SATAN OUTWITTED.

CHAPTER XIX.—Continued.

The young officer answered by hinting, as Williams had previously done to Gus, that they sometimes picked themselves for the tyranny of the best of a battle.

"I have no such fear," haughtily observed the quietist.

His blanching cheek gave the lie to the assertion. Like most vindictive persons, he was at heart a coward, and he secretly resolved to conduct himself in a less overbearing manner towards his men—but not towards Gus, whom he was not more than the usual Frenchman by every means in his power: he knew not exactly why, but he felt that there was a deadly feud between them.

"Has private Manton returned?" he demanded, on reaching the gate.

"A few minutes since," replied the corporal.

"At what hour?"

"Ten o'clock."

"Impossible! You want to see him; it is not half an hour since we met him on the road to San Jacinto—he could not have passed us unperceived."

The substitution of only reply was to hand the speaker the names of those who had obtained leave of absence: the name of Gus was picked off.

Finding that the corporal had spoken truth, and that, thanks to the generous resolution of Travers, who alone had borne a sufferer from the adventure of the evening, nothing could be done, he hastily bade his companions "Good night," and retired to his room, where a fresh surprise awaited him.

CHAPTER XX.

"At this time you know me, sir, for one who holds the thread which runs the tangled web of destiny."

In his right hand, with me you may be all—Without me, nothing is possible."

On entering his apartment, Edward Howard saw, to his surprise, a middle-aged person, whose back was turned towards him, seated at the table, and quietly reading the papers.

Which, during the previous night, he had arrived from England. The air of his visitor betrayed a consciousness that he was perfectly at home in the room of the young officer.

"Whom have I the honor of addressing?" demanded Howard, for he was not used to so very amiable humor, and the familiarity of his visitor annoyed him.

The stranger turned round and discovered the features of his old tutor—the man whom, after our hero, he most hated in the world.

"Hanway!" he exclaimed.

"Ay, Hanway!" replied the old man, holding out his hand.

"His former pupil took no notice of the act, but, throwing himself into an easy chair, eyed him for some moments in silence."

"Is it thus you welcome me?" demanded his visitor, with an air of disappointment; "have years of kindness been merited no better reception at your hands?"

"Better reception!" repeated the young man, "what better reception could you expect for your former tutor, who has been so long paid for them, like any other mortal?"

There was something terrible in the look which his visitor cast upon him as he listened to the coarse, brutal observation.

"Paid?" he exclaimed, "as if the fool was who cherished the half-frenzied viper in his breast, and warmed it till the reptile turned and stung him!"

"This is to me!"

"Why not?"

"You forget that you address an officer and a gentleman—one who will be Earl of Essex!"

"Not unless I please," said his visitor, firmly.

"Worm, to whom my favor has given importance—whom I could crush as easily as the withered leaf beneath my feet! Thing without heart or brain, but with a hundredfold more cunning than the serpent, you know that the claim, the hope of which you are so vain, is derived through me; my abnegation alone can give you the title the expectation of which has so inflamed your vanity."

"You! I—I do not understand you," faltered his grandson, who was far from suspecting the nearness of the tie between them.

"You soon will," he exclaimed.

"My father's death left me the next heir, in the event of the ladies Blanche and Ellen dying childless. The former is unmarried—the latter is never likely again to become a mother."

"Indeed?" observed Hanway, with a sneer; "who told thee that?"

"My grandfather."

"The lawyer, Markland—the pettifogging knave in the Temple, whose spirit and blood you alike inherit: there is a little of the house of Essex in your nature save the name. 'Tis true its sons have been demons in their passions, tigers in their resentments; but yours is the rage of the fox, with the snarling courage of the wolf."

The calm, sneering tone in which the sarcasm was uttered, gazed the proud tutor of Edward Howard to the quick, and the conscious feeling that there was truth in the observation only galled him the more; for no man was ever yet thoroughly base or worthless without an innate sentiment of his degradation.

"Leave the room, you scoundrel! I tell I regret your years and kick you out!"

Hanway remained silent, but his cheek grew fearfully pale.

"I must ring for my servants, then," continued the speaker, "and have his hand upon the belt, and order them to remove you."

"Ring!" replied his visitor, with fearful calmness, "that they may see how Edward Howard treats his grandchild!"

The young man, who in his passion had started from his chair full of pride and anger, sank into it again like one whose limbs were suddenly paralyzed. Lady Blanche had frequently spoken to him of his grandfather, and more than once, after a few moments' reflection, somewhat reassured him.

"Lar!" he faltered; "my grandfather died at Markwell."

"Who told you so? Markland!"

"I have seen the certificate."

"And Markland showed you that, too?" observed Hanway, in the same ironical tone.

"The base-born booby would have sworn to it at any time for the chance of seeing his descendant Earl of Essex! But that you may not be deceived as to his character or mine, and the proof of the one is as at once to him as the other and my punishment."

So saying, he threw a letter from Edward's maternal grandfather upon the table.

The young man was too much struck by the manner of the speaker to doubt his assertion, which a hundred trivial recollections of his youth confirmed. Mechanically, he broke the seal, and cast his eyes over the letter. It ran thus:

"My dear Mr. Edward, the time has arrived when you ought to be informed of a secret which, for many important reasons, it was judged prudent to keep from you in your youth. The secret is this, which you will at once recognize as a friend, possesses a much stronger claim to your gratitude and obedience than have hitherto been made to imagine. Be guided by him in all things, and to him alone the devotion of your life, and more the conviction of your duty are in your nature: the former is centered in yourself, the latter known to you by name. You forget that I have known you from childhood—watched the very forms of your character as they gradually unfolded themselves, without ever discovering one trait of honor or generosity to reflect them. And now tell me, if you would, why should I not abandon you to your fate, and punish your insolence and ingratitude by the only means capable of teaching your selfish nature—the death of a battle."

"You will not do that!" observed his grandson, firmly.

"And why, sir?"

"Because you would disappoint your own vengeance at the same time. You may despise me, but you hate your brother's children: that hatred has been the growth of years, had its origin, in jealousy and disappointed love. Geoffrey Howard was not the man to forgive the wrongs of his youth, or break the tie which binds him by which he could have them!" Then, after a pause, he added, "we are necessary to each other."

THE DEADLY LINDOLINE.

A St. Louis physician says the linden tree is dangerous to health, being like the deadly yucca tree of the East. The St. Louis doctor has been making investigations, and he says: "Just in the Spring, when the sap was about to flow, I wounded my arm in several places, and now tell me, if you would, why should I not abandon you to your fate, and punish your insolence and ingratitude by the only means capable of teaching your selfish nature—the death of a battle."

"You will not do that!" observed his grandson, firmly.

"And why, sir?"

"Because you would disappoint your own vengeance at the same time. You may despise me, but you hate your brother's children: that hatred has been the growth of years, had its origin, in jealousy and disappointed love. Geoffrey Howard was not the man to forgive the wrongs of his youth, or break the tie which binds him by which he could have them!" Then, after a pause, he added, "we are necessary to each other."

Fossils in Meteorites.

It may be remembered how great a sensation was caused by Sir William Thompson, in his address at the Edinburgh meeting of the British Association, suggesting that life may have reached our planet from more advanced worlds by the agency of meteorites. It may be thought that the researches of Dr. Hahn, of Tubingen, and other scientists, have confirmed this daring hypothesis. Dr. Hahn's method of observation has been to obtain transparent sections of meteorites, and to subject these to minute examination. There are two sorts of meteorites, one of which is composed of iron, and the other of nickel-iron, and these are found in various proportions siliceous substances. The former are frequently met with the others composed of iron and nickel-iron, and these are found in various proportions siliceous substances.
