings" in the pre-1987 version of s. 241(3) to applications for search warrants brought before any charge was laid. Parliament moved with some alacrity to bring in the amendment of 1987 to exclude pre-charge proceedings. R. v. Thibault was a drug prosecution entirely unrelated to the administration or enforcement of any of the statutes referred to in s. 241(3). Had it been the intention of Parliament that the words "criminal proceedings" be applicable only to proceedings for the administration or enforcement of the statutes referred to in s. 241(3), it surely would have amended the section at the same time to make clear that restriction.

[39] The trial judge's conclusion that s-s. (a) does not suspend the confidentiality provisions with respect to criminal proceedings in general was presumably based on his view that R. v. White precluded any information obtained through regulatory legislation from being introduced in proof of a criminal charge. From that he moved to the conclusion that, as he put it in his reasons of October 13:

In my judgment the legal effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in White is to restrict the meaning of "criminal proceedings" in s. 241(3)(a) to criminal proceedings related to carrying out the regulatory scheme under the Income Tax Act.

I have already explained why in my view R. v. White has no effect on the meaning of "criminal proceedings" in s. 241(3)(a). It therefore follows that I disagree with the conclusion that it restricts that phrase in the manner suggested by the trial judge. His conclusion seems to imply that s.241(3)(a) is constitutionally invalid insofar as it suspends the confidentiality provisions for criminal proceedings other than those arising under the enumerated statutes. That approach ignores the fact that the constitutionality of the section has not been challenged in whole or in part.

[40] I agree with the Crown's submission that s. 241(3)(b) applies to a criminal proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act, and I also agree that this is such a proceeding.

[41] The leading decision on s. 241 of the Act is that of the Supreme Court of Canada in Slatterly v. Doane Raymond Ltd. (1993), D.T.C. 5443 (S.C.C.). The majority judgment is that of Iacobucci J. (McLachlin J. dissenting). In that case Slatterly was petitioned into bankruptcy by Revenue Canada; Doane Raymond was the trustee in bankruptcy. The issue was whether the trustee's action under the Bankruptcy Act for a declaration that certain property was that of the bankrupt's estate was, in the language of s. 241(3), a proceeding "relating to the administration or enforcement" of the Act. If it was, s. 241(3) would permit the use of taxpayer information as evidence against the bankrupt. If it was not, the use of the information was precluded.

Digitized by Google

[42] The issue which divided the Court was summarized thus by McLachlin J. at p. 5451:
Focusing in part on the fact that the trial would ultimately result in the collection of unpaid taxes, [Iacobucci J.] finds that the trial was a proceeding "relating to" the administration or enforcement of the Act.
In my view, the s. 241(3) exemption applies only in the case of proceedings specifically provided for in the Income Tax Act.
[43] Iacobucci J., after stating that neither the text nor the context ofs. 241 supported the narrow interpretation accepted by McLachlin J., went on to say at p. 5447:
The connecting phrases used by Parliament in s. 241(3) are very broad. The confidentiality provisions are stated not to apply in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.
The phrase "in respect of" was considered by this Court in Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 39.
The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters.
[Emphasis added]
In my view, these comments are equally applicable to the phrase "relating to". The Pocket Oxford Dictionary(1984) defines the word "relation" as follows:
... what one person or thing has to do with another, way in which one stands or is related to another, kind of connection or correspondence or contrast or feeling that prevails between persons or things;...
So, both the connecting phrases of s. 241(3)suggest that a wide rather than narrow view should be taken when considering whether a proposed disclosure is in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.
[44] This proceeding, unlike the proceeding in question in Slatterly v. Doane Raymond, is not one for the collection of tax. But, in view of the broad interpretation given to the words "in respect of" and "relating to", I find this proceeding to be one relating to the enforcement of the Act. It is unnecessary to consider whether it is also a proceeding for the administration of the Act.
[45] It is also unnecessary to decide whether the confidentiality provisions are also suspended by s. 241(3)(a) which, on its plain language, applies to all criminal proceedings. I am, however, inclined to the view that criminal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act are impliedly excluded from subsection (a), which comes into effect only upon the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment. Subsection (b) has no specific provision triggering the application of the suspension. As subsection (b), in relation to criminal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act, covers all of the ground covered by subsection (a), but with the added flexibility that it covers proceedings before information or indictment, it seems a reasonable inference that subsection (a) was not intended to apply to criminal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act. However, I need decide only that subsection (b) is effective to suspend the confidentiality provisions in respect of this prosecution.
[46] The trial judge did not find that, in general, a proceeding of this kind would not be one for the administration and enforcement of the Act. Rather, he reached that conclusion on the basis of an affidavit sworn by Crown counsel shortly after the indictment was preferred which included this paragraph:
THAT the prosecution of the accused named in the said indictment is not being undertaken and will not be used for the direct or indirect enforcement of any revenue law of Canada or directly or indirectly for the establishment or collection of tax, but is a prosecution for alleged crimes of fraud and possession of property obtained by crime.

Digitized by Google

[47] That affidavit was sworn by the late P.W. Halprin, Q.C. in support of an application to the Supreme Court of British Columbia for the appointment of a commissioner to take evidence in Hong Kong pursuant to what was then s. 709(b). Mr. Halprin exhibited to his affidavit a letter from a Mr. Gunasekera, a senior Crown counsel in Hong Kong, setting out the matters which would be taken into consideration in that jurisdiction in deciding whether to honour a request for judicial assistance in the taking of evidence for proceedings in foreign jurisdictions. One of those considerations was that Hong Kong would not, as a matter of public policy, assist in the enforcement of a foreign revenue law. For that reason, it was, he said, necessary "... to ascertain that this application is not in any manner related, either directly or indirectly, to the establishment or collection of tax."

[48] It appears that the order appointing a commissioner was duly made and that the Hong Kong authorities provided the requisite assistance in the obtaining of evidence. The matter of para. 7 of Mr. Halprin's affidavit first became an issue at an early stage of the trial of the co-accused before Wong J. The issue then, as I understand it, was whether the commission evidence should be ruled inadmissible on the ground that Mr. Halprin in his capacity as Crown counsel had deliberately misled the Hong Kong authorities. Wong J. rejected the application to exclude. The position of the Crown on this point is now, as it was before Wong J., that Mr. Halprin was simply tracking the language of the letter from Mr. Gunasekera and that para. 7, read as a whole, merely put forward an assurance that the proceeding was not one "for the establishment or collection of tax".

[49] In this case, the trial judge concluded:

... that Mr. Halprin's carefully chosen words-- "the prosecution of the accused named in the said Indictment is not being undertaken and will not be used for the direct or indirect enforcement of any revenue law of Canada" -- mean the prosecution of the accused, including Mr. Wilder, is not for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

The question whether the proceeding is one relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act cannot be answered by reference to the view held by an employee or agent of the Crown. It must be answered by reference to the known facts as to the charges laid and the case which the Crown seeks to make. Having regard to those matters, it is clear for the reasons expressed earlier that this proceeding is one relating to the enforcement of the Act.

[50] There was some logical basis for the defence in the first trial relying on para. 7 of Halprin's affidavit as a basis for ruling inadmissible the commission evidence. Wong J. considered that submission and, accepting the Crown's submission that the paragraph read as a whole was not misleading, ruled against it. In this case, the contention is not that the paragraph was misleading but rather that Mr. Halprin's statement conclusively establishes that the prosecution was not brought for the enforcement of any revenue law of Canada. The affidavit, as I have said, has no relevance to that question.

[51] It follows that I would not uphold any of the grounds upon which the trial judge in his rulings of August 25, October 13 and November 4, 1998 held taxpayer information to be inadmissible. It follows that the evidence, saving any just exceptions based on other grounds, should have been admitted.

[52] In addition to his submissions with respect to the issues raised by the Crown on this appeal, Mr. Wilder filed a document headed "The Indictment and Previous Trial" which raises various allegations of fraudulent conduct and abuse of process on the part of the Crown in pursuing this case. If there is a proper basis for such contentions, and that is not at all clear from the record before us, such matters must first be pursued in the trial court.

Digitized by Google

There is no basis upon which this court can deal with them on this appeal.
[53] I would allow the appeal, set aside the verdict of acquittal and order a new trial.

"THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE ESSON"
I AGREE:
"THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE RYAN"
I AGREE:
"THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE MACKENZIE"
Corrigendum - April 18, 2000
The reference in para. [1] to Code s.254 should be to s.354.
In para. [17], the word "from" should be inserted between "information" and "sources".

Slattery (Trustee of) v. Slattery, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 430, Realizing Information for Bankruptcy Proceedings and the Extent of "the Act"

Slattery (Trustee of) v. Slattery, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 430 Marguerite Slattery Appellant
v.
Doane Raymond Limited, Trustee of the Estate of Raymond P. Slattery, a Bankrupt Respondent
Indexed as: Slattery (Trustee of) v. Slattery
File No.: 22618.
1993: March 29; 1993: September 30.

Present: Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ.
on appeal from the new brunswick court of appeal

Income tax -- Enforcement -- Confidentiality -- Evidence gained from Income Tax Act investigations protected unless required in proceedings relating to administration or enforcement of the Act -- Taxpayer petitioned into bankruptcy by Revenue Canada -- Trustee in bankruptcy seeking declaration that assets held by taxpayer's wife rightfully assets of bankrupt's estate -- Testimony of Revenue Canada officials from income tax investigation admitted into evidence -- Whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property belongs to the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act -- Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 241(1)(a), (b), (c), (2)(a), (b), (3), (4)(c).

A taxpayer unable to pay his taxes owing was petitioned into bankruptcy by Revenue Canada. The respondent trustee in bankruptcy commenced an action against the appellant (the bankrupt's wife) seeking a declaration that certain assets registered in her name were the property of the bankrupt's estate or were held in trust for that estate.

At trial, the trustee sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the investigation into the bankrupt's affairs. Appellant argued that that testimony was barred because s. 241 of the Income Tax Act prohibits Revenue Canada officials from disclosing information obtained from a taxpayer for the purposes of that Act. The trial judge ruled that this testimony fell within the exception in s. 241(3) which provides that the prohibition does not apply in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act. Both officials testified, and the court granted the declaration in part. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge's interpretation of s. 241 and dismissed the appeal. At issue here was whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property is property of the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding "relating to the . . . enforcement of" the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of the Act.

Digitized by Google

Held (L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Lamer C.J. and La Forest, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: Section 241 involves a balancing of competing interests: the privacy interest of the taxpayer with respect to his or her financial information, and the interest of the Minister in being allowed to disclose taxpayer information to the extent necessary for the effective administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act and other federal statutes referred to in s. 241(4). Only in exceptional or prescribed situations does the privacy interest give way to the interest of the state. By instilling confidence in taxpayers that the personal information they disclose will not be communicated in other contexts, Parliament encourages voluntary disclosure of this information. Parliament, however, has also recognized that the possession of personal information is useless if it cannot be used to assist in tax collection, when required, including tax collection by way of judicial enforcement.

Section 241(3) contemplates not only administrative and enforcement proceedings brought under the Income Tax Act itself but also other proceedings. Both the text and the context of s. 241 buttress this conclusion. The connecting phrases used by Parliament in s. 241(3) ("in respect of" and "relating to") are of the widest possible scope and suggest that a wide rather than narrow view should be taken when considering whether a proposed disclosure is in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. This breadth of meaning is confirmed by the French version of the section.

Section 222 clearly states that the Minister may resort generally to the courts to institute civil proceedings to collect taxes as debts in addition to the procedures specified in the Income Tax Act. In order to take full advantage of this power, the Minister must be able to disclose in court otherwise confidential information in order to prove the cause of action in debt. Absent the ability to disclose as required to prove a debt, s. 222 would be deprived of part of its meaning.

Glover v. Glover (No. 1) must be read to mean that the confidentiality provisions apply to any legal proceeding of a civil character which is not covered by the exception provided in s. 241(3). Sections 241(1) and (2) apply to civil proceedings not related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. Glover does not inform the issue already set out: the essential question is whether or not the bankruptcy proceedings taken herein are related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

The proceedings taken here were related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act even though they were taken by the trustee in bankruptcy. A contrary interpretation is not supported by the wording of s. 241(3) and is somewhat inconsistent with the power given to creditors in s. 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. At the policy level, the Minister should not be inhibited from recourse to the bankruptcy process in light of the advantages and protection that this process can entail. If the Minister cannot disclose confidential information in bankruptcy to prove a claim asserted, the bankruptcy procedure will in many cases not be available for income tax enforcement.

The difference in nature between bankruptcy proceedings and proceedings under s. 160, where disclosure was admitted to be available by appellant, was not relevant. The important point was that disclosure made during bankruptcy proceedings was made in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act within the meaning of s. 241(3). The fact that the Minister chose to collect taxes by petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy did not disentitle Revenue Canada from disclosing the confidential information.

Digitized by Google

Arguments raising the possibility of difficult questions as to competence and compellability were not persuasive.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting): The s. 241(3) exemption applies only in the case of proceedings specifically provided for in the Income Tax Act. These proceedings are, for the most part, set out in Part XV of the Act which establishes "Administration and Enforcement" provisions. A trial to determine title between an individual and a trustee in bankruptcy is not a proceeding provided for in Part XV, or elsewhere in the Act. Accordingly, Revenue Canada officials should have been barred from disclosing information obtained in the course of their investigation of the bankrupt's affairs.

This Court gave the phrase "in respect of" a wide interpretation in the circumstances of the Indian Act as it related to taxation of personal property. The wide interpretation given the phrase in that context is not determinative of its application in s. 241(3). The context of s. 241(3), and jurisprudence of this Court treating the section, suggest that the phrase should be construed narrowly, not broadly.

The proceedings at issue on this appeal are not proceedings so connected to the administration of the Act that they fall within the contemplation of the exemption in s. 241(3). Part XV of the Act provides the Minister of Revenue with a system of debt collection proceedings that mirrors ordinary creditors' remedies. It does not, however, deal with bankruptcy, except to the extent of providing the Minister with the power to collect money owed to a secured creditor by a trustee in bankruptcy, notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Act. This legislative silence is significant. Bankruptcy is a particular process which has specific and salutary aims and which involves all of the creditors of a particular debtor. Concern for the confidentiality of information that is not public is very much at issue.

The proceeding at issue here is not an action under s. 222. The action is brought by a trustee in bankruptcy and not by the Crown as the section appears to contemplate. Under s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, all collection proceedings are stayed when the debtor is declared bankrupt. Until that point the Minister arguably may prove its debt by disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. But once a debtor is declared bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy has been put in place to pursue the bankruptcy, the proceeding is no longer capable of being accurately characterized as a proceeding relating to the administration of the Act. The stay operates until the trustee in bankruptcy is discharged. The practical effect of the proceedings permitting the Minister to realize upon an outstanding debt does not operate to make the proceeding one relating to the administration of the Act.

Part XV of the Act makes no specific provision for disclosure in the context of bankruptcy. When the Minister has recourse to this procedure, its actions are governed by the Bankruptcy Act and no longer by the Income Tax Act. In so proceeding the Minister loses the capacity to deploy the special information gathering techniques, which accrue only by virtue of the Income Tax Act, either to its own advantage, or to those of its fellow creditors.

The Minister was not permitted to disclose confidential information in the case at bar even though a superior court judge is a person, as provided in s. 241(4)(c), "legally entitled" to the information. A party should not be able to avail itself of the s. 241(4)(c) exemption if it cannot bring the proceeding within the terms of s. 241(3).

Cases Cited

By Iacobucci J.

Considered: Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, 1981 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, aff'g (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392; referred to: Canadian Pacific Tobacco Co. v. Stapleton (1952), 86 C.L.R. 1; Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29; Diversified Holdings Ltd. v. Canada, reflex, [1991] 1 F.C. 595.

Digitized by Google

By McLachlin J. (dissenting)

Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29; R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627; Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, 1981 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, aff'g (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, ss. 16(3), (4), 17(1), 19(1), (2), 38(1), 69(1), 136, 163 to 167.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148, s. 133.

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1948, c. 52, s. 121.

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1966-67, c. 47, s. 17.

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22.

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, ss. 160(1)(a) [rep. & sub. S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 140, s. 107], (e) [rep. & sub. idem], 222, 223(3), (5) [rep. & sub. S.C. 1988, c. 55, s. 168], 224(1), 224(1.2) [ad. S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 66], 224.1 [rep. & sub. S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 48, s. 104], 225(1), 238, 239, 241(1)(a), (b) [am. S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 68(1)], (c) [ad. idem], (2)(a), (b), (3) [rep. & sub. ibid., s. 68(2)], (4)(c) [am. S.C. 1978-79, c. 5, s. 9].

Income War Tax Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 97, s. 81(1), (2).

Income War Tax Act, 1917, S.C. 1917, c. 28, s. 11.

Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, s. 87.

Authors Cited

Bohémier, Albert. Faillite et Insolvabilité, t. 1. Montréal: Thémis, 1992.

Brown, D. Scott. "Bankruptcy and Income Tax: A Revenue Canada Perspective" in 1990 Conference Report: Report of Proceedings of the Forty-Second Tax Conference. Canadian Tax Foundation, 1991.

Chabot, Marc. Faillite et Insolvabilité. Sillery, Québec: Presses de l'Université du Québec, 1987.

Dictionnaire de la langue française. Paris: Larousse, 1989, "traits".

Harris, Edwin C. Canadian Income Taxation, 4th ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1986.

Houlden, L. W. Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd ed. By L. W. Houlden and C. H. Morawetz. Toronto: Carswell, 1993 (loose-leaf).

Le Robert Méthodique. Paris: Le Robert, 1988, "avoir trait à".

The Pocket Oxford Dictionary, 7th ed. Edited by R. E. Allen. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1984, "relation".

Toope, Stephen J., and Alison L. Young. "The Confidentiality of Tax Returns Under Canadian Law" (1982), 27 McGill L.J. 479.

APPEAL from a judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal 1991 CanLII 4083 (NB CA), (1991), 120 N.B.R. (2d) 4, 84 D.L.R. (4th) 360, 7 C.B.R. (3d) 157, dismissing an appeal from a judgment of Jones J. Appeal dismissed, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. dissenting.

B. A. Crane, Q.C., and Randall J. Hofley, for the appellant.

John R. Power, Q.C., and Michael Donovan, for the respondent.

The judgment of Lamer C.J. and La Forest, Gonthier, Cory and Major JJ. was delivered by

IACOBUCCI J. -- This appeal concerns the interpretation to be given to s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63 (the Income Tax Act), which permits in certain circumstances the disclosure of otherwise confidential information obtained from a taxpayer by officials of the Department of National Revenue. More specifically, the appeal concerns an action by a trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, for a declaration that certain property is the property of a taxpayer bankrupt's estate. The issue is whether such an action is a proceeding "relating to the administration or enforcement of" the

Digitized by Google

Income Tax Act.

I.Facts

Raymond Slattery, who is not a party to this action, fell into arrears in paying income tax, resulting in a lengthy investigation by Revenue Canada. Unable to collect the taxes owing, Revenue Canada petitioned Slattery into bankruptcy. The respondent, Doane Raymond Limited (the Trustee), was appointed as trustee in bankruptcy of the Raymond Slattery estate. In the bankruptcy, Revenue Canada proved a claim of just over $1 million and other creditors proved claims of over $3 million; however, since Revenue Canada is the only preferred creditor, it appears that the assets of the estate will not be sufficient to satisfy the claims of any other creditors.

The trustee commenced an action against the appellant, Marguerite Slattery, who is the wife of the bankrupt Slattery. The action sought a declaration that certain assets registered in Marguerite Slattery's name were, in fact, the property of the bankrupt's estate or were held in trust for that estate.

At trial, the trustee sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the investigation into Raymond Slattery's affairs. Counsel for Marguerite Slattery objected on the ground that such testimony was barred by s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, which prohibits Revenue Canada officials from disclosing information which has been obtained from a taxpayer for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. The trial judge ruled that the testimony was not barred by s. 241 because it fell within the exception contained in s. 241(3), which exception provides that the prohibition does not apply "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. Both officials testified, and the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench granted the declaration sought in part.

Marguerite Slattery appealed. She argued that the trial judge had erred in permitting the Revenue Canada officials to testify. The New Brunswick Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge's interpretation of s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, and dismissed the appeal.

II.Relevant Statutory Provisions

Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63, s. 241:

241. (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or authorized person shall

(a) knowingly communicate or knowingly allow to be communicated to any person any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act,

(b) knowingly allow any person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or

(c) knowingly use, other than in the course of his duties in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

(2) Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings,

(a) to give evidence relating to any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or (b) to produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information, under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

(4) An official or authorized person may ...

(c) communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained under this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, or allow inspection of or access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, to or by any person otherwise legally entitled thereto.

III. Judgments Below

1. New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench (Jones J.)

The judgment of the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench consists of an oral ruling during the trial on the admissibility of testimony from the Revenue Canada officials. Jones J. held that the proceedings in the case at bar fell within the exception in s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act. In interpreting the phrase "in respect of proceedings relating to the... enforcement of this Act", the trial judge commented upon two possible approaches, namely, the one set out in Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, 1981 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, in which the exception in s. 241(3) was held not to apply in any legal proceedings of a civil character, and a second approach taken in Canadian Pacific Tobacco Co. v. Stapleton (1952), 86 C.L.R. 1 (Aust. H.C.), which was more supportive of the trustee's position.

The trial judge held that "relating to" in s. 241(3) has a broad meaning. He suggested that, although s. 241(3) does not apply to civil proceedings unrelated to the Income Tax Act, some civil proceedings nonetheless fall within the exemption. He concluded that the action by the Trustee was of this latter kind, stating:

Now I know there can be civil legal proceedings strictly under the Income Tax Act, nevertheless, it is my finding that on the interpretation that I make of the words "relating to the enforcement of the Act" that -- and bearing in mind the circumstances in this case, the fact that it is -- this is a civil action by trustee in bankruptcy, major -- while the primary creditor is Revenue Canada, and the purpose for which -- came out in evidence before me yesterday morning, this action is pursued, I would find that it comes within the meaning of s. 241.3 and I would, therefore allow the plaintiff to continue with questions along that -- along the line which he was pursuing, or at least I would say that Sections 241.1 and 241.2 would not apply in this proceeding.

Accordingly, the trial judge permitted the Revenue Canada officials to testify.

2. New Brunswick Court of Appeal 1991 CanLII 4083 (NB CA), (1991), 120 N.B.R. (2d) 4 (Hoyt, Ayles and Ryan JJ.A.)

The reasons of the court were delivered by Hoyt J.A. (as he then was). During a brief review of the facts, Hoyt J.A. noted the importance of the testimony given by the Revenue Canada officials to the decision reached by the trial judge. He also noted that the purpose of the trustee's action was to ensure that the assets of the estate were collected, so that the bankrupt's creditors, including Revenue Canada, could be paid. In determining whether such proceedings were "proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act", Hoyt J.A. held at pp. 11-12:

A taxpayer who, like Mr. Slattery, circumvents tax collection procedures found in the Act is not thereby immune from other proceedings that the Minister may take to collect unpaid taxes and thus enforce the Act. Although Mr. Slattery is not a defendant in this proceeding, the trial judge has found, correctly in my view, that this situation arose because Mr. Slattery attempted to avoid paying outstanding taxes owed to Revenue Canada by implicating Mrs. Slattery with, it must be noted, her acquiescence.

Digitized by Google

Hoyt J.A. held at p. 12 that to "accept the appellant's submission could prevent the Minister from enforcing the Income Tax Act in proceedings other than those brought specifically under that Act". He distinguished Glover, supra, by stating that the present action could not be characterized as a non-Income Tax Act legal proceeding. Although this proceeding was not instituted under the Income Tax Act, he found it to be related to the enforcement of that Act.

As a result, the Court of Appeal held that the Revenue Canada officials had properly been permitted to testify and the appeal was dismissed.

IV. Issue

The question raised by this appeal is whether a civil action commenced by the trustee for a declaration that certain property is property of the bankrupt's estate is a proceeding "relating to the ... enforcement of" the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of that Act. If it is, the prohibitions contained in s. 241 of the Income Tax Act against Revenue Canada officials' communicating or giving evidence of information obtained from the taxpayer do not apply. The respondent trustee in its factum also argues that the disclosure could be permitted by the exception contained in s. 241(4)(c), by suggesting that a bankruptcy judge is a "person otherwise legally entitled" to such information. As a result of my conclusion, I need not discuss this argument further.

An analysis of the history of s. 241, its underlying purposes and policy, its text and context, applicable judicial authority, and the nature of the proceedings involved herein, leads me to conclude that the courts below were correct in their holdings and that this appeal should be dismissed.

V. Analysis

1. History of s. 241

At the outset, it is worth noting that the taxation of income in Canada has been and is based on a self assessment and self reporting system. Confidentiality of taxpayer information has been an important part of our income tax collection system.

Legislated confidentiality of information obtained from taxpayers has moved through two distinct stages in Canada. The first stage began with s. 11 of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, S.C. 1917, c. 28. That section was a simple prohibition against disclosure by a person employed in the service of the Crown to a person, not legally entitled thereto, of any information obtained under the Act. Section 11 read as follows:

> 11. No person employed in the service of His Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this Act, or allow such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this Act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars.

Section 11 was re-enacted as s. 81 of the 1927 Income War Tax Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 97, with the only modification being that the section was divided into two subsections, with the penalty portion becoming s. 81(2). In 1948, s. 81 became s. 121 of The Income Tax Act, slight changes in wording took place, and the subsections reverted to a consolidated form once more (S.C. 1948, c. 52). In 1952, the last change of the first stage occurred, and s. 121 became s. 133 in the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 148. Viewed as a whole, this stage of legislative history is distinguishable because the extent of confidentiality protection afforded to taxpayers by the plain language of the statute had two features. First, the prohibition against disclosure was directed only at persons in the service of the Crown. Second, the success of that prohibition depended almost entirely upon the meaning ascribed to the statutory phrase "a person, not legally entitled thereto", which phrase offered the only exception to the otherwise blanket statutory prohibition.

The second legislative stage began in 1966 when the confidentiality section was entirely modified by two amendments (S.C. 1966-67, c. 47, s. 17, and S.C. 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22). These amendments extended the general rule of non-disclosure to everyone, and at the same time spelled out specific exceptions for prescribed situations. (See Stephen J. Toope and Alison L. Young, "The Confidentiality of Tax Returns Under Canadian Law" (1982), 27 McGill L.J. 479.) The following is a succint summary of the 1966 amendments at p. 489:

Digitized by Google

> The general effect of these provisions is to make the section easier to apply. There is now a general prohibition against release of tax information to anyone. The subsections which follow the general prohibition set up exceptions to the rule, and the circumstances in which ministerial discretion may operate seem to be clear. The organization of the section is, in this respect, more amenable to application by common law courts as it resembles a set of rules rather than an abstract principle.

As will be noted again below, the 1966 amendments were described by the Ontario Court of Appeal as "a comprehensive code designed to protect the confidentiality of all information given to the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act" -- Glover v. Glover (No. 1) (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392, at p. 396. The amendments were initially embodied in s. 133, but in 1970, s. 133 became s. 241 of the Income Tax Act, as it remains today. Since then, the section has been only slightly modified.

2. Purposes and Policy Underlying s. 241

In my view, s. 241 involves a balancing of competing interests: the privacy interest of the taxpayer with respect to his or her financial information, and the interest of the Minister in being allowed to disclose taxpayer information to the extent necessary for the effective administration and enforcement of the Income Tax Act and other federal statutes referred to in s. 241(4).

Section 241 reflects the importance of ensuring respect for a taxpayer's privacy interests, particularly as that interest relates to a taxpayer's finances. Therefore, access to financial and related information about taxpayers is to be taken seriously, and such information can only be disclosed in prescribed situations. Only in those exceptional situations does the privacy interest give way to the interest of the state.

As alluded to already, Parliament recognized that to maintain the confidentiality of income tax returns and other obtained information is to encourage the voluntary tax reporting upon which our tax system is based. Taxpayers are responsible for reporting their incomes and expenses and for calculating the tax owed to Revenue Canada. By instilling confidence in taxpayers that the personal information they disclose will not be communicated in other contexts, Parliament encourages voluntary disclosure of this information. The opposite is also true: if taxpayers lack this confidence, they may be reluctant to disclose voluntarily all of the required information (Edwin C. Harris, Canadian Income Taxation (4th ed. 1986), at pp. 26-27).

Parliament has also recognized, however, that if personal information obtained cannot be used to assist in tax collection when required, including tax collection by way of judicial enforcement, the possession of such information will be useless. Disclosure of information obtained through tax returns or collected in the course of tax investigations may be necessary during litigation in order to ensure that all relevant information is before the court, and thereby to assist in the correct disposition of litigation. But this necessity is sanctioned by Parliament in a very limited number of situations. Disclosure is authorized in criminal proceedings and other proceedings as set out in s. 241(3). Certain other situations are specified in s. 241(4), which have been described by the Ontario Court of Appeal as being "largely of an administrative nature" (Glover v. Glover (No. 1), supra, at p. 397).

3. The Text and Context of s. 241(3)

As already noted, s. 241(3) provides, inter alia, that the confidentiality provisions in s. 241(1) and (2) do not apply "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. The appellant argues that the only proceedings covered by this exception are those which are expressly provided for in Part XV of the Act, entitled "Administration and Enforcement". The appellant's argument would require the words in s. 241(3) to be read as meaning that the confidentiality provisions do not apply "in respect of proceedings taken pursuant to the administration or enforcement provisions" of the Income Tax Act. Neither the text nor context of s. 241 supports this argument.

Digitized by Google

The connecting phrases used by Parliament in s. 241(3) are very broad. The confidentiality provisions are stated not to apply in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

The phrase "in respect of" was considered by this Court in Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 39:

> The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters. [Emphasis added.]

In my view, these comments are equally applicable to the phrase "relating to". The Pocket Oxford Dictionary (1984) defines the word "relation" as follows:

> ... what one person or thing has to do with another, way in which one stands or is related to another, kind of connection or correspondence or contrast or feeling that prevails between persons or things;...

So, both the connecting phrases of s. 241(3) suggest that a wide rather than narrow view should be taken when considering whether a proposed disclosure is in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

This breadth of meaning is confirmed when one examines the French version of the section. The French version of s. 241(3) reads as follows:

> 241. ...
>
> (3) Les paragraphes (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent ni aux poursuites au criminel, sur acte d'accusation ou sur déclaration sommaire de culpabilité, engagées par le dépot d'une dénonciation, en vertu d'une loi fédérale, ni aux poursuites ayant trait à l'application ou à l'exécution de la présente loi... [Emphasis added.]

The phrase "ayant trait à" is defined in the Larousse dictionary Dictionnaire de la langue française (1989) as: "Avoir trait à : avoir un rapport avec". The dictionary Le Robert Méthodique (1988) defines the phrase as: "Avoir trait à: Se rapporter à... V. Rapport". And the same dictionary defines the word "rapport" as meaning "Lien, relation". Consequently, the French version of s. 241(3) is as broad as the English version.

The next question to ask considers what type of administration or enforcement proceedings are contemplated by s. 241(3): only proceedings brought under the Income Tax Act itself, or both such proceedings and others? To answer this question, one must look first to the wording of s. 241(3). That provision contains no language which confines the concept of proceedings relating to administration or enforcement to the boundaries of the Income Tax Act. This conclusion is buttressed when one considers the context of s. 241.

Section 241 is found in Part XV of the Income Tax Act, which deals with administration and enforcement as previously noted. It is obvious, but the fact must nonetheless be highlighted, that the collection of money owing to Revenue Canada is an important part of the Act's enforcement. This proposition is confirmed by s. 222 of the Act which reads as follow:

> 222. All taxes, interest, penalties, costs and other amounts payable under this Act are debts due to Her Majesty and recoverable as such in the Federal Court of Canada or any other court of competent jurisdiction or in any other manner

Digitized by Google

provided by this Act. [Emphasis added.]

Section 222 is a clear statement that, in addition to the procedures specified in the Income Tax Act, the Minister may resort generally to the courts to institute civil proceedings to collect taxes as debts. But, in order to take full advantage of this power, the Minister must be able to disclose in court otherwise confidential information in order to prove the cause of action in debt. It must therefore be possible to disclose such information to establish the amount owed and to prove related matters. Absent the ability to disclose as required to prove a debt, s. 222 would be deprived of part of its meaning. The absurdity of such a result strongly suggests that the collection proceedings specified in s. 222 are proceedings "relating to the... enforcement" of the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3).

This legislative interpretation accords with the necessary balancing of privacy and state interests which takes place in s. 241. Confidentiality of tax information is necessary in order to promote the privacy interests of taxpayers and the success of voluntary tax reporting. But the success of the voluntary tax reporting system will be of no import if Revenue Canada cannot effectively collect taxes owed by taxpayers. In order to collect taxes owed, Revenue Canada should be able to resort to various procedures and proceedings to pursue the amounts owed and in doing so should also be able to disclose in court the information necessary to prove a cause of action in debt. As Décary J.A. said in Diversified Holdings Ltd v. Canada, reflex, [1991] 1 F.C. 595 (C.A.), at p. 599:

> In the instant case, the documents are part of a process, the collection proceedings, which is in itself in the public domain and which involves by its very nature the publication of information that would otherwise have remained confidential. One cannot seize a property pursuant to a certificate which has the force and effect of a judgment (see subsection 223(2) of the Act) without revealing to some extent information given to the Minister.

4. Judicial Interpretation of s. 241

I do not find it necessary to discuss all the cases which were decided under s. 241's predecessor sections or which deal with actions related to those predecessor sections. However, both the appellant and respondent cited, in support of their respective positions, the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Glover v. Glover (No. 1), supra, which was affirmed by this Court in a short judgment (Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, supra). Accordingly, some comment on this case is required.

In Glover, a trial judge ordered Revenue Canada to disclose the address of a taxpayer who had abducted his children in violation of a court order which granted custody to the children's mother. The question was whether the judge who ordered disclosure of the information was a person "legally entitled thereto". That phrase had been carried over from s. 241's predecessor provision and was restated in s. 241(4)(c) as an enumerated exception. The Ontario Court of Appeal set aside the trial judge's order, holding that the judge did not come within the s. 241(4)(c) exception.

In the course of his reasons, MacKinnon A.C.J.O. on behalf of a unanimous court made some general comments on the interpretation of s. 241. He stated at p. 396 that "[s]ection 241, in my view, is a comprehensive code designed to protect the confidentiality of all information given to the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act". In his opinion, at p. 397, s. 241(3) was:

> ... a clear statement of parliamentary policy that no information obtained for the purpose of the Act shall be communicated and no official or authorized person shall be required to give evidence relating to such information in any non-Income Tax Act civil legal proceedings.

The mother appealed the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal to this Court, which dismissed the appeal with brief reasons in which Laskin C.J. said at p. 562:

Digitized by Google

Sympathetic though one is inclined to be to the appellant's plight, the statutory provisions above-mentioned for non-disclosure, in connection with any legal proceedings of a civil character, do not give any power to a court to qualify them, nor do the exceptions set out in s. 241(4)(c) assist the appellant.

I agree with the respondent that, in Glover, the proceedings in question had no connection whatsoever with the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. As a result, this Court's decision must be read to mean that the confidentiality provisions apply to any legal proceeding of a civil character which is not covered by the exception provided in s. 241(3). In other words, ss. 241(1) and (2) apply to civil proceedings which are not related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. In my view, Glover does not inform the issue already set out: the essential question is whether or not the bankruptcy proceedings taken herein are related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. As I will now discuss, I think they are.

V. Are the Present Proceedings Covered by s. 241(3)?

In determining whether the present bankruptcy proceedings are covered by the exception in s. 241(3) of the Income Tax Act, I think it worthwhile to note briefly some of the features of the bankruptcy process.

It has been stated that among the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act are a desire to permit an effective and fair distribution of the assets of a bankrupt person, and a desire to protect creditors of insolvent persons. See Houlden and Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1993), at pp. 1-3, 1-4; see also Marc Chabot, Faillite et Insolvabilité (1987), at p. 8. Indeed, it has been asserted that not only are the interests of debtors and creditors protected under the Bankruptcy Act, but so is the public interest. See Professor Albert Bohémier, Faillite et Insolvabilité, vol. 1, (1992), at pp. 48-56. Thus, there are many who would advocate resort to bankruptcy proceedings as an effective and fair means of debt collection. I need not join the debate as to whether or to what extent these assertions are true. I will simply note that the bankruptcy process is aimed at the proper protection of debtor, creditor and public interests.

In the case on appeal, the Minister of National Revenue petitioned Raymond Slattery into bankruptcy. Mr. Slattery filed a statement of affairs stating that he had virtually no assets. The trustee then commenced the present action in the Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick seeking a declaration that certain assets held in the name of the appellant, Marguerite Slattery, were in reality property of the bankrupt's estate.

The appellant admits that, if the Minister through Revenue Canada had instituted proceedings under the Income Tax Act, such proceedings would be enforcement proceedings covered by the exception in s. 241(3). However, the appellant argues that because the proceedings herein were taken by the trustee, they cannot qualify as such. In my view, this argument fails for several reasons.

First, the appellant's argument is not supported by the wording of s. 241(3). As mentioned earlier, in my opinion the exception authorizing Revenue Canada to disclose tax related information in proceedings is very broad; that is, it operates in respect of proceedings relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act. The practical purpose and result of the present proceedings will be to increase the estate of the bankrupt taxpayer, Raymond Slattery. The ultimate purpose and result of these same proceedings will be the payment of taxes owed, inasmuch as Revenue Canada is a preferred beneficiary under the scheme of distribution established by s. 136 of the Bankruptcy Act. I find it quite clear that, under the terms of s. 241(3), such a proceeding has a "relation" or "connection" with the enforcement of the Income Tax Act. Neither the fact that the bankruptcy proceedings involve other creditors of the bankrupt, nor the fact that the proceedings were commenced by the trustee, detracts from the "relation" or "connection" between the proceedings and the enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

Second, the appellant's argument is also somewhat inconsistent with the power given to creditors in s. 38(1) of the Bankruptcy Act. Section 38(1) provides for the following:

> 38. (1) Where a creditor requests the trustee to take any proceeding that in his opinion would be for the benefit of the estate of a bankrupt and the trustee refuses or neglects to take the proceeding, the creditor may obtain from the court an order authorizing him to take the proceeding in his own name and at his own expense and risk....

If we accept the appellant's proposition, a potential contradiction obviously results. That is, if a trustee initiated proceedings, confidential information obtained by Revenue Canada could not be disclosed in order to prove the fraudulent scheme, whereas if the trustee refused to act and Revenue Canada took the same proceedings, the information could arguably be disclosed. This result makes no sense since, in either case, the proceedings would be under the Bankruptcy Act and would be taken in furtherance of enforcing the Income Tax Act. The intervention of the trustee does not change the character of the bankruptcy proceedings, in so far as that character relates to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

Third, at the level of policy, I see no valid reason why the Minister should be inhibited from recourse to the bankruptcy process in light of the advantages and protection that this process can entail. If the Minister cannot disclose confidential information in bankruptcy to prove a claim asserted, the bankruptcy procedure will in many cases not be available for income tax enforcement. Again, the sense of this result is not apparent.

Without wishing to rule in any way on the matter, it is alleged that Revenue Canada had and still has at its disposal some Income Tax Act remedies against the appellant, which are unaffected by the stay of proceedings provided for by s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, which reads as follows:

> 69. (1) On the filing of a proposal made by an insolvent person or on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor with a claim provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the debtor or his property or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy until the trustee has been discharged or until the proposal has been refused, unless with the leave of the court and on such terms as the court may impose.

(See D. Scott Brown, "Bankruptcy and Income Tax: A Revenue Canada Perspective" in 1990 Conference Report: Report of Proceedings of the Forty-Second Tax Conference, at p. 18:11).

One of these allegedly unaffected remedies is found in s. 160 of the Income Tax Act which provides:

> 160. (1) Where a person has, on or after the 1st day of May, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to
>
> (a) his spouse or a person who has since become his spouse,
>
> ...
>
> the following rules apply:
>
> ...
>
> (e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of
>
> (i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and
>
> (ii) the aggregate of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year.

Digitized by Google

D. Scott Brown, in the article cited above, comments on the scope of s. 160 as follows (at p. 18:13):

> The provisions of section 160 enable the minister to assess a transferee in respect of a transfer of property that, but for that provision, would require recourse under the settlement provisions of sections 91, 92, or 93 of the Bankruptcy Act, or alternatively under a provincial fraudulent conveyance statute. Generally, section 160 provides a very effective remedy against this type of transfer. In fact, the result of any direct or indirect transfer to a spouse... will be that the transferee and the transferor will be held jointly and severally liable under section 160 to pay the lesser of (1) the difference between the fair market value of the property and the amount paid for the property, and (2) the amount of the tax due by the transferor in the year of the transfer or any prior year.

It was apparently acknowledged by the appellant that the Minister could have used s. 160 in an attempt to recover some of the taxes owed by Raymond Slattery, but did not do so. The appellant agrees that, in the context of s. 160, the Minister could have disclosed the confidential tax information, but the appellant argues that the bankruptcy proceedings are different in nature. However, whether or not they are different in nature is beside the point. The important point is whether or not the disclosure within the bankruptcy proceedings occurred "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of" the Income Tax Act. The possible existence of an alternative enforcement procedure which would clearly permit disclosure is further support for the respondent's position. Although the Minister chose to collect taxes by petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy, in my view, this did not disentitle Revenue Canada from disclosing the confidential information. The disclosure occurred in respect of proceedings which can be clearly characterized as relating to the enforcement of the Income Tax Act within the meaning of s. 241(3) of that Act.

Finally, counsel for the appellant argued that to characterize the bankruptcy proceedings as "proceedings relating to the... enforcement of" the Income Tax Act would open up difficult questions relating to competence and compellability as those issues might affect Revenue Canada in a variety of possible actions. I find this argument unpersuasive, particularly in light of the circumstances of this case. Those circumstances include Revenue Canada's act of petitioning the taxpayer into bankruptcy, the active involvement of Revenue Canada in the bankruptcy proceedings, the collaboration between officials and the trustee, and the reality that Revenue Canada was entitled to volunteer and did, in fact, volunteer to disclose the otherwise confidential information in order to enforce the Income Tax Act.

VI.Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that the proceedings taken by the trustee are "proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement" of the Income Tax Act as set out in s. 241(3). Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka and McLachlin JJ. were delivered by MCLACHLIN J. (dissenting) -- I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of my colleague, Justice Iacobucci. I respectfully disagree with his conclusion regarding the scope of the s. 241(3) exemption from non-disclosure of information obtained by the Minister of Revenue for the purposes of the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 63.

Section 241(3) provides that the general prohibition on disclosure of such information, as set out in ss. 241(1) and (2), does not apply, inter alia, "in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act ...." The sole question on this appeal is whether the proceedings at issue are of this type.

These proceedings should be carefully described. Raymond Slattery fell into arrears paying income taxes. Revenue Canada conducted a lengthy investigation into his affairs. They petitioned Mr. Slattery into bankruptcy. In bankruptcy proceedings Revenue Canada proved a claim against Mr. Slattery of over $1,000,000. At a subsequent trial to determine title between the appellant and the bankrupt's estate, the trustee in bankruptcy sought to introduce testimony from two Revenue Canada officials who had participated in the earlier investigation of Mr. Slattery's affairs. This testimony was admitted on the ground that the trial was a proceeding relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. The ruling was upheld on appeal.

Digitized by Google

My colleague Iacobucci J. would uphold these decisions. Focusing in part on the fact that the trial would ultimately result in the collection of unpaid taxes, he finds that the trial was a proceeding "relating to" the administration or enforcement of the Act.

In my view, the s. 241(3) exemption applies only in the case of proceedings specifically provided for in the Income Tax Act. These proceedings are, for the most part, set out in Part XV of the Act which, as the title of the Part indicates, establishes "Administration and Enforcement" provisions. A trial to determine title between an individual and a trustee in bankruptcy is not a proceeding provided for in Part XV, or elsewhere in the Act. Accordingly, in my view, Revenue Canada officials should have been barred from disclosing information obtained in the course of their investigation of the bankrupt's affairs.

The Scope of s. 241

Iacobucci J. has discussed the character of the provisions which govern the disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. He notes, at p. 444, that "[o]nly in those exceptional situations does the privacy interest [of citizens] give way to the interest of the state." These words, as my colleague notes, reflect the balance which Parliament has established between the competing interests at play: the interest in ensuring voluntary disclosure to the Minister of Revenue, which is served by the general rule of confidentiality, and the state's interest the collection of tax debts.

But having noted the primacy of privacy concerns under the Income Tax Act, Iacobucci J. goes on to interpret the disclosure clause of s. 241 broadly. He finds that the connecting phrases used in s. 241(3) are "very broad". Relying on Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, he interprets these connecting phrases to encompass proceedings which have any connection with the administration of the Act.

I do not share the view that Nowegijick informs the issue. That case does not concern s. 241 or any of its predecessor sections. Rather, Nowegijick discusses the phrase "in respect of" as it is employed in s. 87 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, in relation to taxation of personal property. Giving the phrase the "widest possible scope" in that context is not determinative of its application in s. 241(3). Instead, the context of s. 241(3), and jurisprudence of this Court treating the section, suggests that the phrase should be construed narrowly, not broadly. As Wilson J. noted in R. v. McKinlay Transport Ltd., 1990 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 627, at p. 650:

> ... the taxpayer's privacy interest is protected as much as possible since s. 241 of the Act protects the taxpayer from disclosure of his records or the information contained therein to other persons or agencies. [Emphasis added.]

See also Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, 1981 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, at p. 562, per Laskin C.J.

The structure of s. 241 subsequent to its 1966 amendment (S.C. 1966-67, c. 47, s. 17 and S.C. 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22) bears out the interpretation given the section by Wilson J. Prior to 1966, the Minister of Revenue was barred from disclosing information obtained under the Act to persons "not legally entitled thereto ...." This phrase did not constitute a serious hurdle to disclosure. As noted by Stephen J. Toope and Alison L. Young, in "The Confidentiality of Tax Returns Under Canadian Law" (1982), 27 McGill L.J. 479, at p. 487, "the [former] section created a carte blanche for the Minister to consider almost anyone to be `legally entitled' to the information as long as they could show some vague need." After 1966, the prohibition was extended to "any person", unless a specific exemption had been provided. The exemptions are few, and are set out in ss. 241(3) and (4). Disclosure is permitted in specific criminal proceedings, in proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act, and, by virtue of s. 241(4), as might be required to facilitate specific government programs and the internal working of the Ministry of specific features of the Act. In s. 241(4)(c), disclosure to persons "otherwise legally entitled thereto" is again permitted, but the phrase is no longer the animating concern of the section. Rather, it must be understood as one element in a group of narrow and particular exemptions largely administrative in nature: see Glover v. Glover (No. 1) (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392, at p. 398.

Digitized by Google

The appellant submits that the proceedings at issue on this appeal are not proceedings relating to the administration of the Act in which the Minister can disclose information obtained for the purposes of the Act since they are not specifically provided for in Part XV of the Act. I agree with the substance of this submission. We are not here concerned with the capacity of the Ministry to undertake, or to involve itself in, proceedings which may bear some connection to the enforcement of the Act. The concern is whether these are the sort of proceedings which are so connected to the administration of the Act that they fall within the contemplation of the exemption in s. 241(3) and thereby allow the Ministry to disclose information which it has only by virtue of special investigative powers provided for in the Act (see ss. 231.1 to 231.5).

Part XV of the Act provides the Minister of Revenue with a system of debt collection proceedings that mirrors ordinary creditors' remedies. Taxes owing may be recovered by registering the amount in court and enforcing it as a judgment (s. 223(3)), registering the amount as a charge on land (s. 223(5)), garnishing sums destined to the tax debtor from third parties (s. 224(1)), deducting the amount from or setting it off against other sums payable by the Crown to the tax debtor (s. 224.1), seizing and selling the debtor's chattels (s. 225(1)) and prosecuting the tax debtor for offences under the Act and obtaining compliance orders (ss. 238 and 239). But Part XV does not deal with bankruptcy, except to the extent of providing the Minister the power to collect money owed to a secured creditor by a trustee in bankruptcy, notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3: see Income Tax Act, s. 224 (1.2) (added by S.C. 1987, c. 46, s. 66).

In the context of Part XV this legislative silence is significant. Bankruptcy is a particular process with specific and salutary aims. Above all, however, bankruptcy is a process that involves all of the creditors of a particular debtor. Concern for the confidentiality of information that is not public is very much at issue.

My colleague is of the view that the bankruptcy process is available to the Minister by virtue of s. 222 of the Act, which provides that the Minister may resort to a court of competent jurisdiction to collect tax debts. I concur in this interpretation of the plain wording of s. 222, but I am not persuaded that the proceeding that is at issue here is an action under s. 222.

In the first place, the action is not brought by Her Majesty, as the section appears to contemplate. It is brought by a trustee in bankruptcy. Iacobucci J. is of the view that this does not take the proceedings out the s. 241(3) exemption. I disagree. Under s. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, all collection proceedings are stayed once the debtor is declared bankrupt. Until that point the Minister arguably may prove its debt by disclosure of information obtained for the purposes of the Act. But once a debtor is declared bankrupt, and a trustee in bankruptcy has been put in place to pursue the bankruptcy, the proceeding is no longer capable of being accurately characterized as a proceeding relating to the administration of the Act. The stay operates until the trustee in bankruptcy is discharged. The trustee has a statutory duty to take possession of the bankrupt's property. It has a statutory power to institute legal proceedings. Persons in possession of a bankrupt's property have a statutory duty to deliver it to the trustee.

Digitized by Google

(See Bankruptcy Act, ss. 16(3), (4), 19(1), (2), and 17(1).) The trustee is a fiduciary of the estate of the bankrupt and institutes an action to the benefit of the state as a whole. The trustee does not act a mere agent of the creditors, or as an agent of particular creditors. In such a legal context, I do not think that it can be said that the fact that the practical effect of the proceedings will permit the Minister to realize on an outstanding debt suffices to make the proceeding one that relates to the administration of the Act.

The fact that Part XV of the Act makes no specific provision for disclosure in the context of bankruptcy suggests that when the Minister has recourse to this procedure, its actions are governed by the Bankruptcy Act and no longer by the Income Tax Act. In so proceeding the Minister loses the capacity to deploy the special information gathering techniques, which accrue only by virtue of the Income Tax Act, either to its own advantage, or to those of its fellow creditors. The broad powers to compel appearance and disclosure which are exercisable by the trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act (see ss. 163 through 167) should be interpreted in light of this fact. Information available from public sources is not unavailable in such proceedings simply because it has passed through the hands of Revenue Canada. But information that issues from the Minister, by virtue of any special investigative powers, must remain confidential.

Section 241(4)(c)

The respondent also argues that the Minister was permitted to disclose confidential information in the case at bar since a superior court judge is a person, as provided in s. 241(4)(c), "legally entitled" to the information. In my view the decisions of this Court and of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Glover, supra, dispense with this argument. The issue in those cases was whether the judge in child custody proceedings was a "person ... legally entitled" to the information. The Ontario Court of Appeal, in a decision that was affirmed in this Court, held (at p. 397) that the s. 241(4) exemptions were administrative in nature, and that if a court could at any time by its own order entitle itself to receive otherwise confidential taxpayer information "it would emasculate the effect of s. 241(2) and render s. 241(3) unnecessary". The point of these judgments is that a party should not be able to avail itself of the s. 241(4)(c) exemption if it cannot bring the proceeding within the terms of s. 241(3). I have found above that this respondent cannot.

Disposition

The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge's findings in declaring some of the property of the appellant to be the property of the bankrupt's estate depended largely upon the testimony and evidence of the Revenue Canada officials. This information was gathered in the course of an investigation undertaken according to special investigatory powers available to Revenue Canada under the Act. Section 241 forbad its disclosure in the bankruptcy proceedings. I would allow the appeal and set aside the judgments below. I would grant costs to the appellant.

Digitized by Google

Appeal dismissed, L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ, SOPINKA and MCLACHLIN JJ. dissenting.
Solicitors for the appellant: Mockler, Allen & Dixon, Fredericton.
Solicitors for the respondent: Palmer, O'Connell, Leger, Roderick & Glennie, Saint John.

Glover v. Minister of National Revenue[1], Ontario Court of Appeal, CANLII.org, Piercing s. 241 for Civil Purposes Not Allowed

MACKINNON, A.C.J.O., WILSON AND THORSON, JJ.A. 18TH JUNE 1980.
Ian S. MacGregor, for appellant, Attorney-General of Canada on behalf of Minister of National Revenue. William D. Dunlop, for respondent.
[1] The judgment of the Court was delivered by
[2] MACKINNON, A.C.J.O.:—The issue in this appeal is: does the Supreme Court of Ontario have the power, in order to assist in the implementation of one of its orders, to require the Minister of National Revenue to reveal confidential information secured under the provisions of the *Income Tax Act,*1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63, against which requirement and revelation there appears to be a direct prohibition in the Income Tax Act?
[3] Mrs. Glover instituted a petition for divorce in 1977 and also sought, by way of corollary relief, custody of her two young children. Her husband cross-petitioned for divorce and custody. Judge Blair at Milton made an interim custody order on March 10, 1977, in favour of Mrs. Glover and granted limited access to Mr. Glover. On August 16, 1977, Mr. Glover absconded with the children and, despite all her efforts, Mrs. Glover had not seen or heard of them since.
[4] Mr. Justice Garrett made an order on October 11, 1977, directing that Mr. Glover return the children to Mrs. Glover. He also ordered that she was to have interim custody until a final order for custody was made. He authorized the law enforcement agencies to take all necessary steps to carry out the provisions of his order.
[5] The petition for divorce was heard on March 2, 1979, and Mr. Justice Lerner granted a decree nisi and custody of the children to Mrs. Glover. Mr. Glover did not, of course, appear at the trial. At the time of the trial Mr. Justice Lerner made an order directing, inter alia, Revenue Canada, Taxation, to provide "this Court with particulars of the addresses of the respondents Paule Wenenn and James Glover pursuant to The Family Law Reform Act".
[6] The Attorney-General of Canada, on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue, moved before Mr. Justice Lerner on March 10, 1980, for an order that the reference to Revenue Canada, Taxation be deleted from the order of March 2, 1979. The learned Judge stated that the order of March 2, 1979, while purporting to be made pursuant to s. 26(2) of the Family Law Reform Act, 1978 (Ont.), c. 2, was so titled in error, and he held that the order had been made under a federal statute, the Divorce Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. D-8. He amended the wording of his order to this limited extent and dismissed the application.
[7] The Minister of National Revenue now appeals the order. Counsel submits that the prohibition in s. 241 [am. 1978-79, c. 5, s. 9] of the Income Tax Act against requiring the communication of any information obtained by the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act is an absolute one and that the Court, in the circumstances of this case, does not come within any of the listed exceptions to that prohibition. [See 26 O.R. (2d) 477, 102 D.L.R. (3d) 707, 12 R.F.L. (2d) 193.]
[8] Section 241 reads as follows:
241(1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or authorized person shall knowingly communicate or knowingly allow to be communicated to any person any

Digitized by Google

information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, or knowingly allow any person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act.

Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give evidence relating to any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, or to produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act.

Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act.

An official or authorized person may, in the course of his duties in connection with the administration or enforcement of this Act, communicate or allow to be communicated to an official or authorized person information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, and allow an official or authorized person to inspect or to have access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act;

under prescribed conditions, communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained under this Act, or allow inspection of or access to any written statement furnished under this Act to the government of any province in respect of which information and written statements obtained by the government of the province, for the purpose of a law of the province that imposes a tax similar to the tax imposed under this Act, is communicated or furnished on a reciprocal basis to the Minister; or communicate or allow to be communicated information obtained under this Act, or allow inspection of or access to any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, to or by any person otherwise legally entitled thereto; or communicate or allow to be communicated to a taxpayer, such information obtained under this Act regarding the amount of income of his spouse or of any other person as is necessary for the purposes of an assessment or reassessment of tax, interest, penalty or other amount payable by the taxpayer or of the determination of any refund to which he is entitled for the year.

Notwithstanding anything in this section, the Minister may permit a copy of any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by him or on his behalf for the purposes of this Act to be given to the person from whom such book, record, writing, return or other document was obtained or the legal representative of such person, or to the agent of such person or of such legal representative authorized in writing in that behalf.

An order or direction made in the course of or in connection with any legal proceedings requiring an official or authorized person to give evidence relating to any information or produce any book, record, writing, return or other document obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, may, by notice served upon all interested parties, be appealed forthwith by the Minister or by the person against whom the order or direction is made to the court of appeal of the province in which the order or direction is made, in the case of an order or direction made by a court or other tribunal established by or pursuant to the laws of the province, whether or not such court or tribunal is exercising a jurisdiction conferred by the laws of Canada; or

Digitized by Google

the Federal Court of Appeal, in the case of an order or direction made by a court or other tribunal established by or pursuant to the laws of Canada.
The court to which an appeal is taken pursuant to subsection (6) may allow the appeal and quash the order or direction appealed from or dismiss the appeal, and the rules of practice and procedure from time to time governing appeals to the courts shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to an appeal instituted pursuant to subsection (6).
An appeal instituted pursuant to subsection (6) shall stay the operation of the order or direction appealed from until judgment is pronounced.
Every one who, being an official or authorized person, contravenes subsection (1) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 months, or to both such fine and imprisonment.
In this section,
"official" means any person employed in or occupying a position of responsibility in the service of Her Majesty, or any person formerly so employed or formerly occupying a position therein;
"authorized person" means any person engaged or employed, or formerly engaged or employed, by or on behalf of Her Majesty to assist in carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Act; and
"court of appeal" has the meaning assigned by paragraphs (a) to (j) of the definition "court of appeal" in section 2 of the Criminal Code.
[9] Subsection (4)(d) was added in 1979 after the original order was made. It does not assist in the resolution of the problem which faced the trial Judge.
[10] It appears to be common ground that, as a result of the judgment in R. v. Snider, 1954 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1954] S.C.R. 479, [1954] 4 D.L.R. 483, 109 C.C.C. 193, the extended s. 241 was first enacted in its present form by 1966-67 (Can.), c. 47, s. 17, and 1966-67, c. 91, s. 22. Section 241, in my view, is a comprehensive code designed to protect the confidentiality of all information given to the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. The only exception to s. 241 found elsewhere in the Income Tax Act is contained in s. 149.1(15) [enacted 1976-77, c. 4, s. 60; am. 1979-80, c. 5, s. 52] which explicitly states that, "notwithstanding section 241", the Minister shall communicate to the public the information contained in the annual public information return required to be made by every registered charity by virtue of s. 149.1(14) [enacted ibid]. Accordingly, unless the "Court" or Mrs. Glover can come within one of the exceptions found in s. 241 itself, the order herein was made without jurisdiction.
[11] Section 241(1) makes it clear that: "Except as authorized by this section", no official shall communicate to "any person any information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act" (emphasis added). To make the matter clear, so far as legal proceedings are concerned, s-s. (2) is added which states that:"Notwithstanding any other Act or law, no official or authorized person [as defined] shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings" to give evidence or produce any writing relating to any information obtained for the purposes of the Act (emphasis added). This is an all-embracing section which, apart from the exceptions listed in s-s. (3), applies to "any legal proceedings" and to the Court.
[12] Section 241(3) limits the effect of s. 241(1) and (2) by stating that those subsections do not apply in respect of criminal proceedings or in respect of proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act. If one views s. 241(3) conversely along with the two previous subsections, it is a clear statement of parliamentary policy that no information obtained for the purpose of the Act shall be communicated and no official or authorized person shall be required to give evidence relating to such information in any non-Income Tax Act civil legal proceedings.

Digitized by Google

[13] The absolute prohibition as defined and limited in the first three subsections of s. 241, leads directly into s-s. (4). This permissive subsection and its components allow, for the purposes of the effective working of the entire statute, the communication of confidential information obtained for the purpose of the legislation to other persons as therein defined and limited. These persons are, equally, on receipt of the confidential information, under the ukase of s. 241(1). Section 241(4), as has been recently pointed out by this Court, sets out certain exceptions, largely of an administrative nature, to the restrictions imposed by the section: Re Herman et al. and Deputy A.-G. Can. reflex, (1979), 26 O.R. (2d) 520 at p. 529, 103 D.L.R. (3d) 491 at p. 500, 13 C.P.C. 363.

[14] Section 241(4)(c) states that an official or authorized person may communicate information obtained under the Act for the purposes of the Act to "any person otherwise legally entitled thereto". Counsel for Mrs. Glover argues that a Judge of the Supreme Court would be "a person otherwise legally entitled". His submission is that a Judge could "designate" himself to be a person to receive the confidential information or he could direct that it be given to Mrs. Glover. In either case, the Judge or Mrs. Glover would thereby become "a person otherwise legally entitled". This argument overlooks the effect and purpose of s. 241(2) and (3). If the Court, at any time, has the power to make such orders, it would emasculate the effect of s. 241(2) and render s. 241(3) unnecessary.

[15] The accepted rule of statutory interpretation which has application here was stated by Lord Davey in Canada Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. The Queen, [1898] A.C. 735 at p. 741:

[16] Every clause of a statute should be construed with reference to the context and the other clauses of the Act, so as, so far as possible, to make a consistent enactment of the whole statute or series of statutes relating to the subject-matter.

[17] Further, as the editor of Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 12th ed. (1969), p. 36, points out: "A construction which would leave without effect any part of the language of a statute will normally be rejected." The interpretation urged by counsel for Mrs. Glover, if accepted, would be to ignore the other clauses of the same section and indeed, as I have stated, render them either meaningless or ineffectual.

[18] It was suggested that, by virtue of the original order for custody, Mrs. Glover became a "person otherwise legally entitled" to any information as to the address of her husband, within the meaning of the words quoted as found in s. 241(4)(c). In other words, the mere fact that she had been given an order for custody carried with it, by implication, the authority to secure information as to the location of her children from any individual or agency which might have such information. Such an approach, when applied to the Income Tax Act, would, in my view, give far too wide a meaning to the words "otherwise legally entitled" and once again the result would be to ignore or subvert the limitations imposed by the section in its attempt to ensure the confidentiality of the information secured and received by the Revenue Department under the Act. [19] In considering the interpretation to be given to s. 241(4)(c) and the words "any person otherwise legally entitled", the whole of that subsection must be looked at. Section 241(4)(a) allows an official or authorized person (as defined by s-s. (10), in the course of his duties, to communicate to other officials or authorized persons (as defined) certain information. Section 241(4)(b) allows for the communication to provincial officials, on a reciprocal basis, information when a similar tax has been imposed by the Province. The latest amendment, s. 241(4)(d), allows for the communication to a taxpayer of certain information relating to other taxpayers' incomes for the purpose of determining the first taxpayer's assessment or reassessment of tax, interest, penalty or other amount payable. This is a carefully circumscribed permissive subsection to ensure that the taxpayer who is being assessed or reassessed, has knowledge of the basis of such assessment, etc. Section 241(4)(c), for its part, has an administrative purpose similar to the other subsections of s. 241(4). It permits the administration of various Departments of Government to proceed within the limits of the confidentiality imposed by s. 241(1) and of the governing statutes of those Departments. Sections of various statutes indicate who could fall within the words "persons otherwise legally entitled", for example: Canada Pension Plan, [20] R.S.C. 1970, c. C-5, s. 94(2)(b); Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-31, s. 16; Old Age Security Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. 0-6, s. 19(3)(a); Statistics Act, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 15, s. 23(1) [am. 1976-77, c. 28, s. 41(5)].

Digitized by Google

[21] Section 241(5) contains an obvious and necessary exception to the blanket prohibition. It allows the Minister to communicate to the taxpayer or his legal representatives or agent information from the taxpayer's own returns or material. This case does not fall within that exception.
[22] The trial Judge did not rely on any exception to be found within s. 241 but rather appeared to base his order on the "inherent jurisdiction" of the Court to control its own process and see that its orders are obeyed. There is no evidence, of course, that Mr. Glover was aware ofthe orders of Mr. Justice Garrett and of Mr. Justice Lerner but he certainly was aware of the interim order made by Judge Blair on March 10, 1977. Although the record does not disclose it, I assume that Judge Blair's order was made as a Local Judge of the Supreme Court in the course of the divorce proceedings brought in the Supreme Court of Ontario.
[23] The question of the inherent jurisdiction of the Court was not directly canvassed by the trial Judge. However, it was fully argued before us. In his helpful article entitled "Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1970), 23 Curr. L. Prob. 23, Master Jacob points out that inherent jurisdiction is the reserve or fund of powers which the Court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just or equitable to do so. He goes on to emphasize that this is not an unlimited jurisdiction and that it cannot be exercised in contravention of any statutory provision. In dealing with the general jurisdiction of the Court, a term which includes inherent jurisdiction, Brooke, J.A., in 80 Wellesley St. East Ltd. v. Fundy Bay Builders Ltd. et al., [1972] 2 O.R. 280 at p. 282, 25 D.L.R. (3d) 386 at p. 388, said:
As a superior Court of general jurisdiction the Supreme Court of Ontario has all of the powers that are necessary to do justice between the parties. Except where provided specifically to the contrary, the Court's jurisdiction is unlimited and unrestricted in substantive law in civil matters.
[24] The limiting words in that passage, and with respect in my view correctly so, are "except where provided specifically to the contrary". In the instant case there is a specific statutory limitation on the jurisdiction of the Court, which prohibits the divulging by the Minister or his officials of the information sought in this type of proceeding. The address of the taxpayer is a necessary and integral part of the information sought and received for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. To deliberately misstate the address is an offence under the Act. The section does not allow the Court to weigh the quality of relative value of the information. It prohibits the communication of "any" information received for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. In my opinion, the address received by the Minister of taxpayers on the income tax returns is information obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. Such information can only be communicated to persons authorized to receive it by virtue of the exceptions or qualifications contained in s.
241. As I have already stated, I do not believe that the Court of Mrs. Glover, either under s. 241 or by virtue of the invocation of the inherent jurisdiction of the Court, is such a person.
[25] An affidavit was filed in the Court below on behalf of the Minister by an employee of the Department of National Revenue stating that in his (the employee's) opinion, the disclosure of any information received in connection with the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act would be prejudicial to the public interest. I do not think such an affidavit is required in connection with the interpretation and application of s. 241 which is clear in its terms. Accordingly, I have not considered the affidavit.

Digitized by Google

[26] While one may have considerable sympathy with Mrs. Glover and her difficulties, if the Court can make the order that was here made, I can see no limitation on the power of the Court to make an order requiring any information received as a result of the requirements of the Income Tax Act, to be divulged or communicated to the Court or any other person as the Court directs. This would confer on the Court an unlimited discretion which would ignore the combined effect of s. 241(1), (2) and (3). I do not think this is a possible interpretation of s. 241 or of the applicable legal principles.

[27] The appeal is allowed and the order of the Court below is varied by striking out the words "Revenue Canada—Taxation" from para. 1 of the order of March 2, 1979. There will be, under the circumstances, no order as to costs on the appeal or of the order of Mr. Justice Lerner of March 10, 1980.

Appeal allowed.

Glover v. Minister of National Revenue, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 561, The Ontario Case Appealed Present: Laskin C.J. and Martland, Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ. ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO.

Courts—Powers of courts—Income tax—Confidentiality—Whether Revenue Canada is obliged or can be compelled to disclose information contained in tax return—Statutory provisions precluding disclosure of information—Case did not fall within exception—Inherent jurisdiction of the court could not be exercised in contravention of statutory provisions—Income Tax Act, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63 as amended, s. 241.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[141], setting aside an order of Lerner

J[142] directing Revenue Canada to provide the Court with certain information secured under the provisions of the Income Tax Act. Appeal dismissed.

William D. Dunlop and Susan J. Serena, for the appellant.

L.R. Olsson, Q.C., and Ian S. MacGregor, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE—The issue in this appeal is whether the revenue authorities of the Government of Canada are obliged or can be compelled to disclose the address of a taxpayer to the appellant who was awarded custody of her children as against the taxpayer, her former husband, he having abducted the two children and his whereabouts being unknown. Lerner J. made an order for disclosure, notwithstanding the provisions of s. 241(1) and (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1970-71-72 (Can.), c. 63 as amended. His order was set aside by the Ontario Court of Appeal in unanimous reasons given for the Court by MacKinnon A.C.J.

Sympathetic though one is inclined to be to the appellant's plight, the statutory provisions above-mentioned for non-disclosure, in connection with any legal proceedings of a civil character, do not give any power to a court to qualify them, nor do the exceptions set out in s. 241(4)(c) assist the appellant. MacKinnon A.C.J. has dealt fully with the issues that arise in the appeal and no ground has been shown to depart from his reasons and conclusion.

I would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant: Martin, Dunlop, Hillyer & Associates, Burlington. Solicitor for the [141] (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 392, 80 D.T.C. 6262.

[142] (1979), 26 O.R. (2d) 477, 79 D.T.C. 5391

Digitized by Google

respondent: L.R. Olsson, Toronto.

Her Majesty The Queen and The Minister of National Revenue v. George William Harris (et al), A-25-99, Mister Harris and his Purportedly Favoured Trusts

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
Sexton J.A.
INTRODUCTION

[1] Mr. Harris issued a statement of claim, alleging that the Ministry of National Revenue acted illegally or improperly or for ulterior motives by providing preferential treatment to a taxpayer when the Ministry of National Revenue issued an advance tax ruling in 1991. The Ministry of National Revenue moved to strike the statement of claim on the basis that it disclosed no cause of action because one person is not permitted to challenge another's income tax treatment, and because Mr. Harris lacked public interest standing.

[2] The following issues are raised by this appeal:

ISSUES

1. Does the statement of claim describe a reasonable cause of action, arising out of Mr. Harris' allegations that the Minister of National Revenue acted illegally or improperly or for ulterior motives, namely favouritism and preferential treatment by way of a covert deal when he interpreted the provisions of the Income Tax Act in favour of a specific trust?
2. Does Mr. Harris have public interest standing to seek declaratory relief relating to the alleged maladministration of the Income Tax Act by the Minister of National Revenue?

BACKGROUND

The nature of Revenue Canada's advance income tax rulings

[3] Revenue Canada permits taxpayers to request advance income tax rulings ("rulings"), where taxpayers ask Revenue Canada to explain how it will apply specific provisions of the Income Tax Act[1] (the "Act") to proposed transactions.[2] Revenue Canada generally regards the rulings as binding, so as to permit taxpayers to obtain certain tax consequences when the proposed transactions are eventually carried out in accordance with the ruling.[3] In so doing, a taxpayer may choose to not carry out a proposed transaction if Revenue Canada proposes to issue an unfavourable ruling.[4]

The 1985 ruling

[4] In 1984, an accounting firm's client asked it to obtain a ruling from Revenue Canada.[5] In its request for a ruling, the firm explained that a Canadian-resident trust proposed to exchange private corporation shares for public corporation shares. In the ruling, Revenue Canada was required to determine whether, if the trust's residence changed, the trust would be deemed to have disposed of the shares within the meaning of ss. 48(1) of the Act (as it then read) so as to cause the trust to incur an immediate tax liability on the trust's properties' accrued capital gains, or whether such a deemed disposition would not occur because the property constituted a type of property known as "taxable Canadian property."

[5] In January 1985, the Non-Corporate Rulings Division of Revenue Canada issued a favourable ruling to the trust. The ruling was not made public.[6]

The 1985 opinion

[6] One week after the ruling was issued, Revenue Canada received a request for an opinion from a different taxpayer, essentially asking the same question that the trust had earlier asked. When the opinion was issued some five months later, the same Revenue Canada division that had issued the earlier ruling "directly contradicted"[7] that earlier ruling. The opinion was made public.

The 1991 ruling

Digitized by Google

[7] In 1991, a law firm that represented a trust that was related to the parties who had obtained the favourable 1985 ruling requested a similar ruling from Revenue Canada. Even though the 1985 ruling had not been made public, the law firm had a copy of that ruling.[8]

[8] The law firm explained that a trust known as the "Family Trust" had obtained public company shares in exchange for private company shares. The law firm proposed changing the residence of a newly-established so-called "Protective Trust" from Canada to the U.S., and to transfer the public company shares held by the Family Trust to the Protective Trust.

[9] The taxpayer's transaction posed the following problem to Revenue Canada. If Revenue Canada concluded that the public company shares held by the resident Family Trust were taxable Canadian property, the Family Trust would be permitted to dispose of the public company shares to the non-resident Protective Trust without triggering a deemed disposition at fair market value pursuant to ss. 107(5) of the Act.[9] In other words, the Family Trust would not incur an immediate tax liability merely by distributing the shares to the Protective Trust.

[10] In its ruling, Revenue Canada concluded that the Family Trust would not trigger a deemed disposition pursuant to s. 107(5) of the Act when it distributed the shares to the Protective Trust. Therefore, the ruling would have permitted the non-resident Protective Trust to immediately dispose of the public company shares, while sheltering the proceeds from Canadian income tax.

[11] The ruling was made subject to a ten-year waiver that would permit Revenue Canada to reassess the Family Trust "with respect to subsection 107(5)," a waiver that presumably would permit Revenue Canada to reverse its conclusion that Canadian residents could hold taxable Canadian property. The waiver would permit Revenue Canada to conclude that a deemed disposition and corresponding tax liability occurred when the Family Trust transferred the public company shares to the Protective Trust.

[12] Therefore, to summarize, the implicit assumption made in the 1985 and the 1991 non-public rulings was that Canadian residents could hold taxable Canadian property, and that a deemed disposition and corresponding tax liability would not occur when such taxable Canadian property was transferred out of Canada. By contrast, the public opinion released by Revenue Canada in 1985 directly contradicted those conclusions.

The Auditor General's report

[13] In response to the 1991 ruling, the Auditor General issued a strongly-worded report criticizing the ruling itself, the seeming covertness in which the ruling was made, and the lack of documentation associated with the way in which the rulings were made. The Auditor General also suggested that because the taxpayers who obtained the 1991 ruling were bolstered by the 1985 ruling that was not available to the public at large, the taxpayer who received the 1991 ruling might have enjoyed advantages not available to other taxpayers.

George Harris' statement of claim

[14] George Harris is a taxpayer. He is a member of an unincorporated organization known as "CHO!CES - A Coalition for Social Justice," an organization that Mr. Harris describes in his statement of claim as one that "deals with a wide variety of public issues,"[10] including "fiscal and budgetary matters at all levels of government."[11]

[15] After the Auditor General released its report, CHO!CES requested the Attorney General of Canada to refer the rulings "to a court of competent jurisdiction for a determinative decision concerning the correctness and propriety of the Minister's rulings."[12] The Attorney General did not respond to the letter.

[16] Mr. Harris sought to obtain relief on his own. He issued a statement of claim, essentially relying on many of the criticisms the Auditor General had made of the 1991 ruling. As relief for those criticisms, Mr. Harris sought, inter alia, "a declaration that the Minister is obliged to utilize all available measures under the Act to collect any tax properly due and

Digitized by Google

owing as a result of the transaction referenced in the 1991 Ruling, including resort to the waiver given by Family Trust [...]."[13]

The Attorney General of Canada's motion to strike

[17] The Attorney General brought a motion to strike the entire statement of claim, pursuant to the former Rule 419 of the Federal Court Rules. The central grounds upon which the Attorney General based its motion to strike were that the Statement of Claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action, and that Mr. Harris lacked the requisite standing to bring his action.

DECISIONS BELOW

The Prothonotary's decision

[18] Giles A.S.P. granted the Attorney General's motion to strike the entire claim. He held that "a third-party challenge to an assessment has never been permitted in our tax system."[14] Accordingly, he concluded that Mr. Harris' statement of claim should be struck as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. Alternatively, Giles A.S.P. concluded that Mr. Harris did not have standing to bring his claim.

Appeal to the Federal Court - Trial Division

[19] Mr. Harris appealed the decision of Giles A.S.P. to the Federal Court - Trial Division, which allowed the appeal. Again, at this stage of the proceedings, the Attorney General adopted the position that the statement of claim should be struck in its entirety.

[20] In his reasons, Muldoon J. applied the three-stage test stated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Canadian Council of Churches v. The Queen et al.[15] so as to conclude that Mr. Harris had standing to bring his claim. Muldoon J. concluded that the three-stage test was satisfied in the following ways:

1. Mr. Harris had raised "a serious issue [...] as to the invalidity of the favouring acts complained of in question."[16] Muldoon J. held that "what is at stake, to be determined if possible in the action, are: (1) alleged favouritism or blundering in the administration of tax collection; and (2) a huge erosion of the national tax base."[17] He added that "either one of the foregoing, it is evident, is of towering seriousness [...]."[18]
2. Mr. Harris had demonstrated "a genuine interest."[19] Muldoon J. noted that Mr. Harris was a concerned taxpayer and a member of CHO!CES, a group he found to be concerned with "fair taxation."[20] Accordingly, Muldoon J. wondered "what more can be expected of the plaintiff in order to satisfy the second criterion?"[21]
3. There was no other reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the Court. Muldoon J. held that "the only directly affected individuals were accorded a mighty benefit by the departmental administrative acts which the plaintiff challenges,"[22] while the "Attorney General, a member of the government"[23] could not be expected to impugn the 1991 ruling.

[21] The Attorney General appeals Muldoon J.'s decision to this Court.

ANALYSIS

1. Does the statement of claim describe a reasonable cause of action?

Test on a motion to strike

[22] The test to determine whether a motion to strike should be granted was stated by the Supreme Court in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc.:[24]

> Assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it "plain and obvious" that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be "driven from the judgment seat." Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect [...] should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a).[25]

Digitized by Google

[23] Similarly, in Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen,[26]the majority held:

> The law then would appear to be clear. The facts pleaded are to be taken as proved. When so taken, the question is do they disclose a reasonable cause of action, i.e. a cause of action "with some chance of success" (Drummond-Jackson v. British Medical Association, [1970] 1 All E.R. 1094) or, as Le Dain J. put it in Dowson v. Government of Canada (1981), 37 N.R. 127 (F.C.A.), at p. 138, is it "plain and obvious that the action cannot succeed?"[27]

Pertinent allegations relating to cause of action

[24] As previously mentioned, Mr. Harris' statement of claim largely relies on the facts and conclusions contained in the Auditor General's May 1996 report. In that report, the Auditor General concluded that the impugned 1991 ruling raised the following issues that are pleaded by Mr. Harris in his statement of claim:

(a) The Auditor General concluded that the transaction for which the 1991 ruling was issued "may have circumvented the intent of the law,"[28]in that there is a "convincing argument that the general scheme of the Act contemplates the ownership of 'taxable Canadian property' only by non-residents":[29]a "convincing argument" based on the reasons offered in the 1985 opinion.

(b) For over two months after the 1991 ruling request was received, "officials concluded repeatedly that the Department should not rule favourably."[30] Indeed, on December 3, 1991, Revenue Canada advised the Department of Finance that it intended to bring the matter before the general anti-avoidance rule committee to recommend that s. 245(2) of the Act be applied to the transaction. Similarly, on December 19, 1993, a draft legal opinion was provided by counsel at the Department of Justice, which concluded that "the Act is ambiguous with respect to the subject issue," but that "given the general scheme of the Act, I share your view that an argument is available that only a non-resident can dispose of 'taxable Canadian property' for purposes of the deeming provisions of paragraph 85(1)(i) of the Act."

Despite those concerns, the Auditor General found that the ruling was issued after a series of meetings were held between senior officials from Revenue Canada and officials from the Department of Finance on December 23, 1991. According to the Auditor General, no minutes or details were kept of the meetings, even though the transactions represented a potential "legitimate future claim to hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue."[31] Only after the ruling was made did the Department of Justice provide an opinion that concluded that "a resident can dispose of 'taxable Canadian property' for the purposes of the deeming provisions of paragraph 85(1)(i) of the Act."

(c) Other taxpayers might have been denied the benefit afforded to the taxpayer who received the 1991 rulings, since the ruling was not made public until March, 1996, while the 1985 opinion that concluded that resident Canadians could not hold taxable Canadian property was made public earlier.

Claim for relief

[25] The substantive relief claimed by Mr. Harris is located at paragraph 43 of his Statement of Claim. There, he seeks the following relief:

> A declaration that the Minister is obliged to utilize all available measures under the Act to collect any tax properly due and owing as a result of the transaction referenced in the 1991 Ruling, including resort to the waiver given by the Family Trust pursuant to section 152(4)(a)(ii) of the Act with respect to the application of section 107(5) of the Act in the taxation year of Family Trust in which the distribution was made.

The Attorney General's submissions

[26] On appeal, the Attorney General submits that a plaintiff cannot ask a court for a declaration on a mere issue of the proper interpretation of the Act, in the absence of a specific fact situation. In particular, the Attorney General challenges the relief sought at paragraph 36(c) of Mr. Harris' Statement of Claim, where he seeks "a declaration that prior to October 1, 1996, on a proper construction of the Income Tax Act, as a matter of law, 'taxable Canadian property' could not be held by a resident of Canada."

Digitized by Google

[27] More broadly, the Attorney General submits that one person is not permitted to challenge another's income tax treatment. The Attorney General relies on Strayer J.'s (as he then was) decision in Nova Ban-Corp Ltd. v. Tottrup,[32]where he held:

> Nor does the Income Tax Act authorize anyone but the taxpayer to challenge a tax assessment. The plain words of the Act do not so provide. By section 165, 169 and formerly 172 (authorizing appeals to the Federal Court) it is the "taxpayer" who is authorized to file an objection to an assessment or to bring an appeal [...] Apart from the absence of any express authority for such a proceeding, I agree respectfully with my colleague Walsh J. in Hart and Gunther's Building Centre Ltd. v. M.N.R. where he held that a creditor of a taxpayer had no standing to challenge the assessment and the enforcement action taken pursuant to it. I believe that the House of Lords decision in Inland Revenue Commission v. National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Limited quoted by him, provides a clear rationale for denying any implication that a person other than the taxpayer can challenge his assessment. The House of Lords there emphasized the confidentiality of taxation information which militates against third parties coming in to attack an assessment. In Canada that confidentiality is required, in circumstances such as the present, by section 241(2) of the Income Tax Act which states that no official shall be required in connection with any legal proceedings to testify as to information obtained on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of the Act. This would clearly provide a major obstacle to any third party challenging an assessment in Court and it cannot be implied that such a challenge is authorized [...] The action is intrinsically defective. That is, there is no Court which will entertain a challenge to federal income tax assessment other than one brought by the taxpayer nor entertain such a challenge except in the form of an appeal [...].[33]

[28] To the same effect, the Attorney General cites the following extract from Lord Wilberforce's decision in I.R.C. v. Federation of Self-Employed[34]for the proposition that the only person who may complain of the tax treatment afforded by a taxing authority is the taxpayer subject to that treatment:

> [...] The commissioner's duties are to the Crown, and that matters relating to income tax are between the commissioners and the taxpayer concerned. No other person is given any right to make proposals about the tax payable by any individual; he cannot even inquire as to such tax. The total confidentiality of assessments and of negotiations between individuals and the Revenue is a vital element in the working of the system. As a matter of general principle I would hold that one taxpayer has no sufficient interest in asking the court to investigate the tax affairs of another taxpayer or to complain that the latter has been under-assessed or over-assessed; indeed there is a strong public interest that he should not. And this principle applies equally to groups of taxpayers: an aggregate of individuals each of whom has no interest cannot of itself have an interest.[35]

[29] Finally, the Attorney General submits that Mr. Harris' action is barred by the confidentiality afforded to taxpayers by s. 241 of the Act.

Analysis of the cause of action

[30] I agree with the Attorney General's submission that one cannot bring in isolation an action for a declaration on a mere interpretation of the Act, and that this conclusion is supported by Strayer J.'s decision in Nova Ban.[36] However, in his statement of claim, Mr. Harris does not seek such a mere declaration: much more is alleged and much more is claimed.

Digitized by Google

[31] Mr. Harris' statement of claim alleges that the 1985 and the 1991 rulings, which provided favourable tax benefits to certain taxpayers, were not made public until much later on. By contrast, the 1985 opinion, in which Revenue Canada expressed the opinion that taxpayers could not obtain the sort of benefits permitted by the 1985 ruling and the 1991 ruling, was made public earlier. In so doing, Mr. Harris claims that "the Crown bestowed an undue preference and special benefit on Protective Trust and Family Trust, whereas other trusts, and the class of Plaintiffs herein in general, were unaware of the favourable interpretation of the Act being applied by the Minister in such circumstances."[37] Mr. Harris also claims that there was a "lack of documentation and analysis of key decisions made by Crown officials in this regard."[38] He alleges that Revenue Canada and the Department of Finance held meetings on December 23, 1991, during which no minutes of the meetings were taken or made by either department, after which Revenue Canada suddenly concluded that a favourable ruling should be issued to the taxpayer.[39] All this, Mr. Harris pleads, has caused him to have a "reasonable apprehension of bad faith administration" and to conclude that there was an ulterior motive on the part of the Crown in the circumstances of this case.[40]

[32] Therefore, in the context of those allegations, supported in large measure by the Auditor General's report, Mr. Harris seeks "a declaration that the Minister is obliged to use all available measures under the Act to collect any tax properly due and owing [...]."[41] In essence, he seeks to "overcome the inaction or misconduct of persons charged with the performance of duties of a public nature."[42]

[33] Mr. Harris' allegation of maladministration and ulterior motives is akin to the obligation that public officials act in "good faith" when carrying out statutory duties. In Roncarelli v. Duplessis,[43]Rand J. recognized that public officials must act "with a rational appreciation" of statutory intent, and must not act "arbitrarily":

> In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion," that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power, exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. [...] "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith in discharging public duty; [...]
>
> "Good faith" in this context, [...] means carrying out the statute according to its intent and purpose; it means good faith in acting with a rational appreciation of that intent and purpose and not with an improper intent and alien purpose; it does not mean for the purposes of punishing a person for exercising an unchallengeable right; it does not mean arbitrarily and illegally attempting to divest a citizen of an incident of his civil status.[44]

[34] I do not think that the House of Lords' decision in I.R.C. v. Federation of Self-Employed demonstrates that Mr. Harris' claim must fail. As previously mentioned, the Attorney General has cited the decision in support of the proposition that no person other than the person subject to a tax assessment may complain of tax treatment afforded by Revenue Canada. In my view, the case can be distinguished on the basis that certain broad powers are afforded to Britain's Inland Revenue Commissioners, which Revenue Canada does not have. In that case, Lord Wilberforce indicated the very wide discretion afforded to the Inland Revenue Commissioners to conclude compromise agreements with taxpayers:

> The 1970 Act provides (s. 1) that "Income tax [...] shall be under the care and management of the Commissioners." This Act contains the very wide powers of the Board and of inspectors of taxes to make assessments on persons designated by Parliament as liable to pay income tax. With regard to casual employment, there is a procedure laid down by statutory instrument, the Income Tax (Employment) Regulations 1973, SI 1973 No. 334, Reg. 50, by which inspectors of taxes may proceed by way of special assessment or in accordance with any special arrangements which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may make for the collection of tax. As I shall show later it was a "special arrangement" that the commissioners set out to make in the present case.[45]

Digitized by Google

[35] Lord Diplock confirmed Lord Wilberforce's opinion by holding that income tax officials in Britain are vested with a "wide managerial discretion as to the best means of obtaining for the national exchequer from the taxes committed to their charge the highest net return that is practicable having regard to the staff available to them and the cost of collection."[46] In concurring reasons, Lord Scarman held that "the Taxes Management Act 1970 places income tax under [the Commissioners'] care and management and for that purpose confers on them and inspectors of tax very considerable discretion in the exercise of their powers."[47]

[36] Revenue Canada is vested with no such powers. In Ludmer et al. v. The Queen,[48]this Court held that the powers provided to the Commissioners which were at issue in the Federation of Self-Employed case are "fundamentally different"[49]from the powers of the Minister in Canada:

> Neither the Minister of National Revenue nor his employees have any discretion whatever in the way in which they must apply the Income Tax Act. They are required to follow it absolutely, just as taxpayers are also required to obey it as it stands. The institution of Commissioners equipped with broad powers and an extensive discretion to deal with particular cases does not exist here. Accordingly, it is not possible to judge their actions by varying and flexible criteria such as those required by the rules of natural justice. In determining whether their decisions are valid the question is not whether they exercised their powers properly or wrongfully, but whether they acted as the law governing them required them to act.[50]

[37] Similarly, this Court has held that the Minister of National Revenue is limited to making decisions based solely on considerations arising from the Act itself. As previously mentioned, in Galway, while this Court concluded that the Minister has a statutory duty to assess tax "in accordance with the law as he understands it," it also held that the Minister "cannot assess for some amount designed to implement a compromise settlement."[51] Indeed, in Cohen v. The Queen,[52]this Court concluded that any "agreement whereby the Minister would agree to assess income tax otherwise [than] in accordance with the law would [...] be an illegal agreement."[53] Likewise, the Minister cannot award preferential treatment to some taxpayers for ulterior motives or make covert deals. The allegations made in the statement of claim, supported in large measure by the Auditor General's report, take Mr. Harris' claim outside the ambit of a mere question of administrative interpretation.

[38] In Longley v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue), the British Columbia Court of Appeal confirmed the proposition that the Minister is bound to follow the Act absolutely. Hutcheon J.A. held that the "Minister is bound to administer the Income Tax Act according to law,"[54]and added that he knew "of no legal grounds on which the Minister could be directed by the court to act contrary to the law."[55]

[39] Nor do I agree with the proposition that Strayer J.'s decision in Nova Ban demonstrates that it is plain and obvious that Mr. Harris' claim discloses no reasonable cause of action. In Nova Ban, Nova Ban was the creditor of a company called Container Port. Nova Ban sought to challenge the Minister's assessment of Container Port on the basis that it "acceded to an excessive assessment of income tax which should have been payable"[56]by the individual president of Container Port. In other words, the dispute was a private commercial dispute over money. Strayer J. did not consider principles of public interest standing, nor did he conclude that no cause of action could exist where a plaintiff sought to challenge a person's tax assessment for public interest purposes in circumstances where a public interest plaintiff alleges illegality, improper actions, ulterior motives, favouritism, preferential treatment, and covert deals.

Digitized by Google

[40] Accordingly, I conclude that the cases relied upon by the Attorney General do not demonstrate that it is plain and obvious that Mr. Harris' statement of claim discloses no cause of action. Mr. Harris alleges that the Minister of National Revenue acted illegally or improperly or for ulterior motives, namely favouritism and preferential treatment by way of a covert deal when he interpreted the provisions of the Act in favour of a specific trust. Assuming those facts to be true (as must be done on a motion to strike), and considering that the material facts in Mr. Harris' statement of claim are not "allegations based on assumptions and speculations,"[57]but are supported by the Auditor General's report, it is not plain and obvious that Mr. Harris' action cannot succeed.

[41] I wish to emphasize that the Attorney General's motion to strike was made and argued before Giles A.S.P, Muldoon J. and this Court on the basis that the Attorney General sought to strike the entire statement of claim. The original notice of motion and the notice of appeal reflect this,[58]as do the decisions of Giles A.S.P. and Muldoon J. This was not a motion to sever parts of the pleading. Therefore, because I have concluded that it is not plain and obvious that Mr. Harris' action overall cannot succeed, there is no need to consider individual aspects of the statement of claim, such as whether the Minister owes a fiduciary duty or acts in a capacity akin to a fiduciary toward taxpayers in general. Mr. Harris' action is not necessarily dependent on this allegation.

[42] In any event, I have concluded that it is not plain and obvious that the Minister owes no fiduciary obligations to taxpayers. On the one hand, I recognize that there is law to suggest that the Minister owes no such obligation to taxpayers. For example, in Guerin v. The Queen,[59]Dickson J. (as he then was) held:

> It should be noted that fiduciary duties generally arise only with regard to obligations originating in a private law context. Public law duties, the performance of which requires the exercise of discretion, do not typically give rise to a fiduciary relationship. As the "political trust" cases indicate, the Crown is not normally viewed as a fiduciary in the exercise of its legislative or administrative function.[60]

[43] Similarly, in Rothmans of Pall Mall, Le Dain J.A. held that "the duty of the [Minister of National Revenue] under section 202 of the Excise Act is one owing to the Crown rather than [to Rothmans.]"[61]

[44] On the other hand, there is law to suggest that the Minister does owe fiduciary obligations to taxpayers. In Bromley London Borough Council v. Greater London Council and another,[62]Lord Diplock held that "a local authority owes a general fiduciary duty to the taxpayers from whom it obtains moneys needed to carry out its statutory functions [...]."[63] In Roberts v. Hopwood,[64]Lord Atkinson held:

> A body charged with the administration for definite purposes of funds contributed in whole or in part by persons other than the members of that body, owes, in my view, a duty to those latter persons to conduct that administration in a fairly businesslike manner with reasonable care, skill and caution, and with a due and alert regard to the interest of those contributors who are not members of the body. Towards these latter persons the body stands somewhat in the position of trustees or managers of the property of others.[65]

[45] In Federation of Self-Employed, despite holding that "the commissioners' duties are to the Crown," Lord Wilberforce recognized that a taxpayer could challenge other taxpayers' tax treatment where a court examined evidence to demonstrate the "breach of duty" alleged.[66] In so doing, Lord Wilberforce must have implicitly recognized that the commissioners' duties are not exclusively owed to the Crown.

[46] Similarly, in Federation of Self-Employed, Lord Scarman held:

> [...] Nor do I accept that the duty to collect "every part of inland revenue" is a duty owed exclusively to the Crown. Notwithstanding the Treasury case in 1872, I am persuaded that the modern case law recognises a legal duty owed by the Revenue to the general body of the taxpayers to treat taxpayers fairly [...][67]

Digitized by Google

[47] These last few cases, I think, demonstrate that it is not plain and obvious that the Minister owes no fiduciary obligations to taxpayers. Even though the Attorney General could present strong arguments to the contrary, I do not think that Mr. Harris should be "driven from the judgment seat," language used by the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc.

2. Does Mr. Harris have public interest standing to seek declaratory relief relating to the alleged maladministration of the Income Tax Act by the Minister of National Revenue?

[48] The Attorney General submits that public interest standing may be granted to permit a citizen to litigate a non-constitutional issue only where the issue raised concerns the limits of statutory authority for administrative action. The Attorney General relies heavily on Le Dain J.A.'s (as he then was) decision in Rothmans v. Pall Mall Canada Ltd. v. M.N.R. et al. [No. 1].[68]

[49] To evaluate the Minister's argument, a brief reference to the Supreme Court of Canada's decisions in Thorson v. Canada (A.G.),[69]Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil,[70]Minister of Justice (Canada) v. Borowski,[71]Finlay v. Canada (Minister of Finance),[72]and Canadian Council of Churches v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration)[73]must be made. In the Thorson, McNeil and Borowski cases, the Supreme Court established the conditions under which a public interest plaintiff could challenge legislation on constitutional grounds. In Borowski, Martland J. for the majority held that to obtain public interest standing, a plaintiff must (1) demonstrate that there is a serious issue as to the invalidity of legislation, (2) that the plaintiff has a genuine interest, and (3) there is no other reasonable and effective manner to bring the issue before the court.[74] In Canadian Council of Churches, the Supreme Court of Canada adopted the same three-part test to determine when public interest litigants should be granted standing to challenge legislation on Charter grounds.[75]

[50] In Finlay v. Canada (Minister of Finance), Le Dain J. considered whether the principles of public interest standing that applied to litigants who seek to challenge legislation on constitutional grounds ought to be extended to a "non-constitutional challenge [...] for a declaration to the statutory authority for public expenditure or other administrative action."[76] Le Dain J. confirmed that public interest standing should be so extended to ensure "the maintenance of respect for the limits of administrative authority":

> The issue, then, as I see it, is whether the principle reflected in Thorson, McNeil and Borowski should be extended by this Court to such cases. This question raises again the policy considerations and underlying judicial attitudes to public interest standing, and in particular, whether the same value is to be assigned to the public interest in the maintenance of respect for the limits of administrative authority as was assigned by this Court in Thorson, McNeil and Borowski to the public interest in the maintenance of respect for the limits of legislative authority. In my view an affirmative answer should be given to this question.[77]

[51] By contrast, in Rothmans, Le Dain J.A. declined to grant Rothmans standing to challenge the Minister's calculations. He held:

> The decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138, and McNeil v. Nova Scotia Board of Censors (1975) 5 N.R. 43, were urged upon us as indicating a relaxation of the requirement of locus standi. A careful reading of these decisions shows, in my respectful opinion, that the principal consideration governing them is the importance in a federal state of opportunity to challenge the constitutional validity of statutes. No such consideration is applicable here. It was suggested that there is a comparable consideration of public policy in broad access to challenge the validity of administrative action, and this view finds some support in the recognition of a judicial discretion to permit a stranger to bring certiorari or prohibition in certain cases. The present case is not one that raises any question of the limits of statutory authority. The most that is raised is a question of administrative interpretation that the authorities are obliged to make in their application of the governing statute.[78]

Digitized by Google

[52] The essential difference between Rothmans and the instant appeal is that in Rothmans, the court concluded that the issues raised did not involve a question of the respect of the limits of administrative authority. By contrast, Mr. Harris' statement of claim does. He complains that certain taxpayers have been afforded tax advantages by Revenue Canada that were not afforded to other taxpayers. In other words, he alleges that Revenue Canada has afforded preferential treatment to certain taxpayers, something that raises a question of the limits of statutory authority.

[53] This Court has recognized that where strong public interest issues arise, a Court may exercise its discretion to recognize public interest standing. In Distribution Canada Inc. v. M.N.R.,[79]a case in which a plaintiff sought to require the Minister to comply with certain provisions of the Customs Tariff, Desjardins J.A. held that public interest standing may exist where "the matter raised [...] is one of strong public interest and there may be no other way such an issue could be brought to the attention of the Court, were it not for the efforts of the [public interest litigant]."[80]

[54] Similarly, in Federation of Self-Employed, despite holding that "as a matter of general principle I would hold that one taxpayer has no sufficient interest in asking the court to investigate the tax affairs of another taxpayer or to complain that the latter has been underassessed or overassessed,"[81]Lord Wilberforce held:

> That a case can never arise in which the acts or abstentions of the Revenue can be brought before the court I am certainly not prepared to assert, nor that, in a case of sufficient gravity, the court might not be able to hold that another taxpayer or other taxpayers could challenge them. Whether this situation has been reached or not must depend on an examination, on evidence, of what breach of duty or illegality is alleged. On this, and relating it to the position of the complainant, the court has to make its decision.[82]

[55] In the same vein, Lord Diplock held:

> I do not doubt, however, and I do not understand any of your Lordships to doubt, that if it were established that the Board were proposing to exercise or to refrain from exercising their powers not for reasons of 'good management' but for some extraneous or ulterior reason that inaction or inaction of the Board would be ultra vires and would be a proper matter for judicial review if it were brought to the attention of the court by an applicant with "a sufficient interest" in having the Board compelled to observe the law.[83]

[56] Lord Diplock added that it would "be a grave lacuna in our system of public law if a pressure group, like the federation, or even a single public spirited taxpayer, were prevented by outdated technical rules of locus standi from bringing the matter to the attention of the court to vindicate the rule of law and get the unlawful conduct stopped."[84]

[57] Similarly, Lord Scarman recognized that public interest standing could be granted to a litigant to challenge the tax treatment that the Inland Revenue Commissioners had afforded to other taxpayers. Lord Scarman did not permit the public interest litigant's leave application to proceed further because he concluded that the Inland Revenue Commissioners had ample statutory authority to conclude compromise agreements with taxpayers. However, he added that if the Federation had presented "reasonable grounds for believing that the failure to collect tax [...] was an abuse of the Revenue's managerial discretion or that there was a case to that effect which merited investigation and examination by the court," the Federation would have "shown a sufficient interest for the grant of leave to proceed further with its application."[85]

Digitized by Google

[58] Again, as I have explained earlier in these reasons, Revenue Canada would not have the power to conclude the compromise agreement that was at issue in Federation of Self-Employed. Accordingly, I do not think that the reason for which the House of Lords denied public interest standing to the Federation of Self-Employed constitutes good law in Canada. Therefore, I do not think that the House of Lords' decision demonstrates that Mr. Harris is precluded from obtaining public interest standing to challenge the tax treatment afforded to other taxpayers by Revenue Canada. Indeed, I think that the obiter statements of Lord Wilberforce, Lord Diplock and Lord Scarman reproduced above demonstrate the opposite: namely, that if Revenue Canada concludes compromise agreements or covert deals or provides preferential treatment to certain taxpayers without statutory authority, public interest standing may be granted to challenge the tax treatment that Revenue Canada affords to taxpayers who benefit from those actions.

[59] I now turn to the four criteria established in Finlay to determine whether this Court should exercise its discretion to recognize Mr. Harris' public interest standing. In Finlay, Le Dain J. held that courts should be concerned about their proper role and their constitutional relationship to other branches of governments. He held that where an issue may be appropriately decided by a court, a court "should not decline to determine it on the ground that because of its policy context or implications it is better left for review and determination by the legislative or executive branches of government."[86]

[60] In my view, Mr. Harris' statement of claim raises a justiciable issue. His claim that the Minister of National Revenue acted illegally or improperly or for ulterior motives, namely favouritism and preferential treatment by way of a covert deal when he interpreted the provisions of the Act in favour of a specific trust, raises a question of a potential violation of the Act that a Court may assess by reference to the Minister's duty to follow the Act "absolutely," as this Court held in Ludmer.[87]

[61] The second criterion established by Le Dain J. in Finlay was that a public interest litigant must raise a serious issue. As Le Dain J. concluded in Finlay, the issues raised by Mr. Harris are "far from frivolous."[88] Mr. Harris does not merely bring an action to obtain a declaration for an interpretation of particular sections of the Act. Rather, as stated above, he alleges that the Minister of National Revenue acted for ulterior motives with a view to favouring particular taxpayers, in circumstances where there was a "lack of documentation and analysis of key decisions made by Crown officials in this regard."[89] The issues are serious.

[62] The third criterion is that the public interest litigant must have a genuine interest in the issue. On appeal, the Attorney General did not seriously contest that Mr. Harris did have a genuine interest in the issues he raises. Mr. Harris is a taxpayer. He is a member of an organization that seeks to ensure the fair administration of the taxation system. Accordingly, I conclude that Mr. Harris has a genuine interest in the issues he raises.

[63] Finally, in exercising its discretion to recognize public interest standing, a court must be satisfied that there is no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue may be brought before a court. Here too, the Attorney General did not seriously contend that there was another reasonable or effective manner in which the issue could be brought before a court. Mr. Harris requested the Attorney General to do so twice, but to this date, the Attorney General has not yet complied. It cannot be seriously contended that the taxpayers who were provided with the 1991 ruling favourable to them would raise the issues brought by Mr. Harris. Therefore, I conclude that there is no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue could be brought before a court.

Conclusion on standing

[64] Public interest standing has been granted in analogous cases. For example, in

Digitized by Google

Greater Victoria Concerned Citizens Assoc. v. Provincial Capital Commission,[90]a citizens group successfully obtained standing to seek to obtain a declaration that an agreement to lease certain heritage property as a tourist attraction was beyond the Provincial Capital Commission's jurisdiction. In Union of Northern Workers v. Jewell,[91]a union was granted public interest standing to seek to compel a government Minister to hold occupational health and safety board meetings. In Sierra Club of Canada v. Canada (Minister of Finance),[92]an organization promoting protection of the environment was granted standing to seek to compel several government Ministers to subject the sale of nuclear reactors to a full environmental assessment under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act,[93]the absence of which was said to be unlawful.

[65] I do not think that there is a principled basis for concluding that the Minister of National Revenue is somehow protected from a similar action by a public interest litigant to compel the Minister to perform his or her statutory duties. Accordingly, I conclude that Muldoon J. properly ruled that Mr. Harris could be granted public interest standing and therefore correctly set aside the Prothonotary's granting of the Crown's motion to strike.

[66] I wish to emphasize the narrow cause of action for which public interest standing has been granted. Mr. Harris does not merely seek to obtain the interpretation of a particular provision of the Act, akin to requesting a court to provide a legal opinion. A mere bona fide change of position on interpretation of a statute, without more, would be insufficient to constitute a cause of action and would have been insufficient to persuade this Court to exercise its discretion to recognize public interest standing. Nevertheless, in considering Mr. Harris' cause of action for which public interest standing has been granted, the trial judge may incidentally find it necessary to consider whether, on a proper construction of the Act, "taxable Canadian property" may be held by a resident of Canada.

Taxpayer confidentiality

[67] I will briefly address the concerns about taxpayer confidentiality raised by the Attorney General. The Attorney General submitted that to permit Mr. Harris' proceeding to go forward would inevitably tend to breach the confidentiality that is required to be protected by section 241 of the Act. Subsections 241(1) and (2) of the Act state that no official shall, inter alia, "knowingly provide [...]_to any person any taxpayer information," and that "no official shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information."

[68] By contrast, subsection 241(3) states that ss. 241(1) and (2) do not apply in respect of "any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of the Act," something that Mr. Harris submits his public interest action seeks to achieve.

[69] As Lord Scarman decided in Federation of Self-Employed,[94]I think that concerns about taxpayer confidentiality should be left to a case management or trial judge to decide. I note that there is ample provision in the Federal Court Rules, 1998, that would adequately address confidentiality concerns. Rule 29(2) permits a Court to "direct that all or part of a proceeding be heard in camera if it is satisfied that the hearing should not be open to the public." Rule 151 permits a Court to "order that material to be filed shall be treated as confidential." Rule 152(2)(b) requires a solicitor of record to be given confidential material, inter alia, "only if the solicitor gives a written undertaking to the Court that he or she will not disclose its content except to solicitors assisting in the proceeding or to the Court in the course of argument."

[70] I would therefore dismiss the appeal, with costs.

"J. Edgar Sexton"

J.A.

"I agree

Gilles Létourneau J.A.:

Digitized by Google

"I agree
J. T. Robertson J.A."

---

[1]R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.).

[2]Information Circular 70-6R2.

[3] Ibid., para. 4 & 5.

[4] Ibid., para. 3.

[5] On this appeal, I have made reference to the Auditor General of Canada's report, dated May 7, 1996, as well as the Standing Committee on Finance's report, dated September 17, 1996, which are referred to in Mr. Harris' statement of claim (see Rule 177 and Web Offset Publications v. Vickery et al. (1999), 43 O.R. (3d) 802 (C.A.), application for leave to appeal filed September 24, 1999, [1999]_S.C.C.A. No. 460).

[6] Ibid., p. 1-22. See also Statement of Claim, paras. 26 & 29(3).

[7] Third Report of the Standing Committee on Finance, "Taxable Canadian Property" (September 1996) online: < http://www.parl.gc.ca/committees352/fine/reports/03_1996-09/fine-03-appb-e.html > (last modified: September 23, 1996). See also Statement of Claim, para. 25.

[8]Statement of Claim, para. 29(e).

[9]Subsection 107(5) of the Act generally triggers a deemed disposition of property where a trust distributes property to a non-resident taxpayer, except where the property is taxable Canadian property.

[10]Statement of Claim, para. 7.

[11] Ibid.

[12] Ibid., para. 16.

[13] Ibid., para. 43(c).

[14][1997] F.C.J. No. 1826 (Prothon.) at para. 31.

[15][1992] 1 S.C.R. 236.

[16][1992] 2 F.C. 392 (T.D.) at 410.

[17] Ibid.

[18] Ibid.

[19] Ibid., p. 411.

[20] Ibid., p. 413.

[21] Ibid., p. 414.

[22] Ibid., p. 410.

[23] Ibid., p. 414.

[24][1990] 2 S.C.R. 959.

[25] Ibid., p. 980.

[26][1985] 1 S.C.R. 441.

[27] Ibid., p. 486-487.

[28] Report of the Auditor General of Canada to the House of Commons (May 1996), supra at 1-15. See Statement of Claim, para. 11.

[29] Ibid., p. 1-16.

[30] Ibid. See Statement of Claim, para. 29.

[31] Ibid., p. 1-21.

[32][1990] 1 F.C. 288 (T.D.).

[33] Ibid., pp. 294-296 (emphasis added).

[34][1981] 2 All E.R. 93 (H.L.).

[35] Ibid., pp. 98-99.

Digitized by Google

[36]However, I note that in Longley v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue) (1992), 66 B.C.L.R. (2d) 238 (C.A.), counsel for the Attorney General submitted that "a declaration related to the interpretation and application of s. 127 [of the Income Tax Act] is within the jurisdiction of the Federal Court under s. 18 of the Federal Court Act" (at p. 243).

[37]Statement of Claim, para. 33.

[38] Ibid., para. 13.

[39] Ibid., para. 29.

[40] Ibid., para. 33.

[41] Ibid., para. 43(c).

[42] Karavos v. The City of Toronto et al., [1948] O.W.N. 17 (C.A.) at p. 18.

[43][1959] S.C.R. 121.

[44] Ibid., pp. 140-141, cited approvingly in Longley v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue), [1999]_B.C.J. No. 1705 (B.C.S.C.) at paras. 82-83.

[45] Federation of Self-Employed, supra at 98.

[46] Ibid., p. 101.

[47] Ibid., p. 111.

[48] Ludmer et al. v. The Queen, 95 DTC 5311 (F.C.A.).

[49] Ibid., p. 5317.

[50] Ibid.

[51] Galway, supra at 602.

[52][1980] CTC 318 (F.C.A).

[53] Ibid., p. 319.

[54] Longley, supra at p. 243.

[55] Ibid.

[56] Nova Ban, supra at 291.

[57] Operation Dismantle, supra at 455.

[58] The original notice of motion stated that "the Statement of Claim discloses no reasonable cause of action" and that the "Statement of Claim is prejudicial and embarrassing and is an abuse of the process of the Court." The notice of appeal states that "the appellant asks that [...]_the Statement of Claim be struck out pursuant to Rule 221 of the Federal Court Rules, 1998, with costs to the Appellants."

[59][1984] 2 S.C.R. 335.

[60] Ibid., p. 385. See also Lac Minerals v. International Corona Resources, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, per La Forest J. (dissenting).

[61] Rothmans of Pall Mall, supra at 510.

[62][1982]_1 All E.R. 128 (H.L.).

[63] Ibid., p. 165.

[64] [1925] A.C. 578 (H.L.).

[65] Ibid., pp. 595-596.

[66] Federation of Self-Employed, supra at 99.

[67] Ibid., p. 112.

[68][1976] 2 F.C. 500 (C.A.).

[69][1975] 1 S.C.R. 138.

[70][1976] 2 S.C.R. 265.

[71][1981] 2 S.C.R. 575.

[72][1986] 2 S.C.R. 607.

[73][1992] 1 S.C.R. 236.

[74] Borowski, supra at 598.

[75] Canadian Council of Churches, supra at p. 252 ("The principles for granting public standing set forth by this Court need not and should not be expanded").

Digitized by Google

[76] Finlay, supra at 630.
[77] Ibid., pp. 630-631.
[78] Ibid., p. 510 (emphasis added).
[79][1993] 2 F.C. 26 (C.A.).
[80] Ibid., p. 39.
[81] Federation of Self-Employed, supra at 99.
[82] Ibid.
[83] Ibid., p. 101.
[84] Ibid., p. 107.
[85] Federation of Self-Employed, supra at 114.
[86] Finlay, supra at 632.
[87] Ludmer, supra at 5317.
[88] Finlay, supra at 633.
[89]Statement of Claim, para. 13.
[90][1990] 46 Admin. L.R. 74 (B.C.S.C.).
[91][1991] N.W.T.J. No. 40 (N.W.T.S.C.).
[92][1999] 2 F.C. 211 (T.D.).
[93]S.C. 1992, c. 37.
[94] Ibid., p. 114 ("[...] discovery can safely be left to the discretion of the court guided by the law as I believe it to be.")

Her Majesty The Queen and The Minister Of National Revenue v. George William Harris, 2001 FCA 74, The Final Resolution

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

SHARLOW J.A.

The Crown is appealing the order of a Case Management Judge that requires it to make limited disclosure of the identity of a taxpayer who obtained a certain advance income tax ruling in 1991.

The question arises in the context of an action commenced by the respondent George William Harris in 1996. Mr. Harris seeks a number of declarations based on allegations that the ruling is incorrect in law and that the Minister, in giving the ruling, bestowed an undue preference and special benefit on the taxpayer who received it. The statement of claim also alleges "a reasonable apprehension of bad faith administration and an ulterior motive on the part of the Crown in the circumstances of this case".

The Crown argues in its defence that the 1991 ruling is correct in law and that there was nothing improper or unlawful about the issuance of the ruling.

There is no allegation of wrongdoing on the part of the taxpayer.

The affidavit of documents filed on behalf of the Crown lists a number of documents in Schedule "2" as documents for which privilege was claimed on the basis of section 241 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, C. 1 (5th supp), and section 37 of the Canada Evidence Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-5.

The Crown sought directions from the Case Management Judge under Rule 54 as to the validity of its claims of privilege with respect to these documents.

The Case Management Judge directed that the Crown's privilege claims could not stand and ordered the disclosure of the documents listed in Schedule "2" of its affidavit of documents, including any information that would disclose the identity of the taxpayer, subject to editing to remove irrelevant details. However, she directed that the disclosure be limited under Rules 151 and 152 to taxpayer's counsel and any other lawyers working on the case.

Digitized by Google

The Crown appeals these directions.

At the hearing of the appeal, counsel for the Crown conceded its obligation to disclose the documents in Schedule "2" of its affidavit of document. However, the Crown maintains that the documents should first be edited so that they do not reveal the identity of the taxpayer. The Crown's proposal is to edit the documents by blanking out names and other information that could lead a knowledgeable reader to discern the identity of the taxpayer, and replacing the blanked out words with generic descriptions that will be explicit enough to permit counsel for Mr. Harris to conduct a meaningful examination for discovery.
It is not clear whether the documents as so edited are intended to continue to be treated as confidential under Rule 151 and Rule 152. This is a matter to be determined by the case management judge who made the original order.
As a result of this concession on the part of the Crown, this appeal now relates only to the question of the disclosure of the identity of the taxpayer.
Counsel for the Crown also indicated at the hearing of this appeal that the taxpayer involved had consented, under subsection 241(5) of the Income Tax Act, to the disclosure of the documents in unedited form to the Case Management Judge or the Trial Judge. That consent is intended to permit a review of the editing process to ensure that it is done appropriately, and to facilitate the Crown's application under section 37 of the Canada Evidence Act.

The issues to be addressed may be summarized as follows:
1. Was the Case Management Judge correct in concluding that the action of Mr. Harris is a legal proceeding within the scope of paragraph 241(3)(b) of the Income Tax Act, so that subsections 241(1) and (2) do not preclude the Minister from disclosing the identity of the taxpayer?
2. Was the Case Management Judge correct in concluding that section 37 of the Evidence Act does not apply?
3. Was the Case Management Judge correct to order disclosure of the taxpayer's identity?

Section 241 of the Income Tax Act
Section 241 of the Income Tax Act provides as follows:

241(1) Except as authorized by this section, no official shall	241(1) Sauf autorisation prévue au présent article, il est interdit à un fonctionnaire:
(a) knowingly provide, or knowingly allow to be provided, to any person any taxpayer information;	a) de fournir sciemment à quiconque unb) de permettre sciemment à quiconque renseignement confidentiel ou d'end'avoir accès à un renseignement permettre ciemmen la prestation;(b) confidentiel;
knowingly allow any person to have access to any taxpayer information; or
(c) knowingly use any taxpayer information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan,	c) d'utiliser sciemment un renseignement confidentiel en dehors du cadre de l'application ou de l'exécution de la présente loi, du Régime de pensions du

Digitized by Google

Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act or for purpose for which it was provided under this section.

(2) Notwithstanding any other Act of Parliament or other law, no official shall be required, in connection with any legal proceedings, to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information.

(3) Subsections 241(1) and 241(2) do not apply in respect of

(a) criminal proceedings, either by indictment or on summary conviction, that have been commenced by the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, under an Act of Parliament; or

(b) any legal proceedings relating to the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act or any other Act of Parliament or law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty.

Canada, de la Loi sur l'assurance-chômage ou de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi, ou à une autre fin que celle pour laquelle il a été fourni en application du présent article.

(2) Malgré toute autre loi ou règle de droit, nul fonctionnaire ne peut être requis, dans le cadre d'une procédure judiciaire, de témoigner, ou de produire quoi que ce soit, relativement à un renseignement confidentiel.

(3) Les paragraphes (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent:

a) ni aux poursuites criminelles, sur déclaration de culpabilité par procédure sommaire ou sur acte d'accusation, engagées par le dépôt d'une dénonciation ou d'un acte d'accusation, en vertu d'une loi fédérale;

b) ni aux procédures judiciaires ayant trait à l'application ou à l'exécution de la présente loi, du Régime de pensions du Canada, de la Loi sur l'assurance-chômage ou de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi ou de toute autre loi fédérale ou provinciale qui prévoit l'imposition ou la perception d'un impôt, d'une taxe ou d'un droit.

The identity of the taxpayer that obtained the 1991 ruling is clearly "taxpayer information" within the meaning of section 241 of the Income Tax Act. The question is whether the action commenced by Mr. Harris is a legal proceeding "relating to the administration or enforcement" of the Income Tax Act.

As explained above, the subject matter of the action is an advance income tax ruling. The Minister issued that ruling as part of the administration of the Income Tax Act. Mr. Harris commenced this proceeding to establish that the issuance of that ruling was not a proper administrative act. In that sense this proceeding "relates to" the administration of the Income Tax Act. Therefore, the words of paragraph 241(3)(b) are broad enough to cover this proceeding.

However, counsel for the Crown argues for a narrower interpretation of paragraph 241(3)(b). He argues that because the Minister is the only person who is authorized to administer and enforce the Income Tax Act, only a legal proceeding undertaken by or on behalf of the Minister for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act can be within the scope of paragraph 241(3)(b). The Minister is arguing, in essence, that a legal proceeding that seeks to uncover improper administration of the Income Tax Act cannot be said to be related to its administration. This argument seems to me illogical and I am unable to accept it.

I conclude that this proceeding is within the scope of paragraph 241(3)(b) of the Income Tax Act. It follows that the Case Management Judge was correct in determining that subsections

Digitized by Google

241(1) and (2) of the Income Tax Act do not preclude the Minister from disclosing the identity of the taxpayer.

Section 37 of the Evidence Act

Section 37 of the Evidence Act permits the Crown to resist disclosure of information in a legal proceeding on the basis of a judicial determination that there is a specified public interest that outweighs the public interest in the disclosure of the information. Subsections 37(1) and (2) read as follows:

37(1) A minister of the Crown in right of Canada or other person interested may object to the disclosure of information before a court, person or body with jurisdiction to compel the production of information by certifying orally or in writing to the court, person or body that the information should not be disclosed on the grounds of a specified public interest.

37 (1) Un ministre fédéral ou toute autre personne intéressée peut s'opposer à la divulgation de renseignements devant un tribunal, un organisme ou une personne ayant le pouvoir de contraindre à la production de renseignements, en attestant verbalement ou par écrit devant eux que ces renseignements ne devraient pas être divulgués pour des raisons d'intérêt public déterminées.

(2) Subject to sections 38 and 39, where an objection to the disclosure of information is made under subsection (1) before a superior court, that court may examine or hear the information and order its disclosure, subject to such restrictions or conditions as it deems appropriate, if it concludes that, in the circumstances of the case, the public interest in disclosure outweighs in importance the specified public interest.

(2) Sous réserve des articles 38 et 39, dans les cas où l'opposition visée au paragraphe (1) est portée devant une cour supérieure, celle-ci peut prendre connaissance des renseignements et ordonner leur divulgation, sous réserve des restrictions ou conditions qu'elle estime indiquées, si elle conclut qu'en l'espèce, les raisons d'intérêt public qui justifient la divulgation l'emportent sur les raisons d'intérêt public invoquées lors de l'attestation.

In this case the Crown invoked subsection 37(1) of the Evidence Act on the basis of the certificate of the current Director General of the Income Tax Rulings Directorate in the Policy and Legislation Branch of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the entity that is now responsible for income tax administration. That certificate describes the harm that the Director General believes would result from disclosure of the documents referred to in Schedule "2" of the Crown's affidavit of documents. The certificate does not specifically address the question of whether there is a specified public interest in preventing the disclosure of the identity of taxpayer, which is the only information the Crown still seeks to protect.

It appears that the Case Management Judge did not embark on the enquiry mandated by subsection 37(2) of the Evidence Act. Rather, she seems to have considered section 37 to be inoperative because of her conclusion that disclosure was not precluded by subsections 241(1) or (2) of the Income Tax Act. She said, at paragraph 38 of the reasons:

Digitized by Google

The exception provided in section 241(3)(b) [of the Income Tax Act], to the general bar against disclosure of taxpayer information, overrides the public interest immunity which is claimed here. In my opinion, the public interest lies in determining whether the Minister discharged his statutory duty in applying the [Income Tax] Act.

In this case, the disclosure of the information sought by Mr. Harris is required by the Federal Court Rules, 1998, subject only to any applicable claim of privilege. In my view, the Crown must be permitted to assert a claim of public interest immunity with respect to taxpayer information independently of its nondisclosure obligations in section 241 of the Income Tax Act.

I conclude that the Case Management Judge erred in relying on section 241 of the Income Tax Act as a basis for determining the scope of the public interest immunity claim made by the Crown in this case. She ought to have considered specifically whether the public interest in disclosure outweighed the specified public interest asserted by the Crown in the certificate. Having failed to do so, she was in no position to conclude that the documents were not protected from disclosure on the basis of public interest immunity.

The appropriate remedy is to refer the Crown's section 37 application back to the Case Management Judge for reconsideration. In light of the Crown's concessions as described above, the claim of privilege must now be considered to relate only to the taxpayer's identity. It may be appropriate for the Crown to submit a new certificate, and it should be at liberty to do so.

Order for disclosure of taxpayer identity

It cannot be determined from the pleadings whether the identity of the taxpayer who obtained the 1991 ruling is relevant to any of the allegations in the statement of claim. Nor does the record disclose any evidence on that point. The absence of such evidence may be explained by the unusual procedure followed in this case. It appears that the directions sought by the Crown preceded the commencement of examinations for discovery, so there are no unanswered questions that could give rise to a motion under Rule 242. Nor has Mr. Harris moved for disclosure under Rule 229.

The result in any event is that the Case Management Judge had before her no evidence from which it could be determined whether the identity of the taxpayer is relevant to the allegations in the statement of claim. In the absence of such evidence, the Case Management Judge erred in ordering the disclosure of the identity of the taxpayer.

Conclusion

On the basis of the foregoing reasons, I would allow this appeal in part.

The direction for disclosure of the taxpayer's identity should be vacated, without prejudice to the right of Mr. Harris to make an application for disclosure under Rule 229 or 242 as appropriate.

The direction that the documents are not immune from disclosure under section 37 of the Canada Evidence Act should be vacated and the Crown's section 37 application should be referred back to the Case Management Judge for a redetermination that is independent of section 241 of the Income Tax Act. Given the Crown's new position on the disclosure of edited documents, the Crown should be entitled to present a new certificate dealing with the issue of the disclosure of the taxpayer's identity.

Karen R. Sharlow

J.A.

Digitized by Google

"I agree
J. Richard C.J."
"I agree
B.L. Strayer J.A."

Maxine Collins v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2011 FCA 140, A CRA Employee with a s. 241 Breach, on Her Own Information

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
DAWSON J.A.

[1] The appellant, R. Maxine Collins, appeals from a decision of a Judge of the Federal Court striking out, with costs, the amended statement of claim filed by Ms Collins. The Judge's order was silent as to whether the pleading was struck out with or without leave to amend. The reasons in support of the Judge's order are cited as 2010 FC 254, 366 F.T.R. 40.

[2] Paragraph 1(a) of the amended statement of claim set out Ms Collins' claim for general damages against the Crown on account of:

i. misfeasance in public office;
ii. negligence in deliberately failing to enforce statutory provisions; and
iii. violation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Charter).

[3] The main issue to be determined on this appeal is whether the Judge erred in striking out the amended statement of claim.

The Nature of Ms Collins' Claim

[4] Ms Collins' claim arises from her assertion that while she was employed by the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA), her co-workers violated subsection 241(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (Act) by improperly looking at her personal income tax information. Although subsection 239(2.2) of the Act makes contravention of subsection 241(1) an offence, Ms Collins asserts that, aside from firing one employee, the CRA failed to provide any effective redress to her. The two subsections of the Act referred to by Ms Collins state as follows:

239. (2.2) Every person who (a) contravenes subsection 241(1), or (b) knowingly contravenes an order made under subsection 241(4.1) is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, or to both.	239. (2.2) Commet une infraction et encourt, sur déclaration de culpabilité par procédure sommaire, une amende maximale de 5 000 $ et un emprisonnement maximal de 12 mois, ou l'une de ces peines, toute personne : a) soit qui contrevient au paragraphe 241(1); b) soit qui, sciemment, contrevient à une ordonnance rendue en application du paragraphe 241(4.1).
[...]	. . .

Digitized by Google

241. (1) Except as authorized by this section, no official or other representative of a government entity shall	241. (1) Sauf autorisation prévue au présent article, il est interdit à un fonctionnaire ou autre représentant d'une entité gouvernementale :
(a) knowingly provide, or knowingly allow to be provided, to any person any taxpayer information;	a) de fournir sciemment à quiconque un renseignement confidentiel ou d'en permettre sciemment la prestation;
(b) knowingly allow any person to have access to any taxpayer information; or	b) de permettre sciemment à quiconque d'avoir accès à un renseignement confidentiel;
(c) knowingly use any taxpayer information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act or for the purpose for which it was provided under this section.	c) d'utiliser sciemment un renseignement confidentiel en dehors du cadre de l'application ou de l'exécution de la présente loi, du Régime de pensions du Canada, de la Loi sur l'assurance-chômage ou de la Loi sur l'assurance-emploi, ou à une autre fin que celle pour laquelle il a été fourni en application du présent article.

[5] Ms Collins alleges that the CRA has made a planned and deliberate policy decision not to enforce subsection 239(2.2) of the Act. Ms Collins further asserts that she wanted the CRA to tell its employees "that what they were doing was not only morally and ethically wrong, but also a criminal offence for which they could be prosecuted" (emphasis deleted). However, it did not, and after she requested that the CRA investigate the unauthorized access to her personal tax records CRA employees retaliated against her in a manner that created a toxic work environment. Subsequent requests for assistance from the Public Service Human Resources Management Agency of Canada, the Public Service Integrity Commissioner and the RCMP, an attempted complaint under the Canada Labour Code, and requests for access under the Privacy Act and the Access to Information Act did not result in any assistance being provided to Ms Collins.

The Issues

[6] On this appeal Ms Collins raises a number of arguments, including her assertions that the Judge ignored misconduct by counsel for the respondent, restricted oral argument and showed "a blatant bias" against her in her reasons. In my view, the issues to be decided on this appeal are:

i. Has the appellant made out her allegations of bias against the Judge?
ii. If not, what is the standard of review to be applied by this Court to the Judge's decision to strike out the amended statement of claim?
iii. Did the Judge err by striking out the amended statement of claim?
iv. Should the appellant be given leave to re-amend the amended statement of claim?

Consideration of the Issues

i. Have the allegations of bias been made out?

Digitized by Google

[7] As we explained in our reasons dismissing Ms Collins' three motions that asked the members of the panel hearing this appeal to recuse themselves on account of real or apprehended bias, there is a strong presumption that judges will administer justice impartially. This presumption is not easily rebutted and "convincing evidence" is required to prove an allegation of reasonable apprehension of bias (R. v. R.D.S., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 484 at paragraph 32).

[8] Ms Collins acknowledges that she cannot substantiate any allegation of bias arising from the conduct of the hearing before the Judge. This is because she alleges a conspiracy involving the court reporter and others that resulted in a falsified and fabricated transcript.

[9] Turning to her other allegations of bias, there is no merit in Ms Collins' submission that the Judge acted improperly in accepting the Crown's re-amended motion to strike the claim. Justice Campbell allowed Ms Collins to amend her claim so as to withdraw those portions of the claim that related to a proposed class action and he stated that this amendment was without prejudice to the Crown's right to pursue its pending motion to strike the claim in its entirety. The Crown's motion to strike had been filed, but not served (see page 94 of the appeal book). Nothing in Justice Campbell's comments could, or did, prohibit the Crown from amending its motion record in order to advance further grounds for striking the pleading.

[10] Finally, many of Ms Collins' imputations of bias stem from the Judge's interpretation of the amended statement of claim. Ms Collins says that the Judge did not construe the claim as Ms Collins intended. From this, Ms Collins infers that the Judge was biased. However, during the hearing of this appeal we advised Ms Collins that it was not clear to us that the amended statement of claim can fairly be construed as Ms Collins submits. Ms Collins acknowledged both that she was "not an artful pleader" and that the statement of claim "was not perfect". The fact that the Judge interpreted the allegations in the amended claim in a different manner from Ms Collins' intended interpretation is not evidence of bias.

[11] In my view, the Judge's reasons demonstrate a careful and thorough review of a long (123 paragraphs) and difficult pleading. Nothing in the Judge's reasons supports any reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the Judge. No convincing evidence of real or apprehended bias has been provided by Ms Collins.

ii. The Standard of Review to be Applied to the Judge's Decision

[12] In Apotex Inc. v. Canada (Governor in Council), 2007 FCA 374, 370 N.R. 336 this Court considered the test to be applied when reviewing a decision of a judge on a motion to strike a pleading. At paragraph 15 the test was described as follows:

> The respondents correctly point out that the decision to grant or refuse a motion to strike is a discretionary one. When the lower court judge has made a discretionary decision, it will usually be afforded deference by the appellate court. However, the latter will be entitled to substitute the lower court judge's discretion for its own if the appellate court clearly determines that the lower court judge has given insufficient weight to relevant factors or proceeded on a wrong principle of law: Elders Grain Co. v. Ralph Misener (The), [2005] F.C.J. No. 612, 2005 FCA 139 at paragraph 13. This Court may also overturn a discretionary decision of a lower court where it is satisfied that the judge has seriously misapprehended the facts, or where an obvious injustice would otherwise result: Mayne Pharma (Canada) Inc. v. Aventis Pharma Inc., [2005] F.C.J. No. 215, 2005 FCA 50, 38 C.P.R. (4th) 1 at paragraph 9. [emphasis added]

Digitized by Google

[13] The burden is on Ms Collins to demonstrate an error that justifies this Court's interference with the order under appeal (j2 Global Communications, Inc. v. Protus IP Solutions Inc., 2009 FCA 41, 387 N.R. 135 at paragraphs 4-5).

iii. Did the Judge err in striking out the amended statement of claim?

[14] As set out above, the amended statement of claim sought damages on account of:

a. misfeasance in public office;
b. negligence in deliberately failing to enforce statutory provisions; and
c. Charter violations.

Each cause of action will be considered in turn.

a. Misfeasance in public office

[15] The Judge understood the amended statement of claim to base the claim of misfeasance upon the failure of the CRA and the RCMP to lay charges and prosecute offences under subsection 239(2.2) of the Act. The Judge correctly found that law enforcement officers and prosecutors possess discretion as to the laying of charges and their prosecution, so that a failure to lay charges cannot be an unlawful act as required in order to establish the tort of misfeasance in public office.

[16] Ms Collins does not take issue with that analysis. Rather, she states that the amended statement of claim does not base the claim of misfeasance in public office upon any failure to enforce the statutory provision.

[17] However, paragraphs 4, 29, 36, 37, 42 and 43 of the amended statement of claim allege that:

> 4. In written policy consistent with statements on the Canada Revenue Agency [CRA] website, the CRA has made a planned and deliberate decision not to enforce subsection 239(2.2) of the ITA by characterizing unauthorized access as unlawful, i.e., not authorized by law, rather than illegal, i.e., expressly forbidden by statute, or an offence liable to a fine or imprisonment.
>
> [...]
>
> 29. The Plaintiff's experience in laying information and making a complaint pursuant to subsection 244(1) of the ITA is that the RCMP acts in concurrence with the CRA with respect to the non-enforcement of subsection 239(2.2) of the ITA.
>
> [...]
>
> 36. The failure on the part of the CRA to call a spade a spade with respect to offences committed by CRA employees, indicates the clear priority of protecting the employees of the CRA in order to protect the reputation of the CRA even at the expense of failing to adequately protect the confidentiality of taxpayer information.
>
> 37. The Plaintiff states that the CRA owes Canadian taxpayers a statutory duty to ensure the protection of personal information from unauthorized disclosure to CRA employees, and through these individuals to the general public; and, the CRA is deliberately negligent in performing this duty through failing to enforce provisions enacted for the purpose.

Digitized by Google

[…]

42. The Plaintiff has in her possession documents supporting the involvement of many federal government entities, including documents which confirm the agreement of the RCMP with the policy of the CRA with respect to the plan not to enforce subsection 239(2.2) of the ITA.

43. The Plaintiff asserts that the aforesaid deliberate conduct of the CRA and the federal government in denying taxpayers, and the Plaintiff in particular, the protection of statutory law, case law, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms constitutes misfeasance in public office, negligent statutory administration, abuse of power, and disregard for the principles of fundamental justice under the rule of law which has resulted in loss and damage to the Plaintiff.

[18] In my view, the Judge's interpretation of the claim as framed by Ms Collins was reasonable, and her analysis of that claim was appropriate. Ms Collins has not demonstrated that in striking the pleading relating to misfeasance in public office the Judge seriously misapprehended the pleadings, proceeded on a wrong principle of law or otherwise erred so as to warrant intervention by this Court.

b. Negligence in the enforcement of a statutory provision

[19] Ms. Collins argues that:

46. It is under the negligence cause of action that the claim reaches out beyond the CRA to those other federal government entities who were made aware of violations of section 241 of the Income Tax Act and did nothing to protect taxpayer information choosing instead to act to protect the CRA.

47. This cause of action is not based on a statutory duty to enforce subsection 239(2.2) of the Income Tax Act, but rather on the necessity of enforcing this provision in order to meet the requirements of a statutory private law duty of care to protect taxpayer information. This is clearly established in paragraphs [5] and [6] of the Amended Statement of Claim.

[…]

52. The Appellant specifically established the statutory law duty of care in paragraphs [10] and [12] of the Amended Statement of Claim.

53. Throughout the Amended Statement of Claim, the Appellant pleaded that subsection 239(2.2) of the Income Tax Act, being a criminal offence provision, was enacted for the purpose of deterring unauthorized access to taxpayer information.

Digitized by Google

[20] Paragraphs 5, 6, 10 and 12 of the amended statement of claim referred to in argument by Ms Collins allege the following:

> 5. In the Plaintiff's experience, employees of the CRA are not advised by the CRA, either verbally or through written policy, that violations of subsection 241(1) of the ITA constitute an offence pursuant to subsection 239(2.2) of the ITA.
>
> 6. This policy deprives Canadian taxpayers of the protection of section 241 which has been interpreted by the Federal Court of Appeal [Diversified Holdings Ltd. v. Canada, [1991] 1 C.T.C. 118] as being for the protection of taxpayers.
>
> [...]
>
> 10. The CRA is required, under the provisions of the Privacy Act, to keep a record of all authorized and unauthorized uses of a taxpayer's personal information.
>
> [...]
>
> 12. The Federal Court of Appeal found the legislative intent of section 241 to be for the protection of the confidentiality of information given to the Minister for the purposes of the ITA. The Federal Court of Appeal further found privilege to be established in favour of the taxpayer who gives information to Revenue Canada on the understanding such information will remain confidential.

[21] Relying upon the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Canada v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205, the Judge found the failure to follow a statutory provision does not by itself constitute negligence. The Judge also found that no positive common law duty lies upon the Crown to bring forth charges and prosecute under subsection 239(2.2) of the Act.

[22] Ms Collins has not demonstrated any error in the Judge's analysis. No common law or private duty of care arises from the facts as pleaded in the amended statement of claim. It follows from this failure that the amended statement of claim does not plead any proper cause of action in negligence. That portion of the pleading relating to alleged negligence was properly struck.

c. Charter violations

[23] As the Judge correctly noted, the amended statement of claim neither identified which rights were said to be violated nor pled material facts that might support such a claim. On this appeal, Ms Collins argues as follows with respect to this aspect of the claim:

> 59. Do civil servants, or Ministers of the federal government, have the authority to create and implement a policy which enforces section 239 of the Income Tax Act against taxpayers but does not enforce section 239 against federal government employees?

Digitized by Google

60. The Amended Statement of Claim pleads “they” do not possess the requisite authority due to the operation of the rule of law enshrined in the Constitution.

61. Is the undisputed policy of never enforcing subsection 239(2.2) of the Income Tax Act, an issue which comes within the tests established in Anns as referenced in paragraph [20] of the Amended Amended Written Representations of the Responding Party?

[…]

66. The Respondent has a statutory private law duty of care to protect taxpayer information. The Respondent was negligent in exercising this duty of care in that a powerful tool provided by Parliament went unused and ignored.

67. The failure to use this powerful tool against government employees while regularly filing criminal offence charges against taxpayers, violates the rule of law. A policy that violates the rule of law is a policy made in bad faith and under the influence of extraneous considerations.

[…]

71. The Appellant is not claiming damages pursuant to subsection 24(1) of the Charter.

[…]

73. The Appellant established a prima facie private law duty of care under section 241 of the Income Tax Act and also through reference to the statutory duty to keep records of all access to taxpayer information as provided under the relevant provisions of the Privacy Act.

[24] In my view, these paragraphs fail for the same reasons the claim in negligence failed. The submission that any failure to follow the law is actionable is contrary to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Canada in cases such as Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, cited above, and Holland v. Saskatchewan, 2008 SCC 42, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 551.

iv. Should Ms Collins be given leave to re-amend the amended statement of claim?

[25] As noted above, the Judge’s order did not specify whether the claim was struck out with or without leave to amend. Rule 221 of the Federal Courts Rules requires consideration of this issue.

[26] In order to strike a pleading without leave to amend, any defect in the pleading must be one that cannot be cured by amendment. See Simon v. Canada, 2011 FCA 6, 410 N.R. 374 at paragraph 8. In my view, the claim in negligence and the claim based upon violation of the Charter cannot be cured by amendment. However, I believe the claim based upon misfeasance in public office can be cured.

[27] The elements of the cause of action of misfeasance in public office are:

Digitized by Google

1. A public officer must engage in deliberate and unlawful conduct in his or her capacity as a public officer.
2. The public officer must have been aware that his or her conduct was both unlawful and likely to harm the plaintiff. This requirement establishes a required nexus between the parties. There must be a conscious disregard for the interests of those who will be affected by the misconduct in question.

[28] Insofar as the nature of the misconduct is concerned, the essential question is whether the alleged misconduct is deliberate and unlawful. A plaintiff must also show damage which was caused by the alleged misconduct and that the damage was of sufficient magnitude to warrant compensation. See Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263 at paragraph 22 and following.

[29] Turning to the current pleading, the amended statement of claim alleges the following:

a. Paragraph 241(1)(c) of the Act prohibits an official from knowingly using any taxpayer's information otherwise than in the course of the administration or enforcement of the Act.
b. The plaintiff worked at the CRA from November 2005 to November 2007.
c. Two employees of the CRA accessed the plaintiff's personal income tax account and this access was unauthorized.
d. Following an investigation by the CRA that found unauthorized access, co-workers made remarks to the plaintiff based on personal knowledge of her personal income tax returns.
e. The plaintiff suffered retaliation and public embarrassment.
f. As a result of the breach of privacy, the plaintiff sought professional help and suffered from depression, thoughts of suicide and anxiety attacks. As well, she had to resign from what was a toxic workplace, thus suffering financial hardship.

[30] I conclude that with appropriate amendments a cause of action could properly be pleaded alleging the Crown to be vicariously liable for the misfeasance of officials who improperly accessed and disseminated confidential information concerning Ms Collins. It follows that I would clarify the Judge's order by specifying that Ms Collins is given leave to re-amend her pleading so as to allege the tort of misfeasance in public office. No leave would be given to amend any other cause of action.

[31] It may well be helpful to remind Ms Collins that any further pleading must comply with all of the rules of the Federal Court governing pleadings. Any failure to comply with those rules could result in the re-amended pleading being struck out.

[32] To illustrate, the amended statement of claim pleads evidence extensively and does not contain a concise statement of the material facts as is required by Rule 174. Further, while a party may raise any point of law in a pleading (Rule 175), a statement of claim cannot consist of legal argument.

[33] The requirement that a pleading contain a concise statement of the material facts relied upon is a technical requirement with a precise meaning at law. Each constituent element of the cause of action must be pled with sufficient particularity. What is required when pleading the tort of misfeasance in public office was discussed by this Court in Merchant Law Group v. Canada (Revenue Agency), 2010 FCA 184, 405 N.R. 160 at paragraph 29 and following. A narrative of what happened is unlikely to meet the requirements of the Federal Courts Rules. Ms Collins would be well advised to seek legal advice with respect to the elements that must be contained in any re-amended pleading she may wish to file.

Digitized by Google

Conclusion

[34] For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal, but I would clarify the order appealed from to specify that Ms Collins is given leave to re-amend the amended statement of claim to allege the tort of misfeasance in public office.

[35] I would award the costs of this appeal in the cause.

"Eleanor R. Dawson"

J.A.

"I agree
John M. Evans J.A."

"I agree
Johanne Trudel J.A."

Circumstances involving danger – 241(3.1)

(3.1) The Minister may provide to appropriate persons any taxpayer information relating to imminent danger of death or physical injury to any individual.

Registered charities – 241(3.2)

Digitized by Google

(3.2) An official may provide to any person the following taxpayer information relating to another person that was at any time a registered charity (in this subsection referred to as the "charity"):

a copy of the charity's governing documents, including its statement of purpose;

any information provided in prescribed form to the Minister by the charity on applying for registration under this Act;

the names of the persons who at any time were the charity's directors and the periods during which they were its directors;

a copy of the notification of the charity's registration, including any conditions and warnings;

if the registration of the charity has been revoked or annulled, a copy of the entirety of or any part of any letter sent by or on behalf of the Minister to the charity relating to the grounds for the revocation or annulment;

financial statements required to be filed with an information return referred to in subsection 149.1(14);

a copy of the entirety of or any part of any letter or notice by the Minister to the charity relating to a suspension under section 188.2 or an assessment of tax or penalty under this Act (other than the amount of a liability under subsection 188(1.1)); and an application by the charity, and information filed in support of the application, for a designation, determination or decision by the Minister under subsection 149.1(6.3), (7), (8) or (13).

Where taxpayer information may be disclosed – 241(4)

An official may

provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act, solely for that purpose;

provide to any person taxpayer information that can reasonably be regarded as necessary for the purposes of determining any tax, interest, penalty or other amount that is or may become payable by the person, or any refund or tax credit to which the person is or may become entitled, under this Act or any other amount that is relevant for the purposes of that determination;

provide to the person who seeks a certification referred to in paragraph 147.1(10)(a) the certification or a refusal to make the certification, solely for the purposes of administering a registered pension plan;

provide taxpayer information to an official of the Department of Finance solely for the purposes of the formulation or evaluation of fiscal policy, ) to an official solely for the purposes of the initial implementation of a fiscal policy or for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of an Act of Parliament that provides for the imposition and collection of a tax or duty, to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a law of a province that provides for the imposition or collection of a tax or duty, to an official of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the formulation or evaluation of fiscal policy,

Digitized by Google

to an official of the Department of Natural Resources or of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a program of the Government of Canada or of the province relating to the exploration for or exploitation of Canadian petroleum and gas resources, to an official of the government of a province that has received or is entitled to receive a payment referred to in this subparagraph, or to an official of the Department of Natural Resources, solely for the purposes of the provisions relating to payments to a province in respect of the taxable income of corporations earned in the offshore area with respect to the province under the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act, chapter 28 of the Statutes of Canada, 1988, the*Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act*, chapter 3 of the Statutes of Canada, 1987, or similar Acts relating to the exploration for or exploitation of offshore Canadian petroleum and gas resources,

(vi.1) to an official of the Department of Natural Resources solely for the purpose of determining whether property is prescribed energy conservation property or whether an outlay or expense is a Canadian renewable and conservation expense, ) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985 or a similar law of a province,

(vii.1) to an official solely for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Canada Education Savings Act or a designated provincial program as defined in subsection 146.1(1),

(vii.2) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of Part 1 of the Energy Costs Assistance Measures Act,

(vii.3) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Children's Special Allowances Act or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act,

(vii.4) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Universal Child Care Benefit Act or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act,

(vii.5) to an official solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of the Canada Disability Savings Act or a designated provincial program as defined in subsection 146.4(1), an official of the Department of Veterans Affairs solely for the purposes of the administration of the War Veterans Allowance Act, the*Canadian Forces Members and Veterans Re-establishment and Compensation Act* or Part XI of the Civilian War-related Benefits Act, to an official of a department or agency of the Government of Canada or of a province as to the name, address, occupation, size or type of business of a taxpayer, solely for the purposes of enabling that department or agency to obtain statistical data for research and analysis, to an official of the Canada Employment Insurance Commission, the Department of Human Resources and Skills Development or the Department of Social Development, solely for the purpose of the administration or enforcement of the Employment Insurance Act, an employment program of the Government of Canada or the evaluation or formation of policy for that Act or program, ) to an official of the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food or of the government of a province solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a program of the Government of Canada or of the province established under an agreement entered into under the Farm Income Protection Act, an official of the Department of Canadian Heritage or a member of the Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board solely for the purposes of administering sections 32 to 33.2 of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act.

Digitized by Google

an official solely for the purposes of setting off against any sum of money that may be due or payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada a debt due to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or Her Majesty in right of a province, or an official solely for the purposes of section 7.1 of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act; provide taxpayer information, or allow the inspection of or access to taxpayer information, as the case may be, under, and solely for the purposes of, subsection 36(2) or section 46 of the Access to Information Act, section 13 of the Auditor General Act, section 92 of the Canada Pension Plan, a warrant issued under subsection 21(3) of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, an order made under subsection 462.48(3) of the Criminal Code, section 26 of the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, section 79 of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, paragraph 33.11(a) of the Old Age Security Act, subsection 34(2) or section 45 of the Privacy Act, section 24 of the Statistics Act, section 9 of the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, or provision contained in a tax treaty with another country or in a comprehensive tax information exchange agreement between Canada and another country or jurisdiction that is in force and has effect; provide taxpayer information solely for the purposes of sections 23 to 25 of the Financial Administration Act;
(f.1) provide taxpayer information to an official for the purposes of the administration and enforcement of the Charities Registration (Security Information) Act, and where an official has so received taxpayer information, the official may provide that information to another official as permitted by subsection (9.1);
use taxpayer information to compile information in a form that does not directly or indirectly reveal the identity of the taxpayer to whom the information relates;
use, or provide to any person, taxpayer information solely for a purpose relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person by Her Majesty in right of Canada in respect of a period during which the authorized person was employed by or engaged by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada to assist in the administration or enforcement of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act, to the extent that the information is relevant for the purpose;

Digitized by Google

provide access to records of taxpayer information to the Librarian and Archivist of Canada or a person acting on behalf of or under the direction of the Librarian and Archivist, solely for the purposes of section 12 of the Library and Archives of Canada Act, and transfer such records to the care and control of such persons solely for the purposes of section 13 of that Act;

use taxpayer information relating to a taxpayer to provide information to the taxpayer;

(j.1) provide taxpayer information to an official or a designated person solely for the purpose of permitting the making of an adjustment to a social assistance payment made on the basis of a means, needs or income test, or ) a payment pursuant to a prescribed law of a province in respect of a child within the meaning of the prescribed law, where the purpose of the adjustment is to take into account the amount determined for C in subsection 122.61(1) in respect of a person for a taxation year;

provide, or allow inspection of or access to, taxpayer information to or by any person otherwise legally entitled to it under an Act of Parliament solely for the purposes for which that person is entitled to the information;

subject to subsection (9.2), provide to a representative of a government entity the business number of, the name of (including any trade name or other name used by), and any contact information, corporate information and registration information in respect of, the holder of a business number (other than an excluded individual), if the information is provided solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of an Act of Parliament or of a legislature of a province, or ) a by-law of a municipality in Canada or a law of an aboriginal government; provide taxpayer information to an official of the government of a province solely for use in the management or administration by that government of a program relating to payments under subsection 164(1.8);

provide taxpayer information to any person, solely for the purposes of the administration or enforcement of a law of a province that provides for workers' compensation benefits;

provide taxpayer information to any person solely for the purpose of enabling the Chief Statistician, within the meaning assigned by section 2 of the Statistics Act, to provide to a statistical agency of a province data concerning business activities carried on in the province, where the information is used by the agency solely for research and analysis and the agency is authorized under the law of the province to collect the same or similar information on its own behalf in respect of such activities;

provide taxpayer information to a police officer (within the meaning assigned by subsection 462.48(17) of the Criminal Code) solely for the purpose of investigating whether an offence has been committed under the Criminal Code, or the laying of an information or the preferring of an indictment, where such information can reasonably be regarded as being necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the circumstances in which an offence under the*Criminal Code* may have been committed, or the identity of the person or persons who may have committed an offence, with respect to an official, or with respect to any person related to that official,

Digitized by Google

) the official was or is engaged in the administration or enforcement of this Act, and the offence can reasonably be considered to be related to that administration or enforcement; or provide taxpayer information to an official of the government of a province solely for the use in the management or administration by that government of a program relating to earning supplementation or income support.
Measures to prevent unauthorized use or disclosure – 241(4.1) (4.1) The person who presides at a legal proceeding relating to the supervision, evaluation or discipline of an authorized person may order such measures as are necessary to ensure that taxpayer information is not used or provided to any person for any purpose not relating to that proceeding, including holding a hearing in camera; banning the publication of the information;
concealing the identity of the taxpayer to whom the information relates; and sealing the records of the proceeding. Disclosure to taxpayer or on consent – 241(5)
An official or other representative of a government entity may provide taxpayer information relating to a taxpayer to the taxpayer; and with the consent of the taxpayer, to any other person. Appeal from order or direction – 241(6)
An order or direction that is made in the course of or in connection with any legal proceedings and that requires an official, other representative of a government entity or authorized person to give or produce evidence relating to any taxpayer information may, by notice served on all interested parties, be appealed forthwith by the Minister or by the person against whom the order or direction is made to the court of appeal of the province in which the order or direction is made, in the case of an order or direction made by a court or other tribunal established by or pursuant to the laws of the province, whether or not that court or tribunal is exercising a jurisdiction conferred by the laws of Canada; or
the Federal Court of Appeal, in the case of an order or direction made by a court or other tribunal established by or pursuant to the laws of Canada.
Disposition of appeal – 241(7)
The court to which an appeal is taken pursuant to subsection 241(6) may allow the appeal and quash the order or direction appealed from or dismiss the appeal, and the rules of practice and procedure from time to time governing appeals to the courts shall apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to an appeal instituted pursuant to that subsection.
Stay of order or direction – 241(8)
An appeal instituted pursuant to subsection 241(6) shall stay the operation of the order or direction appealed from until judgment is pronounced.
Threats to security – 241(9)
An official may provide, to an official of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada,

Digitized by Google

publicly accessible charity information; designated taxpayer information, if there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to an investigation by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service of whether the activity of any person may constitute threats to the security of Canada, as defined in section 2 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, an investigation of whether an offence may have been committed under Part II.1 of the Criminal Code, or section 462.31 of the Criminal Code, if that investigation is related to an offence under Part II.1 of that Act, or the prosecution of an offence referred to in subparagraph (ii); and information setting out the reasonable grounds referred to in paragraph (b), to the extent that any such grounds rely on information referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).
Threats to security – 241(9.1)
(9.1) Information — other than designated donor information — provided to an official of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as permitted by paragraph (4)(f.1), may be used by such an official, or communicated by such an official to another official of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for use by that other official, for the purpose of investigating whether an offence may have been committed, ascertaining the identity of a person or persons who may have committed an offence, or prosecuting an offence, which offence is described in Part II.1 of the Criminal Code, or ) described in section 462.31 of the Criminal Code, if that investigation, ascertainment or prosecution is related to an investigation, ascertainment or prosecution in respect of an offence described in Part II.1 of that Act; or investigating whether the activities of any person may constitute threats to the security of Canada, as defined in section 2 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act.
Restrictions on information sharing – 241(9.2)
(9.2) No information may be provided to a representative of a government entity under paragraph (4)(l) in connection with a program, activity or service provided or undertaken by the government entity unless the government entity uses the business number as an identifier in connection with the program, activity or service.
Public disclosure – 241(9.3)
(9.3) The Minister may, in connection with a program, activity or service provided or undertaken by the Minister, make available to the public the business number of, and the name of (including any trade name or other name used by), the holder of a business number (other than an excluded individual).
Public disclosure by representative of government entity – 241(9.4) (9.4) A representative of a government entity may, in connection with a program, activity or service provided or undertaken by the government entity, make available to the public the business number of, and the name of (including any trade name or other name used by), the holder of a business number (other than an excluded individual), if

Digitized by Google

a representative of the government entity was provided with that information pursuant to paragraph (4)(l); and the government entity uses the business number as an identifier in connection with the program, activity or service.
Definitions – 241(10)
) In this section "aboriginal government" « gouvernement autochtone »
"aboriginal government" means an aboriginal government as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act;

"authorized person"
« personne autorisée »
"authorized person" means a person who is engaged or employed, or who was formerly engaged or employed, by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada to assist in carrying out the provisions of this Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act or the Employment Insurance Act;
"business number"[Repealed, 1998, c. 19, s. 236(9)] "contact information" « coordonnées »
"contact information", in respect of a holder of a business number, means the name, address, telephone number, facsimile number and preferred language of communication of the holder, or similar information as specified by the Minister in respect of the holder, and includes such information in respect of one or more trustees of the holder, if the holder is a trust, members of the holder, if the holder is a partnership, officers of the holder, if the holder is a corporation, or officers or members of the holder, if the holder is not described by any of paragraphs (a) to (c);

"corporate information"
« renseignements d'entreprise »
"corporate information", in respect of a holder of a business number that is a corporation, means the name (including the number assigned by the incorporating authority), date of incorporation, jurisdiction of incorporation and any information on the dissolution, reorganization, amalgamation, winding-up or revival of the corporation;

"court of appeal"
« cour d'appel »
"court of appeal" has the meaning assigned by the definition "court of appeal" in section 2 of the Criminal Code;

"designated donor information"
« renseignements désignés sur les donateurs »
"designated donor information" means information of a charity, or of a person who has at any time made an application for registration as a registered charity, that is directly attributable to a gift that has been made or proposed to be made to the charity or applicant and that is presented in any form that directly or indirectly reveals the identity of the donor or prospective donor, other than a donor or prospective donor who is not resident in Canada and is neither a citizen of Canada nor a person described in subsection 2(3);

Digitized by Google

"designated person"
« personne déterminée »
"designated person" means any person who is employed in the service of, who occupies a position of responsibility in the service of, or who is engaged by or on behalf of,
a municipality in Canada, or a public body performing a function of government in Canada, or any person who was formerly so employed, who formerly occupied such a position or who was formerly so engaged;

"designated taxpayer information"
« renseignement confidentiel désigné »
"designated taxpayer information" means taxpayer information — other than designated donor information — of a registered charity, or of a person who has at any time made an application for registration as a registered charity, that is in respect of a financial transaction relating to the importation or exportation of currency or monetary instruments by the charity or applicant, or ) in which the charity or applicant has engaged a person to whom section 5 of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act applies, information provided to the Minister by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, the name, address, date of birth and citizenship of any current or former director, trustee or like official, or of any agent, mandatary or employee, of the charity or applicant, information submitted by the charity or applicant in support of an application for registration as a registered charity that is not publicly accessible charity information, publicly available, including commercially available databases, or information prepared from publicly accessible charity information and information referred to in paragraphs (a) to (e);

"excluded individual"
« particulier exclu »
"excluded individual" means an individual who is a holder of a business number solely because the individual is required under this Act to deduct or withhold an amount from an amount paid or credited or deemed to be paid or credited;

"government entity"
« entité gouvernementale » "government entity" means a department or agency of the government of Canada or of a province, a municipality in Canada,
an aboriginal government, a corporation all of the shares (except directors' qualifying shares) of the capital stock of which are owned by one or more persons each of which is
Her Majesty in right of Canada,
Her Majesty in right of a province,
a municipality in Canada, or a corporation described in this paragraph, or a board or commission, established by Her Majesty in right of Canada or Her Majesty in

Digitized by Google

right of a province, that performs an administrative or regulatory function of government, or by one or more municipalities in Canada, that performs an administrative or regulatory function of a municipality;

Digitized by Google

"official"
« fonctionnaire »
"official" means any person who is employed in the service of, who occupies a position of responsibility in the service of, or who is engaged by or on behalf of,
Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, or an authority engaged in administering a law of a province similar to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, or any person who was formerly so employed, who formerly occupied such a position or who was formerly so engaged and, for the purposes of subsection 239(2.21), subsections 241(1) and 241(2), the portion of subsection 241(4) before paragraph (a), and subsections 241(5) and 241(6), includes a designated person;

"publicly accessible charity information"
« renseignement d'organismes de bienfaisance accessible au public »
"publicly accessible charity information" means taxpayer information that is described in subsection (3.2), or that would be described in that subsection if the words "that was at any time a registered charity" were read as "that has at any time made an application for registration as a registered charity", information — other than designated donor information — submitted to the Minister with, or required to be contained in, any public information return filed or required to be filed under subsection 149.1(14), or information prepared from information referred to in paragraph (a) or (b);

"registration information"
« renseignements relatifs à l'inscription »
"registration information", in respect of a holder of a business number, means any information pertaining to the legal form of the holder, the type of activities carried on or proposed to be carried on by the holder, each date on which the business number was issued to the holder,
) the holder began activities, the holder ceased or resumed activities, or the business number assigned to the holder was changed, and the reasons for the cessation, resumption or change referred to in subparagraph (c)(iii) or (iv);

"representative"
« représentant »
"representative" of a government entity means a person who is employed in the service of, who occupies a position of responsibility in the service of, or who is engaged by or on behalf of, a government entity, and includes, for the purposes of subsections (1), (2), (5) and (6), a person who was formerly so employed, who formerly occupied such a position or who formerly was so engaged;

"taxpayer information"
« renseignement confidentiel »
"taxpayer information" means information of any kind and in any form relating to one or more taxpayers that is

Digitized by Google

obtained by or on behalf of the Minister for the purposes of this Act, or prepared from information referred to in paragraph (a), but does not include information that does not directly or indirectly reveal the identity of the taxpayer to whom it relates and, for the purposes of applying subsections (2), (5) and (6) to

Digitized by Google

a representative of a government entity that is not an official, taxpayer information includes only the information referred to in paragraph (4)(l).

References to Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act – 241(11)
The references in subsections 241(1), 241(3), 241(4) and 241(10) to "this Act" shall be read as references to "this Act or the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act".

Digitized by Google

[143]

Non Arm's Length Transfers to Shield Assets from Tax Payment

Tax liability re property transferred not at arm's length - S. 160
160. (1) Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to

(a) the person's spouse or common-law partner or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common- law partner,
(b) a person who was under 18 years of age, or
(c) a person with whom the person was not dealing at arm's length, the following rules apply:
(d) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable to pay a part of the transferor's tax under this Part for each taxation year equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of sections 74.1 to 75.1 of this Act and section 74 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in respect of any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted for it, and
(e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of

(i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and
(ii) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act (including, for greater certainty, an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this

[143] "Tree of Life/Wind of Change", 2012, Patricia Vertes, Howick, Quebec

Digitized by Google

section, regardless of whether the Minister has made an assessment under subsection (2) for that amount) in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection limits the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act or of the transferee for the interest that the transferee is liable to pay under this Act on an assessment in respect of the amount that the transferee is liable to pay because of this subsection.

Joint and several, or solidary, liability — subsection 69(11)

(1.1) If a particular person or partnership is deemed by subsection 69(11) to have disposed of a property at any time, the person referred to in that subsection to whom a benefit described in that subsection was available in respect of a subsequent disposition of the property or property substituted for the property is jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable with each other taxpayer to pay a part of the other taxpayer's liabilities under this Act in respect of each taxation year equal to the amount determined by the formula A - B where A is the total of amounts payable under this Act by the other taxpayer in respect of the year, and B is the amount that would, if the particular person or partnership were not deemed by subsection 69(11) to have disposed of the property, be determined for A in respect of the other taxpayer in respect of the year, but nothing in this subsection limits the liability of the other taxpayer under any other provision of this Act or of any person for the interest that the person is liable to pay under this Act on an assessment in respect of the amount that the person is liable to pay because of this subsection.

Joint and several, or solidary, liability — tax on split income

(1.2) A parent of a specified individual is jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable with the individual for the amount required to be added because of subsection 120.4(2) in computing the specified individual's tax payable under this Part for a taxation year if, during the year, the parent

(a) carried on a business that was provided property or services by a partnership or trust all or a portion of the income of which partnership or trust is directly or indirectly included in computing the individual's split income for the year,

(b) was a specified shareholder of a corporation that was provided property or services by a partnership or trust all or a portion of the income of which partnership or trust is directly or indirectly included in computing the individual's split income for the year,

(c) was a specified shareholder of a corporation, dividends on the shares of the capital stock of which were directly or indirectly included in computing the individual's split income for the year;

(d) was a shareholder of a professional corporation that was provided property or services by a partnership or trust all or a portion of the income of which partnership or trust is directly or indirectly included in computing the individual's split income for the year, or

(e) was a shareholder of a professional corporation, dividends on the shares of the capital stock of which were directly or indirectly included in computing the individual's split income for the year, but nothing in this subsection limits the liability of the specified individual under any other provision of this Act or of the parent for the interest that the parent is liable to pay under this Act on an assessment in respect of the amount that the parent is liable to pay because of this subsection.

Digitized by Google

Joint liability — tax on splitpension income
(1.3) Where a pensioner and a pension transferee
(as those terms are defined in section 60.03) make a joint election under section 60.03 in respect of a split-pension amount (as defined in that section) for a taxation year, they are jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable for the tax payable by the pension transferee under this Part for the taxation year to the extent that that tax payable is greater than it would have been if no amount were required to be added because of paragraph 56(1)(a.2) in computing the income of the pension transferee under this Part for the taxation year.

Assessment
(2) The Minister may at any time assess a taxpayer in respect of any amount payable because of this section, and the provisions of this Division (including, for greater certainty, the provisions in respect of interest payable) apply, with any modifications that the circumstances require, in respect of an assessment made under this section as though it had been made under section 152 in respect of taxes payable under this Part.

Assessment
(2.1) The Minister may at any time assess a taxpayer in respect of any amount payable because of paragraph 94(3)(d) or (e) or subsection 94(17) and the provisions of this Division (including, for greater certainty, the provisions in respect of interest payable) apply, with any modifications that the circumstances require, in respect of an assessment made under this section as though it had been made under section 152 in respect of taxes payable under this Part.

Discharge of liability
(3) If a particular taxpayer has become jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable with another taxpayer under this section or because of paragraph 94(3)(d) or (e) or subsection 94(17) in respect of part or all of a liability under this Act of the other taxpayer,

(a) a payment by the particular taxpayer on account of that taxpayer's liability shall to the extent of the payment discharge their liability; but
(b) a payment by the other taxpayer on account of that taxpayer's liability discharges the particular taxpayer's liability only to the extent that the payment operates to reduce that other taxpayer's liability to an amount less than the amount in respect of which the particular taxpayer is, by this section, made jointly and severally, or solidarily, liable.

Fair market value of undivided interest or right
(3.1) For the purposes of this section and section 160.4, the fair market value at any time of an undivided interest, or for civil law an undivided right, in a property, expressed as a proportionate interest or right in that property, is, subject to subsection (4), deemed to be equal to the same proportion of the fair market value of that property at that time.

Digitized by Google

Special rules re transfer of property to spouse or common-law partner
(4) Notwithstanding subsection 160(1), where at any time a taxpayer has transferred property to the taxpayer's spouse or commonlaw partner pursuant to a decree, order or judgment of a competent tribunal or pursuant to a written separation agreement and, at that time, the taxpayer and the spouse or common-law partner were separated and living apart as a result of the breakdown of their marriage or common- law partnership, the following rules apply:

(a) in respect of property so transferred after February 15, 1984,

(i) the spouse or common-law partner shall not be liable under subsection 160(1) to pay any amount with respect to any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and

(ii) for the purposes of paragraph 160(1)(e), the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred shall be deemed to be nil, and

(b) in respect of property so transferred before February 16, 1984, where the spouse common-law partner would, but for this paragraph, be liable to pay an amount under this Act by virtue of subsection 160(1), the spouse's or common-law partner's liability in respect of that amount shall be deemed to have been discharged on February 16, 1984, but nothing in this subsection shall operate to reduce the taxpayer's liability under any other provision of this Act.

Vicarious Liability for Another's Tax Debt on Non-FMV Transfer

Section 160 through 160.4 set out CRA's legal apparatus to collect on tax payment evaders who attempt to shield assets from realization by the Receiver General by transferring ownership of their property to specified parties (specified above in the provision) for less than fair market value consideration. When there is fair market value consideration provided back on any transfer that transfer is exempt. Likewise, when a loan is merely made or repaid, it is still not a transfer since a note receivable is either created or extinguished, that authentically reflects the subject taxpayer's landscape. It should be noted that the provisions do not automatically allow CRA to rank commercial loan repayment arrangements, but do allow it to rank in the face of any "gratuitous" transfers that take place such as mortgage payments on another's property, certain family maintenance payments, dividends on shares, and outright sales (it is suspected especially with extremely favourable payment terms ie; 99-yr payments[144]).

The Broadest of Nature of Transfer

With respect to how broad the transfer activity can be we have Roger Riverin v. The Queen[145] where the Appeal Court held:

[3] Noting the care taken by Parliament to employ more than once the broadest possible terms in its introductory words, no doubt for the purpose of giving its rule a full extension " "either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other

[144] The researcher was not able to find one case on this issue.
[145] A-48-96

Digitized by Google

means whatever" " we have no difficulty in concluding that the provision ~~applies once the tax de~~btor does the act that gives rise to the process by which his property will ultimately end up in the patrimony of any of these persons with whom he has a non- arm's length relationship. In the particular case of a payment in kind or a payment given as security for the repayment of a loan, it makes no difference whether the payment takes full effect and becomes definitive as a result of some additional intervention of the debtor, a court decision or the mere operation of the Act.

The Classic Case of Livingston

A classic instance where a taxpayer attempts to have someone shield their financial resources by having another non-arm's length party cash their cheques or function as a conduit through which their financial transactions can be performed. Such was exactly the case in the Appeal case of Livingston[146] where it was held:

> REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
> SEXTON J.A.
>
> [1] The power to tax means little without the power to collect. As a result, the Income Tax Act R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "Act") provides for a myriad of powers to collect taxes owed that would otherwise not be obtainable when taxpayers attempt to evade their creditors. These powers must be interpreted in light of their intended purpose and within the contexts of the factual situations to which they are applied.
>
> [2] This is an appeal by Her Majesty the Queen (the "appellant") of the judgment of Tax Court Justice Beaubier (the "Tax Court Judge") who held that section 160 of the Act had not been engaged when Jean Livingston (the "respondent") accepted a taxpayer's funds in order to defeat the Crown as a creditor for unpaid taxes.
>
> [3] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal.
>
> FACTS
>
> [4] The respondent and Michele Davies ("Ms. Davies") have been friends for 11 years. Ms. Davies personally owed around $80,000 in taxes, and was potentially liable for over $700,000 in taxes and various remittances and interest as director of various corporations. When the Canada Revenue Agency (the "CRA") began attempting to collect Ms. Davies' tax debt, no funds could be collected. Ms. Davies repeatedly transferred funds into new banking and brokerage accounts before the CRA could locate and collect the money owed. The respondent was well-aware of Ms. Davies' collection problems. After numerous discussions, the respondent opened a bank account in her name only at a branch of CIBC. The respondent was the sole account holder and signatory with respect to the account.
>
> [5] The account was used only by Ms. Davies, however. Ms. Davies would deposit cheques into the account, and also direct other parties to pay

[146] 2008 FCA 89

Digitized by Google

amounts owed to her into the respondent's account. The respondent provided Ms. Davies with the only debit card in order to allow Ms. Davies to make withdrawals from the account. The respondent had also signed blank cheques on the account which Ms. Davies could use. The respondent had the ability to take money from the account at any time; she also had the ability to close the account. All bank statements, however, were sent to Ms. Davies and not the respondent.

[6] During the period from October 16, 2001 to April 28, 2003, funds totalling $36,650.82 were deposited into the bank account. However, bank records seem to indicate that there was never more than $9,000 in the account at any one time. The funds included money withdrawn from Ms. Davies' RRSP, Canada Child Tax Benefit and GST Credit cheques, welfare cheques payable to Ms. Davies and spousal support seized from Ms. Davies' ex-spouse by the British Columbia Family Maintenance Enforcement Program.

[7] On April 30, 2003, Ms. Davies declared bankruptcy. When her estate was distributed, the CRA received $233 in satisfaction of the $80,000 tax debt. Ms. Davies did not disclose in her sworn statement in bankruptcy that she was the beneficiary of trust funds, despite the fact that on and around the date her statement was sworn, there was around $1,000.00 in the respondent's account.

[8] The respondent was assessed for the total amount of money that had been deposited into the account between October 16, 2001 to April 28, 2003, namely $36,650.82.

DECISION BELOW

[9] The Tax Court Judge determined that in order for subsection 160(1) of the Act to apply, the following four criteria must be met:

1) There must be a transfer of property;
2) The parties must not be dealing at arm's length;
3) There must be no consideration or inadequate consideration flowing from the transferee to the transferor (I would note that the trial judge considered the test to be "No consideration or inadequate consideration flowing from the transferor to the transferee" [emphasis added]: this is a mistaken quotation of the test as cited in Raphael v. Canada 2002 FCA 23.); and
4) The transferor must be liable to pay tax under the Act at that time.

[10] The Tax Court Judge found that the first, second and fourth criteria had been fulfilled. However, he found that there had been consideration flowing from the respondent to Ms. Davies. Specifically, he concluded the following (at paragraphs 3 & 5):

> The deposit by Ms. Davies of funds into Ms. Livingston's name and the delivery by Ms. Livingston to Ms. Davies of a bank debit card and signed blank cheques on the Account constitute an exchange of consideration. As a result, there was a form of contractual agreement between the parties.

Digitized by Google

[…]

> At all the times that Ms. Davies made the transfers of each sum, Ms. Davies had the ability to take each sum in full by using a signed blank cheque from the Appellant or by using the bank debit card. Ms. Davies even got the bank account statements so she, and not Mrs. Livingston, was the person who knew what was in the Account, although Ms. Livingston also had the power to find that out and to take anything in the Account at any time. But, in any event, these findings establish that at all times Ms. Livingston provided adequate consideration to Ms. Davies for the deposit of these funds by Ms. Davies.

The Tax Court Judge also emphasized that the respondent did not obtain any benefit from the bank account.

[11] However, the Tax Court Judge rejected the respondent's contention that the respondent was a bare trustee of the funds in question. He found that the Court will not favour a transferor where property is transferred with the intention of prejudicing a creditor. Nevertheless, as the third criterion had not been fulfilled, subsection 160(1) did not apply to the respondent.

[12] The Tax Court Judge made a number of findings of fact that are crucial for the purposes of this appeal. He found that the respondent's purpose in opening the bank account was to enable Ms. Davies to place her funds beyond the reach of creditors, including the CRA. He even went so far as to conclude that both parties conspired to prejudice the CRA (at paragraph 6). He also found that Ms. Davies was the only person who used the account; that is, the respondent never deposited into, nor withdrew funds from the account.

ISSUES

[13] Broadly speaking, there is only one issue in this appeal: was subsection 160(1) engaged when Ms. Davies made numerous transfers to the respondent's bank account? More specifically there are three areas of analysis to explore in this appeal:

1) What is the test for the application of subsection 160(1) of the Act?
2) Was there a transfer of property?
3) Was there adequate consideration flowing from the transferee to the transferor?

Digitized by Google

STANDARD OF REVIEW

[14] In appellate review, the standard of review is governed by the nature of the question at issue. Questions of law are generally reviewed on a standard of correctness, while findings of fact or mixed fact and law will be set aside only if the trial judge has made an overriding and palpable error: see Housen v. Nikolaisen, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235.

ANALYSIS

Interpreting Subsection 160(1)

[15] The Supreme Court of Canada's preferred approach to statutory interpretation remains Dreidger's modern principle (Elmer A. Driedger, The Construction of Statutes (Toronto: Butterworths, 1974) at 67):

> Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.

See Re Rizzo and Rizzo Shoes Ltd. [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27 at 41; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42 at paragraph 26.

[16] Subsection 160(1) of the Act provides as follows:

Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to	Lorsqu'une personne a, depuis le 1er mai 1951, transféré des biens, directement ou indirectement, au moyen d'une fiducie ou de toute autre façon à l'une des personnes suivantes:
(a) the person's spouse or common-law partner or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common-law partner,	a) son époux ou conjoint de fait ou une personne devenue depuis son époux ou conjoint de fait;
(b) a person who was under 18 years of age, or	b) une personne qui était âgée de moins de 18 ans;
(c) a person with whom the person was not dealing at arm's length,	c) une personne avec laquelle elle avait un lien de dépendance,
the following rules apply:	les règles suivantes s'appliquent :
(d) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay a part of the transferor's tax under this Part for each taxation year equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of sections 74.1 to	d) le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement d'une partie de l'impôt de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de la présente partie pour chaque année d'imposition égale à l'excédent de l'impôt pour l'année sur ce que cet impôt aurait été sans l'application

Digitized by Google

75.1 of this Act and section 74 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in respect of any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefore, and

(e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of

(i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and

(ii) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to limit the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act.

des articles 74.1 à 75.1 de la présente loi et de l'article 74 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, chapitre 148 des Statuts revisés du Canada de 1952, à l'égard de tout revenu tiré des biens ainsi transférés ou des biens y substitués ou à l'égard de tout gain tiré de la disposition de tels biens;

e) le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement en vertu de la présente loi d'un montant égal au moins élevé des montants suivants :

(i) l'excédent éventuel de la juste valeur marchande des biens au moment du transfert sur la juste valeur marchande à ce moment de la contrepartie donnée pour le bien,

(ii) le total des montants dont chacun représente un montant que l'auteur du transfert doit payer en vertu de la présente loi au cours de l'année d'imposition dans laquelle les biens ont été transférés ou d'une année d'imposition antérieure ou pour une de ces années;

aucune disposition du présent paragraphe n'est toutefois réputée limiter la responsabilité de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de quelque autre disposition de la présente loi.

[17] In light of the clear meaning of the words of subsection 160(1), the criteria to apply when considering subsection 160(1) are self-evident:

1) The transferor must be liable to pay tax under the Act at the time of transfer;
2) There must be a transfer of property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever;
3) The transferee must either be:

Digitized by Google

i. The transferor's spouse or common-law partner at the time of transfer or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common-law partner;

ii. A person who was under 18 years of age at the time of transfer; or

iii. A person with whom the transferor was not dealing at arm's length.

4) The fair market value of the property transferred must exceed the fair market value of the consideration given by the transferee.

[18] The purpose of subsection 160(1) of the Act is especially crucial to inform the application of these criteria. In Medland v. Canada 98 DTC 6358 (F.C.A.) ("Medland") this Court concluded that "the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse [or to a minor or non-arm's length individual] in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned to him." See also Heavyside v. Canada [1996] F.C.J. No. 1608 (C.A.) (QL) ("Heavyside") at paragraph 10. More apposite to this case, the Tax Court of Canada has held that the purpose of subsection 160(1) would be defeated where a transferor allows a transferee to use the money to pay the debts of the transferor for the purpose of preferring certain creditors over the CRA (Raphael v. Canada 2000 D.T.C. 2434 (T.C.C.) at paragraph 19).

[19] As will be explained below, given the purpose of subsection 160(1), the intention of the parties to defraud the CRA as a creditor can be of relevance in gauging the adequacy of the consideration given. However, I do not wish to be taken as suggesting as there must be an intention to defraud the CRA in order for subsection 160(1) to apply. The provision can apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax: see Wannan v. Canada 2003 FCA 423 at paragraph 3.

Was There A Transfer of Property?

[20] The Tax Court Judge concluded that Ms. Davies' deposits to the respondent's bank account constituted a transfer of property. The respondent argues that depositing funds into a bank account is not, in and of itself, a transfer of property to the account holder. Rather, there must also be a divesting by the transferor of the funds deposited into the bank account, which, it is submitted, never occurred. As a result, claims the respondent, there was no transfer of property, and the beneficial title to the funds remained with Ms. Davies, and not the respondent. The respondent therefore asks the Court to find a resulting trust to Ms. Davies. I do not find this argument at all convincing.

[21] The deposit of funds into another person's account constitutes a transfer of property. To make the point more emphatically, the deposit of funds by Ms. Davies into the account of the respondent permitted the respondent to withdraw those funds herself anytime. The property transferred was the right to require the bank to release all the funds to the respondent. The value of the right was the total value of the funds.

Digitized by Google

[22] In addition, there is a transfer of property for the purposes of section 160 even when beneficial ownership has not been transferred. Subsection 160(1) applies to any transfer of property – "by means of a trust or by any other means whatever". Thus, subsection 160(1) categorizes a transfer to a trust as a transfer of property. Certainly, even where the transferor is the beneficiary under the trust, nevertheless, legal title has been transferred to the trustee. Obviously, this constitutes a transfer of property for the purposes of subsection 160(1) which, after all, is designed, inter alia, to prevent the transferor from hiding his or her assets, including behind the veil of a trust, in order to prevent the CRA from attaching the asset. Therefore it is unnecessary to consider the respondent's argument that beneficial title to the funds remained with Ms. Davies.

[23] The respondent cites the Tax Court of Canada's decision in Leblanc v. The Queen 99 DTC 410 (T.C.C.). In that case, Tax Court Justice Hamlyn found that following a deposit into a jointly held bank account the property did not vest in or pass to the wife as the wife was acting as agent for her ill husband. That finding in and of itself is suspect: there was certainly a transfer of property. Because Justice Hamlyn concluded that there was no transfer of property, he did not consider whether the wife had provided consideration.

[24] The trial judge emphasized in his reasons that the respondent ultimately received no monetary benefit. The respondent argues that this is a critical factor in considering whether there has been a transfer of property. In my opinion it is irrelevant whether or not the respondent ultimately received a "benefit." It does not matter that the funds went back to Ms. Davies. The respondent certainly received property at the time of transfer which is the relevant time for the purposes of subsection 160(1). That the money happened to go back to Ms. Davies in the end is not sufficient to reverse the triggering of the provision. As was stated by this Court in Heavyside, supra at paragraph 9:

> Once the conditions of subsection 160(1) are met... the transferee becomes personally liable to pay the tax determined under that subsection ... That liability arises at the moment of the transfer ... and is joint and several with that of the transferor. The Minister may "at any time" thereafter assess the transferee (subsection 160(2)) and the transferee's joint liability will only disappear with a payment made by her or by the transferor in accordance with subsection 160(3)).
>
> [Emphasis added.]

[25] For the reasons above, I find there was a transfer of property.

Was There Adequate Consideration Flowing from the Transferee to the Transferor?

Digitized by Google

[26] As outlined above, the Tax Court Judge concluded that there was adequate consideration flowing from the respondent to Ms. Davies by way of the respondent giving Ms. Davies the ability to take each sum in full by using a signed blank cheque from the respondent or by using the bank debit card. The respondent, in the alternative, argues that the forbearance of the respondent from seizing the monies in the account constituted consideration. In my opinion, both the Tax Court Judge and the respondent are in error.

[27] Under subsection 160(1), a transferee of property will be liable to the CRA to the extent that the fair market value of the consideration given for the property falls short of the fair market value of that property. The very purpose of subsection 160(1) is to preserve the value of the existing assets in the taxpayer for collection by the CRA. Where those assets are entirely divested, subsection 160(1) provides that the CRA's rights to those assets can be exercised against the transferee of the property. However, subsection 160(1) will not apply where an amount equivalent in value to the original property transferred was given to the transferor at the time of transfer: that is, fair market value consideration. This is because after such a transaction, the CRA has not been prejudiced as a creditor. Applying such principles to the case at bar, it is clear that the transaction between Ms. Davies and the respondent left Ms. Davies without anything equivalent to the property transferred that could be collected by the CRA, and thus there couldn't possibly be consideration.

[28] The Tax Court Judge erred in law by failing to conduct any analysis of the fair market value of the consideration. He simply concluded that it was "adequate." I fail to see how the fair market value of the consideration, if any did exist, would be equivalent to the funds deposited. Why would Ms. Davies give an amount of money to the respondent in consideration for the ability to withdraw the money, when the respondent retains the power to take the money? No prudent, arm's length purchaser not motivated by the prospect of evading collection of their tax debt would pay the full value of funds in exchange for the right of access that Ms. Davies received. There was no evidence on which the Tax Court Judge could conclude that what was provided by the respondent was equal to the fair market value of the money put into the account.

[29] Nor am I convinced that the respondent's failure to seize the money constituted consideration for the moneys deposited. While forbearance – the act of refraining from enforcing a right, obligation, or debt – can act as consideration for a promise given in return (S.M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 5th ed., at paragraph 121), in my opinion there was no legal forbearance in this case. Indeed, contrary to the finding of the Tax Court Judge, there was no contract. Rather, it is my opinion that the respondent simply acted out of a sense of moral obligation to Ms. Davies. Such an action does not constitute a binding agreement: Raphael v. Canada 2002 FCA 23 at paragraph 10. This is supported by cross-examination of the respondent at trial:

> Q: And why did you agree?
> A: Why did I agree to do this bank account for Ms. Davies?

Digitized by Google

Q: You wanted to help her.
A: That's right and her four children.
Q: And you were her friend.
A: That's correct.

[30] For the reasons above, the Tax Court Judge erred in finding that there had been fair market value consideration.

CONCLUSION

[31] The Tax Court Judge made a palpable and overriding error by concluding that adequate consideration had been given. I would allow the appeal with costs and set aside the decision of the Tax Court. Proceeding to render the decision that should have been rendered, I would dismiss with costs the respondent's appeal to the Tax Court of Canada.

"J. Edgar Sexton"

J.A.

"I agree
Gilles Létourneau J.A."

"I agree
J.D. Denis Pelletier J.A."

A secondary argument that will not work is when the transferee feels they are under "a moral obligation" to not use the funds in their account thus preventing a transfer of property to them that would draw application of s. 160. Such was the case in Debra Raphael v. The Queen[184] where the Appeal Ct. opined:

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE COURT

(Delivered from the Bench at Toronto, Ontario on Thursday, January 17, 2002)

SEXTON J.A.

[1] The Appellant's husband, through a company owned by him operated a large number of jewellery stores in Canada. During the recession in the early 90's, the jewellery business suffered greatly and the husband's company went bankrupt. The husband had guaranteed several hundred thousand dollars of leases and loans for which the company was liable. As a result, the husband's bank alerted him to the fact that a number of his creditors had served garnishees on his bank accounts and that any funds in his accounts with the bank would have to be given to those creditors.

[2] At the time, the husband had money in his RRSP plan and he desired to use those monies so that he could honour some of his debts and thus have the possibility of continuing to carry on the jewellery business. However, he knew that if these monies were deposited into an account in his name they could be garnisheed by his creditors. In order to avoid this happening and still to accomplish his plan, the husband and the Appellant agreed that he would deposit the monies in her account and that she would pay out money from that account on instructions from her husband, as she wished to save him from personal bankruptcy. The monies were duly paid into her account and she in turn in fact paid out monies to a great many of the husband's creditors pursuant to his instructions but as well, paid money out on account of personal expenses for the two of them. Only approximately half of the husband's monies went to pay off existing debts of the husband. His monies in the account were blended along with hers making an accounting somewhat difficult, and the Tax Court Judge concluded that it was not possible to trace the husband's monies to payment of his creditors.

Digitized by Google

[3] In addition to his other creditors, the husband also owed income tax which was not paid. When the income tax authorities became aware of the transfer of the funds into the wife's account, the Appellant was assessed under section 160(1) of the Income Tax Act. It provided as follows:

(1) Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to

(a) the person's spouse or common-law partner or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common- law partner,

(b) a person who was under 18 years of age, or

(c) a person with whom the person was not dealing at arm's length, the following rules apply:

(d) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay a part of the transferor's tax under this Part for each taxation year equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of sections 74.1 to 75.1 of this Act and section 74 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in respect of any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and

(e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of

(i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and

(ii) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year,

but nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to limit the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act. [Emphasis added].

[4] The Tax Court Judge set out four conditions to be met in order for subsection 160(1) to apply and in so doing he was following a decision of the Tax Court, Doreen Williams v. The Queen, File No. 98-1604, July 4, 2000. Those conditions were:

1) There must be a transfer of property;

2) The transferor and transferee are not dealing at arm's length

Digitized by Google

3) There must be no consideration or inadequate consideration flowing from the transferee to the transferor; and
4) The transferor must be liable to pay an amount under the Act in or in respect of the year when the property was transferred or any preceding year.

[5] The Tax Court judge found that there had been a transfer of property by reason of the fact that the funds were transferred into the wife's bank account. He also held that the husband and wife were not dealing at arm's length. In dealing with the third condition, he held that the wife's stated moral obligation to pay out the monies according to his instructions did not amount to consideration. He said:

To put the transfer issue in plain language, a private arrangement between the Appellant and Ernest (the husband) may impose a moral obligation on the Appellant but that moral obligation does not avoid or prevent the application of section 160(1).

[6] The Tax Court Judge therefore dismissed the wife's appeal.

[7] Before us it was argued by the Appellant that there was no transfer of the monies within the meaning of section 160(1) of the Act. The Appellant argued that given the Appellant's evidence that she believed she had a moral obligation to use the funds as her husband directed, which evidence was accepted by the learned Tax Judge, coupled with the evidence that in fact she used the funds to pay amounts which he directed, there was not a transfer of funds within the meaning of subsection 160(1).

[8] The Appellant argued, as well, that a trust had been created for her husband so that there was no transfer of property. However, the intention of the husband and wife in the present case to put the husband's funds where they would be secure from his creditors in not consistent with the creation of a trust. If indeed a trust was established then the husband would be beneficially entitled to those funds and they would not be immune from garnishment proceedings at the instance of his creditors. Thus, clearly the intention of the parties was not to set up an arrangement whereby the funds remained beneficially owned by the husband. Thus no trust was created.

[9] The stronger argument put by the Appellant was that there had been valid consideration given by the wife in the form of her promise to pay out monies only on his direction. If there was valid consideration equal in value to the property transferred, then section 160(1) does not apply.

[10] If indeed the wife had made a legally enforceable promise to pay out monies only on the husband's direction to his creditors in amounts equal to the monies transferred, this might well have constituted sufficient consideration in order to avoid the application of section 160(1). However, this was not the evidence nor was it the finding of the Tax Court Judge. The Appellant when asked whether she had any legal obligation to pay bills as directed by the husband agreed that she had no such legal obligation and that it was only a moral obligation. She admitted further, that he could not force her to pay bills which he wanted paid. If of course there was a legal obligation based on a trust, he could have compelled such payment. This evidence confirms that the Appellant really only felt a moral obligation and we agree with the Tax Court Judge that that is not sufficient consideration.

Digitized by Google

[11] It is also noteworthy that all of the monies transferred did not go to payment of the husband's debts. The monies were used for other purposes as well. Thus, this evidence does not support the alleged promise to use the husband's funds only for the payment of the husband's creditors in amounts equal to the money transferred.

[12] We do not wish to be taken however, as agreeing with all of the comments of the Tax Court Judge relating to whether there can be a consideration given between husband and wife so as to preclude the application of section 160(1).

[13] We therefore are of the view that there was a transfer of property within the meaning of section 160(1) and that consideration was not proven.

[14] For all of these reasons, we would dismiss this appeal with costs.

"J. E. Sexton"

J.A .

For an instance where property was repossessed and subsequently involved a transfer to a parent see Roger St-Fort v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2009 FCA 188, for an instance where the transfer had the involvement of a Quebec bank seizure mixing in with the transfer:

LÉTOURNEAU J.A.

Issue

[1] The Court has before it two appeals that have been consolidated for procedural reasons and for hearing by an order of our colleague, Justice Trudel, on February 26, 2008.

[2] The issue that the appeals raise is the correctness of the decision by Justice Archambault of the Tax Court of Canada (judge), in which the judge found that, pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (Act), the appellants were jointly and severally liable to pay a part of their son's tax liability.

[3] This final conclusion by the judge is based on the fact that there was a non-arms' length transfer of property.

[4] In my view, the two appeals must be dismissed for the reasons that follow.

Relevant legislation

[5] In addition to sections 160 and 250 of the Act, article 476 of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, and articles 1651, 1654, 2781, 2941 and 2944 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64, must be taken into consideration to resolve the case at bar.

[6] These provisions read as follows:

Income Tax Act,* R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.)

Tax liability re property transferred not at arm's length

160. (1) Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to

Digitized by Google

the person's spouse or common-law partner or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common- law partner, a person who was under 18 years of age, or a person with whom the person was not dealing at arm's length,
the following rules apply:
the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay a part of the transferor's tax under this Part for each taxation year equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of sections 74.1 to 75.1 of this Act and section 74 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in respect of any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and

Transfert de biens entre personnes ayant un lien de dépendance

160. (1) Lorsqu'une personne a, depuis le 1er mai 1951, transféré des biens, directement ou indirectement, au moyen d'une fiducie ou de toute autre façon à l'une des personnes suivantes :
son époux ou conjoint de fait ou une personne devenue depuis son époux ou conjoint de fait;
une personne qui était âgée de moins de 18 ans;
une personne avec laquelle elle avait un lien de dépendance, les règles suivantes s'appliquent :
le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement d'une partie de l'impôt de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de la présente partie pour chaque année d'imposition égale à l'excédent de l'impôt pour l'année sur ce que cet impôt aurait été sans l'application des articles 74.1 à 75.1 de la présente loi et de l'article 74 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, chapitre 148 des Statuts revisés du Canada de 1952, à l'égard de tout revenu tiré des biens ainsi transférés ou des biens y substitués ou à l'égard de tout gain tiré de la disposition de tels biens;
le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement en vertu de la présente loi d'un montant égal au moins élevé des montants suivants :
(i) l'excédent éventuel de la juste valeur marchande des biens au moment du transfert sur la juste valeur marchande à ce moment de la contrepartie donnée pour le bien,

Digitized by Google

Arm's length
251. (1) For the purposes of this Act,
(a) related persons shall be deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length; […]
Definition of "related persons"
For the purpose of this Act,
"related persons", or persons related to each other, are individuals connected by blood relationship, marriage or common-law partnership or adoption;
[Emphasis added.]

Lien de dépendance
251. (1) Pour l'application de la présente loi :
a) des personnes liées sont réputées avoir entre elles un lien de dépendance;
[…]
Définition de « personnes liées »
(2) Pour l'application de la présente loi, sont des « personnes liées » ou des personnes liées entre elles :
a) des particuliers unis par les liens du sang, du mariage, de l'union de fait ou de l'adoption;
[Nous soulignons.]

Code of Civil Procedure*, R.S.Q., c. C-25
476. A party may renounce rights arising from a judgment rendered in his favour, by filing in the office of the court a total or partial renunciation signed by him or by his special attorney. A total renunciation accepted by the opposite party places the case in the position it was in immediately before the judgment.

476. Une partie peut renoncer aux droits qui lui résultent d'un jugement rendu en sa faveur, en produisant au greffe un désistement total ou partiel, signé d'elle-même ou de son fondé de procuration spéciale. Le désistement total accepté par la partie adverse a pour effet de remettre la cause dans l'état où elle était immédiatement avant le jugement.

Civil Code of Québec*, S.Q. 1991, c. 64
1651. A person who pays in the place of a debtor may be subrogated to the rights of the creditor.
He does not have more rights than the subrogating creditor. 1654. Subrogation may be made by the creditor only at the same time as he receives payment. It takes effect without the consent of the debtor, notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary.
2781. Where the default has not been remedied or the payment has not been made in the time allotted for surrender, the creditor takes the property in payment by the effect of the judgment of surrender, or of a deed voluntarily made by the person against whom the hypothecary right is exercised, and accepted by the creditor, if neither the subsequent creditors nor the debtor have required him to proceed with the sale.

Digitized by Google

The judgment of surrender or the deed voluntarily made and accepted constitutes the 1651. La personne qui paie à la place du débiteur peut être subrogée dans les droits du créancier.
Elle n'a pas plus de droits que le subrogeant.
1654. La subrogation consentie par le créancier doit l'être en même temps qu'il reçoit le paiement. Elle s'opère sans le consentement du débiteur, malgré toute stipulation contraire. 2781. Lorsqu'il n'a pas été remédié au défaut ou que le paiement n'a pas été fait dans le délai imparti pour délaisser, le créancier prend le bien en paiement par l'effet du jugement en délaissement, ou par un acte volontairement consenti par celui contre qui le droit hypothécaire est exercé, et accepté par le créancier, si les créanciers subséquents ou le débiteur n'ont pas exigé qu'il procède à la vente.
Le jugement en délaissement ou l'acte volontairement consenti et accepté constitue le titre de creditor's title of ownership. 2941. Publication of rights allows them to be set up against third persons, establishes their rank and, where the law so provides, gives them effect.
Rights produce their effects between the parties even before publication, unless the law expressly provides otherwise.
2944. Registration of a right in the register of personal and movable real rights or the land register carries, in respect of all persons, simple presumption of the existence of that right.

propriété du créancier.
2941. La publicité des droits les rend opposables aux tiers, établit leur rang et, lorsque la loi le prévoit, leur donne effet.
Entre les parties, les droits produisent leurs effets, encore qu'ils ne soient pas publiés, sauf disposition expresse de la loi.
2944. L'inscription d'un droit sur le registre des droits personnels et réels mobiliers ou sur le registre foncier emporte, à l'égard de tous, présomption simple de l'existence de ce droit.

Factual background to the transfer and these proceedings

[7] On June 2, 1992, the appellants' son, René St-Fort, and his spouse acquired a house in Chelsea, Quebec. The purchase price was $250,000. A $50,000 down payment was made to the seller. The balance of the purchase price was financed through two hypothecs. The first-ranking hypothec amounted to $150,000 and was granted by the National Bank of Canada (Bank). The second-ranking hypothec, held by the Bank of Hong Kong, was for $50,000. Since the second-ranking hypothec was settled, no further mention will be made of it in these reasons.

[8] In December of that same year, René St-Fort's spouse assigned him her share in the immovable by notarial act duly registered at the Gatineau registry office: see tab 10 of the Appellants' Record.

Digitized by Google

[9] Beginning in April 1996, René St-Fort ceased making the monthly principal and interest repayments to the Bank.
[10] On September 18, 1996, the Bank asserted its rights as creditor. The Bank served René St-Fort and his spouse with a prior notice of the exercise of a hypothecary right under article 2757 of the Civil Code of Québec: ibid. at tab 11.
[11] When the debtors did not respond to the notice, the Bank filed a motion for forced surrender and for taking in payment in the Superior Court: ibid. The motion, based on article 795 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was filed on December 13, 1996.
[12] By judgment dated January 10, 1997, the Superior Court, District of Hull, ordered the debtors to voluntarily surrender the immovable, failing which the Bank would be placed in possession of the immovable by means of a writ of possession: ibid. at tab 12.
[13] The judgement also declared the Bank the sole owner of the immovable as of the registration of the notice, mentioned above, given on September 27, 1996. This judgment in favour of the Bank is not registered in the land register: ibid. at tab 18, at index of immovables.
[14] On January 31, 1997, following discussions with the Bank and its counsel, the appellants registered a $130,000 hypothec on the immovable in favour of the Caisse Populaire St-Jean Bosco in Hull: ibid. at tab 13. [15] Subsequently, more specifically on February 13, 1997, the Bank renounced the judgment in its favour dated January 10, 1997: ibid. at tab 14.
[16] Following this renunciation, the Bank subrogated the appellants to all of its rights in relation to the hypothecary remedies available to it as a result of René St-Fort's failure to pay his hypothecary debt to the Bank. The subrogation was made by notarial act dated April 1, 1997, on payment of $142,016.52: ibid. at tab
The notarial act was published on April 7, 1997, in the Gatineau registration division: ibid.
[17] Still in the same Superior Court file, the Bank and the appellants, represented by the same counsel, filed an appearance for a continuance of suit on May 27, 1997. In the appearance, the Bank was identified as the original applicant and the appellants as applicants in the continuance of suit: ibid. at tab 16.
[18] The case having been given new life, the appearance for a continuance of suit was followed by a notice indicating that the motion for forced surrender and for taking in payment, which had resulted in the January 10, 1997, judgment that had been renounced, would be re-filed in the Superior Court for determination on June 23, 1997: ibid.
[19] On June 27, 1997, the Superior Court delivered a new judgment in the file, ordering that the immovable be surrendered and granting the possession thereof to the appellants. Furthermore, the Court declared that the appellants took the immovable in payment and are the sole owners thereof, retroactive to the registration of the notice of intent on September 27, 1996.
[20] René St-Fort never surrendered the immovable, which he has occupied since its purchase in June 1992. On April 7, 1997, the immovable's fair market value was $220,000. René St-Fort's liability to the Minister of National Revenue amounted to $365,238.69.

Digitized by Google

[21] On November 15, 2001, the Minister of National Revenue issued the appellants an assessment of $77,983.48, representing the difference between the fair market value of the house, namely $220,000, and the amount they paid in consideration for the subrogation to the Bank's rights, namely $142,016.52. The assessment was based on subsection 160(1) of the Act.

[22] The appellants appealed this assessment to the Tax Court of Canada. The judgment and reasons were delivered orally from the bench on November 5, 2007, but the reasons for judgment delivered at that time were later "amended for greater clarity and precision" on January 21, 2008. The finding was that the appeals should be dismissed. This prompted the appellants' application for the Tax Court of Canada's decision to be overturned.

Analysis of the judge's decision and the parties' submissions

Existence of a non-arm's length relationship

[23] The bond of filiation between the tax debtor, René St-Fort, and the appellants meets the definition of "related persons", thus triggering the presumption of non-arm's length dealing at section 251 of the Act. The appellants raise no objection in that respect. Rather, they submit that they acquired the immovable from the Bank, not from their son, such that there was no transfer between related persons within the meaning of the Act.

[24] The appellants are self-represented. With respect, I believe they are mistaken as to the legal effect of the various transactions that led to their ownership of the immovable, or that they are guided by a misapprehension of the consequences of those transactions.

Validity of the Bank's renunciation

[25] The appellants are challenging the judge's conclusions that under article 476 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Bank could renounce the rights conferred upon it by the January 10, 1997, judgment, that the renunciation of that judgment was valid and that this renunciation had the effect of placing the case in the position it was in before the January 10, 1997, judgment: see paragraph 11 of the judge's reasons for decision. According to the appellants, the renunciation is not valid because the Bank did not sign it. Moreover, it cannot have the effect that the judge ruled it had because René St-Fort and his spouse never accepted the Bank's total renunciation.

[26] In my opinion, there is no question that the Bank made a total and valid renunciation of the January 10, 1997, judgment. It is clear that the renunciation, signed by the attorneys representing the Bank, [TRANSLATION] "is, in fact and in law, a true renunciation of the judgment" since the Bank [TRANSLATION] "waived the benefit that would result therefrom": see paragraph 21 of Justice Dalphond's reasons for judgment in Vernet v. Forage expert Québec Inc., J.E. 2007-1095 (C.A.Q.).

[27] The Bank's subsequent actions confirm beyond a shadow of a doubt the validity of the mandate it gave its attorneys to prepare a renunciation and file it in the record. I agree with Justice Dalphond that [TRANSLATION] "there is no call for us to go any further and attempt to interfere in the relationship between lawyer and client": ibid., see also Assurance-vie Desjardins Inc v. Succession de Richard Proulx, [1995] R.D.J. 479 (C.A.Q.).

Digitized by Google

[28] This brings me to the matter of determining whether the Bank's two debtors, René St-Fort and his spouse, accepted the renunciation.

Acceptance of the renunciation by the Bank's debtors

[29] The appellants submit that the renunciation cannot be set up against their son, René St-Fort, because he did not sign it. Under article 476 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the opposing party need not sign a renunciation; it need only accept it. A signature may be the best evidence of acceptance; however, it is not the only means by which that fact may be established. Acceptance may also be proven from the parties' conduct, including that of the opposing party.

[30] In Vernet, above, Justice Dalphond inferred acceptance of the judgment from the agreement as to the conduct of the proceedings signed by the parties to continue the suit: see paragraphs 10 and 21 of his reasons for decision, where he concludes that it is [TRANSLATION] "clear that the opposing parties accepted this total renunciation".

[31] In the case at hand, there is no evidence that the hypothecary debtors objected to the Bank's total renunciation of the January 10, 1997, judgment. To the contrary, in fact, the following evidence in the record leads to the conclusion that the hypothecary debtors accepted it.

[32] First of all, the two debtors were respondents in the renunciation document: see Appellants' Record at tab14. They were also respondents in the appearance filed in the Superior Court in connection with the continuance of suit: ibid. at tab 16. As well, they were respondents in the continuance of the motion for forced surrender and for taking in payment re-filed in the Superior Court owing to the renunciation of the January 10, 1997, judgment: ibid. Last, the two debtors had the status of respondents in the June 27, 1997, judgment delivered following the renunciation and the continuance of suit: ibid. at tab 17.

[33] In my understanding, it is significant that throughout this series of events beginning with the renunciation document, at no time did the debtors oppose, in any way whatsoever, any of the proceedings subsequent and giving effect to the renunciation. In the circumstances, it is certainly not unreasonable, let alone erroneous, to conclude that the two hypothecary debtors accepted the renunciation.

[34] Regardless, according to the Court of Appeal of Québec's interpretation of article 476 of the Code of Civil Procedure, [TRANSLATION] "renunciation is essentially a unilateral act". And the beneficiary of a judgment may renounce it unilaterally, without the other party's involvement, if the judgement does not, in and of itself, benefit that other party (2632-8419 Québec Inc. v. 3170578 Canada Inc., J.E. 97-1817, paragraphs 6 to 10; 118372 Canada inc. v. Groupe Tecnum inc., 2007 QCCS 4283; Caisse populaire Desjardins Saint-Jérôme (reprise d'instance) v. 3099-1947 Québec inc. (reprise d'instance de), [2002] J.Q. No. 5467).

[35] In this case, the January 10, 1997, judgment, which was the subject of the renunciation, did not benefit the two hypothecary creditors in any way. It could therefore be renounced unilaterally.

Digitized by Google

Appellants' capacity to invoke the invalidity of the revocation

[36] Although it is not necessary to decide this question to resolve the dispute, it is certainly appropriate to seriously question the appellants' capacity to challenge the validity of a renunciation of a judgment in proceedings to which they were not parties when, furthermore, they benefitted from the renunciation and accepted it at all times.

[37] In retrospect, it would probably have been preferable for the appellants to proceed differently than in the manner in which they agreed to acquire the immovable.

Legal effect of the renunciation

[38] As provided by article 476 of the Code of Civil Procedure, total renunciation places the case in the position it was in immediately before the judgment. That explains the appearance filed in connection with the continuance of suit, the filing for a rehearing of the motion for forced surrender and for taking in payment and the judgment dated June 27, 1997, granting the appellants (who were the applicants in the continuance of suit) ownership of the immovable.

Legal effect of the subrogation of the appellants to the hypothecary creditor's rights

[39] As already mentioned, the appellants submit that they acquired the immovable from the Bank, not their son However, the evidence affords no legal basis for this submission..

[40] The appellants acquired the immovable by way of a taking in payment, as was made possible by the subrogation document dated April 1, 1997. Pursuant to that document, the appellants acquired the Bank's claims against the hypothecary debtors and, more specifically, its right to exercise [TRANSLATION] "the hypothecary remedies of taking in payment constituted on December 13, 1996, under file No. 550 05 004282961 of the Superior Court, District of Hull": see subrogation document, Appellants' Record at page 92. They do not have more rights than the subrogating creditor: see art. 1651, Civil Code of Québec. In the case at bar, the subrogating creditors were entitled to take, in payment, the immovable in respect of which the hypothecary debtors were in default: ibid. art. 2781.

[41] The appellants' taking in payment was confirmed by the June 27, 1997, judgment with effect as regards the appellants' ownership of the immovable retroactive to September 27, 1996, at which time the appellants' son had possession and ownership of the immovable. Therefore, legally, the immovable was not transferred from the Bank to the appellants, as could have been the case had it been sold by the Bank, but by a taking in payment, authorized by the Superior Court, from René St-Fort, then-hypothecary debtor to the Bank and tax debtor to the Minister of National Revenue.

Conclusion

[42] In conclusion, I believe that the judge made no error in finding that the conditions for applying section 160 of the Act were met and, accordingly, in dismissing the appellants' appeals.

Digitized by Google

[43] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeals, but with a single set of costs payable by the appellants in equal shares. A copy of these reasons and another original judgment to this effect will be placed in file A- 556-07.

"Gilles Létourneau" J.A.
"I agree.
M. Nadon J.A."
"I agree.
Pierre Blais J.A."

Applies to Cover Subsequent Interest and Penalties

In Gary Richard v. The Queen[147] the Tax Court had to address whether interest and penalties that arose after the transfer were also to be considered in the application of s. 160. It held:

> [12] More importantly, the appellant argued in court, although the argument was not raised in his Notice of Appeal, that he is not liable pursuant to section 160 of the ITA for interest assessed or accrued after the date of transfer. In support of that argument, he relied on the decision of this Court in Currie v. MNR, 2008 TCC 338, a case heard under the informal procedure by Rossiter J. (as he then was), and in which Rossiter J. interpreted the oral decision rendered by Judge Dussault in Algoa Trust v. R., [1998] 4 C.T.C. 2001. In court, the appellant, who is himself a lawyer, did not have those decisions with him. As everyone was caught by surprise, I adjourned the hearing for a short period of time to find those decisions myself. As at first glance the decision in Currie seemed to support the appellant's argument, I asked counsel for the respondent to call an officer from the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) to explain the appellant's assessment in order to determine the amount of interest accrued after the date of the transfer. Everyone being confused, I decided to adjourn the hearing to give the respondent a chance to explain in detail the assessment, particularly the amount of interest accrued after the year of the transfer. At that point, counsel for the respondent asked me for permission to make written submissions on that particular issue, which I granted. I also advised the appellant that he would have a chance to reply. Contrary to what is alleged by the appellant in a letter filed on December 16, 2010 in response to the respondent's written submissions, I never gave my decision from the bench. Although I told the appellant that he might be right, I reserved my decision until I received both parties' submissions on that particular issue. The Court received the respondent's on December 15, 2010 and the appellant's on December 29, 2010. The respondent replied on January 12, 2011.
>
> [13] Now that I have everything to hand, I am in a position to give my decision. It is true that Rossiter J. held in Currie, supra, that a transferee cannot be assessed interest accrued on the transferor's debt after the year of the transfer. McArthur J. seems to have followed that decision in a judgment amending his earlier oral judgment in Provost v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 585 (however, it is not clear in Provost whether the interest cancelled pertained to the section 160 assessment or whether it was interest accrued on the transferor's debt after the year of the transfer). It is also true, as alleged by the appellant, that there is a draft proposed amendment of July 16, 2010 to subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) of the ITA, which has not yet been enacted. I reproduce hereunder subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii), as it now reads followed by the proposed amendment (as found in Carswell, TaxnetPro):

[147] 2011 TCC 136

Digitized by Google

the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to limit the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act.

Proposed Amendment – 160(1)(e)(ii) and 160(1) closing words

(e)

(ii) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act (including, for greater certainty, an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this section, regardless of whether the Minister has made an assessment under subsection (2) for that amount) in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection limits the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act or of the transferee for the interest that the transferee is liable to pay under this Act on an assessment in respect of the amount that the transferee is liable to pay because of this subsection.

Application: The July 16, 2010 draft legislation (Part 1 -- technical), subsec. 114(1), will amend the portion of subsec. 160(1) after subpara. (e)(i) to read as above, applicable in respect of assessments made after December 20, 2002.

Technical Notes (July 2010): The amount that a taxpayer is liable to pay in respect of the transfer of property from a non-arm's length tax debtor is determined under subsection 160(1). The Minister may assess the taxpayer for such a liability under subsection 160(2). Paragraph 160(1)(e) is amended, in respect of assessments made after December 20, 2002, to clarify that the assessment of the taxpayer is subject to interest, without any limit on the amount of interest for which the taxpayer may be liable.

This overrules Algoa Trust, [1998] 4 C.T.C. 2001 (TCC), and Currie, [2009] 1 C.T.C. 2139 (TCC); but in Zen, [2010] 6 C.T.C. 28 (FCA) (leave to appeal to SCC denied 2011 CarswellNat 47 (SCC)), the FCA suggests that Algoa Trust is wrong due to "the provisions of this Division apply" in 160(2), and that interest runs anyway. The CRA charges interest from the assessment date, not from the date of transfer, according to VIEWS doc 2008-0287751E5 (but presumably the s. 160 assessment will itself be for an amount that includes the transferor's interest). ...

[14] Nevertheless, I fully agree with the recent decision by Archambault J. of this court in the general procedure case of Christiane Gagnon v. The Queen,

Digitized by Google

2010 TCC 482. Archambault J. did not follow Currie, and ruled that the Minister could legitimately assess the transferee for interest owed by the transferor for any period after the transfer, as long as it was interest in respect of an amount of tax owed for the taxation year in which the transfer took place or for a preceding taxation year. I also fully agree with Archambault J. that it cannot be said (as held by Rossiter J.) that Judge Dussault held in Algoa Trust that the transferee could not be held liable for interest accrued after the year of the transfer with respect to the transferor's tax debt.

[15] In Gagnon, Archambault J. stated the taxpayer's argument in that regard at paragraph 16 :

Whether the tax debt includes interest

16 Ms. Gagnon's counsel argued that the assessment could be only for the amount of $14,855, that is, only the tax amount, and that the $7,257 in interest had to be excluded because it was not part of the tax debt that existed during the year of the transfer. In fact, at December 31, 2001, no such obligation existed. Interest started to accrue only on April 30, 2002. In support of his claim, he cited Currie v. Canada, 2008 TCC 338, [2008] TCJ No. 266 (QL), where justice Rossiter (as he then was) specifically stated at paragraphs 22 and 27:[148]

22 Subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) is really not applicable. Under subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii), the Appellant is liable for all amounts which the transferor, that is the Estate, is liable to pay under the Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or in a preceding taxation year - this means any amount owing for the transfer of the Estate up to and including December 31st of the year of the transfer. The Appellant is only liable for that which the Estate was liable as per subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii). The transfer most certainly took place before Assessment

#1. As a result, Assessment #1 must be sent back to the Minister for recalculation and reconsideration, on the basis that the Appellant is only liable for the amount owing by the transferor, that is the Estate, up to and including December 31st of the year of the transfer and nothing more. This is certainly consistent with Algoa Trust, supra. Also, the Appellant specifically wanted to be repaid the $75,000, paid by him as interest, post the Assessment #1. This amount will be deleted from the assessment, per my previous comment and most certainly should be deleted to be consistent with Algoa Trust, supra, in which Dussault T.C.J. set out the inability of the Minister of National Revenue to levy interest against the transferee, at pages 2002 and 2003:

---

[148] From what I understand of the facts of that case, the transfers of property took place in 1996 and 1999. The transferee was assessed under section 160 on February 3, 2004. The tax debt he was liable for was $544,146, $321,444 of which was interest. From July 2004 to March 2006, the transferee paid the Minister a total of $620,289 (paragraph 16 of the Reasons). The transfe ree acknowledged that he was jointly and severally liable with the transferor to pay the Estate's debt up to February 3, 2004, date of the assessment, but argued that he was not liable to pay the interest that had accrued on the debt between February 3, 2004 a nd the date of payment. Therefore, he was claiming the extra interest he had paid, namely, the amounts accumulated and paid after February 3, 2004. Thus, he acknowledged that he owed the interest incurred after the year in which the transfer had taken place. However, the Court cancelled the interest starting on December 31 of the year of the transfer.

Digitized by Google

. . .
The rule stated in s. 160 of the Act does not have the effect of creating a tax debt. The effect of the provision is not to create a second debt: there is only one tax debt. The wording of the Act is quite clear: the purpose of s. 160 is essentially to add another debtor who is jointly and severally liable with the transferor. This new debtor is called the transferee. There is thus no new debt created under the Act and the obligation arises not from the assessment but from the Act itself. Fundamentally, therefore, there is only one debt and only that debt can bear interest.
First, subsection (1) of s. 160 in fact states that the transferee is jointly and severally liable and that his or her liability is limited to the lesser of the two amounts mentioned in s. 160(e)(i) and (ii), namely (i) the value of the property transferred less the consideration, and (ii) the total of all amounts which the transferor is liable to pay in or in respect of the year of the transfer or any preceding year, that is to say, for the year of the transfer and for any preceding years.
Secondly, s. 160(2) provides that the Minister of National Revenue ("the Minister") may at any time make an assessment. This is also quite clear. However, the limit imposed in s. 160(1)(e) must be observed for each assessment. 6. Thirdly, I would say that there is no provision of the Act regarding interest that may be applicable to an assessment issued pursuant to s. 160 of the Act. This is logical, since there is no new tax debt and an assessment under s. 160 already incorporates the interest which the transferor owed in addition to the tax. The assessment may also incorporate penalties and interest thereon.
. . .
27 The Appeal is allowed and the matter is referred back to the Minister of National Revenue for reconsideration and reassessment on the basis that the Appellant is not liable for interest on the Estate debt from December 31st of the year of the transfer. [Emphasis added.] [16] Thereafter, Archambault J. made a thorough analysis on this particular issue to which I wholeheartedly subscribe. I reproduce here his reasoning:
As always, it is important to cite the relevant provisions of the Act as a starting point for any analysis where there is a dispute as to interpretation:
160. (1) Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to
. . .
(e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to limit the liability of the

Digitized by Google

transferor under any other provision of this Act.
160. (1) Lorsqu'une personne a, depuis le 1er mai 1951, transféré des biens, directement ou indirectement, au moyen d'une fiducie ou de toute autre façon à l'une des personnes suivantes :
. . .

e) le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement en vertu de la présente loi d'un montant égal au moins élevé des montants suivants :
(ii) l'excédent éventuel de la juste valeur marchande des biens au moment du transfert sur la juste valeur marchande à ce moment de la contrepartie donnée pour le bien,
(ii) le total des montants dont chacun représente un montant que l'auteur du transfert doit payer en vertu de la présente loi au cours de l'année d'imposition dans laquelle les biens ont été transférés ou d'une année d'imposition antérieure ou pour une de ces années;
aucune disposition du présent paragraphe n'est toutefois réputée limiter la responsabilité de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de quelque autre disposition de la présente loi.
[Emphasis added.]
In response to Currie, counsel for the respondent cited Montreuil v. R., 1994 CarswellNat 2034, [1994]
T.C.J. No 418 (QL), [1996] 1 C.T.C. 2182, a decision rendered in 1994 by the late Judge Dussault. In that decision, which is not mentioned in Currie, Judge Dussault adopted an interpretation of subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) that is the opposite of that adopted in Currie. Indeed, he held that that subparagraph covered "all interest compounded on an outstanding tax debt for a specified preceding taxation year at the time of the transfer or for the taxation year during which the transfer occurred, whether these are compounded before or after the year of the transfer." [Emphasis added.] Judge Dussault based that ruling on the following analysis, found at paragraphs 43 to 46 CarswellNat (39 to 42 QL):
43 On the second question, we need at the outset to recall that on the date of death, which in my view is also the date of the transfer as I explained above, paragraph 160(1)(e) of the Act prescribed that the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay an amount equal to the lesser of the amounts specified in subparagraphs 160(1)(e)(i) and (ii), i.e.:
the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and the aggregate of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year.
In view of the facts admitted, the only problem here concerns the interpretation of subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) for the purpose of establishing the tax liability of the transferor pursuant to this provision because it is used as one of the parameters to determine the quantum of the transferee's liability. [...] Subsection 161(1) of the Act prescribes that interest is payable on any excess unpaid tax for a taxation year and that it is "computed for the period during which that excess is outstanding". In fact interest is compounded daily, and since 1987, compounded daily pursuant to subsection 248(11) of the Act. The rate is prescribed by Part XLIII of the Income Tax Regulations. Interest is payable as provided in subsection 161(1) for as long as the tax payable for a "taxation year" remains outstanding. Hence the only relationship that exists between the interest on an outstanding tax liability and a "specified taxation year" is precisely the relationship established in subsection 161(1) of the Act based on the amount of tax unpaid for this taxation year and "for the period during which" the amount is outstanding. The tax is the principal and the interest is the accessory. In this sense, interest that compounds until full payment of an outstanding taxation amount for a specified "taxation year" prior to the transfer constitutes, whatever the year in which it is compounded, an amount that the transferor is required to pay under the Act "in respect of" this preceding taxation year according to the wording of subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) as it applied prior to December 17, 1987, or "in or in respect of" this preceding year according to the wording that has applied since that date. Indeed, the Bordas dictionary40 defines the expression "à l'égard de" in its usual and modern sense as meaning "envers" and "en ce qui concerne". Moreover, the Grand Robert de la langue française41 gives particularly to the word "pour" the meaning of "en ce qui concerne" and "par rapport à". The English expression used in subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) "in respect of" has the same meaning and in my view corroborates the interpretation to the effect that these expressions cover all interest compounded on an outstanding tax liability for a specified preceding taxation year at the time of the transfer or for the taxation year during which the transfer occurred, whether these are compounded before or after the year of the transfer. We also know that the words "in respect of" have a very wide meaning, as recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada in Norwegijick. In his judgment in this case, Dickson J., who was later to become Chief Justice, analyzed these words in the following terms:

Digitized by Google

The words "in respect of" are, in my opinion, words of the widest possible scope. They import such meanings as "in relation to", "with reference to" or "in connection with". The phrase "in respect of" is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters.

In my view, this is enough to dispose of the second point. The question of determining whether an amount assessed under section 160 bears interest by application of section 161 was not raised as such and is not directly in issue here, and I thus need not rule on this question.[149]

[Emphasis added.]

19 In my view, Judge Dussault's interpretation is entirely consistent with the [149] He would rule on this issue in Algoa Trust v. Canada, [1998] TCJ No. 292 (QL), 98 DTC 1614. Judge Dussault's footnotes have been omitted.

Digitized by Google

wording of subsection 160(1) of the Act. Though it is true that, as Judge Dussault held, the meaning of the French expression "pour une de ces années" is broad enough to include the meanings of "en ce qui concerne" and "par rapport à", the English version of subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) dispels all doubt by defining tax debt, for the purposes of section 160, as "an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year". If the words "in respect of" were not in the provision, it might be argued that the tax debt is that which existed at the end of the year during which the transfer was made. However, Parliament clearly intended, by adding the words "or in respect of", not to impose any such limit. 20 Not only is Judge Dussault's interpretation more consistent with the wording of the section, it is also more consistent with Parliament's intention. Indeed, when a taxpayer transfers property to a person with whom he or she is not dealing at arm's length for a consideration that is less than the fair market value of the property, the taxpayer is diminishing his or her assets by an amount that could be used to pay off his or her tax debt. A taxpayer's tax debt is not limited to the tax owed, but also includes interest and, if applicable, penalties. Why would Parliament want tax authorities to be unable to recover the interest owed by the tax debtor when the benefit received by the transferee is enough to allow him or her to assume such an obligation?

In addition, I do not accept that Judge Dussault had rejected that interpretation in his opinion for Algoa Trust, mentioned in Currie. On the one hand, he did not do so explicitly, since he did not cite Montreuil. On the other hand, there is nothing in his reasoning in Algoa Trust that would lead me to believe that he changed his interpretation of subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) of the Act.

Let us briefly review the facts of that case. Algoa Trust was a shareholder of the Jaans Leasing. That company had reported dividends totalling $78,000 in May and September 1982 in favour of Algoa Trust. At the time of the transfer, Jaans had a tax debt of $88,244.82, $21,952.37 of which was tax for 1980 and 1981 and $66,292.45 was interest (that is, an amount more than three times as high as the tax) in respect of the 1978 to 1982 taxation years. (See Judge Rip's reasons for Algoa Trust v. Canada, [1993] TCJ No. 15 (QL), 93 DTC 405 at page 406.) One of the important issues before Judge Rip was whether the dividends constituted a transfer of property within the meaning of section 160. Judge Rip held that that was the case and confirmed the assessment made by the Minister under section 160. However, payments had been made by Jaans, or by another party on behalf of Jaans, to reduce its tax debt, and those payments had been made during different taxation years from those indicated at the time of payment. Allowing the appeal, Judge Rip referred the notice of assessment back to the Minister in order that he redetermine the interest taking into account the payments made.

In the reassessment resulting from Judge Rip's decision, the Minister determined a tax debt balance of $25,278.60, but Algoa Trust challenged that reassessment. Judge Dussault heard that appeal. At paragraph 8 of his Reasons, Judge Dussault stated that Jaans' tax debt for 1982 and the preceding years was $88,244.82, which was the same amount as that stated by Judge Rip. According to Judge Dussault, Algoa Trust made a payment of $57,387.14 on February 14, 1991. (See paragraph 13 of his decision.) That payment was not acknowledged until 1993 and was applied to reducing Jaans' debt retroactive to February 14, 1991. As the total benefit received by Algoa Trust, which was determined under subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the Act, was $78,000, the amount of the tax debt in respect of which Algoa Trust could be held jointly and severally liable, could not exceed $78,000, even though the debt was $88,244.82 and interest continued to accrue. Since it had paid $57,387, Algoa Trust could not have been held liable to pay more than $20,612.86 ($78,000 - $57,387.14).

Digitized by Google

That being said, there is nothing in Judge Dussault's reasoning that would lead me to conclude that Algoa Trust could not be held liable for interest accrued in respect of the tax debt owed after the year of the transfer. Quite on the contrary, the assessment under section 160 was dated November 20, 1989. On that date, $66,292 in interest had been calculated in respect of the 1978 to 1982 taxation years. Since the transfers were made in May and September 1982, it is quite likely that the interest of $66,292 in respect of the 1979 to 1982 taxation years was for a period that went beyond 1982. In fact, it is quite likely that the interest was calculated up to the date of the assessment made under section 160 and dated February 20, 1989. Judge Dussault wrote at paragraph 14 that, between November 20, 1989 (date of assessment), and February 14, 1991 (date of payment), the debt increased because of interest, and that, subsequently, the debt, reduced by the payment of $57,387.14, continued to increase, reaching $26,810.36 by December 21, 1995, according to the collection officer's calculations. That was the date of the second assessment before Judge Dussault. He wrote the following at paragraph 14:

Between November 20, 1989 (the date of the assessment) and February 14, 1991 the total debt increased because of interest, and subsequently the debt reduced by the payment of $57,387.14 continued to increase, reaching $26,810.36 by December 21, 1995 according to Mr. Gélinas's calculations. It is now perhaps $32,000 or $33,000, but again this is not significant. If Algoa Trust were assessed now for the first time and a payment of $57,387.14 were received the same day, clearly Algoa Trust could not be held liable for an amount greater than $20,612.86 pursuant to s. 160(1)(e) and (3)(a), namely the difference between the amount established under s. 160(1)(e), that is, $78,000, and the amount already paid, namely $57,387.14. Even if nothing were recovered from Algoa Trust for 50 years, in my opinion no more than $20,612.86 could ever be recovered.

[Emphasis added.]

To really understand the meaning of Judge Dussault's comments, it must be understood that he was making a distinction between the interest that could accrue on the amount established under section 160 and that which was being accrued on the transferor's tax debt. Judge Dussault only said that, in the first case, interest was not being accrued, while, in the second case, it was. He wrote the following at paragraph 6:

Digitized by Google

6. Thirdly, I would say that there is no provision of the Act regarding interest that may be applicable to an assessment issued pursuant to s. 160 of the Act. This is logical, since there is no new tax debt and an assessment under s. 160 already incorporates the interest which the transferor owed in addition to the tax. The assessment may also incorporate penalties and interest thereon.
[Emphasis added.]
His reasoning is clearly expressed at paragraph 3:
3. The rule stated in s. 160 of the Act does not have the effect of creating a tax debt. The effect of the provision is not to create a second debt: there is only one tax debt. The wording of the Act is quite clear: the purpose of s. 160 is essentially to add another debtor who is jointly and severally liable with the transferor. This new debtor is called the transferee. There is thus no new debt created under the Act and the obligation arises not from the assessment but from the Act itself. Fundamentally, therefore, there is only one debt and only that debt can bear interest.
[Emphasis added.]
Judge Dussault's reasoning seems to be cogent. If the Minister could charge interest in respect of the amount determined under section 160, he could, in some way, collect interest more than once on the same debt: once from the principal debtor and another time from the transferee (joint and several debtor). If there were several transferees, the Minister could have as many times the interest. In addition, if the interest could be calculated on the amount of the assessment determined under section 160, that could mean that the amount that the transferee may have to pay would exceed the amount of the benefit he or she received, which would be contrary to the intent of section 160. That would be unfair. 28 On the other hand, nothing prevents the Minister from holding the transferee liable for the interest owed by the transferor under section 160. Thus, he can assess the transferee to pay the interest owed by the transferor for any period after the year of the transfer, including, it would seem, a period following the assessment under section 160, as long as it is interest owed by the transferor. Obviously, as Judge Dussault held in Algoa Trust, that interest amount could not exceed the limit prescribed in subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the Act, that is, the amount of the benefit received by the transferee.
29 Accordingly, it cannot be convincingly argued that Judge Dussault held that the transferee could not be held liable for the interest accrued after the year of the transfer with respect to the transferor's tax debt. For these reasons, I rule that Ms. Gagnon is liable to pay the interest indicated in the assessment made by the Minister, namely, $7,257.73.
[17] There is not much that I can add to Archambault J.'s reasoning. In Montreuil, supra (followed by this court in Achtem v. M.N.R., 1995 CarswellNat 316), judge Dussault clearly interpreted subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) in such a way that the transferee is liable for the amount of tax owed by the transferor in respect of the taxation year in which the transfer took place or any preceding taxation year (including penalties assessed and interest accrued, after the year of the transfer, on the tax debt owed by the transferor) up to the amount of the benefit received by the transferee. In Algoa

Digitized by Google

Trust, supra, judge Dussault concluded that the tax assessed against the transferee pursuant to section 160 related to the transferor's tax liability, but the section 160 assessment itself did not attract interest, as interest was already included in the transferor's tax liability. My reading of the proposed amendment to subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) is that it is aimed at overruling that particular conclusion in Algoa Trust. The way in which the proposed amendment is drafted leads me to conclude that the purpose behind it is to have an assessment pursuant to section 160 considered as a distinct assessment with regard to which interest could accrue. Considering the recent decision in Zen v. Canada, 2010 FCA 180, it might not be necessary to amend subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii) at all. However, it is my understanding that this proposed amendment is not directed at the interest accruing on a transferor's amount of tax owed even after the year of the transfer, as it is clear from the actual wording of the provision that the transferee is jointly and severally liable with the transferor to pay the amount owed by the transferor in respect of the taxation year in which the transfer occurred and any preceding year. That amount, according to the decision in Montreuil, Achtem and Gagnon, supra, includes penalties and all interest accrued on the transferor's debt to the date the transferee is assessed but may not exceed the limit prescribed in subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the ITA. I will not follow the reasoning in Currie (a case heard under the informal procedure and which, pursuant to section 18.28 of the Tax Court of Canada Act, does not constitute a precedent), which, in my view, does not reflect what Judge Dussault said in Algoa Trust, supra. [18] In court, I also raised the point as to whether a section 160 assessment could cover the provincial tax owed by the transferor. Although the appellant did not dispute that it could, I just want to mention that such tax is covered by virtue of the definition of "amount payable" in subsection 223(1) of the ITA, which defines that expression as including an amount payable by a person under an Act of a province with which the Minister of Finance has entered into an agreement for the collection of taxes payable to that province under that Act, which is the case here.

[19] I therefore conclude that the appellant is liable pursuant to section 160 of the ITA for the lesser of 1) the total of all tax, penalties and interest accrued on the debt owed by his spouse in respect of the taxation year in which the transfer took place or any preceding taxation year ($9,011.78) and 2) the amount of the benefit received ($96,000, which is the fair market value of the property ($171,000) less the consideration paid for it ($75,000)). I will therefore confirm the assessment in the amount of $9,011.78.

[20] The appeal is dismissed.

Transferee Cannot Be Absolved with Due Diligence, but held to Strict Liability and Intent to Evade Irrelevant

A transferee cannot take steps to ascertain the tax liability of a transferor before receipt of a legal title so as to prevent being financially disenfranchised when CRA launches an action to collect from them. There is no defence of due diligence available here and the provision is to applied as a strict liability as was noted in Nancy Jo Wannan v. Her Majesty the Queen[150] where the Appeal Court provided:

Digitized by Google

> [3] Section 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important tax collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands. It is, however, a draconian provision. While not every use of section 160 is unwarranted or unfair, there is always some potential for an unjust result. There is no due diligence defence to the application of section 160. It may apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax. Indeed, it may apply to a transferee who has no knowledge of the tax affairs of the primary tax debtor. However, section 160 has been validly enacted as part of the law of Canada. If the Crown seeks to rely on section 160 in a particular case, it must be permitted to do so if the statutory conditions are met.

There is no requirement that the transferor and transferee act with some sort of mens rea via attempt to evade taxes by the transferor. This was provided in Suzanne Tétrault and Her Majesty the Queen[151] with:

[16] In Medland v. Canada, [1998] F.C.J. No. 708 (Q.L.), Madam Justice Desjardins of the Federal Court of Appeal wrote, at paragraph 14, that "the tax policy embodied in, or the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned [sic] to him." Although this is the purpose of the provision, Ms. Tétrault's representative is wrong in claiming that an intention to evade the tax must exist for this section to apply. In the first place, it is obvious that section 160 does not contain such a requirement. Moreover, this interpretation, that no intentional element is required, was adopted by my colleague Dussault J.T.C.C. in Montreuil et al. v. The Queen, 94 DTC 1821, at page 1828. Furthermore, the same approach was taken recently by the Federal Court of Appeal in Wannan v. Canada, [2003] F.C.J. No. 1693 (Q.L.), at paragraph 3. Here is what it says:

Section 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important tax collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands. It is, however, a draconian provision.... It may apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax. Indeed, it may apply to a transferee who has no knowledge of the tax affairs of the primary tax debtor....

The fact that the taxpayer transferee can be assessed at practically any time with respect to the transferor's tax liability is a serious problem since it may prevent them from recourse to the transferor on property they thought they had obtained clearly title to. This issue has been discussed in Canada v. Addison & Leyen Ltd.[152]where the Supreme Court held:

---

[150] 2003 FCA 423
[151] 2004TCC332
[152] [2007] 2 S.C.R.

Digitized by Google

Her Majesty The Queen in Right of Canada and Canada Customs and Revenue Agency Appellants v.

Addison & Leyen Ltd., Concrest Corporation Ltd.,

John Joseph Dietrich, Jeannette Marie Dietrich, Rofamco Investments Ltd., Wilfrid Daniel Roach and Helen Ann Roach Respondents

Indexed as: Canada v. Addison & Leyen Ltd. Neutral citation: 2007 SCC 33.

File No.: 31451.

2007: May 24; 2007: July 12.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Abella and Charron JJ. on appeal from the federal court of appeal

Taxation — Income tax — Tax liability — Property transferred not at arm's length — Taxpayers assessed pursuant to s. 160 of Income Tax Act in respect of non-arm's length transfers of property at less than fair market value — Provision expressly authorizing Minister of National Revenue to assess "at any time" — Assessment made after long delay — Taxpayers filing notices of objection but no appeal raised in Tax Court Judicial review sought in Federal Court of discretionary assessment — Whether length of delay before decision to assess taxpayers enough to ground judicial review — Whether regular appeal process could have dealt with tax liability issues — Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), s. 160 — Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, s. 18.5.

Administrative law — Judicial review — Availability — Jurisdiction of Federal Court — Taxpayers assessed pursuant to s. 160 of Income Tax Act in respect of non-arm's length transfers of property at less than fair market value — Provision expressly authorizing Minister of National Revenue to assess "at any time" — Assessment made after long delay — Taxpayers filing notices of objection but no appeal raised in Tax Court Judicial review sought in Federal Court of discretionary assessment — Whether judicial review available Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), s. 160 — Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, s. 18.5. In February 2001, the Minister of National Revenue sent notices of assessment to the respondent taxpayers pursuant to s. 160 of the Income Tax Act for taxes owing by a company to the limit of the payments received by them as direct or indirect shareholders of that company. The Minister had concluded the company's taxes, which arose from a 1992 assessment of its 1989 taxation year, were not recoverable. The taxpayers filed notices of objection in May 2001, to which Revenue Canada did not respond, but never appealed to the Tax Court. In 2005, the taxpayers applied for judicial review, under s. 18.5 of the Federal Courts Act, of the Crown's decision to use its discretionary assessment powers under s. 160, arguing that the long delay before the assessment was abusive, prevented their mounting a proper challenge to the assessment's validity in the Tax Court and deprived them of any possibility of indemnification by the primary taxpayer. The Federal Court granted the Crown's motion to strike the claim, but a majority of the Federal Court of Appeal reversed that decision and allowed the application for judicial review to proceed. Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Digitized by Google

On the facts of this case, judicial review was not available because the Minister can assess at any time as s. 160 of the Income Tax Act contains no limitation period. This does not mean that the exercise of this discretion is never reviewable, but the length of the delay before a decision whether or not to assess is not enough to ground judicial review. The length of delay might, however, ground a remedy like mandamus to prod the Minister to act with due diligence. Furthermore, the allegations of fact here did not show that the regular appeal process could not have dealt with the tax liability issues. [9-10]

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, s. 18.5.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), ss. 152, 160.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal (Rothstein, Sharlow and Malone JJ.A.), [2006] 4 F.C.R. 532, 265 D.L.R. (4th) 253, 346 N.R. 238, [2006] 3 C.T.C. 95, 2006 2007 SCC 33 (CanLII) D.T.C. 6248, [2006] F.C.J. No. 489 (QL), 2006 FCA 107, reversing a judgment of Kelen J., [2005] 2 C.T.C. 201, 2005 D.T.C. 5212, [2005] F.C.J. No. 516 (QL), 2005 FC 411. Appeal allowed.

Graham R. Garton, Q.C., and Wendy Burnham, for the appellants.

Roderick A. McLennan, Q.C., H. M. Kay, Q.C., Curtis R. Stewart and L. A. Goldbach, for the respondents. The following is the judgment delivered by

THE COURT — The respondents applied for judicial review of a tax assessment issued by the Minister of National Revenue under s. 160 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"). On a motion by the Crown, the Federal Court struck the application. A majority of the Federal Court of Appeal reversed this judgment and allowed the application for judicial review to proceed. For the reasons that follow, we are of the view that the Crown's motion to strike was well founded, that its appeal should be allowed and that the application for judicial review should be struck.

The present litigation arises out of the tax planning decisions that were made several years ago and the business dealings that were subsequently transacted. In 1989, the respondents, who held shares, directly or indirectly, in a company, York Beverages (1968) Ltd. ("York"), which had sold its bottling business the year before, sold their York shares to another company, Synergy Inc. ("Synergy"). Synergy planned to use York's cash in hand to purchase seismic data and reduce York's tax liability to zero. Between the time of the sales of the bottling business and of the York shares, the respondents received various payments from York in the form of dividends, directors' fees, loan repayments, etc.

In 1992, the Minister of National Revenue reassessed York for the 1989 taxation year under s. 152 ITA after determining that the seismic data had been overvalued. The reassessment was for $3,247,074.05, including a penalty and interest. York filed a notice of objection. The Minister never responded and York never appealed to the Tax Court of Canada.

Digitized by Google

At some point, the Minister concluded that nothing would ever be recovered from York. In February 2001, the Minister sent notices of assessment to the respondents under s. 160 ITA. In the notices of assessment, the Minister claimed York's entire tax liability from the respondents, jointly and severally, and the amount assessed in respect of each of the respondents was limited to the amount of the payments that person had received from York in 1988 and 1989. Including interest, the claim now exceeds $6,000,000.

The respondents filed notices of objection in May 2001. Revenue Canada never dealt with the objections and the respondents never appealed to the Tax Court of Canada. In 2005, they applied for judicial review of the Crown's decision to use its discretion to assess them under s. 160 ITA. They submitted that the long delay in issuing the assessment was abusive, prevented them from mounting a proper challenge to the validity of the assessment in the Tax Court and deprived them of any possibility of indemnification by the primary taxpayer.

The Crown moved to strike the application for judicial review. In the Federal Court, Kelen J. granted the motion and struck the application: [2005] 2 C.T.C. 201, 2005 FC 411. He found that judicial review was not available to the respondents and that they could and ought to have pursued alternative remedies. The majority of the Federal Court of Appeal reversed the trial judgment: [2006] 4 F.C.R. 532, 2006 FCA 107. Sharlow J.A. held that the Federal Court had jurisdiction over the matter and that the test for granting a motion to strike had not been met. She stated that judicial review might be available on the issue of the exercise of the discretion to assess a taxpayer under s. 160 ITA. Rothstein J.A. (as he then was), in dissent, would have upheld Kelen J.'s judgment. He was of the view that a delay in issuing an assessment under s. 160 is not reviewable by the Federal Court under its judicial review jurisdiction.

The issue in this appeal is whether judicial review under s. 18.5 of the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7, is available to challenge the exercise of the Minister's discretion to assess a taxpayer under s. 160 ITA. What the case actually turns on, however, is the interpretation of s. 160.

We need not engage in a lengthy theoretical discussion on whether s. 18.5 can be used to review the exercise of ministerial discretion. It is not disputed that the Minister belongs to the class of persons and entities that fall within the Federal Court's jurisdiction under s. 18.5. Judicial review is available, provided the matter is not otherwise appealable. It is also available to control abuses of power, including abusive delay. Fact-specific remedies may be crafted to address the wrongs or problems raised by a particular case.

Digitized by Google

> Nevertheless, we find that judicial review was not available on the facts of this case. As Rothstein J.A. pointed out, the interpretation of s. 160 ITA by the majority of the Federal Court of Appeal amounted to reading into that provision a limitation period that was simply not there. The Minister can assess a taxpayer at any time. In the words of Rothstein J.A.:
>
> While in the sense identified by the majority, subsection 160(1) may be considered a harsh collection remedy, it is also narrowly targeted. It only affects transfers of property to persons in specified relationships or capacities and only when the transfer is for less than fair market value. Having regard to the application of subsection 160(1) in specific and limited circumstances, Parliament's intent is not obscure. Parliament intended that the Minister be able to recover amounts transferred in these limited circumstances for the purpose of satisfying the tax liability of the primary taxpayer transferor. The circumstances of such transactions mak[e] it clear that Parliament intended that there be no applicable limitation period and no other condition on when the Minister might assess. [para. 92]
>
> The Minister is granted the discretion to assess a taxpayer at any time. This does not mean that the exercise of this discretion is never reviewable. However, in light of the words "at any time" used by Parliament in s. 160 ITA, the length of the delay before a decision on assessing a taxpayer is made does not suffice as a ground for judicial review, except, perhaps, inasmuch as it allows for a remedy like mandamus to prod the Minister to act with due diligence once a notice of objection has been filed. Moreover, in the case at bar, the allegations of fact in the statement of claim do not disclose any reason why it would have been impossible to deal with the tax liability issues relating to either the underlying tax assessment against York or the assessments against the respondents through the regular appeal process.
>
> Reviewing courts should be very cautious in authorizing judicial review in such circumstances. The integrity and efficacy of the system of tax assessments and appeals should be preserved. Parliament has set up a complex structure to deal with a multitude of tax-related claims and this structure relies on an independent and specialized court, the Tax Court of Canada. Judicial review should not be used to develop a new form of incidental litigation designed to circumvent the system of tax appeals established by Parliament and the jurisdiction of the Tax Court. Judicial review should remain a remedy of last resort in this context.
>
> For these reasons, the appeal is allowed, the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal is set aside and the judgment of the motions judge is restored, with costs.

Possible to Contest Transferor's Tax Liability as a Latent Party

They're called derivative actions: where a 3rd party who is not one of the initial two parties to a contest, have an interest and should seek independent "natural justice"

Digitized by Google

from a decision that has been provided. In the context of a s. 160 assessment the transferee has an interest in any proceedings that give effect to the transferor's liability upon which the s. 160 assessment has been based. At least, this was the opinion of the Appeal Court in Joanne M. Gaucher v. The Queen[153] where the transferee attempted to argue such, given that the defence of statute-barred assessment had not been raised by the primary taxpayer- transferor at the TCC, when it held:

> [1] The issue in this appeal is whether a taxpayer assessed under a derivative assessment pursuant to subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act may object to that assessment by challenging the primary assessment on which the derivative assessment is based.
>
> [2] The appellant's former husband was assessed for approximately $350,000 of tax. The assessment was confirmed by the Tax Court of Canada. Shortly before the Tax Court confirmed the assessment, the appellant's former husband transferred a residence to her. A few months later, the former husband declared bankruptcy.
>
> …
>
> [4] The appellant now says that the Minister reassessed her former husband after the three year limitation period provided in subsection 152(3.1) had expired and wishes to raise the limitation period as a defence to her assessment under subsection 160(1). The Minister says that she may not raise this defence because, once the former husband's assessment was confirmed by the Tax Court, it cannot be challenged. By assessing after the expiry of the limitation period, the Minister says that the Minister must be presumed to have alleged misrepresentation, that the limitation defence was not raised by the appellant's former husband in his appeal and that the appellant is precluded from now raising it in her appeal.
>
> [5] The learned Tax Court Judge agreed with the Minister. He stated at paragraph 10 of his reasons:
>
> In the end, I conclude that the Appellant is precluded from claiming the defense that the reassessment of her former husband was statute-barred on the basis that the Tax Court of Canada confirmed the Minister's reassessment and it is not open to the Appellant to interfere with that decision. Given the facts of the case, Margeson J. confirmed the Minister's assessment [of the former husband], not to mention that Haynes conceded at the beginning of trial that part of the amounts in dispute were properly assessed.
>
> …
>
> [6] I am of the respectful view that the Tax Court Judge was in error in coming to this conclusion. It is a basic rule of natural justice that, barring a statutory provision to the contrary, a person who is not a party to litigation cannot be bound by a judgment between other parties. The appellant was not a party to the reassessment proceedings between the Minister and her former husband. Those proceedings did not purport to impose any liability on her. While she may have been a witness in those proceedings, she was not a party, and hence could not in those proceedings raise defences to her former husband's assessment.

---

[153] A-275-00

Digitized by Google

[7] When the Minister issues a derivative assessment under subsection 160(1), a special statutory provision is invoked entitling the Minister to seek payment from a second person for the tax assessed against the primary tax payer. That second person must have a full right of defence to challenge the assessment made against her, including an attack on the primary assessment on which the second person's assessment is based.

[8] This view has been expressed by Judges of the Tax Court. See, for example, Acton v. The Queen (1994), 95 D.T.C. 107, at 108 per Bowman T.C.C.J.; Ramey v. The Queen (1993), 93 D.T.C. 791, at 792 per Bowman T.C.C.J.; Thorsteinson v. M.N.R. (1980), 80 D.T.C. 1369, at 1372 per Taylor T.C.C.J. While the contrary view was expressed in Schafer (A.) v. Canada, [1998] G.S.T.C. 7-1, at 7-9 (appeal dismissed for delay (August 30, 1999), A-258-98 (F.C.A.)), I am of the respectful opinion that such view is in error. It seems to me that this approach fails to appreciate that what is at issue are two separate assessments between the Minister and two different taxpayers. Once the assessment against the primary taxpayer is finalized, either because the primary taxpayer does not appeal the assessment, or the assessment is confirmed by the Tax Court (or a higher court if further appealed), that assessment is final and binding between the primary taxpayer and the Minister. An assessment issued under subsection 160(1) against a secondary taxpayer cannot affect the assessment between the Minister and the primary taxpayer.

[9] By the same token, since the secondary taxpayer was not a party in the proceedings between the Minister and the primary taxpayer, she is not bound by the assessment against the primary taxpayer. The secondary taxpayer is entitled to raise any defence that the primary taxpayer could have raised against the primary assessment. The result may be that the assessment against the secondary taxpayer is quashed or is found to be for a lesser amount than the assessment against the primary taxpayer. That, of course, will have no effect on the assessment against the primary tax payer against whom the primary assessment was final and binding.

…

[11] There is no reason why the appellant cannot raise the limitation period as a defence to the assessment made against her under subsection 160(1).

[12] As indicated in paragraph 4, there is some suggestion in the material that there may have been misrepresentation by the primary taxpayer that entitled the Minister to invoke subsection 152(4) and assess after the normal assessment period. Subsection 152(4) provides:

152. (4) The Minister may at any time make an assessment, reassessment or additional assessment of tax for a taxation year, interest or penalties, if any, payable under this Part by a taxpayer or notify in writing any person by whom a return of income for a taxation year has been filed that no tax is payable for the year, except that an assessment, reassessment or additional assessment may be made after the taxpayer's normal reassessment period in respect of the year only if

(a) the taxpayer or person filing the return

Digitized by Google

(i) has made any misrepresentation that is attributable to neglect, carelessness or wilful default or has committed any fraud in filing the return or in supplying any information under this Act ...

It will be open to the parties to address the question of misrepresentation, if it arises, by calling evidence in the Tax Court appeal.
[13] This appeal will be allowed with costs in this Court and in the Tax Court. The decision of the Tax Court will be set aside. In the appeal of her subsection 160(1) assessment, the appellant may raise before the Tax Court any defence that her former husband could have raised in respect of his assessment.

Prescription on Tax Debt and When Minister May Make Assessment

A tax debt "falls off the table" and is not actionable for collection past a certain point in time as a consequence of Markevich v. Canada[154] but when does that period of time start in relation to debts that previously existed and taxpayer actions that were latently executed in respect of them. This was the issue in Huguette Bleau v. The Queen[155]:

Position of the parties
[8] Counsel for Ms. Bleau maintained that at the time the assessment pursuant to section 160 of the Act was arrived at, on June 28, 2001, the tax debt of 6421 was barred by limitation under section 32 of the Crown Liability Act, which stipulates that proceedings shall be taken within six years. Pursuant to section 225.1 of the Act, the date for calculating the time limit for the recovery of this tax debt is, according to Counsel for Ms. Bleau, June 10, 1995,[194] or 90 days after March 13, 1995, the date on which the assessment in respect of 6421 was established. As was recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada in Markevich (supra), the recovery of a tax debt is subject to a limitation of six years from the cause of action. Consequently, since no recovery action was taken during the period from March 13, 1995 to June 28, 2001, the tax debt of 6421 was extinguished on June 10, 2001, or became, at the very least, not payable.
[9] Counsel added that one must refer to the provisions of the Civil Code of Quebec (Civil Code) because of the use of the concept of joint and several liability stipulated by section 160 and because of the application of section 8.1 of the Interpretation Act. Since section 160 creates joint and several liability and we are dealing here with joint and several liability in respect of the same debt and not two separate debts, articles 1531 and 1671 of the Civil Code apply.[195]
[10] Subsidiarily, he maintains, rightly, that repayment of an advance is not a transfer within the meaning of section 160 of the Act. However, the only repayment of an advance that has been demonstrated before me is the repayment of the $46,693 which 6421 owed to Projets and this amount does not form part of the amount of the assessment. This argument is accordingly unfounded, in light of the facts.

[154] [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94
[155] 2006TCC36

Digitized by Google

[11] The final argument of Counsel for Ms. Bleau is that the Minister had informed her that the settlement offer was comprehensive; Ms. Bleau could not, consequently, suspect that an assessment would be established under section 160 of the Act.

[12] As far as the Respondent is concerned, Counsel maintains that the tax debt of 6421 in respect of its 1990 taxation year was not extinguished, since Ms. Bleau's liability was created at the time of the transfer in 1992 (less than two years after the creation of the tax debt), and not at the time of the assessment of June 28, 2001, as Counsel for Ms. Bleau stated. Counsel based her argument on the decision by the Federal Court of Appeal in Heavyside v. Canada, [1996] F.C.J. No. 1608 (QL), in particular paragraphs 9 and 10 of the reasons given by Décary J.A., which I will reproduce:

Once the conditions of subsection 160(1) are met, as they are in the present case, the transferee becomes personally liable to pay the tax determined under that subsection (here, $2,759.50). That liability arises at the moment of the transfer (here, June 6, 1989) and is joint and several with that of the transferor. The Minister may "at any time" thereafter assess the transferee (subsection 160(2) and the transferee's joint liability will only disappear with a payment made by her or by the transferor in accordance with subsection 160(3)).

The moment chosen by the Minister to assess the transferee is of no consequence. It is trite law that liability for tax results from the act and not from the assessment and that in the instant case it is the transfer that triggers the liability. The respondent, therefore, was personally liable, in her 1989 taxation year, for income tax in respect of the gains from the disposition of the property transferred and her liability being joint and several with that of her husband, it had a life of its own and survived the eventual extinguishment through bankruptcy, in 1994, of her husband's own tax liability. The fact that she was assessed only in 1994 and only after her husband's discharge is irrelevant as far as her own liability is concerned.

[My emphasis.]

[13] Counsel for the Respondent also cites paragraph 16 of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Markevich (supra), where the said Court emphasises that an assessment under section 160 of the Act may be made at any time by virtue of subsection 160(2):

16 This conclusion is supported by the explicit manner in which the ITA addresses limitation periods in its assessment provisions. The Court held in Friesen, supra at para. 27, that [r]eading extra words into a statutory definition is even less acceptable when the phrases which must be read in appear in several other definitions in the same statute". Numerous provisions in the ITA expressly stipulate that that the Minister may make an assessment "at any time": see ss. 152(4), 152(4.2), 159(3), 160(2), 160.1(3), 160.2(3), 160.3(2), 160.4(3) and 227(10.1). Parliament has demonstrated a clear willingness to address the issue of limitation periods in the ITA where it sees fit to do so. As Rothstein J.A. noted at para. 22, "Parliament has put its mind to the limitation question in the Income Tax Act and when it intends there to be no limitation period, it has so stated."

Digitized by Google

Accordingly, the unescapable conclusion is that the plain language used in the collection provisions does not support the inference that Parliament intended to exclude the application of limitation provisions to the Minister's collection powers.
[My emphasis.]
[14] Consequently, since the Minister was able to issue an assessment under section 160 at any time, that at the relevant moment, namely on the date of the transfer by 6421 to Ms. Bleau, the tax debt of that corporation was not extinguished because of the application of a limitation period and the other conditions for the application of section 160 are met, the assessment of the Minister is well founded.
[15] Subsidiarily, the Respondent maintains that the changes made to section 222 of the Act, in particular the addition of the new subsection 222(10), have the effect that, even if the Court were to conclude that the tax debt of 6421 is extinguished, this tax debt was re-established with effect from March 4, 2004, and, as a result, the assessment pursuant to section 160 is well founded. The Respondent cited, in support of her position, the decision of the Federal Court in Gibson v. Canada, [2005] F.C.J. No. 817(QL), 2005 FCA 180.
expressly stipulate that that the Minister may make an assessment "at any time": see ss. 152(4), 152(4.2), 159(3), 160(2), 160.1(3), 160.2(3), 160.3(2), 160.4(3) and 227(10.1). Parliament has demonstrated a clear willingness to address the issue of limitation periods in the ITA where it sees fit to do so. As Rothstein J.A. noted at para. 22, "Parliament has put its mind to the limitation question in the Income Tax Act and when it intends there to be no limitation period, it has so stated." Accordingly, the unescapable conclusion is that the plain language used in the collection provisions does not support the inference that Parliament intended to exclude the application of limitation provisions to the Minister's collection powers.
[My emphasis.]
[14] Consequently, since the Minister was able to issue an assessment under section 160 at any time, that at the relevant moment, namely on the date of the transfer by 6421 to Ms. Bleau, the tax debt of that corporation was not extinguished because of the application of a limitation period and the other conditions for the application of section 160 are met, the assessment of the Minister is well founded.
[15] Subsidiarily, the Respondent maintains that the changes made to section 222 of the Act, in particular the addition of the new subsection 222(10), have the effect that, even if the Court were to conclude that the tax debt of 6421 is extinguished, this tax debt was re-established with effect from March 4, 2004, and, as a result, the assessment pursuant to section 160 is well founded. The Respondent cited, in support of her position, the decision of the Federal Court in Gibson v. Canada, [2005] F.C.J. No. 817(QL), 2005 FCA 180.

Analysis
[16] The relevant provisions of section 160 of the Act are as follows:

Digitized by Google

…
[17] For the reasons cited by Counsel for the Respondent and analyzed at paragraphs 12 to 14 above, I believe that the tax debt of 6421 was not extinguished at the relevant moment. In fact, the assessment under section 160 may be made at any time and is thus not subject to a time limit. With regard to the conditions under which section 160 is applicable, the only condition that applies here was the existence of a debt owed by the transferor to the Crown and, since the relevant moment for determining whether such a tax debt existed is the date of transfer – here less than two years after the creation of the tax debt, - this date is not extinguished as a result of a time limit. Consequently, the Minister's assessment is well founded and it is not necessary to comment on the subsidiary argument of Counsel for the Respondent.
[18] With regard to the subsidiary argument of Ms. Bleau, based on the concept of joint and several liability and on the modes of extinction set out in the Civil Code, also seems to me ill founded. In fact, in order to apply the provisions of the Civil Code, such application must be in accordance with the requirements of section 8.1 of the Interpretation Act. Its rules must be used in applying the Act and there must be no rule of law that militates against it. This section stipulates the following:
8.1 Both the common law and the civil law are equally authoritative and recognized sources of the law of property and civil rights in Canada and, unless otherwise provided by law, if in interpreting an enactment it is necessary to refer to a province's rules, principles or concepts forming part of the law of property and civil rights, reference must be made to the rules, principles and concepts in force in the province at the time the enactment is being applied.
[My emphasis.]
[19] I see nothing here that might indicate the need to revert to the concept of solidarity found in the Civil Code or to the causes of extinction provided for under articles 1531 and 1671 of the Civil Code. On the contrary, section 160 of the Act, in my view, provides a complete code of rules regarding the liability of a transferee of a good in respect of the tax debt of the transferor. The amount in respect of which a transferee may be held liable is calculated on the basis of paragraph 160(1)(e) of the Act. Subsection 160(3) of the Act describes the circumstances under which the obligation of the transferee to pay the tax debt of the transferor may be extinguished. Use of the provisions of the Civil Code would constitute an unjustified interference in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act on the Minister to collect federal taxes.
[Footnotes omitted.]
[20] In support of this interpretation, there are these comments by Décary J.A. in Heavyside, at paragraphs 12 and 14:
12 There is no doubt that the husband's discharge from bankruptcy relieves him from paying the Minister the amount due by him under section 160 of the Income Tax Act; this is made clear by subsection 178(2) of the Bankruptcy Act. But the order of discharge does not extinguish the debt; it is personal to the husband and does not affect the liability of the respondent who is jointly bound.

Digitized by Google

As noted by Sarchuk T.C.J., in Garland, when referring to Section 179 of the Bankruptcy Act, it is clear that the Bankruptcy Act did not intend a person who was "jointly bound" with the bankrupt to be released by the discharge of the bankrupt. Unless a payment be made under the terms of subsection 160(3) of the Act, the transferee's liability remains, and a discharge under the Bankruptcy Act is simply not a payment under the terms of subsection 160(3).

...

14 To allow the Respondent to escape her tax liability in the present case because of her husband's discharge from bankruptcy would be to allow what Parliament precisely sought to prevent by the adoption of section 160.

[My emphasis.]

or Regulation or any portion of an Act or regulation" and the word "Act" has the meaning of an "Act of Parliament". Thus, the first condition is met.

[28] The second condition is that it must be necessary to refer to a province's rules, principles or concepts forming part of the law of property and civil rights. For the purposes of defining "property and civil rights", it is important to remember that this phrase is found in subsection 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which specifies the classes of subjects in respect of which the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws. Professors Brun and Tremblay clarify the scope of subsection 92(13):

[TRANSLATION]

Subsection 92(13) legitimizes the greater part of what is considered civil law in Quebec and is traditionally included in the Civil Code. In the other provinces, the corresponding matters within the common law system also come under provincial jurisdiction.

...

[30] The third condition requires that there should be no "law" precluding reference to the rules, principles and concepts forming part of the law of property and civil rights. The expression used is "unless otherwise provided by law". Molot elucidates the scope of this condition:

... In the case of cl. 8.1, there appear to be two point [sic] in the interpretive process where a federal enactment could "otherwise provide". Federal legislation may make it "unnecessary to refer" to provincial private law principles, or may express an intention that reference not be made to rules, etc. of the province concerned. For example, such legislation could so comprehensively define its terms as to implicitly exclude any reference to provincial private law as the external source of interpretation and application. Federal legislation could also expressly refer to some other external source of interpretation thereby demonstrating a contrary intent as regards it being "necessary to refer to a province's rules … " [Emphasis added.]

Mortgage Payments – A Classic Transfer

When a tax debtor makes a payment towards another's mortgage it has been held as a transfer for purposes of s. 160. This was the case in the appeal case of Medland

Digitized by Google

v. The Queen[156] where it was held, on appeal from the TCC that:

> [3] The applicant and her husband, Mr. John Medland, purchased a house in 1985 as joint tenants. The purchase was financed in part by way of a mortgage loan from the Toronto Dominion Bank. They were joint mortgagors. The mortgage, which was renewed a number of times, was secured by the property. On April 8, 1987, the applicant and her husband, as joint tenants, transferred the property to the applicant alone without any consideration being given. The husband then, alone, made all payments on the mortgage for a total sum of $39,979.74. The mortgage payments were made by Mr. Medland issuing cheques to the Toronto Dominion Bank from his personal and business accounts and directing that the funds from those cheques be used to make the mortgage payments. On June 10, 1994, the Minister assessed the applicant $38,857.48 pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act representing the lesser of (a) Mr. Medland's unpaid liability under the Income Tax Act of British Columbia and section 36 of the Canada Pension Plan, and (b) the value of property allegedly transferred by Mr. Medland to the applicant. The applicant objected to the assessment. The Minister later reassessed the applicant thereby reducing the amount assessed to $15,219.56 on the basis that the value of the property allegedly transferred to the applicant was not more than the sum of the mortgage payments attributable to the principal, namely $13,321.69 plus $1,897.87 in interest. Mr. Medland is indebted to the Minister in excess of $49,000 as of June 10, 1994, in respect of his 1990, 1991, 1992 and 1993 taxation years, of which $24,288.83 was in respect of federal taxes.
>
> The decision under review
>
> [4] Before the Tax Court judge, the applicant submitted that her husband never transferred property to her, either directly or indirectly, pursuant to subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act. The mortgage payments were made directly to the Bank. Mr. Medland, she said, paid his own liability to the Bank. Following the transfer by the applicant and her husband of the property to the applicant alone on April 8, 1987, Mr. Medland remained fully liable to the Bank. His liability under the mortgage in question was joint and several with that of the applicant. Thus, she argued, there was no indirect transfer of property. If a benefit was conferred on the applicant, it was not covered by subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act.
>
> [5] The Tax Court judge made the following observations:
>
> It is apparent that section 160 of the Income Tax Act is directed only at transfers of property. This section is not aimed at the conferral of benefits, as correctly pointed out by Counsel for the Appellant. In this regard, section 160 is unlike subsection 15(1) of the Act which requires the inclusion in a shareholder's income of any benefit he may receive from the corporation of which he is a shareholder. Section 160 deals with transfers of property like the present sections 74.1 and 74.2 which set out the attribution rules. The wording relating to the circumstances which trigger the application of section 160 is similar to some extent to the language used in sections 74.1 and 74.2 of the Income Tax Act.

---

[156] A-18-97

Digitized by Google

Having regard to the foregoing observations respecting the Appellant's rights in the subject property and the ambit of section 160 of the Income Tax Act, I do not agree with the proposition advanced by the Appellant that a reduction in the Appellant's liability under the mortgage to the extent of $13,321.69 as a direct result of the payments made to the mortgagee by Mr. Medland does not constitute property. The examination of two hypothetical situations leads me to the conclusion that such reduction in the Appellant's liability amounts to an indirect transfer of property made by Mr. Medland to the Appellant.

[6] He proceeded to examine two hypothetical situations:

In the first situation, termed Example "A", I am assuming that Mr. Medland, instead of paying a little over $13,000 to the mortgage towards the principal of the mortgage, had made, with the agreement of the mortgagee, a balloon payment when he was indebted to the Government of Canada in respect of federal taxes and paid the full amount owing under the mortgage. In such an eventuality, there is no doubt that this payment would have constituted a transfer of property because the Appellant would have acquired the right to redeem the property because a "right of whatever kind" is property, according to the definition of the term "property" in section 248 of the Income Tax Act.

One can imagine another case, which I describe as Example "B", where a person in Mr. Medland's situation would have made just a few regular payments to the mortgagee, which payments happen to represent the last payments to be made under the mortgage. On this assumption, an individual like the Appellant would be entitled to redeem the property and would be left with an unhampered fee simple if, of course, there was no other encumbrance on the property. Again the right to redeem the mortgage would constitute property within the meaning of section 248 of the Income Tax Act, as I have just explained.

I don't see between Examples "A" and "B" on the one hand and the present case on the other hand any substantial difference. In each of these two examples, the situation is simply more apparent, more conspicuous because the right to redeem property and to secure full title is undoubtedly property having regard to the wide import of the term "property" in section 248 of the Act. It would be highly artificial, if not absurd, to conclude on the one hand that in Examples "A" and "B" the payments in question involve the transfer of property and on the other hand assert that the making of regular payments do not happen to include the last payment which gives rise to the right to redeem the property. Such a result would be clearly unintended.

[7] He then concluded:

The matter can be looked at in a very simple fashion. If Mr. Medland had made the regular payments directly to his wife out of his own moneys and if his wife had each time immediately thereafter, used these moneys to make payments directly to the mortgagee it could not be challenged that these payments would constitute a direct transfer of property to his wife. Mr. Medland, instead of making the regular payments owing under the mortgage to his wife, made them to the mortgagee at a time where his wife was the sole owner of equity of redemption. This in my view, constitutes an indirect transfer of property.

Digitized by Google

Looking at the overall situation, I am persuaded that the regular payments made by Mr. Medland to the mortgagee when the Appellant was the sole owner of the equity of redemption had a dual effect from the standpoint of Mr. Medland and the Appellant: a) Mr. Medland paid his own liability under the mortgage and b) Mr. Medland transferred property indirectly to his wife with respect to the portion of the payments that related to the principal of the mortgage. These two results are inextricably linked. In my view, the Appellant in submitting that Mr. Medland simply satisfied his own liability by making these payments is ignoring an important aspect of the situation, the other side of the coin, so to speak. There was a transfer of economic interest involving the equity of redemption in favour of his wife, as in the Kieboom decision.
I am therefore of the view that Mr. Medland had transferred property during the relevant period to the Appellant in an indirect way within the purview of section 160 of the Income Tax Act. Consequently, the assessment made by the Minister of National Revenue in respect of this transfer of property is confirmed.
The applicant's submission
[8] In essence, the applicant submits that, given that she provided no consideration to Mr. Medland in exchange for his making the payments under the mortgage, subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act could only apply if Mr. Medland "transferred property either directly or indirectly "to her" by means of a trust or by any other means whatever". This, she says, did not happen.
[9] The applicant accepts the proposition that the more Mr. Medland made payments on the mortgage, the less indebted she found herself towards the mortgagee. She argues, however, that a reduction in the applicant's liability under the mortgage does not constitute "property" being transferred, even if the word "property" is of wide import.[3] A reduction in the applicant's liability is a result, or an event, but is not a property being transferred. She submits that in order for a "transfer" to occur, Mr. Medland must have had divested himself of a particular property and that same property, under the decision of Fasken Estate v. M.N.R.,[4] must have become vested in the applicant.
Mr. Medland divested himself of money (something included in the word "property") but he made his payments directly to the mortgagee and not to the applicant.
[10] She submits that at all material times after April 8, 1987, the date upon which Mr. Medland transferred his interest in the property to her, she was the sole owner of the equity of redemption.[5] The Tax Court judge erred, she says, when he stated, in both of his hypothetical situations, that the equity of redemption would have passed to her had a balloon payment or the last payment of the mortgage been made by the husband. The Tax Court judge was also in error, she claims, when he calculated that, by making the principal payments, "[t]here was a transfer of economic interest involving the equity of redemption in favour of his wife, as in the Kieboom[6] decision". In that decision, she says, the transferor

Digitized by Google

therein owned a specific portion or percentage of the "equity" of a corporation which he transferred to his spouse and children by compelling the corporation to issue some common shares to them, thereby diluting his interest in the corporation.

[11] In the present case, she says, when Mr. Medland divested himself of money by making the payments, the net value of the equity of redemption of the applicant in the house increased by the amount of the principal payments. That net value is expressed in money but is not money in itself. Had Parliament intended subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act to apply to the facts in issue, the word "amount" defined in subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act which includes "the value in terms of money of the right or thing",[7] would have been used in subsection 160(1) instead of the word "property".

[12] In any event, she says, even if Mr. Medland made the payments on her behalf, that situation is not caught by subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act. The words "on behalf of" his spouse are not found in that section as they are found in paragraph 224(1.1)(b) of the Act. While it is clear that the applicant benefitted from Mr. Medland making the principal payments, she claims that conferring a benefit does not come within the purview of subsection 160(1) of the Act. Such language is to be found in subsections 15(1) and 74.1(1), but not in subsection 160(1).

Analysis

[13] As a preliminary comment, the respondent does not dispute the applicant's proposition that no "right to redeem the property" was transferred to the applicant as a direct consequence of the mortgage payments made by her spouse on the debt owing under the mortgage. That right existed earlier when she became the sole owner of the property. Perhaps, the first judge confused the "equity of redemption" and the "right to redeem" with the concept of "equity" itself. This should not deter us, however, from recognizing the correct direction he gave to this case.

[14] It is not disputed that the tax policy embodied in, or the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned to him.[8] The issue turns, however, on the proper meaning to be given to the terms used in subsection 160(1) of the Act, namely whether Mr. Medland "transferred property... indirectly by any other means" to his wife.

[15] In my view, the Tax Court judge was correct when he concluded that the applicant's spouse transferred property indirectly to the applicant to the extent of the portion of the mortgage payments that related to the principal of the mortgage.

[16] The word "property" in subsection 160(1) of the Act, which is defined as meaning "property of any kind", including "money", has been described by Lord Langdale[9] as "the most comprehensive of all the terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have".

Digitized by Google

[17] The word "transfer" is not defined in the Act. It was commented upon in the Estate of David Fasken v. M.N.R.[10] by President Thorson of the Exchequer Court of Canada in the following terms:

The word "transfer" is not a term of art and has not a technical meaning. It is not necessary to a transfer of property from a husband to his wife that it should be made in any particular form or that it should be made directly. All that is required is that the husband should so deal with the property as to divest himself of it and vest it in his wife, that is to say, pass the property from himself to her. The means by which he accomplishes this result, whether direct or circuitous, may properly be called a transfer. The plain fact in the present case is that the property to which Mrs. Fasken became entitled under the declaration of trust, namely, the right to receive a portion of the interest on the indebtedness, passed to her from her husband who had previously owned the whole of the indebtedness out of which the right to receive a specified portion of the interest on it was carved. If David Fasken had conveyed this piece of property directly to his wife by a deed such conveyance would clearly have been a transfer. The fact that he brought about the same result by indirect or circuitous means, such as the novation referred to by counsel involving the intervention of trustees, cannot change the essential character of the fact that he caused property which had previously belonged to him to pass to his wife. In my opinion, there was a transfer of property from David Fasken to his wife within the meaning of the Act.

[18] The circumstances of that case ought not to be forgotten. The taxpayer had bought a farm in Texas by means of a corporation of which he originally owned nearly all the shares. The title to the farm was vested in the company subject to a lien indebtedness in his favour for the unpaid purchase price. In 1920, he transferred his shares to his son and was never, thereafter, a shareholder, director or officer of the company. He did, however, retain his rights against the company in respect of the unpaid purchase price of the farm and other advances. In 1924, the company executed an acknowledgement of indebtedness in favour of three trustees, one of them representing the wife of the taxpayer. What Mrs. Fasken became entitled to, under the declaration of trust, was the right to receive a portion of the interest on the indebtedness passed on to her from her husband who had previously owned the whole of the indebtedness out of which her right to receive a portion of the interest had been carved.

[19] By applying the phrases "transfer... of property..." of subsection 41(4) of the Income Tax Act of 1917 to that situation, Thorson P. indicated, in effect, that, contrary to the submission of the applicant in the case at bar, it is not necessary that, when a husband divest himself of a particular property, that same property must have become vested in his spouse.

[20] The words "indirectly... by... any other means" in subsection 160(1) of the Act refer to any circuitous way in which property of any kind passes from one person to another. In the case at bar, when Mr. Medland made the payments to the mortgagee, he specified that such money was to be attributed in diminution of the mortgage on the property on which he had no more interest. While it is true that subsection 160(1) of the Act does not contain the words "for the benefit of" or "on behalf of" as found in subsections 15(1) or 74.1(1) or paragraph 224(1.1)(b) of the Act, the applicant does not deny that she became less indebted by the payments and her equity in the property increased. The means by which this result occurred were monies paid to the Bank which was then transferred by the Bank on the account of the mortgage of a house owned solely by the applicant. The payment to the Bank was simply a conduit through which the funds passed indirectly from her husband to her.

Digitized by Google

[21] The applicant's submission, that no transfer of property occurred because what Mr. Medland divested himself was money which monies were never transferred [physically] to the applicant, is without merit. The present scheme, although different from that in Her Majesty the Queen v. Kieboom and White (D.P.) v. Canada amounts to the same thing.

[22] I would dismiss this application for judicial review.

"Alice Desjardins"

J.A.

"I agree

Barry L. Strayer, J.A."

"I agree

F. Joseph McDonald, J.A." [See case for numerous footnotes]

Consideration for Shared Living Expenses

Can an argument be made for transfers of consideration to reimburse for shared living expenses towards the household, and thus, for fair market value, thus exempting it from collection focus?

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

DESJARDINS J.A.

[1] It is my view that the appeal should be dismissed. My reasons for this conclusion are the following.

[2] The facts are not in dispute. In brief, Mr. Yates had an outstanding tax liability, at all relevant times, in excess of $485,000. On December 23, 2002, he released his joint interest in two bank accounts for amounts of $4,972.30 and $2,406.45 in favour of his wife, the appellant. Also, as of December 23, 2002, and throughout 2003, Mr. Yates deposited his paycheques for a total amount of $54,406.20 in a bank account owned by his wife. This account had been used by both to pay their household expenses for many years prior to December 23, 2002. The appellant customarily took care of these expenditures. Between December 23, 2002, and October 31, 2003, the total household expenses set out by the appellant amounted to a total of $151,248.08. Mr. Yates filed for bankruptcy on February 16, 2004.

[3] The Minister issued three reassessments against Ms. Yates under subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the Act) on September 12, 2004, for a total of $61,784.95.

[4] The Tax Court Judge whose judgment is reported as Yates and Her

Digitized by Google

Majesty the Queen, 2007 TCC 498, [2007] T.C.J. No. 328 (QL), found at paragraph 12 of his reasons that, of the four requirements which must be satisfied under subsection 160(1) of the Act, only the following two were in question, namely that:

a. there must be a transfer of property; and
b. there must be no or inadequate consideration flowing from the transfer to the transferor.

[5] The Tax Court Judge had no difficulty in concluding on the first point that there had been a transfer of property since Mr. Yates had divested himself of property, firstly by the removal of his name from the two joint accounts and, secondly, by the deposits of his paycheques into his wife's account. In doing so, he applied Fasken Estate v. MNR, [1948] Ex.C.R. 580, endorsed by this Court in Medland v. Canada, [1998] F.C.J. No. 708, at paragraph 14. His approach was consistent with the decision of this Court in Livingston v. Canada, 2008 FCA 89, at paragraph 21, where it was held that "The deposit of funds into another person's account constitutes a transfer of property".

[6] The more difficult issue was whether Ms. Yates had given consideration for these transfers.

[7] The Tax Court Judge explained at paragraph 16 of his reasons:

> The more difficult issue is whether there was consideration rendered by the Appellant for these transfers from Mr. Yates. This boils down to whether these transfers were merely his satisfying his legal obligation to support his wife and family. If so, then the payments in certain restricted circumstances are not subject to section 160 liability. To find in the Appellant's favour, I must find there was adequate consideration flowing from her to Mr. Yates. I agree with the Appellant that there is a legal obligation for support under the Family Law Act of Ontario. The greatest disparity between the submission of counsel for the Appellant and the present case law is latitude given to the legal obligation.

[8] He further explained at paragraph 19 of his reasons.

> I accept the second approach to the effect that certain limited payments made for some household expenses by a spouse, who is obligated to support his or her family, are not subject to subsection 160(1). I believe these expenditures should be for daily living necessities as opposed to permitting an accustomed lavish standard of living. The Appellant cited the following cases which support this: Michaud v. Canada, Ferracuti v. Canada, Laframboise v. Canada and Ducharme v. Canada.

[9] He reviewed the line of cases cited by the appellant and stated at paragraph 29 of his reasons:

> I agree that the function of this Court under section 160 is not to parse a taxpayer's grocery bills in order to determine which food items are reasonable and which are not. Each case must be considered on its own merits. The Court must examine the evidence of the taxpayer with respect to household expenditures to > determine which expenses, if any, are the vital household expenses that may be excluded from the reach of section 160. I say this because section 160 is a far-reaching collection tool in the Act. It has been described as draconian and Parliament drafted it as such. Accordingly, the exceptions to the reach of this section are narrow. In Ferracuti, I attempted to determine which expenditures were made in satisfaction of the person's legal obligation to support his family.

Digitized by Google

[10] The Tax Court Judge concluded that the expenditures made in the case at bar were not the vital household expenses envisaged in the above line of cases. They went beyond the expenditures permitted in satisfaction of a person's legal obligation to support his family. He consequently dismissed the appeals of Ms. Yates against the Minister's reassessments.

[11] The appellant claims that the Tax Court Judge, although recognizing that at least some payments made by a spouse towards supporting his or her family were beyond the reach of subsection 160(1) of the Act, erred by failing to consider or articulate an appropriate framework for determining the appropriate quantum of such payments. He should, submits the appellant, have adopted an approach consistent with the jurisprudence developed in connection with family law for the determination of support. Indeed, subsection 160(4) of the Act expressly exempts from capture any payments made on account of support pursuant to a separation agreement or judgment of the court. Couples who remained married should be no worse off than those who have separated. Hence, says the appellant, the calculation of support payments should be guided by principles articulated in the family legislation in each province and in the Divorce Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 3 (2nd Supp.).

[12] Section 160 of the Act is unquestionably a draconian measure. But the issue is whether a court of law is permitted to read in a taxation statute provisions that are inexistent in the legislation.

[13] The Court in Medland at paragraph 14 has explained the policy behind this provision in the following manner:

> It is not disputed that the tax policy embodied in, or the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned [sic] to him.
> …

[14] Again, in Wannan v. Canada (2003 FCA 423) at paragraph 3, this Court recognized that "[s]ection 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands".

[15] In Livingston, this Court explained at paragraph 27 that "a transferee of property will be liable to the CRA to the extent that the fair market value of the consideration given for the property falls short of the fair market value of that property". The Court stated in the same paragraph that the "very purpose of subsection 160(1) is to preserve the value of the existing assets in the taxpayer for collection by the CRA".

Digitized by Google

[16] A reading of section 160 makes it clear that the only exception provided under the Act is that of subsection 160(4) of the Act.

[17] The line of cases illustrated by Michaud v. Canada. [1998] T.C.J. 908 (QL); Ferracuti v. Canada. [1998] T.C.J. No. 883 (QL); and Laframboise v. Canada, [2002] T.C.J. No. 628, which takes the position that payments made by one spouse to another in satisfaction of a legal obligation to support his or her family are beyond the reach of section 160, is not supported by the legislation.

[18] The respondent cited the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Canada v. Addison & Leyen Ltd., 2007 SCC 33, [2007] S.C.J. No. 33 (QL) in support of a strict interpretation of section 160 of the Act. That case arose out of a dispute as to whether the Minister was barred from acting under section 160 of the Act, due to some limitation period.

[19] The Supreme Court of Canada held in that case that judicial review was not available because the Minister, under section 160 of the Act, could assess at any time since there was no limitation period provided. The Supreme Court of Canada indicated its preference for the minority view expressed in the court below, the Federal Court of Appeal, by Rothstein J.A. as he then was. At paragraph 9, the Supreme Court of Canada stated the following:

> Nevertheless, we find that judicial review was not available on the facts of this case. As Rothstein J.A. pointed out, the interpretation of s. 160 by the majority of the Federal Court of Appeal amounted to reading into that provision a limitation period that was simply not there. The Minister can reassess a taxpayer at any time. In the words of Rothstein J.A.:
>
> > While in the sense identified by the majority, subsection 160(1) may be considered a harsh collection remedy, it is also narrowly targeted. It only affects transfers of property to persons in specified relationships or capacities and only when the transfer is for less than fair market value. Having regard to the application of subsection 160(1) in specific and limited circumstances, Parliament's intent is not obscure. Parliament intended that the Minister be able to recover amounts transferred in these limited circumstances for the purpose of satisfying the tax liability of the primary taxpayer transferor. The circumstances of such transactions mak[e] it clear that Parliament intended that there be no applicable limitation period and no other condition on when the Minister might assess. [para. 92]
>
> [Emphasis added.]

Digitized by Google

[20] The words “no other condition” followed by the words “on when the Minister might assess” make it clear that the Leyen case is directed to the concept of a limitation period only. We are not dealing, in the case at bar, with a limitation period but with whether family obligations should be read in subsection 160(1) of the Act. The case does not assist the respondent in his demonstration that Parliament’s intent is to exclude family obligations from the purview of the legislation. The Leyen case cannot be read in such a manner.

[21] The appellant claims in his favour the decision of this Court in Ducharme v. Canada (2005 FCA 137), Rothstein J.A., as he then was, writing for the Court, relied essentially on a finding of fact of the Tax Court Judge. At the time, Mr. Vienneau, the common-law partner of Ms. Ducharme, paid the mortgage payments. As found by the Tax Court Judge, the rent for an equivalent (and apparently average) house in the area the couple was living in ranged two times the amount of money transferred by Mr. Vienneau to Ms. Ducharme. Rothstein J.A. felt a reasonable inference could be drawn from these facts, namely that Ms. Ducharme gave to Mr. Vienneau the availability and use of the house she owned in consideration for his payments on the mortgage. The amounts paid by Mr. Vienneau were considered tantamount to rent. Rothstein J.A. was careful to add that identifying the amounts paid by Mr. Vienneau as rent was not a re-characterization of the legal effects of transactions. It was simply a way of explaining that Mr. Vienneau received consideration equivalent to or greater than the amounts he transferred to Ms. Ducharme.

[22] Rothstein J.A. made it clear that in view of the conclusion he had arrived at, it was unnecessary to address Ms. Ducharme’s other arguments based on valuing domestic services or “domestic obligations” of spouses.

[23] The Ducharme case rests therefore on its own facts.

[24] For the same reason, I cannot agree with the respondent that Rothstein J.A. implicitly found that there was a legally enforceable agreement between Ms. Ducharme and Mr. Vienneau according to which each had promised to give the other something they did not already have under the British Columbia legislation which did not give common law spouses the right to use and enjoy the matrimonial home (Family Relations Act [R.S.B.C. 1996] c. 128).

[25] I find on the whole that it is for Parliament to articulate an appropriate framework that would give married couples the equal treatment the appellant wishes they should enjoy by comparison to those who come under the purview of subsection 160(4) of the Act.

[26] I would dismiss this appeal with costs.

“Alice Desjardins”

J.A.

NADON J.A (Concurring Reasons)

[27] I am entirely in agreement with the reasons which Desjardins J.A. gives in support of her view that the appeal cannot succeed. I wish only to elaborate on the following points.

[28] Mr. Yates transferred to his wife's account the sum of $61,784.95. The appellant says that in releasing his joint interest in two bank accounts in favour of his wife and in depositing his paycheques in a bank account owned by his wife,

Digitized by Google

Mr. Yates did not transfer property which falls within the purview of subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act, 1985, c.1 (5th supplement) (the "Act") and that, in any event, if there is a transfer within the purview of the subsection, adequate consideration was given for the transfer.

[29] In support of her argument that there was no transfer within the meaning of subsection 160(1), the appellant says that by reason of her husband's obligation pursuant to sections 30, 31 and 33 of the Ontario Family Law Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.3, to support his family, the deposits made to her account were for the purpose of paying household expenses and that she did pay such expenses, pointing out that the total household expenses during the period at issue exceeded the sum transferred to her by her husband.

[30] With respect to consideration, the appellant again says that her husband transferred money to her by reason of his legal obligation to support his family. She further says that Mr. Yates was allowed to use the matrimonial home during the time that he was making the payments. Thus, she submits that her husband received consideration equal to the funds transferred by him into her bank account.

[31] In my view, these submissions are without merit. As Desjardins J.A. makes clear in her Reasons (paragraph 5), only two of the four requirements to be met under subsection 160(1) are at issue in this appeal:

1. whether there is a transfer of property to a spouse and if so,
2. whether the spouse gave consideration amounting to fair market value.

[32] On the facts of the case before us, the answer can only be that there was a transfer and that no consideration at fair market value was given.

[33] At paragraph 47 of her memorandum of fact and law, the appellant summarizes her position as to why subsection 160(1) does not find application in the present matter:

a. the deposit of John Yates pay cheque net of deductions for tax does not constitute a transfer;
b. the payments made were made pursuant to Mr. Yates' obligation to support his family;
c. the Yates' family had significant living expenses during the relevant time that the payments were made that exceed the amount deposited;
d. thus, there was no "unjust enrichment" as contemplated by section 160 of the Act;
e. in the alternative and, in any event, the amounts paid were for living expenses that John Yates was duty bound to provide for his family;
f. in the further alternative, John Yates received consideration for the transfer in light of the fact that he enjoyed the use of the matrimonial home in exchange for the payments made; and
g. in the further alternative and, in any event, no tax was payable by John Yates at the time that the deposits were made.

Digitized by Google

[34] What the appellant is clearly asking us is, in my respectful view, to read subsection 160(1) as if the exception provided at subsection 160(4) applied to spouses who were not separated and living together. At paragraph 50 of the appellant's memorandum of fact and law the appellant clearly invokes the benefit of subsection 160(4):

> The appellant contends that the Court should adopt an approach consistent with the jurisprudence developed in connection with family law for the determination of support. Indeed, subsection 160(4) of the Income Tax Act expressly exempts from capture any payments made on account of support pursuant to a separation agreement or judgment of the court. Couples who remain married should be no worse off than couples that have separated when considering the effect of section 160.

[35] Subsection 160(1) is clear and unambiguous and the Act does not provide for any exception, other than the one found at subsection 160(4), i.e. that transfers made between spouses "separated and living apart" shall not render them liable under subsection 160(1) to "pay any amount with respect to any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefore, …". The provision also provides that for the purposes of paragraph 160(1)(e), the fair market value of property transferred after February 15, 1984, shall be deemed to be nil.

[36] The question raised by the appellant is clearly a question of law which calls for review on a standard of correctness. In effect, what we have to decide in this appeal is whether a family law exception can be read into subsection 160(1).

[37] As my colleague Desjardins J.A. says at paragraph 13 of her Reasons, "section 160 of the Act is unquestionably a draconian measure. But the issue is whether a court of law is permitted to read in a taxation statute provisions that are inexistent in the legislation". The answer to that question is clearly a no.

[38] Whether Mrs. Yates spent the $61,784.95 transferred to her by her husband on holidays, personal items, groceries or other household expenditures is, in my respectful view, of no relevance to the determination of whether there was a transfer. Let us assume, for example, that Mr. Yates had given Mrs. Yates an automobile valued at $61,784.95. Let us also assume that on the day following the gift, Mrs. Yates sells the automobile for its full value and proceeds to defray household expenses with that money. Would we seriously entertain an argument that the gift of the automobile does not constitute a transfer because the monies resulting from its sale served to defray the family's living expenses? I suspect that we would have no difficulty in dismissing such an argument.

[39] Consequently, I see absolutely no basis for the appellant's argument that the nature of the expenses incurred with the money transferred to her by her husband is a relevant factor in determining whether she is subject to subsection 160(1) of the Act.

[40] The Judge correctly concluded that there had been a transfer by Mr. Yates to the appellant in the sum of $61,784.95. He then turned his attention to the issue of consideration, which he considered to be the more troublesome issue. He stated the issue as follows at paragraph 16:

Digitized by Google

> [16] … This boils down to whether these transfers were merely his satisfying his legal obligation to support his wife and family. If so, then the payments in certain restricted circumstances are not subject to section 160 liability. To find in the Appellant's favour, I must find there was adequate consideration flowing from her to Mr. Yates. I agree with the Appellant that there is a legal obligation for support under the Family Law Act of Ontario. The greatest disparity between the submission of counsel for the Appellant and the present case law is latitude given to the legal obligation.

[41] In my view, the Judge's approach is clearly in error. As I have already indicated, subsection 160(1) does not contain any ambiguity. If there is a transfer within the purview of the provision, then the transferee must satisfy the Court that he or she provided consideration at fair market value. In view of the wording of subsection 160(1), there is simply no basis for the position taken by the Judge.

[42] The Judge had to determine whether Mrs. Yates had provided consideration at fair market value and, in my view, on the record before him, it is clear that the appellant did not provide such consideration. The Judge reached this conclusion based upon the view that only those household expenses which could be considered as "vital household expenses" were beyond the reach of subsection 160(1). In my respectful view, that approach is clearly erroneous.

[43] To conclude, the appellant submits that she gave consideration at fair market value for the sums received from her husband. I see no evidence in the record to support that view. To make things perfectly clear, let me say that in allowing her husband to live in the family residence, the appellant did not provide consideration at fair market value. This is simply another attempt by Mrs. Yates to benefit from the exception found at subsection 160(4).

[44] I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

"Marc Nadon"

J.A.

BLAIS J.A. (Concurring Reasons)

[45] I am in agreement with the disposition of this matter proposed by my colleague Desjardins J.A.; I am of the view that this appeal should be dismissed.

[46] This is an appeal from a decision of the Tax Court of Canada dated August 27, 2007 dismissing the appeals from reassessments made under section 160 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1 (the Act).

Relevant Facts

[47] John Yates, the appellant's husband was a tax debtor who owed the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister) more than $485,000. As of December 2002 and throughout 2003, while he was indebted to the Minister, he transferred money to his wife. The Minister assessed his wife, the appellant, under subsection 160(1) of the Act. The assessment concluded that the appellant should be jointly and severally liable for her husband's tax debt in an amount equivalent to the value of the transferred property. According to the Minister, the appellant is liable to pay $61,784 of her husband's income tax liability because there was a transfer from Mr. Yates to her without adequate consideration, pursuant to subsection 160(1). Mr. Yates filed a personal assignment in bankruptcy in February 2004.

Digitized by Google

Decision Below

[48] The trial judge applied a correct test and reached the correct result in holding that John Yates' removal of his name from the joint bank accounts and deposits of his pay cheques into Debra Yates' account constituted transfers within meaning of subsection 160(1).

[49] The trial judge also decided that certain limited payments made for household expenses by John Yates to Debra Yates are not subject to section 160; specifically, at paragraph 29 of his judgment, he wrote:

> [29] …the Court must examine the evidence of the taxpayer with respect to household expenditures to determine which expenses, if any, are the vital household expenses that may be excluded from the reach of section 160. I say this because section 160 is a far-reaching collection tool in the Act. It has been described as draconian and Parliament drafted it as such. Accordingly, the exceptions to the reach of this section are narrow. In Ferracuti, I attempted to determine which expenditures were made in satisfaction of the person's legal obligation to support his family.

Applicable Legislation

[50] Subsections 160(1) and 160(4) read:

Income Tax Act*, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c. 1	Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu*, L.R.C. 1985 (5e supp.), c. 1
160. (1) Where a person has, on or after May 1, 1951, transferred property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever, to	160. (1) Lorsqu'une personne a, depuis le 1er mai 1951, transféré des biens, directement ou indirectement, au moyen d'une fiducie ou de toute autre façon à l'une des personnes suivantes :
(a) the person's spouse or common-law partner or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common- law partner,	a) son époux ou conjoint de fait ou une personne devenue depuis son époux ou conjoint de fait;
(b) a person who was under 18 years of age, or	b) une personne qui était âgée de moins de 18 ans;
(c) a person with whom the person was not dealing at arm's length,	c) une personne avec laquelle elle avait un lien de dépendance,
the following rules apply:	les règles suivantes s'appliquent :
(d) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay a part of the transferor's tax under this Part for	d) le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont

Digitized by Google

each taxation year equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of sections 74.1 to 75.1 of this Act and section 74 of the Income Tax Act, chapter 148 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, in respect of any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and

(e) the transferee and transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay under this Act an amount equal to the lesser of

(i) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property, and

(ii) the total of all amounts each of which is an amount that the transferor is liable to pay under this Act in or in respect of the taxation year in which the property was transferred or any preceding taxation year, but nothing in this subsection shall be deemed solidairement responsables du paiement d'une partie de l'impôt de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de la présente partie pour chaque année d'imposition égale à l'excédent de l'impôt pour l'année sur ce que cet impôt aurait été sans l'application des articles 74.1 à 75.1 de la présente loi et de l'article 74 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, chapitre 148 des Statuts révisés du Canada de 1952, à l'égard de tout revenu tiré des biens ainsi transférés ou des biens y substitués ou à l'égard de tout gain tiré de la disposition de tels biens;

e) le bénéficiaire et l'auteur du transfert sont solidairement responsables du paiement en vertu de la présente loi d'un montant égal au moins élevé des montants suivants :

(i) l'excédent éventuel de la juste valeur marchande des biens au moment du transfert sur la juste valeur marchande à ce moment de la contrepartie donnée pour le bien,

(ii) le total des montants dont chacun représente

Digitized by Google

to limit the liability of the transferor under any other provision of this Act.

un montant que l'auteur du transfert doit payer en vertu de la présente loi au cours de l'année d'imposition dans laquelle les biens ont été transférés ou d'une année d'imposition antérieure ou pour une de ces années;

aucune disposition du présent paragraphe n'est toutefois réputée limiter la responsabilité de l'auteur du transfert en vertu de quelque autre disposition de la présente loi.

(4) Notwithstanding subsection 160(1), where at any time a taxpayer has transferred property to the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner pursuant to a decree, order or judgment of a competent tribunal or pursuant to a written separation agreement and, at that time, the taxpayer and the spouse or common-law partner were separated and living apart as a result of the breakdown of their marriage or common-law partnership, the following rules apply:

(a) in respect of property so transferred after February 15, 1984,

(i) the spouse or common-law partner shall not be liable under subsection 160(1) to pay any

(4) Malgré le paragraphe (1), lorsqu'un contribuable a transféré un bien à son époux ou conjoint de fait en vertu d'une ordonnance ou d'un jugement d'un tribunal compétent ou en vertu d'un accord écrit de séparation et que, au moment du transfert, le contribuable et son époux ou conjoint de fait vivaient séparément par suite de la rupture de leur mariage ou union de fait, les règles suivantes s'appliquent :

a) relativement à un bien ainsi transféré après le 15 février 1984:

(i) l'époux ou conjoint de fait ne peut être tenu, en vertu du paragraphe (1), de payer un montant relatif au revenu provenant du bien

Digitized by Google

amount with respect to any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and

(ii) for the purposes of paragraph 160(1)(e), the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred shall be deemed to be nil, and

(b) in respect of property so transferred before February 16, 1984, where the spouse common-law partner would, but for this paragraph, be liable to pay an amount under this Act by virtue of subsection 160(1), the spouse's or common-law partner's liability in respect of that amount shall be deemed to have been discharged on February 16, 1984, but nothing in this subsection shall operate to reduce the taxpayer's liability under any other provision of this Act.

transféré ou du bien qui y est substitué ou un montant relatif au gain provenant de la disposition du bien transféré ou du bien qui y est substitué,

(ii) pour l'application de l'alinéa (1)e), la juste valeur marchande du bien au moment du transfert est réputée être nulle;

b) relativement à un bien ainsi transféré avant le 16 février 1984, lorsque l'époux ou conjoint de fait serait, sans le présent alinéa, tenu de payer un montant en application de la présente loi en vertu du paragraphe (1), il est réputé s'être acquitté de son obligation relativement à ce montant le 16 février 1984;

aucune disposition du présent paragraphe n'a toutefois pour effet de réduire les obligations du contribuable en vertu d'une autre disposition de la présente loi.

Issue

[51] In conducting the analysis as to whether a fair market value consideration for the property transferred was given, is the judge entitled to exclude some household expenses from the reach of subsection 160(1)?

Standard of Review

[52] The standard of review applicable depends on the nature of the question. Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, 2002 S.C.J. No. 31, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235 (QL), teaches us that questions of law are generally reviewed on a standard of correctness, while finding of fact or mixed fact and law will be set aside only if the trial judge has made an overriding and palpable error.

Digitized by Google

Analysis

[53] Pursuant to subsection 160(1), when a tax debtor transfers property to a non arm's length person, that person becomes jointly and severally liable with the tax debtor for the tax debt in an amount equal to the difference between the fair market value of the transferred property and the consideration given for the transferred property.

[54] There is nothing in subsection 160(1) that permits a court to excuse a spouse from liability where the conditions of the provision are met; in fact, there is no mention of a family law exception in this provision.

[55] Subsection 160(4) deals specifically with a transfer of property between spouses who are separated and living apart, which shows Parliament's intention to exempt specific transfers in a matrimonial context from the application of subsection 160(1). In my view, our case does not fall under this particular exemption.

[56] The trial judge erred in law by following the line of jurisprudence which concludes that certain limited payments made for household expenses by a spouse are not subject to section 160 (see Reasons for Judgment, paragraphs 19 and 29).

[57] The trial judge failed in this case to conduct the proper analysis as to whether John Yates was given fair market value consideration for the property that was transferred. In fact, he made a palpable and overriding error by concluding that the Court must examine the evidence of the taxpayer with respect to household expenditures to determine which expenses, if any, are the vital household expenses that may be excluded from the reach of section 160.

[58] In my view, there is no ambiguity in the reading of subsection 160(1); nevertheless, several decisions of the Tax Court of Canada have read a "family law exception" into it.

[59] In Livingston v. Canada, 2008 FCA 89, [2008] F.C.J. No. 360 (QL) (Livingston), Sexton J.A. held at paragraphs 27 and 28:

> 27. Under subsection 160(1), a transferee of property will be liable to the CRA to the extent that the fair market value of the consideration given for the property falls short of the fair market value of that property. The very purpose of subsection 160(1) is to preserve the value of the existing assets in the taxpayer for collection by the CRA. [...] However, subsection 160(1) will not apply where an amount equivalent in value to the original property transferred was given to the transferor at the time of transfer: that is, fair market value consideration. This is because after such a transaction, the CRA has not been prejudiced as a creditor. [...]
>
> 28. The Tax Court Judge erred in law by failing to conduct any analysis of the fair market value of the consideration. He simply concluded that it was "adequate." I fail to see how the fair market value of the consideration, if any did exist, would be equivalent to the funds deposited. [...] There was no evidence on which the Tax

Digitized by Google

> Court Judge could conclude that what was provided by the respondent was equal to the fair market value of the money put into the account.

In that case, my colleague Sexton J.A. made clear that the trial judge must conduct a proper analysis of the fair market value of the consideration.

[60] In Medland v. Canada, [1998] F.C.J. No. 708 (QL) (Medland), Desjardins J.A. held at paragraph 14:

> 14. It is not disputed that the tax policy embodied in, or the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned to him. […]

[61] In Wannan v. Canada, 2003 FCA 423, [2003] F.C.J. No. 1693 (QL) (Wannan), Sharlow J.A. held at paragraph 3:

> 3. Section 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important tax collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands. […]

[62] I have no hesitation in concluding that the narrow interpretation provided by the decisions in Livingston, Medland and Wannan, should be followed.

[63] A recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, Canada v. Addison & Leyen Ltd., 2007 SCC 33, [2007] S.C.J. No. 33 (QL), favoured the dissenting reasons of Justice Rothstein of the Court of Appeal, (as he then was), with respect to subsection 160(1). The Supreme Court's decision reflects the narrow approach regarding Parliament's intent. At paragraph 9, the Supreme Court of Canada quoted Justice Rothstein:

> […] As Rothstein J.A. pointed out, the interpretation of s. 160 by the majority of the Federal Court of Appeal amounted to reading into that provision a limitation period that was simply not there. The Minister can reassess a taxpayer at any time. In the words of Rothstein J.A.:
>
> > While in the sense identified by the majority, subsection 160(1) may be considered a harsh collection remedy, it is also narrowly targeted. It only affects transfers of property to persons in specified relationships or capacities and only when the transfer is for less than fair market value.
> >
> > Having regard to the application of subsection 160(1) in specific and limited circumstances, Parliament's intent is not obscure. Parliament intended that the Minister be able to recover amounts transferred in these limited circumstances for the purpose of > satisfying the tax liability of the primary taxpayer transferor. The circumstances of such transactions mak[e] it clear that Parliament intended that there be no applicable limitation period and no other condition on when the Minister might assess. [para. 92]

Digitized by Google

> [My emphasis]

[64] Even if Justice Rothstein's comment on section 160 refers to whether a limitation period should apply, he nevertheless mentioned that section 160 provides: "no other condition on when the Minister might assess". This again reflects the narrow approach followed so far by our Court, and I see no reason to depart from it.

[65] I believe that the approach taken by our Court in Ducharme v. Canada, 2005 FCA 137, [2005] F.C.J. No. 713 (QL), should be distinguished on the basis that the trial judge's conclusion was motivated by a very fact-specific situation with which Court of Appeal decided not to interfere.

[66] There is some confusion in jurisprudence since provincial legislation on family law regarding property, family definition, common law partners and matrimonial homes varies from one province to another. Nevertheless, subsection 160(1) should apply equally everywhere in Canada without exception apart from those specifically described in subsection 160(4).

Conclusion

[67] In my view, the trial judge arrived at the correct conclusion in dismissing the appeal but based his decision on some questionable reasoning. A plain language interpretation of subsection 160(1) does not allow for a family law exception, nor does it allow for an exception for household expenses. If Parliament had wanted to provide for such exemptions, it would have done so expressly. It is not for our Court to read these exemptions into the Act.

[68] Therefore, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

"Pierre Blais"

J.A.

See also the TCC of Lynda Bernier v. The Queen 2010 TCC 85,where the court held with respect to Quebec mandatories:

> [1] By notice of assessment dated October 4, 2006, the Minister of National Revenue ("the Minister") claimed a payment of $29,298.99 from the Appellant under section 160 of the Income Tax Act ("the Act") in connection with a transfer of funds to the Appellant from her spouse on May 10, 2004. On that date, the Appellant deposited $81,869.42 into her account at the Caisse populaire Desjardins du Rivage et des Monts. This amount is equal to the amount of a cheque dated May 3, 2004, issued by the Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail (the Quebec workers' compensation board, hereinafter referred to as the CSST) to Richard Ouellet, the Appellant's spouse.
>
> [2] Earlier, on March 21, 2002, the Minister had issued reassessments against the Appellant's spouse for his 1998 and 1999 taxation years such that, when the Appellant deposited the $81,869.42, her spouse owed money to the Minister. It was this debt that gave rise to the assessment against the Appellant. It should be noted that Richard Ouellet and the Appellant were married at the relevant time.

Digitized by Google

[3] At the outset of the hearing, the parties told the Court that there were in fact only two points at issue. The Appellant acknowledges that she and her spouse are related persons within the meaning of the Act, and that property was transferred at a time when the transferor owed money to the Minister. However, and this constitutes the first point at issue, she submits that there was consideration for the transfer. The second point raised by the Appellant is that the transferred amount is an income replacement benefit representing the capitalization of benefits, and that, since it is from the CSST, it is exempt from seizure regardless of whether it happens to be in Mr. Ouellet's hands or in the Appellant's.

[4] I must also determine whether certain evidence adduced by the Appellant is inadmissible by reason of irrelevance. The evidence in question includes Exhibit A-2, a statement of the household income and expenses of the Appellant, her spouse and their 28-year-old son who, for health reasons, is their dependant. The evidence in question also includes the testimonial evidence regarding the same subject. In fact, the matter of the relevance of this evidence was raised because of the recent decision of the Federal Court of Appeal in Yates v. Canada, 2009 FCA 50, in which it was held that subsection 160(1) of the Act contemplates no exceptions based on family law or domestic obligations. [5] It is true that evidence can be declared inadmissible by reason of irrelevance.

Such a declaration is all the more possible where the impugned evidence can easily be severed from the rest of the evidence. A decision that evidence is inadmissible is not always clear-cut, and, in most cases, it is more prudent to admit the evidence so that the judge who presides at the hearing can analyze it and determine its relevance in light of the issues that the judge will have to decide. In the case at bar, the evidence adduced by the Appellant is directly related to the basis of her argument. It is therefore important that the evidence be admitted so that the Appellant can substantiate her claims.

[6] In 1999, the Appellant's spouse sustained a serious injury while working as a lumberjack. He had also been a fisherman for a number of years, and his wife and son had worked with him in this activity. In fact, it was the tax on the sale of his fishing permit that gave rise to the tax liability that is the subject of the assessment in issue.

[7] The above-mentioned accident forced the Appellant's spouse to seek CSST benefits. Neither the Appellant nor the couple's son was working at the time. According to the Appellant's spouse, the $600 benefit paid every two weeks by the CSST was not enough to meet their needs. He and the Appellant therefore submitted to the CSST a benefit capitalization proposal with a view to investing the money in a restaurant. The CSST accepted the proposal and allowed the Appellant's spouse to capitalize six years' worth of benefit payments, from November 25, 2003, to November 24, 2009. The CSST thus paid him

Digitized by Google

$81,869.42.

[8] Owing to the effects of the work accident on her spouse, the Appellant handled and managed the family's finances. Therefore, she was the one who had to ensure — using the restaurant's revenues — that the home loan and auto loan were repaid and that all other family expenses were defrayed. The Appellant's spouse says that he gave the Appellant the money in question so that she could meet the family's financial obligations. She assumed responsibility for the family expenses.

[9] In her answers upon written examination for discovery, the Appellant explained, with great clarity, that the $81,869.42 was given to her by her spouse, that she invested the amount in a restaurant that constitutes their sole source of income, and that she had to use the restaurant revenues to cover all the family expenses and meet all the needs of her spouse related to his condition resulting from the work accident.

[10] The officer from the Canada Revenue Agency (CRA) who dealt with the Appellant's objection related a conversation that he had with the Appellant's representative. According to the officer, at no point in the conversation was it claimed that the Appellant was her spouse's mandatary, or that she had assumed his debts.

[11] Thus, the question to be determined is whether the transfer of the sum of money in question to the Appellant by her spouse was made for consideration or not. If I find that the transfer was not made for consideration, the question will be whether the transferred amount's being exempt from seizure prevents section 160 of the Act from applying here.

[12] The position of counsel for the Appellant is that since the amount is exempt from seizure by virtue of its being intended to provide the necessaries of life and by virtue of the Quebec Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases, there was valid consideration, and thus, the facts of this case are different from those in Yates, above. The Appellant's assumption of the family obligations constitutes valid consideration, the value of which is even higher than that of the amount transferred, since the evidence clearly shows that five years' worth of family expenses add up to an amount greater than the amount transferred. This position is supported by a table of monthly income and expenditures, produced as Exhibit A-2.

According to Hewett v. Canada, [1997] F.C.J. No. 1541 (QL), contends counsel for the Appellant, the purpose of section 160 of the Act is to prevent taxpayers from divesting themselves of money that would otherwise be seizable by the Minister. Counsel further contends that the fact that the amount was deposited into an account does not cause them to lose their exemption from seizure: D.(J.) v. J.(T.) et al., REJB 1998-08139. Moreover, argues counsel, the transfer is similar to the ones in Canada v. Ducharme, 2005 FCA 137 and Tétreault v. The Queen, 2004 TCC 332, and since it is a gift with concomitant obligations, there is adequate consideration.

[13] For his part, counsel for the Respondent relies on Yates, above, and argues that the only exception to section 160 is the one found in subsection 160(4) of the Act, which does not apply to this case. The decision in Wannan v. Canada,

Digitized by Google

2003 FCA 423, establishes that it matters little whether there is intent to help the transferor avoid the payment of tax. If the four criteria of section 160 are satisfied, the assessment is valid. According to the decision in Yates, the payments made by the transferee to meet family obligations are subject to section 160 of the Act because there is no exception for such obligations. As for whether the exemption of the money at issue from seizure can prevent section 160 from applying, counsel contends that the transfer of the money to the Appellant puts and end to the exemption from seizure, thereby making the Appellant liable for the tax debt. Moreover, the purpose of this appeal is to determine the validity of the assessment, not whether the money at issue is seizable, and so the argument regarding exemption from seizure is premature. According to counsel for the Respondent, exemptions from seizure under provincial law cannot be relied upon where federal law applies: Marcoux v. Canada (Attorney General), 2001 FCA 92. Lastly, counsel argues, the exception conferring an exemption from seizure disappears at the time of transfer: see Cox v. Canada, [1995] T.C.J. No. 242 (QL), 96 DTC 1690.

[14] With respect to the first question, namely, whether, in the present case, there was consideration when the Appellant's spouse transferred the funds to her, it should be pointed out that, in Yates, above, the Federal Court of Appeal clearly established that the only exception contemplated by the Act is in subsection 160(4). At paragraph 17 of the decision, Justice Desjardins provides the following explanation:

The line of cases illustrated by Michaud v. Canada. [1998] T.C.J. 908 (QL); Ferracuti v. Canada. [1998] T.C.J. No. 883 (QL); and Laframboise v. Canada, [2002] T.C.J. No. 628, which takes the position that payments made by one spouse to another in satisfaction of a legal obligation to support his or her family are beyond the reach of section 160, is not supported by the legislation.

Justice Nadon adds the following, at paragraphs 35, 37, 38 and 39:

Subsection 160(1) is clear and unambiguous and the Act does not provide for any exception, other than the one found at subsection 160(4), i.e. that transfers made between spouses "separated and living apart" shall not render them liable under subsection 160(1) to "pay any amount with respect to any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefore [sic],

...". The provision also provides that for the purposes of paragraph 160(1)(e), the fair market value of property transferred after February 15, 1984, shall be deemed to be nil.

. . .

As my colleague Desjardins J.A. says at paragraph 13 of her Reasons, "section 160 of the Act is unquestionably a draconian measure. But the issue is whether a court of law is permitted to read in a taxation statute provisions that are inexistent in the legislation". The answer to that question is clearly a no.

Whether Mrs. Yates spent the $61,784.95 transferred to her by her husband on holidays, personal items, groceries or other household expenditures is, in my respectful view, of no relevance to the determination of whether there was a transfer.

Digitized by Google

Let us assume, for example, that Mr. Yates had given Mrs. Yates an automobile valued at $61,784.95. Let us also assume that on the day following the gift, Mrs. Yates sells the automobile for its full value and proceeds to defray household expenses with that money. Would we seriously entertain an argument that the gift of the automobile does not constitute a transfer because the monies resulting from its sale served to defray the family's living expenses? I suspect that we would have no difficulty in dismissing such an argument.

Consequently, I see absolutely no basis for the appellant's argument that the nature of the expenses incurred with the money transferred to her by her husband is a relevant factor in determining whether she is subject to subsection 160(1) of the Act.

[15] Since that decision, there seems to be a general consensus that once the four criteria in section 160 have been met, there is no choice but to conclude that the assessment is valid. This Court's decisions in Provost v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 585, Woodland v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 434, Allen v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 426 and Campbell v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 431, acknowledge this principle, notwithstanding the Ducharme decision, above, in which Justice Rothstein, who was then on the Federal Court of Appeal, held that, given the facts of the case, it was reasonable to infer that there was consideration because the payment was tantamount to a payment of rent. However, Justice Rothstein did not consider the question of whether domestic service obligations can constitute consideration.

[16] The Court of Appeal in Yates could not have stated more clearly that purpose is of no importance in determining whether a transfer has taken place. Here, the transfer was done to enable the Appellant to invest the funds in a restaurant that would generate income to meet the family's needs. Thus, it was the Appellant who alone took on the management of the funds. To support the argument that there was no transfer there would have to have been a mandate in contemplation of incapacity or a similar document. Consequently, all the criteria of section 160 have been met and the assessment is valid.

[17] The question now is whether the money in issue is exempt from seizure such that section 160 does not apply. Assuming that the amount transferred by the Appellant's spouse is exempt from seizure, can section 160 apply nonetheless, thereby making the Appellant liable for the transferor's tax debt? This question arises because of the object of section 160 of the Act, which, as described by Justice Strayer in Hewett, above, is to prevent taxpayers from avoiding payment of their taxes by transferring their assets to relatives.

[18] In Yates, Justice Desjardins provided an overview of the decisions that deal with the object of section 160 and with Parliament's intent. I shall reproduce paragraphs 13-15 of her reasons for judgment:

The Court in Medland at paragraph 14 has explained the policy behind this provision in the following manner:

It is not disputed that the tax policy embodied in, or the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned [sic] to him. ...

Digitized by Google

Again, in Wannan v. Canada (2003 FCA 423) at paragraph 3, this Court recognized that "[s]ection 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands".

In Livingston, this Court explained at paragraph 27 that "a transferee of property will be liable to the CRA to the extent that the fair market value of the consideration given for the property falls short of the fair market value of that property". The Court stated in the same paragraph that the "very purpose of subsection 160(1) is to preserve the value of the existing assets in the taxpayer for collection by the CRA".

[19] In my opinion, once the transferee's tax liability is triggered by section 160, the CRA is not limited to recovering the property transferred by the transferor. All the transferee's assets are within the CRA's reach and their availability for seizure, should the case arise, has nothing to do with the transferee's tax liability under section 160 of the Act.

[20] That said, I now return to the question of whether the transfer of property exempt from seizure can render section 160 inapplicable because the Respondent cannot claim that the transferor avoided his tax obligations by transferring the property when that property was beyond the CRA's grasp in any event.

[21] Assuming that the answer to that question is affirmative, we must determine what money the CRA cannot seize. In Bourgoin c. Bouchard, 2008 QCCQ 7141, the Court of Québec (Civil Division) made the following statement regarding disability benefits:

[TRANSLATION]

This exemption from seizure results from the fact that the benefits will be used to cover Mr. Bouchard's essential needs resulting from an illness that prevents him from working and that the benefits must accordingly be regarded as being in the nature of support.

[22] However, exemption from seizure is not always assured. In Les sûretés réelles au Québec, Jacques Deslauriers writes:

[TRANSLATION]

In order to avail oneself of this exemption from seizure, the amounts in question cannot have been commingled with other, seizable, money. An example of such commingling would be a deposit into the debtor's general or consolidated bank account. Normally, unless an exception provided for by statute or in the case law applies, these amounts must remain identifiable. . . . It should be noted that, in certain cases — involving CSST, employment insurance and Quebec Pension Plan benefits, for example — the courts have allowed the amounts to remain exempt from seizure even though they had been deposited into the debtor's general account. In such instances, the nature of the funds in the accounts suggested that all the deposits therein were for the purpose of meeting living expenses.

[23] Justice Béliveau of the Quebec Superior Court, in D.(J.) c. J.(T.), above, confirmed that even if unseizable money is commingled with seizable money, the unseizable money does not necessarily lose its unseizable status. At paragraph 47 of his decision, he stated that amounts paid by the CSST retain their unseizable nature, even when the amounts are in the hands of the person who receives the money.

Digitized by Google

[24] However, this exemption from seizure is not ironclad. In Canada c. Bruyère, 2009 QCCA 2246, the Quebec Court of Appeal allowed the Department of Human Resources to recover overpayments of employment insurance benefits on the basis of subsection 126(4) of the Employment Insurance Act, which provides that where a person owes money to a debtor of the Department, that person can be required to pay directly to the Department any amounts payable by the person to the person's creditor. Accordingly, the Department seized money that the CSST was to pay the respondent, Mr. Bruyère. It did so despite section 144 of the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases. Paragraph 7 of the decision states:

[TRANSLATION]

Where, in exercising its legislative jurisdiction, the Parliament of Canada wishes to subject an enforcement measure to a provincially-enacted exemption from seizure, it may do so. This is what Parliament did, for example, in subsection 225(5) of the Income Tax Act (ITA), whose counterpart is subsection 126(2) of the EIA. In this case, however, the enforcement measure set out in subsection 126(4) of the EIA, like the one set out in section 224 of the ITA, is not subject to any such restriction. The inference that must therefore be drawn is that there is a conflict of intent between subsection 126(4) of the EIA and section 144 of the Act respecting industrial accidents and occupational diseases (LATMP), since the latter provision effectively neutralizes a rapid procedure for recovery that the EIA authorizes the Employment Insurance Commission to use. To this extent, section 144 of the LATMP frustrates Parliament's intent and is inapplicable where the Employment Insurance Commission sends the CSST the notice referred to in subsection 126(4) of the EIA.

[25] This principle was also endorsed by the Federal Court of Appeal in Marcoux v. Canada, 2001 FCA 92.

[26] Some writers have expressed their opinion regarding the CRA's powers in cases involving exemptions from seizure. In an article entitled "La protection des revenus de retraite : où en sommes nous?" (in the Cours de perfectionnement du notariat, a continuing education program for Quebec notaries), Lucie Quesnel writes that unseizability clauses in provincial legislation are not binding on the federal government when it comes to recovering tax debts. At paragraphs 21, 22 and 23, she states the following:

[TRANSLATION]

By enacting subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, Parliament has given itself an important tool to ensure that tax debts are collected.

. . .

As we can see, Parliament's intention is for tax debts to have priority over all others. In this regard, Louis Rabeau wrote:

[TRANSLATION]

Revenue Canada maintains that non-seizability, in its broad sense, cannot be invoked against it: since section 224 of the Income Tax Act does not state that the rules regarding exemption from seizure can be set up against the federal Crown, non-seizability cannot be invoked against Revenue Canada. It should be specified that this principle applies to all proceeds that are exempt from seizure: RRSPs, pension funds, benefits from the Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec, Quebec Pension Plan payments, etc.

Digitized by Google

Roger P. Simard states the following: [TRANSLATION]

It must be noted that, apart from contexts governed by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended ("the BIA"), the federal Crown is not bound by provincial grounds of exemption from seizure. Thus is may, through an administrative garnishment mechanism, intercept monthly pension payments and other amounts that might become payable under the contract, though such garnishment does not appear to allow it to exercise the right of withdrawal that the taxpayer might have under the contract.

[27] It would seem that, in view of the decision in Bruyère and the foregoing excerpts from scholarly writings, one can conclude that amounts paid by the CSST can be seized by the Minister of National Revenue, and thus, the application of section 160 of the Act would not be jeopardized by a transfer of unseizable property.

[28] It should be remembered, moreover, that, in Yates, the Federal Court of Appeal clearly held that nothing in subsection 160(1) of the Act enables a court to release a spouse from the tax liability imposed by section 160 if all the requisite conditions are met, since there is no ambiguity in subsection 160(1) of the Act. The exemption of the transferred property from seizure has no effect on the application of subsection 160(1).

[29] Since the Appellant's liability with respect to her spouse's tax debt has now been established, the question whether the amounts paid to him are exempt from seizure is not within this Court's jurisdiction to decide. [30] The appeal is dismissed, with costs.

Signed at Ottawa, Canada, this 12th day of February 2010. "François Angers"

Angers J.

See also Diana De Sanctis-Pedro, and Adamo De Sanctis, v. The Queen, 2010 TCC 118, where it was opined:

[1] The Appellants appeal from assessments under section 160 of the *Income Tax Act (*the "Act").

[2] The Appellants are, respectively, the daughter and son of Anthony De Sanctis. The three are therefore 'related persons' within the meaning of subsection 251(2) of the Act and are deemed by paragraph 251(1)(a) of the Act not to deal with each other at arm's length.

[3] On May 31, 2001, a house which was owned by Anthony De Sanctis and in which he had lived with his son and daughter, was sold. The cash payable by the purchaser on closing was $27,824.10.

[4] On the same day, a condominium residence was purchased using the $27,824.10 cash proceeds from the sale of the house. Title to the condominium was conveyed not to Anthony De Sanctis but rather to the Appellants. It was used by Anthony De Sanctis and his children as a residence.

Digitized by Google

[5] At the time of the transactions, Anthony De Sanctis was liable to pay more than $69,000.00 under the Act.

[6] On February 14, 2008, the Minister of National Revenue assessed the Appellants under section 160 of the Act in respect of the transfer of the cash. Each assessment was for $27,824.10. It is those assessments which are under appeal. The appeals were heard together on common evidence.

[7] Counsel for the Respondent conceded at the commencement of the hearing that the liability of the Appellants under section 160 could not exceed $13,912.05 each, and that judgment should issue accordingly.

[8] Section 160 of the Act provides in part:

[9] The Appellants did not lead any evidence to prove that Anthony De Sanctis did not transfer the net proceeds from the sale of his house to them as had been found by the Minister on assessment. The essence of the position taken by the Appellants at the hearing was that they gave consideration to their father for the transfer of the money. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Notices of Appeal read:

The family income was low throughout the living arrangements in the house and the condominium. To keep the family afloat, the father and the children made a contractual arrangement such that the children would pay for their living expenses including mortgage payment contributions, hence providing consideration for their vital living arrangement.

The enforceable legal agreement enabling the father in part to pay the mortgage and vital expenses from the child's contribution and own expense, amounts to an arm's length relationship disengaging the potential for applying s. 160(1). That section applies only in relationships where there is a tax benefit intended to be obtained by passing the benefit on to a relative with no consideration for such transfer of benefit.

[10] The Appellants both testified that, during the years leading up to the transaction, the income of the family was low, the family was struggling financially and there was an oral arrangement made under which the Appellants contributed as much as possible to the cost of food, shelter and other living expenses of the household. Each stated that the contributions were made by reason of a moral obligation. The amount of the contribution was left to be determined from time to time by the contributor. The contributions were made by payments of cash to the father. No record was kept of the amounts paid. The arrangements could not, in my view, be characterized as enforceable, legal agreements as alleged in the Notices of Appeal. It is obvious that there was no intent to create a binding contractual agreement.

[11] It is not possible to estimate with any reasonable degree of accuracy the amounts paid to Anthony De Sanctis by his children pursuant to the arrangements. Some evidence was led with respect to the earnings of the children during the five years prior to the sale of the house in 2001. This was done in order to demonstrate the ability of the children to make payments to their father. Diana De Sanctis- Pedros' annual earnings were modest. During 1997, 1998 and 1999, they did not exceed $6,697. During 2000 and 2001, the annual figures did not exceed $28,500. Adamo's annual income did not exceed $8,000 during any of those years. There was no basis in the evidence for making a leap from what was earned by either Appellant to what he or she decided to pay to their father.

Digitized by Google

[12] Section 160 was enacted to assist in the collection of taxes owing by counteracting the attempts of reluctant taxpayers to put their assets beyond the reach of the Minister by means of a transfer of such assets into friendlier hands for nothing or for consideration less than the market value of the assets transferred.

[13] It is not necessary to consider whether the transfer of the cash from the sale of Anthony De Sanctis' house was a deliberate attempt to prevent the Minister from seizing the money. In Wannan v. Canada, [2003] F.C.J. No. 1693. Sharlow J. noted that: 3 Section 160 of the Income Tax Act is an important tax collection tool, because it thwarts attempts to move money or other property beyond the tax collector's reach by placing it in presumably friendly hands. It is, however, a draconian provision. While not every use of section 160 is unwarranted or unfair, there is always some potential for an unjust result. There is no due diligence defence to the application of section 160. It may apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax. Indeed, it may apply to a transferee who has no knowledge of the tax affairs of the primary tax debtor. …

[14] The arrangements between the Appellants and Anthony De Sanctis whereby they made voluntary payments from time to time to assist with the living expenses of the household can have no bearing upon the application of section 160 to the transfer now in question. Subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) limits the liability of the transferee to the excess of the fair market value of the property transferred over the consideration given for that property. The evidence given by the Appellants makes it quite clear that the payments which they made were not "… consideration given for the property …" within the meaning of the subparagraph. The payments made by the Appellants to their father were quite unrelated to the transfer of that property. They were, as described by the witnesses, contributions to the shared cost of running the family household, nothing more.

[15] As already noted, the evidence fails to establish how much money was paid by either of the Appellants to their father. It was not suggested that any attempt was made to keep a record. No doubt this is due to the fact that the Appellants and their father did not intend to form an enforceable agreement requiring either of the Appellants to pay any particular amount at any particular time as consideration for a transfer of property.

[16] In my view, no consideration was given by the Appellants for the transfer by Anthony De Sanctis to them of the proceeds from the sale of his house. Section 160 therefore applies.

[17] The appeals will be dismissed. Success was divided. The parties shall bear their own costs.

Digitized by Google

Resulting and Constructive Trust Extinguishment

When legal title of property is held in the name of one party but a constructive trust has arisen in it in respect of another, does the transfer of that legal title constitute a transfer without adequate consideration for purposes of s. 160? This was the issue in the TCC of Gillian N. Darte v. The Queen[157] where the ct. held:

> [1] The issue in these appeals is whether the Appellant had any interest in or any right to any interest in the property located at 317 - 319 Fitzroy Street in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island (the "Property") at the time that it was transferred to her by Danny MacAdam, her common-law partner, and therefore whether the assessments issued against her under section 160 of the Income Tax Act and section 325 of the Excise Tax Act should be reduced.
>
> [2] Danny MacAdam has been the common-law partner of the Appellant for the past 20 years. The Appellant moved in with him approximately two months before she gave birth to their first child. At that time she was 19 years of age and in grade 10. She later received her GED from Holland College. Danny MacAdam's highest level of education was possibly grade 10. The Appellant and Danny MacAdam now have two children.
>
> [3] In 1989, Danny MacAdam had an agreement to acquire the Property. The deed to the Property however was not executed until November 3, 1992. The deed conveyed the title to the property to Danny MacAdam as the sole grantee. The Property was acquired without either Danny MacAdam or the Appellant making any down payment toward the purchase price of the Property. The consideration for the purchase of the Property consisted entirely of an assumption of an existing mortgage on the Property in favor of Royal Trust Corporation of Canada in the amount of $74,906.87 and a second mortgage granted to the vendor of the Property in the amount of $26,433.25. The mortgages that were on the Property were paid in full before the Property was transferred to the Appellant. The Appellant stated that she paid the mortgages. Based on the evidence presented at the hearing, I conclude that the mortgage payments were made from the rents that were collected.
>
> [4] The Property had five units and required substantial renovations. The original plan, which was followed after the Property was renovated, was that the Appellant and Danny MacAdam would occupy one of the units and would rent the other four units. The Appellant and Danny MacAdam initially moved into one of the one-bedroom units until the unit that they would be occupying was renovated.
>
> [5] The renovations that were completed were substantial, including ripping up the flooring and replacing it with new carpet or tile, painting, renovating the bathrooms, tearing down plaster walls and replacing the plaster with gyproc, adding new walls, installing a new backdoor and adding a parking lot. The Appellant performed many of the tasks herself including building walls and a partition, crack filling the gyproc and then sanding and painting, and cutting and installing all of the trim and mouldings around the windows, baseboards and along the ceiling.
>
> [6] Only the Appellant testified during the hearing. It was clear from her

[157] 2008TCC66

Digitized by Google

testimony that the renovations were completed as a result of her efforts and not as a result of the efforts of Danny MacAdam. Danny MacAdam also did not provide any assistance in looking after the children while the Appellant worked on the Property. During this period of time Danny MacAdam was working outside the home and had very little, if any, involvement with the renovations that were being done to the Property. The Appellant also testified that Danny MacAdam was an alcoholic and was violent, although no specific acts of violence were mentioned. There was no evidence that the Appellant received any compensation for her work that she did in relation to the Property, other than the transfer of the Property to her in 2001.

[7] There were items that were donated by the Appellant's mother and father, and the Appellant's father and his friend helped with the labour required to complete the renovations. The Appellant also contributed some of her money to the materials acquired for the renovations although no actual amount was established. The only sources of funds for the renovations were the Appellant's paycheques from her work, family allowance payments, and the rental income generated by the renting of the units in the Property.

[8] Danny MacAdam was involved in a car business and he encountered some problems with his business. He was assessed for unremitted GST and unpaid income taxes. As well, Danny MacAdam was incarcerated for a period of time in relation to certain offences related to provincial sales tax and, as part of his probation, he was prohibited from being involved in the car business. The total amount of Danny MacAdam's outstanding liabilities under the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act, including penalties and interest, at the time that the Property was transferred to the Appellant was $59,143.92 under the Excise Tax Act and $78,791.76 under the Income Tax Act for a total of $137,935.68. The fair market value of the Property, as agreed upon by counsel for the Appellant and counsel for the Respondent, was $140,000. The Appellant was assessed $78,791.76 pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act and $59,143.92 pursuant to section 325 of the Excise Tax Act.

[9] In the written submissions of counsel for the Respondent the issue is described as follows:

The sole issue in these cases is whether the Appellant is liable to pay the amounts of $78,791.76 and $59,143.92 with respect to the transfer of the Property from Danny MacAdam pursuant to section 160 of the ITA and section 325 of the ETA, respectively.

A determination of whether the Appellant had any right, title or interest in the Property, at the time it was transferred, aids in resolving this issue.

[10] The Appellant claims that she had an interest in the Property based on her claim that there was a constructive trust. In Peter v. Beblow, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 980, McLachlin J. (as she then was), stated the following on behalf of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada:

3 The basic notions are simple enough. An action for unjust enrichment arises when three elements are satisfied: (1) an enrichment; (2) a corresponding deprivation; and (3) the absence of a juristic reason for the enrichment. These proven, the action is established and the right to claim relief made out. At this point, a second doctrinal concern arises: the nature of the remedy. "Unjust enrichment" in equity permitted a number of remedies, depending on the circumstances. One was a payment for services rendered on the basis of quantum meruit or quantum valebat. Another equitable remedy, available traditionally where one person was possessed of legal title to property in which another had an interest, was the constructive trust. While the first remedy to be considered was a monetary award, the Canadian jurisprudence recognized that in some cases it might be insufficient. This may occur, to quote La Forest J. in Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, at p. 678, "if there is reason to grant to the plaintiff the additional rights that flow from recognition of a right of property". Or to quote Dickson J., as he then was, in Pettkus v. Becker, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 834, at p. 852, where there is a "contribution [to the property] sufficiently substantial and direct as to entitle [the plaintiff] to a portion of the profits realized upon sale of [the property]." In other words, the remedy of constructive trust arises, where monetary damages are inadequate and where there is a link between the contribution that founds the action and the property in which the constructive trust is claimed.

Digitized by Google

(emphasis added)

[11] In this case, it seems clear that Danny MacAdam was enriched as a result of the labour provided by the Appellant as well as the materials purchased by her and the labour and materials supplied by the Appellant's parents and the labour provided by the Appellant's father and his friend. There was also a corresponding deprivation to the Appellant and the absence of any juristic reason for the enrichment.

[12] In Peter v. Beblow, supra McLachlin J. (as she then was), also stated the following on behalf of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada:

6 I share the view of Cory J. that the three elements necessary to establish a claim for unjust enrichment -- an enrichment, a corresponding deprivation, and the absence of any juristic reason for the enrichment -- are made out in this case. The appellant's housekeeping and child-care services constituted a benefit to the respondent (1st element), in that he received household services without compensation, which in turn enhanced his ability to pay off his mortgage and other assets. These services also constituted a corresponding detriment to the appellant (2nd element), in that she provided services without compensation. Finally, since there was no obligation existing between the parties which would justify the unjust enrichment and no other arguments under this broad heading were met, there is no juristic reason for the enrichment (3rd element). Having met the three criteria, the plaintiff has established an unjust enrichment giving rise to restitution.

…

12 This Court has held that a common law spouse generally owes no duty at common law, in equity or by statute to perform work or services for her partner. As Dickson C.J., speaking for the Court put it in Sorochan v. Sorochan, supra, at p. 46, the common law wife "was under no obligation, contractual or otherwise, to perform the work and services in the home or on the land". So there is no general duty presumed by the law on a common law spouse to perform work and services for her partner.

Digitized by Google

…

24 I doubt the wisdom of dividing unjust enrichment cases into two categories -- commercial and family -- for the purpose of determining whether a constructive trust lies. A special rule for family cases finds no support in the jurisprudence. Neither Pettkus, nor Rathwell, nor Sorochan suggest such a departure. Moreover, the notion that one can dispense with a link between the services rendered and the property which is claimed to be subject to the trust is inconsistent with the proprietary nature of the notion of constructive trust.

(emphasis added)

[13] Counsel for the Respondent argued that no constructive trust could arise in the circumstances of this case because the Appellant and Danny MacAdam were still living together at the time that the Property was transferred to her. In support of this proposition, counsel for the Respondent relied on the case of Blackman

Davison, [1987] B.C.J. No. 200, 12 B.C.L.R. (2d) 24 (BCCA) and Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v. Walsh, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 325. The decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Blackman v. Davison was based on the Family Relations Act of British Columbia (which is not applicable in this case) and it was rendered before the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Rawluk v. Rawluk, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 70.

[14] In the Walsh case, the issue before the Supreme Court of Canada was whether the matrimonial property legislation of the province of Nova Scotia contravened the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it did not provide common-law partners with the same rights that were available to married couples. Counsel for the Respondent argued that the following excerpts from the Walsh case supported her position that no constructive trust could arise until there was a breakdown of the common-law relationship:

49 …The general principle is that, without taking some unequivocal consensual action, these cohabiting persons maintain the right to deal with any and all of their property as they see fit.

…

59 …In these cases, the law has evolved to protect those persons who may be unfairly disadvantaged as a result of the termination of their relationship.

…

61 For those couples who have not made arrangements regarding their property at the outset of their relationship, the law of constructive trust remains available to address inequities that may arise at the time of the dissolution.

[15] The issue before the Supreme Court of Canada in Walsh was not whether a constructive trust can only arise if there has been a breakdown in the common-law relationship and none of these statements indicate that this is the only time that a constructive trust could arise. These statements simply provide that the law of constructive trust is available to address inequities that may arise at the time of the dissolution.

Digitized by Google

[16] In Rawluk v. Rawluk, supra, the Supreme Court of Canada specifically addressed the issue of when the property interest arises under a constructive trust. The issue in that case, as summarized by Cory J., was:

At issue in this appeal is whether the doctrine of constructive trust can be applied to determine the ownership of assets of married spouses under the provisions of the Family Law Act, 1986, S.O. 1986, c. 4.

[17] Cory J. stated as follows on behalf of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in relation to the question of when a property interest arises under a constructive trust:

It is important in this respect to keep in mind that a property interest arising under a constructive trust can be recognized as having come into existence not when the trust is judicially declared but from the time when the unjust enrichment first arose. As Professors Oosterhoff and Gillese state, "the date at which a constructive trust arises ... is now generally accepted to be the date upon which a duty to make restitution occurs" (Oosterhoff and Gillese, A. H. Oosterhoff: Text, Commentary and Cases on Trusts (3rd ed. 1987), at p. 579). Professor Scott has stated in Law of Trusts, op. cit., at pp. 323-24, that:

The beneficial interest in the property is from the beginning in the person who has been wronged. The constructive trust arises from the situation in which he is entitled to the remedy of restitution, and it arises as soon as that situation is created. ... It would seem that there is no foundation whatever for the notion that a constructive trust does not arise until it is decreed by a court. It arises when the duty to make restitution arises, not when that duty is subsequently enforced.

I agree completely with the position taken on this issue by the authors of these helpful texts.

As well in Hussey v. Palmer, supra, at p. 1290 (quoted by Dickson J. in Rathwell v. Rathwell, supra, at p. 455), Lord Denning M.R. noted that a constructive trust "may arise at the outset when the property is acquired, or later on, as the circumstances may require". As a result, even if it is declared by a court after the parties have already separated, a constructive trust can be deemed to have arisen when the duty to make restitution arose. It should therefore be considered as part of the property owned by the beneficiary at valuation date.

It must be emphasized that the constructive trust is remedial in nature. If the Court is asked to grant such a remedy and determines that a declaration of constructive trust is warranted, then the proprietary interest awarded pursuant to that remedy will be deemed to have arisen at the time when the unjust enrichment first occurred. But, as Professor Scott makes clear, the fact that the proprietary interest is deemed to have arisen before the remedy was granted is not inconsistent with the remedial characteristics of the doctrine.

[18] It is clear, based on the comments of the Supreme Court of Canada in Peter v. Beblow, supra and Rawluk v. Rawluk, supra, that no distinction is to be made between commercial situations and family situations in determining whether a constructive trust exists and the constructive trust, when granted, comes into existence when the unjust enrichment first arose. The constructive trust does not arise because of a breakdown in the relationship between common law partners but because one party has been unjustly enriched. As noted by the Supreme Court of Canada, in paragraph 12 of the decision in Peter v. Beblow, "a common-law spouse generally owes no duty at common law, in equity or by statute to perform work or services for her partner". Since the Appellant did not owe any duty to perform work for or provide services to Danny MacAdam, she had no duty to perform any work on the Property (that was only registered in his name) and therefore she had a right to be compensated for her efforts. Since she was not compensated by Danny MacAdam for her efforts, the unjust enrichment (and the Appellant's interest in the Property) would arise when she worked on the Property for no consideration.

Digitized by Google

[19] There has been no finding by a court of equity that there is a constructive trust in this case. The British Columbia Court of Appeal in LeClair v. LeClair Estate, 159 DLR (4th) 638 discussed the requirement that a constructive trust must be judicially declared. Ryan J.A., on behalf of the BCCA stated as follows, after quoting the above paragraphs from Rawluk:

[45] The appellant says that because of the unjust enrichment, the property in question (one-half of the proceeds of the sale of Clair Manor) was automatically subject to a constructive trust before the death of John LeClair. He submitted that it followed from this that the property was not John LeClair's to devise under his Will.

[46] The flaw in the appellant's argument lies in its failure to take into account the remedial nature of the remedy of constructive trust and the requirement that the trust must be judicially declared. In my view, in the passage I have just quoted Cory J. addressed the question whether, once a court declares constructive trust, the interest arises at the time of judicial declaration, or, as of the time of the unjust enrichment. His answer was that it arises at the time of the unjust enrichment. However, contrary to the appellant's argument in this case, this passage does not negate the need for a court to first determine whether an unjust enrichment occurred and whether the appropriate remedy would be a constructive trust. The appellant's argument that a constructive trust arose automatically prior to John LeClair's death is not supported by Rawluk v. Rawluk.

[47] The Rawluk case has not displaced the well-entrenched rule that the remedy of constructive trust does not follow automatically from a finding of unjust enrichment. In Sorochan v. Sorochan, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 38, 29 D.L.R. (4th) 1, Dickson C.J. said this, at p. 47:

The constructive trust constitutes one important judicial means of remedying unjust enrichment. Other remedies, such as monetary damages, may also be available to rectify situations of unjust enrichment. We must, therefore, ask when and under what circumstances it is appropriate for a court to impose a constructive trust.

[20] Therefore a declaration by a court of equity would be required to find that there was a constructive trust in the Property. Once so declared, the constructive trust would have come into existence when the unjust enrichment arose. Sobier J. made the following comments on whether this Court is a court of equity in Sunil Lighting Products v. Minister of National Revenue, [1993] T.C.J.

Digitized by Google

No. 666:

18 The jurisprudence clearly affirms that the Tax Court of Canada is not a court of equity and its jurisdiction is based within its enabling statute6. In addition, the Court cannot grant declaratory relief given that such relief is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court7. In an income tax appeal, the Court's powers are spelled out in subsection 171(1) of the Income Tax Act. Consequently, these powers essentially entail the determination of whether the assessment was made in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax Act8.

[21] As this Court is not a court of equity, the equitable remedy of constructive trust cannot be granted by this Court.

[22] The issue of whether the application of the equitable doctrine of constructive trust can affect an assessment under section 160 of the Income Tax Act has been discussed in earlier decisions of this Court. There appear to be differing views of the Judges of this Court in relation to this matter. In Savoie v. The Queen, [1993] 2 C.T.C. 2330, 93 DTC 552, Bowman J. (as he then was) clearly stated that the doctrine of constructive trust could be invoked in determining, for the purposes of the application of section 160 of the Income Tax Act, the fair market value of a property transferred by a tax debtor. In the subsequent cases of Raphael v. The Queen, 2000 DTC 2434, [2000] 4 C.T.C. 2620 and Burns v. Her Majesty the Queen 2006 DTC 3383, [2006] 5 C.T.C. 2392, the principle of unjust enrichment was held to not be applicable in dealing with assessments issued under section 160 of the Income Tax Act. In neither Burns nor Raphael was there any reference to the decision of Bowman J. (as he then was) in Savoie nor were there any references to the Supreme Court of Canada decisions in Peter v. Beblow and Rawluk v. Rawluk.

[23] The issue before me is whether the existence of an interest of the Appellant in the Property or any right that the Appellant had to have an interest in the Property granted to her by a court of equity, can affect the assessments issued under section 160 of the Income Tax Act and section 325 of the Excise Tax Act. In my opinion, as a result of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in Peter v. Beblow and Rawluk v. Rawluk, since the beneficial interest of the Appellant in the Property, if the equitable remedy of constructive trust would have been granted by a court of equity, would have come into existence when the unjust enrichment occurred (which was when the Appellant improved the Property for no consideration) the right of the Appellant to have a declaration by a court of equity of her beneficial interest in the Property as of the time of the unjust enrichment, is a right that the Appellant surrendered when the Property was conveyed to her in 2001 and hence would be consideration that she gave for the Property.

[24] Both sections 160 of the Income Tax Act and 325 of the Excise Tax Act are intended to prevent taxpayers from escaping their liability for taxes by transferring their assets to persons with whom they do not deal at arm's length for inadequate consideration. Each section imposes a liability on a transferee who receives property from a non-arm's length tax debtor for inadequate consideration. From the Appellant's perspective, the issue, in relation to the application of these sections to the transfer of the Property to her, is to what extent should she be held liable for the tax debts of Danny MacAdam? The Appellant earned her right to an interest in the Property as a result of the substantial amount of work that she performed to improve the Property and her contributions of her own resources to the improvements. It would be unfair to not recognize her rights to an interest in the Property when dealing with an assessment under section 160 of the Income Tax Act and section 325 of the Excise Tax Act.

Digitized by Google

[25] Counsel for the Respondent also submitted that the law of constructive trusts could not be applied when the rights of creditors are affected. However in Re Roberts Estate, [1998] O.J. No. 1109, the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) applied the law of constructive trust in a bankruptcy situation and found that the wife of the bankrupt held a constructive trust in part of the proceeds from the sale of shares and she was only required to return to the trustee in bankruptcy the portion of the proceeds that was not affected by the trust in her favour. This case was followed by Registrar Herauf of the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench (in Bankruptcy and Insolvency) in the Estate of John Allen Patrick, [1999] S.J. No. 82. As well a constructive trust was found in a bankruptcy situation in Ellingsen (Trustee of) v. Hallmark Ford Sales Ltd., 2000 BCCA 458.

[26] In my opinion, a determination that the Appellant had a right to apply to a court of equity for a declaration that she had a beneficial interest in the property under a constructive trust in this case does not prejudice the Respondent because the Respondent did not become a creditor of Danny MacAdam based on any assumption or reliance on the fact that Danny MacAdam was the owner of the Property.

[27] As a result, I find that for the purposes of section 160 of the Income Tax Act and section 325 of the Excise Tax Act, the Appellant had a right to apply to a court of equity for a declaration that she had an interest in the Property at the time that the Property was transferred to her in 2001 and this right was surrendered when the Property was transferred to her and hence the surrender of this right was consideration that the Appellant gave for the transfer of this Property to her. The Appellant has established, on a balance of probabilities, that the elements of unjust enrichment, as set out above, are present in this case and that there is a direct link to the Property as the Property was the one on which the Appellant worked for no consideration. Therefore the Appellant had a right to apply to a court of equity for a declaration that she had an interest in the Property. The only evidence was that the Appellant, and not Danny MacAdam, was the person who did the work needed to improve the Property and who looked after renting the Property, collecting rents and, when necessary, evicting a tenant. There was no evidence of any work performed on the Property by Danny MacAdam or of any of his money (other than his share of the rental income) being used to pay for the Property.

[28] Counsel for the Appellant submitted that the fair market value of the Appellant's interest in the Property, at the time that the Property was transferred to her, was equal to one-half of the fair market value of the

Digitized by Google

Property. Counsel for the Appellant did not call Danny MacAdam as a witness. Although the evidence that was presented was clear that Danny MacAdam did not make any contribution of labour or capital to the Property and hence the Appellant may have a right to more than a 50% interest in the Property, without hearing from Danny MacAdam and with counsel for the Appellant only seeking a ruling that she had a 50% interest in the Property, I am not prepared to find that the Appellant had a right to any more than a 50% interest in the Property. The possibility that the Appellant may have a right to more than a 50% interest would, in my opinion, negate any discount that should be applied in determining the fair market value of her right to apply for a declaration that she had a 50% interest in the property. Since there has been no declaration by a court of equity that the Appellant had a 50% interest in the Property and, since this is an equitable remedy, there is no guarantee that such remedy would have been granted by a court of equity. However, this possibility that a court of equity may not have granted this remedy is, for the purposes of determining the fair market value of her right to apply for this declaration, offset by the possibility that she had a right to a declaration that her interest was greater than 50%, and therefore I find that the fair market value of her right to apply to a court of equity for a declaration of a constructive trust is equal to $70,000, which is one-half of the fair market value of the Property, for the purposes of sections 160 of the Income Tax Act and 325 of the Excise Tax Act.

[29] Counsel for the Respondent had also raised the issue that the Appellant had not reported any of the rental income on her tax returns. In the Reply filed by the Respondent it is stated that the Respondent "denies that until April 12, 2001, Danny MacAdam reported all rental income and expenses relating to the 317 - 319 Fitzroy Street Property and states that for taxation years 1999 and 2000, he failed to file [sic] in his income tax returns as required by the Income Tax Act, hence, he failed to report his income". Therefore it would appear that Danny MacAdam did not report the rental income either. The reporting of the rental income is not the issue in this case. The only issue in this case is the validity of the assessments issued under section 160 of the Income Tax Act and section 325 of the Excise Tax Act.

[30] As a result, the appeal under the Income Tax Act is allowed and the matter is referred back to the Minister of National Revenue for reconsideration and reassessment on the basis that the Appellant gave consideration of $70,000 for the transfer of the Property to her as she surrendered her right to have a declaration by a court of equity that she had a beneficial interest in the Property at the time it was transferred from Danny MacAdam to the Appellant, for the purposes of the assessment issued under section 160 of the Income Tax Act.

Eleanor Martin v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2013 TCC 38, An Argument for Constructive Trust on S. 160 Transfer

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

Boyle J.

Digitized by Google

[1] This is an appeal by the Appellant, Eleanor Martin, of a section 160 transferee liability assessment in respect of transfers allegedly made to her without consideration by her late husband at a time when he was in arrears in his taxes. Two appeals, that of the Appellant and that of her late husband's estate, were to be heard together over two days. The parties filed a Partial Joint Statement of Facts which is appended hereto. Early on the first day the parties communicated that the estate's appeal had been settled and consented to judgment in accordance with that settlement. The hearing of the Appellant's appeal did not require a full day.

[2] Mrs. Martin is an elderly woman at this stage. She holds a university degree. In spite of her age and the long period of time to which her testimony related, I accept generally that all of her evidence is correct to the best of her recollection of the events and conversations she participated in, and what she was told. Her credibility was not challenged, her version of the events is largely consistent with the written evidence presented (especially on the significant issue of having been told very clearly different things by the Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") auditor in writing than orally on the material issue of the salary paid to her as described below). I accept fully her version of the events.

[3] It is the Appellant's position that the section 160 reassessment ignores the consideration she provided for the amounts transferred in the form of services provided in his medical practice, and of premises made available to his medical practice.

[4] It is her position that (i) she was owed for accrued unpaid work prior to the years of her husband's tax arrears and the transfers, and (ii) that she had been unpaid for certain work, and underpaid for other years, during the years of her husband's transfers to her while he had unpaid tax debts. The CRA has recognized the latter unpaid years at the Objections level for years during which her husband made transfers to her. However, CRA has not made any comparable recognition for her accrued unpaid work for prior years nor for the alleged underpaid work in the latter years.

[5] The unpaid and underpaid employment work provided by Mrs. Martin to her husband's medical practice was argued as an accrued debt, as current consideration, as unjust enrichment and on a constructive trust basis relying upon the decisions of Webb J., as he then was, in Darte v. The Queen, 2008 TCC 66, and of Bowman J., as he then was, in Savoie v. The Queen, 93 DTC 552. I do not need to deal with the constructive trust arguments in the circumstances but have concerns that, unlike unjust enrichment, constructive trust is an equitable in rem claim for an interest in a property subject to the alleged trust and I fail to see how that fits the facts before me relating to unpaid services.

[6] The second consideration for the transfers put forward by the Appellant is in respect of unpaid rent for the Fenwick property of which she was the sole registered owner, had made significant financial contributions for its purchase, and which she claimed was beneficially owned only by her prior to the year in which her husband's accrued unpaid tax debts arose. She claims her husband gifted his interest in the property long prior to any tax arrears and that her husband's share of the mortgage repayments in his pre-tax debt period reflected his use of the property in those years for his professional practice.

Digitized by Google

[7] The only consideration for the transfers put forward by the Appellant are these two distinct items for services genuinely rendered to, and premises genuinely made available and used by, her husband's medical practice.

Mrs. Martin's Professional Services:

[8] Mrs. Martin was able to describe in her testimony and in her written summary her daily work duties in the years in question in considerable detail. I accept that to be entirely factual and without question. The only issue is what would have been a reasonable salary for her to have been paid for that work.

[9] This is made easier by the facts that (i) prior to the years in question, her husband had paid her a salary, some of those payments were challenged by CRA on audit, and CRA set out in a letter following its audit what it felt the reasonable arm's length value for the services rendered was, and (ii) in two of the six years in question Dr. Martin paid his wife a salary.

[10] CRA's written audit letter sets the arm's length value of Mrs. Martin's services at $30,000 for the year 1989 rising by $2,000 per year to $36,000 for 1992. The salary set by Dr. Martin, deducted by him and included in Mrs. Martin's income in 2001 and 2002 was $25,000 and $24,700.

[11] I do not accept that the more recent $25,000 or $24,700 number should govern. It is not at all unusual within family businesses for salaries to be lowered to below market to reflect the then current capital needs, cash flows, or other financial performance or realities of the business. Also, it undoubtedly reflected a balancing of CRA wrongly telling them nothing was deductible and their accountant then telling them that CRA was wrong.

[12] Judicial determination after the fact based on evidence available and presented can not be expected to fix an entirely accurate and correct amount. After considering the evidence before me, including the possible explanations for both sets of numbers, the services rendered, Mrs. Martin's accrued experience before 1995 in managing her husband's practice, the effects of inflation on salaries, et cetera, I find that for each year in the period 1995 to 2004 the reasonable amount of salary which would have been paid in an arm's length relationship would have been $38,000 annually.

[13] Dr. Martin made transfers to his wife while he had an unpaid tax liability during the six years 1999 to 2004. For the years 1999, 2000, 2003 and 2004, the Respondent only recognized consideration of $100,000 ($25,000 annually). I therefore find additional unrecognized consideration from her to him of $52,000 during this period.

[14] For the 2001 and 2002 years in which she was paid $25,000 and $24,700 annually during this period I similarly find additional consideration of $26,300.

[15] With respect to the prior unpaid years I find that, in the four years (1995 to 1998) prior to the husband's transfers to her while he had tax arrears, that she had provided services to him worth $38,000 annually and that she was therefore owed $152,000 by him at the time of the transfer. The Respondent's position was that the accrued amount for unpaid services for the prior period was not relevant since it pre-dated the years the husband had tax arrears and made transfers. For this reason it did not give any credit or assign any recognizable value to this. There is no apparent reason for this inconsistency. Had Mrs. Martin loaned Dr. Martin money in the period, that was settled by the later transfers, that would be valuable consideration for section 160 purposes. I see no reason to treat her unpaid services during the years immediately preceding the transfers any differently than her unpaid services in the years that the transfers occurred. Nor when pressed, could counsel for the Respondent articulate one to the Court. CRA had correctly reassessed her following her Objection to allow this for the later years; this was done on a principled basis and not as a settlement. At the time Dr. Martin transferred money to her, she had a claim for unpaid services she had performed for his business. That amount was four years at $38,000 or $152,000 which should also be recognized.

Digitized by Google

Fenwick Property Rentals:

[16] I find on the evidence presented that Mrs. Martin paid at least 25% of the Fenwick property acquisition cost. The proceeds of the sale of the Australian home which they owned jointly and for which she paid at least one-half of the mortgage was used to finance the Fenwick property down payment. Mrs. Martin had also gone back to work in the years 1986 through 1988 while they were still living in the Fenwick property so that the family could save money to repay the mortgage on the Fenwick property on an accelerated basis. Mrs. Martin was the sole registered owner of the house and I therefore find that she had at least a 25% ownership of the house. Rent paid in years prior to 1995 had also been the subject of the earlier CRA audits of Dr. and Mrs. Martin. It can be noted that in the CRA audit previously discussed, the CRA's final position was described as her having a 25% ownership in the property and not the 100% ownership previously claimed. I do not need to decide if she was the 100% beneficial owner in order to vacate this assessment.

[17] The house was used entirely by her husband as a medical office in all of the relevant years.

[18] There is little evidence available to me regarding the fair market value rent which should have been paid in the years in question. The amount of rent previously paid to a commercial landlord for her husband's medical practice was approximately $2,500 a month. This is the amount that was paid and deducted in those prior years.

[19] Being conservative to account for possible differences between the commercially rented premises and the converted home as to size, services included, utilities included and the like, I can conservatively estimate that the fair market rental value of the Fenwick property in the years in question was at least half of the approximately $30,000 annually that had until then been paid to the commercial landlord for nearby premises for a similar use. Her share of the unpaid rent assuming only a 25% ownership would be $3,750 per year over the ten unpaid rental years in question (being 1995 through 2004). This amounts to a further $37,500 of consideration from her for the transfers by her husband. This would be the total unpaid rents owing to her for the years 1995 through 1998 before he fell into tax arrears and for the years 1999 through 2004 during the period he made transfers to her.

[20] In total I have found at least an additional $267,800 of consideration from Mrs. Martin to Dr. Martin for the transfers. That is sufficient to allow the appeal and to vacate the assessment.

Digitized by Google

[21] As mentioned above there is some considerable concern raised by the CRA correspondence with Dr. Martin and the Appellant in relation to the 1994 resolution of the prior audit of 1990 to 1992. There is a shocking difference between what CRA communicated in writing regarding the acceptable reasonable arm's length salary to be paid to Mrs. Martin for her work at her husband's dermatology practice, and what has now been confirmed by CRA to have been told to the Martins by that CRA auditor. This is not a case of a CRA auditor writing something incorrect or stating something incorrectly. It appears that it can only be considered to have been intentionally deceitful. Such actions by public servants are entirely inexcusable. The Court is very surprised that the CRA would in these circumstances have pursued its section 160 case against Mrs. Martin with such vigour given that the deceit related precisely to the most significant issue in this case being the worth of Mrs. Martin's services to her husband's practice. The Court has accepted Mrs. Martin's version that in 1994 the auditor told them in relation to the resolution of both her and her husband's audits that he could no longer deduct any portion of any salary he chose to pay her. The CRA has since acknowledged in writing that in fact that was what they were told, notwithstanding what the same auditor wrote. According to the Appellant this is what led her to continuing to work for her husband but to not be paid for the years prior to the years of her husband's tax arrears and transfers to her, and to be paid a much lesser amount in some of the later years after her husband's business accountant advised them that a reasonable salary was in fact properly deductible and always had been. I accept this explanation fully and believe this reinforces overall Mrs. Martin's credibility.

[22] The appeal is allowed and the assessment is vacated.

[23] I will allow 30 days to receive written submissions from the parties on costs. I would ask to be told by the Appellant what the total amount of Mrs. Martin's legal costs have been in this appeal. I would ask to be told by the Respondent what the date was of CRA's confirmation (referred to in the Report on Objection dated June 20, 2008) that the Martins were clearly misled at the conclusion of the 1994 audit.

Signed at Montréal, Québec this 4th day of February 2013.

"Patrick Boyle"

Boyle J.

See also Elizabeth Anne Warren v. The Queen[158] concerning a resulting trust situation at the TCC level.

[1] Elizabeth Warren appeals an assessment pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, whereby the Government assessed her as jointly and severally liable with her husband, Dr. Frederick Warren, for his tax liability of $261,921.56. The Minister of National Revenue invoked section 160 based on a transfer of the matrimonial home from Dr. Warren to his wife in 1998. Mrs. Warren claims that notwithstanding that Dr. Warren was the sole registered owner of the property, she had a 50% equity interest pursuant to a resulting trust, and that she paid Dr. Warren consideration equal to the fair market value of his 50% interest; consequently, section 160 of the Income Tax Act should not apply. The following are the issues:

158

Digitized by Google

Facts

What property interest did Dr. Warren transfer to his wife? In this regard I must consider:

Does this Court have jurisdiction to consider whether a resulting trust existed for purposes of a section 160 assessment? Yes it does.

If so, was there such a resulting trust in the circumstances before me? Yes, there was a resulting trust.

What were the Warrens' respective interests in the matrimonial property? I conclude Mrs. Warren and Dr. Warren had a one-third and two-thirds interest, respectively, in the property.

Did Mrs. Warren pay to Dr. Warren consideration equal to the fair market value of such interest in the property? No, Mrs. Warren paid to Dr. Warren less than the fair market value of the property transferred ($55,333).[2] In November 1982, Dr. Warren entered an agreement to acquire a lot in Manotick for $74,500 (the "Manotick property"). The Warrens' intention was to construct their matrimonial home on this property. Prior to their move to Manotick, the Warrens lived in Ottawa (the "Elvaston property"). They were registered as joint tenants on the Elvaston property, though when initially acquired in 1974, it was in Mrs. Warren's name, in trust. It was later transferred into both their names. I find their joint ownership of the Elvaston property reflected an equal interest in that property.

[3] In April 1983, the Warrens took out a mortgage on the Elvaston property for $74,200. Also in April 1983, the Transfer of Land of the Manotick property was registered in Dr. Warren's name alone, indicating a consideration of $74,500. He also granted a mortgage back of $37,250 to the Vendor of the Manotick property. Mrs. Warren testified that she believed her husband would look after her interest in the matrimonial property, for, as she put it, they were married so they would share the home together.

[4] In June 1984, the Warrens sold the Elvaston property for $133,000. The construction of their home on the Manotick property was completed in 1984 and they moved into that property, where they continue to reside to this day.

[5] Mrs. Warren did not know what the home in Manotick cost to build, other than it was more than anticipated. Dr. Warren estimated the total cost of construction was approximately $280,000. He suggested that funds were borrowed to pay for the construction. He suggested the borrowed funds were paid off with income from his chiropractic business. A mortgage was registered against this property to the Royal Bank of Canada in 1989 for $280,000, several years after construction had been completed.

[6] There is a third property that also comes into play in the Warrens' story; a property on Woodroffe Avenue in Ottawa from which Dr. Warren carried on his chiropractic clinic. Mrs. Warren testified this property was held in a company, though the only documents presented at trial indicated this property was, in 1976, in Mrs. Warren's name (in trust), and in 1986 was transferred into her name alone. The transfer indicated consideration was "$2.00 - Transfer by Transferee to the beneficiary of the trust". There was a mortgage of $30,000 registered against this property in 1976 to the Royal Bank of Canada.

Digitized by Google

[7] Mrs. Warren testified that her husband paid the mortgage on the clinic property and on the Elvaston property, and also on the Manotick property up until the time that she took over ownership of the Manotick property in December 1997. She was unclear on that latter point in cross-examination. Dr. Warren testified that both he and his wife made payments on the Elvaston property. Mrs. Warren also testified that she received income from the company that owned the clinic and that she was a director of that company. I did not receive any documentary evidence indicating a company owned the clinic, received rent or paid Mrs. Warren any salary. She could not recall what rent the clinic paid, nor initially how much salary she received though she later reflected it may have been around $37,000 a year. She also made no mention of receiving salary for managing the clinic; indeed she admitted she was not a businesswoman. Dr. Warren testified that Mrs. Warren was the manager of the clinic and received a salary for that job, although he acknowledged that she did not actually have to go to the clinic to manage it. I describe this testimony as it has led me to the conclusion that Mrs. Warren had little, if any, involvement in arranging the couple's financial situation. It is clear that it was Dr. Warren, with the assistance of an accountant, a Mr. Savarin, who made the arrangements. Mrs. Warren simply believed her husband would protect her. I am satisfied she received income, though I am not sure exactly what she did to earn it.
[8] With that background, I turn now to what occurred in December 1997. Dr. Warren was in some financial straits. He needed to consolidate his debts and he turned to Healthgroup Financial, a division of Newcourt Credit Group Inc. to do so. As he testified, his accountant set up everything. He was not aware of any tax obligations at this stage. His current accountant, Mr. Patterson, testified that the former accountant had led Dr. Warren to believe he owed no taxes. Dr. Warren in fact owed $261,921.56.
[9] In December 1997, Dr. Warren transferred the Manotick property to his wife. The transfer documents show a transfer from Dr. Warren to his wife for $90,000 (the $90,000 being the assumption of the mortgage against the property). The property had a fair market value of $425,000. Coincidentally, with the registration of the transfer, a new mortgage was placed on the property (now in Mrs. Warren's name) in the amount of $168,000 showing Healthgroup as the lender, Mrs. Warren as borrower, and Dr. Warren as guarantor. Also at the same time, a mortgage in the amount of $206,000 was registered by Healthgroup against the clinic property, again showing Dr. Warren as guarantor. This was all, according to Dr. Warren, in connection with the consolidation of debts.
[10] Clearly, Mrs. Warren entered these arrangements on the advice of her husband. At one point in testimony, she indicated she made the mortgage payments on the $168,000 mortgage, though in cross- examination she was less sure: she had no idea how much the payments were. She also assumed that her husband made the mortgage payments on the clinic property.

Digitized by Google

Appellant's Position

[11] The Appellant argues that at the time Dr. Warren transferred the Manotick property to her in December 1997, she already had a 50% interest in the property, arising from a resulting trust. She was therefore only acquiring Dr. Warren's 50% interest, valued at $212,500, for which she assumed her share of the $90,000 mortgage ($45,000) and borrowed a further $168,000, which she argues formed part of the consideration, as it went to Dr. Warren's consolidation of debts arrangement. There is therefore no inadequate consideration which would bring section 160 of the Income Tax Act into play.

Respondent's Position

[12] The Respondent argues firstly that the Court has no jurisdiction to consider the resulting trust, as the Tax Court of Canada is not a Court of equity. Further, Mrs. Warren only paid $90,000 for a property valued at $425,000, as the subsequent $168,000 mortgage did not constitute part of the consideration paid to Dr. Warren. Section 160 of the Income Tax Act is therefore engaged, and Mrs. Warren has been correctly assessed for her husband's tax liability of $261,921.56.

Analysis

[13] Subsection 160(1) reads as follows:

…

[14] There are four elements to the application of this provision in this case:

There must be a transfer of property from Dr. Warren to Mrs. Warren;

Dr. Warren and Mrs. Warren must be spouses;

There must be no consideration (or inadequate consideration) flowing from Mrs. Warren to Dr. Warren for the property transferred; and

Dr. Warren must be liable to pay an amount under the Act in or in respect of the year when the property was transferred or in any preceding year.

[15] Only the first and third elements are at play before me. With respect to the requirement of the transfer of property, there is no question Dr. Warren transferred property to his wife in December 1997. The question, however, is what was the extent of his interest in the property transferred? He was the sole registered owner of the Manotick property, but the Appellant argues Dr. Warren only had a 50% interest in that property to transfer to her, as she had a 50% interest arising from her resulting trust.

[16] The Respondent argues that a finding of a resulting trust, as an equitable remedy, cannot be determined by this Court as the Tax Court is not a Court of equity. Certainly, Justice Webb concluded in the recent decision of Darte v. R.[159] that a constructive trust must be judicially declared, which had not happened in that case. He neatly sidestepped this obstacle by finding that the Appellant had a right to apply to a Court of equity for a declaration of constructive trust, and that that right could be valued at the same amount as the actual beneficial interest itself. The parties before me did not argue the constructive trust: they focused on the resulting trust.

[17] As pointed out by Professor Waters in the Waters' Law of Trusts in

[159] 2008 TCC 66

Digitized by Google

Canada:[160]

The terms "implied", "resulting" and "constructive" trusts have caused a good deal of confusion in the law of trusts, ... (page 454)

What is clear is that the resulting trust is recognized as something separate from the constructive trust. The Respondent argues that it is not open to the Tax Court to find Dr. Warren's interests in the Manotick property as anything other than a 100% interest, for purposes of the application of section 160 of the Income Tax Act.

The Crown seeks support for this proposition in the judgment of Justice Webb in Darte, and also the judgment of Justice Angers in Burns v. R.[161] where Justice Angers, in dealing also with a section 160 issue, stated:

25 In my opinion, the appellant cannot invoke these equitable remedies to argue that the transfers amounted to a conveyance to her of the interest she had in the properties at the time, when in fact she and McCarthy were still living together and no apparent cause or need to remedy an economic injustice existed between McCarthy and the appellant. See Blackman v. Davison (1986), 2 B.C.L.R. (2d) 8 (B.C.S.C.). The transfer of the properties was not done pursuant to a finding that the appellant had an equitable interest in them.

[18] In the recent decision of Livingston v. R.[162], the Federal Court of Appeal addressed the possibility of a resulting trust in the context of a section 160 issue, and found that it was unnecessary to consider that argument, however, the Court did not raise any concerns about jurisdiction to consider such an equitable remedy. Further, in the case of Savoie v. R.,[163] Former Chief Justice Bowman stated that the doctrine of constructive trust could be invoked in determining the fair market value of a property transfer by a tax debtor for purpose of the application of section 160 of the Income Tax Act.

[19] One purpose of section 160 is to prevent taxpayers from thwarting the Government's ability to collect tax by transferring property to a spouse. It is not intended to widen the Government's collection powers to seize property that never was beneficially owned by the debtor taxpayer. To effectively turn a blind eye to the legal and equitable realities, under the guise of some purported lack of authority, could lead to not just a harsh result, but a result contrary to the very object and spirit of the legislation in issue. Given Former Chief Justice Bowman's view in Savoie, given I have been referred to no definitive statement from the Federal Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court of Canada as to the application of a resulting trust in a section 160 assessment situation, and given my colleague Justice Webb's end-around to accomplish the same objective

---

[160] Donovan W.M. Waters, Q.C., Mark R. Gillen & Lionel D. Smith, Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Thomson Carswell, 2005) at p. 454

[161] [2006] 5 C.T.C. 2392

[162] 2008 FCA 89

[163] 207 93 DTC 552

Digitized by Google

as a finding of constructive trust, I am prepared to consider whether the circumstances of the Warrens' property holdings justify a conclusion of a resulting trust for the purposes of determining exactly what property was transferred by Dr. Warren to his wife.

[20] In April 1983, at the time Dr. Warren took title to the Manotick property (at that stage bare land) in his name alone the following was the situation:

Dr. Warren provided a $37,250 mortgage back on the Manotick property to the Vendor.

Dr. Warren and Mrs. Warren borrowed $74,200 from the Royal Bank secured by a mortgage registered against the Elvaston property (held jointly).

Mrs. Warren's intention was that Dr. Warren would look after her interests. [21] For the several months after the transfer, the following transpired:

Costs were incurred of approximately $280,000 for construction of the home on the Manotick property.

In 1984, the Elvaston property sold for $133,000 (equity of approximately $60,000) and, according to Mrs. Warren, the proceeds went into construction of the house.

According to Dr. Warren, the house was constructed with borrowed funds, though a review of the documents provided show no further borrowing against the Manotick property until 1989.

[22] The concept of resulting trust is not complicated. As Professor Waters asks in Waters Law of Trusts in Canada, in his chapter on resulting trusts:

What is the position if two persons advance the money for the purchase of certain property, which is taken in the name of one of them? If the amount subscribed by each is determinable, it is clear that the transferee holds on a proportionate resulting trust. … (page 370)

[23] I believe that is the situation before me. Two people contributed to the Manotick property notwithstanding title was put in Dr. Warren's name alone. I have been convinced it was intended that some part of the Manotick property was held for Mrs. Warren. So, for purposes of the section 160 appeal, the property which the Government can trace, now in Mrs. Warren's name, is only that part of the property to which she was not previously beneficially entitled.

[24] What then is the extent of the interest in the property held by Dr. Warren for his wife.[?] The Warrens claim he held half the property for his wife. I am not convinced that reflects Mrs. Warren's real contribution. According to Dr. Warren, the Manotick property cost $74,500 for the lot and approximately $280,000 for the construction of the house for a total cost of $354,500. Of that, $133,000 came from the Elvaston property, the former matrimonial home, held jointly by Dr. Warren and his wife. In reviewing the history of that property, the Elvaston property, I have been satisfied that joint ownership reflects an equal ownership. A further $37,000 came from a mortgage Dr. Warren gave back to the Vendor of the Manotick property, and for which Dr. Warren made the mortgage payments. There remains approximately $184,500 to account for, to cover the costs towards the construction of the Manotick property. Dr. Warren testified this came from borrowing. Mrs. Warren did not have a clear handle on the financial and business affairs to offer any insight on this issue. I conclude that the source of the $184,500 could only have come from the one source of revenue for the Warrens and that was the clinic. The clinic was registered in Mrs. Warren's name and she claims to have received some rental income from it. Again, her testimony was somewhat confusing on this point, as she suggested a company owned the property and she got salary from the company. Dr. Warren testified that Mrs. Warren received a salary as manager of the clinic and rent as owner of the clinic. I accept that Mrs. Warren received some income from the clinic in 1983 and 1984 when funds were needed to put into the Manotick property. The only evidence as to amount is the $37,000 per year Mrs. Warren suggested. I find that such income was likely considerably less than what Dr. Warren was taking from the clinic. Unfortunately, I heard little evidence on this critical aspect of the source of funds for the Manotick property. Though Dr. Warren suggested funds were borrowed for the construction costs, I have no evidence of that. The only mortgage was long after the construction.

Digitized by Google

[25] To find a resulting trust, the amount contributed by the beneficiary must be readily determinable. Dr. Warren and Mrs. Warren have made it difficult to make such a ready determination. I am left to surmise from Mrs. Warren's annual income, Dr. Warren's control of financial affairs and, granted, a presumption that he drew the lion's share from the clinic that of the $184,500 contributed to the construction of the house, $50,000 at most may have been contributed by Mrs. Warren. This is, I would suggest, closer to the truth than a finding that Mrs. Warren contributed none of it, half of it or all of it.

[26] In summary, of the $354,500 for the purchase of the lot and construction of the home, Mrs. Warren contributed half of $133,000 plus $50,000 or a total of $116,500, compared to Dr. Warren's contribution of $238,000. I conclude that the interest held by Dr. Warren for Mrs. Warren in the Manotick property was approximately a one-third interest. Dr. Warren had a two-thirds interest. It was this two-thirds interest in the property that he transferred to Mrs. Warren in January 1998. I wish to emphasize that this analysis is not one of a constructive trust on the breakdown of marriage. It is an analysis to determine the extent of Mrs. Warren's interest as a beneficiary of a resulting trust for purposes of the application of section 160 of the Income Tax Act. I conclude Dr. Warren did indeed transfer property to his wife, but the property transferred was a two-thirds interest in the Manotick property, not the 50% interest as suggested by the Appellant nor the 100% interest as suggested by the Respondent.

[27] I now turn to the second element of the section 160 analysis, and that is the adequacy of the consideration Mrs. Warren provided to her husband for the two-thirds interest. There is no dispute that at the time of transfer the Manotick property was valued at $425,000, with a $90,000 mortgage against it, leaving an equity of $335,000. So what did Mrs. Warren pay to Dr. Warren for his two-thirds interest?

[28] In the transfer document the consideration is shown only as the $90,000 remaining balance of the mortgage, and the purpose for the conveyance is stated as "conveyance from husband to wife for natural love and affection". Coincidentally with the transfer a mortgage is registered against the property for $168,000 showing Mrs. Warren as the chargor, Healthgroup Financial as the chargee and Dr. Warren as the guarantor. The Respondent argues that the $168,000 was not part of the consideration, firstly, as it was not registered against the property at the time of the transfer, and secondly that there was no documentary evidence indicating the funds went to Dr. Warren.

Digitized by Google

[29] With respect to the Respondent's first position that the mortgage was subsequent to the transfer, and therefore not part of the consideration, I refer to the Transfer/Deed of Land which shows a registration date of January 6, 1998 at 11:40 a.m. and the mortgage for $168,000 showing a registration date of January 6, 1998 at 11:41 a.m. While the transfer does not refer to the $168,000 mortgage as part of the consideration, the timing is such that these events did take place coincidentally. The Respondent appears to be suggesting that Mrs. Warren only paid $90,000 for the property, then borrowed against the property to raise $168,000 for whatever other purpose she may have intended. But that purpose was to accommodate her husband's consolidation of debt agenda. It is not the timing of the registration of the mortgage that is conclusive, nor the statements in the Transfer/Deed of Land itself, but whether in fact the $168,000 went from Mrs. Warren to Dr. Warren to buy the property. This leads to the consideration of the Respondent's second point. [30] What evidence is there that the $168,000 mortgage went to Dr. Warren as consideration for the Manotick property. As already indicated, the Transfer does not recognize the $168,000 as part of the consideration. The Charge/Mortgage of Land document registered with the Land Registry Office does though show Dr. Warren as a guarantor. I have already commented on Mrs. Warren's limited knowledge of the financial affairs: it was not her but Dr. Warren who, with the assistance of an accountant, devised this plan to consolidate debts. As he testified, he asked his wife to take out the $168,000 mortgage as he was consolidating debts and needed the money for his business, presumably the clinic. When questioned in cross-examination about how much the mortgage payments were and who made them, it was clear Mrs. Warren had no idea. This is not intended in any way to be a criticism of Mrs. Warren: the financial arrangements were just not her area of expertise. She was simply helping her husband.

[31] Although there is no documentary trace of exactly where the $168,000 went, I have been satisfied that it did not go into Mrs. Warren's pocket, but went directly or indirectly to the benefit of her husband. There is no evidence to suggest otherwise. It really comes down to whether Mrs. Warren gave her husband the money, or paid him the money to buy his interest out. She never addressed her mind to how this was structured legally. Dr. Warren needed money. If he simply borrowed the $168,000 against the Manotick property, and the property remained in his name, he would have reduced his wife's equity in the property (whether she had a 50% resulting trust interest, or as I have determined, a one-third interest). So, he protected his wife's interest by shifting the property into her name (presuming he, in turn, retains no resulting trust interest in the property now in his wife's name - this is not an avenue of analysis explored by either side, for good reason - the image of a dog chasing its tail comes to mind). Tax impact aside, this objective was met whether the $168,000 was consideration for the transfer or simply a subsequent loan, the proceeds of which were for Dr. Warren's benefit. While Mrs. Warren and Dr. Warren may not have addressed their minds as to how the $168,000 was to be categorized, it is clear that it went hand in hand with the transfer. It was clearly prearranged so that it would be registered coincidentally with the transfer. There is no doubt, as far as Dr. Warren was concerned, there would be no transfer unless there was the Healthgroup mortgage. I conclude it was all part of the same deal, and therefore, did constitute part of the consideration from Mrs. Warren to her husband.

Digitized by Google

[32] I have a concern with respect to the value of the $168,000 mortgage Mrs. Warren took out to pay her husband. Firstly, she was unsure whether she made the mortgage payments. Secondly, I am satisfied she had no involvement in arranging the financing. Thirdly, Dr. Warren was guarantor and may have been making the mortgage payments himself. No banking documents were presented to indicate who made the payments. The Respondent did not raise these matters to suggest that the $168,000 had a value of anything other than $168,000. While I have concerns whether in these circumstances the $168,000 is properly valued as $168,000 of consideration for the property, I do not intend to engage in an exercise of actuarial and appraisal speculation, when the Respondent has not led me there. I take the $168,000 at its face value.

[33] What really occurred between Dr. Warren and Mrs. Warren was that by assuming the existing mortgage and adding a further $168,000 mortgage, proceeds of which went to Dr. Warren's benefit, Mrs. Warren was effectively acquiring Dr. Warren's equity in the property for $168,000. She argues that Dr. Warren's equity was $168,000 so she paid adequate consideration for purposes of section 160. In that regard, she is mistaken. Dr. Warren's equity interest in the property was twothirds of $335,000, or $223,333. She therefore did not pay him fair market value. She fell short by $55,333, and it is that amount for which she is exposed pursuant to section 160.

[34] The appeal is allowed and the matter is referred back to the Minister of National Revenue for reconsideration and reassessment on the basis that Mrs. Warren's tax liability pursuant to section 160 is to be limited to $55,333. Given the limited success, I am making no award of costs in this matter.

See also the Queen v. Valerie Gail Rose, 2009 FCA 93, where the Appeal ct. held:

[1] This is an appeal by Her Majesty the Queen from a decision by Justice Sheridan of the Tax Court of Canada in which she allowed an appeal by Valerie Gail Rose against an assessment of the Minister of National Revenue under subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.). The Tax Court's decision is reported as Rose v. The Queen, 2007 TCC 657.

…

[4] The Judge concluded on the basis of the evidence that Mr Rose had established that he had intended to transfer to Ms Rose only the bare legal title, and that their relationship with respect to the house was to be unchanged. Accordingly, the Judge found that Ms Rose held the legal title on a

Digitized by Google

resulting trust for Mr Rose as the beneficial owner of half of the equitable interest in the house. Hence, she held, there had been no transfer of property for the purpose of subsection 160(1), and set aside the assessment.

[5] In my respectful view, the Tax Court Judge erred in reaching this conclusion. I fully accept the Judge's finding that the Roses were credible witnesses. Nonetheless, when considered against the relevant legal background, the evidence unmistakably indicates that Mr Rose transferred the entirety of his interest in the property. I would allow the Crown's appeal.

...

[19] Counsel for the Crown argues that the Tax Court Judge erred in her conclusion that Mr Rose had retained his beneficial interest and that Ms Rose was a resulting trustee for her husband. It was common ground that this is a question of mixed fact and law and that the Judge's decision may be set aside only if she made a palpable and overriding error in her application of the law to the facts, or decided a readily extricable question of law incorrectly. [20] Before both the Tax Court and this Court, the parties agreed that Ms Rose has the burden of proving that her husband retained his beneficial interest in the house and that, if she discharged this burden, she would hold the title on a resulting trust for him.

[21] A determination of whether Mr Rose transferred the entirety of his interest to Ms Rose must start with his reason for making the transfer. On this, the evidence is unequivocal: Mr Rose thought that Mr Holyoak might succeed in his claim against him, and wanted to prevent him from placing a lien on the family home. He had taken his name off the title of his daughter's house for a similar reason.

[22] Mr Rose's reason for the transfer is almost conclusive evidence of an intention to transfer his beneficial interest to his wife. Only by divesting himself entirely of his interest in the property could Mr Rose put it beyond the reach of Mr Holyoak, subject to the right of the latter, if a defeated, hindered or delayed creditor, to seek to have the transfer set aside as a fraudulent conveyance. It is also clear from the evidence that Ms Rose understood the reason for the transfer of title to her.

[23] The question before us is whether it was open to the Tax Court Judge on the evidence before her to conclude that, despite Mr Rose's stated intention to avoid Mr Holyoak's claim, he had established that he did not transfer his beneficial interest when he removed his name from the title and put it into his wife's. I note that Mr Rose did not allege, and the Tax Court Judge did not find, that Mr Rose intended to cheat Mr Holyoak by hiding the fact that, despite the transfer of legal title to his wife, he retained a beneficial interest in the house.

[24] The Tax Court Judge relied principally on three items of evidence to establish that Mr Rose retained his beneficial interest in the house. First, the Roses asserted that they intended only to change the ownership of the legal title and had no discussions about the terms on which Ms Rose was to hold the title. The inference to be drawn from this evidence does not depend on the Roses' credibility. However, this evidence is inconsistent with Mr Rose's undisputed intention to transfer title in order to defeat Mr Holyoak's claim.

Digitized by Google

[25] Second, the Judge relied on the fact that the Roses continued their previous arrangements for paying household bills from their separate bank accounts. Mr Rose made the mortgage payments. However, the maintenance of their previous household financial arrangements is likely to have had more to do with the fact that they intended to remain married, and to occupy the house as their home, than with the question of ownership. In short, this evidence is compatible with either view of the ownership of the beneficial interest.

[26] The same is true of the fact that Mr Rose continued to reside in the house. Counsel for Ms Rose argued that this is evidence that he retained his beneficial interest; if he had divested himself of his entire interest, he would have had no right to remain in the house. Again, his continued residence likely had much more to do with the fact that they were a married couple, who intended to continue to live together, than with any legal niceties about ownership of the home.

---

[27] Third, the Roses testified that although Ms Rose could have sold, leased or mortgaged the house after the legal title was put into her name, she would never have done so without Mr Rose's agreement. Indeed, Ms Rose testified, such a thing had never occurred to her. However, whether or not Ms Rose had the entire beneficial interest, she was highly unlikely to sell the house without regard to Mr Rose's wishes. A spouse who has had a long marriage, like Ms Rose, would not normally dispose unilaterally of the matrimonial home, however title is held. Consequently, their testimony has little bearing on the question in dispute; it is equivocal on the question of whether Mr Rose retained his beneficial interest in the house.

[28] Counsel made two other arguments. First, he relied on the Tax Court Judge's finding that, because Mr Rose did not expect the CRA to place a lien on the house, he had no intention of hindering its ability to collect his tax debt. The short answer to this argument is that subsection 160(1) does not require an intention to avoid the payment of tax owing (Addison & Leyen Ltd. v. Canada, [2006] 4 F.C.R. 532, 2006 FCA 107, at para. 65(6) per Sharlow J.A.). In addition, Mr Rose did intend to defeat Mr Holyoak; the transfer of property with the intention of avoiding one creditor may equally prejudice another.

[29] Second, counsel submitted that Mr Rose's interest, valued at $15,000, was exempt from execution by The Exemptions Act because it was worth less than the $32,000. Hence, even if Mr and Ms Rose had remained joint tenants, neither Mr Holyoak nor the CRA could have executed a lien on Mr Rose's half interest. Counsel pointed to the statement in Logiudice v. The Queen, 97 DTC 1462 (TCC) at para. 16, that subsection 160(1) is aimed at preventing tax debtors from placing their exigible assets beyond the reach of the Crown.

[30] I do not agree. To limit the application of subsection 160(1) in this way would require words to be read into the text which are not there. I see no warrant for so doing. Further, no judicial determination of the availability of an exemption has been made on the particular facts of this case. A lien could become enforceable if the value of Mr Rose's equity increased significantly as a result of paying down the mortgage and an increase in the market value of the property.

Digitized by Google

[31] In my respectful view, the Tax Court Judge committed a palpable and overriding error when she inferred from the facts that Mr Rose had discharged his burden of establishing that he had retained his beneficial interest in the house. It an almost inescapable inference from Mr Rose's statement that he transferred title in order to prevent Mr Holyoak from pursuing his claim by placing a lien on the house that he intended to do this in the most effective, and lawful, manner: that is, by transferring his entire interest in the house. The evidence on which the Judge relied as proving that he did not do this is, in my opinion, largely equivocal on the nature of the interest transferred to Ms Rose.

[32] The Crown also argued that, by virtue of the broad wording of subsection 160(1), Ms Rose was liable for her husband's tax debt, up to the value of his half interest in the house (that is, $15,000), even if he had transferred only legal title and retained his beneficial interest. Counsel said that this result flows from the decision of this Court in Livingston v. Canada, 2007 FCA 89. Because of my conclusion that Mr Rose transferred his beneficial interest in the house to his wife, it is not necessary to decide this question. The implications of Livingston are best left for another day.

[33] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal with costs, both here and below, set aside the judgment of the Tax Court, and restore the Minister's assessment of Ms Rose under subsection 160(1) in the amount of $15,000.

Matrimonial Property Transfers

Is a transfer of the matrimonial home pursuant to satisfying a provincial matrimonial Act obligation for without consideration that can be captured by s. 160? There have been differing cases on this as below in Bernice A. Campbell v. Her Majesty The Queen[164]:

[1] The Appellant was assessed the amount of $24,341.00 pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act (the "Act") and section 20 of the Nova Scotia Income Tax Act (the "NS Act") in respect to a transfer of property from her husband, Gerald Campbell, on October 8, 2002.

[2] Initially, the Appellant took the position that the conveyance of the property was not a transfer within the meaning of section 160 of the Act because the disposition did not result in a change of beneficial ownership. However, the Appellant has conceded that there was in fact a transfer in light of the decision in The Queen v. Livingston, 2008 DTC 6233, but argues that Gerald Campbell had only a legal title to transfer which had a value of nil. Therefore, in deciding the issue of whether the Appellant is liable to pay $24,341.00 in respect to this property transfer, it is necessary to address the sub-issue of whether the Appellant's spouse had a beneficial interest in the property when he transferred

[164] 2009 TCC 431

Digitized by Google

it to the Appellant in 2002.

[3] After the Appellant and Gerald Campbell were married in 1979, they moved to Alberta. In 1989 they returned to Nova Scotia and eventually on January 25, 1993 they purchased a condominium property (the "condo") in Halifax. Title to the condo was registered in both names as joint tenants. The Appellant testified that she initiated this purchase and received the down payment of $10,000.00 as a gift from her mother. The Appellant's mother confirmed that she gifted not only the down payment of $10,000.00 but also an additional amount of $1,000.00 to cover legal fees. A mortgage with Scotia Mortgage Corporation was placed on the property on January 25, 1993. This mortgage was renegotiated on December 27, 2000 and both parties remained as co-mortgagors until October 8, 2002.

[4] The Appellant testified that she has made all the mortgage payments on the condo initially from a joint bank account held with Gerald Campbell. Mr. Campbell has had no signing authority on this account since 2001. According to the Appellant, she paid not only the mortgage payments but all of the other expenses associated with this property. Mr. Campbell's work is sporadic within the construction industry while the Appellant has full time employment as an executive secretary with the Nova Scotia Department of Community Services. The Appellant did state that her husband contributed varying amounts between $100.00 and $600.00 once or twice monthly and that he assisted with child care (although the Appellant's mother, Pearl Engram, did most of the babysitting for the Appellant), some household chores and paid for some groceries and the power bill. Mr. Campbell acknowledged that, although he was aware that he was named on the mortgage, he did not make mortgage payments and was not fully aware of how the payments were made. However, he confirmed that the Appellant paid for a joint life insurance policy with respect to this mortgage until 2002 while the Appellant in her testimony claimed that she was not aware of this insurance until her memory was refreshed by documentation (Exhibit R-1, Tab 10).

[5] From the time of purchase in January 1993 until the present time the condo has been occupied by the Appellant, Mr. Campbell and their daughter as a family residence except for periods of marital problems when the Appellant's husband would leave the residence. According to the evidence, Mr. Campbell left the residence in early January 1993 for approximately five or six months. He returned to the residence because he could no longer pay rent and continues to reside in the condo because "… it's better than sleeping on the street." (Transcript, page 110).

[6] On October 8, 2002, Mr. Campbell executed a Warranty Deed (Exhibit A-1, Tab 2) conveying his interest in the property to the Appellant in consideration of one dollar "Because we were going to separate, and she put all the money into it in the first place …" (Transcript, page 110).

[7] As of October 8, 2002 the fair market value ("FMV") of the property was no less than $106,000.00, subject to a mortgage balance of $57,316.83 with Scotia Mortgage Corporation. At the time of the transfer the FMV of 50% of the equity in this property totalled $24,341.58.

Digitized by Google

[8] Until 2000, the Appellant completed Mr. Campbell's income tax returns. On cross-examination, he agreed that he was probably first assessed for taxes around February 2001. The aggregate of all amounts that he was liable to pay under the Act in respect to the 1999, 2000, 2001 and 2002 taxation years was not less than $45,287.51.
The Appellant's Position:
[9] The Appellant claims that since the purchase of the property her husband's only interest in the condo was that of legal title but that he never had a beneficial interest or equity of redemption. The Appellant testified that she has always assumed full financial responsibility for the property including the initial down payment and the subsequent mortgage payments. An assessment should not be made pursuant to section 160 because it was only a legal title to the property that Gerald Campbell released and conveyed to the Appellant by Warranty Deed in 2002. Since nothing of value was conveyed to the Appellant and because the Appellant always held the full beneficial interest in the property, the FMV of Gerald's interest did not exceed the FMV of the one dollar consideration given by the Appellant.
The Respondent's Position:
[10] The Respondent's argument is that the Appellant's husband had both a legal and beneficial interest in the condo at all material times. Because they are spouses of each other, they were not dealing at arm's length. When the property was transferred to the Appellant in 2002, Gerald Campbell owed taxes under the Act with the FMV of the property at transfer exceeding the consideration given by the Appellant. Therefore the Appellant is liable to pay $24,341.00 pursuant to section 160.
Provisions Relied Upon:
[11] The parties relied upon sections 160, 251 and subsection 248(1) of the Act together with section 20 of the NS Act and sections 3, 6 and 8 of the Matrimonial Property Act. The relevant portions of section 160 provide:
[12] Section 251 states:
…
[13] Subsection 248(1) provides the following definition of "property":
…
[14] Subsections 3(1) and 6(1) and section 8 of the Matrimonial Property Act read as follows:
"matrimonial home" defined
3(1) In this Act, "matrimonial home" means the dwelling and real property occupied by a person and that person's spouse as their family residence and in which either or both of them have a property interest other than a leasehold interest.
…
Equal right of possession of matrimonial home
6(1) A spouse is equally entitled to any right of possession of the other spouse in a matrimonial home.
…

Digitized by Google

Disposition of matrimonial home

8(1) Neither spouse shall dispose of or encumber any interest in a matrimonial home unless the other spouse consents by signing the instrument of disposition or encumbrance, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld; the other spouse has released all rights to the matrimonial home by a separation agreement or marriage contract;

the proposed disposition or encumbrance is authorized by court order or an order has been made releasing the property as a matrimonial home; or the property is not designated as a matrimonial home and an instrument designating another property as a matrimonial home of the spouses is registered and not cancelled.

Disposition contrary to subsection (1)

Where a spouse disposes of or encumbers an interest in a matrimonial home contrary to subsection (1), the transaction may be set aside by the other spouse upon an application to the court unless the person holding the interest or encumbrance acquired it for valuable consideration, in good faith and without notice that the property was a matrimonial home.

[15] Section 20 of the NS Act provides:

… Analysis:

[16] Although often described as a draconian provision, section 160 is an important tax collection tool under the Act. The purpose of the section is to prevent a taxpayer from avoiding a tax liability by transferring property to certain individuals or non-arm's length persons, thereby avoiding the tax debt, while still possibly benefiting from the assets. In this appeal the Minister seeks to invoke section 160 to prevent the tax debtor, Gerald Campbell, from transferring assets to his spouse, the Appellant, in an attempt to shield the property from tax collection. If successful, it makes the Appellant liable for the tax liability owed in the year of transfer or any preceding year to the extent that the FMV of the property transferred to the Appellant exceeds the consideration received. It should be noted however that there is no requirement that the transferor have an intention to avoid tax liability at the time of the transfer [Montreuil et al. v. The Queen, 95 DTC 138].

[17] In Wannan v. The Queen, 2003 DTC 5715, the Federal Court of Appeal at paragraph 3 stated the following:

[3] … There is no due diligence defence to the application of section 160. It may apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax. Indeed, it may apply to a transferee who has no knowledge of the tax affairs of the primary tax debtor. However, section 160 has been validly enacted as part of the law of Canada. If the Crown seeks to rely on section 160 in a particular case, it must be permitted to do so if the statutory conditions are met.

[18] There are four conditions that must be satisfied before section 160 can be applied. According to the decision in Livingston at paragraphs 17 to 19, the following criteria will trigger the application of section 160:

[17] In light of the clear meaning of the words of subsection 160(1), the criteria to apply when considering subsection 160(1) are self-evident:

Digitized by Google

The transferor must be liable to pay tax under the Act at the time of transfer;
There must be a transfer of property, either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever;
The transferee must either be:
The transferor's spouse or common-law partner at the time of transfer or a person who has since become the person's spouse or common-law partner;
A person who was under 18 years of age at the time of transfer; or
A person with whom the transferor was not dealing at arm's length.
The fair market value of the property transferred must exceed the fair market value of the consideration given by the transferee.
[18] The purpose of subsection 160(1) of the Act is especially crucial to inform the application of these criteria. In Medland v. Canada 98 DTC 6358 (F.C.A.) ("Medland") this Court concluded that "the object and spirit of subsection 160(1), is to prevent a taxpayer from transferring his property to his spouse [or to a minor or non-arm's length individual] in order to thwart the Minister's efforts to collect the money which is owned to him." See also Heavyside v. Canada [97 DTC 5026] [1996]
F.C.J. No. 1608 (C.A.) (QL) ("Heavyside") at paragraph 10. More apposite to this case, the Tax Court of Canada has held that the purpose of subsection 160(1) would be defeated where a transferor allows a transferee to use the money to pay the debts of the transferor for the purpose of preferring certain creditors over the CRA (Raphael v. Canada 2000 DTC 2434 (T.C.C.) at paragraph 19).
[19] … [G]iven the purpose of subsection 160(1), the intention of the parties to defraud the CRA as a creditor can be of relevance in gauging the adequacy of the consideration given. However, I do not wish to be taken as suggesting as there must be an intention to defraud the CRA in order for subsection 160(1) to apply. The provision can apply to a transferee of property who has no intention to assist the primary tax debtor to avoid the payment of tax: see Wannan v. Canada [2003 DTC 5715] 2003 FCA 423 at paragraph 3.
[19] Three of these four conditions are not in dispute in this appeal.
Tax Liability – subparagraph 160(1)(e)(ii)
[20] One of the Minister of National Revenue's (the "Minister") assumptions was that the Appellant's spouse had a tax liability of $45,287.00 at the time of the transfer on October 8, 2002. Although the Appellant testified that she was unaware of her husband's tax liability because she had ceased filing his tax returns in the early 2000s, according to the decision in Wannan, the transferee need not have knowledge of the tax affairs of the primary debtor in order to trigger the application of section 160. Mr. Campbell's tax liability was not in dispute.
Relationship between Transferor and Transferee – paragraph 160(1)(a) [21] The definition of "related persons" contained in subsection 251(2) includes individuals connected by marriage or common-law partnership. Since related persons are deemed not to be dealing with each other at arm's length and the evidence supports that the parties have been married since 1979, this requirement is also met.

Digitized by Google

Consideration and FMV – subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i)

[22] Pursuant to subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i), a transferee will be liable for the transferor's tax liability to the extent that the value of the property exceeds the value of the consideration received for the property. The Minister assumed that Gerald Campbell's equity in the condo was $24,341.00 and that he transferred both his legal and beneficial interest in the condo to the Appellant for the consideration of one dollar. The Appellant did not dispute that the FMV of the condo on October 8, 2002 was $106,000.00 or that the mortgage balance was $57,316.00. However she maintained that the FMV of her husband's interest in the condo was nil and not $24,341.00 as the Respondent contends. Therefore, she submits that her liability is nil pursuant to section 160 because the FMV of her husband's interest did not exceed the consideration of one dollar.

[23] A determination of the FMV of Gerald Campbell's interest in the condo is dependent upon whether he had only a legal title where the FMV of that interest will be nil or whether he had both a legal and beneficial interest in the condo where the FMV of his interest would then equal $24,341.00.

Transfer of Property

[24] The term "property" is defined in subsection 248(1) of the Act. The condo which was conveyed to the Appellant falls within the ambit of this definition as it includes real property.

[25] The term "transfer" is not defined in the Act but numerous decisions have discussed this term. Thorson

J. in the oft cited case of Fasken v. Minister of National Revenue, 49 DTC 491 at page 497, provided the following definition:

The word "transfer" is not a term of art and has not a technical meaning. It is not necessary to a transfer of property from a husband to his wife that it should be made in any particular form or that it should be made directly. All that is required is that the husband should so deal with the property as to divest himself of it and vest it in his wife, that is to say, pass the property from himself to her. The means by which he accomplishes this result, whether direct or circuitous, may properly be called a transfer. …

[26] The recent decision of Livingston established that the mere transfer of a legal title constitutes a transfer under section 160. At paragraph 22, Sexton J. made the following comment:

[22] In addition, there is a transfer of property for the purposes of section 160 even when beneficial ownership has not been transferred. Subsection 160(1) applies to any transfer of property – "by means of a trust or by any other means whatever".

Thus, subsection 160(1) categorizes a transfer to a trust as a transfer of property. Certainly, even where the transferor is the beneficiary under the trust, nevertheless, legal title has been transferred to the trustee. Obviously, this constitutes a transfer of property for the purposes of subsection 160(1) which, after all, is designed, inter alia, to prevent the transferor from hiding his or her assets, including behind the veil of a trust, in order to prevent the CRA from attaching the asset. Therefore it is unnecessary to consider the respondent's argument that beneficial title to the funds remained with Ms. Davies.

Digitized by Google

....

[27] In light of the Livingston decision, the Appellant conceded that there was a transfer pursuant to section 160 but contends that the decision did not address the value of a legal title. The Appellant argues that since Gerald Campbell did not have a beneficial interest in the property, nothing of value passed to the Appellant in the transfer of the property because the value of the legal title was nil. The Appellant submits that the authorities seem to state that the value of a legal interest is nil but does not cite those authorities. It is likely that the Appellant is referring to Justice Brulé's decision in Gardner v. M.N.R., 88 DTC 1649, where at page 1651 he concluded that the taxpayer's interest in the property was nil because he held only a legal title in the property.

Beneficial Interest v. Legal Title:

[28] In response to the Appellant's argument that Gerald Campbell transferred only legal title which had a value of nil, the Respondent contends that as a pre-condition of concluding that Gerald Campbell had no beneficial interest to convey, this Court must find that he was acting as a prête-nom or holding his interest in the condo in trust for the Appellant. The Respondent submits that there is no evidence that would allow such a conclusion.

[29] In the case of Gardner, Brulé J. concluded that the Appellant's spouse became a joint tenant to facilitate the acquisition of financing and therefore the Appellant's husband held legal title only as trustee. In Hurd v. The Queen, [2001] 2 C.T.C. 2489, McArthur J. concluded that there was no transfer of beneficial interest to an uncle because he was merely a trustee for the taxpayer, having executed a valid declaration of trust.

[30] In both Gardner and Hurd as well as the decision in Linke v. The Queen, 94 DTC 1549, individuals were added to the title of the property as joint tenants so that the appellants in those cases could acquire mortgage financing. However, in the present appeal the Appellant did not register her husband as a joint tenant of the condo to obtain financing because she testified that she chose the property based solely on her salary. In addition, she stated that there was no formal discussion respecting the addition of his name to the deed at the time of the purchase or at least no discussions that she could recall with her husband or with their lawyer who completed the purchase. The Appellant claims that the evidence supports that she was simply content to have title registered as it was generally done – that is, by way of joint tenancy. The Appellant understood this to mean that her husband was on title as a precautionary measure to avoid estate problems in the event of her death so that her daughter would be assured a home.

[31] While it is true that the Appellant is a layperson with no legal background, she has worked her way into the position of Executive Secretary and in addition had the benefit of legal counsel at the time of purchase. The evidence showed that the Appellant's husband had both a drinking and gambling problem. If, at the time of purchase, she was concerned about the welfare of her daughter as she testified, I have difficulty accepting her evidence that she would not discuss this with the solicitor at the time of purchase rather than proceed on what her own views were of a "joint tenancy" proposition. I am reinforced in my perception of this evidence by the fact that she refused to waive solicitor-client privilege and did not call the lawyer to validate her testimony. This lends support to my suspicion that if this lawyer had been called as a witness, he may have contradicted her testimony.

Digitized by Google

[32] The Respondent relied on the cases of Miller v. M.N.R., 88 DTC 1488, Splinter v. The Queen, [2001] 3 C.T.C. 2553 and Isaac v. The Queen, [2006] G.S.T.C. 6, to demonstrate that the Appellant's husband was not a prête-nom holding the interest in the condo in trust for the Appellant. In the decisions of both Miller and Splinter, title was not held as joint tenants. In Miller, Taylor J. concluded that in light of a trust agreement indicating that the transferor received only legal title to the property, he could therefore not transfer what he did not own, namely a beneficial interest.

[33] In Splinter, while there was no declaration of trust document that had been executed, there was a finding that other documentary evidence supported that a trust relationship existed so that the transferor held the property in trust only.

[34] In Isaac, the transferor was not a resident in the property at the time of transfer and, in addition, documentation, including an executed power of attorney and a separation agreement, indicated that the transferor did not have a beneficial ownership.

[35] Based on this jurisprudence, the Respondent contends that there was no evidence, including documentary evidence such as a declaration of trust, that the Appellant's husband was holding the property in trust for her. Although the Appellant did not specifically address the prête-nom argument and did not argue that Gerald Campbell was holding any interest in the property in trust for the Appellant, in the oral submissions, Appellant's counsel relied on the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal decision in Anderson v. Hervieux, [1985] S.J. No. 29 (S.K.C.A.). In Anderson, the Court held that the Plaintiff, who was residing in a common-law relationship, was entitled to full ownership of the house upon separation based on a resulting trust because the Defendant made no financial contribution and the Plaintiff had registered the property in joint names to ensure that the equity would pass to her on his death. The Appellant argued that these two factors of Anderson are similar to the facts in the present appeal and lend support to the Appellant's position that only legal title was transferred but not the beneficial ownership.

[36] The Anderson decision does not involve a section 160 assessment. It involves family law and estate trust principles. The parties in Anderson were separating while the parties in the present appeal are still married and in fact continue to reside in the condo. There was no evidence in Anderson of monetary contribution to the household while Gerald Campbell made financial contributions in amounts between $100.00 and $600.00 once or twice monthly. Further, in Anderson there was no evidence of joint bank accounts or joint VISA statements as in the present appeal. Although the Appellant testified that title to the condo was registered in both names to protect their daughter, she affirmed that she never had any formal discussions with her husband or the lawyer respecting title and the consequences of registering the condo in both names.

Digitized by Google

[37] In summary, there is insufficient evidence to allow me to conclude that the Appellant's husband was a prête-nom, holding the interest in the condo in trust for the Appellant. There is no documentary evidence to support such a proposition and the oral testimony contains some inconsistencies.

Joint Tenancy

[38] Joint tenancy is a form of ownership in which the joint tenants have concurrent ownership and possession of the same property. The Respondent argued that the most significant factor favouring beneficial ownership is that the Appellant and her husband acquired the condo and held title as joint tenants as opposed to tenants in common. The Respondent also submits that a presumption exists, in the absence of credible documentary evidence, that when parties own property as joint tenants each will have both a legal and beneficial interest in the property. Because the interest of each joint tenant is identical and the property cannot be sold or mortgaged without the consent of both joint tenants, whatever the Appellant had in law so did her husband.

[39] The Appellant contends that it was always her intention that her husband would hold legal title only. However, there is no documentary or circumstantial evidence to support this claim. The evidence supports that the Appellant's husband was involved to some extent with the purchase. He met with the realtor and viewed the condo before purchasing it; he met with the lawyer and reviewed the documents and executed all of the mortgage documentation (although few of these documents are before me). In fact, he remained on the mortgage when it was renegotiated in 2000 until he came off in 2002. In the event of the Appellant's death, her husband had a right of survivorship in respect of the property and he would then have become sole owner of the property. I am perplexed by the Appellant's testimony that she wanted to protect her daughter's future by putting the property in joint names in light of her testimony that her husband had a drinking and gambling problem and that it was primarily her mother that provided child care when her daughter was younger. The designation of the Appellant and her husband as joint tenants and co- mortgagors clearly contradict the Appellant's assertion that she always intended that her husband would have only a legal title to the property.

[40] Respondent has also asked that I draw an adverse inference in respect to the fact that the lawyer that represented the parties in the purchase in 1993 was not called as a witness to confirm the Appellant's intentions at the time of the purchase. The Appellant submitted that this lawyer was on holidays and therefore not available to appear at the hearing. In addition, the Appellant suggested that the Respondent could have subpoenaed this lawyer.

[41] Both the Appellant and her husband met with the lawyer but the evidence was vague in respect to exactly what was discussed at the time of the purchase. Consequently, the testimony of this lawyer could have clarified the questions, concerns and explanations that were discussed with the Appellant and her husband. His testimony had the potential of validating the Appellant's testimony respecting her intentions at the time of purchase. The fact that the Appellant refused to waive solicitor-client privilege leaves me wondering whether the lawyer might have contradicted her testimony respecting the ramifications of joint tenancy if he had been called as a witness. In respect to the Appellant's suggestion that the Respondent could have subpoenaed the lawyer, this becomes largely irrelevant because the solicitor-client privilege was not waived. This lawyer would not have been able to provide any relevant information without the Appellant's consent to revoke this privilege.

Digitized by Google

[42] The Respondent contends that even if the Appellant's husband was not a joint tenant, he still had a beneficial interest in the condo at the time of transfer. The Minister interprets "beneficial ownership" to mean the entitlement to use or benefit from a property, whether or not one has legal title (Respondent's Submissions, paragraph 40). The Respondent submitted several technical and interpretation bulletins to show how Canada Revenue Agency ("CRA") has come to interpret joint ownership and beneficial ownership [Technical Interpretation 2000-0048195 – Joint Tenancy – Beneficial Ownership; Interpretation – external 2007-025699IE5 - Beneficial Ownership; Interpretation Bulletin IT-437R – Ownership of Property (Principal Residence)].

The Income Tax Act (Act) does not define the term "owned". In the common law jurisdictions, two forms of property ownership are recognized -- legal and beneficial. Normally "legal ownership" exists when title is transferred to, recorded in, registered in or otherwise carried in the name of a person. Legal owners are generally entitled to enforce their ownership rights against all other persons. By contrast, the term "beneficial ownership" is used to describe the type of ownership of a person who is entitled to the use and benefit of the property whether or not that person has concurrent legal ownership. The determination of whether a person beneficially owns a property is a question of fact that can only be determined after a review of all the documents and the circumstances applicable to a particular situation. The primary attributes of beneficial ownership include possession, use and risk. Therefore, in determining whether a person has beneficial ownership in a property, one should consider such factors as the right to possession, the right to collect rents, the right to call for the mortgaging of the property, the right to transfer title by sale or by will, the obligation to repair, the obligation to pay property taxes and other relevant rights and obligations. [...] (CRA Views – external 2007-025699IE5 – Beneficial ownership, December 6, 2007). (Emphasis added)

[43] I agree with the Respondent's submissions that Gerald Campbell held a beneficial interest in the condo because he exercised continued use and possession and bore the usual financial risks associated with home ownership (Respondent's Submissions, paragraph 42). Because the Appellant's husband was named as a joint tenant in the deed and as a co-mortgagor on the financing documents, he was liable on an equal footing with the Appellant for payment of property taxes, repairs, condo fees and any outstanding mortgage balance. The property could not be sold or encumbered by further mortgages without his consent. Although the evidence supports that the Appellant made all of the mortgage payments, this alone will not be a defence to an assessment pursuant to section 160 nor does it support an argument that her husband did not have a beneficial interest. Bowman J. (as he was then) at paragraph 25 of MacDougall v. The Queen, 98 DTC 2180, stated the following in this respect:

Digitized by Google

[25] Even if this case arose in a common law province I would have reached the same conclusion. The mere fact that a husband makes all the payments under a mortgage on a house that he and his wife own jointly does not mean that she is not a beneficial owner of her one-half. One needs very cogent evidence that a spouse who is shown as the legal owner of an interest in property is not also the beneficial owner. …

(Emphasis added)

[44] The Appellant stated that the bank included her husband's name on the mortgage to allow her to look better in respect to the bottom line picture (Transcript, page 78). According to her evidence, the bank took a "guesstimate" of her husband's earnings without proof and instead relied on her statement of earnings. I have difficulty believing that a lending institution would rely on a "guestimate" and if, as the Appellant contends, the condo was purchased and financed based on her salary alone then there would be no need for her husband to remain on the mortgage documents until October 8, 2002.

[45] In the present appeal, there is little evidence respecting the actual financial contribution of the husband. His contribution varied between $100.00 and $600.00 either once or twice monthly. There was no specific evidence as to how household expenses and duties were divided. The account from which the mortgage payments were made was a joint account. The Appellant claimed that her husband's signing authority was removed in 1994 but I was not provided with any record to support this. The bank records could only confirm that it was removed in 2001. In addition, these records do not cover the entire period for which the parties owned the condo.

[46] The Appellant stated that her mother gifted her $11,000.00 to cover the down payment plus legal fees for the purchase and submitted that the testimony of the Appellant's mother was consistent with that of the Appellant in respect to how the funds were transferred - that is, by way of a joint account. However, while the Appellant's mother did testify that she gifted $11,000.00 to the Appellant, she did not corroborate the Appellant's testimony respecting the transfer of the funds. She initially did not recall how it was transferred and, when questioned further, Pearl Engram recalled that she left the money in a TD account from which her daughter, the Appellant, withdrew the funds even though it did not appear that the Appellant was named on that account. In addition, there were no bank statements, receipts or other financial records to support the Appellant's contention that this $11,000.00 amount was used as a down payment on the condo. The Appellant's testimony therefore has not been fully corroborated here.

[47] On a balance of probabilities the Appellant's financial contribution to the condo was greater than that of her husband. However, as stated by Angers J. in Burns v. The Queen, 2006 DTC 3383, this Court cannot invoke equitable remedies to conclude that a transfer amounted to a conveyance of the interest he/she had in the home at the time, when in fact the Appellant and her husband were living together in the property and there is no apparent cause or need to remedy an economic injustice.

Digitized by Google

[48] The Respondent submits that it is difficult to accept the Appellant's contention that she did not realize for numerous years that she and her husband shared a joint bank account. While the evidence suggests that Gerald Campbell was removed from the account by 1999, there is nothing in the evidence to support that he was removed from the account before that date (Transcript, page 168-169). The banking records are incomplete and do not cover the entire period that the Appellant and her husband owned the condo. The Appellant's testimony respecting the origin of transactions of less than $500.00 was vague and few records of any transactions were submitted.

[49] Neither Appellant's counsel nor Respondent's counsel questioned Gerald Campbell about his income or where he was depositing his money if not into the joint Scotiabank account. This certainly would have been beneficial in light of the fact that he incurred a substantial tax debt throughout 1999 to 2002. This leads me to believe that he had income although the Appellant has claimed that his work was sporadic and that he could not be counted on for financial help. If he was not depositing his money into a separate account and was drinking and gambling then I am left to wonder why the Appellant allowed him on title to the condo as a joint tenant, registered him as a co-mortgagor, maintained a joint account, joint life insurance and joint credit cards. The Appellant's evidence did not address these issues. In fact, it is interesting to note that while the Appellant removed her husband's name from the title to the condo, the mortgage and the joint bank account, she did not remove his name from the joint credit cards even though she had to refinance the mortgage to pay them off. Her reason for this was that she needed his signature to do so and did not want to confront him about the credit cards. I am left wondering again why the Appellant felt comfortable in approaching her husband about removal of his name in respect to larger transactions that required his signature but did not want to deal with him on the credit card debt. Also Mr. Campbell contradicted this evidence as he did not believe that he shared joint credit cards with the Appellant. It is also strange that Mr. Campbell testified that the Appellant paid for joint life insurance while the Appellant claimed that she did not know about this – why then would her husband know about the insurance if, as the Appellant claimed, he was never involved in the mortgage because the Appellant attended to all of the affairs of the condo? How could the Appellant be unaware that she was paying for a joint life insurance while her husband had such knowledge?

[50] The Appellant submits that the inconsistencies in the testimony were "quibbling differences" only and of minimal significance. However, I do believe that the evidence before me is sufficient to conclude that Gerald did not have a beneficial interest. There were a number of inconsistencies in the testimony and unanswered questions concerning why Gerald was on the title to the condo and the mortgage, the origin of various deposits to the account, how Gerald was involved in the purchase, the lawyer's absence and the Appellant's refusal to waive solicitor-client privilege. In addition, supporting documentation was either lacking or incomplete.

Digitized by Google

Nova Scotia Matrimonial Property Act ("MPA")

[51] The Respondent argued that as a spouse under the MPA, that even if the Appellant's husband had not been a legal owner of the property, he would nevertheless be equally entitled to any right of possession of the condo pursuant to his rights in law as a spouse under the relevant provincial family law legislation. The Respondent asserted that, pursuant to subsection 8(1) of the MPA, the Appellant could not dispose of the condo or encumber it unless her husband consented to or otherwise released his rights, for example by separation agreement or court order. At all material times, he lived in the condo after the transfer with the Appellant and their daughter.

[52] The Appellant referred to the decision in Yates v. The Queen, 2009 DTC 5062 where the Federal Court of Appeal stated that family obligations under provincial legislation do not provide any exceptions to the operation of section 160. The Court stated the following at paragraphs 41, 43, 54 and 70:

[41] […] As I have already indicated, subsection 160(1) does not contain any ambiguity. If there is a transfer within the purview of the provision, then the transferee must satisfy the Court that he or she provided consideration at fair market value. In view of the wording of subsection 160(1), there is simply no basis for the position taken by the Judge.

…

[43] To conclude, the appellant submits that she gave consideration at fair market value for the sums received from her husband. I see no evidence in the record to support that view. To make things perfectly clear, let me say that in allowing her husband to live in the family residence, the appellant did not provide consideration at fair market value. This is simply another attempt by Mrs. Yates to benefit from the exception found at subsection 160(4).

…

[54] There is nothing in subsection 160(1) that permits a court to excuse a spouse from liability where the conditions of the provision are met; in fact, there is no mention of a family law exception in this provision.

…

[70] There is some confusion in jurisprudence since provincial legislation on family law regarding property, family definition, common law partners and matrimonial homes varies from one province to another. Nevertheless, subsection 160(1) should apply equally everywhere in Canada without exception apart from those specifically described in subsection 160(4).

(Emphasis added)

[53] I agree with the Appellant's contention that family law concepts and principles should not play any part when section 160 is being considered and this is particularly so in light of the comments in the Yates decision. I note that the Appellant placed considerable reliance on the decision in Anderson, which involved family law and estate trust principles, to support the argument that her husband held only legal title to the condo. By the Appellant's own admission, Anderson should not therefore be considered given that merging provincial legislation and matrimonial property principles with section 160 is not encouraged according to the jurisprudence. Further, as noted in counsel's Reply

Digitized by Google

Submissions, the concept of matrimonial rights does not exist unless and until there is a separation. In Anderson the parties lived in a common-law relationship but had separated. In the present appeal the parties remain married and both continue to reside in the condo. Consequently, I do not believe that the decision in Anderson should be given any weight in this appeal.

Section 20 of NS Act

[54] Finally, the Reply referenced section 20 of the NS Act, which provides a formula for the calculation of income not earned within the Province of Nova Scotia. Neither the Appellant nor the Respondent addressed this provision in their Submissions and I am unsure of how this provision is relevant to the issues in this appeal. Since I received no submissions from either counsel and because it is unclear why the Minister would have resorted to this provision in assessing the Appellant, I do not believe that it is necessary for me to comment on it.

[55] The appeal is therefore dismissed, with costs.

"Family Support Obligations" – Statutorily Recognized?

When a parent makes a contribution towards the up-keep of the estranged family needs is there a transfer for consideration, being his/her obligation to provide in light of a provincial Family Relations Act? This was the case in Harish Kadola v. The Queen[165] where the TCC held:

> [21] Counsel also contended that the amounts transferred by Jagir to Slrender were made partly to meet Jagir's statutory obligation to support his spouse and children. He referred to sections 88 and 89 of the Family Relations Act R.S.B.C. 1996 c. 128, which read as follows:
>
> Obligation to support child
>
> (1) Each parent of a child is responsible and liable for the reasonable and necessary support and maintenance of the child.
>
> (2) The making of an order against one parent for the maintenance and support of a child does not affect the liability of another parent for the maintenance and support of the child or bar the making of an order against the other parent.
>
> Obligation to support spouse
>
> (1) A spouse is responsible and liable for the support and maintenance of the other spouse having regard to the following:
>
> the role of each spouse in their family;
>
> an express or implied agreement between the spouses that one has the responsibility to support and maintain the other;
>
> custodial obligations respecting a child;
>
> the ability and capacity of, and the reasonable efforts made by, either or both spouses to support themselves;
>
> economic circumstances.

[165] 2008 TCC 474

Digitized by Google

(2) Except as provided in subsection (1), a spouse or former spouse is required to be self sufficient in relation to the other spouse or former spouse.

[22] Counsel said that Slrender was unaware of Jagir's tax problems when he made the payments to her and there was no complicity in trying to defeat the Crown's claims to Jagir's property. He said that the payments were no more than what was necessary to support Jagir's family and that they were made for good consideration according to the provisions of the Family Relations Act.

[23] Counsel relied on the decisions of this Court in Michaud v. R. 99 DTC 43, Dupuis v. The Queen 93 DTC 723 and Ferracuti v. R. 99 DTC 194 in which it was held that payments made by one spouse to the other or for the other's benefit in order to fulfill a legal obligation to provide spousal or family support were made for valuable consideration.

[24] Counsel also brought to my attention the decision of this Court in Raphael v. The Queen 2000 DTC 2434. There, Mogan, J. held that no consideration was given by a spouse to whom property was transferred by the other spouse pursuant to an obligation to support his spouse. Although the case was appealed to the Federal Court of Appeal, this point was not argued and the appeal was decided on other grounds. Counsel said, however, that the Court distanced itself from the comments of the trial judge relating to the issue of whether fulfillment of a family support obligation constituted consideration and referred to the following comments at paragraph 12 of the Reasons:

We do not wish to be taken however, as agreeing with all of the comments of the Tax Court Judge relating to whether there can be a consideration given between husband and wife so as to preclude the application of section 160(1).

Analysis

[25] With respect to the Appellants' first argument, I find that it has not been shown that part of the amounts Slrender received from Jagir between 2002 and 2004 were repayments of a loan. The Appellant admitted that she had not loaned any money to Vertex, and there was no evidence produced to show that Jagir had personally borrowed money from Slrender. While counsel maintained that the promissory note and demand letter were written before Jagir became indebted for taxes, Jagir was first assessed for director's liability in 1998. In this light, a promise to repay a loan that was admittedly never made in the first place is hightly suspect and is by all appearances a sham.

[26] Even if I were inclined to accept Slrender's explanation for the creation of the promissory note, her explanation does not satisfy me that she gave any consideration for the note, and any payments made pursuant to the note would therefore not have been made for any consideration.

[27] I am of the view that the Appellant's second argument cannot succeed either. I am aware of the conflicting decisions in this Court on the point of whether payments of amounts by one spouse to the other spouse or for the other spouse's benefit as family support are made for consideration. The relevant jurisprudence was fully reviewed by Archambault, J. in Tétrault v. R. 2004 TCC 332, and I agree with his conclusions at paragraphs 47 to 50 which read as follows:

[47] The contribution to the expenses of the marriage is, in my opinion, in the nature of a donation by which a property is given without any consideration.27 This analysis of the domestic obligation concurs with that made by Judge Mogan in the Raphael decision, where he says "[t]hose same domestic obligations, however, cannot be 'consideration' within the meaning of section 160...." (paragraph 27 of the decision). It also concurs with that in Logiudice, where it is explained that "The word consideration, as it is used in the context of section 160 of the Act, in its ordinary sense refers to the consideration given by one party to a contract to the other party, in return for the property transferred" and that "The limiting provision in subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the Act is to protect genuine business transactions from the operation of the section" (paragraph 16 of the decision). It is also consistent with the analysis made by Judge Sobier in Sinnott v. The Queen, supra, at paragraph 19 (Q.L.), page 598 DTC: The Appellant's counsel put a good deal of emphasis on the argument that consideration was given for the transfer. But what was that consideration? Can it be said that the paying of household expenses is consideration for the transfers? Subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) states that the joint liability of the transferor and transferee is an amount equal to the lesser of the amount by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property. At the time the transfers were made, no consideration was given.

Digitized by Google

[Emphasis added.]

[48] The absence of any consideration given in return for the performance of the domestic obligation readily explains why it highly problematic, if not impossible, to determine what the FMV would be of the transferee's right to receive the property transferred by the transferor pursuant to the latter's domestic obligation. Furthermore, as Judge Mogan said, even if a FMV could be determined, this right would not constitute "consideration given for the property".28

[49] Not only does this interpretation seem to me to be in greater harmony with the language of section 160 of the Act, but it is unavoidable in light of the interpretative presumption that the law is coherent and systematic.29 Section 160 must be considered as a whole if we are to determine its scope. Subsection 160(4)30 of the Act provides that the paragraph 160(1)(e) rule is of no effect when a spouse transfers property to the other spouse as a result of the breakdown of the marriage. For the purposes of this rule, the FMV of the transferred property is deemed to be nil. If the reasoning adopted in the Ferracuti, Michaud and Dupuis decisions were adopted, one would have to conclude that subsection 160(4) is of no use, for upon separation,31 the spouse's right to receive a portion of the other spouse's domestic estate is recognized by law, in this case the Civil Code, in particular in the rules governing the partition of the family patrimony set out in articles 414 et seq. of the Code. It then involves "a transfer of property ... in performing [a] legal obligation".32 Furthermore, if the right to receive this property under the Civil Code constituted consideration, the FMV of which is equal to the FMV of the transferred property, it would not have been necessary to enact that the FMV of the transferred property is nil. On the contrary, I think Parliament assumed that such a transfer upon a separation constitutes a transfer without consideration and, were it not for subsection 160(4) of the Act, the transferee could have been jointly and severally liable for any tax debt of the transferor.

Digitized by Google

[50] Consequently, the conclusion is unavoidable: the transfer of property under a legal obligation (as in the partition of the family patrimony) constitutes a "transfer" for the purposes of section 160 of the Act and is subject to that section. The mere right to be the beneficiary of this obligation does not constitute a particular consideration. Likewise, the transfer of property to the other spouse in performance of a domestic obligation constitutes a transfer for which no consideration has been given, and there is nothing in section 160 that would allow this Court to exempt this transfer from its operation.33

Strictly speaking, it can be argued that the liberality that is necessary for the existence of a donation is missing here. However, most people who live together would contribute quite voluntarily to the expenses of the marriage, even in the absence of such a domestic obligation; it is generally during a separation or a divorce that the situation becomes conflictual and the existence of this obligation becomes significant.

Paragraph 27 of Raphael and subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the Act.

See in particular Pierre-André Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 2000), at pages 308 et seq.

This subsection reads as follows:

Special rules re transfer of property to spouse -

Notwithstanding subsection 160(1), where at any time a taxpayer has transferred property to the taxpayer's spouse pursuant to a decree, order or judgment of a competent tribunal or pursuant to a written separation agreement and, at that time, the taxpayer and the spouse were separated and living apart as a result of the breakdown of their marriage, the following rules apply:

in respect of property so transferred after February 15, 1984, the spouse shall not be liable under subsection 160(1) to pay any amount with respect to any income from, or gain from the disposition of, the property so transferred or property substituted therefor, and for the purposes of paragraph 160(1)(e), the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred shall be deemed to be nil,

...

but nothing in this subsection shall operate to reduce the taxpayer's liability under any other provision of this Act.

The transfer after divorce is generally not subject to section 160 since the transferee is no longer the spouse of the transferor.

To use the words of the Michaud decision, paragraphs 19 and 20.

In my opinion, an amendment to the Act, like the one enacted by S.C. 1984. c. 45, subsection 65(1), applicable after February 15, 1984, for subsection 160(4), would be needed to exempt from the operation of section 160 the property transferred in performance of a domestic obligation. Parliament could draw on provisions such as articles 552 et seq. of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, which list the exemptions from seizure, such as "The food, fuel, linens and clothing necessary for the life of the household".

Digitized by Google

[28] Even if I had accepted that payments made by a spouse pursuant to a legal obligation to pay his or her share of family expenses were transfers made for consideration, it would still not have been possible on the evidence before me to determine what portion of the funds transferred to Slrender by Jagir were used by her for expenses that Jagir was required to share under the Family Relations Act provisions.

[29] I note firstly that many of the expenses that she paid would appear to have benefited all members of the household equally, including Slrender and Jagir's adult children, Jagir's mother and Jagir himself. The Appellants' counsel did not produce any authority to show that Jagir's support obligations extended to these individuals.

For the purposes of section 88 of the B.C. Family Relations Act the term "child" is defined in section 87 as including "a person who is 19 years of age or older and, in relation to the parents of the person, is unable, because of illness, disability or other cause, to withdraw from their charge or to obtain the necessaries of life." Subsection 90(2) of that Act provides that a child is liable to maintain and support a parent where the parent is dependent on an adult child because of age, illness or infirmity. In this case, however, there was no evidence led to show that the adult children were unable to withdraw from their parents' charge or that Jagir's mother was dependent on him because of age, illness or infirmity.

[30] Furthermore, only a few of the household and family expenses paid by Slrender with the transferred funds were quantified to any extent by her or corroborated by any other evidence. Slrender estimated that she spent $2,000 a month on groceries, $4,000 a year on Harish's private school fees, and $25,000 on Shawna's wedding. As well, some credit card statements that were put into evidence showed that her monthly payments on the Mercedes-Benz car were about $800 a month. She did not quantify any other expenses that she incurred or paid in 2002, 2003 or 2004 such as cable, hydro or gasoline. In cross- examination, Slrender was shown a withdrawal slip for the bank account in issue that indicated $2,000 was used to purchase U.S. dollar travellers cheques. She said she had no recollection of the transaction or what the funds were used for.

[31] I am therefore left without any means of determining what Jagir's support obligations were or what portion of the funds transferred by Jagir to Slrender would have related to those support obligations.

Corporate Distributions – Dividends, Taxable and Otherwise

When a corporation, which has an outstanding tax liability, pays a dividend to its shareholders it is possible to use s. 160 to pursue that dividend amount for collection. This was the case in Christian Larouche v. The Queen[166] where the

[166] 2010 FCA 32

Digitized by Google

Appeal Ct. held:

[1] This is an appeal of a decision of Justice Angers of the Tax Court of Canada (judge) by which he ruled that there had been a transfer of property between persons who were not dealing at arm's length within the meaning of section 160 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, 5th Supp., c. 1 (Act) and that this transfer was made without consideration.

[2] Accordingly, he dismissed the appellants' appeals regarding the notices of assessment established for the 1993, 1994, 1995 and 1996 taxation years.

[3] The appeal before this Court raises only one issue: Is the payment of dividends to the appellant a transfer of property without consideration within the meaning of section 160 of the Act? This section reads as follows:

…

Appellants' submissions

[4] The company 9039-0618 Québec Inc. (the assignor) transferred $141,250 in dividends to appellant Christian Larouche and $41,980 in dividends to appellant 2753-1359 Québec Inc. At the time of the transfer, the assignor owed income tax, interest and penalties to the federal Minister of Revenue.

[5] The fact that a transfer was made between persons who were not dealing at arm's length is not contested. However, the appellants submit that the payment of a dividend should not be considered to be a transfer without consideration as described in section 160. This submission is based on the following two lines of reasoning.

[6] First, legal ownership of a dividend must be determined on the basis of the principles of Quebec corporate and civil law. Corporate law determines the rules that apply when a dividend is illegal. Under article 910 of the Civil Code of Québec, a paid dividend is revenue yielded by capital invested in a company.

[7] Second, although the payment of a dividend is a transfer within the meaning of section 160, it is not made without consideration. The declaration of a dividend either creates a debt to the shareholder — in which case the payment of the debt and the release given by the shareholder are consideration, or the dividend is paid in consideration of a corresponding reduction in the value of the shares held by the shareholder — or it represents an income paid in consideration of the capital supplied by the shareholder for use by the corporation.

Analysis of the decision and of the appellants' submissions

[8] The appeal basically challenges well-established case law of the Supreme Court of Canada (Newman v. M.N.R.., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 770, McClurg v. Canada [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1020), of our Court (Addison & Leyen Ltd. Canada, [2006] F.C.J. No. 489, The Queen v. Gilbert, 2007 FCA 136, Algoa Trust v. The Queen, A-201-93, 1998, Fasken Estate v. Canada (Minister of National Revenue – M.N.R.), [1948] Ex.C.R. 580, Riverin v. Canada, [1999] F.C.J. No. 913, 99 D.T.C. 5356, Delage v. Her Majesty the Queen, A-14-01, 2002) and of the Tax Court of Canada (Algoa Trust v. The Queen, [1993] 1 C.T.C. 2294, Ruffolo v. Canada, [1998] T.C.J. No. 714, affirmed by this Court in [2000] F.C.J. No. 700, Gosselin v. Canada, [1996] T.C.J. No. 206, Côté v. Canada, [2002] T.C.J. No. 76).

Digitized by Google

[9] Dividends are property within the meaning of the Act: see subsection 248(1). According to case law, there is no doubt that the payment of dividends is a transfer of property within the meaning of section 160.

[10] In addition, it is difficult to see how the legal treatment of a dividend under corporate and civil law would prevent Parliament from regarding that dividend, for tax purposes, as a transfer of property without consideration when made by persons who are not dealing at arm's length.

[11] The purpose of section 160 is to protect the integrity of a tax debtor's assets against a transfer of that person's property to non-arm's length persons where that transfer thwarts, or could thwart, collection of a tax debt: see Medland v. Canada, 98 D.T.C. 6358 (F.C.A.), Canada v. Livingston, 2008 FCA 89. Hence, such a transfer must be made for consideration corresponding to the fair market value of the transferred property.

Conclusion

[12] For these reasons, the appeal will be dismissed with costs. However, costs will be limited to one set, given the joint hearing of these two appeals.

In Her Majesty the Queen v. Adela Gilbert[167] the Appeal Ct. also held:

[1] This is an appeal of a decision by Madam Justice Lamarre Proulx of the Tax Court of Canada dated October 17, 2005, in dockets 2002-3402(IT)G and 2002-3401(IT)G, allowing the appeal of Adela and Pierre Gilbert (the respondents) against an assessment made in their regard by the Minister of National Revenue (the Minister or the appellant) pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.1 (5th Supp.) (the Act).

[2] The appellant asked the Court to vary the Tax Court of Canada's decision by ordering that the fair market value of the dividends correspond to the actual amount of the dividend received by each of the respondents. The appellant also asked that the respondents' cross-appeal be dismissed with costs.

[3] For their part, the respondents asked the Court to vary the Tax Court of Canada's decision and to decide that the payment of dividends does not amount to a transfer without consideration within the meaning of paragraph 160(1)(a) of the Act.

Statement of facts

[4] The respondents were the sole shareholders of the corporation Sécovac Inc. (the corporation) and responsible for the administration and control of the corporation. Incorporated in 1996, the corporation was in the field of design and sales of lumber drying kilns.

[5] For tax years 1999 and 2000, the corporation paid dividends to each of the respondents totalling $55,000. At the time the dividends were paid, the corporation had a tax debt of $36,338.04 owing to the Minister of National Revenue.

[6] On June 6, 2002, the Minister assessed each of the respondents under section 160 of the Act, in the amount of $55,000.

[7] The respondents appealed the Minister's decision to the Tax Court of Canada and on October 17, 2005, Lamarre Proulx J. allowed the appeal in part

[167] 2007 FCA 136

Digitized by Google

(Gilbert v. Canada [2005] T.C.J. No. 570). First, she determined that paying a divided to a shareholder was a transfer without consideration within the meaning of subsection 160(1) of the Act. Second, she determined that the fair market value of the dividends paid to the respondents was the amount transferred less the tax payable by the transferee for the dividend received.

[8] On November 15, 2007, the appellant filed a notice of appeal before this Court challenging the second finding by the Tax Court of Canada. The respondents challenged the judge's first finding by way of a notice of cross-appeal.

Issues

[9] Two issues are therefore raised by the appeal and by the cross-appeal. The first is whether the payment of dividends to the respondents was a transfer of property without consideration within the meaning of paragraph 160(1)(a) of the Act. If we answer the first question in the affirmative, the second question arises regarding the fair market value of the dividends paid to the respondents.

Analysis

[10] Prior to reviewing the judge's decision, I immediately refer to subsection 160(1) of the Act:

…

[11] With regard to the first issue, Lamarre Proulx J. determined that the dividends paid to the respondents amounted to a transfer without consideration within the meaning of paragraph 160(1)(a) of the Act. At paragraphs 30 to 32 of her reasons, she stated the following:

[30] From my understanding of corporate law, it is when a corporation is wound up that the shareholders share the remaining property of the corporation. The issuing of a dividend is different in nature. I cannot accept the argument that receipt of a dividend causes the correlative impoverishment of the shareholder transferee. I do not believe that is the case in corporate law and it is decidedly not the case in tax law. In tax law, a person who receives a dividend must include it in computing his income because it is an increase in his income. For the corporation that issues it, it constitutes a reduction of its retained earnings and a reduction of its assets.

[31] There is therefore impoverishment of the issuing corporation and enrichment of the transferee, as is the case in any transfer of property subject to section 160 of the Act.

[32] As to the possibility of consideration to be given for the issuing of a dividend, I believe that the Supreme Court of Canada clearly stated in Neuman (supra) there was no such possibility. The right to a dividend stems from ownership of the shares. The consideration given to acquire the shares must not be confused with the consideration for dividends. The consideration given to acquire shares is considered for the acquisition and disposition of shares. It is not a consideration given for a dividend.

[12] In my opinion, Lamarre-Proulx J. did not err in dismissing the respondents' argument to the effect that a dividend was paid to them as shareholders of the corporation for consideration, since she was simply following the precedents of our Court and the Supreme Court.

Digitized by Google

[13] Specifically, Lamarre Proulx J. referred to Newman v. M.N.R., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 770, at page 791, where the Supreme Court of Canada, referring with approval to the dissenting reasons of LaForest J. in McClurg v. Canada, (1990) 3 S.C.R. 1020), clearly confirmed that no consideration can be given for the payment of a dividend:

. . . a dividend is received by virtue of ownership of the capital stock of a corporation. It is a fundamental principle of corporate law that a dividend is a return on capital which attaches to a share, and is in no way dependent on the conduct of a particular shareholder.

[14] This finding ratified the determination of Rip J. of the Tax Court of Canada in Algoa Trust v. Canada, [1993] 1 C.T.C. 2294, page 2303, a decision which our Court dismissed on appeal, on February 4, 1998 (Court docket A-201-93):

When a person subscribes for shares of a corporation he or she is paying theoretically for the acquisition of a share of the ownership of the corporation and receives shares of a class in the capital stock of the corporation. The shareholder gives consideration for the shares and not for what the shares may bring. Ownership of shares gives the shareholder certain rights: right to vote as a shareholder, right to a distribution of capital on the winding-up of the corporation, right to receive dividends. (This list is not meant to be exhaustive.) When the shareholder receives a dividend it is not as a result of any consideration he or she gave the corporation and which the corporation is obliged to pay for investing. When a shareholder purchases shares he is not purchasing an income right. A shareholder receives a dividend solely because the right to a dividend is an attribute of owning shares.

[Emphasis added.]

[15] With regard to the issue of whether the payment of a dividend is a transfer of property within the meaning of section 160 of the Act, Sharlow J.A. in Addison & Leyen Ltd. v. Canada [2006] F.C.J. No. 489, at paragraphs 57 to 60, stated that dividends could be subject to section 160:

[57] . . . One of the questions raised but not answered by the 1981 amendment to section 160 was whether the payment of a dividend could be a "transfer of property" within the meaning of section 160. It is possible to imagine a corporation, especially a closely held one, using the payment of a dividend to divest itself of assets in order to avoid paying a tax liability, but in most cases the payment of a dividend is an ordinary commercial transaction. A dividend is also taxable income to the recipient (except for certain corporate recipients) . . .

[60] . . . Thus, the 1993 decision of the Tax Court in Algoa Trust is the leading authority for the proposition that section 160 may apply to a dividend. [Emphasis added.]

[16] Despite his very clever arguments, Mr. Ryan, the respondents' counsel, did not persuade me that the respondents had given consideration for the dividend they were paid by the corporation. Moreover, he did not persuade me that there was a basis for reconsidering Rip J.'s determination that a shareholder receiving a dividend does not give any consideration.

[17] I now turn to the second issue. According to subparagraph 160(1)(e)(i) of the

Digitized by Google

Act, the transferee and the transferor are jointly and severally liable to pay a tax debt in an amount equal to "the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the property at the time it was transferred exceeds the fair market value at that time of the consideration given for the property".

[18] In Nash v. Canada, 2005 FCA 386, our Court agreed with the definition of "fair market value" set out by Cattanach J. of the Federal Court in Henderson Estate and Bank of New York v. M.R.N (1973), 73 D.T.C. 5471, at page 5476 (affirmed by this Court in [1975] F.C.J. No. 613), namely:

. . . the highest price an asset might reasonably be expected to bring if sold by the owner in the normal method applicable to the asset in question in the ordinary course of business in a market not exposed to any undue stresses and composed of willing buyers and sellers dealing at arm's length and under no compulsion to buy or sell. I would add that the foregoing understanding as I have expressed it in a general way includes what I conceive to be the essential element which is an open and unrestricted market in which the price is hammered out between willing and informed buyers and sellers on the anvil of supply and demand.

[19] Moreover, in Hewett v. Canada, [1997] F.C.J. No. 1541 (QL), our Court determined that the fair market value of property had to be assessed in the hands of the transferor and that the value of transferred property had to be the same in the patrimony of the transferor as it was in that of the transferee.

[20] In this case, the transferred property is a dividend in the amount of $55,000 received by each of the respondents. Applying the definition of fair market value accepted by our Court in Nash, supra, I find that the fair market value paid to the transferor for the purposes of section 160 is $55,000 for each of the respondents.

[21] It is therefore this amount which must be assessed, i.e. the amount that the Minister could have seized in the hands of the corporation had the transfer not been effected. It appears to me that this determination is the only one possible considering the fact that the fair market value must be assessed by considering that the property is still in the hands of the transferor, namely the respondents. This finding is consistent with section 160 of the Act, the purpose of which is to prevent taxpayers from transferring their property in order to circumvent the Minister's assessment for unpaid taxes.

[22] Moreover, I am satisfied that the fiscal consequences for the respondents resulting from the transfer are not at all relevant in regard to determining fair market value.

[23] Accordingly, in my opinion, Lamarre Proulx J. erred in deciding that the fair market value of a dividend is the amount of the dividend less the income tax payable on that dividend.

Conclusion

[24] I would allow the appeal with costs, I would dismiss the cross-appeal and I would set aside the decision of the Tax Court of Canada. Deciding as the Tax Court of Canada should have decided, I would dismiss the appeal filed by the respondent against the Minister's assessment with costs.

Digitized by Google

In the case of capital dividends (s. 83(2)) similar argument has been made with John Neumann, Monica Neumann v.The Queen[168] when the TCC held:

> [1] The Appellants are challenging assessments made under subsection 160(1) of the Income Tax Act (the "Act"). The Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") assessed the Appellants on the basis that they had each received a dividend of $173,500 from 782047 Alberta Ltd. ("782"), a corporation with which they were not dealing at arm's-length, at a time when 782 had a debt of $39,152.51 under the Act.
>
> [2] The Appellants are contesting the assessments on two grounds. Firstly, they say that subsection 160(1) does not apply to the dividends paid by 782 because the dividends were capital dividends as described in subsection 83(2) of the Act. Secondly, they say that if section 160 does apply to a capital dividend, they provided consideration for the dividends that exceeded the amount of the dividends.
>
> Facts
>
> [3] The following summary of facts is taken from the statement of agreed facts filed by the parties at the hearing.
>
> [4] The Appellants are married. They incorporated 782 in 1998 and each held 50% of the shares. They were the only directors and officers of 782.
>
> [5] The principal asset of the corporation was an industrial building which it rented to another corporation, Apex Group Inc., which was also owned by the Appellants.
>
> [6] The Appellants worked approximately 10 hours per week for 782 managing its affairs but did not receive any payment for this work.
>
> [7] On December 28, 2002, 782 sold the building to an unrelated purchaser. This gave rise to a large capital gain to 782, and an increase of $347,337 in its capital dividend account for tax purposes.
>
> [8] On July 1, 2003, 782 filed an election under subsection 83(2) of the Act to pay its shareholders a capital dividend of $347,000. On August 20, 2003, 782 declared and paid a dividend of $347,000 to the Appellants. The directors' resolution of the same date read, in part, as follows:
>
> A dividend in the amount of $3,470 per Class A share (for a total dividend of $347,000) is hereby declared to be payable on the 20th day of August 2003 to all Class A common shareholders of record of the Corporation as of the 20th day of August 2003.
>
> The Corporation shall make an election under subsection 83(2) of the Income Tax Act (Canada) in respect of the full amount of the dividend.
>
> The said dividend shall not become payable unless and until the Corporation has duly filed an election, in prescribed manner and in prescribed form, under subsection 83(2) of the Income Tax Act (Canada) in respect of the full amount of the said dividend.
>
> …
>
> [9] The dividend was paid to the Appellants by way of a credit of $173,500 to each of their shareholder loan accounts with 782 on August 20, 2003. The amount owing by 782 to the Appellants as a result of the credit to their

[168] 2009 TCC 81

Digitized by Google

shareholder loan accounts was secured by a general security agreement registered in their favour in the Alberta Personal Property Registry.

[10] On December 2, 2004, 782 made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy filing showed that 782 had assets of $319,729 against liabilities of $498,489. The Appellants, the only secured creditors and 782, filed proofs of claim in the amount of $160,000 each. The Minister was an unsecured creditor in the bankruptcy and did not receive any funds from the distribution of the assets of 782.

[11] On January 25, 2005 the Minister assessed each of the Appellants pursuant to subsection 160(1) for the outstanding liability of 782 under the Act for its taxation years ending January 31, 2003 and January 31, 2004 in the amount of $39,152.51.

Arguments

[12] The Appellants first argument is that section 160 does not apply to the dividend paid to the Appellants' by 782 because the dividend was a capital dividend.

[13] Counsel for the Appellants acknowledged that the payment of an ordinary dividend by corporation to its shareholder is a transfer of property within the meaning of section 160 of the Act but submitted that the capital dividend paid to the Appellants in this case was not an ordinary dividend and did not constitute a transfer property under section 160.

[14] According to counsel, a capital dividend is "a notional creature under the Income Tax Act and is not a corporate law concept." He said that a capital dividend is created by the Act, and is triggered by the filing of an election under subsection 83(2) of the Act, and that the filing of the election could not be equated to a transfer property by the Corporation.

[15] He also likened a capital dividend to a stock dividend, saying that a capital dividend was not the property of the corporation prior to the capital dividend being declared.

[16] If the payment of the dividend in this case is found to be a transfer of property by the corporation to the Appellants, counsel argued that the assessments should still be vacated because the Appellants provided consideration for the payment of the dividend. That consideration consisted of the Appellants filing the election, the unpaid work they had done for 782 over the years, and their loan of the dividend back to 782. [17] Finally counsel stated that the Appellants were not attempting to obtain the benefit of the dividend to the detriment of the other creditors of 782.

[18] Respondent's counsel submitted that the payment of the dividend to the Appellants was a transfer property within the meaning of subsection 160(1) and that the fact that the dividend was a capital dividend did not matter. The dividend was paid from the proceeds of the sale of the building owned by 782, and was therefore paid out of property of the Corporation. The Corporation was impoverished by the payment of the dividends and the Appellants were correspondingly enriched by the receipt of them. The transfer of the property out of the Corporation led ultimately to its inability to pay its taxes owing under the Act.

Digitized by Google

[19] Counsel for the Respondent referred to the case of Neuman v. The Queen, 1 S.C.R. 770, in which the Supreme Court held that the payment of a dividend relates to the entitlement of the shareholder to a capital or share interest in the corporation and not to any other consideration received from the shareholder. This decision was followed in Ruffolo v. The Queen, [1998] 4 C.T.C. 2114, [1998] T.C.J. No. 714, and Cote v. The Queen, [2002] T.C.J. No. 76, [2003].4 C.T.C. 2064, 2002 D.T.C. 1348.

[20] Lastly, counsel for the Respondent submitted that an intention to avoid payment of taxes by the transferor of the property is not required in order to apply section 160 of the Act.

… Analysis

[23] The Appellants' first argument, that a capital dividend is not a transfer of property under subsection 160(1) of the Act, cannot succeed. While I am not aware of any jurisprudence on point, and no cases were referred to me by counsel, it appears self-evident that a capital dividend is no less a transfer of property by a corporation to its shareholder than an ordinary dividend.

[24] In Algoa Trust v. The Queen, [1993] 1 C.T.C. 2294, 93 D.T.C. 405, Rip, J., as he then was, found that a dividend was a transfer of property within the meaning of subsection 160(1). In doing so, he said:

When a corporation pays a dividend to its shareholders the corporation gives or hands over property to its shareholders. Property is taken from the patrimony of a corporation and placed in the patrimony of a shareholder. When the dividend is declared, the corporation becomes indebted to the shareholder. When the dividend is paid, the corporation divests itself of ownership of the money (or other property) used to pay the dividend. This description is equally applicable to the payment of the dividends in this case. Property of 782 was taken from the patrimony of the corporation and placed in the patrimony of the Appellants; there was an impoverishment of the corporation and an enrichment of the Appellants.

[25] The fact that 782 elected under subsection 83(2) to pay the dividend out of its capital dividend account did not affect the legal nature of the dividend or the means by which the dividend was paid. A capital dividend allows a private corporation to make a tax-free distribution of certain non-taxable gains it earns, such as the untaxed portion of capital gains. The election only affects the tax attributes of the dividend payment once it had been made. Subsection 83(2) is applicable only "where at any particular time after 1971 a dividend becomes payable by a private corporation to shareholders of any class of shares" and an election under that section has been made.

[26] Contrary to the submission of the Appellants' counsel, the capital dividend election did not create the dividend; it simply made the dividend tax-free to the recipient shareholders. Subsection 83(2) does not purport to authorize the payment of the dividend by a corporation or to create a fund out of which to pay it. The authority to declare a dividend lies with the directors subject to any restrictions that have been included in the articles of incorporation. The dividend here was created by the directors' resolution and paid pursuant to that resolution out of the property of the corporation.

[27] Since the dividend was paid out of the property of the corporation it is distinguishable from a stock dividend. As noted by Rip, J. at paragraph 51 of the Algoa case, supra, the shares authorized in a corporation's articles of incorporation are not assets of the corporation, and the issuance of shares pursuant to the declaration of a stock dividend is not a transfer of property by the corporation because the corporation has not divested itself of any of its property.

Digitized by Google

[28] The Appellants' argument that they provided consideration for the dividend cannot succeed either. It has now been clearly established that the right of a shareholder to receive the payment of a dividend that has been declared flows from his or her status as a shareholder and not from any consideration given by him or her. In other words, dividends attach to the shares and not to the shareholder. In Neuman v. The Queen, supra, Iacobucci J., writing for the Court said at paragraph 57 that:

…a dividend is a payment which is related by way of entitlement to one's capital or share interest in the corporation and not to any other consideration. Thus, the quantum of one's contribution to a company, and any dividends received from that corporation, are mutually independent of one another. La Forest J made the same observation in his dissenting reasons in McClurg (at p. 1073):

With respect, this fact is irrelevant to the issue before us. To relate dividend receipts to the amount of effort expended by the recipient on behalf of the payor corporation is to misconstrue the nature of a dividend. As discussed earlier, a dividend is received by virtue of ownership of the capital stock of a corporation. It is a fundamental principle of corporate law that a dividend is a return on capital which attaches to a share, and is in no way dependent on the conduct of a particular shareholder.

[29] Thus, neither work done for a corporation nor a promise by a shareholder to lend money to the corporation can be a consideration for the payment of a dividend to the shareholder. As well, the Appellants' position that they gave consideration for the dividends by making the capital dividend election is ill-founded also because the election was made by 782 rather than by them.

[30] In summary, therefore, I find that the payment of the dividend by 782 to each of the Appellants was a transfer of property within the meaning of subsection 160(1) that was made for no consideration. As a result, the appeals shall be dismissed, with one set of costs to the Respondent.

See also Peter Kirkwood and Peter Kirkwood Holdings Limited v. The Queen[169] for similar pronouncement on capital dividend account distributions.

CRA Internal Operations Manual - Non-Arm's Length Transfers
(See image pages below)

[169] 2003TCC76

Digitized by Google

NON-ARM'S LENGTH TRANSFER ASSESSMENTS 1

Overview 1

Legislation 1
Federal Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability 1
Provincial Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability 2

Background Information 2
Extent of Transferee's Liability 160(1) ITA 2
Benefit Conferred or FMVD 3
Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 160(1)(e)(ii) ITA 3
Tax Debt Exists Before the Assessment Recognizing It is Made 4
Extent of Transferee's Liability 325(1) ETA 4
Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 325(1) ETA 5
Limitation Periods 5
Limitation Period to Assess the Transferee 5
Limitation Period to Issue a Reassessment/Additional Assessment 6
Impact of the Memorandum Assessment on the Transferor's Own Debt Limitation Period 6
Interest on Assessments under Section 160 ITA or 325 ETA 6
Persons Not Dealing at Arm's Length 7
Related Persons 7
Blood Relationship 8
Marriage 8
Common-Law Partnership 8
Adoption 9
Extension of the Meaning of "Child" 9
Corporations and Other Persons 9
Related Group and Unrelated Group 10
Personal Trusts 11
When Dealing With Each Other at Non Arm's Length is a Question of Fact 12
What is a Fair Market Value? 13
Fair Market Value Concept 13
Fair Market Value of Undivided Interest 13
What is a transfer? 14
Methods of Transfer 15
Cascading Effect 15
Further Cascading 16
When Considering Cascading Assessments 17

Policy 17
When to Issue a Memorandum Assessment 17
When is a Memorandum Reassessment Issued 18
Resolving a Disputed Memorandum Assessment 18
Request for Adjustment to a Memorandum Assessment 19
Notice of Objection or Appeal Filed Subsequent to a Request for Adjustment 19
Notice of Objection or Appeal is Outstanding When Request for Adjustment is Made 19
Where Time to File Notice of Objection or Extension Order has not Expired 19
When Should Reassessment be Made or Adjustment Request be Declined? 20
Reassessment Approval Authority 20
Collection Restrictions on Reassessment 20
When is an Additional Assessment Issued? 20
Assessment Amount Limit 20
Transferee's Liability When the Transferor is Bankrupt 21

Digitized by Google

Transferee's Liability When the Transferor Files a Proposal 21
Transferee's Liability when Bankrupt or in a Proposal 22
Benefit Programs' Joint and Several Liability 22
Amalgamation Project Canada Child Tax Benefit 160.1(1) ITA 22
No 90-days Collection Restrictions Applicable to Refund Off-Set 23
RRSP or RRIF/Deceased Annuitant subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) ITA 23
Combined Effect of ss. 84(2) of the ITA and s.160 of the ITA or s.325 of the ETA 24
Recourse When Corporation Struck from the Register 24
The Operation of Subsection 84(2) of the ITA 24
The Combined Effect of Ss. 84(2) and S.160 ITA or S. 325 ETA 25
The Subsection 84(2) Assessment 25
When Subsection 84(2) ITA is Statute-Barred 25
The Transfer of Property Assessment 25
Combined 84(2) and 160(2) Assessments Case Recounted by a Collection Officer 25
Attribution Rules Under the Income Tax Act 27
Amounts Which May be Subject to 160(1)(d) ITA 27
Joint Liability Where Anti Avoidance Rule Ss. 69(11) Applies 28
Criteria to Identify Non-Arm's Length Transactions 28
Defining Property 29
Definitions 29
Types of Properties 29
Reconveyance of Property Constitute a Transfer of Property 33
Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist 33
Transfer as a Result of Marriage Breakdown 33
Transfer is a Valid Loan 35
Transfer as a Consequence of a Merger/Amalgamation 35
Other Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist 35
Opinion from Department of Justice Required 35
Opinion from Department of Justice Not Required 36
Notice of Objection or Appeal 37
Collection Action on Memorandum Assessment 37

Procedures 38
Determining If Non-Arm's Length Transaction Occurred 38
The CRA does Not Have to Prove the Intention Behind the Transfer 38
A Dividend Payment is a Transfer of Property 39
When Transfer is Effected by Way of Mortgage Payments 39
Transfer by Means of Deposits Into a Related Person's Bank Account 40
Collecting Evidence of Transfer 40
Determining the Transferee's Ability to Pay 42
Pre-assessment Letter 42
Method of Service for Pre-Assessment Proposal Letters 42
Requesting an Opinion from the Department of Justice 43
Preparing a Non-Arm's Length Assessment 44
Third Party Assessment Approval 46
Recording the Details in the Control Register 46
Administrative Functions 47
Collection Measures 47
Law, Sheriff and Bailiff Costs 48
How to Create a Subsidiary Ledger Account 48
Allocating Payments 48
Accruing Interest 49
T779/GST259 Memorandum Assessment Verses 49
Joint and Several Liability Ss.160 (1) ITA, 325(1) ETA , 297 ETA 2001 or CA, 97.29(1) 49
Indirect Transfers 49
Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(1.1) ITA 50

Digitized by Google

Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(2.1) ITA 50
The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF 50
The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160(1.1) Where Ss. 69(11) Applies 50
Retention of Primary Assessment Information 51
Obligation to Retain Information 51
How Collections Should Retain the Information 51

Resource Material 52

Digitized by Google

Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

This chapter is designed to be a resource document for Collections Officers who have received training on Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments and require a more extensive review of the applicable legislation and some of the relevant case law. It is intended to assist in addressing on-the-job situations that are often encountered. Collections Officers having little knowledge of Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments should first review the training product, TD8605-000, Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments.

Where a transfer of property has been made either directly or indirectly by means of a trust or by any other means to a spouse, to a minor, or to any other person with whom the transferor did not deal at arm's length, the transferor and the transferee are jointly and severally liable for the payment of certain taxes.

The purpose of sections 160 of the Income Tax Act and 325 of the Excise Tax Act is to prevent a taxpayer from avoiding his tax liability by simply transferring his assets to his or her spouse or to any other person described in these sections. Sections 160 and 325, in making the transferee jointly and personally liable for the debt owed by the transferor, allows the Minister to seek payment from a taxpayer who is not the original taxpayer. The purpose of these provisions is to ensure that a tax debtor may not transfer his assets or a part of them so as to reduce the value of his financial assets by receiving a consideration that is less than the value of the property transferred.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation related to a Non-Arm's Length Transaction.

- Income Tax Act, sections: 160, 251
- Excise Tax Act, sections: 325, 126
- Excise Act 2001, section: 297
- Customs Act, section: 97.29(1)

Related Topics:

- Federal Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability
- Provincial Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability

Federal Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability

The statutory authorities to impose liability under the Federal Acts are:

- Subsection 160(1), 160(1.1), 160.1(1.1), 160.1(2.1), 160.2(1), 160.2(2) Income Tax Act
- Subsection 325(1) Excise Tax Act
- Section 297 Excise Act 2001

Digitized by Google

- Section 97.29(1) Customs Act
- Subsection 23(2) Canada Pension Plan – Employer
- Section 36 Canada Pension Plan - Self-Employed
- Section 66 Unemployment Insurance Act – Employer
- Section 126 Unemployment Insurance Act - Benefit Repayment
- Section 99 Employment Insurance Act – Employer
- Section 149 Employment Insurance Act - Benefit Repayment

Provincial Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability

The statutory authorities to impose liability under the Provincial Income Tax Acts are identified in the "Memorandum Assessments" chapter section Provincial Statutory Authorities to Impose Liability.

Background Information

This section identifies background information related to Non-Arm's Length Transactions:

- Extent of Transferee's Liability 160(1) *ITA
- Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 160(1)(e)(ii) *ITA
- Extent of Transferee's Liability 325(1) *ETA
- Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 325(1) *ETA
- Limitation Periods
- Interest on Assessments under section 160 ITA or 325 *ETA
- Persons Not Dealing at Arm's Length
- Related Persons
- Related Group and Unrelated Group
- Personal Trusts
- When Dealing With Each Other at Non-Arm's Length is a Question of Fact
- What is a Fair Market Value?
- What is a Transfer?

Extent of Transferee's Liability 160(1) ITA

Related Topic:

Digitized by Google

Tax Debt Exists Before the Assessment Recognizing It Is Made

Collection Officers should be advised that arguments could be raised that at the time of the transfer no tax liability existed because the transferor had simply not yet been assessed. It is a recognized principle in tax law that liability for tax results from the Act and not from the assessment. This means that for example if the transferor's tax debt is from a reassessment of the year 2003, issued in 2005 and the transfer of property to a spouse occurred in 2003 prior to the 2005 reassessment, the transferor is deemed to have been liable to pay tax for the year 2003 at the time the transfer took place. See: The Queen v. Simard-Beaudry Inc., [1971] F.C. 396; D'Argys v. MNR 93 DTC 1710 (TCC); The Queen v. Westbrook Management Ltd. 96 DTC 6590 (FCA) with leave to appeal refused by the SCC, Canada v. Heavyside 97 DTC 5026 (FCA) Jurak:

- transfer occurs in 2003
- at the time of this transfer, the transferor did not have an outstanding tax debt
- in 2005, the transferor is reassessed for the 2003 taxation year
- in 2007, a 160(1) ITA assessment is raised against the transferee
- transferee argues that the transferor wasn't liable for any tax at the time of the 2003 transfer
- counter argument: tax debt exists before the assessment recognizing it is made, the assessment merely states the obligation to pay income tax because the tax liability itself is created by the Act

Extent of Transferee's Liability 325(1) ETA

In calculating the extent of the transferee's liability pursuant to ss. 325(1) of the ETA there is a further factor to consider, in addition to those found under the ITA and described in the section Extent of Transferee's Liability 160(1) *ITA. The Benefit Conferred will take into consideration any amount assessed pursuant to 160(1) of the ITA that relates to the same transfer. By taking the same example as the one found under Extent of Transferee's Liability ITA and adding to it, for the purpose of this ETA example, a previous 160(1) ITA memo assessment of $10,000, the result is as follows:

For example:	Fair market value of property:	$65,000
	Price paid (consideration given):	$30,000
	Benefit conferred ITA:	$35,000
	Less 160(1) ITA assessment:	-$10,000
	Benefit conferred ETA :	$25,000
	Registrant's debt:	$50,000

The lesser of the two amounts between the Benefit conferred pursuant to the ETA and the Registrant's debt would be $25,000. This amount represents the extent of transferee's liability pursuant to ss. 325(1) of the ETA .

If, for example, a payment of $3,000, is applied against the $10,000 s.160 assessment further to a payment received from the principal debtor (for instance from a Requirement to Pay for monies owing to the transferor), this would increase the unused portion of the benefit conferred by $3,000 for the purpose of ss. 325(1) of the ETA :

Digitized by Google

For example:	Fair market value of property:	$65,000
	Price paid (consideration given):	$30,000
	Benefit conferred ITA:	$35,000
	160(1) ITA assessment:	$10,000
	Less amount paid by transferor	$3,000
	Total 160(1) ITA liability	$7,000
	Benefit conferred ETA:	$28,000
	Registrant's debt:	$50,000

Although the 160 ITA and 325 ETA memorandum assessments total $38,000 and exceed the Benefit conferred, the CRA will not claim more than $35,000 from the transferee in light of the fact that $3,000 has been collected from the transferor himself.

For further details refer to Directive RCD-00-10, Calculating the Transfer of Property Liability for GST under par. 325(1)(d) of the *ETA.

Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 325(1) ETA

All amounts for the reporting period at the time of the transfer—or any preceding reporting period of the transferor, including applicable penalty and interest at that time—are captured by 325(1) ETA.

Under section 325 of the ETA interest is charged from the date of assessment. Reference is made, in this regard, to subparagraph 325(1)(e)(ii) of the ETA: "interest or penalty for which the transferor is liable as of that time" (time of the transfer). It is likely that the transferee is not liable for interest accruing after the date of transfer and before the date of assessment.

Refer to RCD-96-13, Application of Interest in respect of Memorandum Assessments and RCD-99-05, Interest on Assessments under section 160 of the *Income Tax Act (ITA).

Limitation Periods

Related Topics:

- Limitation Period to Assess the Transferee
- Limitation Period to Issue a Reassessment/Additional Assessment
- Impact of the Memorandum Assessment on the Transferor's Own Debt Limitation Period

Limitation Period to Assess the Transferee

Subsection 160(2) is the actual provision to issue such an assessment, and it allows the Agency the ability to raise an assessment against the transferee "at any time", providing that at such time the transferor's own limitation period doesn't prevent any collection action from being taken. The assessment issued against the transferee will be governed by a separate limitation period that will begin the 90th day after the day the Memorandum Assessment is mailed.

On appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, (Quasen and CRA v Addison & Leyen et al, 2007 SCC 33), the "at any time" wording of section 160 was affirmed by the Court and noted parliaments intent that there is no applicable limitation period on when the Minister might assess under Section 160.

Digitized by Google

Unlike the English version of subsection 325(2) ETA that provides for the "at any time" provision, the same provision found in the 160(2) ITA, this wording is absent in the French 325(2) ETA version. This discrepancy causes us to turn to the general limitation period found under 298(1) ETA . Since the 4 year limitation period outlined in ss.298(1) ETA to raise an initial assessment relates to audit restrictions starting the limitation period and that 325(2) ETA has no relation with filing obligations, it is likely that it does not preclude Collections from raising a Memorandum Assessment beyond the 4 year limitation. Subsection 298(1) ETA states "more than four years after the later of the day on or before which the person was required under section 238 to file a return for the period and the day the return was filed...".

A request will be made to have the French version of the 325(2) ETA amended to include the equivalent "at any time" provision.

Limitation Period to Issue a Reassessment/Additional Assessment

An additional assessment for instance, is possible when the value of the Benefit conferred has not been totally used with the issuance of the initial 160(1) assessment, and the transferor's liability for the year of the transfer or for prior years has increased since that issuance. Because subsection 160(2) brings into use section 152 of the ITA, we can only reassess or issue an additional assessment over the same transfer within 3 years of the initial 160(1) assessment.

In the case of a memorandum assessment issued under the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, 2001, a reassessment must be made within four (4) years of a third party becoming liable for an amount. For purposes of calculating the (4) year's limitation period, the third party becomes liable from the time the initial memorandum assessment was issued.

For further information refer to RCD-00-29, Reassessing a Transferee under the *Income Tax Act, and TSDMB-2004-014, Reassessing Joint and Several Liabilities.

Impact of the Memorandum Assessment on the Transferor's Own Debt Limitation Period

If a Collection Officer issues an assessment for a non-arm's length transfer of property, the limitation period for the main debtor will restart for a new 10-year period pursuant to paragraph 222(5)c) ITA and 313(2.3)e) ETA .

For further information refer to ARD-2005-024, Limitation Periods Applicable to the Collection of Tax Debts.

Interest on Assessments under Section 160 ITA or 325 ETA

Section 160 of the ITA and section 325 of the ETA allows the Agency to assess a transferee for an amount up to the amount of the benefit conferred. However there are differences for charging interest on assessment after it has been issued

S160 ITA

In Algoa Trust, [1998] 4 C.T.C. 2001(TCC) the Court ruled that accrued interest on a 160 assessment is limited by the value of the transfer. In other words, a transferee's liability cannot exceed the benefit conferred.

Digitized by Google

Accrued interest on a S160 assessment must be raised either by reassessment of the original S160 assessment or by an additional assessment. The total of the assessment including accrued interest cannot exceed the amount of the benefit conferred.

Not: Collection restrictions apply to reassessments and additional assesements

S325 ETA

Under section 325 of the ETA, the transferee is not liable for interest accruing after the date of transfer and before the date of assessment, pursuant to subparagraph 325(1)(e)(ii) of the ETA: "interest or penalty for which the transferor is liable as of that time" (time of the transfer). However, accrued interest can be charged to the transferee, from the date of assessment without limit or the need for additional (re)assessments. For further details, refer to RCD-96-13, Application of Interest in respect of Memorandum Assessments and RCD-99-05, Interest on Assessments under section 160 of the *Income Tax Act (ITA) and Communication TSDMB-2008-066, Interest on Assessments for Liability under Section 160(1).

Note; A technical amendment to paragraph 160(1)(e) is pending. This amendment seeks to establish that the liability pursuant to subsection 160(2) of the Act is subject to interest, without limit as to the amount of interest for which the taxpayer may be liable. A similar amendment has not been sought in relation to the Excise Tax Act, as it is believed that the wording contained within section 325 of the ETA provides a reasonable legal basis for the charging of subsequent interest without limit from the date of assessment.

Persons Not Dealing at Arm's Length

The key element in determining whether or not there has been a non-arm's length transfer is the relationship between the transferor and transferee. In fact, it is essential that the parties be related in some way—for example, by blood, marriage, adoption or a question of fact—for the relationship to be deemed not at arm's length. Subsection 251(1) of the ITA sets out the essential framework through the definitions of related persons contained in ss. 251(2) for determining if a transaction was conducted between non arm's length parties.

Section 126 of the ETA refers to section 251 of the ITA. Therefore, non-arm's length applies for GST/HST purposes in the same way as for ITA purposes.

Related Persons

Pursuant to subsection 251(2) of the ITA, individuals related by blood, marriage, common-law partnership or adoption are always deemed to not be dealing at arm's length.

Related Topics:

- Blood Relationship
- Marriage
- Common-Law Partnership
- Adoption
- Extension of the Meaning of "Child"
- Corporations and Other Persons

Digitized by Google

Blood Relationship

Pursuant to paragraph 251(6)(a), individuals are related by blood if one is the child, grandchild or great grandchild of the other, or if one is the brother or sister of the other.

Section 252 extends the meaning of these terms to encompass other individuals who might otherwise not be considered to fit the normal use of the term "related by blood." For instance, a taxpayer's brother is related to him by blood pursuant to 251(6)(a) of the ITA while through the application of 252(2)(b)(i) ITA the term brother is extended to also capture the brother of the taxpayer's spouse.

The term "blood relation" does not include aunts, uncles, nieces, nephews or cousins even if listed under paragraph 252(2) of the ITA because they would first have to meet the criteria of blood relationship under 251(6)(a). The criteria of blood relationship is restricted to a child or other descendant such as a grandchild and, to a brother or sister.

Marriage

Pursuant to paragraph 251(6)(b) ITA, two persons are connected by marriage if one is married to the other or to a person who is connected by blood relationship to the other. An example of the latter situation: John is married to June and he is deemed related to June's brother Paul because Paul is connected by blood to June.

However the relationship between John's own brother and June's brother would not be captured by 252(2) of the ITA.

Therefore, an individual will be connected by marriage to the parents and any siblings of the individual's spouse.

Where an individual's marriage is dissolved by either divorce or the death of the individual's spouse, the individual will cease to be "connected by marriage" or to be "connected by blood relationship" to the parents and any siblings of the individual's former spouse. The relation between persons is established at the time the transfer giving rise to a third party assessment occurs.

Common-Law Partnership

Paragraph 251(6)(b.1) ITA provides that two individuals are "connected by common-law partnership" if one individual is in a common-law partnership with the other or with a person who is connected by blood relationship to that other person. Subsection 248(1) defines a common-law partnership as the relationship between two persons who are common-law partners of each other. The expression "common-law partner" is also defined in subsection 248(1) and means a person of the opposite or same sex who, at that time, lives with and has a conjugal relationship with the individual. In addition, one of the following conditions must be satisfied:

- the person has been living in a conjugal relationship with the individual for a continuous period of at least one year; or
- the person is the natural or adoptive parent (whether legally or in fact) of the individual's child.

Paragraph 251(6)(b.1) was added by the 2000 same-sex partners bill, effective for 2001 and later taxation years, or earlier by election.

Digitized by Google

Adoption

Pursuant to paragraph 251(6)(c,) two persons are connected by adoption if one is the adopted child of the other.

The term "adoption" includes legal and de facto adoption. In addition, a person related by blood (except a brother or sister) to another person would be related by adoption to a child adopted by that person. Consequently, individuals are related by adoption to their adopted children, parents, and grandparents.

Extension of the Meaning of "Child"

Subsection 252(1) of the ITA states that the child of an individual includes any of the following individuals:

- a person of whom the taxpayer is the legal parent
- a person who is wholly dependent on the individual and of whom the individual has, in law or in fact, custody and control, or had custody and control just prior to the child turning 19
- a child of individual's spouse or common-law partner
- a spouse or common-law spouse of a child of the individual, e.g. a son-in-law or daughter-in-law, as well as the spouse or common-law spouse of a stepson or stepdaughter, adopted child or person deemed to be the individual's child under paragraph (a)

Corporations and Other Persons

Paragraphs 251(2)(b) and (c) set out the statutory rules for determining when a corporation and another person will be considered to be "related persons" (or persons related to each other) for purposes of the Act. Under paragraph 251(2)(b), a corporation will be related to another person (including another corporation) where:

- that person (individual or corporation) controls the corporation;
- that person (individual or corporation) is a member of a related group that controls the corporation; or
- that person (individual or corporation) is a person who is related to a person described above.

In addition, paragraph 251(2)(c) provides that two corporations will be related if:

- the two corporations are controlled by the same person or group of persons;
- each of the corporations is controlled by one person and the person who controls one corporation is related to the person who controls the other corporation;
- one of the corporations is controlled by one person and that person is related to any member of a related group that controls the other corporation;
- one of the corporations is controlled by one person and that person is related to each member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation;

Digitized by Google

Example 1: A has two adult children, C and D. C has two children, X and Y, and D has one child, Z. A owns all of the issued and outstanding shares of Aco, consequently, A controls Aco. Each of Y and Z owns 50% of the common shares of Opco. Since Y and Z are cousins, they will, for purposes of the Act, be an unrelated group that controls Opco. As A is related to each of Y and Z (i.e. A is their grandparent), Aco and Opco will be related pursuant to subparagraph 251(2)(c)(iv).

- any member of a related group that controls one of the corporations is related to each member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation;

  Example 2: Same facts as in Example 1, except that each of A, C and D own 33 1/3% of the common shares of Bco. A, C and D are a related group that controls Bco. Since A is related to each of Y and Z (i.e. A is their grandparent), Bco and Opco will be related pursuant to subparagraph 251(2)(c)(v).

- each member of an unrelated group that controls one of the corporations is related to at least one member of an unrelated group that controls the other corporation.

  Example 3: Mr. X, Mr. Y and Mr. Z are an unrelated group that controls XYZ Co. Their spouses, Mrs. X, Mrs. Y and Mrs. Z are an unrelated group that controls ZYX Co. As Mr. X is related to Mrs. X, Mr. Y is related to Mrs. Y and Mr. Z is related to Mrs. Z, XYZ Co will be related to ZYX Co pursuant to subparagraph 251(2)(c)(vi).

For the purposes of subsection 251(2), control means de jure control, which generally means the right of control that rests in ownership of such number of shares as carries with it the right to a majority of the votes in the election of the board of directors of the corporation.

For detailed information on de jure control of a corporation, see the current version of IT-64R4, Corporations: Association and Control.

Related Group and Unrelated Group

The expression "related group" is defined in subsection 251(4) and means a group of persons each member of which is related to every other member of the group. For example, a group consisting of two common-law partners and their children would be a related group. An unrelated group refers to a group of persons that is not a related group. For a group of unrelated persons to constitute a group of persons which controls a corporation, there must be a common link or interest between the persons (which must involve more than their mere status as shareholders) or there must be evidence that those shareholders act together to exert control over the corporation. For further information on unrelated persons that control a corporation refer to the section When Dealing With Each Other at Non Arm's Length is a Question of Fact.

Subsection 251(3) of the ITA provides that where two corporations are each related to a third corporation, they will be considered to be related to each other for the purposes of subsections 251(1) and (2). For example, A and B are sisters and each has an adult child, being C and D, respectively. Each of A, B, C and D owns all of the issued shares of a corporation, Aco, Bco, Cco and Dco, respectively. In this situation, Aco and Bco are related to each other by virtue of subparagraph 251(2)(c)(ii). Also, Aco and Cco are related to each other and Bco and Dco are related to each other by virtue of subparagraph 251(2)(c)(ii). Therefore, Aco and Dco will be related to each other by virtue of subsection 251(3) because each of them is related to Bco. Similarly, Bco and Cco will be related under subsection 251(3) because each of them is related to Aco. However, since subsection 251(3) does not apply for the purposes of a subsequent application of subsection 251(3), Cco will not be related to Dco.

Digitized by Google

Personal Trusts

Paragraph 251(1)(b) provides that a taxpayer and a specified personal trust will be deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length if the taxpayer, or any person not dealing at arm's length with the taxpayer, is beneficially interested in the trust. Pursuant to subsection 248(25), a person who is beneficially interested in a trust includes:

- a person who has any right (whether immediate or future, whether absolute or contingent or whether conditional on or subject to, the exercise of any discretion by any person or partnership) as a beneficiary to receive any of the income or capital of the trust either directly from the trust or indirectly through one or more trusts or partnerships;

- a particular person or partnership who is not otherwise beneficially interested in a trust at a particular time but may, by reason of the exercise of discretion by any person or partnership, subsequently become beneficially interested in the trust where any property has been acquired, directly or indirectly in any manner, by the trust from the particular person or partnership;

- a member of a partnership that is beneficially interested in the trust.

The following are examples of situations where an individual is beneficially interested in a trust:

- trust income is payable to the individual

- income is held in trust and will be paid upon the individual's attainment of a certain age

- the individual is one for whom a preferred beneficiary election may be made

- the individual is one of a class who has a remainder interest under the trust

- the individual has contributed property to the trust (e.g. the settlor of the trust) and may, by virtue of the existence of a power of appointment, be added as a beneficiary of the trust at a later date

Therefore, the Act provides that a 160(2) or 325(2) assessment may be raised in any of the above situations providing that other governing criteria are also met.

For example where a taxpayer, in this situation the settlor of the trust, appoints his/her spouse and/or children (or any other related person) as beneficiaries of a trust into which he has contributed property, two collection avenues arise. Collections may raise a 160 ITA or 325 ITA memo assessment against the trust itself and/or against the beneficiaries of the trust depending whether—at the time of contemplating the memo assessment—the property transferred into the trust rests within the trust and/or the beneficiaries' hands.

In the above example, the memorandum assessment against the trust is possible through the effect of 251(1)(b) of the ITA, which deems the taxpayer and the trust in such instance to not be dealing at arm's length. On the other hand, an assessment against the beneficiaries is also possible pursuant to the text of 160(1) ITA and 325(1) ETA which explicitly recognizes transfers made to a related person by means of a trust.

It is not necessary that the transfer of property to the beneficiary of the trust be the identical asset transferred as in the original transfer of property to the trust. This principle is further explained in the section Cascading Effect.

A personal trust, as defined in subsection 248(1), is either a testamentary trust or, an inter vivos trust where a beneficiary receives an interest from the trust without having paid any consideration to the trust or to any person who contributed to the trust. The fact that the beneficiary is also the settlor of the trust will not deem his contribution as a settlor to be a consideration paid for an interest received from the trust.

Digitized by Google

When in doubt as to the ownership of a property transferred into a trust, the matter must be referred to DOJ for an opinion.

A specified personal trust will be deemed not to deal at arm's length with its beneficiaries or with any person who does not deal at arm's length with any such beneficiary. In any other case, it is a question of fact whether or not a trust and a particular person or group of persons are dealing at arm's length.

For further information on the relation between an individual and a personal trust refer to Meaning of Arm's Length IT-419R2.

When Dealing With Each Other at Non Arm's Length Is a Question of Fact

Shareholders holding more than 50% of a corporation's voting shares are related to the corporation, as defined in subsection 251(2) of the Act, and related persons are deemed to deal at non arm's length with each other. Paragraph 251(1)(c) provides that it may also be a question of fact whether persons not related to each other are, at a particular time, dealing at arm's length.

In order to determine whether there is non-arm's length relationship between two unrelated persons, the concept of "dealing at arm's length" must first be defined for the purposes of subsection 160(1).

Three criteria or tests are commonly used to determine whether the parties to a transaction are dealing at arm's length. They are:

a. the existence of a common mind which directs the bargaining for both parties to the transaction;

b. parties to a transaction acting in concert without separate interests; and

c. "de facto" control.

For instance, while investigating a possible 160 assessment through a transfer of dividend paid by a corporation to its shareholders, the investigation reveals there are only two shareholders, in equal proportions and they are unrelated between themselves. The relation between the shareholders and the corporation is not captured by the definition of related person pursuant to 251(1)(a) and 251(2)(b) because they are not part of a related group that control the corporation; however, an investigation could reveal a de facto relationship based on one of the above tests.

In Gosselin v. R., [1997] 2 C.T.C 2830 (TCC) a corporation, by declaring dividend, distributed all of its property and was wound up. The corporation only had two 50 per cent shareholders. Gosselin was one of them and was assessed under section 160 of the Act for the unpaid tax debt of the corporation. In this case, the court recognized that the shareholder was in fact in control of the corporation and not dealing at arm's length with the corporation.

In Gestion Yvan Drouin Inc v. HMTQ [2000] TCC 19991856., the Court rejected CRA's de facto relationship argument in a 50 per cent shareholders' scenario. This case however, offers a lengthy discussion on de facto non-arm's length relationships between two persons, starting at paragraph 72.

Additional jurisprudence;

Digitized by Google

- R. v. McLarty, 2008 SCC 26
- McNichol v. Canada, 97 DTC 111, at pages 117 and 118

Collection Officers must refer to DOJ for an opinion on the existence of a possible non arms length relationship between unrelated persons involved in a transaction.

What is a Fair Market Value?

The fair market value is the highest price in terms of money, which the subject property will bring to a willing seller if exposed for sale on the open market between parties acting at arm's length.

Related Topics:

- Fair Market Value Concept
- Fair Market Value of Undivided Interest

Fair Market Value Concept

The concept of fair market value assumes that:

- there is a willing buyer and a willing seller
- the buyer and the seller are fully informed
- the property was exposed for sale on the open market for a reasonable period of time
- neither party is compelled to act
- the buyer and seller are dealing at arm's length

Fair Market Value of Undivided Interest

For the purposes of sections 160 and 160.4 ITA, the fair market value at any time of an undivided interest in a property, expressed as a proportionate interest in that property, is deemed to be equal to the same proportion of the Fair Market Value of that property at that time.

Subsection 160(3.1) was enacted in 2000 and is applicable to transfers of property made after June 4, 1999. Its purpose is to further clarify the basis on which we calculate the value of an undivided interest in a property. It prevents any argument that a discount or reduction in the Fair Market Value is necessary to enable the sale of the undivided interest. For example:

> Mr. and Mrs. Jones share an undivided interest in their residential home. Mr. Jones transfers his 50% share of undivided interest in the home to Mrs. Jones. At the time of the transfer the value of their home is $200,000.
>
> Mrs Jones argues that if the CRA had tried to seize and sell her husband's undivided interest in the property before the transfer its value would have been discounted from $100,000 to a lesser value. In her view, any purchaser would have to take into account that he or she would obtain a 50 per cent interest as a joint tenant in a home in which the wife was still living.

Subsection 160(3.1) ensures that the valuation of the undivided interest Mr. Jones has transferred to his spouse is 50% of the property's value for purposes of subsection 160(1) ITA. In the above example, Mrs Jones would not be able to assert that the FMV of her husband's undivided interest would be worth less than $100,000.

Digitized by Google

Further reference is made to Hewett v. The Queen, 97 DTC 561 (T.C.C.), affirmed 98 DTC 6003 (F.C.A.), which prompted the enactment of subsection 160 (3.1).

Subsection 160(3.1) is applicable to transfers of property made after June 4, 1999. Refer to Memorandum 00-10, Bills C-24.

What is a transfer?

A transfer is every method of disposing of, or parting with:

- property;
- an interest in property; or
- a charge against property.

A transfer can be:

- direct or indirect
- absolute or conditional
- voluntary or involuntary

On the meaning of the word "transfer", the most cited definition is from the Exchequer Court decision in Fasken Estate v. Minister of National Revenue, 49 DTC 491, in which Thorson, P. said at page 497:

"The word "transfer" is not a term of art and has not a technical meaning. It is not necessary to a transfer of property from a husband to his wife that it should be made in any particular form or that it should be made directly. All that is required is that the husband should so deal with the property as to divest himself of it and vest it in his wife, that is to say, pass the property from himself to her. The means by which he accomplishes this result, whether direct or circuitous, may properly be called a transfer."

Judge Marceau of the Federal Court of Appeal best summarized the scope of the meaning of a transfer, as defined in section 160 ITA, in the Riverin v. Canada decision:

"Noting the care taken by Parliament to employ more than once the broadest possible terms in its introductory words, no doubt for the purpose of giving its rule a full extension " "either directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatever" " we have no difficulty in concluding that the provision applies once the tax debtor does the act that gives rise to the process by which his property will ultimately end up in the patrimony of any of these persons with whom he has a non-arm's length relationship. In the particular case of a payment in kind or a payment given as security for the repayment of a loan, it makes no difference whether the payment takes full effect and becomes definitive as a result of some additional intervention of the debtor, a court decision or the mere operation of the Act."

Related Topics:

- Methods of Transfer
- Cascading Effect

Digitized by Google

Methods of Transfer

Transfers subject to section 160 of the Income Tax Act or 325 of the Excise Tax Act may include, but are not limited to:

- conveyance
- lien
- security
- sale
- encumbrance
- mortgage
- transfer of property and mortgage payments
- payment
- gift
- hypothecation
- pledge
- transfer from a settlor to a trust or trustee &/or trust beneficiary
- payment of cash dividend
- giving of a property under a will
- divestment of beneficial ownership without necessarily transferring possession
- release of an indebtedness
- repayment of a person's loans by another person

Cascading Effect

Related Topics:

- Further Cascading
- When Considering Cascading Assessments

The Jurak decision reversed the judgment in Nanini v. Canada, 94 DTC, 1839 (T.C.C.) and confirmed that cascading assessments are permissible within the scope of subsection 160(1) of the ITA. Of particular importance in that decision is the Court's comment that the decision in Nanini had not been accepted by the other judges of the Tax Court, and hence, ought not be followed. Affirming the reasoning of Lamarre Proulx T.C.J., the Federal Court of Appeal ruled as follows:

Digitized by Google

"The recipient of a transfer, therefore, can himself become a transferor for purposes of subsection 160(1) of the Act, if at the time of such transfer he is indebted for tax, either in his own right, or as the transferee of the original transfer (under subsection 160(1)) (TRANSLATION)."

In view of the decision in Jurak, Collection Officers should proceed with assessments under subsection 160(1) of the ITA, subsection 325(1) of the ETA and subsection 97.29(1) of the CA where there has been a subsequent transfer of property. In this context, it is not necessary that the transfer of property be the identical asset transferred as in the original transfer of property. The significant element of a cascading assessment under these provisions is that the vicarious liability will be enforceable against the final recipient.

The following example provides an illustration of the cascading effect:

ABC Corporation, following an audit by the Agency in January 2003, was assessed the following amounts for unpaid corporate taxes:

Taxation year
1999	$25,000
2000	35,000
2001	40,000

On referral to Collections, ABC claimed it was ceasing its business operations and was unable to make an arrangement for payment. However, a review by Collections, discovered that a cash dividend of $125,000 had been paid in October 2002. The dividend had been paid to DEF Corporation, a company that held 100% of the common voting shares of ABC Corporation.

Further investigation by Collections revealed a cash dividend totalling $100,000 had been paid by DEF Corporation in equal amounts of $33,333.33, to its three shareholders and directors in November 2002. A review of the corporate records showed the above individuals to be Allan and Cynthia Anderson, husband and wife and their eldest son, Robert Anderson.

Each of these three shareholders maintained one third of the common voting shares of DEF Corporation.

Assessments Raised: An initial assessment under subsection 160(1) was issued to DEF Corporation, in the amount of $100,000, the amount of ABC's corporate tax debt, being the lesser of ABC's tax liability and the October 2002 cash dividend of $125,000 represented the transfer of property without consideration.

On the presumption that DEF corporation had no ability to pay the above assessed amount, a further assessment under subsection 160(1) may be raised against each of the three shareholders in the amount of $33,333, this amount being the lesser of the fair market value of the dividend received without consideration and the liability of DEF corporation established via the initial 160(1) assessment. In this manner, it can be seen that the original tax liability has been cascaded down to a subsequent transferee.

Further Cascading

In the above example, if the individual shareholders subsequently made transfers of property to persons with whom they are deemed to deal at non-arm's length, those subsequent transferee's could potentially be subject to an assessment under subsection 160(1) of the ITA.

Should Collection Officers be presented with a similar fact situation, they are advised to seek guidance from their respective Legal Services Office before issuing the assessment.

Digitized by Google

When Considering Cascading Assessments

The rules for liability do not change. As stated at paragraph 10 in Williams D. v. The Queen [2000] DTC. 2340 (T.C.C.) affirmed 2002, F.C.A. 380, "In order for subsection 160(1) of the Act to apply, four conditions need to be met. First, there has to be a non-arm's length dealing; second, a transfer of property must occur; third, there must be an absence of consideration from the person who receives the property and fourth, the transferor must be liable for tax the year in which the property was transferred or any preceding year."

For further information refer to Directive RCD-03-02, Transfers of Property: Cascading Assessments.

Policy

This section provides policy related to Non-Arm's Length Transactions:

- When to Issue a Memorandum Assessment
- Assessment Amount Limit
- Transferee's Liability When the Transferor is Bankrupt
- Transferee's Liability When the Transferor Files a Proposal
- Transferee's Liability When Bankrupt or In a Proposal
- Benefit Programs' Joint and Several Liability
- RRSP or RRIF/Deceased Annuitant Subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) *ITA
- Combined effect of Ss. 84(2) of the ITA and S.160 of the ITA or S.325 of the *ETA
- Attribution Rules Under the *Income Tax Act
- Joint Liability Where Anti Avoidance Rule Ss .69(11) Applies
- Criteria to Identify Non-Arm's Length Transactions
- Defining Property
- Reconveyance of Property Constitute a Transfer of Property
- Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist
- Opinion from Department of Justice Required
- Opinion from Department of Justice Not Required
- Notice of Objection or Appeal
- Collection Action on Memorandum Assessment

When to Issue a Memorandum Assessment

A memorandum assessment is raised to establish the joint and several liability of a third party.

Digitized by Google

A memorandum assessment is issued:

- If the assessment is collectible and/or reasonable in view of the circumstances
- If applicable, where a Department of Justice opinion concurs with the action
- when the collection investigation of the situation is complete and all the required evidence has been secured

Related Topics:

- When is a Memorandum Reassessment Issued?
- When is an Additional Assessment Issued?

When is a Memorandum Reassessment Issued

In many circumstances, it is not unusual for additional relevant facts to come to light after an assessment has been issued. In some instances, had the additional information been available at the outset it may have impacted the amount included on the Notice of Assessment, or resulted in the assessment not having been made at all.

Accordingly, the following policies have been developed to provide Tax Services Offices with guidance and direction concerning the circumstances when Revenue Collections should consider downward reassessments of joint and several liabilities.

The policies outlined below can be found within Communication ARD-2004-014, entitled, Reassessing Joint and Several Liabilities.

Related Topics:

- Resolving a Disputed Memorandum Assessment
- Request for Adjustment to a Memorandum Assessment
- Notice of Objection or Appeal Filed Subsequent to a Request for Adjustment
- Notice of Objection or Appeal is Outstanding When Request for Adjustment is Made
- Where Time to File Notice of Objection or Extension Order has not Expired
- When Should Reassessment be Made or Adjustment Request be Declined?
- Reassessment Approval Authority
- Collection Restrictions on Reassessment

Resolving a Disputed Memorandum Assessment

It is not uncommon for disputes to arise after an assessment has been issued. When a dispute results in the amount of a debt being re-determined or recalculated, it does not constitute a compromised settlement, but rather is a re-consideration of the actual amount owed. When amounts are re-determined or recalculated, the appropriate adjustments are made within the Agency's records and a Notice of Reassessment is issued to inform the taxpayer accordingly.

Digitized by Google

Issuing reassessments to resolve disputes cannot be done on an ad hoc basis; there must be a proper basis for doing so.

Request for Adjustment to a Memorandum Assessment

Occasionally, Revenue Collections is requested to reconsider a memorandum assessment that has been issued against a third party under one of the various joint and several liability provisions. Such requests may emanate from recipients who have been assessed, or their representatives. In some instances the third party who has been assessed, or the person's representative, is able to provide additional information to demonstrate that the amount assessed is in error.

Although rare, there have also been instances when counsel at the Department of Justice has requested Revenue Collections to consider an adjustment to a memorandum assessment. Although not always the case, usually counsel is representing the Agency in the dispute process when such a request has been made.

Revenue Collections Divisions will only reconsider the amount of a third party's liability and issue a reassessment to adjust the amount when there is a proper basis to do so and an objection or appeal is not outstanding. In the event an Objection or Appeal is outstanding, Revenue Collections should leave matters to the Appeals Division to handle the case and follow any instructions they may issue as a result of disposing of the Objection or Appeal.

Notice of Objection or Appeal Filed Subsequent to a Request for Adjustment

Occasionally, Revenue Collections may be requested to reconsider a memorandum assessment and subsequently, a Notice of Objection or Appeal is filed. Once a Revenue Collections Officer becomes aware that an Objection or Appeal is outstanding, he or she is encouraged to pass any additional information that they have gathered to the Appeals Division along with any observations, conclusions or recommendations they have made or wish to make. The Appeals Officer would benefit from this information and any additional work that has been done.

Notice of Objection or Appeal is Outstanding When Request for Adjustment is Made

Unless instructed to do so by Appeals, whenever an assessment is subject to a Notice of Objection or Appeal, Revenue Collections Division must not make an adjustment to a memorandum assessment under any circumstance. In the event that a request for an adjustment is received from a person who has been assessed pursuant to one of the memorandum assessment provisions, and a Notice of Objection or Appeal is outstanding, the person making the request should be referred to the Appeals Division. When disposing with the objection or appeal, the Appeals Division will issue instructions to Revenue Collections if and when appropriate.

Where Time to File Notice of Objection or Extension Order has not Expired

In the event a request is received for an adjustment and an Objection or Appeal has not been filed, the collection officer can reconsider the facts and can complete the necessary steps to have the assessment varied when the facts warrant it. However, the third party should be informed of their right to file an objection, or seek an order to extend the time to file an objection when time to do so has not lapsed, particularly when the request for adjustment is denied or there is a chance the time may expire before a decision can be made.

Digitized by Google

When Should Reassessment be Made or Adjustment Request be Declined?

When it is clear from the additional information that the amount of a memorandum assessment is in error, it would be appropriate for Revenue Collections to proceed with a reassessment provided a Notice of Objection or Notice of Appeal is not outstanding.

In the event a request for an adjustment is received and it is not clear from the additional information provided that the assessment is incorrect, the request for adjustment should be declined. It may be that the Tax Services Office staff will choose to obtain advice from the Department of Justice or the Field Support Section in advance of making such a decision.

Reassessment Approval Authority

A Collection Officer should not commit to an adjustment being made as a result of receiving a request. Instead, the matter should be referred to the person within the local office who has been delegated the authority to approve memorandum assessments to seek concurrence with the Collection Officer's recommendation. For further details refer to Memorandum 01-21, Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act.

If the decision is made to make an adjustment, the Collection Officer will issue a reassessment accordingly.

Collection Restrictions on Reassessment

Since subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act (ITA), section 2 of the Excise Act, 2001 (EA 2001) and subsection 58.1(1) of the Excise Tax Act (ETA) define an assessment to include a reassessment, collection restrictions, imposed by section 225.1 of the ITA and section 286 of the EA 2001, apply to the full amount of a reassessment. Therefore, once the Agency has issued a notice of reassessment, we will not continue or initiate collection actions, in respect of the amounts reassessed until the collection restrictions no longer apply on them.

For more information, please refer to Communication ARD-2005-022 entitled Collection Restrictions following Reassessments Under the Income Tax Act, Excise Act 2001 and Excise Tax Act – Non-GST.

When is an Additional Assessment Issued?

An additional assessment is issued when the liability of the tax debtor is increased as a result of a further assessment(s) after the original memorandum assessment is issued. The additional assessment is separate and distinct, and does not replace the original assessment or previous reassessment.

Separate memorandum assessments are required in instances where there is more than one party to be assessed for a particular liability.

Assessment Amount Limit

It is recommended that the minimum assessment amount be set at $10,000. However, Tax Services Office (TSO) Management may use their discretion when considering an assessment below the recommended assessment balance limit.

In these circumstances, TSO Management will take into consideration:

- current TSO workloads
- cost effectiveness

Digitized by Google

- previous compliance history

Transferee's Liability When the Transferor is Bankrupt

The transferee remains liable despite the transferor's bankruptcy or discharge from bankruptcy.

In the matter Canada v. Heavyside, 97 DTC 5026 (F.C.A.) the Federal Court of Appeal upheld the Agency's position that:

- the transferee's liability under section 160 arises at the time of the transfer of the property, not at the time of the assessment, and
- the discharge in bankruptcy of the transferor does not discharge the liability of the transferee.

Transferee's Liability When the Transferor Files a Proposal

In respect of the transferee's liability where the transferor has filed a proposal, the transferee is not released by the acceptance of the proposal pursuant to subsection 62(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA). In the matter of Bergeron v. Her Majesty the Queen 2003 DTC 1491, although seemingly not relying on subsection 62(3) BIA, the Court held: « I conclude, therefore, that the acceptance of the proposal had no effect on the assessments [160(1) ITA] giving rise to these appeals. The respondent was therefore fully justified in making the notices of assessment [160(1) ITA] against the appellants [the transferee]» In Bergeron, the Collection Officer insisted upon having a clause such as this one inserted in the proposal of the principal debtor «The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency shall retain all its remedies under the Income Tax Act.» In the end, when it was clear that the trustee would not consent to adding the clause, the Collection Officer sent out this written notice to the trustee «We are informing you that not including, in the debtor's proposal, the clause we proposed last February 9 in no way limits the remedies available to the CCRA under the Income Tax Act.»

When Collection Officers are made aware of transactions giving rise to Non-Arms' Length memorandum assessments, after the acceptance of a proposal made by the transferor, careful attention should be given to the proposal. Should the amended payment terms presented by the trustee not be satisfactory to the Agency, Collection Officers must give consideration to pursuing a third party assessment.

A third party's liability arises at the time of the transfer of the property not at the time of the assessment. The acceptance of a proposal, including the Agency's acceptance, does not release a third party's liability by the effect of subsection 62(3) and section 179 of the BIA.

Directive RCD-00-28, Terms for Proposals under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, provides for terms that apply or could apply when a tax debtor files a proposal under the BIA. The following is an example of a term that would apply for a transfer of property:

> transfer of property
>
> The Agency reserves the right to issue assessments pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, or section 325 of the Excise Tax Act for any transfer of property which the proponent has made to his or her spouse or to a person who has since become that person's spouse, to a person who was under 18 years of age, or to a person with whom he or she was not dealing at arm's length.

Digitized by Google

Transferee's Liability when Bankrupt or in a Proposal

When the transferee has been assessed pursuant to 160(1) ITA prior to filing a bankruptcy or a proposal, we follow Collections policy and procedure as outlined in the Bankruptcy chapter, including filing a proof of claim.

If on the day of the bankruptcy or the filing of a proposal, the transfer giving rise to the 160(1) ITA assessment has occurred but the transferee has not yet been assessed, in order to take part in the dividend distribution the Agency will have to substantiate its claim by assessing and proving its claim before the declaration of the dividend.

Benefit Programs' Joint and Several Liability

Related Topics:

- Amalgamation Project Canada Child Tax Benefit 160.1(1) *ITA
- No 90-days Collection Restrictions Applicable to Refund Off-Set

Situations where a joint and several liability may exist for an excess credit refund include:

- a Goods and Services Tax Credit (GSTC) under the Income Tax Act (ITA) subsection 160.1(1.1)
- a Child Tax Benefit credit (CTB) under the ITA, subsection 160.1(2.1)

In both these situations the authority to raise a memorandum assessment will fall under subsection 160.1(1) ITA.

Subsection 160.1(2.1) ITA, applies to a spouse or a common-law partner who was cohabiting with the primary caregiver at the year-end of a base taxation year and during the months in which benefits were paid in the benefit year. The spouse and cohabiting spouse can be held jointly and severally liable for all benefits paid during the benefit year for the period they were cohabiting.

For example:

> Mary and Jim were cohabiting spouses on December 31, 1995. During the benefit year July 1, 1996 to June 30, 1997, Mary, as the primary care giver received monthly benefits. In April 1997, Mary and Jim separated with Jim moving to another location.
>
> Both Mary and Jim could be held jointly and severally liable for any CCTB overpayment incurred during the period July 1, 1996, up to the date in April 1997, when they ceased to be cohabitants.

The onus is on the individuals being assessed to prove they were not cohabiting spouses at the year-end of the base taxation year and during the months in which the benefits were initially paid.

Amalgamation Project Canada Child Tax Benefit 160.1(1) ITA

Under the CCTB legislation, only one cheque can be issued per family. Therefore, when two single parents marry or form a common-law partnership, an amalgamation of their CCTB accounts is processed combining all of the child benefit entitlements under the CCTB account of one parent. If the marriage or union took place in the past, the amalgamation can result in a debit on one client's CCTB account (usually the male's) and a corresponding credit on the other client's account.

Digitized by Google

CRA cannot arbitrarily use the credit the client will be receiving for the "underpayments" to offset the debit that will be created on their spouse's/partner's account, unless they give us permission. Requesting consent from the credit client is included in the procedures that the Child Tax Benefit Unit would be following, but sometimes consent is not given. The end result could be one party being assessed for several thousand dollars in overpayment of benefits, while their respective spouse is receiving a refund of underpayment of benefits for the same or greater amount.

In order to collect the refund of these underpayments, CRA must raise an assessment under subsection 160.1(2.1) of the Income Tax Act (ITA) to create a joint and several liability against a cohabiting spouse. Subsection 160.1(2.1) of the ITA, applies to a spouse who is cohabiting with the primary caregiver at the year end of a base taxation year, and the months in which benefits were paid during the benefit year. The spouse and cohabiting spouse can be held jointly and severally liable for all benefits paid during the benefit year for the period they were cohabitating.

For further information refer to Memorandum 03-04, Amalgamation Project Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB) and Communication ARD-2004-010 entitled Hold Credit Overrides on Canada Child Tax Benefit Accounts.

No 90-days Collection Restrictions Applicable to Refund Off-Set

The collection restrictions outlined in subsection 225.1(1) of the ITA are applicable to memorandum assessments raised. However, subsection 164(2) of the ITA permits the Minister where a person is, or is about to become, liable to make any payment to Her Majesty, to apply the amount of any refund or repayment to that other liability. There is no requirement for these funds to be held in abeyance until the collection restrictions as outlined in subsection 225.1(1) have expired. This section permits the CRA to apply the captured funds immediately to the debtor's account.

Therefore, Benefit Programs has been instructed to transfer the credit to the debtor's account as soon as Collections requests a Hold Credit Override (HCO) action.

For further information refer to Communication ARD-2004-010 entitled Hold Credit Overrides on Canada Child Tax Benefit Accounts.

RRSP or RRIF/Deceased Annuitant subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) ITA

Under the Income Tax Act (ITA) subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) respectively, a deceased taxpayer and the last annuitant under a registered retirement savings plan or a registered retirement income fund are jointly and severally liable to pay the amounts of additional tax which are created by the deemed disposition of the RRSP or RRIF. The legislation deems the disposition to have taken place "immediately before death."

Both obligations created by the deemed disposition of an RRSP or RRIF were enacted in two separate subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2); however, the treatment for purposes of a memorandum assessment is the same in both cases.

Situations where the Minister is permitted to raise an assessment under section 160.2 are those in which the third party beneficiary of the RRSP or RRIF funds is neither a spouse, a financially-dependant child, nor a grandchild.

In imposing these type of liabilities amongst Non Arm's Length beneficiaries, ss. 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) actually allow for memorandum assessments against beneficiaries dealing at Arm's Length such as a friend, where designated as beneficiary under the RRSP.

Digitized by Google

For further information refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-025, entitled Subsection 160.(1) Non-arm's length Transfer of Property/ Subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF and Directive RCD-00-26, entitled Assessments Under Section 160.2 of the Income Tax Act for Amounts received out of a RRSP or RRIF.

Combined Effect of ss. 84(2) of the ITA and s.160 of the ITA or s.325 of the ETA

Related Topics:

- Recourse When Corporation Struck from the Register
- The Operation of Subsection 84(2) of the *ITA
- The Combined Effect of S.84(2) and S.160 ITA or S. 325 *ETA
- The Subsection 84(2) Assessment
- When Subsection 84(2) ITA is Statute-Barred
- The Transfer of Property Assessment
- Combined 84(2) and 160(2) Assessments Case Recounted by a Collection Officer

Recourse When Corporation Struck from the Register

Ordinarily, the Agency has two recourses for tax recovery when a corporation is involuntarily dissolved:

1. Reinstate the corporation and take action, provided that assets are available.
2. Issue directors' liability assessments.

Both recourses are time-sensitive. In (1), provincial and federal laws impose a time frame for reinstatement, while in (2) the ITA and the ETA stipulate that such an assessment must be raised within two years of the director ceasing to be a director. A director ceases to be a director when the corporate charter is revoked. Further, it is problematic in some provinces to reinstate a corporation, given the particularity of provincial law.

The Operation of Subsection 84(2) of the ITA

Under subsection 84(2) of the ITA, the shareholders of a corporation are deemed to have received a dividend on the:

- winding-up,
- discontinuance, or
- reorganization of the business. The dividend is equal to the net worth of the corporation, on the happening of one of those events, and accrues to each shareholder in proportion to the shares that each holds.

Digitized by Google

The Combined Effect of Ss. 84(2) and S.160 ITA or S. 325 ETA

As long as the shareholders have the ability to pay, the combined effect of subsection 84(2) of the ITA and section 160 or 325 can result in increased tax recovery. The shareholders can be assessed a transfer of property assessment, following the subsection 84(2) assessment. This provides an alternative to recovery via an assessment for directors' liability, which is effective to collect payroll deductions and GST/HST, but not corporate (T2) income tax.

The Subsection 84(2) Assessment

The basis for calculating the deemed dividend is the net worth of the corporation at the date of the winding-up, discontinuance, or reorganization. To arrive at the net worth, Audit relies on the last return that the corporation filed, and allocates the net worth to each shareholder, in proportion to that person's interest in the corporation. Audit then assesses the shareholder under subsection 84(2), creating the liability for personal income tax on the dividend distribution.

Audit can raise the subsection 84(2) assessment on any shareholder, once that corporation's charter is revoked, or the company is otherwise struck from the register. It is not anticipated that Audit will calculate the net worth of all defunct corporations. Rather, Audit would do net worth assessments on those corporations with property at the date of the striking off. Revenue Collections could play a role as well, by advising Audit when a suitable situation exists for such an assessment.

When Subsection 84(2) ITA Is Statute-Barred

Time is of essence, when raising a subsection 84(2) assessment. To avoid the assessment being statute-barred, in keeping with subsection 152(4) of the ITA (the statute-barred provision), it must be raised within three years of the striking-off, provided that the shareholder has filed tax returns as required. If the shareholder has not filed a tax return, the statute-barred provision would not apply.

The Transfer of Property Assessment

Once Audit raises the subsection 84(2) assessment, and if the corporation at the time of the striking-off, is indebted for income tax or GST/HST, the shareholder can be assessed under subsection 160(2) of the ITA, or subsection 325(2) of the ETA .

The reason for the Agency's ability to raise a transfer of property assessment is that subsection 84(2) of the ITA creates a deemed dividend in the hands of the shareholder. This deemed dividend concept is no different from, and is legally as valid as, the deemed trust concept.

Moreover, such an assessment should not be construed as double taxation, keeping in mind the comments in Algoa Trust v. The Queen, [1998] 4 C.T.C. 2001 (TCC). In this respect, had the company liquidated the assets and paid its tax debt, no tax would be owing.

Combined 84(2) and 160(2) Assessments Case Recounted by a Collection Officer

"The corporation was struck from the corporate registry on April 1, 1991. The collection diary indicated that the business continued to operate as a proprietorship until the end of 1992. The principal of the business had confirmed that it operated as a proprietorship.

The corporation was audited in April 1994, and the shareholder received a Notice of Assessment for the deemed dividend, under subsection 84(2) of the Income Tax Act. The shareholder filed a Notice of Objection in October 1994. Appeals confirmed the assessment in May 1995, with minor adjustments to the amount.

Digitized by Google

The subsection 160(2) assessment stems from the striking-off of the corporate entity prior to the cessation of business operations. Pursuant to subsection 84(2) of the Income Tax Act, the shareholders of a corporation are deemed to have received a dividend at the date of the striking-off of the corporation. The dividend is approximately equal to the net worth of the corporation on that date, and accrues to each shareholder in proportion to his shares held. The shareholders are consequently liable for personal income tax on the dividend that they receive.

Audit had calculated and assessed a deemed dividend under subsection 84(2) of the Income Tax Act. This would therefore be the amount distributed to the shareholders. As the shareholder gave no consideration for this deemed dividend, the Department of Justice is of the opinion that the receipt by the shareholders of such a dividend constitutes a transfer of property, and the Agency may assess the shareholder, pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act.

The dates in this case are also interesting, as the Assessment Committee approved the assessment in December 1998, on a deemed dividend that was assessed in 1994.

Audit has advised that the deemed dividend under subsection 84(2) can be assessed on any and all shareholders, once the company is struck. Audit does not require much documentation as to the actual disposition of the corporate assets. It is a simple matter that the ITA deems that the assets went to the shareholders in proportion to their shares held, and therefore that is where the assets were considered to have gone. Audit does not require entries to be recorded in the corporate Minute Book or cancelled cheques to show funds in the bank account being paid to a shareholder. It is a simple case of the ITA stating that this is what happened. Therefore, this is what happened, and the shareholders are assessed accordingly. Not all shareholders are actually assessed, but consideration will be given to corporations that have sufficient assets at dissolution, to make the expenditure of audit time worthwhile.

Particularly if there are large dollar amounts involved, we may be able to talk Audit into raising an assessment for us. Our chances of getting Audit to raise an assessment could possibly be improved if we already have some contact information, and evidence of the transfer, and if the people involved admit to carrying on as a partnership or proprietorship, or we have evidence of such (such as cancelled cheques with the corporate name on them, dated after the corporation was struck). However, the subsection 84(2) assessment must be raised within 3 years of when the corporation was struck, or when the return for that period was filed. If you are anywhere close to that critical date, it would be best to contact Audit for detailed information.

As we assessed the recipient of the dividends, and not the corporation, it is not necessary for the corporation to be revived before the assessment can be raised.

Assessments of this nature would likely be of most value on T2 accounts, where there is no recourse via Directors' Liability. However, this type of assessment could also be used on GST and payroll deductions accounts where the corporation was struck while still operating, but the two-year time limit for assessing a director was missed. Or, if the director has already been assessed under s.227.1 of the ITA or under s.323 of the ETA , but the director has insufficient assets to satisfy the debt, a section 160 or section 325 assessment on the deemed dividend could be used to recover, from the shareholder, the amount owing by the corporation.

We do not need evidence of a cheque written out to the shareholder, or entries in the corporate minute book declaring what is to become of the assets. We do not need to gather any further documentation of the date of transfer, to whom the assets were transferred, proof of the transfer, or the value of the transfer. This is all done for us.

Audit, of course, issues a Notice of Assessment when they assess the shareholders. The Notice of Assessment states the date of the transfer and the value of the transfer, information that we in Collections would need to have in order to raise a s. 160 or s. 325 assessment.

Digitized by Google

In my particular case, the opinion from Justice was that further documentary evidence of the transfer of assets, such as cancelled cheques, was not required. What was considered by Audit to be sufficient and appropriate documentary evidence for the subsection 84(2) assessment was considered by Justice to be sufficient and appropriate documentary evidence for Collections to raise a s.160 assessment.

Q: When does the clock start ticking for raising an assessment?

A: For raising a s.160 or s.325, we have no time limit; however, Audit has a time limit for raising the subsection 84(2).

When a corporation has been struck, any potential adjustments will be made to the respective shareholder's personal income tax return for the year the corporation was struck (e.g. corporation struck on June 1, 1995. Adjustments are to be made to the 1995 return of the shareholders). Audit has 3 years from the date of the initial T1 assessment.

Please bear in mind that these facts are specific to my particular case. We should be able to use deemed dividends on the striking of a corporation on a much broader range of accounts".

For further information refer to Directive ARD-03-05, Collection Action on Involuntarily Dissolved Corporations.

Attribution Rules Under the Income Tax Act

Related Topic:

- Amounts Which May be Subject to 160(1)*(d) ITA

The attribution rules are intended to prevent individuals from reducing their taxes by splitting their income with a spouse, certain minors, and persons with whom the transferor is not dealing at arm's length:

- Attribution may result when an individual loans or transfers property to certain family members.
- The taxpayer who transferred or loaned the property is deemed to be the recipient of any income generated from this property and is required to report this income on the return.

When reviewing a disposition, Audit will consider whether or not the attribution rules apply.

Related provisions of the ITA:

70(6), 70(9) & 70(9.2) 73(1) 73(3) & 73(4) 74.1(1) 74.2(1) 74.1(2) 75.1

Amounts Which May be Subject to 160(1)(d) ITA

Through the operation of attribution rules by Audit, the property transferred will remain in the name of the transferee but income or loss incurred from it will be taxed in the hands of the transferor. Consequently, this measure could prove problematic for Collections where the property transferred is the only asset available to satisfy the transferor's debt while the property is in the transferee's name.

Paragraph 160(1)(d) of the ITA establishes a joint and several liability in cases where Audit has applied the attribution rules. This provision enables Collections to assess the transferee for a part of the transferor's tax equal to the amount by which the tax for the year is greater than it would have been if it were not for the operation of the attribution rules and this, for each taxation year.

Digitized by Google

Of special interest is that paragraph 160(1)(d) does not refer to a principal debt in terms of amounts payable by the transferor in the year of the transfer or previous years as found under 160(1)(e). This is understandable in light that the attribution rules impacts the transferor's debt for the year of the transfer and/or subsequent years.

It is advisable to consult with Audit and validate that the underlying income is in fact attributable to the attribution rules before proceeding with a memorandum assessment. At the same time, Collections will confirm the amounts by which the tax debt of the transferor is greater for each year since only that portion represents the joint and several liability of the transferee under 160(1)(d) ITA.

Joint Liability Where Anti Avoidance Rule Ss. 69(11) Applies

Subsection 69(11) of the ITA is an anti-avoidance rule that is intended to prevent a vendor from disposing of property on a tax-deferred basis as part of a series of transactions where one of the main purposes is to obtain the benefit of tax deductions, or other entitlements available to a specified person, when a subsequent disposition of the property takes place within 3 years of the original disposition.

Subsection 160(1.1) of the ITA provides that where subsection 69(11) of the ITA applies to deem a disposition of property to have occurred at fair market value, both the person disposing of the property and the person acquiring the property are jointly and severally liable for the payment of each other's liabilities arising under the Act as a result of that disposition. Essentially, each person's liability for any taxation year affected by the disposition, is the excess of the amount payable under the ITA by that person for that year over the amount that would have been payable by that person for that year had subsection 69(11) not applied to the disposition. Subsection 160(1.1) of the Act applies to dispositions deemed by subsection 69(11) to have occurred after April 26, 1995.

Refer to Directives RCD-98-04, Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program and RCD-98-06, Lien and Charge Registration for further details.

Criteria to Identify Non-Arm's Length Transactions

The criteria to identify non-arm's length transactions include:

- there has to be a non-arm's length dealing
- a transfer of property must occur
- there must be an absence of consideration from the person who receives the property meaning, insufficient or no consideration
- the transferor must be liable for tax the year in which the property was transferred or any preceding year

A failure to carry out a transaction at fair market value is not conclusive, and a transaction between unrelated persons at fair market value does not necessarily indicate an arm's length situation.

Digitized by Google

Defining Property
Related Topics:

- Definitions
- Types of Properties

Definitions
Pursuant to subsection 248(1) ITA "property" means property of any kind whatever whether real or personal or corporeal or incorporeal and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, includes
(a) a right of any kind whatever, a share or a chose in action,
(b) unless a contrary intention is evident, money,
(c) a timber resource property, and
(d) the work in progress of a business that is a profession;

A similar definition of property is found under subsection 123(1) ETA and reads,

"property" means any property, whether real or personal, movable or immovable, tangible or intangible, corporeal or incorporeal, and includes a right or interest of any kind, a share and a chose in action, but does not include money;

The apparent exclusion of money as property in subsection 123(1) ETA is overcome by subsection 325(5) which specifically includes money as property for purposes of section 325 ETA

Types of Properties
Without being an exhaustive list, the following are properties that could be the object of a transfer:

1. Real Property/Real Estate
    - estate in fee simple
    - outright ownership of land
    - immovable property
    - land
    - business and or tenements
    - estates
    - interest in real property
    - mortgage payments
    - mobile homes
    - floating homes
    - leaseholds

Digitized by Google

- proprietary interest
- lessor rights or interest including:
  - leases
  - mortgages
  - agreements for sale
  - rights to purchase
  - options to purchase
  - mineral rights
  - rights of way
  - air space rights

2. Tangible Property Other Than Real Estate
   - personal use property
     - original works of art
     - jewellery
     - rare books
     - stamps
     - coins
     - household effects
     - furnishings
     - cars
     - boats
     - recreational vehicles
     - equipment
   - chattels used in business operations
     - equipment
     - computer hardware and software
     - telephone and communication systems

Digitized by Google

- copiers
- furnishings
- machinery
- inventory and work-in-progress
- livestock

3. Negotiable Financial Instruments and Interests

- cash
  - bank accounts
  - in safety deposit boxes
  - guaranteed investment certificates
  - term deposits
  - Canada Savings Bonds
- commercial paper
  - promissory notes and notes receivable
  - debentures
  - long-term bonds
  - chattel mortgages
  - bills of lading
  - warehouse receipts
- equity investments
  - stock and shares in distributing corporations
  - stock and shares in non distributing closely held corporations
  - dividends; when a corporation, while indebted for tax, pays a dividend to its shareholders, that payment constitutes a transfer of property

    For additional information regarding assessments for dividend payments refer to Directives RCD 00-23, A Dividend Payment Is a Transfer of Property and ARD 03-05, Collection Action on Involuntarily Dissolved Corporations.
- annuities
  - Income Averaging Annuity Contract
- pension investments

Digitized by Google

- RRSPs
- RRIFs

  For additional details on RRSPs and RRIFs, refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-025, entitled Subsection 160.(1) Non-arm's length Transfer of Property/ Subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2)Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF and Directive RCD 00-26, Assessment Under Section 160.2 of the Income Tax Act for Amounts Received out of a RRSP or RRIFs.

- pension funds

4. Intangible Property

   - licenses and permits granted by government authorities
     - timber licenses
     - tree farm licenses
     - liquor vending licenses
     - fishing licenses
     - motor carrier permits
     - hospital operation permits
     - taxi licences
   - exclusive use rights
     - copyrights
     - patents
     - royalties
     - franchises
     - goodwill
     - right to explore for petroleum

5. Contingent Interest and Future Rights

   - Interests and rights that have a potential or accruing monetary benefit
   - Inheritances, for example, pending probate
   - income from trust

Digitized by Google

Reconveyance of Property Constitute a Transfer of Property

In Riverin v. Canada, 99 DTC 5356, a favourable Federal Court of Appeal decision for the Agency, with leave to appeal refused by the Supreme Court of Canada, the Court had to examine a transfer of property through the effect of a default on a loan where both parties were related persons.

The details are as follows, the borrower is the taxpayer and—for the purpose of s.160—he is the transferor. The transfer consisted of real estate property he transferred to his father-in-law in lieu of re-payment of a loan.

In February of 1989, the transferor borrowed $70,000 from his father-in-law and used real property to secure the loan. The loan agreement stipulated that in order to take possession of the property if the borrower failed to make payment, a 60-day notice must be issued to him. In February of 1990 he failed to make payment; he was served the 60-day notice and he continued in default after the 60-day period. In May of 1990 he transferred the property to his father-in-law retroactive to February 1989 as satisfaction of the debt.

The father-in-law was assessed pursuant to section 160 of the ITA for he was related to the transferor and did not provide sufficient consideration for the property received. The transferee argued that there was no transfer arguing that he became owner of the property under the provisions of article 1040a of the Civil Code of Lower Canada. In his view, the fact that the transferor transferred the property voluntarily in order to avoid court costs rather than act upon a Court order, should not affect his legal rights as a creditor.

The Court dismissed the appeal and held in favour of the CRA. Even if the Income Tax Act does not define what constitutes a transfer for the purposes of subsection 160(1) it has been extensively commented on in case law. The Court concluded that the meaning of the word transfer is broad enough to apply to every transaction in which an asset passes from one to another, whether the transfer was by an act between the parties or by operation of law, whether voluntary or involuntary and whether or not legal proceedings were instituted. For the purposes of subsection 160(1) a transfer occurred in May, 1990.

Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist

Related Topics:

- Transfer as a Result of Marriage Breakdown
- Transfer is a Valid Loan
- Transfer as a Consequence of a Merger/Amalgamation
- Other Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist

Transfer as a Result of Marriage Breakdown

A special rule exists to exempt a transferee from liability when the transfer arises as a result of a marriage breakdown. As stated in Rose Fluxgold v. The Queen, 90 DTC 6187:

"Section 160 has been specifically inserted into the [Income Tax] Act to obviate tax avoidance schemes by means of transfer of property between enumerated categories [as in (a), (b), and c) above]. The legislators were prepared to recognize certain exceptions to this strict rule, and enacted subsection (4) to provide relief in circumstances of marriage breakdown."

Digitized by Google

You will find the exception to a transfer of property assessment in subsection 160(4) of the ITA and subsection 325(4) of the ETA . But for these exceptions to prevail, some specific conditions must be met.

For the exemption to apply:

1. There must have been a breakdown in the marriage;
2. The spouses must have been separated and living apart; and
3. The transfer must have been made pursuant to a. *a written separation agreement; or
   b. a judicial order.

*In the case Linda Carrière v. The Queen 2006 CCI 289, the court held that in order to constitute a separation agreement the document should make reference to certain specifics such as child custody, support or division of matrimonial property. In other words a separation agreement is not just any document.

Ss. 248(1) ITA defines a separation agreement as follows:

"separation agreement" "includes an agreement by which a person agrees to make payments on a periodic basis for the maintenance of a former spouse or common-law partner, children of the marriage or common-law partnership or both the former spouse or common-law partner and children of the marriage or common-law partnership, after the marriage or common-law partnership has been dissolved, whether the agreement was made before or after the marriage or common-law partnership was dissolved;"

The exception provision does not apply if one of the circumstances mentioned below is present. Accordingly, you would raise an assessment if:

1. The transfer occurs before the judicial order or the separation agreement; for if the transfer instrument is executed without the benefit of the order or the agreement, the transfer will have already taken place, and there would be no connection then between the transfer and the separation of the spouses;
2. The judicial order or separation agreement does not contain any express provision that calls for the transfer of that particular property;
3. The spouses were not living separate and apart when the transfer took place; and
4. The transfer occurred as a result of a pre-nuptial contract, a marriage contract, or a change in the matrimonial regime.

Despite the exception provisions, it should be noted that if the value of the property transferred exceeds what the written separation agreement stipulates, or what the judicial order prescribes, the difference between what was transferred, and what should have been transferred, could be available for a transfer of property assessment.

Refer to Directive RCD-98-02 entitled Exception to Transfer of Property Assessment.

Digitized by Google

Transfer Is a Valid Loan

On occasion a taxpayer who has transferred moneys to a related party may invoke that the transfer is a loan rather than a gift. An all-inclusive statement that identifies when a loan is considered "valid" is not available; however, the following are some guidelines:

- a written contract to reimburse signed by the parties and specifying the amounts to pay over a given period of time
- evidence supports that regular payments were made with respect to principal and interest

The fact that no interest is required to be paid does not in itself mean that a valid loan was not made.

Transfer as a Consequence of a Merger/Amalgamation

A merger/amalgamation occurs when two or more corporations are combined to form one new corporation. Both Federal and Provincial Corporations' Acts provide that the amalgamated corporation remains responsible for all liabilities of the predecessor corporations. On this basis there is no application of the Non Arm's Length provisions. Reference is made to the Canada Business Corporations Act section 186 and the business corporation's acts of the provinces such as the Ontario Business Corporations Act section 179.

Other Situations Where Non-Arm's Length Transaction May Not Exist

Other situations where non-arm's length transaction may not exist include:

- situations where the value of consideration equals the fair market value of the property transferred
- the recipient of RRSP or RRIF funds upon the death of the annuitant provided the recipient is the surviving spouse or financially dependant children or grandchildren

  For additional details, refer to Communication TSDMB-2006-025, entitled Subsection 160.(1) Non-arm's length Transfer of Property/Subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF and Directive RCD 00-26, Assessments Under Section 160.2 of the Income Tax Act for Amounts Received out of a RRSP or RRIF.

Opinion from Department of Justice Required

An opinion from the Department of Justice is required when there is a question as to:

- whether there was a transfer
- whether what was transferred was property
- whether there was adequate consideration
- whether there is any question concerning the validity of a separation agreement or judicial order
- whether the parties were related or otherwise dealing at non-arm's length

Digitized by Google

- in the case of dividend payments, where there is doubt whether the recipient (transferee), who was not related to the corporation, was at arm's length with the corporation with respect to the dividend payment
- where the transfer is stated to be, on the face of the documentation, "in trust"
- where the transfer is indirect for example: from the transferor to corporation A to the transferor's spouse or is effected by the dilution of shares in a corporation by the transferor
- where it is unclear if property was transferred Collection Officers should consult with their Technical Advisor, Resource Officer/Complex Case Officer or a Headquarters Field Support Program Officer prior to referring a matter to the Department of Justice where a factual situation resulting from the examination of the matter does not fall into these guidelines.

Opinion from Department of Justice Not Required

An opinion from the Department of Justice is not required when all of the following criteria are met:

- investigation did not uncover any evidence of adequate consideration
- the value of the item transferred is clearly measurable
- the transfer took place subsequent to November 12, 1981
- the transferor became indebted in respect of, or prior to, the year the property was transferred
- the transferor, if an individual, is related to the transferee by
  - blood
  - adoption
  - marriage or common-law partnership
- the transferor, if a company, is either:
  - 100% owned by the transferee if the transferee is an individual
  - 100% owned by the same person who owns the transferee company
- there was a clear direct transfer with no conditions attached and no trust arrangement
- control of a corporation resides in the person or group of persons whether they are individuals or corporations which individually or collectively hold 50% plus 1 of the voting stock of the corporation
- the transfer occurred directly from the transferor to the transferee without any other party, except for the transferor, having held title to the property prior to the property being transferred to the transferee

Digitized by Google

Collection Officers should consult with their Technical Advisor, Resource Office/Complex Case Officer or a Headquarters Field Support Program Officer prior to referring a matter to the Department of Justice where a factual situation resulting from the examination of the matter does not fall into these guidelines.

Notice of Objection or Appeal

Persons assessed under section 160 have the same right to object and appeal as those who are assessed for their own primary tax liability. An objection or appeal of a section 160 assessment may raise any issue relating to the correctness of the assessment (for example, whether property was transferred for less than fair market value consideration, and whether the tax debtor and the transferee of its property deal with each other at arm's length), and may also raise any issue relating to the correctness of the underlying assessment (that is, the assessment of the primary tax liability of the tax debtor): Gaucher v. R., 2000 D.T.C. 6678 (FCA).

For further information refer to the section Obligation to Retain Information and also Memorandum 01-09, entitled Third Party Assessments - Retention of Primary Assessment Information.

A protocol was agreed upon in 2002 that covers the roles and responsibilities of Appeals Officers and Revenue Collections Officers in the resolution of objections to assessments resulting from revenue collections activities (Income Tax and Goods and Services Tax/Harmonized Sales Tax). The Protocol is attached as Appendix A of Memorandum 02-06, entitled National protocol agreement for memorandum assessments.

Collection Action on Memorandum Assessment

The subsection 225.1(1) ITA restrictions will apply to all Memorandum Assessments. Although the Excise Tax Act permits immediate collection action on mailing of a Notice of Assessment, collection action on all Memorandum Assessments will be held in abeyance for 90 days.

Third party Memorandum Assessments are subject to the same legislative collection restrictions and rights to appeal as regular assessments.

Should Collection Officers identify a danger of loss on a memorandum issued under ss. 325(2) ETA they should inform Headquarters of the details surrounding the case and request approval to waive the 90-day period. In respect to a third party assessment issued pursuant to the ITA, a jeopardy action under subsection 225.2(2) ITA is required when facing a danger of loss situation.

The filing of a Notice of Objection and subsequent Appeal period on a primary tax debtor account does not preclude an officer from raising/issuing a memo assessment; however, the revenue type of the primary tax debtor account will determine how and when a memo assessment liability can be collected, for instance:

- When the primary tax debtor liability is either a PAYDAC or GST account and a memo assessment has been raised/issued, jeopardy must be invoked against the memo assessment before collection action can be initiated.

- When the primary tax debtor liability under appeal is either a T1 or T2 account and a memo assessment has been raised/issued, jeopardy provisions will generally be invoked against both the primary tax debtor and the memo assessment liability before collection actions can be initiated.

Digitized by Google

A Dividend Payment is a Transfer of Property

In McClurg [The Queen v. McClurg, 91 DTC 5001 S.C.C.] the Court held that "had the dividend not been declared and paid to the third party, it would have been retained by the corporation; the taxpayer would not have received the funds." In Algoa Trust, the transfer of property was a payment of dividend and the court added on to the McClurg reasoning in these words "The corporation is impoverished and its shareholders are enriched."

A transfer by means of Dividend payment will include a situation such as a shareholder taking compensation by way of an advance from the corporation, and converting such at year's end into a dividend to obtain a tax credit. When this is the case, and the corporation is indebted for income tax or GST, the Agency can raise an assessment pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act or section 325 of the Excise Tax Act against the shareholders. This application is in addition to the usual assessment against shareholders, who function only as investors.

The same rule applies to surpluses distributed as capital dividends free of tax to the corporation's shareholders.

There are many decisions confirming that a Dividend payment is a transfer of property such as Algoa Trust, 93 DTC 405, Delage, [2002] 1 C.T.C. 2756 (TCC); also Gazaille, [2003] 2 C.T.C. 2732 (TCC).

For further information refer to Directive RCD-00-23 entitled A Dividend Payment is a Transfer of Property.

When Transfer Is Effected by Way of Mortgage Payments

Where a transfer of property concerns the payment of a mortgage obligation in the form of either a lump sum payment and or an accumulation of periodic payments, the Agency will not differentiate between the principal and interest portions of such payments. It is the Agency's position that the fair market value of the property transferred is the total value of the monetary payments made by the transferor in favour of the borrower.

For further information refer to Directive RCD-02-05, Transfers of Property and Mortgage Payments.

The following general guidelines are provided to assist collection officers when contemplating raising a non-arm's length assessment relating to mortgage payments.

Ability to Pay:

Collection officers must ensure an ability to pay on the part of the transferee before raising the assessment. The ability to pay may also include the ability to borrow against any equity available in the real property owned by the transferee or to provide consensual mortgage security in connection with an acceptable repayment arrangement or a non-consensual lien.

Legal Obligation:

Collection officers may expect arguments that the transferor is obligated by law to provide for the shelter and care of his family members and accordingly such payments are not transfers of property made without consideration. The Courts have accepted such arguments in some cases and may continue to do so where such payments do not appear to be unusual in nature or amount given the specific financial circumstances of the family unit.

Rental Benefit:

Digitized by Google

A ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal (Ducharme, [2005] FCA 137, April 29, 2005), has suggested that mortgage payments may be viewed as tantamount to rent with a net rental benefit being established on the basis of what a comparable home would rent for. Where such a benefit exceeds the amount of the mortgage payments a transferee will have been considered to have provided more than he/she received. Alternatively where the net rental benefit is less than the amount of the mortgage payments the excess amount would be considered a transfer of property subject to assessment.

Successful memo assessment based on mortgage payment transfers often require a thorough review of the transferor's lifestyle such as in the matter of Williams v Canada, 2000 DTC, 2340 subsequently upheld by the Federal Court of Appeal. The final decision of whether to proceed with non-arm's length assessments based on mortgage payments rests with the delegated TSO authority in conjunction with the necessary Legal Services' opinion and input as required.

Transfer by Means of Deposits into a Related Person's Bank Account

It has been pretty much established that deposits made into a personal banking account of a related party are deemed to be transfers of property. The following cases stand for that proposition: Thalheimer v. M.N.R., 83 DTC 498; Sanger v. Canada, 94 DTC 1955; White v. Canada, 96 DTC 1552 (TCC); Simnott v. Canada, 97 DTC 596 (TCC); Moss v. Canada, 2000 DTC 1729; and Raphael v. Canada, 2002 DTC 6798.

In Caron v. R. 2002 D.T.C. 1936 the husband would deposit cheques made to his name in his spouse's personal bank account but would also later withdraw these funds through a power of attorney provided to him by his wife. The Court held that even in this case the transfers were made without consideration from the beneficiary regardless of whether the amounts deposited were subsequently used for the transferor's own purposes. The deposits were deemed non-arm's length transactions within the meaning of s. 160 ITA.

Judge Dussault in Caron v. R. "In my view, André Caron's deposits of cheques made out in his own name or of amounts belonging to him in the appellant's bank account constitute transfers of property within the meaning of section 160 of the Act since he legally divested himself of ownership of those amounts in favour of the appellant, the sole account holder. The power of attorney obtained from the appellant and dated May 7, 1992 (Exhibit A-2) did not transfer ownership of those amounts back to him, but simply gave him a mandate to administer them for and on behalf of the appellant as her agent. Such a power of attorney in no way implies that the appellant gave up her ownership of the amounts deposited in her account since, under the very terms of the power of attorney, all the powers set out therein must be exercised for her and on her behalf."

In Caron v. R. the appellant argued that the power of attorney was the consideration given for the transfers of funds. Other often-raised arguments to counter third party assessment related to transfer of funds would be the legal obligation or domestic services provided as consideration. On this basis Collection Officers should be prepared to document and support the Agency's contention that the payment of legal obligations or household expenses are not valid consideration for the original transfers. For example, the investigation may reveal that these specific transfers are made in addition to the transferor's overall contribution to household expenses. Additional evidence may suggest that the transferor was providing for the support of his spouse while the investigation may reveal that each spouse has adequate independent means to meet their individual needs.

Collecting Evidence of Transfer

To determine if a non-arm's length transaction occurred:

Digitized by Google

1. Identify that property was transferred by examining and/or comparing:
   - details of changes to declared income
   - Audit/Appeals working papers
   - permanent document files
   - financial statements
   - notes to the financial statements
   - loan/credit application files
   - insurance policies
2. Request the appropriate searches:
   - land titles
   - registry office
   - personal property security
   - motor vehicle searches – Ownership history
   - credit bureau reports (Equifax)
3. Confirm:
   - date property acquired by transferor
   - consideration for which property was acquired
   - date transfer occurred
   - name and address of transferee
   - amount of consideration paid by transferee
   - particulars and amounts of all lien holders
4. Obtain copies of transfer documents, including:
   - deeds
   - conveyances
   - invoices
   - separation agreements
   - contracts

Digitized by Google

- titles
- sales/purchase documents
- copies of share register
- copies of transfer agent's records
- trust agreements
- statements of adjustment
- bank statements
- financial arrangements
- cancelled cheques
- instruments of payments
- lawyer's trust account ledger

Determining the Transferee's Ability to Pay

Determine if the proposed assessment is collectible from the transferee or if it can be secured.

For further information refer to the section Ability to Pay in the "Payment Arrangement" chapter.

Pre-assessment Letter

Related Topic:

- Method of Service for Pre-Assessment Proposal Letters

Transfer of property pre-assessment letter ELCS 80754 is meant to advise a third party of action being considered as a result of a transfer of property. It also provides the opportunity to the third party to inform the Agency of any information that would cause us to reconsider our actions.

In many instances this letter of intention will be brought to the attention of the principal debtor. The Agency's intention to hold a related third person liable for the principal debtor's taxes will, on occasion, prompt the tax debtor to resume discussions with Collections to resolve their tax liability.

Should circumstances dictate a jeopardy action in relation to a contemplated memo assessment, a pre-assessment letter would not be issued.

For further information refer to the Directive RCD 00-09, Pre-assessment Letter for Transfer of Property Assessments.

Method of Service for Pre-Assessment Proposal Letters

The information relating to the following topics is contained in the "Memorandum Assessment" chapter and can be viewed by choosing the corresponding topic:

- Method of Service for Pre-Assessment Proposal Letters

Digitized by Google

- No Response to the Pre-Assessment Proposal Letter
- Response Received to the Pre-Assessment Proposal Letter
- Verifying Documents Relating to Memo Assessments (Including Document Analysis by the Forensic Sciences Division)
- Follow-Up to the Third Party's Response

Related Topics:

- Requesting an Opinion from the Department of Justice
- Preparing a Non-Arm's Length Assessment

Requesting an Opinion from the Department of Justice

To request an opinion from the Department of Justice:

1. Prepare a memorandum requesting an opinion as to the legality of a proposed assessment.
2. Provide particulars of the transferor's liability including:
   - taxation year
   - date(s) of assessment or reassessment
   - summary of tax
   - penalty
   - interest
   - particulars of the basis of any objection or appeal filed by the transferor
3. Particulars of the asset transferred including:
   - description
   - ownership: title deeds, mortgage documents, agreements of purchase and sale
4. Particulars of the transfer and how the asset was transferred.
5. Provide particulars of the transferee, including:
   - the name of the transferee
   - relationship of the transferee
6. If the transferor and the transferee are not related, provide particulars setting out why the transferor and the transferee are believed not to have dealt with each other at arm's length.

Digitized by Google

7. Where the transfer was made directly to a trust or indirectly to a beneficiary of a trust provide all pertinent information to the Department of Justice.

8. Attach the following documents:

   - evaluation or appraisal of the fair market value of the property
   - evaluation or appraisal of the fair market value of the consideration at the time of transfer
   - documentation supporting the relationship of the transferee to the transferor

9. Obtain the authorization from the delegated authority. Refer to the Policy Authorities Matrix, Memorandum 01-21 entitled Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act. While reference to the EA 2001 is not made in Memorandum 01-21, delegation authorities to request a legal opinion are the same.

Preparing a Non-Arm's Length Assessment

To prepare a non-arm's length assessment, a specific Collection file will contain all documentation and evidence relating to the proposed assessment, this Collection file will also:

1. Demonstrate the fair market value of the property and,where applicable, this will be done through either:

   - a Request for appraisal assistance form (Form T104R)
   - a Business equity valuation requisition form (Form T104V)

   Refer to an example on how to complete Form T104R taken from training material TD8605-000-T, Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments (Tool 8605-3 and 8605-3a)

2. Determine the liability of the transferee by establishing which is the lesser of:

   - the difference between the fair market value of the property at the time of transfer and the consideration given for the property at that time
   - the liability of the transferor

   Refer to Transferor's Tax Liability Captured by 160(1)(e)(ii) *ITA.

   Note: Indicate that where property was previously held in joint tenancy, only 50% of the equity in the property is considered to have been transferred, less the fair market value of the consideration given for the property.

3. Establish the transferee's ability to pay through summaries of his income situation and net worth as well as a plan of action to collect the proposed assessment.

4. Where necessary, include an opinion from the Department of Justice. Refer to the policy when an Opinion from the Department of Justice Required.

Digitized by Google

5. Include an approved recommendation to assess by the appropriate level of authority. This is a summary of the following facts in the form of a memorandum recommending the assessment:

   a. Brief collection history

   b. Third party's ability to pay

   c. Facts related to the transfer

   d. Legal opinion where required

   e. Other relevant facts for e.g.:

      i. Outstanding Notices of Objections or Appeals

      ii. Danger of loss review

      iii. Bankruptcy information

   It is important that the information in the recommendation to assess be clear and concise. The clearer the facts are, the easier it will be for the person approving the recommendation. A complete and well organized file will also assist other interveners such as Appeal Officers in their decision making process.

   The recommendation to assess will be part of the non-arm's length memorandum assessment's Collection file that will contain copies of all documentation obtained by CRA that provide evidence relating to the third party assessment. A copy of this Collection file will be requested by the Appeals' Division should the third party file a notice of objection. Under normal circumstances, the original documents will remain in Collections and a copy of the entire Non-Arm's Length Collection file will be sent to Appeals.

6. The Collection file will also contain:

   a. A separate docket for the retention of all of the information relating to the original assessment, which should include: the Notice of Assessment; audit information and/or reports; returns (or copies) for the affected years; and, any other information which may have affected an assessment for the period(s) in question.

   b. A copy of the Particulars of Assessment. Refer to an example taken from TD8605-000-T Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments (Tool 8605-6); however, the transferor's debt should be broken down by years. A reassessment or additional assessment will also require the completion of a Particulars of Assessment or Particulars of Reassessment.

      The contents of amended Particulars of Assessment/Reassessment should include:

      - an accounting sufficient to detail the basis for the reassessment or additional assessment, and
      - the revised balance

      Note: The details of any amended Particulars of Assessment or Reassessment must provide a link between what is being assessed/reassessed with what was originally assessed.

Digitized by Google

A Particulars of Assessment must always accompany a Non-Arm's Length Assessment and be identified as being part of the Notice of Assessment. See example in Tool 8605-6.

c. A copy of the memorandum Notice of Assessment/Reassessment that has been issued.

The Notice of Assessment form can be completed upon receipt of written concurrence from the applicable delegated authority or submitted along with recommendation to assess depending on local divisional policy.

For detailed information on how to fill forms T779 and GST 259 refer to the Directors' Liability chapter, Completion of the T779 Form and/or Completion of the GST259 Form section.

Third Party Assessment Approval

The Approval authority for a third party assessment is delegated to the following:

- Director, Tax Services Office
- Assistant Director, Revenue Collections
- Manager, Revenue Collections

For further details please refer to Memorandum 01-21 entitled, Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act. While reference to EA 2001 is not presently included in Memorandum 01-21, delegated authorities for third party assessment are the same.

Recording the Details in the Control Register

Since memorandum assessments are not recorded in any computer system, the only way to monitor manually issued assessments is to keep a register. Before sending out the Notice of Assessment, you will have to ensure that the control register for all memorandum assessments is properly completed. In most offices, one person keeps the control register.

The following details will be entered in the control register by the designated person who will also keep a copy of the Memorandum Assessment form:

- the serial number of the Notice of Assessment/Reassessment
- the name of the person being assessed
- the date of the assessment
- an explanation of the type of assessment being issued
- the appropriate approval for the release

The status should be monitored and noted accordingly for changes (i.e. Collectible, Appealed, Reassessed/Amended, Paid, Uncollectible, Cancelled).

Digitized by Google

Administrative Functions

The following actions should be undertaken immediately upon the issuance of a memo assessment:

- If the third party is an individual, set a Keep Code 6 against the T1 account of the third party assessed. This will ensure that any T1 refunds or other credits, to which the third party is entitled, are intercepted and retained. For further details regarding Keep Code 6, refer to the chapter Receiving and Managing Accounts. Where funds have been intercepted and the taxpayer later requests these sums be reimbursed because he has filed a notice of objection, Collection Officers should refer to the section Refund or Release of Security pursuant to Subsection 164(1.1) *ITA in the "Collection in Jeopardy" chapter. Set refund holds on the proprietorship payroll account. Set a disbursement inhibit on the proprietorship GST/HST account.

- If the third party is a corporation, set a disbursement inhibit on the GST/HST account and a refund hold on the CORTAX account.

  Note: Any disbursement inhibits that are set will require follow up every 120 days to re-input the inhibit until the memo assessment is resolved and the hold is no longer required.

- Reference to the issuance of a Memorandum Assessment should be captured in ACSES of the principal and third party's accounts. A Notepad entry (F21) is preferred to a Diary entry since Diary information is subject to deletion.

- Routine Collections letters available in the ELCS system can be issued during the 90-day collection restriction period. Officers must ensure that the taxpayer has received a legal warning within 120 days of any potential legal action. The following are the available ELCS letters (similar Collections letters are available for those accounts administered under the Customs Act and are maintained separately within the ELCS):

  1. "First Collection Letter", ELCS 19619.
  2. "Second Collection Letter", ELCS 19620.
  3. "Pre-Legal Letter", ELCS 19621.
  4. "Legal Action Letter", ELCS 19614

- Update the ACSES diary confirming the issuance of the Collection letters.

Collection Measures

Collection procedures for third party memorandum assessments are the same as for any other regular assessment.

If a Notice of Objection is not filed, or if the third party has not responded to any of the legal warning letters issued, proceed with legal action to resolve the account.

Any garnishments issued for a memo assessment must identify the original tax debtor account number in order for payments to be properly applied.

Certifying the memo assessment liability will require a request for Certificate and/or Writ of Seizure and Sale through the primary taxpayer's account. For more information, refer to the chapter entitled Certificates, Writs and Other Legal Proceedings.

Digitized by Google

Law, Sheriff and Bailiff Costs
Related Topic:

- How to Create a Subsidiary Ledger Account

Any law, Sheriff or Bailiff costs incurred in facilitating the collection of the transferee's debt cannot be charged to the memorandum assessment account. Any law costs applicable to the transferee alone cannot be included on the memorandum assessment because they are not considered to be joint and several liabilities shared with the transferor. Where applicable, charge law costs and Sheriff's costs to a separate ledger account in the name of the party being assessed.

How to Create a Subsidiary Ledger Account
To create the subsidiary ledger account:

1. Prepare a memorandum:
   a. Request the creation of a subsidiary ledger account, type 100, revenue type 0031, using the name and SIN of the individual assessed on the memorandum assessment where the law costs are being incurred.
   b. State that there is a valid transaction on a memorandum assessment account.
2. Send the memorandum to the Sub-Ledger Unit at the appropriate Tax Centre.
3. Indicate on the memorandum assessment account that a Subsidiary Ledger account has been created.

Allocating Payments
Related Topic:

- Accruing Interest

Because memorandum accounts are not controlled by the ACSES system, the docket specific to the Memorandum Assessment should contain a dummy card or posting sheet.

Where a transferor and transferee have become jointly and severally liable under s. 160 ITA and/or s. 325 ETA , the following rules apply:

- Payments made by the transferee are first applied to any Law, Sheriff or Bailiff costs and then applied to the portion of the debt that has the joint and several liability.
- Payments made by the transferor are first applied to any arrears that are not subject to the memorandum assessment. Once this is cleared any remaining amounts will be applied to the portion of the debt subject to the s. 160 and s. 325 liabilities.

Enter the amount of each payment received on the dummy card. This will enable you to keep track of the exact up to date amount owed by each party.

The maintenance of the dummy card or posting sheet is very important because there is no system equivalent to back it up. Refer to the example of a posting sheet found in the training manual TD8605-000-T (Tool 8605-11).

Digitized by Google

Accruing Interest

Another consequence of memorandum assessments not being on-line is that accrued interest charges must be calculated manually whenever a payment is received.

- Interest will be charged from the day after the date on which the memorandum assessment was issued to the date on which the payment was received. Collection Officers are reminded that the maximum amount collectable may never exceed the Fair Market Value Difference or benefit conferred. For further information refer to the section Interest on Assessments under section 160 ITA or 325 ETA .
- The payment will then be applied on the total amount owed.
- If either a reassessment is issued or another payment is received, the accruing interest will be calculated from the day after the last assessment was issued or the last payment was received to the date of the present reassessment or payment.

The amount of each payment received as well as accrued interest charges when applicable is recorded on the dummy card.

T779/GST259 Memorandum Assessment Verses

Related Topics :

- Joint and Several Liability Ss. 160(1) ITA, 325(1) ETA , 297 ETA 2001 or CA.97.29(1)
- Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(1.1) ITA
- Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(2.1) ITA
- The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF
- The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160(1.1) Where Ss. 69(11) Applies

Joint and Several Liability Ss.160 (1) ITA, 325(1) ETA , 297 ETA 2001 or CA, 97.29(1)

Related Topic:

- Indirect Transfers

The joint and several liability of the transferee as a result of certain non-arm's length transfers, under the ITA, subsection 160(1), under the Excise Tax Act, subsection 325(1), the Excise Act 2001, section 297, or Customs Act, subsection 97.29(1):

> The liability under (insert the section of the Act for e. g. subsection 325(1) of the Excise Tax Act) and (insert the corresponding liability under the Provincial Income Tax Act, Canada Pension, Unemployment Insurance Act and Employment Insurance Act, where applicable) in the amount of $_____, in respect of a transfer that took place on or about (date) from (name of transferor) to (name of transferee) of property (describe). Please see the attached Particulars of Assessment for additional information.

Indirect Transfers

Digitized by Google

The liability under (insert the section of the Act for e. g. subsection 325(1) of the Excise Tax Act) and (insert the corresponding liability under the Provincial Income Tax Act, Canada Pension, Unemployment Insurance Act and Employment Insurance Act, where applicable) in the amount of $_____, in respect of an indirect transfer that took place on or about (date) from (name of transferor) to (name of transferee) of property (describe). Please see the attached Particulars of Assessment for additional information.

Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(1.1) ITA

Holding the cohabiting spouse or common-law partner jointly and severally liable with the individual to pay any excess GST credit:

The liability under subsection 160.1(1) of the Income Tax Act in the amount of $_____, in respect of Goods and Services Tax Credit refunded in excess of entitlement for which you are jointly and severally liable with (name of credit overpayment recipient) pursuant to subsection 160.1(1.1) of the Income Tax Act. Please see the attached Particulars of Benefits refunded in excess for additional information.

Joint and Several Liability of Cohabiting Spouse 160.1(2.1) ITA

Holding the cohabiting spouse or common-law partner jointly and severally liable with the individual to pay any overpayment of a CCTB credit:

The liability under subsection 160.1(1) of the Income Tax Act in the amount of $_____, in respect of Canada Child Tax Benefits refunded in excess of entitlement for which you are jointly and severally liable with (name of credit overpayment recipient) pursuant to subsection 160.1(2.1) of the Income Tax Act. Please see the attached Particulars of Benefits refunded in excess for additional information.

The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160.2(1) and 160.2(2) Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF

The liability under subsection (select 160.2(1) or 160.2(2)) of the Income Tax Act and section (____) of the Income Tax Act - (name of province) in the amount of $_____, in respect of the amount of $_____ received on or about (date), out of a (select registered retirement income fund or a registered retirement savings plan), the annuitant being (name of annuitant) , deceased. This assessment is issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection 160.2(3) of the Income Tax Act. Please see the attached Particulars of Assessment for additional information.

The Joint and Several Liability under Ss. 160(1.1) Where Ss. 69(11) Applies

The liability under subsection 160(1.1) of the Income Tax Act and section _____ of the Income Tax Act (name of province) in the amount of $_____, in respect of a deemed disposition of property pursuant subsection 69(11) in respect of a transfer that took place in the taxation year (year) from (name of transferor) to (name to transferee) of property (describe). This assessment is issued pursuant to the provisions of subsection 160(2) of the Income Tax Act. Please see the attached Particulars of Assessment for additional information.

In addition, the information relating to the following topics is found in the "Memorandum Assessment" chapter and can be viewed by choosing the corresponding section:

- Notice of Reassessment Verse for a Memorandum Assessment

Digitized by Google

- Additional Assessment Verse
- Cancellation of a Memorandum Assessment Verse

Retention of Primary Assessment Information
Related Topics:

- Obligation to Retain Information
- How Collections Should Retain the Information

Obligation to Retain Information

Memorandum assessments, secondary, or derivative assessments, will often result in appeals or objections being filed.

The Courts have indicated that even though the primary debtor may not have appealed or objected to an original amount owing, the secondary debtor is entitled to object or appeal amounts owing on the primary debtor's assessment. Furthermore, in two decisions the courts required the Agency to produce the Notices of Assessment, and/or underlying information supporting those assessments.

In the Federal Court of Appeal decision, in Gaucher v. M.N.R., it was indicated that:
"a person who is not a party to litigation cannot be bound by a judgment between other parties...and hence could not in those proceedings raise defences to her former husband's [primary debtor] assessment. Since the secondary taxpayer was not a party to the proceedings...she is not bound by the assessment against the primary taxpayer."

The Court went on to say:
"that second person must have the full right of defence to challenge the assessment made...including an attack on the primary assessment."

In Drouin v. M.N.R., the Court concluded:
"the onus of providing prima facie evidence of the tax liability where an assessment has been made under subsection 160(1) of the Act generally falls on the Minister.."

More importantly, they concluded that as a result of not tendering a Notice of Assessment, or substantiating audit information:
"it has not been established with a reasonable degree of certainty that DPCI acknowledged that it owed the amounts determined by the Minister.."

The obvious result of these findings is that the onus has been placed on the Agency to retain information relating to the original, or primary assessment, in order to enable us to defend and advance our case, should it be appealed based on that assessment.

How Collections Should Retain the Information

Collection Officers should obtain, and retain, primary debt information until the file has been concluded, i.e. paid in full, resolved at all appeals stages, or deleted from active inventory. In order to achieve this, a separate docket must be established for the retention of all of the information relating to the original assessment and third party assessment and which should include, the Notice of Assessment, Audit information, returns for the affected years, Trust Examinations and any other information which may have affected an assessment for the period(s) in question.

Digitized by Google

For further information refer to Memorandum 01-09, entitled Third Party Assessments - Retention of Primary Assessment Information.

Resource Material

Non-Arm's Length Transfer Assessments, TD8605-000 (June 2005) issued by the Training and Learning Directorate.

IT-419R2, Meaning of Arm's Length

IT-64R4, Corporations: Association and Control

Memorandum 01-09, Third Party Assessments – Retention of Primary Assessment Information, issued July 6, 2001.

Memorandum 01-21, Delegation of the Minister's Powers under the Income Tax Act, Excise Tax Act and *Customs Act, issued December 18, 2001.

Memorandum 02-06, National protocol agreement for memorandum assessments, issued June 12, 2002.

Memorandum 03-04, Amalgamation Project Canada Child Tax Benefit (CCTB), issued March 24, 2003.

Directive RCD-96-13, Application of Interest in respect of Memorandum Assessments.

Directive RCD-98-02, Exception to Transfer of Property Assessment, issued February 20, 1998.

Directive RCD-98-4, Bill C-28 impacts on Accounts Receivable Program, issued July 3, 1998.

Directive RCD-98-6, Lien and Charge Registration, August 28, 1998.

Directive RCD-99-05, Interest on Assessments under section 160 of the Income Tax Act (ITA), issued May 27, 1999.

Directive RCD 00-09, Preassessment Letter for Transfer of Property Assessments, issued May 30, 2000.

Directive RCD-00-10, Calculating the Transfer of Property Liability for GST under par. 326(1)(d) of the *ETA, issued May 30, 2000.

Directive RCD 00-23, A Dividend Payment is a Transfer of Property, issued August 28, 2000.

Directive RCD-00-26, Assessments Under Section 160.2 of the Income Tax Act for Amounts received out of a RRSP or RRIF, issued September 20, 2000.

Directive RCD-00-28, Terms for Proposals under the *Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, issued October 20, 2000.

Directive RCD-00-29, Reassessing a Transferee under the *Income Tax Act, issued November 1, 2000.

Directive RCD-02-05, Transfers of Property and Mortgage Payments, issued August 27, 2002.

Digitized by Google

Directive RCD-03-02, Transfers of Property: Cascading Assessments, issued June 1, 2003.

Directive ARD 03-05, Collection Action on Involuntarily Dissolved Corporations, issued July 25, 2003.

Communication ARD-2004-010, Hold Credit Overrides on Canada Child Tax Benefit Accounts, issued March 4, 2004.

Communication ARD-2004-014, Reassessing Joint and Several Liabilities, issued April 8, 2004.

Communication ARD-2005-022, Collection Restrictions following Reassessments Under the Income Tax Act, Excise Act 2001 and Excise Tax Act – Non-GST, issued July 6, 2005.

Communication ARD-2005-024, Limitation Periods Applicable to the Collection of Tax Debts, issued August 10, 2005

Communication TSDMB-2006-025, Subsection 160.(1) Non-arm's length Transfer of Property/ Subsections 160.2(1) and 160.2(2)Deceased Annuitant under a RRSP or RRIF, March 16, 2006.

Glossary

Acting in Concert

Even when there are two distinct parties or minds to a transaction, these parties may act in a highly interdependent manner, and therefore it can be assumed that the parties are acting in concert and not at arm's length.

Arm's Length Transaction

A transaction negotiated by unrelated parties, each acting in their own self interest.

Common-Law Partner

Subsection 248(1) provides a detailed and current explanation of the term, for purposes of the Income Tax Act.

Common Mind

The Courts have held that where one person or group of persons is, in fact, the bargaining agent, or the mind by which the bargaining is directed, on behalf of all parties to a transaction, then the parties cannot be dealing at arm's length.

Control

Contemplates the right of control that rests in ownership of such a number of shares as to have a majority of the voting power in the corporation.

Conveyance

Digitized by Google

Document effecting the transfer of property.

Deed of Transfer

Written or printed instrument effecting the legal disposition and bearing the disposer's signature.

Fair Market Value

The price that would be agreed upon in an open and unrestricted market between fully-informed, knowledgeable and willing parties dealing at arm's length without constraint.

Intangible Property

Includes the value of partnerships, copyrights, royalties, patents, licenses, mortgages, notes and franchises etc.

Inter Vivos Trust

A trust other than a testamentary trust.

Non-Arm's Length Transaction

Occurs when related persons deal with each other.

Property

Property of any kind whether real or personal, tangible or intangible, a right of any kind, a share in an action, money, the work in progress of a business that is a profession or a timber resource property.

Real Estate

Includes land and improvements along with any interests, benefits and rights.

Real Estate Appraisal

Is requested for an appraisal of real property. The appraisal sets a price for the property.

Tangible Property

Includes chattels such as equipment, furniture, machinery, as well as works of art, jewellery, books, stamps and coins etc.

Testamentary Trust

Digitized by Google

Trust created within a will which does not take effect until the death of the settlor.

Transfer

The act that gives rise to the process by which property will ultimately end up in the patrimony of any other person either directly or indirectly.

Transferee

The recipient of the property transferred.

Transferor

The person who makes the transfer.

Valuation

Is requested for an evaluation of assets other than real property, for example, royalties, partnerships, copyright, goodwill, licenses, etc.

Digitized by Google