HOWICK-H'DON AYRSHIRE CLUB OPTIMISTIC

Officers All Re-elected With Mr. John Dickson as President.

Financial Report Favorable.

Howick-Huntingdon Ayrshire Club is Largest Club of its Breed in Canada.

At the annual meeting of the Howick-Huntingdon Ayrshire Club held in Ormstown yesterday, a representative gathering were present to hear the annual reports of the Club, which showed that this organization was in a healthy financial position, although during the past year nearly four hundred dollars was spent in publicity. The President, Mr. John Dickson, gave the following report—

"The year 1926 has been one of considerable enlargement in the boundaries of our Club. The Howick-Huntingdon Ayrshire Club with the result that we now have a number of members from that section. There is no doubt but what this has been to the advantage of all, as in the selecting of Club herds it gives us a much larger number of cattle to choose from, and especially in the advertising of the Club. We are now able to show a larger membership list and a greatly increased number of herds, all in a radius which can be covered in a very short time. We have also the addition of a few members from the Island of Montreal which represents some of the finest herds in the Province."

Ayrshire Club Advertising.

One of the chief activities of our Club during the past year has been the printing of a catalogue of breeders entitled "Where Good Ayrshires Are Bred." A 36 page booklet of which 59 different breeders contributed to our catalogue, for although he was not a member of your directorate he gave his time and advice unstintingly. To Mr. Stephen and his staff we owe our sincere thanks for their generosity in lending us cuts and generally giving us any advice or assistance which was within their power, and to our genial Secretary "Chick" Hyde, I think you will all agree that we owe him a hearty vote of thanks as his was no light task, to look after the many details in preparing this booklet for the press, as well as mailing them out to different addresses. Just what amount of benefit has been derived from this means of advertising is at the present time rather hard to state, but we have already had direct proof of a number of cases where buyers were enticed into the district, having seen and having seen this book. Already about 500 copies have been distributed.

District R. O. P. Work.

R. O. P. work in this district has shown a steady increase during the past year. The most notable record being that of Nellie Osborne of Elmbridge 16th, owned by Mr. W. C. Wythe, of Howick, produced 23,223 lbs. milk, 1,093 lbs. of fat which was the world's record for a few months until shattered by Betsy Wythe, with a production of 21,850 lbs. milk, 1,103 lbs. of fat, with an average test of a little over 5 per cent.

Nellie Osborne still stands head and shoulders over anything else in the Honor Roll division, having produced in the 305 days 21,241 lbs. milk and 909 lbs. fat. I am sure that we are all proud to have such a noted animal as this within the precincts of our club and hope that many others may likewise be developed.

Many Successful Dispersion Sales.

Auction sales held locally during the past year have produced very satisfactory results. Good size herds were maintained at the following dispersions: "Grand Spring, Mr. Lorne Drysdale, 'Edgewood,' Mr. D. Ness; 'Cherrybank,' Mr. P. D. McArthur; and the sale of the late Robert Holmes which was perhaps the most sensational, setting as it did, a previous record of price for grade Ayrshire cows."

Exhibition Activities.

In the past year we donated special prizes to all the local shows, particularly at Huntingdon in connection with the last annual meeting made the generous offer to the effect that whatever the Club saw fit to donate in special prizes he would duplicate it. This was done in the form of special prizes for township herds. We are sorry to say that owing to one thing and another only the prize was taken up. Exhibitors from this Club have been very fortunate at outside exhibitions.

At the National Dairy Show animals from this Club were successful in winning the State Herd prize for Quebec as well as both the male and female junior championships. At the Royal Winter Fair the senior and grand, reserve senior, junior and reserve grand all came to this district and to the one herd. Our club was also successful in again winning the first prize for club herds. The Burnside herd again toured the Western show circuit where they won nearly all of the major prizes.

At the Bull Sale held last April the Ayrshire section contributed 28 animals, a few of which, I am sorry to say, were not sold. This sale was not as satisfactory as some in the past, due partially to the fact that there were not as many offering which resulted in the inspection being slackened to a certain extent.

A very pleasing feature of a lot of the shipments of Ayrshires out of this district during the past year has been the number of new herds which these

Specialty to the Huntingdon, Gleaner

The House of Commons came back to the Hill at Ottawa on Tuesday of last week and started business as though there had not been an interruption of six weeks in the session. A short discussion opened the day's activities over a motion that on Wednesday for the balance of the session the House would meet at three in the afternoon. On Wednesday the Rules call for the sitting to start at two and end at six; on the other days the House meets at three, rises at six and reconvenes at eight. That day is also given over to motions introduced by private members, so that the session of the day is lost an hour this year as the session promises to be short. It was decided that they would try 3 p.m. for the first Wednesday and as the discussions on that day were all wound up within two hours—the first time in many years—it is likely the House will follow the custom of previous years and gather together at three on Wednesday afternoons this year.

The sitting on the first day was given over to passing the supplementary estimates of last year. These had been prepared a few days before the Liberals went out of power and were tabled by the Meighen government, but never proceeded with. As the supplementary estimates frequently have a tinge of politics to them, it was expected that the discussions last week might go to some length, but the members are not wanting a long session and they passed the whole before the day was done.

Among the honours of the fray was the passing of an item for $2,168 to compensate farmers whose animals had been confiscated under the Health of Animals legislation, but before the beasts reached the slaughter house they died. Tubercular animals are only compensated for when the slaughtering is done in certain abattoirs, but sometimes weak beasts are trampled to death in the cars, and this vote was for the purpose of compensating the owners. In the vote $34, for a Pallardou of St. Timothee and $20 for Jos. Platt of St. Agnes. The Minister of Agriculture was being cross-questioned as to the reasons for such payments and he gravely explained "that sometimes the animals on their way to die, died."

Peat Bogs. We have large peat bogs in our district so we have some property as to the success met with in turning peat into fuel. At Alfred, Ont., which is on the C.P.R. line between Ottawa and Montreal, the Government has been carrying on experiments for several years but the venture is still far from paying its way. A vote of $70,000 was the estimates for this work and the Minister of Interior Hon. Charles Stewart was called upon to explain it. "The explanation," said the Minister, "of this vote is that the federal government and the government of Ontario have spent in the neighborhood of $250,000 in developing machinery to manufacture peat fuel at Alfred. Two years ago the advisers of the government felt that the machinery had been perfected to the point where it would be well to let a commercial company operate the plant. This was undertaken by a company under the supervision of Mr. Moyser, representing the two governments. Unfortunately the company was not able to finance the project. Apparently investors felt that the process was not yet beyond the experimental stage, and that therefore the government should lend further aid. I may say that this peat fuel has been sold as far east as Three Rivers, as well as in this city and the surrounding country. I take it that this will be a very important industry not only to Ontario but also to the maritime provinces and to Quebec, and if this industry is to be established it is necessary that we take over the plant and operate it for one year."

"What was done in the past was to produce machinery to spread the peat and dry it by air. No attempt was made to invent any machinery that would compress the peat, the object being simply to develop the proper machinery to spread it on the surface and dry it. Machinery was also secured for picking up the peat, thus avoiding the excessive labour cost entailed in this process in the absence of such machinery. Up to the time when the experiment was turned over to the company, what had been done was largely a matter of developing and testing the necessary machinery to do the work in such a way as to make it commercially feasible to sell the fuel in competition with other fuels on the market. We have done that. If the company had succeeded in financing the scheme they would have been making peat today and would have been able to sell it at a profit in competition with other fuels in this province and in the province of Quebec. These provinces are both in the peat fuel area. In this city and in Montreal between 15,000 and 20,000 tons of this fuel have been burned in domestic furnaces and it has proved successful. While therefore one cannot say that it is entirely beyond the experimental stage, nevertheless the experiment has been carried far enough to demonstrate that peat fuel can be produced by the process upon which these expenditures have been made."

Sir George Perley: I know something personally about this matter cause forty years ago I spent a good deal of money trying to develop peat fuel commercially. There is no trouble about selling it; it is a very fine fuel. If we could discover a method by which it could be made satisfactorily from a commercial point of view it would be worth a great deal of money to this country because we have peat bogs in every part of Canada. And it would help to solve our fuel problem. There is, I repeat, no trouble about either selling it or burning it; indeed, I burned it in my own house forty years ago. The problem is to complete successfully such a process as will turn out the fuel commercially at prices which the people can afford to pay. I understood from the minister that when he handed the property over to the company they had a completed process. It seems now that it is not entirely successful.

Mr. Stewart: I am sorry my hon. friend got that impression. Certain drawings were made for the improvement of the machinery, so that this part of the machinery at least could not be said to have been tested. The major portion of the machinery was all tested and proved efficient and to that extent the process has gone past the experimental stage. Unfortunately, however, as in the case of many new enterprises, they could not finance the project and carry it on, so that they were unable to operate it. Sir George Perley: Does the minister suggest that he can sell the fuel at cost?

Mr. Stewart: We can sell it and make a profit; we have demonstrated that with machinery not entirely completed. We have to sell the fuel at about $7 or $8. You can manufacture it and put it in cars for less than $5, and it has already been proved that we can cut that $5 cost considerably. It will be remembered also that we had to haul the fuel a considerable distance to Alfred station. We propose now to lay a track to the fuel bed itself, thus effecting a saving.

In the evening the House got in to the Public Works estimates, and as the Minister of Public Works was at Sarnia representing the Government at the funeral of Senator Pardee, Messrs. Robb and Manning had the job of supplying the required information to the House. The chief critic was Doctor Edwards who lamented that he represented a constituency which had not had a public building since Confederation. He and Mr. Robb lamented together as Chateauguy, Huntingdon complains of the same thing. Doctor Edwards refused to be comforted saying that Chateauguy-Huntingdon at least had a minister's salary while he didn't have much chance of being made a cabinet minister for three or four years at least.

The Doctor was at his best when chiding the Government for spending $12,000 for a postoffice in a small town on Prince Edward Island. According to the records the place had a population of 500, so he said he "wanted to smoke the member out who could get $12,000 for a village that size while he couldn't get half that much for Sydney in his county." The member, Mr. MacLean, came back with an explanation that there was no building suitable for a post office near the centre of the town. But the Doctor was not satisfied; the problem of finding the centre of a village with 500 population of convenience so he argued, "in my constituency there is a larger village than that whose claim is stronger, and I appeal to the minister to cut that $12,000 in two, and allot half of it to Kensington to provide the kind of building they ought to have there, and give the other half to Frontenac. Both places would then have buildings in keeping with their importance."

Mr. Robb: What do you say to cutting them both out?

Mr. Edwards: No; I do not say that. I want my hon. friend who is interested in this vote to understand that I am not in any way knocking the item. I do not want him to labour under any such impression.

The Income Tax. On Wednesday the House was called to discuss the Income Tax Act. Mr. Church moved that the tax be abolished so far as the Dominion Government was concerned. He spoke at length and the Minister of Finance replied. Mr. Church argued that 80 per cent of the income tax was paid by the cities of Toronto and Montreal. Mr. Robb claimed that this argument was defective as seven counties comprised the Toronto district and the Montreal district extended from the Ontario boundary line to Three Rivers. Moreover, in each of these districts were the head offices of the banks, insurance companies, transportation companies, etc., and as these did a nine province business each gave its share of the total. They were the only two speakers, showing that the income tax reductions of last year have so modified the tax that it is no longer a standard bone of contention.

Mr. Church then moved that we should have a national system of registering voters. He did not explain in detail what he wanted, except that he thought regularly paid officers should prepare lists every year and thus have them ready at all time. A debate was promising, and, after Mr. Lapointe had made a general reply for the Government, a general free-for-all appeared to be in the offing but Mr. Guthrie was extremely critical of Mr. Church's motion, so that debate ended then and there.

Model Electioneering. The next day the Railway estimates were up and particular interest was taken in the proposed C.N.R. hotel in Vancouver. As will be remembered the political contests in Vancouver last fall were rather warm, in fact, they might have been styled decidedly warm, so when it was announced that the Government was going to spend several millions on an hotel in Vancouver it had a scent which was noticeable. The question was asked, and it came out in the discussion that the Government had never signed a formal contract but that the contractor had, Mr. Dunning, who loves a fight was expressing his opinion of the whole transaction, and raised the ire of General Clark, a Conservative Vancouver member, who is a lover of hair splitting. The members may have been very serious, and the Minister may have been ironic when the following took place:

Mr. Clark: This is a matter of privilege. The minister made the statement that I personally appealed to the electors of Vancouver on every occasion in the manner he has described. I want to say in answer to that statement that it is absolutely incorrect and without foundation. So far as I at any rate am concerned, not on one platform did I mention the hotel in Vancouver, nor did any speaker refer to it on any platform on which I stood. To the best of my recollection no mention was ever made of that hotel. I ask the minister, as regards myself at least, to withdraw his statement.

Mr. Dunning: I rise to the same question of privilege. The minister in his vigorous style sometimes uses extravagant and incorrect language. So far as his words refer to myself, the statement he has made is incorrect, because on no occasion did I ever refer—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dunning: I am making this statement as a member and a gentleman and I want to be heard. I say, on no occasion did I ever refer to the Canadian National Railway in connection with this hotel in any of my speeches to the people. The minister should be careful in his statements.

Mr. Spence: How did the people of Vancouver find out that they were going to get the hotel?

Mr. Dunning: Through the usual channel, the press.

Mr. Dunning: If it will please my hon. friends opposite, I am quite prepared to believe their statement that they made absolutely no political capital out of the fact that during the election campaign the government had ever referred to the expenditure of $5,000,000 on a hotel in Vancouver. I am prepared to accept that statement.

Mr. Clark: Be a man and withdraw the statement. Be a gentleman.

Mr. Dunning: I am quite content to let the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Clark: State the facts.

Mr. Dunning: I am quite convinced that my hon. friend never mentioned the Vancouver hotel during his election campaign. That is what he says and I accept his word.

Mr. Clark: I said more than that.

Mr. Dunning: More than that?

Mr. Clark: Yes.

Mr. Dunning: Nobody on my hon. friend's behalf mentioned the Vancouver hotel?

Mr. Clark: There was no such appeal made on my behalf.

Mr. Dunning: I accept that statement; neither my hon. friend nor anybody in his behalf in his election campaign—

Mr. Lapointe: Nor any newspaper.

Mr. Dunning: Nor any newspaper, nor anyone with whom my hon. friend had to do for the purpose of getting elected mentioned the Vancouver hotel."

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA TRADE TREATY.

On January 1st, a commercial trade treaty went into effect between Canada and Czechoslovakia as the result of favorable negotiations between the two countries which concluded the first commercial agreement to be arranged since Canada obtained new treaty-making powers at the recent Imperial Conference. Through this, according to the announcement of the Canadian Department of Finance, Canada obtains the lowest rates of duty given any country by Czechoslovakia on a list of some seventy-one commodities, which comprise all the important Canadian exports to that country. In return Canada grants Czechoslovakian goods the benefits of the Canadian intermediate tariff.

The agreement is of a temporary character, continuing for a period of fifteen months or until three months' notice of renunciation has been given by either party. It is stated that before the expiration of the agreement negotiations will be begun for a more general definite convention for the regulation of commercial relations between the two countries.

Canadian goods, which are given most favored nation treatment on importation into Czechoslovakia, are flour, wheat, hosiery, wrapping paper, barley, oats, rice, buckwheat, malt, peas, fresh and dried apples, all kinds of fish, including canned, lard, butter, cheese, canned fruits and vegetables, condensed milk, agricultural machinery, rubber, footwear and tires, lead, zinc, engines and motors, adding machines, automobiles, and various other items.

The agreement preserves for Canada a trade in flour estimated as approaching a million and a half barrels of flour a year worth in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 for though trade figures do not indicate anything like this volume of value, a large portion of Canadian flour consumed by Czechoslovakia reaches there indirectly through consignments to other European countries. Had the agreement not been concluded, a Czechoslovakian duty of $3.60 per 220 pounds would have gone into effect on January 1st, as against a duty of $2.10 on flour from countries having most favored nation treatment, and the incidence of Canadian millers, who have built up a large flour trade with Czechoslovakia since the war, expedited the negotiations which led to the treaty. The agreement will also be of great value to the Canadian agricultural implement, automobile, fish and rubber goods industries.

Canadian imports from Czechoslovakia consist of a large number of items, mostly manufactured goods, no one of which in itself runs into a large amount, and that country would not appear to be benefiting as greatly from the treaty as Canada since the intermediate tariff now granted to these goods is, in many cases, the same as the general tariff which heretofore applied and, in many other items, is only about 2½ per cent. less. The duty on china tableware, for instance, which is about 10 per cent. on Czechoslovakian imports into Canada, is exactly the same under both tariffs. Worsteds, similarly, another large item of import, pays the same under intermediate and general tariffs, and the duty on serges is but 2½ per cent. lower. Many articles of glassware imported

"THE HERMIT OF FAR FND"

by
MARGARET PEDLAR.

CHAPTER XXXIII

"He didn't do it!"

Suddenly Sara found herself saying the words aloud in the darkness and solitude of the night.

Since her meeting with Garth, on her way to the hospital, ever had been an hour of conflict. That brief, strained interview had shaken her to the depths of her being, and, unable to sleep when night came, she had lain, staring wide-eyed into the dark struggling against its influence.

Little enough had been said. It had been the silences, the dumb, passion-filled silences, vibrant with all that must not be spoken, which had tried her endurance to the utmost, and she had fled, at last, incontinently because she had felt her resolution weakening each moment she and Garth remained together—because, with him beside her, the love against which she had been fighting for twelve long months had awakened into fierce life again, beating down her puny efforts to withstand it.

The mere sound of his voice, the lightest touch of his hand, had power to thrill her from head to foot, to rock those barriers which his own act had forced her to build up between them.

The recollection of that one perfect moment, when the serene austerity of his face had given the lie to that of which he was accused, lingered with her, a faint elusive thread of hope which would not leave her, urging, combating, the hard facts to which he himself had given ruthless confirmation.

Almost without her cognisance, Sara's characteristic, vehement belief in whomsoever she loved—stunned at the first moment of Elisabeth's revelation—had been gradually creeping back to her, haltingly, weakened at times by the mass of evidence arrayed against it, yet still alive—growing and strengthening secretly within her as an unborn babe grows and strengthens.

And since that moment on the moor, when her eyes had searched Garth's face—his face with the mask off—the dormant belief within her had sprung into conscious knowledge.

Throughout the long hours of the night she had fought against it, deeming it but the passionate outcome of her love for the man himself. She wanted to believe him innocent; it was only her love for him which had raised this phantom doubt of the charges brought against him; the wish had been father to the thought. So she told herself, struggling conscientiously against that to which she longed to yield.

And then, making a mockery of the hateful truth of which he had been accused, her individual knowledge of Garth himself rose up and confronted her accusingly.

Nothing that she had ever known of him had pointed to any lack of courage. It had been on no sudden, splendid impulse of a moment that he had plunged into the sea and fought that treacherous, racing tide off Devil's Hood Island. Quite composedly, deliberately, he had calculated the risks—and taken them!

Once more she recalled the vision of his face as she had seen it yesterday, in that instant before he had perceived her nearness to him—strong and steadfast, imprint with a disciplined nobility—and the reputation of his dishonour leapt spontaneous from her lips.

"He didn't do it!"

She had spoken involuntarily, the thought rushing into words before she was aware, and the sound of her own voice in the darkness startled her. It seemed almost like a voice from some other sphere, authoritatively assuring her of all she had asched to believe.

She lay back on her pillows, smiling a little at the illusion. But the sense of peace, of blessed assuredness, remained with her. She had struggled through the darkness of those bitter months of unbelief, and now she had come out into the light on the other side. She felt dreamily contented and at rest, and presently she fell asleep, trustfully, as a little child may sleep, the smile still on her lips.

With morning came reaction—blank, sordid reaction, depressing her unutterably.

And the score of trifling details incidental to the day's arrangements, with the usual unimportant conversation prevalent at the breakfast-table going on around her, the mood of the previous night, informed as it had been, with that triumphant sense of exaltation, slipped from her like a garment.

Supposing she were to tell them—to tell Selwyn and Molly—that, without any further evidence, she was convinced of Garth's innocence? Why, they would think she had gone mad! Regretfully, with infinite pain it might be, but still none the less conclusively, they had accepted the fact of his guilt. And indeed, what else could be expected of them, seeing that he had himself acknowledged it?

And yet—that inner feeling of belief which had stirred into new life refused to be repressed.

Mechanically she went about the small daily duties which made up life at Sunnyside—interviewed Jane Crabb, read the newspapers to Mrs. Selwyn, accomplished the necessary shopping in the town, each and all with a mind that was only superficially concerned with the matter in hand, while, behind this screen of commonplace routine, she felt as though her soul were struggling impotently to release itself from the bonds which had bound it in a month.

In the afternoon, she paid a visit to the Convalescent Hospital. She made a practice of going there at least once a day and giving what assistance she could. Frequently she relieved Miles of part of his secretarial work, or checked with him the invoices of good received. There were always plenty of odd jobs to be done, and after her strenuous work in France, she found it utterly impossible to settle down to the life of masterly inactivity which Selwyn had prescribed for her.

Audrey greeted her with a little flurry of excitement.

"Do you know that there was a Zepp over Oldhampton last night?" she asked, as they went upstairs together.

"Yes, they dropped one bomb, that's all. It fell in a field, luckily. But goodness knows how they got over without any one's spotting them! Everybody's asking where our searchlights were. As for our anti-aircraft guns, they've never had the opportunity yet to do anything more than try our nerves by practising! And last night a golden opportunity came and went unobserved."

"The milkman was babbling to Jane about Zeppelins this morning, but I thought it was probably only the result of overnight notations at the oil's Sallormann."

"No, it was the real thing—made in Germany," smiled Audrey. "I begin to feel as if we were quite the hub of the universe, now that the Zepps have acknowledged our existence."

They paused outside the door of the room allotted to her husband's activities.

"Miles will be glad to see you to-day," she pursued. "He's bemoaning a new manifestation of warfare among the feminine population of Monksnave. Go in to him. Will you? I must run on—I've got a million things to see to. You're not looking very fit to-day—suddenly observing the other's white face and shadowed eyes. Are you feeling up to work?"

Sara nodded indifferently. "Quite," she said. "I shouldn't have come otherwise."

Miles welcomed her joyfully. "Bless you, my dear!" he exclaimed. "You're the very woman I wanted to see. I'm snowed under with fool letters from females anxious to entertain 'our poor, brave, wounded officers.' Head 'em off, will you?" He thrust a bundle of letters into her hands. Then, as she moved towards the window, and the cold, searching light of the wintry sunshine fell full on her face, his voice altered. "What is it? What has happened, Sara?" he asked quickly.

She looked at him dumbly. Her lips moved, but no sound came. The sudden question accompanied by the swift, penetrating glance of Miles's brown eyes had taken her off her guard.

He limped across to her. "Not a stroke of work for you to-day," he said decisively, taking the bundle of letters out of her hands. "Now tell me what is wrong?"

She looked away from him, a slow, shaded red creeping into her face. At last—

"I've seen Garth," she said very low.

Herick nodded. He knew what that meeting had meant to one of the two friends of his. Now he was to see the reverse of the medal. He waited, his silence sympathetic and far more helpful than any eager, probing question, however well-intentioned.

"Miles," she burst out suddenly. "I'm—wretched!"

"How's that?" He did not make the mistake of attributing her outburst to a transient mood of depression. Something deeper lay behind it.

"Since I saw Garth yesterday I have been asking myself whether—whether I've been doing him a ghastly injustice"—she moistened her dry lips—"whether he was really guilty of—running away."

"Ah!" Miles stuffed his hands in his pockets and limped the length of the room and back. In that moment, he realised something of the maddening, galling restraint of the bondage under which Garth Trent had lived for years—the bondage of silence, and, within his pockets, his hands were clenched when he halted again at Sara's side.

"Why?" he shot at her.

She hesitated. Then she caught her breath a little hysterically. "Why—because—I just can't believe it! I've seen a lot since I went away. I've seen brave men—and I've seen men—who were afraid!" She turned her head aside. "They—the ones who were afraid didn't look as Garth looks."

Herick made no comment. He put a question.

"What are you going to do?"

"I don't know. I expect you think I'm a fool! I've nothing to go on—the contrary, I've Garth's own admission that he was cashiered. And yet—Oh! Miles, if he were only doing anything now it would be easier to believe in him! But—he holds absolutely Toof. It's as though he were afraid—still."

"Have you ever thought—" Herick spoke slowly, without looking at her—"that this year of war must have meant to a man who has been a soldier—and is one no longer?" His eyes came back to her face meditatively.

"How—what do you mean?" she whispered.

"You've only got to look at the man to know what I mean, I think—since the war broke out—that Trent has been through the bitterness of death."

"But he could have enlisted—got in somehow under another name! He wanted to fight. Or he might have gone out and driven an ambulance car as Lester Kent did."

Sara was putting to Herick the very arguments which had arisen in her own mind to confound the intuitive belief of which she had been conscious since that moment of inward revelation on Crabtree Moor—putting them forward in all their repulsive ugliness of fact, in the desperate hope that Herick might find some way to refute them.

"Some men might have done, perhaps," answered Miles quietly. "But not a man of Trent's temperament. And last night in a storm, when the worst of it is past, they spring erect again. Some cannot; they break."

The words recalled to Sara's mind with sudden vividness the last letter Patrick Lovell had ever written her—the one which he had left in the Chippendale bureau for her to open after his death. He had applied almost those identical words to the Malincourt temperament, of which he had recognised the share she had inherited. And she realised that her guardian and Miles Herick had been equally discerning. Though differing in its effect upon each of them, the consequent upon individual idiosyncrasy, the fact remained that she and Garth were both "breaking" beneath the strain which destiny had imposed on them.

With the memory of Patrick's letter came an inexpressible longing for the man himself—for the kindly, helping hand which he had laid stretched out to her in this crisis of her life. She felt sure that, had he been beside her now, his shrewd counsel would have cleared away the mists of doubt and indecision which had closed about her.

But since he was no longer there to be appealed to, she had turned instinctively to Herick, and, somehow, he had failed her. He had not given her a definite expression of his own belief. She had been humbly craving to hear that he, too, believed in Garth, notwithstanding the evidence against him—that he had some explanation to offer of that ghastly tragedy of the court-martial episode. And instead, he had only hazarded some tolerant suggestions—sympathetic to Garth, it is true, but not carrying with them the vital, unqualified assurance she had longed to hear.

In spite of this, she knew that Herick's friendship with Garth had remained unbroken by the knowledge of the Indian Frontier story. The personal relations of the two men were unchanged, and she felt as though Miles were withholding something from her, observing a reticence for which she could find no explanation. He had been very kind and understanding. It would not have been Miles had he been otherwise—but he had not helped her much. In some curious way she felt as though he had thrown the whole onus of coming to a decision, unaided by advice, upon her shoulders.

She returned to Sunnyside oppressed with a homesick longing for Patrick, the two years which had elapsed since his death had blunted the edge of her sorrow—as time inevitably must—but she still missed the shrewd, kindly, worldly-wise old man unspeakably.

and just now, thrown back upon herself in some indefinable way by Miles's attitude, her whole heart cried out for that other who was gone.

She wondered if he knew how much she needed him. She almost believed that he must know—wherever he might be now, she felt that Patrick would never have forgotten the child of the woman whom, in this world, he had loved so long and faithfully.

With an instinctive craving for some tangible memory of him, she unlocked the leather case which held her mother's miniature, together with the last letter which Patrick had ever written; and, unfolding the letter, began to read it once again.

Somehow, there seemed comfort in the very wording of it in every little characteristic phrase that had been Patrick's, in the familiar appellation, "Little old pal," which he had kept for her alone.

All at once her fingers gripped the letter more tightly, her attention riveted by a certain passage towards the end.

And when love comes to you, never forget that it is the biggest thing in the world, the one altogether good and perfect gift. Don't let any twopenny-halfpenny considerations of worldly advantage influence you, nor the little-tattle of other folks, and even if it seems that something unsurmountable lies between you and the fulfilment of love, go over it, or round it or through it! If it's real love, your faith must be big enough to remove mountains in the way—or to go over them."

Had Patrick foreseen the exact circumstances in which his "little old pal" would one day find herself, he could not have written anything more strangely applicable.

Sara sat still, every nerve of her taut and strong. She felt as though she had laid bare the whole of her trouble, revealed her inmost soul in all its anguished perplexity, to those shrewd blue eyes which had been wont to see so clearly through externals, piercing infallibly to the very heart of things.

Patrick had always possessed that supreme gift of being able to separate the grain from the chaff—to distinguish unerringly between essentials and non-essentials, and now, in the quiet, wise counsel of an old letter, Sara found an answer to all the questions that had made so bitter a thing of life.

It was almost as if someone had torn down a curtain from before her eyes, rent asunder a veil which had been distorting and obscuring the values of things.

Mountains! There were mountains indeed betwixt her and Garth—and there was no way round them or through them! But now—now she would go over them—go straight ahead, unregarding of the mountains between, to where Garth and love awaited her.

No man is all angel—or all devil. Supposing Garth had been guilty of cowardice, had had his one moment of weakness? She no longer cared! He was hers, her lover alike in his weakness and in his strength. She had known men in France shrink in terror at the evil droning of a shell, and then, disselflessly that others might live.

"Your faith must be big enough to remove the mountains in the way—or to go over them," Patrick had written.

And Sara, hiding her face in her hands, thanked God that now, at last, her faith was big enough, and that love—the one altogether good and perfect gift—was still hers if she would only go over the mountains.

CHAPTER XXXIV

The Triumph of Love

"Garth Trent, Coward."

The words, in stinging white capital letters, had been chalked up by some one on the big wooden double doors that shut the world out from Far End.

Sara stood quite still, gazing at them fixedly, and a tense, white-hot heat of anger flared up within her. Who had dared to put such an insult upon the man she loved?

"Coward!" No one had ever actually applied that term to Garth in her hearing. They had skirted delicately round it, or wrapped up its meaning in some less harsh-sounding tangle of phrases, and although he had bitterly used the word herself, now that the opprobrious expression publicly confronted her, writ large by some unfriendly hand, she was swept by a shiver of indignation. Denial, it seemed in her the immediate instinct to defend, to range herself unmistakably on Garth's side against a world of traducers.

With a faint smile of self-mockery, she realised that had this flagrant insult been levelled at him in the beginning, had her first knowledge of the black shadow which hung over him been thus brutally, reluctantly broken to her by Elisabeth, she would probably, with the instinctive partisanship of woman for her mate, have utterly refused to credit it—against all reason and all proof.

She wondered who could have done this thing, nailed this insult to Garth's very door. The illiterate characters stamped it as the work of some one in the lower walks of life, and with a frown of annoyance, Sara promptly—and quite correctly ascribed it to Black Brady.

"I never forgot to pay back," he had told her once, belligerently. Probably this was his notion of getting even with the man who had prosecuted him for poaching. But had Brady realised that, in retaliating upon Trent, he would be giving pain to his beloved Sara, whom he had grown to regard with a humble, dog-like devotion, he would certainly have refrained from recording his vengeance upon amazement. "Why not?"—grimly. "It's true, isn't it?" And in that moment the long struggle in Sara's heart ended, and she answered out of the fullness Continued on Page 5

Date Bread

Beat one egg well and add three-cup cup brown sugar and one and three-quarters cups of sour milk in which has been dissolved half teaspoon soda. Add two cups bran, one cup each of whole wheat flour and graham flour, and one teaspoon each of salt and baking powder mixed with the flour, six ounces of dates cut in bits, and quarter cup coarsely chopped nuts. Beat well. Let stand for half an hour and bake for one hour (in a moderate oven) in one large loaf or two small loaves. Sweet milk and three teaspoons of baking powder may be substituted for the sour milk and soda.

HOWICK

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Stewart entertained at their home "Lyndhurst Farm" Monday evening, between forty and fifty invited guests at a Progressive Euchre Party, given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Earle Goudy and Mr. and Mrs. Ohlsson of Otonari, Alta., prior to the departure of Mr. and Mrs. E. Goudy who left Tuesday morning for Montreal and Detroit en route to their home out west. Pretty Valentine colors and beautiful plants banked around the rooms formed the decorations. Euchre was played at nine tables and when finished prizes were presented to the winners. Mrs. A. E. Ward and the hostess, Mrs. J. D. Stewart, dainty refreshments were then served before the second part of the evening's entertainment commenced, which was music and dancing. All related a very enjoyable evening spent together.

Mr. A. E. Ward was in Montreal over the week end in order to attend the District Bankers' Meeting. Messrs. Clifford Watson and Stanley Gebbie are enjoying vacations at their respective homes.

Miss Cockburn of Westmount spent the week end at Georgetown Manse, the guest of Miss Margaret White.

A Valentine Tea under the auspices of the Y.W.A. of Georgetown W.M.S. was held at the home of Miss Alice Gordon on Saturday afternoon from four to eight o'clock. Six tables were very prettily and suitably decorated for the occasion. Waitresses were on hand to serve the dainty prepared tea to many who availed themselves of the opportunity of being waited on instead of preparing tea at home. Net proceeds amounted to $21.00, which will be used for Mission work.

At a meeting of the Georgetown Ladies' Aid held at the church on Tuesday afternoon, plans were made to have a Shamrock Tea. More definite arrangements will be decided later.

On Friday, Feb. 10th a meeting was held in the Model School to organize a local branch of The Parents and Teachers' Association and to discuss several matters regarding the welfare of the school. Mr. Heron was appointed President and Miss Hayes Secretary of the branch formed. The Principal read a paper on "The Mutual Relations of Home and School" and pointed out many ways by which the home could help the school. He asked for the support of the parents, so that the year 1927 may be a banner one for Howick Model School. Following the reading of the paper, some interesting discussion took place, after which the ladies of the Women's Institute served lunch, and the remainder of the evening was spent in social intercourse.

On Monday, February 14th, the pupils of the Model Room were treated to a sleigh drive by their Principal. The sleighs started from the school at 7.30 p.m. and drove to the Presbyterian Church Hall at Riverfield, kindly loaned for the occasion where the order of the evening was games. A pleasant feature of the evening was the Valentines for their different friends. The reading of these produced much laughter. At 11.30 p.m. lunch was served after which the return journey was made to Howick, all feeling they had spent a very enjoyable evening.

A judge had taken rooms in a town during his holiday. One day the landlady said to him at lunch, "I'm anxious for you to try this cold chicken, sir."

"Indeed, I tried it yesterday," answered the judge; "the chicken proved an alibi."

THE HERMIT OF FAR END.

of the faith that was in her.

"No! It is not true! I've been a fool to believe it for an instant. But I'm one no longer, I don't believe it." She paused, then, very deliberately and steadily, she put her question.

But he remained unmoved.

"Elizabeth Durward has surely supplied you with all the information on that subject which you require," he said in expressionless tones, and Sara was conscious anew of the maddening feeling of impotence with which a contest of wills between herself and Garth never failed to imbue her.

"Garth"—there was appeal in her voice, yet it was still very steady and determined—"I want to know what you say about it. What Elizabeth—or any one else—may say, doesn't matter any longer."

Something in the quiet depth of emotion in her voice, momentarily broke through his guard. He made an involuntary movement towards her, then checked himself, and, with an effort, resumed his former detached manner.

"More important than anything either I, or Elizabeth can say, is the verdict of the court," he answered.

"The deadly calm of his voice ripped away her last remnant of composure.

"The verdict of the court!" she burst out. "Damn the verdict of the court!"

"I have done—many a time!"—bitterly.

"Garth!" she came a step nearer to him and her sombre eyes blazed into his. "I will have an answer! For God's sake, don't fence with me any longer! There have been misunderstandings enough, reticences enough, between us. For this once, let us be honest with each other. I pretended I didn't care—I pretended I could go on living, believing you to be what they have called you. And I can't! I can't go on. I can't bear it any longer. You must answer me! Were you guilty?"

He was white to the lips by the time she had finished, and his eyes held a look of dumb torture. Twice he essayed to answer her, but no sound came.

At last he turned away, as though the passionate question in her face—the eager, hungry longing to hear her faith confirmed—were more than he could bear.

"I cannot deny it!" The words came hoarsely, almost whispered.

Her eyes never left his face. "I didn't ask you to deny it," she persisted doggedly. "I asked you—were you guilty?"

Again there fell a heavy silence. Then reluctantly, as if the admission were dragged from him, he spoke.

"I'm afraid I can give you no other answer to that question."

A light like the tender, trembling shining of dawn broke across Sara's face.

"Then you weren't guilty!" she exclaimed, and there was a deep, surpassing joy in her shaken tones.

"I knew it! I was sure of it. Oh! Garth, Garth, what a fool I've been! And oh! my dear, why did you do it? Why did you let me go on thinking you—what it almost killed me to think?"

He stared down at her with wondering, uncertain eyes.

"But I've just told you I can't deny it!"

She smiled at him—a smile of absolute content, with a gleam of humor at the back of it.

"I didn't ask you to deny it. I asked you to own to it; I tried to make you—every way. And you can't!"

She laid her hand across his mouth—laughing the tender, triumphant laughter of a woman who has won, and knows that she has.

"You needn't blacken yourself any longer on my account Garth! I shall never again believe anything that you may say against—the man I love."

She stood leaning a little towards him, surrender in every line of his slender body, and her face was like a white flame—transfigured, radiant with some secret, mystic glory of love's imparting.

With an inarticulate cry she opened wide his arms and she went to him—swiftly, unerringly, like a boning bird—and, as he folded her close against his breast and laid his lips to hers, all the hunger and the longing of the empty past was in his kiss. For the moment, pain and bitterness and regret were swept away in that ecstasy of reunion.

Presently, with a little sigh of spent rapture, she leaned away from him.

"To think we've wasted a whole year," she said regretfully. "Garth, I wish I had trusted you better! There was a sweet humility of repentance in her tones.

"I don't see why you should trust me now," he rejoined quietly. "The facts remain as before."

"Only that the verdict of the court-martial was wrong," she said swiftly. "There was some horrible mistake. I am sure of it—I know it! Garth"—and after a moment's pause—"are you going to tell me everything? I have the right to know, haven't I?—now that I am going to be your wife."

She felt the clasp of his arms relax, and, looking up quickly, she saw his face suddenly revert to its old lines of weariness. Slowly, reluctantly, he drew away from her.

"Garth!" There was a shrilling note of apprehension in her voice. "Garth! What is it? Why do you look like that?"

It was a full minute before he answered. When he did, he spoke heavily, as one who knows that the next words will dash all the joy out of life.

"Because," he said quietly, "I can no more tell you anything now that I could before. I can't clear myself, Sara!"

Her eyes were fixed on his.

"Do you mean—you will never be able to?" she asked incredulously.

"Yes, I mean that."

"Answer me one more question, Garth. Is it that you cannot—or will not clear yourself?"

"I must not," he replied steadily. "I am not the only one concerned in the matter. There is some one to whom I owe it to be silent. Honour forbids that I should even try to clear myself. Now you know all—that I can ever tell you."

"Who is it?" The question leaped from her, and Garth's answer came with an irrevocable refusal that there was no combating.

MODERN NOVELS WAS TOPIC OF PROF. STANLEY

You to recall the workings of your imagination just after you had learned to read and when you were introduced to an imaginative world through whatever book you first remember reading. If you can recall the workings of your imagination at that time, that is the sort of trance I can promise you when you read these three books."

Professor Stanley gave an outline of the life of Aksakoff and pictured the Russian of his time and followed up by reading several passages from the books before mentioned. "These books," Professor Stanley added in conclusion, "are very delightful books for reading to children. For the mature reader, the story of the relationship between the author's parents is a very notable work of art and for subtlety and delicacy of portrayal it is quite unequalled in any other piece of literature."

"It may interest many of you who do not know Prof. Stanley even by reputation to know that he is a many-sided man, who has had a career already as a successful business man. He is a graduate of Toronto University and of Oxford and is able to speak out of a knowledge of many literatures with authority on such a subject as we have heard to-night."

"I feel that it is of great value to any community to have a subject such as this brought to its attention. One danger to which we are exposed is having a circumscribed horizon. We need constantly to be reminded that the world is a pretty big place after all. One way in which to remind us of this is to have a literature which is written in another language revealed to us through translations."

Musical selections were rendered by Mrs. Robinson, Mrs. McCrimmon and Miss Helen Kelly.

A vote of thanks to Principal MacMillan and the School Board for the use of the Academy moved by Mrs. Geo. Hyde was seconded by Mrs. Robt. Sellar.

Mrs. Adam Sellar and Mrs. J. A. McCracken acted as usher and a good collection was taken up by Mrs. H. R. Fraser and Mrs. Ernest Lefebvre.

The Annual Meeting of the Institute will be held in March. It is hoped there will be a good attendance as the election of officers and other important business will be taken up.

Either I will find a way, or I will make one.—Sir P. Sidney.

ORMSTOWN

The Farmers' Club and Milk Producers' Annual Banquet held in McDougall Hall on Tuesday evening was the most successful yet. The speakers from Macdonald College and entertainment was good. Needless to say the banquet itself was all that could be desired. Miss McKane of Macdonald College spoke on Women's Institute work and Dr. Latimer of the Economics Department, styled his subject, "Production, Price and Profits," both these giving very interesting talks on these subjects. Other speakers were Rev. Dr. Wilson, Rev. W. T. Payne, Mayor Curran and Greig and Jas. Winter.

Songs by Mr. Dougherty, accompanied by Miss Rousseau and music by the McWhinnie orchestra was much enjoyed.
