THE "GLOBE" AND THE CANADA PACIFIC.

Referring to the proposition to finish the Canadian Pacific Railway by the summer of 1886, the Toronto Globe remarks:

What will it profit the people of those older Provinces who must bear all those burdens to have a railroad round Lake Superior by that time, or a railroad through the Rocky Mountains? Will it not in fact add greatly to their burdens to be compelled to provide, as they will be asked to provide, for the running of trains on all that vast extent of railroad, and through those regions little adapted for settlement, so many years before a business sufficient to pay running expenses has been developed?

It might be asked, in the same strain, Why build the Pacific Railway at all? Why open up the North-West at all? Why seek to create a commerce in that country for the older provinces and homes for our Eastern people who otherwise would go off to the prairies of the United States' North-West? Why do anything quickly which can be done slowly? Why exhibit push and energy and resolution in great movements when we might be content with conditions of existence which do not call for the use of these qualities and gifts?

As for moving slowly in regard to the Canadian Pacific and waiting for business to be created before building the road, it must surprise the readers of the Globe to find such notions propounded in a journal which has all along advocated the building of railways in advance of traffic and as creators of traffic. If the Globe's present theory had prevailed in the past, we should have had very few railways in Canada; we should certainly have had no Inter-colonial railway, with its present revenue of a million a year; and it is questionable if much of the Grand Trunk system would have been built. The Canadian Pacific Railway, with its disconnected links, is now earning as much in a month as the Inter-colonial which has far exceeded the traffic expectations of its friends, earns in six months; and yet the Toronto Globe would delay the union of the several parts for years, and thus prevent the increase of business while preventing the reduction in the cost of management which would follow the building of the road from ocean to ocean.

It ought to be patent to everybody that if it is right to finish the Canadian Pacific railway, at all it is wise to do it as quickly as possible. This road was to have been finished long ago, according to agreement between the Mackenzie Government and the Province of British Columbia; so that the Globe's objection to haste in building comes rather late in the day. If there is in the west a country worth developing; if there is a trade worth considering; if the times are favorable for emigration from the old world; if the present, and next year will be favorable to railway building in Canada owing to the halt in railway construction elsewhere; if early connection by a Canadian railway with Canadian territory west of Lake Superior is desirable at all, why the sooner we have all these advantages the better and the sooner the voice of the croaker is silenced the better. There is, of course, one satisfaction in connection with the dreary prophecies in which the Globe and some other journals are indulging. We know that in their dismal and woe-begone character they can not surpass what were uttered three years ago, and we know how the history of the North-West, and of the country generally, has given the lie to all the gloomy predictions of that period. It is not in the Canadian character to give up a cherished undertaking promising great national advantages, nor even to postpone it when the voice of Parliament is equal to its successful accomplishment. Nor is it likely that this view will be taken by one class of politicians in Parliament. The Liberals in that body are as firmly bound to the early completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway as the Conservatives are. The two sides of the House may differ as to the proper method, price, location, etc., but seeing that great progress has been made under the syndicate, and that such headway has been made as to render it possible to complete the work in two years, we can well understand that some Liberals may not be willing to record their votes against the immediate completion of what they regard as a necessity to the well being of the country. Parties may differ as to whether it is judicious to initiate a great undertaking involving very great public expenditure, but the principle having been adopted by Parliament and the country, the work having proceeded in good faith and successfully, the name and resources of the country having been pledged to the completion of the undertaking, many who may have opposed the origin of the movement may not see their way clear to do otherwise than aid by all the means in their power the object to which the public faith is pledged, even though the form of aid may not altogether meet their approval. The Globe should not push its opposition to the proposed legislation quite so far, as it can not be representing the views of many of the best men of its party in the Dominion.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS VINDICATED.

Mr. Rayner, Solicitor to the United States Treasury Department, reported adversely to Mrs. Miller's application for a license to serve as a master of a Mississippi steamboat, his decision having a good deal the character of a lecture in opposition to woman's rights, so called. Mr. Rayner's official head, however, Mr. Folger, Secretary of the Treasury, takes a different view of the application. He takes the ground that sex or clothing has nothing to do with the case—that competency should decide. He says:—

I see no reason, in unwritten or written law, why Mistress Miller may not lawfully demand an examination, and if she proves herself duly qualified have a license to serve as a master of a steam vessel. Nor is there need of talk, or of con, on social status, or of woman's rights, so called. Having been put on God's footstool by Him, she has the right to win her bread in any moral, decent way which is open to any of His tolling creatures. She chooses to do so as the master of a steam vessel. It is an honest calling. If she is fitted for it, though clothed in skirts rather than breeches, she has a right to follow it, and no man should say her nay.

The Secretary, therefore, decides that Mrs. Miller shall have her license on passing her examination. This is a great triumph for woman's rights and will, no doubt, be duly celebrated. It will also be an example to be followed, and we may expect to hear of numerous applications of the same kind, until the Courts by their decisions throw doubt upon the legality of the Secretary's position.
