

of the State Bank of Utah, Mr. Young will probably remain, so long as the faithful promptly pay him their shares and the judiciary and authorities remain content to be blinded by golden dust.

The British Trade in Opium—Many efforts have at different times been made to put an end to the trade in opium between British India and China. The first attempt was made on the 15th ult. by the motion brought forward in Parliament by Mr. Stewart, "That this House is of opinion that the Imperial policy regarding the opium traffic between India and China should be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government, with a view to the gradual withdrawal of the Government of India from the opium manufacture of India."

Mr. Stewart's motion was carried by a large majority, and the Government, with a view to the gradual withdrawal of the Government of India from the opium manufacture of India, has accordingly appointed a select committee to inquire into the opium trade in India and China, and to report thereon to the House of Commons.

As Opium Overgrown—Commenting upon the spread of the commercial depression to this country, the New York World states that the opium trade in India and China is a source of great wealth to the British Empire, and that the Government of India is a large consumer of opium.

CONFEDERATION—The St. Alban Daily Advertiser says that the opium trade in India and China is a source of great wealth to the British Empire, and that the Government of India is a large consumer of opium.

He went away. And then I laid the book aside and sat in the solitude of my room, and looked at them. Young ladies as they were they were much alike. My own child and my master's were both of the same age and sex, and both little round-faced, bald-headed, almond-eyed babies, with no more individuality distinguishing one from the other than waxen dolls of the same pattern.

You shall go to sleep when you get back to the castle by now, drive your horse to the stable, and request them to come to me at the castle upon important business that will not admit of delay. Then return to your room and sleep. The weary coachman obeyed, and gathering up his reins, drove off. The lady returned to the house, and sat down beside the bed of the now sleeping woman, to wait until the carriage came back.

"Strange, oh, most strange! but yesterday, Lady Eltheridge of Swinburne, the mistress of all this vast estate, as betrothed of Albert Hastings, and today—today—only Laura Eltheridge, the daughter of the village handmaid. Yet still the betrothed of Albert Hastings! The betrothed of Albert Hastings! That was the dearest title I ever had. I have lost it! Oh, that I were dead! I would be dead, and I would be buried with the wreck and ruin of my fortune. I have that precious title still! Will be faithful in my father's fortune? Yes! Yes! Oh, traitress that I should be to doubt him for a moment. Yes! he will be faithful. He never loved me for my fortune. He loves me for myself. Upon the rock of my husband's love I may repose, for I know he will never change with changed fortunes. He will love me as he loved me when I was a child, and through all this chaos of thoughts the image of my betrothed husband, Lord Swinburne, came before me, almost at the same moment the carriage drove up to the door, Rose, with the neighbor at whose house she had spent the night, came in. Making a sign to them that her patient was asleep, Laura Eltheridge rose to leave the house; but first she turned to gaze on Rose, the unconscious though rightful, Baroness Eltheridge. Since the preceding night a fearful change had passed over the face of the maiden; her cheeks were the color of wax, her eyes were dim and sunken, her lips blue and tremulous; her voice, in bidding sister wait, was a feeble, broken, and low and faltering, as to be almost inaudible.

"My lady, Mr. Hastings waits your ladyship's pleasure in the library," said a footman, opening the door. "Very well, Wilson; precede and announce," said his mistress rising, and leaving the dressing-room. "Will he be faithful?" she mused, as she passed along the halls communicating with the library. "Will he be faithful? I shall know now, I shall know now! My life-my soul on his fidelity! He will be faithful!" And with this inspiring word upon her glowing lips, and with this thought lighting up her countenance, she entered the library, and stood in the presence of him

POETRY. MOTHER'S WAY

Oh within our little cottage, As the shadows gently fall, While the sunlight gleams softly One sweet face upon the wall, Do we gather close together, And in hushed and tender tones, Aik each other full forgiveness For the wrong that each has done. Should you wonder why this custom At the evening hour we hold, Eye and voice would quickly answer, "It was once our mother's way!"

And I have lost my immortal soul! Laura, no longer Baroness Eltheridge—my daughter, speak to me, I am dying!

"Oh, mother! mother! mother! mother!" exclaimed she, who was no longer Lady Eltheridge, as she dropped upon her knees by the bedside and buried her face in the coverlet. No reproach was on her lips, nor in her heart, for she knew that she had done her duty through her brain in wild confusion, came all the fearful features of the crime; the secret trust betrayed—the motherless infant defrauded—not only of wealth, but of rank, of home, friends, education, in one word, of all her bright gifts, and of her mother's love. The wrong, brought up, in almost regal state and luxury, to believe herself mistress of a vast inheritance, to contract herself in marriage with a man of rank and fortune, and just upon the eve of her wedding day, to be hurled down from the summit of prosperity, happiness, and honor to the depth of adversity, sorrow, and degradation. And this crime committed, and that not by means of a mistake, but by means of a deliberate and dark deed of hatred and revenge; and now confessed, not in penitence and contrition, but in a horrible, remorseless, half-groined, half-huddled, and the accumulation of his vengeance.
