

As it laughed a defiance to him.
Her countenance flattered like a honey on the
Her tresses trailed free on the breeze; and
To his eyes, and to his eyes alone, she seemed Underneath the old gnarled apple tree.
My grandfather rose through the white orchard
And tethered his soul to a tree:
He had come to the garden from his silly young pate.
And with his hand he took his knee,
From his apple blossoms that over him hung
He breathed out of the dew with his hat,
Till he came to the spot where the rocking chair stood.
And my merry young grandmother sat.
The kingdom and cowdily blossomed 'round far
The bees from their sweetest did sip;
But my grandfather blushed—and my grandmother blushed.
As he tickled off their heads with his whip.
Then he turned to his wife and said, "counting old times I have never won lady fair!"
So he sighed and he stood, and before very long
There sat two in the old garden.

"Isn't it glorious weather?" he said to the man on his left on the streetcar platform. "I will look into this matter for you. I will be back in a moment." "Say, your liver is out of order," continued the other. "Take some blue mass at once." "That was rather over conversation," said a passing stranger who had overheard it, after the liver-ailing man had got off. "Oh, had to hedge," replied the other, who was a doctor, and he was not. "I recognized him as a lawyer. He was going to write an opinion and send me a bill. I'm a doctor, and so I gave him medical advice as an office call."
