

THE ABBE TIGRANE.

BY FERDINAND FABRE.

(Translated by the Rev. Leonard Woolley Bacon.)

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CANDIDATE FOR THE HOLY

SENE.

The Abbe Tigrane died in the early months of 1869. The Abbe Lavigne, who had lost his mother rather more than a year before, was thus released from the burden of the tender to him which kept him at Lormieres, was wanted in time, and reached the monastery of the Franciscans at Tivoli in all haste. He had the consolation of receiving his friend's last sigh, and of closing his eyes. As might be expected, the odor of Rome intoxicated the deeply religious soul of the Abbe Lavigne. Not less than that, he dreamed of ending his days in this splendid retreat, à la carte, as the saying is, and he was then on the point of addressing his resignation of the prison chaplaincy to his bishop—for Monsignor Capdepon, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mial, who was less forgetful and more implacable, had where he was in his past—when he received a despatch which begged him to return immediately to his diocese, to occupy once more his former post of sacred eloquence at the Grand Seminary.

What had happened there? Nothing but what was very natural. Monsignor Capdepon, as the Abbe Lavigne had predicted, in pursuing his upward march in the Church, had just been appointed archbishop; and the new bishop of Lormieres, Monsignor Tissandier, anxious to win the affection of his clergy, recalled the diocesan priests to the Grand Seminary, after having dislodged the Jesuits whom Monsignor Capdepon had so recently expelled. The Grand Seminary, had established there at the beginning of his episcopate.

Archbishop Capdepon makes himself very little spoken of. Archbishop Capdepon lives a very retired life in his diocesan palace, occasionally leaving it to see his subjects, or to be detained by laborers which he will shortly publish, in order to administer the sacrament of Confirmation. People talk in whispers of a History of the Pontificate of Pius IX., followed by very curious and unpublished theories of the political intrigues of Count Cavour, and the ministers who succeeded him—Ricasoli, Rattazzi, Menabrea.

This book, which has its motto thus: Three Latin words, Quia deus, if it may be said, has been permitted to see a few of its pages, is destined to make no small sensation. All the questions which pre-occupy the religious and political world, are squarely confronted and scrutinized with the boldness of genius, and so very easily, the absolute theories of the Syllabus, the new dogma of Infallibility, (which Archbishop Capdepon was at the last council one of the most energetic defenders, if our information is not erroneous, are discussed there with a resolution of spirit, and a freedom of argument, calculated not to force conviction on the mind, at any rate to excite admiration for an intellect so endowed both with versatility and vigor.

Just now Archbishop Capdepon is occupied on a chapter called—

Who will be the successor of Pius IX.?

The archbishop never comes now to Paris, where we used to see him so frequently of old. He goes every year to Rome, about the month of September. Not unfrequently he returns in the company of the Holy Father, who gives him a reception which has occasioned jealousy; and rumor says that Pius IX., appreciating the services which a man of the world, like Archbishop Capdepon, could render in the future, has named him cardinal in pectore. Is it true?

Archbishop Capdepon was walking lately in the company of his habitual confidant, the Grand Vicar (for the Archbishop had laid his ambition, if satisfied, in the large and beautiful garden which surrounds the archiepiscopal palace with a broad belt of verdure.

"Faith, my lord, from the way things are going in Italy and Europe, I consider you are to be the next Pope, blurted out quite blank the former professor of moral theology.

"Do you think so, Mial?"

"I do indeed think so. France has already given sixteen successors to St. Peter. Why should not you be the next?"

"Long may I live before the Holy See become vacant! To begin with, if the Holy Father should die, it is the Italian clergy which would have every thing its own way in the conclave."

"But, your grace, you have none but friends in the sacred college, and the votes might easily unite on your eminence."

"My eminence! Mial, I have repeatedly forbidden you to give me that title."

The grand vicar, whose sharp hot-temper had grown sharper yet with years, made a grimace.

"Then, looking stealthily along the walks—

"What's the harm?" he murmured: "we are quite alone."

There was a seat close at hand under the shade of the lime tree, the archbishop sat down. He seemed out of breath. All at once his head, too heavy through the weight of its thoughts, dropped on his breast. He remained some time absorbed in thought.

"Mial, who was still as alert, as lively as of old, replied—

"I am aware that Pius IX. is much attached to Cardinal de Angelis, archbishop of Fermo."

"Sixtus V. was archbishop of Fermo," muttered Capdepon, less in answer to Mial than to the recollection of his own mind.

"Yes," pursued the grand vicar, "Cardinal de Angelis might well be elected if, as has been said, the election should take place before the corpse of the deceased pope, ante."

"No, no," cried the archbishop impatiently. "There was silence for a few minutes."

"Prussia, which, unfortunately for us, has risen to so great prosperity, might perhaps use and abuse the influence which events have given her, to push the interests of Cardinal Hohenlohe."

"A German pope! The remembrance of the long wars between the Holy See and the Empire is not yet dead in the Church. Impossible! With a German pope, France must be her two votes, even if he had the assurance to aim at the pontifical throne."

"And the archbishop of Westminster?"

"Cardinal Manning? If the Holy Father, when pillaged by the banditti of Savoy, had accepted the hospitality which England offered him at Malte, possibly the gratitude of the Sacred College for this shelter from persecution might have given the archbishop of Westminster a chance. But Pius IX.'s noble determination, not to leave Rome invaded even by the northern barbarians, leaves no hope for this candidate."

"Harroved by his thoughts, which pierced him like so many daggers, the archbishop arose, and, leading along the grand vicar, threaded with hurried steps the shaded paths like a deer through his garden. He muttered some disjointed words.

"The tiara!" he repeated several times.

"Your head, where God has placed such

THE ABBE TIGRANE.

BY FERDINAND FABRE.

(Translated by the Rev. Leonard Woolley Bacon.)

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CANDIDATE FOR THE HOLY

SENE.

The Abbe Tigrane died in the early months of 1869. The Abbe Lavigne, who had lost his mother rather more than a year before, was thus released from the burden of the tender to him which kept him at Lormieres, was wanted in time, and reached the monastery of the Franciscans at Tivoli in all haste. He had the consolation of receiving his friend's last sigh, and of closing his eyes. As might be expected, the odor of Rome intoxicated the deeply religious soul of the Abbe Lavigne. Not less than that, he dreamed of ending his days in this splendid retreat, à la carte, as the saying is, and he was then on the point of addressing his resignation of the prison chaplaincy to his bishop—for Monsignor Capdepon, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mial, who was less forgetful and more implacable, had where he was in his past—when he received a despatch which begged him to return immediately to his diocese, to occupy once more his former post of sacred eloquence at the Grand Seminary.

What had happened there? Nothing but what was very natural. Monsignor Capdepon, as the Abbe Lavigne had predicted, in pursuing his upward march in the Church, had just been appointed archbishop; and the new bishop of Lormieres, Monsignor Tissandier, anxious to win the affection of his clergy, recalled the diocesan priests to the Grand Seminary, after having dislodged the Jesuits whom Monsignor Capdepon had so recently expelled. The Grand Seminary, had established there at the beginning of his episcopate.

Archbishop Capdepon makes himself very little spoken of. Archbishop Capdepon lives a very retired life in his diocesan palace, occasionally leaving it to see his subjects, or to be detained by laborers which he will shortly publish, in order to administer the sacrament of Confirmation. People talk in whispers of a History of the Pontificate of Pius IX., followed by very curious and unpublished theories of the political intrigues of Count Cavour, and the ministers who succeeded him—Ricasoli, Rattazzi, Menabrea.

This book, which has its motto thus: Three Latin words, Quia deus, if it may be said, has been permitted to see a few of its pages, is destined to make no small sensation. All the questions which pre-occupy the religious and political world, are squarely confronted and scrutinized with the boldness of genius, and so very easily, the absolute theories of the Syllabus, the new dogma of Infallibility, (which Archbishop Capdepon was at the last council one of the most energetic defenders, if our information is not erroneous, are discussed there with a resolution of spirit, and a freedom of argument, calculated not to force conviction on the mind, at any rate to excite admiration for an intellect so endowed both with versatility and vigor.

Just now Archbishop Capdepon is occupied on a chapter called—

Who will be the successor of Pius IX.?

The archbishop never comes now to Paris, where we used to see him so frequently of old. He goes every year to Rome, about the month of September. Not unfrequently he returns in the company of the Holy Father, who gives him a reception which has occasioned jealousy; and rumor says that Pius IX., appreciating the services which a man of the world, like Archbishop Capdepon, could render in the future, has named him cardinal in pectore. Is it true?

Archbishop Capdepon was walking lately in the company of his habitual confidant, the Grand Vicar (for the Archbishop had laid his ambition, if satisfied, in the large and beautiful garden which surrounds the archiepiscopal palace with a broad belt of verdure.

"Faith, my lord, from the way things are going in Italy and Europe, I consider you are to be the next Pope, blurted out quite blank the former professor of moral theology.

"Do you think so, Mial?"

"I do indeed think so. France has already given sixteen successors to St. Peter. Why should not you be the next?"

"Long may I live before the Holy See become vacant! To begin with, if the Holy Father should die, it is the Italian clergy which would have every thing its own way in the conclave."

"But, your grace, you have none but friends in the sacred college, and the votes might easily unite on your eminence."

"My eminence! Mial, I have repeatedly forbidden you to give me that title."

The grand vicar, whose sharp hot-temper had grown sharper yet with years, made a grimace.

"Then, looking stealthily along the walks—

"What's the harm?" he murmured: "we are quite alone."

There was a seat close at hand under the shade of the lime tree, the archbishop sat down. He seemed out of breath. All at once his head, too heavy through the weight of its thoughts, dropped on his breast. He remained some time absorbed in thought.

"Mial, who was still as alert, as lively as of old, replied—

"I am aware that Pius IX. is much attached to Cardinal de Angelis, archbishop of Fermo."

"Sixtus V. was archbishop of Fermo," muttered Capdepon, less in answer to Mial than to the recollection of his own mind.

"Yes," pursued the grand vicar, "Cardinal de Angelis might well be elected if, as has been said, the election should take place before the corpse of the deceased pope, ante."

"No, no," cried the archbishop impatiently. "There was silence for a few minutes."

"Prussia, which, unfortunately for us, has risen to so great prosperity, might perhaps use and abuse the influence which events have given her, to push the interests of Cardinal Hohenlohe."

"A German pope! The remembrance of the long wars between the Holy See and the Empire is not yet dead in the Church. Impossible! With a German pope, France must be her two votes, even if he had the assurance to aim at the pontifical throne."

"And the archbishop of Westminster?"

"Cardinal Manning? If the Holy Father, when pillaged by the banditti of Savoy, had accepted the hospitality which England offered him at Malte, possibly the gratitude of the Sacred College for this shelter from persecution might have given the archbishop of Westminster a chance. But Pius IX.'s noble determination, not to leave Rome invaded even by the northern barbarians, leaves no hope for this candidate."

"Harroved by his thoughts, which pierced him like so many daggers, the archbishop arose, and, leading along the grand vicar, threaded with hurried steps the shaded paths like a deer through his garden. He muttered some disjointed words.

"The tiara!" he repeated several times.

"Your head, where God has placed such

THE ABBE TIGRANE.

BY FERDINAND FABRE.

(Translated by the Rev. Leonard Woolley Bacon.)

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CANDIDATE FOR THE HOLY

SENE.

The Abbe Tigrane died in the early months of 1869. The Abbe Lavigne, who had lost his mother rather more than a year before, was thus released from the burden of the tender to him which kept him at Lormieres, was wanted in time, and reached the monastery of the Franciscans at Tivoli in all haste. He had the consolation of receiving his friend's last sigh, and of closing his eyes. As might be expected, the odor of Rome intoxicated the deeply religious soul of the Abbe Lavigne. Not less than that, he dreamed of ending his days in this splendid retreat, à la carte, as the saying is, and he was then on the point of addressing his resignation of the prison chaplaincy to his bishop—for Monsignor Capdepon, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mial, who was less forgetful and more implacable, had where he was in his past—when he received a despatch which begged him to return immediately to his diocese, to occupy once more his former post of sacred eloquence at the Grand Seminary.

What had happened there? Nothing but what was very natural. Monsignor Capdepon, as the Abbe Lavigne had predicted, in pursuing his upward march in the Church, had just been appointed archbishop; and the new bishop of Lormieres, Monsignor Tissandier, anxious to win the affection of his clergy, recalled the diocesan priests to the Grand Seminary, after having dislodged the Jesuits whom Monsignor Capdepon had so recently expelled. The Grand Seminary, had established there at the beginning of his episcopate.

Archbishop Capdepon makes himself very little spoken of. Archbishop Capdepon lives a very retired life in his diocesan palace, occasionally leaving it to see his subjects, or to be detained by laborers which he will shortly publish, in order to administer the sacrament of Confirmation. People talk in whispers of a History of the Pontificate of Pius IX., followed by very curious and unpublished theories of the political intrigues of Count Cavour, and the ministers who succeeded him—Ricasoli, Rattazzi, Menabrea.

This book, which has its motto thus: Three Latin words, Quia deus, if it may be said, has been permitted to see a few of its pages, is destined to make no small sensation. All the questions which pre-occupy the religious and political world, are squarely confronted and scrutinized with the boldness of genius, and so very easily, the absolute theories of the Syllabus, the new dogma of Infallibility, (which Archbishop Capdepon was at the last council one of the most energetic defenders, if our information is not erroneous, are discussed there with a resolution of spirit, and a freedom of argument, calculated not to force conviction on the mind, at any rate to excite admiration for an intellect so endowed both with versatility and vigor.

Just now Archbishop Capdepon is occupied on a chapter called—

Who will be the successor of Pius IX.?

The archbishop never comes now to Paris, where we used to see him so frequently of old. He goes every year to Rome, about the month of September. Not unfrequently he returns in the company of the Holy Father, who gives him a reception which has occasioned jealousy; and rumor says that Pius IX., appreciating the services which a man of the world, like Archbishop Capdepon, could render in the future, has named him cardinal in pectore. Is it true?

Archbishop Capdepon was walking lately in the company of his habitual confidant, the Grand Vicar (for the Archbishop had laid his ambition, if satisfied, in the large and beautiful garden which surrounds the archiepiscopal palace with a broad belt of verdure.

"Faith, my lord, from the way things are going in Italy and Europe, I consider you are to be the next Pope, blurted out quite blank the former professor of moral theology.

"Do you think so, Mial?"

"I do indeed think so. France has already given sixteen successors to St. Peter. Why should not you be the next?"

"Long may I live before the Holy See become vacant! To begin with, if the Holy Father should die, it is the Italian clergy which would have every thing its own way in the conclave."

"But, your grace, you have none but friends in the sacred college, and the votes might easily unite on your eminence."

"My eminence! Mial, I have repeatedly forbidden you to give me that title."

The grand vicar, whose sharp hot-temper had grown sharper yet with years, made a grimace.

"Then, looking stealthily along the walks—

"What's the harm?" he murmured: "we are quite alone."

There was a seat close at hand under the shade of the lime tree, the archbishop sat down. He seemed out of breath. All at once his head, too heavy through the weight of its thoughts, dropped on his breast. He remained some time absorbed in thought.

"Mial, who was still as alert, as lively as of old, replied—

"I am aware that Pius IX. is much attached to Cardinal de Angelis, archbishop of Fermo."

"Sixtus V. was archbishop of Fermo," muttered Capdepon, less in answer to Mial than to the recollection of his own mind.

"Yes," pursued the grand vicar, "Cardinal de Angelis might well be elected if, as has been said, the election should take place before the corpse of the deceased pope, ante."

"No, no," cried the archbishop impatiently. "There was silence for a few minutes."

"Prussia, which, unfortunately for us, has risen to so great prosperity, might perhaps use and abuse the influence which events have given her, to push the interests of Cardinal Hohenlohe."

"A German pope! The remembrance of the long wars between the Holy See and the Empire is not yet dead in the Church. Impossible! With a German pope, France must be her two votes, even if he had the assurance to aim at the pontifical throne."

"And the archbishop of Westminster?"

"Cardinal Manning? If the Holy Father, when pillaged by the banditti of Savoy, had accepted the hospitality which England offered him at Malte, possibly the gratitude of the Sacred College for this shelter from persecution might have given the archbishop of Westminster a chance. But Pius IX.'s noble determination, not to leave Rome invaded even by the northern barbarians, leaves no hope for this candidate."

"Harroved by his thoughts, which pierced him like so many daggers, the archbishop arose, and, leading along the grand vicar, threaded with hurried steps the shaded paths like a deer through his garden. He muttered some disjointed words.

"The tiara!" he repeated several times.

"Your head, where God has placed such

THE ABBE TIGRANE.

BY FERDINAND FABRE.

(Translated by the Rev. Leonard Woolley Bacon.)

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CANDIDATE FOR THE HOLY

SENE.

The Abbe Tigrane died in the early months of 1869. The Abbe Lavigne, who had lost his mother rather more than a year before, was thus released from the burden of the tender to him which kept him at Lormieres, was wanted in time, and reached the monastery of the Franciscans at Tivoli in all haste. He had the consolation of receiving his friend's last sigh, and of closing his eyes. As might be expected, the odor of Rome intoxicated the deeply religious soul of the Abbe Lavigne. Not less than that, he dreamed of ending his days in this splendid retreat, à la carte, as the saying is, and he was then on the point of addressing his resignation of the prison chaplaincy to his bishop—for Monsignor Capdepon, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mial, who was less forgetful and more implacable, had where he was in his past—when he received a despatch which begged him to return immediately to his diocese, to occupy once more his former post of sacred eloquence at the Grand Seminary.

What had happened there? Nothing but what was very natural. Monsignor Capdepon, as the Abbe Lavigne had predicted, in pursuing his upward march in the Church, had just been appointed archbishop; and the new bishop of Lormieres, Monsignor Tissandier, anxious to win the affection of his clergy, recalled the diocesan priests to the Grand Seminary, after having dislodged the Jesuits whom Monsignor Capdepon had so recently expelled. The Grand Seminary, had established there at the beginning of his episcopate.

Archbishop Capdepon makes himself very little spoken of. Archbishop Capdepon lives a very retired life in his diocesan palace, occasionally leaving it to see his subjects, or to be detained by laborers which he will shortly publish, in order to administer the sacrament of Confirmation. People talk in whispers of a History of the Pontificate of Pius IX., followed by very curious and unpublished theories of the political intrigues of Count Cavour, and the ministers who succeeded him—Ricasoli, Rattazzi, Menabrea.

This book, which has its motto thus: Three Latin words, Quia deus, if it may be said, has been permitted to see a few of its pages, is destined to make no small sensation. All the questions which pre-occupy the religious and political world, are squarely confronted and scrutinized with the boldness of genius, and so very easily, the absolute theories of the Syllabus, the new dogma of Infallibility, (which Archbishop Capdepon was at the last council one of the most energetic defenders, if our information is not erroneous, are discussed there with a resolution of spirit, and a freedom of argument, calculated not to force conviction on the mind, at any rate to excite admiration for an intellect so endowed both with versatility and vigor.

Just now Archbishop Capdepon is occupied on a chapter called—

Who will be the successor of Pius IX.?

The archbishop never comes now to Paris, where we used to see him so frequently of old. He goes every year to Rome, about the month of September. Not unfrequently he returns in the company of the Holy Father, who gives him a reception which has occasioned jealousy; and rumor says that Pius IX., appreciating the services which a man of the world, like Archbishop Capdepon, could render in the future, has named him cardinal in pectore. Is it true?

Archbishop Capdepon was walking lately in the company of his habitual confidant, the Grand Vicar (for the Archbishop had laid his ambition, if satisfied, in the large and beautiful garden which surrounds the archiepiscopal palace with a broad belt of verdure.

"Faith, my lord, from the way things are going in Italy and Europe, I consider you are to be the next Pope, blurted out quite blank the former professor of moral theology.

"Do you think so, Mial?"

"I do indeed think so. France has already given sixteen successors to St. Peter. Why should not you be the next?"

"Long may I live before the Holy See become vacant! To begin with, if the Holy Father should die, it is the Italian clergy which would have every thing its own way in the conclave."

"But, your grace, you have none but friends in the sacred college, and the votes might easily unite on your eminence."

"My eminence! Mial, I have repeatedly forbidden you to give me that title."

The grand vicar, whose sharp hot-temper had grown sharper yet with years, made a grimace.

"Then, looking stealthily along the walks—

"What's the harm?" he murmured: "we are quite alone."

There was a seat close at hand under the shade of the lime tree, the archbishop sat down. He seemed out of breath. All at once his head, too heavy through the weight of its thoughts, dropped on his breast. He remained some time absorbed in thought.

"Mial, who was still as alert, as lively as of old, replied—

"I am aware that Pius IX. is much attached to Cardinal de Angelis, archbishop of Fermo."

"Sixtus V. was archbishop of Fermo," muttered Capdepon, less in answer to Mial than to the recollection of his own mind.

"Yes," pursued the grand vicar, "Cardinal de Angelis might well be elected if, as has been said, the election should take place before the corpse of the deceased pope, ante."

"No, no," cried the archbishop impatiently. "There was silence for a few minutes."

"Prussia, which, unfortunately for us, has risen to so great prosperity, might perhaps use and abuse the influence which events have given her, to push the interests of Cardinal Hohenlohe."

"A German pope! The remembrance of the long wars between the Holy See and the Empire is not yet dead in the Church. Impossible! With a German pope, France must be her two votes, even if he had the assurance to aim at the pontifical throne."

"And the archbishop of Westminster?"

"Cardinal Manning? If the Holy Father, when pillaged by the banditti of Savoy, had accepted the hospitality which England offered him at Malte, possibly the gratitude of the Sacred College for this shelter from persecution might have given the archbishop of Westminster a chance. But Pius IX.'s noble determination, not to leave Rome invaded even by the northern barbarians, leaves no hope for this candidate."

"Harroved by his thoughts, which pierced him like so many daggers, the archbishop arose, and, leading along the grand vicar, threaded with hurried steps the shaded paths like a deer through his garden. He muttered some disjointed words.

"The tiara!" he repeated several times.

"Your head, where God has placed such

THE ABBE TIGRANE.

BY FERDINAND FABRE.

(Translated by the Rev. Leonard Woolley Bacon.)

CHAPTER XXVI.—A CANDIDATE FOR THE HOLY

SENE.

The Abbe Tigrane died in the early months of 1869. The Abbe Lavigne, who had lost his mother rather more than a year before, was thus released from the burden of the tender to him which kept him at Lormieres, was wanted in time, and reached the monastery of the Franciscans at Tivoli in all haste. He had the consolation of receiving his friend's last sigh, and of closing his eyes. As might be expected, the odor of Rome intoxicated the deeply religious soul of the Abbe Lavigne. Not less than that, he dreamed of ending his days in this splendid retreat, à la carte, as the saying is, and he was then on the point of addressing his resignation of the prison chaplaincy to his bishop—for Monsignor Capdepon, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mial, who was less forgetful and more implacable, had where he was in his past—when he received a despatch which begged him to return immediately to his diocese, to occupy once more his former post of sacred eloquence at the Grand Seminary.

What had happened there? Nothing but what was very natural. Monsignor Capdepon, as the Abbe Lavigne had predicted, in pursuing his upward march in the Church, had just been appointed archbishop; and the new bishop of Lormieres, Monsignor Tissandier, anxious to win the affection of his clergy, recalled the diocesan priests to the Grand Seminary, after having dislodged the Jesuits whom Monsignor Capdepon had so recently expelled. The Grand Seminary, had established there at the beginning of his episcopate.

Archbishop Capdepon makes himself very little spoken of. Archbishop Capdepon lives a very retired life in his diocesan palace, occasionally leaving it to see his subjects, or to be detained by laborers which he will shortly publish, in order to administer the sacrament of Confirmation. People talk in whispers of a History of the Pontificate of Pius IX., followed by very curious and unpublished theories of the political intrigues of Count Cavour, and the ministers who succeeded him—Ricasoli, Rattazzi, Menabrea.

This book, which has its motto thus: Three Latin words, Quia deus, if it may be said, has been permitted to see a few of its pages, is destined to make no small sensation. All the questions which pre-occupy the religious and political world, are squarely confronted and scrutinized with the boldness of genius, and so very easily, the absolute theories of the Syllabus, the new dogma of Infallibility, (which Archbishop Capdepon was at the last council one of the most energetic defenders, if our information is not erroneous, are discussed there with a resolution of spirit, and a freedom of argument, calculated not to force conviction on the mind, at any rate to excite admiration for an intellect so endowed both with versatility and vigor.

Just now Archbishop Capdepon is occupied on a chapter called—

Who will be the successor of Pius IX.?

The archbishop never comes now to Paris, where we used to see him so frequently of old. He goes every year to Rome, about the month of September. Not unfrequently he returns in the company of the Holy Father, who gives him a reception which has occasioned jealousy; and rumor says that Pius IX., appreciating the services which a man of the world, like Archbishop Capdepon, could render in the future, has named him cardinal in pectore. Is it true?

Archbishop Capdepon was walking lately in the company of his habitual confidant, the Grand Vicar (for the Archbishop had laid his ambition, if satisfied, in the large and beautiful garden which surrounds the archiepiscopal palace with a broad belt of verdure.

"Faith, my lord, from the way things are going in Italy and Europe, I consider you are to be the next Pope, blurted out quite blank the former professor of moral theology.

"Do you think so, Mial?"

"I do indeed think so. France has already given sixteen successors to St. Peter. Why should not you be the next?"

"Long may I live before the Holy See become vacant! To begin with, if the Holy Father should die, it is the Italian clergy which would have every thing its own way in the conclave."

"But, your grace, you have none but friends in the sacred college, and the votes might easily unite on your eminence."

"My eminence! M

