

This book is provided in digital form with the permission of the rightsholder as part of a Google project to make the world's books discoverable online.

The rightsholder has graciously given you the freedom to download all pages of this book. No additional commercial or other uses have been granted.

Please note that all copyrights remain reserved.

About Google Books

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Books helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Curiosities and Anomalies in The Federal Income Taxation of Trusts and Estates, 4th Ed.

1350+ Commonwealth Tax Case Analysis/Citations for The Canada Income Tax Act
Treatment of Common-law Trusts and Estates

By: Lyndon Maither, CFE, B.Comm

Written for Kim

How to Use This Internet Book

I'm very happy that companies like Googlebooks allow me to publish this for free complete viewing which allows me to deliver my compilations to anyone who wants to improve their knowledge. If you'd like a copy of this please read the following.

You are encouraged to use Google Chrome or Firefox to view this since with Internet Explorer the pages may not render properly.

Also, you're encouraged to use the hypertext embedded Table of Contents immediately following rather than Google's generated Table since it is far more accurate.

This source is available as a free download with the above right-hand sprocket button and I can only hope that since this is made available for free that you can contribute, any amount, towards a valid cause pursued by the below organizations this compiler highly values:

Federation CJA (Montreal)

United Way

Covenant House (Toronto-Vancouver)

Centraide (Montreal)

Kids Helpphone

Breakfast Club of Canada

Sierra Club of Canada

SPCA (Montreal-Toronto-Vancouver)

Mona Parsons Commemoration Project or, give some money to a university law library (U of Western Ontario's good...)

If you're from the USA: Shamayim V'Aretz

Researched and Written by Lyndon Maither, a be calm, (1987-1993, 2012)©
1-888-498-8062

For Kimberley Edith, who gave a mere B.Comm something to write about, work on, polish...
... the 'star' who she was and continues to be, who earned and owns New York better than Liza M. And Washington DC, too!

And who never slowed down "with her chrome heart shining in the sun".

Table of Contents

Kim Scott Neufeld JD's "Book"	A

Foreword.....
Recommendations to Improve the ITA vis-a-vis Trusts and Estates: A Start.....
Creation of, or Contribution to Existing, Trusts	1
Unrestricted "Expenditures" deduction against Right or Thing(s. 70(3)-69(1.1(b)) as well as unwarranted reintroduction of "cost" to be deducted (income interest in trust)	1
Preventing Shifting of Tax Incidences when Executor Assents to Dispositions of Estate Property to Enduring Trusts Etc. within Executors' Year	2
Ensuring All Benefits Conferred on Non-Residents in Relation to Trusts or Estates are Taxable	2
Ensuring Spouse under Spousal Trust Recognizes All of Trust's Taxable Income	2
Sec. 104(13.1)-(13.2) Trust-Beneficiary Income Recognition Carve-back, illegitimately Used ...	3
Severing The Disposition in a Trust Distribution to Disallow Expenses and Outlays to be Considered Creating Tax Non-Zero Affect	4
Aligning Reversionary Trust Income/Loss Attribution Specifics to be the Same as Other Income Attribution Provisions	4
Technical Cleanliness of Untainting Tainted Spouse Trusts	4

Estates and Trusts... A Difference.....	7
Fiscal Targeting.....	7
"Reference to trust or estate – Sec. 104(1)"	7
"Restricted meaning of "beneficiary" – Sec. 104(1.1)"	7
"Person acting for another – Sec. 159(1)"	15
The "Splintered 4 Quadrant" "Multi-faceted" Trust/Estate: What Our Act Actually Says and Why You Should Be Cautious in your Dealings with its Property.....	22
Estates	24
Trusts Arising out of Estates	26
When the Unadministered Estate becomes a Trust and Why It's Important for Tax Aspects: Should There Be 4 Testamentary Ownership Base's and Not 3?	33
Testamentary Trusts.	38
A General Definition.....	38
"Definition of Testamentary Trust – Sec. 108(1)"	38
Created only by the Dying Individual.....	39
Advanced Anti-avoidance and Balancing Property Holdings	40
Dependant's/Family Relief Trusts.....	42
"How trust created – 248(9.1)"	42
Inter vivos Trusts.....	42
Whether Non-resident Arrangements Fit as Canadian Recognized Trusts?	47
Trusts and Agencies.	53
Personal Trusts.....	53
The Specific Definition.....	53
"Definition of personal trust – Sec. 248(1)"	54
"Interests acquired for consideration – Sec. 108(7)"	54
"Variation of trust – Sec. 108(6)"	54
"Definition of "disposition" – Sec. 248(1)"	55
"Inadequate considerations – Sec. 69(1)"	57
Contributions by Dispositions	58
A Two Dimensional Scope.....	58
Disposition of Interests acquired and their Costs.....	59
Subsection 105(1) Benefits and Other Considerations	60
Who "Creates" or "Contributes" to That Trust or "Creates a New Distinct One with that Other's Terms"?	61

Revocable, Protective and Bare Trusts.....	65
Revocable Living Trusts	65
Protective Trusts	66
Bare Trusts	66
Spousal Trusts.....	83
“joint spousal or common-law partner trust”.....	84
“Inter vivos transfers by individuals – Sec. 73(1)”	84
“Qualifying transfers – Sec. 73(1.1)”	84
“Exception for transfers – Sec. 73(1.02)”	85
“Interpretation – Sec. 73(1.1)”	85
“Capital cost and amount deemed allowed to spouse, etc., or trust – Sec. 73(2)”	85
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	85
Tax Payable by an Inter Vivos Trust	85
IT-406R2	86
“Tax payable by inter vivos trust – Sec. 122(1)”	88
“Deductions not permitted – Sec. 122(1.1)”	88
“Where s. (1) does not apply – Sec. 122(2)”	88
Picking the Trustees, Changes in Corporate Control and the Case for the “Drunken Trustee”	89
 Trusts when Equity looks to Intent and Not Documentation.....	 96
Documentation without Substance.....	96
Proving in the Absence of Documentation.....	104
Implied Trusts.....	111
Resulting Trusts	113
 Multiple Trusts.....	 121
“Taxed as individual – Sec. 104(2)”	123
Some Cases on Multiple Trusts.....	125
 The Taxation Year of A Trust.....	 131
“Testamentary Trusts – Sec. 104(23)”	131
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	135
Change of fiscal period	135
IT-179R	135
 Constructive Trusts.....	 139
Splitting Income/Ownership.....	141
 The Trust as a Taxable Individual and its Residence.....	 147
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	165
Residence of a Trust or Estate	165
IT-447	165
“But Your Honour, the ITA Does Recognize “Splintered Trusts” in Respect of the Incidents of Any Trust Property, and that Party is Resident!”	167
Changes of Residence.....	169
Trusts.....	169
“Returning trust beneficiary – Sec. 128.1(7)”	170
Beneficiaries.....	172
Avoiding the Ownership Target.....	173
Becoming Resident: Deemed FMV Acquisition.....	173
A Question of Beneficial Ownership.....	174
Some Distributions and Cost Bumps.....	175
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	175
Deemed Disposition and Acquisition on Ceasing to be or Becoming Resident in Canada	175

IT-451R	175
The Treaties - Conventions and Residence	179
Testamentary Transfers and Death	182
Capital Property	182
"Capital property of a deceased taxpayer – Sec. 70(5)"	183
Should you Send Capital Property Through a Sec. 70(5) Disposition?	184
Valuing Capital Property	184
POLICY STATEMENT ON BUSINESS EQUITY VALUATIONS	187
IC 89-3 August 25, 1989	187
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	192
Valuation of Shares of a Corporation Receiving Life Insurance Proceeds on Death of a Shareholder	192
IT-416R3	192
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	193
Capital Property Owned on December 31, 1971 - Actual Cost of Property Owned by a Testamentary Trust	193
IT-130	193
Who acquires under Sec. 70(5)	193
Avoiding the Disposition	194
Resulting Trusts	195
Bare Trusts Arising on Sales	200
Buy-Sell Agreements as Trusts	202
"Fair market value – Sec. 70(5.3)"	203
Avoiding Sec. 70(5.3)	203
Avoiding Sec. 70(5.3) and the Buy-Sell	206
Powers of Appointment	208
Forgiving Debt	214
Subject: Debts Bequeathed or Forgiven on Death	215
IT-382 Date: June 20, 1977	215
Creation of Legal Life Interests	215
"Life estates in real property – Sec. 43.1(1)"	215
"Exchanges of property – Sec. 43.1(2)"	215
Eligible Capital Property and Resource Property	219
"Eligible capital property of deceased – Sec. 70(5.1)"	221
"Resource properties and land inventories of a deceased taxpayer – Sec. 70(5.2)"	222
Subject: Eligible Capital Property - Deceased Persons	223
IT-344R Date: May 8, 1987	223
Subject: Income of Deceased Persons - Resource Properties	224
IT-329R Date: September 26, 1983	224
Periodic Payments and Rights and Things	225
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	228
Income of Deceased Persons -- Periodic Payments and Investment Tax Credit	228
IT-210R2	228
"Amounts receivable – Sec. 70(2)"	231
The Election	231
"Rights or things transferred to beneficiaries – Sec. 70(3)"	232
"Idem, where s. 70(3) applies – Sec. 69(1.1)"	232
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	232
Returns of Deceased Persons as "Another Person"	232
IT-326R3	232
The Roll-Through	238
"Idem, where s. 70(3) applies – Sec. 69(1.1)"	238
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	239
Income of Deceased Persons - Rights or Things	239
IT-212R3	239
Trust Interests: Special Issues	243
The Testamentary Trust Income Beneficiary Separate Return	243
"Testamentary trusts – Sec. 104(23)"	244
Conditions Precedent	244

Distributions to Non-Residents	246
Reintroduction of Inter Vivos Trust Income Interest Cost?	247
Avoidance.	248
Some Case Law on Sales of Rights or Things.	249
The Extinguishment of Debt on Rights or Things as a Condition Precedent.	251
Variations.	252
More Trust Rights.	253
The Question of Assent.	254
Partnership Interests on Death, Separate Returns	254
"Death of partner or proprietor – Sec. 150(4)"	255
Dispositions during the Executor's Year	256
Where disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer – Sec. 164(6)	257
Non-Residents	259
 Testamentary Spousal Transfers and Trusts	 261
A General Overview.	261
"Where transfer or distribution to spouse or spouse trust – Sec. 70(6)"	261
Disclaimers, Renunciations and Allocation Powers.	263
"Occurrences as a consequence of death. – Sec. 248(8)"	264
Until the Transfer is Made: Questions of Spousal Residency, Interest Acquisitions and C.C.A.	267
Creation of the Trust.	272
Not with Variations.	273
Indefeasibly Vest.	274
A Very Limited and Focused Definition of Indefeasibly Vested for Spousal Capture	281
"Vested indefeasibly – Sec. 248(9.2)"	281
" Narrow " Indefeasible Vesting and the Relief Acts.	281
Subject: Meaning of "Vested Indefeasibly"	283
IT-449R Date: September 25, 1987	283
Dependent's Relief Acts	286
"How trust created – 248(9.1)"	287
Family Law Act/Matrimonial Property Act Applications.	288
"Matrimonial regimes – Sec. 248(22)"	288
"Dissolution of a matrimonial regime – Sec. 248(23)"	288
"Transfers after death – Sec. 248(23.1)"	289
Severing Ownership Interests on the Roll-over	291
Buy-Sell Agreements.	292
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	296
Buy-sell agreements	296
IT-140R3	296
The Need to "Transfer or Distribute"	297
The Use of Testamentary Options and those Dangerous Words "Buy" and "Sell"	304
On or after his death and as a consequence thereof and its implications	310
Spousal Entitlement.	313
"Income of a trust in certain provisions – Sec. 108(3)"	313
No Need for A Sec. 104(13) Inclusion.	313
Powers of Encroachment and Effects on Income	315
Remarriage Clauses.	315
Spousal Trust Income and Entitlements to Receive or Enforce a Distribution.	315
Structuring out Income Potential.	322
Access to Capital.	324
Constructive Receipt.	326
The Spouse as Trustee.	327
Indirect Receipt of Capital.	330
Powers of Encroachment/Advancement/Appointment in Respect of Access to Capital	330
Poor Drafting.	331
Timing of Vesting.	332
The Roll-Over	338
Structured Payments to the Estate/Trust by the Beneficiaries.	339

Subsection 70(6.2) Fair Market Value Deemed Disposition Elections	341
“Election – Sec. 70(6.2)”	341
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	342
Testamentary Spouse Trusts	342
IT-305R4	342
 Tainted Spousal Trusts	354
The “Taint”	354
The Exception	355
“Trust not disqualified – Sec. 104(4)”	356
“Special rules applicable in respect of trust for benefit of spouse – Sec. 70(7)”	356
“Meaning of certain expressions in s. (7) – Sec. 70(8)”	357
Testamentary Debt	358
Non-qualifying Debt	359
Structuring around the Definitions	360
The Listing Process	362
Eligible Property	363
Excessive Listings and Arbitrary Reductions	366
Filing.....	367
Subject: “Tainted” Spouse Trusts	367
IT-207R Date: March 26, 1979.....	367
 Deemed Dispositions	372
“Deemed disposition by trust – Sec. 104(4)”	374
“Depreciable property – Sec. 104(5)”	378
“Election – Sec. 104(5.3)”	379
“Revocation of election – Sec. 104(5.31)”	383
“Exempt beneficiary – Sec. 104(5.4)”	384
“Beneficiary – Sec. 104(5.5)”	384
“Designated contributor – Sec. 104(5.6)”	385
“Idem – Sec. 104(5.7)”	387
“Trust transfers – Sec. 104(5.8)”	387
“Trusts in favour of spouse, common-law partner or self – Sec. 107(4)”	390
 Principal Residence Trust Transfers	392
“Disposal of principal residence to spouse or trust for spouse. – Sec. 40(4)”	395
“Where principal residence is property of trust for spouse. - Sec. 40(5)”	395
“Distribution of principal residence – Sec. 107(2.01)”	395
Spousal Recipients	396
“Property in satisfaction of interest in trust - Sec. 40(7)”	397
Principal Residence - Transfer to Spouse, Spouse Trust or Certain Other Individuals	399
IT-366R Date: May 4, 1984	399
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	401
Ownership of Property (Principal Residence)	401
IT-437R	401
DATE: February 21, 1994.....	401
SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT	401
Changes in Use and the Deemed Disposition	406
 Reserves on Death	408
“Reserves, etc., for year of death – Sec. 72(1)”	408
“Election by legal representative and transferee re reserves – Sec. 72(2)”	409
 Deductibility of Executor, Trustee, and Probate Fees.....	412

Effect on Trust Law Income Filters Through, in Splintering	417
Trustee Income and the Alteration in Character of Trust Income Payable to "Beneficiaries"	417
And the Trustee acts For....?	433
Subject: Director's, Executor's and Juror's Fees	434
IT-377R Date: January 27, 1989	434
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin	435
NO.:	435
IT-99R5 (Consolidated)	435
DATE: See Bulletin Revisions section	435
Legal and Accounting Fees	435
 The Basic Mechanics of the Recognition of Trust Income under Subsection 104(6)-(13),(24)	444
The Initial General Overview.	444
The Subsection 104(13) Inclusion.....	444
"Income of beneficiary – Sec. 104(13)"	445
"Testamentary trusts – Sec. 104(23)"	446
Non-Resident Trusts with Resident Beneficiaries and Differing Income Bases	448
Payments Made in Error.	449
"Income of beneficiary – Sec. 104(13)"	450
"Deduction in computing income of trust – Sec. 104(6)"	450
The Trust's Subsection 104(6) Deduction.	455
Indirect Payment to Minors – CRA's Interpretation	455
Payments Made by a Trust for the Benefit of a Minor Beneficiary	455
The Beneficiary Deduction of Trust Interest Cost.	457
"Income interest in trust - Sec. 106(1)"	457
Deduction for Upkeep Benefits for Non-residents.	457
Restrictions and Deductions re: Non-resident Beneficiaries.	457
"Non-resident beneficiary – Sec. 104(7)"	458
Possible Double Inclusions.....	460
When an Amount becomes Payable	461
"Amount payable – Sec. 104(24)"	463
"Retroactive" Income Entitlements.	463
Lawyers' Trust Accounts During Litigation.	464
Trustee Confusion as to Receipt Character.	465
Ignorance of the Beneficiary of his Rights.....	465
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	466
Trusts - Income Payable to Beneficiaries	466
IT-342R	466
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	469
Lawyers' trust accounts and disbursements	469
IT-129R	469
General Comments.	471
Payments in Error or Embezzlements.....	472
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	474
Gains from Theft, Defalcation or Embezzlement	474
IT-256R	474
Minor Income Entitlements.....	475
"Trust for minor – Sec. 104(18)"	475
"Technical News No. 11	482
September 30, 1997	482
Payments Made by a Trust for the Benefit of a Minor Beneficiary	482
Executors' Year and During Estate Administration w/ Specific and Residuary Bequests.	483
The Trust as A Conduit.	494
"Interpretation – Sec. 108(5)"	495
Constructive Receipt.	495
 The Subsection 104(13.1) & (13.2) Income Payable Fine Tuning.....	497

The Problem and Solution	497
Capital Gain Recognition	498
"Idem – Sec. 104(13.2)"	499
Income Recognition	500
"Amounts deemed not paid – Sec. 104(13.1)"	501
Questions About the Apportioning Base	501
Uses and Abuses	502
Amended Previously Filed Trust Returns and Can the "Abuse" be Condoned by the Court	504
Trust Law Considerations and Tax Law Repercussions	506
 Trust Benefits	 509
"Benefits under trust – Sec. 105(1)"	509
The Now-Not-So-New Integration	509
Double Taxation	510
Inapplicable to Non-residents	510
Value Inclusions	510
The Two Forms of Benefit	511
The Sec. 53(2)(h) Exemptions	512
"Cost Integration of Capital Interest in Trust – Sec. 53(2)(h)"	514
Interest Free Loans and other Benefits	516
Personal Property Use	517
"Benefits" to Settlers	517
In Relation to Upkeep Benefits	518
Transfers of Income Rights	518
Extra Payments for Taxes	519
Powers of Appointment	519
Disclaimers	522
Problems with C.C.A.	522
Differences in Income Recognition	523
Testamentary Forgiving of Debt and Commuting of Income Interests	523
Loans through Trusts	524
Property Upkeep Benefits	525
"Upkeep, etc. – Sec. 105(2)"	528
 Trust Law Income Payable v. Tax Law Income Payable: A degree of reconciliation	 530
Capital Cost Allowance and Depreciation	530
Accounting Losses	534
Liquidity and Payment in Specie	535
Debt and Indemnification	537
When Amounts are not Actually Payable	537
Beneficiary by Beneficiary Allocation	539
 The Preferred Beneficiary Election	 542
The Problem	542
"Deduction of amounts included in preferred beneficiaries' incomes – Sec. 104(12)"	543
"Election by trust and preferred beneficiary – Sec. 104(14)"	543
"Allocable amount for preferred beneficiary – Sec. 104(15)"	544
The Election and Who May Make it	545
Definition: "preferred beneficiary" – Sec. 108(1)	546
Definition: "settlor"	547
Definition: "accumulating income"	548
"Regulations 2800 of the Income Tax Regulations"	549
"Late, amended or revoked election – Sec. 104(14.01)"	549
"Late, amended or revoked election – Sec. 104(14.02)"	550
Subsequent Adjusted Cost Base Reductions	550
The OLD Preferred Beneficiary Election	550

Subject: Preferred Beneficiary Election	551
IT-394R Date: July 14, 1989	551
The Preferred Beneficiary	554
Of Testamentary Trusts	556
Of Inter Vivos Trusts	556
No need for Property to be Retained	556
Joint Spousal Settlers	557
Losing and Gaining the Settlor Status	557
Residency	557
Subject: Meaning of "Settlor"	558
IT-374 Date: May 16, 1977	558
Accumulating Income	559
Spousal Trusts	560
Subject: Preferred Beneficiary's Election	561
ATR-34 Date: October 28, 1988	561
Non-Spousal Non-Discretionary Trusts	563
The General Loose Wording	563
As a Class	564
Entitled to What Income?	565
"Earned for the Benefit of"	565
A Multitude of Classes	567
Discretionary Powers over Indirect Application	567
Non-Class Members Entitlements	568
Latent and Previous Exercises of Powers	569
"Discretionary" Trusts	569
Various Powers	570
Various Ways Powers can Have Effect	570
"Discretionary Shares" under the Regulations	571
Entitlements "Arising" Upon Death	571
The Scenarios	572
Subject: Preferred Beneficiary Election on Accumulating Income of Estate	575
ATR-30 Date: May 9, 1988	575
The Worst and Last Case Scenario	576
Filing	577
Regulation 2800 Elections in Respect of Accumulating Incomes of Trusts	577
Electing as a Condition Precedent	578
Distribution of Funds	578
Income Attribution	578
 Income Payable to Non-Residents and Part XII.2 Tax	 580
The Old Rules	580
The Not-So-New Rules	580
The Trust Target	580
The Exceptions	582
Trusts not Contaminated with Designated Beneficiaries	582
"Application of Part – Section 210.1"	584
"Where no designated beneficiaries – Sec. 210.3(1)"	584
Designated Beneficiaries with Part I Liability	584
The Tax and Its Bases	585
"Designated beneficiary – Section 210"	585
Designated Income: First Base	586
"Designated income – Sec. 210.2(2)"	587
The Income of the Trust: Second Base	587
"Tax on income of trust – Sec. 210.2(1)"	588
The Third Base	588
Filing and Payment	589
>Returns – Sec. 210.2(5)"	589
"Liability of trustee – Sec. 210.5(6)"	589

The Final Integration: Resident Beneficiary Tax Credits.....	590
“Tax deemed paid by beneficiary – Sec. 210.2(3)”	590
“Where beneficiary deemed not designated – Sec. 210.3(2)”	591
“Designations in respect of partnerships – Sec. 210.2(4)”	591
“Provisions applicable to Part – Sec. 210.2(7)”	592
“Tax under Part XII.2 – Sec. 104(30)”	592
“Idem – Sec. 104(31)”	592
Part Year Resident Trusts & Beneficiaries.	592
Benefits to Non-Residents and N.R.O.I.C's.	592
“Where property owned for non-residents – Sec. 104(10)”	594
“Dividend received from non-resident owned investment corporation – Sec. 104(11)”	594
 Income Attribution – Non Reversionary Trusts.	 595
An Overview of the General Rules.	595
“Transfers and loans to spouse or common-law partner – Sec. 74.1(1)”	598
“Transfers and loans to minors – Sec. 74.1(2)”	598
“Repayment of existing indebtedness – Sec. 74.1(3)”	598
“Gain or loss deemed that of lender or transferor 74.2 – Sec. 74.2(1)”	599
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	600
Interspousal and Certain Other Transfers and Loans of Property	600
IT-511R	600
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	611
Transfers and loans of property made after May 22, 1985 to a related minor	611
IT-510	611
Attribution of Income Received From a Trust.....	615
“Transfers or loans to a trust – Sec. 74.3(1)”	616
Definition of “designated person”	616
“excluded consideration”	617
“Transfers and loans to corporations – Sec. 74.4(2)”	617
The Two Different Treatments.	618
The Attribution Bases.	619
“Transfers or loans to a trust”	619
Altering the Type of Recognition.	619
Spousal Gains and Losses Attribution.	620
Three Interesting Points.	621
Income Tax Ruling - ATR-70.....	622
Creation of a trust for the benefit of a minor. April 17, 1978.....	622
Subsection 74.4(2).....	623
The Purpose Test.....	624
The Amount Attributed.	624
The Trust Exemption.	624
“Benefit not granted to a designated person – Sec. 74.4(4)”	625
General Exemptions and Modified Anti-avoidance.	626
Fair Market Value Transfers and Loans.	626
“Transfers for fair market consideration – Sec. 74.5(1)”	627
“Loans for value – Sec. 74.5(2)”	628
Marriage Breakdowns.....	628
“Spouses or common-law partners living apart – Sec. 74.5(3)”	628
“Idem – Sec. 74.5(4)”	629
Certain Other Exemptions.	629
“Where ss. 74.1 to 74.3 do not apply – Sec. 74.5(12)”	629
Anti-Avoidance.....	630
Intermediate Parties.....	630
“Back to back loans and transfers”	630
“Outstanding amount – Sec. 74.4(3)”	630
Loan Guarantees.	631
“Guarantees”	631
Disallowance from Relying on their Rules of The Game.	632

“Artificial transactions”	632
"Where an Individual has transferred or loaned..."	632
Subsections 56(2), (4).	635
"Indirect payments – Sec. 56(2)"	635
"Transfer of rights to income – Sec. 56(4)"	638
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	639
Transfer of Rights to Income	639
IT-440R2	639
 Reversionary Trusts and Income Attribution.....	 644
“Trusts – Sec. 75(2)”	645
Reversions.....	646
Powers to Direct Beneficial or Legal Interests.	647
Dispositive Vetoes/Disposal Powers.....	649
Some Case Law.	650
Income/Loss Doubling.....	664
Fair Market Value Distributions.....	669
"Where subsection 75(2) applicable to trust – Sec. 107(4.1)"	670
Uses and Abuses.....	671
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	673
Attribution of Trust Income to Settlor	673
IT-369R	673
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	675
S.R. Attribution of Trust Income to Settlor (Revision to it369r dated March 12, 1990)	675
IT-369RSR	675
Transfer of funds to trusts with minor beneficiaries.	677
ATR-80 March 19, 1979	677
 Taxable Capital Gains.....	 678
The General Situation.....	678
"Taxable capital gains – Sec. 104(21)"	679
"Late, amended or revoked designation – Sec. 104(21.01)"	681
"Late, amended or revoked designation – Sec. 104(21.02)"	681
"Late, amended or revoked designation – Sec. 104(21.03)"	681
"Beneficiary's taxable capital gain – Sec. 104(21.1)"	682
"Taxable capital gain – Sec. 104(21.2)"	682
"Capital gains of trust determined – Sec. 104(21.3)"	684
Certain Problems with The General Mechanics vis-a-vis Trust Law Entitlements.	684
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	685
Trusts -- Capital Gains and Losses and the Flow-Through of Taxable Capital Gains to Beneficiaries	685
IT-381R3	685
 Dividends.....	 695
The General Rules.	695
The Case Law as to Entitlements to Alternate Forms.....	696
Stock Dividends.....	703
Capital Dividends & Tax Free Dividends.....	704
Qualified Dividends.....	705
Subsection 104(19) Taxable Dividend Flow Through Designations.....	706
"Taxable dividends – Sec. 104(19)"	708
Taxable Dividends Received From Foreign Affiliates.....	709
Part IV Tax.	709
Subsection 104(20) Non-Taxable Dividend Designations.....	711
"Designation in respect of nontaxable dividends – Sec. 104(20)"	713
and "Loss Limitations."	713
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	715

Losses on Shares on Which Dividends Have Been Received	715
IT-328R3	715
Capital Cost Allowance and Depreciation.....	721
Common Law Tests for Depreciation Deduction.....	721
Usufructuaries.....	724
Common Law C.C.A. Tests	725
Equitably Compelled to Deduct C.C.A.	726
Two Ways to Reduce Taxable Income Inclusions.....	727
Possible Effective Double Income Inclusions	728
Interest Income.....	731
Alterations in Reporting.....	732
The Three Year Rule.....	732
Interest Deductions – Inside, and Outside the Trust.....	734
Limited Deductibility: Interest on Succession Duties.....	738
Subject: Interest on Death Duties	738
IT-203 Date: February 24, 1975	738
Thin Capitalization.....	738
Withholding Tax and Alternate Income Elections.....	741
The Basic Charges	741
“Estate or trust income – Sec. 212(1)(c)”	741
Eliminating the Conduit Principle.....	742
“Payment to beneficiary as income of trust – Sec. 212(11)”.....	742
An Example Of Recent Case On “Paid Or Credited” Vs. “Payable”	742
Beneficial Ownership and the Treaties.....	752
Alternate Reporting re: Rents and Royalties.....	755
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	757
Election Re: Tax on Rents and Timber Royalties Non-Residents	757
IT-393R2	757
Non-resident Trusts.....	763
“Application of certain provisions to trusts not resident in Canada – Sec. 94(1)”.....	763
“Obligations – Sec. 94(2)”.....	765
“Deduction in computing taxable income – Sec. 94(3)”.....	765
“Deduction from foreign accrual property income – Sec. 94(4)”.....	765
“Adjusted cost base of capital interest in trust – Sec. 94(5)”	765
“Where financial assistance given – Sec. 94(6)”.....	766
“Beneficially interested – Sec. 248(25)”	766
Beneficially Interested Taxpayers.....	766
Foreign Resident Trust Acquirors: The Primary Target.....	767
Certain Exempt Trust Acquirors.....	769
Interest Acquisitions: The Secondary Target.....	771
Discretionary Trust Income Tax Liability.....	773
An Interesting Deduction.....	773
Deemed Double Residency.....	774
The Beneficiary's Liability.....	775
Non Discretionary Trusts.....	776
F.A.P.I. Inclusions: Who Recognizes the Tax Consequences.....	776
Another Similarly Interesting Deduction.....	778
Dealing in Foreign Affiliate Trust Interests.....	779
Some Relevant Overall Considerations	780
Offshore Investment Funds.....	780
“Offshore investment fund property – Sec. 94.1(1)”.....	780

“designated cost”	782
“non-resident entity”	782
“Interpretation – Sec. 94.1(3)”	783
“eligible trust”	783
“entity”	783
“exempt trust”	783
 Trust Interests	 785
Fiscal Hybrids	785
“capital interest” – Section 108 Definitions”	786
“income interest” – Section 108 Definitions”	786
Prescribed Trusts	789
Rights to Receive Indirectly	790
During Estate Administration	791
Five Basic Characteristics of Trust Interests	791
Discretionary Interests	794
Powers of Appointment	805
Options and Equitable Charges	809
“Beneficial Interests.”	814
“Beneficially interested – Sec. 248(25)”	814
 Costs of Income and Capital Interests	 821
Income Interests	821
“Cost of income interest in a trust – Sec. 106(1.1)”	821
Testamentary Transfers of Existing Interests	822
Interests Created on a Death or Inter Vivos	824
Costs Incurred verses the Cost of An Interest	825
Cost Inflation	825
Capital Interests	826
“Cost of capital interest in a trust – Sec. 107(1.1)”	827
Interests Acquired as Gifts	827
To Whom is Consideration Paid?	828
Adjusted Cost Base Adjustments	829
Section 94 Non-Resident Trusts	829
Section 94.1 Offshore Investment Funds	831
Valuation Costs	832
Purchase of Interests in Non-resident Trusts: Taxable Canadian Property Cost Bump Restrictions	833
The Subparagraph 53(2)(h) Distribution Adjustments	834
“Cost Integration of Capital Interest in Trust – Sec. 53(2)(h)”	836
 Dispositions of Capital Interests	 843
Tax Cost Attribution for Disposition Purposes	846
“Disposition by taxpayer of capital interest – Sec. 107(1)”	846
“Cost amount” of Capital Interests	850
“Cost of capital interest in a trust – Sec. 107(1.1)”	851
“cost amount” – Sec. 108”	852
Alterations in Residency by Both Beneficiary and Trust: Effects on ACB and Other Issues	855
Bumping the ACB	857
Corporate Disponers and the Effect of Dividends	859
Partial Dispositions	860
Capital Cost Allowance Increases Gains without Relief	861
Spousal Cost Bumping?	862
 Disposition of Income Interests	 863
“Disposition by taxpayer of income interest – Sec. 106(2)”	865

“Proceeds of disposition of income interest – Sec. 106(3)”	866
Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin.....	869
Disposition of an Income Interest in a Trust	869
IT-385R2	869
Satisfying Property Distributions.	871
“Proceeds of disposition of income interest – Sec. 106(3)”	872
Subject: Winding-up of an Estate	874
ATR-3 Date: November 29, 1985	874
 Distribution of Income.	 877
The Subsection 106(1) Deduction.....	877
“Income interest in trust – Sec. 106(1)”	878
Deductible Cost vs. Deductible Expenses	879
Distributions to Non-Residents.....	882
Royalties and N.R.O.I.C.s.	883
Pre-1949 Non-resident Trusts	883
 Income or Capital Distributions.....	 886
Foreign Trust Distributions.....	891
 Capital Distributions by Personal Trusts.....	 896
“Distribution by personal trust – Sec. 107(2)”.....	897
““eligible offset” – Sec. 108(1)”	901
“Fractional interests – Sec. 107.4(2.1)”	901
“Cost of capital interest in a trust – Sec. 107(1.1)”	901
Tax Free Dispositions by the Trust.	903
Cost Integration.	903
The Cost Bump and Beneficiary's Proceeds of Disposition	904
The Effect of Debt or Other Obligations Assumed.	904
More analysis of debt and distributions.	907
The Applicability of Sec. 69(1)(c).....	910
Deductibility of Distribution Costs.....	911
Capture of Accrued Tax Consequences by Cdn. Resident Trusts or Non-Resident Trust Beneficiaries	911	911
“No rollover on election by a trust – Sec. 107(2.001)”	911
“No rollover on election by a beneficiary – Sec. 107(2.002)”	911
“Other distributions – Sec. 107(2.1)”	912
“Gains not distributed to beneficiaries – Sec. 107(2.11)”	916
Subject: Distribution of all of the Property of an Estate	917
ATR-38 Date: July 10, 1989	917
Distributions from Spousal Trusts.....	919
“Trusts in favour of spouse, common-law partner or self – Sec. 107(4)”	919
Reversionary Trust Distributions.	922
“Where subsection 75(2) applicable to trust – Sec. 107(4.1)”	923
Capital Distributions to Non-Residents.	925
“Distribution to non-resident – Sec. 107(5)”	926
Loss Reductions.	927
“Loss reduction – Sec. 107(6)”	929
Indirect Distributions, Benefits and Commutations.	930
Clearance Certificates.	932
Some Points on Apportioning Tax Liabilities in Estate/Trust law	937
Tax Payment Arrangements and Deductions.....	938
“Election where certain provisions applicable – Sec. 159(5)”	940
“Idem – Sec. 159(5.1)”	940
“Idem – Sec. 159(6)”	940
“Certificate before distribution – Sec. 159(2)”	941
“Personal liability – Sec. 159(3)”	941

“Appropriation of property – Sec. 159(3.1)”	941
Subject: Estate or Trust Distributions - Clearance Certificates	941
IT-282R Date: August 3, 1976	941
“Qualifying disposition – Sec. 107.4(1)”	945
“Application of paragraph (1)(a) – Sec. 107.4(2)”	946
“Tax consequences of qualifying dispositions – Sec. 107.4(3)”	947
Specie Distributions and the Fair Market Value of Interests.	951

Disclaimers, Powers, and Methods of Varying the Trust Setting.....	954
Disclaimers and Releases	955
Income Attribution.	963
Severable Interests.....	964
Retractions.....	965
Consideration for Disclaimers.	967
Renunciations and Releases.....	968
Dispositive Powers.	969
Powers of Appointment.....	969
Retraction of Erroneous Exercises of Powers of Appointment.....	981
Powers of Advancement.....	981
Powers of Encroachment.	985
Variation of Trusts Statutes and the Common Law Rule of Saunders v. Vautier.....	986
Trust Variation Loss Continuity, Interest Valuation, and Variation Expense Deductibility	995
“Variation of trust – Sec. 108(6)”	1001
“Trust-to-trust transfers – Sec. 248(25.1)”	1002
““disposition” – Sec. 248(1)”	1002

Disclaimer

This publication is given away with the understanding that the author is not responsible for the results of any actions taken on the basis of information in this work nor errors or omissions and that the author is not engaged in the business of rendering legal, accounting or other services. The author expressly disclaims any and all liability to any person whether a purchaser of this work or not in respect of anything and of the consequences of anything done or omitted to be done by any person in reliance, whether in whole or in part, on the whole or part of the content of this publication. If legal advice or other expert assistance is required the services of a competent professional person should be sought.

Kim Scott Neufeld JD's "Book".

This "book" came from someone. It came more from Kim Scott Neufeld, JD than from me. Kim Scott Neufeld is the only "thing" I had when I wrote it. I just did the "play" iz all...

And if you don't think it's one of two things that will cause a writer in the late 80's/early 90's to spend all his time in the library following the legal Amazon "upstream", waiting for a yes, get it right, mere 16 megahertz computer to spell check an estimated 650 pgs of Wordperfect DOS, replete with case names – that will slow you right down, to think - (garnered the old fashion way of photocopying in the library and marking for the series of typists, some of who were really proficient) then you're not too intelligent. By the way, being "crazy", the other one, isn't it. (I had to try to catch up to a Close-Encounters-Of-The-Third-Kind "spaceship", starting with a mere Chevy Chevette...knowing I was completely "certain".)

So while you read this (in areas slightly outdated now unfortunately) I hope you can appreciate who it actually came from, and what caused it. After all, I could only do my best, for the best. Kim Neufeld, JD, solely, prepared my mind for everything I encountered in my life, as the journey of a thousand miles started with one, with frantic complete abandon, step...

Of "Tax";

"Love isn't "commanded" or "earned", like respect. It simply arises when so so many things are perfect. It doesn't depend on "what you do" but "who you are" instead. It's "particular" in its detail and completely, permanently, opens the senses. It arises not because the person wants it to happen, but because nothing else can. It weathers slur, mockery, bold-faced contempt and when that's all that's wanted, then nothing else in the entire World matters: it's one sided. It happens without condition and it blindly doesn't even look for imperfections, demanding "So what!". It causes tears of happiness, when no one is looking, and when the person arises in the morning it only asks how they can honour more who they have found, sometimes "turning whole libraries upside down". It causes the most rational of mind to talk out loud to itself. With it you cannot "live more" and without it, well, I don't remember the time it didn't exist. It's a domain of deep sighs and endless thoughts... It doesn't ask needless questions. Mere matters of the flesh aren't remembered "yesterday" since form is never enough, but love will allow you to "fall down an elevator shaft and enjoy all the bumps". When the entire World turns cold, its elements, its hardships, its reputations, its history, it will still keep a person going. And in the meantime it proves to you on a daily basis "what a wonderful World it is" as it takes it over. It will cause Sinead O'Conner to state that "nothing compares" as well as getting Willie Nelson to "always have it on his mind". It's always a celebration replete with regalia and pageantry. It brings out 'the crazy' in any person "infected" and if left to run its course completely morphizes them to ends not foreseen. It will compel you to forever feel "23" and it prevents your compassion from limiting your passion. It carries with it all the virtues, selectively applied, that benefit the World and none that take, purposively, from it. Infatuation is fickle, until the next novelty, but love lasts and lasts decades, even in absence making that a true test and the latter can cause miracles while the former can cause catastrophes. And these are words and meanings which you will not find in sequence in a library, or, in a movie/TV show."

~ Some dude who used to "peel up" Peel, in Montreal, and "blow down" Redpath, with "chicken legs" on a dexterous mountain bike ~

Foreword

This research results from not being able to get enough. (... I'm sometimes like that with people.)

Humans try and are rational throughout most of their lives. Economists speak of it and when most awake in their morning they have their day "planned" because of their version of "certainty" they have come to understand. This research was the result of not being able to, effectively, get enough certainty.¹

And finitely measured "certainty" is what our civilizations are founded on. I tried to get as much as possible by reading as much as possible since our World is measured in our court-rooms. This topic happened to be the Canadian income taxation of trusts, estates and testamentary planning spoken of, to various qualities, in a few tons of paper photocopied and speed-reading many irrelevant head-notes and in some cases feet of unindexed case reporters, as well as, as of course, relevant cases (it's amazing how things "collide..."). I chose trusts because of Lloyd Raphael's 1982 "Taxation of Trusts" that was out of date by the time I read it in 1987 (I was consuming everything I could get on income tax at that time: "if I could be like that, just for one day, I'd do anything...") and that trusts by their nature are, in my opinion, the most flexible legal 'creatures', if I can ascribe a personality to them, that our ITA has to attend to. The same was being started for partnerships and joint ventures when I stopped in early 1993. This is the updated work to the Office Consolidation of our ITA as at December 2013 with what I think are "substantially all" the directly relevant cases from the chosen Commonwealth countries of Canada, the U.K., Australia and New Zealand. I chose these countries to examine since they all have an English common-law heritage and consequently their tax law must attend to it, like ours. This also contains new footnoted material in the form of Dept. of Finance pronouncements ('non-descript' as they may be) on the introduction of the legislation, references to numerous periodical pieces (principally from the Canadian Tax Journal – mostly available on-line, and Estates, Trusts and Pensions Journal), as well as cases that have occurred in the cited Commonwealth since last printing (March 2011) (generally approx. 117 not previously commented on, Secretariat on the quarter-lap) and, more analysis of the principles spoken of in the 3rd edition. Somehow it has been lengthened by approx. 190 pages so I must have done something. A hard-copy is not available for sale so download at will for free from Google Books.

Unfortunately, this compendium speaks only of the income taxation of common-law trusts, estates and beneficiaries and though there may be some incidental application to the Quebec civil law environment I didn't try and capture that World as well. I thus encourage driven, knowledgeable and capable researchers to provide their own "copyrightable" opinion to the public forum (Google Books) on how our ITA applies to their environment.

Our Income Tax Act is a back-bone of how our government of the day provides a finite amount of benefits to our population to ensure that the cruel dark World spoken of by the actor Russell Crowe in "Gladiator" does not imperil the standards of our lives. We don't go to witch-doctors on dirt paths, unprotected, with chicken in hand after a neighbouring marauder has inflicted harm on us.²

We tax because we care – about, ourselves as a community, and it is that simple.

We used to hear about "loop-holes" an awful lot. I have a phrase "Just because you can doesn't mean you should" that reflects a lot on what Revenue Quebec also tried to pronounce in attaching an ethical obligation to its reporting compliance television ads in the mid-90's. (I was once amused in a small Vancouver convenience store when I read a landed immigrant owner's note to his customers in a nook-in-the-wall convenience store, attended to religiously by both parties (on Carrol Street – you may find the same on the counter in same across from Dominion Square on Peel in Mtl.), which was to the effect that "Everyone Fears the Police, No one Fears God.") I hardly remember any of a particular professor's course that he taught at Concordia University in the early 90's when he spoke of "trying to obey the Ten Commandments": it was a pleasure to watch a B.Comm teacher speak of a religion, in a business law class, since there are always several levels of rules in any society. But, income tax is a positivism strain of law. And when money is the blood of modern life, while our heart tells us where to put it, counting on ever cell is important. And laws with their peculiarities must apply to “the rich”, like “the poor”.

¹ Some do find "certainty" only once in a lifetime as was described in The Bridges of Madison County.

² ...unless they've harmed your chicken

With this in mind, this is why this research takes such an offensive approach: it tries to find loop-holes (tactical – “Tarzan swinging on vines”, and substantive: “mismatches” between underlying and tax), and it’s not shy. Like a blood-hound looking for the skunk it sometimes tries to introduce cases that have bearing that have not come to light in Canada. I purposefully took the approach of staying off the beaten path of regular planning where the industry is flooded with so-called summarized “editorial comment” etc. and only wanted to know of how our ITA broke down. This is certainly not a “how-to” book for juniors replete with check lists and other “filler” generally available on the internet etc. but instead seeks to introduce cases and issues that have not been examined in detail for those who can appreciate the balance of what they are reading – read that other material generally available on the topic first: read this last, and hopefully you’ll remember me and this as the one who told you “stuff” the others didn’t. You’ll thus understand that I have no interest in what CRA Rulings has stated here and there except to elaborate on their general opinion embodied in their ITs/ICs/ATRs/TNs: I concerned myself only with what the judges have said.

I did this because arguments don’t happen when there is clarity/certainty, nor do Acts evolve until there has been systematic or material testing of their possible deficiencies (either in the hands of legislators or the population). Rulings is but one side of the issue, a judge’s opinion always ranks. I once said to a Manager in CRA Rulings that “Problems don’t go away just because you ignore them.” So, like Nathan Bedford Forrest, the Confederate Commander, who I later came to understand, “get there first, with the most [thought]”: find the flaws, pronounce them, and like pesky Jack Nicholson said of absolutely fabulous works-of-wonder called “women” in “The Witches of Eastwick”, ask “was it intentional, or was it a mistake, because if it was a mistake, maybe we can do something about it!” Jump the gun, analyze/show the argument before it happens and let the legislators hopefully evolve the universe. Provisions crack on commas, words are missed, misused or poorly added, judges try and give us certainty when so little of it exists in Canada on this subject and for a brief period of a few years I initially enjoyed the 4:00 AM silence of tossing handfuls of the finite universe of common-law trust and estate variables at the dance of our Act to see if it would falter. Many times it didn’t; many times it did.

And maybe if I find enough of them first, I too will be the first to close that many of them....which is the primary purpose of my research, from “the outside”.³

R.E. Lee was once bothered by the conundrum of being a good commander: “In order to save the ones you love, you have to sometimes cause the death of the ones you love.” I choose not to actually practice this particular sport since it would bother my conscience. (I enjoy a considerable freedom in my opinion, choosing to “put myself out-there, to be proven wrong” and practice as “an artist” rather than “a painter..”) Some would say that I’m the one who “builds the snow-balls that are thrown”: I think, would you rather hear it from me, or someone who gets into an argument with CRA/Justice over actual facts and presents it to a Judge. Is it not better to “prove” the battle without having to have it? Is it not better to “point out The Emperor’s new clothes” before “it happens”? Is it not in the interest of everyone to acutely scrutinize our fiscal laws to make them better? Finance counsel do “drink coffee at the same Tim Hortons” as us: they too, take breaks. And with regard to this superficial argument of “snow-balls”, I hope you can accept that I don’t write the statute law and I don’t judge its contested application to a fact situation: this is the way it is and this is what others have said about it. And I’d find it unethical to advise and charge a client for this given the public money I enjoyed to compose it in the form of: sidewalks, a well-stocked string of university and court-house libraries, a Montreal General Hospital doctor over a bike accident, cheap photocopies all over the place, sometimes EI – and of course earnings spent on typists, and all those other minute incidents of public finance Canadians may not understand how they come to them: I never did like “big cars or long cigars” as “a hillbilly” song called

³ No one likes to see an Act fail: it insults the integrity of all those who hope it applies to them equally, as well as those technically-and non-technically-inclined who brought it into existence. Our Acts, of which this is one, must apply to those wealthy enough to pay those to “professionally” look for $320 M problems, as well, equally. I’m not sure of the cost of building the hospital and staffing it, where I was born, but I’m pretty sure that it was less than $320 M, as they’ve handled their share of substance abuse victims.

“Was I Right or Wrong?” would rhyme. I just want to make our ITA better by questioning it. And rather than stumble over a Sec. 85(1) filing extension problem as I’ve seen some do, on his way to his version of rock and roll fame, why not question it all. And, maybe after a few hours, I do have a properly qualified one 35,000,000th opinion of how it can be weak.

Unfortunately, this is a rather superficial study of how our ITA applies since to do otherwise would certainly cause extensive lengthened elaboration. There was a trade-off between trying to cut in-depth to the core of the issues that I wanted to address, and the coverage of the numerous other issues that others may speak about. This is a study of curiosities: where the law is clear there is nothing to talk about but where the law can or does create unexpected results is where I chose to dwell. I have thus made multiple references to other researchers’ articles for your review, generally. And it has also tested my resolve to adapt a work that I started in 1987, while our Act “grew up”, so I’m sorry if my particular statutory references are not completely technically accurate at times – while provisions may shift around the policy behind them basically doesn’t so I do apologize: a detailed study of all the provisions related may undermine some issues I comment on.

I don’t believe I’ve even thoroughly scratched the surface here since each one of the jurisprudential issues could take a small book by itself before all the various outcomes could be covered, but I’ve tried to get into the material far more than what a normal “reference manual” would. I’ve also tried to focus on only the principal issues in testamentary planning (estate and trust planning and use) and the use of private trusts and not estate planning per se the latter including inter vivos issues that are prepared for in advance. This area of income tax has also become extremely complex with the issue of “beneficial ownership” and while Finance has advanced the work to refine our Act since this project started in 1987 there are still numerous mis-steps and short-comings where the Act doesn’t meet the environment perfectly. This compendium analyzes the basic structure of how the environment is attended to and how previous issues regarding it have been spoken of by our Judges (principally in Canada but also from the other English law tradition countries of the UK, Australia and New Zealand.) I choose to adopt case law from the foreign commonwealth environments as well since there is so little actual case law in Canada on this sport: importing judicial reasoning on specific issues, while not binding, illustrates how similar provisions (with similar objectives) have been scrutinized in the face of very similar trust/testamentary environments. Equally unfortunately, I cannot say that I have included every single meaningful case applicable to this environment but at 1350+ I don’t know how many more there are. I stopped counting at that number.⁴ With respect to all these cases I have copied the salient judicial pronouncement or have tried to paraphrase what the case was about in the context in which it is cited: you’re definitely encouraged to read the full case. Even still, this is a finite arena where the inter-lock of statutory provisions must work all of the time to all of the possible situations and in this case I am grateful for the holdings of various law faculty and court-house libraries that allowed me to think of a substantial number of the variables that our Act has to attend to, and in many cases, our Act is still rudimentary.⁵

A CRA Rulings Official once said to me that “no law is perfect”: that is rather repulsive statement from someone who is supposed to serve in a last line in defending our tax-revenue. But unfortunately, they only have to work with what they have. And I thought “If one gets by ‘Mother T’, (a cross between Mother Theresa and Mister T), by the time you turn around and amend, with approx. 247,000 people dying in Canada every year when I last checked, you’ll lose a lot more.⁶ Maybe instead you should have the desire of the Canadian Olympic Women’s Volley-ball team: the ball never touches the ground!” (Maybe we’d live in a different World when Rulings employees, with guidance, directly earn their salaries by saving us money from very “crafty” counsel who earn theirs by being exactly so. Having spent time in the CRA Head Library/National Archives in Ottawa, and the McGill CDH/Nahum Gelber, U. of T. Bora Laskin and U.B.C. Law Faculty Libraries and listening to the “ping” of internal databases I can conclude that they are best equipped for it. Or, have mere B.Comms and others continue to get ‘fatal’ “$320 M opinions” from them, as has happened in our history.) When I started this project the McGill Library contained copies of “the Act” (IWTA and ITA) all the way back to its origin: it was a pretty thin document when it started out – now it’s evolved a great deal more – so the above logic doesn’t work when one merely considers how it has “grown into the taxpayer’s life like a tree to light”: is it full-grown, or only half way there?⁷

⁴ There is certainly one on mere control of trust property, without status of trustee, attracting filing obligation as it appeared in Australia that I was not able to rediscover at time of printing, on a provision very much like Sec. 104(1).

⁵ When I describe why I like this “labour of love” activity to those who ask I simply explain that it is like the present condition of the Pyramids in Egypt: there are sharp steps up their sides when they initially were smooth. Any human language, in dealing with codifying the treatment of the inter-lock of “smooth creatures” in testamentary/trust taxation, is limited to how precise you can be, and in many instances as you will note, the “steps” in our Act are “juttery” – they are not “smooth”. What I hope to try and do here is also develop this sense in you.

⁶ The ITA can only be interpreted as a positivism strain of law: the end-game isn’t taxpayers saying “this is sort of what I pay” when they file their returns and remit their proceeds.

An Act is only as good as the carefully polished thought you put into it considering all relevant issues in the domain including past successes and failures: statutorily and jurisprudentially, in all relevant forums. Unfortunately, Finance seems to only want to make amendments when the need arises instead of projecting out that need before it arises. While some sympathy does reside for Finance counsel we do govern ourselves by our Acts and perhaps one day our federal employees will sense out needs before they arise and be more concise with their syllables. Should a fiscal Act respond to the “ebb and flow” of the underlying law or project out and make provision for that “ebb and flow”, in advance, considering all evolving streams of precedents that are developing that can affect before a tax case “happens”? This project was started in 1987 and a huge amount of now very historic case still has massive impact to this day, though like a river-bed changing it can be predicted where it will be going and with what I find in other jurisdictions we certainly have not seen ‘the end of it’. And in the case of the testamentary/trust environment you’ll sometimes get a grasp of how mismatched our ITA with underlying possible law can be through what you’ll find here. Or, is this issue (any in tax-interpretation), some joke where some judge inevitably should be sought for some opinion!? ...we govern ourselves certainly, with what is and can only be, our Acts meeting our facts and resulting evolving precedents.

But, any and all steps are better than nothing (since the underlying environment is relatively finite and static), and as “Col. Kilgore” of the movie “Apocalypse Now” would state “Someday all this will be over.” and we’ll have a ridiculously air-tight Act, significant evolution of which was started by Paul Martin in the 90’s. Until then, “Agitate, Agitate, Agitate” like an instigator once helped make “those United States” “the United States” and while “Nothing is Achieved Through Unanimous Consent” as ol’Chris Columbus mused, “the frontier” is getting, thankfully, harder to find. (Who knows, maybe we will not have huge amounts of litigation over “taxes” in our future...because more will know of In Re: Weston's Settlements where it was said “The avoidance of Tax may be lawful, but it is not yet a virtue.” and more will understand day-to-day, simple, “privilege”. [Star Track eliminated money in the 23rd century..])

In this study you will find amongst other things, like in any “Dr. Seuss-like” compilation, issues that may change the way you look at the Act such as:

- the inconsistent use of the statutory terms “trust created” and “contributions to a trust” in the face of considerable case law that states various interpretations for differing purposes (when is an existing trust agreement augmented with additional after-received property, as compared to the creation of an identical trust anew through adoption of another existent’s terms), dangerous in the absence of proper referencing if you want your provisions to apply to THAT trust, or,
- the case for the statutorily recognized “splintered trust” that opens up multiple instances for assessment of income tax incidences of the trust’s individual properties, as well as allowing for resident taxation where a majority of the “trustees” or other “owning or controlling” parties in respect of the property are resident outside of Canada, though one is resident, or,
- leaving an unqualified “expenditure” be a direct off-set against a Sec. 69(1.1)(b)-70(2)-(3) inclusion for a knit-in, against full income inclusion of a right or thing, of otherwise non-deductible executor fees/probate et cetera, (which can also be used to give an inter vivos trust income interest tax-free deductible cost, and possibly even recoup cost previously deducted, tax-free), or,
- the poor statutory coverage of trust income interests going through a death that causes problems vis-à-vis their cost deductibility (and possible double taxation of their “value”, as rights

⁷ Has anyone seen the “thickness” of the US IRC?

- or things) and the resulting need to always assent to their transfer as expeditiously as possible, prompting the Sec. 70(3) roll-through, or,
- the need to have 4 ownership bases (testator to estate to trust to beneficiary) through which title devolves in the ITA, instead of the quasi-3 (testator to estate/trust to beneficiary) now to disallow mis-matching on such issues as:
 - transfers of property to the general estate “ahead” of trusts that arise out of it
 - transactions with nebulously based estate/trust interests which can avoid capital gains therein
 - timing of creation of trusts out of estates to take too much advantage of recognition deferrals
 - recognition of income of the estate vs. trust by the beneficiary
 - poor mechanics on tainted spousal trust cleansing, etc., or,
 - the poor interaction between Sec.164(6) and the section 107 trust-property roll-out mechanics that allow carry-back of non-spousal beneficiary-recipient-generated estate executor’s-year losses to the testatrix’s terminal return (why the disparity with those of spousal beneficiary-recipients), (generally applicable to transfer and other fees to affect an actual tax-consequence section 107 distribution that is a Sec. 164(6) “disposition” – did you think there were no tax consequences here?), as well as beneficial carry-back when transfer of assets to holding in enduring testamentary trusts by the executrix allow such a “disposition” cited in s. 164(6) to occur, or,
 - the possibility that the underlying law of residuary estates, at any time in the process of administration of an estate always causes its income to be taxed in the hands of the estate (thus subjecting it to possibly lower testamentary trust tax rates, changing it to tax capital), even when immediately paid out, and even when administration comes to an end, regardless of how long the administration of the residuary estate takes to legitimately finalize, and in the face of the Sec. 104(6)-(13) mechanics which only work on “income” payable, due to the relation-back principle and ownership of the income as such (unless upset by a statute), or,
 - the fact that the Sec. 104(13.1)-(13.2) trust-beneficiary income recognition carve-back option is not properly qualified to be available only when the trust has, in fact, tax loss carry-forwards, for which it was enacted, which can be used to reduce absolute tax payable amounts in cases of testamentary trusts for instance and plan for the avoidance of income attribution instances for those inter vivos, or,
 - the possibility that the spouse under the famous subsection 73(1) or 70(6) spousal trust does NOT have to recognize any, nor all, of the taxable income of the trust given Sec. 108(3) and the consequential disparity with the income recognition mechanics applicable to non-spousal trust income beneficiaries (I guess spousal recipients really are favoured), or,
 - just what are you trying to NOT have happen with those “tainted spousal trust” rules given how porous they are (what “debt assumed” and what “property transferred”), or,
 - failing to see a need for the syllables “immediately before that time” to sever the disposition (and not the cost amount: compare the “when” against a Sec. 70(5) or (6) disposition) cited in a Sec. 107(2) roll-out of trust property to make it not a disposition against which executor/probate fees can be, again, deducted as “outlays or expenses” (exactly on-point as a McGill HL told me - 26’ of unindexed Simons reporters to find that jewel, plus exactly what was said in Pappas Estate) (sorry, you’ll have to read this in its entirety to find the other ways to deduct trustee fees as such: directly against income in many respects), or,
 - the doubling of property and capital losses through a differently-evolved income attribution provision applicable to “reversionary trusts”, Sec. 75(2), or,
 - there is no danger at all vis-à-vis all-too-crazy-an-impact of powers of appointment (as some privately have noted the lethargy in respect of when even the USA/UK/Aust. recognizes their distinct characters for estate and other tax purposes - attending to these creatures is going to take considerable amendment all over the place – they’re just “rights” with a fancy name), such as the direct undermining of Sec. 70(5.3) (testamentary insurance valuation implications if CRA continues to not recognize them as “property”, “per se”, for tainted spousal trust listing consideration), or the ability to resettle trusts through a special power that are not actual variations upon which at least one provision is based (I see no need to not follow ‘arcane’ and highly evolved property law jurisprudence here, giving credence to the power-grantor’s opinion, in what is, already, a measured World, – can our legislative thought not be so infantile(?), especially when the USA/UK/Aust. recognizes their classes in their Acts/case), or,

- the poor linkage of tax aspects of floating trust debt, that can be reassigned to a selection of beneficiaries, gaining from the “equitable off-set” mechanics under s. 107(2) distributions that can cause unintended tax consequences, or,
- hey, why even bother targeting Sec. 105(1) ‘in-direct’ trust benefits for non-resident Part XIII withholding tax rates, maybe no one will notice (imagine how many different ways that dangerous purportedly all-encompassing stop-loss failure can be knit in all over the place), et cetera, then I hope you find the attached worthy of a sound read. The author is also of the strong opinion that there should be 4 full ownership bases through which legal title of property flows in the ITA in the testamentary setting (testator-estate-trust-beneficiary), not the hodge-podge quasi-3 now (testator-estate/trust-beneficiary, non-spousal; in spousal cases it’s only 2) linked up fully to the provincial estate-devolution and trust statutory and common-law environments (with adjustment for certain instances of provincial quirks when they are not homogenous) eliminating quite a few instances where mis-matches cause anomalies and taking away some possibility of mis-interpretation/application. I’m also strongly of the opinion that Canada should adopt the Australian basis of trust-beneficiary income recognition – “proportionality” – and/or at least reform Sec. 104(24) to allow notional income to be deemed payable (in accompany to proportionality and some stat. adjustment for better targeting) to a beneficiary thus modernizing the use of commercially-oriented testamentary and, in particular, inter vivos trusts for situations where notional “tax income” is higher than actual income in-hand and payable in specie through a court order.⁸

The intent here is the mockery of the repulsiveness of the “Emperor’s New Clothes” since that sometimes works to the better and, that’s exactly what I want with this research: the statutory obsolescence of the above issues at least. I sincerely encourage anyone to please correct what I’ve written here if my interpretations are in error since I dislike the legal conclusions I’ve reached with how the case law cited, hopefully exhaustively, allows our ITA to be looked at, in my opinion. (If your conscience allows you to see fit to put an issue in-front of a judge, fire-at-will, and regardless of the outcome, at the end of the day, the environment will be enriched.) I’ve also fallen in love with Aussies, actually in particular, their jurisprudence since it tends to be more refined than in Canada on this subject (I think of Masterman-Macfarlane’s “constructive trust” that finally broke the mould, and their reasoned “testamentary options” to “buy and sell” testamentary property in a roll-over context that our less-well-argued cases have missed, even “the proportionality” of their income recognition process, et cetera). And the diversity of their case law is far wider. It is probably because trusts are better understood and are more pervasively used in their society than ours... must be something to do with the kangaroos...

The numerous people who gave me the drive to promulgate the intricacies and deficiencies I found through this study are too lengthy to list but those who I can name and like to thank include, two professionals who I met at the start of this work: one didn’t know I could start, and the other who didn’t even want to read it even when I could. Both unknowingly started it all off. It would definitely include Catherine Brown of the U. of Calgary (who I read in the start of this project, back in ’87 to ’93, - as well as now - when she had authored only 5-6” thick of periodical explanations about our World then), Maurice Cullity, the late Wolfe Goodman of the firm Goodman Carr, Vern Krishna of the U. of Ottawa, the slew of other researchers, whose heady concentrated pronouncements in “the spectrum of periodicals” were the wind beneath my wings, Guy Fortin formerly of McGill, of civil heritage, who allowed me into his Estate Planning Course at McGill so long ago in '93, Adam Parachin of the U. of Western Ontario for his sincere kindness in "the rekindling", Lawrence Jacobson CA MBA of CRA/Concordia U. (for "holding the line, year after year after year" as the Best Tax Professor I ever had as a student, smiling at the 1 hr. final, and, "those non-paying rock and roll bands" (trust me Larry, the band does pay)), Teresa Tettraelt, Manager of the CRA 305 Rene Levesque, Montreal, Library for "drying my ears" and allowing me access to the photocopy machine when that Library was open to the public and the late Harold Porter of the McGill University Old CDH Library-Circulation for "keeping the lights on 15 minutes longer" on basically every one of those nights in 1989 to 1993 as I learned about the importance of "words in an Act", unable to close a book (and, of course, the rest of the McGill old CDH now Nahum Gelber / U. of T. Bora Laskin / U.B.C. Law Library staff, past and present), when "I didn't have an office". In this regard, I was truly blessed with this purity, these "Dreamers" as an Apple computer "Think Different" tv advertisement would say, and am eternally grateful.

⁸ due to non-deductibility of numerous trust expenses that, while having bearing in trust law, have none in tax law

I'd also like to Thank Yin Vallaincourt, of Montreal, for her own dedication during 1988-1993, for churning out 1st and 2nd drafts based on my case photocopies (before jurisdictions' judgment web-sites existed and the World went electronically searchable⁹) and "chicken scrawl", as well as the 4 other typists who were paid somehow "as the diamond was recut".

I'd also definitely like to Thank Laura Shevchenko of the Montreal company of The Bookbinders Daughter (www.bookbindersdaughter.com) for binding my material facilitating this "indie" expression.

If you would like to be kept timely abreast of cases that pop up in Canada, the UK, Australia and New Zealand that I feel impact this environment, on a quarterly basis, please feel free to contact me at the number below: I'll add you to my free email broadcast list.

Hope you like.

LM

⁹ And, of course, I'd like to Thank the compilers/administrators/supporters behind the Australian AUSTLII.org, New Zealand NZLII.org, UK BAILII.org and the Canadian CANLII.org/S.C.C.-Fed.Ct. databases for easing my play-load.

Recommendations to Improve the ITA vis-a-vis Trusts and Estates: A Start

February 2nd, 2014.

2013FIN398819

April 16th, 2014

The Honourable Joe Oliver, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Finance
Department of Finance Canada
140 O'Connor Street
Ottawa, ON K1A 0G5

Ref: Submission of Specific Points on Common-law Estate/Trust ITA provisions

Dear Honourable Sir.

I was greatly saddened by the passing of James M. Flaherty, P.C., M.P. and I hope that with the PM's eulogy at his recent Funeral the country will remember him very well like I do.

I initially tried to point out technical problems with the ITA via submission of my research to Finance in 2002. The research started in 1987/8.

I have previously submitted the attached via the your Finance email on your web-page but thought that I'd also submit a written copy to both you and CRA Rulings to possibly sensitize you to deficiencies I feel exist within the ITA.

I have attached some thoughts that I think could improve the ITA with respect to the list of points I mentioned in the Foreword of the work I submitted in CD form late last year. While I have not had the opportunity to cover them all - some take considerable study to attend to! - I have attached what I think could better our ITA.

I do not know the statistics behind the effect the attached would have - I do not know how material they are in relation to what kind of scenarios CRA is encountering in their Rulings Division, generally, so the attached is submitted only as ideas to "tidy up some loose ends" which I feel exist.

The ITA can only be made better, technically, as time goes by, as well as reacting to new underlying law as well as to new argument that gains favour of the day.

While seemingly insignificant, technical points in a fiscal law could and should aim to give certainty without any room for possible misinterpretation even in the instance of GAAR so I thought I'd "jump the gun" in trying to formulate some legalese that could cure any of these problems that I feel exist.

Thanking you I remain,

Yours truly,

Lyndon Maither

Cc: Mrs. Theresa Murphy, CGA
Director CRA
320 Queen St.
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0L5

The three are:

1. Whether there is a legal argument to bring another trust residency instance back to the SCC and this time argue extensively on the enlarged scope of how a trust/estate is actually targeted for assessment in the ITA (S. 104(1)) thus making the POEM ineffective as a poor test. Words count.
2. The law on residuary estates and income recognition mechanics that can be perhaps successfully argued to prevent s. 104(13)-(24) from transferring recognition until and even when the residuary estate is finalized.
3. Possible wording for powers of appointment over trust/estate property, which cannot be ignored, that can prevent abuse.

(There are other specific points that I will be submitting comments on.)

Creation of, or Contribution to Existing, Trusts

There are numerous instances in the ITA which state "contributions" to a trust and yet there are also some which state trusts "created". As recently as 2011 below there has been a TCC that noted it in passing. Given the foundation structure of numerous provisions in the ITA on this differentiation clarity could be added by explicitly stating what these terms mean.

For purposes of this Act,

- (a) a contribution to a trust is deemed to have been made when there is a transfer or loan of property to an existing trustee or executor to be held on the same terms of an existing trust whereby the property is subject to the same capital and income interests,
- (b) a trust is deemed to have been created when a transfer or loan is made to a person to be held on conditions of a trust and as a result new capital or income interests in a trust are created.

Counters start of drift in TCC thought (contained in Peter Sommerer and Her Majesty The Queen, 2011 TCC 212) that contributions to an existing trust could be recognizable as creation of identical trusts anew.

Unrestricted "Expenditures" deduction against Right or Thing (s. 70(3)-69(1.1)(b)) as well as unwarranted reintroduction of "cost" to be deducted (income interest in trust)

"Idem, where s. 70(3) applies - Sec. 69(1.1)"

(1.1) Where a taxpayer has acquired property that is a right or thing to which subsection 70(3) applies, the following rules apply:

- (a) paragraph 69(1)(c) is not applicable to that property; and
- (b) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the total of
 - (i) such part, if any, of the cost thereof to the taxpayer who has died as had been capable of being deducted by the taxpayer in computing the taxpayer's income for the year, and
 - (ii) any qualified expenditures made or incurred by the taxpayer to acquire the property.

S. 69(1.2) - Qualified expenditures

For purposes of subparagraph 69(1.1)(b)(ii) a qualified expenditure means:

- (a) funeral expenses of the deceased to whom subsection 70(3) applies,
- (b) transfer costs related to the right or thing, or
- (c) optional

and shall not include

- (d) estate or trust fees or expenses, and,
- (e) conditional bequests to any party as a consequence of death
- (f) optional.

Focuses the unqualified expenditures that a taxpayer can incur to be off-set against a full income inclusion such as executor fees, testamentary conditional payments to relatives of the deceased, etc. By qualifying the nature of the expenditure to narrow it down the "expenditure" is much more exact.

"Capable of being" deducted disconnects the flow through of historic cost of an income interest in a trust going through death as a right or thing. The way the provision now reads (even if in conjunction with the definition of "cost amount" in s. 248) a taxpayer could bequeath an income interest in a trust and if she hadn't have taken maximum allowable deductible cost under s. 106 against it that "cost", though lost to her, would now be deductible by the right or thing beneficiary since they have inherited the "cost": not deductible cost. Merely by changing the designation to "cost amount" still doesn't cure the problem since the s. 248 definition thereof (below¹¹) still allows build-up and transfer of undeducted cost to another generation.

¹¹S. 248 "cost amount"

(f) in any other case, the cost to the taxpayer of the property as determined for the purpose of computing the taxpayer's income, except to the extent that that cost has been deducted in computing the taxpayer's income for any taxation year ending before that time;

"Income interest in trust - Sec. 106(1)"

(1) Where an amount in respect of a taxpayer's income interest in a trust has been included in computing the taxpayer's income for a taxation year by reason of subsection 106(2) or 104(13), except to the extent that an amount in respect of that income interest has been deducted in computing the taxpayer's taxable income pursuant to subsection 112(1) or 138(6), there may be deducted in computing the taxpayer's income for the year the lesser of

- (a) the amount so included in computing the taxpayer's income for the year, and

(b) the amount, if any, by which the cost to the taxpayer of the income interest exceeds the total of all amounts in respect of the interest that were deductible under this subsection in computing the taxpayer's income for previous taxation years.

Preventing Shifting of Tax Incidences when Executor Assents to Dispositions of Estate Property to Enduring Trusts Etc. within Executors' Year

"Where disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer - Sec. 164(6)"

(6) Where in the course of administering the estate of a deceased taxpayer, the taxpayer's legal representative has, within the first taxation year of the estate,

(a) disposed of capital property of the estate to a qualified recipient so that the total of all amounts each of which is a capital loss from the disposition of a property exceeds the total of all amounts each of which is a capital gain from the disposition of a property, or

(b) disposed of all of the depreciable property of a prescribed class of the estate to a qualified recipient so that the undepreciated capital cost to the estate of property of that class at the end of the first taxation year of the estate is, by virtue of subsection 20(16) or any regulation made under paragraph 20(1)(a), deductible in computing the income of the estate for that year, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the following rules apply:

(c) such parts of one or more capital losses of the estate from the disposition of properties in the year (the total of which is not to exceed the excess referred to in paragraph 164(6)(a)) as the legal representative so elects, in prescribed manner and within a prescribed time, are deemed (except for the purpose of subsection 112(3) and this paragraph) to be capital losses of the deceased taxpayer from the disposition of the properties by the taxpayer in the taxpayer's last taxation year and not to be capital losses of the estate from the disposition of those properties,

(d) such part of the amount of any deduction described in paragraph 16(6)(b) (not exceeding the amount that, but for this subsection, would be the total of the non-capital loss and the farm loss of the estate for its first taxation year) as the legal representative so elects, in prescribed manner and within a prescribed time, shall be deductible in computing the income of the taxpayer for the taxpayer's taxation year in which the taxpayer died and shall not be an amount deductible in computing any loss of the estate for its first taxation year,

(e) the legal representative shall, at or before the time prescribed for filing the election referred to in paragraphs 164(6)(c) and 164(6)(d), file an amended return of income for the deceased taxpayer for the taxpayer's taxation year in which the taxpayer died to give effect to the rules in those paragraphs, and

(f) in computing the taxable income of the deceased taxpayer for a taxation year preceding the year in which the taxpayer died, no amount may be deducted in respect of an amount referred to in paragraph 164(6)(c) or 164(6)(d).

S. 164(6.1)- Qualified Recipients

For purposes of subsection 164(6) qualified recipients are deemed not to include

(a) trusts arising as a consequence of death of the deceased taxpayer,

(b) taxpayers and partnerships related to the deceased taxpayer immediately before death,

(c) optional.

There is no qualification on to whom the estate can dispose of property during the executor year and still have the provision apply: the way it is worded presently this could easily be interpreted to include a trust that the deceased taxpayer creates and since both are recognizable as different beings outside of subdivision k the loss/gain would be recognizable and there could be statutorily unintended transfer of said results. The same applies to taxpayers formerly related to the deceased which would, again, force "artificial" recognition that would not otherwise occur in normal instances when property would otherwise exit the taxpayer's arena of related parties. By taking out these two parties there is some restriction on the possibility of creating "artificial" tax consequences with parties related to the deceased taxpayer and the property stays in the same relative hands.

Ensuring All Benefits Conferred on Non-Residents in Relation to Trusts or Estates are Taxable

Presently per S. 212(1)(c) there is no Part XIII tax imposed on s. 105 (property upkeep, and, abnormal benefits) benefits realized by non-residents in respect of a trust or estate. While per the above it is possible to eliminate artificial cost charge-up on trust income interests going through a death, there is still a possibility when the trust imposes an "eligible off-set" obligation¹⁰ in the form of a conditional bequest to make a payment to a non-resident. In this case the eligible off-set

¹⁰ S. 108(1) "eligible offset" « montant de réduction admissible »

"eligible offset" at any time of a taxpayer in respect of all or part of the taxpayer's capital interest in a trust is the portion of any debt or obligation that is assumed by the taxpayer and that can reasonably be considered to be applicable to property distributed at that time in satisfaction of the interest or part of the interest, as the case may be, if the distribution is conditional upon the assumption by the taxpayer of the portion of the debt or obligation; tax affects a distribution by the trust/estate with consequences, but the actual payment is not captured for tax effect to the non-resident: by referencing it below there are tax consequences when this is attempted.

S. 212(1)(c) - Estate or trust income

- (c) income or benefit of or from an estate or a trust to the extent that the amount
 - (a) is included in computing the income of the non-resident person under subsection 104(13) or section 105, except to the extent that the amount is deemed by subsection 104(21) to be a taxable capital gain of the non-resident person, or
 - (b) can reasonably be considered (having regard to all the circumstances including the terms and conditions of the estate or trust arrangement) to be a distribution of, or derived from, an amount received by the estate or trust as, on account of, in lieu of payment of or in satisfaction of, a dividend on a share of the capital stock of a corporation resident in Canada, other than a taxable dividend;

Ensuring Spouse under Spousal Trust Recognizes All of Trust's Taxable Income

"Where transfer or distribution to spouse or spouse trust- Sec. 70(6)"

(6) Where any property of a taxpayer who was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death that is a property to which subsection 70(5) would otherwise apply is, as a consequence of the death, transferred or distributed to

- (a) the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner who was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death, or
- (b) a trust, created by the taxpayer's will, that was resident in Canada immediately after the time the property vested indefeasibly in the trust and under which
 - (i) the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the spouse's or common-law partner's death, and

(ii) the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner is entitled to have all of the taxable income of the trust immediately payable to the spouse or common-law partner, and

- (iii) no person except the spouse or common-law partner may, before the spouse's or common-law partner's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust,

if it can be shown, within the period ending 36 months after the death of the taxpayer or, where written application therefor has been made to the Minister by the taxpayer's legal representative within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances, that the property has become vested indefeasibly in the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, the following rules apply:

- (c) paragraphs 70(5)(a) and 70(5)(b) do not apply in respect of the property,
 - (d) subject to paragraph 70(6)(d.1), the taxpayer shall be deemed to have, immediately before the taxpayer's death, disposed of the property and received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to
 - (i) where the property was depreciable property of a prescribed class, the lesser of the capital cost and the cost amount to the taxpayer of the property immediately before the death, and
 - (ii) in any other case, its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the death,
- and the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to those proceeds,

(d.1) where the property is an interest in a partnership (other than an interest in a partnership to which subsection 100(3) applies),

- (i) the taxpayer shall, except for the purposes of paragraph 98(5)(g), be deemed not to have disposed of the property as a consequence of the taxpayer's death,
- (ii) the spouse or common-law partner or the trust, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to its cost to the taxpayer, and
- (iii) each amount added or deducted in computing the adjusted cost base to the taxpayer of the property shall be deemed to be required by subsection 53(1) or 53(2) to be added or deducted, as the case may be, in computing the adjusted cost base to the spouse or common-law partner or the trust, as the case may be, of the property; and
- (e) where the property was depreciable property of the taxpayer of a prescribed class, paragraph (5)(c) applies as if the references therein to "paragraph 70(6)(a)" and to "paragraph 70(6)(b)" were read as references to "paragraph 70(6)(d)".

"Income of a trust in certain provisions - Sec. 108(3)"

(3) For the purposes of the definition "income interest" in subsection (1), the income of a trust is its income computed without reference to the provisions of this Act and, for the purposes of the definition "pre-1972 spousal trust" in subsection (1) and paragraphs 70(6)(b) and (6.1)(b), 73(1.01)(c) and 104(4)(a), the income of a trust is its income computed without reference to the provisions of this Act, minus any dividends included in that income

- (a) that are amounts not included by reason of section 83 in computing the income of the trust for the purposes of the other provisions of this Act;

(b) that are described in subsection 131(1); or
(c) to which subsection 131(1) applies by reason of subsection 130(2).

CRA is of the opinion, ostensibly (per past rulings), that subpara. 70(6)(b)(i) causes the spouse to recognize all of the taxable income of the trust as payable to them however it is very possible for a Ct. to misinterpret this to mean only deferred entitlements :

- 1....Is the provision still available when the trust is phrased to capitalize the income through deferred payment and make it payable every 3 years? It could be said to be.
- 2....If the income to which the spouse is entitled is measured as trust law income you have an immediate problem in transferring recognition of all that tax income in that trust law expenses may be deductible against that stream of revenue, legally per the terms of the will, and that reduces shadow tax law income payable since there is an immediate divergence when those expenses/adjustments are not allowable per the ITA causing the trust to recognize in its hands some of the taxable income.

This being said is it not prudent to force recognition of all taxable income in the hands of the spouse so that there is never a problem in the issue of divergence on trust law vs. tax law deductible expenses or deferral/shifting of recognition?

Sec. 104(13.1)-(13.2) Trust-Beneficiary Income Recognition Carve-back, illegitimately Used

In Jeannette Lussier v. Her Majesty The Queen, 97-1928-IT-G, the TCC considered not irreprehensible that S. 104(13.1) could be used to split income as one of the primary purposes of the taxpayer group (beneficiary-trust). It's obvious to most that this set of provisions were enacted to legitimately allow for loss absorption by the trust though this is now how at least the TCC is interpreting their use (as well as in some estate-planning commercial prints). There should be some qualification on the claw-back of recognition to be available only when the trust does in fact have those loss carry-forwards: otherwise it's simply handing on a silver platter the ability of a taxpayer group to reduce its absolute tax payable between trust and beneficiary.

Amounts deemed not paid - 104(13.1)

(13.1) Where a trust, in its return of income under this Part for a taxation year throughout which it was resident in Canada and not exempt from tax under Part I by reason of subsection 149(1), designates an amount in respect of a beneficiary under the trust, not exceeding the amount determined by the formula

$$A/B \times C$$

where

A is the beneficiary's share of the income of the trust for the year computed without reference to this Act,
B is the total of all amounts each of which is a beneficiary's share of the income of the trust for the year computed without reference to this Act,

C is the amount for the year of the trust described in subparagraph 111(1)(a), the amount so designated shall be deemed, for the purposes of subsections 104(13) and 105(2), not to have been paid or to have become payable in the year to or for the benefit of the beneficiary or out of income of the trust.

Idem - 104(13.2)

(13.2) Where a trust, in its return of income under this Part for a taxation year throughout which it was resident in Canada and not exempt from tax under Part I by reason of subsection 149(1), designates an amount in respect of a beneficiary under the trust, not exceeding the amount determined by the formula

$$A/B \times C$$

where

A is the amount designated by the trust for the year in respect of the beneficiary under subsection 104(21),
B is the total of all amounts each of which has been designated for the year in respect of a beneficiary of the trust under subsection 104(21), and

C is the amount for the year of the trust described in subparagraph 111(1)(b), the amount so designated shall

(a) for the purposes of subsections (13) and 105(2) (except in the application of subsection (13) for the purposes of subsection (21)), be deemed not to have been paid or to have become payable in the year to or for the benefit of the beneficiary or out of income of the trust; and

(b) except for the purposes of subsection 104(21) as it applies for the purposes of subsections 104(21.1) and 104(21.2), reduce the amount of the taxable capital gains of the beneficiary otherwise included in computing the beneficiary's income for the year by reason of subsection 104(21).

This considerably simplifies the equations obviously and directly considers the tax loss balances of the trust in determining what amount can be clawed back for trust recognition to absorb them. There is a need to also have accompanying loss account adjustments to reflect the fact that these discretionary elections do have effect on the balances, during the periods, even if not taken, in the subpara. 111(8) definitions.

Severing The Disposition in a Trust Distribution to Disallow Expenses and Outlays to be Considered Creating Tax Non-Zero Affect

"Distribution by personal trust - Sec. 107(2)"

(2) Subject to subsections (2.001), (2.002) and (4) to (5), if at any time a property of a personal trust or a prescribed trust is distributed (otherwise than as a SIFT trust wind-up event) by the trust to a taxpayer who was a beneficiary under the trust and there is a resulting disposition of all or any part of the taxpayer's capital interest in the trust,

- (a) the trust shall be deemed to have disposed of the property immediately before that time for proceeds of disposition equal to its cost amount to the trust immediately before that time;

Can there be argument in Canada that a deemed disposition that directly coincides with an actual disposition allows expenses and outlays to be considered to determine a capital gain/loss on an otherwise taxable non-event? If there is, and that's not what was legislatively thought of, the above additional 4 words would prevent it [applied to all trust capital distribution and income provisions]. Note: the second "immediately before that time" can only be interpreted to apply to the cost amount, not the time of disposition. (Please refer to jurisp. on prevention of expense deduction against a s. 70(5) deemed disposition. "Immediately before that time")

Aligning Reversionary Trust Income/Loss Attribution Specifics to be the Same as Other Income Attribution Provisions

Without rewriting everything I composed about how this provision could be very dangerously interpreted, especially with regard to the fact that in the recent FCA case of Her Majesty The Queen v. Peter Sommerer¹¹ the Crown attempted to argue that there could be double recognition between attributee and beneficiary. Through the evolution of the other general attribution provisions this, I consider to be, the most dangerous provision in the ITA that I know of: it artificially doubles losses and through the court's evaluation of the evolution of the provisions they too could come to this conclusion. While it has some penalizing value now which could prompt for double recognition of income, once argued, it opens up for double loss, so it can only penalize once.

"Trusts - Sec. 75(2)"

(2) Where, by a trust created in any manner whatever since 1934, property is held on condition

- (a) that it or property substituted therefor may

- (i) revert to the person from whom the property or property for which it was substituted was directly or indirectly received (in this subsection referred to as "the person"), or

- (ii) pass to persons to be determined by the person at a time subsequent to the creation of the trust, or

- (b) that, during the existence of the person, the property shall not be disposed of except with the person's consent or in accordance with the person's direction, any income or loss from the property or from property substituted for the property, and any taxable capital gain or allowable capital loss from the disposition of the property or of property substituted for the property, shall, during the existence of the person while the person is resident in Canada, be deemed to be income or a loss, as the case may be, or a taxable capital gain or allowable capital loss, as the case may be, of the person and not of the trust.

Technical Cleanliness of Untainting Tainted Spouse Trusts

Special rules applicable in respect of trust for benefit of spouse - s. 70(7)

(7) Where a trust created by a taxpayer's will would, but for the payment of, or provision for payment of, any particular testamentary debts in respect of the taxpayer, be a trust to which subsection 70(6) or 70(6.1) applies,

- (a) for the purpose of determining the day on or before which a return (in this subsection referred to as the "taxpayer's return") of the taxpayer's income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died is required to be filed by the taxpayer's legal representatives, subsection 150(1) shall be read without reference to paragraph 150(1)(b) and as if paragraph 150(1)(d) read as follows:

¹¹ 2011 TCC 212. Appealed : 2012 FCA 207

"150(1)(d) in the case of any other person, by the person's legal representative within 18 months after the person's death; or;" and

(b) where the taxpayer's legal representative so elects in the taxpayer's return (other than a return of income filed under subsection 70(2) or 104(23), paragraph 128(2)(e) or subsection 150(4)) and lists therein one or more properties (other than a net income stabilization account) to which subsection 70(6) would otherwise apply that, as were previously owned by the taxpayer, on or after the taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof, transferred or distributed to the trust, the total fair market value of which properties immediately after the taxpayer's death was not less than the total of the non-qualifying debts in respect of the taxpayer,

(i) subsection 70(6) does not apply in respect of the properties so listed, and

(ii) notwithstanding the payment of, or provision for payment of, any such particular testamentary debts, the trust shall be deemed to be a trust described in subsection 70(6),

except that, where the fair market value, immediately after the taxpayer's death, of all of the properties to which subsection 70(6) would otherwise apply so listed exceeds the total of the non-qualifying debts in respect of the taxpayer (the amount of which excess is referred to in this subsection as the "listed value excess") and the taxpayer's legal representative designates in the taxpayer's return one property so listed (other than money) that is capital property other than depreciable property,

(iii) the amount of the taxpayer's capital gain or capital loss, as the case may be, from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer is that proportion of that capital gain or capital loss otherwise determined that

1. the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of that property immediately after the taxpayer's death exceeds the listed value excess, is of
2. the fair market value of that property immediately after the taxpayer's death, and

(iv) the cost to the trust of that property is

(A) where the taxpayer has a capital gain from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer, the total of

(I) its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death, and

(II) the amount determined under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) to be the taxpayer's capital gain from the disposition of that property, or

(B) where the taxpayer has a capital loss from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer, the amount by which

(I) its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death exceeds

(II) the amount determined under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) to be the taxpayer's capital loss from the disposition of that property.

Meaning of certain expressions in s. (7) - Sec. 70(8)

(8) In subsection 70(7),

(a) the "fair market value" at any time of any property subject to a mortgage or hypothec is the amount, if any, by which the fair market value at that time of the property otherwise determined exceeds the amount outstanding at that time of the debt secured by the mortgage or hypothec, as the case may be;

(b) "non-qualifying debt" in respect of a taxpayer who has died and by whose will any trust has been created that would, but for the payment of, or provision for payment of, any particular testamentary debts in respect of the taxpayer, be a trust described in subsection 70(6), means any such particular testamentary debt in respect of the taxpayer other than

(i) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable, in consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any property of, or interest in, the trust, or

(ii) any debt secured by a mortgage or hypothec not existing immediately before the time of death on property owned by the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death;

and

(c) "testamentary debt", in respect of a taxpayer who has died, means

(i) any debt owing by the taxpayer, or any other obligation of the taxpayer to pay an amount, that was outstanding immediately before the taxpayer's death, and

(ii) any amount payable (other than any amount payable to any person as a beneficiary of the taxpayer's estate) by the taxpayer's estate in consequence of the taxpayer's death, including any income or profits tax payable by or in respect of the taxpayer for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died or for any previous taxation year, and any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable in consequence of the taxpayer's death.

Ensuring only the Deceased's Property Can be Listed

For purposes of the ITA, outside of subd. k, which is s. 70(7)-(8) in this case, estates are not recognized as trusts that arise out of them: that can be the only reason both terms of redundantly used throughout these subsections. That being said it is possible for a taxpayer estate to be a recipient of a gratuitous or FMV sale of property from an "outside" party, and, in this case, there is no restriction on whether that property can then be used to be considered on a listing since the provision simply doesn't say that it applies to only property previously owned by the deceased taxpayer.

What Type of Property can be Listed

Other than a net income stabilization accounts cannot be listed, as specified, however this tax creature is afforded treatment other than under the s. 70(5)-(6) regular channels anyhow so by mentioning them here the argument is opened that property other than that described in s. 70(5)-(6) can be listed. And that includes s. 70(2) rights or things.

The only non-depreciable capital property that need be listed is one to act as a sink for the gain/loss recognition through disallowance of s 70(6), the rest apparently need not be subject to s. 70(6) since no where does the provision require it.

Capping the Incurrence of Mortgages as Non-Qualifying Debt

Non-qualifying debt causes tax consequences and it is based on testamentary debt part of which is that debt which is

(i) any amount payable (other than any amount payable to any person as a beneficiary of the taxpayer's estate) by the taxpayer's estate in consequence of the taxpayer's death,

If the executor faces a will that compels that property of the testator be mortgaged to secure funds to make ancillary payments then that mortgage is compellable by the vigour and effect of the will and can be argued to be in consequence of the taxpayer's death. That latently arising mortgage then becomes a testamentary debt.

When considering what kind of debt to be listed against to withhold beneficial tax consequences under s. 70(6) - non-qualifying debt - the phrase that "jumps" that mortgage over the targeting is

"other than

(ii) any debt secured by a mortgage or hypothec on property owned by the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death"

and seeing how there is no qualification in the definition of non-qualifying debt on when that mortgage can be obtained a taxpayer can simply have his spousal trust sustain it after compelling the executors to contract for it to obtain more liquidity for the estate and it produces no tax consequences when assumed by the trust. By qualifying mortgages to exist with "other than ...not existing immediately before the time of death" only those mortgages that exist prior to death will be exempt, which I believe is the objective

Estates and Trusts... A Difference.

Fiscal Targeting.

The Canadian Income Tax Act provides definitions of both "estate" and "trust" in subsection 248(1) both of which have "the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1)" while that subsection provides:

"Reference to trust or estate – Sec. 104(1)"

Sec. 104. (1) In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a "trust") shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property, but, except for the purposes of this subsection, subsection (1.1), subparagraph (b)(v) of the definition "disposition" in subsection 248(1) and paragraph (k) of that definition, a trust is deemed not to include an arrangement under which the trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust's property unless the trust is described in any of paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition "trust" in subsection 108(1).¹²

"Restricted meaning of "beneficiary" – Sec. 104(1.1)"

(1.1) Notwithstanding subsection 248(25.1) and for the purposes of subsection (1), paragraph (4)(a.4), subparagraph 73(1.02)(b)(ii) and paragraph 107.4(1)(e), a person or partnership is deemed not to be a beneficiary under a trust at a particular time where the person or partnership is beneficially interested in the trust at the particular time solely because of

(a) a right that may arise as a consequence of the terms of the will or other testamentary instrument of an individual who, at the particular time, is a beneficiary under the trust;

(b) a right that may arise as a consequence of the law governing the intestacy of an individual who, at that time, is a beneficiary under the trust;

(c) a right as a shareholder under the terms of the shares of the capital stock of a corporation that, at the particular time, is a beneficiary under the trust;

12 March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(1) provides a rule under which a reference to a trust or estate is read in the Act as a reference to the trustee or the executor, administrator, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control over trust property.

Subsection 104(1) is amended to include a "liquidator of the succession" to the list of persons to which a trust or estate refers for the Purposes of the Act. This amendment is made to ensure that the Act appropriately reflects both the civil law of the province of Quebec and the law of other provinces.

Subsection 104(1) is amended so that this rule does not apply where the context otherwise requires and to clarify that this rule is meant to be a convenient way of linking the trustees and others described in the subsection with a trust for the purposes of the Act. This amendment recognizes that there are references to "trust" in the Act that are meant to indicate a trust arrangement, rather than the persons who are responsible for the operation of the arrangement. The latter references include those found in subsections 74.4(4), 104(5.3) and (5.5), 108(6) and 127(7).

Subsection 104(1) is amended, in conjunction with 104(1.1), so that, except for the purposes of those two subsections, subparagraph (b)(v) of the definition "disposition" in subsection 248(1) and paragraph (k) of that definition, references in the Act to trusts are considered not to include an arrangement where a trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for its beneficiaries with respect to all dealings in the trust's property. These arrangements are generally known as "bare trusts". Trusts described in paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition "trust" in subsection 108(1) are expressly not affected by the amendment.

These amendments generally apply to the 1998 and subsequent taxation years. However, in order to co-ordinate this, amendment with changes to the replacement of the definition "disposition" in section 54 with the new definition of the same expression in subsection 248(1), it does not apply in connection with transfers of property that occurred before December 24, 1998.

(d) a right as a member of a partnership under the terms of the partnership agreement, where, at the particular time, the partnership is a beneficiary under the trust; or
(e) any combination of rights described in paragraphs (a) to (d).¹³

alter ego trust

"alter ego trust" means a trust to which paragraph 104(4)(a) would apply if that paragraph were read without reference to subparagraph 104(4)(a)(iii) and clauses 104(4)(a)(iv)(B) and (C);¹⁴ estate

"estate" has the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1);

inter vivos trust

"inter vivos trust" has the meaning assigned by subsection 108(1);

testamentary trust

"testamentary trust" has the meaning assigned by subsection 108(1); trust

"trust" has the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1);

and thus one is left with the conclusion that that provision operates only to assign the tax liability of the trust or estate against the person having the ownership or control of the property subject to it.¹⁵

The applicable tax liabilities can be applied against two parties and not just one since the provision refers to those having ownership or control over the property however the subsection 248(1) definition and subsection 104(1) target are of absolutely no help in ascertaining whether a trust or estate exists for purposes of our Act. The taxpayer must rely on historic common law principles or relevant statute law in order to ascertain what reporting responsibilities she has and which provisions of our Act he can benefit ¹³ July 2010 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (Part 1 -technical): Subsection 104(1.1) applies for the purpose of identifying beneficiaries under a trust for the purposes of subsection 104(1), subparagraph 73(1.02)(b)(ii) and paragraphs 104(4)(a.4) and 107.4(1)(e).

Subsection 104(1.1) is amended to clarify that it applies notwithstanding subsection 248(25). Subsection 248(25) describes, for other purposes of the Act, the circumstances in which a person or partnership is considered to be "beneficially interested" in a trust.

This amendment applies to the 1998 and subsequent taxation years.

March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: New subsection 104(1.1) applies for the purpose of identifying beneficiaries under a trust for the purpose of subsection 104(1), as well as for the purposes of subparagraph 73(1.02)(b)(ii) and paragraphs 104(4)(a.4) and 107.4(1)(e). A person or partnership is deemed not to be a beneficiary under a trust at a particular time for these purposes where the person or partnership is beneficially interested in the trust at the particular time solely because of any one, or a combination of, the following:

- a right that may arise as a consequence of the terms of the will or other testamentary instrument of an individual who, at the particular time, is a beneficiary under the trust;
- a right that may arise as a consequence of the law governing the intestacy of an individual who, at the particular time, is a beneficiary under the trust;
- a right as a shareholder under the terms of the shares of the, capital stock of a corporation that, at the particular time, is a beneficiary under the trust; or
- a right as a member of a partnership under, the terms of the partnership agreement, where, at the particular time, the partnership is a beneficiary under the trust.

These amendments generally apply to the 1998 and subsequent taxation years. However, in order to co-ordinate this amendment with changes to the replacement of the definition "disposition" in section 54 with the new definition of the same expression in subsection 248(1), it does not apply in connection with transfers of property that occurred before December 24, 1998.

¹⁴ See article in Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 24 Pg. 346 "Alter Ego, Joint Conjugal, and Self-benefit Trusts Revisited: Some Troubling Tax Issues and A Search for Better Alternatives" by Catherine Brown

¹⁵ See FCT v. Prestige Motors Pty Ltd, 114 A.L.R. 507 FC Aust where a taxpayer attempted to argue a mis-targeting of an assessment notice.

from or suffer.^{16 17 18}

16 For an excellent discussion of the fiduciary environment see "Demystifying the Fiduciary Mystique", R. Maurice Gautreau, C.B.R. Vol. 68 March #1.

17 Dec. 23, 1998 Press Release: TRUST TAXATION — PROPOSED NEW RULES

The proposals on the taxation of trusts and their beneficiaries relate to measures on trust taxation announced in the October 2, 1996 Notice of Ways and Means Motion. In addition, these amendments respond to gaps, inconsistencies and uncertainties in the existing law. These issues are, or can become, relevant in the context of:

- the taxation of emigrants;
- the distribution of property from Canadian trusts to non-resident beneficiaries; and
- the distribution of property from non-resident trusts to Canadian beneficiaries.

The proposed amendments are summarized below, with attention drawn in particular to those amendments that are proposed to be effective from today.

Changes to the rules governing the distribution of trust property to beneficiaries

There are currently five sets of taxation rules for distributions from trusts to beneficiaries contained in subsections 107(2) to (5). The rules in subsection 107(2.1), which generally apply to distributions by commercial trusts, are problematic because they do not provide a clear mechanism to avoid double taxation of gains. The existing rules in subsection 107(5), which apply to dispositions of property to non-resident beneficiaries in satisfaction of a trust interest, are problematic because they provide that there is no gain or loss associated with the disposition of the interest.

Proposed amendments address these problems and eliminate a number of inconsistencies, effective with regard to distributions made after 1999. The taxation of trust distributions will now be governed by either roll-over rules under amended subsection 107(2) or fair market value realization rules* under subsection 107(2.1). In accordance with the October 2, 1996 press release, there will now generally be a deemed disposition at fair market value where a Canadian trust distributes taxable Canadian property to a non-resident beneficiary.

Rules governing the tax treatment of bare, protective and similar trusts

Under the existing law, there is uncertainty with respect to the tax treatment of bare trusts, protective trusts- and other trust vehicles into which property can be transferred without any change in its beneficial ownership. The existing law generally provides that a transfer of capital property to a trust that does not result in any change in the beneficial ownership of the property is not treated as a 'disposition', but does not provide for an explicit cost for the transferee.

The proposed amendments are generally intended to preserve Revenue Canada's administrative position with regard to bare trusts, which is essentially that such trusts are treated as agents for their beneficiaries for income tax purposes. However, in the event that a Canadian resident transfers property to a non-resident bare trust after today, that transfer will be treated as a "disposition" and the bare trust will be treated as an ordinary trust for income tax purposes.

Where bare trusts are not involved, transfers of property which do not result in any change in the beneficial ownership of the property will now generally be treated as dispositions of the property. In these circumstances, a special set of "roll-over" rules in new section 107.4 is proposed. Consequential to these changes, the existing definitions of 'disposition' in subsection 13(21), section 54 and subsections 59(5) and 66.4(5) have been replaced by a new definition of that term in subsection 248(1). These amendments also apply after today.

In addition, new subsection 107.4(4) provides for special rules after today in the event that all or part of a trust interest created on a "rollover" transaction to which new subsection 107.4(3) applies is subsequently disposed of. In these circumstances, the trust interest is considered to have been disposed of for proceeds of disposition that are not less than an amount based on the fair market value of the net trust assets associated with the interest.

Application of the 21-year rule

The proposed amendments ensure that a non-resident trust is not deemed to dispose of and reacquire, a property pursuant to the 21-year deemed disposition rule unless the proceeds of disposition are taken into account in determining the non-resident trust's Canadian tax position. This ensures that, after today, the 21-year rule cannot be used as a mechanism for non-resident trusts to distribute property to Canadian residents at an artificially high cost amount. In addition, the proposed amendments ensure that the 21-year rule applies, as intended, for the 1999 and subsequent taxation years to non-resident discretionary trusts to which paragraph 94(1)(c) applies.

The proposed amendments also restrict, after today, the exemption from the 21-year rule for trusts in which all interests have vested indefeasibly to cases where the beneficiaries are all resident in Canada. This exemption is contained in paragraph (g) of the definition 'trust' in subsection 108(1). A related relieving amendment to subsection 104(5.8) provides that the date of the 21-year anniversary for such a trust is determined without reference to the special transfer rules for trusts in subsection 104(5.8), if the transfer occurred on or before today.

Oct. 1, 1987 Press Release: The Minister noted that the increasing use of trusts in commercial arrangements has emphasized the need for several other amendments to the Act, including changes to the special rules which were intended for testamentary and family trusts in which none of the interests was purchased from the trust or a settlor of the trust. These changes include:

- withdrawing the rules that allow a trust to allocate capital cost allowances and depletion to beneficiaries,
- restricting the preferential flow-through of trust income and the character, of certain of its sources to trusts that are resident in Canada,
- permitting a trust, in computing its income, to deduct an amount in respect of its income distributions to beneficiaries which is less than the amount of the actual distributions,
- amending the adjusted cost base rules to require amounts received from the trust to reduce the adjusted cost base of the beneficiary's interest in the trust except to the extent such amounts are included in the beneficiary's income,
- limiting the preferential treatment accorded dispositions of capital interests to interests in testamentary and family trusts, and

- excluding from the "21 year"-deemed disposition rule, those trusts under which all beneficiaries' rights are vested indefeasibly in possession.

Income Flow-through Rules

Under the existing rules, the income of a trust for a taxation year - determined in accordance with the provisions of Part I but before deducting any amount in respect of capital cost allowance or terminal loss - that becomes payable in the year to the beneficiaries of the trust is normally taxable in the hands of the beneficiaries. If the trust would otherwise be entitled to claim capital cost allowance or depletion allowance in computing its income for the year, the existing rules permit beneficiaries under the trust to deduct their shares of such allowances against the trust income which has become payable to them. Under these rules, a trust may be unable to deduct its losses from a prior year if in accordance with the terms of the trust, all trust income is required to be distributed to the beneficiaries under the trust. This results from the mandatory deduction of trust income distributions (under the existing rules).

Under the proposals, the income distributions of a trust will only be taxable in the beneficiary's hands to the extent of the trust's income otherwise determined under Part I - after deducting capital cost allowance and terminal loss amounts - and to the extent the trust deducts such amounts in computing its income. These changes allow for the repeal of the rules dealing with the trust allocations of capital cost allowance and depletion allowance and will generally resolve the problem for trusts in utilizing loss carry-forwards.

Under the proposals, the rules providing for the flow-through of the trust income and certain of its sources will be restricted to beneficiaries of resident trusts. Beneficiaries of non-resident trusts will include in their income all distributions which they become entitled to receive from the trust other than distributions or payments of capital by a testamentary trust or an inter-vivos trust in which none of the interests has been purchased from the trust or a settlor thereof.

Adjusted Cost Base Rules

Under the existing rules, certain amounts distributed by a trust to its beneficiaries out of trust income may be neither taxable in their hands nor regarded as payments of capital. Such amounts may not reduce the adjusted cost base of the capital interests of the beneficiaries under the trust.

Under the proposals, the rules governing the computation of the adjusted cost base of a capital interest in a trust will be revised to require that all trust distributions other than amounts which are required to be included in income by the beneficiaries will reduce the beneficiary's adjusted cost base. An exception to this rule will permit a resident trust to distribute in a year the non-taxable portion of its capital gains for the year without causing a reduction in the adjusted cost base of its capital interests. These rules will not apply in respect of capital interests in testamentary trusts or inter-vivos trusts in which none of the interests is purchased from the trust or a settlor of the trust, unless such interest has been purchased by the beneficiary.

Capital Interest Rules

Under the existing rules, beneficiaries under commercial trusts, other than unit trusts, are entitled to the benefits of the special rules that apply on the disposition of capital interests in the trust. These rules provide that where the trust property is distributed to the beneficiary in satisfaction of his rights as a capital beneficiary,, the property may be rolled over to the beneficiary at its cost amount to the trust. In addition, on the disposition of a capital interest, the capital gain that would otherwise occur may be reduced where the cost amount of the trust property attributable to the interest is greater than the beneficiary's adjusted cost base.

Under the proposals, these rules would be limited in their application to testamentary trusts and inter-vivos trusts in which none of the interests has been purchased from the trust or a settlor of the trust.

Deemed Disposition Rules

Under the existing rules, the capital properties, land inventories and resource properties owned by trusts other than unit trusts and trusts governed by certain deferred income plans are deemed to have been disposed of and subsequently reacquired by the trust on certain dates. In the case of commercial trusts other than unit trusts, the first application of this rule would occur on January 1 1993. This rule was intended to prevent the use of trusts in estate planning arrangements to defer indefinitely the recognition of capital gains which would otherwise occur on the death of the individual or on his ceasing to reside in Canada.

It is proposed to exclude from the deemed disposition rules those trusts in which every interest in the trust is vested absolutely in possession in the holder thereof or which will so vest upon the death of the settlor or his spouse (or former spouse). Such trust arrangements do not permit the deferral of capital gains beyond the lifetime of the holders of such vested interests.

1971 TR: Under the present tax system, all taxable trusts or estates are subject to the same set of rules, the most important of which are as follows:

- (1) generally income received by the trust and payable to beneficiaries in the year received is taxable to the beneficiary, not the trust;
- (2) income that is not so payable is taxable to the trust, and for this purpose the trust uses the personal rate schedule (although it is not entitled to a personal exemption); and
- (3) once the trust has paid income tax on an amount, the balance can usually be distributed in subsequent years without further tax.

The new legislation continues the present tax treatment for the first category of income. This income will be taxed in the hands of the beneficiaries, and deducted in computing the income of the trust.

For trusts which accumulate income, the new bill distinguishes between estates (trusts created by a will) and personal trusts (trusts created by a living person).

In the case of an estate, income not payable to beneficiaries in the year received is taxed to the estate under the same system as at present. The estate uses the personal rate schedule, but is not entitled to personal exemptions.

In the case of a personal trust, income not payable to beneficiaries in the year received is taxed to the trust at the higher of 50% or the personal rate schedule.

For another jurisdiction's apparatus on how the trust-estate is to be referenced in tax legislation see *Leighton v. Commissioner of Taxation*¹⁹ where the Aust. Federal Ct. of Appeal looked to their Income Tax Assessment Act's reference and held:

"Was Mr Leighton a "trustee"?"

42. First, I consider that Mr Leighton did satisfy paragraph (b) of the definition of "trustee" in s 6 of the 1936 Act. He had, and took upon himself, "the administration or control of income affected by [a] ... trust". That conclusion requires explanation.

43. It was common ground that the share trading in Australia was conducted in the name of Salina and Kolton and that the various broking accounts were in their individual names "c/ Leighton & Leighton 4 rue des Orchidees MC98000 Monaco" or words to similar effect. The invoices issued by the various brokers confirming a buy or sell trade were addressed to Kolton or Salina. Settlement of those invoices was subject to two recorded instructions in the following general terms. First, that the registration details for the shares was "Westpac Custodian Nominees" and, secondly, that payment was to be effected along the following lines:

Unless we hear from you before the settlement day we will be settling direct with Westpac Custodian Nominees Limited on the settlement day.

Of course, the relevant Westpac Custodian Account was in the name of Mr Leighton: see [7] above. But that is not the only connection.

44. Critically, Mr Leighton administered and controlled the share trading (and, as will become apparent, administered and controlled the income arising from the share trading

The new bill also provides that the minimum 50% tax on investment income of personal trusts will not apply to trusts in existence on budget day 1971 unless that trust receives additional contributions or borrows any money from a non-arm's-length lender after that date.

The new bill also provides that the preferred beneficiaries of a personal trust or estate may elect to include in their income the income of the trust that is being accumulated for their benefit. If this election is made the income is not taxed to the trust. This election may be made by any or all of the preferred beneficiaries, but the election by each is limited to his share of the trust income. Preferred beneficiaries are defined as the spouse or children of the person who established the trust. When the beneficiaries or their "shares" cannot be ascertained, the bill provides rules based on reasonable but generous assumptions, to determine each beneficiary's share of income. This election will also permit capital gains realized by a trust and otherwise included in its income to be taxed in the hands of lower-rate beneficiaries.

With the introduction of a tax on capital gains a number of special rules are needed to cover trusts. These rules are somewhat complex because of the extreme complexity of trusts, and the following summary is intended to give a general understanding of these rules.

When property is transferred to a trust this will generally be regarded as a sale at fair market value and accordingly a capital gain or loss will result. The cost of the property to the trust will be the fair market value of the property at the date of transfer.

When property is transferred to a special trust under which a spouse is a beneficiary⁷, the capital gain on the transfer can be deferred under certain circumstances. In these cases the trust will take over the property at the cost of the person establishing the trust. On the death of the spouse the trust will be considered to have sold the property at its fair market value and accordingly a capital gain or loss will result. The cost of the property to the trust for tax purposes will then be increased to the fair market value of the property.

For trusts in existence at the start of the new system, the cost of the trust property will be original cost or fair market value on Valuation Day.

When trust transfers property to its capital beneficiaries, the beneficiaries will take over the property at the trust's cost. This tax-free transfer recognizes the fact that a trust is, in a sense, the agent of its beneficiaries.

If a beneficiary sells or otherwise disposes of an income interest in a trust, all of the proceeds received will be treated as ordinary income but the purchaser will be able to deduct his cost from trust income received. If a beneficiary sells or otherwise disposes of a capital interest in a trust, the capital gain or loss will be measured against his pro rata share of the cost of the trust property to the trust at the time of sale.

The property of a trust, other than a special trust for a spouse, will be revalued every 21 years for capital gains tax purposes. This provision is necessary to prevent the indefinite postponement of capital gains taxes through the use of long-term trusts.

¹⁸ See "The Taxation of Trusts: Reconciling Some Fundamental Principals" by Catherine Brown in Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 21, Pg. 1 for a review of some key-points in what a trust is and how the ITA attends to its more rudimentary attributes.

¹⁹ [2010] FCA 1086 (6 October 2010)

conducted through the share broking accounts) pursuant to the administrative and management services he provided to each of Salina and Kolton under the Directors and Management Services Agreement (see [9] and [11] above) he had with each of them. These “basic” services (for which he was paid a fee based on a percentage of sales proceeds from the sale of shares) were defined in each agreement as:

Leighton will provide the following basic services or any part thereof (together with any ancillary, additional or other services provided by Leighton on behalf of SALINA, “the Services”) to SALINA as and when SALINA may reasonably require:

- 1.2.1 management services, including the opening of bank accounts, and the purchase, sale, settlement and safekeeping of securities and other assets and property;
- 1.2.2 accounting services;
- 1.2.3 corporate services;
- 1.2.4 provision of director(s) and secretary (as applicable);
- 1.2.5 provision of office facilities; and
- 1.2.6 provision of Board Room facilities upon notice ...

...

45. Put simply, Mr Leighton was contracted by each of Salina and Kolton to administer and control “the purchase, sale, settlement and safekeeping of securities”, which in this case included the 676 share trades the subject of the dispute: see [15] above. In that direct sense, Mr Leighton controlled the income of Salina and Kolton. He controlled, by direction, which shares were purchased and which shares were sold. He also controlled, by direction, settlement of those share trades through the Westpac Bank Account which had a number of important characteristics.

46. In relation to the Westpac Custodian Agreement:

1. it was signed by Mr Leighton in his own name;
2. Mr Leighton held an equitable interest in the shares the subject of the Custodian Agreement, the legal title to which was vested in Westpac. Mr Leighton held that equitable interest not for his own benefit but on trust for the benefit of Salina or Kolton; and
3. Mr Leighton’s obligations under the Westpac Custodian Agreement and in relation to the shares were of a fiduciary nature: see [33], [43] – [44] above and [51] below.

47. Similarly, in relation to Mr Leighton’s Westpac Bank Account:

1. it was opened and operated by Mr Leighton in his own name;
2. there was a debtor / creditor relationship between Mr Leighton and Westpac in relation to the moneys standing to the credit of the account;
3. the source of the moneys standing to the credit of the account was from Salina, from Kolton or from the sale of securities purchased with their money;
4. the rights Mr Leighton held as creditor against Westpac were held not for his own use and benefit but for the benefit of Salina and Kolton. Mr Leighton had a fiduciary obligation (see [33], [43] – [44] above and [51] below) to apply those funds to purchase shares (registered in the name of Westpac Custodian) on behalf of Salina and Kolton; and
5. when proceeds from the sale of shares were paid into Mr Leighton’s Westpac Bank Account, he did not receive those proceeds of sale for his own benefit but for the benefit of Salina and Kolton. The proceeds were marked with a fiduciary obligation to apply the proceeds for the benefit of Salina and Kolton: see [33], [43] – [44] above and [51] below. The proceeds were not retained in Mr Leighton’s Westpac Bank Account. They were used for further share purchases on behalf of Salina or Kolton or transferred to CLC's account with HSBC and CLC then distributed the proceeds to Salina and Kolton's respective bank accounts with HSBC.

48. By making the arrangements between Mr Leighton, on the one part, and Kolton or Salina, on the other part, as recorded in the Directors and Management Services Agreement (see [44] – [45] above) it was intended that the moneys received by Mr Leighton be kept separate from his personal moneys and be accounted for separately, consistent with a fiduciary obligation: see [33], [43] – [44] above and [51] below. That was not only the intention but what was in fact achieved.

49. As the Commissioner submitted, applying the reasoning of Wilcox and Lee JJ in Harmer 24 FCR 237 at 247-248:

1. Legal title to Salina and Kolton's money was given to Mr Leighton to enable him to invest the moneys and earn income therefrom;
2. There was more than a mere grant by Salina or Kolton of enjoyment of possession of their money by Mr Leighton pending demand for redelivery to them coupled with a right to collect any income accruing to the owner; and
3. The object of the arrangements between Salina and Kolton and Mr Leighton was to deliver the funds to Mr Leighton for him to hold for the eventual benefit and use of Salina and Kolton.

50. It was common ground that where, as here, a taxpayer (namely Salina or Kolton) is trading in stock, including shares, income is earned on a sale when a recoverable debt comes into existence, even though the debt may be payable at a later date: J Rowe & Son Pty Ltd v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1971] HCA 80; (1971) 124 CLR 421 at 450. Mr Leighton conceded (as he had to) that in relation to each purchase, the debt was discharged by payment into the Westpac Bank Account at the direction of Salina or Kolton. This statement of the position is accurate, so far as it goes. However, contrary to Mr Leighton's submissions, that is not the end of the enquiry which Div 6 (and in particular, the definition of "trustee") requires you to make. The statement, at the direction of Salina or Kolton – invites the further question – how was the debt discharged? Here, it was discharged through the Westpac Bank Account which could only be, and was only, operated and conducted by Mr Leighton. Whether the brokers had rights against Salina or Kolton is not conclusive. The question is the proper characterisation of the role of Mr Leighton. If the income was earned on a sale when a recoverable debt came into existence, then the capacity and manner in which Mr Leighton administered or controlled that income was under the Directors and Management Services Agreement which included his capacity as a director of Salina or Kolton and the management services of opening bank accounts etc under cl 1.2.1. If, however, the timing of the earning of income by Salina or Kolton was not until settlement through Westpac, then the capacity and manner in which Mr Leighton administered or controlled that income again was under the Director and Management Services Agreement and included his capacity as a director of Salina or Kolton and the management services of opening bank accounts etc under cl 1.2.1.

51. Consistent with earlier authority (see [33] above), for each of Salina and Kolton, Mr Leighton stood in some relation to the proprietary right by virtue of which the income exists (Howey at 293) and he owed a fiduciary obligation towards them which included a liability to account to them: Manning at 509; Hospital Products Ltd v United States Surgical Corporation [1984] HCA 64; (1984) 156 CLR 41 at 96-97 and 142. That is sufficient to make him a "trustee" within the meaning of the term in s 6 of the 1936 Act having the administration and control of income from the share trading affected by a trust in favour Salina and Kolton.

Existence of a "trust estate"

52. The conclusion that Mr Leighton was a "trustee" within the meaning of the term in s 6 of the 1936 Act having the administration and control of income from the share trading affected by a trust in favour of Salina and Kolton requires further explanation. One of the tests of s 98(3) is not only that Mr Leighton be a "trustee" but a "trustee of the trust estate". In my view, on either construction of the role of Mr Leighton (see [50] above), the "trust estate" included the shares held and the income earned from the share trading. The corpus of the trust estate changed over time consistent with the share trading. And for the reasons earlier identified, the "income" of that "trust estate" was "affected by an ... express or implied trust" in favour of Salina and Kolton. Mr Leighton was not administering or controlling the shares and the income derived from the share trading for his own benefit. He was doing it for Salina and Kolton under the terms of their respective Director and Management Services Agreement. In both instances, those Agreements expressly stated that he was an independent contractor: cl 7.2. That is not determinative: cf New Zealand Netherlands Society "Oranje" Inc v Kuys [1973] 2 All ER 1222 at 1229-1230 and Noranda Australia Ltd v Lachlan Resources NL (1988) 14 NSWLR 1. The management services he undertook included responsibility for the "purchase, sale, settlement and safekeeping of securities" for the benefit of Kolton or Salina, as the case may be. Put another way, the "trust estate" was synonymous with the trust property – the shares and the income which was under his direct administration and control: see [34] – [35] above. It was that trust property which gave rise to the income derived by the trustee, the trustee having satisfied all of the tests in s 98(3) of the 1936 Act.²⁰

Subsection 248(1) provides that the definition of trust in Sec. 104(1) while apply for purposes of the Act while subparagraph 108(1)(j) provides that a trust will include an inter vivos trust and a testamentary trust except in certain instances related to commercial, deferred income plan and unit trusts.

Since subsection 108(1) is in subdivision k it is relevant in adding body to Sec. 104(1) while "testamentary trust" is defined in Sec. 108(1)(i) to include both trusts and estates of a certain character while "inter vivos trust" is defined in Sec. 108(1)(f) to mean any trust other than a testamentary trust. For purposes of the Act then it could be argued that the term "trust" if used alone includes estates while if the term estate is used a trust is not included. If the term testamentary trust is used only those arrangements described in Sec. 108(1)(i) will be targeted.

By virtue of the fact that an estate appears to be provided for in the definition of trust for purposes of the Act all of the provisions which provide favorable or unfavorable treatment for trusts and property held under them could also apply to estates. If certain provisions are targeted exclusively at estates, trusts are not captured²¹. The consistency of the legislative thought on what "a trust" includes for purposes of the Act would not be the best however if this were the case. Both are used in Sec. 70(3) when only "trust" would have been sufficient, subsections 70(7)-(8) use both terms, most likely due to the fact that both are significantly needed in the particular instance, subparagraph 212(1)(c) also uses both and so does Sec. 128(2)(b), apparently without reason if the statutory logic above is valid, while Sec. 164(6) cites only estates, expressly disqualifying trusts. If the cascading of the trust definition in Sec. 108(1)(j) for purposes of the Act is relevant there would appear to be minor redundancy in Sec. 70(3) and 212(1)(c). There could be an argument against the above when one considers that the term "estate" as defined in Sec. 248(1) is that in the definition in Sec. 104(1) as well. Equally ambiguous is the fact that the definition of "trust" in Sec. 248(1) does not refer to the Sec. 108(1)(j) definition directly while the latter is to apply only for certain purposes of subdivision k. This argument represents the more valid statutory operation: that Sec. 108(1)(j) does not apply for purposes of the Act and it has no bearing on the Sec. 104(1) targeting as that provision relates to the Act as a whole since ITA convention is that if such subdivisional definitions are to be valid for purposes of the whole Act Sec. 248(1), (or some other bridging provision), must provide for such.

²⁰ See also the Aust. case of Nekon Pty Ltd v Commissioner of State Revenue [2010] TASSC 2 (16 February 2010) for an instance of litigation over an Act that seemingly did not differentiate between types of ownership.

²¹ See an example of exactly this reasoning in Paul Hess and Her Majesty The Queen, 2011 TCC 360, whereby the Tax Court considered the difference in terminology used for filing purposes, exempting the taxpayer.

Under numerous Estate Administration/Trustee Acts the definition of "trust" includes duties incidental to the office of personal representative of a deceased person however the Ontario provincial Trustees Act from which this reference was drawn was enacted in 1970 where prior to that time, and after, the ITA used both the terms "estate" and "trust" for eons in various provisions. The same holds true with respect to section 2 of the Ontario Estates Administration Act where property devolves to and becomes vested in the legal representative "as trustee for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto". If the two terms are to be treated as the same tax entity why would subdivision k, Sec. 70(6)-(7)-(8), 164(6), or 212(1)(c) and virtually every tax treaty Canada has entered in to make specific reference to one, the other, or both in certain provisions and not others? Clearly one, the other, or both are to be expressly captured in the particular instance and the legislators recognized consistently their difference and lack of equivalence under the Act.

An "estate", in the context in which our Act refers to it, is not equivalent to a trust and unless the Act provides so²² favorable provisions expressly targeted at trusts may not be available to incompletely administered estates while by the same principle unfavorable provisions will be avoided.

This is one of the most important technical deficiencies in the Act concerning the taxation of property passing on death or being held under trust for and although the Act's "official commentators" may be quite quick to point out that "an estate" and a "trust" are "almost" the same tax entity, they are not nor have they been recognized as equivalent under the Act by the use of the terms "estate" and "trust".

It's important since, while there has not been extensive litigation on the issue, taxpayers may choose to transact with the two different entities in arranging affairs, in a testamentary situation, that can cause "abnormal" consequences such as:

- ... Transferring interests in estates with their nebulous rights thereto rather than in the trusts where their interests are more codified,
- ... Transferring property to a general estate, even for consideration, upstream of a trust that will result out of its administration,
- ... Disclaiming interests in estates that do not affect their possible interests in any trusts that arise,
- ... The possibility of a string of differing tax years for trusts that arise out of one estate depending on when the executrix assents to title apportionment and trust creation,
- ... The creation and/or assignment of estate debt that alters pre-assented-to-creation trust interest values post transfer of the interests thereunder, to name five.

"Person acting for another – Sec. 159(1)"

(1) For the purposes of this Act, where a person is a legal representative of a taxpayer at any time,

(a) the legal representative is jointly and severally liable with the taxpayer

(i) to pay each amount payable under this Act by the taxpayer at or before that time and that remains unpaid, to the extent that the legal representative is at that time in possession or control, in the capacity of legal representative, of property that belongs or belonged to, or that is or was held for the benefit of, the taxpayer or the taxpayer's estate, and

(ii) to perform any obligation or duty imposed under this Act on the taxpayer at or before that time and that remains outstanding, to the extent that the obligation or duty can reasonably be considered to relate to the responsibilities of the legal representative acting in that capacity; and

(b) any action or proceeding in respect of the taxpayer taken under this Act at or after that time by the Minister may be so taken in the name of the legal representative acting in that capacity and, when so taken, has the same effect as if it had been taken directly against the taxpayer and, if the taxpayer no longer exists, as if the taxpayer continued to exist.

²² which it does in one certain instance: the "testamentary trust"

Subsection 159(1) previously, charges the trustee with joint and several liability with her trust for the payment of any taxes under the Act. For an interesting case dealing with the equivalent provision in the Australian Income Tax Assessment Act see *Barkworth Olives Management Ltd v. Deputy Commissioner of Taxation*²³ where the trustee attempted to state that he was not personally responsible for a $81 M tax liability of a trust. The Supreme Court Of Queensland found, after an examination of considerable jurisprudence, that:

[8] Section 254 provides:

“Agents and trustees

(1) With respect to every agent and with respect also to every trustee, the following provisions shall apply:

(a) He shall be answerable as taxpayer for the doing of all such things as are required to be done by virtue of this Act in respect of the income, or any profits or gains of a capital nature, derived by him in his representative capacity, or derived by the principal by virtue of his agency, and for the payment of tax thereon.

(b) He shall in respect of that income, or those profits or gains, make the returns and be assessed thereon, but in his representative capacity only, and each return and assessment shall, except as otherwise provided by this Act, be separate and distinct from any other.

(c) If he is a trustee of the estate of a deceased person, the returns shall be the same as far as practicable as the deceased person, if living, would have been liable to make.

(d) He is hereby authorized and required to retain from time to time out of any money which comes to him in his representative capacity so much as is sufficient to pay tax which is or will become due in respect of the income, profits or gains.

(e) He is hereby made personally liable for the tax payable in respect of the income, profits or gains to the extent of any amount that he has retained, or should have retained, under paragraph (d); but he shall not be otherwise personally liable for the tax.

(f) He is hereby indemnified for all payments which he makes in pursuance of this Act or of any requirement of the Commissioner.

(g) Where as one of 2 or more joint agents or trustees he pays any amount for which they are jointly liable, the other or others shall be liable to pay him each his equal share of the amount so paid.

(h) For the purpose of insuring the payment of tax the Commissioner shall have the same remedies against attachable property of any kind vested in or under the control or management or in the possession of any agent or trustee, as he would have against the property of any other taxpayer in respect of tax.

(2) In subsection (1), tax includes the general interest charge under section 163AA, former section 170AA, subsection 204(3), former subsection 221AZMAA(1), former subsection 221AZP(1), former subsection 221YD(3) or former section 221YDB, additional tax under former Part VII and shortfall interest charge.”

[13] Each notice of assessment was issued to the appellant as trustee of a described trust, it identified the relevant income year, it specified the relevant taxable income (described as “Your Taxable Income”) and relevant penalties, and it asserted the amount payable and the date upon which the amount payable fell due for payment. Objections against the assessments, amended assessments and penalty assessments were lodged but those objections remained unresolved.

[14] Section 255-45 of TAA 1953 provides that a certificate signed by the Commissioner, a Second Commissioner or a Deputy Commissioner covering one of the matters stated by s 255-45(2) or (3) is prima facie evidence of the matter in a proceeding to recover an amount of tax-related liability.

23 [2010] QCA 80 (9 April 2010)

The respondent relied upon such a certificate. It verified that each of the notices of assessment and amended assessment was made and served upon the appellant and certified that $81,425,884.83 was due by the appellant to the Commonwealth.

[15] The appellant's defence admitted that at all relevant times it was the trustee of the trusts as described in the notices of assessment, that it received the notices of assessment and amended assessment as alleged by the respondent, and that it had not paid any amount of income tax for any of the tax years in accordance with the notices of assessment nor any amount of the administrative penalties and general interest charges assessed by the Commissioner. The appellant pleaded that it was not liable because it had not received the money which constituted the assessed taxable income. In opposition to summary judgment the appellant adduced affidavit evidence from its director, Mr Pollard, to this effect: the appellant was at the relevant times and it remained a trustee of the trusts described in the various notices of assessment and amended assessment; each notice of assessment and notice of amended assessment was issued to the identified trust; and in each case the income assessed to tax was money that did not come to the appellant in its representative capacity or at all.

...

[20] On the other hand, if s 254(1)(e) does operate, its operation could not be limited to execution after a judgment for a tax debt has been obtained. A judgment for a tax debt incurred by a trustee as trustee does not limit the respondent's rights to execution in the way proposed by the respondent and it also does not authorise direct recourse to the trust assets.[6] The judgment in this case was given in the form appropriate for a debt: "...the Defendant pay to the Plaintiff the amount of $81,425,884.83...". Under that form of judgment the respondent is entitled to seek recourse to the appellant's assets to recover the full amount of the judgment and as the respondent's senior counsel acknowledged in argument, the respondent is entitled to apply to wind up the appellant if the judgment debt is not paid. Furthermore, whatever remedies may be given by s 254(1)(h) the operation of that provision is not expressed to be conditional upon the existence of a judgment against the trustee (or agent);[7] and even if the remedy given by that provision were predicated upon the existence of a judgment for a tax debt, that would provide no ground for implying that a judgment may be ordered against a trustee (or agent) for an amount which (on the present hypothesis) s 254(1)(e) provides that the trustee (or agent) is not liable to pay.

[21] But although I would reject that aspect of the respondent's argument, I would uphold the respondent's argument that an analysis of the relevant statutory provisions and their interrelationship with each other demonstrates that it was entitled to summary judgment.

[22] It must be acknowledged that the question of statutory construction is not straightforward. So much is sufficiently indicated by the tentative remarks about the relation between s 89 of the Income Tax Assessment Act 1922-1928 (Cth) (the predecessor of s 254) and s 31 of that Act (the predecessor of Div 6 of Pt III) in the joint judgment of Rich and Dixon JJ in Howey v Federal Commissioner of Taxation, [1930] HCA 45; (1930) 44 CLR 289 in the course of which their Honours observed that s 89 enables the Commissioner to assess a trustee, "but it is not easy to say precisely in respect of what income."

[23] The taxation of the income of trust estates is dealt with in Div 6 of Pt III of ITAA 1936. Broadly speaking, the "net income" of a trust estate is equivalent to the amount which would be the taxable income if the trust estate were an Australian resident taxpayer. (For ease of reference, I will refer to the net income of the trust estate by the abbreviation "trust income".) In Div 6 of Pt III, s 96 states the general rule: a trustee is not liable as trustee to pay income tax upon the trust income except where the Act so provides. Accordingly, where tax is payable upon the trust income it is the beneficiary who is assessed and is liable to pay the tax unless some provision exceptionally renders the trustee liable to be assessed and to pay the tax. For present purposes it is sufficient to summarise the scheme of Div 6 of Pt III in the following very broad (therefore inevitably imprecise) terms: where a beneficiary not under a legal disability is presently entitled to the trust income then (subject to some qualifications not presently relevant) the trustee will not be liable to pay tax on the trust income and the beneficiary or beneficiaries will be assessed and liable to pay that tax: s 97; if beneficiaries are presently entitled to all or part of the trust income but one or more of the beneficiaries is under a legal disability, the trustee is to be assessed and is liable to pay tax on all or a corresponding proportion of the trust income: s 98; and if no beneficiary is presently entitled to part of the trust income the trustee is to be assessed and is liable to pay tax in respect of a corresponding part of the trust income: ss 99, 99A.

[24] There are other provisions dealing with different scenarios, but the point which is relevant here is that, in specified cases, instead of a beneficiary or beneficiaries being assessed and liable to pay tax on the trust income the trustee must be assessed and is liable to pay the tax. This is such a case. We were informed by the appellant's senior counsel that the assessments were made under s 99A. It is convenient therefore to refer to some of its provisions, by way of example of the manner in which particular provisions in Div 6 of Pt III render trustees liable to tax as an exception to the general rule that beneficiaries are liable to pay the tax assessed upon the trust income. Section 99A(4) provides that in specified circumstances "the trustee shall be assessed and is liable to pay tax on the net income of the trust estate...". A different form of words is used in s 99A(4A), which provides that in the different circumstances it specifies "the trustee shall be assessed and is liable to pay tax on...part of the net income of the trust estate." These expressions are used throughout Div 6 of Pt III where liability to tax on trust income is imposed upon a trustee in lieu of the beneficiary.

[25] Section 161(1) provides that "every person" must, if required by the Commissioner by notice published in the Gazette, give to the Commissioner a return for a year of income within the period specified in the notice. Section 166 then provides that from the returns and any other information in the Commissioner's possession he shall make an assessment of the amount of the taxable income of any taxpayer and of the tax payable thereon. That provision may apply in relation to the assessment of trustees under Div 6 of Pt III, but if it does not then s 169 applies. Section 169 provides that where under the Act any person is liable to pay tax the Commissioner may make an assessment of the amount of such tax. That an assessment is to be made in relation to a trustee rendered liable to pay tax on trust income under Div 6 of Pt III is also made clear by the relevant sections in Div 6 of Pt III themselves (including s 99A) and so much is yet again confirmed by the definition of "assessment" as meaning, where the taxpayer is the trustee of a trust estate, "the ascertainment of so much of the net income of the trust estate as is net income in respect of which the trustee is liable to pay tax (or that there is no income in respect of which the trustee is so liable) and of the tax payable on that net income (or that no tax is payable)...". It follows from these provisions that the amount shown on each notice of assessment in this case as "Your Taxable Income" must be understood as a reference to so much of the net income of the trust estate in respect of which the trustee is made liable to pay tax by s 99A, or other relevant provision in Div 6 of Pt III.^[9]

[26] Section 174 of ITAA 1936 provides that the Commissioner is obliged to serve a notice of an assessment in writing upon the person liable to pay tax. Section 175 provides that the validity of any assessment shall not be affected by reason that any of the provisions of the Act have not been complied with. Section 175A provides that a taxpayer who is dissatisfied with an assessment made in relation to the taxpayer may object against it in the manner set out in Part IVC of TAA 1953. Section 177(1) provides that the production of a notice of assessment or of duly signed copies shall be "conclusive evidence of the due making of the assessment and, except in proceedings under Part IVC of [TAA 1953] on a review or appeal relating to the assessment, that the amount and all the particulars of the assessment are correct." As was common ground in this appeal, these provisions apply in relation to the subject assessments. As was also common ground, the effect of reading s 175 with ss 175A and 177(1) is that the validity of an assessment is not affected by a failure to comply with any provision of the Act but a taxpayer may object to the assessment in the manner set out in Part IVC of TAA 1953.^[10]

[27] As the appellant argued, it is s 204 of ITAA 1936 which creates the legal consequence that the income tax specified as being payable in a notice of assessment becomes due and payable by the person liable to pay the tax to the Commissioner at a particular time.^[11] The liability of the taxpayer to pay tax prior to assessment is “conditional” upon assessment and objection^[12] or “inchoate”.^[13] Service of the notice of assessment “crystallises the taxpayer’s liability under the Act and makes the tax assessed due and payable at a certain date (s 204)”.^[14] Section 204 relevantly provides that, subject to other provisions of Part VI, where the taxpayer’s return was lodged on or before the due date for lodgement, the tax payable by a taxpayer for a year of income becomes due and payable on the later of 21 days after the due date for lodgement of that return specified in the Gazette under section 161 for the year of income or 21 days after a notice of assessment is given to the taxpayer; otherwise the tax becomes due and payable 21 days after the due date for lodgement. ^[15] That is supplemented by s 255-5 of TAA 1953, which provides that an amount of a tax-related liability that is due and payable is a debt due to the Commonwealth, payable to the Commissioner, and may be sued for by the Commissioner, a Second Commissioner or a Deputy Commissioner. Accordingly, in circumstances in which s 99A rendered the appellant trustee liable to be assessed and to pay tax upon the trust income, the combined effect of s 204 of ITAA 1936 and s 255-5 of TAA 1953 was that the amount described in each notice of assessment as the amount payable became due and payable by the appellant as a debt due to the Commonwealth and payable to the Commissioner on the date specified in the notice as the due date for payment. Again, so much was common ground, subject to any operation of s 254(1)(e).

[28] The ground upon which the appellant contended that s 254(1)(e) excluded liability was, as sworn to by the appellant’s director, that the income assessed for tax was “money that did not come to the [appellant] in its representative capacity, or at all.” To treat that evidence as throwing doubt either on the amount of the tax payable by the appellant or on the amount of the trust income would be contrary to s 177(1) of ITAA 1936 (under which both amounts were conclusively established for the purposes of these proceedings by each notice of assessment) and s 204 of ITAA 1936 and s 255-5 of TAA 1953 (which rendered the amount of tax specified in each notice of assessment a debt due and payable by the appellant to the Commonwealth at the time specified in the notice of assessment). On any view there is a substantial conflict between s 254(1)(e) and those statutory provisions summarised earlier which render trustees liable for tax in accordance with s 99A and similar provisions in Div 6 of Pt III. That conflict must be alleviated, as far as possible, “by adjusting the meaning of the competing provisions to achieve that result which will best give effect to the purpose and language of those provisions while maintaining the unity of all the statutory provisions”, a process which may require the Court to determine which is the “leading provision”, which is the “subordinate provision”, and “which must give way to the other.”^[16]

[29] The better construction of s 254(1)(e), at least when it is read in isolation from the other provisions I have discussed, appears to be that it imposes and qualifies personal liability only where the agent or trustee retains or fails to retain money which comes to the agent or trustee after the making of an assessment under s 254(1)(b). That accords with the terms and structure of s 254(1) as a whole and it is suggested by the expression in s 254(1)(d) “tax which is or will become due”, an expression that postulates a degree of certainty about the fact and amount of the tax liability which might not be present before a notice of assessment is served.^[17] Section 254(1)(e) would therefore ordinarily limit the liability of an agent or trustee to any amount of money received by the agent or trustee after the due date for lodging a return^[18] and thus after the derivation of the income with reference to which the tax was assessed. On this construction of s 254(1)(e), the appellant’s argument would produce quite remarkable results in the case of a trustee who, unlike other trustees, and unlike agents generally, is made liable under Div 6 of Pt III. Tax assessed to the trustee upon trust income, which otherwise would become due and payable shortly after issue of the notice of assessment, would not become due or payable unless and until the trustee, in that capacity, subsequently received more income in the form of money sufficient to pay the tax. That would be so even if the trust income with reference to which the tax was assessed was derived in the form of the receipt of money by the trustee and even though no beneficiary was presently entitled to any of the trust income or potentially liable for the tax. These are such surprising results as to cast doubt upon the construction which produces them.

[30] Other constructions of s 254(1)(e) may also be open, but on any construction which produces the limitation of liability for which the appellant contends there is a substantial conflict between it and those provisions which render trustees liable for tax with reference to s 99A and similar provisions in Div 6 of Pt III. In my opinion, the limitation of liability in the general provision in s 254(1)(e) must give way to those specific provisions in Div 6 of Pt III which impose liability to tax upon the trustee as an exception to the general rule that the beneficiaries are liable. Whilst s 254(1)(e) qualifies the personal liability s 254 creates, it should not be construed as qualifying the trustee's personal liability created by operation of s 204 and the other provisions mentioned earlier where, as in this case, a trustee is expressed to be liable to tax under a provision of Div 6 of Pt III; that is so, at least where, as in this case, the trustee was trustee during the period in which the trust income was derived and up to the time when the liability accrued under s 204. [19]

[31] In support of a contrary construction the appellant's counsel referred to the following passage in Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Prestige Motors Pty Ltd [1994] HCA 39; (1994) 181 CLR 1:

"By virtue of s 254(1)(b), the trustee was obliged to make a return in respect of any income derived by him in a representative capacity. Although s 254(1)(b) provides that the trustee is to be assessed on the return, the trustee is not liable to pay tax on any of that income save in respect of so much of the net income of the trust as is brought to tax by s 98, s 99 or s 99A. Where the trustee is liable to pay tax which is or will become due, the trustee is authorized and required to retain sufficient funds to meet that payment out of "any money which comes to him in his representative capacity"(s 254(1)(d)) and, to that extent but only to that extent, the trustee is personally liable for that tax (s 254(1)(e)). The trustee is not liable to be assessed to tax or to pay tax in respect of any share of the net income of a trust estate which is included in the assessable income of a beneficiary under s 97. But, where the trustee is liable to be assessed to tax, the assessment imposes a debt to be borne by the estate [Deputy Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Brown [1958] HCA 2; (1958) 100 CLR 32, at p 42]. Section 254(1)(b) directs that "each return and assessment shall, except as otherwise provided by this Act, be separate and distinct from any other".

[32] That passage supports the appellant's argument in so far as it conveys that s 254(1) comprehensively deals with the personal liability of trustees for tax. Considerable weight must be given to this considered statement by the High Court, but in my respectful opinion it does not foreclose the present question in the appellant's favour. The High Court was not called upon to decide and it did not decide whether or not trustees might be liable to make returns under s 161(1), to be assessed on such returns, and to pay tax under the statutory provisions discussed earlier in these reasons; and the Court did not decide whether or not s 254(1)(e) applied to limit the trustee's liability for tax in a case of this kind. Reference to the question in issue in Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Prestige Motors Pty Ltd and the authority cited in the quoted passage suggests that it should not be read as requiring the conclusion that s 254(1)(e) applies in a case such as this.

[33] The question was whether a notice of assessment was effective where the notice did not name the trustee. At first instance the Federal Court declared that the income tax assessed to the trustee was due and payable by the trustee to the Commissioner pursuant to s 204 of ITAA 1936.[21] The Full Federal Court reversed that decision [1993] FCA 580; (1993) 47 FCR 138, but the High Court set aside the decision of the Full Court. That case therefore did not define the relationship between s 254 and the statutory provisions which give conclusive effect to notices of assessment. The effect of ss 174, 177 and 204 of ITAA 1936 was, however, discussed in subsequent observations in the joint judgment [1994] HCA 39; (1994) 181 CLR 1:

"Service of the notice of assessment brings to an end the process of assessment"

As Kitto J explained in Batagol v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [(1963) [1963] HCA 51; 109 CLR 243], service of the notice of assessment on the taxpayer fixes the ascertainment of the amount of the taxable income and the amount of the tax payable by the taxpayer and brings to an end the process of assessment. His Honour said [ibid, at pp 251-252]:

"[I]f the Commissioner, having gone through the process of calculation, serves on the taxpayer a notice that he has assessed the taxable income and the tax at specified amounts, the tax becomes by force of the Act due and payable on the date specified in the notice or (if no date is specified) on the thirtieth day after the service of the notice: s 204. Thus, and thus only, there is brought about an 'ascertainment' of the taxable income and of the tax ... The word 'ascertainment' being understood in this sense, the definition of 'assessment' means, in my opinion, the completion of the process by which the provisions of the Act relating to liability to tax are given concrete application in a particular case with the consequence that a specified amount of money will become due and payable as the proper tax in that case."

Service of the notice on the taxpayer brings the process of assessment to an end in the sense that, in conformity with s 174(1), the notice, which necessarily reflects the requisite elements of the calculation that has been made, is served after the making of that assessment.

In Batagol, Kitto J was directing his comments to an assessment of a taxpayer to tax on his own taxable income. In applying the provisions of the Act to an assessment of a trustee to tax in respect of the net income of the trust estate, it is necessary to take into account the definition of "assessment" in s 6(1) as it relates to an assessment of a trustee to tax in respect of such income. Hence the process of assessment in such a case – and the notice – must specify, not the taxable income, but "so much of the net income of the trust estate as is net income in respect of which the trustee is liable to pay tax".

[34] The notice of assessment in that case was addressed to the "Prestige Toyota Trust" and, like the notices of assessment here, it included a statement that:

"Your taxable income is ..."

[35] The High Court concluded that "the recipient of the notice...would have understood it as a notice of assessment directed to the trustee of the Prestige Toyota Trust, and that the notice relates to the assessment of the trustee to tax in respect of a share of the net income of that trust";[24] and that, "the notice purported to define the tax liability of the trustee to be met out of money in the trust estate" and that the notice of assessment was therefore "a notice of assessment of the respondent to tax".[25]

[36] As to the liability being met out of money in the trust estate, the authority cited in the passage quoted in paragraph 31 of these reasons was Deputy Commissioner of Taxation v Brown [1958] HCA 2; (1958) 100 CLR 32. Significantly, that case did not concern a trustee who was rendered liable to pay tax on income of a trust estate derived by the trustee during the relevant year of income. The question in Brown was whether the Commissioner could recover from a person entitled in a distribution of a deceased's estate amounts she had received from the executors which were sufficient to cover the tax which had been assessed upon the executors by assessments and amended assessments made after they had fully administered the estate. The dictum of Dixon CJ in Brown cited in Prestige Motors Pty Ltd concerned the combined effect of ss 216, 217 and 254 of the Income Tax and Social Services Contribution Assessment Act 1936-1952 (Cth). Section 216 applied where a taxpayer escaped full taxation in his lifetime by reason of not having duly made full, complete and accurate returns: in that event the Commissioner was given the same powers and remedies against the trustees of the estate of the taxpayer in respect of the taxable income of the taxpayer as the Commissioner would have had against the taxpayer if he was still living, and consequential provisions (including the creation of a first charge on all the taxpayer's estate in the hands of the trustees for the amount of the tax) were provided for that purpose. Section 217 provided that, where at the time of a person's death, tax had not been assessed and paid on the whole of the income derived by that person up to the date of his death, the Commissioner should have the same powers and remedies for the assessment and recovery of tax from the trustees of that person's estate as he would have had against that person if that person was alive: again consequential provisions were made to give effect to that purpose. Importantly for present purposes then, the taxing provisions operated in relation to income derived by the deceased taxpayer rather than by the trustee.

[37] It was in that context that Dixon CJ observed:[27]

“The provisions of ss 216, 217 and 254 are specific: they do not in terms extend beyond the “trustees”. They are interpreted as imposing a liability upon the executors only quoad assets and as meaning by assessment to impose a debt owing by the estate: see Stapleton v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [(1955) [1955] HCA 58; 93 CLR 603, at p 618].”

[38] In Stapleton v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1955] HCA 58; (1955) 93 CLR 603, the relevant provision in issue was again s 216 of the Income Tax and Social Services Contribution Assessment Act 1936-1953 (Cth). The question was whether the Commissioner was entitled to claim a first charge on the assets of a bankrupt vested in the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy to secure payment of the amount of amended assessments to tax issued after the bankruptcy and after the appointment of the Official Receiver or, alternatively, whether the Commissioner was entitled to prove against the estate in the same amount in priority to most of the secured creditors. Dixon CJ, McTiernan, Williams, Webb and Taylor JJ[29] construed s 216 as authorising the Commissioner to assess the trustees of the estate and proceed against them for recovery of the tax, “though he could not, of course, recover from them anything in excess of the value of the assets in their hands at the time of the assessment or coming to their hands thereafter (cf Patterson v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [(1936) [1936] HCA 57; 56 CLR 507 at pp 518, 519]).”

[39] Patterson v Federal Commissioner of Taxation [1936] HCA 57; (1936) 56 CLR 507, concerned s 62 of the Income Tax Assessment Act 1922-1932 (Cth), which gave the Commissioner the same powers and remedies for the assessment and recovery of tax from the executors and administrators as the Commissioner would have against the deceased person if that person were alive. In the context of that section, which rendered a representative liable to pay tax in respect of income derived by a taxpayer before the representative was appointed, it seems unsurprising that the Court concluded that the executors and administrators’ liability was “as representatives and extends only to the assets of the deceased coming to their hands or which ought to come to their hands.”[31]

[40] In summary, Brown, Stapleton and Patterson concerned taxing provisions which imposed a liability to tax upon a person who was appointed as a representative after the relevant income had been derived and who therefore had no opportunity during the period when that income was derived to make provision for any tax liability. Whilst s 254 might well have a similar operation in a similar case, there is no similar rationale for construing s 254(1)(e) as qualifying the ordinary operation of s 204 in its application to those sections in Div 6 of Pt III which expressly contemplate that a trustee will be made personally liable for tax as an exception to the general liability of beneficiaries.

Our subsection 159(1) has a broader scope since applies to not just the trust property itself but also beneficiaries for whom the trustee acts as well, as the trustee personally: the collection alternatives are 3 fold when considering the above case though there would be of course argument that once the income has been paid/payable to a beneficiary the trust’s tax liability in respect of it disappears.

The “Splintered 4 Quadrant” “Multi-faceted” Trust/Estate: What Our Act Actually Says and Why You Should Be Cautious in your Dealings with its Property

While a vast majority of trusts are recognizable and assessed based on the stated trustees or executors it should be noted that these are not the only parties who can be subject to assessment in respect of its property. The “targeting” provision that gives the trust its identity for purposes of the Act and turns it into “a taxpayer”, s. 104(1), opens up the parties against which an assessment can be based to those that are:

*...unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property...

and thus there are 4 quadrants of recognition who can deal with trust property who can attract assessment:

1. the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator, succession heir or legal representative having ownership of any of the trust property
2. the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator, succession heir or legal representative having control of any of the trust property

3. those not actual such parties since the provision refers to only include, not “mean”, having ownership of any of the trust property
4. those not actual such parties since the provision refers to only include, not “mean”, having control of any of the trust property.

Equally, unlike the rest of the subsection, such a party need not have such characteristics in respect of all of the trust property since when reading further in the subsection Finance has made specific provision for other types of trusts that:

...a trust is deemed not to include an arrangement under which the trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust's property...

Such specifically allows for the valid argument that Finance sought to cast as wide as possible a net, especially given its opening identification process to a very broad cast of possible parties to capture any instance where any party has any control or ownership of any of the trust's property: the ITA does not seek to dwell on inter-“trustee” legal obligations but only seeks to capture any and all economic incidents of any the trust's property and it doesn't differentiate who owns or controls it but instead identifies, for assessment purposes, anyone who “comes near it”, for tax realization.

These primary 4 quadrants of trust identity can then be easily seen to open up, on a multiple faceted basis, to be, ownership or control by any party, on a trust property by property basis. “Ownership” or “control” were undoubtedly chosen to target since some trusts are created only with loaned property without title transfer and thus “control” captures such: but, it's interesting that the definition hasn't evolved to narrowing the discretion to identify to between the two, which, *presently it allows for both*²⁴.

So Finance has cast a “diamond” multi-faceted definition of “trust” (or “estate” for that matter) for purposes of the Act²⁵.

In other words, if the party fits within 1 to 4 above, then they can be subject to an assessment if they have dealings with any of the trust's property.

While under the ITA the shareholders and their corporation are maintained completely “opaque” through the corporate shell, and in the case of partnerships the same holds equally true to certain extents though attribute immediately gains from the property to the partners, in the case of trusts/estates the fact that ownership/control of the trust property is referenced statutorily, the constituting document, the trust deed, or named trustees/executors thereunder, are not the assessment target as such: those parties, looking through the trust deed to who has ownership or control of the trust's actual property(ies), are. Simply put, s. 104(1) isn't narrowed down to apply only to the trust document as a global item and named trustees/executors stated therein: it looks through it to the underlying property(ies) and who owns them, individually through the trust deed, or controls them. And, s. 104(1) further splits that ownership/control down to multiple parties and multiple properties since to do otherwise would disallow the broadness of the “ownership or control” referencing to allow some property to avoid capture. In short, even if you're not a named trustee, though have control over a particular property owned by it, you can be assessed since that is the targeting of identification for assessment under s. 104(1)²⁶.

24 And by ensuring both seem to apply equally the argument that one party either owns or controls property, while another does, precludes the argument from exempting that party from assessment.

25 Clearly there must be a trust in respect of it being subject to ownership/control by one party for the measured benefit of another, allowing the 3 certainties to exist.

26 This is further reinforced with the wording in s. 104(2) referring to multiple trustees, multiple trusts and multiple specified properties.

“Taxed as individual – Sec. 104(2)”

(2) A trust shall, for the purposes of this Act, and without affecting the liability of the trustee or legal representative for that person's own income tax, be deemed to be in respect of the trust property an individual, but where there is more than one trust and

(a) substantially all of the property of the various trusts has been received from one person, and
(b) the various trusts are conditioned so that the income thereof accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary, or group or class of beneficiaries,

The SCC seems to have interpreted differently in detail, in the author's opinion, the actual wording of the liability provision, s. 104(1) in two of its pronouncements on trust identity and coverage in the ITA: Consolidated Holdings and Fundy Trust. In Consolidated²⁷ the SCC drilled down to the individual executor as a related party and thus looked through the trust deed to establish who, individually, controlled the trust property - being corporate shares - for vote casting purposes and thus control purposes - the subject of the litigation²⁸. In terms of establishing residency the SCC has looked to a global party test looking for the centrality of management of the actors and residency thereof, on a global basis. In the author's opinion, the former is a correct perspective of the simple application of s. 104(1) and the latter isn't.

This argument is very important in the face of recent SCC jurisprudence concerning issues of trust residency that state that the residency of the trust must be determined as the residency of the centrality of point of effective management (POEM) of an indivisible taxpayer, when, upon proper reading of the "identifying provision" - s. 104(1), *the alternative has clearly been provided for*²⁹.

While CRA will undoubtedly assess, based on convention, the named trustees/executors, that is not who they are limited to.

Estates

An "estate" within the context of the ITA provisions³⁰ consists of the property of the testator, within its widest definition, that passes to the legal representative on death pursuant to statutory authority or the will. The estate includes any property to which the testator was beneficially entitled before his death and pursuant to the death his legal representatives, be they executors or administrators, are compelled to deal with either pursuant to intestate law or the will in distributing it to parties entitled thereto.³¹ Certain forms of rights may arise to parties designated by the testator in his will that allow them to receive property not from or through the estate but pursuant to contractual/fiduciary situations in which the testator was formerly entitled and the distinction between such and those arising under a will/intestate law arises from the contractual arrangement in which the testator was involved. Such was the case in *Baltzan Estate v. Canada*³² where a testator stated in his will that his spouse would be entitled to the benefit of his R.R.S.P. if she survived him for thirty days and the Minister of National Revenue contended that the benefits flowed through the estate first then to her causing the R.R.S.P.s to be taxable in the hands of the estate. The relevant R.R.S.P. plans allowed the testator to designate a beneficiary if a designation was signed and delivered to the bank administering the plan and was acceptable by it before any payment was made whereby payment to the testator (or more accurately his estate) would not occur. The will designated the spousal beneficiary and she gained rights to the plan directly from the agreement and not from the estate or the will and the proceeds did not pass through the estate to be taxed.³³ As will be discussed, it's important to note the difference in the origin of the rights one creates when such of the trustees as the Minister may designate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be in respect of all the trusts an individual whose property is the property of all the trusts and whose income is the income of all the trusts.

This provision is needed for several reasons which include to disallow accessing marginal rates through creation of multiple trusts as well as amalgamating for assessment purposes. Note that the draftsman felt it necessary to refer to all properties and provides the discretion to the Minister to amalgamate: until she does then s. 104(1) applies by default to follow ownership or control issues across multiple instances to the mass of possible parties specified therein.

²⁷ [1974] S.C.R. 419

²⁸ See a subsequent subchapter on "the drunken trustee"

²⁹ At least in respect of the subject property

³⁰ related to those instances other than bankruptcy

³¹ See Stapleton v. F.C.T., 93 C.L.R. 603, Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th Ed. Vol 17 para. 61-612. See also In re: Estate of McKeena, 51 D.T.C. 533.

³² 1990 2 C.T.C. 232, Sur. Ct. of Sask.. See also the recent UK case of Fryer & Ors v Revenue & Customs [2010] UKFTT 87 (TC) (17 February 2010) for instances where pension fund balances did "hit" an estate or tax purposes.

³³ See a similar situation in Baird v. Baird, 1990 2 W.L.R. 1412 (PC), where Re: MacInnes, 1935 1 D.L.R. 401 (SCC), and Re: Shirley, 1965 49 D.L.R. (2d) 474, were discussed as jurisprudence concerning the source of nominated beneficiaries' entitlements under pension plans while In re Danish Bacon Ltd. Staff Pension Fund Trusts, 1971 1 W.L.R. 248 also was commented on wherein it was held with respect to a nomination:

"First, although the nomination had certain testamentary characteristics, and not least that of being ambulatory, it tax planning - very different consequences can result depending on their source.

A will may give an absolute gift but cut it down and impose a trust of varying duration in respect of it but the testator's intention must be clear³⁴. Superadded words may express wish/expectation but nothing more does not create a trust³⁵. The person named in the will or codicil upon which the responsibility is placed to ensure that the testamentary instructions are enforced is commonly referred to as the executor since habitually the bare legal title of the estate will vest in him by statutory authority and thus he must fulfill the duties of the office and execute the appropriate distributions. Since he has assumed the obligation of dealing with the legal title to the assets of the deceased a charging of the tax liabilities in respect of the estate, no matter how long it lasts in its form, against the executor is rational since it will only be he who is in the position to deal with the estate property. If the will doesn't provide that a certain person should be executor, or if there isn't any valid will applicable (intestacy) then the Courts (Surrogate) will appoint "an administrator" of the estate and once done he assumes the same responsibilities as the executor with respect to the estate property.

It is not here where you will find a rendition of the mechanics of the provincial estate administration/property devolution acts: they can be found generally now on-line for your inspection.

An executor or administrator of an estate may be deemed by provincial statute law relating to the devolution of property that in respect of certain types of property they are "trustees". In a loose sense an executor or administrator may be regarded as a trustee regardless since in effect they are holding legal title of property that is not their own that will be distributed to those beneficially interested, however, they are not obliged in the role of an executor/administrator to distribute legal title until the debts of the deceased have been extinguished and only then can they be described as "trustees".³⁶ If the property is specifically bequeathed to an executor upon a trust then he becomes a trustee of it when he has executed a declaration of this in respect of it or has severed it from the estate, thus sheltering it from estate claims. In *Pagels v. MacDonald*³⁷ the Court held:

"When the executor has performed all his executorial functions he may become a trustee in various ways: he may become a trustee by merely continuing to hold property after his functions as executor have been performed. When the executor becomes a trustee of ascertained property, the beneficiaries then become owners of equitable interests in that property. Thus a beneficiary under a will does not, by reason of the will alone, obtain any title, legal or equitable, to any asset forming part of the testator's estate. When he does obtain such a title, he obtains it as a result of the administration of the estate of the testator according to law and in accordance with the dispositions of the will."

In *Re: Cockburn Danckwert*³⁸ J. held that:

"Whether persons are executors or administrators, once they have completed the administration in due course, they become trustees holding for the beneficiaries, either on an intestacy or under the terms of took effect as a contractual arrangement and not as a disposition by the deceased. The contributions and interest did not come to the deceased and then pass on from him by force of his will or the nomination: they went directly from the fund to the nominee, and formed no part of the estate of the deceased.

.....
Despite certain testamentary characteristics, the nomination takes effect under the trust deed and rules, and the nominee in no way claims through the deceased."

The court in Baird held:

"Contracts and trusts are not mutually exclusive concepts and it does follow that, because a member has a right (whether in terms contractual or fiduciary) to have a payment made to his estate after his death in certain events in default or on failure of prior interests limited by the terms of the contract, the designation of those prior interests in accordance with the terms of the contract necessarily constitutes a testamentary disposition of trust property which is freely disposable by him during his lifetime."

The terms of the arrangement must be examined to ascertain whether it allows the testator the power to dispose of the amount standing to his credit under the scheme during his lifetime in that a disposition of the interest therein upon death will be testamentary: the testator can exercise effective control over the funds inter vivos.

34 Re: Fraser, 1942 2 W.W.R. 497.

35 Re: Richardson Estate, 1949 1 W.W.R. 1075, Re: Iversen Estate, 1956 19 W.W.R. 524, Re: Fletcher Estate, 1953 9 W.W.R. 566, Re: Duncan, 1953 10 W.W.R. 289, Brice v. Brice & Public Trustee for Alberta, 1971 1 W.W.R. 481, and Re: Quinn, 1984 52 B.C.L.R. 273.

36 See Wellington Harness Racing Club Inc. v. Hutt City Council [2004] 1 N.Z.L.R. 82 NZHC where the mere use of the term in a national Act was not enough to create a trust in the equity sense. The term's use was, essentially, found to be for limited statutory scheme.

37 1936 54 C.L.R. 519 at 526.

38 [1957] 2 All E.R. 522, at pg. 524.

the will..."

An executor is not to be equated with a trustee until all of the debts and liabilities of the deceased and estate are discharged or provided for and the residue has been ascertained. It is this residue that can then become the property of a trust accepted by the executor however, it is not until the estate has been administered that a trust in respect of its residue can come into existence.³⁹

Trusts Arising out of Estates

"A trust" is an equitable obligation binding a person to deal with the legal title of property over which he has control though most generally also legal ownership, for the benefit of persons described in the trust agreement or will by the settlor/testator. Trusts are a means by which the legal title to property may be held by one person while the benefits, ultimate or interim, accrue to or are currently realized by those persons equitably entitled to them. From this definition, one can clearly see the similarity between a trust arising out of a will and the unadministered estate which is subject to that will however there are some very fundamental differences. The executors or administrators of estates are not compelled in equity to be concerned with the proportionality of benefits, realized through their activities or spontaneously, inuring to the income or capital beneficiaries of the estate. They are instead simply concerned with the legal title to property in the estate and how it becomes vested, after the debts and liabilities have been extinguished, in the proper parties as per the will.

Until the residue of the estate is ascertained the subject matter, being the property of the trust which results, cannot be ascertained. In winding-up the estate, the executor/administrator must ascertain all of the liabilities of the estate of the deceased and extinguish or make provision for them, in many cases pursuant to the will. They may include trade accounts, credit card balances, income tax liabilities, mortgage liabilities and lease obligations etc.. It is only after the liabilities against the estate of the deceased have been extinguished or provided for that property can be considered clear of implicit encumbrances and transferred to beneficiaries or trustees named in the will upon the implicit/explicit assent of the executor.

It is also quite common for the testator's beneficiaries to have to assume estate debt as a consequence of receiving property. When and to what extent particular beneficiaries are to assume this debt have repercussions on the integration of tax-costs of property under the section 107 mechanics and on transfers of their estate/trust interests if such is to be the case.

One of the most classic instances where an unadministered estate was recognized as separate and distinct from a residuary trust that could arise on the completion of the administering of an estate was that of the Commissioner of Stamp Duties (Queensland) v. Livingston.⁴⁰ The Privy Council provided in is often quoted case, concerning whether a deceased taxpayer had formerly held a choice in action enforceable against the executors or a beneficial interest enforceable against trustees at the time of death, that:

"The testator's assets consisted of real and personal estate in New South Wales and real and personal estate in Queensland. Mrs. Coulson died on July 8th, 1950, intestate, having married her second husband on June 22nd, 1950. She thus survived her first husband by less than two years, and at the date of her death, his estate was still in the course of administration, no clear residue had been ascertained, and, consequently, no final balance payable or attributable to the shares of residuary beneficiaries had been determined. It is essential to the decision of this case that Mrs. Coulson's rights at her death were the rights of a person interested in a dead man's unadministered estate.

What, then could be the "beneficial interest in property" that was charged by this Act as the subject of a succession on Mrs. Coulson's death?... One way or the other then, if there is to be a taxable succession, it must be because she died owning a beneficiary interest in real property in Queensland or had beneficial personal property interests locally situate in Queensland. This is the way in which the issue has been posed in the judgments of the High Court of Australia, and in their Lordship's view it is the correct formulation of the problem.

When Mrs. Coulson died, she had the interest of a residuary legatee in the testator's unadministered estate. The nature of that interest has been conclusively defined by decisions of long-established authority, and its definition no doubt depends upon the peculiar status which the law accorded to an executor for the purposes of carrying out his duties of administration. There were special rules which long prevailed about the devolution of freehold land and its liability for the debts of a deceased, but subject to the working of these rules whatever property came to the executor virtue official came to him in full ownership, without distinction between legal and equitable interests. The whole property was his. He held it for the purpose of carrying out the functions and duties of administration, not for his own benefit; and these duties would be enforced upon him by the Court of Chancery, if application had to be made for that purpose by a creditor or beneficiary interested in the estate. Certainly, therefore, he was in a fiduciary position with regard to the assets that came to him in the right of his office, and for certain purposes and in some aspects he was treated by the court as a trustee. "An executor," said Kay J. in In re: Marsden, "is personally liable in equity for all breaches of the ordinary trusts which in Courts of Equity are considered to arise from his office." He is a trustee "in this sense." It may not be possible to state exhaustively what those trusts are at any one moment. Essentially, they are trusts to preserve the assets, to deal properly with them, and to apply them in a due course of administration for the benefit of those interested according to that course, creditors, the death duty authority, legatees of various sorts, and the residuary beneficiaries. They might just as well have been termed "duties in respect of the assets" as trusts. What equity did not do was recognize or create for residuary legatees a beneficial interest in the assets in the executor's hands during the course of administration. Conceivably, this could have been done, in the sense that the assets, whatever they might be from time to time, could have been treated as a present, though fluctuating, trust fund held for the benefit of all those interested in the estate according to the measures of their respective interests. But it never was done. It would have been a clumsy and unsatisfactory device from a practical point of view; and, indeed, it would have been in plain conflict with the basic conception of equity that to impose the fetters of a trust upon property, with the resulting creation of equitable interests in that property, there had to be specific subjects identifiable as the trust fund. An unadministered estate was incapable of satisfying this requirement. The assets as a whole were in the hands of the executor, his property; and until administration was complete no one was in a position to say what items of property would need to be realized for the purposes of that administration or of what the residue, when ascertained, would consist or what its value would be. Even in modern economies, when the ready marketability of many forms of property can almost be assumed, valuation and realization are very far from being interchangeable terms. At the date of Mrs. Coulson's death, therefore, there was no trust fund consisting of Mr. Livingston's residuary estate in which she could be said to give any beneficial interests, because no trust had as yet come into existence to affect the assets of his estate...

39 Re: Ponder, 1921 2 Ch. 59, Palmer v. Simmonds, 1854 2 Drew 221.

40. (1965) A.C. 694 (H.L.), as referred to in The Queen v. Eide Estate, 74 D.T.C. 6286.

... The law as they were stated it was reaffirmed by the House in the same terms in Dr. Barnardo's Homes v. Special Income Tax Commissioners. It is sufficient to quote two short passages from speeches in that case. Viscount Finlay said: "... the legatee of a share in the residue has no interest in any of the property of the testator until the residue has been ascertained. His right is to have the estate properly administered and applied for his benefit when the administration is complete"; while Viscount Cave says: "When the personal estate of a testator has been fully administered by his executors and the net residue ascertained the residuary legatee is entitled to have the residue, as so ascertained, with any accrued income, transferred and paid to him; but until that time he has no property in any specific investment forming part of the estate or in the income from any such investment, and both corpus and income are the property of the executors and are applicable by them as a mixed fund for the purposes of administration."...

"It is idle to use such phrases as... that she had an 'interest' in his estate." If the present appeal is tried by this test, which they accept as the correct one, their Lordships regarded as clearly established that Mrs. Coulson was that entitled to any beneficial interests in any property in Queensland at the date of her death. What she was entitled to in respect of her rights under her deceased husband's will was a choice in action, capable of being invoked for any purpose connected with the proper administration of his estate; and the local situation of this asset, as much under Queensland law as any other law, was in New South Wales, where the testator had been domiciled and his executors resided and which constituted the proper form of administration of his estate. For these reasons their Lordships agree with the view of the law that is expressed in the opinion of those members of the High Court, Fullagar, Kitto and Menzies J.J., who formed the majority on this appeal. They have studied, too, the reasoning of The Supreme Court of Canada on a similar issue in In re: Steed and Raeburn Estates; Minister of National Revenue v. Fitzgerald (1949 S.C.R. 453), and they note that the views that they have expressed in this opinion coincide with the judgments delivered by four out of five of the members of that court."⁴¹

While certain provincial devolution Acts statutorily provide that "trust" come into existence in respect of the deceased's property it's the author's opinion that this is mere codification of common law principles above enunciated. Whether the codification can be relied upon for purposes of the CITA is questionable: the legislators ostensibly did not wish to incorporate the diversity of provincial codifications into their Federal Act thus the sometimes concurrent usage of both terms "estate" and "trust" and specific usage of one, the other, or both in various provisions previously commented upon.⁴²

Besides the trusts created by statute for the purposes of and under the provincial Devolution of Estate Acts and Trustee Acts, technically, in order for a trust to be constituted there must be three certainties in the arrangement which may be created by way of transfer of legal title to another party⁴³ or by way of unilateral declaration.⁴⁴ The three certainties are that the intent or wish to create a trust can be ascertained, the property which is to be subject to the trust can be ascertained and the parties who are to be beneficiaries, and the extent of their interest, under the trust can be ascertained. Obviously, trusts may be directly created under a will by providing for these three certainties in the language used however until the debts and liabilities of the estate are netted out against the property to be held the arrangement suffers from a lack of certainty of the property to be held and thus cannot constitute a trust in the form of a residuary estate.⁴⁵ In the case of inter vivos trusts valuable consideration must be contributed to the trust and there must arise the existence of a fiduciary relationship between the ultimate parties to benefit and the holder of the property. The property subject to the trust must be ascertainable in order for the trust to be constituted: it is not enough that a description of property that might exist, the extent of the property must be ascertainable so as to lay the foundation of the beneficiaries' rights and the trustees' duties.⁴⁶ There need not be an overly meticulous description of the property: a description of the steps to be taken in ascertaining the property would be enough to allow the courts to establish the extent of interests and trustee duties if such is required.⁴⁷

The legal title to property⁴⁸ need not vest in a trustee in order for the trust to arise but instead the legal title

41 See also Robertson v. F.C.T. 1941, 65 C.L.R. 338, when properly held in an unadministered estate was held by the Australian High Court not to be held in a trust for purposes of the Australian Land Tax Assessment Act as well as Re: Beardmore Trusts, 1951 O.W.N. 728, and Ogilvie-Five Roses Sales Ltd. v. Hawkins et al., 1979 4 E.T.R. 163, as well as Smith v. Layh, 90 C.L.R. 102, and New Zealand Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of Probate Duty, 1973 V.R. 659, Re: Leigh's Will Trusts, 1970 Ch. 277, Re: Ponder, 1921 2 Ch. 59, Re: Cockburn's Will Trusts, 1957 Ch. 438 (severed property), Re: Edward's Will Trusts, 1982 Ch. 30, Wise v. Whitburn, 1924 1 Ch. 460, Attenborough v. Solomon, 1913 A.C. 76 (H.L.), Bromley et al. v. Tyron et al., 1952 A.C. 265 (H.L.), Richardson v. Watson, 1833 4 B & Ad. 787, Off. Rec. in Bankruptcy v. Schultz, 1990 64 A.L.J.R. 651, Winter v. Grady, 1921 21 S.R. (N.S.W.) 686, Re: Ferguson, 1957 V.R. 635, Lords Atkinson, Wrenbury, and Carson in Baker v. Archer-Shee, 1927 A.C. 844 Corbett v. I.R.C. 1938 1 K.B. 567, Eastbourne Mutual B.S. v. Hastings, 1965 1 W.L.R. 861, Barclay v. Barclay, 1970 3 W.L.R. 82, and Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th Ed. Vol. 17, para. 1355-56.

42 See Duggan v. Gov. of Full Sutton Prison and Anor., [2003] 2 All E.R. 678 ChD, where the statutory reference to "a trust" did not recognize one to be created for the purposes of private law, while in Registrar of the Accident Compensation Tribunal v. Comm. Of Tax. Of Aust., [1993] 178 C.L.R. 145 HC Aust., where a statutory body was recognized as a trust for purposes of the imposition of the taxing statute.

43 which is the case in all will trusts and some inter vivos trusts.

44 which should be, but need not be, in writing except in the case of land.

45 Bromley v. Tyron, 1952 A.C. 265 (H.L.), Re: Ferguson, 1975 V.R. 635, Eaton v. Paines, 1894 W.N. 32. See also Re: IBL Industries Ltd, 1991 76 D.L.R. (4d) 439, and B.C. v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., 1989 2 S.C.R. 24, where the vagueness of property purportedly held in trust did not allow one to be recognized in an inter vivos situation.

46 Re: Beardmore Trusts, 1951 O.W.N. 728.

47 If the subject matter isn't accurately defined the trust may fail, as was the case in F.C.T. v. Clarke, 40 C.L.R. 246, where a taxpayer tried to divert income into a supposed trust.

48 being its legal ownership to the right to the use of the property may be the object that is conveyed as valuable consideration. This distinguishes the "transfer, assignment or disposition" of property to the trust from the lending of the legal title of the property to the trust under the agreement that in return for the use of the property the trust may pay rent for it to the "contributor". On the termination of the agreement the property is "returned" to the lender and the trust either continues to maintain the excess income realized from the property for the benefit of the stated beneficiaries, or dissolves following a distribution of that excess accumulated income. The valuable consideration is obviously the right to the excess income and it is only generated through a loan of property to the trust.⁴⁹

A testamentary general or special power of appointment granted to the executors that will allow them to appoint property from the residuary estate to unspecified or certain parties automatically doesn't, in the author's opinion, cause the trust to be void due to lack of certainty of object nor does it offend the rule against delegation of testamentary power.⁵⁰ This was the case in *Re: Nicholls*⁵¹ where broad and successive general powers of appointment were given to executors exercisable in respect of residuary property. This case is illustrative of jurisprudence concerning the topic and the Court of Appeal found that the residuary trust was created notwithstanding the lacking of specific beneficiaries. No contemporary or societal interest would be prejudiced by the general power of appointment in a testamentary situation and the issue should be decided on principle and policy in each individual case.⁵²

A trust is an equitable obligation imposed upon the acceptor of the office of trustee which causes him to fulfill the terms of the agreement, (i.e. holding of legal title, distribution of property, carrying on business, etc.). It is the beneficiaries as expressed in the agreement, for whom such action will benefit, who have recourse to the trustee in the event of a breach of the equitable obligation that compels him to act. A settlor acting only in that capacity doesn't have recourse against the trustee in instances of breach though he may reserve the power to revoke the trust or remove the trustee and appoint another. This is often a good tax planning point even with Sec. 75(2). A trust can easily be equated with being a structured arrangement whereby the legal title to the subject property is to ultimately vest in a beneficiary, (who may be the trustee) or be made available for his use. The property in this case may be the original property that the settlor of the trust transferred to the trustee or it may be property such as income that accrues in respect of the original property. Beneficiaries may be absolutely entitled to receive the legal title of the property at some time or they may be contingently entitled being their beneficial rights are enforceable only upon the occurrence of an event that is described in the trust deed and in cases where the event doesn't occur there may be a gift over to the other beneficiaries or a reversion to the settlor. Their rights, as given in the beneficial title, may be enforceable in the future or immediately.

Unlike the unsettled estate a trust agreement compels the trustee to deal with property in a manner that is impartial to the beneficiaries named in respect of the trust and thus he must exercise his powers and obligations in an "even-handed" way so as not to cause the beneficiaries entitled to capital and income 49 See Dunkelman v. M.N.R., 59 D.T.C. 1242, and C.I.R. v. Levy, 56 T.C. 68, for the classic example as well as Chamberlain v. C.I.R., 25 T.C. 317, and C.I.R. v. Plummer, 1979 3 All E.R. 775.

50 A power of appointment is imply the legal ability to grant legal or beneficial ownership or interests in property it is expressed in respect of. They will be commented upon in depth subsequently in relation to disclaimers and are another other flexible tool.

51 34 D.L.R. (4d) 321 (O.C.A.)

52 See Re: McEwen, 1955 N.Z.L.R. 575, Blausten v. I.R.C., [1972] 1 All E.R. 41 (C.A.), Chichester Diocesan Fund & Bd. of Fin. Inc. v. Simpson, [1944] 2 All E.R. 60 (H.L.), Re: Leek, 1967 2 All E.R. 1160, Re: Manisty's Settlement, 1974 Ch. 17, Re: Abraham's Will Trusts, 1969 1 Ch. 463, Klassen Estate v. Klassen, 1986 5 W.W.R. 746, and Hatfield Estate, 12 B.C.L.R. (2d) 162 (S.C.). See Horan v. James, 1982 2 N.S.W.L.R. 376, for historic analysis of 33 relevant cases and E. & T.Q. 1988 Vol. 9 pg. 1. As provided in Re: Beatty's Will Trusts, 1990 3 All E.R. 844 (Ch), citing Re: Nicholls with concurrence, the rule of uncertainty has often been the basis for holding a testamentary power invalid, not the rule against testamentary delegation. It was also held by the Chancery Court justice that the question of what would constitute sufficient guidance to the executors (as well as the courts) is so much a matter of degree that predicting a rule on powers would be impossible and that the rule against delegation was a "shadow cast by the rule of uncertainty, having no independent existence". Tatham v. Huxtable and Horan v. James were expressly not concurred with while it was pointed out that it would be additionally disruptive to individuals if such a rule was found to exist given their reliance on liberal jurisprudence in arranging wills additionally reinforced by examples of such powers to avoid inheritance taxes in the popular source books.

therefrom unequal hardship, loss, or benefit, other than that allowed as per the trust provisions.⁵³ This is often a difficult consideration in the taxation environment.

A bequest of a specific property through the will is quite different from a general bequest of a value of the estate after it has been fully administered in that the beneficiary under the former receives immediate beneficial ownership of the property and it vests indefeasibly in him, (subject to possible subsequent estate debt application), while under the latter his rights to the estate may be negated by excessive creditor claims. The legal representative still maintains a lien against the former specific bequest. Since the property is specified and ascertained to a greater extent than the balance of the estate it can be concluded that a trust in respect of it has arose while it continues to suffer from being subject to creditors' claims.⁵⁴

In *Scott Davis et al. v. Her Majesty the Queen*⁵⁵ the TCC had to establish whether an inter vivos trust had been established in respect of founding employees of a corporation with regard to its shares. It held:

[30] I must now review the evidence and jurisprudence to determine whether a Trust existed in this situation.

[31] Counsel for the Appellants referred to the text by Professor Donovan Waters – The Law of Trusts in Canada, Chapter 5. Counsel for the Appellants quoted from page 107:

For a trust to come into existence, it must have three essential characteristics. As Lord Langdale M.R. remarked in Knight v. Knight, in words adopted by Barker J. in Renahan v. Malone and considered fundamental in common law Canada, first, the language of the alleged settlor must be imperative; second, the subject matter or trust property must be certain; third, the objects of the trust must be certain. This means that the alleged settlor, whether he is giving the property on the terms of a trust or is transferring property on trust in exchange for consideration, must employ language which clearly shows his intention that the recipient should hold on trust. No trust exists if the recipient is to take absolutely, but he is merely put under a moral obligation as to what is to be done with the property. If such imperative language exists, it must, secondly, be shown that the settlor has so clearly described the property which is to be subject to the trust that it can be definitively ascertained. Third, the objects of the trust must be equally clearly delineated. There must be no uncertainty as to whether a person is, in fact, a beneficiary. If any one of these three certainties does not exist, the trust fails to come into existence or, to put it differently, is void.

I. Certainty of Intention to Create a Trust

[32] Counsel for the Appellants referred to the characteristics specified to by Professor Waters and said:

Dealing with the first certainty, certainty of intention, simply put, this means there has to be some evidence a settlor had in mind to give another person the benefit of some property that is owned by the settlor.

[33] Counsel for the Appellants again quoted from the text by Professor Waters at page 108:

There is no need for any technical words or expressions for the creation of a trust.

[34] Counsel for the Appellants noted that the evidence indicates that there was an intention that a certain percentage of the shares of Canfish were to benefit Canfish employees. Counsel for the Appellants said that the intention to hold the shares for Canfish employees is satisfied by the evidence which established that each principal took the position that they were holding 5% of the shares in Trust for employees or future employees.

[35] Counsel for the Appellants also noted that further evidence of the intention to create a trust is the Trust Declaration (Exhibit A-2).

II. The Subject Matter of the Trust Property must be Certain [36] Counsel for the Appellants said that the subject matter of the Trust property was 5% of the

⁵³ See Re: Haye's Will Trusts, 1971 1 W.L.R. 758, and Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th Ed., Vol. 48, para. 827.

⁵⁴ Is there thus a fundamental dichotomy here then? See Re: West, 1909 2 Ch. 180.

⁵⁵ 2008TCC31

issued and outstanding shares of Canfish.

[37] Counsel for the Appellants also noted that the fact that the amount paid for the 5% of Canfish shares flowed through SKD Holdings is an indication that there was Certainty of Property concerning the Canfish employees.

III. Certainty of Objects

[38] Counsel for the Appellants said that the "Certainty of Objects" is to be regarded to mean certainty as to who is a beneficiary of the Trust.

[39] Counsel for the Appellants said that the "objects" of the Trust have to be either existing employees of Canfish or may include former employees of Canfish.

[40] Counsel for the Appellants said that "it is sufficient to name a class or category of persons as beneficiaries, as long as it is possible to ascertain that a particular person is a member of the class" (Transcript p. 49).

[41] Counsel for the Appellants said that in this situation it is sufficient that the Trust was established for the benefit of employees of Canfish, i.e. an ascertainable class.

[42] Counsel for the Appellants admitted that while Davis, Beagrie and Ramsay looked at all of the employees of Canfish (or former employees) and only selected some, this does not change the situation from the point of view of the trust law.

[43] Counsel for the Respondent said that the Crown's position is that there was not a valid Trust.

[44] Counsel for the Respondent agreed with counsel for the Appellants on the three "Certainties". However, counsel for the Respondent maintains that when we consider clause 1 of the Trust Declaration, the description of the beneficiaries of the Trust is too vague to meet the test of certainty.

[45] Counsel for the Respondent maintains that the cash and the NQL shares were received by the Canfish employees because of their employment with Canfish. Counsel for the Respondent said that the cash and the value of the NQL shares are taxable as a benefit under paragraph 6(1)(a) of the Act.

A. Creation of a Trust

[46] Both parties agree that three certainties must exist for a trust to be established.

[47] Counsel for the Respondent argued that there was an additional requirement for the effective creation of a trust that being the "constitution of the trust" which is the title transfer of property to the trustees. According to counsel for the Respondent, without this transfer of property a trust would simply be declared but not created.[1]

[48] The certainty of intention to create a Trust was spelled out in Exhibit A-1 which established that from the onset of the creation of Canfish, shares were to be held in Trust for the employees of the company. This intention was further evidenced by the execution of a Trust Declaration in favour of the future Canfish employees (Exhibit A-2). Collectively, these documents and the testimony of Mr. Davis and Mr. Mullen support the certainty that the founders of Canfish intended to establish a Trust on behalf of the Canfish employees.

[49] In the present appeal, the certainty of subject matter is achieved through a review of the Trust Declaration (Exhibit A-2), which states that 5% of the shareholdings of Canfish would be held in Trust. Although a specific number of shares were not provided in the Trust Declaration it is the discretionary power given to the trustees that prevents this certainty from failing.[2]

[50] The certainty of objects requires that the beneficiaries of the trust are described in clear terms such that the trustees can perform their duties when distributing property of the trust.

[51] In the context of a discretionary trust there is no need to individually identify all of the members of the group. However, this certainty will fail if "the definition of beneficiaries is so hopelessly wide as not to form 'anything like a class', so that the trust is administratively unworkable".[3]

[52] In the present appeal a discretionary Trust was established and the beneficiaries of the Trust were referred to as the employee pool of Canfish, i.e. an identifiable group easily ascertained.

[53] As discussed above, constitution of a trust occurs when there is a transfer of property to the trustee after a declaration has been prepared. This particular requirement for the creation of trust is contained in section 1260 of the Civil Code of Québec^[4] and as such would have no application in the present appeal.^[5]

[54] Since the three certainties have been established by the Appellants and the constitution of the Trust has application only in a civil law context, I have concluded that a Trust was legally established to hold a 5% share interest in Canfish, on behalf of Canfish employees.⁵⁶

The Act consistently refers to either trust or estate or both in its subsections and when reading it you should forever be sensitive to which tax creature the provision is applying to. This difference in character was pronounced quite well in the TCC of Howard Lipson, *Harriet Lipson v. Her Majesty The Queen*⁵⁷ where the Tax Court had to consider whether the definition of “taxable Canadian property” attended properly to trusts or, estates as well, in a Quebec succession environment (similar to an unadministered estate in common-law provinces). It held, appropriately with respect to the targeting provisions in the Act:

[15] The respondent says that the appellants disposed of capital interests in a trust and, accordingly, had the obligation to send notices pursuant to subsection 116(3).

[16] The respondent can only be correct if a Québec succession is a trust for the purposes of the definition of “taxable Canadian property”.

[17] Under the Civil Code of Québec there is no question that a succession is not a trust.^[2]

[18] The respondent argues that a succession is treated as a trust under the Act. She relies upon subsection 248(1) of the Act which provides that:

“trust” has the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1);

and upon subsection 104(1) which provides that:

In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a “trust”) shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property, but, except for . . .

The French language text of subsection 104(1) reads as follows:

Dans la présente loi, la mention d’une fiducie ou d’une succession (appelées « fiducie » à la présente sous-section) vaut également mention, sauf indication contraire du contexte, du fiduciaire, de l’exécuteur testamentaire, de l’administrateur successoral, du liquidateur de succession, de l’héritier ou d’un autre représentant légal ayant la propriété ou le contrôle des biens de la fiducie. Toutefois, [...]

[19] The appellants disagree, take the position that subsection 104(1) does not define the term “trust” and submit that providing that a trust or estate is to be referred to as a “trust” is a matter of labelling rather than definition. Consequently, it is wrong to conclude that an estate is to be considered as a trust for all purposes of the Act.

[20] I agree with the appellants’ conclusion. I think it is helpful to take the analysis through some additional steps.

[21] The terminology “the meaning assigned by” is used in a number of statutes and subsection 248(1) also provides that:

“estate” has the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1);

[22] When I first considered the appellants’ argument on this point, I was troubled by the question: What is the effect of the definition of “trust” in subsection 248(1)? Parliament puts in particular language for a purpose and, if the language of the statute is susceptible of a reasonable meaning, that meaning should be given effect.

[23] At first, it seemed unclear what the point of the definition in subsection 248(1) combined with subsection 104(1) was. Could it be that the two subsections constituted a surprisingly worded attempt to treat estates as trusts and trusts as estates?^[3]

⁵⁶ See also Arthur Stern and Her Majesty the Queen, 2004TCC461, where the TCC did not recognize the creation of a trust in respect of ownership of property when documentary evidence simply didn’t “go far enough” to provide such.

⁵⁷ 2012 TCC 20

[24] Clearly not. Not only is subsection 104(1) worded in a way that is not suited to such a purpose, but if one had wanted to equate trusts and estates, one would have written something much more straightforward.

[25] The words “‘trust’ has the meaning assigned by subsection 104(1)” have to be understood as meaning that throughout the Act a reference to “trust” shall be read to include a reference to a “trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator . . .” as the case may be.

[26] The words do not import into the Act as a whole a rule that the use of the word “trust” means “trust or estate”.^[4] This becomes clear when one examines the purpose of the subsection.

[27] When one considers the text of subsection 104(1) and that estates, successions and trusts are not legal persons, it becomes apparent that the purpose of the subsection is to simplify the drafting.

[28] In the absence of this provision, in some places where one is describing how to compute income, the text of the law would have to refer to the trust or estate, which is not a legal person, but in other places where one is placing an obligation to do something such as filing a return, one would have to refer to the person charged with carrying out that obligation, for example the trustee.

[29] What this drafting technique does is avoid the necessity of distinguishing between the trust or estate and the person charged with doing something; one has to read each section referring to “trust or estate” as referring either to the trust or estate or to the person given an obligation in relation to the trust or estate. The technique also avoids the necessity of repeating a series of alternative persons who may be the person who has the obligation.

[30] That is the effect of the attribution of meaning provided for in subsection 248(1); it is not to treat an estate as a trust.

[31] Consequently, there was no disposition of property described in paragraph (h) of the definition of “taxable Canadian property” and accordingly there was no obligation on the appellants to file a notice pursuant to subsection 116(3) of the Act.

When the Unadministered Estate becomes a Trust and Why It's Important for Tax Aspects: Should There Be 4 Testamentary Ownership Base's and Not 3?

The time at which an estate, which is undergoing administration, becomes a trust for purposes of the Act is very much a question of fact which must be evaluated in each individual case while the importance of the difference in the two can be quickly inferred from the expressed targeting of “trusts” and “estates” throughout the Act. As previously submitted a trust, in the form of the residuary estate, cannot come into existence⁵⁸ until the debt/obligations of the testator have been ascertained. Until that time, as a consequence, the value of the property subject to the beneficiaries trust rights cannot be ascertained.

The issue is extremely important since the Act does recognize a difference between the estate and a trust that arises out of it through its use of the terms both inside and outside subdivision k.

That point of time is an extremely important event that determines when:

1. income can be paid as such to residuary beneficiaries as capital rather than income to be taxed as income in the hands of the estate at potentially lower rates, directly undermining the application of the Sec. 104(6)-(13) income recognition transfer mechanics⁵⁹,
2. slightly technical though poorly drafted tainted spousal trust rules that allow for accessing of tax-free roll-overs to a spousal trust, in Sec. 70(7)-(8)⁶⁰,

⁵⁸ failing the expressed severing of property therefrom.

⁵⁹ See the subchapter in Income Payable Mechanics regarding Executors Year and Unadministered Estates

⁶⁰ Here, you can have your cake and eat it too, since it seems that you can donate property to the general estate and have it listed for purposes of the rules since they do not state that the property listed must be owned by the deceased

3. accessing carry-back of a common-law and ITA recognized executor's year estate losses in Sec. 164(6) to the testator's terminal return (which may be prevented if the estate crystallizes to a trust),
4. the avoidance of Part XIII withholding tax on "income" payments, which are actually tax capital payments per very material historic principles, to non-residents since Sec. 212(1)(c) targets Sec. 104(13) inclusions,
5. the enforceability of rights to income otherwise, when an estate takes extended periods of time to administer to the point of being a trust,
6. the numerous of provisions in the Act which apply to either specified "trusts", or, "estates", or both.

The facts of the instance determine how the ITA applies to it. And that's why it's extremely important to know in which "New York state of mind" you're in.

On the issue of how the property makes its way through the chain of ownership from testator to ultimate recipient [Sec. 70(5)/(6) "testator"-Sec. 104(1) "trust" - Section 107 "beneficiary", existing principally]⁶¹ and the non-capital property applications [Sec. 70(1)/(2)/(3)] the author's opinion is that there should be 4 ownership bases through which property flows in a testamentary tax setting: testator to, estate, to crystallized trust (if but for an infinitesimally small amount of time) then to, ultimate beneficiary as opposed to in many instances what exists now which is the 3, of, testator to, estate or trust, to ultimate beneficiary, or 2 in the case of spousal recipients. We see both the general estate and arising trust upon its administration, even for an instant, considered in the Sec. 70(7)-(8) tainted spousal trust mechanics, and the recognition of the executor's year, purely of an estate law perspective, in Sec. 164(6) but the difference in state of environment allows for considerable flexibility when one targets what transactions can occur between any trust arising out of the estate itself.⁶² Estate law is one aspect of the testamentary process, trust law applicable to creatures arising out of a crystallized estate in the testamentary setting is another. The provinces, with their command of property rights, have systemtically recognized the difference in the environment with both estate devolution and trustee acts where one or the other applies.⁶³ Here, the underlying law is not fully established save for a reasonable volume of non-tax precedents, while our ITA doesn't "think like that" at all. Why partially recognize a difference in the legal environments with their ramifications and then draw out inherent flaws via the absence of equally attendant provisions?

An important distinction to be made in this process of subject ascertainment is the recognition and accounting for debts/obligations of the testator that must be met out of the property in the estate and the actual extinguishment of those debts. In order for the executor/administrator to be considered to have fulfilled his function, through the normal process of advertising for creditors, fulfilling the deceased obligations etc., the estate must have been administered to the extent at which the beneficiaries' equitable rights become ascertainable in respect of property held. It is only at this time, at which property can be recognized not to be potentially subject to latently arising or identifiable claims that a trust in respect of it occurs, either informally or formally. Assent to the then operative instructions of the will, the second necessity, may also be evidenced by the executor's conduct.⁶⁴

This is not to say that debts will always be extinguished for often the testator directs that such debt is to be assumed by the beneficiaries as a condition of the distribution of the estate property, (or of the gift itself). Here the issue is debt not indicated in the will or debt in respect of which there are no directions given, how it is taxpayer. That property then can be streamed back to the donator through the will's/trust's provisions.

61 Though in the case of spousal recipients the property is deemed transferred directly to the spousal beneficiary.

62 Here there can be inter-estate/trust transactions involving such things as interest transactions/income recognitions/debt transactions, etc. Even more interesting is the instance where a spouse under a to-be testamentary spousal trust, who in common law has an interest in the general estate until the trust is created, transfers his interest. Is the scope of the interest limited to the spousal trust or to the estate as it is administered? Is there not a difference in their value? There is numerous case in the UK where the law is more refined in this area.

63 Though there may be instances where both apply to a given situation, but the primary objective of these two sets of statutes is the respect of genres of the historic common-law in their regard.

64 In Re: Perry, 1950 N.Z.L.R. 530, Attenborough v. Solomon, 1913 A.C. 76, Re: Claremont, 1923 2 K.B. 718, Gudgeon v. Pub. Trustee, 1960 N.Z.L.R. 233, In the Estate of Dunn, 1963 V.R. 165, Blake v. Bayne, 1908 A.C. 371, Re: Ponder, 1921 2 Ch. 59, Re: Rowe, 1926 V.L.R. 452, and Re: Yerburch, 1928 W.N. 208.

ascertained, extinguished or assumed, and the effect it has on the scope of the beneficiaries' rights. In C.I.R. v. Sir Aubrey Smith,⁶⁵ the question of whether or not an estate had been administered to the extent at which it could be seen as a trust arose with respect to payments received by a beneficiary while the beneficiary contended that since a singular, albeit substantial, mortgage remained to be extinguished out of the estate property "a trust" could not be recognizable. At the heart of the case was the fact that under the rule in *Rex (The King) v. Special Commissioners of Income Tax (ex parte Dr. Barnardo's)*⁶⁶ payments received by the beneficiary which were in substance income of the executor's were not recognizable as income in the hands of the beneficiary unless the estate could be shown to be fully administered thus allowing for the recognition of the beneficiary's distinctive income rights. Essentially in Smith the estate had been fully administered save for the extinguishment of the mortgage and when the beneficiary contended that due to the debt the residuary estate could not be ascertained Lord Hanworth, M.R. provided:

"... There were, as I say, mortgage debt due from the estate. There is still a sum of £10,000 due on mortgage. Emphasis has been laid upon that, and it is said that it has been attempted in some case, and in this case, to rely upon the fact that there was an outstanding mortgage unpaid as connoting that there could not be an estimation or ascertainment of the residuary estate because the estate was still fluid as the direction to pay debts has not yet been carried out. For my own part, I think this question of a mortgage debt, or any other debt, must take its proper place in perspective. It may be in some cases that there is a factor from which a strong inference may be drawn. It may be, on the other hand, that the device of leaving a debt unpaid is resorted to in order to pretend that the residue of the estate has not been ascertained and is not ascertainable. If such a device were resorted to in any case it ought to be held ineffective. In other words, there may be in this, or in any other case, features which point in one direction or another, and largely those features are questions of degree and so of fact."

"... all the relevant matters must be taken into consideration and, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt quite neatly says in his judgment in the present case, you may have an assent by conduct: 'When it is said that the executor 'assents to a bequest' what is meant is not that he assents to the disposition of the testator but that he assents to its taking effect upon the specific property if the bequest is specific, upon a sum of money if it is pecuniary, or upon the residue brought out by the executor at the end of the administration if it is a residuary bequest.'" Lord Haldane's exposition in Attenborough v. Solomon makes this clear. The assent of the executor, it is important to add, may be inferred when there is clearly nothing more to be done by way of administration. "The question is, in all cases: Has the administration of the estate reached a point of ripeness at which you can infer an assent, at which you can infer that the residuary estate has been ascertained and that it is outstanding and not handed over merely for some other reason.""

"The property which on the death of the testator vests in the executor does not remain vested in him forever. So soon as he assents to the dispositions of the will becoming operative and the trusts taking effect, the estate vested in him as executor is divested and vests under the dispositions of the will in the trustees of the will. The assent of an executor may be given formally and may be inferred from his conduct. In my opinion, it is a pure question of fact whether such an assent has been given or not, depending upon the particular circumstances of each case, and no other case with different facts can form any guide for the determination of that question. It has been mooted, but I do not think seriously contended, that the existence of a debt or debts, or liabilities which are outstanding prevents the assent of the executor being inferred by his conduct."

Essentially, the Court came to the conclusion that even though there remained a mortgage equal to £10,000, the estate property could still be ascertained by simply making provision for such out of the property to be passed on to the trustees or by assigning the debt to the trustees and that the fact that the debt remained unextinguished did not preclude the estate's attainment of full ascertainment.⁶⁷

65 15 T.C. 661 (C.A.)

66 7 T.C. 646.

67 See also Carlish v. C.I.R., 38 T.C. 37 (C.A.), as well as C.I.R. v. Wahl, 17 T.C. 744 (C.A.), Re: King's Will Trusts, 1964 Ch. 542, Re: Gibbs, 1951 Ch. 933, Re: Ponder, 1921 2 Ch. 59, Harvell v. Foster, 1954 2 Q.B. 367, as well as Martin v. Martin, 1903 S.R. (N.S.W.) 156, Re: The Earl of Stamford, 1896 1 Ch. 288. In Daw v. I.R.C., 14 T.C. 58, substantial mortgages with

Under most provincial Devolution of Estate Acts/Trustee Acts, depending on the property involved, vesting of property will be recognized, with respect to persons beneficially entitled thereto, at the end of an arbitrary time limit, (sometimes three years), while during that time, as per Ontario's Trustee Act, the personal representative may allow time for the payment of any debt while under Sec. 51(1) and 52(1) the personal representative has the power to distribute the residuary estate to the parties beneficially entitled thereto, upon the provision for the payment for covenants in respect of leases or liabilities in respect of rent charges. The ascertainment of a residue and the assent to the residuary gift are not equivalent and although a residuary trust may be set up with trustees separate from the executors until the latter's assent is established, even though the residue may be ascertained, the residue has not become subject to the testamentary trust.

Assent may be inferred from the executor's conduct, such as delivery of possession, while it may be deferred until settlement of disputes arising out of the nature of the situation possibly brought on by Dependant's Relief Act, Matrimonial Property Act applications.

The important concept to recognize when determining tax strategies is that the ITA does not in many instances apply to estates in the process of being administered but does when the residuary estate can be ascertained⁶⁸ hence there can be significant advantages to be obtained in retaining title of property frozen in the administrative stage and recognizing capital therefrom^{69, 70}

Nothing precludes the personal executors from giving effect to alternate directions in the will at differing times whereby the severing of potentially liability charged property from the estate occurs thus constituting operative trusts at that point of time, while until that point of time the trust cannot be considered in existence however the will must make provision for such.⁷¹

In *Frederick et al. v. C.I.R.*⁷² the windup of an estate was deferred due to the fact that to do so would cause the dissolution of a partnership that would eventually prove very profitable to the heirs. The administration was carried on for approximately eight years and the creditors' claims were fully satisfied within that time and the heirs allowed the title to the property to remain vested in the personal representatives so that they could continue the business. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue (USA) was unable in the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal to successfully argue that the estate income should be recognized by the heirs⁷³ and not the estate on the grounds that the reasonable period of time for administration had passed, and the Judge found that the estate was to be recognized as a distinct tax entity. In *Chick et al. v. C.I.R.*⁷⁴ at issue was whether the estate of a testator had ceased to exist after a certain period of time thus making the residuary estate's beneficiaries subject to the recognition of its income. As provided by the First Circuit Court of Appeal:

"Indeed the executor has never filed any account, either preliminary or final, in the Probate Court, he has never transferred any of the assets of the estate from himself as executor to himself as trustee of the residuary estate, nor has he ever identified any of the assets of the estate as assets of that trusts. Neither partial on going repayment precluded an estate from being seen to be completely administered for tax purposes precluding ascertainment of beneficiaries' rights. In Pilkington v. I.R.C., 29 T.C. 160 an outstanding mortgage didn't deter residue ascertainment.

68 such as in the case of the associated corporation rules, minimum tax, Sec. 94(1) foreign resident trusts, etc.

69 The estate will generally be "testamentary" in the tax sense of the term and thus benefit from the marginal tax rates applicable to individuals. As per Gresson, J. in Commr. of Taxn. v. Luttrell, 1949 N.Z.L.R. 828 (C.A.), and in essence in F.C.T. v. Whiting, 68 C.L.R. 199, and multitudes of other cases: "The state of administration is a governing factor." See recently Church And Commissioner Of State Revenue [2011] WASAT 26 (11 February 2011) for an instance of questioning whether a trust had arisen out of an estate when there was some question as to the executor's conduct.

70 Subsection 104(23), in para. (a), applying implicitly to both trusts and estates, recognizes that the taxation year of "the trust" will equal the period for which the accounts of the estate/trust have been ordinarily made up and when a date of property ascertainment has been reached by the estate, it becomes a trust, another fictional tax creature. Is this change in character an adequate reason to recognize that one tax entity's tax year has come to an end by its cessation of existence while another's has started, in the instance when the residuary estate is handed over to different parties who will assume the duties of trustees? It may be since clearly accounting methods used by the latter functionary are substantially dissimilar from the former's. Until that point of time trust accounting has not applied however changes in accounting methods may have to serve as the actual basis of an application for a change in fiscal period, not merely because the arrangement has become a trust.

71 See Brougham v. Poulett, 1855 19 Beav. 119, 52 E.R. 294, Lord Sudeley v. A.G., 1897 A.C. 11, (appropriation powers) and Halsbury's Law of England, 4th Ed. Vol 50 para 612.

72 145 F. 2d 796.

73 Under rules similar to Sec. 104(13).

74 166 F.2d 337.

has he ever paid any of the income from assets held by him as executor to himself as an individual or to his sister, Mrs. Foss the other petitioner, nor has he ever in any way earmarked, identified or credited any of the income received by the estate as income belonging to or distributable to himself or to his sister as beneficiaries under that trust. Since 1937, at least until after the tax year 1940, the petitioners, both of whom are on the cash basis did not report and pay federal income taxes on any of the income from the property comprising the residue of their father's estate.

Under these circumstances, The Commissioner of Internal Revenue determined deficiencies in the petitioner's income taxes for the taxable year 1940 on the ground that since the executor had collected all of the assets of the estate, had paid all its legacies and debt, and there were no contingent liabilities or civil suits pending against the estate and all acts relating to its administration had been performed, except for the transfer of the residue of the estate by the executor to himself as trustee, the income of the residue of the estate was in fact trust income taxable to the petitioners individually as beneficiaries of the residuary trust as provided in S. 162(b) of the Internal Revenue Code..."

Regulations under the U.S. Internal Revenue Code allow the Commissioners to essentially deem the estate to have ended and the residuary trust to have begun however no such power exists under the ITA for the use of the Canadian tax authorities.

In *Roy v. M.N.R.*⁷⁵ the Tax Review Board had to ascertain whether a taxpayer, who was both residuary beneficiary under an estate and its executor, had to recognize income from the estate in a particular year when non-deductible interest income was added to the beneficiary's income when the estate deducted it. Administration had begun in 1969 and the relevant year of assessment was 1974, five years after the death. Since the residue had not been distributed nor had the estate taxes been paid the Board found that the estate had not been settled⁷⁶ and thus the beneficiary could not recognize the income of the estate in his personal capacity. Five years, it would appear, is an acceptable time over which an estate can be settled. In *W.H. Grayson v. M.N.R.*⁷⁷ an entire estate was bequeathed to an accountant who was sole executor and beneficiary and although the will did not provide for the creation of a trust out of the residue of the estate the taxpayer attempted to argue, before the Tax Court, that the trust he created through the suspending of the terminal distribution did not declare income to be payable to him, the sole beneficiary. The Minister contended that even though the executor caused a trust to be created in respect of the estate the income realized thereby was still subject to an enforceable right of the taxpayer as sole beneficiary. Kempo, T.C.J., provided with respect to the taxpayer's motive:

"Indeed there is a very strong inference here that the Appellant was in a legal position, as sole beneficiary, to enforce the wind-up and distribution of the estate to him prior to the end of the estate's first fiscal year end as all administrative matters had apparently been completed before that time."

This direction is entirely in line with that in Chick et al. in that under both the estate had reached an appropriate point of "ripeness" while under both the beneficiary and executor were the same person however this does not negate the reasoning in *Roy v. M.N.R.*⁷⁸ For a contradictory case, see *McCauley v. C.I.R.*⁷⁹ where the exact opposite conclusion was found in a situation very similar to that in Grayson.⁸⁰ In *C.I.R. v. Wahl*⁸¹ the U.K. House of Lords found that a sole beneficiary was assessable for tax on the income of the estate of which he was the sole administrator when such had been received by him, deposited in his personal bank account, and spent personally.⁸²

75 78 D.T.C. 1123 (TRB).

76 especially since its assets were still being administered by the taxpayer in the role of executor.

77 90 D.T.C. 1108.

78 See Re: Heberley, 1971 N.Z.L.R. 325, & Re: Cook, 1948 Ch. 212, where the beneficiary as executor ceases to hold property under executorship once duties are completed and cannot be trustee for himself. As per Cunard's Trustees v. I.R.C., 1946 1 All E.R. 159, receive payments to a residuary beneficiary doesn't necessarily imply an assent.

79 193 F. Supp. 938 (1961).

80 See J.H. Anderson v. C.I.R. 1934 30 B.T.A. 1275, for jurisprudence similar to that in Roy.

81 17 T.C. 744 at 761.

82 See also Case #57, 1950 T.R.B.D. 209 (Australia), as well as F.C.T. v. Whiting, 68 C.L.R. 199, Case # G13, 7 T.R.B.D. 70 (1956) (Australia), and Robertson v. F.C.T., 65 C.L.R. 338. For further case law, see Patton v. U.S., D.C. Tex., 3 A.F.T.R. 2d 1475, Alston v. C.I.R., 8 T.C. 525, Harwood Estate, 46 B.T.A. 750, Stewart v. C.I.R., 5 Cir, 196 F.2d 397, Estate of E.J. Hyland, 10 C.C.H. T.C. Mem. Dec. 823 (1951), C.I.R. v. Hedges, 1952 18 T.C. 681, I.R.C. v. Smith, 1930 1 K.B. 713, M.C.

Testamentary Trusts.

Subsection 248(1) provides that for the purposes of the ITA "a testamentary trust" has the meaning described in Sec. 108(1)(i) which provides a definition of "testamentary trust" for purposes of subdivision k and thus it is only by virtue of Sec. 248(1) that the definition applies for purposes of the whole Act.

Aiming to maintain the testamentary trust status is critical since all other trusts are considered those inter vivos which suffer from the highest tax rate of 29% on their income pursuant to Sec. 122(1). Testamentary trusts enjoy graduated rates. In limited instances it may be possible to contribute property to an existing testamentary trust to benefit from lower marginal rates⁸³, or simply sell it to it to accomplish the same. Maintaining a testamentary trust status is, again, critical.⁸⁴

A General Definition

A "testamentary trust" means a trust or an estate that arose upon and in consequence of the death of an individual regardless of its residence or the deceased's residence immediately before death. In the subparagraphs of the Sec. 108(1) definition there are four provisions that preclude certain trusts or estates from being testamentary, even though the above general condition exists. There isn't an expressed time limit placed upon when the trust may arise however upon a review of the history of the provision it can be seen that, since it formerly meant "trust or estate that arose upon the death of an individual and in consequence of his death", there has to be a direct connection between the arising of the trust and the death and the time at which it arose cannot be unreasonably deferred after the time of death. From this rationale, it would appear that special powers of appointment, that can be used to create sub-trusts which must be read back into the original settlement, will be able to create a "testamentary trust" several years after the death of a settlor regardless of whether or not the will which contains the power creates itself a "testamentary trust". The sub-trust may be seen to arise in consequence of the death of the settlor (testator) and "upon" his death since the result of its exercise will be read back into the will of the testator however where the power is a general power of appointment given to the trustees of the testamentary trust property, its exercise which creates a "sub-trust" will not be read back into the original settlement and the new trust may not be "testamentary".⁸⁵

"Definition of Testamentary Trust – Sec. 108(1)"

"testamentary trust" in a taxation year means a trust or estate that arose on and as a consequence of the death of an individual (including a trust referred to in subsection 248(9.1)), other than

- (a) a trust created by a person other than the individual,
- (b) a trust created after November 12, 1981 if, before the end of the taxation year, property has been contributed to the trust otherwise than by an individual on or after the individual's death and as a consequence thereof, and
- (c) a trust created before November 13, 1981 if
 - (i) after June 28, 1982 property has been contributed to the trust otherwise than by an individual on or after the individual's death and as a consequence thereof, or

Westphal v. C.I.R., 1961 37 T.C. 340, McCaughey v. Commr. of S.D., 46 S.R. (N.S.W.) 192, Re: Mackay, 1906 1 Ch. 25, Re: Richetson, 17 S.R. (N.S.W.) 233. See also Herbert v. I.R.C., 9 T.C. 593, for J. Rowlatt's endorsement of executor's ability to withhold assent due to incidental outstanding liabilities. Such a position allowed interim payments out of income to be received as capital. See Easterbook v. Young, 13 A.L.R. 351, for change in capacity of an executor-beneficiary through assent.

⁸³ Without taste, for those who want to take it that far, is to actually transfer ownership of property to a to-be-testator, under contract, that he set up a testamentary trust of it even recognizing a Sec. 70(5) disposition: thinking a few years ahead of the game pays off in reduced taxation.

⁸⁴ See "Qualifying and Non-qualifying Testamentary Trusts", John E. Poyser, Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 24 Pg. 41 for additional comment on the importance of testamentary trust status.

⁸⁵ A special power of appointment, unlike a general one, allows the power holder to decide, within the expressed restrictions imposed by the settlor, who will receive property, while a general power is not restricted and the trustee's discretion can be exercised without restraint to the detriment of any beneficiary. The fact that the trust arising upon the exercise of the special power of appointment will not relate back to the time of the death does not detract that it arose on or after and as a consequence of death.

(ii) before the end of the taxation year, the total fair market value of the property owned by the trust that was contributed to the trust otherwise than by an individual on or after the individual's death and as a consequence thereof and the property owned by the trust that was substituted for such property exceeds the total fair market value of the property owned by the trust that was contributed by an individual on or after the individual's death and as a consequence thereof and the property owned by the trust that was substituted for such property, and for the purposes of this subparagraph the fair market value of any property shall be determined as at the time it was acquired by the trust;

Created only by the Dying Individual

Subparagraph (a) provides an important restriction whereby trusts "created by a person other than the individual", even though they may have arose upon and in consequence of that individual's death, will not be considered as "testamentary". One must have a technical understanding of the phrase "a trust created by a person other than the [testator]" to recognize the importance of this provision.⁸⁶

Whereupon the death of a taxpayer another person creates a trust for the deceased's offspring the trust will not constitute a testamentary one even when it arose upon and in consequence of the death of the taxpayer however if it was the taxpayer, upon his death and as a consequence thereof, who caused the trust to be created, the trust will be testamentary depending on where the property contributed to it came from. Thus if a testator who had a power to revoke a previously established inter vivos trust, or who had a general power of appointment over a trust property, exercised the power through his will so as to cause the property previously owned by the existing trust to become subject to the new trust, a testamentary trust would have been created by the taxpayer and not by the inter vivos trust. By virtue of the fact that the testator has a general power it is the individual who is contributing property to the trust through his testamentary wishes. If a taxpayer other than the deceased exercised the above power it would be he who would be recognized as the creator of the trust and the trust resulting would not be testamentary.

The result of the exercise of a general power of appointment is to be read back to the person exercising the power as if he created or contributed to the trust, not as if the trust where the legal title was previously situated created or contributed. The result of the exercise of a special power of appointment is recognized as being derived from the terms of the will/trust itself, not the person exercising the power, hence where a will grants a special power of appointment over property held in an inter vivos trust to an executor and as per the will it is restrictively "special" the exerciser may create "a testamentary trust", (if provided for), without hindrance since it is not the executor who is making the contribution but the testator as if he were to have directed the contribution. If such a power is exercised at will and the initial trust is testamentary the sub-trust will be testamentary while if the head trust is inter vivos the sub-trust can still be testamentary (per the balance of the full definition since the property is coming from an individual – an inter vivos trust). In the case of general powers it will only be when the power is exercised on death through the will that the resulting trust will be testamentary.

An inter vivos trust deed may contain a trust that can arise on and as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer⁸⁷ when there are various successions of interests depending on the contingent occurrence of events, however, the critical condition in order for it to be a testamentary trust is that it must have arose as a consequence of the death. In such a situation, the trust may be recognized to be inter vivos.⁸⁸

Even though an arrangement may derive its vigour and effect from death it need not be testamentary. If the trust is created pursuant to an inter vivos contract entered into by the testator that provides the trust will be created upon his death the trust will not arise as a consequence of the death but as a consequence of the terms of the contract.⁸⁹

86 See "Distributions by Canadian Testamentary Trusts" by Virginie Chan and François Morin in The Canadian tax Journal 87. as per Kent and Anor. v. Commr. of S.D., 106 C.L.R. 366, Atwill v. Commr. of S.D., 45 A.L.J.R. 703 (HCA).

88 See also Robett v. Commr of S.D., 1929 A.C. 444, Thomson v. Commr. of S.D., 1929 A.C. 450. Commr. of S.D. v. Perp. Trustee Co. Ltd., 21 C.L.R. 69, Campbell v. Commr. of S.D., 11 S.R. (N.S.W.) 426, Rosenthal v. Rosenthal, 11 C.L.R. 87, Elder's Trustee & Exor. Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of S.D. 1945 S.A.S.R. 34, Re: Bowman, 1937 S.A.S.R. 274, as well as Commr. of S.D. v. Sprague, 101 C.L.R. 184, and Re: Watkins, 1968 V.R. 486, for trusts arising on death.

89 See McFadden v. Public Trustee for Victoria, 1981 1 N.S.W.L.R. 15, for the designation of a beneficiary under a pension

In Re: Harmsworth,⁹⁰ a testator provided to his spouse an annuity of £ 5000 per year on condition that she create a trust out of one half of the investment property she owned at the time of death the beneficiaries under which were to be those entitled to the testator's residue. The trust was created thus the annuity paid but when the spouse died duty was not assessable upon the property held in trust; it was not held in her personal capacity.⁹¹ If these arrangements were executed in Canada, the spouse would recognize a taxable disposition of her property under Sec. 69(1), and the trust she creates would not be testamentary.^{92 93}

Advanced Anti-avoidance and Balancing Property Holdings

Subparagraphs (c)(i) and (ii) are anti-avoidance measures that cause otherwise testamentary trusts to lose their status if they have received contributions of property from "foreign" parties. As per para. (i) where the trust was created after Nov. 12, 1981, and property was contributed to that trust otherwise than by an individual on or after his death and as a consequence thereof, the trust cannot be testamentary.⁹⁴ See above notes on who contributes to trusts through the exercise of differing powers.

If property was sold for consideration payable which is equal to the fair market value of the property a "contribution" cannot be seen to have been made since a "contribution to a trust" is usually a gratuitous transfer of property. In this respect since property cannot be sold to an estate in the midst of administration unless the executor is exercising purchase options formerly held by the deceased it can only be contributed and if it wasn't contributed as a result of the death of an individual the recipient estate will automatically lose its testamentary nature. In that case, it would be preferable to wait until the estate is fully administered so that the residual trust could pay consideration to the transferor as consideration for the property allowing it to maintain its status if it is to receive outside property. Alternatively the will could be structured to allow the executor to create trusts out of specified property or contribute to created trusts property received by the estate whereby the trust recipient should retain its testamentary status. A trust and its estate are separate taxpayers as recognized under Sec. 108(1) as per the diction, though they are not at arm's length.

Since the paragraph concerns only contributions of legal title of the property to the trust but not loans of that title obviously a lending of property to the residual estate will not affect its testamentary status, and it is only as a consequence that the residual estate is considered in substance, and by the Sec. 108(1), to be a trust that the attribution rules in sections 74.1 and 74.3 will apply.⁹⁵

Would one be reading too much into the Sec. 108(1)(c) subparagraph to perceive a restriction in inter-testamentary trust beneficiary relationships created by the terms of the taxpayer's will? If the will creates two or more trusts where one holds an interest in the other is the interest-holder trust testamentary or has it received property otherwise than on as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer? Since the definition doesn't refer exclusively to property formerly held by a taxpayer it could operate to capture property created by the death however it's questionable whether the receipt of such an interest would violate the definition.⁹⁶ contract which operated to create a trust arising after the pensioner's death. The trust was found to have arose by the virtue of the contract enforceable upon death and not as a consequence of death but this may be too "narrow". See also Beyer v. Beyer, 1960 V.R. 126, Cathels v. Commr. of Stamp Duty, 1959 79 W.N. (N.S.W.) 271, Nat. Trustees, Exors, & Agency Co. v. Trainor, 1974 V.R. 49, while see also Russell v. Scott, 55 C.L.R. 440, Williams v. F.C.T., 81 C.L.R. 359, Schaefer v. Schuhmann, 1972-3 A.L.R. 501, & Robertson v. Ramsay, 1891 24 S.A.L.R. 112. An inter vivos trust passes an immediate interest to a beneficiary at the moment it is executed which does not await the death of the settlor while a testamentary trust passes an interest only upon the death from which the agreement to create the trust becomes operative. If the agreement to create the trust is enforceable only upon the death of the taxpayer when the trust arises after the death but not necessarily as a consequence thereof.

⁹⁰ 1967 2 All.E.R. 249 (C.A.).

⁹¹ See also Hayes v. Nat. Heart Foundation of Aust., 1976 1 N.S.W.L.R. 29, In the Will of Snadden, 1962 V.R. 571, and Re: Gardiner, 1971 2 N.S.W.L.R. 494, Halsbury's Laws of Eng. 4th Ed., Vol. 50, para. 583.

⁹² See also Sprange v. Barnard, 1789 2 Bro CC 585.

⁹³ See "Tax Issues in Will Planning: Parts 1 and 2" by Jane Kirby Donahue and Sheila M. Crummey in The Canadian Tax Journal.

⁹⁴ As per Lord Advocate v. Bogie, 1894 A.C. 83, In Re: Cousen's Will Trusts, 1937 Ch. 381, Baskett v. Lodge, 23 Beav. 138, property willed to a personal representative of another's will causes it to be held on the other will trust and not under the disposing will trusts. Referential trust rules have an effect here however.

⁹⁵ Until the estate is fully settled, at which time it technically becomes a trust, the major attribution adaption provision in Sec. 74.3(1) will not apply to it since that provision refers only to "trusts". The attribution provisions lie outside subdivision k where the two creatures-concepts and terms are equal.

⁹⁶ This seems to be the opinion of the Bilingual Services and Resources Industries Division on July 10th, 1990, where it

A "contribution" of property to a trust in this context must be taken to mean those actions that cause the augmentation of the particular trust's property via a gratuitous transfer and whether it can also amount to a "creation" of a trust in substance is a contentious issue. Augmentation is the addition of the property to that over which the initial fiduciary obligations are imposed so as to be subject to precisely the same interests and trust terms as those created by the original trust deed. A referring to the original will trust's terms as a supplement to, or upon which, other terms are imposed does not amount to a contribution but a referring to another trust as a means of adopting its terms in settling one's own disposition.⁹⁷

In the author's opinion a contribution can only be a transfer of gratuitous bounty as described in the UK case of *Jones v Garnett*⁹⁸:

"Not every transfer of property is a settlement for the purposes of section 660A. There has to be an "element of bounty" in the transaction. This is an old-fashioned phrase, apparently derived from the judgment of Plowman J in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v Leiner (1964) 41 TC 589, 596 and approved by the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v Plummer [1980] AC 896,913, conjuring up the image of Lady Bountiful in The Beaux' Stratagem, is perhaps not the happiest way of describing a provision for a spouse or minor children. A donation to a spouse or child is traditionally expressed in a deed to be 'in consideration of natural love and affection' rather than the donor's bounty. It is nevertheless exactly the kind of thing at which the anti-avoidance provisions are aimed. In Chinn v Hochstrasser [1981] AC 533, 555 Lord Roskill cautioned against treating the word "bounty" as if it had been included in the statute. It seems to me that the general effect of the cases is that, under the arrangement, the settlor must provide a benefit which would not have been provided in a transaction at arm's length."⁹⁹

Where the trust/estate was created prior to Nov. 13th, 1981, subparagraph (c) applies to cause the loss of testamentary status when after June 28th, 1982, property was contributed to the trust otherwise than by an individual on or after his death and as a consequence thereof, or, where the composition of property in the trust is of a certain proportion. Where the aggregate fair market value of the property owned by the trust that was contributed to the trust otherwise than by an individual upon and in consequence of his death, exceeds the aggregate fair market value of the property owned by the trust that was contributed by an individual upon and in consequence of his death¹⁰⁰ the trust will lose its testamentary status. It will remain contaminated only for the period in which such a proportion existed. The critical factor in this provision is the property which was previously contributed before the "new" rule came into effect, whereby if the fair market value of that property contributed other than by and upon the death of an individual exceeds that which was so contributed the trust will be disqualified hence in making in specie distributions of capital from the trust that which was not received upon and in consequence of the death of an individual should be drawn upon first. Both the property owned by the trust which was the property actually received by contributions, as well as its substitute, will be subject to the phrase hence if the property received is converted into substitute property through dispositions and held that if a testamentary spousal trust distributes its property to another trust for offspring created as well under the testator's will upon the spouse's death the contribution will not cause the offsprings' trust to lose its testamentary character if the testator directed that such was to occur. The basis of the opinion was the intent expressed in the Technical Notes accompanying the introduction of para. (ii) & (iii):

"The present wording of (paragraph 108(1)(i)) is too restrictive since it would disqualify a trust which has received contributions by an individual that are effective after his death. It is not intended that a contribution to a trust by an individual that takes effect after the death of his surviving spouse would disqualify a trust as a testamentary trust. Subparagraphs (ii) and (iii) are amended to disqualify only those trusts receiving contributions otherwise than by an individual on or after his death and as a consequence thereof."

[Technical Notes to a Notice of Ways and Means Motion Relating to Income Tax, May 9, 1985, clause 49] A substantially identical opinion was expressed in T.I. A-8006 of April 1983 rendered by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division.

97 See the notes on "Who Creates the Trust" in the Old Preferred Beneficiary Chapter.

98 [2007] UKHL 35, see also Patmore v Revenue & Customs [2010] UKFTT 334 (TC) (14 July 2010)

99 See also Audley v Revenue & Customs [2011] UKFTT 219 (TC) (01 April 2011) for a UK example of how to structure a pre-Sec. 70(5) deemed disposition wealth transfer that attracted un-intended results.

100 the fair market values being measured at the time of contribution acquisitions the rule will still apply.

The loss of its testamentary status will automatically cause it to be an inter vivos trust for the entire period in which the status was lost which need not be the full tax year. The definition refers to the trust "in a taxation year" and while it does not state "at anytime" the definition is a continuous one whereby part of the year the trust can be inter vivos and the other part testamentary. This being said, however, once the trust becomes inter vivos its tax year automatically defaults to the calendar year and, in the author's opinion, unless through other justification, there is no way to get a non-calendar year back once the trust becomes again testamentary.

Dependant's/Family Relief Trusts

"How trust created – 248(9.1)"

For the purposes of this Act, a trust shall be considered to be created by a taxpayer's will if the trust is created

(a) under the terms of the taxpayer's will; or

(b) by an order of a court in relation to the taxpayer's estate made under any law of a province that provides for the relief or support of dependants.

As per the Sec. 248(9.1) a trust shall be considered created by a taxpayer's will if one of the two qualifications are met. The provision does not have to say that they will be deemed to be created as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer since the Sec. 248(9.1) trusts are specifically captured as testamentary trusts in the latter's opening preamble. Such laws would, however, include Alberta's and Newfoundland's Family Relief Act. Manitoba's, New Brunswick's and Nova Scotia's Testator's Family Maintenance Act, etc.

Inter vivos Trusts.

Under subsection 248(1), an "inter vivos" trust has, for the purpose of the Act, the definition in Sec. 108(1) which provides that an inter vivos trust is a trust other than a "testamentary trust" and while the draftsmen of the definition of "testamentary trust" felt it necessary to cite both trusts and estates, that necessity was not recognized in the construction of the definition of "inter vivos trust".¹⁰¹

An inter vivos trust is any trust other than a testamentary trust and for certain purposes under the Act a trust can be only a "testamentary" or "inter vivos" trust. If the particular provision does not address the tax entity as an inter vivos trust or a testamentary trust but merely as a trust then estates are not captured since it may only be with respect to the technical definitions of the two former that estates are captured unless otherwise expressed.

A trust compelled to be created is a trust none-the-less.¹⁰²

An inter vivos (or even testamentary) trust is entirely able to conduct business in exactly the same manner as an incorporation without being subject to any provincial/Federal Acts concerning such. See Her ¹⁰¹ Subsection 104(1) provides: "In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a "trust") shall be read...", hence the Sec. 104(1) provision could be argued to cause the Sec. 108(1)(g) inter vivos trust definition reference to trust to also include a reference to an estate which is not a testamentary trust. At the same time, the consistency of the use of the terms "trust" and "estate" in Sec. 108(1)(i), which technically are not needed, could be attacked along the line of reasoning that the creators of the testamentary trust definition felt it necessary, even though it was provided for by Sec. 104(1), to have a specific reference to trusts and estates while they didn't recognize the same necessity in respect of the definition of inter vivos trust. Could it be argued that they didn't recognize the necessity because it didn't exist and that the Sec. 108(1)(f) provision concerns only trusts and not estates which do not meet the criteria described in Sec. 108(1)(i)?

¹⁰² Harvey v. Sivger, 58 T.C. 569, Yates v. Starkey, 32 T.C. 38. See also Harmer and Ors. v. F.C.T., 90 A.T.C. 4672, where trustee didn't recognize role of trusteeship. In T.I. 51710 of Oct. 1986 rendered by the Small Business and General Section it was provided that a trust compelled to be created by a court order in favour of a spouse is a spousal trust none-the-less. In the same T.I. it was held that if the property was to revert to the contributing taxpayer after three years from the trust the trust would not constitute a Sec. 73(1) spousal trust.

Majesty The Queen v. Keith E. Ferrel¹⁰³ where the Fed. Appeal Court held:

"[2] It follows that other structures, including trusts, may also be used to save tax, as long as proper legal documentation is prepared to accomplish the purpose desired. Despite the able argument of Mr. McNary, we have not been persuaded that the agreements between the trust and the taxpayer and the trust and the company were illegal for purposes of the Income Tax Act (See Section 104 (2)) nor improper under trust law, which now appears to permit structures called "business trusts", which conduct businesses. (See Flannigan "The Nature and Duration of the Business Trust" 6 Estates and Trusts Quarterly 181)."

There has been continual controversy in the past few years concerning the treatment of bare trusts and agency arrangements and Question 32 of the 1988 Roundtable Discussions provided the Department the opportunity of expressing its opinion that an agency relationship is different from a trust relationship for purposes of the Act. There are a multitude of dissimilarities between trusts and agency-principal relationships. An agent is governed by a contract from which he draws his rights and incurs his obligations to act for his principal while the principal and agent are the only parties to that contract: a trustee acts for the beneficiaries of the trust as per the terms of the trust agreement entered into with the settlor while the settlor usually cannot be made party to the agreement once it has been accepted unless he reserves expressly direct rights against the trustee and instead only the beneficiaries would be in a position to enforce the trust. An agent binds his principal through the legitimate actions taken under the agreement while the trustee binds himself and not the beneficiaries, again unless specific authority is given, and he thus remains usually personally exposed for the actions of the trust however retains a right to be indemnified out of trust property in respect of losses rightfully and validly incurred. Agency agreements will terminate upon the death of one of the parties to the contract while trust agreements will not. The claims of the principal against his agent will abate the claims of others where the agent becomes insolvent while in the case of a trustee becoming bankrupt in his personal capacity the beneficiaries maintain the equitable proprietary interest in the trust property and it is not subject to claims against the trustee.

The courts have had little qualms in applying conventions of equitable jurisprudence to the agency relationship where the agent has benefitted from the relationship at the expense of the principal and the constructive trust mechanism has been applied as a form of remedy. A constructive trust is a remedy for an unjust enrichment with consequential deprivation without juristic reason and it has been held in Canada that it exists from the moment the need for restitution occurs. In some jurisdictions a remedial constructive trust arises when the court applies it while the substantive institution constructive trust exists during the time the unjust enrichment occurred. England, Australia, and Canada have adapted the former recognition while the U.S.A. has adopted the latter basis.

The Canadian Income Tax Act causes the liability for the actions of the agent to fall upon the principal and the beneficial owner is recognized as an end of the principal-agent conduit. Question 32 of the 1988 R.T.D. allowed the Department the opportunity to express the opinion that when a trust relationship existed, though the trust could be "bare" of all dispositive/administrative powers generally autonomously or semi-autonomously held by the trustees, the trust would still be regarded as a trust for purposes of the Act. Generally the bare trust is that under which the trustees have ceased to have, or have never had, dispositive powers or other active duties/powers but instead are compelled to deliver legal title on the request of the beneficiaries the latter being in a position of beneficial ownership of the property as compared to being merely beneficially interested in it.¹⁰⁴

103 A-746-97

104 In Internal Memo 7-0210 issued Apr. 11, 1986 to the St. Catharines DO by the Specialty Rulings Directorate, it was recognized that a corporation may hold in trust property for a shareholder when it is acquired specifically for that purpose and suggested and disclosed as such. at issue was whether the corporation, acting as bare trustee, was carrying on the manufacturing business or whether the shareholder were with the corporation acting as agent. The Department recognized that an agency arrangement exists when one is authorized to represent or act for another while a trust arrangement includes only those instances when no representations are made by the trustee, he doesn't act for the beneficiary, and he merely holds the legal title of the property. In the particular situation a manufacturing and processing activity was carried on through the trust agreement specified that the corporation was to act as bare trustee. The Department concluded that the corporation was acting as bare trustee due to: it described itself as such in its financial statements and that the use of the term "bare" was inappropriate even though as per the overall terms of the agreement a trust arrangement was to exist.

Contracts for the benefit of third parties may impose fiduciary duties on the parties whereby the party to provide the benefit must act with loyalty and in good faith and is saddled with a duty of care.¹⁰⁵ The same occurs in respect of contracts between businessmen etc. for the benefit of each other and although the contract produces contractual rights and obligations, unless expressed to the contrary, it may also be that fiduciary obligations arise. As in *International Corona Ltd. v. Lac Minerals Ltd.*¹⁰⁶ by the Ontario Court of Appeal dealing with the confidentiality of mineral information in a joint venture situation:

"We agree that the law of fiduciary relationships does not ordinarily apply to parties who are involved in arm's length commercial transactions. Nevertheless, it appears to be clear that the law of fiduciary relationships does apply in certain circumstances to persons dealing at arm's length in commercial transactions.

It becomes a question of fact in each case whether the relationship of the parties, the one to the other, is such as to create a fiduciary relationship. The circumstances which give rise to such a relationship have not been fully defined nor are they forever closed."

The context in which the activity is to proceed, (the normal business context), and the actions of the parties towards each other in light of the express terms of the contract may generate a fiduciary relationship and merely because the setting is initially contract¹⁰⁷ does not preclude a fiduciary environment from arising.¹⁰⁸ In instances where the fiduciary environment has been tarnished the use of the constructive trust may follow.

*Walker and Ors. v. Corboy and Ors.*¹⁰⁹ is a very illustrative case of what criteria a court will evaluate in establishing whether an agency arrangement has evolved into a trust due to the intentions of the parties and the manner of interaction. This case involved produce growers passing possession of their produce to a wholesaler who would sell it as agent in certain markets. The proceeds from the sales were intermingled with general funds of the agent, which was recognized industry practice, and when the agent was liquidated the funds from the sales were in the agent's possession and the produce growers wished to establish a more secure right thereto than merely unsecured creditor. Justice Priestly held:

"In every case, in my opinion, the circumstances of the relation between the principal and agent must first be looked at, the fact finding itself being uncolored by preconceptions as to whether they should or should not be interpreted as giving rise to a trust or to equitable obligations, and then upon consideration of circumstances found, a decision made whether (i) there was an express trust or equitable obligation

105 As per Ryder v. Taylor, 1935 36 S.R. (N.S.W.) 31, there must be an intention of one of the contracting parties to confer an interest in the subject matter of the contract on the third party as a result of the contract in order for a trust to arise. Viles v. Viles, 1939 S.A.S.R. 164, Lloyds v. Harper, 1880 16 Ch. 290, & Robertson v. Waite, 1853 8 Exch. 299, Re: Empress Engineering Co., 1880 16 Ch. 125, Re: Northcliffe, 1925 1 Ch. 651, Gandy v. Gandy, 1885 30 Ch. 57, Greenwood Shopping Plaza Ltd. v. Beattie, 1980 2 S.C.R. 228, are all cases involving who can enforce such a contract and should be examined in detail. See Commr. of Stamp Duty v. Pandal Nominees Pty. Ltd., 84 A.L.R. 590, Bannister v. Bannister, 1948 2 All E.R. 133, Neale v. Willis, 1968 19 P. & C.R. 836 (CA), Green v. Russell, 1959 1 Q.B. 28, Ralna Ltd. et al. v. Can. Assurance Co., 1985 51 O.R. 781, Re: Garbett, 1963 N.Z.L.R. 384, and MacLellan v. Wimbush, 20 E.T.R. 300. See also "The Quitclose Trust: Who can Enforce It.", P.J. Millett Q.C., 101 L.Q. Rev. 270. In Trident General Insurance Co. Ltd. v. McNeice Bros. Pty. Ltd., 1988 80 A.L.R. 574, it was held:

"The requisite intention to create a trust of a contractual promise to benefit a third party can, however, be formed and carried into effect (either by the contract itself or some other act) by a promisee who would be bemused by the information that the chose in action constituted by the benefit of a contractual promise is property and uncomprehending of the distinction between law and equity ... In the context of such a contractual promise, the requisite intention should be inferred if it clearly appears that it was the intention of the promisee that the third party should himself be entitled to insist upon performance of the promise and receipt of the benefit and if trust is, in the circumstances, the appropriate legal mechanism for giving effect to that intention."

106 1987 44 D.L.R. (4d) 592;

107 Chase Manhattan Bank N.A. v. Israel British Bank Ltd., 1981 Ch. 105, Lyus v. Prowsa Development Ltd., 1982 1 W.L.R. 1044, Little v. Little, 1988 15 N.S.W.L.R. 43, "Towards a Unified Concept of Fiduciary Relationships." 1981 97 L.Q. Rev. 51, Shepard, "Contract and the Fiduciary Principle." 1989 12 UNSWLJ 76, P. Finn, "Joint Venturers as Fiduciaries" 1989 2 CBLJ 34 5. Corcoran & J.C. Tucker.

108 This is very relevant when one reviews new Sec. 248(3) as it relates to contracts in Quebec. See also Hospital Products Ltd. v. U.S. Surgical Corp., 156 C.L.R. 41, Re: Livanos, 1955 Q.S.R. 362, Molchan v. Omega Oil & Gas Ltd., 1988 1 S.C.R. 348 (no trust), Gordon v. Gonda, 1955 1 W.L.R. 888, Thompson's Trustee in Bankruptcy v. Heaton, 1974 1 W.L.R. 605, Re: Fada, 1927 S.A.S.R. 590, Walker v. Corboy, 1990 19 N.S.W.L.R. 382, Re: Maritime Med. Care Inc. & McLaughlin, 1980 37 N.S.R. (2d) 521, while a partnership gives rise to a fiduciary environment; Noranda Aust. Ltd. v. Lachlan Res., 1988 N.Z.L.R. 1. though the fiduciary environment of an on-going partnership isn't normally a trust: Cameron v. Murdoch, 1986 63 A.L.R. 575.

109 1990 19 N.S.W.L.R. 382 CA

in the circumstances, or (ii) whether the court should say that the expectations of the parties would most appropriately be served by saying that the circumstances brought a non-express trust (to use a completely neutral expression) or equitable obligation into existence, or (iii) finding no trust or equitable obligation. It is not in my opinion, a question of seeing whether a general rule has been displaced, but of seeing whether the particular circumstances did or did not give rise to the trust or obligation.

...

It seems to me to be prudent not to approach the question whether equitable doctrines are applicable in a commercial situation with the thought in mind that one should be disinclined to give a positive answer to the question. The question simply is, do the particular circumstances attract equitable rules. There is no reason to regret one answer rather than the other. If there are express agreements between parties to a commercial transaction, or a series of commercial transactions, requiring the application of equitable rules for their working out, then it is difficult to see that commercial life will be any the worse for those rules, which in one very real sense are as much legal rules as are common law rules, being applied. In situations where there is no express agreement, then ultimately whether a court will apply equitable rules will depend upon the court's understanding of the expectations of the parties implicit in their dealings with one another in the commercial milieu in which the particular dispute has arisen. It is to these areas that the court's factual and evaluative attention should be directed and upon which decision should be based."

Justice Clarke held:

"There was no express agreement between the growers and Lojon (agent) that in those cases in which Lojon sold produce as an agent the latter would hold the proceeds of sale of produce on trust for the relevant grower. Accordingly it is necessary to examine the circumstances of the case, which include the course of trading, in order to determine whether an intention to constitute Lojon a trustee of the proceeds should be inferred. That is not to say that one disregards the fact that Lojon received the produce as agent for the grower. The general rule is that if a person delivers the goods to an agent to be sold the goods remain the property of the principal until the sale takes place and the moment the proceeds of sale are received by the agent they become the property of the principal: Foley v. Hill (1848) 2 HL Cas 28; 9 ER 1002. This rule is allied to a wider rule that where a principal entrusts money or property to an agent, a solicitor, for some specific purpose the agent is bound to hold the money or goods on trust to deal with them as directed."

Clarke did not concur with the use of the term "constructive trustee" to describe the agent in such a case since such would infer that the agent did not have the intention of holding the property on express (or implied) trust. Constructive trusts arise when the intention to create a trust doesn't exist. He further held:

"Although it is a general rule there will remain instances in which the courts will be required to carry out an investigation of the circumstances of the case and, in particular, the course of trading between the parties in order to determine whether a trust exists. In the second place the courts will, in carrying out that investigation, be concerned to consider whether an intention to create a trust obligation should be inferred or, as it is sometimes put, imputed to the parties. The position is different with regard to constructive trusts. They arise where the courts conclude that it would be inequitable to permit the holder of property to hold it for his own benefit: see Chapters on Equity in New South Wales (1921) by Jordan at p. 20; Muschinski v. Dodds (1985) 160 CLR 583 at 612-614 per Deane J.

...

... the general rule is that an agent will hold the proceeds of property delivered to him for sale on trust. But whether or not the general rule applies falls to be determined upon a consideration of the facts surrounding the delivery of the property. The authorities demonstrate that although a trust is readily imposed on proceeds arising from an isolated transaction the position may not be the same where property is received in the ordinary course of an ongoing trading relationship. The distinction is vividly demonstrated by the judgment of Jessel MR in Kirkham v. Peel (1880) 43 LT 171."

Justice Meagher held:

"The question whether an agent for sale holds the proceeds of sale on trust for his principal, so that the relationship between them is that of trustee and cestui que trust, on the one hand, or simply owes to his principal whatever sum of money is then due on account between them, so that the relationship between them is simply that of creditor and debtor, on the other hand, is one which is not easy to answer in many factual contexts. Basically, as Scott says, the answer must depend on the intention of the parties: Scott on Trusts, 4th ed (1987) at 133. This must be so because, except in the case of constructive trusts where a trust is thrust on the parties irrespective of their intentions and as a matter of policy, an intention to create a trust is an essential element of a trust. If the parties expressly spell out that their arrangements do or do not involve a trust, a trust comes into existence or does not come into existence accordingly. However, this consideration is of little assistance where, as in the present case, the parties to the transaction are silent as to their intentions.

...

Clearly, what intention the law would regard as appropriate in the case of a simple single sale might not be the intention which should be imputed in a case involving complex and multiple transactions, and in the present case I am of the view that no intention to create a trust should be imputed. It is necessary to look at the nature of the transaction, the particular provisions of the agreement of the parties, and the whole of the circumstances attending the relationships between the parties. If one examines the whole of the relevant circumstances in the present case I am of the view that the law would not impute to the parties any intention to create a trust."

He based this opinion primarily on 5 circumstances:

- 1, that the relevant Act that concerned the creation of agency arrangements with respect to the particular activity did not require the keeping of separate trust accounts by agents in respect of proceeds realized on separate producers' produce and that the agency agreement allowed the agent to mix the funds with his own general reserves, something that would tend to contradict the intention of the producers that a trust be created,
- 2, that industry practice was that no trust was to be created and no separate trust accounts were to be maintained,
- 3, that the fact that the relevant agency statute law deliberately didn't require the agent to maintain separate accounts which would go against practice,
- 4, that there is a natural reluctance for the courts to impose equitable doctrine into commercial transactions¹¹⁰ in light of the practical concerns of the arrangements (which would make the accounting of the agency exceedingly complicated in light of the simplicity of the arrangement), and
- 5, that the agent's only duty in such a case was to merely account, which trustees also have to do, to their respective principals or beneficiaries, but the finding of a trust cannot merely be based on the fact that the agent must only account and is not saddled with alternate fiduciary requirements.

Re: Air Canada and M & L Ltd et al.¹¹¹ illustrates the character of an agreement that agents must enter into with their respective principals to be recognized as holding proceeds/property on trust for them. The latter company sold air line tickets for the former as agent and as per the agency agreement the proceeds were to be kept separately in a bank account on trust for Air Canada. Citing Canadian Pacific Air Lines Ltd. v. C.I.B.C.¹¹² the court found that the agreement with respect to the treatment of the proceeds impressed a trust upon them incidental to the general agency environment. C.P. Air concerned essentially the same circumstances and both cases held that the terms imposed on the use of the proceeds operated to impress a trust on them. In C.P. were cited Quantas Airways Ltd. v. Stevens Travel Service International Pty. Ltd. et al., Myrta Forastieri et al. v. Eastern A.L.¹¹³, Air Traffic Conference v. Downtown Travel Center¹¹⁴ and PanAm v. Lew Art Travel, to endorse the dicta that money to be received and restricted in use by the agent as per the agreement was impressed with a trust¹¹⁵ while in Air Canada Re: Morales Travel Agency¹¹⁶, Re: Shulman

¹¹⁰ citing New Zealand and Australian Land Co. v. Watson, (1881) 7 QBD 374 and Neste Oy v. Lloyds Bank Plc, 1983 2 Lloyd's Rep 658, as authority

¹¹¹ 1991 77 D.L.R. (4d) 536 (OCA)

¹¹² 1987 42 D.L.R. (4d) 375

¹¹³ 18 Avi 17,145 (1983) (CCH)

¹¹⁴ 14 Avi 17,172 (1976) (CCH)

¹¹⁵ See also Niedner Ltd. v. Lloyds Bk. of Can., 1990 74 O.R. 574.

¹¹⁶ 667 F.2d 1069

Transport Ent¹¹⁷, Re: Chaim Einhorn Vacation Planning Center¹¹⁸ & Re: Shulman Transport Ent.¹¹⁹ were cited as authority that a mere debtor-creditor relationship is involved in similar situations where there are not any restrictions on the use of the proceeds to be received by the agent and no expression of the impressing of a trust in respect of them.

Whether Non-resident Arrangements Fit as Canadian Recognized Trusts?

Whether a non-resident arrangement can be recognized as a trust for purposes of application of the provisions of the ITA to its Canadian aspects is a fundamental question that can only be answered through analysis of the characteristics of a Canadian trust and those that exist for the arrangement. Peter Sommerer and Her Majesty The Queen¹²⁰ provides exactly this type of analysis whereby the Tax Court had to consider with an Austria Private Foundation would qualify. It held, considering the 3 certainties and the overriding fiduciary duty, in detail:

2. Can the arrangement whereby Mr. Herbert Sommerer endowed the SPF with funds for the purpose set forth in the SPF Deeds be viewed as a trust for purposes of the application of the Income Tax Act?

[58] As already indicated, I reframed the issue in a manner that is more readily open to analysis. This should not be an issue of whether an Austrian Private Foundation under the APFA is a trust, let alone whether the SPF is a trust. That is the wrong question. The Appellant says it is a company: the Respondent says it is a trust. I have concluded that, depending on the terms of the Foundation Declaration and Supplemental Declaration, an Austrian Private Foundation could be considered a trust company, acting as a trustee, and with respect to the SPF, I find that that is as good a label as can be attached, when looking at it through the eyes of Canadian laws.

[59] What needs to be analyzed, however, is not what the SPF is, but what relationship exists amongst the SPF (a separate legal person), Mr. Herbert Sommerer, and Mr. Peter Sommerer and the Sommerer family. Is there a trust relationship? Can Mr. Herbert Sommerer be seen as a settlor? Can the SPF be seen as a trustee, perhaps a corporate trustee? Can Mr. Sommerer be seen as a beneficiary? Do the three certainties, certainty of intention, certainty of subject matter, and certainty of objects exist? Are there any other characteristics of the Canadian trust that are missing in the Sommerer arrangement?

[60] I agree with the Appellant's suggestion that, in characterizing a foreign arrangement, I rely on the Supreme Court of Canada's comments in Backman v. The Queen^[11] to look at the private law in Canada to determine the essential elements of a trust, and then compare the elements of the foreign arrangement to determine if it can be treated as its correlate under Canadian law. So, what are the essential elements of a trust under Canada law? I note, with some concern, Professor Waters' opening comments in this regard in his article "The Concept Called 'the Trust'":^[12]

It is agreed among text writers of the common law tradition – an opinion adopted by the Courts – that "the trust" cannot be defined. It can only be described. That means you can point to its characteristics or elements, but you cannot put into a sentence what it is.

[61] The Appellant's counsel referred me to a number of comments from authorities such as Oosterhoff on Trusts^[13] and Waters Law of Trusts in Canada.^[14] Notwithstanding Professor Waters' heads-up, I have found the following excerpts helpful:

From Oosterhoff:

117 17 Avi 17,363
118 59 B.R. 179 (1986)
119 744 F.2d 293
120 2011 TCC 212

An equitable obligation, binding a person (called a trustee) to deal with property (called trust property) owned by him as a separate fund, distinct from his own property, for the benefit of persons (called beneficiaries or, in all cases, cestuis que trust) of whom he may himself be one, and anyone of whom may enforce the obligation.

From Waters:

The hallmarks, the essential characteristics of the common law trust, are heavily reflective of a peculiar legal history. The foremost of these is the fiduciary relationship which exists between trustee and beneficiary. The following elements are surely essential. From the moment of the creation of the trust, there must be an ability of the beneficiary to secure an accounting or, to put it another way, a power in the beneficiary to enforce the discharge of its duties by the trustee.

[62] The Respondent, in his argument, puts the essential features more generally:

In broad terms, a trust is a means of managing wealth for the benefit of one or more persons. The essential features of a trust are specified property, a person or persons as the objects of the trust with the exclusive right to its enjoyment or dedication, and person holding title to the property and administering it on behalf of the objects. In simplified terms, a trust is an arrangement whereby a person who holds title to property is under an obligation to administer it for the benefit of another person or persons.

[63] There is no disagreement as to the need for the three certainties to create a trust, though in a somewhat circuitous, though logical, fashion, the Appellant argues that if an essential element is missing for the arrangement to be considered a trust, then there cannot have been the requisite intention to create a trust. The missing element in the SPF arrangement, according to the Appellant, is the lack of the right of the beneficiaries to enforce an obligation owed to them by the trustee. Professor Waters' attempts to address this when he states:

As necessary conditions, if any of the three certainties are not present, the courts will not recognize the existence of a trust. The presence of the three certainties are not, however, sufficient conditions to the creation of a trust; they are evidentiary in nature and represent the factual threshold at which the law will recognize as enforceable the obligations of a trustee towards the beneficiary with respect to the designated trust property.

[64] This is something of a chicken and egg statement: do the beneficiaries' rights of enforcement arise in law because there is a trust, or must the beneficiaries' rights of enforcement exist by the Trust Deed, for example, for there to be considered a trust. The Appellant suggests the latter.

[65] It is this element of accountability owed by the trustee to the beneficiaries, enforceable by the beneficiaries, that is at the crux of the dispute between the parties on this issue; in essence, the nature and extent of the required fiduciary obligation.

[66] In summary, the essential ingredients of a trust under Canadian law that I wish to address are:

a) segregated property;

b) owned by a person (trustee) having control of the property;

c) for the benefit of persons (beneficiaries);

d) to whom the trustee has a fiduciary duty enforceable by the beneficiaries.

If I find these essential features in the arrangement by which the SPF held the Vienna shares, then I will have no difficulty finding the three certainties were met to create the trust. It is absolutely clear to me that there is certainty of subject matter and objects, and if the essential features of a trust are evident, then the intention of Mr. Herbert Sommerer to create a trust can be gleaned from the Foundation Declaration, the Supplementary Deed and the application of APFA. All to say, the analysis does not hinge on the three certainties.

[67] Turning then to the SPF and its holding of the Vienna shares, I readily find that the first two essential features are apparent in this arrangement. The property, the Vienna shares, substituted for the initial endowment to the SPF from Mr. Herbert Sommerer, was subject to the provisions of the APFA, which at the very outset in section 1, refer to "an endowment for achieving a permissible purpose determined by the founder". No purpose was for the SPF to use the endowment to its own account. Secondly, the property was owned by the SPF, which, as a legal person, held title to the Vienna shares, and held control over the property.

[68] Third, was the property held for the benefit of persons? In this regard, the experts testified that Austrian law distinguishes between actual and potential beneficiaries. There is also the distinction under the APFA between beneficiaries and ultimate beneficiaries. The Foundation Declaration and Supplementary Declaration are not expansive in their descriptions of the beneficiaries, but I take from the experts' views that the beneficiaries (Mr. Peter Sommerer, Mrs. Dawn Sommerer and children and their offspring, provided they are resident of Austria) are income beneficiaries only, and even then only potential beneficiaries, as none were resident in Austria and none were named to receive any grant. Similarly, Mr. & Mrs. Sommerer, in the event of the founders' revocation, are ultimate capital beneficiaries, though, again only potential beneficiaries until there is a revocation. This classification of actual versus potential beneficiary is of no consequence in answering the question of whether the property was held for the benefit of persons. Of course it was; that was the raison d'être of the SPF. The difference between actual and potential beneficiaries becomes a factor only when considering the fiduciary duty of the SPF.

[69] With respect to the income beneficiaries, the class of beneficiary was clear; it was also clear from the Foundation documents how it was to be determined who within the class might receive a grant from the SPF. The potential beneficiaries are clearly ascertainable.

[70] With respect to the ultimate beneficiaries, it is even clearer. If Mr. Herbert Sommerer decides to revoke the SPF, Mr. Peter Sommerer and Mrs. Dawn Sommerer receive the capital. They are persons who will benefit. The third essential ingredient exists.

[71] So, the penultimate question is whether the SPF had any fiduciary obligations to any of these beneficiaries, enforceable by the beneficiaries.

[72] The Appellant points to several factors in support of his position that the beneficiaries had no enforceable right to call the SPF to account. I will deal with those items, but first want to make an overriding observation regarding this essential feature. The right of the beneficiary is the flip side of the fiduciary duty of the trustee; in this case, the duty of the SPF, if any, is at issue. If there is no duty enforceable by the beneficiaries, is the SPF simply under some moral obligation and the Sommerers simply hopeful they might get something from the SPF? This would more resemble a power of appointment. My impression is that the SPF was not founded on the shifting sands of moral obligation: there were no beneficiaries other than the Sommerers; there were no ultimate beneficiaries in the case of revocation other than Mr. & Mrs. Sommerer; there are no ultimate beneficiaries in any other case other than those set out in 3.2 of the Supplementary Deed. This is not designed for the SPF to exercise any moral obligation. So, in the context of attempting to determine whether an arrangement in Austria, whose laws do not contemplate the concept of a North American trust, is akin to a trust under Canadian law, it is my overriding view that there is something well beyond moral obligation going on here. And certainly close enough to the Canadian fiduciary duty to find this final essential element for a trust exists in the SPF arrangement.

[73] I will now address those factors raised by the Appellant to suggest my impression is misplaced.

[74] First, the Appellant relies on Dr. Torggler's evidence that there is no fiduciary duty owed by the Executive Board to the beneficiaries or by the SPF itself. This, though, must be viewed in the context of Dr. Torggler's opinion that, in Austrian law, there is no literal translation of the fiduciary duty. He testified, in answer to the question whether there are any duties owed to beneficiaries as follows:[15]

Not from the outset, but at the moment a beneficiary has been appointed an endowment, usually the beneficiaries have been resolved upon and from that point in time, there was obligation on the part of the Board to fulfil this commitment.

He also stated:[16]

There is a provision that the Board of Directors' owes fulfillment of the purpose of the Foundation, and as the purpose of the Foundation, generally, is in favour of the beneficiaries, in that respect indirectly there is a duty, but there is no direct duty prescribed in the law.

[75] These opinions do not go as far as the Appellant suggests. The Foundation itself is implicitly obliged to fulfill the purpose for which it is established. Further, one of its primary organs, the Executive Board, "must perform his/her responsibilities frugally and with the prudence of a conscientious manager" (section 17(2) APFA). Also, the Executive Board must keep the books (section 18 APFA). If there is any disagreement between the auditor and the Executive Board, regarding the application of the Foundation Declaration, the Court shall decide (section 21(4) APFA). Every member of the Executive Board is liable for damages as a result of negligent neglect of duties (section 29(1) APFA). For a jurisdiction that does not recognize a fiduciary duty concept, what is to be made of the above? What I make of it is that Austria has legislated obligations, and when combined with a requirement to fulfill the purposes of the Foundation, which with respect to the SPF is to benefit the Sommerer family, I conclude Dr. Torggler's opinion of no fiduciary duty is overstated. There are sufficient parallels between the Canadian concept of fiduciary duty and the combination of the provisions of the APFA and the wording of the Foundation Declaration to find that some requisite duty exists.

[76] Second, the Appellant argues the rights of a beneficiary under the APFA are limited to section 30 rights, and in very limited circumstances, section 35(3) rights (application by a beneficiary or ultimate beneficiary for dissolution). With respect to the section 30 right of the beneficiary to information, the Appellant also argues that because Mr. Sommerer was only a potential beneficiary (as he was not an Austrian resident nor had been chosen for a grant) and potential ultimate beneficiary (as there had been no call by the founder to revoke the Foundation), he is not entitled to the section 30 rights for information. Dr. Torggler testified that there has been a court decision in Austria that section 30 is only available to actual beneficiaries. This raises the interesting situation where the SPF is established to benefit the Sommerer family, and no one else, yet they cannot be considered actual beneficiaries until certain conditions are met: in effect there are no beneficiaries. When the condition is met, certain rights kick in. Mr. Taylor acknowledged that only at that point might there be a trust. Presumably, following that reasoning, if Mr. Sommerer became an Austrian resident and the Executive Board determined to make a grant to him, at that point there would be a trust, yet after the grant is paid, Mr. Sommerer goes back to being a potential beneficiary only and there is again no trust. This cements my view, apparently shared by eminent authors on this subject, that the definition of a trust is illusory. But it also suggests to me that this essential feature of enforcing a fiduciary duty should not be viewed in isolation, nor rigidly adopted. Clearly, these rights could arise, and will arise, in the very situation that the founder contemplated of benefiting the Sommerer family. How different is this from the Canadian trust where property is held for a minor until the age of majority when he/she is entitled to a distribution of capital. What right does the minor have to enforce the trustee to pay out before attaining the age of majority?

[77] Also, it is noteworthy that the founder, Mr. Herbert Sommerer, provided that the Advisory Board was to be made up of Mr. & Mrs. Sommerer, the ultimate beneficiaries. Further, he provides the Advisory Board was to play an important role in the SPF including supervisory tasks. This confirms to me an explicit right to information given by the founder to beneficiaries, notwithstanding the provisions of the APFA.

[78] With respect to what the Appellant calls the limited rights found in section 35(3) of the APFA, of the ultimate beneficiary to apply to the court if the Executive Board does not pass a resolution to dissolve, once the founder has sought revocation, I view this as a significant right. This goes to the distribution of all of the capital of the SPF to the Sommerers. This is no limited right. Mr. Herbert Sommerer decides to revoke and Mr. & Mrs Sommerer take all: if the Executive Board does not pass the requisite resolution to put this distribution into effect, the Sommerers can apply to court. I find this right alone is sufficient to meet the requirement for an enforceable right of beneficiaries to have the trustee, the SPF, act in their best interests.

[79] The Appellant goes on to argue that the potential beneficiaries have no right in the property of the SPF, as would all the beneficiaries of a common law discretionary trust, who could call for the property by invoking the rule in Saunders v. Vautier.^[17] Again, Dr. Torggler opined that even an actual beneficiary does not have a property right in the Private Foundation property. I am concerned that because common law treatment is not afforded the Austrian Private Foundation that it fails to match the essential features of the common law trust. It is important to keep in mind what process is being engaged here. The essential features of a common law trust have been identified, and now the establishment of the SPF and transfer of property into it for the benefit of the Sommerer family is being examined to determine if it can be viewed as a common law trust, notwithstanding its jurisdiction does not have such a concept. It should be no surprise that the concept of beneficial ownership of property is not apparent. I do not find that the lack of such right of beneficial ownership is fatal.

[80] Finally, the Appellant relies on the wording of the Foundation document itself to suggest the income beneficiaries have no legal claim. The Foundation Declaration states: "Beneficiaries and those who may become beneficiaries based on the purpose of the Foundation have no legal claim to grants from the Foundation". Firstly, I interpret this provision to be dealing with income beneficiaries only, not the ultimate beneficiaries. This simply makes clear the discretionary nature of income grants. They can only be to the Sommerer family, but no individual family member can come knocking on the SPF's door asking to be paid a grant. This evidence is no more than that, and is not sufficient to strip away the character of a discretionary trust.

[81] On balance, I have not been convinced that there is no fiduciary duty enforceable by the Sommerer family. Certainly, the rights may not be as extensive as one might find in many common law trusts, but for purposes of trying to determine if an arrangement involving an Austrian Private Foundation has the elements of a common law trust, it is unnecessary to find every possible right of a beneficiary against a trustee, but more appropriately the question should be, are there sufficient rights that reasonably resemble those found in the Canadian trust? I conclude there are.

[82] It should be clear that in reaching this conclusion, I am not finding the SPF is a trust: I am finding the relationship between Mr. Herbert Sommerer, the SPF and the beneficiaries constitutes a trust, with the SPF as the trustee. Further, I do not make this finding in any way as a generalization that all relationships involving an Austrian Private Foundation are trust relationships. There may well be a Foundation Declaration that is found to be more akin to a power of appointment, for example, by stripping away any rights of enforceability a beneficiary might have. Here, on balance, there are sufficient indices of the essential features of a trust to find the arrangement can be considered a trust. Given that conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to review the Quebec Civil Code concepts, as well explained to me by Me Tassé, to determine if the Austrian arrangement falls within any of the Quebec concepts of trust.

On appeal however the Federal Court of Appeal delved deeper into the environment with:

(C) Is there a trust?

[37] The Crown argued in the Tax Court that the Sommerer Private Foundation is a trust. Peter Sommerer argued that it is a corporation. Justice Miller concluded that it is a corporation that holds its property in trust for Peter Sommerer and the other named beneficiaries. He went on to conclude that subsection 75(2) of the Income Tax Act does not apply to attribute to Peter Sommerer the capital gains realized by the Sommerer Private Foundation on the sale of the Vienna shares and the Cambrian shares. He held in the alternative that Article XIII (5) of the Canada-Austria Income Tax Convention precludes Canada from taxing Peter Sommerer on the capital gains realized by the Sommerer Private Foundation.

[38] The Crown's appeal assumes that Justice Miller was correct when he concluded that the Sommerer Private Foundation holds its property in trust. The Crown challenges only Justice Miller's conclusions on the application of subsection 75(2) of the Income Tax Act and Article XIII (5) of the Canada-Austria Income Tax Convention. Peter Sommerer does not agree that the Sommerer Private Foundation holds its property in trust, but as respondent in this appeal he has chosen not to argue that point. He has concentrated instead on defending Justice Miller's conclusions on the application of subsection 75(2) of the Income Tax Act and Article XIII (5) of the Canada-Austria Income Tax Convention. Because of the manner in which this appeal was argued, the proposition that the Sommerer Private Foundation holds its property in trust was not the subject of submissions, and I will express no final opinion on whether it is correct. However, I will say that in my view, it is a doubtful proposition.

[39] According to the undisputed evidence of Dr. Torggler, the law of Austria does not recognize trusts as understood in Canadian law. However, it is evident that as a practical matter (and putting aside for the moment any income tax considerations), Herbert Sommerer may well have achieved many of the objectives that could have been achieved in a common law jurisdiction by settling a trust for Peter Sommerer, his spouse and their children. He did so by creating and endowing the Sommerer Private Foundation under the Austrian Private Foundations Act and naming Peter Sommerer, his spouse, and their children as beneficiaries and ultimate beneficiaries. But that does not mean as a matter of law that the creation and endowment of the Sommerer Private Foundation was the settlement of a trust, or that a trust existed or came into existence when the Sommerer Private Foundation bought the Vienna shares or the Cambrian shares from Peter Sommerer.

[40] As mentioned above, an Austrian private foundation is a juridical person with the legal capacity to own property in its own right and to deal with its property on its own account. The legal right of an Austrian private foundation to deal with its own property is the same as the legal right of a Canadian corporation to deal with its own property. That is so despite the fact that the board of an Austrian private foundation must manage its affairs in furtherance of the purposes stipulated in its constating documents. The board of directors of a corporation is similarly constrained, in the sense that it must manage the affairs of the corporation in its best interests, subject to any terms and conditions in its constating documents.

[41] A corporation does not hold its property in trust for its shareholders or members, except to the extent that a trust deed or an analogous legal instrument imposes the legal and equitable obligations of a trustee on the corporation with respect to specific corporate property. Assuming it is theoretically possible for an Austrian private foundation to hold its property in trust (that is, subject to conditions that are analogous to the legal and equitable obligations of a trustee in a common law jurisdiction), that possibility cannot be realized unless those conditions are formally established. Nothing in the constating documents of the Sommerer Private Foundation or the law of Austria, as reflected in the record of this case, supports the conclusion that the right of the Sommerer Private Foundation to deal with its property is constrained by any legal or equitable obligations analogous to those of a common law trustee.

[42] Looking at the situation from another point of view, a shareholder or member of a corporation, as such, is not the beneficial owner of any property of the corporation, and has no legal or equitable claim to the corporate property (unless such a claim arises upon the declaration by the board of directors of a dividend, or when the dissolution of the corporation is imminent). Unless and until such an event occurs, a shareholder or member has only an inchoate right to receive distributions of corporate property from time to time at the discretion of the board of directors, and to share in the distribution of the corporate property upon its dissolution. The same can be said of the interest of a beneficiary or an ultimate beneficiary in the property of an Austrian private foundation. Nothing in the Austrian Private Foundations Act or the constating documents of the Sommerer Private Foundation gives Peter Sommerer a legal or equitable claim to the corporate property that is different from that of a shareholder or member of a corporation.

[43] For these reasons, I doubt that the Sommerer Private Foundation holds any of its property in trust for Peter Sommerer. However, in the remainder of these reasons I set aside my doubts about whether the Sommerer Private Foundation holds its property in trust, and I assume without deciding that in October of 1996 when Herbert Sommerer created the Sommerer Private Foundation and endowed it with the equivalent of $126,000, he settled a trust for the benefit of Peter Sommerer, his spouse and their children, with the Sommerer Private Foundation as trustee.

Trusts and Agencies.

A trust agreement or estate setting cannot be equated with an agency arrangement whereunder one party acts as agent with respect to the ownership/control of property as per the terms of the contract entered into with his principal. In such a case, the basis of the arrangement is a contract entered into by the parties whereby the agent acts as a conduit for his principal and as long as he acts within the terms of the contract, he will not be personally liable, but instead the principal will be, for his actions. A trust on the other hand, is not a contract compelling parties to act in a certain way but instead is an equitable obligation assumed by the trustee as a consequence and condition of the obtaining of the legal title to property, (transferred by the settlor), and thus he is not an agent for any party, (settlor or beneficiary), but instead as legal title holder is ultimately accountable for his own actions and is thus able to deal with the property without, (or usually without), the consent of anyone. Agents can act to bind their principals while trustees cannot act to bind either beneficiary or settlor but only themselves. A breach in the contract forming an agency can result in the agent becoming personally liable to either his principal or a third party while a breach in a trust agreement allows the trustee to become personally liable only to the beneficiaries for whom in equity, he was to act.¹²¹

Personal Trusts.

Implemented with the 1988 reform was the definition of "personal trust" upon which the bulk of any existing "favourable" provisions concerning trusts in our Act operate. The definition and amendments to the "favourable" provisions were introduced primarily as a restricting measure to disallow those favourable from applying to transactions/arrangements other than those for which they were intended. The "favourable" provisions referred to include the ability to deduct the cost of an income right in computing the taxable income received from, in connection with, the trust, the ability to receive an effectively tax free distribution of capital in satisfaction of a capital interest in the trust, or a tax free disposition of the capital interest to another party, etc.. As will be seen in subsequent chapters, the retention of the personal trust status is not so important in respect of recognizing or computing income of the trust or its beneficiaries on an on-going basis, but instead becomes critical when the trust is distributing property on a wind-up or where there is substantial trading or expected to be trading in its capital or income interests.

In any private family/estate planning environment this is the creature that "the fur of which you want to protect at any cost". Once you lose it it's gone forever and so many favourable provisions operate on its existence.

The Specific Definition

A "personal trust" as defined in Sec. 248(1) for the purpose of the Act, applicable after 1984, means a testamentary trust of any nature, or an inter vivos trust, no beneficial interest in which was acquired for consideration payable directly or indirectly to the trust or any person who has made a contribution to the trust by way of transfer, assignment, or other disposition of property.¹²²

¹²¹ Without referencing numerous instances it is possible for a trust to arise in an agency environment: see Walsh Bay Developments Pty Ltd and Anor. v FCT, 130 A.L.R. 415, FC Aust. as well as Winterton Contructions Pty Ltd v Hambros Australia Ltd and Anor., 101 A.L.R. 363, FC Aust.

¹²² On the fulfillment of a condition precedent upon which the interest vests does the beneficiary acquire a new right different from that contingent previously held? In the author's opinion not necessarily and these issues illustrate perhaps one of the easier ways to preserve the personal status and have the contributing party receive consideration for the substance of the right, and not the right itself. The consideration payable to the contributor/trustee to have the right vest would not be added to the cost of the interest for the purposes of the Sec. 107(1) provision while the recipient if resident, would suffer a Sec. 105(1) inclusion but the trust would remain personal. Since the payment would not flow through to be added to the cost of the trust property via the Sec. 107(2) distribution it shouldn't exceed the a.c.b. of the trust property the interest is enforceable in respect of. There are exceptions to this however when one examines the possibility of non-resident trusts and the possibility of cost bumps.

“Definition of personal trust – Sec. 248(1)“

"personal trust" means

(a) a testamentary trust, or

(b) an inter vivos trust, no beneficial interest in which was acquired for consideration payable directly or indirectly to

(i) the trust, or

(ii) any person who has made a contribution to the trust by way of transfer, assignment or other disposition of property, but, after 1999, does not include a unit trust;

“Interests acquired for consideration – Sec. 108(7)“

(7) For the purposes of paragraph 53(2)(h), subsection 107(1), paragraph (j) of the definition “excluded right or interest” in subsection 128.1(10) and the definition “personal trust” in subsection 248(1),

(a) an interest in a trust is deemed not to be acquired for consideration solely because it was acquired in satisfaction of any right as a beneficiary under the trust to enforce payment of an amount by the trust; and

(b) where all the beneficial interests in a particular inter vivos trust acquired by way of the transfer, assignment or other disposition of property to the particular trust were acquired by

(i) one person, or

(ii) two or more persons who would be related to each other if

(A) a trust and another person were related to each other, where the other person is a beneficiary under the trust or is related to a beneficiary under the trust, and

(B) a trust and another trust were related to each other, where a beneficiary under the trust is a beneficiary under the other trust or is related to a beneficiary under the other trust, any beneficial interest in the particular trust acquired by such a person is deemed to have been acquired for no consideration.

“Variation of trust – Sec. 108(6)“

(6) Where at any time the terms of a trust are varied

(a) for the purposes of subsections 104(4), (5) and (5.2) and subject to paragraph (b), the trust is, at and after that time, deemed to be the same trust as, and a continuation of, the trust immediately before that time;

(b) for greater certainty, paragraph (a) does not affect the application of paragraph 104(4)(a.1); and

(c) for the purposes of paragraph 53(2)(h), subsection 107(1), paragraph (j) of the definition “excluded right or interest” in subsection 128.1(10) and the definition “personal trust” in subsection 248(1), no interest of a beneficiary under the trust before it was varied is considered to be consideration for the interest of the beneficiary in the trust as varied.

“Definition of “disposition” – Sec. 248(1)”

“disposition” of any property, except as expressly otherwise provided, includes

(a) any transaction or event entitling a taxpayer to proceeds of disposition of the property,

(b) any transaction or event by which,

(i) where the property is a share, bond, debenture, note, certificate, mortgage, agreement of sale or similar property, or an interest in it, the property is redeemed in whole or in part or is cancelled,

(ii) where the property is a debt or any other right to receive an amount, the debt or other right is settled or cancelled,

(iii) where the property is a share, the share is converted because of an amalgamation or merger,

(iv) where the property is an option to acquire or dispose of property, the option expires, and

(v) a trust, that can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust’s property (unless the trust is described in any of paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition “trust” in subsection 108(1)), ceases to act as agent for a beneficiary under the trust with respect to any dealing with any of the trust’s property,

(c) any transfer of the property to a trust or, where the property is property of a trust, any transfer of the property to any beneficiary under the trust, except as provided by paragraph (f) or (k), and

(d) where the property is, or is part of, a taxpayer’s capital interest in a trust, except as provided by paragraph (h) or (i), a payment made after 1999 to the taxpayer from the trust that can reasonably be considered to have been made because of the taxpayer’s capital interest in the trust,

but does not include

(e) any transfer of the property as a consequence of which there is no change in the beneficial ownership of the property, except where the transfer is

(i) from a person or a partnership to a trust for the benefit of the person or the partnership,

(ii) from a trust to a beneficiary under the trust, or

(iii) from one trust maintained for the benefit of one or more beneficiaries under the trust to another trust maintained for the benefit of the same beneficiaries,

(f) any transfer of the property as a consequence of which there is no change in the beneficial ownership of the property, where

(i) the transferor and the transferee are trusts,

(ii) the transfer is not by a trust resident in Canada to a non-resident trust,

(iii) the transferee does not receive the property in satisfaction of the transferee's right as a beneficiary under the transferor trust,

(iv) the transferee held no property immediately before the transfer (other than property the cost of which is not included, for the purposes of this Act, in computing a balance of undeducted outlays, expenses or other amounts in respect of the transferee),

(v) the transferee does not file a written election with the Minister on or before the filing-due date for its taxation year in which the transfer is made (or on such later date as is acceptable to the Minister) that this paragraph not apply,

(vi) if the transferor is an amateur athlete trust, a cemetery care trust, an employee trust, an inter vivos trust deemed by subsection 143(1) to exist in respect of a congregation that is a constituent part of a religious organization, a related segregated fund trust (in this paragraph having the meaning assigned by section 138.1), a trust described in paragraph 149(1)(o.4) or a trust governed by an eligible funeral arrangement, an employees profit sharing plan, a registered disability savings plan, a registered education savings plan, a registered supplementary unemployment benefit plan or a TFSA, the transferee is the same type of trust, and

(vii) the transfer results, or is part of a series of transactions or events that results, in the transferor ceasing to exist and, immediately before the time of the transfer or the beginning of that series, as the case may be, the transferee never held any property or held only property having a nominal value,

(g) [Repealed, 2005, c. 30, s. 17]

(h) where the property is part of a capital interest of a taxpayer in a trust (other than a personal trust or a trust prescribed for the purpose of subsection 107(2)) that is described by reference to units issued by the trust, a payment after 1999 from the trust in respect of the capital interest, where the number of units in the trust that are owned by the taxpayer is not reduced because of the payment,

(i) where the property is a taxpayer's capital interest in a trust, a payment to the taxpayer after 1999 in respect of the capital interest to the extent that the payment

(i) is out of the income of the trust (determined without reference to subsection 104(6)) for a taxation year or out of the capital gains of the trust for the year, if the payment was made in the year or the right to the payment was acquired by the taxpayer in the year, or

(ii) is in respect of an amount designated in respect of the taxpayer by the trust under subsection 104(20),

(j) any transfer of the property for the purpose only of securing a debt or a loan, or any transfer by a creditor for the purpose only of returning property that had been used as security for a debt or a loan,

(k) any transfer of the property to a trust as a consequence of which there is no change in the beneficial ownership of the property, where the main purpose of the transfer is

(i) to effect payment under a debt or loan,

(ii) to provide assurance that an absolute or contingent obligation of the transferor will be satisfied, or

(iii) to facilitate either the provision of compensation or the enforcement of a penalty, in the event that an absolute or contingent obligation of the transferor is not satisfied,

(l) any issue of a bond, debenture, note, certificate, mortgage or hypothecary claim, and

(m) any issue by a corporation of a share of its capital stock, or any other transaction that, but for this paragraph, would be a disposition by a corporation of a share of its capital stock;

“Inadequate considerations – Sec. 69(1)”

(1) Except as expressly otherwise provided in this Act,

(a) where a taxpayer has acquired anything from a person with whom the taxpayer was not dealing at arm's length at an amount in excess of the fair market value thereof at the time the taxpayer so acquired it, the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired it at that fair market value;

(b) where a taxpayer has disposed of anything

(i) to a person with whom the taxpayer was not dealing at arm's length for no proceeds or for proceeds less than the fair market value thereof at the time the taxpayer so disposed of it,

(ii) to any person by way of gift inter vivos, or

(iii) to a trust because of a disposition of a property that does not result in a change in the beneficial ownership of the property; and the taxpayer shall be deemed to have received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to that fair market value; and

(c) where a taxpayer acquires a property by way of gift, bequest or inheritance or because of a disposition that does not result in a change in the beneficial ownership of the property, the taxpayer is deemed to acquire the property at its fair market value.

A testamentary trust can never be a "non-personal" trust, even when an interest the fair market value of which was paid for with a transfer of property, is acquired by an initially foreign taxpayer. Such a disposition will not constitute a gratuitous contribution so as to impair the status of the trust as per the Sec. 108(1) definition of testamentary trust, and since the trust remains testamentary, it also remains personal after a beneficial interest has been "purchased" for consideration paid to the trust.¹²³

Contributions by Dispositions

Where the trust is an inter vivos trust it cannot be personal when any sort of "beneficial interest" is acquired for consideration payable directly or indirectly to the trust or any person who made a direct contribution to the trust by way of transfer, assignment or other disposition of property, though qualified by Sec. 108(7). The trust will lose permanently the personal nature. There is no definition of "beneficial interest" provided for purposes of this definition and giving it its normal meaning it would include "beneficial interests" in the form of enforceable rights to or to receive property, (income or capital, be they rights immediate or future, contingent or absolute), as well as pecuniary interests the beneficiary may have as a discretionary beneficiary having no enforceable right to or to receive property except when a discretionary power is exercised so as to grant one.¹²⁴

The deemed payment of consideration will also be considered.

The beneficial interest must have been acquired for consideration payable to either of the two parties hence there would have to be some degree of connection between the acquisition of the interest and the receiving of consideration by the trust or contributing party.¹²⁵

A Two Dimensional Scope

The definition applies in respect of inter vivos trusts to cause a loss of status when consideration is paid or payable directly or indirectly to the trust in which the interest was acquired or any person who has made a contribution of property to that particular trust.

Subsection 108(7) operates to allow the preservation of the personal trust status by deeming interests acquired in certain instances not to disqualify the trust.

This provision determines that the interest in the trust will not be considered acquired, it speaks nothing of the cost of the interest created on the contribution of property to the trust cited when such occurs.

Since the provision doesn't include persons who have indirectly contributed to the particular trust in which the interest exists some flexibility exists. A personal trust created by a settlor for two offspring beneficiaries places a general power of appointment with a friend of the family. The (general) power of appointment is exercised by that fourth party to create a distinctive new sub-trust out of some of the initial trust property, obviously operating to the detriment of the offspring beneficiaries since the new trust has as beneficiaries fifth and sixth parties. They make a gift to the original settlor or beneficiary of the initial trust, (the payment of which is possibly imposed by the second trust as a condition precedent) to reduce the adverse effects of the exercise of the power created. Although they will not be able to recognize a cost for their income or capital interests as per Sec. 106(1.1) or 107(1.1) their trust will be a personal trust since the person to whom they gifted did not in fact make a transfer, assignment or other disposition of property to the particular trust. That trust arose by the exercise of a general power of appointment which has as its creator/settlor the power holder under the initial trust and no one else. If the secondary trust's beneficiaries were to make a gift directly to the power holder

123 Can a trust have an interest carved out of it after it is created and sold by it? If so, have the other beneficiaries suffered a disposition of some of their interest rights?

124. An entitlement to be created with a power of appointment cannot be gratuitously transferred but can be conveyed for consideration, (Norman v. F.C.T., 109 C.L.R. 9, Sheppard v. F.C.T., 113 C.L.R. 385, Akron Tyre Co. Ltd. v. Kittson, 82 C.L.R. 477), and until the interest is created the trust should remain personal.

125 If the trustees thus exercise a general power of appointment so as to grant a capital interest to a particular taxpayer which operates to cause a reduction in the scope of another beneficiary's capital interest a subsequent gift to the deprived beneficiary by the appointed beneficiary will not cause a loss of personal trust status when the deprived beneficiary did not make a contribution to the trust, while as per Sec. 107(1.1) that payment may not constitute a cost of the capital interest acquired. If a taxpayer made a contribution to a previously existing trust which contained a general power of appointment over trust property and that taxpayer did not receive an interest therein then the personal status would not be lost. If another taxpayer made a substantial gift to the contributing taxpayer then the personal status would still not be jeopardized while if subsequent to the gift the third party power holder exercised the general power of appointment granting a capital interest to the gifting taxpayer then the Department would have a slight problem arguing that the gift made to the contributing taxpayer was as consideration for the acquisition of an interest he did not own nor had he had control over. The key aspect that would be scrutinized in such an instance would be who holds the power of appointment and the purpose of its exercise. A "gift" to a contributor could flag a series of transactions the Department could chase with section 245.

then they would possibly cause their trust to lose its personal status, if the power holder had contributed to the trust. If a beneficial interest was acquired in an inter vivos trust not for consideration payable directly or indirectly to the trust or a contributor to the trust but to create a trust for other beneficiaries therein interested then both trusts would retain their status and the initial trust could be varied so as to allow a discretionary power to be implemented and subsequently exercised to pay to the beneficiary, (secondary trust creator), the capital/income of the first.

Perhaps most entertaining is the fact that the consideration cannot be payable to the trust or a person who has made a "contribution to the trust by way of transfer, assignment or other disposition..." and be a party which lends property to the trust does not constitute a disqualifying recipient. The provision concerns contributions in the way of transfers, assignments or "other dispositions" of property, not loans which must be repaid hence a taxpayer could lead income producing property to a trust, or possibly even create one through a loan, and receive consideration paid from the income or capital beneficiary who receives a right to the income from the property, without causing the trust to lose its personal status. In *Dunkelman v. M.N.R.*¹²⁶ a loan was not considered to be a transfer for purposes of the attribution rules while in *P. Boisselle v. M.N.R.*¹²⁷ the forgiving of such a loan was. In such a manner, a substantial loan can be made to a trust, property rented can accomplish the same result, on long-term repayment, to rank second to another loan to double the income producing capacity of the trust, and the consideration paid to the settlor for his interest will not disqualify it. Has Canadian tax jurisprudence evolved to the extent that it will recognize "a transfer" of economic interest in such a case as is this why the legislators expressed more coinage than the word disposition?

Disposition of Interests acquired and their Costs

Where an interest is acquired by a settlor of the trust, at the time the trust was created, it will not be considered acquired for consideration payable to the trust hence the trust will be "personal" however when the interest is disposed of to another party the trust will lose its status. Consideration has been paid to a contributor. If the contributor transfers the interest to a spousal trust Sec. 73(1) will apply to offer a tax free roll-over while the contributor will receive proceeds, deemed so she cannot even transfer it on. This requires a bit of foresight as to where the interest and resulting economic effects are to flow to seed its' ownership in the proper place in the possible stream.

While the interaction of the Sec. 248(1) definition and Sec. 108(7) initially allows a to be trust set-up privately, once the beneficiaries start dealing in their interests, depending on their relationship to the contributor, there could be problems.

Relevant to all of the above are factors which concern the tax cost of the interest acquired and the conferring of benefits on any party by way of a trust by way of conditions precedent.

The tax cost of an interest in a personal trust is, generally, only important when it is an income interest. Under Sec. 106(1.1), an income interest will be allowed to have a deductible tax cost equal to the amount of consideration paid to a former beneficiary and not to anyone else. Payments made to a contributor of property will not be deductible unless they owned the severed out income interest before – the buyer is not buying what the contributor is selling. If a payment is made to an income beneficiary for his interest the personal status of the trust will not be tainted unless the beneficiary contributed directly to the trust.¹²⁸

Under Sec. 107(1.1), the initial cost (ACB) of a capital interests in a trust will be allowed to equal the amount of consideration paid to a former beneficiary in respect of the interest or the trust itself and while a payment to the former as consideration will not taint the trust obviously a payment to the latter, as consideration, will. (This isn't the case with testamentary trusts.) A payment to an indirect contributor may not be recognized as included in the ACB of the interest. The trust retains its personal status there is no great harm in the capital interest therein having an ACB equal to nil, except where there are to be trust-beneficiary transactions that are to be affected by the Sec. 53(2)(h) ACB adjustment provision applicable to purchased capital interests in personal trusts.

¹²⁶ 59 D.T.C. 1242

¹²⁷ [1989] 1 C.T.C. 2385 (TCC)

¹²⁸ If an income interest in a temporarily non-resident trust is gifted to a non-resident on condition that the dispose of it for a certain amount subsequently to a Canadian resident Sec. 115(1)(a)(iv) will not cause taxation on the Canadian residents purchase of the interest. (There may be problems with such effective restraints on alienation but if the trust deed is structured so as to divest the interest if the instructions are not followed the restraint may be avoided.) The gift of the interest could be saddled with a condition precedent requiring payment of a sum on trust for the particular purchaser.

Part of the favourable provisions available in respect of personal trusts include the Sec. 107(2) disposition provision which allows another virtually tax free distribution of property in satisfaction of a capital interest. This subsection is to be aimed for when contemplating the use of a personal trust (unless the trust is to dispose of the contribution)

Subsection 105(1) Benefits and Other Considerations

A major danger in respect of any indirect transfers in settling a trust arrangement is that which the Sec. 105(1) provision poses which causes the value of all benefits to a taxpayer, (which need not be a beneficiary), from or under a trust to be included fully in his income unless they haven't already done so, or if they didn't lead to an actual or hypothetical Sec. 53(2)(h) adjustment in the ACB of the taxpayer's capital interest in the trust. Obviously payments made to an indirect contributor to the trust will be fully included in his income if they can be traced to being a benefit from or under a trust.¹²⁹ This can be avoided if the object the payment is made in respect of is an interest in the trust. A payment made to the holder of a general power of appointment, regardless of whether it is exercised favourably for the benefit of the payer, will fall under Sec. 105(1) and be fully included in income, even though it will not be recognizable as consideration paid for any resulting interest acquired by the payer.¹³⁰

An inter vivos trust will not lose its personal status if consideration is paid for a beneficial interest to a person who has made a contribution to the trust by way of a loan for value in a situation similar to that in *Dunkelman v. M.N.R.*¹³¹. The contributor could make a loan of property for a charge less than its fair market rental cost and the excess income produced would be the contribution. Until the loan is forgiven it cannot be considered a contribution by way of transfer, assignment, or other disposition of property. Since the payment can be made to the lender/creditor to compensate her for a reduced yield from his economic transfer to the trust, can it be a Sec. 105(1) benefit: is she realizing a benefit from the trust purely and is this the enlarged scope of the Sec. 105(1)-53(2)(h) mechanics? ^{132 133}

If the lender of the property, as a means of creating the trust, takes back a beneficial interest therein the closing prose of the definition's (b)(ii) will apply to retain the personal character. A contributor loans property to a trust and takes back consideration being the income interest in the trust's full income. Can that income interest have a deductible cost for purposes of Sec. 106(1) that allows it's write off? The trust remains personal since the holder of the income interest/contributor did not transfer/assign/dispose: she loaned and by virtue of the fact that she can recognize a cost equal to the consideration she did pay for her interest – she loaned property to the trust for consideration being a reduced return, to obtain more of a return with the 2nd loan's capacity. She can transfer that income interest for a larger amount and there is integration of its cost deductibility under Sec. 106(1). Again, this can knit in to an estate plan and split up deductibility of costs in various hands as the income from the property acquired by the trust is realized by the trust and paid out to various parties. First, maybe, to the contributor to a certain extent and then to the 2nd income interest beneficiary as the first interest is exhausted.¹³⁴ Variations can discretionarily occur. What is the value of a

129. Such a payment would be as consideration for exercising a power of appointment and granting a substantial capital/income interest to the payer.

130 Subsection 105(1) does not apply to non-residents by virtue of the lack of technical accuracy in Sec. 214(3)(a) hence the recipient can be non-resident without consequences.

131 59 D.T.C. 1242

132 See the recent Aust. case of Brown and Secretary, Department of Family and Community Services [2004] AATA 48 (22 January 2004) for a blurring of the line between loan creditor and trust beneficiary in a social security case when loans were made to an off-shore trust and repaid.

133 If such is the case can you imagine where the line is on how extensive the types of benefits CRA will recognize that a settlor can realize from his trust?

134 One would want to make sure that the primary income interest is severable to a certain extent here to ensure loan/rental at a reduced rate and it is all assignable to the income interest's cost.

The final important aspect concerning the personal trust definition is that if so much as one beneficial interest of any degree is acquired for consideration payable to either of the two subject parties the entire trust will lose its status regardless of the actions of the other beneficiaries. When they have acquired their capital interests in such a way as to not be able to recognize an appropriately substantial ACB in relation to the value of the interest harsh tax consequences will follow, (under Sec. 107(2.1), for example), when property is distributed in satisfaction of the interest or where it is disposed of to a third party. Since income interests exist for purposes of the Act only in respect of personal trusts, a loss of personal status will automatically change all of the income interests into capital interests precluding the taxpayer from deducting any deductible cost it might otherwise have had under Sec. 106(1).¹³⁵ Substantial care must be taken in working within the definition of personal status since once a particular trust loses it, it is lost forever with significant tax consequences.

Who "Creates" or "Contributes" to That Trust or "Creates a New Distinct One with that Other's Terms"?

Ascertaining who creates a new trust through adopting another's terms or merely contributes to one that already exists is of considerable importance in the ITA since so many rules target contributions to trusts and creations thereof. Does the contribution of property to a previously existing trust recreate the trust already existing, or does it merely increase/augment the existing trust's property without effect on the fiduciary obligations for both common-law and consequential tax purposes? Or, is there merely an adoption of an existing trust's terms to create a new one?

In the author's opinion, CRA and Finance are bound by this jurisprudence since there are selective uses of the words "create" or "contribute" in various provisions in the Act. And what is interesting is that it seems that through the inconsistent use of the terms they may have un-intended consequences.

The issue is extremely important since all over our ITA there are references to

- beneficiaries having interests in trusts,
- contributions to trusts by targeted parties,
- creations of trusts, and
- their relation with "the trust" being the intermediary

so the issue of "which trust" is being spoken of, statutorily, cannot be underscored enough. They exist since our fiscal authorities seek to capture those instances where taxpayers use trusts to transfer economic benefits to others however if the taxpayer is able to demonstrate that "another trust" was actually at issue the formulated provisions may not apply. Such is the case with, amongst others, the testamentary trust definition, the personal trust definition, the preferred beneficiary election and the non-resident trust rules.

In *Baldwin v. C.I.R.*¹³⁶ the Supreme Court of New Zealand had to decide whether a trust had been "created" in an income tax situation and it essentially had occurred when property was transferred for 1 shilling to an already existing trust which as per its terms could accept any such contributions. MaCarthur J. held:

"The dictionary meaning of the word "create" is "to make, form, constitute, or bring into legal existence": see Shorter Oxford Dictionary. In my opinion the phrase "a trust has been created" in s.84A simply means "a trust has been brought into legal existence". No particular method of creation of a trust is indicated by the section. I think therefore that if it is shown that trust obligations have been imposed or constituted in respect of certain property by one or more of the specified persons then a trust has been created by that person or those persons within the meaning of the section."

maximum flexibility.

¹³⁵ On the other hand, if the existing capital interests under the trust have substantial a.c.b.'s (brought about by becoming resident etc.) and the income interests have substantial undeducted deductible costs, and the trust is to be wound up, it could prove beneficial, depending on the f.m.v. and tax cost of the trust's property, to taint it so that the income interests become capital interests and thus create capital losses when canceled. Integrated use of Sec. 106(3) and selective Sec. 107(2) distributions may have to occur prior to the taint but at least the deductible income interest cost, that quite likely caused income recognition in the hands of its previous beneficiary, can gain some sort of tax benefit rather than be completely lost.

¹³⁶. 1965 N.Z.L.R. 1

The same approach was used in *Tucker v. C.I.R.*¹³⁷ where a taxpayer augmented a previously existing trust with property and in that case the same court concluded that the taxpayer had made use of the previously existing trust's terms to effect his own dispositions and that he had created a trust by having the intention of making property subject to the previously existing terms in favor of beneficiaries which were known to him.

In *Truesdale v. F.C.T.*¹³⁸ the Australian High Court had to ascertain whether a taxpayer created a trust upon gifting property to a previously existing arrangement in an income tax issue and Menzies J. held:

"There is an obvious difference between creating a trust in respect of property, on the one hand, and, on the other, transferring property to a trustee to hold upon the terms of an established trust. To read the section as if it applied to such a transfer would be, in the absence of a context, to expand it. Such a reading would be tantamount to saying that the transfer to the trustee of property to be held as part of the assets of an already constituted trust would be to create a second trust, whereas, from the point of view of both the trustee and of the beneficiary, there would be but one trust, and the property transferred would be nothing more than an addition to the property subject to the trust."

Tucker & Baldwin were considered inapplicable. In the author's opinion Truesdale may not be entirely well concluded. Without property there is no trust and as Counsel for the F.C.T. contended, the original settlor of the trust could not create "a" trust in respect of the property that was subsequently contributed, though he may allow the trustee to accept other property. Contrary to the highlighted phrase the fact that the trustee and beneficiaries perceive only one set of fiduciary obligations does not negate the possible existence of two trusts with identical terms over different property for the same beneficiaries in the same share created by two different people.¹³⁹ Critical to the establishment of a trust by a subsequent transfer to a previously existing trust would appear to be that the transferor has the intention of creating a trust out of the property for the benefit of the specific beneficiaries (with their specific interests) and if the transferor doesn't concern himself with who his property is to benefit then he can't create a trust when he gifts it to the trustees even though he knows they are receiving it in that capacity. If he gifts the property with the full recognition of the terms and how the beneficiaries will receive it then it should be said that he's concerned himself with who and how the gift is to benefit and has thus adopted and created a trust.¹⁴⁰

¹³⁷ 1965 N.Z.L.R. 1027 (SC)

¹³⁸ 120 C.L.R. 353

¹³⁹ See also Mills v. I.R.C., 1974 1 All E.R. 977, & Crossland v. Hawkins, 1961 2 All E.R. 812.

¹⁴⁰ In J.W. Broomhead (Vic.) Pty. Ltd. (in liq.) v. J.W. Broomhead Pty. Ltd. & Ors., 1985 V.R. 891, the Supreme Court of Victoria had to ascertain, amongst other issues, whether a business transferred to a trust became part of the original trust fund or created a new trust when the original trust's terms defined the trust property to include 'any moneys which may accrue or be added' to the settled sum. Citing Prichard v. Prichard, 1870 L.R. 11 Eq. 232, Perrin v. Morgan, 1943 A.C. 399, Re: Lenry, 1975 V.R. 601, & Kensington Cellars Pty. Ltd. v. Bactanee Pty. Ltd., 1984 2 A.C.L.C. 245, the court found that the description attached to the trust fund by its settlor was wide enough to allow the trust's obligations to be imposed on the augment and that the business was to be treated as included in the sole trust fund.

Width of description of the trust property is, in the author's opinion, of importance in determining whether an identical trust is created or if a settled amount is increased when a subsequent gift is made. If one can take the view that a trust can only be created by a dispositive act it could perhaps be argued that a gift of 'subsequently realized' property will allow it to be considered as part of the trust on account of the fact that it is the subject of the gift, while if the trust deed is so restrictive as to expressly apply only to the initial property dealt with its terms property subsequently 'added' thereto cannot be considered as part of the initial gift and thus must constitute a new disposition consequently creating a new trust with identical terms. See also Marsal Pty. Ltd. & Ors. v. Comp. of Stamps, 82 A.T.C. 4536. In B.L. & M. Grollo Homes Pty. Ltd. v. Comp. of Stamps, 1985 V.R. 445, the Full Court had to ascertain whether a deed that transferred property to a previously existing trust the terms of which arguably were phrased as to apply to after acquired land received gratuitously operated as itself a settlement or merely a gift for stamp duty purposes. The case was not argued excessively on the scope of the initial trust's terms but the court pointed out that even if they were restrictive "a" trust could have been created via the assent of the recipient trustee to hold on the terms of the original trust. The fact that the deed of transfer didn't create any new interests different from the original trust didn't prevent the holding that there was the creation of a settlement following the imposition of the terms of the initial trust upon the property while it was also held that it was both the initial trust and that of the transfer which operated to create the trust in respect of the property: the former could not create one alone by virtue of the fact that it didn't vest in the trustee any title to the control of the property subsequently contributed. (This broke with the dicta in C.S.B. v. Hopkins wherein it was held that for stamp duty purposes it was the deed that declared or described the trust that was dutiable as that creating it.) Could it be argued that this case allows Sec. 108(1) to be undermined in respect of inter vivos trusts whenever a contribution is made so as to "create a trust"? Were the legislators concerned with this jurisprudence at the time of the enactment? It appears not from their choice of expression.

See also the recent NZ case of Begg & Ors v. CIR, NZCA 127/2008 [30 April 2009], where Baldwin was cited as well as Adams and Richardson's Law of Estate and Gift Duties (5ed 1978) with:

In the Sec. 108(1) context in respect of inter vivos trusts and the definition of personal trust the difference between a creation of a trust identical to one existing and a mere contribution to one existing has considerable repercussions. The former will also allow the settlor status for the preferred beneficiary election to be preserved since the initial trust is not being affected: a completely new one is being constituted, and although the income from the augmentation property can't benefit from the P.B.E., (unless the settlor is the same or other qualified person), the income of the initial trust will continue to gain P.B.E. treatment. If the contribution does not create a trust in respect of the property but merely augments the initial's portfolio then there must be concern for the proportions. While if it can be argued that a contributor chose to adopt an existing trust's terms to create his own the application of the personal trust definition may not be drawn into for consideration.

Ignorance of the beneficiaries, how they are to share, or the trust's terms itself may be the deciding factor in the author's opinion while the width of the description of property to be held under the initial may also be of paramount importance.¹⁴¹

[43] In our view, the position is accurately stated by Sir Ivor at [2/34] [Adams and Richardson's Law of Estate and Gift Duties (5ed 1978) – Ed.] of his text:

A trust is "created" for the purpose of para (b) when specific property is impressed with the terms of a trust. The words "a trust has been created" in s 84A of the Land Income Tax Act 1954 (now repealed) were considered by Macarthur J in Baldwin v CIR [1965] NZLR 1 where he said (p 6):

"In my opinion the phrase 'a trust has been created' in section 84A simply means 'a trust has been brought into legal existence'. No particular method of creation of a trust is indicated by the section. I think therefore that if it is shown that trust obligations have been imposed or constituted in respect of certain property by one or more of the specified persons then a trust has been created by that person or those persons within the meaning of the section".

A trust is created, then, when trustees accept the transfer of property to them to be held in trust. Where the terms of the trust are set out in a trustee deed executed by the trustees and the settlor a trust is "created" only in respect of that property which is actually impressed with a trust at the time the deed is executed. Later transfers of property to the trustees to be held on the terms of the deed create further trusts in respect of that property. Each separate transfer is the creation of a separate trust, and is consequently a separate disposition of property under para (b): Re Adlard [1953] 2 All ER 1437; Re Bowden [1936] Ch 71.

[44] In our view, there is no doubt that specific property, namely the donor's home, did become "impressed with the terms of a trust" under the Public Trust template from the date of execution of the deed. It does not matter that the settlor and the trustee were one and the same person, for the reasons given, in particular by Edwards J, in Perry. The point is that, after execution of the deed, the settlor no longer had the full beneficial interest in his or her home; he or she held it as trustee in terms of the declaration of trust.

[45] Sir Ivor then went on to refer to Perry, with no suggestion that that case was wrongly decided. (We may add that, in the last edition of The Law of Estate and Gift Duties in New Zealand written by the original author, E C Adams, there is also no suggestion that Perry was wrongly decided: see (3ed 1956) at [102]. Mr Adams, himself formerly an Assistant Commissioner of Stamp Duties, was in his day New Zealand's leading scholar in this field and, we may add, in others.)

[46] Sir Ivor then continued at [2/35]:

Although it is clear that the creation of a trust is an effective means of disposing of property within the meaning of the definition, the application of the definition as a whole raises more problems. The principal difficulty is that the various steps involved in the creation and performance of a trust seem to include a number of possible dispositions within the definition. The transfer of property to trustees on trust, the creation of various equitable interests in the trust property, and the transfer of property to beneficiaries under the terms of the trust, all appear to come within the terms of the Act.

There might be some difficulty in deciding which of these dispositions is the most relevant for gift duty purposes. It might even be concluded that the creation and performance of a trust involve not one but several dispositions.

By virtue of para (b), however, the creation of a trust is itself to be regarded as a disposition. Consequently it is suggested that any transfers, payments, or conveyances made in the performance of the trust are not separate dispositions, for they are incidental to the creation of the trust or flow from it.

[47] At [2/39], Sir Ivor discusses the case where trusts create future or contingent interests. Even in those circumstances, he concludes, a gift is made at the time the trust is created "even where the various interest and beneficiaries are unascertained or contingent" and "even when the final destination of those interests cannot be determined until a later date".

The case actually involved whether a disposition for purposes of gift tax occurred on the binding of a trust deed even when the property would not be transferred to it until substantially subsequently: In this case the appeal court found that even when the contributions were made substantially deferred, they "created" a trust many years previously when the documentation was executed.

141 See also Re: Chester, 19 S.A.S.R. 247, Re: Sharpe, 1945 18 A.L.J. 156, Smith v. Cock, 12 C.L.R. 30 & Atwill v. Commr. of S.D., 1970 92 W.N. (N.S.W.) 869. If the jurisprudence reveals that a "contribution" to a trust "creates" another,

In the recent Tax Court case of *Peter Sommerer And Her Majesty The Queen*¹⁴² the court had to consider the instance where a taxpayer had sold property to an non-resident trust and had been assessed under s. 75(2) as a contributor in respect of its subsequent capital gains. The court held:

[87] The opening words are significant - "by a trust created...property is held on condition". In this case, one could insert the date and have the opening words: "where, by a trust created on October 3, 1996, property is held on condition". The provision does not say "where property is held in trust or in a trust on condition". It specifically refers to a trust created and a time at which the trust is created. I suggest it invites an interpretation to look at the conditions on the creation of the trust, the creation in this case by Mr. Herbert Sommerer, the settlor. The nature of the trust, and whether it is of a type contemplated by subsection 75(2) of the Act, is to be discerned at the time of creation. On the creation of the trust by a settlor, there can only be one person from whom property is received – the settlor. There is no other person. This does not however preclude the possibility of another person settling property in trust with the same trustee and on the same terms, but in such a case, I would suggest there is another trust created. In effect, by the opening words of subsection 75(2) of the Act only a settlor, or a contributor akin to a settlor is contemplated as being the defined person.

...

[94] Does this mean that Mr. Peter Sommerer could never be "the person" for purposes of this section? No. If he settled the shares in the same trust, by contributing them to the trust (that they be held on the same conditions), he could be seen as creating a new trust and could, therefore, be a settlor and subject to the application of subsection 75(2) of the Act. He would, however, had to have been a contributor. But he did not do that. He did not transfer shares into the SPF as a settlor or contributor creating a trust. He sold the shares unconditionally to the SPF, who, as trustee of the property, held the property on conditions created by Mr. Herbert Sommerer, substituting those shares for the shillings endowed by Mr. Herbert Sommerer. In these circumstances, Mr. Peter Sommerer could not be "the person" as defined.

...

[104] This view has garnered some favour amongst the academics. Maurice Cullity in Taxation and Estate Planning indicates the usual object of subsection 75(2) attribution is the settlor, though could apply to a subsequent transferor in the sense of a contributor. In that regard, I concur with Justice Bowie's comments in Greenberg Estate v. The Queen^[20] that "contributed" signifies a voluntary payment made to increase the capital of the estate: a sale to the trust at fair market value does no such thing. As I indicated earlier, if Mr. Peter Sommerer was to contribute to the trust, he might be viewed as a settlor creating a new trust. A fair market sale of property to a trust is not a contribution and the vendor is not a contributor, nor therefore a settlor. The property sold to the trust cannot, as argued by the Respondent, be viewed as "original property"; it can only be substituted property, as consideration was given for it by the trust.

It's important to note that there is an inherent reinforcement of the "4 Quadrant multifaceted" trust described in a previous subchapter since the definition in s. 104(1) "drills down to a property by property basis" and this judicial recognition of the creation of new seemingly individual trusts upon future individual augment accommodates that. And, it should be noted that until the Minister deems the two trusts to be the same, as allowed pursuant to s. 104(2)¹⁴³, they are not: that subsection is termed only in respect of principally the same regardless of whether it can be argued to be the same original trust, the use of the two terms is wholly inadequate. See also Inland Revenue v Rysaffe Trustee Company (CI) Ltd [2003] EWCA Civ 356, [2003] NPC 39, [2003] STC 536, (2002-03) 5 ITELR 706, [2003] WTLR 481, [2003] EWCA Civ 356, [2003] BTC 8021, [2003] STI 452 where the issue of how many trusts were created where the term "disposition" was argued to be relevant in their context.

142 2011 TCC 212

143 "Taxed as individual – Sec. 104(2)"

(2) A trust shall, for the purposes of this Act, and without affecting the liability of the trustee or legal representative for that person's own income tax, be deemed to be in respect of the trust property an individual, but where there is more than one trust contributor/settlor.

Again, this has repercussions all over the ITA on such things as:

- The PBE
- The 21 Deemed Disposition rule
- The accessing of beneficial distribution mechanics in s. 107 to name a few.

A trustee is not under any obligation to accept property as that of the trust he is administering unless it is specified in the constituting deed. In the author's opinion he may accept to act as trustee for an identical trust in respect of that subsequent disposition but he should not be, in the author's opinion, compelled to augment the wealth of the trust which he is administering through donative receipts - though of course he may through its own terms. If, through such an act, he impairs the personal status//P.B.E. mechanics application a charge of impartiality/imprudent actions causing damages could be constituted. It would prove more effective, rather than relying on such a threat, to expressly prevent an augmentation that would jeopardize an unforeseeable instance.

Revocable, Protective and Bare Trusts

Technical News 7, of 1996, allowed CRA to provide their opinion on the issue of the above purpose driven trusts. To the author's opinion, they have not changed.

"Income Tax Technical News No. 7

February 21, 1996

The following is the text of a presentation given on November 29, 1995 by Michael Hiltz of the Income Tax Rulings and Interpretations Directorate of Revenue Canada at the annual conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation held in Toronto.

Revocable Living Trusts

Some people use a revocable living trust to avoid the potential impact of provincial probate taxes. By the Declaration of Trust the settlor is a trustee and, during his or her lifetime, is the sole income and capital beneficiary. The settlor retains the ability to revoke, alter or amend the terms of the trust at any time. Additionally, the settlor has the unfettered ability to deal with the property as he or she sees fit during his or her lifetime. The Declaration of Trust further provides for the vesting of the income and capital interests in the trust in other beneficiaries at the time of the settlor's death.

Revenue Canada has previously opined that because the settlor retained beneficial ownership of the property during his or her lifetime, a transfer of property to a revocable living trust resident in Canada would not be a disposition of property, pursuant to paragraph (e) of the definition of "disposition" in section 54 and that we would ignore the trust for income tax purposes during the lifetime of the settlor. Consequently, the settlor would be considered to be the owner of the property for all purposes of the Act.

Recently, we have received a number of technical interpretation requests concerning the income tax consequences of a transfer of property to a revocable living trust. In connection with these requests we reconsidered our previous opinion, our response to question 33 of the Revenue Canada Round Table at the 1988 Canadian Tax Conference, and the relevant jurisprudence and literature.

and

- (a) substantially all of the property of the various trusts has been received from one person, and
- (b) the various trusts are conditioned so that the income thereof accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary, or group or class of beneficiaries,

such of the trustees as the Minister may designate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be in respect of all the trusts an individual whose property is the property of all the trusts and whose income is the income of all the trusts.

It is now our opinion that a revocable living trust should be recognized for income tax purposes at the time that legal title to property is transferred to it and that the transfer of the property is at its full fair market value (and not at the value of the remainder interest only). Consequently, our response to question 33 of the 1988 Revenue Canada Round Table is withdrawn and the income tax consequences of transactions completed by taxpayers who relied on our previous opinion on transfers of property to a revocable living trust will be determined on a case by case basis. Subsection 75(2) will be applicable during the lifetime of the settlor while he or she is resident in Canada.

Protective Trusts

Revenue Canada has received a number of enquiries concerning whether the transfer of property to a protective trust results in a disposition of the property for income tax purposes. A protective trust would be established by a settlor to protect property in the event of some contingency such as deteriorating health.

It is our view that a trust will be considered a protective trust when its indenture contains all of the following terms:

- The settlor is the sole beneficiary of the trust.
- The settlor is entitled to so much of the annual income and any realized capital gains of the trust as he or she may request or, in the absence of such a request, such amounts as the trustees, in their absolute discretion, deem advisable. (For this purpose, the income of the trust is its net income calculated without reference to the provisions of the Act. Realized capital gains are capital gains as calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Act.)
- The property of the trust reverts to the settlor if the trust is terminated prior to the settlor's death.
- The trust will terminate upon the death of the settlor unless it is terminated at an earlier date. (When the settlor dies, any property held by the trust will devolve in accordance with the terms of the settlor's will or, if the settlor dies intestate, the property of the trust will devolve in accordance with the laws of intestacy that are relevant to the estate.)

Transfers of property to a protective trust will not result in a disposition, pursuant to paragraph (e) of the definition of "disposition" in section 54 of the Act. However, a protective trust is recognized for income tax purposes and is the owner of the property for all purposes of the Act. The settlor will have an income and capital interest in the protective trust and subsection 75(2) will be applicable during the lifetime of the settlor while he or she is resident in Canada.

Bare Trusts

Revenue Canada stated in a paper entitled "Bare Trusts" at the 1989 Corporate Management Tax Conference that, pending a review of our position, where property is held by a bare trust, we will ignore the trust for income tax purposes and will consider the transferor/settlor to be the owner of the property for all purposes of the Act.

It was further stated that we generally view a trust under common law to be a bare trust when:

- the trustee has no significant powers or responsibilities, and can take no action without instructions from the settlor;
- the trustee's only function is to hold legal title to the property; and
- the settlor is the sole beneficiary and can cause the property to revert to him or her at any time.

Our review of this matter has been completed and the above position remains unchanged."¹⁴⁴

¹⁴⁴ See Bruton Holdings Pty Limited (In Liq) v Commissioner of Taxation [2011] FCAFC 79 (17 June 2011), an Aust. case dealing with the duties of a bare trustee. See also Paul Perovich v. Her Majesty The Queen, 97-3644-IT-G, where the Tax Ct. refused to recognize a bare trust, while in Salvatore Peragine And Her Majesty The Queen, 2012TCC348, the Tax Court further held:

[18] In De Mond, above, Justice Lamarre stated as follows:

31 This approach has also been followed by the courts, as it has been held that losses incurred in a real estate transaction conducted in the name of a corporation as a bare trustee should be deducted by the person who has an absolute right to the profit. In Brookview Investments Ltd. et al v. Minister of National Revenue (1963), 63 D.T.C. 1205 (Can. Ex. Ct.), an arrangement had been devised under which a trust was constituted in order to purchase land as a bare trustee. Cattanach J. concluded that the sole function of the trust was to convey the property as directed by the group of investors. He therefore concluded that the investors could deduct the losses incurred due to the real estate transaction, which had turned bad. Cattanach J. affirmed that had a profit been realized, such profit would not have been taxed in the hands of the trust but rather in the hands of the person who had an absolute right to the profit. Mr. W.D. Goodman, in "The Character of the Bare Trust in Canadian Tax Legislation", in D.W. Waters, ed., Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts (Toronto: Carswell, 1993), at p. 219, made the following comment on Brookview Investments, at p. 233:

... Unfortunately, the reasons for judgment do not clearly indicate the legal basis for this decision, but presumably it was based on the view that a bare trust may be totally ignored for tax purposes, so that the property held by the bare trustee and any income or loss flowing from such property had to be regarded as belonging to the beneficiaries of the bare trust.

...

34 In "The Character of the Bare Trust in Canadian Tax Legislation", supra, Mr. Goodman referred at page 222 to an article by Professor Hayton in which a bare trust was characterized as not being a true trust. Professor Hayton wrote:

If, despite the form of the trust instrument, the trust is a sham, apparently having legal effects, but not really intended to have any legal effect, the settlor having real dispositive control over capital and income, then the trust is not a true trust but a bare trust where the whole equitable ownership remains in the settlor.

However, Mr. Goodman took care to suggest that Professor Hayton's statement should not be interpreted as implying that provisions in the Act regarding trusts are inapplicable to bare trusts.

35 In the Corporate Management Tax Conference 1989: "Creative Tax Planning for Real Estate Transactions --- Beyond Tax Reform and into the 1990s", Revenue Canada's view of the bare trust concept is stated as follows at p. 8:1:

From Revenue Canada's perspective, difficult income tax issues arise from the use of bare trusts for commercial purposes. The reason these issues are difficult is that in order to arrive at apparently equitable tax results, the existence of a trust, which is effective for commercial purposes, has to be ignored for income tax purposes.

Although a bare trust is not defined in the Income Tax Act, Revenue Canada generally views this to be a trust under common law where the trustee has no significant powers or responsibilities, and can take no action regarding the property held by the trust without instructions from the settlor. Normally the trustee's only function is to hold legal title to the property. Furthermore, the settlor is also the sole beneficiary and can cause the property to revert to him at any time. Thus a bare trust does not include a blind trust or other trusts in which the trustee has established powers and responsibilities.

36 Aside from the definitions of bare trusts referred to by counsel for the appellant, supra, it has also been stated that a bare trustee is a person who holds property in trust at the absolute disposal and for the absolute benefit of the beneficiaries (see Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., volume 48, paragraph 641, and Adams v. R. (1998), 98 D.T.C. 6232 (Fed. C.A.)).

37 Bare trustees have also been compared to agents. The existence of a bare trust will be disregarded for income tax purposes where the bare trustee holds property as a mere agent or for the beneficial owner. In Trident Holdings Ltd. v. Danand Investments Ltd. (1988), 64 O.R. (2d) 65 (Ont. C.A.), Mr. Justice Morden, speaking for the Ontario Court of Appeal, made the distinction between an ordinary trust and a bare trust. He reproduced the following passages from Scott, The Law of Trusts, 4th ed. (1987):

An agent acts for, and on behalf of, his principal and subject to his control; a trustee as such is not subject to the control of his beneficiary, although he is under a duty to deal with the trust property for the latter's benefit in accordance with the terms of the trust, and can be compelled by the beneficiary to perform this duty. The agent owes a duty of obedience to his principal; a trustee is under a duty to conform to the terms of the trust [Vol. 1, p. 88].

A good Tax Court case that explains the interaction of bare trust, resulting trust and agency concepts is *Sjc Property Management Inc., Dsd Properties Inc., Learning Boost Inc. v. Her Majesty The Queen*¹⁴⁵ whereby the Court held:

[1] These appeals are brought by Shirley Fourney (the “Appellant”), SJC Property Management Inc. (“SJC”), DSD Properties Inc. (“DSD”), and Learning Boost Inc. (“Learning Boost”) from reassessments for each of their respective tax returns for the years 2003, 2004 and 2005. The Appellant alleges that the three companies she incorporated, SJC, DSD and Learning Boost, were merely acting as her agents and bare nominees, and that she never gave up beneficial ownership of her business assets and activities. A summary of the reassessments at issue in these appeals is to be found in Schedule 1 to these reasons for judgment.

...

Analysis: Beneficial Ownership

[22] Subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act (the “Act”) specifically excludes certain transfers where no change in beneficial ownership occurs. In the present case, the relevant provision is as follows:

248(1) Definitions — In this Act,

...

“disposition” of any property, except as expressly otherwise provided, includes

(a) . . .

but does not include

...

A person may be both agent of and trustee for another. If he undertakes to act on behalf of the other and subject to his control he is an agent; but if he is vested with the title to property that he holds for his principal, he is also a trustee. In such a case, however, it is the agency relation that predominates, and the principles of agency, rather than the principles of trust, are applicable [Vol. 1, p. 95].

38 Mr. Justice Morden also quoted with approval from an article by M.C. Cullity, “Liability of Beneficiaries — A Rejoinder”, (1985-86), 7 Estates & Trusts Quarterly 35, at p. 36:

It is quite clear that in many situations trustees will also be agents. This occurs, for example, in the familiar case of investments held by an investment dealer as nominee or in the case of land held by a nominee corporation. In such cases, the trust relationship that arises by virtue of the separation of legal and equitable ownership is often described as a bare trust and for tax and some other purposes it is quite understandably ignored.

The distinguishing characteristic of the bare trust is that the trustee has no independent powers, discretions or responsibilities. His only responsibility is to carry out the instructions of his principals --- the beneficiaries. If he does not have to accept instructions, if he has any significant independent powers or responsibilities, he is not a bare trustee.

[19] Subsection 104(1) of the Act provides as follows:

104. (1) In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a “trust”) shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property, but, except for the purposes of this subsection, subsection (1.1), subparagraph (b)(v) of the definition “disposition” in subsection 248(1) and paragraph (k) of that definition, a trust is deemed not to include an arrangement under which the trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust’s property unless the trust is described in any of paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition “trust” in subsection 108(1).

(emphasis added)

[20] It seems to me that the Appellant was simply acting as the agent for Leo Peragine in holding the Victoria Property. The Appellant did not have any beneficial interest in the property nor did the Appellant have any independent power, discretion, or responsibility with respect to the Victoria Property. Therefore the trust would not be a trust as determined in accordance with the provisions of subsection 104(1) of the Act and would be what has been described as a bare trust. As a result any gain arising from the sale of the Victoria Property would not be included in the Appellant’s income.

(e) any transfer of the property as a consequence of which there is no change in the beneficial ownership of the property, except where the transfer is

- (i) from a person or a partnership to a trust for the benefit of the person or the partnership,
- (ii) from a trust to a beneficiary under the trust, or
- (iii) from one trust maintained for the benefit of one or more beneficiaries under the trust to another trust maintained for the benefit of the same beneficiaries,

[Emphasis added.]

[23] Subsection 104(1) of the Act provides that references to trusts in paragraph (e) of the definition of "disposition" in subsection 248(1) do not include transfers to bare trusts, which will not be considered dispositions under subsection 248(1) when the trust acts entirely as the agent of the beneficiary, holding title with no change in beneficial ownership:

104(1) Reference to trust or estate – In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a "trust") shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property, but, except for the purposes of this subsection, subsection (1.1), subparagraph (b)(v) of the definition "disposition" in subsection 248(1) and paragraph (k) of that definition, a trust is deemed not to include an arrangement under which the trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust's property unless the trust is described in any of paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition "trust" in subsection 108(1).

[24] In this case, the Appellant argues that there was no disposition under subsection 248(1) of the Act because only the legal ownership of the business assets and interests was transferred, with no actual taxable disposition occurring because the incorporated entities were merely holding title to the properties as the Appellant's bare nominees or agents, without acquiring beneficial ownership thereof. The Appellant argues that the lack of consideration for any of the properties, combined with the lack of intent to create a trust or give a gift, shows that true ownership was never transferred. She further submits that any additional purchases or sales of property were made through the corporations in their roles as agents.

[25] In considering this argument, I will explore the meaning of beneficial ownership, the law regarding transfers of property for no consideration, and the factors required in order to establish an agent-principal relationship. First, with regard to beneficial ownership, the concept emerges from the need in equity to distinguish between a person who holds title to a property (the "legal owner") and the person who has the true right to the benefits of ownership. As recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada in Covert et al. v. Minister of Finance of Nova Scotia,^[1] citing Hart J. in MacKeen Estate v. Minister of Finance of Nova Scotia (1977), 36 A.P.R. 572:

It seems to me that the plain ordinary meaning of the expression "beneficial owner" is the real or true owner of the property. The property may be registered in another name or held in trust for the real owner, but the "beneficial owner" is the one who can ultimately exercise the rights of ownership in the property.

[26] More recently, the Supreme Court of Canada, in Pecore v. Pecore, addressed the meaning of beneficial ownership,^[2] acknowledging the distinction between legal and beneficial ownership as emerging from equity considerations:

Equity . . . recognizes a distinction between legal and beneficial ownership. The beneficial owner of property has been described as "[t]he real owner of property even though it is in someone else's name": Csak v. Aumon (1990), 69 D.L.R. (4th) 567 (Ont. H.C.J.), at p. 570.^[3]

[27] When the person who has legal ownership by holding title is different from the person having beneficial ownership of the same property and the legal owner has no discretion to do anything with the property, the property is understood to be held in a bare trust, whether by an agent or a trustee.

In De Mond v. The Queen,^[4] the Tax Court of Canada explored the meaning of bare trust:

. . . Professor Waters defines a bare trust as follows:

The usually accepted meaning of the term "bare," "naked" or simple trust is a trust where the trustee or trustees hold property without any further duty to perform except to convey it to the beneficiary or beneficiaries upon demand.

. . .

Every fiduciary, which includes an agent holding the title to property for a principal, is a bare trustee of the property he holds for another.^[5]

. . . it has also been stated that a bare trustee is a person who holds property in trust at the absolute disposal and for the absolute benefit of the beneficiaries (see Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., volume 48, paragraph 641, and The Queen v. Robinson et al., 98 DTC 6232 (F.C.A.)).^[6]

[28] Judge Lamarre then reviewed the relationship between the concepts of bare trustee and agent:

Bare trustees have also been compared to agents. The existence of a bare trust will be disregarded for income tax purposes where the bare trustee holds property as a mere agent or for the beneficial owner. In Trident Holdings Ltd. v. Danand Investments Ltd., 64 O.R. (2d) 65 (Ont. C.A.), Mr. Justice Morden, speaking for the Ontario Court of Appeal, made the distinction between an ordinary trust and a bare trust. He reproduced the following passages from Scott, The Law of Trusts, 4th ed. (1987):

. . .

A person may be both agent of and trustee for another. If he undertakes to act on behalf of the other and subject to his control he is an agent; but if he is vested with the title to property that he holds for his principal, he is also a trustee. In such a case, however, it is the agency relation that predominates, and the principles of agency, rather than the principles of trust, are applicable [Vol. 1, p. 95].

[38] Mr. Justice Morden also quoted with approval from an article by M.C. Cullity, "Liability of Beneficiaries - A Rejoinder", (1985-86), 7 Estates & Trusts Quarterly 35, at p. 36:

It is quite clear that in many situations trustees will also be agents. This occurs, for example, in the familiar case of investments held by an investment dealer as nominee or in the case of land held by a nominee corporation. In such cases, the trust relationship that arises by virtue of the separation of legal and equitable ownership is often described as a bare trust and for tax and some other purposes it is quite understandably ignored.

The distinguishing characteristic of the bare trust is that the trustee has no independent powers, discretions or responsibilities. His only responsibility is to carry out the instructions of his principals --- the beneficiaries. If he does not have to accept instructions, if he has any significant independent powers or responsibilities, he is not a bare trustee.^[7]

[29] For the Appellant's theory of the case to stand up, the transfers (and any subsequent purchases) of property must have resulted in legal ownership in bare trust by the corporations. Any further activity undertaken by the corporations with the properties held in bare trust would need to be conducted as agents of their principal, the Appellant.

[30] A transfer of property for no consideration generally results in a rebuttable presumption of a resulting trust. The transferee is obligated to prove the transferor's intent to make a gift in order to rebut the presumption that the property is merely being held in trust for the transferor. As stated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Pecore:

A resulting trust arises when title to property is in one party's name, but that party, because he or she is a fiduciary or gave no value for the property, is under an obligation to return it to the original title owner: see D.W.M. Waters, M.R. Gillen and L.D. Smith, eds., Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada (3rd ed. 2005), at p. 362. . .

24. The presumption of resulting trust is a rebuttable presumption of law and general rule that applies to gratuitous transfers. When a transfer is challenged, the presumption allocates the legal burden of proof. Thus, where a transfer is made for no consideration, the onus is placed on the transferee to demonstrate that a gift was intended: see Waters' Law of Trusts, at p. 375, and E. E. Gillese and M. Milczynski, The Law of Trusts (2nd ed. 2005), at p. 110. This is so because equity presumes bargains, not gifts.[8]

[31] While in Pecore, the Supreme Court went on to evaluate the appropriate burden of proof that the transferee must meet in order to show the transferor's intent to gift, such considerations are not relevant in this case. The Appellant denies having had the requisite intent to transfer the property gratuitously, and as she was the majority shareholder of the transferee, it would lie with her to rebut the presumption that, having received the properties by way of gratuitous transfers, the corporation held those properties in resulting trust.

[32] Further, a gift will not be valid unless the donor's intention to gift was absolutely unambiguous:

Inter vivos gifts are gifts from one living person to another living person, literally between the living. Inter vivos gifts can be oral or by deed.

(a) – Oral

The intention to gift must be unequivocal. If a donor's words or actions are equivocal or consistent with a possible intention to give or not to give, the courts will not infer a gift. The difference between a complete and an incomplete gift often turns on the use of specific words (Jones v. Lock (1865), LR 1 Ch App 25).

Delivery is not merely evidence of a gift being made. Courts demand full transfer of possession to complete an oral gift. The donor must put the good out of his control. . . .

(b) –By Deed

To make a gift by deed, the donor must deliver to the donee a sealed instrument in writing that states the intention to give and the subject of the gift. The seal is needed to corroborate the intent in the written document. The sealed instrument must be delivered out of the possession of the donor. It is now less clear how formal the instrument needs to be. While a sealed instrument many no longer be required, there must still be sufficient formality to corroborate an informed and considered intention to gift.[9]

[33] As the Land Titles Registry's transfer documents are deeds, it might be argued that no consideration was required when such deeds were used to transfer real property to DSD. Such an argument was considered and rejected by the Supreme Court of Canada in Niles v. Lake, [1947] S.C.R. 291, [1947] S.C.J. No. 13 (QL):

. . . the mere fact of the document in question being under seal does not prevent the appellants from showing that there was no consideration. That, they have done, and the resulting trust follows.[10]

[34] In the present case, the evidence suggests that there was no meeting of the minds with regard to forming a valid contract between the Appellant and the corporations. As submitted by the Appellant:

A contract can only arise if there is the animus contrahendi between the parties. With the expressed or implicit intention that a contract should emerge as a result of the language or conduct of the alleged parties, no contractual obligations can be said to exist and be capable of enforcement.[11]

[35] The resulting trust doctrine should apply to all the properties transferred in this case. All transfers of business assets and interests to the corporation were done gratuitously. There is no evidence to indicate an intention to gift. Further, as outlined below, the conduct of the Appellant and the corporations over the three-year period does not indicate an intention to transfer property to the corporation. Instead, an implied agent-principal relationship is indicated, with the Appellant always maintaining beneficial ownership of the properties and businesses.

[36] The Appellant contends that although there was no written agreement, the agency relationship between her, the alleged principal, and the three corporations, her alleged agents, is implied by their behaviour during the taxation years at issue. The Federal Court of Appeal explored the meaning of the term "agency", and how an agency relationship arises, in Kinguk Travel Inc. v. Canada:^[12]

The term agency has been defined as:

"... a fiduciary relationship which exists between two persons, one of whom expressly or impliedly consents that the other should act on his behalf so as to affect his relations with third parties, and the other of whom similarly consents so to act or so acts." (Bowstead & Reynolds on Agency (17th edition, Sweet & Maxwell 2001)).

In Royal Securities Corp. Ltd. v. Montreal Trust Co. et. al 59 D.L.R. (2d) 666, Gale C.J.H.C. identified the essential ingredients of an agency relationship as follows:

1. The consent of both the principal and the agent;
2. Authority given to the agent by the principal, allowing the former to affect the latter's legal position;
3. The principal's control of the agent's actions.

In reality, points 2 and 3 are often overlapping, as the principal's control over the actions of his agent is manifested in the authority given to the agent.^[13]

[37] Bowstead and Reynolds on Agency explains that an agency relationship can emerge in the following ways:

(1) The relationship of principal and agent may be constituted –

- (a) by agreement, whether contractual or not, between principal and agent, which may be express, or implied from the conduct or situation of the parties;
- (b) retrospectively, by subsequent ratification by the principal of acts done on his behalf.^[14]

[Emphasis added.]

[38] The Respondent submits that the Appellant is trying to retroactively recharacterize her business transactions and calls her credibility into question, insisting that she is a capable and educated woman who chose whatever form was most convenient at various times. The Respondent argues that the Court should not now allow her to pick beneficial ownership with an agency relationship as the current most convenient choice because it avoids the adverse tax consequences she is facing. Counsel includes in his case law authorities that refer to the frequently cited passage in the Federal Court of Appeal's decision, in The Queen v. Friedberg, 92 OTC 6031 at page 6032, [1991] F.C.J. No. 1255 (QL), regarding the importance of form in tax matters:

In tax law, form matters. A mere subjective intention, here as elsewhere in the tax field, is not by itself sufficient to alter the characterization of a transaction for tax purposes. If a taxpayer arranges his affairs in certain formal ways, enormous tax advantages can be obtained, even though the main reason for these arrangements may be to save tax (see The Queen v. Irving Oil 91 DTC 5106, per Mahoney, J.A.). If a taxpayer fails to take the correct formal steps, however, tax may have to be paid. If this were not so, Revenue Canada and the courts would be engaged in endless exercises to determine the true intentions behind certain transactions. Taxpayers and the Crown would seek to restructure dealings after the fact so as to take advantage of the tax law or to make taxpayers pay tax that they might otherwise not have to pay. While evidence of intention may be used by the Courts on occasion to clarify dealings, it is rarely determinative. In sum, evidence of subjective intention cannot be used to 'correct' documents which clearly point in a particular direction.

[39] The Respondent argues further that the Appellant is calling upon the Court to lift the corporate veil. As one of the Respondent's own submitted authorities notes, however, the courts have accepted agency as a suitable reason to characterize the relationship between a corporation and another entity by its substantive nature:

The third basis on which courts have purported to disregard separate corporate personality is by finding that the corporation is merely acting as the agent of someone else, usually the controlling shareholder that is, itself, a corporation. Conceptually, the corporate form is not disregarded by a holding that it is an agent. Rather, the business of the corporation or whatever activity gives rise to the claim by a third party is determined to be carried on not by the corporation directly but only as an agent of the controlling shareholder.[15]

There is no general bar to seeking to determine whether the corporations were indeed agents of the Appellant. As will be seen below, however, the test for finding an agency relationship in the absence of a written agreement is restrictive; it requires evidence of the necessary conduct.

[40] In Denison Mines Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [16] Cattanach J. analyzed an argument that a subsidiary corporation was merely the agent of its parent company, which held all of the subsidiary's shares:

Briefly the appellant's position is that the business of Con-Ell was in reality the business of the appellant and in contradistinction thereof the position of the Minister rests on the Salomon case (Salomon v. A. Salomon & Co. Ltd. [1897] A.C. 22) that there are two separate legal entities and the losses of one are not the losses of the other.

It is well settled that the mere fact that a person holds all the shares in a company does not make the business carried out by that company the shareholder's business, nor does it make that company the shareholder's agent for carrying on the business. However it is conceivable that there may be an arrangement between the shareholder and the company which will constitute the company the shareholder's agent for the purpose of carrying on the business and so make the business that of the shareholder.

It is immaterial that the shareholder is itself a limited company.[17]

[41] More recently, a corporation's ability to act as its shareholder's agent was acknowledged without question by Paris J. of the Tax Court of Canada in Avotus Corp. v. The Queen. Paris J. cited Denison Mines in support of the following assertion:

It is established in the case law that there is no bar to a corporation acting as agent for its shareholder. In Denison Mines (supra) Cattanach J. noted at page 5388:

. . . it is conceivable that there may be an arrangement between the shareholder and the company which will constitute the company, the shareholder's agent, for the purpose of carrying on the business and so make the business that of the shareholder.

It is immaterial that the shareholder is itself a limited company.[18]

[42] It is established, then, that corporations can act as agents, and this concept is not repugnant to the rule that corporations have separate legal personality a matter addressed in the oft-cited Salomon case.

[43] In the present case, in the absence of a written agreement expressing the clear intent to establish an agency relationship, what is the evidence required in order to support the Appellant's claim? In Avotus, there was a written agreement between the principal and the agent, although it had been drafted and signed in 1996 and the agent-principal relationship had actually begun in 1994.[19] Regardless of the timing of the agreement, Paris J. concluded that its existence was the deciding consideration:

In Denison Mines (supra) there was no express contract of agency between the taxpayer and its subsidiary corporation, and the court declined to find that there was an implied contract of agency between them. By contrast, in this case the Appellant and Americas entered into a written agency agreement.

...

... It is only in the absence of a written agreement that the conduct of the parties must be examined for the purpose of determining whether an agency agreement may be implied.[20]

[44] Here, given the absence of a written agreement, the Court needs to closely examine the conduct of the parties to determine whether there was an implied intention to create an agency relationship, as described by G.H.L. Fridman in Canadian Agency Law:

... To arrive at the conclusion that there was an agency involves an intricate analysis of the facts to elucidate the correct nature of the relationship between the parties ...

... the agency relationship may be impliedly created by the conduct of the parties, without anything having been expressly agreed as to terms of employment, remuneration, etc. The assent of the agent may be implied from the fact that he has acted intentionally on another's behalf. In general, however, it will be the assent of the principal which is more likely to be implied, for except in certain cases, "it is only by the will of the employer that any agency may be created."

...

Mere silence will be insufficient. There must be some course of conduct to indicate the acceptance of the agency relationship. The effect of such an implication is to put the parties in the same position as if the agency had been expressly created.[21]

[45] Here, a key consideration in reviewing the conduct of the alleged principal (the Appellant) and her agents will be determining the level of control the Appellant exerted over the corporations:

... It is important that the alleged agent be under the control of the alleged principal.

In the language of the court in 2000 in Advanced Glazing Systems Inc. v. Frydenland.

"The greater the power of control over the agent/trustee, the greater the likelihood that the principles of agency ... are applicable." [22]

[46] The Appellant in this case had full control over every action of the corporations. Indeed, the corporations could not act without her; even if the minority shareholders became active, the Appellant would remain the controlling party. The mere fact that she had such control, however, is not sufficient for a finding of an agent-principal relationship, otherwise many privately controlled corporations could be characterized as the agents of their majority shareholders. What, then, is the actual test to apply in determining whether an agency relationship existed?

[47] In Otineka Development Corporation Limited et al. v. The Queen,[23] the Tax Court of Canada emphasized the need for a high threshold of evidence for a finding that a corporation was actually acting as an agent:

... Where a corporation holds itself out to third parties as owning its property and business, keeps separate financial records, files its own corporate income tax returns and acts like any other corporation that is independent of its shareholders, it would require extremely cogent evidence to establish that all along it was really just an agent or trustee for its shareholders on the basis of an unwritten oral understanding or assumption on the part of some of the shareholders or directors.[24]

[48] Here, DSD and SJC also each held itself out to third parties as owning its property and business, but only in limited instances. DSD held title to certain real property, but, as previously discussed, the properties were held in resulting (bare) trust as they were acquired through gratuitous transfers. Beginning in 2005, DSD carried all mortgages on the properties. In 2003 and 2004, however, after DSD's incorporation, the mortgages had remained in the Appellant's name. There is no evidence that the Appellant transferred the mortgages to DSD's name in 2005 to minimize risk, rather, she continued to be the guarantor for all the mortgages, and all payments on the mortgages came out of her personal accounts. In certain limited circumstances, SJC did contract with third parties, concluding rental agreements with tenants, for example; it also handled some correspondence with tenants. SJC was found, however, in the CRA audit, to be doing essentially nothing as a corporation.

[49] Neither SJC nor DSD kept separate financial records, although it appears that the Appellant did her best, using her financial spreadsheets, to track general income and expenses. All of SJC and DSD's transactions went through the Appellant's personal accounts. While SJC's name was used on letters and contracts with tenants, rent cheques were made out to Ms. Fourney, and she was shown as the landlord on documents filed with the Office of the Rentalsman.

[50] Both DSD and SJC filed corporate tax returns, however, the Appellant reported and claimed income and expenses that were the same as or similar to those claimed by the corporations. The reporting and claiming by the Appellant personally implies an intention to act as a principal, with the corporations being mere agents and bare trustees. The Appellant's credibility is strong in this case; the accountant did not demonstrate adequate and reasonable care or professional skill when he prepared corporate returns without being able to trace any of the assets in the corporations. The double-claiming by the Appellant was not intentional and the reporting of income and claiming of expenses on the corporate returns should not be taken as evidence against an agency relationship when the Appellant's claiming of the same expenses personally provides evidence of exactly the contrary.^[25]

[51] The Appellant testified that she adopted the strategy of transferring the properties to DSD in order to achieve her goal of hiding her assets from her brother. She testified that she set up the corporate structure to make it more difficult for her brother to discover what properties she owned. According to the Appellant, her brother, accustomed to managing and operating a farm, placed an inordinately high value on land. The Appellant alleges that her brother was bitter that the Appellant had stood with her mother in the latter's attempt to have her son honour his commitment to paying the debt he owed her. That debt originated from the sale to him of the family dairy farm after the Appellant's father had died. According to the Appellant, her brother stopped paying her mother because he decided unilaterally that he had paid her enough. The Appellant's concern about protecting against a possible litigation risk turned out, with hindsight, to be ill-founded. Her mother's claim was upheld by the courts, thanks in large part to the considerable assistance of the Appellant.

[52] The evidence reveals that the Appellant did not have a panoply of structures to choose among to achieve her alleged objectives. She could transfer the properties outright to DSD in exchange for less liquid shares. The beneficial and legal ownership of the properties would then reside with DSD. That is the Respondent's theory of what the Appellant in fact did. The evidence presented by the Appellant does not allow me to share this view.

[53] The other course of action was for the Appellant to transfer only registered title to DSD. DSD would hold the properties as bare trustee and would be constituted as the Appellant's agent in dealing with those properties. The Appellant could also choose not to disclose the agency agreement to third parties. This is often done for real estate transactions. Disclosure of the verbal agreement would in fact defeat the purpose of that agreement.

[54] The Appellant, in my opinion, has established that such an arrangement is what she intended, implemented, and caused the corporations to carry out on her behalf. Undoubtedly, it would have been much simpler had the Appellant caused a bare trust and agency agreement to be drawn up. She did not, and she has paid a very heavy price, including having her life turned upside down by an audit, an assessment and these appeals, all at considerable cost to her.

[55] The empowering of DSD to act on the Appellant's behalf is confirmed by numerous factors. While the bare trust and agency relationship was not totally disclosed to the lessees and suppliers of DSD, the wary certainly had reasons to believe that this relationship existed. For example, the evidence reveals that the rental cheques were made payable to the Appellant. The invoices for repairs and renovations were addressed to the Appellant. It was the Appellant who advertised the rental properties, collected the rent cheques, cleaned the properties and was listed as the landlord with the Office of the Rentalsman. The Respondent actually acknowledges that SJC did nothing.

[56] As noted earlier, the Appellant's troubles originate from the fact that both she and the corporations reported the same revenue and expenses. This led to a duplication of the claims for losses. Mr. Chambers, the person who prepared the corporations' tax returns, made a number of startling revelations during his testimony, which explains in part how this occurred. The evidence shows that there was an absence of effective communication between the Appellant and Mr. Chambers. For example, he admitted that the Appellant was presented with copies of the corporations' 2003 and 2004 tax returns much later, after they had been electronically filed. Those returns are not comprehensible to anyone other than a person who has memorized the line codes opposite which the tax information appears. The codes correspond to an electronic coding of the information, and this coding is known only to the most skilled tax compliance professional. A taxpayer, or a tax lawyer for that matter, cannot determine what the codes mean unless they have access to a detailed coding manual which explains their meaning. The CRA officer appearing for the Respondent admitted that CRA personnel receive specialized training to enable them to understand electronically-filed tax returns. On reviewing the returns at issue, the Appellant had no way of knowing that Mr. Chambers claimed the same losses as she had claimed on her personal tax return. [57] The most startling revelation made by Mr. Chambers is his admission that he completed and filed the tax returns without understanding how DSD acquired the properties. If the Appellant had intended to transfer the properties on a tax-deferred basis, she would have had to file an election under section 85 of the Act assuming all the preconditions had been met. Generally speaking, because the Appellant had accrued gains, she would have filed, if properly advised, a section 85 rollover election. The present value of the tax payable will always exceed the present value of the future depreciation expense. This is due to the fact that the depreciation rate is low, meaning that the future tax savings have a low present value. The Appellant did not file an election because, as the evidence shows, she intended to retain beneficial ownership. In her mind, no taxable disposition occurred. On a related-party transfer of property, a professional completing tax returns will ask to see the transfer agreement in order to discern whether the transfer qualifies for a tax-free rollover or not. I note that the Appellant's two sons were given shares in the bare trust corporation. If a true disposition had occurred and there had existed an element of gift in the form of a shifting of some of the value of the transferred properties to the shares of the Appellant's sons part of the transfer could be taxable. On the other hand, if, as Mr. Chambers admitted, he learned later that a section 85 rollover election had not been filed, he needed to know the fair market value of each property in order to determine the undepreciated capital cost (UCC) balance for DSD. Under the technical rules of the Act, only one-half of the accrued gain is added to the UCC balance to match the taxation on one-half in the hands of the transferor. In this case, the UCC balance is equal to the sum of the cost of the property to the transferor and one-half of the gain.

[58] A few basic questions on Mr. Chambers' part could have clarified the situation. He could have asked, for example: Where is the purchase and sale agreement? What was the consideration that was paid? Do you realize that the sale could be construed as taxable unless you document your retention of beneficial ownership? Are you aware that you will realize a taxable capital gain, which will exceed the net present value of the future tax savings from the depreciation expenses if the transaction is found to be taxable? He could have said: I need to know the foregoing to establish the UCC balance, if any, of the properties. The confusion was compounded by the fact that the electronic returns were filed twice, long before the Appellant received copies. Had Mr. Chambers done as indicated above, these matters could have been cleared up without an audit and resulting reassessments.

[59] The Appellant testified that she felt comfortable using off-the-shelf tax software to complete her personal tax returns as she had done in the past. She was, in her words, terrified by the complexity of the tax software used to prepare electronically-filed tax returns. This is understandable as it takes a great deal of sophistication to convert financial information into the tax information required in the returns. She turned to Mr. Chambers for this service. Mistakes were made but the evidence shows that it was not the Appellant who wrongly claimed the expenses, as alleged by the Respondent. It was DSD and the other corporations that did so in the returns prepared and filed by Mr. Chambers. The basis for the Respondent's claim of tax, interest and penalties against the Appellant is that the Appellant failed to report the gains from the transfers and claimed losses to which she was not entitled. With regard to DSD and SJC, the evidence clearly shows that she was entitled to do so.

[60] Learning Boost held itself out to third parties as a separate legal entity in more ways than DSD and SJC. Learning Boost did have its own bank account and did prepare financial statements every year. The Appellant however, took care of every aspect of Learning Boost's activities except the work performed by the hired tutors. She collected payments from students, took care of all advertising, and designed the Learning Boost logo. The Appellant personally took on the risk when she contracted in her own name to renovate her home for Learning Boost's office. Unlike the procedure followed for SJC, however, payments for tutorial services were made to Learning Boost and not the Appellant. Contracts with tutors were made between the tutors and Learning Boost, as were confidentiality agreements. Learning Boost had a business number and a business licence, and issued T4s under its own name. The tutorial company maintained its own phone number and Web site. Still, the Appellant continued to claim Learning Boost's income and expenses in her personal returns.

[61] The mere maintenance of a separate bank account and careful attention to budgeting for a business endeavour do not necessarily mean that such an endeavour (here, Learning Boost) is not an agent, but the number of instances of the corporation holding itself out to third parties as a separate legal entity does weaken the appearance of an implied agency relationship (in this case, with the Appellant). I believe that other tests regarding agent-principal relationships and beneficial ownership can guide me in my decision on the status of Learning Boost.

[62] J. Anthony VanDuzer in The Law of Partnerships and Corporations, tells us that the test for whether an agency relationship exists is as follows:

. . . The factors referred to in Smith, Stone and Knight Ltd. v. Birmingham Corp. are almost universally cited as those relevant to a determination whether agency exists:

- Were the profits treated as profits of the shareholder?
- Was the person conducting the business appointed by the shareholder?
- Was the shareholder the head and brain of the trading venture?
- Did the shareholder govern the adventure and decide what should be done and what capital should be committed to the venture?
- Did the shareholder make the profits by its skill and direction?
- Was the shareholder in effectual and constant control?[26]

[63] All three corporations herein can answer each of the above questions in the affirmative. The Appellant had total control of these corporations and there is no evidence of any restraints by the minority shareholders or anyone else on her discretion to guide the business, commit (her own) capital to that business, choose what to do with profits, and so on. Still, VanDuzer goes on to stress that the mere presence of the above factors is not sufficient:

Extensive and even complete control by a single person, however, is contemplated in the CBCA, so the existence of control satisfying the test in Smith cannot in any way be conclusive. . . .

. . .

There is nothing in any corporate statute which suggests that any particular degree of control is inappropriate or prohibited. In Alberta Gas Ethylene Co. v. M.N.R., Madame Justice Reed observed that Smith does not stand for the proposition that one must ignore the separate existence of a subsidiary corporation when the six criteria are met. One must ask for what purpose the corporation was incorporated and used, and consider the overall context in which the obligation to the third party arose.[27]

[64] Rip A.C.J. (as he was then) undertook in Prévost Car Inc. v. The Queen[28] a detailed analysis of the meaning of "beneficial owner" in Canadian common law, as that term was undefined in the agreement in question in that case. He concluded that an agency relationship in which the principal retains beneficial ownership can only exist in narrow circumstances that meet very specific criteria:

. . .

When the Supreme Court in Jodrey stated that the "beneficial owner" is one who can "ultimately" exercise the rights of ownership in the property, I am confident that the Court did not mean, in using the word "ultimately", to strip away the corporate veil so that the shareholders of a corporation are the beneficial owners of its assets, including income earned by the corporation. The word "ultimately" refers to the recipient of the dividend who is the true owner of the dividend, a person who could do with the dividend what he or she desires. It is the true owner of property who is the beneficial owner of the property. Where an agency or mandate exists or the property is in the name of a nominee, one looks to find on whose behalf the agent or mandatary is acting or for whom the nominee has lent his or her name. When corporate entities are concerned, one does not pierce the corporate veil unless the corporation is a conduit for another person and has absolutely no discretion as to the use or application of funds put through it as conduit, or has agreed to act on someone else's behalf pursuant to that person's instructions without any right to do other than what that person instructs it, for example, a stockbroker who is the registered owner of the shares it holds for clients. . . . [29]

[65] This is such a case: all three corporations could be characterized as mere conduits for the Appellant. They had no ability to act on their own; there is no evidence of minute books or annual meetings; the corporations had neither the discretion nor any right to use any income earned through them; they could indeed be described as mere conduits or agents of the Appellant.

[66] In Larose v. Minister of National Revenue, [30] this Court describes as follows the beneficial ownership test: "A property is deemed to be beneficially owned when one person possesses the three attributes of the ownership of property (usus, fructus, abusus). . . ." [31] In Smedley v. The Queen, [32] the Tax Court of Canada reiterated that ". . . the test for beneficial ownership is the date at which the party has acquired the indicia of ownership, those being risk, use and possession." [33] With respect to DSD and SJC, the Appellant clearly meets this test, as she takes on all the risk personally, using all the business assets herself and having possession of them. Only the case of Learning Boost raises some doubt in that the Appellant took risks in terms of her investment in home renovations for teaching space, but at the same time reduced her risk by using the corporate name to contract with third parties, including the tutors, in some contexts.

[67] In the specific case of Learning Boost, although it is not perfect, the evidence establishes on a balance of probabilities that Learning Boost was also acting as a bare nominee and agent of the Appellant. Indications of such a relationship include the following:

- (a) The Appellant created the television and print advertisements for Learning Boost.
- (b) The Appellant designed and created the Learning Boost logo.
- (c) The Appellant collected the fees from Learning Boost students.
- (d) The Appellant converted her single-car garage into a "Learning Boost Office".
- (e) The Appellant personally contracted with tradespeople to effect renovations to the Learning Boost teaching space.
- (f) The Appellant travelled to the students' homes to sign contracts and assist with tutoring.
- (g) The Appellant hired tutors to work with Learning Boost students.
- (h) The Appellant used personal funds during the tax years in question to cover operating expenses for the Learning Boost business.

VI. PENALTIES

Appellant's Position

[68] In the Appellant's view, gross negligence penalties should not be imposed in this case for the following reasons:

- Given the manner in which the Respondent worded her pleading, which cannot be changed without affecting the fairness of the trial, gross negligence penalties can only be imposed if the Appellant's agency claim fails. Any references to double-claiming by the Appellant of some of the expenses, if such references are not found in the Respondent's pleading, cannot be considered now, as the Respondent has no right to appeal her own assessment. This issue is different than the double-claiming issue raised by the Respondent to support the assessments. The issue raised in the pleading concerns the double-claiming by the corporations and the Appellant of the same expenses. At trial, the Respondent brought up the fact that the Appellant claimed some of the same expenses twice in her tax returns. This is a matter not covered by the assessments issued against the Appellant and was raised for the first time at trial. As a result, this matter did not form part of the basis of the assessment of gross negligence penalties against the Appellant.

- The burden of proof lies with the Respondent, who failed to establish the evidentiary grounds for gross negligence, having never provided the penalty calculation despite the Appellant's request and the CRA's undertaking during examination for discovery to provide the relevant documents.
- The Respondent has not proven that the Appellant had the necessary intent justifying the assessment of such penalties.
- Despite the reference to such a test in the Respondent's reply to the notice of appeal, the gross negligence penalty provisions in subsection 163(2) of the Act and section 285 of the Excise Tax Act (the "ETA") do not impose an "ought to have known" test. Rather, the phrase used is "knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence".
- The Respondent has in no way proven that the Appellant knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, made false statements or omissions in her returns. The Appellant has no formal education in taxation or accounting, but she kept detailed books and records and shared that information with her accountant on the assumption that she was obtaining qualified professional assistance that would ensure that she was meeting her tax obligations.
- Although the Appellant had experienced two previous audits, they related to different issues and were prior to the incorporations.
- The Appellant never had the opportunity to review her 2004 and 2005 corporate returns before they were e-filed. While she did see the 2003 return, the Appellant did not have the requisite skill to understand the corporate returns, a claim supported by the CRA appeals officer's concession that the corporate returns require special training in order for a person to be able to read and understand them.
- Even without the double-claiming, the Appellant's returns for the years in question would still show her to be in a loss position.

Respondent's Position

[69] Gross negligence penalties should be imposed, the Respondent having proven the existence of multiple grounds for doing so, namely:

- (a) "Ms. Fourney has recklessly disregarded her legal obligations with respect to personal and corporate taxation. The evidence supports a finding that Ms. Fourney chose to do whatever seemed to work for her, regardless of whether or not it conformed to the requirements of the Income Tax Act or the Excise Tax Act." [34]
- (b) "Ms. Fourney's cross-examination disclosed errors in her personal tax returns and in the corporate tax returns of the incorporated Appellants, almost too numerous to mention. . . . The problem of errors in the various personal and corporate tax returns was pointed out to Ms. Fourney at the audit and appeals stages; there is no ambush." [35]
- (c) The Appellant was previously audited for issues relating to the capitalization of expense items and the non-reporting capital gains. [36]
- (d) The Appellant should have properly shared information with her accountant. [37]
- (e) Mr. Chambers, the accountant, testified that once he noted the double-claiming, he informed the Appellant in 2005 that she needed to amend her personal return. [38]
- (f) As a person who had been in business since 1994, the Appellant should have taken steps to inform herself to a greater degree about tax accounting matters.[39]

(g) The large number of errors in the Appellant's returns shows that her bookkeeping system was clearly inadequate.[40]

The amounts involved are substantial. With respect to DSD, the unreported income is substantial in relation to the reported net income for 2003, 2004, and 2005. With respect to Learning Boost, it is evident that the losses claimed are substantial in relation to the income reported for 2003 and 2004. With respect to Ms. Fourney, it is evident that the business losses claimed with regard to the business activities of DSD, SJC and Learning Boost are substantial. As regards SJC's GST matters, the amounts involved are substantial in relation to the total amounts reported and claimed.

Penalties Analysis

[70] It is abundantly clear from the reply to the notice of appeal, that it was the Minister's position that penalties should apply to the Appellant if and only if this Court were to find that both beneficial and legal ownership of the properties was transferred to the corporations and that the corporations were not appointed agents of the Appellant for the purposes of dealing with the transferred properties and operating the businesses on her behalf. In this regard, the reply frames the issues as follows:

The issues are:

- a) whether Shirley Fourney was the beneficial owner and operator of the assets and activities of DSD, SJC and Learning Boost in 2003, 2004 and 2005;
- b) if Shirley Fourney was not the beneficial owner and operator of the assets and activities of DSD, SJC and Learning Boost in 2003, 2004 and 2005, whether the Minister properly assessed the appellant to:
 - i) increase rental income by $3,824.57 in 2003 and reduce rental income by $11,151.67 in 2004;
 - ii) add business income of $146,335 in 2003, $136,071.80 in 2004 and $49,215.28 in 2005;
 - iii) include shareholder benefits of $10,800 in each of the 2003, 2004 and 2005 taxation years;
 - iv) include taxable capital gains of $8,710.76 in 2003 and $26,412.33 in 2004 in respect of the disposition of properties; and
 - v) include penalties pursuant to subsection 163(2) of the Act in respect of the appellant's 2003, 2004 and 2005 taxation years.

The Respondent's counsel attempted to put forward a different position at trial, which met with strenuous objections from the Appellant's counsel. The Respondent invited me to consider the fact that the Appellant admittedly double-claimed some expenses in 2003 and 2004 tax returns. This Court has stated in the past that taxpayers generally have the right to rely on the issues being as framed by the Respondent in her reply. While leave may be granted to amend the reply, the discretion to do so is generally not exercised once the trial has begun. In any event, I note that the Respondent did not move to have her reply amended but raised the issue in argument. The purpose of the above-stated position of the Court with regard to the issues is to avoid trial by ambush and preserve the parties' right to properly prepare for trial. More generally, the Respondent's claim for penalties should be dismissed either way because the Respondent failed, for detailed reasons stated below, to establish on a balance of probabilities that the conditions giving rise to the assessment of penalties have been met.

[71] Subsection 163(2) of the Act describes the standard for imposing gross negligence penalties:

False statements or omissions

163(2) Every person who, knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, has made or has participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of, a false statement or omission in a return, form, certificate, statement or answer (in this section referred to as a "return") filed or made in respect of a taxation year for the purposes of this Act, is liable to a penalty of the greater of $100 and 50% of the total of. . . .

The subsection uses the word "knowingly" but not the phrase "ought to have known", which the Respondent uses in both her reply to the notice of appeal and her Additional Written Submissions.

[72] Section 285 of the ETA uses the same standard as the Act, again without the phrase “ought to have known”:

285. Every person who knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, makes or participates in, assents to or acquiesces in the making of a false statement or omission in a return, application, form, certificate, statement, invoice or answer (each of which is in this section referred to as a “return”) made in respect of a reporting period or transaction is liable to a penalty of the greater of $250 and 25% of the total of. . . .

[73] The standard referred to by the Respondent in her written submissions is wrong. Instead, the Appellant’s actions need to be reviewed on the basis of whether her false statements were made “knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence.” The case law provides a road map for applying this standard to the facts herein. First, the Federal Court of Appeal’s decision in Lacroix v. Canada,^[41] supports the Appellant’s position in the present case that the burden is on the Minister to prove that penalties should be imposed:

Although the Minister has the benefit of the assumptions of fact underlying the reassessment, he does not enjoy any similar advantage with regard to proving the facts justifying a reassessment beyond the statutory period, or those facts justifying the assessment of a penalty for the taxpayer’s misconduct in filing his tax return. The Minister is undeniably required to adduce facts justifying these exceptional measures. In Richard Boileau v. M.N.R., 89 D.T.C. 247, Judge Lamarre Proulx stated as follows, at page 250:

Indeed, the Appellant was unable to contradict the basic elements of the net worth assessments. However, in my view, this is not sufficient for discharging the burden of proof which lies on the Minister. To decide otherwise would be to remove any purpose to subsection 163(3) by reverting the Minister’s burden of proof back onto the Appellant.

In a similar vein, in Farm Business Consultants Inc. v. Her Majesty the Queen, [1994] 2 C.T.C. 2450, 95 D.T.C. 200, Judge Bowman wrote the following at paragraph 27:

27. A court must be extremely cautious in sanctioning the imposition of penalties under subsection 163(2). Conduct that warrants reopening a statute-barred year does not automatically justify a penalty and the routine imposition of penalties by the Minister is to be discouraged. . . .

Moreover, where a penalty is imposed under subsection 163(2) although a civil standard of proof is required, if a taxpayer’s conduct is consistent with two viable and reasonable hypotheses, one justifying the penalty and one not, the benefit of the doubt must be given to the taxpayer and the penalty must be deleted^[42]

[74] The Federal Court of Appeal, in Lacroix, went on to make a statement regarding the Minister’s burden that has since caused some confusion:

What, then, of the burden of proof on the Minister? How does he discharge this burden? There may be circumstances where the Minister would be able to show direct evidence of the taxpayer’s state of mind at the time the tax return was filed. However, in the vast majority of cases, the Minister will be limited to undermining the taxpayer’s credibility by either adducing evidence or cross-examining the taxpayer. Insofar as the Tax Court of Canada is satisfied that the taxpayer earned unreported income and did not provide a credible explanation for the discrepancy between his or her reported income and his or her net worth, the Minister has discharged the burden of proof on him within the meaning of subparagraph 152(4)(a)(i) and subsection 162(3).^[43]

[75] When reviewing the above passage in Dao v. The Queen,^[44] Campbell J. of the Tax Court of Canada found it confusing, that it made it unclear whether the Federal Court of Appeal was imposing a new standard for gross negligence penalties:

. . . With respect, the reasons of Pelletier J. in Lacroix v. The Queen, [2008] F.C.J. 1092, leave me bewildered and somewhat perplexed when I compare his analysis to the preceding cases in both the Tax Court and the Federal Court of Appeal. At paragraphs 30 to 32 of Lacroix, the two provisions are essentially lumped together and the same onus is imposed upon the Minister with respect to both provisions. The effect of this would be to remove the requirement for the element of mens rea and, consequently, establish circumstances that would allow penalties in many unsuccessful appeals. Where a taxpayer is accused of reckless and reprehensible conduct bordering on criminal behaviour for which he may be slammed with the punishment of gross negligence penalties, the Minister under subsection 163(2) has a duty to justify its decision which will not be satisfied merely, as Lacroix suggests, by showing that the taxpayer has unreported income but could not provide a credible explanation.^[45]

[76] I do not believe that the decision of Pelletier J.A. in Lacroix constitutes a departure from the principles enunciated in previous case law, as suggested by my colleague in Dao. Pelletier J.A.'s comments must be considered in light of the nature of the appeal he was dealing with. Mr. Lacroix was reassessed on the basis of the findings of a net worth assessment. The trial judge found that the appellant in that case had no explanation for the large discrepancy between his reported income and his significantly greater net worth. I understand Pelletier J.A.'s comment to mean that a trial judge can draw a reasonable inference from the evidence presented by the Respondent. If no reasonable explanations are given to explain the discrepancy, a trial judge can draw the inference that the taxpayer was grossly negligent in failing to report his or her income. I caution, however, that the inference must be reasonable and further, that the evidence must not allow for a different explanation. If it does, then the Minister must establish on a balance of probabilities that this explanation is untrue.

[77] Because subsection 163(2) is penal in nature, it calls for a higher degree of culpability and must be applied only where the evidence clearly justifies so doing. If the evidence creates any doubt that it should be applied in the circumstances of the appeal, then the only fair conclusion is that the taxpayer must receive the benefit of that doubt in those circumstances. In Farm Business Consultants Inc. v. The Queen, 95 DTC 200, a decision which was upheld by the Federal Court of Appeal (96 DTC 6085), at pages 205 to 206, Judge Bowman (as he was then), stated:

A court must be extremely cautious in sanctioning the imposition of penalties under subsection 163(2). Conduct that warrants reopening a statute-barred year does not automatically justify a penalty and the routine imposition of penalties by the Minister is to be discouraged Moreover, where a penalty is imposed under subsection 163(2) although a civil standard of proof is required, if a taxpayer's conduct is consistent with two viable and reasonable hypotheses, one justifying the penalty and one not, the benefit of the doubt must be given to the taxpayer and the penalty must be deleted . .

[78] An extensive body of case law refers to the need for evidence of intent or recklessness on the part of an appellant in order for gross negligence penalties to be imposed. Here, no such evidence has been provided. The Appellant sought professional accounting assistance to complete her tax returns. Mr. Chambers provided no plausible explanation showing how he could have acted with reasonable care as an accountant without having had with the Appellant a conversation about the tax consequences of transferring properties to the corporations, about the need to trace the corporate assets, and about the Appellant's intentions regarding the reporting of income and claiming of expenses personally or through the corporations. Mr. Chambers' testimony that he noticed the double-claiming in 2005 and that he told the Appellant to amend her returns at that time lacks credibility considering the general lack of care that he displayed. In any event, it was by then much too late for the returns that had already been filed. Finally, his advice was inconsistent with the factual reality that the Appellant transferred only the legal title to the properties to the corporations that acted as her exclusive agents in connection with those properties and the business.

[79] The evidence shows that the Appellant strived to become self-reliant in building her rental property business from scratch and launching Learning Boost following her retirement as a teacher. As a single mother she wanted a better life for her two sons and herself. Rental businesses are not high-profit activities. To be successful, one cannot afford to outsource all services to outside professionals. It is obvious that the Appellant went one step too far in trying to become self-reliant with respect to her tax compliance obligations. She believed that she had mastered the use of the personal tax preparation software, when in fact she had not. Undoubtedly, she has learned from this unpleasant and costly experience. The double-claiming of expenses on her personal returns was attributable to the fact that she did not understand that she had to enter the information under either the rental property section or business section of the software, but not both, as this would lead to a duplication of her declared losses. She incorporated Learning Boost on her own to save costs. She completed the real estate transfer documentation on her own, not fully appreciating that she could have succeeded in implementing her plan by using a written bare trust and agency agreement. She had the judgment not to tackle the preparation of the electronic tax returns of DSD, SJC and Learning Boost herself because she realized that she would be out of her depth. She hired Mr. Chambers for this purpose. Rather than sitting down and gauging the Appellant's true intent, Mr. Chambers filed the returns without taking stock of the situation. It is clear that the Appellant recognizes that she needs help in meeting her tax compliance obligations. Nonetheless, the Appellant should be applauded for having succeeded in building two businesses and should not be punished for honest mistakes that clearly, in light of the evidence, do not constitute grossly negligent behaviour. In any event, the evidence shows that the Appellant retained beneficial ownership of the properties and businesses, meaning that the Respondent has failed to prove that the Appellant wrongly claimed the expenses at issue in these appeals.

[80] It is clear that the Appellant lacks basic knowledge of accounting and tax matters. Her numerous errors in her tax returns point to her lack of skill in these areas. In a self-assessing tax system, however, gross negligence penalties are not imposed for mere mistakes by a taxpayer who lacked the intention to misstate or omit. Further, the case law establishes that if there is any doubt about intent, the benefit of that doubt should go to the taxpayer since the penalty provision in question is penal in nature. The same reasoning applies to the penalties assessed against the corporate appellants under the Act.

[81] The Minister also reassessed SJC with respect to input tax credits (ITCs) claimed on taxable supplies. The evidence shows that the properties and businesses belonged to the Appellant. For these reasons, SJC was not entitled to claim ITCs and the reassessments should stand.

VI. CONCLUSIONS

[82] The Appellant's beneficial ownership claim succeeds for the reasons set out above. The resulting trust doctrine applies to all the properties transferred in this case; the corporations merely had legal ownership of property transferred gratuitously in circumstances where there was no evidence of an intention to gift. An assessment of the conduct of the Appellant and the corporations over the three-year period indicates an implied agency relationship. The Appellant always was the owner of the assets and businesses registered in the name of the corporations.

Spousal Trusts.

Subsections 70(6) and 73(1) provide favourable provisions whereby property, of varying nature, that is transferred by a taxpayer to his spouse, (formerly upon his death and latterly inter vivos) or a trust under which she has a certain interest and is designed in a certain way, will be considered disposed of for its tax cost and not its fair market value, hence allowing the transferor to recognize a tax-free disposition. The tax-free roll-over is elective. A "spousal trust" is a trust under which no one but the spouse is entitled to receive the income therefrom before her death and no person other than the spouse may receive or obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust before her death. While Sec. 70(6)(b) and 73(1) provide for transfers of property to a trust for the benefit of the transferor's spouse, there are no such provisions available to reduce tax exposure when the taxpayer transfers property to a trust for her whereunder income therefrom is to be paid to the transferor.

Subparagraph 54(c)(v) allows an exemption from the recognition of a disposition when property is transferred and there is a change in legal ownership without a change in beneficial ownership, (but only for the purposes of subdivision C), hence when a transferor contributes property to a trust whereunder the income is payable to him but the capital is payable to her upon his death a taxable disposition will be recognized by the fact that the beneficial ownership of the capital element of the property has been changed.

Subsection 73(1)-(1.1) provides that an inter vivos transfer of property directly to a spouse by a taxpayer can be effectively tax free hence rather than transfer the property to a trust whereunder he is an income beneficiary, and recognize a disposition, it would be obviously more beneficial to transfer the property to the spouse, and after "a few years", have it transferred back to a trust under which "her spouse", the original owner, was entitled to receive all of the income of the trust before his death, whereupon the capital would revert to her. In that case, she would not recognize potentially substantial tax consequences on the transfer to the trust, by virtue of the applicability of section 73 and the initial owner would continue to be able to recognize the income.

"joint spousal or common-law partner trust"

"joint spousal or common-law partner trust" means a trust to which paragraph 104(4)(a) would apply if that paragraph were read without reference to subparagraph 104(4)(a)(iii) and clause 104(4)(a)(iv)(A);

"Inter vivos transfers by individuals – Sec. 73(1)"

Sec. 73. (1) For the purposes of this Part, where at any time any particular capital property of an individual (other than a trust) has been transferred in circumstances to which subsection (1.01) applies and both the individual and the transferee are resident in Canada at that time, unless the individual elects in the individual's return of income under this Part for the taxation year in which the property was transferred that the provisions of this subsection not apply, the particular property is deemed

- (a) to have been disposed of at that time by the individual for proceeds equal to,
 - (i) where the particular property is depreciable property of a prescribed class, that proportion of the undepreciated capital cost to the individual immediately before that time of all property of that class that the fair market value immediately before that time of the particular property is of the fair market value immediately before that time of all of that property of that class, and
 - (ii) in any other case, the adjusted cost base to the individual of the particular property immediately before that time; and
- (b) to have been acquired at that time by the transferee for an amount equal to those proceeds.

"Qualifying transfers – Sec. 73(1.1)"

(1.01) Subject to subsection (1.02), property is transferred by an individual in circumstances to which this subsection applies where it is transferred to

- (a) the individual's spouse or common-law partner;
- (b) a former spouse or common-law partner of the individual in settlement of rights arising out of their marriage or common-law partnership; or
- (c) a trust created by the individual under which
 - (i) the individual's spouse or common-law partner is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the spouse's or common-law partner's death and no person except the spouse or common-law partner may, before the spouse's or common-law partner's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust,
 - (ii) the individual is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the individual's death and no person except the individual may, before the individual's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, or

(iii) either

- (A) the individual or the individual's spouse is, in combination with the other, entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the later of the death of the individual and the death of the spouse and no other person may, before the later of those deaths, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, or
- (B) the individual or the individual's common-law partner is, in combination with the other, entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the later of the death of the individual and the death of the common-law partner and no other person may, before the later of those deaths, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust.

"Exception for transfers – Sec. 73(1.02)"

(1.02) Subsection (1.01) applies to a transfer of property by an individual to a trust the terms of which satisfy the conditions in subparagraph (1.01)(c)(ii) or (iii) only where

- (a) the trust was created after 1999;
- (b) either
 - (i) the individual had attained 65 years of age at the time the trust was created, or
 - (ii) the transfer does not result in a change in beneficial ownership of the property and there is immediately after the transfer no absolute or contingent right of a person (other than the individual) or partnership as a beneficiary (determined with reference to subsection 104(1.1)) under the trust; and
- (c) in the case of a trust the terms of which satisfy the conditions in subparagraph (1.01)(c)(ii), the trust does not make an election under subparagraph 104(4)(a)(ii.1).

"Interpretation – Sec. 73(1.1)"

(1.1) For greater certainty, a property is, for the purposes of subsections (1) and (1.01), deemed to be property of the individual referred to in subsection (1) that has been transferred to a particular transferee where,

- (a) under the laws of a province or because of a decree, order or judgment of a competent tribunal made in accordance with those laws, the property
 - (i) is acquired or is deemed to have been acquired by the particular transferee,
 - (ii) is deemed or declared to be property of, or is awarded to, the particular transferee, or
 - (iii) has vested in the particular transferee; and
- (b) the property was or would, but for those laws, have been a capital property of the individual referred to in subsection (1).

"Capital cost and amount deemed allowed to spouse, etc., or trust – Sec. 73(2)"

(2) Where a transferee is deemed by subsection 73(1) to have acquired any particular depreciable property of a prescribed class of a taxpayer for an amount determined under paragraph 73(1)(e) and the capital cost to the taxpayer of the particular property exceeds the amount determined under that paragraph, for the purposes of sections 13 and 20 and any regulations made under paragraph 20(1)(a)

- (a) the capital cost to the transferee of the particular property shall be deemed to be the amount that was the capital cost to the taxpayer thereof; and
- (b) the excess shall be deemed to have been allowed to the transferee in respect of the particular property under regulations made under paragraph 20(1)(a) in computing income for taxation years before the acquisition thereof.

IT-406R2

DATE: May 11, 1990

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Tax Payable by an Inter Vivos Trust

REFERENCE: Subsection 122(2) (also sections 117, 117.1 and 127.53, subsections 96(1), 104(2), 104(18), 122(1), 122(1.1), 149(5) and 248(1), and paragraphs 125(7)(d) and (e))

Application

This bulletin cancels and replaces Interpretation Bulletin IT-406R dated June 21, 1982. Current revisions are indicated by vertical lines.

Summary

This bulletin sets out the rates of tax payable by inter vivos trusts. It also discusses the circumstances in which inter vivos trusts established before June 18, 1971 may receive more favoured treatment by being taxed at graduated individual rates.

Discussion and Interpretation

1. An inter vivos trust is subject to a flat rate of federal tax on its amount taxable for the year equivalent to the highest rate for individuals, except where all of the conditions set out in subsection 122(2) are met by the trust (see 2 below). For 1988 and subsequent taxation years, subsection 122(1) imposes a federal tax rate of 29 percent on inter vivos trusts. For the 1985 to 1987 taxation years, the rate was 34 percent. By virtue of subsection 122(1.1), an inter vivos trust may not claim the personal tax credits provided in section 118.

2. Where an inter vivos trust (other than a mutual fund trust) meets all of the conditions set out in subsection 122(2), it is taxed at the graduated federal tax rates for individuals which are set out in section 117. For 1988 those rates are: 17 percent on the amount taxable up to $27,500, 26 percent on the next $27,500, and 29 percent on the amount taxable in excess of $55,000. For 1989 and subsequent taxation years, section 117.1 establishes an indexing formula for adjusting these dollar values to reflect increases in the Consumer Price Index in excess of 3 percent. The conditions of subsection 122(2) are met if the trust:

- (a) was established before June 18, 1971 (see 3 and 4 below),
- (b) was resident in Canada on June 18, 1971 and without interruption thereafter until the end of the taxation year (see 5 below),
- (c) did not carry on any active business in the year (see 6 and 7 below),
- (d) has not received any property by way of gift since June 18, 1971 (see 8 below), and
- (e) has not, after June 18, 1971, incurred
 - (i) any debt or
 - (ii) any other obligation to pay an amount, to, or guaranteed by, any person with whom any beneficiary of the trust was not dealing at arm's length.

3. Paragraph 122(2)(a) requires the trust to have been established before June 18, 1971. Variations in the terms of the trust must be examined to determine if a particular change is of such a nature as to constitute the establishment of a new, successor trust. Where a trust was established before June 18, 1971, a subsequent change in one or more of the trustees would not cause the trust to be viewed as a new trust as of the date of the change. Conversely, under the provisions of subsection 149(5), an inter vivos trust that is deemed to have been created in respect of a club, society or association cannot have come into existence prior to the end of 1971 even though the club, society or association was in existence prior to June 18, 1971.

4. Where a trust was in existence prior to June 18, 1971 and, on or after that date, a second inter vivos trust was created, with the circumstances of the two trusts being such that the conditions specified in subsection 104(2) are met, the two trusts may be designated by the Minister as being one trust and that trust will not meet the requirements of subsection 122(2). The creation of a second trust, in these circumstances, may be tantamount to a contribution of additional property to the first trust, which is a disqualifying event as specified in paragraph 122(2)(d).

5. Paragraph 122(2)(b) requires the trust to have been resident in Canada on June 18, 1971 and to have remained a resident of Canada at all times thereafter. For this purpose, the normal rules for determining the residence of a trust are applicable. See the current version of IT-447 entitled Residence of a Trust or Estate.

6. As indicated in paragraph 122(2)(c), a trust fails to meet the requirements of subsection 122(2) if it carried on any active business in the year. In subsection 248(1), "active business" is defined to mean any business carried on other than a "specified investment business" or a "personal services business". Since each of the excluded types of business can only be carried on by a corporation (see paragraphs 125(7)(d) and (e)), any business carried on by a trust in the year is an active business. The word "year" in this context has reference to the taxation year of the trust, i.e., the calendar year, and not the fiscal period of any business. Unlike the other requirements of subsection 122(2) where, if any one of them is not met for a particular year the trust becomes subject to taxation under subsection 122(1) not only in that year but also in all subsequent years, a failure to meet the requirement in paragraph 122(2)(c) in one year does not necessarily affect the trust in subsequent years.

7. Where the trust is a partner (whether a general or limited partner) in a partnership which carries on a business, the trust and each of the other partners is viewed as carrying on that business. The assumption in subsection 96(1), namely, that the partnership, as distinct from the partners, is to be viewed as if it were a separate person that carries on the business, is only for the purpose set out in subsection 96(1) and has no relevance for purposes of subsection 122(2).

8. In paragraph 122(2)(d) there is the requirement that the trust must not have received any property by way of gift after June 18, 1971. For this purpose, the word "gift" is not considered to include a property received as a bequest under the will of a deceased taxpayer or under the terms of a testamentary trust, even where the deceased taxpayer was the settlor of (or other contributor to) the inter vivos trust receiving the property.

9. In paragraph 122(2)(e) it is provided that a trust becomes subject to subsection 122(1) if, after June 18, 1971, it incurred any debt or any other obligation to pay an amount to any person with whom any beneficiary of the trust was not dealing at arm's length. This rule applies also where the debt or other obligation of the trust is guaranteed by such a person. The trust would not be considered to have incurred an "obligation to pay an amount" in the sense contemplated by subparagraph 122(2)(e)(ii) where, in return for immediate payment of fair market value consideration, a trust acquires property or assets from a person with whom any beneficiary of the trust was not dealing at arm's length. (For further discussion of the meaning of "arm's length", see the current version of IT-419.)

10. If a settlor (or other contributor to a trust) and a beneficiary are connected by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, then they are deemed not to deal with each other at arm's length. Even if the settlor (or other contributor) is not so related to any beneficiary, the circumstances may indicate that the settlor (or other contributor) and at least one beneficiary do not in fact deal with each other at arm's length. In either of these situations, if an amount is owing by the trust to the settlor (or other contributor to the trust), or if the trust assumes responsibility for any debt or other obligation guaranteed by such a person, the requirement in paragraph 122(2)(e) would not be met.

11. The debts or other obligations of a trust referred to in 9 and 10 above do not include ordinary operating debts or bank loans (other than those guaranteed by or owing to a person not dealing at arm's length with a beneficiary).

12. Paragraph 122(2)(e) is not contravened by a debt or other obligation of the trust to pay to a beneficiary an amount required by the terms of the trust, provided it is paid out to the beneficiary during the reasonable time needed to discharge the debt or obligation. A reasonable time will usually not be considered to extend beyond the end of the taxation year following the year in which the debt or obligation became payable by the trust. However, where subsection 104(18) applies with respect to the income of a trust in which a minor beneficiary has a vested interest, a reasonable time will usually not be considered to extend beyond the end of the taxation year following the year in which the child reaches the age of majority.

13. For the purposes of the "Alternative Minimum Tax", paragraph 127.53(1)(b) allows an exemption of $40,000 to an inter vivos trust which meets the criteria of subsection 122(2). A single such exemption must be allocated among multiple trusts that arose as a consequence of contributions by the same individual.

“Tax payable by inter vivos trust - Sec. 122(1)”

(1) Notwithstanding section 117, the tax payable under this Part for a taxation year by an inter vivos trust is the total of

(a) 29% of its amount taxable for the taxation year, and

(b) if the trust is a SIFT trust for the taxation year, the positive or negative amount determined by the formula

A × B where

A is the positive or negative decimal fraction determined by the formula

C + D - E where

C is the net corporate income tax rate in respect of the SIFT trust for the taxation year,

D is the provincial SIFT tax rate of the SIFT trust for the taxation year, and

E is the decimal fraction equivalent of the percentage rate of tax provided in paragraph (a) for the taxation year, and

B is the SIFT trust's taxable SIFT trust distributions for the taxation year.

“Deductions not permitted - Sec. 122(1.1)”

(1.1) No deduction may be made under section 118 in computing the tax payable by a trust for a taxation year.¹⁴⁶

“Where s. (1) does not apply – Sec. 122(2)”

(2) Subsection 122(1) is not applicable for a taxation year of an inter vivos trust other than a mutual fund trust if the trust

(a) was established before June 18, 1971;

(b) was resident in Canada on June 18, 1971 and without interruption thereafter until the end of the year;

(c) did not carry on any active business in the year;

(d) has not received any property by way of gift since June 18, 1971;

146 1988 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: While a trust is treated as an individual for tax purposes, subsection 104(3) denies any deduction to a trust in respect of personal exemptions. That subsection is repealed (and replaced by new subsection 122(1.1)) as a consequence of the repeal of section 109, which is itself repealed as a consequence of the conversion of such exemptions to credits.

(e) has not, after June 18, 1971, incurred

(i) any debt, or

(ii) any other obligation to pay an amount, to or guaranteed by, any person with whom any beneficiary of the trust was not dealing at arm's length; and

(f) has not received any property after December 17, 1999, where

(i) the property was received as a result of a transfer from another trust,

(ii) subsection (1) applied to a taxation year of the other trust that began before the property was so received, and

(iii) no change in the beneficial ownership of the property resulted from the transfer.

Picking the Trustees, Changes in Corporate Control and the Case for the "Drunken Trustee".

Care should be taken in the initial and evolving status of the trustees of a family trust for at least two tax reasons:

- changes in control of any corporate ownership that is embodied in the trust and,
- changes in residence of the trust.

CRA has provided the following opinion with respect to changes in corporate control where one of the trustees is changed¹⁴⁷:

"Change in Trustees and Control"

In May of this year, the CRA issued a technical interpretation that could have widespread consequences for corporations that have trusts as shareholders. The technical interpretation deals with the question of whether there is an acquisition of control of a corporation on the replacement of one or more of three trustees of an inter vivos trust holding a majority of the voting shares of the corporation. The CRA essentially indicated that a change in any of the trustees of the trust would generally result in a new group of persons controlling the corporation so that the acquisition of control rules in the Act would apply, unless a saving provision in paragraph 256(7)(a) applied. The consequences of an acquisition of control could be quite onerous for the corporation. For example, the availability of its tax losses and other accounts could be restricted, and it would have a deemed taxation year-end that could have several adverse tax consequences. It does not seem appropriate that these results should arise when there has been no change in the beneficial ownership of the corporation.

Question 1

What is the legal basis for the CRA's interpretation?

Response 1

The Supreme Court of Canada held, in M.N.R. v. Consolidated Holding Company Limited that where the majority of the voting shares of a corporation are held by a trust, it is the trustees of the trust who have the legal ownership of the shares, who have the right to vote those shares (subject to any restrictions on such right in the trust indenture) and who, therefore, control the corporation.

¹⁴⁷ Prepared for discussion at the annual Canadian Tax Foundation conference held in Vancouver on September 27, 2005. Members of the panel were Mr. Marc Vanasse, CA, Director, and Mrs. Theresa Murphy, CGA, Manager, Income Tax Rulings Directorate, Mrs. Arlene White, Director, Vancouver Tax Services Office, Mrs. Sandra Jack, CA, Felesky Flynn LLP of Calgary and Mr. Mark Robinson, CA, Deloitte & Touche LLP of Toronto.

Question 2

The technical interpretation indicates that where only one of three trustees is replaced, there would be an acquisition of control by a group of persons. Why is that the case?

Response 2

The technical interpretation acknowledged that where a trust has multiple trustees, the determination as to which trustee or group of trustees controls the corporation can only be made after a review of all the pertinent facts, including the terms of the trust indenture. However, it went on to indicate that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, we would consider there to be a presumption that all of the trustees would constitute a group that controls the corporation. We took this view because we believed that the fiduciary obligation that each of the trustees would have to act in the best interests of the beneficiaries of the trust would make it unlikely that two trustees could properly act together to control a corporation, to the exclusion of a third trustee.

Question 3

Some commentators have suggested that the position in the technical interpretation contradicts the CRA's position in paragraph 10 of IT-302R3. Do you agree?

Response 3

Paragraph 10 of IT-302R3 indicates only that control of a corporation will be regarded as remaining unchanged where the executor, administrator or trustee of an estate is replaced as a result of that person's death or inability to fulfill his or her functions. Therefore, that position does not apply to the replacement of trustees of an inter vivos trust.

Question 4

Why will the CRA not extend the interpretation bulletin position to inter vivos trusts, given that it appears to be an administrative concession?

Response 4

The interpretation bulletin position was first adopted when a previous version of paragraph 256(7)(a) provided a legal basis for the position. A 1994 amendment to paragraph 256(7)(a) has removed the legal basis for the position. Therefore it cannot be extended, and consideration will have to be given to withdrawing the current bulletin position when the bulletin is next revised.

Question 5

Does the possibility of an acquisition of control of a corporation when there has been no change in its beneficial ownership present a policy issue?

Response 5

We have raised the matter with the Department of Finance and understand that Finance recognizes that there is an issue."

One would think that this is something to disagree with given our ITA designates the entirety of a trust to nestle with the trustees for purposes of assessment, not individual trustees but with the entirety of the trustees: the trust itself though is recognized as one tax creature, not a mass of several and even though per Sec. 104(1) ownership or control attracts assessment, it is still as one entity. If one trustee is changed the trust, in exact same form, as such continues in the same way as before. While in common law partnerships do have look-through essence and corporations, not, a trust can only be equivalent to the latter when it comes to ownership and control issues. In particular to Q2 above, when the specific trustee holding and voting for the shares in the trust is changed, the equation is not changed since she is still voting them pursuant to the office of a trustee: the ownership and control follows the office, not the specific person and since they are saddled with the trust obligation that continues unchanged, changing the person in no way should reflect down to a change in control of the corporation: the shares are owned by the trust and as an indivisible tax creature that is where the equation ends. Also, is a purported trustee acting as a trustee when she adversely votes them out of line with her co-trustees opinions? This should be even so if one adversely votes them not in congruence with their majority since trustees do owe themselves joint and several liability for their individual actions and a rogue trustee's adverse voting exercise can be petitioned and rescinded since she was not actually "wearing the hat" of proper trusteeship when the vote was made – is she acting as a trustee of the trust when her contrary minority vote is placed(?). Does not the corporate share registry cite the trust/trustee?

However, *Minister of National Revenue v. Consolidated Holding Co.*¹⁴⁸, a Supreme Court decision, is an excellent case whereby the issue was well addressed with reference to numerous UK precedents. In this instance a testator had bequeathed shares into a trust, one trustee of which was a third party and two other trustees were his sons. The trust deed stated that two of the trustees could compel the third to accept their opinion on how the shares were to be voted. When the Minister assessed the son's corporation and the testator's as related due to being controlled by the same group the trust argued that the trustee was not so subject to the group control scenario. The Court held:

"Do Harold Duncan Gavin and Robert Duncan Gavin, who control "Consolidated", also control Martin & Robertson Limited by virtue of their ability to combine and give a direction to the third trustee, Montreal Trust? The Exchequer Court held, in accordance with the Company's Articles, that Montreal Trust Company had an equal voice with the two co-executors and could prevent the two co-executors from exercising that control which is accorded by the said will.

In determining whether a group of persons controls a company, it is not sufficient in the case of trustees who are registered as shareholders to stop the inquiry at the register of shareholders and the Articles of Association. It is necessary to look to the trust instrument to ascertain whether one or more of the trustees have been put in a position where they can at law direct their co-trustees as to the manner in which the voting rights attaching to the shares are to be exercised.

From the point of view of the company, apart from protective provisions, trustee shareholders must vote as a unit. If they are not unanimous, the shares cannot be voted. In this event, the control would be in "Consolidated", the two shareholders of which are the two Gavin trustees. Merely to look at the share register is not enough when the question is one of control.

The problem here is not solved by a decision that a company is not bound to see to the execution of trusts to which its shares are subject or that it may take the vote of the first named trustee on its share register. These are merely protective provisions in favour of the company and do not touch the question of control. Here, if one looks at the facts as a whole, one finds that the two Gavins, by combining, can control the vote of the estate shares.

...

I do not think that the decision in I.R.C. v. J. Bibby & Sons Ltd [1945], 1 All. E.R., 667., establishes anything more than this proposition—that a person who is the registered owner of 50 per cent of the shares with voting rights controls the company and that it is immaterial whether or not his exercise of that voting power can be controlled either by co-trustees or through appropriate proceedings by order of the Court. It does not establish the proposition that in a case such as this, where two trustees have the power to subject a third trustee in the exercise of the voting rights of the shares, one must disregard that power.

The respondent Consolidated Holding Company Limited submits that there is no right to go behind the share register of Consolidated Holding Company Limited and investigate the character in which any shareholder holds the shares registered in his name and that when three persons hold shares jointly, in this case, Harold Duncan Gavin, Robert Duncan Gavin and the Montreal Trust Company, then the provision in the will, of which they are executors, that two may impose their decision on the third, is irrelevant. The respondent further submits that under the ordinary rules of corporation law there must be unanimity in the voting of the said shares before they may be validly voted. The respondent cites Lumbers v. Fretz (1928), 62 O.L.R. 635., where a judgment of Wright J. was affirmed on appeal to the Court of Appeal[6]. Wright J. said at p. 649-650:

148 [1974] S.C.R. 419

Counsel for the defendants has cited to me some American decisions to the effect that in such cases a trustee or executor is entitled to vote the shares when the other trustees are not present. I do not think these decisions are in harmony with the English decisions. In Masten and Fraser's Company Law of Canada, 2nd ed., p. 528, it is stated that "joint holders must concur in voting, unless the by-laws provide otherwise," and that statement or opinion appears to be the logical deduction from the decisions in In re T.H. Saunders & Co. Ltd. [1908], 1 Ch. 415, and Barton v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1889), 24 Q.B.D. 77; Burns v. Siemens Bros. Dynamo Works Ltd. (No. 2) (1918), 88 L.J.Ch. 21.

In Corpus Juris, vol. 14, p. 903, para. 1397, it is stated: "Where there are two or more personal representatives, no one or more can vote against the protest of the other or others."

It is manifest that the action of L.O. Lumbers and Maria Lumbers in protesting against the introduction of the by-laws in question, and requesting an adjournment of the meeting, was an emphatic protest on their part against the other executors assuming to represent or vote the shares of the estate.

I accept as the law the statement already cited from Masten and Fraser's book, and hold that the votes for the estate of James Lumbers in respect of the 40 shares held jointly as trustees by Maria Lumbers and W.G. Lumbers were improperly cast.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. J. Bibby and Sons Ltd. [1945], 1 All. E.R. p. 667., a decision of the House of Lords, dealt with a section of the Finance (No. 2) Act of 1939 which provided in s. 13(3) that a company was entitled to have its standard profits increased by the percentage of the increase in its capital and in subsection (9) permitted that increase to come to 10% provided that the directors had a "controlling interest" in the company. There were eight directors who were the beneficial owners and registered holders of 209,000-odd ordinary shares out of the 500,000 issued. Three of those directors were also registered holders of another 57,500 shares which they held as trustees of their sister's marriage settlement. The Commissioners contended that those latter shares, of which the said three directors were not the beneficial owners although they were the registered owners, could not be counted in determining whether the directors had a controlling interest. The House of Lords unanimously found in favour of the company. Lord Russell of Killowen said at p. 669:

My Lords, I agree with the view of the Court of Appeal. When the section speaks of directors having a controlling interest in a company, what it is immediately concerned with in using the words "controlling interest" is not the extent to which the individuals are beneficially interested in the profits of the company as a going concern or in the surplus assets in a winding up, but the extent to which they have vested in them the power of controlling by votes the decisions which will bind the company in the shape of resolutions passed by the shareholders in general meeting. In other words, the test which is to exclude a company's business from subsect. (9) (a) and include it in (9) (b), is the voting power of its directors, not their beneficial interest in the company.

For the purpose of such a test the fact that a vote-carrying share is vested in a director as trustee seems immaterial. The power is there, and though it be exercised in breach of trust, or even in breach of an injunction, the vote would be validly cast vis-a-vis the company, and the resolution until rescinded would be binding on it.

Lord MacMillan said at p. 670-671:

In my opinion the Court of Appeal rightly rejected the contention of the Inland Revenue Commissioners. The question whether the directors of the respondent company have the control of it by their voting power as shareholders must in my view be determined by the memorandum and articles of the company and by the register of shareholders. By the constitution of the company, as I have already mentioned, the voting power is vested in the ordinary shareholders and the register shows that the directors hold a majority of these shares. As was said by Jessel, M.R., in Pullbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Company, (1878), 9 Ch.D. 610, at p. 615:

The company cannot look behind the register as to the beneficial interest but must take the register as conclusive and cannot inquire... into the trusts affecting the shares.

And again on the latter page:

Suppose that all the shares held by the directors in the present case were held by them as trustees, could it be said that they did not control the company? If so, then in whose hands was the control of the company?

Lord Porter said at p. 672:

Nevertheless for good or ill the trustee like the beneficial owner controls, though if his powers be wrongly exercised they may in some way or other be capable of being challenged.

...

The apparent clash between that decision and the decision in Bibby was explained by Lord Evershed, M.R., in I.R.C. v. Silverts Ltd. [1951] Ch. D. 521., when he pointed out that the control may be exercised either directly or indirectly through the agency of another company. The Silverts case is interesting in the present situation as there of four directors one, S.J. Silvert, was the registered holder of all the "B" shares. No other director was the registered holder of either "A" or "B" shares. The "A" and "B" shares conferred equal voting rights on their holders and there was no provision for a casting vote. The "A" shares were all the subject matter of a settlement in favour of an infant. By the settlement, the National Provincial Bank Limited was appointed a custodian trustee but two of the other directors were appointed managing trustees. The question was whether those two directors together with the other director S.J. Silverts controlled the company. The Court of Appeal held that they did not do so and that the National Provincial Bank Limited being the registered shareholder of all the "A" shares excluded the two directors from being considered as controlling the company despite the fact that they were managing trustees of the settlement. At p. 526, Lord Evershed, M.R., said:

The distinction (between a custodian and bare trustee) is, for practical purposes, perhaps a fine one; but it is a real one. Indeed, it has not been seriously contended before us on the part of the Crown that the bank in the present case can be properly regarded as a bare trustee in the sense intended by the House of Lords in the Bibby case.

The situation in the Silverts case would seem to be very close to the present one. By the statute under which the trustees were appointed, the Public Trustee Act, 1906, in s. 4, subs. (2)(b), all powers and discretions remain vested in the managing trustees, but by para. (d) the custodian trustee was not bound to give effect, for example, by voting in all cases to the wishes and effects of the managing trustees.

In my view, however, the matter is dealt with authoritatively in Barclays Bank Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1961] A.C. 509. In that case, the deceased person held at his death 1,100 shares in a company. By a settlement made nineteen years before, he had settled another 3,650 shares of the company on a trust for his wife and children taking no beneficial interest himself. In the settlement deed, he named four trustees and he was the first of those named. Under Table A of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which had been incorporated in the company's articles of association, being the first-named of the four trustees, the deceased exercised the power of voting the shares. The two blocks together were a majority of the issued share capital of the company. It was held that the deceased had "control of the company" within the meaning of the relevant sections of the Finance Act 1940. Five members of the House of Lords sat on the appeal, Viscount Simonds, Lord Cohen and Lord Keith of Avonholm holding that a person who had the power by exercise of voting rights in accordance with the constitution of a company to carry a resolution in general meeting had control for the purpose of the subsection and that it was irrelevant that the shareholder who had the apparent control might himself be amenable to some external control. Lord Reid dissented and Lord Denning concurred only because the settlor was the person who held the joint holding having created it in his own disposition. The view of the majority would seem to apply exactly in the present case. There, the settlor being the first-named trustee voted by virtue of the provisions of the articles of the company despite the fact that he might have been amenable to control by the other three trustees.

Here, by virtue of corporations law, the three executors and trustees must agree on the voting of the shares despite the fact that by virtue of the clause in the will two of the three might control the decision of the third."

Thus, when planning the use of inter vivos or testamentary trusts that are to hold decisive corporate shares care should be taken to prevent the above dicta from applying to your environment.

The residency issues are dicussed subsequently.

Trusts when Equity looks to Intent and Not Documentation.

Express trusts are those created through express declaration by the owner of the property whereby either he continues to hold legal title but for the benefit of the stated beneficiaries or whereupon the legal title is transferred to another person whereby they are compelled in equity to hold the property as per the terms of the trust. In order for an express trust to be accepted as being capable of being constituted it must have, in the absence of certain violations of specific technicalities such as remoteness, the rule against perpetuities etc., three basic, very broad characteristics;

- the settlor must have shown the intent to have a trust created,
- the subject matter of the trust, being its present property and its future property must be ascertainable, and
- the beneficiaries under the trust, and their interests or rights to the property must be ascertainable.¹⁴⁹

While these aspects need not be overly complicated in application they must be ascertainable by the courts if need be, upon a review of the substance of the relationships between the parties involved. If they cannot be clearly ascertained then the express trust cannot be recognized as being in existence and potentially significant tax consequences may result. In such a case a resulting trust may arise, if legal title has been conveyed to another party, whereunder the settlor will be recognized as the beneficiary having not passed the beneficial interest.¹⁵⁰

Documentation without Substance.

Perhaps one of the most analyzed Canadian tax cases concerning the existence of a trust is *Kingsdale Securities Company Limited v. M.N.R.*¹⁵¹ where five family trusts were to carry on a limited partnership thus facilitating flexibility in income splitting however there was some question as to when exactly the trusts were thoroughly constituted. As a simple income splitting/estate planning arrangement the five taxpayers were encouraged to settle separate trusts, none of them actually knowing until a later date what they were doing, while the bank accounts and initial contributions to the trusts were opened and made by a party who was effectively directing the arrangement and encouraging the three taxpayers. At a later date the constituting documentation was presented to them for their signature, and it was only then that they were provided the required comprehensive explanation of the mechanics of the arrangements. Until that time they did not even know exactly who their respective trust's beneficiaries would be. At issue was whether the trusts had in substance been created prior to the time above mentioned since if they were not, the partnership which they were part of would also not come into existence until a later time.

Urie, J. of the Federal Court of Appeal after a listing of the three certainties, provided that:

"Accepting as I do the findings of fact of the learned trial judge, none of the settlers, with the possible exception of Jack Shnier, had evinced any intention to create a trust for ascertainable beneficiaries at least until the trust deeds were received in Oklahoma in March or April 1964. Moreover no monies were advanced by any settlor except Jack Shnier nor authorized to be advanced by him on their behalf even after the execution of the trust deeds. Neither had they appointed trustees nor did some know even the names of some of the trustees they purported to appoint."

Quoting from *Snell's Principles of Equity*¹⁵² he also provided:

"Absence of certainties. The effect of the absence of any of the certainties may be summarized as follows. The paramount certainty is that of subject-matter, in the first sense; if there is no certainty as to the property to be held upon trust, the entire transaction is nugatory. Next, if that certainty is present but 149. See Knight v. Knight, 1840 3 Beav 148, 49 E.R. 58, for the landmark case. See Royal Trust Co. v. Tucker, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 250, where the issue of the extent of how to identify beneficiaries was at issue in a testamentary situation.

150 Will such a trust be personal or non-personal if the settlor acquires the interest subsequent to the contribution which creates the trust?

151. [1975] C.T.C. 10 FCA

152 27th ed. at pg. 115. See also the Aust. cases of FC of T v. Gulland, Watson v. FC of T, Pincus v. FC of T, 85 ACT 4765 where they were referred to in QT87/4231 and Commissioner of Taxation [1990] AATA 450 (1 May 1990) that the creation of a trust was objectively considered to be only for the diversion of income, thus subject to GAAR-like disregard.

there is no certainty of words, the person entitled to the trust property holds free from any trust. Finally, if both these certainties are present but there is uncertainty of objects, there is a resulting trust for the settlor for "once establish that a trust (of definite property) was intended, and the legatee cannot take beneficially" 92 (Briggs v. Penny, (1851) 3. Mac. & G. 546 at 557, per Lord Truro L.C.) the same applies where there is uncertainty of the subject matter as regards the beneficial interest, unless one of the beneficiaries can establish a claim to the whole."¹⁵³

Counsel for the taxpayers also contended that if the deeds were properly executed then the existence of the trust should be given retroactive effect while Urie, J. felt otherwise:

"It seems to me that in advancing the argument that the deeds of trust, after the execution thereof, should be given retrospective or retroactive effect, the appellant is saying that the oral agreements allegedly made on December to become settlers or the opening of the bank accounts, constituted agreements to create trusts in the future. In Underhill's Law of Trusts and Trustees, 12th Ed, the author of this authoritative work discusses the validity of that kind of agreement at page 47, where he says:

"The rule that a valid agreement to create a trust in future, is sufficient to create a trust in praesenti, so as to bind the property in the hands of the parties, or those having notice of the agreement, depends on the maxim that "Equity regards that as done which ought to be done." It follows, therefore that where a trust is alleged to have been created by an agreement to do something, its validity depends on the question whether the agreement is one of which courts of equity would decree specific performance(s). If it is merely a voluntary promise (or even a covenant under seal, not supported by valuable consideration), no trust will be created; for equity gives no assistance to volunteers, and consequently there is nothing which can, under the foregoing maxim, be regarded by the court as done."

The findings of the learned trial judge make it clear that none of the settlers were even volunteers at that date. That being the case there were no enforceable agreements. Logically then, it seems to follow that there could be no retrospective or retroactive effect given to the trust deeds after their execution."

"With respect to question 2, the appellant argued that if the trust deeds had no retrospective effect, executory trusts were created through the fiduciary control of the trust's bank accounts by the trustees, and these were the same trusts whose terms were reduced to writing and confirmed by the trust deeds. The fallacy of this argument is that on the evidence, as found by the trial judge, none of the settlers had evinced any interest in creating trusts at the time the trust accounts were opened in the names of the trustees by one of the Shnier brothers. While executory trusts can be created using fewer formalities than are required in bringing executed trusts into existence, they cannot be created unless the intention of the settlers can be ascertained. Since the earliest at which their intention could have been ascertained was, as found by the learned trial judge, not until March or April 1964, no executory trusts could have come into existence prior to that time."

Ryan, J. also commented on the existence of a trust and how it comes into existence vis-a-vis the intention of the settlor:

"The role of the settlor is, of course, vital in the creation of a settled trust. It is the settlor who transfers to the trustee the property which constitutes the trust fund or res; it is the settlor who defines the objects of the trust; it is the settlor who vests the powers in the trustee: only the settlor can do these things. Once the trust is established, the participation of the settlor may come to an end, as was contemplated in this case, but only he can bring the trust into existence."

While later, as to the timing of the creation, he provided:

"The submission would be that by the time the relevant partnership documents were executed, the trusts had been constituted, (albeit retroactively), the trustees appointed and in a position under the trust indentures to make the partnership contract. My response is that the family trusts were created, if they were created at all, by execution of the trust indentures. Each of these trusts came into being (if at all) as a result of the execution of the indenture containing a declaration by the settlor of an intention to create a trust and a designation of object, and by a vesting in the trustees of the trust res. The trust came into being, if it did come into being, when the constructive acts were done."

¹⁵³ See also Re: Leek, 1968 1 All E.R. 793, I.R.C. v. Broadway Cottages Trusts, 35 T.C. 577, and Innes v. Harrison, 35 T.C. 594.

From such analysis the Court found that the trusts had clearly not come into being until after the partnership documents had been properly filed with the provincial authorities, however they had been constituted upon a review of the trust deeds, and agreement to through signing, by the "settlers" in the spring of 1964, well later than the "creation" of "the partnership".¹⁵⁴

In *Atinco Paper Products Ltd. v. The Queen*¹⁵⁵ a similar estate planning/income splitting arrangement was attempted whereunder a business was to be carried on by a partnership, three partners of which were corporations controlled by individual taxpayers, and two of which were trusts the beneficiaries of which were certain wives and children of the other individual taxpayers, however the weaknesses in the structuring was in the nature of "the trusts" which were created when an aunt had made essentially two absolute gifts of $250.00 to the male taxpayers expressing the hope that the money would be invested for the benefit of the wives and children. The gifts were sent with a letter which didn't contain imperative directive language. The recipients of the gifts used the gifts as a basis for the creation of the trusts, thereupon drafting two trust agreements which the giftor eventually signed, as settlor.

Urie, J., commenting on whether the gifts made by the aunt created trusts which were later formalized by documentation, referred to the necessity of the three basic certainties; words employed, as taken as a whole, must be imperative, the subject matter must be certain, and the objects must be certain, and then went on to comment on Keetan and Sheridan's Laws of Trusts observation, 10th Ed, pg.90:

"Since equity looks at intent rather than at the form, no special form of words is necessary for the creation of a valid trust, and if an intention to create a trust may unmistakably be construed from the expressions which the settlor has used, the court will give effect to that intention. The really difficult question in these case is, what did the settlor really intend? For example, if he used words, precatory, recommendatory, or expressing a belief, did he intend to create a binding trust or not?"¹⁵⁶

If, from a review of the whole of the language used by a taxpayer and his actions at the time of the supposed creation and subsequently, it cannot be found that he wished either a trust to be expressly created or a fiduciary relationship with respect to the subject matter to come into existence, the courts will not give recognition to the supposed intention that never manifested. Commenting on Ryan, J's. comment on settlor involvement in Kingsdale Securities, Urie, J. then went on to provide:

"Finally, it should be observed that it is clear from the jurisprudence on the subject that if the words purporting to create the trust cannot be construed as imperative then the person holding the trust property holds it free from any trust. Thus, if it is found, as the Trial Judge found, that the words contained in Miss Stein's letters are not imperative, then, notwithstanding what later may have been done, she would have been unsuccessful in establishing on the basis of those letters, that a trust had been settled on her nephews."

Referring to several authorities cited in Underhill's *Law of Trusts*¹⁵⁷, he then went on to comment:

"The documents in either type of case, of necessity, must speak for themselves but where there is doubt

¹⁵⁴ It was then that the three certainties existed; see Re: Rose, 1952 1 Ch. 499, I.R.C. v. Allan, 9 T.C. 234 (H.L.), as to the timing of creation while see also F.C.T. v. Phillips, 20 A.L.R. 607, Gullard v. F.C.T., 55 A.L.R. 65, and Watson v. F.C.T., 56 A.L.R. 505. For an excellent recent case of a trust existing and the evaluation of countering arguments in the case of the dual objective of tax planning and matrimonial planning poorly "poured in concrete" see the Aust. case of Robson v Robson [2011] QSC 234 (12 August 2011).

¹⁵⁵ 78 D.T.C. 6387 FCA

¹⁵⁶ It was put more eloquently in Heartley v. Nicholson, (1875) L.R. 19 Eq. 233:

"It is not necessary that the declaration of a trust should be in terms explicit. But what I take the law to require is, that the donor should have evinced by acts which admit of no other interpretation, that he himself had ceased to be, and that some other person had become, the beneficial owner of the subject of the gift or transfer, and that such legal right to it, if any, as he retained was held by him in trust for the donee."

See also Byrnes v Kendle [2011] HCA 26 (3 August 2011) for an Aust. High Court examination of whether a trust existed when there was inconsistent activity with what the purported trustee did with the property and various assertions he made as well as the Aust. case of Crouch v Smith & Anor [2004] FMCA 676 (12 November 2004) and Hyhonie Holdings Pty Ltd & Anor v Leroy & Anor [2004] NSWCA 72 (18 March 2004). See Ali v Ali [2011] NSWSC 261 (7 April 2011) for examination of intention to create a trust.

¹⁵⁷ 11th ed., at pg. 33

in inter vivos trust cases, as here, as to the settlor's intention, it seems to me that assistance in the interpretation of the purported trust documents may be derived from the testimony of the settlor. Not only may the Trial Judge obtain some actual assistance in the ascertainment of what was intended by the ambiguous language used, but, perhaps more importantly, he is afforded an opportunity to assess from the witnesses demeanor, manner, hesitation and other nuances his impression of the likelihood that what is alleged to be the intention was or was not the intention at the time the document, or in this case the letters, (which supposedly created the trust), were written."

In the previous court the Trial Judge did just this and gained the most damning of evidence that caused, quite effectively the case to "go down for the count for lack of simple coaching" by revealing that she left the trust to be created by the instigating taxpayers, rather than execute the needed procedures herself or make the appropriate expressions to have them executed. An example being:

"Q: Am I fair to say that that letter describes what you wanted to do?

A: Right. (Miss Stein)

Q: Then am I correct that you left it up to Philip and Irving...

A: Right.

Q: To prepare the Trust agreements and things of that nature.

A: Right.

Q: Am I correct, that you never instructed Mr. Harris a solicitor to prepare a trust agreement?

A: No, I didn't.

Q: That these agreements were brought by Philip that he brought both of them?

A: Right."

Concluding commentary provided by Urie J. was quite appropriate in that it summarized the application of the imperative standard to the content of the letters in which the gift was made:

"Whether such evidence did so influence him or not, it does, in my view, support the conclusion that the gifts were made to the nephews absolutely unencumbered by any limitations on them other than an expressed hope that the ultimate benefit, therefrom would accrue to the nephew's respective wives and children. That hope does not convert absolute gifts into trusts. Nor did depositing the money in separate bank accounts, even if that was done shortly after their receipt change their nature since it is the intention of the donor or settlor that is determinative in ascertaining the nature of the gift, not what the recipients do with them. The settlor did not define the objects of the trusts in any but the most general way and the same may be said of the powers she purportedly conferred on the trustee of each. All of the instructions as to the preparation of the trust documents and the contents thereof came from the Granovsky brothers, not the settlor."

"...The short answer to that contention is that the evidence shows that no settlement was made or contemplated by Miss Stein in the terms of the executed trust documents. They were drawn by the Appellant's Solicitor on the instructions of the Granovskys. The only gifts she ever made were the personal ones to Philip and Irving with super imposed thereon the expressed wish as to what they should do with the money..."¹⁵⁸

In *Herdegen v. F.C.T.*¹⁵⁹ a married couple argued that shares held by them individually were held in trust for corporate tax recoupment purposes but no documents were drawn up and the spouse didn't understand the alleged conversation which supposedly caused her to create the trust out of her shares. Upon questioning by the Commissioner's counsel it became obvious that she didn't know what she was doing:

"Can you remember what you said?"

"I just left it to him (the husband)."

"Can you remember how many shares were to be held for these people?"

"No."

"Any particular reason for that, that you can't recall it?"

¹⁵⁸ See also Parker v. Westby & others, 1941 Q.S.R. 47, for a letter not creating an express trust though purported otherwise due to the vagueness in who were to be the beneficiaries which created a resulting trust in favor of the giftor.

¹⁵⁹ 84 A.L.R. 271 (FCA)

"Well, there was probably some form of conversation at the time but I just really don't recall it, you know; what was said I probably, something was probably said at the time and I just left it to John."

"Why did you leave it to him?"

"I always leave all of my business to him."

Sound familiar; no trust was created. Settlor intention (and not mere motive) is critical to the creation of the trust.¹⁶⁰

In *Ablan Leon (1964) Ltd. v. M.N.R.*¹⁶¹ a "settlor" issued 43 cheques to his brother-in-law to create 43 separate trusts to be used in an income splitting/corporation association avoidance scheme and did so, in his own words, to fulfil "the purpose of the trust and the purpose of my brothers-in-law". No trust documents were created until subsequently and the cheques were not impressed with directions for any particular trust. (They were all for nominal amounts.) The trusts really weren't meant to be in this case since the purported settlor was acting as a nominee in the tax scheme, did not familiarize himself with the trusts terms and was only "to drive in the pegs upon which the tax minimization scheme was to hang"¹⁶². As per Megarry V.C. in *Tito v. Waddell*¹⁶³ acknowledging the frequent and sometimes incorrect use of the term trust to describe an arrangement:

"In every case one has to look to see whether in the circumstances of the case, and on the trust construction of what was said and written, a sufficient intention to create a true trust has been manifested."¹⁶⁴

One of the only ways a trust may be created without settlor intention is where the court steps in to impose a constructive trust in an unjust and inequitable situation¹⁶⁵.

One should note the similarities and dissimilarities between Kingsdale Securities and Atinco Paper being the former concerned the timing of the creation of the trusts, whereby the trust could not come into existence until the three certainties were ascertainable while the latter did not concern the timing of the trust creation, but instead questioned whether the trusts had in fact been constituted when one of the certainties (intention to create) was missing. Both "trusts" were extensively documented and attested to by the respective parties however the latter, though formally substantiated, lacked one of the main characteristics being the conveyance of valuable consideration with intention to create a trust. Documentary evidence is only prima facie proof of its content as per Barnes and Chrustie (post). Though a lack of it may prove more critical in trying to prove a trust merely having it is not conclusive and the actions of the parties must be an issue.

The *Official Assignee v. Wilson*¹⁶⁶ is very illustrative of what a court will look to in determining whether a purported trust is a sham or an alter ego of the settlor when the constituting documentation was in order but the conduct of the parties afterwards was such that the settlor practically continued to carry on the trustee functions as his own but did have all transactions posted in the trust's name. While weak on references to streams of other jurisprudence this case does get into the nitty-gritty of where a court will split hairs as to the extent of how far into a trust environment a settlor can project his involvement without it being considered a sham. In this case, a sham was not proven and all conduct was acceptable.

Paul Antle v. The Queen, 2009 TCC 465, is very illustrative of documentary evidence being used to impeach the idea that a trust was even created. In this Tax Court case the taxpayer ostensibly attempted to hive off assets to a Sec. 73(1) spousal trust, in which ostensibly he actually "had no trust", by executing

¹⁶⁰ See Corozo Pty. Ltd. v. Total Aust. Ltd., 1988 Qd. R. 366, Re: Armstrong, 1960 V.R. 202, Commr. of Stamp Duty v. Jolliffe, 28 C.L.R. 178, McPherson v. L'Hirondelle, 1927 S.C.R. 429, Kauter v. Hilton, 90 C.L.R. 86, Re: Wall, 25 A.L.R. 615, & Austin v. Keele, 72 A.L.R. 579, Paul v. Constance, 1971 1 W.L.R. 527, Williams v. Lloyd, 50 C.L.R. 341, Re: Lamshed, 1970 S.A.S.R. 224, Comp. of Stamps v. Howard-Smith, 54 C.L.R. 614, Winter v. Grady, 21 S.R. (N.S.W.) 686, Teasdale v. Webb, 57 W.N. (N.S.W.) 151. In Baldassarra v. M.N.R., 91 D.T.C. 289, mere intention for offspring to benefit wasn't sufficient to create a trust when it wasn't acted upon/evidenced in incorporating documentation/subscription declarations.

¹⁶¹ 76 D.T.C. 6280 FCA

¹⁶² One has to ask if it is possible to have a nominee create a trust for a principal and have the principal recognized to be the settlor.

¹⁶³ 1977 3 All E.R. 129

¹⁶⁴ See also Case R3, 84 A.T.C. 120.

¹⁶⁵ Re: Hope, 1985 59 A.L.R. 609, Allen v. Snyder, 1977 2 N.S.W.L.R. 685.

¹⁶⁶ [2006] 2 N.Z.L.R. 841 HCNZ

the sale of the assets that were to be held by the trust when the trust actually hadn't been created in respect of them. Judge Campbell J. Miller held appropriately:

"[58] With certainty of intention and certainty of subject matter in question and, more significantly, no actual transfer of shares, there is no properly constituted trust: the Trust never came into existence. This conclusion emphasizes how important it is, in implementing strategies with no purpose other than avoidance of tax, that meticulous and scrupulous regard be had to timing and execution. Backdating of documents, fuzzy intentions, lack of transfer documents, lack of discretion, lack of commercial purpose, delivery of signed documents distributing capital from the trust prior to its purported settlement, all frankly miss the mark – by a long shot. They leave an impression of elaborate window dressing. In short, if you are going to play the avoidance game, it is not enough to have brilliant strategy, you must have brilliant execution. I find no Trust was duly constituted. The Trust's appeal is therefore quashed. With respect to Mr. Antle's appeal, with no valid trust he either sold the shares to his wife and triggered a gain in his hands or he rolled the shares to his wife and had the gain attributed back to him. Either way, he has been correctly assessed on the resulting capital gain, and his appeal is dismissed."

On appeal the Court further held that:

"[3] The assessments in question arise from a sale of shares by the appellant to a Canadian arm's length purchaser. In order to shelter the resulting capital gain from tax, the appellant embarked on a plan known in tax circles as a capital step-up strategy. In summary, the plan was for the appellant to settle a Barbados trust in favour of his wife, to convey the subject shares to the Trust which would then sell the shares to his wife, who in turn would sell them to the arm's length purchaser. This series of transactions was to take place in sequence in the course of the same day so that the proceeds of disposition would find their way back into the appellant's newly incorporated business the next day by way of a loan from his wife. Documents purporting to give effect to this plan were executed on December 14, 1999 and the Trust was said to have come to an end in early 2000 upon payment of the trustee's account.

...

[5] The first assessment issued by the Minister disregards the interim sale of the shares to the Trust on the basis, inter alia, that the Trust was not validly constituted, and levies the applicable tax in the appellant's hands on the assumption that the shares were sold directly to the arm's length purchaser. The second assessment was issued on the alternative assumption that the Trust did acquire the shares before they were sold to the arm's length purchaser, and is liable to the applicable tax.

...

[7] In support of his appeal, the appellant submits that the Tax Court judge applied the wrong legal test to determine if the Trust had been validly constituted and that he incorrectly determined that there had been an abuse of the Act and the Treaty. The Trust likewise maintains that it was validly constituted and that the assessment issued against it ought to have been vacated solely because it had been dissolved at the time when the assessment was issued, and the Act does not empower the Minister to assess a Trust which no longer exists.

...

[9] The appellant does not dispute that he never intended to grant the trustee control of, or discretion over, the shares. Nor does the appellant challenge the factual finding of the Tax Court judge that, when all surrounding circumstances are considered, there was a failure of certainty of intention in this case. The sole attack against the Tax Court judge's conclusion is that it is based on circumstances that are external to the trust deed which is otherwise clear and unambiguous. The contention is that this amounts to an error of law.

...

[11] It would be a surprising result if courts were bound by the formal expression of the parties and could not look to the surrounding circumstances, including the conduct of the parties, in assessing whether the intent to settle a trust is present. Indeed, in Fraser v. Minister of National Revenue, 91 DTC 5123 at page 5128, Reed J. stated that both the written documents and the actions of the parties were to be considered in the determination of the intention of the parties:

... in any event, intention is determined by all of the evidence, including the conduct of the parties and the terms of the written documentation which flowed between them, and not merely on the basis of one person's subjective view.

On appeal, (95 DTC 5685), this Court reiterated that a finding of whether or not a trust has been created was to be made on the facts of the case, as evidenced by both the documents and the actions of the parties.

[12] A test that requires one to look at all of the circumstances, and not just the words of the trust deed, is an approach that appears to have been adopted by Canadian courts generally. In Mohr v. C.J.A. (1991), 40 E.T.R. 12, for instance the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that (p. 13):

While the words "trust", "trustees", and "trust deed" appear from time to time in the agreement, and there is an incomprehensible reference to "a liquidation trust provision in keeping with the current Trust Act of B.C.," those words and expressions are not determinative of the issue. The task of the Court is to construe the agreement against the background facts to determine "objectively the 'aim' of the transaction".

[My emphasis]

...

[16] The authors of Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada, 3rd Edition, Thomson Carswell at page 145 address the concept of a sham as it applies to the very situation with which the Tax Court judge was confronted:

What is the position if the terms of the trust instrument appear usual in character, but the actual intention is to disregard those terms and for the settler, either as trustee himself or as instructor of the trustee, to retain control of the assets and do with the trust property as he pleases? This hidden intention being revealed, is the trust void as a "sham", or is the trust valid but the trustee is acting in breach of trust?

The term "sham" in English and offshore parlance, adopted in Canada, is not a precise term. It is more a turn of speech; its meaning has been given as "something that is not what it seems; a counterfeit" (Black's Law Dictionary, 7th ed. (St-Paul. Minn.: West Group 2000)). It originated in England with regard to transactions, to which of course there are always at least two parties, and it means the parties' true intent is that others shall be misled by the terms appearing in the transactional instrument. The real terms are something other, and the instrument is therefore declared void. Used in the trust law setting, now a practice in Canada as elsewhere, it describes a trust that the courts will declare void because the provisions in the trust instrument do not represent the settlor's true intent as to the terms upon which the trustee is to hold the trust asset(s). Though the trust instrument sets out the persons or purposes that are to benefit, the settlor's true intent is to retain control of the assets purportedly held in trust because the true intent is to appear to have disposed of the assets and so to evade tax, to defeat personal creditors, or prejudice the claim of an estranged spouse or the children of the relationship. A trust created by the settlor who declares himself the trustee of the property, rather than make a transfer of assets to another as trustee, lends itself to this misrepresenting behaviour. But another as trustee who agrees to assist the falsity, or who is indifferent to whether, in fact, he merely implements the settlor's decisions, will equally enable the assertion to be made that the fraud [sic] [I believe the intended word was "trust"] is but a deception, and consequently void.

...

[18] However, he ruled that there was no intentional deception and therefore no sham (Reasons, para. 71):

The stumbling block for the [r]espondent is that, while all the circumstances point to an arrangement that was inaccurately reflected in the Trust Deed, there was no intentional deception but, if there was deception it was by the very existence of this clever avoidance strategy. Although [the appellant] and [the trustee] and indeed, Mr. Brown, Mr. Devries and Mr. Batallia could all, with some legitimacy, say we believe the trustee always had the discretion to say no, I find they all knew with absolute certainty that the trustee would not say no. The plan was such it made no sense for the trustee to say no.

[My emphasis]

...

[20] In so holding, the Tax Court judge misconstrued the notion of intentional deception in the context of a sham. The required intent or state of mind is not equivalent to mens rea and need not go so far as to give rise to what is known at common law as the tort of deceit (compare MacKinnon v. Regent Trust Company Limited, (2005), J.L.Rev. 198 (CA) at para. 20). It suffices that parties to a transaction present it as being different from what they know it to be. That is precisely what the Tax Court judge found.

[21] When regard is had to the reasons as a whole, it is apparent that the only reason why the Tax Court judge reached the conclusion that he did is his finding that the appellant and the trustee - as well as all participants in the plan - could say "with some legitimacy" that they believed that the trustee had discretion over the shares (Reasons, para. 71). While the claim to "some legitimacy" may show that there was no criminal intent to deceive (as would be required in a prosecution pursuant to subsection 239(1) of the Act) and perhaps no tortious deceit, it does not detract from the Tax Court judge's finding that both the appellant and the trustee gave a false impression of the rights and obligations created between them. Nothing more was required in order to hold that the Trust was a sham.

[22] I respectfully conclude that the Tax Court judge was bound to hold that the Trust was a sham based on the findings that he made."¹⁶⁷

An "executory trust" is a trust which is established in principle being that the intent to create a trust has been recognized and the trust property has been transferred to the trustees but the beneficiaries and the scope of their interests have not yet been specified¹⁶⁸, while an "executed trust" is a trust which is a trust that has been reduced to writing and agreed to be the settlor and acknowledged by the trustee; in essence, a trust the terms of which can be referred to through a review of the documentation. The mere fact that the courts will recognize executory trusts and give them consideration and protection equal to that afforded "validly" constituted executed trusts offers a very offensive method of providing flexibility in tax planning in that if an executory trust can be proven to have come into, or been in, existence at a given point of time without supporting, (or in some cases disproving), documentation, then the relevant taxpayers may be quite capable of gaining from available provisions applicable to the trust¹⁶⁹. In complex trust situations obviously in order to maintain the rights of the beneficiaries the trust will need to be substantiated in writing however in cases where simple relationships exist, the trust need not be put to writing if other valid forms of evidence of its existence and of its nature can be recognized. There is no provision in the Act which requires a trust to be evidenced in writing, (although in the case of certain non-resident trusts recognized under section 94 there is an indirect requirement). When a beneficiary's interest fails due to lack of certainty or other reasons, which includes an executory trust situation, the property is held on resulting trust for the settlor¹⁷⁰ or in a testamentary situation for the residuary beneficiaries¹⁷¹. Subsection 75(2) would apply to the executory trust generally due to the fact the property may revert to him and also the contributor may have control over to whom it will pass subsequently. If alternative directions are given on the initial transfer so as to cause the property to be conveyed to a certain party (creditor, ¹⁶⁷ See also the Aust. case of Keach & Keach and Ors [2011] FamCA 192 (9 March 2011) for an interesting examination of elements of sham trusts in a divorce proceeding.

¹⁶⁸ Re: Bostock's Settlement, 1921 2 Ch. 469, & Re: Flavel's Will Trusts, 1969 1 W.L.R. 444.

¹⁶⁹ There must be an intention to create a trust when the property is conveyed.

¹⁷⁰ Boyce v. Boyce, 1849 16 Sim 476

¹⁷¹ though the terms of the disposing deed will obviously be important in ascertaining the secondary destination of the interest charitable institution), so that reversion isn't possible. Sec. 75(2)(a)(ii) is still satisfied notwithstanding no resulting trust arises. Executory trusts do however have a use in, amongst others, reducing the impact of the Sec. 256(1.2)(f) trust-beneficiary corporation association rules, facilitating residency cost bumps in certain situations, etc. though if Sec. 75(2) applies to the arrangement Sec. 107(4.1) may create hardship when any and all trust property is subsequently distributed¹⁷².

Proving in the Absence of Documentation.

The burden of establishing that there was an intention to create a trust is on the person who alleges that a trust was created.^{173 174}

The classic case of the executed trust being treated in the tax environment as valid without being substantiated with documentation is that of *E. Bouchard v. The Queen*¹⁷⁵ where a taxpayer purchased a house solely for his son, whereby he held the legal title thereto until the son paid him consideration. The Minister, not one to miss a free lunch, or listen to facts, assessed the taxpayer as making a disposition of the property to the son under Sec. 69(1), when title was finally conveyed, for fair market value proceeds, instead of treating the disposition as that of a tax-free distribution, to be handled by Sec. 107(2). The facts of the case are fairly simple; the taxpayer purchased a house for his son due to his lack of funds and financial credibility on the agreement that the son and his wife repay him. The plaintiff took on a mortgage secured by the property with the vender while the sale itself was closed with the vender understanding and accepting the fact that the house was being purchased for the son, and that the legal title would be transferred thereto upon the plaintiff realizing the payments from him. The father plaintiff computed monthly payments to be made by the son, a significant portion of which could be described as interest, and in the meantime the son and wife occupied the house as if it were their own. The plaintiff recognized the excess of the payment received from the son over that paid by him to the vender in respect of the mortgage as rent and declared it in his income whereupon he deducted capital cost allowance on the house. The beneficiary son and wife made substantial additions and alterations to the property as they occupied it and it was only when they planned on taking a trip that they accordingly recognized that a written declaration should be made whereupon an "Agreement of Sale and Purchase" was entered into to attest to some degree of interest they had in the property¹⁷⁶. The Minister recognizing their version of the facts where a property had been bought by a father and "sold" to a son for consideration less than its FMV pounced under the pretence of Sec. 69(1)(b), assessing the father. The whole arrangement was a direct result of the personal attribute of the father being his utter rejection of ever guaranteeing or endorsing loans of someone else, including his son, hence he could not co-sign for his son's mortgage, however he also didn't want to loan directly to the son the amount needed as consideration to buy the home directly. One of the main issues also concerned whether the plaintiff was eligible to prove a "parole" trust while the Judge commented on three cases involving the applicability of the Statute of Frauds to parole evidence use to 172 That subsection applies only to property and not businesses and only when the contributor is resident in Canada.

173 Herdegen v. F.C.T. (1988) 84 A.L.R. 271 In that case the two taxpayers agreed, I guess, to sit at a kitchen table and said to the beneficiaries that they held shares in their corporation for the benefit of the purported beneficiaries' benefit, but did absolutely nothing to evidence it or act on it. When the shares were sold the taxpayer's attempted to contend that they held them as bare trustees. The taxpayer's straight-faced claim failed EVERYWHERE when the court considered FCT v. Clarke (1927) 40 C.L.R. 246, McPhail v. Doulton [1971] A.C. 424 Rollestone v. National Bank of Commerce (1923) 252 SW 394, Busch v. Truitt (1945) 160 P 2d 925, Pullan v. Koe [1919] 1 Ch 9, Sackville-West v. Holmesdale (1870) LR 4 HL and Pass v. Mills (1886) 7 LR(NSW) (Eq) 34. See also a humorous Aust. case of Fletcher v George & Ors [2011] FMCA 553 where just about everything was tried to prove a poorly documented trust.

174 It is not important that the term "trust" actually be used in the documentation creating it – it can be established from external sources and circumstances: Valeress Pty Ltd v Valenest Pty Limited (in liquidation) [2011] NSWSC 465 (20 May 2011). See also the examination of whether a trust has been established in a less than formal situation between siblings' expressions in the Aust. case of Sheikholeslami v Tolcher [2011] FCA 1050 (9 September 2011). See also the recent case of Sutherland v Woods [2011] NSWSC 13 (3 February 2011) for conflicting testimony on the creation of trusts for Aust. tax purposes that ran astray for other purposes. While also see the Aust. case of Georgas and Department of Family and Community Services [2002] AATA 371 (20 May 2002) concerning proving an oral express trust.

175 83 D.T.C. 5193 FCTD

176 The agreement was drawn up by lawyers of the father.

substantiate oral trusts, one of the main ones being *Hull v. Allan*¹⁷⁷ wherein Boyd, C. commented:

"...the parole evidence was insufficient to establish a case in the acquisition of land held by the defendant so as to give relief to the plaintiff notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. Doubtless the law as set forth in James v. Smith, [1891] 1 Ch. 388, (384 is the correct page) is modified and perhaps changed entirely by Rochefoucauld v. Boustead, [1897] 1. Ch. 196; but it is essential that the evidence of such alleged trust be clear and complete to the satisfaction of the Court."

In Rochefoucauld v. Boustead it was held appropriately by Lindley, L.J. that:

"But it is not necessary that the trust should have been declared by such a writing in the first instance: it is sufficient if the trust can be proved by some writing signed by the defendant, and the date of the writing is immaterial."

"...It is further established by a series of cases, the propriety of which cannot now be questioned, that the Statute of Frauds does not prevent the proof of a fraud: and that it is a fraud on the part of a person to whom land is conveyed as a trustee, and who knows it was so conveyed, to deny the trust and claim the land himself. Consequently, notwithstanding the statute, it is competent for a person claiming land conveyed to another to prove by parole evidence that it was so conveyed upon trust for the claimant, and that the grantee, knowing the facts, is denying the trust and relying upon the form of conveyance and the Statute, in order to keep the land himself."

Cattanach J. then went on to comment:

"When a trust may be established by parole despite the Statute of Frauds as I accept as a premise in this appeal sound policy demands that its existence must be brought within reasonable certainty and not left within the realm of conjecture."

The evidence that needs to be provided in court must be clear and complete as to the existence of the trust which would include the existence of the specific characteristics of the trust and thus the parole evidence provided must attest with clarity to the existence of the three certainties required of any trust.¹⁷⁸

Cattanach J. found that as per the claim of a trust the Court should ask itself and obtain clear answers to the following questions:

- "1: is the claim supported by probability?
- 2: is it supported by writing in any form?
- 3: is it supported by any indisputable facts?
- 4: is it supported by disinterested testimony?
- 5: is the parole evidence quite satisfactory and convincing?"

As per the first question the Court examined most of the substantial aspects of the situation being that the plaintiff was an unusual individual and had legitimate cause to structure the deal in the manner he did. The Minister contended that since the plaintiff had recognized the payments from the son as rent in his income, and since he held legal title and also claimed C.C.A. and maintenance expenses, as if he were realizing income from rental property, at the least the relationship consisted solely of a proprietor - tenant nature however the Judge quite accordingly disposed of the argument as the fault of the C.A.s who prepared the tax returns and didn't comprehend what they were dealing with:

"The plaintiff's income tax returns were prepared by chartered accountants retained by him. The monthly income received was income to which the adjective "rental" was applied as was logical to do rather than embark upon an explanation, as the chartered accountant sought to do later after the fact of assessment without a full appreciation of the legal implications involved in reaching the result they did."

A particularly interesting aspect about the arrangement was that the plaintiff claimed C.C.A. and recognized income from the property in computing his own personal income, and while he was the legal owner of the property, the Judge provided that, "that does not detract from the possibility that as legal owner he held the property in trust for the equitable owner". The interesting part that obviously isn't described anywhere in the case text is that to recognize income as such and to claim C.C.A. in respect of the property held in trust he plaintiff must have also been recognized implicitly as the income beneficiary of the trust with respect to $76.00 net inflow of funds. In substance what the plaintiff had done, could have been done instead through an executed trust, that being that he had purchased the property and assumed the mortgage to the vender as trustee, paid mortgage payments as trustee, received payments from his son, as trustee, but received a certain excess net amount from the trust as income from a property which was an interest in a trust, but only after he, as a trustee, had deducted C.C.A. and maintenance expenses. Although he obviously did not file the appropriate documentation in respect of the separate tax entities but instead fused them together the deductions were still allowed. If the trust had been documented he would have deducted C.C.A. at the level of the beneficiary or could have deducted both it and maintenance expense at the trust level.¹⁷⁹¹⁸⁰

¹⁷⁷ [1902] 1 O.W.N. 782.

¹⁷⁸ See Re: Johnson, 1962 30 D.L.R. (2d) 474, Owchar v. Owchar, 1949 2 W.W.R. 97, Farrar v. Commr. of S.D., 1975 5 A.T.R. 364, Re: Riffel Estate, 28 E.T.R. 1, Re: Snowden, 1979 Ch. 528, Bloch v. Bloch, 55 A.L.J.R. 701, and Last v. Rosenfeld, 1972 2 N.S.W.L.R. 923.

Cattanach, J. also commented on the fact that the son and wife had made substantial expenditures altering the property:

"That is not consistent with the relationship of tenant and landlord between the plaintiff's son and the plaintiff. Rather it is more consistent with the relationship of beneficiary of a trust and the trustee...It is a principle of equity that a beneficiary who is induced to change his position in reliance on a trust as reason for incurring an expense may well be entitled to a lien for compensation on the property or a right to the conveyance of the legal title. This is particularly so if the person in the position of beneficiary did so in the belief that he owned the property, that he was encouraged in that belief by the person in the position as nominal owner, or such owner stood by and let such beneficiary make the expenditure without disabusing his mind."¹⁸¹

With these facts in mind the Judge found it quite probable that a trust existed while with respect to evidence in writing he turned to the Agreement to Purchase and Sell entered into by the parties quoting:

"I say this because of the statement in Lewin on Trusts (16th Ed. at page 25) that "The trust, however late the proof, operates retrospectively from the time of its creation" and the remarks of Lindley, L.J. in Rochefoucauld v. Boustead (supra) already quoted but here repeated that "it is sufficient if the trust can be proved by some writing signed by the defendant and the date of the writing is immaterial." The Chairman placed reliance on the circumstance that "trust" was not mentioned by the plaintiff until the assessment was contested. I attach no particular significance to the plaintiff's failure to do so. There is ample authority for the proposition that equity looks at the intent rather than at the form. It is quite clear ¹⁷⁹ See also Jeffries v. Stevens, 56 T.C. 134, for similar instance where incorporators of a corporation lacking financial integrity purchased in their names property and arranging for financing then "rented" it to the corporation where the rent was to essentially pay for the property whereafter legal title would be transferred. Beneficial ownership didn't pass to the corporation and rent was deductible by the corporation where there wasn't any declaration of trust only that corporation to ultimately benefit. See also Sec., Dept. of Social Security v. James, 95 A.L.R. 615 (F.C. of Aust.), where a parent purchased a house for her mentally infirm daughter and provided various expressions that the house was purchased for her in correspondence while she also provided that should the daughter not need it it would be disposed of but the proceeds would be used exclusively to benefit her. The fact that nominal "rent" was charged to the daughter who had a stream of relief did not undermine the fact that a trust had been established. Paul v. Constance, 1977 1 W.L.R. 527, provides a very good example of where repeated expressions amounting to the gift and recognition of a past gift of a beneficial interest were held to have created a trust. The phrase "This money is as much yours as mine" repeated was imperative and though there was no express disclosure of the sums being held on trust such did not detract from the passage of beneficial interest after the numerous expressions.

¹⁸⁰ See also Thexton v. Thexton [2001] 1 N.Z.L.R. 237 HCNZ, where it was held:

"In order to create a trust there must have been either a transfer of the shares or a declaration of trust by David Junior so as to bring about complete constitution. Whilst it is not difficult to find an intention on the part of David Junior, the existence of a declaration of trust presents problems. There is no written document existing so other evidence of the existence of such a declaration is required. If the trust is not completely constituted then absent consideration on the part of the beneficiary, the trust is not binding on the settlor: equity will not assist a volunteer. A declaration of trust does not require a technical form of expression, it is a question of construction whether the words used, taking into account the surrounding circumstances, amount to a declaration of trust: Paul v. Constance [1977] 1 All ER 195. Where no words exhibiting the necessary intent are used it may in exceptional cases be possible to infer a declaration of trust from acts showing that a person has constituted themselves as trustee, ie from conduct evincing an intent to deal with his property so that somebody feels to his own exclusion acquires the beneficial interest in his property."

¹⁸¹ For proprietary estoppel see Chalmers v. Pardoe, 1963 3 All E.R. 552 (PC), Dillwyn v. Llewellyn, 1862 4 De G & E & J 517/45 E.R. 1285, Dagley v. Dagley, 1906 38 N.S.R. 313 (CA), Campbell v. Campbell, 1932 3 D.L.R. 501, Pascoe v. Turner, 1979 1 W.L.R. 431 (CA). See the five essential conditions for proprietary estoppel in Crabb v. Arun District Council, 1979 Ch. 179. See also Loone v. Tasmanian Trustees Ltd., 1987 Tas. R. 146, for situation similar to Bouchard.

that a trust can be created without the use of the word "trust". Intention is a question of fact to be proven as any other fact is to be proven. If from the facts the interest that the plaintiff intended to be given to his son is clear then that is the interest he gave."¹⁸²

Understandably a simple agreement for purchase and sale may not in itself prove the existence of a trust since, if vaguely worded, all it would provide for was a binding commitment to dispose of and acquire property by respective parties. The technical attributes of the Agreement in Bouchard were not commented upon by the court (however the final conveyance deed was), and from this it should be recognized that the court could not find, from a review of the speech therein, a reference, implicit or otherwise, to an executory trust, and thus the Agreement was interpreted as being a component of the larger transaction. If the Agreement would have been phrased so as to draw attention to the circumstances in which the property was purchased initially, as well as the reason for which the agreement was being made, giving recognition to the acquirors as beneficiaries or those beneficially interested from the start of the series of transactions, the Court could have placed far more reliance on the Agreement.

Perhaps the linch-pin of the evidence came in the form of the impartial, "disinterested" testimony, provided by the original vender of the property to the plaintiff, when she provided testimony substantiating the claim that the property was expressly, (orally), purchased for the son. The Judge was also of the opinion that the son and wife acquirors were also "disinterested" parties since the only parties to the question were the Minister of National Revenue and the plaintiff father, while the son or wife had themselves "nothing to gain from the proceedings". Cattanaach, J. found Mrs. Unger's evidence to confirm the plaintiff's contention and since he found her to have all of the attributes of a good disinterested party; impartiality, independence and credibility, he found her testimony (and more importantly credibility) unimpeachable. An important note must be made here being the vender of the property to the "trustee" was a very good disinterested party but such parties could come in many forms such as inquisitive potential third party purchasers of the property, friends of the family who were independent, etc. Essentially a disinterested party could be literally invented "at the drop of a hat" so as to meet the needs.

In Bouchard the evidence provided by the plaintiff was considered satisfactory and convincing enough to substantiate the existence of an undocumented executed trust, the singular property of which was the legal title to a dwelling, however, it was the sheer bulk of the evidence, and its mutually confirming aspects that allowed the Federal Court Trial Division to consider it adequate.¹⁸³

Belton v. I.R.C.¹⁸⁴ illustrates the quality of evidence that must be provided to prove an oral trust and have it recognized retroactively to the date of declaration by the settlor. In this case the settlor declared himself trustee to hold property on trust for his offspring whereafter live stock was purchased in the offspring's name, proceeds from its realization were received in his name on an on-going basis while a separate bank account was opened, (under the offspring's name), to handle the proceeds. The trust was initially oral but was documented nine years subsequently. During the activities the livestock was grazed separate from his own while funds were expended on the son. The trustee was recognized to feel compelled to keep the activities separate from his own which indicates his frame of mind. He did borrow money from the offspring's trust accounts to cover a temporary overdraft but this was disclosed on his personal balance sheet as a loan that would have to be ¹⁸² It seems interesting that the matter of expressing an equitable interest in the property was carried out through an agreement to purchase and sell when the solicitors of the plaintiff should have recognized the essence of the arrangement, (or were they properly informed as to the initial purpose of the plaintiff actually purchasing the property)?

¹⁸³ See Jane Gardner v M.N.R., 88 D.T.C. 1649 TCC, for a very similar situation resulting from the real purchaser not being financially sound. A dwelling was purchased as trustee expressly for the taxpayer by her spouse due to the fact that the spouse could not provide collateral/stability and didn't have the funds herself at the time and both trustee and taxpayer were to be registered as joint tenants of the property to secure the 100% mortgaged purchase. The trustee had relatively substantial financial integrity. Mortgages were extinguished by the taxpayer when she received the funds from other sales and when the spouse-trustee executed a quit-claim of his legal ownership of the joint tenancy allowing all the legal ownership to reside in the taxpayer-spouse-beneficiary so as to facilitate a sale the Minister contended that such was a transfer within the Sec. 160(1) context and thus the spouse became liable for the husband's tax debt. The court found that the quit claim did not operate to transfer a beneficial interest, that such an interest existed exclusively in the spouse-beneficiary before the execution, and that the husband acted as a trustee only. See also Anderson v. Hervieux, 46 R.F.L. (2d) 230 (SCA).

¹⁸⁴ 1959 N.Z.L.R. 1372 (SC)

repaid.¹⁸⁵ The tax assessors contended that the income from the activities was his during the period in which no documentation existed but the Supreme Court recognized that the intention was clear and the property ascertained while the beneficiaries were specified with clarity. In respect of oral declarations by taxpayers to hold on trust the Court held out certain needs of evidence citing *Lewin on Trusts*¹⁸⁶:

"If the settlor proposes to convert himself into a trustee, then the trust is perfectly created, and will be enforced as soon as the settlor has executed an express declaration of trust intended to be final and binding upon him... In all cases where a declaration of trust is relied on, the Court must be satisfied that a present irrevocable declaration has been made."

while citing *Bentley v. Mackay*¹⁸⁷, *Gee v. Liddell*¹⁸⁸ and Halsbury:

"In case of doubt, the contemporaneous and subsequent acts of the settlor may be looked at."¹⁸⁹

A discussion of the quality required of a disposition to be recognized in the taxation context as an adequate declaration of trust would not be complete if *Thomas Purcell v. D.F.C.T.*¹⁹⁰ were not referred to. In this case the taxpayer declared that he held on trust his sheep station property in Queensland for the benefit of his wife and daughter and himself with respect to both capital and income and then went on to carve out exceedingly wide and fundamental powers (that could easily undermine the disposition) to manage the business. Powers reserved to himself to be exercised by and large without regard to any fiduciary obligation included: to carry on or wind-down the business, mortgage and give security "as if I were the absolute owner thereof and that these presents had not been executed", sell or dispose of the business or solicit partners, use the trust premises without interference from those beneficially interested in them, appoint new trustees though disallow them from compelling transfer of title to them and preventing them from ascertaining income entitlements of the beneficiaries, while if he were to die without such trustees being nominated the property would revert to his testamentary estate. The abilities of both the beneficiaries and potential trustees to interfere with his administrative or dispositive powers were substantially eliminated and when he was assessed in respect of the business's income in a subsequent year the trust deed, though unregistered, was forwarded as evidence that the trust existed. Three of the four High Court judges did not find that the retention of substantial managerial or dispositive powers offended any rule of equity while the fourth, dissenting, found that the substance of the powers operated to negate the gift purported to be executed. The trust declaration was recognized as¹⁹¹ valid.¹⁹²

Belton should definitely be compared with *Baldassarra v. M.N.R.*¹⁹³ to illustrate perhaps how superficially the Tax Courts will address a nebulous trust situation where there is a lack of hard proper documentary evidence establishing a clear chronology. In that case the taxpayer/incorporator could not prove that he

¹⁸⁵ See Glynn v. Commr. of S.D., 1977 2 N.S.W.L.R. 673, and Andrews Estate v. M.N.R., 66 D.T.C. 798, for conduct subsequent to declaration evidencing existence notwithstanding personal appropriations.

¹⁸⁶ 15th Ed. p. 51

¹⁸⁷ 51 E.R. 440

¹⁸⁸ 55 E.R. 1038

¹⁸⁹ See also Williams v. Lloyd, 50 C.L.R. 341, and Critchton v. Critchton, 43 C.L.R. 536, for subsequent conduct and declarations as evidence and Perp. Exors. & Trustees Assn. v. Wright, 23 C.L.R. 185, for authenticity of writings and circumstances subsequently evolved. See also Woollends v. Woollends, 1983 41 B.C.L.R. 391, Paul v. Constance, 1977 1 W.L.R. 527 (CA), Re: Kayford Ltd., 1975 1 All E.R. 604, F.C.T. v. Purcell, 29 C.L.R. 464, Cain v. McEacham, 16 V.L.R. 62 though with limits: Stewart Dawson and Co. Pty. Ltd. v. F.C.T., 48 C.L.R. 683, F.C.T. v. Wade, 84 C.L.R. 105, C.I.R. v. Brooks, 1915 A.C. 478. In MacFarlane v. F.C.T., 67 A.L.R. 624, the fact that a taxpayer recognized and paid tax on income from property as if it was his own did not preclude a trust from being recognized in respect of it. Conduct of the parties subsequent to the alleged creation can be used to rebut the existence of the trust: Shephard v. Cartwright, 1955 A.C. 431, Calverley v. Green, 155 C.L.R. 242, and Williams v. Lloyd, 50 C.L.R. 341, or confirm its existence; Boccalatte v. Bushelle, 1980 Qd.R. 180, and Donaldson v. Freeson, 51 C.L.R. 598. See Halsbury's Laws Of Eng., 4th Ed., Vol. 48, para. 605. See Don King Productions Inc. v. Warren and ors., [1998] 2 All E.R. 608 ChD, where it was held that a taxpayer can create a trust out of non-assignable interests in a partnership.

¹⁹⁰ 29 C.L.R. 464 at 468-472

¹⁹¹ See also Tunley v. F.C.T., 39 C.L.R. 528, for valid declaration notwithstanding that the settlor/trustee maintained exceedingly wide dispositive/distributive powers while C. of T. (W.S.) v. Hedges, 1935 3 A.T.D. 255, is another such case.

¹⁹² See also Kitto J. in Glynn v. F.C.T., 111 C.L.R. 169 at 174, for:

"It is true that proof of a formal statement by the owner of property to the effect that he holds it upon trust, for special circumstances may explain the statement as having been due to some other intention than that of creating a trust."

See also Commr. of S.D. v. Joliffe, 28 C.L.R. 178.

¹⁹³ 91 D.T.C. 289 (TCC),

received shares subscribed for as trustee and the weight of incidental evidence suggested that he didn't. The Tax Court judge provided:

"I can find no basis in the evidence for a conclusion that a trust was created. No doubt the appellant intended that the children derive benefit from the operation of the company and that they ultimately become owners of the common shares. However, the existence of that rather imprecise intention is not sufficient to create a binding trust upon the Appellant from the moment the shares were issued to him. There is no evidence of a prior declaration of trust, of issuance to the Appellant as trustee or of the use of trust funds as consideration for the issuance of shares.

The written contemporaneous evidence is entirely consistent with the evidence of an intention on the part of the Appellant to effect a settlement by way of transfer of the common shares to Angela Baldassarra in trust for the children. It may be that Mr. Larson devised a plan whereby the Appellant's wishes in relation to the children might have been carried out in such a way as to avoid the clutches of subsection 75(1). Assuming that such a plan was devised there is simply no evidence that it was carried out. The desire to avoid an adverse tax consequence is not sufficient by itself to conjure up a trust at the precise point in time required to achieve the desired tax result nor is it evidence of a declaration of trust."

In *Caplan v. M.N.R.*¹⁹⁴ a corporation wished land adjacent to land it owned to be purchased for it rather than purchase it itself owing to the fact that if it did problems could arise under the local Planning Act. One of the three shareholders agreed to purchase it under her name, which it was, with the corporation paying the token down payment, registration fee, land transfer tax and legal fees and subsequently administering it paying the taxes and mortgage payments to the vendor. Unfortunately the shareholder reported the income from the land, (rent charged to the corporation), on her personal returns for two years while the subsequent transfer to the corporation was recorded as a "sale" though no consideration was paid. The transfer price was equal to the original purchase price. (The shareholder hadn't paid anything for the property essentially.) The Tax Court judge cited the commentary of D. Waters in The Law of Trusts in Canada on implied trusts:

"The term "implied trust" is commonly used for two situations. First where the intention to create a trust is not clearly expressed but has to be discovered from the indirect and ambiguous language. This is all that distinguishes such an implied trust from the express trust. Secondly, where one [person has gratuitously transferred his property to another, or paid for property and had the property put into another's name. The intention of the transferor or purchaser is implied to be that the transferee is to hold the property on trust for the transferor or purchaser."

Key evidence to rebut the existence of the trust was the lack of clarity with which the particular relationship was described in the corporation's financial statements and although the Bouchard dict was recognized as valid of little relevance was the fact that the corporation was the party which had executed every transaction with respect to the property's title/mortgage etc.. in conclusion for the Minister the Tax Court found that the intention of the corporation was to have beneficial and legal ownership reside with the shareholder so as to allow her to deal with the property to the greatest extent, (quite likely to preclude Planning Act problems from arising), and that the trust didn't exist. (When the property was sold within a short period of time after its receipt by the corporation for an amount approx. 3 times its transfer price the Minister assessed the transfer under Sec. 69(1) causing sever tax consequences for the shareholder.) Does beneficial ownership have to reside with a beneficiary under an implied (resulting) trust and was the fact that it resided with the trustee not due to a legitimate reason, (pursuant to an attempt to avoid the Planning Act problems). Could the avoidance motive not be the base for all of the actions taken by the parties and could the corporation not prove in the courts of equity subsequently if need be that the resulting trust existed when it was the party which orchestrated the purchase, provided the purchase funds, administered the property as if it was its own?¹⁹⁵ In the author's opinion the case should have been appealed.¹⁹⁶

¹⁹⁴ 86 D.T.C. 1489

¹⁹⁵ All of the book entries evidencing a sale could still be legitimately argued to have as their reason the avoidance motive. Facts attesting to intention at the time of the initial purchase could have out-weighted the evidence admitted to rebut the resulting trust.

¹⁹⁶ See Tucker Estate v. Gillis, 22 E.T.R. 73, Boulos v. Boulos, 24 E.T.R. 56, Coverdale v. Griffith, 1977 3 B.C.L.R. 291 (S.C.), Ruff v. Strobel, 1978 3 W.W.R. 588, Russell v. Fenwick, 1927 S.A.S.R. 42, and especially Re: O'Brien v. Walker, 1981 5 A.C.L.R. 564, Roynat Inc. v. Utd. Rescue Services Ltd., 1982 44 C.B.R. (NS) 1 (MCA).

In *J.B. Lansdell v. M.N.R.*¹⁹⁷ the Federal Trial Court had to decide whether a trust existed with respect to a speculation in some shares when one party, having personal accounts at a brokerage firm, acted on behalf of several other unrelated parties whereby he took their monies and gave it to the brokerage firm to invest in particular shares. The taxpayer opened a separate trust account at the firm but the brokerage firm accounted for the relevant transactions very poorly and the taxpayer's personal account was used to perform the purchases and sales. The Minister assessed the taxpayer in respect of the profit earned and included it in his income however the Trial Court found that the evidence provided by the stock broker and the taxpayer's wife was sufficient evidence so as to substantiate the existence of the trust.¹⁹⁸

Obviously a taxpayer will not be doomed if his documentary evidence attesting to the existence of a trust isn't in order, if he has some other credible proof. Such may take the form of insurance contracts, municipal tax bills, land registry entries, etc. listing the ownership of the particular property as in trust. Documentation relating to transactions that refer to the existence of the trust, (and that were executed on the premise of its existence), even though they have no bearing on the trust, or that refer to the trust documents themselves may prove valuable in substantiating the trust's existence if they display the appropriate credibility.¹⁹⁹ In the absence of such the acts must speak for themselves and documentary evidence implicitly not evincing a trust may be determinative and prove insurmountable in proving the trust's existence. This was the case in Baldassarra and Caplan as well as latterly *Barnes v. M.N.R.*²⁰⁰ where two spouses each owned 50% of a common corporation and the husband unilaterally had $45,000 of the corporate funds advanced to a friend's corporation to buy shares the motive of which was to help the friend's corporation. the shares were listed in the husband's name on the corporation's register as on his personal account without any trust and were sold by him whereafter the proceeds were deposited in the spousal corporation's account and part of the realization credited the "loan receivable" account that had been set up to eliminate it while the balance was used to create a "loan payable to shareholders account" and was distributed equally between his spouse and himself. Although the spouse had initially discussed the plan with him she did not get involved with the dealings and it was thoroughly a one-men show. The Tax Court held that the spouse shareholder had actually received a loan from his corporation on his personal account and had invested in the shares not as a trustee for himself and his spouse but exclusively for himself and the fact that he didn't take steps to have the share register corrected to reflect a trust when he had all the opportunity in the world or to more elaborately account for the corporation's loan with a journal entry indicating the trust relationship indicated that the situation had been properly described and that his exclusive oral testimony was of little weight. Proper descriptions in books of record are and will continue to be a major stumbling block until taxpayers recognize that in such an "official" medium it's critical to "say what you mean".

In *Morris v. M.N.R.*²⁰¹ the credibility of the witnesses attesting to the existence of a trust as well as that of the fiduciary documentation itself was definitely lacking in integrity and the Exchequer Court found that no trust existed. The main essence of the case was that property had been conveyed to the taxpayer for the expressed consideration of natural love and affection...and $2. The taxpayer's father, as well as mother and the taxpayer had initially acquired the property as joint tenants and not as tenants in common while his surviving father was the party that transferred the legal title solely to him. Prior to this conveyance the taxpayer's wife, (a practicing lawyer), had assumed a mortgage lien on the property albeit under a trust agreement whereby the particular taxpayer was to manage, (at times in accompany with his wife), the property which produced rental revenue, using the proceeds to pay down the mortgage, while what remained was to be shared by him and his two sisters equally. The particular taxpayer thus collected the rents...and didn't pay over the relevant share to his two sisters, and the trust agreement was initiated by his wife, herself being an intricate factor and was carried out, through her law office, but was never registered. The taxpayer during the years in questions received ¹⁹⁸ In Hunter v. Moss, [1994] 3 All E.R. 215 CA, it was held that when a oral trust statement was with respect to 5% of the sole class of shares of a corporation, the fact that that property could be ascertained allowed the trust to come into being notwithstanding that the settlor also owned additional shares of the sole class.

¹⁹⁷ 72 D.T.C. 6057

¹⁹⁹ See Ash Street Prop. Pty. Ltd. & Ors. v. Pollow & Ors., 87 A.T.C. 4606 (SCNSW), as well as "The Trust of Real Estate vs. The Registry Act.", R.R. Anger, E. & T.Q., 1988-89 pg. 340.

²⁰⁰ 86 D.T.C. 1546 TCC

²⁰¹ 63 D.T.C. 1044 (Exch)

mortgages on the property, the proceeds of which were never divided with his sisters, and in applying for the mortgages he listed his ownership as fee simple and thus had the right to convey the property. The sisters of the taxpayer, who were also supposedly beneficiaries under the supposed trust had never received anything from the property, nor had they, it seemed, being advised that they were in fact beneficiaries of the supposed trust since they were in a safe position to have their respective rights measured and protected, (being related either as spouse or parent to lawyers), had they been. The evidence (Registrar's Abstract of Title) showed that the appellant was the sole owner of the property and there was no documentary evidence which referred to the unregistered trust agreement after it was constituted. The evidence showed that the appellant had been assessed as sole owner for purposes of municipal property taxes in the relevant years, while he had arranged for several mortgages on the property, as sole owner, the relevant share of the proceeds of which, net or otherwise were not paid to his sisters, as required by the trust agreement. The most damning of evidence was that he had not paid anything to the sisters in respect of the proposed rights, rights the beneficiaries acquaintances would have definitely upheld had they been recognized. As closing comment Cameron, J. held in respect of the rental income of the trust:

"But I am quite unable to accept the evidence of the appellant when it is in conflict with either documentary evidence or with other oral evidence. His explanation of the manner in which he has dealt with these receipts is quite incredible. That he did receive them in his personal capacity is not open to question. He has been collecting them since 1948 and has not paid one cent to his sisters nor accounted to them in any way. At the conclusion of his evidence, he did say that he held them in trust under the trust agreement and that he still had them "on hand" although declined to state where or on what form they now are. He said, also, that his sisters were entitled to a share therein, but he had not paid it over as he did not want them to dissipate the money - namely, money which he now says belonged to them, each being presumably a woman of mature years. Finally, he said that his wife at some unspecified time had demanded that he return the money to her, but he had refused to do so. His wife, however, made no mention of such demand. Now he says he is willing to turn over the shares to the sisters if they demand it. Frankly, I do not believe his last-minute conversion to the theory that he held the money in trust and made for the first time fifteen years after he first began to receive the payments and under pressure of a demand for income tax there on."

Obviously the five aspects needed to prove even undocumented trusts as described by Judge Cattnach in *Bouchard v. The Queen*²⁰² could not be satisfied in the Morris case. The "trust" was supported by a trust deed of questionable integrity, while the trust arrangement could not be supported by indisputable facts. The claim for the existence of the trust could not be recognized as supported by probability, nor could it be supported by disinterested testimony. If the sisters under the trust deed had brought an action against the trustees in Morris, (essentially against the action of the appellant), although the appellant would obviously sustain an immense liability at least the trust would have been legitimately recognizable.²⁰³

Implied Trusts.

A trust need not be evidenced in writing if the intentions of the parties involved are known by each other and thus the actions of the parties as a consequence of relying on those tacitly recognized intentions may suffice to provide adequate proof of the existence of the fiduciary environment. In *Rolf Drescher v. The Queen*²⁰⁴ the Federal Court Trial Division had to decide whether an implied trust existed with respect to the ownership of a 1 million dollar lottery winning, (and thus the interest revenue thereupon), when the entire process of claiming the prize was carried out by one individual, "the head of the family". The taxpayer, and his wife and daughter, had habitually purchased lottery tickets the incidental winnings therefrom being "replayed" after being unanimously agreed upon by the three. The particular winning ticket was purchased by one of the group although his/her identity could not be determined and when "the jackpot" was realized the father and wife picked up the cheque together the cheque being made out to the father since it was solely he who had placed his name on the back of the ticket. Through the publicity and process at the lottery offices the two of them expressed what "they" would do with the money and at home afterwards, in private the daughter joined in to plan the investment thereof in a term deposit. The Minister attempted to assess the father on the total amount of the interest income from the term deposit since the investment was made solely in his name as per the bank's books, (which were in the process of being changed so as to make notice to the fact that the wife and the daughter were also joint owners of the term deposit). In the second year after the winning impending tax law complications were recognized and a trust declaration was drawn up the most crucial provision of which was:

202 83 D.T.C. 5193

203 See Starr v. Starr, 1935 S.A.S.R. 263, Re: McGuire, 41 W.A.L.R. 120, Re: Appleby's Estate, 25 Tas. L.R. 126, but Re: Lamshed, 1970 S.A.S.R. 224, Perp. Exors. & Trustees Assn. of Aust. Ltd. v. Wright, 23 C.L.R. 185, Re: Hampton, 1922 S.A.S.R. 286. Not every arrangement will give rise to a trust if the term "trust" is used to describe it: Te Teira Te Paea v. Te Roera Tareha, 1902 A.C. 56, Tito v. Waddell, 1977 3 All E.R. 129, Re: H. B. Haina & Assc. Inc., 1978 86 D.L.R. 262, F.C.T. v. Higgins, 44 C.L.R. 297, Kinlock v. Sec. of State for India, 1819 L.R. 1 A. & E. 109. The legal/equitable right situation must be examined. This was especially so in Case D45, 82 A.T.C. 213, where a trust was purportedly created though all the parties continued to regard their ownership abilities as before: found to be a sham.

204. 85 D.T.C. 5064

"And whereas the said Rolf Drescher...did receive a cheque in the sum of...$1,000,000 which, for convenience, was taken in the name of said Rolf Drescher only, but on behalf, [of], his wife...and their daughter."

Judge Muldoon paid particular attention to this provision providing:

"The operative provisions are to the same effect and disclose that the plaintiff was "not the beneficial owner of the entire sum...but holds one third of the same...in trust and as nominee of and for his wife...and holds one-third of same...in trust and as nominee of and for his daughter..." Further provisions recite the plaintiff's willingness to account to his wife and their daughter and upon demand of either, to convey to her her undivided one-third interest in the principal and the interest. Appended as a form of consent signed by Edith and Evelyn Drescher releasing the plaintiff from any liability which he may incur for having their share of the sum, but holding him "responsible for his proportionate share of any loss or liability incurred." So, if the learned member of the Tax Review Board described a weakness in one preamble, it must nevertheless be noted that the entire instrument appears to be quite robust enough to stand firmly for its stated purpose. However, having been drawn up and executed so long after the date, (June 1, 1978), which the plaintiff wrote therein for his own satisfaction, (and perhaps as an aide - memoire), the best use of it in this case would be to demonstrate the continuity of the Dreschers' intentions; but the important question revolves around their intentions from the beginning."

And it is with respect to this last question that the taxpayer in any given situation must be so acutely aware of his actions and of those around him. Documentation expressing a trust, though latently created, will add nothing to the plausibility of a fiduciary environment if at least the existence of the confidence cannot be derived from the implications it has on the behavior of the parties involved especially before the documents are drawn up. Judge Muldoon provided with respect to the actions:

"On this evidence there is virtually no doubt that in obtaining the cheque and in taking out the two term deposits in his name alone, the plaintiff was acting as the agent, the amanuensis, the nominee and trustee of the group consisting of himself, Edith Drescher and Evelyn Drescher. Any other conclusion goes against the evidence, the weight of the evidence, logic, reason, and human nature. On this evidence, had the plaintiff balked at according his wife and their daughter their equal, equitable and non legal shares, there is no doubt that they would have a formidable right of action which would be pursued successfully to judgment in law and in equity in their favor. Evidence of the three Drescher's prior conduct would be virtually conclusive against anyone of them who might have acquired merely the apparent legal title and control of the prize money, as the plaintiff did, and who would have refused to disgorge in favor of the whole family."

"...The evidence here lacks one main ingredient which alone could make it consistent with such conclusions (of the Minister): the plaintiff's stealth in all this, of which there was not only no evidence but plainly opposite and contrary evidence. In all of the circumstances of a close, sharing family so amply demonstrated in the evidence, the plaintiff could be considered to be acting solely on his own behalf only if he had taken out the term deposits secretly. He certainly did not behave in this manner. In fact, the plaintiff and his wife went together to the lottery office, and then all three Dreschers went together to the airport to retrieve the cheque.

There was no stealth at all, and that constitutes a salient gap in the evidence."²⁰⁵

Resulting Trusts.

In *Martin Chrustie v. M.N.R.*²⁰⁶ the Tax Court had to decide whether a resulting trust arose when an interest in a M.U.R.B. was purchased by a taxpayer with funds personally provided by him but when the legal title of the interest was transferred to a corporation set up by the taxpayer. Essentially the taxpayer was to become a joint venturer in the construction of a M.U.R.B., with three other individuals, through the purchase of a 25% interest, while he was to own one half thereof. The four incorporated a company to provide competitively price supplies for the construction of the building, as a cost control conduit, but although the corporation was not to become a joint venturer the joint venture agreement was drawn up with the interest being acquired under Russ-Mar Investment Ltd. even though the offer to acquire the joint interest was made only to the incorporators of Russ-Mar and, in the taxpayer's case, the payment for the interest, $20,000, was made by the taxpayer in his personal capacity not by the corporation with the taxpayer acting as executive officer. When rental losses were recognized the Minister disallowed the deduction thereof by the taxpayer on the grounds that his corporation owned the interest, not the taxpayer, while the taxpayer contended that he had beneficial ownership of the 12½% interest and that legal title thereof was held by Russ-Mar only as trustee and agent for him. The taxpayer's counsel provided documentary evidence in the form of the minutes of Russ-Mar where the three incorporators expressly provided that "the investor's position would be for private and individual investment to receive any tax benefit and enjoyment that would apply" while also provided was the taxpayer's personal cheque as payment of the down payment. Russ-Mar had been incorporated three weeks prior to the formal date of the joint venture agreement and upon briefly analyzing section 14 of the C.B.C.A. the judge found that there was an absence of the intention that the corporation be bound upon its creation for prior acts of its incorporator. Although taxpayer's counsel cited Bouchard v. The Queen as a precedent for the validity of attempting to invoke the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, (and satisfy the five question test), so as to prove the trust the judge was of the opinion that such rules did not apply to trusts created by the operation or construction of law but instead could apply only to express or declaratory trusts.

Finding a resulting trust to be in existence with respect to the purchase Judge Kempo provided, quoting from Equity Jurisprudence in Wilson v. Owens, (1878), 26 Gr. 27:

"The resulting trust is said to have its origin in 'the natural presumption, in the absence of all rebutting circumstances, that he who supplies the money means the purchase to be for his own benefit rather than for that of another; and that the conveyance in the name of the latter is a matter of convenience and arrangement between the parties for other collateral purposes.'"

Going on, he found that the trust could be proven through parol evidence if need be and then noting documentation supporting the personal payment for the interest, the consistency of the appellant's performance under enquiry and the integrity thereof and viewing the case evidence and factual circumstances the judge found that the appellant had successfully established the existence of the trust. Having been found to be beneficial owner of the 12½% interest the rental losses were recognizable by the taxpayer. It is not only by virtue of Sec. 75(2) that the beneficial owner of property held in trust is allowed to deduct capital losses sustained by the trust. If beneficial ownership of the property was found not to reside with the particular taxpayer, although he could have been found to be beneficially interested/entitled thereto, the losses would have been stuck in the trust unless Sec. 75(2) could have applied on some other grounds. Had rental income been recognized the taxpayer could have been successful at establishing that the interest was owned by the corporation and not by him however the arguments would have been quite different. The interesting aspect about this case is that the beneficial ownership of the interest, in technical sense of the term, was never examined but instead, apparently, was found to exist simply because a resulting trust had occurred and the corporation was controlled by the appellant. A slightly different result could have been of consequence had the corporation not been controlled by the taxpayer since although, in such a case, a resulting trust would have occurred, beneficial ownership of the interest would not have resided with the appellant. The M.U.R.B. losses would then be deductible by the trust and by the taxpayer since technically the property could revert to him and thus Sec. 75(2) could apply. Beneficial ownership of and being beneficially entitled to property are not equivalent.

²⁰⁵ See also Trevey v. Grubb, 44 A.L.R. 20, and F.C.T. v. Clarke, 40 C.L.R. 246, for similar implied trust situations as well as Andrews Estate v. M.N.R., 66 D.T.C. 798 (TAB) where subsequent conduct and previously established convention helped prove a family trust in respect of a lottery winning.

²⁰⁶. [1984] C.T.C. 2533

In *A. Nelson v. The Queen*²⁰⁷ the taxpayer and his three sons in equal partnership agreed to incorporate the activity into a corporation in which each would have equal shareholdings however due to errors in the process the partnership business was transferred to the corporation and the taxpayer received 96% of the common shares personally. His sons and himself had subscribed on incorporation for 1 share each and although the father was to receive an additional 96 shares of the class the sons were also to receive additional shares of a different class without voting powers to equalize their participation in the corporate earnings. The class B shares were never issued. Dividends were paid by the corporation some time subsequently but the father directed that all four of the former partners were to be paid an equal amount. The Minister contended that such constituted a direction to have income diverted under a provision similar to Sec. 56(2) and though the Trial Division held that no constructive or resulting trust arose due to the fact that the shares upon which the dividends were paid were meant to be owned by the father the Appeal Division held that a resulting trust did exist with respect to the shares issued legitimately in the father's name because they were issued to him as consideration for the sons' interests in the partnership and the agreement called for equal sharing.

In *Brookview Investments Ltd. et. al. v. M.N.R.*²⁰⁸ property was to be purchased for a corporation that had not yet been incorporated and the taxpayers entered into purchase agreements "as trustee for companies to be incorporated". The final purchase agreement, entered into by a lawyer acting for the corporation not yet incorporated, as per Cattanach J., recited: "that Maxwell S. Lewis, as trustee for a company to be incorporated, had entered into an agreement to purchase a 60 percent interest in the land in the Township of Toronto, that Armley had been incorporated and that the members of the group had agreed the land was to be purchased in the name of Armley as trustee for them in their individual capacities. The operative portion of the agreement then provided that the members agreed to contribute such sums as were required to complete the purchase in the proportions stipulated in the agreement and that Armley held the land as trustee only for members of the group and undertook to convey the land to the members of the group in accordance with their respective proportionate interest therein as and when called upon to do so by them." The land value apparently decreased and the corporation was only partly incorporated, since it didn't issue shares, while the group sought to cut its losses and allowed the letters patent to be canceled by the provincial government while at the same time defaulting on the mortgage payments that were to be made to the vendor on a mortgage secured on the property. Foreclosure quickly followed and the group then attempted to deduct, as a business loss, the lost funds that they had actually pumped into the arrangement. The Minister of National Revenue contended that the corporation had sustained the loss and not the group however the Court found that a bare trust relationship existed and that the loss was to be deductible by the group. Justice Cattanach Held:

"Assuming a profit had been realized, such profit would not represent taxable income of Armley, for as Thorson P. said in Kenneth B.S. Robertson v. M.N.R., 1944 Ex. C.R. 170, 184 and approved by Taschereau J, as he was then, in delivering the unanimous decision in Sura v. M.N.R., 1962 S.C.R. 65 at 68:

"...it lacks the essential quality of income, namely, that the recipient shall have an absolute right to it and be under no restriction, contractual or otherwise, as to its disposition, use or enjoyment.""

In the recent UK case of *Singh v Revenue & Customs*²⁰⁹ the First-Tier Tribunal had to consider a situation where a taxpayer had dealt in real estate and had uncharacterized despoits into his bank account and when assessed for hidden income by HMRC the taxpayer contended that they resulted from resulting (or constructive) trust relationships he had with his siblings with respect to the transactions. The Tribunal held:

36. S1 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 charges capital gains tax on the disposal of assets. The only person who can make a disposal of assets is the owner. Under English law, the owner of an asset and the person who will make a gain from its disposal is the beneficial owner.

207 1974 C.T.C. 360 FCA

208 [1964] Ex. C.R. 123

209 [2011] UKFTT 584 (TC) (08 September 2011)

37. Mr. Kelly argued that the legal title to the four properties is not conclusive in determining the beneficial ownership of the properties. He asserts that the properties were held by Mr. Singh as nominee, or trustee for himself and his brothers.

38. Section 60 TCGA 1992 provides

'60 Nominees and bare trustees

(1) in relation to [property] held by a person as nominee for another person, or as a trustee for another person absolutely entitled as against the trustee....this Act shall apply as if the property was vested in, and the acts of the nominee, or trustee in relation to the [property] were the acts of the person for whom he is the nominee, or trustee..

(2) It is hereby declared that references in this Act to any [property] held by person as trustee for another person absolutely entitled as against the trustee, are references to a case where that other person has the exclusive right to direct how that [property] shall be dealt with'.

Therefore disposals by nominees and their trustees are attributed to the person for whom they are nominee, or trustee and who is absolutely entitled to the asset. Chargeable gains accrue to the person who is absolutely entitled to the asset, that is, the beneficial owner.

39. HMRC say that section 60 TCGA1992 has no application in this case because they do not accept the assertion by Mr. Singh that the gain made on the disposal of the four properties should be divided between Mr. Singh and either one or both of his brothers.

40. HMRC acknowledge that English law distinguishes between the legal and beneficial ownership of property and that section 60 TCGA 1992 assesses the beneficiary to capital gains tax rather than the legal owner. However HMRC assert that the concept of beneficial ownership is only of relevance where evidence shows that the ownership of the asset has become fragmented in some way and it is shown that expressly or otherwise the beneficial ownership of the property is held by someone other than the actual legal title owner. HMRC contend that the documentation relating to the purchase mortgage and sale of the four properties shows that it was Mr. Singh in whose name the properties were registered and that it was he who mortgaged the properties and received the proceeds of sale.

41. HMRC argue that there is no evidence that a trust existed nor that any oral agreement in that regard between Mr. Singh and his brothers was subsequently recorded or otherwise evidenced in writing. They contend that there is no documentary evidence, legal or otherwise, to show that the brothers of Mr. Singh held any proprietary or beneficial interest in the properties whatsoever.

42. Mr. Kelly acknowledges that there is no formal documentary evidence of a trust but argues that a constructive trust or a resulting trust existed in relation to the four properties and referred the Tribunal to s 53(2) of the Law Property Act 1925.

...

44. S.53 (2) makes it clear that s.53 does not affect the creation or operation of resulting implied or constructive trusts. HMRC, in their statement of case and submissions to the Tribunal, do not address the issue as to whether or not, on the acquisition of the properties by Mr. Singh, a resulting or constructive trust arose in favour of one or both of his two brothers, other than to say that they have not seen any evidence that a trust existed. HMRC says that, 'whilst an agreement could initially be made orally, it must be followed up in writing prior to the disposal of the asset'. No case law authority for this particular proposition was offered by HMRC and it is not one with which the Tribunal would necessarily agree. The Tribunal's view is that, under a resulting trust, the interest held under trust must have been created at the date of acquisition of the property and, in the case of a constructive trust, prior to the property's disposal.

45. Mr. Kelly on behalf of Mr. Singh sought specifically to rely upon the provisions of section 53(2) arguing that a resulting or constructive trust had arisen on the acquisition of the four properties. He referred extensively to the case of Stack v Dowden [2007] 9 ITELR 81. In that case, the property in question had been purchased for £190,000 of which Miss Dowden had paid £125,000, the remaining £65,000 having been met by a mortgage advance. The property was held jointly. The court had to decide firstly whether there was a joint tenancy in equity or a tenancy in common and secondly the proportions of the respective beneficial shares of the parties.

46. This appeal largely turns on different issues. The essential ingredient of both resulting and constructive trusts is 'common intention', that is an intention common to both, the legal estate holder and the claimant to a beneficial interest, that the claimant acquired an interest in the property. The distinction between resulting and constructive trusts is that in resulting trusts this common intention is presumed from the situations which give rise to the trust (see Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886). Whenever the legal title to land is purchased in the name of one (or more) person, but is actually paid for (in whole or in part) by another (or others), the titleholder will hold on trust for himself and the other contributor in proportions reflecting their contributions. As a general principle the consideration paid or contributed (or at least the common intention which lies behind the payment or contribution) must exist at the time of acquisition of the legal estate. Payment of a deposit by someone other than the legal estate holder would raise the presumption of resulting trust.

47. Resulting trusts are therefore founded on contributions of money towards the acquisition of the legal title to the property. Any other form of contribution would fall under constructive trusts or 'implied common intention', so that for example, mortgage payments made after the acquisition of the property would not be regarded as payments towards the purchase price. Thus, if the intention does not arise until after the acquisition of the legal title, the Courts would normally consider there to be a constructive trust rather than a resulting trust.

48. In this case, Mr. Kelly argues that a presumed intention existed and in consequence a resulting trust arose upon payment of the £52,080 by 'DS' but that a constructive trust also arose which overrode the resulting trust. He argues that a constructive trust arose firstly because of the £52,080 contribution by DS, secondly because of the contributions to the mortgage installments which he contends were partially or even entirely defrayed from cash payments to Mr. Singh's private bank account by 'DS' and 'GS', and thirdly because of the whole course of dealing between the brothers regarding the acquisition and disposal of the properties, evidenced their common intention to own them jointly.

51. HMRC have not sought to argue that there may have been a presumption of advancement in respect of either the £1000 or the £52,080 'deposit monies'. Where equity imposes a moral duty upon one party to provide for another, for example a father to support his child, the doctrine of advancement raises a presumption of gift so that the equitable interests follow the legal title. In such circumstances, no resulting trust will arise in favour of the person who has provided the money. Clearly in this case there is no presumption of advancement with regard to the deposit monies paid by 'DS'.

52. Much of the correspondence with the solicitors acting in the acquisition of the properties and the associated legal documentation, for example the contract and deed of transfer, was not copied to the Tribunal. The copy documentation was limited to the 'client care letter', a letter confirming receipt of contract documentation with a 'pre-exchange of contracts report', a letter enclosing an authority instructing the solicitors to proceed to an unconditional exchange of contracts (despite the fact that a mortgage had not at that stage been arranged), a letter confirming unconditional exchange of contracts and finally a letter following completion of the purchase of the property which enclosed the NHBC insurance certificate in respect of one of the properties.

53. The Tribunal noted that it was 'DS', who initially contacted and instructed the solicitors but on behalf of Mr. Singh and 'GS'. Mr. Singh says that this was because the purchase of the properties was the idea of 'DS' and that because 'DS' had already remortgaged his property for a substantial sum, he would not have been able to participate in the acquisition of the properties and act as a co-mortgagor. The Tribunal also noted that, although the final letter from the solicitors which enclosed the NHBC certificate for one of the properties was addressed to 'Messrs G & T Singh', the property, along with one of the other properties, had by then already been acquired in Mr. Singh's sole name.

54. Following completion, it was Mr. Singh who arranged for the properties to be let and the rental monies to be paid to him pending a resale of the properties. Rental monies were paid into his private account.

55. A constructive trust will arise where an agreement or common intention can be inferred from all the circumstances. Direct contributions to the purchase price whether initially or for example by payment of mortgage instalments generally justify the inference necessary for the creation of a constructive trust, (see Passee v Passee [1988] Fam Law 132). However the fundamental question which must always be resolved is whether independently of any inference to be drawn from the conduct of the parties during the course of dealing with the property, there must at some time prior to disposal of the property have been an agreement or understanding between them that the equity in the property is to be shared beneficially. The finding of an agreement or arrangement in this regard can be based on evidence of discussions between the individuals concerned, however imprecise the terms may have been. Once a finding to this effect is made it is only necessary for the contributor to show that he has acted to his detriment, or significantly altered his position on the basis of that understanding or agreement in order to give rise to a constructive trust.

56. Without doubt, a resulting trust arose in respect of the £52,080 contribution by 'DS'. The issue is whether Mr. Singh also held the property on constructive trust for himself and either one or both of his brothers pursuant to their alleged common intention to share the beneficial ownership of the properties. A distinction must be drawn between resulting and constructive trusts when calculating the parties' beneficial shares. A resulting trust only recognises the actual payments made. For a constructive trust there must be a finding of either an implied common intention resulting from a substantial contribution or an express common intention between the parties, of shared beneficial ownership in the property, plus an act of detrimental reliance on that intention by the party or parties not on the title. Only where such a common intention cannot be found can a resulting trust be inferred from financial contributions towards the acquisition of the property. If a common intention and thus a constructive trust is found, a court can ascertain the individual beneficial shares at its discretion.

57. The difficulty in this case is that, whilst it is fairly clear that at the outset the three brothers shared a common intention to purchase the four properties, it is not clear whether that intention continued up to completion of the purchase. 'GS' only provided £1000 towards acquisition costs, but 'DS' says it was he who paid the £1,000. Although it was 'GS' and Mr. Singh who exchanged contracts to purchase the properties, it was Mr. Singh who completed the purchase utilising mortgage funds arranged in his sole name. 'GS' says that he had a bad credit record and that this was the reason he could not act as co-mortgagor whereas Mr. Singh was self-employed and could easily secure mortgage facilities by means of a 'self-certificated' annual income confirmation. 'DS' was not involved in the purchase of the properties at all other than to initially contact the solicitors and provide the 'deposit monies' of £52,080 although of course on acquisition of the properties these monies effectively represented the entire equity in the properties. Perhaps Mr. Singh and his brothers were not advised as well as they could have been as there was no reason why the deed of transfer (form TR1) could not have contained a simple declaration that the beneficial interest in the property was held by Mr. Singh on behalf of himself and either one or both of his brothers in whatever proportions they chose.

58. Although it seems clear that 'DS' was repaid his contribution of £52,080 in one form or another, it is not clear that he was also paid a one third share of the profits. Mr. Singh says that the profit element was paid to 'DS' in small denominations of £200 or £300 by ATM cash withdrawals from his account. 'GS' says he was paid his share of the profits in similar manner. All three brothers say they ended up with a one-third share of the profits but none of them was able to say how much that was after allowing for payment of mortgage interest and acquisition and disposal costs. Significantly, in evidence, Mr. Singh said that he could not specifically remember how the profit was divided. He said it was a 'family transaction' and that he paid money from the proceeds of sale to his brothers as and when they needed it. The application of the proceeds or profits is however a separate matter and irrelevant to how those proceeds or profits were actually owned.

59. Mr. Singh's account of the acquisition of the properties varied throughout the course of the enquiry. Initially, he suggested that the monies paid into his account were a loan but that was at a stage in the enquiry when HMRC were unaware of the capital gain made on the properties. Following the Discovery Assessment, he said that the properties were purchased firstly by himself, then with one brother and their respective wives and then with two brothers and their three wives. Finally, in evidence, he said the properties were purchased by him for himself and his two brothers.

60. Whatever Mr. Singh said to HMRC during the course of the enquiry with regard to ownership of the properties it is clear to the Tribunal that DS would not have remortgaged his property for a substantial sum simply to effect a gift of £52,080 to his brother. It is equally unlikely, given the evidence overall that these monies were intended to be a loan. No loan agreement had been drawn up but that was because there was mutual trust between the brothers. Plainly, DS was interested in the purchase and disposal of the properties in order to make a profit. DS played a significant role in the acquisition of the properties. On the other hand, GS was only peripherally involved and following exchange of contracts took no further part in the transaction.

61. The Tribunal concluded that a resulting trust must have arisen in respect of the £52,080 contribution made by 'DS', but that the resulting trust gave way to a constructive trust derived from the implied common intention of Mr. Singh and DS, as inferred from the whole course of dealing between them and their respective contributions towards the purchase price. However imperfectly recalled and imprecise Mr. Singh may have been in recounting to HMRC exactly on whose behalf the properties had been purchased, it would be unreasonable to conclude that DS was not expecting to receive a substantial part of the profits. Mr. Singh and DS therefore held the beneficial interest in the properties equally. It is unclear whether GS paid £1000 towards the purchase of the properties. It seems clear that there was an intention at one stage that he should share in the acquisition of the properties. However he subsequently withdrew from any involvement and crucially, unlike DS there was no detrimental reliance by him on an agreement that he should participate in the beneficial ownership of the properties. GS therefore had no beneficial interest in the properties.

Having an arrangement recognized as a trust unilaterally by CRA can have very unfortunate tax consequences if the parties have not properly planned for it. In *Fraser et. al. v. M.N.R.*²¹⁰ 95 taxpayers in an investment "syndicate" took their case to the Tax Court when the Minister assessed their investment vehicle as a unit trust and contended that losses it incurred in the mortgage business were not deductible by the taxpayers. For nine years the syndicate had realized business income, since the acting party attending to the activities performed such as an occupation, which the beneficiaries had recognized. The syndicate was set up through the issue of "units" for a par value while the members could have their units redeemed at any time however they could not receive any interest in any mortgage investments held but only cash as proceeds. Control of the investments was maintained by a management company and this control was recognized by the court as "full" control ie; that arising out of full legal and beneficial ownership, while the investors never directly participated in the running of the business but instead investment decisions were executed by the management company only and were not subject to the opinion of the investors. The instigator of this arrangement contended that:

"As participation in the General Mortgage Syndicate represents ownership of an undivided share in the underlying mortgages, every taxpaying participant must report as income his or her share of the mortgage earnings accumulated during each year."

while he also contended that the ownership of the mortgages represented tenancies in common and that "true" trusts did not arise. The Minister contended that an inter vivos trust had arose, that the investors were beneficiaries under the trust administered by the management company and that a partnership had not been created since the investors were in no legal position to control the investments or the party controlling the investments.

Garon. T.C.J., found that the fiduciary element needed for the creation of the trust was present:

"A second requirement for the existence of the trust is the existence of a fiduciary relationship. In the present case, the subscriptions from the individual members of the G.M.S. were turned over to Marlowe-Yeoman on the understanding that they are to be used for the purpose of being invested in mortgages." In respect of the taxpayer's submissions of tenancy in common ownership he held:

"I do not agree with that characterization for a number of reasons. First the unitholders have no control over the property; it is out of their hands. If they were co-owners of the property they could assume the management of the property. This was not possible here having regard to the terms of the offering memorandum dated March 16, 1973 and the restatement of principles relative to the participation in the G.M.S. formulated in the memorandum of January 10, 1979. Secondly, if the investors were tenants in common in respect of the mortgages, they could not withdraw from the syndicate and be entitled upon 30 days notice to an amount representing the value of the share without the consent of the other co-owners. Here there is a right of redemption on notice entitling them to the value of their share minus certain deductions. There was a provision in the contractual arrangements that if funds were lacking, payments will be made to withdrawing members in the order in which requests for redemption were received. There is the further point that this right of repayment was canceled directly by Marlowe-Yeoman in October 1981 without securing the consent of the members of the syndicate. If they were co-owners, how could this be done?"

Garon, T.C.J. concluded that the arrangement constituted a trust and that beneficial ownership did not reside with the investors and that the losses incurred were not deductible by them but only by the trust.²¹¹ On appeal to the Federal Court-Trial Division²¹² the application of Sec. 75(2) was latently forwarded by the taxpayer to allow deduction of the loss but Reed J. held correctly that it applied only to property income and not that from the business of the trust.²¹³ In such a situation, where it is suspected that CRA will recognize as a trust an arrangement that could be proven in court to be such, it would be advantageous, if the investors are to recognize the income from the investment fund yearly, regardless of if it is to be paid to them or not, to arrange the terms of the fund so as to allow subsection 75(2) to apply to it in years when losses are being sustained. If the property or its substitute contributed by the taxpayers can revert to them in specie, be passed to others determined by them, or be precluded from being disposed of without their consent or in accordance with their direction both the trust and the investors will be able to recognize the same loss even though beneficial ownership may not reside with the investors.

²¹¹ See also Case NOS 3-6/1980, (1981) 12 A.T.R 55.

²¹² 91 D.T.C. 5123

²¹³ Unfortunately he considered an absolute reversionary interest necessary for Sec. 75(2) to operate and considered the trust to carry on a business both of which can be argued to be incorrect, latterly as per Charles Trust v. F.C.T. etc. in the subsequent chapter "Does it Carry on a Business?" and were mere investment activities. If the fund would have had any of the above three characteristics the decision could perhaps be favorably appealed.

Multiple Trusts.

Subsections 70(6) and 73(1) provide provisions that allow tax-free roll-overs of property to spousal trusts while with the 1988 reform, amendments have been made to section 107 that allow for tax-free distribution of property in satisfaction of capital interests under a personal trust only.

As per Sec. 104(4), testamentary or inter vivos spousal trusts, (as well as all other trusts), be they created as such, or in the latter case, take on the spousal nature at anytime, will be required to recognize a deemed disposition of their property at certain times. Just satisfying the spousal characteristics as described in Sec. 70(6)(b) or 73(1) being; that the settlor's spouse must be entitled to receive all of the income of the entire trust that arises before her death and that no person other than the spouse may before her death receive or obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the entire trust, is a trying feat, (especially upon examining the technical requirements in the former attribute: the ability to receive the income). While there is a method by which a tainted spousal trust having limited "contamination" may be adjusted to qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment, as provided in Sec. 70(7)-(8), a singular trust created wherein spouse and offspring share entitlement at the same time will never be able to obtain the favourable treatment due to the fact that the trust was created with the disqualifying characteristics. Given that in a testamentary environment, the taxpayer may understandably want to bequeath benefits not only to his spouse but to a lot of other individuals, quite possibly to be held in trust, it would be a waste of the available provisions to give them all entitlements in one residuary estate trust and instead it would be far more advantageous to have a will create multiple separate trusts, one of which has as its exclusive beneficiary the spouse, thereby allowing property transferred to it to obtain Sec. 70(6) treatment. That spousal trust can even have interests in the others so as to allow it to participate more fully for the spouse's benefit. This also relates to the transfer of rights the substance of which have been allowed reserves in computing income as per Sec. 72(2).

It is not solely with respect to obtaining the benefit of the Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) spousal trust provisions that multiple trusts, be they testamentary or inter vivos, may be contemplated. Subsection 107(4.1) applies to the distribution of any property in satisfaction of a capital interest in a personal trust which was subject, in respect of any property, at any time, to Sec. 75(2) attribution by virtue of the fact that the contributor of property retained some degree of control or influence over property held by it, as described in Sec. 75(2), the result being that the distribution will not be as tax-free as that otherwise available in Sec. 107(2) and thus by segregating that contributor influence or control to another separate trust, property in the former trust will not be affected when distributed. Subsection 104(14) allows a preferred beneficiary election to be elected whereby income accumulating in the trust will be recognized by, and taxed, possibly at the lower rates of, a beneficiary however the specific characteristics of the particular trust. Without going into detail about the conditions here, (since they are meticulously covered in a later chapter), it could prove very beneficial if instead of one contaminated trust, whereby the P.B.E. would simply be inapplicable to all beneficiaries, two trusts are instead created whereby at least one trust's preferred beneficiaries will benefit from the election being available.

Since the ITA imposes tax at progressive rates upon marginal levels of income recognized, the more taxpayers to recognize a stream of income the less they will have to recognize individually and consequently the lower the effective tax rate on the economic benefits, in the absolute amount, being realized. Multiple trusts having multiple beneficiaries for which the income is be accumulated can serve an obvious purpose in this case, especially given that an inter vivos trust is automatically subject to the highest tax rate of 29%. Thus this instance of multiple trusts should only be considered in respect of testamentary trusts since they incur tax on graduated rates: if a testator can splinter the income flow of multiple properties across numerous accumulating testamentary trusts, all enuring to the benefit of the same set of beneficiaries he is that much farther ahead.

Perhaps one of the best uses of the reasons for creating multiple trusts is that of the insurance against enormous tax consequences to the trust and its beneficiaries, recognizable immediately or over the long term, upon the trust losing its personal status through an ignorant, forced, or voluntary transaction whereby consideration is received either by the trust or a person who made a contribution of legal title of property to the trust as proceeds for the acquisition of an interest in the trust by another party. Also, all trusts have dispositions deemed to occur every 21 years: splintering up ownership across multiple trusts allows for lower rates on any tax consequences of these instances. Under Sec. 107(2) a distribution of property in satisfaction of capital interests in a personal trust will rarely result in the immediate recognition of a capital loss by the beneficiary where he has purchased his interest in that a legitimately excessive ACB of the interest satisfied will only be tacked on to the tax cost of the property received, (tax cost of the property to the trust previously), as per para.(b). If the single capital beneficiary under a personal trust can recognize as a tax cost of his capital interest a legitimate excessive ACB, inflated as a result of becoming resident and being affected by Sec. 128.1(1) (where the trust isn't resident), or as a result of disposing of and reacquiring the interest, favourably as per Sec. 107(1)(a), (both instances not causing tax consequences to any party), then that high ACB will not have any benefit until the property received from the personal trust in satisfaction of the interest is disposed of whereby it will reduce a capital gain or increase/create a capital loss. If, often the ACB of the capital interest has been systematically inflated, and the trust loses its personal status, (by a token transaction), the single capital beneficiary may be immediately allowed to recognize a capital loss due to the high ACB, of his capital interest as per the distribution provision in Sec. 107(2.1)(c), when property is distributed to him. If the fair market value of the property has declined substantially since the trust acquired it, to being materially less than its ACB to the trust, then a distribution by a personal trust, in respect of a capital interest, will defer the recognition of that implicit loss as per Sec. 107(2)(a), while if a non-personal trust were to make such a distribution, as per Sec. 107(2.1)(a), the beneficiary would recognize the loss immediately, while so too will the trust.

The use of multiple trusts obviously provides a means with which to alleviate the problem of the loss of a personal status affecting other property held by the trust that would have otherwise obtained favourable treatment upon distribution, if by a personal trust. A loss of a personal status will not only immediately eliminate the existence of any income interests in the trust, (as per the technical definition thereof in Sec. 108(1)), and turn them into capital interests but it will also expose all of the trust's property with respect to the trust, and all of the capital interests with respect to the beneficiaries to deemed dispositions for fair market value proceeds when property is distributed in satisfaction of them. A loss of a personal status will, over the long term, possibly be very expensive to both the trust and its beneficiaries and thus by reducing the property that a particular trust owns, as well as the number of beneficiaries under the trust, through the use of multiple separate trusts, the tax consequences may be significantly reduced, while the other property and beneficiaries are sheltered when one single trust loses its personal status.

It has been held by some fairly high courts that the contribution of property to an inter vivos or testamentary trust by a giftor who knows how the trust operates and how the beneficiaries are to benefit creates a trust separate from that the terms of which are being adopted and this would seem logical when the initial settlor cannot create a trust out of the subsequent property he doesn't know will be contributed. The distinction between an augmenting contribution and the settlement of an identical trust may reside in whether the giftor concerns himself with how the beneficiaries are to benefit. Ignorance of such could validate a contribution only.

Subsection 104(2) provides one of the Department's first statutory attempts at blocking such beneficial use of multiple trusts and, in the author's opinion, the provision was solely formulated to hinder the use of multiple trusts as a means of reducing effective taxation of income being recognized. The provision provides that "where there is more than one trust and substantially all of the property of the various trusts has been received from one person, and the various trusts are conditioned so that the income thereof accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary, or group or class of beneficiaries, such of the trustees as the Minister may designate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be in respect of all the trusts an individual whose property is the property of all the trusts." As per the first condition all that is required is that substantially all of the property of the trusts, be it legally owned or simply borrowed, be received, (transferred or loaned), from one individual while none of the trusts need be created by that person hence gifts made to trusts may be enough to cause application.

Although the provision doesn't comment on substitute property but only property in its initial form being received from one person, the provision does not specify a time at which the Minister, may designate all as one hence where the trusts initially stated with loaned property the income of which was capitalized, even after the loaned property has been returned the Minister may not be able to make a designation retroactively applicable to that initial period which will be retroactive through to the present where the property held has not technically been received from one person.

It would seem that the designation must be made in the year in which all of the target property owned by the trust was property received from the one taxpayer and thus if the property of one trust is sold and other property is acquired the taxpayer can set up another trust without fear of the application of Sec. 104(2). All of the property of the initial trust has, at the time of creation of the second, not been received from the taxpayer albeit it is his contribution's substitute. The provision does not refer to substitute property.

Again, this provision need not be of concern only in respect of graduated tax rates applicable to testamentary trusts but also instances of non-rate related issues in the inter vivos trust setting.

"Taxed as individual – Sec. 104(2)"

(2) A trust shall, for the purposes of this Act, and without affecting the liability of the trustee or legal representative for that person's own income tax, be deemed to be in respect of the trust property an individual, but where there is more than one trust and

(a) substantially all of the property of the various trusts has been received from one person, and

(b) the various trusts are conditioned so that the income thereof accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary, or group or class of beneficiaries, such of the trustees as the Minister may designate shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be in respect of all the trusts an individual whose property is the property of all the trusts and whose income is the income of all the trusts.

Thankfully the provision applies only to property received from one person directly and not property received indirectly from one person through another person or trust. Nor does it apply when the property received has been converted into substitute property at a later time.

The second circumstance which must exist in order for the provision to apply is that the trusts must be conditioned so that the income accrues, immediately or ultimately, to the same beneficiary or group or class of beneficiaries and it would appear that the present standing of a trust is irrelevant in light of a past designation made by the Minister when at that time the condition existed. This is an interesting provision since where in the chain of beneficiaries does the Minister measure to make her determination. It's pretty safe to say that since the focus of the provision is the accrual of income rather than income payable it was sought to target those instances where the income was not payable to a beneficiary and those instances where the creation of multiple trusts was in attempt to access lower marginal rates on the total income, but, what beneficiary is to be measured. The focus is on the particular trust and its beneficiary so as long as that trust has a different beneficiary then it would seem not be caught. The provision applies if the trusts are conditioned so that the income accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary of all of the trusts directly, or group or class of beneficiaries directly hence if there exists a sole income beneficiary under trust B, (but not under trust C), who has a right to income from trust B while trust B is sole income beneficiary under trust C the provision will not apply to trust B & C since with respect to those two trusts directly, the sole income beneficiary isn't "the same beneficiary" under both. Trust B has been planted, as a beneficiary, between Trust B and Trust C has been planted, as a beneficiary, between Trust C and the income beneficiary.^{214, 215}

Where the income of the trusts is to accrue to the same beneficiary, or group etc. the provision will apply hence by settling up numerous personal trusts which have as sole capital beneficiaries different parties, and

214. The individual entitlements of each member of the common class under multiple trusts do not have to be equal from trust to trust in order that the provision apply.

215 Until a power of appointment is exercised a common or common classes of beneficiaries is not created. Thus the whole provision can be drastically avoided by simply not vesting the interests until there is need.

by structuring the trusts so that they accumulate their income the provision will only apply at the time where a singular taxpayer acquires all of the singular capital interests and not before hence when Sec. 107(1) offers such a favourable personal trust capital interest disposition provision, (by artificially inflating the ACB thereof), it could prove tax effective to execute this sort of arrangement, (even when Sec. 69(1) is applied to the acquisition of the capital interests).

If the personal trusts are structured so as to hold exclusively non-income producing capital property, which can only be distributed in satisfaction of capital interests, then no income can be realized or accrue, even though the value of the capital property may appreciate, and thus the provision won't be applicable on the grounds that income, including recognized capital gains, does not accrue to the benefit of any beneficiary, but an increase in value of the property does.

In the case of spousal trusts it could be argued that where more than one has been created and principally contributed to by a taxpayer they will be considerable as one since the income will accrue to the same beneficiary, the spouse, however it would seem that this argument doesn't take into consideration the intent of the legislators when the provision was enacted. The provision expressly refers to "various trusts are conditional so that the income thereof" accrues to the same beneficiary or group and it doesn't refer to "various trusts are conditioned so that income thereof" accrues to the same beneficiary or group and difference in the two references is subtle but there.

"The income" refers to all of the income to ever be realized by the trust while simply "income" without any "the" reference may mean any particular income realized. With this in mind numerous spousal trusts may be set up, with the income accruing in the interim solely to the spouse, however, if after the spouse's death the trusts continue to exist and earn income for the benefit of distinct beneficiaries they cannot be caught under Sec. 104(2).

The subparagraph 104(2)(b) condition is satisfied when the income "accrues or will ultimately accrue to the same beneficiary" however it does not state whether it has to be paid to the beneficiary directly or applied for his benefit rather than through his actual receipt. "Accrue" is a particularly vague term in respect of trust entitlements however it could be argued that the basis of application is the beneficiary's ability to receive the income in person. The provision does recognize that the income need not be payable to the beneficiary as it is realized. This provision directly attacks those situations where the income is not payable but held in the trust thus accessing the (testamentary) trust's (graduated) tax rates.

Subsection 104(2) can create absolutely disastrous results when applied to two family trusts, one of which is personal, the other not. In such an instance the consolidated trust will not be personal and thus the property becomes "locked in" pursuant to the effect of Sec. 107(2.1).

In *Mitchell v. M.N.R.*²¹⁶ a taxpayer created four virtually identical trusts one for each of his offspring, whereby the settlor transferred income producing shares to them. The Minister attempted to contend that the four trusts were to be treated as one, as per the Sec. 63(2) (identical to Sec. 104(2)) provision in the pre 1972 Act. The Tax Appeal Board did not agree whereby it was provided:

"I am of the opinion that the facts of this case do not bring it within the ambit of section 63(2) for, even though it could be held that substantially all of the property of the four trusts has been received from the same person, i.e., the appellant, these trusts are not conditioned so that the income thereby accrues, or will ultimately accrue, to the same beneficiary or group or class of beneficiaries, each trust providing for a different beneficiary."

Thus by altering the taxpayers of a group of beneficiaries who are to receive or obtain the use of the income under several trusts so that no two beneficiary groups are identical the application can be avoided.²¹⁷

It is not at the taxpayer's discretion as to whether the provision will apply if the conditions are existing but only at the Minister's hence a favourable application would be expectedly rare. Given that the provision operates to cause all of the trusts to be recognized as one, if it applied, all of the appropriate trustees of the legally distinct trusts would have to file a singular T3 consolidating the income to be reported and since all of the trusts then, for the purposes of the Act, fuse into a singular trust, all of the distinct trustees, although understandably having little ownership or control over legal trust property other than their respective own, will be identifiable under Sec. 104(1), for purposes of the imposition of liabilities, with the whole of the designated composite trust. This would have serious tax consequences in respect of the Sec. 104(2) PBE, the associated corporation rules, as well as imposing an obligation for income tax on a trustee who has neither control nor ownership of the actual trust(s) property. This can be avoided easily with a holding trust created by the beneficiary out of one of the interests in one of the two initial trusts.²¹⁸

²¹⁶ 56 D.T.C. 521 ITAB.

²¹⁷ See Case E21, 73 A.T.C. 164, for a situation involving ten identical trusts clearly based on an income splitting motivation.

If the Minister deems the trusts to be one then it applies for purposes of the entire Act however what happens when one of the two trusts becomes in common law entirely non-resident? If two unequal size trusts are deemed to be one, and the trustees of the smaller trust, being a technical minority of the aggregate, became non-resident then since the two trusts are deemed one individual and the majority of the control and ownership of that deemed aggregate trusts property still resides in Canada the residence of the deemed aggregate will not have changed. Could the non-resident trust then be varied so that the Sec. 104(2) criterion is not satisfied thus causing the Sec. 104(2) provision to cease to apply? The answer of course depends on whether the designation of the Minister under Sec. 104(2) is of permanent nature or whether it can fail after the trusts have varied and it could be argued that the former would seem to be, unfortunately, as per the statute, more valid. If the designation isn't permanent then favourable attraction of the application of the provision could be created, so that trusts are considered one, after which they could be varied so as to achieve the result wished by the trustees-beneficiaries.

Multiple trusts may be created under the same deed, be they inter vivos or testamentary, however if so done, clear unequivocal speech should be used.

Finally, a personal note: if this provision's purpose is to prevent income splintering and accessing of lower marginal rates through creation of multiple testamentary trusts, and it has its origin long before the relatively elaborate associated corporation rules were evolved, it begs the question "Why bother having it?" when its application can be so easily avoided: why not make it a bit more refined to apply to those nebulous instances that it doesn't apply to now (it is a discretionary provision), or, not bother. Sometimes you have to feel sorry for the Minister with her discretions....

Some Cases on Multiple Trusts.

In *MacNeill Estate v. M.N.R.*²¹⁹ the testator provided in his will for the establishment of a trust of 50% of his residuary estate exclusively for his spouse while the remaining 50% was to be held in trust for his offspring however, the testator provided in his will that certain charges relating to a house occupied by his mother were to be levied on "the estate" but he didn't indicate which part of it. The basic question at issue was whether the taxpayer had severed the spousal trust from his general estate, thus sheltering it from the dwelling charge to be levied against "the estate" while the Chairman recognized that on the way the instrument was structured, the intent of the testator had been to sever at least 50% of the estate, unencumbered, for the benefit of his spouse. The will made references to two distinct residue distributions: one creating the spouse's trust, the other for the offspring. Flanigan Q.C. held:

"... placing myself as nearly as possible in the shoes of the testator and, more particularly, in the mind of the testator, I find it difficult to believe that he would have involved himself in such difficulties or gone to such lengths or given such detailed instructions to draft two separate paragraphs under the so-called "distribution of residue" portion of the will, if he did not in fact intend to sever and place aside for his widow at least 50% of his estate."

²¹⁸ See Case K69 (1960) 10 TBRD 364 (Aust.), and Thomas v. Marshall, 34 T.C. 178. In order for this to be successful the intermediary trust shouldn't be so bare as to allow the common law to disregard it and have the ultimate beneficiary recognized as such under the top tier trust.

²¹⁹ 73 D.T.C. 189 TRB.

and on those grounds, (the "other" trust was hence charged with the dwelling liabilities), the spousal trust severed and unencumbered was allowed to obtain relief under Sec. 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act, (substantially similar to Sec. 70(6)(b) of the ITA).

In *Kamichik Estate v. M.N.R.*²²⁰ a similar situation arose wherein the will of a taxpayer instructed executors and trustees to hold the residue of the estate in trust and to pay one half of the net revenue to the spouse for life and to accumulate the other half for the offspring whereupon turning 25, it would be distributed to them while upon the death of the spouse the capital would be distributable to the children. The executors attempted to obtain the benefit of Sec. 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act, which is identical to Sec. 70(6)(b) of the ITA, while the Minister contended that while there was only one trust, only 50% and not 100% of its income was payable to the spouse hence Sec. 7(1)(b) could not apply. Flanigan Q.C. of the Tax Review Board quickly held that the granting of administrative powers over the spouse's and the offspring's entitlements to the same executors was irrelevant. In arriving at his conclusion that the testator had created two trusts the Chairman placed considerable significance upon the diction used, particularly the plurality of the designation of "trusts" in the clause granting everyday powers to the executors and that upon the death of the spouse the children were, as per the will, entitled to receive the capital set aside for her, (or what was left at that time).

Clearly, one would not want to leave the interpretation of a will or other testamentary document open to question in respect of the Sec. 104(2) on account of poor draftsmanship and thus it should be obvious that clear unambiguous speech should be used, under a will to create multiple trusts, through the use of clear designations and descriptions.²²¹

In re: *Beaumont*²²² an inter vivos marriage settlement was created by a taxpayer and subsequently her father's will directed that his trustees hold "upon the same trusts and with and subject to the same powers ... as are in their respective marriage settlements contained with respect to the funds thereby settled." There were two separate settlers, separate funds and separate sets of trustees while some question arose as to whether there were two separate trusts or merely an accretion to that inter vivos. *Hindle v. Taylor*²²³, *Cooper v. MacDonald*²²⁴ and *Trew Perpetual Trustee Co*²²⁵ were cited to support the contention that there were two separate trusts not an accretion though In re: *Perkin's*²²⁶ was put forward to argue that when a testator directs that funds be held "upon the same trusts" and not "upon the like trusts" a blended fund is intended. L.J. Farwell held that since new trustees were directed to execute the trust an accretion was not intended and two trusts arose.²²⁷ Separate trustees of numerous settlements created under a will or by reference to those inter vivos was also a conclusive factor in In re: *Wood*²²⁸ where Cozens- Hardy M.R. held:

"What do we find here? We find in this will that there certainly are several distinct settlements with different beneficiaries, with different trusts, and different persons entitled on failure of issue of all of them taking the respective settled funds, and it appears to me they must be regarded as independent trusts. I suggested during the argument what I thought then, and think now, is not a fair test. Could not separate

220 73 D.T.C. 177 TRB.

221 See Case R67, (1966) 16 TBRD 308, Case G20, (1956) 7 TBRD 114, and Re: Munro, 1910 V.L.R. 395. In McArthur Estate v. M.N.R., 74 D.T.C. 1070 (TAB), one trust was found to exist even though as per its terms there was deemed to be two for income computation / entitlement purposes: diction was very indicative and the severance of the fund for income computation did not serve to be so in respect of the interests as well. See also Re: Agar, 1981 N.Z.L.R. 684, Re: Paul's Settlement Trusts, 1920 1 Ch. 99. Jarmon or Wills, 8th Ed. 1951, p. 692, for presumption against multiple charges in referential trusts stated in wills.

222 1913 1 Ch. 325

223 5 D.M. & G. 577

224 L.R. 16 Eq. 258

225 1895 A.C. 264

226 1893 1 Ch. 283

227 See also In re: North, 1897 76 L.T. 186. In Re: Hickman's Will Trusts, 1950 2 All E.R. 285, a taxpayer covenanted that upon his death his executors would augment an existing marriage trust of his offspring by £10,000 however when his will directed that £20,000 be given the trustees of the inter vivos trust "to be held by them on the trusts of the settlement" "in addition to the sum of £10,000 covenanted by me to be settled upon her by the ... settlement" some question arose as to the destination of the £20,000: whether it was an accretion or a new fund similar to that existing and void due to the death of a beneficiary under it. On the language use, though it was held that as per Re: Campbell, 1922 1 Ch. 551, the donative description "addition" is not conclusively determinative to its manner of receipt, the larger sum was to be treated as an accretion and to pass with the £10,000.

228 1913 2 Ch. 574

trustees have been appointed in respect of each of these funds? I think they clearly could, and counsel for the appellant quite admitted that could be so, at least before there was any grandchild who attained twenty-one or attained a vested interest. If separate trustees might have been appointed of these funds there would be no coalescence; one could not be deemed to be an accretion to the other. If separate trustees had been appointed I know of no process of law by which the one set of trustees could be required to hand over the funds to another set, although the beneficiaries might be the same. It seems to me to be exactly like the case where you have a will and a settlement, or, if you like, two settlements with similar trusts. Can it make any difference that in one particular event at a future date the beneficiaries happen to be the same? In my opinion it cannot. They are still separate trusts although under those trusts in one event, which may or may not happen, the beneficiaries may be the same. I am unable to find on this will any such scheme or any such rule of law or any such presumption as will justify me in saying that the fund, one half of William's one third which went over on this death without issue, is to be treated as a mere accretion to the elder son's share in the sense that all the original powers and provisions, including the hotchpot clause set out in the will with reference to his share, would apply not merely to the original fund, but to the accretion."

In *Re: Paul's Settlement Trusts*²²⁹ a testator directed that £20,000 "be held upon the trusts" settled by a deed executed the same day as the will so that such trusts should "take effect in relation to the said sum of £20,00 in the same manner in all respects as if such sum had formed part of the property originally settled by such indenture". It was held in the Chancery:

"In my judgment the true effect of clause 10 of his will is to make the £20,000 legacy in all respects an accretion to the trust funds originally settled by the settlement of August 11, 1910. The testator does not say that the legacy is to be held on similar or upon the same trusts as are declared by that settlement, but bequeaths it to the trustees of the settlement upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions therein declared concerning the trust funds thereby settled; and then, to place his meaning beyond doubt, he adds that the trusts and powers of the settlement are to take effect in relation to the legacy in all respects as if it had formed part of the property originally settled. In my opinion the testator could hardly have used clearer words in which to express his intention to make the bequest operate so that the legacy should form part of the trust fund settled by the settlement and should not form an independent trust fund settled by his will."

In *Fraser or Robinson v. Murdoch*²³⁰ executors were given the power to appropriate portions of residue and hold on several trusts in satisfaction of legacies created by the will and once this was validly done one of the funds suffered a loss which the beneficiary contended could be equalized with assets from the other fund. Lord Watson held with respect to the result of the exercise of the power:

"The real question in this case, according to my apprehension of it, comes to be - What was the effect of the severance of the two legacies upon the right of indemnity competent to these trustees so long as they held, and were justified in holding, the trust estate as an undivided whole? I cannot agree with the opinion expressed by the late Lord Ormisdale, one of the two judges composing the majority of the Second Division, to the effect that the appropriation of the stocks held by the trustees consisted of mere book entries made for the convenience in dealing with the interest of the life-rentors, Mrs. Sinclair and Mrs. Robinson. The appropriation of these stocks, if authorized, as I hold it to have been, by the terms of the trust deed, was an act of administration which the trustees of themselves had no power to undo. The immediate effect of that act was to alter the pecuniary interest of the two sets of beneficiaries concerned, and the relations subsisting between them and the trustees. The beneficial interests of Mrs. Sinclair and her issue on the one hand, and of Mrs. Robinson and her children on the other, were henceforth limited to the stocks severally assigned to them, and the trustees ceased to be under any liability to account to either life-rentrix and her children for the stocks appropriated to the others. Two trusts were created instead of one, with separate funds, and different beneficiaries having no community of interest. Such being the legal result of the appropriation, it is, in my opinion, immaterial whether the authority to constitute these two trusts was derived from one and the same deed, or whether each was constituted by virtue of a separate deed under the hand of the testatrix."

229 1920 1 Ch. 99
230 1881 6 A.C. 855

Pexton v. Bell & Anor, Crowe v. Appleby²³¹ is illustrative of the underlying principles of appropriation powers. In the former case on the life tenant's death the trust fund in which he was interested was to suffer a deemed disposition in a manner similar to Sec. 104(4) of the ITA. Due to the diction used in the legislation some question arose as to how extensive and in respect of which assets the life interest was based. The will setting out the trust provided that the fund was to be held in trust for such of the testator's male offspring as attained the age of 25 and female offspring as attained the age of 21 or married. Each offspring's share was to be separately invested. The will further proceeded, "Nevertheless as to the share of every daughter of mine in my trust property I direct that the same shall not be paid to her but shall be retained by my trustees upon the trusts herein after declared concerning the same that is to say - As to the share of every such daughter separately upon trusts to invest the same pursuant to the clause concerning investments hereinafter contained and upon further trust to pay the income of such share and the investments thereof for the time being (which are hereinafter referred to as 'the portion of my said daughter') to my same daughter without power of anticipation during her life" with certain subsequent gift overs to grandchildren. Unfortunately the trustee did not make an appropriation of the shares of the daughters out of the fund to meet each interest as it sprang up on the attaining of the age and when one died the tax assessors contended that the whole fund was to suffer a disposition for FMV proceeds while the taxpayers contended that the whole fund wasn't assessable, only the proportion of the particular life tenant's interest in it (in accompany with others) pending the appropriation. Sir John Pennycuik held:

"Mr. Taylor, for the taxpayer in the case, relied on the further point raised in his cross-notice. He expressed this further point (unless I misunderstood him) in these terms:

"(1) Pending appropriation Mrs. Robert's share consisted of one fourth off each specific asset, that is to say, the mortgage and the money on deposit; and (2) the testator himself expressly created separate settlements."

So far as the first of these contentions goes, I do not think it really solves the problem. I will assume that, pending appropriation, each of the beneficiaries should be treated as entitled to a fourth of each specific asset, in contradistinction to a fourth of the fund as a whole. But, even if one goes down to the blocks of shares or single shares, the fact remains that pending appropriation, the shares are still held for the four tenants in common in undivided shares and no item of property, not one single share, could be said to belong exclusively to one of the settled shares."

...

"I should mention one further difficulty in the way of Mr. Potter's contentions, namely, that it would make the charge of duty depend upon the purely administrative acts of the trustees by way of appropriation or omission to appropriate. Liability for tax frequently follows from the exercise of a discretion of trustees affecting beneficial interests, but the Court is normally reluctant to make liability to tax depend on purely administrative acts of the trustees."

...

"Mr. Millett contended that under a disposition in the present form the settlor creates not a single settlement but several distinct settlements, namely the, first, a settlement of a trust fund upon his children as tenants in common absolutely and, secondly, a separate settlement upon each child of the share of that child upon trusts for the child and his children. I do not think this is a correct analysis of the position. It is, of course, competent for the owner of an undivided share in property to make a settlement of that share; and I do not doubt that, if he does so, that would be a different settlement distinct from the head settlement which creates the undivided share. But where the trusts of each share are declared by the settlor himself, then I think there is a single settlement upon the totality of those trusts and a single trust fund subsisting until it is broken up by the payment out or appropriation. In deed, the settlor could not achieve his purpose otherwise, since, once he had divested himself of the ownership of the fund by settlement upon his children as tenants in common without more ado, it would no longer be open to him to declare trusts of those shares by s different disposition."

231 51 T.C. 457 (CA)

Case U111²³² illustrates a taxation tribunal's approach to the appropriation which give rise to separate trusts out of current income. In that case the trust deed specified that the trustees were to have the absolute discretion of deciding what amount of income would be distributable in the future to the beneficiary and the Appeals Tribunal held that once such a power was exercised a new trust, distinct from the head trust, was created. Case U4²³³ illustrates a sub-trust creation where amounts are credited and create a sub-trust, the head trust apportions interest in respect of the credit balance in the account and takes a deduction while the sub-trust recognizes "interest" income. There were held to be two distinct trusts.²³⁴ A concrete adjustment in the scope of a power of advancement requiring its exercise has been held not have created a new trust.²³⁵

In the case of any testamentary disposition where multiple trusts are to be created accurate diction should be used to convey the settlor's desire that multiple distinct units with independent interests be created.²³⁶ In the case of inter vivos dispositions equally clear terms should indicate whether the existing trust disposition should apply to that being made or that the disposition not augment that existing but that the terms of that existing be adopted to govern the disposition as if creating a new trust.

²³² 87 A.T.C. 667

²³³ 88 A.T.C. 123

²³⁴ See also Case V53, 88 A.T.C. 403, Case U157, 87 A.T.C. 912, and Vestey's Exors. v. I.R.C., 31 T.C. 1.

²³⁵ Case U202, 87 A.T.C. 1129. See also "Unravelling the Confusion", Tax'n in Aust., Aug. 1990. P.D. Giugni. See additional comments in the Chapter Preferred Beneficiary Election, "Who creates the trust".

²³⁶ See Special Powers of appointment in a following chapter for special considerations.

The Taxation Year of A Trust.

The taxation year of an inter vivos trust varies considerably from that of a testamentary trust owing to the substance of Sec. 104(23)(a) which provides that the taxation year of a testamentary trust will be the period for which the accounts of the trust (or estate) have been ordinarily made up and accepted for purposes of assessment, while in the absence of an established period, the period adopted by the trust for that purpose which cannot exceed 12 months.

In the absence of a similar provision in respect of inter vivos trusts, the taxation year thereof will be that provided in Sec. 249(1)(b) being the calendar year since an inter vivos trust is considered an individual.

“Testamentary Trusts – Sec. 104(23)”

(23) In the case of a testamentary trust, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act the following rules apply:

(a) the taxation year of the trust is the period for which the accounts of the trust have been ordinarily made up and accepted for purposes of assessment under this Act and, in the absence of an established practice, the period adopted by the trust for that purpose (but no such period may exceed 12 months and a change in a usual and accepted period any not be made for the purpose of this Act without the concurrence of the Minister);

(b) when a taxation year is referred to by reference to a calendar year, the reference is the taxation year or years coinciding with, or ending in, that year;

An executed trust is fully constituted only after the three certainties exist and thus until all of them are clear the trust does not come into existence and thus its taxation year does not begin until that time however in the instance where the testamentary trust consists of an unadministered estate, regardless of whether or not the taxpayer died intestate, the "testamentary trust" will be treated as constituted immediately after his death, even though the residuary estate, being the technical trust, has not been constituted.²³⁷

As per *Anning v. Anning*²³⁸ in order for an inter vivos trust to be constituted via a transfer to another party the gift creating it must be perfected and this, in equity, can occur only if the transferor has done all of those acts which he is obliged to do personally, or, that he must have done all of the acts possible or that must have ensured that the acts were done so as to make the conveyance.²³⁹ There must be an effective passage of legal title of the property while the manner in which such can occur isn't important.

In *Milroy v. Lord*²⁴⁰ the taxpayer wished to convey shares to a trustee on trust for certain beneficiaries and although the share certificates were delivered the formal conveyance method, an entry in the registry of the company, had not been completed when dividends were received. The Lord Justices held that the trust failed, (and implicitly that the transferor also did not intend to act as executory trustee), due to the imperfect gift. The courts will not step in to complete an imperfect gift where the settlor has expressed merely an intention to create a trust but has not acted on that intention to create via the concluding act of legal conveyance.²⁴¹ This

237. In the case of executory trusts, the transfer of property/provision for transfer of valuable consideration is the act that initiates the arrangement and it should, in the author's opinion, be considered as the time at which the trust is created and thus the beginning of its tax year. The fact that beneficiaries and their interests are decided upon subsequently should not cause the subsequent trust to be recognized as different, for taxation purposes, from the executory one.

238 4 C.L.R. 1049.

239 See In re: Rose, 1952 1 Ch. 499.

240 45 E.R. 1185.

241 See the Aust. case of JACA Nominees Pty Ltd v Waldarra Pty Ltd & Anor [2010] VSC 546 (2 December 2010) where, concerning a sale gone wrong that:

129 In Shepard v Doolan (2005) NSWSC 42. White J provided a useful summary of the applicable principles.

34. Where a constructive trust is imposed, based upon the parties' common intention as to the ownership of property upon which the claimant has acted to his or her detriment, the inquiry is as to the actual intention of the parties. The law does not impute a presumed intention to the parties based upon was the case in *I.R.C. v. Allan*²⁴² where a taxpayer wished to create a trust out of shares held personally, expressed such to the beneficiaries and disclosed of such to the corporation's directors, but did not execute any trust declaration so as to give the intention legal effect. Dividends were received and until the deed was what the Court considers fair and reasonable persons in the position of the parties would have intended had they turned their minds to the issue. (Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] UKHL 5; [1970] AC 777 at 804, 810, 810, 816-817; Gissing v Gissing [1970] UKHL 3; [1971] AC 886 at 900, 902, 905-909; Allen v Snyder [1977] 2 NSWLR 685 at 690, 698, 701).

35. It is unnecessary to enter the debate as to whether a trust based on the parties' common intention is properly characterised as a constructive trust, or whether it should be characterised as an express trust which is enforceable notwithstanding the want of writing as it would be an equitable fraud for the legal owner to rely on the absence of writing to deny the beneficiary's interest. (Allen v Snyder at 692-3; 699). In later cases, eg Grant v Edwards [1989] CH 638; Maharaj v Chand [1986] AC 898 at 907; Green v Green (1989) 17 NSWLR 343; Brandling v Weir [2003] NSWSC 723; Parianos v Melliush [2003] FCA 190; (2003) 30 Fam LR 524, this class of trust has been classified as a constructive trust, even though it is based on the parties' actual intentions, rather than imposed despite their intentions.

36. The intention to be established need not be that the parties have a specific share of the property. It is sufficient that they intend that the claimant should have a beneficial interest or "some form of proprietary interest". (Green v Green at 355, 356; Grant v Edwards at 654; Parianos v Melliush at [31], [39]).

37. The intention may be established in various ways. There may be an agreement between the parties as to how the property should be held. There may be express statements as to their intention. There intention may be inferred from their conduct. The question of what acts demonstrate an agreement or common intention referable to the beneficial enjoyment of the property is one of evidence, not law. Allen v Snyder at 691; Green v Green at 355). A common intention that a party have a beneficial interest in a property owned by another will not be inferred merely from their joint occupation of property, nor the carrying out of household duties, nor the bringing up of children on the property, nor the doing of repairs, renovations, maintenance, decoration or improvement, nor the provision of furniture. (Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] UKHL 5; [1970] AC 777 at 805-6, 811, 181, 826; Gissing v Gissing [1970] UKHL 3; [1971] AC 886 at 900, 910; Burns v Burns [1984] Ch 317 at 326, 328, 342).

38. The intention may be inferred from financial contributions, direct or indirect, to the acquisition of property, including the paying off of mortgages, or the payment of expenses which free up funds for that purpose. (Burns v Burns at 328-329; Gissing v Gissing at 900, 902-3, 906-907; Grant v Edwards at 647, 648-9, 653-4, 655; Green v Green at 355). This is a wider enquiry than whether a contribution was made to the purchase money such as to give rise to a presumption of a resulting trust. Whilst both enquiries address the inferences to be drawn as to the parties' actual intentions, a contribution to the purchase price creates a presumption of beneficial ownership in the proportion which the amount contributed bears to the price. For a "common intention" constructive trust, a contribution, direct or indirect, to the costs of acquisition of the property is a matter from which an intention that the claimant have a beneficial interest in the property might be inferred. There is a difference between a fact from which an inference can be drawn, and a fact from which a rebuttable presumption arises. The significance of the difference will depend upon the strength of the presumption. In the case of the "common intention" constructive trust, there is no presumption that the beneficial interest is in proportion with the contribution on the purchase price.

39. Other evidence from which conclusions may be drawn about the intentions of the parties include declarations of the parties before or at the time of the transaction or so close in time after the transaction as to constitute a part of it. Subsequent declarations of intention are only admissible against interest. (Calverley v Green [1984] HCA 81; (1984) 155 CLR 242 at 262 and 269; Charles Marshall Pty Ltd v Grimsley [1956] HCA 28; (1956) 95 CLR 353 at 365; Bryson v Bryant (1992) 29 NSWLR 188 at 215).

40. The plaintiff must also show that she acted to her detriment in a way referable to the agreement or intention that she have an interest in the property. Austin v Keele (1987) 10 NSWLR 283 at 291; Grant v Edwards at 648; Carruthers v Manning [2001] NSWSC 1130 at [124]. Conduct which is insufficient to establish a common intention as to the ownership of the property may be insufficient to constitute relevant actions to the plaintiff's detriment to establish a trust if the common intention is established otherwise. Conduct may be both the evidence from which an intention that the plaintiff have a beneficial interest can be inferred and the act of detrimental reliance.

In the case the judge went on to find that with the most minimal documentation there was an agreed express trust dictated in its terms.

242 9 T.C. 234 (HL).

actually endorsed they continued to be his income.²⁴³ See also *Baldassarra v. M.N.R.*²⁴⁴ where incorporation subscribed for shares for 40 offsprings in what was contended to be a trustee capacity however the Tax Court found that since there was no evidence of a declaration of trust, receipt as trustee, or the use of trust funds to acquire the shares, a mere intention that the offsprings benefit was insufficient. Milroy v. Lord was expressly cited.

As per *Williams v. C.I.R.*²⁴⁵ property not presently owned cannot be conveyed by gift, assigned, or imposed with a trust though it may be subject to an agreement to impress it with a trust once it comes into the hands of the assigner.²⁴⁶ This is the second rule arising out of Milroy v. Lord: the transferor must have done everything which according to the nature of the property is necessary to convey it. Future property cannot be conveyed by nature.²⁴⁷ Equitable interests may be transferred if intention is sufficiently clear though, unless statutorily required, no legal conveyance method need be adhered to.²⁴⁸ There are two exceptions to perfect an otherwise imperfect gift;

- 1) the purported donee is made executor of the gift,²⁴⁹ and
- 2) equitable estoppel, where possession is granted to the donee without legal conveyance and with the implied or explicit assent of the donor the donee invests on the faith of the gift.²⁵⁰

If a will provides that from the initial estate certain property is to be conveyed to certain trustees on trust then the testamentary trust will arise only when the property can be conveyed clear of testamentary encumbrances which may have been assigned to it as per the will and when the executors have assented to the conveyance.

Upon the execution of a will and the continual administration of an estate there could be a multitude of concurrent T3s to file, corresponding to the estate itself and any severed testamentary trust that has arisen out of it. Although the Sec. 108(1)(i) definition of testamentary trust includes both estates and trusts it would be foolish to equate a true trust arising out of the estate that is not in the form of the residue to being equivalent to the estate itself for purposes of determining a tax year which depends upon the time of creation since clearly one is created later than the other. An estate comes into being at the moment after the time of death and the final residuary estate, being technically a trust, may take years to ascertain.²⁵¹

It may prove quite beneficial to surviving beneficiaries to have several pure trusts arise out of an estate, each with a different time of creation and resultingly different tax year, (as per Sec. 104(23)(a)), many of which may be inter-connected through discretionary income beneficiary-trust relationships so as to allow the deferral of the recognition of the income actually being realized.²⁵² They will also come in extremely handy in a spousal situation as the deemed disposition provisions in Sec. 104(4) will not have much effect on a trust that owns no, or small amounts of, property, and thus a trust-beneficiary distribution just prior to the applicable date will allow for the avoidance of the effect of that onerous subsection. Since the trusts will be usually "testamentary"

²⁴³ See F.C.T. v. Clarke, 40 C.L.R. 246 (HCA), for mere promises and incomplete legal steps, as well as Arthur v. Public Trustee, 1988 90 F.L.R. 203.

²⁴⁴ 91 DTC 289 (TCC)

²⁴⁵ 1965 N.Z.L.R. 395 (CA).

²⁴⁶ See Norman v. F.C.T., 109 C.L.R. 9 and Blair v. C.I.R., 1936 300 U.S. Rep. 5.

²⁴⁷ In Case No. B-26-31, 75 A.T.C. 303, a taxpayer shareholder held shares in a closed corporation the articles of which precluded the shares from being held by anyone but specified shareholders, (registered pharmaceutical chemists). The taxpayer entered into an agreement to sell them to his family holding corporation and executed a trust deed to this effect, holding them in trust for the corporation, but the dividends paid to him as trustee were assessable in his hands since he continued to hold the shares as shareholder albeit trustee. See also Hollycock v. Comm. of Taxn., 71 A.T.C. 4202, for application of anti-avoidance provisions to similar arrangement entered into to split income. For other problems in complete conveyances see Taylor v. Dep. F.C.T., 1969 1 A.T.R. 97, and for retroactivity of expressions; J.W. Broomhead v. J.W. Broomhead, 1985 V.R. 891 at 921 and 923.

²⁴⁸ See Comp. of Stamps v. Howard-Smith, 54 C.L.R. 614, and Grey v. I.R.C., 1960 A.C. 1.

²⁴⁹ Strong v. Bird, 1874 L.R. 18 Eq. 315.

²⁵⁰ See Bouchard v. The Queen, 83 D.T.C. 5193.

²⁵¹ All testamentary trusts are not created immediately under the will of a testator; one only has to examine the case of general powers of appointment given to executors and their ability to create trusts, if the power is properly delegated, for an example.

²⁵² Their creation may be based on the occurrence of a contingent event so that relation back to the time of death may not necessarily result.

they will not cause Part XII.2 tax to apply.

Residuary trusts arise when the residue is ascertainable. Specific bequest trusts relate back to the moment immediately after death and trusts based on contingent events or that can be created with the exercise of properly delegated discretionary powers arise when the event occurs or the power is exercised.²⁵³

The fact that an executrix has disclaimed her office or testamentary trustee has no her office has no bearing on the tax year of the arrangement: it exists regardless of whether a party exists to attend to its functions.

Where a person dies without a will, (or other similar testamentary document), concerning certain property formerly held he is considered to have died either wholly or partially intestate however he is still considered to have an estate identifiable with the person who has control, (possession or de jure), over the intestate property, and the estate is considered to have arose immediately following his death, even though it still has to be processed through the courts, but its tax year commences at that date. If the Courts provide, under the appropriate provincial statutes, that a trust is to be set up for dependants out of property in the estate that trust begins as at the date of the court order and not retroactively, (unless the order or specific statute specifies otherwise), hence even when there isn't a will there can be some manipulation (albeit limited control), of the taxation years of the entities resulting in the intestate situation.

Subsection 104(23)(a) provides that the tax year of a testamentary trust will be the period for which the accounts of the trust have been ordinarily made up and accepted for purposes of assessment while in the absence of such a practice, the period adopted by the trust for that purpose while a change in a usual and accepted period may not be made for the purpose of the Act without the concurrence of the Minister. There may be significant advantages in playing around with the fiscal period of an estate or trust, (such as deferral of income recognition), but upon a review of I.T. 179, the Department's overall opinion can be ascertained to be that there would have to be a good reason, other than personal convenience or deferral of tax, in order for the Minister to concur with a change. With respect to corporations and businesses the Department considers as valid reasons for a change in fiscal periods the alignment of fiscal periods with parent or associated corporations or the alignment with seasonal low levels of inventory or slack operational periods, however it does not provide examples of acceptable reasons for the change in the fiscal periods of testamentary trusts which is clearly allowed as per the wording in Sec. 104(23)(a).

A valid reason could include the terminal ascertainment of the unencumbered property of an administered estate which then becomes fully subject to the beneficiaries' entitlements, in that the form of the entity has been altered significantly, as well as its accounting.

Another valid reason for a change, similar to that in the case of corporations, is the alignment of fiscal periods of trusts created under a will or intestate court order so as to facilitate more comprehensive and a manageable accounting by mutual trustees while variations of the trust's terms should also serve as valid reasons.

Where the trust's sole activity is the carrying on of a business then it could also alter its fiscal period on the same basis normally afforded proprietorships; alignment with low inventory levels or seasonal slack periods. I.T. 179, para. 4(e), provides that a request for a change in fiscal periods need not be forwarded when an estate or trust is wound up, however, it could be valid reason, to alter a fiscal period, when a trust is varied through statute law/court order approaches so as to allow it to carry on initially prohibited activities such as a business, or incorporation of activities, et cetera.

The basic necessity for a change to be allowed is that it can be demonstrated to be prompted solely by sound business reasons, (other than the obvious two previously disclosed), and since a testamentary trust is usually a non-business focused entity the Department would most likely accept non-business reasons which harbour the same degree of legitimacy.

Since under subdivision k, an estate is equated with a trust, and since Sec. 104(23)(a) refers only to trusts it would appear that the draftsmen provided for the continuation of the estate's tax year even when a trust had been ascertained, otherwise the subsection would have been placed outside of subdivision k. In the author's opinion, a testamentary trust arising out of residue will not be allowed to automatically apply for a tax year different from the estate simply because it's a trust and not an unadministered estate. Subsection 104(23) must be read within the context of subdivision k which equates estates and trusts and thus there is little argument to recognize functions and duties of executors and trustees as distinctive for purposes of subdivision k. Outside of the subdivision, the Department and the taxpayer can treat estates and trusts as distinctive, but within the subdivision they cannot. The continuity of the tax entity within subdivision k is inferred.

²⁵³ See Re: Batty, 1952 1 All E.R. 425 (Ch). In Estate of Tolley, 1972 5 S.A.S.R. 466, Brougham v. Poulett, 52 E.R. 294, Burke v. Dawes, 59 C.L.R. 1, and Halsbury's 4th Ed., Vol. 50, para. 612.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Change of fiscal period

IT-179R

DATE: May 28, 1993

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Change of fiscal period

REFERENCE: Subsection 248(1) (also subsections 25(1) and 99(2); paragraphs 87(2)(a), 104(23)(a), 128(1)(d) and 128(2)(d))

Application

This bulletin cancels and replaces Interpretation Bulletin IT-179 dated September 23, 1974 and the Special Release dated June 13, 1986. Current revisions are indicated by vertical lines.

Summary

This bulletin discusses the criteria which apply and the procedure to be followed when a taxpayer requests a change in the fiscal period of a business. The bulletin also notes several events which can cause a change in the fiscal period by operation of law.

Discussion and Interpretation

1. "Fiscal period" means the period for which the accounts of the business of a taxpayer have been ordinarily made up and accepted for assessment purposes under the Income Tax Act. A fiscal period of a corporation must not exceed 53 weeks, whereas a fiscal period for other taxpayers must not exceed 12 months.

2. According to the definition of "fiscal period" in subsection 248(1), a taxpayer may not change the usual and accepted fiscal period without approval (see 3 and 4 below). This requirement is to prevent taxpayers from rearranging their fiscal periods primarily to minimize taxes. Requests for changes in fiscal periods will be approved if they can be demonstrated to be prompted solely by sound business reasons other than obtaining tax benefits. On the other hand, there are various events which can cause a fiscal period to terminate prematurely by operation of law, and such changes in fiscal period do not require approval (see 5 below).

REQUESTED CHANGE IN FISCAL PERIOD

3. Each request for a change of fiscal period is reviewed on its own merits. "Sound business reasons" normally include the following:

- a) A corporation changes its fiscal period to end on the same date as that of its parent or associated company.
- b) A business changes its fiscal period to end when its inventory is at a seasonally low level or within a seasonally slack period.
- c) A taxpayer has transferred property used in carrying on a business to a corporation under section 85 or to a partnership under subsection 97(2) and changes the fiscal period of the business to end on the day immediately before the day of transfer. This is acceptable where the only purpose for such change is to enable capital cost allowance to be deducted in the last fiscal period ending before the transfer and the transferor and transferee are not both entitled to claim capital cost allowance on a particular property for a common time period. (Refer to the current version of IT-172, Capital Cost Allowance - Taxation Year of Individuals.)

Neither the personal convenience of the taxpayer nor, for the purposes of this paragraph, the saving or deferment of income taxes is accepted as a sound business reason. Normally a retroactive change will not be approved.

Procedure for Requesting Change

4. A taxpayer other than a registered charity or registered Canadian amateur athletic association should submit a written request for approval of a change in fiscal period to the Director of the local district taxation office. A request by a registered charity or registered Canadian amateur athletic association should be referred to:

Director, Charities Division,
Revenue Canada, Taxation,
Ottawa, Ontario,
K1A 0L8.

The request should be accompanied by a written statement (signed by the taxpayer or the taxpayer's representative) explaining the reasons for the change.

CHANGE IN FISCAL PERIOD - OPERATION OF LAW

5. Requests for a change in fiscal period are not required where the fiscal period is revised by operation of law. Also, the filing of certain valid elections under the Act will extend the fiscal period beyond the date that would be applicable if there were no such election. The following events can result in a change to the current fiscal period:

- (a) A sole proprietor dies or disposes of a business, or an election is made under subsection 25(1) to retain the normal year-end for a business disposed of by an individual proprietor.
- (b) A partnership ceases to exist (see 6 and 7 below) or a partner elects to retain the normal year-end of the partnership pursuant to subsection 99(2). (See the current version of IT-358, Partnerships - Deferment of Fiscal Year-End.)
- (c) A corporation becomes bankrupt (see 10 below).
- (d) An estate or trust is wound up.
- (e) Taxable Canadian corporations are amalgamated as described in subsection 87(1) and accordingly paragraph 87(2)(a) applies.
- (f) A Canadian corporation is wound up as described in subsection 88(2) and accordingly subparagraph 88(2)(a)(iv) applies.
- (g) Control of a corporation is acquired and paragraph 249(4)(d) applies.

OTHER COMMENTS

Death of a Partner

6. A partner's fiscal period with respect to a partnership ends when the partner dies, whether or not the partnership ceases to exist. Approval to change the fiscal period of the partnership is not required if the partnership ceases to exist. However, approval would be required if the partnership did not cease to exist and it decided to end its fiscal period on the date of the partner's death.

Termination of Partnership

7. Pursuant to subsection 99(1), the fiscal period of a partnership is deemed to end immediately before the time the partnership ceases to exist, even where subsection 98(1) deems the partnership not to have ceased to exist because of an incomplete distribution of partnership property.

Receivership

8. The fiscal period does not end automatically when the business carried on by an individual or a corporation is placed in the hands of a receiver, liquidator or trustee (other than a trustee for a corporation in bankruptcy - see 10 below).

Bankruptcy of an Individual

9. If the business is disposed of or ceases in the course of bankruptcy, the fiscal period would end at that time. However, if the business operated by an individual is carried on during bankruptcy, the bankruptcy would not of itself cause a change in the fiscal period.

Bankruptcy of a Corporation

10. Where a corporation becomes a bankrupt during a fiscal period, paragraph 128(1)(d) provides that the current taxation year is deemed to end on the day immediately before the day it becomes a bankrupt, and a new taxation year is deemed to commence on the day it becomes a bankrupt. Since the taxation year is the fiscal period, the effect of this is to cause the current fiscal period to be deemed to have ended.

Lapse of a Corporation's Charter

11. Where a corporation's charter lapses but is later reinstated, and in the meantime operations are continued as usual in the corporation's name, the corporation should continue to use the fiscal period which it established before the lapsing of its charter.

Fiscal Period Longer Than 365 Days

12. No change is considered to occur where a corporation follows the practice of ending its fiscal period on a chosen day of the week that is nearest to a certain day of the year, provided that the resulting period does not exceed 53 weeks.

Accounting Period versus Fiscal Period

13. A change in the year-end for accounting purposes will not automatically result in a change to the fiscal period for tax purposes. Although normally the year for accounting purposes coincides with the fiscal period for income tax purposes, there is no requirement for this to be so. If the taxpayer wishes to change the accounting year and have the fiscal period coincide with that year, a request should be made to change the fiscal period.

If you have any comments regarding the matters discussed in this bulletin, please send them to:

Director, Technical Publications Division Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs Branch
Revenue Canada, Taxation
875 Heron Road
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0L8

Constructive Trusts.

A constructive trust in Canada has primarily taken the form of an equitable remedy imposed by the Court for "unjust enrichment" wherein the "enriched" party will stand as trustee to the "deprived" party in respect of subject property allowing the rules of trusts to be applied to the arrangement, however, it must be recognized that though the constructive trust to be applied to the arrangement is an entity of the Courts it comes into existence not as a result of their action but as a result of the unjust enrichment.²⁵⁴

In *Pettikus v. Becker*²⁵⁵, Dickson J. provided a fairly accurate description of a constructive trust in a matrimonial dispute context:

"In *Murdoch v. Murdoch*²⁵⁶ Laskin, J. as he was then introduced in a matrimonial property dispute, the concept of constructive trust to prevent unjust enrichment. It is imposed without reference to intention to create a trust, and its purpose is to remedy a result otherwise unjust. It is a broad and flexible equitable tool which permits courts to gauge all the circumstances of the case, including the respective contributions of the parties, and to determine beneficial entitlement. It is described this way in *Rathwell*²⁵⁷ at page 455:

"The constructive trust, as so envisaged, comprehends the imposition of trust machinery by the court in order to achieve a result consonant with good conscience. As a matter of principle, the court will not allow any man unjustly to appropriate to himself the value earned by the labors of another. That principle is not defeated by the existence of a matrimonial relationship between the parties; but for the principle to succeed, the facts must display an enrichment, a corresponding deprivation, and the absence of any juristic reason, - such as a contract or disposition of law - for the enrichment."

Although the resulting trust approach will often afford a wife the relief she seeks, the resulting trust is not available, as Professor Waters points out: "where the imputation of intention is impossible or unreasonable." One cannot imply an intention that the wife should have an interest if her conduct before and after the acquisition of the property is "wholly ambiguous", or its association with the alleged agreement "altogether tenuous". Where evidence is inconsistent with resulting trust, the court has the choice of denying a remedy or accepting the constructive trust."²⁵⁸

Such an arbitrarily assigned relationship by the courts could come in the form of a remedy for agent-principal disputes where the former has benefitted unjustly from the latter²⁵⁹ while the important aspect to recognize is that the "trust" need not even have been contemplated or recognized to exist by the parties prior to the court action, in order to be validly recognized as such once the court has assigned the relationship, although usually there is the existence of a fiduciary relationship.²⁶⁰

In N.J. Fletcher v. M.N.R.,²⁶¹ the Tax Court of Canada had to decide whether a constructive trust was eligible for treatment under subsection 104(1), 108(i)(j) and 115(b)(vi), when a fiduciary relationship existed with respect to proceeds held by a party as consideration on a sale or orchestrated by the party through the direction of the legal though absent owner. The funds were lost through bad mortgages entered into by the holder at his own discretion not through the direction of the non-resident "beneficiary" and the mortgages personally benefitted the intermediary through his interests in the mortgage. (The holder acted on his power of attorney granted by the legal owner.) After the $95,000 loss had occurred, the two parties entered into a 254 Whether or not it is a true substantive institution or merely a remedy in Canadian law, especially for income tax purposes, has not been settled: Nelson v. M.N.R. forthcoming. The English consider it a substantive institution while the Americans consider it a remedy only. See Rawluk v. Rawluk, 1990 1 S.C.R. 70. For advanced commentary, see D. Waters "The Constructive Trust" & "The Development of the Remedial Constructive Trust" forthcoming.

255 1980 2 S.C.R. 834.

256 1972 1 S.C.R. 423.

257 1978 2 S.C.R. 436.

258 See "Constructive and Resulting Trusts as Defensive Strategies" by John E.S. Poyser and Jacob D. Giesbrecht, Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 25 Pg. 302 for some discussion.

259 See Keech v. Sandford, 1726 Sel Cas Ch 61.

260 A constructive trust was not available in Rosenfeldt et al. v. Olson et al., 22 E.T.R. 83, while see also Re: Dreger, 1976 12 O.R. (2d) 371, and Schobelt v. Barber, 60 D.L.R. (2d) 519. For more constructive trust cases involving various situations of unjust enrichment, see Chase Manhattan Bank NA v. Israel-British Bank Ltd., 1981 Ch. 105, DHN Food Dist. Ltd. v. Tower Hamlets Ldn. Bour., 1976 1 W.L.R. 852, Bannister v. Bannister, 1948 2 All E.R. 133, English v. Dedham Vale Prop. Ltd., 1978 1 All E.R. 382, Carly v. Farrelly, 1975 1 N.Z.L.R. 356, Hussey v. Palmer, 1972 1 W.L.R. 1286 (CA).

261 [1987] 2 C.T.C. 2341.

"trust agreement" acknowledging their trustee-beneficiary relationship whereafter the "beneficiary" sold his interest therein for $1. As per Sec. 107(1.1), the interest had cost him $95,000, thus the loss was recognizable but the Minister claimed otherwise contending what the relationship consisted of a principal-agent and thus when the interest was disposed of the loss was from a disposition of a mortgage, not a trust interest. The non-resident taxpayer contended that the loss was from a disposition of a capital interest in a trust resident in Canada while the beneficiary had also been successful before the Supreme Court of British Columbia in contending that a breach in trust had occurred with respect to the intermediary's actions. With respect to the timing of the conception of the constructive trust Sarchuk, T.C.J. held, contrary to the opinion of counsel for the Minister:

"I do not accept the view that a constructive trust does not exist until the Court so declares in the course of, for example, an action by the beneficiary against the trustee."

and quoting from "The Development of the Remedial Constructive Trust,"²⁶² he provided the dicta:

"The trust may arise at the outset when the property is acquired, or later on, as the circumstances may require.

...

The evidence before this court leaves no doubt that there was a fiduciary relationship between the appellant and Hyman, which relationship gave rise to the placing of trust and confidence by Fletcher in the fiduciary. This relationship existed at the time that the "misappropriation" occurred while Hyman was acting within the general scope of his fiduciary duty."²⁶³

With respect to the appellant's contention that the constructive trust was eligible for treatment under Sec. 115(1)(b)(vi), as opposed to the Minister's contention that only express trusts were to be treated, the Judge held:

"The careful manner in which the word "trust" has been used in Division B and D of the Income Tax Act and the fact that the legislators chose not to define the term "trust" for purpose of Division D, or to exclude a constructive trust or a resulting trust, can only be taken to mean that for the purposes of subparagraph 115(1)(b)(vi) the term "trust" encompasses all forms of trusts."²⁶⁴

Subparagraph 108(i)(j) defines "trust" for purposes of some of the subdivision K rules and not for purposes of the Act in general, however even with respect to the technical provision the Tax Court Judge's concluding comment concerning character expression would be valid.

Fletcher was successful at suing the trustee Hyman for breach of trust in the B.C. Supreme Court, however, if he sold his capital interest for $1 thus crystallizing the loss, how would the proceeds the Supreme Court Judge awarded him be treated under the I.T.A.? The trustee would be personally liable for the payments thereof to the former beneficiary, (unless the judge ordered that the payments be made to the trust itself then distributed out to the beneficiary: a ludicrous arrangement in this particular instance but possibly not so in others), and if he made payments to the beneficiary directly then Sec. 53(2)(h) would not apply, (to cause a capital interest ACB adjustment), even if the beneficiary maintained his capital interest since the trust is not making the payments of capital; the trustee is and is only in his personal capacity. If the capital interest had already been disposed of prior to the making of the payments then Sec. 53(2)(h) would definitely not be applicable. Since such payments would not be otherwise includable in computing the recipient's income, being awards on account of capital subsection 105(1) would most likely apply to them, to cause them to be fully includable in computing their recipient's income, since they are clearly a benefit from a trust though not from being a beneficiary under it per se.^{265 266} If the Court provides that the trustees are to pay the damages

262 J.L. Dewar, (1982), 60 Can. Bar Review 265.

263 With respect to the timing of the creation of the constructive trust, see Howard v. Miller, 1915 A.C. 318, Central Trustee & Safe Deposit Co. v. Saider, 1916 1 A.C. 266, Hussey v. Palmer, 1972 1 W.L.R. 1286 (CA), Gissing v. Gissing, 1971 A.C. 886, though see Angeletakis v. Thymaras, 32 E.T.R. 300 (remedial trust not arising until order of court).

264 Could this approach be fostered, with its obvious conclusion, with respect to the fact that the Sec. 115(1)(b)(vi) provision does not refer to capital interests in estates which are not completely administered?

265 In the Fletcher case, the plaintiff was a non-resident: Sec. 105(1) does not apply in respect of non-resident: Sec. 105(1) does not apply in respect of non-resident since there is no adapting provision in respect of it under Part XIII or Division D, thus the plaintiff could recognize the loss under Sec. 115(1)(b)(vi) and realize the value equivalent to it tax free.

266 See the Aust. case of Shail Superannuation Fund and Commissioner of Taxation [2011] AATA 940 (23 December through the trust vis-a-vis segregate the funds and make them subject to the trust's terms then upon a distribution Sec. 105(1) will not usually apply and the proceeds will be received under the effect of section 107.

Splitting Income/Ownership.

In Fletcher v. M.N.R., a constructive trust was imposed by the B.C. Supreme Court and the Tax Court had to deal with the legal/equitable relationship when the Minister questioned its tax consequences, but will a Tax Court recognize a constructive trust unilaterally to alleviate an otherwise unjust/inequitable imposition of taxation when no court has done so with respect to the situation previously?²⁶⁷ In *Nelson et al. v. M.N.R.*²⁶⁸ the Tax Court had to decide whether a constructive trust as a remedy was within the context of the trust provisions of the I.T.A. when the trust had not been recognized previously, and whether it had the jurisdiction, (under the Tax Court of Canada Act), to recognize one so as to adjust the tax positions of the taxpayers in such a manner as to reach an equitable taxing situation.²⁶⁹ The court concluded ominously, though assuming without deciding that it could apply the doctrine:

"As contrasted to the various Family Law Acts, there is no basis upon which one can assume that the legislator who enacted the Income Tax Act were aware of the existence and effect of the constructive trust remedy, nor is there anything in this Act which either directly or by inference suggests that access to equitable remedy was intended or accepted as a doctrine.

...

Although there is no specific prohibition it seems to me necessary at some point of time to consider whether by implication remedial use of the constructive trust is precluded by the very nature of the Income Tax Act."

As submitted by the Minister, citing *Herdacz v. M.N.R.*²⁷⁰ and *Clemas v. M.N.R.*²⁷¹ the Court does not have power to apply equitable principles as a relief of a taxpayer's mistake or omission while it also is not allowed, as per *Matheson v. R.*²⁷² to rearrange the relationships of the taxpayers to assist in deriving a more beneficial tax position.²⁷³

Does the I.T.A., by its very nature, preclude the use of the constructive trust doctrine against inequitable tax situations unless previously the doctrine has been invoked to rearrange ownership interests independent of the concerns of the I.T.A.? In short, does a taxpayer have to secure a provincial/federal court's judgment invoking the constructive trust in order for the proceedings with respect to the I.T.A. to be based on its existence: the Tax Court may be able to recognize it but not impose it in addressing the fact situation?²⁷⁴ In 2011) as well as Burgess v Commissioner of Taxation (1988) 80 ALR 639 for deductibility of these losses. CRA has generally provided that when funds are misappropriated they are included in the income of those who took them and are deductible when they are paid back.

267. Sarchuk T.C.J. did without hesitation in Fletcher providing:
"I do not accept the view that a constructive trust does not exist until the Court so declares in the course of, for example, an action by the beneficiary against the trustee. There is nothing in Pettkus v. Becker (supra) which supports such a conclusion" and citing Martland J. in Pettkus:

""The areas in which a constructive trust has been found to exist have usually been in cases where a fiduciary relationship exists, eg., a trustee or fiduciary taking advantage of his position to make a profit for himself.""

268 91 D.T.C. 37.

269 In this case there would not have been a cause for applying to the courts to impose the trust since there would not have been a deprivation.

270 56 D.T.C. 34.

271 84 D.C.T. 1289.

272 74 D.T.C. 6176.

273 As per Case V150, 88 A.T.C. 948, relying on Masterman of the lower court, the factual situation only is to be examined. How valid this is in light of the decision in the appeal depends on whether the constructive trust is recognized as substantive or remedial: in Australia Case V150 would not be authority, while in Canada, perhaps where the constructive trust will be held to be merely remedial, it illustrates the point that tax positions can't be rearranged by subsequent remedies.

274 In Erickson v. M.N.R., 1988 2 C.T.C. 2380, the Tax Court recognized that the trust, as a remedy and not a substantive institution, following the Supreme Court in Sorochan v. Sorochan, came into being only upon the intervention of the courts: since no court had created the trust it wasn't recognizable (though on different grounds the case was decided in favor of the taxpayer).

Thomas N. Collins v. The Queen²⁷⁵ the Appeal Court noted that they did not express an opinion on whether the Tax Court could recognize a constructive trust [within its mandate] and then went on to provide that the facts didn't indicate such regardless.

The Australian courts have had to address this particular issue in the *Masterman-MacFarlane v. F.C.T.*²⁷⁶ cases. In this case, both man and de facto spouse contributed capital and effort to the operation of a business though the property was registered solely in his name. The activity was subsequently incorporated and investment income received exclusively by the man was contended to be held 50% on constructive trust for the spouse.²⁷⁷ The tax assessors contended that the doctrine of constructive trust could only be invoked by a court of equity on application by the de facto spouse against the husband if he was acting unconscionably or inequitably and until such a situation occurred the tax court was to regard the legal relationships existing.

Enderby J. cited *Allan v. Snyder*²⁷⁸ and held:

"A constructive trust differs from an express trust in that it is raised by operation of law without reference to the intention of the parties concerned... Constructive trusts arise where no trust was directly or indirectly been declared, but where, accordingly to the principles of equity, it would be a fraud for the person on whom the court imposes the trust to assert a beneficial ownership."²⁷⁹

Pointing out that the de facto spouse could not show evidence of a deprivation or suffering from unconscionable behavior the Judge implied that a constructive trust could not be invoked though, not argued in the instance, an implied trust might exist.²⁸⁰ Providing that the power of equity does not displace the law but follows it and modifies it the constructive trust had to be seen in its context and concluding Judge Enderby held:

"In this case, there was no legally enforceable agreement between the appellants. There was a relationship that may or may not have permitted relief being given if one or the other had used or abused his or her legal rights unconscionably but that is all. The Commissioner was a stranger to their relationship and their supposed true intentions and had no notice of them. He only knew of their stated intention.

It would be an extraordinary thing, if, after all these years of representing one state of affairs, the appellants could come to this Court and successfully argue against the legal forms that they had freely agreed should govern their business activities. There is no dispute between them. Their dispute is with the Commission and the doctrine of constructive trust has no application. It only operates if it would be a fraud for one of them. Mr. MacFarlane in this case, on whom the court might impose a trust, to claim a beneficial ownership.

I find that no constructive trust can be raised such as would permit the appellants to use it in their dispute with the Commissioner and reduce tax, which is otherwise due. It is an attempt to split an income by using a principle that has a proper role in other distinctly limited situations that are different from the one being considered."²⁸¹

MacFarlane appealed against the decision and the opinion of Beaumont J., (concurring with entirely by Burchett J. forming the majority), definitely provides good argument for "constructive" income splitting. He provided:

"In my opinion, the learned Judge erred in holding that, for the purposes of the Act, the legal title to income is determinative. The Act, in my view, takes the taxpayer's income as it finds it - that is to say, subject to the general law in all aspects. This will pick up the position at law and in equity, modified by any relevant legislation, including the provisions of the Act itself. In Stewart Dawson & Co. (Victoria) Pty. Ltd. v. F.C. of T., (1933) 48 C.L.R. 683, Dixon J., speaking of the presumption of advancement,

275 A-664-95

276 86 A.T.C. 4009 while in 86 A.T.C. 4469 the taxpayer appealed to the Full Federal Court.

277 Once again there wasn't a deprivation upon which a legitimate constructive trust claim could be based.

278 1977 2 N.S.W.L.R. 685 at 697.

279 as from Jacob's Law of Trust in Australia, 4th Ed., pg. 232.

280 See the UK case of Halpin v Revenue & Customs [2011] UKFTT 512 (TC) (26 July 2011) concerning the proportionality of interest income recognition on joint accounts.

281 See Case V150, 88 A.T.C. 948, where the Administrative Appeals Tribunal refused to accept the concept of constructive trust to split income in a spousal situation citing Masterman/MacFarlane v. F.C.T.

said (at p. 691):

"I see no reason why this rule should not apply in revenue matters. If liability for tax depends upon the existence or non-existence of a trust, the occasion seems to demand the application of the rules by which the determination of such questions is governed by the Courts of Equity."

Dixon J. was there dealing with a question arising under land tax legislation, but his observations are equally applicable to the operation of the Act.

I should add that nothing here turns on the circumstance that, in the events happened, it was not necessary for Miss Masterman to seek relief from a court of equity with a view to enforcing her rights as beneficiary under a trust. The learned Judge, viewing the case as one of constructive trust only, was much influenced by the fact that equitable relief had not actually been granted or even sought by Miss Masterman. His Honour thought that, unless and until such relief were granted, the respondent, as a "stranger" to the trust could ignore any equitable interest claimed by Miss Masterman.

With all respect to the learned Judge, I cannot agree. Since equity will regard as done that which ought to be done, the existence of equitable interests does not depend upon the making of a crucial order granting equitable relief, even in the case of a constructive trust (see Muschinski v. Dodds (supra) per Deane J. at p. 451). The position is a fortiori in the cases of express and resulting trusts, where the kind of relief granted by the court of equity is more uniform than in the case of a constructive trust."^{282 283 284}

The constructive trust arises at the time there is a duty to provide restitution²⁸⁵ and this necessitates an unjust enrichment accompanying a deprivation and if there isn't such then the trust may not be validly applied.²⁸⁶ To this end would it be possible to argue for purposes of bringing up the form of remedy in an income tax litigation, that to do otherwise would cause the income to be taxed at higher rates in a spouse's hands thus a deprivation of the excess marginal tax? An unjust enrichment implies a deprivation but who is being enriched in the instance where the remedy isn't invoked? In fact, may a spousal party enduring a higher effective tax on all her income to which her spouse has an interest not be the party also sustaining a deprivation? Is not the taxman realizing an unjust enrichment by taxing the income in one set of hands at consequently higher rates and does it matter within the constructive trust environment?²⁸⁷

As a concluding note it would appear that as long as the lower courts in Canada recognize a constructive trust as a remedial device that arises only upon its imposition by the court the remedy will be of little assistance

282 This doesn't seem to be the opinion of Gerein J. in Bedard v. Schell, 1987 59 Sask. R. 71, where a spouse contended that a constructive trust could save her interest in property legally owned by her spouse that had been assigned in bankruptcy proceedings. The Queen's Bench court held that the Supreme Court in Sorochan v. Sorochan and Pettkus v. Becker had imposed the trust as a remedy, had not recognized it as a substantive institution, and concluded with respect to the rights: "In the case of a constructive trust such identification and segregation cannot take place until the Court imposes the trust taking into account the claims of the creditors."

Can this be correct given the unjust enrichment of the bankrupt spouse?

283 In the lower court, the Commissioner had contended that the taxpayers were estopped by representation from purporting a constructive trust since such would be to his detriment and the court held after citing numerous authorities that the delay in accurate assessment would constitute a detriment for these purposes. The Full Court disposed of this opinion in pointing out that the tax returns did not disclose any expression of beneficial interests of the de facto spouse and in fact were entirely silent on the matter eroding the base for estoppel. Detriment could also not be proven when the Commission had the ability to reassess without time restrictions any previous tax year if fraud or evasion could be proven inherent in the declaration (as is the case in Canada), and this is further eroded the basis for estoppel. The Appeal Court did however order that all previous years relevant returns be amended to reflect the arrangement.

284 See the recent NZ case of BB v Commissioner of Inland Revenue [2011] NZTRA 1 (25 January 2011) where the tax authorities tried, unsuccessfully, to argue that a trust partnership which had misappropriated their partners'-beneficiaries' trust funds caused them to stand as constructive trustees for the trust thus it was the trust that should recognize the consequences of the transactions. Even in the face off the misappropriation, the Tax Review Authority held that the party to recognize the transactions was the partners.

285 Pettkus v. Becker, Chase Manhattan Bank, McDonald v. MacDonald, 1988 R.F.L. (3d) 321, Rawluk v. Rawluk, Hussey v. Palmer, 1972 1 W.L.R. 1286.

286 See Case W21, 89 A.T.C. 242, for precisely this result.

287 For an excellent relevant article that could shed insight into this unsettled issue, see "The Remedial Constructive Trust: A Principled Basis for Priorities over Creditors." David M. Paciocco, C.B.R. Vol. 68, pg. 315.

in Canadian income tax splitting unless the participants can secure it via court order prior to the tax litigation. If it's authoritatively held that the Canadian constructive trust can be substantive for certain purposes following English/Australian and not American law, then it could prove of use following the Masterman precedent.

*Rawluk v. Rawluk*²⁸⁸ would seem to provide this authority in that in this case a slim majority of the Supreme Court moved away from the historic American version of the constructive trust and provided when the point was directly in issue:

"It is important in this respect to keep in mind that a property interest arising under a constructive trust can be recognized as having come into existence not when the trust is judicially declared but from the time when the unjust enrichment first arose. As Professors Oosterhoff and Gillese state, "the date at which the constructive trust arises.. is now generally accepted to be the date upon which a duty to make restitution occurs" (Oosterhoff and Gillese, A.H. Oosterhoff: Text, Commentary and Cases on Trusts (3rd ed. 1987), at p.579). Professor Scott has stated in Law of Trusts, op. cit., at pp. 323-24, that:

.... "The beneficial interest in the property is from the beginning in the person who has been wronged. The constructive trust arises from the situation in which he is entitled to the remedy of restitution, and it arises as soon as that situation is created... It would seem that there is no foundation whatever for the notion that a constructive trust does not arise until it is decreed by a court. It arises when the duty to make restitution arises, not when that duty is subsequently enforced."

I agree completely with the position taken on this issue by the authors of these helpful texts.

As well in Hussey v. Palmer, supra, at p.1290 (quoted by Dickson J. in Rathwell v. Rathwell, supra, at p.455), Lord Denning M.R. noted that a constructive trust "may arise at the outset when the property is acquired, or later on, as the circumstances may require". As a result, even if it is declared by the court after the parties have already separated, a constructive trust can be deemed to have arisen when the duty to make restitution arose. It should therefore be considered as part of the property owned by the beneficiary at valuation date."

The slim minority held that the constructive trust had been consistently regarded as the American remedy in Canada and that the English version of the substantive institution in the unjust enrichment environment had not been followed. Instead the courts were to assess the relevant remedies available and consider which is appropriate to apply and on these grounds the remedial constructive trust arises only when the court chooses its genre of equitable restitution in light of the inadequacy of those otherwise available. Until that time, as held by citing numerous Supreme court passages, the trust isn't imposed. It's to be noted that these points concern the constructive trust in the context of an unjust enrichment.²⁸⁹ It could prove more easy to argue that an implied trust existed where the actions of both parties can indicate a mutual intention that the trust was created.²⁹⁰

In order to establish a constructive trust in a matrimonial situation²⁹¹, the spouse has to establish that her contributions were made to acquire an interest in specific property acquired and that by not acquiring such an instance of unjust enrichment would arise.²⁹² As per *Atlas Cabinets v. National Trust Co.*²⁹³ an unjust enrichment in a matrimonial environment may be quite different from that in a commercial environment. The connection must be direct and substantial and, as the case in Pettkus v. Becker, it may be indirect in that it

²⁸⁸ 1990 1 S.C.R. 70

²⁸⁹ Professor Donovan Waters has written yet again another article on the cutting edge of the evolving discussion "The Constructive Trust in Evolution: Substantive and Remedial", Estates and Trusts Journal, 1991 pg. 334, and for advanced commentary it should be the primary source to consult.

²⁹⁰ See the Aust. case of JACA Nominees Pty Ltd v Waldarra Pty Ltd & Anor [2010] VSC 546 (2 December 2010) on the application of a constructive trust when an oral trust was all that was witnessed and understood.

²⁹¹ See BJ v MJ (Financial Remedy: Overseas Trusts) [2011] EWHC 2708 (Fam) (27 October 2011) for a UK judicial discussion of types of matrimonial trusts.

²⁹² See Heon v. Heon, 34 E.T.R. 252, Coates v. Hunt, 34 E.T.R. 291.

²⁹³ 1990 68 D.L.R. (4d) 161 BCCA

enables one to acquire the property through a lessening of financial burdens, while in order for the unjust enrichment to occur, there must be a connection between the acquisition of the particular property and the deprivation.²⁹⁴ In Nelson v. M.N.R., the spouse could not show that she had contributed to the acquisition of the property in any form and could thus not show a consequential deprivation. Her purported indirect contributions to the business, (ancillary banking activities at most consonant with the voluntary activities of a rural wife), did not substantiate a propriety "connection" with the land while her activities following the land acquisition did not change substantially. She also thought that the whole exercise of acquiring the land was to build up the personal wealth of her de facto spouse so that the offspring would ultimately benefit. Due to primarily the inadequacy of the evidence but also the nature of that which existed a constructive trust could not be equitably invoked. This wasn't the case in *Sorochan v. Sorochan*²⁹⁵ where it was also held that the contribution doesn't have to have a direct link with the acquisition of the property but relates to the property's preservation, maintenance and improvement if it's already owned²⁹⁶, and *Rawluk v. Rawluk*²⁹⁷ where contributions of the deprived spouses were more proprietarily focused and extensive.²⁹⁸

294 See Guzzo v. Catlin Estate, 33 E.T.R. 163. As per Sorochan v. Sorochan, post, a second consideration is whether the deprived expected to receive an interest in the actual property and whether the enriched knew or should they have known of that expectation. See Gill v. Grant, 30 E.T.R. 255.

295 1986 2 S.C.R. 38.

296 See also Novick Estate v. Lachuk Estate, 33 E.T.R. 103.

297 1990 1 S.C.R. 70.

298 See also Naylor v. Naylor, 37 E.T.R. 274, for lesser cases concerning respective contributions and Passee v. Passee, 1988 1 F.L.R. 263 (a resulting trust case) as well as DaCosta v. DaCosta, 1991 74 D.L.R. (4d) 439, for the inadequacy of consideration in maintenance or acquisition. See also "A Question of Intention", J. Montgomery, The Conveyancer, 1987 pg. 16, "Remedial Constructive Trusts of Homes; An Overseas Overview", D. Hayton, The Conveyancer, 1988, pg. 259, "The Melting Down of the Remedial Trust", R.P. Austin, 1988 11 UNSWLJ #1, 66, and "Casual Connection in Constructive Trusts", K.B. Farquher, 1985-86 E.& T.Q., pg. 161.

The Trust as a Taxable Individual and its Residence.

Subsection 2(1) imposes income tax upon taxable income for each year of every person resident in Canada at any time in the year while taxable income of the person, as per Sec. 2(2), is that income, as computed in Section 3, that is net of the adjustments applicable in Division C²⁹⁹. If the person is not resident in Canada but was employed in Canada, carried on a business in Canada, or disposed of taxable Canadian property he will sustain tax liabilities under Division D, section 115-116.

"Person" defined in Sec. 248(1) for purpose of the Act includes heirs, executors, administrators, and other legal representatives of a person as well as any body corporate or politic, and although a trust is only an agreement and not a separate legal entity it is only Sec. 104(2) which gives it the quality of "a person" for purposes of the Act.³⁰⁰

Under subsection 104(1), as commented upon previously, a reference to a trust or estate in most instances shall be read as a reference to the trustee or executor having ownership or control of the trust property, while under Sec. 104(2), a trust shall, without affecting a liability of the trustee/executor/legal representative etc. for his own income tax, for purposes of the Act, be deemed to be an individual "in respect of the trust property" and thus although a corporation may be sole trustee, the trust will still retain its individual nature.³⁰¹

A trust/estate, (and thus the trustee or executor thereof), must file a return within 90 days from the end of its tax year while obviously the trust/estates return (on a T3) will not pertain to the same income etc. as that personally of the trustee/executor who must likewise file separately under Sec. 150(1)(d), as per Sec. 104(2).

A trust or estate is to be identified, for purposes of the imposition and collection of tax, with the "trustee or the executor, administrator, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property" and in this regard, the tax is to follow the party supposedly closely involved with the trust property.³⁰² In simple trust arrangements, the trust property may be both legally, though nominally, owned, and controlled by virtue of this fact, by the same party, or limited number of parties however the final aspect that allows such a trust to be caught for taxation under Sec. 104(1)-2, is that such property is owned or controlled by a person as trustee, executor, administrator, heir, et cetera, and not in any other capacity.³⁰³ Subsection 104(1) thus captures only trusts consisting of property that were owned or controlled by a person acting in a fiduciary capacity. If the legal ownership of the right to receive the income/gain from the borrowed property is vested with a trustee even though the income producing activity/-property lent to a trust may not be owned or controlled by the trustees if they have the right to the income in the fiduciary capacity the trust will understandably exist. If a transfer to a taxpayer is made so as to create a trust, and the recipient disregards the trust agreement and the Statute of Frauds must be used in proving the trust, until the trust is proven in what capacity does the recipient act with respect to the property received? Does he hold title unencumbered in his personal capacity subject to subsequent equitable judgment or does he continue to hold the title as trustee of a trust that he doesn't recognize? Since upon favorable judgment the court will recognize the recipient to have always been a trustee he'll not shake off the Sec. 104(1) targeting merely because he refuses to act as a trustee and disregard the fiduciary relationship.

The subsection 104(1) targeting provision begins to appear even more all-encompassing when one examines the nature of the arrangement and the effect of Sec. 104(2), being, that although Sec. 104(2) provides that a trust is to be a singular individual it may have numerous trustees that have varying degrees of ownership or control over the property. Property, the legal title of which has been transferred to a trust, may be jointly legally owned by all or only some of the trustees as per the trust terms while those same trustees may not have control over it whereby instead the day-to-day control is vested with other trustees, or beneficiaries, and the other trustees hold only bare de jure ownership. Where the legal title isn't transferred but the 299. Subdivision 9, section 81 describes amounts that will not be includable in that income, while Division H, Section 149 contains a list of entities that are exempted from paying tax under Part I.

300 See Drummond v. Collins, 1915 A.C. 1011, and Wood v. Owen, 23 T.C. 541, for trustees' liability.

301 For a discussion of the extent and importance of the individual status see Case M92, 80 A.T.C. 659.

302 As per Henderson Estate, Bank of N.Y. v. M.N.R., 1973 C.T.C. 636 (FCTD), and Bank of N.Y. v. M.N.R., 1975 C.T.C. 497 (FCA), an executor do son tort is identifiable as the estate/trust under Sec. 104(1).

303 Constructive trustees may not be captured if it is conclusively held that until the Court imposes the trusteeship they don't act as such though once the Court does assign the remedy the party must attend to the tax consequences.

trustees control the property lent to them then in respect of above there arises the question as to who the relevant trustees are. The essential aspect to recognize about the Sec. 104(1) targeting provision is that where a trust's liability is imposed, by adjusting the nature of the trustees' ownership and control the property the liability cannot be avoided in that the targeting is such that it charges the liability against both sets of parties having ownership or control of the property. (Jointly). This is so even in respect of bare trusts where the trustees have no control over the property but do won it through the holding of legal title.

Subdivision K doesn't offer a single provision that provides a method by which the residence of a trust can be determined, however, since Sec. 104(1) imposes the tax liability on the trustee in respect of it, the residence of the trustees can be regarded as the sole significant factor to examine in determining residence of the trust. Where a trust has a single owning and controlling trustee in respect of its property, the residence of the trust will be attributed to that trustee, regardless of whether that trustee is resident in two or more jurisdictions and thus it is entirely possible for a trust (or estate) to have two or more places of residence for tax purposes. Such a case may arise where the sole trustee is a corporation, that is not subject to the Sec. 250(4) residency provision, that has de facto mind and management of the highest level being exercised from two or more countries.³⁰⁴ Where such a common law dual residency is found the trust will be subject to the taxing statutes of both jurisdictions however remedy will most likely always come in the form of an existing tax treaty-convention between the two jurisdictions and the associated powers usually therein provided allowing for elimination of double taxation³⁰⁵ on the trust however there may still be problems encountered on taxation of the beneficiaries.

Where the trust has two or more equally controlling or owning trustees then the determination of residence becomes more difficult owing to the fact that the Act recognizes a singular trust but doesn't preclude the possible recognition of two or more trustees. Generally, unless provided to the contrary in the trust deed, all trustees of a trust must be of unanimous opinion in order to carry out any action, be it investing of funds or distribution of income, etc., since they will all be jointly and not severally liable and held accountable should such action turn unfavorable. Given this fact the residences of all of the trustees are relevant and since the Act recognizes a single trust that cannot be split up, allocating ownership or control of property to particular trustees, it would be foolish to argue that a trustee resident in Canada that has control or ownership of trust property can be held liable under Sec. 104(1) for even part of the trust income, (regardless of its source), when the trust has "99" other trustees resident in another country. Unless that singular trustee is the supreme controlling or owning trustee, holding or exercising more than 50% of either, the trust can never be regarded as residing in Canada. Since the Act doesn't preclude the recognition of two or more trustees, the residence of all of those trustees must be examined to ascertain where the majority of the ownership or control of the trust resides or is exercised/exercisable. The trust, as a singular (deemed) entity, will have a residence where the majority of the control or ownership resides. Understandably this present problems where three equally controlling and owning trustees reside in three countries since as per the Sec. 104(1) provision a residence will not be ascertainable.

Generally, the legal title of the trust property is vested jointly in all of the trustees of a simple trust, (although there may be instances where as per the trust deed of more complex trusts property is vested in certain groups), and from this ownership the trustees also have instilled in them de jure control while de facto control (possession) may reside in some other person. Where a singular trustee has a general power of appointment over trust property his power should not be considered as a determining factor since the power is exercisable only in respect of certain trust property and does not, per se, affect the trust as an ongoing (deemed) entity in its day to day existence. The same reasoning applies in respect of powers of advancement or encroachment. Hence, effectively, a trust could otherwise be considered non-resident due to the majority of its day-to-day ownership residing outside of Canada, while a Canadian taxpayer, (who need not actually be a trustee), could have considerably influence over the ultimate destination of the trust property. Where a Canadian trustee/settlor reserves the power to appoint trustees, regardless of where they are to be resident, 304 Where the parties exercising such control reside is not so much a factor as where that control is actually exercisable.

305 See Art. XXI of Canada-U.K. Tax Convention (1978).

he cannot be found to have a controlling position on that fact alone since until he exercises that power he is not in such a position, hence residence cannot be attributed on that factor alone. Where he does have the power to bind the trustees, regardless of their opinion, (which can only follow when the trust deed spells the power out), then he may be considered to be a controlling trustee in that his actions will influence all of the rest, and they do not have the ability to veto his decisions, however, once again, the scope of the power, vis-a-vis the aspects of the trust it may affect, would have to be examined as well as the manner in which it is exercisable. In I.T. 447 the Department, in para. 2, provides the opinion that a trustee who has management and control of the trust will be the person who has most or all of the,

- (1) control over the changes in the trust investment portfolio,
- (2) responsibility for the management of trust property or businesses,
- (3) responsibility for banking, financing arrangements,
- (4) ultimate responsibility for preparation of trust accounts and reporting to beneficiaries,
- (5) power to contract with or deal with trust advisors (auditors, lawyers, etc.).

In *N.B. Dill and J.A. Pearson, both of the Parish of Pembroke in the Islands of Bermuda, Trustees of the Thibodeau Family Trust v. The Queen*³⁰⁶ the ascertaining of the residence of a trust was at issue. The trust was created in Canada by a Canadian taxpayer where two resident trustees were initially agreed upon, wherein one had the power to appoint others. The other retired and resigned from his post while the remaining trustee appointed two new ones, both resident in Bermuda. Upon being appointed the assets of the trust and their administration were transferred to Bermuda where the two trustees took possession and stored them, however, it would appear that all of the trustees had equal ownership of the assets. From then on, the Canadian resident trustee made investment suggestions to the Bermuda trustees, who would then either reject them or act upon them while the Canadian trustee had no power to legally enter into the investments or bind the trusts, and a substantially number of his suggestions were absolutely rejected. Control of the entirety of the trust funds, (and the administration of the trust), obviously lay with the Bermuda trustees. The investments made by the trust were scattered around in several countries while the beneficiaries were either resident in the U.S. or Canada at all material times.³⁰⁷ For a period of time, the trust recognized investment income from investments made in Canada, upon which the 15% withholding rate had been applied, (as if it was non-resident), while the trust did not at any time carry on business in Canada. In 1972, the trust disposed of some shares in a corporation and the Minister attempted to tax the trust on the capital gain as being resident. The trustees objected.

The Minister's argument dwelt upon the substance of the infamous De Beer's Consolidated Mines Ltd. v. Howe case³⁰⁸ where corporate residence was found to be where the company carried on its real business i.e.: where the central management and control actually resides. Counsel for M.N.R. also argued that the trust could be found to have dual residence as per the arguments presented in *Unit Construction Co. Ltd. v. Bullock*³⁰⁹ being that the central management and control of a company may be divided and it may "keep house and do business" in more than one place. The Minister's submissions were that the Court could find at least part of the paramount or supreme authority of the trust resident in Canada based on the fact that the Canadian resident had the power to appoint trustees, took an active interest in the affairs of the trust and was the initiator of the investment program, had circumscribed the authority of the Bermuda trustees and acted unilaterally on at least two occasions, while the Minister also contended that the initial retirement of the second Canadian trustee was ineffective and consequently there were two Canadian resident trustees, that the only way to transfer administration to Bermuda was via an Ontario Variation of Trusts Act court order which should have terminated the trust and constitute a new one, (a ridiculous suggestion), and that the real settlor was the Canadian trustee, (creating the trust when he sold shares to it), rather than the real settlor thus that trust that was actually transferred was not substantiated by the documentation and thus that trust did not contain an express power to transfer the assets and administration as the actual trust did.

306 78 D.T.C. 6376 FCTD.

307 Since the event occurred in 1972 the section 94 non-resident trust rules did not exist to apply.

308 (1906) A.C. 455.

309 1960 A.C. 351

The Court found all of the Minister's submission invalid, that the Canadian trustee was found to have resigned properly, that the trust deed provided expressly a power allowing the transfer of assets and administration to Bermuda and thus the variation order wasn't needed. With respect to the Minister's contention that a trust can reside in more than one place the Judge provided:

"As to the submission that the Court in this case, even if it also finds that the trust has a residence in Bermuda, it should find that it has a residence in relation to the management of this trust was carried on in Canada applying by analogy the principles in the cited cases of determining residence for income tax purposes of corporations, in my view, such submission is also not valid. The judicial formula for this respecting a corporation, in my view, cannot apply to trustees because trustees cannot delegate any of their authority to co-trustees. A trustee cannot adopt a "policy of masterly inactivity" as commented upon in Underhill on the Law of Trusts and Trustees, 12th Ed. pg. 284; and on the evidence, none of the trustees did adopt such a policy."

Unfortunately Gibson, J. then went on to express the opinion that it is impossible for a trust to have dual residence³¹⁰. Taking two broad indicators for the first instance, the court found that the fact that the majority of the trustees were resident in Bermuda and that the trust document required a majority decision on all matters, was enough to cause the trust to be considered solely resident in Bermuda.

It's unfortunate that Judge Gibson did not attack the problem with more comprehensive reasoning; i.e., the fact that the control and the ownership resided with a majority of trustees who were non-resident however the collective residence of all the trustees of the trust (at the time of the question) was obviously considered. Clearly a trust can have dual or multiple residency when its trustees have a multitude of residences in different countries.

In Jones Trust v. Commissioners,³¹¹ the U.S. tax authorities were successful at assessing a U.K. trust in respect of capital gains on some shares of a domestic corporation as it were resident in the U.S.. Income was assessable if the individual held an office in the U.S., as per the clear terms of the statute, and this the trust clearly did through the efforts of one of its trustees. The other three trustees, resident in the U.K., had given him control of 90% of the trust fund situated in New York thus although control of the trust resided in the U.S. the tax authorities didn't even have to prove it, the provision captured the trust by virtue of its holding an office in the U.S. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held:

"What is non-residence on the part of a trust, within the statutory meaning, is a question which in some instances may be difficult of determination: but we feel no hesitation in saying that it cannot be predicted of a trust, ninety percent of whose property consists of stocks and bonds of domestic corporations, held in this country in the possession of a trustee who is a citizen of the country, traded in by that trustee on the exchange of the country, and returning income which is collected by such trustee in the country and handled from an office maintained in the country for that purpose."

Administration was carried out from within the U.S. and more importantly the power to bind the trust and its control was also resident therein.

In *Dawson v. I.R.C.*³¹², the U.K. Court of Appeal had to ascertain whether a single resident trustee, under a trust with two non-resident trustees, was liable for tax on income that accrued to the benefit of non-resident beneficiaries from non-resident situated property. This English case was determined with respect to tax charging provisions substantially different from Sec. 104(1) however, the principles inherent in the reasoning are relevant to the Canadian context. Nicholas, L.J., commenting on the scope of the trustees' ownership individually with respect to the income received:

"The relevant income was trust income, and the entitlement of trustees to trust property is joint, not joint and several. Accordingly, this trust income accrued, not to the taxpayer alone, but to him jointly with his co-trustees: "each joint tenant holds the whole and holds nothing, that is, he holds the whole jointly and nothing separately" (Co. Litt 186a). Joint entitlement to income does not give rise to any difficulty where all those entitled are resident in the United Kingdom, because the singular 'person' in para. 1(a)(i) of Sch. D. is to be read as including the plural 'persons' by virtue of what is now 5.6(c) of the Interpretation Act 1978..."

³¹⁰ leaving himself open to criticism of the instance where a sole trustee is resident in two jurisdictions

³¹¹ 132 F.2d 914.

³¹² [1988] 3 All E.R. 753.

Subsection 104(1) refers to trustees having ownership or control over the trust property but it does not indicate that the basis of such measurement is to include single joint owners. Since ownership of trust property is usually joint the resident of all of the joint owners must be considered in arriving at the residence of the trust. Judge Nicholls went on to provide with respect to the Crown's contention that a single resident joint owner would be sufficient to attract taxation:

"On a natural reading of para. 1(a)(i) the necessary qualification "residing in the United Kingdom" is a qualification which, when the income accrues to one person, applies to that person and, when the income accrues to persons jointly applies to all those persons, they must all possess the attribute of "residing in the United Kingdom". I can see no justification for reading the statutory provision as expanded by the Interpretation Act 1978, as satisfied, where the income accrues to more than one person jointly, if anyone of them possesses the necessary attributes of residing in the United Kingdom even though the other or others do not."

In closing it was held:

"In the instant case the Crown is, in effect, asserting the right to tax a person resident in the U.K. solely upon the ground of residence on income from property outside the U.K. in which he has no control, and to do so notwithstanding that he may have no right of recourse to the income on which he is assessed to tax and no right of contribution or indemnity against the income or from the person beneficially entitled to it. In my judgment the very clearest of language would be required to justify a claim as wide as that."

The House of Lords concurred with the Court of Appeal's decision³¹³ and denied the Crown's appeal. The Crown accepted that the revenue accrued to the trustees jointly and not jointly and severally, so that in law they were not entitled to individual shares and Lord Keith of Kinkel provided:

"There can be no justification for assessing to tax the respondent alone, on the ground that he is resident in the United Kingdom, because the income does not arise or accrue to him personally. He has no right of control over the income. His only interest in it is a right and duty to secure, in conjunction with his co-trustees, that it is applied in accordance with the directions of the trust deeds... It is sufficient to say that the enactments directly in point do not, upon a sound analysis, support the construction contended by Revenue. It can be perceived that there would be much to be said for making the liability to tax depend upon the center of administration of the trust and the place of residence of the majority of the trustees, as is the position with capital gains tax: see section 52 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979. But Parliament has not so far chosen to do that."³¹⁴

Since the Sec. 104(1) identification basis operates on control or ownership of the trust property, it could be argued that by virtue of the dual basis use Parliament recognized that trustee ownership is usually joint ownership and by use of the alternative identification base, "control", attempted to capture the instance where the majority of joint owners (trustees) resided outside of Canada but the resident joint owner had control over the trust property by virtue of specifications in the trust deed thus causing the trust to be subject to Canada taxation, unless there is another reason for this approach. This would exactly cause an exposure to Cdn. taxation those instances where a settlor sought to avoid taxation by placing all her trustees outside Canada except for one who had status here to act for the trust in respect of property situs here. If such is the proper interpretation of the scope of Sec. 104(1) then Dawson v. I.R.C. above is of no assistance in advancing that a majority of the residency of the trustees is where a trust lives since the statute clearly attends to the argument: a trust can have more than one country of residence, and the Act specifically targets those trustees that merely have ownership or control of any portion of the trust property.

313 in 1989 2 W.L.R. 858.

314 The Report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, Vol. 4, pg. 209 conclusion and recommendation 18 recommended that a trust be taxed as resident if a majority or a controlling group of the trustees were resident in Canada, carried on a business in Canada, or if substantially all of the property situated in Canada. Of importance is the fact that only some of these recommendations were accepted and acted upon (carrying on a business in Canada inherent in Sec. 115(1)), while since the others were not it can be accepted as implied that the legislators wished a wider net to be cast than majority/control criteria which have not implicitly been enacted.

In *St. Michael Trust Corp. as Trustee of the Fundy Settlement*³¹⁵ the Fed. Ct. of Appeal had to consider the residence of a Bermuda trust when its Cdn. resident beneficiaries could almost completely undermine all discretions of the trustees and control them. Surprisingly this was a case, in the author's opinion, that should have been argued explicitly on the extent of Sec. 104(1) "control" over trust property – the second targeting - that attracts the application of the provision since the Cdn. beneficiaries could very effectively do this, regardless of ownership: the word in the provision isn't there for nothing.³¹⁶ Instead the arguments opened up the can of worms on residence of a trust based on where its trustees resided, though substantively, did recognize the control element. It opined:

"[25] The terms of the trust indentures that are relevant to these appeals are substantially the same except for the name of the trust and the identification of the beneficiaries. It is not necessary to recite all of the terms. A sufficiently accurate picture of the trust indentures emerges from the following summary:

- a. The trustee was required to keep the trust property invested until the "Division Date" (any date chosen by the trustee or 80 years from the date of settlement, whichever occurred first), subject to the absolute discretion of the trustee to distribute some or all of the income to one or more beneficiaries, with any undistributed or unallocated income to be added to the capital.
- b. The trustee had the absolute discretion to encroach on capital to or for the benefit of one or more of the beneficiaries, even to the extent of using all of the trust property.
- c. On the division date, the property was to be divided and distributed as follows:
 - (i) in the case of the Garron Trust, equally among the children of Myron and Berna Garron or their children (subject to certain conditions relating to the age of the child at the division date); and
 - (ii) in the case of the Dunin Trust, to Mr. Dunin or, if he was not then living, equally to his children or their children (subject to certain conditions relating to the age of the child at the division date).
- d. The trustee was precluded from distributing in specie the Class A shares of New Garron Co (in the case of the Garron Trust) or New Dunin Co (in the case of the Dunin Trust), but had the power at any time to convert those shares to cash or other property which could then be distributed in accordance with the general power of distribution.
- e. Except for the specific prohibition relating to distribution in specie of the Class A shares of New Garron Co and New Dunin Co, the trustee was given broad powers to invest and to make payments and distributions in money or other property of the trust, and the power to retain or sell any property in any manner and on any terms.
- f. The protector had the absolute discretion to remove a trustee and appoint a new trustee.
- g. The protector could be removed and a new protector appointed by the majority of beneficiaries who had attained a specified age.

...

[48] The Minister rejected the claims for exemption and assessed St. Michael Trust Corp. accordingly. St. Michael Trust Corp. objected to the assessments without success, and appealed to the Tax Court of Canada again without success. I summarize as follows the key conclusions reached by Justice Woods:

315 2010 FCA 309

316 The author knows of at least 1 Australian tax case where control of trust property by a non-trustee attracted demand to file and assessment.

- a. In determining residence for purposes of the Income Tax Act, the established test of residence applicable to corporations should be applied, so that a trust is resident in the country where its central management and control is exercised. In relation to the Trusts, the essential responsibility for decision making was intended from the outset to be exercised, and was in fact exercised, by Mr. Dunin and Mr. Garron, not St. Michael Trust Corp. Therefore, the central management and control of the Trusts was located in Canada, and the Trusts were resident in Canada.

...

[55] It remains the case to this day that, for income tax purposes, the residence of a corporation is determined primarily by finding the location of the corporation's central management and control, which is a question of fact. The relevant factors include the legal indicia of the place where the corporation's management and control should be exercised (as disclosed, for example, by the corporation's governing law and constating documents). Where a corporation is actually managed and controlled by its directors in the manner contemplated by its governing law, the residence of a corporation usually will be determined as the place where the corporate directors exercise their management and control responsibilities.

[56] However, that may not be the result if the facts disclose that the corporation is not in fact managed and controlled as its governing law requires. In that regard it is relevant to consider the nature of the decision making authority actually exercised by the directors. If significant management decisions are in fact taken by a person who is not a director, the place where that person resides or operates may be determined to be the residence of the corporation. Thus, for example, if it is established that management and control is exercised in fact by a shareholder operating out of another country, the corporation may be found to be resident where the shareholder resides: see Unit Construction Co. Ltd. v. Bullock, [1960] A.C. 351.

[57] There is very little jurisprudence relating to the determination of the residence of a trust for tax purposes. Justice Woods reviewed the jurisprudence and concluded, correctly in my view, that there is no case law establishing a single test for determining the residence of a trust. She also concluded that "the judge-made test of residence that has been established for corporations should also apply to trusts, with such modifications as are appropriate" (reasons, paragraph 162). I agree with her, substantially for the reasons she gave.

[58] Some learned writers on tax matters have expressed the opinion that the residence of a trust is determined solely by the residence of the trustee, citing cases where the residence of a trust has been found to be the place where the trustee resides (or, in one case, in the place where the majority of the trustees reside, the trust indenture having permitted the majority to act for the trust: see Trustee of Thibodeau Family Trust v. Canada, [1978] F.C.J. No. 607, 78 DTC 6376 (T.D.)).

[59] However, no case has established that the residence of the trustee is an invariable legal test for the residence of the trust. Nor has any case rejected conclusively the central management and control test as an appropriate legal test for the residence of a trust in a situation where it was found, for example, that someone other than the trustee exercised management and control of the trust property, or that the trustee resided in one place but exercised the management and control of the trust property in another place.

[60] Certain comments in Thibodeau have sometimes been taken as a rejection of the corporate test of residence for a trust. In fact the Crown had submitted in that case that the central management and control test should be applied, and that submission was rejected. However, the comments that are most often cited in support of a blanket rejection of the central management and control test for a trust were made in the context of a narrower submission to the effect that the trust could have been resident in two places because one trustee lived in Canada and two lived in Bermuda. What the judge said (at paragraph 22; DTC page 6385) is this:

As to the submission that the Court in this case, even if it also finds that the Trust has a residence in Bermuda, it should find that it has a residence in Canada in that part of the paramount or supreme authority in relation to the management of this Trust was carried on in Canada applying by analogy the principles in the cited cases of determining residence for income tax purposes of corporations, in my view, such submission is also not valid. The judicial formula for this respecting a corporation, in my view, cannot apply to trustees because trustees cannot delegate any of their authority to co-trustees. A trustee cannot adopt a "policy of masterly inactivity" as commented upon in Underhill on the Law of Trusts and Trustees, 12th Edition, page 284; and on the evidence, none of the trustees did adopt such a policy. Therefore, it is not possible for a trust to have a dual residence for income tax purposes, and therefore it is not possible to find that part of the paramount of "superior and directing authority" of a Trust is and was in two places. In any event, a finding of dual residence of this Trust is not made in this case.

...

[62] By analogy from DeBeers, supra, the task is to determine where a trust "keeps house and does business", i.e. where the powers and discretions of the trustee are really being exercised. It may well be that in most cases, the residence of the appointed trustee is a sufficient basis in fact for determining the residence of the trust. This is the case where the trustee is given and actually exercises the powers and discretions regarding the management and control of the trust property, and does so where he resides. However, a rigid legal test that necessarily ties the residence of a trust to the residence of the trustee regardless of the facts is, in my view, not sound in principle because it denies the central theme of the jurisprudence on the determination of residence for tax purposes, which is that residence fundamentally is a question of fact. I conclude therefore that where a question arises as to the residence of a trust for tax purposes, it is appropriate to undertake a fact driven analysis with a view to determining the place where the central management and control of the trust is actually exercised.

...

[64] St. Michael Trust Corp. also argues that the residence of the trust must be determined as the residence of the trustee because section 104 of the Income Tax Act embodies the trust, as taxpayer, in the person of the trustee. In my view, that gives section 104 a meaning beyond its words and purpose. Section 104 was enacted to solve the practical problems of tax administration that would necessarily arise when it was determined that trusts were to be taxed despite the absence of legal personality. I do not read section 104 as a signal that Parliament intended that in all cases, the residence of the trust must be the residence of the trustee.

[65] Finally, St. Michael Trust Corp. argues that, even if the residence of the Garron Trust and the Dunin Trust in 2000 was the place where their central management and control was exercised at that time, Justice Woods made a palpable and overriding error in applying that test to the facts. To assess the validity of that argument, it is necessary to consider the factors that Justice Woods took into account in locating the central management and control of the Trusts in Canada, where Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin resided.

[66] Justice Woods concluded that St. Michael Trust Corp. was not exercising the main powers and discretions of the trustees under the trust indentures. Rather its true role was "to execute documents as required, and to provide incidental administrative services", and it was not expected to "have responsibility for decision-making beyond that" (at paragraph 189). Rather than exercising its powers and discretions under the trust indentures, St. Michael Trust Corp. would default automatically to the recommendation of Mr. Dunin and Mr. Garron. This was "understood to be the arrangement from the outset" (at paragraph 194). She found that it was Mr. Dunin and Mr. Garron "who made the substantive decisions respecting the Trusts", not St. Michael Trust Corp. (at paragraph 252). In reaching these conclusions, Justice Wood relied on a number of facts which are fully stated in her reasons. I summarize as follows a number of these facts:

- a. Under the terms of the trust indentures, Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin and their respective spouses alone could replace the protector, who in turn could replace the trustee, if the trustee acted against their wishes.

b. The limited role of St. Michael Trust Corp. was understood by all parties at the outset. In particular, it was understood that St. Michael Trust Corp. would have no decision making role in relation to the sale of the Trusts' interests in PMPL, the investment of the cash proceeds received on the sale, the making of distributions to the beneficiaries, and the taking of appropriate action to minimize the tax burden of the Trusts. It was further understood from the outset that decisions of that nature would be made by Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin and implemented by St. Michael Trust Corp. under their direction.

c. The Trusts used the same investment advisers as the beneficiaries. This allowed the beneficiaries to deal directly with the Trusts' financial advisers and directly control the Trusts' investment activity without the involvement of St. Michael Trust Corp.

d. The tax advisers to Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin were also used for the Trusts and when acting for the Trusts were directed by Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin.

e. There is no documentary evidence that St. Michael Trust Corp. took an active role in managing the Trusts, and the correspondence and other documents introduced by the Crown indicated that St. Michael Trust Corp. had no involvement in the affairs of the Trusts except the execution of documents and in administrative, accounting and tax matters.

f. St. Michael Trust Corp. was an arm of an accounting firm and thus had significant expertise in tax and accounting matters, but there is no evidence that it had any expertise in the management of trust assets.

g. The oral evidence of Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin did not provide a clear picture of how the Trusts operated, and was less than full and complete.

h. Mr. Dunin in particular was disingenuous when he testified that St. Michael Trust Corp. controlled the Trusts.

i. Mr. Dunin attempted to give the impression that he had little interest in what St. Michael Trust Corp. was actually doing vis-à-vis the Dunin Trust which, given his economic interest in the Dunin Trust, supports the conclusion that it was Mr. Dunin himself who was in effective control. The same can be said about the evidence of Mr. Garron that he had little interest in what St. Michael Trust Corp. was doing.

j. Other individuals who could have shed light on the relevant facts as to the operation of the Trusts were not called to give evidence. That included the various advisers who were involved in planning and implementing the relevant transactions, Mr. Gill who was the protector of both Trusts, Mr. Jesson who was in charge of St. Michael Trust Corp. when the Trusts were created and the person who prepared the memoranda of "trustee intentions" quoted above, Mr. Knott who had the day to day responsibility for the Trusts, Mr. Carroll who was the lead adviser on the sale of PMPL, and various other individuals who acted as investment advisers to the Trusts or who were involved in the selection of investment advisers.

k. The evidence of Mr. Hutchinson, an officer of St. Michael Trust Corp. who dealt with the Trusts, was not particularly helpful because of his lack of personal knowledge of events that occurred before his involvement in 2003. In particular, Mr. Hutchinson could provide no useful information about the degree of due diligence undertaken by St. Michael Trust Corp. in relation to any of the relevant transactions.

l. Mr. Hutchinson testified that the directors of St. Michael Trust Corp. were required to ratify actions proposed to be taken or taken by the Trusts, but there is no evidence that they had much substantive information about the transactions, which tends to support the proposition that they knew that the role of St. Michael Trust Corp. was intended to be limited to administrative matters.

[67] Some of the factors listed above are common characteristics of ordinary trusts and, considered in isolation, would not be sufficient to locate the management and control of the Trusts anywhere but the residence of the St. Michael Trust Corp. For example, the fact that the beneficiaries have the right to appoint a protector who has the power to replace the St. Michael Trust Corp. as trustee is a common safeguard in a trust indenture and would not by itself be enough to find the beneficiaries to be in control of the property of the Trusts. The same could be said of the fact that St. Michael Trust Corp. and the beneficiaries employ common advisers, or the fact that the beneficiaries took it on themselves to advise the St. Michael Trust Corp. and even urged St. Michael Trust Corp., however strongly, to undertake a particular transaction. Indeed, the appointment of a trustee with little investment experience in a trust that requires the property to be invested might not be significant, provided that the trustee has the power to retain others for advice and, in the end, is the one making the decisions.

[68] However, there is a line to be drawn. On one side of the line are recommendations, even strong ones, by the beneficiaries to the trustee, leaving the trustee free to decide how to exercise the powers and discretions under the trust. In that case, the trustee is still managing and controlling the trust. On the other side of the line the beneficiaries are really exercising the powers and discretions under the trusts, managing and controlling the trusts, and displacing the appointed trustee. As mentioned above, on which side of the line a case falls is a factual question, requiring consideration of the evidence in its totality.

...

[70] Indeed, what else is to be made of the common understanding of the parties, as found by Justice Woods, that decisions in relation to the sale of the Trusts' interests in PMPL, the investment of the cash proceeds received on the sale, the making of distributions to the beneficiaries, and the taking of appropriate action to minimize the tax burden of the Trusts would be made by Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin and implemented by St. Michael Trust Corp.? What else explains the lack of documentary or other evidence that St. Michael Trust Corp. took an active role in assessing any of the important decisions relation to the disposition of the property of the Trust? What is the explanation for the professed lack of interest on the part of Mr. Garron and Mr. Dunin of the capabilities of St. Michael Trust Corp. to manage trust assets, except in relation to the work ordinarily done by someone with accounting and tax expertise? What is the explanation for the paucity of evidence as to the formation and operation of the Trusts and the failure to call key witnesses?"

Without getting into it, is this also not an instance where the beneficiaries could be argued to have such a degree of control over the property, and the lack of substantive control by the "trustees", that beneficial ownership resided with the Cdn. residents?

On appeal to the SCC³¹⁷ that Court held:

Taxation — Income tax — Trusts — Residence — Trusts held by corporation resident in Barbados — Beneficiaries of trusts resident in Canada — Central management and control of trusts carried out by main trust beneficiaries in Canada — Trustee seeking return of amounts withheld on account of Canadian tax from capital gains realized by trusts on sale of shares in Canada — Whether trusts are resident in Canada for taxation purposes.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed.

The principal basis for imposing income tax in Canada is residency. As with corporations, the residence of a trust should be determined by the principle that a trust resides for the purposes of the Income Tax Act where its real business is carried on, which is where the central management and control of the trust actually takes place. The residence of the trust is not always that of the trustee. It will be so where the trustee carries out the central management and control of the trust where the trustee is resident. Here, however, the trusts are resident in Canada, since the central management and control of the trusts was exercised by the main beneficiaries in Canada and the trustee's limited role was to provide administrative services and it had little or no responsibility beyond that.

317 Fundy Settlement v. Canada, 2012 SCC 14, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 520

Cases Cited

Referred to: De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd. v. Howe, [1906] A.C. 455; The King v. British Columbia Electric Railway Co., [1945] C.T.C. 162; Crossley Carpets (Canada) Ltd. v. M.N.R. (1967), 67 D.T.C. 522; Unit Construction Co. v. Bullock, [1960] A.C. 351.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canada-Barbados Income Tax Agreement Act, 1980, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 44, s. 25.

Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), ss. 2(1), 94, 104(1), (2), 245.

Treaties and Other International Instruments

Agreement Between Canada and Barbados for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with Respect to Taxes on Income and on Capital, Can. T.S. 1980 No. 29.

Authors Cited

Krishna, Vern. The Fundamentals of Income Tax Law. Toronto: Carswell, 2009.

APPEALS from a judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal (Nadon, Sharlow and Stratas J.J.A.), 2010 FCA 309, 411 N.R. 125, [2011] 2 C.T.C. 7, 2010 D.T.C. 5189, 61 E.T.R. (3d) 168, [2010] F.C.J. No. 1457 (QL), 2010 CarswellNat 4259 (sub nom. St. Michael Trust Corp. v. Minister of National Revenue; Garron Family Trust v. The Queen), affirming a decision of Woods J., 2009 TCC 450, [2010] 2 C.T.C. 2346, 2009 D.T.C. 1287, 50 E.T.R. (3d) 241, [2009] T.C.J. No. 345 (QL), 2009 CarswellNat 2600 (sub nom. Garron Family Trust v. The Queen). Appeals dismissed.

Douglas H. Mathew, Matthew G. Williams and Mark A. Barbour, for the appellants.

Anne M. Turley and Daniel Bourgeois, for the respondent.

THE FOLLOWING IS THE JUDGMENT DELIVERED BY

[1] THE COURT — St. Michael Trust Corp. (“St. Michael”) is the trustee of two trusts, the Fundy Settlement and the Summersby Settlement. The trusts were settled by an individual resident in St. Vincent in the Caribbean. The beneficiaries are residents of Canada. St. Michael is a corporation resident in Barbados.

[2] When the trusts disposed of shares they owned in two Ontario corporations, the purchaser remitted some $152 million to the Minister of National Revenue as withholding tax on account of Canadian tax from capital gains realized by the trusts on the sale of the shares.

[3] St. Michael sought return of the withheld amount based on an exemption from Canadian capital gains tax under the Agreement Between Canada and Barbados for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with Respect to Taxes on Income and on Capital, Can. T.S. 1980 No. 29 (incorporated into Canadian law by the Canada-Barbados Income Tax Agreement Act, 1980, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 44, s. 25). Under the treaty, tax would only be payable in the country in which the seller was resident. St. Michael claimed that because it was resident in Barbados, the trusts were resident in Barbados. As a result, there would be no basis for withholding tax in Canada.

[4] The Minister of National Revenue was of the opinion that the trusts were resident in Canada and that the withheld tax was properly payable.

[5] St. Michael’s appeal from the Minister’s reassessment to the Tax Court of Canada was unsuccessful (2009 TCC 450, [2010] 2 C.T.C. 2346), as was its further appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal (2010 FCA 309, 411 N.R. 125). It was granted leave to appeal to this Court.

[6] The issue in this case is the residence of the Fundy and Summersby trusts. St. Michael says the residence of the trusts is the residence of the trustee, which is Barbados. The Minister says the trusts are resident in Canada because the central management and control of the trusts was carried out by the main beneficiaries, who were resident in Canada. On the facts as determined by Woods J., the Tax Court judge, St. Michael is resident in Barbados while the central management and control of the trusts was carried out in Canada by the main beneficiaries of the trusts.

[7] As Sharlow J.A. in the Federal Court of Appeal explained, the principal basis for imposing income tax in Canada is residency (para. 52). Professor V. Krishna in The Fundamentals of Income Tax Law* (2009), noted, at p. 85, that the policy reason for this is to ensure that a person who enjoys the legal, political and economic benefits of associating with Canada will pay their appropriate share for the costs of this association. For an individual, factors such as nationality, physical presence, location of family home and social connections, among others, will be considered in determining residence. While the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the “Act”), contains certain deeming rules with respect to residency, generally residence is a question of fact.

[8] While there is a dearth of judicial authority on the question of the residency of a trust, the residency of a corporation has been determined to be where its central management and control actually abides. In De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd. v. Howe, [1906] A.C. 455 (H.L.), Lord Loreburn stated, at p. 458:

In applying the conception of residence to a company, we ought, I think, to proceed as nearly as we can upon the analogy of an individual. A company cannot eat or sleep, but it can keep house and do business. We ought, therefore, to see where it really keeps house and does business. . . . [A] company resides for purposes of income tax where its real business is carried on. . . . I regard that as the true rule, and the real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abides.

The central management and control test for residency of a corporation has been adopted in Canada in a number of cases and is well established (see The King v. British Columbia Electric Railway Co., [1945] C.T.C. 162 (Ex. Ct.); Crossley Carpets (Canada) Ltd. v. M.N.R. (1967), 67 D.T.C. 522 (T.A.B.)).

[9] In general, the central management and control of a corporation will be exercised where its board of directors exercises its responsibilities. However, as Sharlow J.A. pointed out (at para. 56), where the facts are that the central management and control is exercised by a shareholder who is resident and making decisions in another country, the corporation will be found to be resident where the shareholder resides. (See Unit Construction Co. v. Bullock, [1960] A.C. 351 (H.L.).)

[10] St. Michael says that the residence of the trust must be the residence of the trustee based on two fundamental propositions. First, the trust is not a person like a corporation, so the central management and control test is inapplicable to trusts. Sharlow J.A. disposed of St. Michael’s first argument summarily, as do we. While a trust is not a person at common law, it is deemed to be an individual under the Act. Section 104(2) provides:

A trust shall, for the purposes of this Act, and without affecting the liability of the trustee or legal representative for that person’s own income tax, be deemed to be in respect of the trust property an individual

We agree with the Minister that the fact that at common law a trust does not have an independent legal existence is irrelevant for the purposes of the Act.

[11] St. Michael’s second argument is that the Act links a trust to the trustee and therefore the residence of the trust must be the residence of the trustee. It bases this argument on s. 104(1), which provides:

In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate . . . shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property

The Federal Court of Appeal found that the linkage in s. 104(1) was for the purposes of solving “the practical problems of tax administration that would necessarily arise when it was determined that trusts were to be taxed despite the absence of legal personality” (para. 64). However, this did not mean that in all cases, the residence of the trust must be the residence of the trustee.

[12] St. Michael argues that s. 104(1) links the trustee to the trust for all attributes of a trust, including residency. However, although the subsection provides that a reference to a trust in the Act shall be read to include a reference to a trustee, St. Michael points to no provision that would link the trust and the trustee for purposes of determining the residency of the trust. The link that St. Michael asserts is not a principle of general application to trusts for all purposes, and there is nothing in the context of s. 104(1) that would suggest that there be a legal rule requiring that the residence of a trust must be the residence of the trustee.

[13] On the contrary, s. 2(1) is the basic charging provision of the Act, and its reference to a “person” must be read as a reference to the taxpayer whose taxable income is being subjected to income tax. This is the trust, not the trustee. This follows from s. 104(2), which separates the trust from the trustee in respect of trust property.

[14] On the other hand, there are many similarities between a trust and corporation that would, in our view, justify application of the central management and control test in determining the residence of a trust, just as it is used in determining the residence of a corporation. Some of these similarities include:

- (1) Both hold assets that are required to be managed;
- (2) Both involve the acquisition and disposition of assets;
- (3) Both may require the management of a business;
- (4) Both require banking and financial arrangements;
- (5) Both may require the instruction or advice of lawyers, accountants and other advisors; and
- (6) Both may distribute income, corporations by way of dividends and trusts by distributions.

As Woods J. noted: “The function of each is, at a basic level, the management of property” (para. 159).

[15] As with corporations, residence of a trust should be determined by the principle that a trust resides for the purposes of the Act where “its real business is carried on” (De Beers, at p. 458), which is where the central management and control of the trust actually takes place. As indicated, the Tax Court judge found as a fact that the main beneficiaries exercised the central management and control of the trusts in Canada. She found that St. Michael had only a limited role — to provide administrative services — and little or no responsibility beyond that (paras. 189-90). Therefore, on this test, the trusts must be found to be resident in Canada. This is not to say that the residence of a trust can never be the residence of the trustee. The residence of the trustee will also be the residence of the trust where the trustee carries out the central management and control of the trust, and these duties are performed where the trustee is resident. These, however, were not the facts in this case.

[16] We agree with Woods J. that adopting a similar test for trusts and corporations promotes “the important principles of consistency, predictability and fairness in the application of tax law” (para. 160). As she noted, if there were to be a totally different test for trusts than for corporations, there should be good reasons for it. No such reasons were offered here.

[17] For these reasons, we would dismiss the appeals with costs.

[18] In the alternative, the Minister argued that the trusts are deemed residents of Canada under s. 94, which provides a scheme for taxing non-resident trusts. Even if the trusts were found not to be resident in Canada under common law principles, the Minister submitted that their assessments were justified under s. 94 because the trusts were deemed to be Canadian residents for the purposes of the Act, and therefore Canadian residents for the purposes of the treaty exemption. In the case that this alternative argument failed, the Minister further argued that the tax benefit should be denied according to the general anti-avoidance rule under s. 245 of the Act because it would frustrate the purpose of relevant parts of the treaty.

[19] Given our conclusion that the trusts are resident in Canada under common law principles, it is not necessary to consider the arguments made about s. 94 or s. 245 of the Act. We should not be understood as endorsing the reasons of the Federal Court of Appeal on those matters.

In *Commissioners For Her Majesty's Revenue And Customs v. Smallwood & Anor.*³¹⁸ the UK Ct. of Appeal had to consider an instance where the taxpayer had been advised to temporarily send a trust off-shore temporarily to "wiggle between" the application of two provisions on the trust's disposition of property to access treaty tax rates. While the Court did examine, in detail, the parameters by which the relevant provisions applied to a trust, when on the superficial review the trust did access them, it determined the residence of the trust with:

"The question which this therefore raises (and critically in the present case) is how the DTA is intended to resolve residence/residence based conflicts when the liability under the relevant domestic legislation does not depend upon concurrent periods of residence.

...

With respect to the judge, I am not convinced about this. For the reasons I have explained, Article 13(4) must, I think, be construed as effective to deal with any liability to taxation for capital gains which either Contracting State may impose regardless of the basis of that charge under the domestic legislation in question. It seems to me unlikely that the draftsman of the Model Convention intended that capital gains which are to be taxable only on the basis of residence should depend exclusively on residence at the date of disposal and so exclude the rights of a Contracting State to tax gains by reference to residence within the same tax year. The definition of "resident of a Contracting State" in Article 4(1) re-inforces this view by making "liability to taxation" by reason of residence the criterion for the taxation of capital gains under Article 13(4). This, I think, must denote what the Special Commissioners described as chargeability and not simply physical residence. That view is, I think, consistent with the purpose of Article 13(4) and avoids descending into whether the UK or Mauritian requirements for residence are satisfied. The definition assumes that they are and allocates the right to tax on the basis that there is liability.

...

I therefore accept Mr Brennan's basic submission that the provisions of Article 13(4) are not to be read as incorporating a reference to the date of disposal but (for the reasons already given) I am not persuaded by his submission that one can construe Article 4(1) as meaning no more than tax resident and so avoid any application of the tie-breaker provisions in Article 4(3). The definition of "resident" in Article 4(1) is critical to the meaning of Article 13(4) and Article 4, once applied by the wording of Article 13(4), has to operate in its entirety. The definition of "resident" in Article 4(1) is expressly subject to Article 4(3) which therefore applies whenever the alienator is liable to taxation in both Contracting States in respect of the gain. Article 4(3), as I have explained, is focused on liability for tax regardless of the period of residence under national law which creates that liability. Looked at in this way it becomes meaningless and impermissible to draw a distinction between consecutive and concurrent periods of "residence".

...

It was also taken to be the correct test by the special commissioner (Mr David Shirley) in Wensleydale's Settlement Trustees v IRC [1996] STC 241. The Special Commissioners took as their formulation of the test a passage in the current Commentary on Article 4(3) of the Model Convention which is in these terms:-

"As a result of these considerations, the 'place of effective management' has been adopted as the preference criterion for persons other than individuals. The place of effective management is the place where key management and commercial decisions that are necessary for the conduct of the entity's business are in substance made. The place of effective management will ordinarily be the place where the most senior person or group of persons (for example a board of directors) makes its decisions, the place where the actions to be taken by the entity as a whole are determined; however, no definitive rule can be given and all relevant facts and circumstances must be examined to determine the place of effective management. An entity may have more than one place of management, but it can have only one place of effective management at any one time."

318 [2010] BTC 637, [2010] STC 2045, [2010] STI 2174, 12 ITL Rep 1002, [2010] EWCA Civ 778

Mr Prosser accepts that this is the test to be applied and that what has to be identified is the place where the real top-level management of the trustee qua trustee occurred rather than the day-to-day administration of the trust. But he submits that the top-level management of a company is usually carried out by its board of directors (as the Commentary suggests) unless it can be shown that the control of the company's affairs was effectively usurped and exercised by some third party and that the directors were content merely to rubberstamp the decisions which were taken. In this case there was, he says, no evidence or finding that KPMG Bristol or Mr Smallwood dictated the decision to sell the shares.

...

In their decision they concentrated on the management of the trusts between 19th December 2000 (when Lutea retired) and 2nd March 2001 when PMIL retired and was replaced by Mr and Mrs Smallwood. They found in terms that all the actions of PMIL in Mauritius were carried out correctly and were properly documented. This meant that the appropriate meetings took place there and the necessary resolutions were passed. But (in paragraph 133) they said that:-

"Nevertheless during the Mauritius period the influence of Mr Smallwood, who was the settlor and who alone had the power to appoint new trustees, and the guiding hands of Mr Gadd and Mr Turbervill of KPMG Bristol, were evident throughout. We first consider the evidence about the role of KPMG Bristol."

The Special Commissioners heard evidence from Mr John Turbervill (a senior manager at KPMG Bristol) and Mr Roger Gadd, one of the directors of the private client department. They said that KPMG Bristol (which had recommended the use of the Round the World scheme to Mr Smallwood) were acting purely as tax advisers and could not tell the trustees what to do. They were in contact with PMIL throughout the tax planning exercise but in order to make sure that what was going on fitted within that exercise. There was a confident expectation that the scheme would be followed through but no more than an expectation. PMIL could still have decided not to sell the shares.

The Commissioners also heard evidence from Ms Taher, the departmental manager at PMIL who had responsibility for regulatory compliance, and from Mr Jaye Jingree, the managing director of PMIL. The effect of their evidence and the relevant findings of fact are contained in the following paragraphs of the Decision:-

"136. We accept the evidence of Ms Taher that there was no formal appointment by PMIL as trustee of the Trust for KPMG Bristol to advise PMIL "but then they were all part of the KPMG network, and they had introduced the [Trust] client to us, so it was normal practice for us to deal with another KPMG office; it was normal practice for us to take some advice from the other KPMG offices who were dealing with the particular company or trust". Mr Jingree told us that it was normal practice within his firm to get in touch with the person who had introduced a client and to keep the introducer briefed about progress.

137. In the light of this evidence we find that KPMG Bristol saw themselves as tax advisers to the trustees of the Trust, being first Lutea and then PMIL. There was no formal appointment by PMIL but that was not regarded as necessary as both KPMG Bristol and KPMG Mauritius were "under the KPMG umbrella". With that conclusion in mind we turn to examine the facts relevant to the place of effective management.

The relevant facts

138. The tax planning scheme was devised by KPMG Bristol as tax advisers to Lutea, the previous trustee of the Trust. Mr Smallwood had retired as Chairman of FirstGroup and any restrictions on the sale of the FirstGroup shares had been lifted. A tax efficient way of diversifying the portfolio of investments held for the Trust was needed. The appointment of trustees in Mauritius had been the idea of Mr Turbervill and the details were described to Mr Smallwood as early as August 2000. Mr Smallwood had the power to appoint new trustees. It was Mr Turbervill who approached PMIL and told them about the tax planning proposals and set out the basis of their appointment in the email of 24 November 2000. That made it clear that the confident expectation was that the shares would be sold before 5 April 2001.

139. We accept the evidence of Ms Taher that she did not understand "the basis" referred to in the email of 24 November 2000 as to mean that the sale of the shares was a condition for PMIL to accept the appointment as trustee; her evidence was that the trustees would wish to receive appropriate advice and recommendations. However, she accepted that eventually as part of the tax planning exercise the shares would be sold at some time. We accept the evidence of Mr Jingree that there was no agreement that PMIL would behave in a certain way or make certain decisions as a quid pro quo for the introduction of the Trust. PMIL's duties as trustee were laid down in legislation and in the trust deed and PMIL would only act within the context of what it was allowed to do. We also accept the evidence of Mr Jingree that the whole point of the tax planning exercise was to sell the shares and to realise the gain and to avoid tax on the gain.

140. The facts surrounding the appointment of PMIL lead us to the view that the real top level management, or the realistic, positive management of the Trust, remained in the United Kingdom. We accept that the administration of the Trust moved to Mauritius but in our view the "key" decisions were made in the United Kingdom.

141. This view is confirmed by subsequent events. The sale of the FirstGroup shares was not an isolated decision taken by PMIL on 10 January 2001. It had been carefully arranged beforehand by the transfer of the shares to Quilter to be held in their nominee account. Further, Mr Bazzone of Quilter had been told of the tax planning exercise and that Quilter would be asked to dispose of the holding of FirstGroup shares after PMIL had been appointed. It was when Mr Bazzone of Quilter told Mr Gadd on 4 January 2001 that he needed instructions from the new trustees that Mr Turbervill prompted PMIL to get on with what they should be doing. At no time did Mr Bazzone recommend the sale of all the shares but the sale of all the shares fitted in with the tax planning scheme. When Mr Bazzone wrote on 6 January to PMIL about the sale of the shares Mr Jingree was away from the office and Mr Shah asked Mr Turbervill for advice. There was then a delay in PMIL receiving the deed of indemnity and Mr Turbervill sent his email of 8 January to PMIL, Lutea and Mr Bazzone that no instructions to sell the shares should be given until the deed had been received. PMIL also asked Mr Turbervill to help with the opening of the account with Quilter and Mr Turbervill suggested an investment objective of capital growth with medium risk. Even on the date of the decision to sell Mr Bazzone had to remind PMIL how many FirstGroup shares were to be sold. Mr James Baxter of Merchant took the initiative in obtaining a set of account opening forms for Merchant.

142. We accept the evidence of Mr Jingree that the sale of the shares was motivated by United Kingdom tax planning reasons. The purpose of selling all the shares was to ensure that the tax planning which had been put in place worked to the best advantage of the Trust and it was vital that all of the shares were sold prior to the end of March in order to achieve this. The decision to sell all the shares was made in the hope that all the shares could be sold before the end of March. However, if it had not been in the interests of the beneficiaries and the Trust, the trustees would not have sold the shares; "if the funds which had been realised had to go away in taxes then it would not have been in the best interests of the beneficiaries". Also, if the share price dropped dramatically, and if the fund manager had advised against a sale, then the trustees would not have decided to sell. We also accept the evidence of Ms Taher that the decision to sell all the shares was based upon tax planning and the need for the shares to be sold by a particular date. The fact that the share price had gone up was not the "driver" for the sale of the shares.

143. We fully accept that the decision to sell the shares that day was taken by the directors of PMIL at the telephone meeting on 10 January 2001. We also accept that if, for example, the price of the shares had fallen to a level that meant that no gain would be realised on their disposal, the shares would not have been sold but would have been retained and perhaps sold later. Nevertheless, in our view this was a lower level management decision as there was no doubt that the shares would be sold; the real top level management decisions, or the realistic, positive management decisions of the Trust, to dispose of all the shares in a tax efficient way, had already been, and continued to be, taken in the United Kingdom. The "key" decisions were made in the United Kingdom.

144. Finally the events after the sale of the shares confirm our view. The tax planning exercise was completed by the appointment of United Kingdom trustees. We remark that PMIL's fee note was approved by Mr Turbervill.

145. We conclude that the state in which the real top level management, or the realistic, positive management of the Trust, or the place where key management and commercial decisions that were necessary for the conduct of the Trust's business were in substance made, and the place where the actions to be taken by the entity as a whole were, in fact, determined between 19 December 2000 and 2 March 2001 was the United Kingdom."

...

The importance of the case for present purposes lies in the analysis by Chadwick LJ of what is capable of constituting management and control of a company by persons who are not its directors. Referring to the treatment of this issue by Park J at first instance, he said this:-

"[26] At para [26] of his judgment the judge had examined four cases in which (as he said) the courts had recognised the considerations to which he had just alluded. Those cases were Re Little Olympian Each Ways Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 560, Esquire Nominees Ltd v Comr of Taxation (1971) 129 CLR 177, New Zealand Forest Products Finance NV v Comr of Inland Revenue [1995] 2 NZLR 357 and Untelrab Ltd v McGregor (Inspector of Taxes) [1996] STC (SCD) 1. He accepted, of course, that each of those cases was decided on its own facts; but 'they do have some common features which ... are relevant to the present case'. He identified those features at para [27]:

'[27] ... They all involved persons based in one jurisdiction (commonly a high tax jurisdiction) causing companies to be established in other jurisdictions (commonly low or no tax jurisdictions). In all the cases the companies so established were intended to fulfil particular purposes which were ancillary to the activities of the persons who caused them to be established. In all the cases the local managements did not take initiatives, but responded to proposals (described in some passages in the judgments as instructions) which were presented to them. In all the cases they did implement the proposals, and it is obvious that, when the foreign companies had been established, the confident expectation was that they would implement the proposals. In general, although large amounts of money may have been involved, the functions which the companies were established to fulfil did not involve much regular activity, so there was no great need for frequent exercises of central management and control.

...

In my view the judge was correct in his analysis of the law. In seeking to determine where 'central management and control' of a company incorporated outside the United Kingdom lies, it is essential to recognise the distinction between cases where management and control of the company is exercised through its own constitutional organs (the board of directors or the general meeting) and cases where the functions of those constitutional organs are 'usurped'—in the sense that management and control is exercised independently of, or without regard to, those constitutional organs. And, in cases which fall within the former class, it is essential to recognise the distinction (in concept, at least) between the role of an 'outsider' in proposing, advising and influencing the decisions which the constitutional organs take in fulfilling their functions and the role of an outsider who dictates the decisions which are to be taken. In that context an 'outsider' is a person who is not, himself, a participant in the formal process (a board meeting or a general meeting) through which the relevant constitutional organ fulfils its function."

...

The conclusion of the Special Commissioners (in paragraph 140 of their Decision) that the key decisions were made in the UK where the realistic, positive management of the trusts remained is said to be based on the facts surrounding the appointment of PMIL. It is clear that they were appointed as part of a pre-existing scheme which involved choosing Mauritius as the situs of the trust because of its favourable treatment of capital gains. It is equally clear that PMIL accepted the trusteeship on the basis that the shares would be sold as part of that tax planning exercise and that the shares were indeed sold in accordance with the scheme. But the Special Commissioners also accepted Mr Jingree's evidence that there was no agreement that PMIL would behave in a certain way or make certain decisions as a quid pro quo for the introduction of the trust and that had the sale of the shares not been in the interests of the beneficiaries as at the date of the sale then PMIL would not have agreed to sell.

I find it difficult to accept that on the basis of these findings the Special Commissioners could properly have concluded that the POEM of the trustees up to March 2001 lay in the UK rather than in Mauritius. The findings made do not go beyond saying that PMIL accepted the advice of KPMG to proceed with and implement the scheme in the interests of the beneficiaries. But they retained their right and duties as trustees to consider the matter at the time of alienation and did not (on the Special Commissioners' findings) agree merely to act on the instructions which they received from KPMG. The function of the directors was not therefore usurped in the sense described in Wood v Holden. It seems to me to follow that the Special Commissioners' conclusions are not ones which were therefore open to them on the evidence or on the findings of fact which they made. "

Leighton v Commissioner of Taxation³¹⁹ is an interesting recent Australian case whereby the tax authorities successfully contended that by virtue of the fact that the corpus of the trust (sale proceeds of shares) were held in an Aust. resident bank, and the account holders were acting as trustees, the otherwise non-resident office holders would be subject to income tax. It is a wonderful case that reflects the terms contained in our Sec. 104(1) references to both ownership and control.

This being said, one must distinguish, also, in the author's opinion, the difference between where the controlling/owning trustees reside and where they are capable of exercising that control or ownership rights. This is the proper approach in ascertaining corporate residence and in the author's opinion, although it wasn't dealt with in Thibodeau Family Trust the salient fact in that case was that the assets, the trustees, and the administration of the assets had been moved out of Canada thus the trustees did not have to return to Canada to apply to the courts in respect of administration questions and the beneficiaries rights would have been enforceable only by the foreign jurisdiction's legal system. By moving the assets out of Canada, as well as the control of those assets the Canadian legal system ceased to apply and control was exercisable only from within Bermuda.

If one examines this issue more in detail it would appear that a foreign resident trustee can exercise a multitude of powers and rights while being non-resident without ever having to petition the domestic courts for judicial opinion.³²⁰ In the case of estates and the passing of their accounts, the domestic courts would have on-going relevance throughout the administration, (probate would have to be obtained from them, beneficiary disputes would have to be heard, etc.). In the case of trusts, however, the courts, to an extent, may have significantly less involvement and the trust can be completely functional from a non-resident control base. A taxpayer doesn't cease to be a trustee if he resides in a foreign jurisdiction; domestic courts serve as a forum, primarily, in which the trust problems may be solved should they evolve and the fact that the non-resident trustee must apply thereto to solve questions of duty, etc., does not preclude him from dealing with the trust property principally unhindered while non-resident. The extent of the involvement of the domestic courts, determined primarily by the state of the trust/estate situation has significant importance since if the trustee cannot exercise control without the blessing of the domestic courts clearly control can only be exercised from within Canada and the actual residence of the trustee ceases to be relevant. The contrary would tend to result in the opposite.

319 [2010] FCA 1086 (6 October 2010)

320 The proper law of the trust was implicitly held irrelevant in determining residency in Thibodeau Family Trust and Jones Trust.

In the author's opinion, the residence of the beneficiaries of a trust/estate substantively controlled elsewhere, as per the incidental comments in *Holden v. M.N.R.*³²¹ are and will continue to be, irrelevant in establishing residence of the trust/estate in Canada tax law. The situs of the trust property has the same effect on the residence of the trust in the same way as the involvement of the domestic courts.

In *Alworth v. Min. of Finance*³²² the Supreme Court paid special attention to both a bare trustee and a discharged executor in recognizing that they were captured for logging tax remittance under a provision very much like Sec. 104(1).

In respect of compelling CRA to bind itself to recognizing the residency of a trust there are at least two cases that illustrate instances where there have been hic-cups in the process. Such was the case in *Hugh William Perry, in his Capacity of Trustee of the 2005 Robert Julien Family Delaware Dynasty Trust v. Canada (The Minister of National Revenue) and Canada Revenue Agency*³²³ where the Fed. Trial Court was approached in an effort of writ of mandamus to compel CRA to make a decisive pronouncement on trust residency. The court refused. In the *Minister of National Revenue v. Robert M.O. Morris et. al.*³²⁴ the issue was whether the taxpayer could compel the Minister to make a determination of residency that would apply for Barbados Convention purposes that would pre-empt section 116 certificate process purposes on a disposition of trust property. The Fed. Appeal Court recognized that it hadn't the legal authority to usurp the scheme of the Act and the discretion of the Minister and compel her to make a decision. In the author's opinion, why didn't the taxpayers simply get a ruling first, rather than get a lawyer after the fact.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Residence of a Trust or Estate

IT-447

DATE: May 30, 1980

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Residence of a Trust or Estate

REFERENCE: Subsection 2(1) (also subsections 75(2), 94(1), 104(1) and (2))

Notice to the reader:

- Bulletins do not have the force of law.
- This is an HTML version of the original document. It is also available in other formats.

1. The residence of a trust or estate (hereinafter referred to as a trust) in Canada, or in a particular province or territory within Canada, is a question of fact to be determined according to the circumstances in each case. However, a trust is generally considered to reside where the trustee, executor, administrator, heir or

321 1 D.T.C. 243.

322 [1978] 1 S.C.R. 447

323 T-2206-06

324 A-219-09

other legal representative (hereinafter referred to as the trustee) who manages the trust or controls the trust assets resides.

2. The trustee who has management and control of the trust, while he may not have physical possession of the trust assets, will be the person who has most or all of the following powers or responsibilities:

- (a) control over changes in the trust's investment portfolio,
- (b) responsibility for the management of any business or property owned by the trust,
- (c) responsibility for any banking, and financing, arrangements for the trust,
- (d) control over any other trust assets,
- (e) ultimate responsibility for preparation of the trust accounts and reporting to the beneficiaries of the trust, and
- (f) power to contract with and deal with trust advisors, e.g. auditors and lawyers.

3. In certain cases, more than one trustee may be involved in exercising the management and control over the trust. In one such trustee clearly exercises a more substantial portion of the management and control than the others, the trust will reside in the jurisdiction in which that trustee resides. Where two or more trustees exercise relatively equal portions of the management and control of the trust, and trustees exercising more than 50% of such management and control reside in one jurisdiction, the trust will reside in that jurisdiction.

4. In some cases it may not be clear who has management and control of the trust and in these situations the Department will examine other factors relating to the trust to determine residence. The most important of these factors are:

- (a) the location where the legal rights with respect to the trust assets are enforceable, and
- (b) the location of the trust assets.

The residence of the beneficiaries of a trust and domicile of the settlor are not considered to be relevant except in situations as described in 5 below.

5. Normally residence of a trust is dependent upon residence of the trustee or trustees who can exercise management and control of the trust. In some situations the facts may indicate that a substantial portion of the management and control rests with some other person such as the settlor or the beneficiaries. In these situations the residence of this other person may be considered to be the determining factor for the trust regardless of any contrary provisions in the trust agreement.

6. Where an individual exercises the management and control of a trust, the residence of that individual is determined based on the normal factual tests for determining the residence of an individual.

7. Where a corporation exercises the management and control of a trust, the residence of that corporation is determined based on the normal factual tests for determining residence of a corporation. An exception to the general rule may be encountered where the management and control of a trust is exercised by a branch office, for example, a branch of a trust company. In these circumstances, the trust may be determined resident in the jurisdiction where the branch office is located even though the corporation itself is resident outside that jurisdiction.

8. In some situations, after examination of all factors, it may be determined that a trust is resident in Canada notwithstanding that another country may consider the trust to be resident in that country.

9. Pursuant to paragraph 94(1)(c) a trust not otherwise resident in Canada may be deemed to be a resident in Canada for the purposes of Part I of the Act if the trust is such that the amount of the income or capital of the trust to be distributed at any time to any beneficiary of the trust depends upon the exercise by any person of, or the failure by any person to exercise, any discretionary power.

10. Subsection 75(2) provides that, where property is transferred by a person to a trust created after 1934 on condition that the property, or property substituted for it, may revert to that person or pass to persons designated by him or that during his lifetime the property may be disposed of only with his concurrence, any income or loss or taxable capital gain or allowable capital loss from the property, or property substituted for it, is attributable to that person during his lifetime while he is resident in Canada. In such situations attribution applies whether or not the trust is resident in Canada.

11. The foregoing are the considerations viewed as relevant in determining the residence of a trust or estate in ordinary situations. Regard may be had to other factors where the purported residence of a trust or estate appears to have been motivated by reasons of tax avoidance.

"But Your Honour, the ITA Does Recognize "Splintered Trusts" in Respect of the Incidents of Any Trust Property, and that Party is Resident!"

The Income Tax Act doesn't impose a tax on persons (it's not a "head-tax"): it identifies for collection of income tax targeted parties who have ownership of the economic aspects of the underlying property that is divisible between income or capital depending on how the "taxpayer" deals with that property. That being said, the underlying fact is that the party who owns or controls that property is assessed since how else can parties be responsible for tax remittance in respect of increases in its value.

In the case of trusts, per the opening remarks about the fact that Finance has provided statutorily for "splintered trusts" in an above subchapter, to be identified to be the following parties opening described in s. 104(1):

1. the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator, succession heir or legal representative having ownership of any of the trust property
2. the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator, succession heir or legal representative having control of any of the trust property
3. those not actual such parties since the provision refers to only include, not "mean", having ownership of any of the trust property
4. those not actual such parties since the provision refers to only include, not "mean", having control of any of the trust property³²⁵

did the SCC "get it right" in its statement in St. Michael Trust Corp. as Trustee of the Fundy Settlement? In that judgment that Court went into detail that the trust must be equated with the party identified in s. 104(1), that that party is indivisible to multiple parties and that the POEM (point of effective management) test of the entire body of trustees/beneficiaries must apply. With this the author disagrees. Clearly, when reading how "open" the targeting provision identifying "the taxpayer" is read in s. 104(1) it is clear that Finance sought to capture any instance where any resident taxpayer had any of the stated characteristics in respect of any of the trust's property. This then makes the POEM apply to each owning/controlling party and not the centrality of all of the actors, given that s. 104(1) has "splintered" them: Finance wanted to give CRA a very open hand to capture a very broad cast of actors while also prompting for the issue to drill down to the property by property basis so the POEM should be applied on that individual level in respect of each property - rather than the mass of actors. That's what the wording of the Act presently allows interpretation for.

This is directly supported by the reasoning in *Dawson v. I.R.C.*³²⁶ above noted where the UK Ct. of Appeal refused to splinter the trust solely because the charging provision identifying "the taxpayer" did not provide for such, instead choosing to evaluate the application of the Finance Act on, again, the "indivisible taxpayer" concept: it does, so far, in Canada as well.³²⁷

And then the argument comes back to, the underlying thrust of the Act is to tax those who have ownership or control of a property's increase in value and that the ITA does not, actually, bother to contemplate those ³²⁵ "Reference to trust or estate – Sec. 104(1)"

Sec. 104. (1) In this Act, a reference to a trust or estate (in this subdivision referred to as a "trust") shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be read to include a reference to the trustee, executor, administrator, liquidator of a succession, heir or other legal representative having ownership or control of the trust property, but, except for the purposes of this subsection, subsection (1.1), subparagraph (b)(v) of the definition "disposition" in subsection 248(1) and paragraph (k) of that definition, a trust is deemed not to include an arrangement under which the trust can reasonably be considered to act as agent for all the beneficiaries under the trust with respect to all dealings with all of the trust's property unless the trust is described in any of paragraphs (a) to (e.1) of the definition "trust" in subsection 108(1).

³²⁶ [1988] 3 All E.R. 753.

³²⁷ One can see the ever-present danger in the case of jointly named trustees owning the trust property in this regard since even if one is resident, the trust is too.

instances of the inter-play of trustee/trust obligations since all it is trying to do is ensure that income tax is collected, through the identified party, on the property's increase in wealth. Those owning or controlling the underlying property are exactly those who should be liable. While these parties are saddled with possibly a non-resident focused trust deed, they "breathe" the trust's functioning and may enjoy the benefits of the Canadian milieu that should prompt them to be subject to its taxation, in respect of property controlled/owned. While the trust must be resident somewhere it is represented in Canada through that targeted party in respect of its splintered property so there should be Canadian taxation of that aspect of it. Simply put, Finance deliberately cast an ever increased broad net to try and capture any instance where anyone (trustee, beneficiary, etc.) exercises ownership OR control of any of the trust's underlying property in effort to try and capture its incremental increase in value. That allows CRA to legally assess multiple successive instances over all of the relevant properties through any and all of the relevant parties where trustees are in disagreement of the interpretation and functioning of their trust since "the country isn't interested in their squabbling" and only wants to tax the underlying realized increases in value.

On this issue, by chance, the SCC did get it right since in St. Michel's Trust it was the Cdn. resident beneficiaries who exercised complete control over the trust's property and were to such an extent, beneficial owners outright. But, even standing as beneficiaries, they fit within the non-listed parties in s. 104(1) on the criteria of control/beneficial ownership any way. And herein lays the difficulty with the drill-down: all parties seem to have equal standing and then the person who decides has to simply take them on an individual basis. What happens when a Cdn. resident controlling beneficiary(ies) is completely matched with a possible group of non-resident controlling trustees...? The test is still met on residency since the beneficiary(ies), as one of the parties, satisfies the splintered basis. Thus it can be said that if ANY party satisfying the elements of the s. 104(1), on a property by property basis, is resident, then that trust property, for ITA purposes is resident since even though the vast majority of all of the other actors reside outside the country, one, satisfying the definition, is, and that's all that's needed. The trust property "breathes" through that Canadian resident party in Canada, regardless of how it also breathes through others non-resident.

Given this it should be clear, that even in the face of the present SCC recent decision, CRA could and should argue that an instance where a resident "included" party has de facto or de jure control, or, ownership of a trust's particular property, *even if shared with other stated trustees*³²⁸ etc., even when the vast majority of the ownership and control of other trust property is resident outside of Canada, can be assessed in respect of that particular trust property. Where the property is situated is irrelevant: the residence of the party, who stands in relation to it, is. And, Finance has specifically provided for such with its referencing in s. 104(1). Note: that provision refers to the trust's property, any part of it, and not all of it as subsequently described in that same subsection. It also does not superficially refer to "the trust" as a shell of a fictional legal creature, but instead, with reference to the trust's actual subject property, thus causing the assessment focus to be on the property, in accompany to possibly multiple parties owning or controlling it, on an individual basis and not on the global instrument.

While, per this argument, the "vast majority" of all trust acting parties may not be subject to Cdn. taxation on their owned or controlled properties, since they themselves may be non-resident, those who are resident should be in respect of their owned or controlled properties. *The latter satisfy the targeting identity in respect of "their" property proper under s. 104(1)*³²⁹.

And that should cause you to be very sensitive to ensure that this easy interpretation applies or doesn't to those who have qualifying dealings with any trust property. (Can CRA change its mind on this issue, spontaneously "bringing hordes of trusts on-shore"?) Consider issues of determinative control or ownership of each trust/estate property always.

328 Can this argument be used in the face of joint ownership of trust property by trustees: the fact that a single trustee owns jointly with others seems to still allow for such since the provision doesn't call for complete ownership and in law the trustee still stands as an owner. She of course has recourse to her other trustees with respect to this property and they, in the majority can bind her etc., however she is still one of joint owners.

329 This would allow some property not be captured for taxation when its acting parties are non-resident.

Changes of Residence.

Since the residence of a trust, for purposes of the ITA, generally depends collectively upon the residence of the majority of its trustees having control or ownership of trust property a fine line between non-resident or resident status may be difficult to ascertain once one or more of the controlling/owning trustees change their residence. In a simple case such as the case of three equal controlling and jointly owning trustees, where only one of them becomes a non-resident, the remaining two that are resident will allow the residency status to be maintained but the opposite will result when two of the three become non-resident. The simple principle is very difficult to apply where control or ownership isn't so equally subdivided amongst the trustees and thus it can prove particularly difficult to determine changes in residence of the trust when some or all of the trustees routinely change their place of residence.

A change in residence implies that the trust has ceased to be resident in one jurisdiction and taken on a residence in another however if the trust doesn't cease to be resident in one, but instead takes on dual residency, then the section 128.1 deemed disposition rules will not apply. Such is the case where a sole trustee corporation or individual is found to be resident in two or more jurisdictions and while the relevant tax treaty may provide relief for possible resulting double taxation, the trust will still not be considered to have terminated residency thus allowing it to avoid the section 128.1 rules. Where the trustee(s) which caused the trust to be considered resident are to become non-resident it may prove quite beneficial for the beneficiaries to vary the terms of the trust, (through common or statute law rules), so as to allow the existing trustees to appoint a new one, (or possibly by doing it themselves), such as a corporation incorporated in Canada after April 26, 1965 which is deemed by Sec. 250(4) to be resident in Canada, (wherein the existing trustees could be directors or the corporation could be controlled by a newly created trust). Unlike the appointment of a separate legal individual the appointment of a corporation will allow the existing trustees to retain their control over the trust, but through a different medium.

Trusts.

Subsection 128.1 provides that when a taxpayer, has after 1971, ceased to be resident in Canada he will be deemed to have disposed of each property of a certain nature immediately before that time for proceeds equal to the (Canadian) fair market value thereof at that time: Sec. 128.1 expressly opens with the phrase "for purposes of this Act". The change in residency rules are formulated to ensure Canada taxes only accretions in wealth when resident in Canada and that those accretions are taxed on departing.

The fair market value of the property will be that which is determined as if the property was disposed of in Canada at that time. The taxpayer will subsequently be deemed to have reacquired the property for its FMV that was recognized as proceeds.

Subsection 128.1 applies to cause deemed dispositions of property other than certain types of described property such as; a taxable Canadian property other than that elected by a "non-trust" individual to be treated as disposed, any right described in Sec. 212(1)(h), 212(1)(j) to (q) being certain pension benefits, annuity payments, retiring allowances, RRSP/DPSP payments etc, or a right to receive benefits under the CPP or certain other provincial pension plans or property other than that above in respect of which the "non-trust" taxpayer has furnished to the Minister acceptable security for the payment of the tax that would have resulted if the property had been deemed to have been disposed of. A trust holding taxable Canadian property will not recognize a deemed disposition in respect of it when it becomes non-resident and thus it will not be able to recognize accrued capital losses³³⁰. Since under para. 48(1)(c) a trust cannot elect to have certain property exempt from deemed dispositions upon the posting of acceptable security³³¹ it may prove advantageous to simply distribute it out to the appropriate capital beneficiary, (if the trust is a personal trust), thus avoiding early recognition of implicit tax liabilities if the trust is to become non-resident however this would depend upon

330. which will be limited in recognition by non-trust individuals by the closing phrase which operates to restrict recognition of capital losses from deemed dispositions of taxable Canadian property, to the amount of capital gains otherwise recognized from deemed dispositions of similar property

331 which as per Sec. 128.1(2) causes the property elected upon to be deemed taxable Canadian property until the time the taxpayer disposes of it or becomes resident again, whichever comes first whether in fact an accrued gain, (and not a loss), is recognizable upon the deemed disposition, and the residency of the beneficiary.³³² It could prove more beneficial, when an accrued loss exists, to recognize the disposition thus having a loss to reduce effective taxation of gains recognized. If a distribution to the appropriate beneficiary isn't advisable then there are at least two broad options the trust has in order to avoid a "deemed" disposition; it can incorporate a taxable Canadian corporation and transfer the property to it, tax-free under Sec. 85(1), whereby the shares taken back as consideration will be a taxable Canadian property as per Sec. 115(1)(b)(iii), (regardless of Sec. 85(1)(i)), or it can transfer the property to another trust created through a general or special power of appointment, whereby as per Sec. 54(c)(v) a disposition will not be recognized if the beneficial ownership does not change. Both operations may require the variation in the trust deed to allow the trustees to execute such action however the result is that the property taken back(if any) will not be exposed to the deemed disposition, in order that it will be taxable Canadian property.³³³

“Returning trust beneficiary – Sec. 128.1(7)”

If an individual (other than a trust)

- (a) becomes resident in Canada at a particular time in a taxation year,
- (b) owns at the particular time a property that the individual last acquired on a trust distribution to which subsection 107(2) would, but for subsection 107(5), have applied and at a time (in this subsection referred to as the “distribution time”) that was after October 1, 1996 and before the particular time, and
- (c) was a beneficiary of the trust at the last time, before the particular time, at which the individual ceased to be resident in Canada, the following rules apply:
 - (d) subject to paragraphs (e) and (f), if the individual and the trust jointly so elect in writing and file the election with the Minister on or before the earlier of their filing-due dates for their taxation years that include the particular time, subsection 107(2.1) does not apply to the distribution in respect of all properties acquired by the individual on the distribution that were taxable Canadian properties of the individual throughout the period that began at the distribution time and that ends at the particular time,
 - (e) paragraph (f) applies in respect of the individual, the trust and a property in respect of which an election under paragraph (d) is made where, if the individual
 - (i) had been resident in Canada at the distribution time,
 - (ii) had acquired the property at the distribution time at a cost equal to its fair market value at that time,
 - (iii) had ceased to be resident in Canada immediately after the distribution time, and ³³² It should also be recognized that this applies only in the case of changes in residence of trusts and not changes in residences of estates in the midst of administration.

³³³ Subsection 104(21) cannot be used to designate out capital gains on account of the dispositions since the trust isn't resident throughout its tax year. The income caused by the gains may be designated out to the beneficiaries via Sec. 104(21) in a P.B. Election so as to utilize their tax rates.

(iv) had, immediately before the particular time, disposed of the property for proceeds of disposition equal to its fair market value immediately before the particular time, the application of subsection 40(3.7) would reduce the amount that would, but for that subsection and this subsection, have been the individual's loss from the disposition,

(f) where this paragraph applies in respect of an individual, a trust and a property

(i) notwithstanding paragraph 107(2.1)(a), the trust is deemed to have disposed of the property at the distribution time for proceeds of disposition equal to the total of

(A) the cost amount to the trust of the property immediately before the distribution time, and

(B) the amount, if any, by which the reduction under subsection 40(3.7) described in paragraph (e) exceeds the lesser of

(I) the cost amount to the trust of the property immediately before the distribution time, and

(II) the amount, if any, which the individual and the trust jointly specify for the purposes of this paragraph in the election under paragraph (d) in respect of the property, and

(ii) notwithstanding paragraph 107(2.1)(b), the individual is deemed to have acquired the property at the distribution time at a cost equal to the amount, if any, by which the amount otherwise determined under paragraph 107(2)(b) exceeds the lesser of the reduction under subsection 40(3.7) described in paragraph (e) and the amount specified under subclause (i)(B)(II),

(g) if the individual and the trust jointly so elect in writing and file the election with the Minister on or before the later of their filing due dates for their taxation years that include the particular time, in respect of each property that the individual owned throughout the period that began at the distribution time and that ends at the particular time and that is deemed by paragraph (1)(b) to have been disposed of because the individual became resident in Canada, notwithstanding paragraphs 107(2.1)(a) and (b), the trust's proceeds of disposition under paragraph 107(2.1)(a) at the distribution time, and the individual's cost of acquiring the property at the particular time, are deemed to be those proceeds and that cost determined without reference to this paragraph, minus the least of

(i) the amount that would, but for this paragraph, have been the trust's gain from the disposition of the property deemed by paragraph 107(2.1)(a) to have occurred,

(ii) the fair market value of the property at the particular time, and

(iii) the amount that the individual and the trust jointly specify for the purposes of this paragraph in the election,

(h) if the trust ceases to exist before the individual's filing-due date for the individual's taxation year that includes the particular time,

(i) an election or specification described in this subsection may be made by the individual alone in writing if the election is filed with the Minister on or before that filing-due date, and

(ii) if the individual alone makes such an election or specification, the individual and the trust are jointly and severally liable for any amount payable under this Act by the trust as a result of the election or specification, and

(i) notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to (5), such assessment of tax payable under the Act by the trust or the individual for any year that is before the year that includes the particular time and that is not before the year that includes the distribution time shall be made as is necessary to take an election under this subsection into account, except that no such assessment shall affect the computation of

(i) interest payable under this Act to or by the trust or the individual in respect of any period that is before the individual's filing-due date for the taxation year that includes the particular time, or

(ii) any penalty payable under this Act.

Beneficiaries.

Where the party becoming non-resident is a beneficiary under a trust, depending on where the trust is resident at the time and the nature of his interest, he may not have to recognize a deemed disposition in respect of her interest. Capital interests, within the technical meaning provided in Sec. 108(1), will usually be recognized as capital property when disposed of regardless of the residence of the trust however if the trust is resident in Canada at the time the beneficiary becomes non-resident, the capital interest will be considered a taxable Canadian property and thus be exempt from deemed disposition. A capital interest in an unadministered estate is capital property but as per Sec. 115(1)(b)(vi) it may not be a taxable Canadian property due to the specification expressed in that subparagraph and there may be, in the author's opinion, a very sound reason for this. If the beneficiary can be shown to carry on the business of trading in trust interests then the technically defined capital interest will be regarded as inventorial property and thus exempted from Sec. 128.1 application regardless of the residence of the trust.

If the taxpayer isn't a trust, he may also elect to have Sec. 128.1 apply upon providing acceptable security whereby a disposition will not be recognized. If the trust is a resident personal trust then Sec. 107(1)(a) will apply to severely reduce the tax consequences recognizable by the beneficiary upon a deemed disposition by allowing for an artificially recognized higher capital interest ACB than otherwise recognizable under the normal ACB provisions, which will thus reduce and possibly eliminate the recognition of a capital gain. If the trust isn't personal then an income right under it will be treated as a capital interest, as per Sec. 108(1)(c)(ii), while if the trust is personal, (as per the definition in Sec. 248(1)), then the income right will qualify as an income property interest within the Sec. 108(1)(e) technical definition and since it then represents an income property, (following the substance of Sec. 106(2)), it will be exempt from the Sec. 128.1(1) disposition rules, regardless of the residence of the trust.

Understandably income interests under a personal trust have a distinct advantage over capital interests when it comes to residency alterations, (though primarily when the trust is non-resident), and it should be further pointed out that Sec. 106(3) offers a provision that allows the beneficiary with an income interest to receive property (capital) in satisfaction of his interest and recognize a tax free disposition thereof, hence in limited instances where long term residency in Canada is questionable it may prove beneficial to grant a discretionary income interest to a beneficiary who may leave Canada, regardless of the residency of the trust.

This would allow him to receive capital in satisfaction of his interest after he becomes non-resident without recognizing any tax consequences. A power of appointment could grant the beneficiary another interest subsequently.³³⁴ Presently under Sec. 128.1(1), it isn't so much the residency of the trust that will affect application of the provision to an income right under a trust, but also the nature of the trust itself, (vis-a-vis personal or non-personal). If the trust is non-resident and the Canadian resident beneficiary will otherwise recognize a substantial gain on ceasing to be resident the non-resident trust could be varied to accept significant amounts of property subject to a power of appointment held by a non-resident; the tax cost of the resident's interest will be inflated by the underlying tax cost of the property but its fair market value will not be increased by the power.³³⁵

Avoiding the Ownership Target.

The section 128.1 disposition provisions apply only to property which was owned by the taxpayer, (and in this sense one can infer that legal ownership is the basis), and not property which has been loaned to the trust. A trust may be initially created solely with loaned property instead of a transfer of property (legal title) to the trust, and thus by lending property to the trust for a long term the provision will not apply to it if and when the trust becomes non-resident. If the trust was not originally created with loaned property, but instead holds legal title to it, (and if the trust is personal), it could prove advantageous to distribute the property, which would be affected by Sec. 128.1(1), to the resident beneficiaries and have them lend it back to the trust so as to allow the income therefrom to continue to be realized for the benefit of the income beneficiaries. The trust deed may have to be slightly varied to achieve this (which could affect the trust interests involved) while it may be necessary to pay the lending beneficiary interest on the loan at a prescribed rate so as to avoid the implementation of the attribution rules in Sec. 56(4.1) etc.. This could be of benefit when the property isn't taxable Canadian property and the recipient beneficiaries are Canadian residents. In the case of non-resident beneficiaries Sec. 107(5) would apply to cause identical tax consequences if the property distributed isn't taxable Canadian property however if the non-resident transfers his interest to a Canadian resident bare trust Sec. 54(c)(v) will apply to preclude the recognition of a taxable disposition and the Sec. 107(2) tax free distribution can occur. If the non-resident testamentary trust is newly formed and the Canadian resident beneficiary hasn't realized benefits from it the interest may be disclaimed prior to becoming non-resident. The disclaimer will not cause tax consequences to the beneficiary, (in the form of a disposition), and once non-resident he can retract the disclaimer if no other beneficiary has altered his position on the faith of its legitimacy. The foreign jurisdiction's trust law would have to be examined to ensure that a retraction could take place and inter beneficiary agreements may be executed to facilitate this.

Becoming Resident: Deemed FMV Acquisition.

Under subsection 128.1(1) a taxpayer will be deemed to have acquired, for purposes of subdivision C, each property owned by him at a time when he became resident in Canada other than property which is taxable Canadian property or property upon which he previously elected under Sec. 128.1(1)(c) to post security when previously changing residence, whereby that property will then have an initial cost equal to its fair market value at that time. As will be seen in later chapters a capital interest in a trust with a significant existing legitimate ACB, regardless of the possibility of the trust losing its personal status, is always better than one with none at all and with this in mind Sec. 128.1(1) may prove an effective way to inflate the ACB of a capital interest by altering residencies of the trust and capital beneficiary. Subsection 128.1(1) does not deem the taxpayer to have paid consideration for the interest thus the Sec. 53(2)(h) capital interest ACB adjustments cannot be activated on a change in residence although there will be a cost bump.

Subsection 128.1(1) doesn't apply to taxable Canadian property such as a capital interest in a trust

334. It should be pointed out that a discretionary interest isn't technically an "income interest" with respect to the technical definition thereof in Sec. 108(1)(e) however how successful would an argument be contending that a potential right solely enforceable (normally) in respect of income under a personal trust, is a capital property?

335 To be noted in this respect, however, is that subparagraph 108(1)(d) does not apply to interests in trusts that constitute subpara. 94(1)(d) foreign affiliates of the beneficiary: if it doesn't the Sec. 107(1)(a) cost amount of the interest deemed disposed of will be the a.c.b. of the interest which does not assimilate the tax cost of the trust's property to that of the capital interests.

resident in Canada hence in order to obtain the treatment of the provision the taxable Canadian property status must be removed via the ceasing of residence by the trust.³³⁶ This may be executed without severe tax consequences when the trust property otherwise consists of taxable Canadian property that is not subject to Sec. 128.1(1). Once the trust is non-resident the capital beneficiary may then become resident in Canada whereby his capital interest in the non-resident trust, will obtain the treatment afforded by Sec. 128.1(1) thus giving the interest a cost equal to its fair market value at that time,...tax-free.³³⁷ Once the beneficiary is resident the trust may itself become resident whereby Sec. 128.1(1) will not apply, however one must recognize that the trust and the beneficiary may themselves realize tax liabilities in the other tax jurisdiction when ceasing to be resident there, that will negate the advantage of any such arrangement. In general this arrangement works well in inflating the ACB of a capital interest in a trust which has substantial amounts of taxable Canadian property whereby after the trust becomes resident, and distributes the property to the Canadian resident beneficiary, the fair market value of the interest will bump the cost of the property to the beneficiary as per Sec. 107(2)(b). Not to be overlooked as well, when the trustees of a non-resident trust are not mobile, is the effect Sec. 94(1)(c) has on a trust whereunder any discretionary power could alter the entitlements of the capital or income beneficiaries. In such a case the trust would be deemed to be resident attracting the cost bumps which is the opinion of the Department as expressed in several private interpretations. See "ACB Bumping with Deemed Residency" in the "Non-Resident Trusts" chapter.

A Question of Beneficial Ownership.

The Interpretation Bulletins provide that the Act is to apply, generally, on the beneficial ownership rather than legal ownership basis however does this also apply when a trust holding legal title ceases to be resident and beneficial ownership resides with a Canadian resident thus precluding the section 128.1 rules from applying to the property? The author thinks that the opinion isn't always applicable when express language has been used in the provision or one related to it. If a Canadian resident trust could transfer its property that would otherwise be affected by Sec. 128.1(1) upon ceasing to be resident to a non-resident trust or beneficiary the deemed disposition thereof could be avoided. Under Sec. 54(c)(iii) and (v) a transfer of property to a trust or by a trust to a beneficiary is regarded as a disposition while under para. (v) any transfer in which there is a change in legal ownership but not a change in beneficial ownership, other than a transfer by a Canadian resident trust to a trust not resident in Canada, will not be regarded as a disposition. This results in the trust being unable, under para. (v), to transfer property to a foreign resident trust without realizing tax consequences consequential to the recognition of a disposition. Paragraph 54(c)(v) was altered in 1980 to cause a disposition to be recognizable when a Canadian resident trust "transfers" property to a non-resident trust when there hasn't been a change in beneficial ownership. A Canadian resident trust is thus precluded from transferring legal ownership of a property to a non-resident trust so as to avoid a deemed disposition if it becomes non-resident, regardless of where the beneficiary is resident.³³⁸ The provision was especially altered to preclude avoidance of section 128.1 effects via a transfer of legal title without a transfer of beneficial ownership and if this is the case how can the Department contend that beneficial ownership is relevant in respect of section 128.1 dispositions by trusts? By amending Sec. 54(c)(v) they've removed beneficial ownership and changes therein as a basis of disposition and replaced it with legal ownership but only in respect of non-resident trust recipients. Presently, regardless of where the beneficial ownership resides a shift in legal ownership out of the country in the particular manner will result in a disposition. (Subsection 107(5) attends to distributions to beneficiaries.) How can beneficial ownership be the target in the section 128.1 provisions in respect of alterations in the trust's residence? ...It can't be.

³³⁶ This can be done by appointment to non-resident trustees, or by having the resident trustees resign or become non-resident themselves. Understandably there would be consequences on-the-way-out for the trust unless it is already non-resident. Layering of trusts would be beneficial here so that the intermediate would be resident while the owning trust could be resident.

³³⁷ The applicability of Sec. 128.1(1) to the exclusion of Sec. 107(1.1) on a trust capital interest was precisely recognized by the Financial Industries Division on Oct. 2/Nov. 2 1990.

³³⁸ And this applies to taxable Canadian property, even though such could be rolled out tax free under Sec. 107(5) from a resident trust.

Some Distributions and Cost Bumps.

Under subsection 107(5), distributions to non-resident capital beneficiaries made by a personal trust will result in the trust recognizing a deemed disposition of the property for proceeds equal to the fair market value thereof, while the beneficiary will not recognize any tax consequences since he will be deemed to have disposed of the part of the interest satisfied for its adjusted cost base. This will not occur when the property distributed is taxable Canadian property or Canadian resource property, thus if the trust can "cleanse" its properties' "non-taxable Canadian property" nature through incorporation in Canada etc, the share then distributed would not be affected under Sec. 107(5) although upon holding such property the trust would itself not be exposed to resulting tax liabilities through the avoidance of the application of Sec. 128.1(1).

A distribution by a non-resident personal trust will cause the property to be subject to Sec. 107(2) and not Sec. 128.1(1) when the beneficiary is Canadian resident thus there will be a flow through of the tax cost of the property but the ACB thereof will not be bumped up to its FMV. If the Canadian resident beneficiary transfers legal ownership of his interest to a non-resident trust Sec. 54(c)(v) will preclude the recognition of a disposition thereof, (unless the beneficiary is a trust), if he continues to hold beneficial ownership of the interest. Subsection 75(2) will apply to the property and CRA has expressed that such a trust will be recognizable as a liability base. If the distribution is then made to the non-resident trust who brings legal ownership of the property back to Canada there will be a Sec. 128.1(1) cost bump and upon distribution to the resident beneficial owner a Sec. 107(2) flow through of that FMV will result.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Deemed Disposition and Acquisition on Ceasing to be or Becoming Resident in Canada
IT-451R

DATE: March 25, 1987

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Deemed Disposition and Acquisition on Ceasing to be or Becoming Resident in Canada

REFERENCE: Sections 48, 88.1 and 219.1 (also sections 90 to 95, 110.6 and 250, subsections 115(1), 126(2.2) and 159(4), paragraphs 212(1)(h) and 212(1)(j) to (q) of the Act and section 1300 and subsection 5907(13) of the Regulations)

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-451 dated June 13, 1980 and IT-451 ADDENDUM dated September 8, 1982. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

Introduction

1. This bulletin deals with the deemed disposition rules in subsection 128.1(1) and section 88.1, the deemed acquisition rules in subsection 128.1(1), and the rules in subsection 128.1(5) which include prescribed amounts in the foreign accrual property income of certain foreign affiliates.

2. The purpose of subsection 128.1(1) is to include in the computation of income of a taxpayer, for a taxation year in which the taxpayer ceases to be resident in Canada, certain capital gains or losses accrued prior to departure from Canada. On the other hand, subsection 128.1(1) is intended to exclude from the computation of income of a taxpayer who has become a resident of Canada that portion of any capital gain or loss that had accrued prior to becoming resident. Although subsections 48(1) and 48(3) refer to "any property" and "each property", they relate only to capital property since these subsections apply for purposes of subdivision c of Division B of Part I only. Furthermore, section 128.1 does not apply to deem either an acquisition or disposition for capital cost allowance purposes. Where a foreign affiliate of a taxpayer resident in Canada becomes resident in Canada after November 12, 1981, subsection 128.1(5) provides rules for the calculation of the affiliate's foreign accrual property income as discussed in 22 and 23 below. In addition, as discussed in 18 to 20 below, section 88.1 provides rules, applicable to certain corporations emigrating after August 28, 1980, which override section 128.1.

Becoming or Ceasing to be Resident in Canada

3. Whether or not a taxpayer has become or ceased to be resident in Canada is generally a question of fact. Where a person sojourns, (see IT-221R2, paragraph 15) in Canada for 183 days or more in a taxation year, paragraph 250(1)(a) deems that person to have been resident in Canada throughout the year. Where this is the case, the person is considered to have become so resident at the commencement of that year and to have ceased to be so resident at the end of the year so that the provisions of section 128.1 apply. However, where that person is an individual, the relieving provision of subsection 128.1(4) (see 11 below) may apply to exempt the individual from the deemed disposition rules of subsection 128.1(1) (also see IT-221R2 for additional comments on an individual's residence status).

4. Where the taxpayer is a trust, the trust is generally considered to become resident or cease to be resident in Canada when the trustee who has ownership or control over the assets of the trust becomes or ceases to be resident. It is possible that a trust may be subject to the provisions of section 128.1 by virtue of the trustee becoming or ceasing to be a resident of Canada even though the trust property and/or the beneficiary were already located in or outside Canada.

5. Subject to the provisions of subsection 250(4) which deems residency in Canada throughout a particular taxation year, a corporation is normally resident in the country where its central management and control are located. Therefore the provisions of sections 48 or 88.1 may be applicable where such management and control moves out of or into Canada.

Deemed Disposition on Ceasing to be Resident

6. Where a taxpayer ceases to be resident in Canada at any particular time after 1971 in a taxation year, subject to the comments in 10 and 11 below, subsection 128.1(1) provides that the taxpayer is deemed to have disposed of certain capital properties owned immediately before that time (i.e., while still resident in Canada) for proceeds equal to fair market value. The taxpayer is also deemed to have reacquired the property immediately after ceasing to be resident in Canada at a cost of the same amount. Ownership is to be interpreted in the broadest sense, in accordance with Canadian judicial interpretation, no matter where the property is located. However, for valuation purposes the fair market value in the country or area of location of the property will usually govern.

7. The taxpayer is required to use the rules of subdivision c of Division B of Part I to calculate taxable capital gains, allowable capital losses and taxable net gains (listed personal property) on property deemed to be disposed of in computing income for Part I tax purposes for the taxation year in which the taxpayer ceased to be resident (see IT-193 Special Release). A capital gain from a deemed disposition under subsection 128.1(1) cannot be reduced by a reserve under paragraph 40(1)(a).

Capital Gains Deduction

8. In taxation years before 1985 (former) paragraph 48(1)(d) had the effect of exempting an individual, other than a trust, on the first $5,000 of total capital gains from deemed dispositions of property other than listed personal property. To the extent that such capital gains were less than $5,000, the balance of the exemption was applied under (former) paragraph 48(1)(e) to reduce the individual's gains from deemed dispositions of listed personal property. The taxpayer's "gains" from deemed dispositions of listed personal property were the amounts thereof determined under subparagraph 40(1)(a)(i) and not the "net gain" referred to in subsection 41(2). No part of the exemption could be applied against gains arising from actual dispositions of capital property.

9. In computing taxable income after 1984, section 110.6 permits an individual (other than a trust) who was resident in Canada throughout a taxation year to deduct an amount in respect of capital gains of that taxation year. For this purpose, subsection 110.6(5) provides that an individual who was resident in Canada at some time during a particular taxation year and throughout either the immediately preceding or following taxation year is deemed to have been resident in Canada throughout the particular taxation year. As a consequence such an individual who, for purposes other than subsection 110.6, has ceased to be resident in Canada at some time during a taxation year is eligible for the capital gains deduction to the extent provided by section 110.6. (see 12 below).

Exceptions

10. Subsection 128.1(1) does not apply to

(a) property that would be taxable Canadian property as described in paragraph 115(1)(b) if the taxpayer had not been resident in Canada at any time in the year, unless the taxpayer is an individual (other than a trust) who has elected under paragraph 48(1)(a) to be deemed to have disposed of that property immediately before ceasing to be a resident of Canada (see 12 and 14 below),

(b) property that is deemed to be taxable Canadian property because of an election under paragraph 48(1)(c), (see 13 and 14 below),
(c) a right to receive payments described in paragraph 212(1)(h) and paragraphs 212(1)(j) to (q) (e.g., pension benefits, retiring allowances, payments from registered retirement savings plans, etc.), or
(d) a right to receive a payment of any benefit under the Canada Pension Plan or a provincial pension plan described in section 3 of that Plan.

In addition, as discussed in 18 to 20 below, subsection 128.1(1) is not applicable to a corporation that was incorporated in Canada where section 88.1 is applicable nor, as discussed in 11 below, to certain properties owned by an individual other than a trust.

Resident in Canada for Short Term Only

11. Subsection 128.1(4) excludes from the deemed disposition rule of subsection 128.1(1) any property owned by an individual (other than a trust) if the taxpayer either owned the property immediately before becoming resident or acquired it by inheritance or bequest after becoming resident, provided that during the 10-year period immediately before ceasing to be a resident the taxpayer was not resident in Canada for periods totalling more than 60 months. Property acquired in exchange for property owned when the individual last became resident, as may be the case as a result of a share exchange under section 85.1 or under the rollover provisions of section 85, is not excluded by subsection 128.1(4) and is deemed to be disposed of when the individual subsequently ceases to be resident. Where an individual who sojourned in Canada is deemed to be resident in Canada under paragraph 250(1)(a) throughout a calendar year, the full calendar year, as opposed to the actual period of sojourning, is required to be included in determining the 60-month period referred to in subsection 128.1(4).

Election to Include Property

12. For 1985 and subsequent taxation years an individual (other than a trust) who elects under paragraph 48(1)(a) in prescribed manner and within a prescribed time is deemed to have disposed of property described in 10(a) above immediately prior to departure from Canada for proceeds of disposition equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before the departure. By making such an election an individual may claim a capital gains deduction in respect of capital gains accrued at the time of departure. The capital gains deduction is not available to a non-resident except to the extent described in 9 above. Procedures for making an election under paragraph 48(1)(a) have not yet been prescribed.

Election to Exclude Property

13. A Canadian corporation or an individual other than a trust may elect under paragraph 48(1)(c) to exclude from the deemed disposition rule of subsection 128.1(1) any property to which that rule would otherwise apply. The election is made on form T2061 which must be filed not later than the time when the taxpayer is required under section 150 to file an income tax return for the year of ceasing to be resident. Regulation 1300 sets out the applicable requirements. Security acceptable to the Minister is required to be furnished (see 15 below). Subsection 128.1(2) deems any property in respect of which such an election is made to be taxable Canadian property from the time immediately after the taxpayer ceased to be resident until the earlier of the date that the property is sold and the date on which the taxpayer next becomes resident in Canada.

14. Where a taxpayer has elected under paragraph 48(1)(a) or (c) on one or more properties, subsection 128.1(1) limits the allowable capital losses from deemed dispositions of property other than listed personal property to the lesser of

- (a) the aggregate of such allowable capital losses, and
- (b) the amount deemed by subsection 128.1(1) to be the aggregate of the taxable capital gains from deemed dispositions of property other than listed personal property.

This limitation prevents a taxpayer from electing in respect of property (other than listed personal property) under paragraph 48(1)(a) or

(c) in such a manner as to defer deemed capital gains while claiming deemed capital losses. There is no similar provision in respect of listed personal property because losses from that source are not deductible except against gains from listed personal property.

Acceptable Security

15. An election under paragraph 48(1)(c) or subsection 159(4) (see 16 below) requires that the taxpayer furnish to the Minister security acceptable to the Minister for payment of any tax the payment of which is deferred by the election. Where such an election is to be made, the taxpayer should contact the local District Taxation Office to determine the security necessary in respect of the deferral.

Election to Pay Tax by Instalments

16. A taxpayer may elect under subsection 159(4) to pay the Part I tax arising from deemed dispositions under subsection 128.1(1) in up to six annual instalments, with interest, provided the Minister is furnished with acceptable security (see 15 above). The election must be made on form T2074 and be filed on or before the day when the taxpayer's last income tax return as a resident of Canada is required to be filed. Regulation 1301 sets out the requirements applicable to such elections.

Foreign Tax Deduction

17. Where a taxpayer who is not resident in Canada disposes of property that was deemed by subsection 128.1(2) to be taxable Canadian property of the taxpayer and the gain is taxed in a foreign country as well as in Canada, the Part I tax otherwise payable may, within the limitations of subsection 126(2.2), be reduced on account of foreign taxes paid.

Corporate Emigration

18. Section 128.1 does not have application in respect of a taxation year to which section 88.1 applies. Section 88.1 is somewhat similar to section 128.1 except that it deems a disposition of each property rather than certain capital properties and applies only to a corporation that was incorporated in Canada and was resident in Canada at some time and that has, after August 28, 1980, either

(a) been granted articles of continuance (or similar corporate constitutional documents) in a jurisdiction outside Canada, or

(b) become resident in a jurisdiction outside Canada and as a consequence becomes exempt from Part I tax on its subsequent income from non-Canadian sources by virtue of any Act of Parliament or anything approved, made or declared to have the force of law thereunder (generally a tax convention).

19. The corporation's taxation year is deemed to have ended immediately before the particular time that either of the two events described in 18 above occurs and a new taxation year is deemed to have commenced at the particular time. The corporation is deemed to have disposed of all the property that it owned immediately before the particular time for proceeds equal to fair market value at the time of such disposition. Unlike section 128.1, this rule applies for all purposes of the Act, including recapture of capital cost allowances. Such property is deemed to have been reacquired by the corporation immediately after the particular time at a cost equal to those deemed proceeds of disposition. The corporation is also deemed not to be a Canadian corporation at the particular time and all subsequent times. However, the corporation will continue to be a resident of Canada if the conditions described in subsection 250(4) are met, and will be subject to the tax consequences that ensue as a result of such residency.

20. Where a taxation year of a corporation is deemed by section 88.1 to have ended, section 219.1 provides that a tax of 25% shall be paid on the amount by which the deemed proceeds of disposition pursuant to the provisions of section 88.1 exceed the aggregate of

(a) the paid-up capital of all the issued and outstanding shares of the corporation immediately before the deemed end of its taxation year, and

(b) all amounts outstanding at the deemed year end, excluding dividends, of debts owing by the corporation, and other obligations of the corporation to pay an amount.

Demand Payment of Taxes

21. Where the Minister suspects that a taxpayer is about to leave Canada, he has the power under section 226 to demand payment of all taxes, interest and penalties before the day otherwise fixed for payment. If the taxpayer fails to comply with the demand, the Minister may direct that the taxpayer's goods and chattels be seized.

Corporate Immigration

22. Where, at any time after November 12, 1981, a corporation becomes resident in Canada and immediately before that time it was a foreign affiliate (as defined in paragraph 95(1)(d)) of a taxpayer resident in Canada, subsection 128.1(5) provides that for the purposes of sections 90 to 95

- (a) the corporation's taxation year is deemed to end immediately before that time,
- (b) the corporation is deemed to have commenced a new taxation year at that time,
- (c) the corporation is deemed to have been a controlled foreign affiliate, as defined in paragraph 95(1)(a), of the taxpayer at the end of the taxation year described in (a) above, and
- (d) the amounts determined under subsection 5907(13) of the Regulations are to be included in the corporation's foreign accrual property income for that year.

23. In essence, subsection 128.1(5) and Regulation 5907(13) provide that certain amounts that accrued to the foreign affiliate prior to becoming resident in Canada are deemed to be foreign accrual property income of a controlled foreign affiliate. Pursuant to the provisions of section 91 such amounts are therefore taxable in the hands of a shareholder resident in Canada in the shareholder's taxation year in which the foreign affiliate's taxation year is deemed to end.

Deemed Acquisition on Becoming Resident

24. Subject to 25 below, a taxpayer who becomes a resident of Canada at any particular time in a taxation year is deemed under subsection 128.1(1) to have acquired at that time each property owned at a cost equal to fair market value at that time. Property that is "taxable Canadian property" as described in paragraph 115(1)(b), or deemed to be taxable Canadian property because of an election under paragraph 48(1)(c), is excepted from subsection 128.1(1).

25. A taxpayer who became resident before 1972 and disposes of property after 1971 will compute capital gains or losses from original cost or V-day value, as the case may be. The same rule applies to a taxpayer who becomes a resident of Canada after 1971 and who later disposes of property that was excepted from the deemed acquisition rule (e.g., "taxable Canadian property").

26. Subsection 128.1(1) may apply to property that is cash located in a country where foreign exchange restrictions are in effect. Where this is so, it is the Department's view that in determining the fair market value of such blocked currency, the currency should be valued at its Canadian dollar equivalent at the normal exchange rate prevailing at the time the taxpayer becomes resident in Canada, discounted by a factor for premiums or other amounts which would be payable on conversion at that time even though the currency is, in fact, not converted.

The Treaties - Conventions and Residence.

Two of the treaties that Canada has with other countries concerning the taxation of income contain statutory exemptions that provide for either favorable or negligible taxation of the income of trusts or estates. Article XX of the Canada-U.K. Tax Convention (1978) provides that income received by a U.K. resident beneficiary from a Canadian resident trust or estate may be taxed in Canada by its law (as provided in Part XIII), but tax charged shall not exceed 15% of the gross amount. This will not apply if the beneficial recipient of the income resident in the U.K. carries on a business in Canada through a permanent establishment therein or performs professional services in Canada from a fixed base situated therein, and where the right or interest in the estate or trust in respect of which the income is paid is "effectively connected" with such permanent establishment or fixed base. If these conditions exist then Article VII and XIV concerning businesses carried on in, or professional services performed in, Canada will apply and these two articles generally provide that income "attributable" to the permanent establishment or fixed base will bear the tax of the Contracting State (Canada) and in this sense in being "effectively connected" to the establishment or base, the trust/estate income will be exempt from the 15% withholding but subject to the Sec. 115(1)(a) taxation, even though the taxpayer resident in the U.K. maybe receiving it directly.

Unlike the Canadian-U.K. Convention the Canada-U.S. Income Tax Convention (1980), under Article IV (1), provides that a trust or an estate is resident only to the extent that income derived by the estate or trust is liable in the State, either in its hands or in the hands of the beneficiaries while under para. (4) where due to the above an estate or trust is a resident of both States the competent authorities shall by mutual agreement settle the question as to the mode of application of the Convention. Where a trust has a singular trustee who resides in Canada, regardless of where its beneficiaries are resident, it will for Canadian income tax purposes be considered resident in Canada by virtue of Sec. 104(1) however if the income beneficiaries reside in the U.S. the trust will take on a dual residency but only to the extent of the income that is taxable in the hands of the U.S. resident income beneficiaries. If the beneficiaries residing in the U.S. are only capital beneficiaries then the income normally will not be taxable in their hands hence the only jurisdiction in which the trust will be exposed to taxation is Canada. If the beneficiaries which are resident in the U.S. have discretionary income and capital interests then the year to year residence of the otherwise Canadian resident trust will result from the exercise of the discretion to pay either the income or capital out to the beneficiaries since the residency is determined on the basis of income liable for tax, not potential income rights. It should be recognized that the provision operates upon the necessity that the income be liable to tax in the Contracting State, be it in the hands of the trust or its beneficiaries thus a trust set up in Canada to receive capital dividends or certain Canadian exempt income, (such as that described in section 81), that would otherwise not be taxable in its hands or its Canadian beneficiaries, will cause the trust to incur the U.S. residence when such income is paid to the U.S. income beneficiaries, (to be taxed in their hands). Certain types of income receive special tax rates as is the case with dividends paid to non-residents beneficial owners being exposed to a maximum tax rate of 15% while if the beneficial owner is a company which owns 10% or more of the voting stock directly of the paying company a 10% rate will be applied, (while this rate will not apply if the beneficial owner carried on a business in the other state through a permanent establishment/fixed base, and the holding, (stock) was "effectively connected" with such an establishment/base whereby the Article VII or XIV Business profits or Independent Personal Services provisions would apply to allow higher rates of tax to be applied by the other state). Interest will be taxed in the state in which it arises but where the beneficial owner is a non-resident taxation will not exceed 15%.³³⁹ Interest will be exempt from taxation if it is owned beneficially by a non-resident and amongst others, the debt was issued at arm's length and was guaranteed or insured by the foreign State or any political subdivision. "Beneficial owner" in the context in which the treaty uses it should indicate those parties who have proprietary rights to the income from specific trust property and not those merely having rights to the income from the trust no matter how derived. The law of each relevant state is to be adhered to for the purposes of the treaties unfortunately and failing the existence of a universally applicable definition the local law of the jurisdictions may vary so as to disallow a recipient from being recognized as a beneficial owner even though under the recipient's local law he is.

339. Where a U.S. resident trust invests in the bonds of a Canadian corporation the Canadian corporation will withhold the 15% on the interest paid but once the trust distributes it to a Canadian resident beneficiary the beneficiary will not obtain any relief for that withholding: Memorandum for file A-7707 Feb. 1983.

Testamentary Transfers and Death.

Capital Property.

The importance of creating a trust that has the spousal characteristics described in Sec. 70(6) through a will or special power given to the executor to create such is obvious when compared to what will occur on death as otherwise required under Sec. 70(5), (5.1), or (5.2). As a last resort a Sec. 70(6) spousal trust can be created that will allow property to be deemed disposed of at its effective cost rather than its fair market value as is the norm.

Subsection 70(6), (and certain parts of (5.1) and (5.2)), provide favourable testamentary transfer treatment only when property of the estate of the deceased is transferred and indefeasibly vested in the spouse or a trust created by the taxpayer's will that was resident in Canada immediately after the property became indefeasibly vested in it, under which the spouse is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust arising before her death and under which no other person other than the spouse may receive or obtain the use of any capital or income of the trust before her death. The spousal trust need not be or remain testamentary in the technical sense of the term thus allowing it to have some flexibility to tuck further property into it. The Sec. 70(6) transfer provision applies only to capital property be it depreciable or not, that is not land inventory or resource property though subparagraphs 70(5.2)(d) & (f) provide tax-free roll-over provisions in respect of the latter two types of property. The transfer or distribution must occur upon and in consequence of the death of the taxpayer and while the will may grant the legal representative wide or extremely conditional power to choose property which will be transferred, those that are not will be treated under Sec. 70(5), (5.1), or (5.2) depending on the character of the property. When capital property is not transferred to a Sec. 70(6) spousal trust it instead suffers a fair market value deemed disposition with resulting recognition of accrued gains and consequential large income tax payment.

The applicability of Sec. 70(6) or (5), (5.1), (5.2) to testamentary transfers/distributions does not depend exclusively on whether the terms of the will or the executor acting on powers given to him, transfers or severs the property from the general estate in such a manner as to have it qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment, in that if the spousal trust is "tainted" with non-spousal entitlements/claims, as a result of the "untainting" process in Sec. 70(7)-(8), the applicability of Sec. 70(6), and only Sec. 70(6), will be negated in respect of properties "listed".³⁴⁰ As well, Sec. 70(5) only may apply to property otherwise qualified to be treated under Sec. 70(6), if the executor elects under Sec. 70(6.2).³⁴¹ The Sec. 70(6.2) election negates the application of Sec. 70(6) only hence an election cannot be made in respect of land inventory or resource property that are the concern of Sec. 70(5.2)(d) and (f).

"Property", as described in Jones v. Skinner (1836)³⁴², consists of "the most comprehensive of all the terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have."

Subsection 70(5) applies to a taxpayer regardless of his residence wherein a tax year he has died and it provides that the taxpayer will be deemed to have disposed of each non-depreciable capital property immediately before his death for proceeds equal to its fair market value at that time while he will also be deemed to have disposed of immediately before his death³⁴³ all of his depreciable capital property of a prescribed class for proceeds equal to effectively half of the aggregate of the properties' fair market values and the class U.C.C. immediately before his death. Pursuant to Question 54 of the 1990 Roundtable discussions for the purposes of computing any capital gains on the disposition of depreciable capital property the deemed proceed of the class will be apportioned to the particular properties of the class on their relative fair market values so as to ascertain the proceeds of each individually.

Since it applies to any taxpayer the death of a non-resident taxpayer may cause him to recognize tax ³⁴⁰ See the following chapters.

³⁴¹ Since Sec. 70(5) causes deemed dispositions of property for proceeds equal to its fair market value, while Sec. 70(6) allows a tax-free cost roll-over, electing for the former will allow the early or needed recognition of capital gains or losses, recapture or terminal loss, and resulting cost adjustment to the recipient, which could prove favourable to both parties.

³⁴² 5 L.J. (N.S.) c. 87

³⁴³ See Re: Silk, 1976 V.R. 60, for an examination of the phrase "immediately before death" in a taxing statute though for different purposes.

consequences under Sec. 115(1)(b) on the deemed dispositions but only where the property is "taxable Canadian property" as listed in that subparagraph.³⁴⁴ Where any person, as a consequence of the taxpayer's death, has acquired non-depreciable capital property formerly of the taxpayer he will be deemed to have acquired it at a cost equal to its fair market value immediately before the taxpayer's death while if the capital property acquired is depreciable and of a prescribed class it will be deemed to have been acquired at a cost equal to the U.C.C. of the class of the deceased from which it came apportioned on the basis of its fair market value before the death that is of the aggregate fair market values of all of the property of the class immediately before the death. Where the depreciable property's deemed capital cost to the acquiror is less than the capital cost of the property to the taxpayer than the acquiror, for purposes of section 13 and 20 and accompanying C.C.A. regulations the acquiror will be deemed to have acquired the property at a capital cost equal to that recognized by the deceased taxpayer and the excess of the deceased taxpayer's actual capital cost over the acquiror's otherwise deemed capital cost will be deemed effectively to have been deducted by him as C.C.A. in previous years, thus exposing him to C.C.A. recapture when he disposes of the property.

Subsection 70(5) effectively just causes the taxation on death of all capital value appreciation or depreciation accrued to the taxpayer and it applies to both non-resident and resident taxpayers serving as a basis upon which Division B or Division D then follow to determine what amounts of taxable income to recognize.³⁴⁵

"Capital property of a deceased taxpayer – Sec. 70(5)"

(5) Where in a taxation year a taxpayer dies,

(a) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have, immediately before the taxpayer's death, disposed of each capital property of the taxpayer and received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before the death;

(b) any person who as a consequence of the taxpayer's death acquires any property that is deemed by paragraph 70(5)(a) to have been disposed of by the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired it at the time of the death at a cost equal to its fair market value immediately before the death;

(c) where any depreciable property of the taxpayer of a prescribed class that is deemed by paragraph 70(5)(a) to have been disposed of is acquired by any person as a consequence of the taxpayer's death (other than where the taxpayer's proceeds of disposition of the property under paragraph 70(5)(a) are redetermined under subsection 13(21.1)) and the amount that was the capital cost to the taxpayer of the property exceeds the amount determined under paragraph 70(5)(b) to be the cost to the person thereof, for the purposes of sections 13 and 20 and any regulations made for the purpose of paragraph 20(1)(a),

(i) the capital cost to the person of the property shall be deemed to be the amount that was the capital cost to the taxpayer of the property, and

(ii) the excess shall be deemed to have been allowed to the person in respect of the property under regulations made for the purpose of paragraph 20(1)(a) in computing income for taxation years that ended before the person acquired the property; and

(d) where a property of the taxpayer that was deemed by paragraph 70(5)(a) to have been disposed of is acquired by any person as a consequence of the taxpayer's death and the taxpayer's proceeds of disposition of the property under paragraph 70(5)(a) are redetermined under subsection 13(21.1), notwithstanding paragraph 70(5)(b),

(i) where the property was depreciable property of a prescribed class and the amount that was the capital cost to the taxpayer of the property exceeds the amount so redetermined under subsection 13(21.1), for the purposes of sections 13 and 20 and any regulations made for the purpose of paragraph 20(1)(a),

³⁴⁴ See I.T. 420R2

³⁴⁵ As per May Estate v. M.N.R., 88 D.T.C. 1189 (TCC), a testator and his estate are not at arm's length due to the fact that both are directed by the same mind.

- (A) its capital cost to the person shall be deemed to be the amount that was its capital cost to the taxpayer, and
- (B) the excess shall be deemed to have been allowed to the person in respect of the property under regulations made for the purpose of paragraph 20(1)(a) in computing income for taxation years that ended before the person acquired the property, and
- (ii) where the property is land (other than land to which subparagraph 70(5)(d)(i) applies), its cost to the person shall be deemed to be the amount that was the taxpayer's proceeds of disposition of the land as redetermined under subsection 13(21.1).

Should you Send Capital Property Through a Sec. 70(5) Disposition?

There is only one of two possible streams of taxation that capital property will have on death of a Cdn. resident: either tax-free rolled to a spouse or spousal trust, or, as a deemed FMV disposition with capture of all tax consequences.

By rolling it to a spouse/spousal trust there is only a deferral of tax consequences though there is considerable length of time after to arrange for better absorption of those tax consequences inherent in the property. When there is an immediate FMV disposition everything hits at once and there is no room to plan.

This being said, it is not at all unbeneficial to attract a Sec. 70(5) FMV disposition if its effects are properly planned for and balanced against other fiscal events on the death. One would want to make sure however that the Sec. 70(7) spousal trust untainting trust rules are examined when setting up a will since it is important that the ownership of the particular property directly end up in the trust even though as a result of those rules the property suffers a Sec. 70(5) FMV disposition.

In the FLA/Dependant Relief environment there are close to an infinite number of arrangements that can be done so that seemingly disenfranchised descendants do not trigger various applications that can knock an estate plan out of swing. Capital interests in spousal trusts can be given to off-spring that can be basically sold without interfering with the trust while giving the off-spring immediate value, economic value of the ownership in the spousal trust can be hived off and incorporated with recognition of the fair market value of the components and by explaining to a seemingly disenfranchised party that there this plenty of opportunity to structure with a spousal trust when they may not even have the assets if none were used a FLA/Dependants Relief application trigger may be avoided.

As a point one would want to try and trigger enough capital losses to offset capital gains on a death if one can and had to, and, always absorb any life-time capital gains exemptions such as on Small Business Corporation shares and Qualified Farm Property, etc. by "going high" on valuation to set up costs for the descendant.

Valuing Capital Property.

Valuing shares of a company, partnership interests, or other property subject to a testamentary buy-sell agreement for purposes of Sec. 70(5) has been an interesting subject of debate that will most likely continue to be controversial until legislation is enacted to attend to it specifically. Subsection 70(5) causes a disposition to be recognizable immediately before death and although Mastronardi Estate v. The Queen put forward the dicta that the provision was to operate without regard to the imminence of death it did not create any Canadian jurisprudence as to how conditions attached to or inherent in the property making up its nature had effect on its FMV for these purposes. (In Mastronardi Estate the FMV exploded upon death.) A buy-sell agreement obliges the taxpayer or his executor to sell (or buy) the owned shares/interests for a price determined by the agreement though the FMV of the shares not subject to the buy-sell agreement is what is to be valued for purposes of Sec. 70(5). If the purpose of the provision is to target for disposition purposes "the value" of the property to the taxpayer, that which he would expect to realize on its disposition the diction similar to that in Sec. 70(1)-(2) would have been employed.^{346 347}

Beament Estate illustrates how the character of the property itself may be altered to affect its fair market value upon the occurrence of an event. In *Beament Estate v. M.N.R.*³⁴⁸ a taxpayer's offspring subscribed for Class A 5% cumulative preferred shares of a corporation while the taxpayer subscribed for Class B shares which entitled him to dividends payable out of the earnings of the corporation not used to satisfy the preferred shares' entitlements. Each share had equal voting power while the offspring had subscribed only pursuant to a contract between themselves and the taxpayer under which upon his death the corporation was to be wound up while the company's charter provided that upon such the Class A shareholders would be entitled to the surplus assets, and the Class B shareholders could not participate. Upon the death of the Class B shareholder parent the executors valued his shares at $10,700 taking into account the dividends payable upon them and their proposed redemption value but the tax assessors valued them at $110,000, based on the assets of the 346. When capital gains taxation imposed on death was introduced the Estate Tax Act was repealed while under that Act the value at the time of death of the deceased's property was subject to tax, and this was necessary since the purpose of that Act was to tax property passing into the estate of the taxpayer. The capital gains tax however is intended to tax gains accrued prior to death however to do such it must cause a disposition to be recognizable without the effect of the death.

347 See also the recent UK case of Watkins & Anor v Revenue & Customs [2011] UKFTT 745 (TC) (17 November 2011) concerning testamentary valuation issues where cited jurisprudence provided:

12 The locus classicus in regard to the valuation criteria and their application to cases such as this is indeed the judgment of Hoffman LJ in IRC v Gray, which it is worth quoting at length since it sets the parameters for the task which we must undertake. At [1994] STC 371-372 he says this:

The hypothetical vendor is an anonymous but reasonable vendor, who goes about the sale as a prudent man of business, negotiating seriously without giving the impression of being either over-anxious or unduly reluctant. The hypothetical buyer is slightly less anonymous. He too is assumed to have behaved reasonably, making proper inquiries about the property and not appearing too eager to buy. But he also reflects reality in that he embodies whatever was actually the demand for that property at the relevant time.

It cannot be too strongly emphasised that although the sale is hypothetical, there is nothing hypothetical about the open market in which it is supposed to have taken place. The concept of the open market involves assuming that the whole world was free to bid, and then forming a view about what in those circumstances would in real life have been the best price reasonably obtainable. The practical nature of this exercise will usually mean that although in principle no one is excluded from consideration, most of the world will usually play no part in the calculation.

The inquiry will often focus on what a relatively small number of people would be likely to have paid. It may have to arrive at a figure within a range of prices which the evidence shows that various people would have been likely to pay, reflecting, for example, the fact that one person had a particular reason for paying a higher price than others, but taking into account, if appropriate, the possibility that through accident or whim he might not actually have bought. The valuation is thus a retrospective exercise in probabilities, wholly derived from the real world but rarely committed to the proposition that a sale to a particular purchaser would definitely have happened.

13 One aspect of these general principles appears in a further decision of the Court of Appeal in Walton v IRC [1966] STC 68. That case involved a decision of the Lands Tribunal on the valuation for capital transfer tax purposes of the share of a partner in a farming partnership, one of whose assets was an agricultural tenancy. The case seems to us authority for the proposition that the intentions of a known potential purchaser of the interest to be valued should be taken into account, and is a matter of fact to be established by the evidence. Giving the judgment of the court, Peter Gibson LJ held, at 86:

The open market hypothesis does not require as a necessary incident of it that the landlord [a potential purchaser] should be hypothetical. In my judgment the statute requires one to assume a sale but it should be assumed to take place in the real world.

14 In Crossman v CIR [1936] 1 All ER 762, the issue concerned the value to be put on shares for estate duty purposes where they were saleable in the open market, but only after pre-emption rights in favour of the existing shareholders at a reduced price had not been taken up. Following the Irish Court of Appeal in Attorney-General v Jameson [1905] 2 IR 218 and the Scottish Court of Session in Salvesen's Trustees v. IRC [1930] SLT 387, the House of Lords held, by a majority, that the value of the shares was the price they would fetch in the open market on the basis that the purchaser was entitled to be registered as the holder of them, but that he would be subject to the restrictions on sale which the company's articles provided for.

348 70 D.T.C. 6130 (SCC)

corporation that, pursuant to the wind-up directions, were to be distributed to the offspring. The Supreme Court found that no sensible person would pay anything more than the amount expected to be realized on the wind-up: $10,700, and that the contract bound the parties to the wind-up.³⁴⁹ The "value" of the property passing on the death is to be taxed and if the fair market value of the property is reduced by obligations specifically attached to or inherent in it then the net value is the tax base. This is true only if the particular statute does not provide support provisions requiring such obligations-rights-agreements to be disregarded, (which the ITA does not, and the E.T.A. did not).

J.J. West Estate illustrates arrangements that can be entered into to impose obligations on the particular property as compared to altering its very nature. In *J.J. West Estate v. Min. of Fin. (B.C.)*³⁵⁰ ascertaining the value of shares subject to a testamentary buy-sell agreement was at issue when on the application of the B.C. Succession Duty Act the duty assessors arrived at a substantially greater value than the deceased's executors did. The relevant shareholder agreement entered into required the firm to value the shares on the asset value of the firm discounted for transfer restrictions and that upon death/retirement etc. the shares had to be sold to the employees of the firm for such a value. The "value" was statutorily defined to be FMV. The Finance Minister contended that, following the reasoning in *A.G. v. Jameson*³⁵¹ and *C.I.R. v. Crossman and Mann*³⁵² the value of the shares was to be determined without regard to any conditions imposed upon their alienation and that the provision imported an open market based disposition. Andrews, J., appropriately held that both these cases were based on provisions expressly providing for such³⁵³ but that the B.C. Act did not provide for such, citing *Re: Harvey v. Walsh*³⁵⁴ as fundamentally identical support. Since the shareholders agreement set the maximum price at which the shares could be sold to "outside" parties, and since the agreement could not be disregarded due to the absence of statutory authority, the determined price of the shares was held to be fair market value for the purposes of the Act.³⁵⁵

A buy-sell agreement if properly expressed may not only prevent the shareholder from disposing of the shares unless to other shareholders due to the right of first refusal but may also require any purchaser if an outside party to enter into an identical buy-sell agreement with the initial remaining shareholders if they don't first exercise their rights to acquire. This was the case in *Smith v. The Queen*³⁵⁶ where it was held that the purchaser would take the requirement that a potentially detrimental contractual restriction may disallow him from subsequently disposing of the shares as a consideration in arriving at their fair market value. The nature of the buy-sell agreement compelling the parties to transfer the shares between each other may or may not prevent their sale to outside parties predominately depending on its scope and whether the prospect of exercising rights of first refusal was legitimate. The fact that the shares may contractually be required to be conveyed, pursuant to a buy-sell agreement entered into by the new purchaser, to the other shareholders for nominal amounts may not totally reduce the shares' FMV when the contingent triggering event is remote or the company is very much a going concern. In I.T. 140R2 CRA takes the position that shares sold pursuant to a buy-sell agreement by the estate have a fair market value independent from the buy-sell agreement, for purposes of Sec. 70(5), if the parties were not dealing at arm's length when the agreement was executed. It is also of the opinion that Sec. 69(1)(b) applies to the estate when the shares are sold, (so as to cause the deemed proceeds of disposition), and again the agreement is not to have effect. The fact that the parties may not be at arm's length when the buy-sell agreement is entered into is irrelevant in most instances. If one adopts 349 See Abrahams v. F.C.T., 70 C.L.R. 23, Blackwood's Exors. v. Commr. of Stamps, 17 S.R.(N.S.W.) 447, Onslow v. Commr. of Stamps, 13 S.R.(N.S.W.) 354, Re: Tolley, 1932 S.A.S.R. 10, as well as Robertson v. F.C.T., 86 C.L.R. 463, for an interesting contractual reorganization that affected the value of the shares on death.

350 1976 C.T.C. 313 (BCSC)

351 1905 2 Ir. 218 (KB)

352 1937 A.C. 26 (HL)

353 such as in section 26 of the 1972 Manitobian Succession Duty Act.

354 1953 D.L.R. 257 (Nfld SC)

355 See also Gregory v. Commr., 123 C.L.R. 547, McCathie v. Commr., 69 C.L.R. 1, for post mortem conditions' relevance and Tait v. Commr., 116 C.L.R. 620, for a partnership wind-up and the value of the interest. See also Hatton v Revenue And Customs [2010] UKUT 195 (LC) (23 June 2010) for property valuation issues on UK Inheritance tax instances as well as Price v Revenue & Customs [2010] UKFTT 474 (TC) (07 October 2010) for issues that the value should not be net of disposal costs and that various interests in the property must also be examined.

356 87 D.T.C. 5355 FCTD

the dicta of Judge Andrews in J.J. West Estate the buy-sell agreement does have effect on the value for purposes of Sec. 70(5) at least, since no statutory provision precludes it. If one adopts the premise that the Sec. 70(5) provision does not have to be supported by provisions requiring the elimination of the effect of conditions in which the property is held, which is not the statutory convention in this type of legislation, then the Department's opinion can be supported however the former appears more plausible.³⁵⁷

In *The Queen v. Mastronardi Estate*³⁵⁸ the court concurred with the Trial Court Judge's opinion that Sec. 70(5) "did not import a necessity of valuing capital property taking into account the imminence of death" and that "no premise of imminence of death of the deceased should form part of such valuations".³⁵⁹ In that case the taxpayer died suddenly from a heart attack which was obviously not foreseeable. The corporation in which the taxpayer had shares was the annuitant of a life insurance policy held on his life and it was held that the proceeds could not inflate the FMV of the shares for purposes of Sec. 70(5). The taxpayer had died suddenly; if there had been a protracted deterioration in health such would not be the case since the value of the policy would increase while the shareholder was alive and this condition, inherent in the property itself, would have an effect in determining the value of the shares. Another example of a condition inherent in the property which is not related to a condition which is imposed upon its ownership would definitely be where the corporation is to be wound up on the death.

IC89-3 Policy Statement on Business Equity Valuations

POLICY STATEMENT ON BUSINESS EQUITY VALUATIONS

IC 89-3 August 25, 1989

Purpose

1. This Information Circular outlines the valuation principles, practices and policies that the Department generally considers and follows in the valuation of securities and intangible property of closely-held corporations for income tax purposes.

Law

2. All valuations should be made in accordance with the provisions of the Canadian Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Regulations.

Definitions

3. (a) Fair market value is the highest price, expressed in terms of money or money's worth, obtainable in an open and unrestricted market between knowledgeable, informed and prudent parties acting at arm's length, neither party being under any compulsion to transact.

(b) Value, as found in paragraph 7(1)(a), is generally interpreted by the Department to mean fair market value.

(c) A closely-held corporation is a corporation whose shares are owned by a relatively limited number of shareholders. There is no established market for such shares, in that they are sold infrequently.

Valuation Approaches

4. The Circular discusses, in general, the approaches applicable to closely-held or private corporations, recognizing that the facts and circumstances of each case will be determinative of fair market value. The valuator must use reasonable judgment and objectivity in the selection and analysis of the relevant facts of each valuation.

Factors

³⁵⁷ In the author's opinion until the issue of whether a buy-sell is to be taken into consideration under Sec. 70(5) has been authoritatively concluded it would be preferable to structure the company's charter to allow for the same effect so as to alter the very nature of the property (shares or a partnership interest) rather than argue that the obligation attached to the property by its owners has affected the property's f.m.v.. The flexibility and end result of a buy-sell can just as easily be resolved into the corporate charter subsequent to its incorporation though such could cause f.m.v. dispositions of the shares due to a change in rights inherent therein: it would be preferable to incorporate all of the outstanding shares into a common holding company with the flexible charter with the initial shareholders taking back common shares under a Sec. 85(1) tax free roll-in.

³⁵⁸ 77 D.T.C. 5217 (FCA)

³⁵⁹ This does not contradict the dicta in Beament Estate and J.J. West Estate.

5. When dealing with the valuation of shares of closely-held corporations and of intangible assets, the effect on value of a number of fundamental factors, such as the following, should be considered and analyzed: (a) The nature of the business, and history of the business from its inception. (b) The general outlook, the specific outlook and condition of the particular industry and the company's position in the industry. (c) The balance sheet, the financial condition and the capital structure of the particular company. (d) The company's earnings record and its earnings power. (e) The dividend-paying capacity of the specific company. (f) The existence of goodwill and/or other intangible assets. (g) Sales of the company's stock. (h) The size of the specific shareholding to be valued. (i) The stock market prices of comparable stocks of reasonably similar corporations in the same line of business, where these shares are actively traded in an open, unrestricted and public market. (j) The value of the corporate assets underlying the shares.

6. There are also numerous factors and issues relevant to the valuation of specific shareholdings, apart from the fundamental factors considered in valuing the enterprise as a whole. These include the existence of (a) options, other buy-sell agreements or other contractual rights or obligations; (b) control or minority shareholder interests; (c) the rights and privileges of the various classes of shares under the company's letters patent, bylaws, or memorandum of association; and (d) corporate-owned life insurance.

Weighting of Various Factors

7. Depending on the nature of the corporation's business, certain of the relevant factors may be accorded greater weight. In some businesses, earnings may be the primary determinant of value, while in others it may be asset value. The valuator must consider a different combination of factors in each case in determining fair market value.

Methods

8. The earnings and asset value methods are the two most generally accepted bases for determining value. The earnings method is of primary concern when valuing shares of operating companies that manufacture or market products or services.

9. Asset value methods are useful where: (a) A reasonable and viable alternative to buying an existing business is to start one from scratch, such as small construction subcontractors operating on competitive bids, auto body repair shops, machine shops, some retail outlets. (b) A business sells largely on an asset basis, that is, it derives its income largely from the assets, either tangible or intangible, rather than from the personal efforts of the owners and personnel, e.g., real estate holding companies, equipment leasing or investment companies, franchise or dealership operations.

Approaches

10. Generally speaking, the fair market value of a business is usually the greater of (a) its liquidation value, and (b) its going concern value.

11. The liquidation value approach is generally used where (a) the business is not a viable ongoing operation and is consequently suitable only for liquidation; (b) the business is a going concern, but its value is related to the liquidation value of the company's underlying assets; and (c) it is an aid in the determination of fair market value on a going concern basis, as in determining risk.

12. The going concern value approach is normally used where the business is a continuing enterprise with the potential for earning a reasonable return on investment. Where there is adequate potential earning power in the form of economic future profits or discretionary cash flows, the determination of going concern value depends on the amount and quality of the earnings or cash flows, and the business and financial risk that these earnings or cash flows can be achieved and sustained.

Factors in Capitalization Rate Selection

13. The risk, expressed in a going concern value calculation as the capitalization rate, relates to a number of factors in the business, among which may be: (a) The tangible asset backing. (b) The liquidation value. (c) The nature and history of the business operations. (d) The general economic, money and stock market conditions and outlook. (e) Specific industry and market comparisons. (f) The financial condition of the specific business being valued. (g) The quality of the business operations, including such factors as its management depth, its marketing, research and development capabilities, the composition of its labour force and product mix, and the existence of major contracts. (h) The impact of inflation and foreign exchange fluctuations. (i) The specific risk as related to the stability or irregularity of the maintainable level of earnings or cash flows of the particular business. (j) The general and specific political environment. (k) Opportunities for growth as related to the social environment of the business. (l) The existence and importance of competitors. (m) The cost or ease of entry into the particular industry being reviewed. (n) The choice of and rates of return on alternate investments.

It should be noted that the foregoing list is not exhaustive.

The valuator must exercise judgment in determining the extent to which these and other potential external and internal factors are relevant in the quantification of a capitalization rate.

14. The general approach, appropriate methods and relevant factors are applicable to the determination of fair market value of any type of business interest, incorporated or unincorporated and of intangible assets, for income tax purposes.

Procedures

15. The organization of the departmental business equity valuation function is outlined in the current version of Information Circular 72-25.

16. The Regional Valuation Officer may ask for documents, statements or other information, including the following: (a) Details and the basis of values filed, for Valuation Day or any other dates. (b) A balance sheet with supporting statements, schedules and notes as at the date of valuation. (c) Copies of any appraisals of the fixed assets and/or real estate. (d) Financial statements for the five most recent fiscal periods prior to the valuation date, or since the commencement of operations, whichever represents the shorter period. (e) If the business has been operating for five years or less, the financial statements should include an opening balance sheet. (f) Copies of all option, buy-sell or other shareholder agreements or partnership agreements. (g) Complete details of all acquisitions and dispositions of the taxpayer's interest in the entity, proposed or completed. (h) Copies of any arm's length offers for substantially all of either the company's shares or its fixed assets. (i) For small closely-held companies, a list of shareholders outlining the number of shares held and any family relationships. (j) For large closely-held companies and public companies, a list of major shareholders, outlining the number of shares held and any family relationships, if applicable. (k) For partnerships, a list of the partners outlining their profit and capital-sharing ratios. (l) If the property is a bond or other obligation, details of the series, face value, interest rate and maturity date. (m) Copies of extracts from the corporate letters patent, memorandum of association, or by-laws detailing the rights and privileges attaching to all classes of shares. (n) With regard to companies, details of any recent sales of similar securities. (o) A brief history of the business operation, including the area it serves, its relation to its competitors in the same industry, and the specific outlook and condition of the particular industry. (p) Any pertinent facts or opinions concerning such issues as the dependence of the company on key personnel, suppliers or customers, the taxpayer's role in the company, the company's potential for growth, the adequacy of its facilities, and the existence of contracts or leases. (q) Details of life insurance policies owned by a corporation or partnership on the lives of its key personnel. (r) Details of and comments on the adequacy of salaries and/or other benefits paid or credited to the principal shareholders, partners or proprietor and their families.

It should be noted that the foregoing list is not exhaustive.

Policies

Options and Buy-Sell Agreements

17. Options and buy-sell agreements affect fair market value determination as required by several sections of the Income Tax Act, notably section 69 and subsection 70(5).

18. In a closely-held corporation, fair market value must be determined by referring to share rights and restrictions, whether found in the company's articles, by-laws or valid contracts between shareholders. These rights or restrictions can have an appreciatory or a depreciatory effect on the price a willing purchaser would pay for the shares in the notional market.

19. Where these rights cannot be changed without incurring the possibility of minority shareholder court or breach of contract action, where such rights limit the amount that can be realized at the date of valuation and require the shares to be disposed of for a stipulated amount, their value must be determined according to the provisions of such agreement or article. In these circumstances, other relevant factors normally considered in valuing shares may not be relevant.

20. On the other hand, where a majority shareholder holds shares subject to rights and restrictions and can modify these same rights and restrictions without incurring the possibility of adverse minority action, the value of these shares should not be restricted to the amount prescribed by the terms of the arrangement.

21. It must be noted that an arrangement that restricts the value of the shares subject to it must be bona fide in nature. That is, there must be some primary legitimate business purpose, such as the orderly succession of management, control over the influx of outsiders and creation of an outside market for the shares.

22. In addition, for the provisions of any arrangement to be considered relevant to the valuation of shares, the contractual agreement must be validly constituted and binding (i.e., a legally enforceable arrangement), and there must be a reasonable estimate of fair market value made.

23. The following two types of restrictions will not render the agreement determinative of fair market value:

(a) Where a restriction on transfer is one only of consent by shareholders and/or directors, which does not stipulate a price at which shares can be transferred or does not specify events under which an obligation to transfer or option to purchase shares arises, it will not be determinative of fair market value. However, the restriction may be a depreciatory factor to consider in valuing the shares subject to the arrangement.

(b) Where a restriction is merely a right of first refusal at a stipulated price, it will not be determinative of fair market value, although it may be another depreciatory factor to consider.

24. In the situation where shares are subject to a bona fide commercial option at a specified or formula price at the time of valuation, the option price will likely represent the lowest (or "floor") price which a prospective and willing purchaser would pay and a willing vendor would accept. To be a bona fide commercial option, it must be a legally enforceable contract with a legitimate business purpose. Such an option would have a depreciatory effect on the fair market value of the shares.

25. The facts of a case would determine what amount, if any, a purchaser would pay in excess of that "floor" price and would depend on a number of factors including, when the option is exercisable; the likelihood that the option will be exercised; whether the option price is fixed, subject to periodic increases, or based on a formula which affects an increase in price as the company succeeds; and, the size of the particular shareholding.

26. An agreement may provide for a number of inter vivos events which will give rise to either an optional or a mandatory sale at a specific price, such as retirement, resignation, or disability. Such restrictions may have a depreciatory effect on share value. Where the terms of the agreement stipulate a mandatory sale when the shareholder wants to sell his shares, the price stipulated in the agreement should accordingly limit the value pursuant to subsection 70(5), because a prospective purchaser would not be willing to pay any more for the shares than he/she would be able to receive under the provisions of the agreement.

27. If the restrictions contained in agreements are not considered determinative of fair market value, normal valuation approaches will be used to determine the fair market value of the shares in question.

28. In order for a buy-sell agreement to be considered determinative of value pursuant to subsection 70(5), it must meet all the following requirements: (a) The agreement must obligate the estate to sell the shares at death either under a mandatory sales and purchase agreement or at the option of a designated purchaser. (b) The agreement must restrict the shareholder's right to dispose of his/her shares at any price during his/her lifetime. (c) The agreement must fix a price for the shares or set out a method for determining the price on a current basis. (d) The agreement must represent a bona fide business arrangement and not a device to pass the decedent's shares to his/her heirs for less than an adequate and full consideration.

29. If a buy-sell agreement, normally determinative of value, is executed between parties not acting at arm's length, its provisions should be determinative of value, as long as it meets the following criteria: (a) It is a bona fide business arrangement. (b) The stipulated price or formula price in the agreement provides full and adequate consideration, and represents the fair market value of shares determined without reference to the agreement at the time it is executed. (c) It is a legal and binding contract.

30. In order for an agreement to be considered bona fide, there must be no donative intent in the agreement. In other words, while the parties to the agreement may be related, they must transact as they would at arm's length with strangers.

31. Each case will be dealt with on the basis of the related facts. These facts will determine whether a specific buy-sell or option agreement is legally enforceable and whether its provisions should be determinative of value or should be some of the many relevant factors to be considered in arriving at fair market value of the shares subject to the agreement, in accordance with generally accepted valuation principles.

Reference should also be made to the current version of IT-140.

Family and Group Control

32. The Department recognizes that in certain situations either a related group or an unrelated group of shareholders may control a corporation if they owned amongst themselves at least 50% + 1 of the issued and outstanding voting shares of the corporation at the same time and if they have historically acted in concert as a group. It is a rebuttable presumption that a family group has acted in concert to control a corporation.

An assertion by a minority shareholder that he/she is part of a family control group must be considered in light of all relevant factors, including the rights and restrictions attributable to his/she particular shares.

In a situation where the existence of family control is recognized, the Department will employ a rateable valuation for each family group member's shares.

33. An assertion of group control by family members, such as those referred to in subsection 251(6) of the Income Tax Act, will be accepted, provided there is no contrary evidence that they did not act in concert. Groups of relatives other than those referred to in subsection 251(6), must provide proof that they were part of a controlling family group and acted in concert with that group.

34. With regard to control by a group of shareholders dealing at arm's length, the criteria necessary for acceptance of claims of group control will include (a) a written agreement under which all the shareholders in the group relinquish their rights to vote and to sell their shares independently at all times; or (b) provision in the corporate letters patent, memorandum of association or the bylaws restricting individual rights to vote and to sell their shares independently at all times; or (c) permanent release of the individual shareholder's rights by giving of an irrevocable proxy to a designated person to vote and to sell the shares as he/she sees fit on behalf of all the shareholders in the group; or (d) a pattern of conduct to demonstrate that the shareholders acted collusively in all matters relating to the control of the corporation.

35. In order to determine whether a certain pattern of conduct is indicative of collusive action in all matters relating to control, the following actions may be undertaken individually or in any combination: (a) Shareholders' and directors' minutes may be examined to determine the extent of consultation among the group. (b) A review of remuneration may be made to insure that all members of the group were treated fairly. (c) Interviews with members of the group may be held to determine the role played by each member. (d) Details of actual purchases and/or sales made by the claimants may be examined.

36. Where the Department is satisfied that the documentation provided indicates a consistent pattern of group control, it will apply a rateable valuation for each member's shares, and not apply a minority discount.

37. The Department also recognizes that effective control can exist in a public corporation where an individual or group has a large block of shares, where through unconditional proxies, a majority of votes at any shareholders' meeting controls management and where the remaining shares are widely dispersed. In these cases, satisfactory evidence of control must be provided.

Each case will be dealt with on its own merits.

Stock Option Benefits

38. The Department's policy concerning benefits received by employees under stock option plans pursuant to section 7 of the Income Tax Act revolves around a few key words contained therein.

With regard to the phrase "value of the shares" encountered in paragraph 7(1)(a), the Department generally interprets the term "value" to mean fair market value, as defined previously.

39. For purposes of determining the date upon which the corporation's shares are "acquired" pursuant to paragraph 7(1)(a), the Department considers that to be the date at which the taxpayer acquires the rights of a shareholder with regard to the purchased shares subject to the option.

The factual circumstances of each case will determine the date at which a taxpayer obtains legal ownership or the incidence of legal ownership in and to the shares subscribed, and thereby acquires the shares.

Reference should also be made to the current version of IT-113.

Corporate-Owned Life Insurance

40. According to subsection 70(5.3), in determining the subsection 70(5) value of a deceased's shares (for deaths occurring after December 1, 1982), the value of corporate owned life insurance is its cash surrender value. This applies to the deceased, but where there are two or more shareholders and corporate-owned life insurance is required to fund a stock purchase agreement, one must determine the value of the policies held by the corporation on the other shareholders.

The factors to be considered in determining the value of such policies held on the lives of shareholders other than the deceased, should include: (a) cash surrender value; (b) the policy's loan value; (c) face value; (d) the state of health of the insured and his/her life expectancy; (e) conversion privileges; (f) other policy terms, such as term riders, double indemnity provisions; and (g) replacement value.

Reference should also be made to the current version of IT-416.

41. If the death of one of the shareholders for which corporate life insurance is owned is considered "imminent" and it is proper to consider this factor in valuing a policy, the value may be greater than the policy's cash surrender value. However, one must also consider the following factors: (a) the possibility that the insured will recover and not die; (b) the effect that the loss of a key person would have on the business operations; (c) whether the share interest being valued represents a majority or minority of the outstanding shares; and (d) the importance attached to factors other than asset value in the circumstances, such as the future earnings expectations and the prospects for dividends.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Valuation of Shares of a Corporation Receiving Life Insurance Proceeds on Death of a Shareholder
IT-416R3

DATE: July 10, 1987

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Valuation of Shares of a Corporation Receiving Life Insurance Proceeds on Death of a Shareholder

REFERENCE: Subsections 70(5) and 70(5.3)

This bulletin cancels and replaces IT-416R2 dated September 26, 1984. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

1. Paragraph 70(5)(a) deems the property of a deceased person to have been disposed of immediately before death for proceeds equal to the fair market value of the property at that time.

2. The property referred to in 1 may include shares of a corporation the value of which depends at least in part upon the value of a life insurance policy under which the decedent was the person whose life was insured. The corporation's interest in the policy may be direct or it may be through its ownership of shares of another corporation. In either case, for deaths occurring after December 1, 1982, subsection 70(5.3) provides that the value of the policy immediately before death shall be its cash surrender value at that time as determined under paragraph 148(9)(b) (see 3 below). Where the death occurred prior to December 2, 1982, the comments in paragraphs 4 and 5 below apply.

3. In determining the cash surrender value of a policy for the purposes of subsection 70(5.3), paragraph 148(9)(b) provides that policy loans outstanding, policy dividends payable and any interest payable upon such dividends shall be disregarded. In addition to those specific exclusions, the Department also considers that prepaid premiums and dividends left on deposit are not elements of the cash surrender value of a policy although their values, and the values of those elements specifically excluded, may affect the values of the shares of a corporation which is the owner and beneficiary of the policy.

Death of Shareholder before December 2, 1982

4. Where subsection 70(5.3) does not apply, the insurance policy, as a component of the assets underlying the shares, will be valued in accordance with normal valuation practices taking into consideration all facts relevant to the particular case. In this regard, the value established for the insurance policy immediately before death should be based on relevant factors relating to the deceased shortly before death, e.g., the day prior to death (see 5 below).

5. Major factors that should be taken into account are

- (a) the cash surrender value, if any, of the policy,
- (b) the life expectancy of the insured based on mortality tables, and
- (c) the state of the health of the insured as it would be known to other persons.

For example, the value of an insurance policy could approach its face value if it were known that the insured had a terminal illness or was critically injured as a result of an accident and not expected to recover. Conversely, it would have little added value if a person in apparently excellent health were to die unexpectedly as a result of an accident or heart attack. For valuation purposes the state of health of the insured prior to death would override the effect of an unexpected death due to a cause not related to any known health problem. Therefore, if a person with terminal cancer died from an unexpected heart attack the actual cause of death would not be relevant in the valuation, but the fact that the person had terminal cancer would.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Capital Property Owned on December 31, 1971 - Actual Cost of Property Owned by a Testamentary Trust
IT-130

DATE: November 20, 1973

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Capital Property Owned on December 31, 1971 - Actual Cost of Property Owned by a Testamentary Trust

REFERENCE: Subsection 26(3) of the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971 (ITAR)

1. The actual cost of capital property is a determinant of "cost" in the median rule computation under subsection 26(3) of the ITAR. The Department's view on the determination of actual cost in various situations is expressed in Interpretation Bulletin IT-93 dated March 12, 1973.

2. Interpretation Bulletin IT-93 states in paragraph 4(b) that the actual cost of a capital property acquired by a taxpayer prior to 1972 is

- (a) the fair market value of the property on the date of death of the deceased where the property was received as an outright bequest or inheritance, or
- (b) the fair market value of the property on the date of its actual delivery by the trustee to the taxpayer where the property was received in satisfaction of a capital interest or part thereof.

The Bulletin however, is silent as to the actual cost of property acquired by a trust established pursuant to a will which took effect prior to 1972.

3. In such event, where the trust arose at the date of the testator's death and the property was transferred to it out of the estate during or within a reasonable time after the "executor's year", the Department considers that the actual cost of the property to the trust for the purpose of subsection 26(3) of the ITAR is its fair market value at the date of the testator's death. This also applies even if the trust created prior to 1972 constitutes, after 1971, a spouse trust as defined in paragraph 70(6)(b) or 104(4)(a) of the Act. Where, however the trust holding the property on December 31, 1971 did not arise at the date of the testator's death, or where the property was not transferred to the trust within a reasonable time after the "executor's year", in the Department's view the actual cost of the property for the purpose of subsection 26(3) of the ITAR is its fair market value at the time of its actual transfer to the trust.

Who acquires under Sec. 70(5).

Subsection 70(5) is different implicitly from Sec. 70(6) and 70(3) in one significant way. The former provides that any person who has acquired the property of the deceased will have to recognize a tax cost thereof equal to the fair market value of the property at the time of death while the latter provides that the beneficiary will recognize the property to have a cost equal to the deceased's. Where is the estate in all of this? Obviously the only person that can be referred to in Sec. 70(5) is the estate and no other taxpayer who is beneficially interested in the estate. The section 107 distribution provisions were not enacted for nothing and the subsection 70(5) provision sets up the cost of the property for the estate, (and obviously for section 107 purposes), but it is former that dictates how the beneficiaries of the estate will inherit the property.³⁶⁰³⁶¹

Usually the results of a direct effect of the Sec. 70(5) provision as if it refers to the ultimate recipient will be equivalent to that if it were read as if Sec. 70(5) and section 107 worked in unison however not always and it is important in this instance to point out that this is the way the provisions must interact. This isn't the case with subsection 70(6)(a), (the spouse recipient), since implicit in the mechanics of that provision is the negation of the effects of section 107 to the ultimate distribution by the estate to the spouse. Subsection 70(6) prescribes how the spouse, (or spousal trust), will receive the property, (ie tax cost as per the final two lines of subpara. 70(6)(d)), while apparently section 107 will not apply. The estate is to be ignored as a liability base. This is all lovely of course if subsection 70(6) is as technically solid at preserving the Canadian tax base as the section 107 provisions however it isn't as will be seen. (To elaborate; if a taxpayer purchases a beneficiary's interest in an estate that is in the midst of administration he will not benefit from the effect of Sec. 70(5) on the terminal distribution since the property has not technically been acquired "as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer", (the requirement of Sec. 70(5)(c) and (d)) and instead in the case of a personal trust(estate), Sec. 107(2) will apply to determine ultimate capital gains integration and cost flow-through. If then the interest isn't sold but instead is maintained by the specified beneficiary should Sec. 70(5) apply on a terminal distribution by the estate since the property is being acquired "as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer"? What happens when the executors, during the years in which the estate is being administered have the power and exercise it in taking capital cost allowance on the capital property that will be distributed? Will Sec. 70(5) apply or will it be Sec. 107(2) that applies to determine the cost of the property to the beneficiary on a terminal distribution? If Sec. 107(2) doesn't categorically apply then it would be possible to have the executors take C.C.A. in the years of administration thus reducing the tax cost of the property as well as income, and then have the beneficiary recognize the property to have a cost to him for subsequent C.C.A. purposes equal to its fair market value at the date of death, obviously an abnormality. Subsection 70(5) and section 107 work in unison³⁶². It was that when you examined Sec. 70(6) you didn't find that: the roll-over allowed the estate to deduct CCA on the property and then the spouse/spousal trust would pick it up at its ACB with no possible recapture of that CCA. Now, when the property is rolled to a spouse/spousal trust the draftsmen have left no room for such in that Sec. 70(6) specifies how the beneficiaries are to pick up the property.³⁶³)

Avoiding the Disposition.

Avoiding unplanned deemed dispositions of property upon death is of paramount concern in estate planning and if ownership of the property in a personal capacity can be avoided then Sec. 70(5) will not apply to the property upon death. Methods of doing just this include inter vivos spousal trust transfers where the property is subsequently loaned back to the contributor, or holding the property upon implied trust as in instances described in *G.M. Miller v. M.N.R.*³⁶⁴ or *E. Bouchard v. The Queen*³⁶⁵.

360. This was specifically recognized in a T.I. provided in Aug. 1977 by the Technical Interpretations Division.

361 If this were not the case then when a taxpayer purchased a beneficiary's interest in the estate there would be no way in which he could tack on the excess cost of the interest to the property ultimately received and cost integration would not follow, even more so if that purchaser had to also assume estate debt such as the case in Sec. 107(2).

362 There is absolutely no room for Sec. 69(1)(c) to apply to an instance where the deceased's property is acquired by the beneficiary in that the preamble of subsection 69(1) starts off with "Except as expressly otherwise provided in this Act" though this obviously didn't prevent the needless wasting of a question in the 1990 Roundtable Discussions:Q25. What subparagraph 69(1)(c) will apply to is that property which isn't subject to the section 107 mechanics and this would include all property which the taxpayer "creates" that cannot be distributed from his estate in satisfaction of a capital interest. See also Q49 in 1988 Roundtables.

363 Regardless of the type of bequest (specific or residuary) subsection 70(5) does not operate to provide the cost to the beneficiary of the property.

364. 88 D.T.C. 1488 See also Gardner v. M.N.R., 88 D.T.C. 1649 TCC.

365 83 D.T.C. 5193. See also I.R.C. v. Allan, 9 T.C. 234, (income diversion), I.R.C. v. Parsons, 13 T.C. 700 (corpus diversion), Glynn v. F.C.T., 111 C.L.R. 169, (undisclosed trust for offspring), Re: Armstrong, 1960 V.R. 202, (though Re: McGuire, 41 W.A.L.R. 120), F.C.T. v. Purcell, 29 C.L.R. 464, as well as O.K. Murphy Estate v. The Queen, 1974 C.T.C. 552, for a trust of shares pending a reorganization of a corporation that allowed avoidance of estate tax; beneficial ownership was not held at the time of the death of the taxpayer. See also Minister of National Revenue v. National Trust

Resulting Trusts.

Invoking a resulting trusts can be useful in avoiding the Sec. 70(5) provision if they can be proven.^{366 367} Property purchased by one and conveyed directly to the trustee or to the purchaser jointly for himself and another presumes a resulting trust.³⁶⁸ Rebutting the presumption of resulting trust can occur if evidence exists to establish that the intention of the purchaser was to pass equitable interest to the other party. The "natural" presumption of resulting trust can be rebutted by the special relationship otherwise existing between the purchaser and the "trustee" recipient and the presumption of advancement displaces it.³⁶⁹ The accurate rule would be that where such a relationship exists it serves as prima facie evidence that the conveyance was to be a gift though evidence can be introduced to rebut such and prove that the intention was that the recipient was not to take beneficially.³⁷⁰

The primary two special relationships exist between father/mother and offspring³⁷¹ and husband and wife (de facto or otherwise).

In the case of the former *Commr. of S.D. v. Byrnes*³⁷² serves as an illustration of how income can be continually realized from property that has been gifted without the creation of a resulting trust. In that case the deceased purchased property in the names of his offspring but received the income therefrom in his personal capacity. The fact that rent was continued to be paid to the parent did not rebut the presumption of advancement but was only an act of reverence and good manners. In such a case the property would not be subject to Sec. 70(5).³⁷³

In *Stuckey v. Trustees, Exors., & Agency Co. Ltd.*³⁷⁴ the fact that the parent retained a life interest in property that was purchased in the name of her offspring rebutted the presumption of advancement making the property subject to probate duty, given that her intention at the time of the transfer was to avoid the application of probate duty and not benefit her offspring.³⁷⁵

Co., [1949] S.C.R. 127, where a testator escaped succession duty when he shed assets into a trust before death though with some reversionary interest.

366. There are two general types of resulting trust: when the legal title is transferred to a person in a manner without the transferor intending that beneficial title also pass, and, when the intention is that beneficial interest pass, upon the conveyance of legal title to an expressly created trust but fails due to uncertainty of object or extent of interest. See Re: Vandervell's Trusts, No 2, 1974 Ch. 269. If the sole beneficiary under a trust refuses to accept her interest the trust will fail in the absence of alternative conveyance directions and due to an incomplete passage of equitable title the trustee will hold the property on resulting trust for the settlor. This was the case in F.C.T. v. Cornell, 73 C.L.R. 394, where dividends on shares were assessable in the settlor's hands when the beneficiary disclaimed her interest in the trust. Compare this with Case Q17, 1964 15 TBRD 94, where refusal came after the constitution of the trust. Legitimate loans do not create constructive/resulting trusts if they are to be repaid since such would allow the lender to get his money back twice: Re: Sharp, 1980 1 All E.R. 198. See M. D. Donald Ltd. v. Brown, [1933] S.C.R. 411 where shareholders transferred for free property to their corporation while continuing to enjoy its benefits personally, with the corporation disposing of it, and a resulting trust was found to exist.

367 For an instance where a deceased was found to own property on resulting trust see the Aust. case of Neil v Jacovou [2011] NSWSC 87 (28 February 2011), though see also from that country Drayson v Drayson [2011] NSWSC 965 (24 August 2011) where the opposite was the case. See the UK case of Singh v Revenue & Customs [2011] UKFTT 584 (TC) (08 September 2011) where the assertion failed on a hidden income assessment.

368 See Pettitt v. Pettitt, 1970 A.C. 777 (HL), & Bateman T.V. Ltd. v. Bateman and Thomas, 1971 N.Z.L.R. 453 (CA).

369 See the recent Aust. case of Markoska & Markoska [2011] FamCA 572 (19 July 2011) for a rebuttal of presumption of advancement.

370 See Blochv. Bloch and Anor, [1981] 180 C.L.R. 390, for an instance where a son was accepted to act as a resulting trust trustee in respect of property paid for by his parents, when an oral agreement existed to the effect. See also the Aust. case of Tabtill Pty Ltd v Creswick; Creswick v Creswick & Ors [2011] QCA 381 (23 December 2011) for the timing at which one comes into existence.

371 See the Aust. divorce case of Liakos & Zervos and Anor [2011] FamCA 547 (15 July 2011) for gifts between a father and son asserted to exist to shield the son's assets.

372 1911 A.C. 386 (PC)

373 There was an opposite conclusion in Warren v. Gurney and Anor, 1944 2 All E.R. 472 (CA), though the property did not produce income.

374 1910 V.L.R. 55

375 This case was questioned in Davies v. Nat. Trustees, Exors., and Agency Co. of Aust. Ltd., 1912 V.L.R. 397. See also Batsone v. Salter, 1875 L.R. 10 Ch. 431.

In *Rider v. Kidder*³⁷⁶ Lord Eldon was of the opinion that a person buying property for himself and a stranger and causes the income therefrom to be paid to the stranger rebuts the presumption of resulting trust qua the income but not the corpus.

There is a difference between vesting beneficial interest on an advancement immediately and in the future.³⁷⁷ In *re: Kerrigan*³⁷⁸ a taxpayer advanced mortgages in the names of his offspring though received the interest thereupon personally. The children were not made aware that "they had assets" until a later date and when the Commissioner of Stamp Duty attempted to assess the principal for duty on the taxpayer's death the executors were unsuccessful at arguing that there had been an immediate advancement but the Court held that the principal was to be held on resulting trust for the taxpayer thus was subject to the duty.³⁷⁹ In *Shepherd v. Cartwright*³⁸⁰ a taxpayer purchased shares in the names of his children which increased in value subsequent to which they were sold with the proceeds being placed in separate bank accounts for the underaged and, at all material times, unknowlegable children. A power of attorney was secured from them by the parent to withdraw from the accounts which was used principally for the parent's benefit while the children reported the income from the shares in their respective tax returns. On the death of the taxpayer the children commenced actions against the executors for the depleted share proceeds and were successful when the court found an advancement had occurred and that subsequent conduct by either party was inadmissible to prove the intention at the time of the transfer. Viscount Simonds held:

"I think it well then to pause in this year 1919 and to ask what was the result in law of equity of the registration in the names of his children, of shares for which he supplied the cash, and I pause in order to examine the law, because it appears to me that the only two facts which are at this stage relied on to rebut the presumption of advancement, viz.: that the children were ignorant, and that certificates were not given to them, are of negligible value. My Lords, I do not distinguish between the purchase of shares and the acquisition of shares on allotment, and I think that the law is clear that, on the one hand, where a man purchases shares and they are registered in the name of a stranger, there is a resulting trust in favour of the purchaser; on the other hand, if they are registered in the name of a child in loco parentis, there is no such resulting trust but the presumption of advancement. Equally, it is clear that the presumption can be rebutted, but should not, as Lord Eldon said, give way to slight circumstances.

It must then be asked by what evidence can the presumption be rebutted, and it would, I think, be very unfortunate if any doubt were cast (as I think it has been in certain passages in the judgments in review) on the well settled law on this subject. It is, I think, correctly stated in substantially the same terms in every text-book that I have consulted and supported by authority extending over a long period of time. I will take, as an example, a passage from Snell's Principles of Equity (22nd Edn.), p. 122, which is as follows:

"The acts and declarations of the parties before or at the time of the purchase, or so immediately after it as to constitute a part of the transaction, are admissible in evidence either for or against the party who did the act or made the declaration; subsequent acts and declarations are only admissible as evidence against the party who did or made them, and not in his favour."

. I do not think it necessary to review the numerous cases of high authority on which this statement is founded. It is possible to find in some earlier judgments reference to "subsequent" events without the qualifications contained in the textbook statement: it may even be possible to wonder in some cases how, in the narration of facts, certain events were admitted to consideration. But the burden of authority in favour of the broad proposition as stated in the passage I have cited is overwhelming and should not be disturbed."

Mothers have been more usually held to create a resulting trust rather than give a gift via the acquisition in the

376 1805 10 Ves. Jr. 360

377 See In re: Cochrane, 1906 2 Ir. 200, and Grey v. A.G., 1900 A.C. 124.

378 47 S.R. (N.S.W.) 76

379 Stuckey was disapproved of here as well. See also Boulos v. Boulos, 24 E.T.R. 56.

380 1954 3 All E.R. 649 (CA)

name of a child.³⁸¹ In *Dagle v. Dagle Estate*³⁸² there was a presumption of advancement when a mother conveyed property to one son but her will stated that the property was to be shared by her both sons. The frustrated son was not able to overcome the onus of disproving the presumption.³⁸³

381 See Edwards v. Bardley, 1957 9 D.L.R. (2d) 673, when a joint bank account arranged by the widowed parent did not produce a presumption of advancement. See also Re: Mailman, 1941 3 D.L.R. 449, Niles v. Lake, 1947 2 D.L.R. 248, Lattimer v. Lattimer, 1978 18 O.R. (2d) 375, Cohen v. Cohen, 24 E.T.R. 269, and Klimashewski v. Klimashewski, 28 E.T.R. 163.

382 1990 70 D.L.R. (4d) 201

383 See also Madsen Estate v. Saylor, 2007 SCC 18, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 838 where the Supreme Court held that when a father had transferred property to a joint account with his adult daughter giving her a right of survivor to the account, though the daughter did not actually use any of the account's funds that, per the head note:

P, an adult daughter, was made a joint account holder by her father following the death of her mother. The accounts had a right of survivorship. P's father also executed a power of attorney in her favour and she remained the named alternate executor under his will, which was never changed after her mother's death. P's father retained control of the bank accounts and the funds were used solely for his benefit during his life. He also declared and paid all taxes on income made from the accounts. There was conflicting evidence from P and her siblings as to their relationships with their father, P claiming to be the preferred child. Under her father's will, P and her two siblings were to share one half of her father's estate. Following the father's death litigation was commenced by P's siblings against P as executor because she did not include the accounts in the distribution of the estate. Applying a presumption of resulting trust, the trial judge found that there was no evidence to support P's position that her father intended to gift the joint accounts to her and held that they should be included in the father's estate. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision. The majority concluded that the trial judge was incorrect in applying the law of resulting trust and should have applied the presumption of advancement, but added that she was not required to consider either presumption because the intention of the father at the time of the transfer was demonstrated on the evidence.

Held (Abella J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: A presumption of a resulting trust applies to the gratuitous transfer of assets by P's father into the joint accounts. The presumption of advancement has no application because P was not a minor child of her father. P therefore had the burden of rebutting the presumption of a resulting trust by showing that her father intended to gift the assets in the accounts to her on the balance of probabilities. The trial judge incorrectly found that there was no evidence to suggest that P's father intended for her alone to have the assets in the joint accounts. The financial institution documents and P's evidence that she and her father acknowledged that they understood at the time that the right of survivorship meant that on the death of one of the joint account holders the other would become the sole owner, did constitute some evidence that was relevant to the father's intention. In the circumstances of this appeal, it is both feasible on a practical level and within the interests of justice for this Court to take into consideration the evidence not considered by the trial judge and make a final determination rather than sending the case back to trial. The financial institution documents and P's testimony in relation to them do not satisfy P's burden of proof on the balance of probabilities. Little weight can be accorded to that evidence because of the lack of clarity in the bank documents and because of the trial judge's finding that P's testimony was evasive and conflicting. The conclusion that the presumption of resulting trust was not rebutted is consistent with the trial judge's finding, based on the evidence she did consider, that the father had not intended to make P a gift of the account proceeds. [17] [20] [22] [24] [27-29]

Per Abella J. (dissenting): The presumption of advancement should be applied in this case and a new trial ordered. This presumption should continue to apply to all gratuitous transfers from parents to their children, and not be restricted to transfers to non-adult children. The fact that the trial judge ignored or drew contrary inferences from certain factors which could be considered reflective of an intention to make a gift, illustrates how her error in applying the presumption of resulting trust may have influenced her findings of fact and credibility. The key finding made by the trial judge, a finding which reflects the erroneous assignment of the burden of proof to P, was that there is no evidence to support P's position that her father intended to gift the contents of his joint accounts to her. [33] [42]

In Pecore v. Pecore, 2007 SCC 17, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 795 it as further held:

An ageing father gratuitously placed the bulk of his assets in joint accounts with his daughter P, who was the closest to him of his three adult children. Unlike her siblings, who were financially secure, P worked at various low-paying jobs and took care of her quadriplegic husband, M. P's father helped P and her family financially, including buying them a van, making improvements to their home, and assisting her son while he was attending university. P's father alone deposited funds into the joint accounts. He continued to use and control the accounts, and declared and paid all the taxes on the income made from the assets in the accounts. In his will, P's father left specific bequests to P, M and her children but did not mention the accounts. The residue of the estate was to be divided equally between P and M. Upon the father's death, P redeemed the balance in the joint accounts on the basis of a right of survivorship. P and M later divorced, and a dispute over the accounts arose during their matrimonial property proceedings. M claimed that P held the balance in the accounts in trust for the benefit of her father's estate and, consequently, the assets formed part of the residue and should be distributed according to the will. The trial judge held that P's father intended to make a gift of the beneficial interest in the accounts upon his death to P alone, concluding that the evidence failed to rebut the presumption of advancement. The Court of Appeal dismissed M's appeal, but found that it was not necessary to rely on the presumption of advancement because the presumption is only relevant in the absence of evidence of actual intention or where the evidence is evenly balanced.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The second special relationship consists of that of husband and wife and the common rule is property rights of the parties must be ascertained at the time of the purchase of the property and unless there is an agreement to then alter them they remain the same.³⁸⁴ Asper J. in *Re: Eykyn Trusts*³⁸⁵ provided:

Per McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Charron and Rothstein JJ.: The long-standing common law presumptions of advancement and resulting trust continue to play a role in disputes over gratuitous transfers. These presumptions provide a guide for courts where evidence as to the transferor's intent in making the transfer is unavailable or unpersuasive. They also provide a measure of certainty and predictability for individuals who put property in joint accounts or make other gratuitous transfers. The presumption of resulting trust is the general rule for gratuitous transfers and the onus is placed on the transferee to demonstrate that a gift was intended. However, depending on the nature of the relationship between the transferor and transferee, the presumption of advancement may apply and it will fall on the party challenging the transfer to rebut the presumption of a gift. The civil standard of proof is applicable to rebut the presumptions. The applicable presumption will only determine the result where there is insufficient evidence to rebut it on a balance of probabilities. [23-24] [27] [43-44]

In the context of a transfer to a child, the presumption of advancement, which applies equally to fathers and mothers, is limited in its application to gratuitous transfers made by parents to minor children. Given that a principal justification for the presumption of advancement is parental obligation to support dependent children, the presumption does not apply in respect of independent adult children. Moreover, since it is common nowadays for ageing parents to transfer their assets into joint accounts with their adult children in order to have that child assist them in managing their financial affairs, there should be a rebuttable presumption that the adult child is holding the property in trust for the ageing parent to facilitate the free and efficient management of that parent's affairs. The presumption of advancement is also not applicable to dependent adult children because it would be impossible to list the wide variety of the circumstances that make someone "dependent" for the purpose of applying the presumption. Courts would have to determine on a case-by-case basis whether or not a particular individual is "dependent", creating uncertainty and unpredictability in almost every instance. While dependency will not be a basis on which to apply the presumption, evidence as to the degree of dependency of an adult transferee child on the transferor parent may provide strong evidence to rebut the presumption of a resulting trust. [33] [36] [40-41]

With joint accounts, the rights of survivorship, both legal and equitable, vest when the account is opened. The gift of those rights is therefore inter vivos in nature. Since the nature of a joint account is that the balance will fluctuate over time, the gift in these circumstances is the transferee's survivorship interest in the account balance at the time of the transferor's death. The presumption of a resulting trust means in that context that it will fall to the surviving joint account holder to prove that the transferor intended to gift the right of survivorship to whatever assets are left in the account to the survivor. [48] [50] [53]

The types of evidence that should be considered in ascertaining a transferor's intent will depend on the facts of each case. The evidence considered by a court may include the wording used in bank documents, the control and use of the funds in the account, the granting of a power of attorney, the tax treatment of the joint account, and evidence subsequent to the transfer if such evidence is relevant to the transferor's intention at the time of the transfer. The weight to be placed on a particular piece of evidence in determining intent should be left to the discretion of the trial judge. [55] [59-62] [69]

In this case, the trial judge erred in applying the presumption of advancement. P, although financially insecure, was not a minor child. The presumption of a resulting trust should therefore have been applied. Nonetheless, this error does not affect the disposition of the appeal because the trial judge found that the evidence clearly demonstrated the intention on the part of the father that the balance left in the joint accounts was to go to P alone on his death through survivorship. This strong finding regarding the father's actual intention shows that the trial judge's conclusion would have been the same even if he had applied the presumption of a resulting trust. [75]

Per Abella J.: The trial judge properly applied the correct legal presumption to the facts of the case. Historically, the presumption of advancement has been applied to gratuitous transfers to children, regardless of the child's age, and there is no reason now to limit its application to non-adult children. The argument that a principal justification for the presumption was the parental obligation to support dependent children unduly narrows and contradicts the historical rationale for the presumption. Parental affection, no less than parental obligation, has always grounded the presumption of advancement. Furthermore, the intention to have an adult child manage a parent's financial affairs during his or her lifetime is hardly inconsistent with the intention to make a gift of money in a joint account to that child. Parents generally want to benefit their children out of love and affection. If children assist them with their affairs, this cannot logically be a reason for displacing the assumption that parents desire to benefit them. It is equally plausible that an elderly parent who gratuitously enters into a joint bank account with an adult child on whom he or she depends for assistance intends to make a gift in gratitude for this assistance. If the intention is merely to have assistance in financial management, a power of attorney would suffice, as would a bank account without survivorship rights. Accordingly, since the presumption of advancement emerged no less from affection than from dependency, and since parental affection flows from the inherent nature of the relationship not of the dependency, the presumption of advancement should logically apply to all gratuitous transfers from parents to their children, regardless of the age or dependency of the child or the parent. The natural affection parents are presumed to have for their adult children when both were younger should not be deemed to atrophy with age. [79] [89] [100] [102] [107]

In any event, bank account documents which, as in this case, specifically confirm a survivorship interest should be deemed to reflect an intention that what has been signed is sincerely meant. There is no justification for ignoring the presumptive relevance of clear language in banking documents in determining the transferor's intention. [104]

³⁸⁴ See Pettitt v. Pettitt, 1970 A.C. 777, & Bingeman v. McLaughlin, 78 1 S.C.R. 548.

³⁸⁵ 1877 6 Ch. D. 115

"The law of this Court is perfectly settled that when a husband transfers money or property into the name of his wife only, then the presumption is, that it is intended to be a gift or advancement to the wife absolutely at once... And if a husband invests money, stock or otherwise, in the names of himself and his wife, then it is an advancement for the benefit of the wife absolutely if she survives her husband, but if he survives her, then it reverts to him as joint tenant with his wife."

In *Tinker v. Tinker*³⁸⁶ the U.K. Court of Appeal relied upon the presumption of advancement without hesitation when the husband exclusively paid consideration for a house that was registered in his wife's name. In *Reaney v. Reaney*³⁸⁷ the financial considerations provided by the spouses in acquiring a property were considered and the disparity therein proved adequate grounds for considering a presumption of resulting trust when the wife had not contributed to the acquisition but had received the property registered in her name.

The presumption however has been statutorily eliminated for specified purposes in Canada with provincial family law reforms and replaced with the presumption of resulting trust pertaining to married couples as if to strangers.³⁸⁸

The existence of a resulting trust whereby the taxpayer holds as a trustee the property will preclude it from being captured by Sec. 70(5) when the taxpayer dies if the trust can be proven and subsequent declarations are admissible only against the party making them as per Shepard v. Cartwright. Where a resulting trust exists and the beneficiary dies the capital interest owned will be captured by Sec. 70(5) as well if the Department can establish that the taxpayer was a beneficiary of a resulting trust. Such could occur in numerous situations not just arising out of the situations created on the holding of legal title on an acquisition but also where there isn't a valid alienation of beneficial interest on an inter vivos trust creation/gift.

In *MacDonald Estate v. M.N.R.*³⁸⁹ the Exchequer Court had to decide whether a testatrix held property on a resulting trust for succession duty purposes when the property was legally owned by her but had as its source the husband who survived to be the sole beneficiary of her estate. Although the source of the wealth had been the husband directly she had managed the property herself though with some advice from the husband. The executors of her estate could not provide adequate documentation of such and the actions of the spouse beneficiary and not the actions of both prior to her death, did not indicate that a trust, resulting or otherwise, existed and subsequent acts could only be held against those making them, not for their benefit. The testatrix was subject to succession duty on the particular property upon death.³⁹⁰

In *Nelson et al. v. M.N.R.*³⁹¹ farmland was registered in the name of a taxpayer and disposed of subsequent to which the taxpayer and his spouse attempted to split the recognition of gain between them on the basis that there was either a resulting trust in respect of the property arising on the basis that it was their common intention when the property was acquired that both would have ownership, or, on the basis that there was a constructive trust when the spouse had expended considerable effort on the property and in the farming business. Since the property was conveyed to the taxpayer without any expression that the spouse was also to have joint ownership and it could not be found that she had provided any consideration towards the acquisition, a resulting trust was not recognized as created while her contribution of effort to the farm activities was not sufficient to warrant the presumption when such behavior she would otherwise have displayed, (as she previously did).³⁹² If she would have expended a sum towards the acquisition, devoted a separate amount of time and effort to the particular farm and had not otherwise carried on extensive general farm activities a resulting trust could be more easily proven. Common intention could not be proven at the time of the acquisition and the use of the proceeds after the sale was held not indicative of the intention at the earlier time.

In *Jake Harms v. M.N.R.*³⁹³ Taylor J. held that a husband would have to recognize all of the rental income

386 1970 1 All E.R. 540

387 1990 72 D.L.R. (4d) 532

388 See Family Law Act and Riley v. Riley, 27 E.T.R. 224, & "The Unsung Demise of The Presumption of Spousal Advancement", D.R. Klinck, E. & T.Q., pg. 6.

389 59 D.T.C. 1235

390 See also Hanscomb Estate v. M.N.R., 64 D.T.C. 720.

391 91 D.T.C. 37 (TCC)

392 See Burns v. Burns, 1984 1 All E.R. 244 at 254.

393 1990 1 C.T.C. 2010 (TCC)

from a farm which was legally owned by him³⁹⁴ notwithstanding that his spouse had cooperated in operating the farm when he ran it and when both had discussed its acquisition. The "resulting trust" could not be substantiated when the spouse was coached to declare part of the income as hers though did nothing more to gain a more legally secure recognizable interest in the property while the husband did not offer any assurance that a resulting trust was agreed to. The taxpayer held himself out over 30 years as being the beneficial and legal owner of the farm and had not dismissed anyone's mind to that effect.

In *Kostiuk v. M.N.R.*³⁹⁵ a resulting trust in essence allowed the avoidance of a capital gain arising under the application of Sec. 69(1)(b) when parents incorporated an activity and one share was subscribed to in the name of their 10 year old offspring. No dividends were ever paid, the offspring wasn't made aware of her rights, informed of the company, etc., and upon the dissolution of the marriage of the parents the share was listed as matrimonial property and was used in the settlement. The Minister wasn't successful on assessing the offspring under Sec. 69(1)(b) on the transfer to the father of the share since beneficial ownership didn't reside with the offspring to begin with.³⁹⁶

If a trust fails for one of the three certainties the legal ownership of its property is held on resulting trust for its settlor. This causes you to be extremely careful in setting up a trust since if it can be found not to exist Sec. 75(2) applies to transfer all the recognition of income to its settlor while there is FMV dispositions of the property when legal title is transferred back to the settlor. It also causes the settlor to have ownership of interests in the trust that would be subject to the Sec. 70(5) if the trust can be proven to exist on death by CRA.³⁹⁷

In both *I.R.C. v. Sunnylands Trust*³⁹⁸ and *Innes v. Harrison*³⁹⁹ trusts were found to be void resulting from uncertainty of objects or infringement of the rule against perpetuities thereby creating a resulting trust for the settlor attributing income to him: if such were to occur in Canada under the present ITA by virtue of Sec. 75(2), (and possibly Sec. 104(13)), all of the income of the trust property would be attributed out to the settlor if he were resident.⁴⁰⁰ See also *Hood Barrs v. C.I.R. (#3)*⁴⁰¹ for an instance of how the tax authorities can demolish the presumption of advancement to a child with subsequent acts of both parties as evidence.⁴⁰²

Bare Trusts Arising on Sales.

In *Patterson Estate v. M.N.R.*⁴⁰³ a taxpayer, prior to death, agreed to sell shares of a personally controlled company to his sons whereby the consideration could be paid at any time but any outstanding would be payable upon his death. Legal title to the shares remained registered in the father's name until payment was made in full while if the father chose, the agreement could be terminated upon repayment of the sums ³⁹⁴ following a ten year period during which he did just this

³⁹⁵ 89 D.T.C. 541 (TCC)

³⁹⁶ Of little importance apparently was who had advanced consideration (1$) for the share.

³⁹⁷ A trust can fail in so many ways I could go on and on here. I think firstly of failure to properly identify the beneficiaries and extent of their interests. And what happens if a beneficiary disclaims her one interest out off many that exist and the whole trust fails.

³⁹⁸ 35 T.C. 577

³⁹⁹ 35 T.C. 594

⁴⁰⁰ See also Haworth v. C.I.R., 49 T.C. 489 (Ch), Muir v. C.I.R., 43 T.C. 367 (CA), Hannay's Exors. v. C.I.R., 37 T.C. 217, and Aked v. Shaw, 28 T.C. 286. There could be a transfer of beneficial ownership in the income without a passage of beneficial interest while it could be argued that if there isn't a change in beneficial ownership Sec. 75(2) applies regardless. The resulting trust can prove to be the greatest danger to an income splitting instance that avoids the Sec. 56(4.1) provision by legal title transfer whereafter it's transferred back after a term of years with the accumulated income. Beneficial interest can be said not to have passed. This is also of concern in attempting to access unused capital gains deductions by transferring property to a spouse/spousal trust/corporation without the use of a tax free roll-over: Question 20 of the 1990 Roundtable Discussions allowed the Department the chance to opine that it would look to ascertain if there had been a passage of beneficial ownership in such a situation, the result being that if there hadn't then a disposition would not be recognizable. This was exactly the case in P. de Graaf v. The Queen, 1985 1 C.T.C. 374, where property was purchased in a spouse's name but the husband financed it and the spouse signed the acquisition documentation under the taxpayer's dominion and influence when told to. Subsequently the property was transferred to a corporation owned by the taxpayer and the recognition of a Sec. 54(c) disposition was avoided by virtue of the applicability of para. (v) therein.

⁴⁰¹ 39 T.C. 209, as well as Sinclair v. C.I.R., 24 T.C. 432

⁴⁰² though Glynn & Ors. v. Commr. of S.D., 1977 2 N.S.W.L.R. 673, provides an example of a successful advancement in questionable circumstances. See also Claverley v. Green, 155 C.L.R. 242, and also De Pol v. Cunningham, 49 T.C. 445, for interpretation of loan or cash advancement creating resulting trust on partnership buy-out/incorporation, as well as Soul v. Irving, 41 T.C. 517 (CA).

⁴⁰³ 69 D.T.C. 711 TAB received, any time prior to the full balance being received, to the sons who would have no recourse. Upon the father's death the Minister assessed the taxpayer as owning the shares and contended that the agreement provided for the transfer of the shares on the death thus until that time they remained the deceased's. The Tax Appeal Board thought otherwise providing:

"Dealing with the latter point first, I am firmly of the opinion that Exhibit A-1 effected an immediate sale of the shares to the two sons as of April 1, 1962, binding on the parties thereto on and from that date, and that in retaining the physical possession of the share certificates Patterson, Sr. was doing no more than maintaining a lien on these documents until such time as he was paid in full. Meanwhile his sons had an equitable interest in the shares to the extent that they had given consideration therefore.

The agreement gave the sons the right to pay for the shares in full at any time and in no sense should the transaction be regarded as coming into effect only on or after the death of Patterson, Sr."

Although this case involved a question of the existence of "competency to dispose", a concern of the Estate Tax Act at the time effective, the arrangement would be equally successful at avoiding/reducing the Sec. 70(5) deemed dispositions.⁴⁰⁴ (#40 v. M.N.R.⁴⁰⁵ is another instance where a trust was used to arrange a sale.⁴⁰⁶) If the shares were transferred to a trust company to be held in trust and distributed to the sons providing they paid consideration to the contributor with reversion back to him if they didn't, the sale would be recognized at the time of contribution while the consideration would be realized by the estate subsequently. The reversionary interest the original owner would have in such an instance would be subject to Sec. 70(5) however its value would be questionable.⁴⁰⁷

Lysaght v. Edwards⁴⁰⁸ illustrates the principle of a bare/constructive trust arising pending delivery of legal title when Lord Hardwicke provided:

"What is that doctrine? It is that the moment you have a valid contract for sale the vendor becomes in equity a trustee for the purchaser of the estate sold, and the beneficial ownership passes to the purchaser, the vendor having a right to the purchase-money, a charge or lien on the estate for the security of that purchase-money, and a right to retain possession of the estate until the purchase-money is paid, in the absence of express contract as to the time of delivering possession. In other words, the position of the vendor is something between what has been called a naked or bare trustee, or a mere trustee(that is, a person without beneficial interest), and a mortgagee who is not, in equity(any more than a vendor), the owner of the estate, but is, in certain events, entitled to what the unpaid vendor is, viz., possession of the estate and a charge upon the estate for his purchase-money. ...If anything happens to the estate between the time of sale and the time of completion of the purchase it is at the risk of the purchaser. If it is a house that is sold, and the house is burned down, the purchaser loses the house. He must insure it himself if he wants to provide against such an accident. If it is a garden, and a river overflows its banks without any fault of the vendor, the garden will be ruined, but the loss will be the purchaser's. In the same way there is a correlative liability on the part of the vendor in possession. He is not entitled to treat the estate as his own. If he willfully damages or injures it, he is liable to the purchaser; and more than that, he is liable if he does not take reasonable care of it. So far he is treated in all respects as a trustee, subject of course to his right to being paid the purchase-money, and his right to enforce his security against the estate."⁴⁰⁹

⁴⁰⁴ This particular type of arrangement would fully allow the testator to opt out and bequeath the shares to someone else. A sales agreement structured as such would allow this: see Corlett v. Isle of Man Bank, 1937 2 W.W.R. 209. The taxpayer would however be subject to reassessment in a previous year in which the purported sale occurred however the fair market value of the shares might have changed since then.

⁴⁰⁵ 52 D.T.C. 16

⁴⁰⁶ See also Escoigue Prop. Ltd. v. I.R.C., 1958 A.C. 549, for constructive trusts incidental to sales pending delivery and Parway Estates Ltd. v. I.R.C., 1958 37 T.C. 135 (CA), for passage of equitable interest on sale without passage of legal title. See also Rich v. Krause, 1975 1 W.W.R. 87, Re: Aquarius T.V. Ltd., 1975 21 C.B.R. (NS) 144, Bunny Ind. Ltd. v. F.S.W. Ent. Pty. Ltd., 1982 Qd. R. 712, Lake v. Bayliss & Anor., 1974 1 W.L.R. 1073, J.H. & S. Ltd. v. Quirk, 48 T.C. 595, and Clark v. Follett, 48 T.C. 677.

⁴⁰⁷ If the shares produced income Sec. 75(2) would attribute it to the settlor.

⁴⁰⁸ 1876 2 Ch. D. 499

⁴⁰⁹ See DeGroote v. The Queen, 85 D.T.C. 5008 (FCTD), for an example of passage of equitable interest in dividends in shares sold awaiting completion that allowed the vendor to avoid being assessed in respect of them. See also Comp. of Stamps v. Hutchins, 1985 V.R. 599, at 610, for transfer of beneficial ownership upon creation of trust to execute sale of Whether a constructive trust arises depends on the availability of specific performance as per *Central Trust and Safe Deposit Co. v. Snider*⁴¹⁰ while if the constructive trust relationship exists the vendor cannot declare an express trust in respect of anyone else other than the purchaser.⁴¹¹ Until the purchase price is paid the vendor retains a lien on the property and this lien is subject to the Sec. 70(5)-(6) disposition mechanics upon death and can be transferred via Sec. 73(1). The right to the proceeds of disposition would have an ACB equal to the FMV of the property conveyed. If payment is deferred for an extended period of time its FMV may be less than its face value possibly creating a capital loss under Sec. 70(5). Although in such a case the taxpayer will be able to take the Sec. 40(1)(a)(iii) reserve he'll more than likely suffer penalties and interest for failing to report the earlier disposition though adjusted for the reserve.

Buy-Sell Agreements as Trusts.

A contract in the form of a buy-sell agreement does not pass a beneficial interest in the subject property until its triggering event transpires which is substantiated through the actions of the parties so as to cause the sale to occur. Until the parties agree to effect a sale upon or after the triggering event upon which the agreement is based no beneficial interest is passed to the potential acquiror. Consequently the underlying property will be subject to Sec. 70(5).

This was the case in *Smith v. The Queen*⁴¹² where a business was to be passed from one generation to another. Shares were transferred by their owner to a corporation for 28% of the shares while his three sons each acquired 24% of the shares and then they entered into a buy-sell so that each shareholder would have a pre-emptive right to acquire any shares any one of them would at any time wish to sell. Upon the parent's death the 28% was to be transferred to the sons for 1$ for each third of the holding. If shares were ultimately acquired by an outsider he would have to enter into an agreement identical to the buy-sell with the others. A restructuring occurred whereby the 28% was transferred to the three sons' wholly owned corporation for 3$ and on condition that the father sit as director of the sons' corporation as long as he liked and drew a salary therefrom as well. Any taxes from the disposition of the particular shares were to be reimbursed by the corporation. The shareholder was assessed in respect of the disposition under Sec. 69(1)(b) as not having made a disposition in an arm's length environment while the taxpayer contended that the buy-sell created a trust (and the trust disposed of it). McNair J. held, with regard to the need of imperative expression in creating the trust:

"Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, I am bound to conclude that the 1970 buy-sell agreement did not create a trust of the plaintiff's shares in Amherst. While the agreement may have reflected something of a common intent that the shares would pass to the sons in the event of the plaintiff's death, this did not clearly bespeak an intention to transfer or vest the beneficial ownership of those shares in the three sons. Moreover, the interest of the sons with respect to the plaintiff's shares on the latter's death, if any, was contingent at best, depending as it did on the fact of their surviving the plaintiff and the further condition that neither company nor any of the parties to the agreement were adjudged bankrupt or insolvent. In my view, there are just too many "ifs" and "buts" militating against the construction that the 1970 agreement effectuated an immediate vesting of a contingent interest in the plaintiff's shares.

Indeed, I find that the evidence is inconsistent with the submission that the plaintiff was a trustee of his shares of Amherst, following the execution of the 1970 agreement. From this time until the execution of the triad agreements in 1981, the plaintiff continued to regard himself as the owner of the shares. The tripartite agreement of January 30, 1981 that assigned the sons' rights under the 1970 buy-sell agreement to Malden recited that the three assignors and the party of the third part, H. Murray Smith, shares as well as Wood Preservations Ltd. v. Prior, 45 T.C. 112 (CA), and J.H.S. Ltd. v. Quirk, 48 T.C. 595 Ch. See also Platinum Investment Management Limited v Chief Commissioner of State Revenue (No 2) [2010] NSWSC 1 for whether establishment of trust pending delivery of proceeds is a dutiable transfer for Aust. tax purposes.

⁴¹⁰ 1916 A.C. 266, though see Black v. Homersham, 4 Ex. D. 24, as well as Bell v. Guaranty Trust Co., 16 E.T.R. 113 (Sask CA).

⁴¹¹ McCarthy & Stone Ltd. v. Julian S. Hodge & Co. Ltd., 1971 1 W.L.R. 1547. See The Law of Trusts, Keeton & Sheridan, P.B. Ltd., 1974 3rd. Ed., pg. 174 for an excellent discussion on the principles.

⁴¹² 87 D.T.C. 5355 FCTD

were registered and beneficial owners of all of the issued and outstanding shares of Amherst Quarries (1969) Limited. The 1981 sale agreement further corroborated this by reciting that the plaintiff owned "17,920 of the issued and fully paid common shares of Amherst, representing 28% of the issued and outstanding shares of that company; with the parties of the second part, and the third part, and the fourth part, each being the registered owner of 15,360 common shares of Amherst, representing 24% of the fully paid and issued capital of Amherst." There was, it is true, a further recital to the effect that the plaintiff was restricted by the company's charter and was estopped by verbal commitment to his sons from selling his shareholdings of Amherst to any other party during his lifetime but this falls short, in my view, of stating an avowed intention that the 1970 shareholders' agreement created a trust in respect of the plaintiff's shares. Moreover, the plaintiff warranted in the 1981 sale agreement that he had full power and authority to sell his Amherst shares to Malden, the wholly owned company of his sons. Apart from this, the plaintiff acted at all times as though he were beneficial owner of the shares up until the time of sale in 1981. He voted his shares, he took what few dividends were declared, and he reported those dividends in his income tax returns.

In my opinion, paragraph 4 of the 1970 buy-sell agreement imported at best a conditional obligation to transfer the plaintiff's shares in Amherst at a future time. In the result, the first question must be answered in the negative; the 1970 agreement did not create a trust of the plaintiff's shares."⁴¹³ If an accurate expression had been made as to recognize a transfer of beneficial interest with retention of legal ownership as a lien to secure the payment of the consideration on death with the dividends being payable to the transferor until death a trust would have been created though subsequent expressions would have to be consistently appropriate. Any subsequent dealings in the property would be by the trust and the property would be sheltered from Sec. 70(5).

"Fair market value – Sec. 70(5.3)"

(5.3) For the purposes of subsections (5) and 104(4) and section 128.1, the fair market value at any time of any property deemed to have been disposed of at that time as a consequence of a particular individual's death or as a consequence of the particular individual becoming or ceasing to be resident in Canada shall be determined as though the fair market value at that time of any life insurance policy, under which the particular individual (or any other individual not dealing at arm's length with the particular individual at that time or at the time the policy was issued) was a person whose life was insured, were the cash surrender value (as defined in subsection 148(9)) of the policy immediately before the particular individual died or became or ceased to be resident in Canada, as the case may be.

Avoiding Sec. 70(5.3).

Where the taxpayer owns capital stock of a company deemed to have been disposed of on his death as capital property the fair market value thereof will be deemed to be their fair market value as if the value of the life insurance policy held by the corporation under which the taxpayer is the person insured were its cash surrender value, as described in Sec. 148(9)(b) at the time. In such an instance the fair market value of the corporation's shares will explode and the taxpayer will be exposed to recognize a massive capital gain under Sec. 70(5).⁴¹⁴

The testator can insulate an insurance proceeds explosion by taking back preferred redeemable par-value shares in the policy holding corporation and having the corporate charter stream the value of any insurance proceeds to other share classes: the FMV explosion is funneled to other classes and the FMV of the deceased's shares remains the same, even though deemed disposed of. The property going through a Sec. 70(5) is not tagged to the actual proceeds realized and the legislative draughtsman sharpens his pencil a bit more next time. And your counsel has prepared the charter/share structure to do "marvelous things" with those ⁴¹³ See Beyer v. Beyer, 1960 V.R. 126, for another such very similar instance where similar issues had to be decided including whether the buy-sell agreement was testamentary.

⁴¹⁴ See "Estates and Trusts Holding Shares of Private Corporations: Selected Issues" by Sheila M. Crummey in Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 26 Pg. 302 for a balanced discussion of legal and tax issues.

insurance proceeds like buy descendants property, make loans to spousal trusts et cetera.

CRA Rulings has also given the author a private opinion that ..catch this one... a power of appointment is not "a property" subject to the Sec. 70(7)-(8) trust untainting rules even though in the author's opinion it fully qualifies under the Sec. 248(1) definition of property.⁴¹⁵ If a power of appointment isn't a property then it can't be owned: guess it's one of those things like...air. So a taxpayer can set up a holding trust of the policy that contains a testamentary general power of appointment, not bother with a capital interest since that would be captured by Sec. 70(5.3)-(5) (and we all wouldn't want that to happen), and on death the insurance proceeds are streamed off to where the deceased power-holder desires on exercise of the power via the will : here's to opinionated Rulings officers and not-so-drunk Whiskey-men.⁴¹⁶

Exit strategies out of these two positions if the statute changes are easy to formulate.⁴¹⁷

If he rolled the capital stock to his spouse or spousal trust under Sec. 70(6) he would avoid the recognition of the gain while if he rolled the stock to his offspring directly he would have to incur it. If he were to have transferred the shares before his death into an inter vivos non-spousal trust in which he took back an income interest he would have had to recognize a disposition of the shares under Sec. 69(1) conditions and consequently a possible capital gain unless they are loaded in immediately after acquisition.⁴¹⁸ If the beneficial ownership of the capital element did not change then he wouldn't recognize a disposition however the capital interest that he would take back as consideration would still be subject to Sec. 70(5)-95.3) with the same net effect, (regardless of if the trust is personal or not). If he took back a life income interest from the inter vivos trust and maintained a power of appointment over the capital shares which formed the basis of another's capital interest then he'd recognize an inter vivos disposition, and if the income interest were based upon the dividend receipt upon the shares he'd also retain ownership of the income stream and the ability to receive dividends. If he retained a specific power of appointment over the shares he'd also control them in the trust. The power of appointment would not be caught by Sec. 70(5)-(5.3) upon death since per Rulings privately, it's not a property.⁴¹⁹ If taxable dispositions occurred immediately after the property's acquisition due to the recent cost minimal tax consequences would result while with powers of appointment the capital element could be received back if needed perhaps after the death by his estate.⁴²⁰ With the power of appointment the testator can choose where the insurance proceeds are funneled to avoiding any form of FMV taxation to whomever she decides, at a later date: in the meantime they satisfy a loan's covenant's via the trust, or, encourage better family cohesiveness inter vivos.

God only knows where those insurance proceeds could end up tax-free when a power of appointment isn't "a property" that can be used in a Sec. 70(7)-(8) tainted spousal trust listing process thus not being a goose the other way, or, the FMV of the shares is stamped fixed inherent in its properties regardless what Sec. 70(5.3) says.

In some ways it is better that the testator not own shares in corporations or interests/powers in trusts but instead simply set up the proceed recipient with liquid cash to stream off exactly with foresight.

Question 33 of the 1988 CRA Roundtable Discussions recognized that when property is transferred to a trust and an income interest in the property's revenues is taken back a disposition of the remainder interest, (ultimate legal title of the shares), will be recognized by the transferor. The ACB of the remainder interest will ⁴¹⁵ I wish I could have the fun of ignoring our Income Tax Act, but hey, I don't invent the rules.

⁴¹⁶ And, like any Monty Python movie, watch what happens when CRA finally says that a power issss "a property", then we have a whole new legislation ball-game!

⁴¹⁷ See "Combining Trusts and Life Insurance in Estate Planning: Tricks and Traps" by Robin Goodman in The Canadian Tax Journal.

⁴¹⁸ To avoid a gain after a tax free Sec. 85(1) incorporation the trust as compared to the individual incorporator could receive cash without tax consequences to purchase its own shares.

⁴¹⁹ Subsection 75(2) would apply to attribute income from the shares out to the transferor but Sec. 4(4) could be relied upon to eliminate a double inclusion: Sec. 75(2) forces income from the particular property to be recognized while Sec. 108(5) causes such income to be from a trust interest: a different property, but from the same place. The subsection 104(19) dividend flow through could be used to obtain the Sec. 4(4) relief. If the power were to be held by the taxpayer's personal holding corporation it would not be captured by Sec. 70(5) and would allow Sec. 75(2) to be avoided.

⁴²⁰ See Commr. v. Hedges, 1935 3 A.T.D. 255, and Perp. Trustee Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of S.D., 64 C.L.R. 492.

equal its fair market value divided by the fair market value of the total property, (capital and income rights), multiplied by the ACB of the total property. Where the capital stock has a history of producing significant dividend streams in relation to its residual value a disposition where only the remainder interest is disposed of, will attract less tax consequences than if the shares transferred produced more dividends: the proportionate value of the remainder would be larger. Since an income interest in the dividend streams of shares held in trust isn't a capital property, (unless the trust isn't personal), it will not be subject to the Sec. 70(5) rules upon death but could be favorably transferred under the Sec. 70(2)-(3) mechanism to be commented upon.⁴²¹

If the taxpayer transferred the shares to an inter vivos spousal trust then he would have to "lose control" of them until the spouse died in order for Sec. 73(1) to apply, (unless a power of appointment is varied in afterwards), however if dividends continued to be paid on them, through an Sec. 104(19) designation the spouse could recognize the dividend portion of the trust income as dividend income whereupon she could designate under Sec. 82(3), (if the corporation was a taxable Canadian corporation), whereby the original owner would continue to recognize the dividends paid out to his spouse.⁴²² In this way the tax result would be the same only he would have been sheltered from the possible application of Sec. 70(5).⁴²³ If his capital interest in the inter vivos spousal trust terminates upon death its fair market value immediately before death may still be large and tax consequences could be recognizable in respect of it under Sec. 70(5).⁴²⁴ (This isn't necessarily the case with discretionary capital interests that gain value only if the discretionary power is exercised. Again, this is very similar to a redeemable "capped" fair market value share when the actual characteristics of the property do not warrant a high FMV since that's the nature of the property: a discretionary capital interest has no value until the 3rd party power vesting it is played.)⁴²⁵

Where the corporation receives the proceeds of the policy, as per Sec. 89(1)(b)(iv), the excess thereof over the ACB of the policy as defined in Sec. 148(9)(a), will enter the corporation's capital dividend account which will be available to be paid out as a non-taxable capital dividend under Sec. 83(2). If the inter vivos spousal trust receives them the spouse need not be entitled to them, since they do not represent "income". They will not be taxed upon receipt by the spousal trust and can be flowed through to a non-spousal beneficiary upon her death, or, in the interim, be used to enhance the value of a capital interest allowing for it to have a larger collateral value for interim loan purposes.⁴²⁶ Subsection 75(2) would apply to attribute dividend interim income from the shares out to the transferor in the case of a spousal trust but by virtue of the last phrase of Sec. 108(5) the transferor would be able to negate the double income inclusion in respect of the dividends if the trust made 421 If the shares are to appreciate in value with increasing dividend streams as the incorporator ages a retention of a life interest in the shares only by the taxpayer will allow for the avoidance of Sec. 70(5) gains thereupon while Sec. 70(2) will not capture the life interest in the dividend potential if it is terminate upon the death (or rolled through under Sec. 70(3)). Dividend payout can be increased after the incorporator has recognized a disposition of the remainder estate to a trust or other party so as to allow for an increased proportional a.c.b. of the remainder interest upon its disposition. See C.I.R. v. Sunnylands Trust, 35 T.C. 576, for trust of capital but not of income arising from it. See Ingram v. I.R.C., 1986 1 Ch. 585, where the Ramsay doctrine was applied to an instance where a taxpayer successively granted a lease in property and subsequently arranged for the residual interest to wind up in the same lessee's hands. A composite transaction was found to have been orchestrated and the taxpayer didn't recognize the beneficial tax consequences of the splitting in the dispositions. Could this dicta be applicable where, as above, the effects of Sec. 70(5)-(2) can be systematically reduced/avoided through the proper conveyances of property rights to the proper parties with the retention of proper powers or reversions?

422 See I.T. 295R.

423 The spousal inter vivos trust could be varied to grant him a power of appointment over the shares after the applicability of Sec. 73(1) has been accepted thus the transferor doesn't have to lose control over the long term however upon a varying in of a power one interest holder would recognize a disposition of his interest, (which can be avoided if the beneficiary and trust are non-resident or if the spousal trust is non-resident and the interest is held in another non-resident trust for the benefit of a resident beneficiary).

424 See Weller v. Commr. of S.D. (NSW), 84 A.T.C. 4111 (SCNSW), where a capital interest's value was plunged prior to the exposure to stamp duties on death when advances were made to the other beneficiary to virtually terminate the trust. To be noted however is the difference between an advance and a distribution which isn't recouped in subsequent periods.

425 See In re: Trafford's Settlement, 1985 1 Ch. 32, for some related issues. Obviously it could be "less messy" to convey the remainder interest to the other party and simply retain a life interest in specie in the share's dividends subsequent to which the dividend rate is increased to allow a shift in the maximum amount of a.c.b. to the remainder interest for disposition purposes. Such a shifting is desirable even if the Sec. 73(1) roll is utilized since the shares will have to suffer a disposition some time.

426 They can also materially warp the relative f.m.v.s of the capital interests under the trust.

the Sec. 104(19) designation in respect of him.

A taxpayer could always transfer the shares to his spouse under Sec. 73(1) whereafter a period of years she could transfer them to a spousal trust described in Sec. 73(1) and whereunder the original transferor would be the spouse while the effect of Sec. 70(5.3) would be avoided upon the transferor's death⁴²⁷: he doesn't own a capital interest in the trust.

Subsection 70(5.3) does apply for purposes of Sec. 104(4) which causes a trust to recognize FMV deemed dispositions of its policy supported shares on the death of the underlying spouse so it is not possible to gain any advantage in placing policy-funded shares in the trust but that's a very small impediment to funneling insurance proceeds that it's not worth nothing when there are so many other ways to get it done.

Avoiding Sec. 70(5.3) and the Buy-Sell.

Shares held in an inter vivos trust are not exposed to deemed disposition when an incorporator and discretionary beneficiary in respect of them dies. In the interim, from the date they were acquired for cash by the trust to the date of death, the beneficiary can realize the dividend income while a buy-sell agreement may be structured in relation to the shares with regard to the trust to allow for their orderly transfer to the appropriate parties upon the settlor's death.⁴²⁸⁴²⁹ A buy-sell agreement can be entered into by either the trust and the other shareholders inter vivos to provide for a buy out of the positions on the death, or it can be structured between the to-be-vested beneficiaries of the trust if the shares are to be rolled to them. Since the original incorporator need only be interested in the income until death, with possible powers of appointment over the shares, Sec. 70(2) and Sec. 70(5)-(5.3) will be avoided. A capital interest in the trust will be subject to Sec. 70(5) and even though its Sec. 108(1)(d) cost may be inflated to reduce capital gain it may still be preferable to simply hold a power of appointment over the shares which has its cost determined by Sec. 69(1)(c) and the power will not be captured.⁴³⁰

How to finance the purchase of the shares or interests is always a concern: either the shareholders arrange financing outside the arrangement (such as to obtaining bank loans the interest upon which should be deductible) or can finance it through life insurance taken on the incorporator's life held personally, by the trust or by the corporation or by the beneficiaries. If the corporation receives the life insurance proceeds they will be included in its capital dividends account and either flowed down to the individual shareholders or the trust tax free once the above simple hurdles have been over-come. If interests in the trust are to be the object of the agreement the dividends may not be flowed favourably from the trust to the beneficiary immediately upon receipt: the interests will be purchased capital dividends suffering a Sec. 104(20) designation will reduce capital loss/increase capital gains exposure on a disposition of the interest or property distributed in satisfaction of it via the reduction in cost base under Sec. 53(2)(h) even if the trust doesn't lose its personal character. For this reason it is advisable that either the trust be varied or have the necessary characteristics that would prevent the dividends from being distributed in the year of receipt by the trust or have the beneficiary or trust themselves hold the insurance policy so that the proceeds do not have to be cascaded down from the corporation/trust. If the trust is the beneficiary of the policy the proceeds can be used to reverse finance the acquisition of the other interests by the acquiring beneficiary immediately following death without fear of the above however immediately after death, and before the execution of the agreement the proceeds will inflate the FMVs of the interests which could attract the application of Sec. 69(1) if the buy-out does not proceed between arm's length parties while if it does, and the pre-agreed price is less than the value of the interest a capital loss could not ⁴²⁷ since it doesn't apply to trust interests. Of prime importance is the actual passage of beneficial ownership of the shares.

⁴²⁸ See "Shareholders' Buy-Sell Agreements to operate on the Winding Up of a Trust" by J. E. Magee, 1991 C.T.J. Vol. 39 #4, pg. 983

⁴²⁹ Since the trust need not be spousal it will not undergo a deemed disposition on the death of the life tenant but over the long term the trust must distribute the shares to avoid their Sec. 104(4) disposal.

⁴³⁰ The interests of the trust rather than the shares themselves may be the subject of the agreement in which case their enforceability may be deferred pursuant to the trust deed until an agreement is reached or enforced. The interests can be disposed of by the beneficiaries in execution of the agreement with far less tax exposure, (with the use of powers of appointment inflations etc.) while if the agreement couldn't be reached the trust could compel the sale of the shares outright.

be produced since the interest disposed of would not otherwise have a legitimate ACB.⁴³¹

Can a trust pay for an insurance policy on the life of its settlor and have the proceeds be payable directly to a beneficiary without attracting a full Sec. 105(1) inclusion of "benefit" that is not otherwise cited in Sec. 53(2)(h) or subject to the section 107 mechanics? The author thinks of the fact that the beneficiary is realizing a benefit, even before death, that is not caught by the other sections of the Act that is under or in respect of a trust and thus leading to full income inclusion as detailed in the purpose of Sec. 105(1).

An alternative would be to have the trust receive the insurance proceeds either directly, or indirectly through the corporate dividend account, and distribute them in the following year pursuant to the exercise of a power of appointment/power of allocation operating in respect of immediate interests though contingent on an agreement between the beneficiaries as to the quantum of benefit. If the trust power must be exercised in respect of an agreement reached by the beneficiaries when their interests allow them to either receive an allotment of the trust's shares or of the proceeds (as well as possibly other cash pools) realized depending on an agreement reached with the other beneficiaries then interests are not being transferred: some are being satisfied in a certain manner with certain property and others differently. The beneficiaries would agree so that one or two etc. would be entitled to the shares and all others would be entitled to the cash. Of course the trust deed would have to be properly structured to allow for this and the quantum of benefits to be realized by a disengaging beneficiary would have to be accurately established pursuant to the trust's terms so as to avoid any litigation based on purported fraudulent exercise of powers/impartiality, etc.: the magnitude of the benefits could be referenced to the corporation's financial worth/earnings potential/off-spring involvement etc. at the time of execution to allow for the dynamics of the situation.

If planting controlling shares in a trust testamentarily, either non or spousal, exterior to the trust arrangement the beneficiaries could subscribe for shares in the corporation directly and the corporate charter could provide for a buy-out of the trust's shares immediately after death or on further subscription whereby control of the corporation would migrate to those shareholders who acquired shares as a predetermined plan. The incorporator in this case would otherwise determine who would be allowed to subscribe for shares while the insurance proceeds paid to the trust to redeem its shares could make up part of the consideration one shareholder would receive on selling his shares to another. Such an instance allows the trust to realize a capital loss when the shares have gone through a Sec. 70(5) (as compared to a Sec. 70(5.3)) disposition which can be carried back against the testator's income inclusions via Sec. 164(6) and though the unadministered estate must have its shares redeemed within the first executor's year in order for the carry-back to occur the proceeds. In effect, attract the application of Sec. 70(5)-(5.3) by sending the controlling shares through a terminal disposition, setting up their cost to the spouse/trust/estate, and carry-back the loss when they are redeemed post-mortum so that the net effect is negligible between the 2 parties (testator and recipient) and the insurance proceeds go to the relevant buy-out. The beneficiary-shareholder selling out gets some of the proceeds, and those not don't.

One concern in any buy-sell agreement is that of retaining any losses the corporation has booked that could be lost with a change in control while Sec. 256(7) provides some relief here. Where the shares are acquired by an executor or trustee which acquired the shares by virtue of the death of any other person or by anyone who received them by way of a distribution by an estate arising on the death of a related person the control of the corporation will not be recognized to have changed for purposes of section 111. If the incorporator exercises a power of appointment over the inter vivos trust's shares in his will to transfer the shares to his estate a change in control statutorily won't occur, (the shares don't have to be owned by the testator prior to death: all that is required is that they be acquired by virtue of his death), while if they are subsequently distributed from the testamentary trust to a beneficiary related to the testator control again won't change, even if they are distributed in satisfaction of a interest acquired in a buy-sell as a final step. Care must be taken here to confirm from CRA that for these purposes a spousal "trust" is equal to an "estate" since Sec. 256(7) lies outside subdivision k and it is only within that the two are equal: Sec. 256(7) refers exclusively to estates and not trusts, another instance where Finance Canada seems to have recognized that the two are not equal.

⁴³¹ The a.c.b. could be bumped however with the use of powers of appointment or alterations in residency by the interest holder.

Obviously there are "a thousand and one ways" to structure a testamentary buy-sell agreement with respect to corporation shares (or just as well partnership interests) with the use of an inter vivos or testamentary trust while advantages, in the form of Sec. 70(5.3) avoidance, could be obtained that would otherwise not be available.⁴³²

Powers of Appointment.

A power of appointment over property held in trust constitutes "a property" for purposes of the Act being a choice in action however valuing it for subsection 70(5) can be a very subjective exercise.⁴³³ That's in the author's opinion, even though CRA seems to think that a power of appointment is not a property per se.⁴³⁴ The power can be said to be "owned" for purposes of Sec. 70(5) since the trust deed grants it to the holder though alienation may be hindered by its mere nature.⁴³⁵ In the author's opinion the power will have its cost determined via Sec. 69(1)(c) since it's a property and it is acquired by way of gift etc.. This may reduce tax consequences upon its extinguishment depending on what the value of the subject property does.⁴³⁶

Melville & Ors v Inland Revenue⁴³⁷ is a UK Appeal Ct. case that specifically provides, concerning the application of inheritance tax to a power of appointment:

"This appeal gives rise to a short but difficult question of construction of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 ("the Act"): is a general power of appointment exercisable by the holder over property comprised in a settlement "property" forming part of the estate of the holder? In the case of the settlement with which we are concerned the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ("the Revenue") claimed that it was not and by notices of determination dated 5 August 1999 under s. 222 of the Act informed the settlor of the settlement, Leslie Melville, and the settlement trustees, Philip Enoch and Lawrence Melville, that they had so determined. I shall call the settlor and the trustees "the taxpayers". On an appeal to the High Court by the taxpayers, Lightman J. on 20 June 2000 (in a judgment reported at [2000] STC 628) allowed the appeal, upholding their argument that the power was "property". The Revenue now appeal to this court with the leave of the judge.

...

The judge commenced his consideration of the arguments by looking at the meaning of the terms "property", "rights" and "interests" and the authorities relating thereto. It is unnecessary for me to rehearse the judge's review of the authorities because the judge's conclusion on this point is not challenged. The judge said ([2000] STC para. 13 at p. 634):

"In summary, whatever the technical meaning of the word 'property', it seems to me that the terms 'property', 'interest' and 'right' are capable of embracing a general power of appointment depending on the legislative context, for they are terms capable (as is such a general power) of embracing anything which is capable of producing value, being realised and turned into money, and a general power is capable of exactly this: it may be exercised to vest property in the appointor and it may be released for valuable consideration. Whether the words do bear this meaning in s 3(1) of the Act must depend upon the legislative scheme and purpose of the Act."

432 See also "Dispositions of Life Insurance Policies" by Joel Cuperfain, Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 23 Pg. 129 for ancillary instances where the insurance policy itself is the focus of the transaction, not the proceeds upon death.

433 A power is the ability to control the legal or beneficial interest in property legally or beneficially owned by another. See the chapter on Varying the Trust Setting and in particular issues related to powers-in-trust that do have some limitation on how they can be exercised – re: in regard to the intentions of the grantor for specific purposes. See the UK case of Melville & Ors. CIR [2001] STC 1271 specifically on this issue.

434 CRA Rulings has provided to the author a private technical opinion that for purposes of their use in the Sec. 70(7)-(8) property listing process a power isn't a property, even if it is alienable as requested by the author.

435 A power must be "a property", it's a right and even with limitations on alienation it still has a value. For the broadest definition of a property see Jones v. Skinner (1836), 5 L.J. (N.S.) c. 87 at 90 "the most comprehensive of all the terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have", cited in Estate of Fasken v. M.N.R. 49 DTC 491 at 496, The Queen v. Kieboom 92 DTC 6382 at 6386.

436 Is it possible for it to create a capital loss for its holder?

437 [2001] EWCA Civ 1247, [2001] STC 1271, [2001] NPC 132, 74 TC 372, [2001] EWCA Civ 1247, [2001] STI 1106, [2001] WTLR 887, [2001] BTC 8039, [2002] 1 WLR 407

...

The judge referred to two submissions made by the Revenue. One was the fact that the existence of powers under trusts does not diminish the value of the settled property in the hands of the life tenant, and should not constitute property in the hands of the donee of the power. The other was that a general power, if "property" within the meaning of s. 3 (1), will constitute a reversionary interest whilst a future interest, but once it is presently exercisable there will be double taxation on the death of the holder of the general power who exercises the power by will so as to terminate an interest in possession.⁴³⁸ The judge accepted that those were arguments in favour of the Revenue's construction. But, the judge said, the arguments were not all one way. He pointed to a number of other considerations, saying (para. 22 at p. 636):

"Further the reality is that a general power of appointment is something of a very real value vested in the appointor, and the definition of property in Section 272 is deliberately of the widest character. Looking at Section 3 (1) in the context of the [Act] as a whole I do not think that it can be held that the context requires that the statutory definition should not apply in case of Section 3 (1)."

...

Skilfully and attractively though these submissions were made, I am not persuaded by them. They seem to me to concentrate too much on the settled property in a settlement while ignoring the basic scheme of the Act to charge tax on chargeable transfers made, or deemed to be made, by individuals. The holder of a general power of appointment (in contrast with the holder of a special power which he cannot exercise in his own favour) unquestionably has a valuable right, the value of which must be taken into account in the value of the holder's estate under s. 5 (1) unless excluded by some provision of the Act. As Mr. Nugee submitted, the truly remarkable proposition is that put forward by the Revenue that although the holder of the general power has effective dominion over the settled property if he chooses to exercise it, nevertheless it is to be left out of account on the death of the holder. The nub of Mr. Furness' submissions is to assimilate a general power to a reversionary interest. A power is of a wholly different character from a reversionary interest, and whilst the cl. 4 (c) power was not presently exercisable during the first 90 days of the settlement, once that period was over the power became presently exercisable and even less like a reversionary interest. There is nothing which I can see in the Act to suggest that it was the draftsman's intention or thought that a general power is a reversionary interest. I do not accept that it is inappropriate or asymmetrical to recognise the reality that a general power of appointment is a valuable asset in the holder's estate, while at the same time recognising that, for example, the life tenant of settled property subject to an unexercised power of appointment can be deemed to be entitled to the settled property the income of which the life tenant enjoys. Mr. Nugee was right to say that the reason why the provisions relating to settled property do not include any reference to powers is that those provisions are designed to apply to the beneficial interests in settled property as they exist at any given time and to the persons for the time being entitled to them. In short there is nothing in the settled property provisions which causes or requires the cl. 4 (c) power to be excluded property or otherwise prevents it from being, as a valuable right or interest, property the value of which is to be included in the settlor's estate. I conclude, in agreement with the judge, that the context does not require "property" to have a meaning other than the statutory meaning."

In *Minister of Revenue (Ontario) v. McCreath*⁴³⁹ the Supreme Court of Canada had to consider whether a taxpayer had her power to appoint trust property captured for estate tax purposes, even when she failed to exercise it in her will. It held:

"On the death of Mrs. McCreath the primary duty of the trustee was to dispose of the trust fund among the issue of Mrs. McCreath or such of them as she might by will direct and subject to such terms and conditions as she might by will direct. In default of such direction, the capital of the fund was to be distributed among her issue in equal shares per stirpes. Although Mrs. McCreath retained the power by will to choose which of her issue should be the object of her bounty, she died without exercising that power.

⁴³⁸ Author's note: see "Testamentary Planning to Avoid Double Taxation" by H. Elise Rees in The Canadian Tax Journal where double taxation issues are discussed.

⁴³⁹ [1977] 1 S.C.R. 2

Thus there were many "strings" attached to the property of which Mrs. McCreath purported to dispose. The appeal arises under The Succession Duty Act of Ontario R.S.O. 1960, c. 386, and the crucial questions to be answered are: (i) Did Mrs. McCreath, either expressly or by implication, reserve to herself an interest in the property passing under the trust so as to make it "property passing on the death of the deceased" as defined in s. 1(p) (viii) of the Act? (ii) Was actual and bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property assumed by the issue of Mrs. McCreath and retained to the entire exclusion of Mrs. McCreath so as to exempt the property from tax by the operation of s. 5(1) (g)? I would answer the first question in the affirmative, the second question in the negative and allow the appeal of the Minister.

...

Subject to ss. 4 and 5 of the Act, succession duty is payable on the death of any person domiciled in Ontario or elsewhere where any property situate in Ontario passes on his death. The Act is drafted so as to catch all forms of transactions which have the result of transferring property on death. Therefore "property passing on the death of the deceased" is broadly defined and is deemed to include, according to s. 1(p) (viii):

any property passing under any past or future settlement, including any trust, whether expressed in writing or otherwise and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not, as between the settlor and any other person, made by deed or other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property or the proceeds of sale thereof for life, or any other period determinable by reference to death, is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right by the exercise of any power to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property, or the proceeds of sale thereof, or to otherwise resettle the same or any part thereof,...

...

Reservation of an interest under s. 1 (p)(viii)

It is essential, I think, to identify with some precision the "property" which can be said to have passed in the settlement of 1948. This question usually presents difficulty, especially in an Act such as the present one which provides no statutory definition. In the present case the question of definition is of particular importance because counsel for the respondents submits in effect that Mrs. McCreath made two gifts, one a gift of the equitable interests in the net income from the trust fund and the other a gift of the equitable remainder in the corpus of the fund. With respect, I do not agree with this reading of the indenture. In my view the "property passing" under the settlement was the equitable interest in a voting trust certificate representing 99,986 common shares in the capital stock of Mount Royal Paving & Supplies Limited which were transferred by Mrs. McCreath to the trustee.

If the "property" for purposes of s. 1(p)(viii) is such equitable interest, the next question is whether Mrs. McCreath retained an "interest" therein. In all the circumstances it seems to me difficult to say that she did not reserve an interest in the property, the subject-matter of the trust. Collectively she and her children were entitled to all of the income.

...

There are no Canadian precedents to illuminate s. 1(p)(viii). Two English authorities construing tax legislation in almost identical wording may afford some guidance. In Attorney General v. Heywood (1887), 19 Q.B.D. 326, s. 38(2)(c) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (U.K.) c. 12 was in issue. It taxed:

(c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day [June 1, 1881] by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life, or any other period determinable by reference to death, is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property.

In Heywood the settlor created a trust fund of £43,000 held on the following trusts: to pay income to such of the settlor, his wife and children for the settlor's life as the trustee should choose and on the settlor's death to hold the property in trust for the widow and children. It was argued that all that was reserved to the settlor was a mere possibility or contingency, and not an interest. Stephen J. held that the settlor had retained an interest for life within the terms of the statute and Wills J. stated, p. 331:

The application of the word "interest" is not confined to a vested or a necessarily contingent interest. The Act was meant to cast a wider net than such a construction would imply. The settlor here could only be deprived of the benefit he would otherwise get under the settlement by the exercise of the power of depriving him of such benefit which was vested in the trustees, and unless the trustees so deprived him he would necessarily get a benefit.

The same interpretation of "interest" was adopted in Attorney-General v. Farrell [1931] 1 K.B. 81 (C.A.), where the settlor was also a discretionary object of income of a trust for his life with a gift over on his death and Lord Hanworth M.R. had this to say, p. 98:

However, even without the support which can be gathered from Drummond v. Collins, [1915] A.C. 1011, I think it is too late for us to reopen the question which was decided in Attorney-General v. Heywood; and I think that for the purposes of the interpretation of s. 38, sub-s. 2(c), it must be held that where there is a discretionary trust, a possible object of that trust holds an interest within sub-s. 2(c).

It is the respondents' contention that the term "interest" should have a more technical meaning than in Heywood. They rely on Gartside v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1968] A.C. 553 (H.L.), where the discretionary object of a trust was held not to have an "interest in possession" for purposes of s. 43 of the Finance Act, 1940 (U.K.), c. 29. In that case, the terms of the trust gave the trustee the power to distribute all or part of the income among a class comprising the settlor's son, wife and issue for the son's life or to accumulate the income and provided for a gift over on the son's death. Lord Reid (Lords Morris and Guest concurring) held at p. 607:

...an examination of the relevant provisions of this legislation leads to the clear conclusion that objects of a discretionary trust do not have interests extending to the whole or any part of the income of the trust fund and it must follow that they do not have interests in the fund within the meaning of section 2(1) (b).

While this quotation would seem to support the respondents' contention that the deceased did not have an interest here, in my opinion Gartside is inapplicable.

...
I conclude that Mrs. McCreath retained an interest in the settled property for purposes of s. 1(p) (viii) by making herself one of the possible objects of the discretionary trust. The primary objects of the donor's bounty are "the Settlor and her issue from time to time alive", and, in fact, the settlor did receive income pursuant to para. 1(a). Mrs. McCreath could apply to the Court to require the trustee to respect the terms of the trust if it refused to exercise its discretion. The fact that a discretionary object may have no interest in property law terms because she has no "right" to a definable amount of income is irrelevant. I do not believe that the niceties and arcana of ancient property law should be fastened upon with mechanical rigidity to determine the effect of a modern taxation statute whose purpose is plain."⁴⁴⁰

⁴⁴⁰ In the Aust. case of Scaffidi -V- Montevento Holdings Pty Ltd [2011] WASCA 146 (7 July 2011) citing the Aust. article of TW Magney, 'A Comparative Analysis of Estate Planning Vehicles', (1977-78) 12 Taxation in Australia 222 where it was opined, citing comprehensive jurisprudence:

71 Later in his article, Mr Magney made these comments about the death and estate duty consequences arising from the existence of a power of appointment in a discretionary trust deed:

A 'general power of appointment' is defined in section 100 of the Stamp Duties Act [1920 (NSW)] as a power which enables the holder thereof to appoint or dispose of any property as he thinks fit for his own benefit but does not include a power exercisable by a person in a fiduciary capacity for the benefit of others only arising under a disposition not made by himself. The definition of general power of appointment would include many powers which apart from the definition would be only special powers of appointment. If the power of appointment contained in a discretionary trust falls within the above definition then the property the subject of the power may be included in the estate of the person possessing the power by virtue of section 102(2)(a), (b) or (j) - see Hill, Stamp Death & Estate Duties, page 234, and Silk's case (1976), Aust Estate and Gift Duty Reporter.

A sole trustee who is also one of the objects of the discretionary trust will clearly have a 'general power of appointment' as defined. It is for this reason that I advocate use of a corporate trustee and strongly advise against an object being a trustee of the trust. (emphasis added)

The Estate Duty Assessment Act [1914 (Cth)] only includes in the estate of a deceased person property over which he had a general power of appointment exercised by will. General power of appointment is not defined and would therefore have its ordinary meaning (245 - 246). (original emphasis)

72 In a 1978 supplement to Discretionary Trusts, Dr Hardingham and Professor Baxt included a 'draft settlement' of a discretionary trust. In the precedent, 'John Doe' is the settlor and 'Roe Nominees Pty Ltd' is the trustee. The controller of the trust is 'Donald Doe' (Don) and the deed recites that the settlor desires to make provision for Don and his family. Don is a beneficiary (cl 1.5) and the appointor (cl 8.1). As appointor, Don is given the power, exercisable at any time and from time to time, to remove any trustee and to appoint 'any person or persons to be new and additional Trustees hereof (other than the Settlor or Don)' (emphasis added).

73 As at 2 May 1977, being the date of execution of the Trust Deed, s 10(1) of the Death Duty Assessment Act 1973 (WA) (the WA Act) provided that, for the purposes of the Act, the estate of a deceased person comprised:

(a) his real and personal property in the State; and

(b) his personal property situate outside the State if he was domiciled in the State at the time of his death.

74 By s 10(2)(i) of the WA Act, for the purposes of s 10(1), 'any property over which the deceased person had at the time of his death a general power of appointment, if that power is exercised by his will' was deemed to be property of the deceased person.

75 The WA Act did not define the term 'general power of appointment'.

76 As at 2 May 1977, the Estate Duty Assessment Act 1914 (Cth) (the Commonwealth Act) contained provisions similar to s 10(1) and s 10(2)(i) of the WA Act. The provision in the Commonwealth Act with respect to personal property referred to the deceased being domiciled in Australia at the time of his death. See s 8(1) and s 8(3) of the Commonwealth Act. Like the WA Act, the Commonwealth Act did not contain a definition of 'general power of appointment'.

77 Powers of appointment over property can be divided into general powers, special powers and intermediate powers. A general power confers on the holder the right to appoint to anyone in the world (including himself or herself). A special power entitles the holder to appoint to anyone within a specified class of individuals. An intermediate power entitles the holder to appoint to anyone in the world except a specified class of individuals. See Re Penrose [1933] Ch 793, 805 - 808; Re Triffitt's Settlement [1958] Ch 852, 860; Thompson v Commissioner of Stamp Duties [1969] 1 AC 320, 337 - 339; Re Manisty's Settlement [1974] Ch 17, 21; Re Hay's Settlement Trusts [1982] 1 WLR 202, 208 - 209; Schmidt v Rosewood Trust Ltd [2003] UKPC 26; [2003] 2 AC 709 [35], [42]; Snell's Equity, 2010, (32nd ed), 11-001.

78 In R & I Bank of Western Australia Ltd v Anchorage Investments Pty Ltd (1993) 10 WAR 59, Owen J expressed the opinion, in the context of contempt proceedings for alleged breach of an interlocutory injunction, that it was 'clearly arguable' that a combination of powers held by a natural person (Lombardo) 'may amount to a general power of appointment' even though the class of beneficiaries did not comprise everyone in the world. His Honour summarised the powers in question, as follows:

[Lombardo] was a beneficiary and not a member of the 'excluded class' as that term is defined in cl 1(3) of the Trust Deed. Accordingly, he was eligible to be appointed as trustee of the Trust. Lombardo was the appointor of the Trust. Under cl 21 of the Trust Deed he could, as appointor, remove Anchorage as trustee and appoint himself as trustee in its place. As a trustee, Lombardo had the power to deal with the trust fund in any way authorised by the Trust Deed. Clause 10 indicates that the discretions vested in the trustee by the Trust Deed 'shall be absolute and uncontrolled and every power vested in [the trustee] shall be exercisable at [the trustee's] absolute and uncontrolled discretion.' There is an exception where a guardian is in office. That exception does not apply because prior to 9 August 1991, no guardian had been appointed. Once Lombardo had become trustee, or in any event through his ability to control the actions of Anchorage, Lombardo was in a position, counsel for R & I submitted, to use the trust fund for his own purposes. He could, for example, appoint income to himself (cl 3(1)(a)) or advance the vesting date and vest the whole or part of the trust fund to himself beneficially (cl 4(1)(a)). Even before the vesting date he could pay any sum from the capital of the trust fund for his own use and benefit (cl 6(1)) or permit any beneficiary (including himself) to have the custody or use of immovable property (cl 6(6)). Further wide ranging powers are set Subsection 70(5) refers only to property owned by the testator, beneficially, and not solely legally, (such as in the capacity of a trustee), and since a power of appointment over property does not constitute ownership of the subject property the property itself is not subject to Sec. 70(5), though the power is. If the power is a trust power and not a mere power, and if it is instilled in the taxpayer by virtue of his holding the office of trustee and it isn't instilled in him in his personal capacity by naming him as the power holder without regard to his relationship to the trust, upon his death the power should not be captured by Sec. 70(5) since he doesn't own the power in a personal capacity.⁴⁴¹ In such an instance the trustee could exercise the power favorably in respect of a multitude of objects, though possibly be subject to question by legitimate beneficiaries, (though if the trust deed is properly structured to limit beneficiary recourse some flexibility could exist), and as long as the power is held by virtue of being a trustee Sec. 70(5) will not apply to it.⁴⁴² Thus, watch the language and scope by which you draft it.

If the power can be exercised so as to vest the power holder with the underlying property its value should equal the value of the underlying property thus the control of the ownership of the property is equated with that of actual ownership in a limited sense. If the power can be exercised only in respect of someone else other than the holder its value for purposes of Sec. 70(5) should again equal the value of the underlying property to which it relates regardless of its value to the deceased immediately before his death. That ability to control the ownership – beneficial or legal – of property should have a value to its exerciser even if it cannot be alienated or exercised in respect of him. This time the author tends to BENEFICIALLY disagree with CRA Rulings who have stated that it is not a property: but this is not the case with trust powers.

If the power terminates upon death then its fair market value technically doesn't decrease until that time but not if it terminates immediately before death. In the latter instance it would appear that a trust power to appoint property out from under a trust could prove valuable at insuring that the testator does not get caught by Sec. 70(5) in respect of property that he previously owned. If the power is exercisable under the will then the value of it still doesn't get caught by Sec. 70(5) since it is not owned in his personal capacity. The power of appointment will be caught by Sec. 75(2) in such an instance so as to cause income/gain/loss attribution if its holder is Canadian resident, and double taxation, but will not be subject to Sec. 70(5) on death.⁴⁴³ out in cl 7 including the power to borrow monies from the Trust, to use Trust assets as security for his own borrowings and to cause the trustee to give guarantees for his obligations. Lombardo also had the power to cause the Trust Deed to be varied or supplemented (cl 28) (80).

79 As at 2 May 1977, pt 4 of the Stamp Duties Act 1920 (NSW) (the NSW Act) imposed death duties. By s 101, in the case of every person who died after the passing of the Act, whether in New South Wales or elsewhere, and wherever the deceased was domiciled, death duty was assessable and payable upon the final balance of the estate of the deceased, as determined in accordance with the Act.

80 In general, the estate of a person who died domiciled in New South Wales attracted duty on the whole of his or her real property in New South Wales and his or her personal property wherever situated as at the date of death. In general, the estate of a person who died domiciled outside New South Wales attracted duty on his or her real and personal property in New South Wales as at the date of death.

81 By s 102(2)(j) of the NSW Act, the property of a deceased was deemed to include any property over or in respect of which the deceased had at the time of his or her death 'a general power of appointment'. The term 'general power of appointment' was defined in s 100 to include 'any power or authority which enables the donee or other holder thereof ... to appoint or dispose of any property ... as he thinks fit for his own benefit, whether exercisable by instrument inter vivos or by will or otherwise'. This definition included within the concept of a general power of appointment numerous powers which would ordinarily be classified as special powers of appointment.

441 See Re: Edward's Will Trusts, 1947 2 All E.R. 521, as well as Re: Buckingham, 1915 1 Ch. 241, Paterson's Trustees v. Finlay, 1918 S.C.R. 713, Re: Smith, 1904 1 Ch. 139, Re: Robinson, 1912 1 Ir. 411, Kennedy v. Kennedy, 1914 A.C. 215 (PC), Innes v. Harrison, 1954 1 W.L.R. 668, Whishaw v. Stephenson, 1970 A.C. 508, Re: Symm's Will Trusts, 1936 3 All E.R. 236, Re: Will's Trust Deeds, 1964 Ch. 219, Re: Everd, 1910 2 Ch. 147, & Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th Ed., Vol. 36, para. 860 for discussions on powers held in individual capacity or virtue office.

442 If the power can be exercised to grant interests to its holder it doesn't necessarily cause it not to be held in a trustee capacity.

443 In Grey v. F.C.T., 62 C.L.R. 49, the unexercisable contingent power of appointment of a testator held on his death was not captured for death duty purposes though this doesn't preclude it from having a value. In Equity Trustees and Exors. & Agency Co. v. Commr. of Probate Duties, 10 A.L.R. 131, a power to compel the trustee to raise by mortgage proceeds to be distributed was held not a power to appoint though for Canadian income tax purposes the power would have a value

Since a power of appointment created via a will whether in trust, or mere, is a property gifted by the will and not in existence as such prior to death the testator will not recognize a disposition in respect of it under Sec. 70(5)-(6) but those subsections will also preclude the recipient from recognizing a cost thereof since they compute the cost of property disposed of by the testator under those subsections only. Subparagraph 69(1)(c) will, however, allow the power gifted by the testator to have a cost amount equal to its fair market value at the time it is acquired by the recipient, even if the recipient is a spousal trustee in that Sec. 70(5)-(6) does not attend to its cost set up. In such a case the power cannot be said to be a property owned by the testator subject to Sec. 70(5) etc. since it is created by the death. Since the power isn't "distributed in satisfaction of a capital interest" Sec. 107(2) cannot apply to provide the cost of the power to the recipient trustee or otherwise and no provision operates to prevent Sec. 69(1)(c) from creating the cost of the property.⁴⁴⁴ Another power fused to the actual ownership could subsist with the executors/trustees⁴⁴⁵. If the power terminates after a certain period of time or upon the occurrence of a certain event it would appear that its holder, trust or individual, could recognize a capital loss even if the power is held in trust. Obviously this abnormality arises due to the fact that the property is being literally created by the will (the same as a testamentary option), and although it did not cost the recipient anything, (though it could have), it will start off with a deemed cost.⁴⁴⁶ Does anyone want to test CRA Rulings on this: seed down mere powers all over the place through a will and have them expire?⁴⁴⁷ Is a mere power of appointment over trust property "a gift" that is not a capital/income interest thus exempting it from the section 107 mechanics?

Forgiving Debt.

If a taxpayer forgives debt owing to him on his death its value would still be caught by Sec. 70(5). Regardless of whether such bequest is made depending on the interest rate applied, the prospect of repayment, etc., may affect the FMV of the debt causing capital gains or losses. The fact that the debt is to be forgiven upon death is of no influence in computing its FMV. Subsection 80(1)(h) allows the borrower to avoid an income inclusion if the forgiving act is a bequest or inheritance, regardless of how and when it is actually canceled.⁴⁴⁸ If the cancellation is to occur upon death the estate doesn't receive the property and no Sec. 70(6) roll is available in respect of it while it will also not be available to list under a Sec. 70(7) untainting process if need be. If the debt is contingently enforceable by the estate/trust depending on a condition precedent or subsequent once it is canceled the estate/trust shouldn't recognize a capital loss since the cancellation operates as a bequest⁴⁴⁹ but is there a distribution within the context of Sec. 107(2) etc.?⁴⁵⁰ equal to the amount that could be validly raised. There is a difference between a contingent event precluding the exercise of a power and an event giving effect to its previous exercise: Re: Manning 2 E.T.R. 195.

444 If the power is received quo trustee can it be a gift within the context of Sec. 69(1)(c)?

445 Since the power isn't a capital or income interest Sec. 107(1.1) or 106(1.1) does not apply to preclude Sec. 69(1)(c) from applying. The control of the ownership of property can be argued to be a gift.

446 This is a complete area of the I.T.A. that is dangerously lacking in attention and should be of immediate concern to the Department of Finance and those wishing to structure very favourable arrangements. See abusive uses of powers of appointment in Variations.

447 Then again, according to Rulings a power of appointment isn't a property for tainted spousal trust purposes so if they ever decide to change their minds there's all sorts of hocus-pocus problems they could cause.

448 There will not be any gains reserve available in the year of death under Sec. 40(1) though if the terms provide for a substantial deferral in extinguishment a loss may be created on the deemed disposition.

449 See Bone v. Commr. of S.D., 3 A.L.R. 561, Dawes v. Exors., Trustees, and Agency Co. of S.Aust. Ltd., 52 C.L.R. 291, Re: Howlett, 1964 Tas. S.R. 63, for common law bequests.

450 It may be possible to structure a partial tax free cost bump in property sold before death, a capital loss on the Sec. 70(5) disposition of the note receivable taken as consideration on the sale, perhaps following a Sec. 70(7) listing, when the terms call for substantially deferred payment, preserve the Sec. 72(2) reserve. The note can be rolled to a spousal trust not necessarily using Sec. 70(6) but if the recipient is a Sec. 70(6) spousal trust, cause the note to have a reduced interest rate while held by the spousal trust, but will retain the availability of the reserve via a spousal trust variation allowing for the debt cancellation since such would cause Sec. 107(4) to recognize a f.m.v. disposition of the note bringing all of the proceeds into capital gains computation.

Subject: Debts Bequeathed or Forgiven on Death

IT-382 Date: June 20, 1977

Capital Property

1. Subsection 70(5), except when subsection 70(6) or 70(9) applies, deems a deceased taxpayer to have disposed of all non-depreciable capital property immediately before his death for fair market value. This, of course, includes debts that are capital property.
2. If the deceased has given property to the debtor with a provision that it, or part of it, is to be used to pay such a debt, or he bequeaths the debt to the debtor, specifically or as part of a general bequest, or he forgives the debt in his will, there is no change in the deceased's tax position set forth in 1 above. This is also the case when a debtor receives the debt as heir in an intestacy.
3. It is the practice of the Department not to apply section 80 to the debtor in the circumstances referred to in 2 above and therefore there are no tax consequences to him. The adjusted cost base of any property owned by the debtor is also unaffected by the transactions referred to in 2 above.

Rights and Things

4. Rights or things may include debts forgiven by will. The fair market value of these is included in the deceased's income for his last year, either in a separate return, or in the ordinary return (subsection 70(2)) unless they have been transferred to the beneficiary of them before the later of one year after death and 90 days after the issuance of the assessment notice for the year of death. In the event of such a transfer the liability for tax on the right or thing falls on the beneficiary instead of the deceased.

Creation of Legal Life Interests.

“Life estates in real property – Sec. 43.1(1)”

(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, where at any time a taxpayer disposes of a remainder interest in real property (except as a result of a transaction to which subsection 73(3) would otherwise apply or by way of a gift to a donee described in the definition “total charitable gifts” or “total Crown gifts” in subsection 118.1(1)) to a person or partnership and retains a life estate or an estate pur autre vie (in this section called the “estate”) in the property, the taxpayer shall be deemed

(a) to have disposed at that time of the life estate in the property for proceeds of disposition equal to its fair market value at that time; and

(b) to have reacquired the life estate immediately after that time at a cost equal to the proceeds of disposition referred to in paragraph 43.1(1)(a).

“Exchanges of property – Sec. 43.1(2)”

(2) Where, as a result of an individual's death, a life estate to which subsection 43.1(1) applied is terminated,

(a) the holder of the life estate immediately before the death shall be deemed to have disposed of the life estate immediately before the death for proceeds of disposition equal to the adjusted cost base to that person of the life estate immediately before the death; and

(b) where a person who is the holder of the remainder interest in the real property immediately before the death was not dealing at arm's length with the holder of the life estate, there shall, after the death, be added in computing the adjusted cost base to that person of the real property an amount equal to the lesser of

(i) the adjusted cost base of the life estate in the property immediately before the death, and

(ii) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of the real property immediately after the death exceeds the adjusted cost base to that person of the remainder interest immediately before the death.

Subsection 43.1(2) states that when a life estate terminates on death the disposition is basically tax-free and only if the remainderman is not-dealing at arm's length with the life-interest holder there is a migration of cost to the remainderman.

Question 33 of the 1988 CRA Roundtable Discussions recognized that when property is transferred to a trust and an income interest in the property's revenues is taken back a disposition of the remainder interest, (ultimate legal title of the shares), will be recognized by the transferor. The ACB of the remainder interest will equal its fair market value divided by the fair market value of the total property, (capital and income rights), multiplied by the ACB of the total property.⁴⁵¹

⁴⁵¹ In Commr off State Revenue (Victoria) v Pioneer Concrete (Vic) Pty Limited, 2002 209 C.L.R. 651 HCA, an estate in fee simple was transferred and there was some issue as to what exactly its value was when there were certain additional non-property rights of use were attached to it.

See also the recent Cdn. case of Darrell Frank Nauss v. Her Majesty The Queen, 2005-785(IT)I, where the TCC considered valuation methods of the interests and held:

[17] Mr. Chappell did do some research and he set out what strikes me as a fairly reasonable starting point in valuing life interests and remainder interests. The valuation of such interests is at best an imprecise calculation. It is not like valuing a house in a subdivision where one can look to comparable sales. Life interests and remainder interests are, after all, not exactly a hot commodity on the real estate market. In any event, you either take the total value and deduct from it the value of the remainder interest to arrive at the value of the life interest or else you take the total value and deduct from it the value of the life interest to arrive at the value of the remainder interest. The latter method is difficult but the former is virtually impossible. A life interest has a finite and, at least in theory, an ascertainable value. You cannot determine a remainder interest in a vacuum or in the abstract. You have to determine the value of the life interest first and excise it out of the total value before you value the remainder interest.

[18] The virtual impossibility of determining the remainder interest in some manner other than by first valuing the life interest is illustrated by the following passage from Mr. Chappell's report:

3.2.4. Method 1 Remainderman Interest

In calculating the Remainderman Interest the first step is to forecast the total future value of the subject property at the date that the Life Estate is expected to expire (based on mortality tables). This total future value is then discounted back to the effective date of valuation to provide an indication of the total present worth of the value. This present value is representative of the Remainderman Interest and indicates the current value to the property owner. By deducting this Remainderman Interest from the total fair market at the effective date one can arrive at the value of the Life Interest as a residual value.

3.2.5 Method 2 Life Interest

The calculation of the Life Estate considers the present value of the potential net revenue that the property may be capable of producing. Only the Life Tenant has the right to receive rent from the property during the life tenancy. With this method, an estimate of the income the property can produce and the expenses it would incur must be estimated. The net income is then capitalized at an appropriate rate to provide a present value of the anticipated cash flow over the estimated term of the Life Interest based on mortality tables. By deducting this Life Interest from the total fair market at the effective date one can arrive at the value of the Remainderman Interest as a residual value.

In the case of the subject property, the Remainderman Interest is the interest that accrues to the grandchildren, Darrell Nauss and Leone Russell. It is the value of the right to own the property when the life estate is ultimately extinguished. A similar calculation was made for both dates. The first date is the date that the Life Interest was created and the second date is the date when the Life Interest was extinguished.

3.2.6 Remainderman Interest

In order to estimate the Remainderman Interest in the property at each date we must follow 3 steps as noted above:

Step 1. Estimate the fair market value of the property at the date the life estate was created – September 1997 and the date of the sale of the property in November 2002.

Step 2. Forecast the future value of the property when it is anticipated that the Life Interest will cease to exist and the grandchildren will gain the fee simple interest in the property. This must be done for each of the two dates.

Researched, Written and Published by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm®

Step 3. Discount that estimated future value back to provide a present value based on the expected duration of the life estate. This also must be done for each of the two dates.

In addressing the valuation issues we have broken the process into two sections. The first addresses the value allocation as of the date the Life Interest was created i.e. September 1997. The second addresses the value allocation as of the date the Life Interest was extinguished i.e. November 2002.

In the result we have to start by valuing the life interest at the two dates – December 15, 1997 and November 27, 2002.

[19] I come back to the Crown's calculations set out above. A few things strike me as interesting, if not peculiar. The first is that Mr. Nauss' taxable capital gain on the new calculations is $34,245 whereas the capital gain on the old and erroneous assumption that Mr. Nauss and his sister got the entire fee simple in 1997 and sold it in 2002 results in a taxable capital gain for him of $35,000 – a difference of only $755. This despite the fact that Mr. Nauss' mother in 1997 at 70 had an actuarial life expectancy of 16.02 years and in 2002 of 12.44 years. Another thing that is somewhat odd is that according to the above calculations the fmV of the life interest in 1997 as calculated by the Minister's expert is $108,180 whereas five years later in 2002 when Mrs. Nauss was 75 the fmV of her life interest was $111,199. Now it is true that the overall value of the property rose by $140,000 from $245,000 to $385,000. A purely mathematical calculation would look something like this, assuming the fmV of the life interest to be $108,180 in 1997:

$$\frac{$108,180 \times 385,000}{245,000} = 169,997 \times \frac{12.44}{16.02} = 132,007.76$$

[20] It should also be borne in mind that the use of any factor that increases the proportion of the entire value that is attributable to the remainder interest is a two-edged sword. In 1997 it increases the appellant's adjusted cost base of the remainder interest. In 2002 it also increases the proportion of $385,000 that is attributable to the sale of the remainder interest so that the capital gain on the sale of the remainder interest is adjusted both ways and remains relatively constant.

[21] According to Mr. Chappell the life interest on September 15, 1997 was 44.15 percent of the total value whereas on November 22, 2002, it represented 35.55 percent of the total. This is roughly consistent with the fact that Mrs. Nauss' actuarial life expectancy had declined from 16.02 years to 12.44 years. It is interesting, albeit irrelevant, that statistically Mrs. Nauss was expected in 2002 to live for 12.44 years whereas she in fact died on November 12, 2003. It certainly proves the truth of the statement that we know neither the day nor the hour.

[22] The question of using the actual date of death rather than actuarial mortality tables arose in Ithaca Trust Co. v. United States, 279 U.S. 151. The answer seems obvious – the actuarial tables should be used. However, I am pleased that this view was confirmed by no less an authority than Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who said at pages 154-5:

The second question is raised by the accident of the widow having died within the year granted by the statute, section 404, and regulations, for filing the return showing the deductions allowed by section 403, the value of the net estate and the tax paid or payable thereon. By section 403(a)(3) the net estate taxed is ascertained by deducting among other things gifts to charity such as were made in this case. But as those gifts were subject to the life estate of the widow of course their value was diminished by the postponement that would last while the widow lived. The question is whether the amount of the diminution, that is, the length of the postponement, is to be determined by the event as it turned out, of the widow's death within six months, or by mortality tables showing the probabilities as they stood on the day when the testator died. The first impression is that it is absurd to resort to statistical probabilities when you know the fact. But this is due to inaccurate thinking. The estate so far as may be is settled as of the date of the testator's death. The tax is on the act of the testator not on the receipt of property by the legatees. Therefore the value of the thing to be taxed must be estimated as of the time when the act is done. But the value of property at a given time depends upon the relative intensity of the social desire for it at that time, expressed in the money that it would bring in the market. Like all values, as the word is used by the law, it depends largely on more or less certain prophecies of the future, and the value is no less real at that time if later the prophecy turns out false than when it comes out true. Tempting as it is to correct uncertain probabilities by the now certain fact, we are of opinion that it cannot be done, but that the value of the wife's life interest must be estimated by the mortality tables. Our opinion is not changed by the necessary exceptions to the general rule specifically made by the act.

(Case law citations omitted)

The same view was expressed by Frank, Circuit Judge in Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Marshall, 141 A.L.R. 445, 125 F.2d 943 at 946. (Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.)

It is also argued that Congress could not have intended to be so unjust as to impose a tax based upon an estimate of value, taken from the mortality tables, which may turn out to be not in accordance with reality. Thus the Board refers to the fact that, under Section 510, the donee of a gift may be personally liable for a gift tax not otherwise paid 'to the extent of the value of such gift'; suppose, then, argues the Board, that the children, under that section, were required to pay a tax on the value of their remainders at the date of the gift, computed actuarially, and that the life tenants die while the donor still lives; in such circumstances, says the Board, 43 B.T.A. 99, 'the children would thus have paid a gift tax on something which they never received'.

That argument proves too much. It would preclude a tax on any 'value' which is not almost certain to correspond with actual enjoyment. But 'value' seldom does so correspond. The fallacy in that argument stems largely from lack of recognition of the eely character of the word 'value'. It is a bewitching word which, for years, has disturbed mental peace and caused numerous useless debates. Perhaps it would be better for the peace of men's minds if the word were abolished.⁷ Reams of good paper and gallons of good ink have been wasted by those who have tried to give it a constant and precise meaning. The truth is that it has different meanings in different contexts,⁸ even in the restricted field of 'tax law'.⁹ And there, as almost always, 'value' involves a conjecture, a guess, a prediction, a prophecy. With reference to the taxation of life estates, the Supreme Court has relied on educated guesses, as of a given date, based on the mortality tables, disregarding the fact that actually, in the particular case before it, the prophecy has turned out to be wrong because the life tenant did not live up to her life expectancy. 'Like all values, as the word is used by the law, it depends largely on more or less certain prophecies of the future; and the value is no less real * * * if later the prophecy turns out false than when it comes out true.' Ithaca Trust Co. v. United States, 279 U.S. 151, 155, 49 S.Ct. 291, 292, 73 L.Ed. 647. The rationale of that case is controlling here. Treasury Regs. 79, Art. 19 adopts the actuarial method of valuing remainders. That method is not so arbitrary as to be unreasonable and invalid.

It is immaterial that actuarial estimates may not accord with realities. Few estimates of value do, whether used by courts or laymen: For purposes of corporate reorganization, value, generally, is a reasonable capitalization of future earnings as reasonably foreseeable at the date of reorganization; reliance is had upon an educated guess or peering into the future, which, being a human conjecture, may be wrong. No one can foretell what changes in technology will do to the earnings of any business.¹⁰ Anyone who wants to eliminate uncertainties from 'value' will have a sad time getting along in this world. All aspects of living are chancy. We cannot, by the use of a symbol, 'value', convert the risky into risklessness, Canute restless change out of existence. Businessmen sometimes pay cash for value which exists only in 'moonshin or dreamland'.¹¹ That 'market value', for instance, in the case of city real estate, is often a mirage, has been strikingly shown by Abrams, Revolution in Land (1939) 198-200, cf. 132-133, 81-89. Accordingly, we reject the argument that, merely because the 'value' of the contingent remainders, measured actuarially, may be inaccurate, Congress must be deemed to have intended that such remainders should not be subject to a gift tax.

(Footnotes omitted)

[23] We all know the definition of fmV in Henderson Estate v. M.N.R., 73 DTC 5471. Nonetheless the determination of the value of life interests and remainder interests is at best an imprecise exercise. It is based on a variety of imponderables not the least of which are actuarial mortality tables and capitalization rates. Mr. Chappell also looked at residential rental rates which he projected to 2013 and then discounted them at 12 percent to 1997 to arrive at a fmV for the life interest of $89,869. Whether it is in 2005 possible to predict rental rates in Nova Scotia in 2013 while theoretically standing in 1997, or to use as appropriate a discount rate of 12 percent, or whether it is acceptable to use residential rental rates in valuing a 250 year old historic property is open to question. The assumptions upon which such calculations are based vary within a range of indeterminate magnitude. At all events the computation results in a fmV for the remainder interest of $155,131 ($245,000 - $89,969 = $155,131) on September 15, 1997. The exercise that I performed above would increase the fmV of the life interest in 2002 as follows:

$ 89,869 X 385,000 = 141,222 X 12.44 = 109,663.00
245,000 16.02

[24] On this basis we would attribute $275,337 to the remainder interest in 2002 ($385,000 less $109,663) and the

Eligible Capital Property and Resource Property.

Subsection 70(5.1) provides tax free roll-over treatment in respect of eligible capital property used in a business carried on by the testator immediately before his death and the main thrust of the new provision, like that of the former, is to place the beneficiary recipient in the same tax position as that of the testator with respect to the property. As per the provision the property must have been acquired as a consequence of the taxpayer's death and the business must have been carried on by the taxpayer immediately before his death. It does not apply where the E.C.P. is acquired via a distribution of property by a trust that has taken a Sec. 20(1)(b), (E.C.E.A.) deduction in respect of the particular property distributed or where the spouse of the testator or a corporation controlled by him has acquired the property in an instance where Sec. 24(2) applies.

capital gain would be $275,337 minus $155,131 = $120,205 ÷ 2 = $60,102.50. Mr. Nauss' taxable capital gain is $30,051.25. I daresay I could do some more tinkering and fine tuning but it would not make an appreciable difference.

[25] This strikes me as a somewhat more reasonable result than that arrived at by the Minister. I do not think it is reasonable to base a valuation of the remainder interests on hypotheses and premises that result in the capital gain on the sale of the remainder interests being virtually identical to that realized on the sale of the entire fee simple. The result appeals as much to my common sense as to my sense of mathematical or logical congruity. As Viscount Simon said in Gold Coast Selection Trust v. Humphrey, [1948] A.C. 459 at 472:

In my view, the principle to be applied is the following. In cases such as this, when a trader in the course of his trade receives a new and valuable asset, not being money, as the result of sale or exchange, that asset, for the purpose of computing the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to him from his trade, should be valued as at the end of the accounting period in which it was received, even though it is neither realized nor realizable till later. The fact that it cannot be realized at once may reduce its present value, but that is no reason for treating it, for the purposes of income tax, as though it had no value until it could be realized. If the asset takes the form of fully paid shares, the valuation will take into account not only the terms of the agreement but a number of other factors, such as prospective yield, marketability, the general outlook for the type of business of the company which has allotted the shares, the result of a contemporary prospectus offering similar shares for subscription, the capital position of the company, and so forth. There may also be an element of value in the fact that the holding of the shares gives control of the company. If the asset is difficult to value but is none the less of a money value, the best valuation possible must be made. Valuation is an art, not an exact science. Mathematical certainty is not demanded nor indeed is it possible. It is for the commissioners to express in the money value attributed by them to the asset their estimate, and this is a conclusion of fact to be drawn from the evidence before them.

[Emphasis added]

This passage has frequently been cited and followed and it illustrates in my view the need to keep in mind some sense of reality and common sense in valuing property that is hard to value.

[26] In light of the paucity of helpful material in this area, I looked to foreign sources to see how other jurisdictions dealt with the matter of valuing life and remainder interests. The United States yielded a substantial amount of material but it was of no assistance because regulations under the Internal Revenue Code prescribe specific proportions to be ascribed to life estate and remainder interests. For example, for a person of 70 years the split between a life estate and a remainder interest is .36617 and .63383. For a person of 75 it would be .30375 and .69625. If I were required or entitled to use these figures the life estate and remainder interest in 1997 would have a value of $89,711.65 and $155,288.35, respectively. In 2002, when the mother was 75, they would be $116,943.75 and $268,056.25, respectively based on a fmV of the fee simple in 1997 of $245,000 and in 2002, $385,000.

[27] Thus the capital gain on the remainder interest would be $112,767.90 and the taxable capital gain would be $56,383.95 and Mr. Nauss' share of the taxable capital gain (before costs of disposition) would be $28,191.98. I mention this simply to illustrate the discrepancy that may result from different methods. However, whatever value the tables prescribed by the IRS may have in the United States, they have none here and cannot be used without an evidentiary foundation being laid. Nonetheless, I suspect that the figures in the tables are actuarially sound although this conclusion is not based on anything presented in the evidence in this case. It is interesting however that the figure of $28,191.98 arrived by the use of the United States tables is relatively close to my figure of $30,051.25.

If the trust doesn't take a Sec. 20(1)(b) deduction in respect of the particular E.C.P. it distributes then Sec. 70(5.1) will apply to it.

The fact that Parliament has qualified the tax free roll over in respect of property upon which the trust has taken a E.C.E.A. deduction is critical in the author's opinion in that it establishes the premise that Sec. 107(2) shall apply to such a distribution if E.C.E.A. is deducted, and thus it follows only by specific expression in the Sec. 70(5.1) provision itself. Where the trust deducts E.C.E.A. on the property and distributes it new Sec. 107(2)(e) will apply allow an effective tax free roll-over from the trust with the beneficiary being exposed to E.C.E.A. recapture.⁴⁵²

Subsection 70(5.1) applies to allow the testator to recognize a tax free disposition of his E.C.P. for consideration equal to 4/3rds of the cumulative eligible capital balance in respect of the business that the fair market value of the E.C.P. acquired by the beneficiary is of the aggregate FMV of all of the E.C.P. in respect of the particular business. If all of the E.C.P. in respect of each particular business is not acquired by any beneficiary as a consequence of death the above proration will cause the testator to recognize a taxable disposition in respect of that part which isn't acquired. Under para. (b) and (c) the beneficiary will be deemed to have acquired the property as a capital property for the proceeds recognized by the testator and where the beneficiary continues to carry on the business of the testator he'll be deemed to have acquired the E.C.P. for a cost equal to the proceeds recognized plus 4/3rds of the aggregate E.C.E.A. deductions taken by the testator in respect of the business that the fair market value of the particular property acquired is of the aggregate FMV of all of the E.C.P. in respect of the business immediately before his death. The beneficiary's C.E.C. balance will be reduced by 3/4ths of the potential recapture amount described in Sec. 70(5.1)(c)(ii).

Subsection 70(5.1) does not apply where Sec. 24(2) does and subsection 24(2) provides an automatic roll-over of C.E.C. in respect of a business carried on by the taxpayer where immediately upon ceasing to carry it on the spouse or corporation controlled directly or indirectly by the testator continues to carry it on. With the 1990 amendments there will be an effective tax free roll-over of the E.C.P. in a manner similar to Sec. 70(5.1) only if all of the E.C.P. of the particular business is acquired by the spouse or corporation and only when the E.C.P. has actual value however the spouse and the corporation cannot acquire the property as joint owners and at the time of writing it is not known whether the value of the E.C.P. in the form of future Sec. 20(1)(b) deductions will be enough to allow it to have value for these purposes. Unlike the Sec. 70(5.1) roll-over the spouse or corporation need not acquire the property as a consequence of the death hence where there is a "splintering" of ownership of various E.C.P. in respect of various businesses it would appear that the parties may be able to consolidate receipt of the numerous E.C.P.s in respect of each business so as to allow Sec. 24(2) to apply, (however this may jeopardize the applicability Sec. 70(5.1)). Rolling property to a spousal trust will not allow it to qualify for Sec. 24(2) treatment while it would appear that Sec. 70(5.1) may provide roll-over treatment since such a tax entity is a person.

Subsection 24(1) has been amended to allow deduction of the full amount of the taxpayer's C.E.C. in computing his income in the taxation years after the time at which he ceased to carry on the business and since a testator ceases to carry on business at the time of death and does not have any subsequent taxation years the C.E.C. existing will not be deductible by the estate, the beneficiaries, or the testator unless the E.C.P. obtains some sort of roll through treatment.

If the E.C.P. is distributed to a taxpayer by the estate undergoing administration or the residuary trust Sec. 107(2)(e) applies, (unless the trust isn't personal), to allow tax free roll over of its grossed up cost amount but this doesn't apply if the trust hasn't taken a Sec. 20(1)(b) deduction in respect of it, (the application of Sec. 70(5.1) is mandatory if the beneficiary continues to carry on the business), however the application of Sec. 24(2) and Sec. 107(2) are not mutually exclusive and there would appear to be the possibility that Sec. 24(2) can apply where an estate takes Sec. 20(1)(b) deductions and rolls the property out to the spouse. Subsection 70(5.1) overrides the application of Sec. 24(1) only when amongst the other conditions Sec. 24(2) doesn't apply and the estate doesn't take a Sec. 20(1)(b) deduction while Sec. 24(2) overrides the terminal disposition described in Sec. 24(1).

452. Section 70 is situated outside of subdivision k in the Act and only in the latter are estates and trusts equated as being the same tax entity. Will Sec. 70(5.1) be precluded from applying where an estate in the midst of administration takes a E.C.E.A. deduction and distributes the property?

“Eligible capital property of deceased – Sec. 70(5.1)”

(5.1) Notwithstanding subsection 24(1), where at any time a taxpayer dies and any person (in this subsection referred to as the beneficiary), as a consequence of the taxpayer’s death, acquires an eligible capital property of the taxpayer in respect of a business carried on by the taxpayer immediately before that time (otherwise than by way of a distribution of property by a trust that claimed a deduction under paragraph 20(1)(b) in respect of the property or in circumstances to which subsection 24(2) applies),

(a) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have disposed of the property, immediately before the taxpayer’s death, for proceeds equal to $\frac{4}{3}$ of that proportion of the cumulative eligible capital of the taxpayer in respect of the business that the fair market value immediately before that time of the property is of the fair market value immediately before that time of all of the eligible capital property of the taxpayer in respect of the business;

(b) subject to paragraph 70(5.1)(c), the beneficiary shall be deemed to have acquired a capital property at the time of the taxpayer’s death at a cost equal to the proceeds referred to in paragraph 70(5.1)(a);

(c) where the beneficiary continues to carry on the business previously carried on by the taxpayer, the beneficiary shall be deemed to have, at the time of the taxpayer’s death, acquired an eligible capital property and made an eligible capital expenditure at a cost equal to the total of

(i) the proceeds referred to in paragraph 70(5.1)(a), and

(ii) $\frac{4}{3}$ of that proportion of the amount, if any, determined for F in the definition “cumulative eligible capital” in subsection 14(5) in respect of the business of the taxpayer at that time that the fair market value immediately before that time of the particular property is of the fair market value immediately before that time of all eligible capital property of the taxpayer in respect of the business, and for the purposes of determining at any time the beneficiary’s cumulative eligible capital in respect of the business, an amount equal to $\frac{3}{4}$ of the amount determined under subparagraph 70(5.1)(c)(ii) shall be added to the amount otherwise determined, in respect of the business, for P in the definition “cumulative eligible capital” in subsection 14(5); and

(d) for the purpose of determining, after that time, the amount required by paragraph 14(1)(b) to be included in computing the income of the beneficiary in respect of any subsequent disposition of the property of the business, there shall be added to the amount determined for Q in the definition “cumulative eligible capital” in subsection 14(5) the amount determined by the formula

$A \times B/C$

where

A is the amount, if any, determined for Q in that definition in respect of the business of the taxpayer immediately before that time,

B is the fair market value immediately before that time of the particular property, and

C is the fair market value immediately before that time of all eligible capital property of the taxpayer in respect of the business.

Under subsection 70(5.2)(a), for purposes of Sec. 59(1) (concerning the disposition of foreign resource property), Sec. 66.2(5)(b)(v)(A) and 66.4(5)(b)(v)(A), the taxpayer will be deemed to have disposed of in the year of death, each property owned that was a Canadian resource property or a foreign resource property and to have received proceeds of disposition equal to their fair market values at that time, thus causing recapture of resource allowances or possibly causing direct income inclusions (under Sec. 59(1)). Paragraph (e) of subsection 70(5.2) provides that immediately prior to death the deceased will be deemed to have disposed of each property that was land included in his business as inventory and to have received proceeds of disposition equal to the fair market thereof at that time. Under subpara. 70(5.2)(d) if the resource property is transferred to the spouse or a spousal trust having the character described in Sec. 70(6) the legal representative of the testator will be able to elect the amount of proceeds that the testator will be deemed to have received, up to the property's fair market value, and the spouse or spousal trust will be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the amount included in the testator's income by virtue of Sec. 59(1) or amount determined under Sec. 66.2(5)(b)(v)(A) or 66.4(5)(b)(v)(A), all of which depend on the elected amount. Under subpara. 70(5.2)(f), if the land inventory is transferred to the spouse or spousal trust it will be deemed disposed of and acquired, by the testator and the recipient respectively, for its cost amount. In order for both tax free roll-overs to be available the major aspects of Sec. 70(6) transfer provision, as they would apply to the particular property, must be satisfied; (i.e.: vesting, residency, et cetera).

“Resource properties and land inventories of a deceased taxpayer – Sec. 70(5.2)”

(5.2) Where in a taxation year a taxpayer dies,

(a) the taxpayer is deemed to have, immediately before the taxpayer's death, disposed of each Canadian resource property and foreign resource property of the taxpayer and received proceeds of disposition for that property equal to its fair market value immediately before the death;

(a.1) subject to subparagraph (b)(ii), any particular person who as a consequence of the taxpayer's death acquires any property that is deemed by paragraph (a) to have been disposed of by the taxpayer is deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before the death;

(b) notwithstanding paragraph 70(5.2)(a), where the taxpayer was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death, any Canadian resource property or foreign resource property of the taxpayer that is, on or after the death and as a consequence of the death, transferred or distributed to a spouse or common-law partner of the taxpayer described in paragraph 70(6)(a) or a trust described in paragraph 70(6)(b) and it can be shown within the period ending 36 months after the death or, where written application therefor has been made to the Minister by the taxpayer's legal representative within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances, that the property vested indefeasibly in the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be,

(i) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have, immediately before the death, disposed of the property and received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to such amount as is specified by the taxpayer's legal representative in the return of income of the taxpayer filed under paragraph 150(1)(b), not exceeding its fair market value immediately before the death, and

(ii) the spouse, common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, is deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to the amount determined in respect of the disposition under subparagraph (i);

(c) the taxpayer is deemed to have, immediately before the taxpayer's death, disposed of each property that was land included in the inventory of a business of the taxpayer and received proceeds of disposition for that property equal to its fair market value immediately before the death;

(c.1) subject to subparagraph (d)(ii), any particular person who as a consequence of the taxpayer's death acquires any property that is deemed by paragraph (c) to have been disposed of by the taxpayer is deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before the death; and

(d) notwithstanding paragraph 70(5.2)(c), where the taxpayer was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death, any property that is land included in the inventory of a business of the taxpayer is, on or after the death and as a consequence of the death, transferred or distributed to a spouse or common-law partner of the taxpayer described in paragraph 70(6)(a) or a trust described in paragraph 70(6)(b) and it can be shown within the period ending 36 months after the death of the taxpayer or, where written application therefor has been made to the Minister by the taxpayer's legal representative within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances, that the property vested indefeasibly in the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be,

(i) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have, immediately before the death, disposed of the land and received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to its cost amount to the taxpayer immediately before the death, and

(ii) the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to those proceeds.

Subject: Eligible Capital Property - Deceased Persons

IT-344R Date: May 8, 1987

This bulletin replaces and cancels IT-344 dated September 7, 1976, and incorporates the comments in the Addendum dated April 27, 1981. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

1. Subsection 70(3.1) provides that where a taxpayer dies after May 6, 1974, eligible capital property of the deceased is excluded from the expression "rights or things" for the purposes of section 70.

2. Where, as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer (see 3 below) occurring after May 6, 1974, an eligible capital property of the deceased has been acquired by a person other than a spouse or a controlled corporation to whom subsection 24(2) applies, the following rules apply:

(a) . the deceased is deemed to have disposed, immediately before death, of the eligible capital property and to have received proceeds of disposition equal to twice the cumulative eligible capital in respect of a business carried on by the deceased immediately before death (paragraph 70(5.1)(a));

(b) . as a consequence of the deemed disposition of the eligible capital property by the deceased at twice the amount of the cumulative eligible capital, the deceased's cumulative eligible capital amount is reduced to nil and therefore no amount is included in the income of the deceased (paragraph 14(5)(a), subsection 14(1));

(c) . no amount is deductible by virtue of paragraph 20(1)(b) since the deceased's cumulative eligible capital amount is nil;

(d) . a person who acquires the property (the successor) as a consequence of the death but does not continue the deceased taxpayer's business is deemed to have acquired a capital property immediately after the death of the taxpayer at a cost equal to twice the cumulative eligible capital in respect of the business as determined immediately before the death of the taxpayer (paragraph 70(5.1)(b)). A subsequent disposition of this property may result in either a capital gain or capital loss to the successor; and

(e) . a successor who continues to carry on the business previously carried on by the deceased is deemed to have acquired an eligible capital property and to have made an eligible capital expenditure in an amount equal to twice the cumulative eligible capital (or portion thereof acquired) calculated immediately before the death of the taxpayer. Consequently, an amount may be deducted by the successor pursuant to paragraph 20(1)(b) and upon disposition of the eligible capital property the usual rules of section 14 will apply. However, subject to 4 below, the provisions of ITAR 21 will not apply, since the successor will not have carried on the business continuously since December 31, 1971.⁴⁵³

3. Subsections 248(8) and (9) provides rules for determining whether property has been acquired by a person as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer.

4. Although the provisions of ITAR 21(1) normally do not apply to a successor's proceeds of sale of eligible capital property acquired after 1971 in circumstances set out in 2 above, ITAR 21(2.1) provides an exception in the case of a government right acquired by the successor, either directly or indirectly, from a deceased person in a non-arm's length transaction. Under that provision, the successor and the deceased person are treated as one for purpose of ITAR 21(1) which imposes the requirement that the proceeds must be payable in respect of a business carried on continuously by the taxpayer since January 1, 1972. For the Department's interpretation of when a non-arm's length relationship exists with a trust, see 17 and 18 of IT-419.

⁴⁵³. In a technical interpretation rendered on July 12th, 1984, the Dept. held that an E.C.P. (milk quota) would not be recognized to have been acquired by a trust when trustee-beneficiaries would not be carrying on the farming business. See Swift & Anor. v. Dairywise Farms Ltd. & Ors, [2000] 1 All E.R. 320 ChD, where it was held that a milk quota could be held in trust even when mixed with other quota.

Subject: Income of Deceased Persons - Resource Properties

IT-329R Date: September 26, 1983

This bulletin cancels and replaces IT-329 dated July 12, 1976. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

1. Subsection 70(3.1) and 70(5.2) have application where the death of the owner of a resource property occurred after May 6, 1974.
2. By virtue of subsection 70(3.1), "rights or things" otherwise included in income under subsection 70(2) or 70(3) do not include resource properties described in paragraphs 59(2)(a) to (e). For purposes of section 59 such properties are deemed by operation of subsection 70(5.2) to have been disposed of immediately before death by the deceased for proceeds equal to their fair market value at the time, subject to special rules discussed below where the properties are transferred to the deceased's spouse or a trust for the spouse as described in paragraph 70(6)(b). Interpretation Bulletin IT-125R3 deals generally with dispositions of resource properties described in section 59.
3. The proceeds of disposition deemed by subsection 70(5.2) to have been received by the taxpayer for the resource property in Canada are accounted for as a deduction in determining either the deceased's cumulative Canadian development expense by virtue of subsections 59(1.1) and 59(3.1) or cumulative Canadian oil and gas property expense by virtue of subsection 59(1.2). Where the deduction results in a credit balance in the cumulative Canadian oil and gas property expense, such balance is, by virtue of subparagraph 66.2(5)(b)(x), required to be deducted in the computation of the cumulative Canadian development expense. Any credit balance in the cumulative Canadian development expense must be included in income of the deceased for the year of death by virtue of paragraph 59(3.2)(c) and subsection 66.2(1). If the deceased has a debit balance in his cumulative Canadian development expense, a deduction in an amount not exceeding 30% of the residual cumulative Canadian development expense may be claimed in the year of death under subsection 66.2(2). No further deduction is allowed in respect of the balance. If a debit balance remains in the deceased's cumulative Canadian oil and gas property expense, an amount not exceeding 10% of the residual cumulative Canadian oil and gas property expense may be claimed in the year of death under subsection 66.4(2). Again, no further deduction is allowed in respect of the balance.
4. The proceeds of disposition deemed by subsection 70(5.2) to have been received for a resource property outside Canada are included in the deceased's income for the year of death pursuant to subsection 59(1) and 59(3). A deduction pursuant to subsection 66(4) is also available to the deceased in the year of death up to the full extent of the deceased's income from foreign resources including proceeds of disposition of such properties. Where this income is less than 10% of the available foreign exploration and development expenses, an amount not exceeding that 10% may be claimed in the year of death. No further deduction is allowed in respect of the balance.
5. If a resource property was owned by the deceased on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption and this property would have been a Canadian resource property (or foreign resource property) had it been acquired after 1971, while it is deemed to be disposed of for proceeds equal to the fair market value immediately before death, the "relevant percentage" provisions in section 59 as described in Interpretation Bulletin IT-125R3 will apply to the proceeds. However, after 1979, the relevant percentage is always 100% for this rule and the rules in 7 and 8 below.
6. Where a resource property owned by the deceased on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption (the disposition of which is subject to the provisions of subsection 59(3) or (3.1)) is acquired on or after death and as a consequence thereof by a person who was related to the deceased taxpayer, the cost of acquisition to such person is deemed to be the amount which is included in the deceased's income pursuant to paragraph 59(3)(a) if subsection 59(3) is applicable or, if subsection 59(3.1) is applicable, the amount referred to in clause 66.2(5)(b)(v)(A) (that is, the amount which is subtracted from the balance of the deceased's cumulative Canadian development expense account as a result of the deemed disposition described in 5 above). For example, if the deceased died in 1976 owning a mining claim acquired in 1970, 80% of the value of this claim at the time of death would be treated as proceeds of disposition and would be accounted for as a deduction in computing the "cumulative Canadian development expense" account. Assuming no positive elements in the account, this amount would be included in the income of the deceased for the year of death (paragraph 59(3.2)(c)). If a child of the deceased inherits the claim, the child's cost is the amount so deducted in the account.

7. By virtue of subsection 59(3) and (3.1), the related person acquiring the property is also deemed to have owned it on December 31, 1971, and thereafter without interruption, and accordingly, the relevant percentage provisions in section 59 will apply to the proceeds of disposition if that person should subsequently dispose of the property.

Transfers to Spouse or Spouse Trust

8. Paragraph 70(5.2)(d) provides that where a resource property as described in paragraphs 59(2)(a) to (c) was owned by a taxpayer resident in Canada immediately before his death, and no later than 15 months after the taxpayer's death becomes vested indefeasibly in the spouse, or a trust for the spouse referred to in paragraph 70(6)(b), the following rules apply:

- (a). The deceased taxpayer's legal representatives may specify the amount of the proceeds deemed to have been received, but this amount may not exceed the fair market value of the property immediately before death.
- (b). The cost of acquisition to the spouse or trust is the portion of the amount specified by the deceased taxpayer's legal representatives which is included in the deceased's income or which is included in the amount referred to in clauses 66.2(5)(b)(v)(A) or 66.4(5)(b)(v)(A), as the case may be, by virtue of subsection 59(1), (1.1), (1.2), (3), or (3.1).
- (c). Where the spouse or trust subsequently disposes of property in respect of which subsection 59(3) or (3.1) applied, the spouse or trust is deemed to have owned the property on December 31, 1971 and thereafter without interruption until that subsequent disposition, and accordingly the relevant percentage provisions in section 59 apply to the proceeds from the disposition.

Payment of Tax in Installments

9. The additional tax payable where subsection 70(5.2) is applicable may be paid in up to ten equal consecutive annual installments when the conditions in subsection 159(5) are met and when the death occurs after 1977.

Periodic Payments and Rights and Things.

While subsections 70(5), (5.1), (5.2) cause dispositions of capital property of the testator to be recognized on death whereby the proceeds are determined and other provisions then apply to cause income computations subsections 70(1) and (2) apply upon the death of a taxpayer regardless of his residence, to cause him to include directly and fully in his income amounts in respect of property that when disposed of or satisfied inter vivos would have been directly included in his income. They do not specifically cause the testator to recognize a deemed disposition. Subsection 70(1) applies to cause the value of interest, rent, royalty, annuity, (other than described in Sec. 148(2)(b)), remuneration from office or employment or other "periodic payment" deemed accruing up to the day of death in equal daily amounts since the time it was last paid to be included in computing the deceased's income. The "value" in this case⁴⁵⁴ is that net of amounts that would be deductible had they been actually realized prior to death thus interest or other deductible amounts will reduce the amount of value to be included in the taxpayer's income under Sec. 70(1) in respect of royalties or interest revenue even if they haven't been paid.⁴⁵⁵

In I.T. 210R the Department is of the opinion, in para. 4, that it will allow excess expenses deductible against the periodic payment, after it has reduced its value to nil, to be applied to other sources of income. The Act, as well as the I.T.s to the author's best knowledge, are silent on whether such amounts included under Sec. 70(1)

454. as provided in the Department's opinion contained in I.T. 210R,

455 Where there is a question as to whether a certain asset has the nature of a periodic payment or a right or thing described and attended to be Sec. 70(2) the matter will be resolved, administratively, in the taxpayer's favor usually.

will be included again when realized by the beneficiaries of, or by, the estate. Technically such accrued income can not be the estate's income since it did not accrue as income during the time that the estate existed.

Subsection 70(1) was also amended in the 1988 reform to apply to investment tax credits deducted by the taxpayer in previous years that are, as per Sec. 12(1)(t), required to be included in computing income of a taxpayer unless they led to an adjustment in the capital cost of the property that formed the I.T.C.'s base (of that or a related property) or that were included previously in the taxpayer's income under Sec. 12(1)(t).

The Sec. 12(1)(t) inclusion is inapplicable if the I.T.C. led to a subject property cost adjustment under Sec. 13(7.1)(e), (21)(f)(viii), 37(1)(e), 66.1(6)(b)(vii), or 53(2)(h)(ii)⁴⁵⁶. The Sec. 70(1) provision doesn't include such amounts itself, but causes Sec. 12(1)(t) to be read as not referring to acquisitions or expenditures, (which rewarded an I.T.C.), in a previous tax year, (which it does), thus capturing I.T.C.'s taken in the terminal year in respect of qualified acquisitions or expenditures made in the terminal year. Thus if an I.T.C. in respect of a terminal year acquisition is deducted from taxes payable, and it doesn't cause an adjustment in the capital cost of the property it will be included in income and a circular computation will result.

On the issue of whether rights or things can include RRSP entitlements Estate of Peter A. Baak and Her Majesty the Queen⁴⁵⁷, a TCC, provides some interesting discussion with:

Legislation

[5] Subsection 70(1) sets out how a deceased taxpayer's income is to be calculated for the year of death and commonly referred to as the terminal return. Subsection 70(2) reads:

70(2) Where a taxpayer who has died had at the time of death rights or things (other than any capital property or any amount included in computing the taxpayer's income by virtue of subsection (1)), the amount of which when realized or disposed of would have been included in computing the taxpayer's income, the value thereof at the time of death shall be included in computing the taxpayer's income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died, unless the taxpayer's legal representative has, not later than the day that is one year after the date of death of the taxpayer or the day that is 90 days after the mailing of any notice of assessment in respect of the tax of the taxpayer for the year of death, whichever is the later day, elected otherwise, in which case the legal representative shall file a separate return of income for the year under this Part and pay the tax for the year under this Part as if

- (a) the taxpayer were another person;
- (b) that other person's only income for the year were the value of the rights or things; and
- (c) subject to sections 114.2 and 118.93, that other person were entitled to the deductions to which the taxpayer was entitled under sections 110, 118 to 118.7 and 118.9 for the year in computing the taxpayer's taxable income or tax payable under this Part, as the case may be, for the year.

Other relevant provisions of the Act are as follows:

146(8) There shall be included in computing a taxpayer's income for a taxation year the total of all amounts received by the taxpayer in the year as benefits out of or under registered retirement savings plans, other than excluded withdrawals (as defined in subsection 146.01(1) or 146.02(1)) of the taxpayer and amounts that are included under paragraph (12)(b) in computing the taxpayer's income.

146(8.8) Where the annuitant under a registered retirement savings plan (other than a plan that had matured before June 30, 1978) dies after June 29, 1978, the annuitant shall be deemed to have received, immediately before the annuitant's death, an amount as a benefit out of or under a registered retirement savings plan equal to the amount, if any, by which

- (a) the fair market value of all the property of the plan at the time of death exceeds

⁴⁵⁶ the latter two concerning partnership interests and capital interests in trusts other than where they are personal and where the interest was not acquired for consideration

⁴⁵⁷ 2001-567(IT)l

(b) where the annuitant died after the maturity of the plan, the fair market value at the time of the death of the portion of the property described in paragraph (a) that, as a consequence of the death, becomes receivable by a person who was the annuitant's spouse or common-law partner immediately before the death, or would become so receivable should that person survive throughout all guaranteed terms contained in the plan.

[Emphasis added]

[6] The Appellant in his submissions devoted considerable time to defining certain words and phrases, including whether an RRSP was "rights or things", "deem or deemed", "immediately", "death" and "context". The subsection 15(1) Charter submissions appear to be the Appellant's primary argument.

Analysis

[7] I will first deal with whether, upon a taxpayer's death, RRSPs can be claimed as "rights or things" within the meaning of subsection 70(2). Subsection 70(1) sets out how a taxpayer's income shall be calculated for the year of death. Subsection 70(2) permits the taxpayer's legal representative to claim on a separate income return, the value of rights or things that the taxpayer had at the time of his death. Subsection 146(8) applies to this case. It requires the Appellant to include in income for the year, the total amount of benefits received out of his RRSPs during the year. Subsection 146(8.8) deems any amount of the RRSPs held by the taxpayer at the time of his death to have been received immediately before his death.

[8] I agree with the Minister of National Revenue's position that RRSPs are not "rights or things" within the meaning of subsection 70(2).

[9] Counsel for the Respondent referred me to L. Lamash Estate v. M.N.R., [1990] 2 C.T.C. 2534. The facts in Lamash are similar to the present ones. The Minister denied the executor of the Lamash Estate's claim that RRSPs were "rights or things" and not to be included as income. The Tax Court upheld the Minister's decision. I agree with the decision and reasons for it set out by Christie J. I will not review his reasons in detail, but refer to his comments on page 2539:

I regard subsections 70(2) and 146(8.8) as being in the same context for the purposes of statutory interpretation and I agree that the late Lillian Lamash is deemed to have received, immediately before her death, the $19,096.67 in dispute and consequently she could not have had rights, within the meaning attributable to that word in subsection 70(2), in relation to those funds at the time of her death. The subsection speaks of rights the amount whereof when realized or disposed of would have been included in computing the deceased's income. In Cullity, Forbes, Brown, Taxation and Estate Planning, 2d ed. Carswell, Toronto, this is said at pages 68-69:

Registered Retirement Savings Plans, Etc.

17. A taxpayer is not considered to have a right or thing in respect of a registered retirement savings plan, whether matured or not, of which he was, until his death, the annuitant. However, except in the case of a plan that had matured before June 30, 1978, where the annuitant dies after June 29, 1978, the fair market value of all the property of the plan at the time of death (less amounts receivable by the spouse of the deceased or received as a refund of premiums by a child, grandchild or other beneficiary of the deceased, as described in subsections 146(8.8) to (8.91)) must be included in the income of the deceased on his final return by virtue of subsection 146(8.8). Similarly, a taxpayer is not considered to have a right or thing in respect of a registered retirement income fund or a registered home ownership savings plan.

[10] I find the wording of subsections 70(2), 146(8) and 146(8.8) clear and unambiguous. Their plain and ordinary meaning is determinative with respect to their interpretation.[1] I do not find the phrase "immediately before death" ambiguous and do not accept the Appellant's argument. I accept the Respondent's reasons for concluding that Parliament intended that RRSP proceeds are income in the year of death unless they qualify under certain exceptions that do not apply to the present circumstances.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Income of Deceased Persons -- Periodic Payments and Investment Tax Credit

IT-210R2

DATE: November 22, 1996

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Income of Deceased Persons -- Periodic Payments and Investment Tax Credit

REFERENCE: Subsection 70(1) (also subsections 70(2) and (3); and paragraphs 12(1)(t) and 148(2)(b) of the Income Tax Act)

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

This document is also available for download in PDF format.

Contents

- Application
- Summary
- Discussion and Interpretation
 - General (¶ 1)
 - Accrued interest (¶ 2)
 - Accrued salary or wages (¶ 3)
 - Genuine doubt about the nature of income (¶ 4)
 - Deduction of related accrued expenses (¶ 5)
 - Reporting requirements (¶ 6)
 - Investment tax credit (¶ 7)

Explanation of Changes

Application

This bulletin cancels and replaces Interpretation Bulletin IT-210R, Income of Deceased Persons -- Periodic Payments, dated November 5, 1982.

Summary

The purpose of subsection 70(1) is to require certain amounts to be included in computing the income of a taxpayer for the year of death.

This bulletin discusses the tax treatment of certain amounts payable periodically that had accrued but were not received at the time of death. It also explains the tax treatment of any related accrued expenses. As well, the bulletin outlines the tax consequences when an amount of investment tax credit is claimed for the year of death or a previous year.

Discussion and Interpretation

General

¶ 1. Under paragraph 70(1)(a), an amount payable on a periodic basis that was not paid to a taxpayer before the taxpayer's death is deemed to have accrued in equal daily amounts in the period for which the amount was payable. The value of the portion that is deemed to have accrued to the date of death is required to be included in computing the taxpayer's income for the year of death. Paragraph 70(1)(a) applies to amounts of interest, rents, royalties, annuities (other than an interest in an annuity contract to which paragraph 148(2)(b) applies), remuneration from an office or employment, and other amounts payable periodically. This provision does not apply to amounts which had become payable before death.

Accrued interest

¶ 2. If a deceased taxpayer owned a term deposit or other similar investment on which interest was payable periodically, interest accrued from the last date on which interest was payable up to the date of death would be included in income for the year of death under paragraph 70(1)(a). However, if the taxpayer also had on hand a matured investment (such as a matured Treasury Bill or uncashed matured bond interest coupons) at the date of death, any interest that was owing to the deceased taxpayer on the matured investment immediately before the date of death would be considered a right or thing for the purposes of subsection 70(2) to the extent the amount was not included or required to be included in the deceased's income for the year or a preceding year. For information about the tax treatment of "rights or things," refer to the current version of IT-212, Income of Deceased Persons -- Rights or Things.

Accrued salary or wages

¶ 3. Only the amount of salary or wages accrued from the beginning of the pay period in which an employee dies to the date of death is included in the employee's income under paragraph 70(1)(a). When the amount due and unpaid is in respect of a prior pay period, such amount would be included in income under subsection 70(2). If, prior to the death of an employee, the employer is committed (say because of union bargaining) to pay retroactive salary or wage adjustments, but these are unpaid at the date of the employee's death, the amount due to the employee is included in income under subsection 70(2).

Genuine doubt about the nature of income

¶ 4. Where there is genuine doubt about whether the nature of income earned before a taxpayer's death is a periodic payment or a right or thing, its treatment is generally resolved in favour of the taxpayer. As a result, the legal representative may report the income in question under paragraph 70(1)(a) or under subsection 70(2). In the latter case, depending upon the timing, an election under that provision may be made, or if the income has been transferred to beneficiaries, subsection 70(3) applies instead of subsection 70(2).

Deduction of related accrued expenses

¶ 5. Any accrued expenses related to the amount included in income under paragraph 70(1)(a) may be deducted provided that the expenses would have been deductible if paid (e.g., interest expense and property taxes). When such expenses exceed the gross amount included in income, the excess is deductible from other income of the taxpayer.

Reporting requirements

¶ 6. Amounts included in income under paragraph 70(1)(a) and any related accrued expenses that are deductible are reported in the taxpayer's "ordinary" income tax return for the year of death.

Investment tax credit

¶ 7. When an amount of investment tax credit has been deducted from a taxpayer's tax payable for the year of death or a previous year, the rule in paragraph 12(1)(t), as modified by paragraph 70(1)(b), applies. The amount is required to be included in the taxpayer's income for the year of death to the extent that the amount was not included in income under paragraph 12(1)(t) for a previous year or is not used to reduce the tax basis of the related expenditure (i.e., the undepreciated capital cost of depreciable property, the adjusted cost base of certain interests in a partnership or a trust, the amount of deductible scientific research expenditures, or the amount of qualified Canadian exploration expenditures).

Explanation of Changes

Introduction

The purpose of the Explanation of Changes is to give the reasons for the revisions to an interpretation bulletin. It outlines revisions that we have made as a result of changes to the law, as well as changes reflecting new or revised departmental interpretations.

Reasons for the Revision

We have revised bulletin IT-210R to clarify our position with respect to the deduction of accrued expenses and to reflect amendments to subsection 70(1) by S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 140 (formerly Bill C-139) and by S.C. 1988, c. 55 (formerly Bill C-139). The comments in the bulletin are not affected by any draft legislation released before July 29, 1996.

Legislative and Other Changes

¶s 1, 2 and 3 replace former ¶ 1. These paragraphs reflect the amendment to renumber the rule regarding periodic payments in subsection 70(1) as paragraph 70(1)(a) and to add new paragraph 70(1)(b) which is discussed in new ¶ 7. This amendment to subsection 70(1) took effect in 1988. ¶ 1 also reflects an amendment which clarifies that the reference to an annuity in subsection 70(1) (as it read before 1988) does not include an interest in those annuity contracts to which paragraph 148(2)(b) applies. This latter amendment took effect after November 12, 1981.

¶ 5 (former ¶s 3 and 4) is revised so that it only comments on the deduction of related accrued expenses. The deductibility of such expenses are determined under the relevant provision of the Act and the amounts claimed are reported in the appropriate places on the taxpayer's income tax return.

New ¶ 7 reflects the enactment of paragraph 70(1)(b) as a consequence of amendments to paragraph 12(1)(t) and other provisions of the Act relating to the investment tax credit.

Throughout the bulletin, we have changed some of the wording to improve readability.

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

Interpretation bulletins (ITs) provide Revenue Canada's technical interpretations of income tax law. Due to their technical nature, ITs are used primarily by departmental staff, tax specialists, and other individuals who have an interest in tax matters. For those readers who prefer a less technical explanation of the law, the Department offers other publications, such as tax guides and pamphlets.

While the ITs do not have the force of law, they can generally be relied upon as reflecting the Department's interpretation of the law to be applied on a consistent basis by departmental staff. In cases where an IT has not yet been revised to reflect legislative changes, readers should refer to the amended legislation and its effective date. Similarly, court decisions subsequent to the date of the IT should be considered when determining the relevancy of the comments in the IT.

An interpretation described in an IT applies as of the date the IT is published, unless otherwise specified. When there is a change in a previous interpretation and the change is beneficial to taxpayers, it is usually effective for all future assessments and reassessments. If the change is not favourable to taxpayers, it will normally be effective for the current and subsequent taxation years or for transactions entered into after the date of the IT.

A change in a departmental interpretation may also be announced in the Income Tax Technical News.

If you have any comments regarding matters discussed in this IT, please send them to:

Director, Business and Publications Division

Income Tax Rulings Directorate
Policy and Legislation Branch
Revenue Canada
Ottawa ON K1A 0L5

Subsection 70(1) computes into income periodic payments that the deceased would have otherwise realized and recognized as income but that were at the time of his death not distributable to him while subsection 70(2) applies to "rights or things" other than capital property or that described in Sec. 70(3.1), which when realized or disposed of would be included in computing his income.⁴⁵⁸

The property to which the subsection doesn't apply includes an interest in a life insurance policy, eligible capital property, land inventory, or resource property commented on under Sec. 70(5.2), and, of course, capital

458. Examples of such property include farm crops, accounts receivable of cash based fishermen and farmers, unpaid salary, dividends that have been declared but not paid. Would a personal license to the use of trust property that is consequentially unassignable due to its very nature constitute a right or thing for these purposes when realized it would not lead to an income inclusion? A right to trust income has been held to be a capital property, (Gadsden v. M.N.R., 83 D.T.C. 127), and an "income" property, (Evans v. M.N.R., 60 D.T.C. 1047 (SCC), Hall v. M.N.R., 71 D.T.C. 5217), however regardless of whether it is held income or capital Sec. 106(2) requires an income inclusion when it is realized thus it would be fully subject to Sec. 70(2). As per Lamash Estate v. M.N.R., 1990 2 C.T.C. 2534 TCC, a right to receive the proceeds from a RRSP contract is not a right or thing for purposes of Sec. 70(2) but requires a Sec. 146(8.8) inclusion. It also isn't a death benefit.

property captured by the Sec. 70(5)-(6) mechanics⁴⁵⁹.

The subsection, like Sec. 70(1), includes in income only the value of the property (right or thing), net of expenses that would otherwise have been deductible while it is substantially different from Sec. 70(1) in that it allows the deceased to elect to have all of such possible inclusions recognized in one single separate additional return as if from a different person, (thus allowing them to possibly benefit from a lower effective tax rate). The legal representative of the deceased, (possibly acting upon the last testament), may also act through assent to transfers to the beneficiaries if so stated in the will, under Sec. 70(3), to have them taxed instead in the hands of the beneficiaries of the estate as they are ultimately realized or disposed of. Thus, they are includable in the terminal return, in a separate terminal return, or if assented to their dispositions cited in the will, they are recognizable by the beneficiaries.

“Amounts receivable – Sec. 70(2)”

(2) Where a taxpayer who has died had at the time of death rights or things (other than any capital property or any amount included in computing the taxpayer’s income by virtue of subsection 70(1)), the amount of which when realized or disposed of would have been included in computing the taxpayer’s income, the value thereof at the time of death shall be included in computing the taxpayer’s income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died, unless the taxpayer’s legal representative has, not later than the day that is one year after the date of death of the taxpayer or the day that is 90 days after the mailing of any notice of assessment in respect of the tax of the taxpayer for the year of death, whichever is the later day, elected otherwise, in which case the legal representative shall file a separate return of income for the year under this Part and pay the tax for the year under this Part as if

(a) the taxpayer were another person;

(b) that other person’s only income for the year were the value of the rights or things; and

(c) subject to sections 114.2 and 118.93, that other person were entitled to the deductions to which the taxpayer was entitled under sections 110, 118 to 118.7 and 118.9 for the year in computing the taxpayer’s taxable income or tax payable under this Part, as the case may be, for the year.

The Election.

Under the election in respect of rights or things to have them reported on a separate return, the beneficiaries will not recognize an income inclusion. An election to report on a separate return should almost always be taken since there are additional separate return will result in lower bracket rates of taxation. There is a balancing act though since there are certain limitations one has when electing, below noted.

The election must be made within one year after the day of death or within 90 days of the mailing of a notice of assessment in respect of tax on the terminal year’s income, whichever is later.

Another advantage of the election⁴⁶⁰, is that the separate artificial person will be allowed the deductions under sections 110, 118 (charitable gifts), to 118.7, (U.I. & C.P.P. premium/contribution credit), as well as being allowed transfers to spouses under section 118.9 in computing his taxable income or tax payable, section 118.93 operates to disallow the aggregate of deductions in Sec. 118(3) and sections 118.1 to 118.7 and 118.9 taken through the four possible separate returns of a deceased from exceeding that amount that would be deducted had only one return been filed, while section 114.2, does the same with respect to section 110 Division C deductions only.

The separate return must include all of the Sec. 70(2) possible inclusions while if the legal representative acts within the same period of time, some of them may be affected under subsection 70(3) which will apply to roll them through to the beneficiaries.⁴⁶¹ If the election is erroneously made it can be revoked, via Sec. 70(4), by a notice to the Minister delivered within the time period for making the election if signed by the legal ⁴⁵⁹ as well as income averaging annuity contracts, matured or unmatured RRSPs, and RRIFs.

⁴⁶⁰ although limited by the effect of sections 114.2 or 118.93

⁴⁶¹ A good planing point is to have the executor selectively assent to the bequest of certain rights or things on a timely basis so as to cause Sec. 70(3) to apply to them and then have the alternative reporting apply to the balance.

representative who need not have originally made the election.⁴⁶²

Subsection 70(3) applies to rights that would otherwise be subject to Sec. 70(2) hence, the roll through and the separate return, or, the roll through and the ordinary terminal year return, can share the recognition, but not the separate return and the ordinary terminal year return. For the last, it's all or nothing.⁴⁶³

Subparagraphs 115(1)(a)-(b) will not cause Sec. 70(2) to apply to a non-resident while since a payment is not being made Part XIII will also not apply. The ultimate realization of the proceeds of the right or thing will be subject to withholding rates as applicable though.

"Rights or things transferred to beneficiaries – Sec. 70(3)"

(3) Where before the time for making an election under subsection 70(2) has expired, a right or thing to which that subsection would otherwise apply has been transferred or distributed to beneficiaries or other persons beneficially interested in the estate or trust,

(a) subsection 70(2) is not applicable to that right or thing; and

(b) an amount received by one of the beneficiaries or persons on the realization or disposition of the right or thing shall be included in computing the income of the beneficiary or person for the taxation year in which the beneficiary or person received it.

"Idem, where s. 70(3) applies – Sec. 69(1.1)"

(1.1) Where a taxpayer has acquired property that is a right or thing to which subsection 70(3) applies, the following rules apply:

(a) paragraph 69(1)(c) is not applicable to that property; and

(b) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the total of

(i) such part, if any, of the cost thereof to the taxpayer who has died as had not been deducted by the taxpayer in computing the taxpayer's income for any year, and

(ii) any expenditures made or incurred by the taxpayer to acquire the property.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Returns of Deceased Persons as "Another Person"

IT-326R3

DATE: November 13, 1996

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Returns of Deceased Persons as "Another Person"

REFERENCE: Sections 114.2 and 118.93 (also sections 110, 118, 118.1 to 118.9, and 180.2; subsections 70(2) and 150(4); and paragraph 104(23)(d) of the Income Tax Act)

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

This document is also available for download in PDF format.

⁴⁶²

Sec. 70(4)

(4) Revocation of election. An election made under subsection (2) may be revoked by a notice of revocation signed by the legal representative of the taxpayer and filed with the Minister within the time that an election under that subsection may be made.

⁴⁶³ For jurisprudence on valuation of life interests see In the Will of Tyson, 1907 Q.S.R. 52, Re: Jaeger, 1961 V.R. 14, Perpetual Trustee Co. Ltd. v. Shelly, 1921 21 S.R.(N.S.W.) 426, Chesterman v. F.C.T., 32 C.L.R. 362 & 37 C.L.R. 317, and value of life interest in accompany to obligation to use it to maintain children, Re: Botting, 10th May 1895 S.A. Advertiser (newspaper) (S.A. Sup. Ct. F.C.).

Contents

Application

Summary

Discussion and Interpretation

Separate returns (¶ 1)

Credits and deductions allowed

Deductions in computing taxable income (¶s 2, 3)

Non-refundable tax credits (¶s 4-8)

Credits and deductions not allowed

Deductions in computing net income (¶ 9)

Deductions in computing taxable income (¶ 10)

Tax credits (¶s 11-13)

Other considerations (¶s 14-16)

Explanation of Changes

Application

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-326R2 dated February 2, 1990.

Summary

The legal representative of a deceased person must file an income tax return (referred to in this bulletin as an "ordinary return") reporting the income of the deceased from January 1 of the year of death to the date of death. In certain circumstances the legal representative has the opportunity to exclude specific types of income from the "ordinary" return and report them on separate income tax returns as if the taxpayer were "another person." A separate return may be filed to report the value of the deceased person's rights or things. Similarly, where the fiscal period of a testamentary trust or unincorporated business ends in the year and before the taxpayer's death, the deceased person's share of the income from the testamentary trust or the business for the period from the end of the fiscal period to the date of death may be reported on a separate return.

The purpose of sections 114.2 and 118.93 is to limit the total of certain deductions and certain non-refundable tax credits claimed on the ordinary and separate returns to the amount that could be claimed if only the ordinary return were filed.

The age tax credit, the basic personal tax credit, the spousal tax credit, the equivalent-to-spouse tax credit, and the dependant tax credit that apply in the ordinary return for the year of death may also be deducted in each of the separate returns filed. Certain other tax credits, as well as certain deductions allowable in calculating taxable income, may be deductible in the separate returns or in the ordinary return. However, the total of these other tax credits and deductions may not exceed the amount that could be deducted if only the ordinary return were filed with all of the income, deductions and credits reported therein.

This bulletin identifies the income that can be reported in the separate returns and discusses the deductions from taxable income and tax credits that may be claimed when such returns are filed.

Discussion and Interpretation

Separate returns

¶ 1. Subsection 70(2), paragraph 104(23)(d) and subsection 150(4) each allow the filing of an income tax return for certain portions of a deceased person's income for the year of death as if the return were that of another person. Such a return is available upon election:

(a) under subsection 70(2), to report the value of rights or things which would normally enter into the computation of income on realization or disposition (see the current version of IT-212, Income of Deceased Persons -- Rights or Things);

(b) under paragraph 104(23)(d), where a beneficiary of a testamentary trust dies after the end of the taxation year of the trust but before the end of the calendar year in which the taxation year ended, to report any income from the trust during the period from the end of that taxation year to the date of death; and
(c) under subsection 150(4), where a partner or an individual proprietor of a business dies after the end of the fiscal period of the business but before the end of the calendar year in which the fiscal period ended, to report the income from that business pertaining to the period from the close of that fiscal period to the date of death (see the current version of IT-278, Death of a Partner or a Retired Partner).

The election in (a) must be made within one year after the date of death, or 90 days after the mailing of any notice of assessment or reassessment for the year of death, whichever is later.

In order to avoid possible late filing penalties the elections in (b) and (c) should be made by April 30 of the year following the year of death or six months after the date of death, whichever is later. However, for 1995 and later taxation years, the due date for making the elections in (b) and (c) above may be extended for a deceased person if the deceased person, or the deceased person's spouse, carried on a business in the year of death (except where the expenditures of the business are primarily the cost or capital cost of "tax shelters"). In such circumstances, the due date for making the elections is:

- on or before June 15 of the year following the year of death if the individual died during the period January 1 to December 15;
- within six months after the date of death if the individual died during the period December 16 to December 31 or during the period January 1 to June 14 of the following year (i.e. before the individual's filing due date for the previous year had the individual not died).

Note that although the due date for making the elections in (b) and (c) above may be extended as described above, interest at the prescribed rate will be assessed on any unpaid balance from the later of April 30 of the year following the year of death or six months after the date of death.

The appropriate flow-through rules for partnerships will apply in respect of the return described in (c) above (see the current version of IT-138, Computation and Flow-through of Partnership Income).

Credits and deductions allowed

Deductions in computing taxable income

¶ 2. Pursuant to section 114.2, the total of all deductions under section 110 that may be claimed on the ordinary and separate returns filed on behalf of the deceased person may not exceed the amount that could be claimed if only the ordinary return were filed with all income included therein. The deductions provided under section 110 include deductions in respect of:

- employee stock option benefits included in income -- paragraph 110(1)(d) or (d.1) (see the current version of IT-113, Benefits to Employees -- Stock Options);
- an amount included in income in respect of prospector's and grubstaker's shares -- paragraph 110(1)(d.2);
- income exempt under a tax treaty -- subparagraph 110(1)(f)(i);
- certain compensation amounts received under an employers' or workers' compensation law for injury, disability or death -- subparagraph 110(1)(f)(ii) (see the current version of IT-202, Employees' or Workers' Compensation);
- an amount included in income in respect of a home relocation loan -- paragraph 110(1)(j) (see the current version of IT-421, Benefits to Individuals, Corporations and Shareholders from Loans or Debt); and
- a vow of perpetual poverty -- subsection 110(2) (see the current version of IT-86, Vow of Perpetual Poverty).

¶ 3. The deductions under section 110 (such as under paragraphs 110(1)(d) and (f)) which relate to a particular source of income can be claimed on a given return only to the extent of the income from the particular source reported on that return.

Non-refundable tax credits

¶ 4. Where a portion of the income of a deceased person is reported on a separate return as though it were the income of "another person," the personal tax credits that applied to the deceased person's ordinary return for the year may also be claimed on each of the separate returns filed pursuant to subsection 70(2), paragraph 104(23)(d) or subsection 150(4). The personal tax credits, which are provided by paragraphs 118(1)(a) to (d) and subsection 118(2), are the basic personal tax credit, the spousal tax credit, the equivalent-to-spouse tax credit, the dependant tax credit, and the age tax credit. See the current version of IT-513, Personal Tax Credits.

¶ 5. Pursuant to section 118.93, the total of all tax credits that may be claimed under subsection 118(3) and sections 118.1 to 118.7 and 118.9 on the ordinary and separate returns filed on behalf of the deceased person cannot exceed the amount that would be deducted under those provisions if no separate returns were filed (referred to in this bulletin as the "overall limitation rule"). In general terms these tax credits may be described as follows:

- (a) the tax credit for an individual who is in receipt of certain pension income -- subsection 118(3) (see the current version of IT-517, Pension Tax Credit);
- (b) the tax credit for total gifts -- section 118.1 (see ¶ 8 below and the current version of IT-110, Deductible Gifts and Official Donation Receipts);
- (c) the tax credit for medical expenses -- section 118.2 (see ¶ 7 below and the current version of IT-519, Medical Expense and Disability Tax Credits and Attendant Care Expense Deduction);
- (d) the tax credit for an individual who has a severe and prolonged mental or physical impairment -- section 118.3 (see the current version of IT-519);
- (e) the tax credit for tuition fees of a student who is enrolled at an appropriate educational institution -- section 118.5 (see the current version of IT-516, Tuition Tax Credit);
- (f) the tax credit for a student enrolled in a qualifying education program at a designated educational institution -- section 118.6 (see the current version of IT-515, Education Tax Credit);
- (g) the tax credit for employee premiums for Unemployment Insurance and employee contributions to the Canada Pension Plan or Quebec Pension Plan -- section 118.7; and
- (h) the tax credit in respect of unused tax credits for tuition or education (see (e) and (f) above) that are transferred to the student's parent or grandparent -- section 118.9.

¶ 6. The tax credits under sections 118.1, 118.2, 118.3, 118.5, 118.6 and 118.9 may be claimed on any of the returns regardless of the type of income reported on the return. However, the tax credits under section 118.7 and subsection 118(3) may only be claimed on those returns on which the related income is reported.

¶ 7. For the purpose of the overall limitation rule in section 118.93, in determining the maximum amount that may be claimed as a medical expense tax credit under section 118.2 (see the current version of IT-519), qualifying medical expenses are reduced by the lesser of the dollar amount specified in the T1 individual income tax return for the year for this purpose ($1,614 for 1995) and 3% of the total net income reported on all of the returns.

¶ 8. As noted in ¶ 6 above, the tax credit for total gifts, as determined by the formula in subsection 118.1(3), may be claimed on any of the returns filed on behalf of a deceased person. Subject to the overall limitation rule in section 118.93, the tax credit is based on the total for the year of "total Crown gifts," "total cultural gifts," "total ecological gifts" (for ecological gifts made after February 27, 1995), and the lesser of "total charitable gifts" and 20% of the net income that is reported on that return.

Note: The Federal Budget tabled by the Minister of Finance on March 6, 1996 contains a proposal to raise the limit for charitable donations, for 1996 and subsequent taxation years, to 100% of an individual donor's income for the year in which the individual dies and for the preceding year.

Credits and deductions not allowed

Deductions in computing net income

¶ 9. When calculating the income of a deceased person on the separate returns filed as "another person" under subsection 70(2), paragraph 104(23)(d) or subsection 150(4), the following types of expenses cannot be deducted:

- child care expenses -- section 63 (see the current version of IT-495, Child Care Expenses); and
- attendant care expenses -- section 64 (see the current version of IT-519).

Deductions in computing taxable income

¶ 10. The following deductions are not applicable in determining the taxable income of a deceased person in any of the separate returns filed as "another person":

- capital gains deduction -- section 110.6;
- northern residents deductions -- section 110.7; and
- losses -- section 111.

Tax credits

¶ 11. The transfer of unused tax credits from a spouse under section 118.8 is not applicable in determining the tax payable of a deceased person on any of the separate returns filed as "another person."

¶ 12. The following tax credits cannot be deducted in calculating the income tax payable of a deceased person on any of the separate returns filed as "another person":

- the refundable goods and services tax credit -- section 122.5;
- the refundable child tax benefit -- sections 122.6 to 122.64; and
- the refundable investment tax credit -- section 127.1.

¶ 13. The election under subsection 127(8.4) to renounce investment tax credits which have been allocated to a partner pursuant to subsections 127(8) and (8.3), cannot be made on any of the separate returns filed as "another person."

Other considerations

¶ 14. Pursuant to subsection 110.4(5), the forward averaging amount brought into income under subsection 110.4(2) cannot be reported in any of the separate returns filed as "another person."

¶ 15. By virtue of section 127.55, minimum tax is not imposed on any of the separate returns filed as "another person." As well, subsection 120.2(4) provides that any minimum tax credits arising from another taxation year cannot be applied to reduce the tax payable in respect of the separate returns.

¶ 16. Section 180.2 (Part I.2) provides for the repayment of Old Age Security benefits when an individual's net income, as modified by that section, exceeds a base amount for a taxation year. In the case of a deceased person, the Part I.2 tax is applied separately to each tax return filed on the deceased person's behalf. Therefore, the income reported on a separate return would not be relevant in determining the Part I.2 tax payable on the ordinary return and vice versa.

Explanation of Changes

Introduction

The purpose of the Explanation of Changes is to give the reasons for the revisions to an interpretation bulletin. It outlines revisions that we have made as a result of changes to the law, as well as changes reflecting new or revised departmental interpretations.

Overview

This bulletin deals with the effect of sections 114.2 and 118.93 when a separate income tax return is filed under subsection 70(2), paragraph 104(23)(d) or subsection 150(4) in addition to the ordinary return filed on behalf of a deceased person. Sections 114.2 and 118.93 limit the total of certain non-refundable tax credits and deductions claimed on the ordinary and separate income tax returns to the amount that could be claimed if only the ordinary return were filed.

The bulletin reflects amendments by S.C. 1990, c. 39 (formerly Bill C-28); S.C. 1990, c. 45 (formerly Bill C-62); S.C. 1994, c. 7, Schedule II (1991, c. 49 -- formerly Bill C-18); S.C. 1994, c. 7, Schedule VII (1992, c. 48 -- formerly Bill C-80); S.C. 1995, c. 3 (formerly Bill C-59); and S.C. 1996, c.21 (formerly Bill C-36). The bulletin also reflects the Federal Budget tabled on March 6, 1996.

The comments in the bulletin are not affected by any other draft legislation released before September 3, 1996.

Legislative and Other Changes

¶ 1 reflects amendments to paragraphs 150(1)(b) and (d), applicable for 1995 and later taxation years, which in most cases will extend the due date for making the elections under paragraph 104(23)(d) and subsection 150(4) where the deceased or the deceased's spouse carried on business in the year of death.

New ¶ 2 (former ¶ 3) has been modified to replace the list of section 110 related IT bulletins with a current list of available section 110 deductions.

In new ¶ 3 (last part of former ¶ 5), we have removed the reference to paragraph 110(1)(i) which was repealed applicable to the 1989 and later taxation years.

Paragraph 110(1)(i) provided for a deduction for the repayment of unemployment insurance benefits in computing taxable income. This deduction has been replaced with a deduction under paragraph 60(v.1) in computing net income.

New ¶ 7 (second part of former ¶ 5) has been revised to replace the reference to $1,500 with $1,614 which is the applicable amount for 1995.

New ¶ 8 (third part of former ¶ 5) reflects the amendment to the definition of "total gifts" in subsection 118.1(1) to delete the words "computed without reference to subsection 137(2)," applicable after December 11, 1988 and to add "total ecological gifts" for such gifts made after February 27, 1995. In addition, we have removed the comments dealing with the calculation of the tax credit for total gifts since the calculation is included in the T1 individual income tax return.

New ¶ 9 (former ¶ 6) has been revised to add a reference to the deduction for attendant care expenses.

New ¶ 12 (former ¶ 9) has been revised to reflect the repeal of:

- the refundable federal sales tax credit, applicable to 1991 and later years; and
- the refundable child tax credit, applicable to 1993 and later years.

These credits were replaced by the refundable goods and services tax credit and the refundable child tax benefit, respectively.

New ¶ 15 (former ¶ 12) has been revised to add that the provisions of subsection 120.2(4) do not apply to separate returns filed on behalf of a deceased person.

New ¶ 16 has been added to reflect the Department's position on the application of section 180.2 when more than one tax return is filed on behalf of a deceased person.

Throughout the bulletin, we have changed some of the wording and the ordering of some paragraphs to improve clarity.

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

Interpretation bulletins (ITs) provide Revenue Canada's technical interpretations of income tax law. Due to their technical nature, ITs are used primarily by departmental staff, tax specialists, and other individuals who have an interest in tax matters. For those readers who prefer a less technical explanation of the law, the Department offers other publications, such as tax guides and pamphlets.

While the ITs do not have the force of law, they can generally be relied upon as reflecting the Department's interpretation of the law to be applied on a consistent basis by departmental staff. In cases where an IT has not yet been revised to reflect legislative changes, readers should refer to the amended legislation and its effective date. Similarly, court decisions subsequent to the date of the IT should be considered when determining the relevancy of the comments in the IT.

An interpretation described in an IT applies as of the date the IT is published, unless otherwise specified. When there is a change in a previous interpretation and the change is beneficial to taxpayers, it is usually effective for all future assessments and reassessments. If the change is not favourable to taxpayers, it will normally be effective for the current and subsequent taxation years or for transactions entered into after the date of the IT.

A change in a departmental interpretation may also be announced in the Income Tax Technical News.

If you have any comments regarding matters discussed in this IT, please send them to:

Director, Business and Publications Division

Income Tax Rulings Directorate

Policy and Legislation Branch

Revenue Canada

Ottawa ON K1A 0L5

The Roll-Through.

Subsection 70(3) provides that where, within the time period described in Sec. 70(2), a right or thing has been transferred or distributed to beneficiaries under "the estate or trust"⁴⁶⁴ Sec. 70(2) will not apply to it and the amount received by such beneficiaries upon its realization or disposition will be included in computing their income for the year in which they received it. The application of the provision is mandatory and not elective where the conditions exist. In order to avoid it the executors may have to retain ownership via the withholding of assent until the time period lapses.⁴⁶⁵ The right or thing must be transferred or distributed to, but not necessarily indefeasibly vested in, the beneficiaries, not just of the estate but also of any trust arising on death, within one year of death or 90 days after the terminal year's notice of assessment whichever is later. The important note to make is that although the right or thing need not be indefeasibly vested in the beneficiary, (although the beneficiary himself couldn't have been the estate or the trust arising out of the estate or instantaneously upon the taxpayer's death), inter vivos trusts, corporations, or even other testamentary trusts may serve as eligible recipients if they are beneficiaries under the estate or trust however the initial estate or trust itself cannot.⁴⁶⁶ There is no equity allowed where the assent is too early and the beneficiary has to make good any short-fall in the estate assets. If assent had been withheld the same tax consequences could have occurred.

Under subsection 69(1.1) where any person has acquired the right or thing which was subject to Sec. 70(3) he shall not be deemed to have acquired it for consideration equal to its fair market value as that described in Sec. 69(1)(c), but instead for a cost equal to its cost to the deceased that was not deducted by him in computing his income for any year plus the amount of "expenditures incurred or made" by the recipient to acquire it. These fees could include legal representation, accountant's fees, title transfer charges, in the author's opinion trustee fees and probate, or any equitable charges/conditions precedent imposed upon such property by the deceased in his will/testament the extinguishment of which is conditional upon receipt of the property itself. The recipient need not be resident in Canada.

If the right/thing is recognized by the testator under Sec. 70(2) only the net value will be includable in computing his income while if it is rolled through to the beneficiaries only the deceased's deductible cost will be rolled through as well. Interest costs, expenses, etc. that could be deductible by the testator in a Sec. 70(2) recognition may not be able to be capitalized so as to form part of the deductible cost that is rolled through to the beneficiary as per Sec. 69(1.1) and may be lost due to the fact that they relate to an activity that does not produce income for the testator. Will the Department allow them, administratively, to be deducted from other terminal income when the revenue they were sustained in respect of is being recognized by another party? Either way, they will not gain roll through treatment under Sec. 69(1.1) and thus can only be deducted by the testator in his terminal return, if at all. If there isn't a Sec. 70(3) roll through Sec. 69(1)(c) will apply to determine the cost of the right or thing to the recipient to be its fair market value, but in the case of an income interest in a trust Sec. 106(1.1) will cause it to be nil regardless.⁴⁶⁷

"Idem, where s. 70(3) applies – Sec. 69(1.1)"

(1.1) Where a taxpayer has acquired property that is a right or thing to which subsection 70(3) applies, the following rules apply:

- (a) paragraph 69(1)(c) is not applicable to that property; and
- (b) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the total of
 - (i) such part, if any, of the cost thereof to the taxpayer who has died as had not been deducted by the taxpayer in computing the taxpayer's income for any year, and ⁴⁶⁴ Another instance where the legislators recognized that an estate and possible trust arising out of it are not equal.

⁴⁶⁵ This may be favourable where the testator's effective tax rate is less than the beneficiaries due to loss carry-forwards etc. and the rate on the elective alternate return is of consideration.

⁴⁶⁶ If the initial beneficiary is an individual he must receive it in the capacity of a beneficiary, (taking in some beneficial way), but this doesn't preclude the beneficiary from having to create a trust out of certain funds, not necessarily realized from the right or thing, as a condition of the bequest.

⁴⁶⁷ Subsection 106(1.1) notwithstanding Sec. 69(1)(c), not Sec. 69(1.1).

(ii) any expenditures made or incurred by the taxpayer to acquire the property.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Income of Deceased Persons - Rights or Things

IT-212R3

DATE: March 21, 1990

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Income of Deceased Persons - Rights or Things

REFERENCE: Subsection 70(2) (also subsections 10(6), 61.1(2), 69(1.1), 70(1), 70(3), 70(3.1), 70(4), 70(5.2), 96(1.5), 110.4(5), 159(5) and 159(5.1) and paragraphs 34(a) and 69(1)(c) of the Act and section 23 of the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971 (ITAR))

Application

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-212R2 dated June 29, 1987. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

Summary

The provisions of the Act discussed in this bulletin concern the tax treatment of "rights or things" that a taxpayer owns on death and that would have been included in income if the taxpayer had survived to realize or dispose of these properties. The amount of the rights or things that is brought into the income computation of the decedent for the year of death is the value of the rights or things at the time of death. Rights or things include, for example, dividends declared but unpaid, unused vacation leave credits and the inventory of a farmer who reports income on a cash basis. Rights or things do not include, for example, Canadian or foreign resource properties and the accrued portion of periodic payments. The legal representative of the decedent and the beneficiaries have three alternatives for reporting the income in respect of the decedent's rights or things. The alternatives are:

- (a) the income can be reported in the decedent's income tax return for the year of death along with the other income for that period,
- (b) the income can be reported in a separate income tax return for the rights or things of the decedent, or
- (c) the rights or things can be transferred to one or more of the beneficiaries of the decedent with the result that the beneficiaries rather than the decedent report the income.

Discussion and Interpretation

1. "Rights or things", as the term is used in subsection 70(2), and their taxation are discussed in this bulletin. Subsection 70(1), which discusses payments received on a periodic basis, is discussed in the current version of IT-210 "Income of Deceased Persons - Periodic Payments".

2. With certain exceptions, where a taxpayer at the time of death had rights or things which, when realized or disposed of, would have been included in computing income, subsection 70(2) requires the "value" (see 4 below) of such rights or things at the date of death to be included in computing income for the year of death. Subsection 70(2) includes in income amounts that have been earned but have not been included in income: dividends declared but unpaid, deferred cash purchase tickets (see subsection 76(4)), uncashed matured bond coupons and amounts in respect of which an amount has been deducted in computing income, such as a "cash basis" inventory. Excluded from the application of subsection 70(2) are capital property, amounts included in income under subsection 70(1), and, pursuant to subsection 70(3.1), life insurance policies (including annuity contracts other than those in respect of which an amount was deductible by the decedent under paragraph 60(l)), eligible capital property, land included in the inventory of a business and Canadian or foreign resource properties.

3. Where there is genuine doubt about whether income earned before a taxpayer's death is a periodic payment or a right or thing, its treatment is generally resolved in favour of the taxpayer. As a consequence, the legal representative may report the income in question under subsection 70(1) or under subsection 70(2). In the latter case, depending upon the timing, an election under that provision may be made, or if the income has been transferred to beneficiaries, subsection 70(3) applies instead of subsection 70(2) (see 20 and 25 below).

4. The value of a right or thing for purposes of subsection 70(2) depends upon the facts of each particular situation. In calculating this "value", there may be deducted from the gross amount of the right or thing certain amounts incurred but unpaid at the date of the taxpayer's death. To be deductible for this purpose, those amounts must be of such a nature that, had the taxpayer not died, they would have been deductible in computing the taxpayer's income. For example, amounts payable or accrued for items such as interest, property taxes or insurance premiums are deductible if they are in respect of rights or things included in income under subsection 70(2).

5. Where deductions allowable according to the foregoing exceed the gross amount of the rights or things, the excess is deductible from other income of the taxpayer. Where the aggregate of deductions allowable in computing rights or things exceeds the aggregate of the gross amount of rights or things, no amount can be reported on the separate return for rights or things. In this situation the rights or things may be reported on the final return of the deceased taxpayer. See 20 below for further comments on the separate return for rights or things.

Supplies on Hand and Inventory

6. Supplies on hand and inventories of taxpayers on the cash basis of reporting income for tax purposes (farmers and fishermen) are rights or things. The inventory of an artist that is valued at nil pursuant to subsection 10(6) is a right or thing (see the current version of IT-504 "Visual Artists and Writers").

Work in Progress of Professionals

7. Work in progress of a professional, who is a sole proprietor and who elects to exclude work in progress in computing income pursuant to paragraph 34(a), is a right or thing. Paragraph 34(a) applies to the professional practice of an accountant, dentist, lawyer (including a notary in the province of Quebec), medical doctor, veterinarian or chiropractor. The treatment of work in progress of a professional partnership on the death of a partner or a retired partner is discussed in the current version of IT-278 "Death of a Partner or a Retired Partner".

Livestock

8. Where a deceased farmer on the cash basis owned a "trading" herd, the value of the herd is a right or thing. If the herd includes a "basic" herd, the fair market value at December 31, 1971 of the basic herd at the time of death may be deducted from the value at date of death. See the current version of IT-427 "Livestock of Farmers" for further details.

Grain

9. The right to receive an interim or final payment for grain marketed through the Canadian Wheat Board is a right or thing. Where an announcement is made before a taxpayer's death that an interim or final payment will be made, the right or thing is to be valued at the amount fixed by the Canadian Wheat Board. Where an announcement of an interim or final payment is made after a taxpayer's death, the payment is considered to have no value for the purposes of subsection 70(2). Similarly an entitlement to receive a payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Act is a right or thing. Where it has been announced before a taxpayer's death that a Western Grain Stabilization payment will be made, the taxpayer's share of the payment is subject to the provisions of subsection 70(2). Where such announcements are made after the taxpayer's death, the taxpayer's share of such payments is not considered to have any value for the purposes of subsection 70(2).

10. The inventory of harvested grain of a deceased taxpayer who computed income using the cash basis is a right or thing. The value of the grain, for purposes of subsection 70(2), is considered to be not less than the open market feed grain prices less applicable deductions such as freight and elevator handling charges. See the current version of IT-234 "Income of Deceased Persons - Farm Crops" for comments on unharvested crops.

Debts Receivable

11. A right or thing may include a debt receivable. For example, a taxpayer has a debt receivable that is a right or thing where income is reported on the cash basis and an amount is owing to the taxpayer on the sale of livestock. Where such a debt is forgiven by the decedent by will, the debt is no less a right or thing but section 80 does not apply because of paragraph 80(1)(h).

Dividends

12. A dividend which was declared but not paid before the taxpayer's death is a right or thing if the ex-dividend date, (or, if none, the date of record) was prior to the date of death. A dividend which is a right or thing is subject to the normal "gross up and credit" provisions.

Leave Credits

13. Where an employee is entitled to be paid for unused vacation leave credits, the amounts thereof are rights or things which are brought into income under subsection 70(2).

Employee Compensation Plans

14. Where an employee has at the time of death a vested right to receive, though perhaps not immediately, additional compensation in respect of employment which is payable, in the event of death, to the estate or beneficiaries (but which had not accrued in the last pay period prior to death as contemplated in subsection 70(1)), the right to such payment is a right or thing. For instance, if under an employee benefit plan, certain amounts of compensation are payable on certain future dates to the employee or, in the event of death, to the employee's estate, the right to future payment at the time of death of the employee is a right or thing.

Lump-sum Payment out of a Pension Plan

15. Where a lump-sum payment out of a pension fund or plan in respect of a deceased employee's interest therein is made to an estate, trust or beneficiary (a recipient), no part of that amount is a right or thing within the meaning of subsection 70(2) in any case where the terms of the fund or plan were such that the employee could not have obtained a refund of contributions prior to death except in the event of retirement or other withdrawal from employment. This is by far the most usual situation, and where such is the case, the amount is income of the recipient pursuant to subparagraph 56(1)(a)(i). There may be exceptional cases where a pension fund or plan provides for voluntary withdrawal of contributions by an individual contributor (possibly with interest and/or employer's contributions) at a time or times other than on retirement or on leaving the employment. Where this is so, the portion of the lump-sum payment which would have been taxable had it been received by the decedent normally is still regarded as income of the estate or beneficiary; but if the executor desires, for any reason, to report that amount as income of the employee for the year of death pursuant to subsection 70(2), no objection will be made to that manner of reporting nor to any consequential election properly made under subsection 70(2).

Registered Retirement Savings Plans, etc.

16. A taxpayer is not considered to have a right or thing in respect of a registered retirement savings plan, whether matured or not, if the taxpayer was, until death, the annuitant thereunder. However, except in the case of a plan that had matured before June 30, 1978, where the annuitant dies after June 29, 1978, the fair market value of all the property of the plan at the time of death (less amounts receivable by the spouse of the decedent or received as a refund of premiums by an eligible child or grandchild of the decedent, as described in subsections 146(8.8) to (8.91)) must be included in the income of the decedent by virtue of subsection 146(8.8) in the ordinary return required to be filed by section 150. See the current version of IT-500 "Registered Retirement Savings Plans (maturing after June 29, 1978) Death of Annuitant after June 29, 1978" for further details. Similarly, a taxpayer is not considered to have a right or thing in respect of a registered retirement income fund.

Land Inventory

17. Land that is included in the inventory of a business of the deceased taxpayer is not a right or thing for purposes of subsection 70(2). However, such land is deemed to be disposed of, immediately before death, by the deceased taxpayer for proceeds equal to fair market value, pursuant to paragraph 70(5.2)(e). Paragraph 70(5.2)(f) contains special rules where the land is transferred to the spouse or to a trust for the spouse.

Income-Averaging Annuity Contracts

18. On death, an income-averaging annuity contract is not a right or thing to which subsection 70(2) is applicable. Pursuant to subsection 61.1(2), any amount paid out of an income-averaging annuity contract subsequent to the death of the original annuitant is deemed to be a payment out of an income-averaging annuity contract and will therefore be included in the income of the recipient with no deduction for any capital element.

1971 Receivables

19. Section 23 of the ITAR provides rules for taxing "1971 receivables" of a business that is a profession. Any such receivables not already brought into income at the date of death are included in the decedent's final return pursuant to paragraph 23(3)(c) of the ITAR and a further deduction is precluded by paragraph 23(4)(a) of the ITAR. They are not considered to be rights or things under subsection 70(2). By virtue of subsection 159(5.1), the tax incurred on such receivables may be paid in instalments, as described in 24 below.

Elections

20. Pursuant to subsection 70(2) the taxpayer's legal representative may elect to file a separate return of the value of the decedent's rights or things and pay tax thereon for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died as if the taxpayer were another person. To be valid, the election must be made not later than the later of one year after the date of death and 90 days after the mailing of any notice of assessment or reassessment for the year of death. If a separate return is filed, it must include the total value of all the decedent's rights or things other than those transferred to beneficiaries within the time provided by subsection 70(3) (see 25 below). For 1988 and subsequent taxation years, the personal tax credits provided in paragraphs 118(1)(a) to (d) and subsection 118(2) that apply to the decedent's ordinary income tax return for the year of death may also be claimed on the separate return filed pursuant to subsection 70(2). The personal tax credits are the married tax credit, the married equivalent tax credit, the basic personal tax credit, the dependant tax credit and the age tax credit. See the current version of IT-513 "Personal Tax Credits". The extent to which deductions under section 110 and tax credits under subsection 118(3) and sections 118.1 to 118.7 and 118.9 may be claimed on the separate return is discussed in IT-326R2 "Returns of Deceased Persons as 'Another Person'". (Prior to 1988, the personal exemptions provided by paragraphs 109(1)(a) to (h) that applied to the decedent's ordinary return for the year of death could also be claimed on the separate return filed pursuant to subsection 70(2). The extent to which deductions under sections 110, 110.1 and 110.2 could be claimed on the separate return is discussed in IT-326R.)

21. Pursuant to subsection 70(4), an election made under subsection 70(2) may be revoked if the notice of revocation is in writing, signed by the decedent's legal representative and filed within the time for making the election.

22. Pursuant to subsection 110.4(5), the forward averaged amount brought into income pursuant to subsection 110.4(2) cannot be reported in the separate return filed under subsection 70(2).

23. A sale of a right or thing for good and valuable consideration does not come within the meaning of the phrase "transferred or distributed" as used in subsection 70(3).

Payment of Tax in Instalments

24. The additional tax payable by virtue of subsection 70(2) may be paid in up to ten equal consecutive annual instalments when the conditions in subsection 159(5) are met. See T2075 "Election under subsection 159(5) by a deceased taxpayer's legal representative to defer payments of income tax".

Recipients of Rights or Things

25. Where an estate, trust or beneficiary (the recipient) acquires a right or thing upon a taxpayer's death, the tax consequences arising therefrom will depend on whether the value of that right or thing was included in the income of the deceased taxpayer's income tax return under subsection 70(2) or in the deceased taxpayer's income tax return for the year of death or in the hands of the recipient under subsection 70(3).

(a) Where subsection 70(2) applies or the rights or things are included in the deceased taxpayer's income tax return for the year of death, the recipient is deemed by paragraph 69(1)(c) to have acquired the asset at a cost equal to its fair market value. The fair market value is normally the gross amount (see 4 above) used in computing the income of the decedent. The disposition of the asset by the recipient will generally be on capital account unless the recipient's activities in relation to the asset are such that the asset constitutes a trading asset.

(b) Where a right or thing has been transferred or distributed to beneficiaries of the estate not later than one year after the date of death or 90 days after the date of mailing of any notice of assessment or reassessment in respect of the year of death, whichever is the later date, subsection 70(3) applies. Where subsection 70(3) applies, the disposition is always on income account and the tax liability arises when the beneficiary realizes or disposes of the asset. In addition where subsection 70(3) applies, paragraph 69(1)(c) does not apply with the result that the recipient's cost is determined under subsection 69(1.1) as the aggregate of such part of the cost of the property to the deceased as was not deducted in computing the income of the deceased for any taxation year and any expenditures made or incurred by the recipient to acquire the property.

Trust Interests: Special Issues.

In respect of income interests in other inter vivos or testamentary trusts or estates income that accrued prior to death subsequently realized under Sec. 104(13) by the estate will not be negated with a Sec. 106(1) deduction since the income interest acquired will not have a cost pursuant to Sec. 106(1.1) unless the testator had one deductible. The income will be taxed under Sec. 70(2) as "value" and Sec. 104(13) when realized. Thus there will be double taxation of the value attributable to the stub period income prior to death. Income interests in trusts should always be rolled through, (if possible), otherwise double taxation could easily result. Subsection 70(2) doesn't cause a deemed disposition, only a realization of the value as if disposed of hence where a right or thing has a deductible cost it should be rolled through so as to maintain that deductible cost. Even though current expenses are administratively allowed to be deducted against a Sec. 70(2) inclusion, booked costs appear not to be provided for. In the case of income interests in trusts Sec. 106(1) offers a deduction of cost only against Sec. 104(13) inclusions and Sec. 106(1) disposition inclusions while Sec. 70(2) doesn't cause either. The general rule; income is not taxed in the hands of the testator and his estate is violated in this case. (Would Sec. 70(1) rather than 70(2) capture such stub year income? It's doubted.⁴⁶⁸⁴⁶⁹

The Testamentary Trust Income Beneficiary Separate Return.

Subparagraph 104(24)(d) allows a taxpayer's personal representative to file a separate return in respect of income of only a testamentary trust that would be payable to the taxpayer if the taxpayer dies before the end of the calendar year in which the trust's tax year ends. The stub period income, since the beginning of the trust's tax year, can be reported on a completely separate return operating within the same restrictions as those imposed under Sec. 70(2). Applicable only in respect of testamentary trusts the provision provides that the stub period income will be included in computing the beneficiary's income however it doesn't provide that income not yet paid but accrued will be deemed to be paid/payable to him and subsection 104(6)(b) doesn't technically offer the trust a deduction in respect of the amount recognized under Sec. 70(2).⁴⁷⁰

If income accrues and is payable to the beneficiary after the end of the trust's tax year after it is capitalized the Sec. 104(24)(d) election will not be available since at the date of death the taxpayer does not have income from the trust.⁴⁷¹ In this respect the provision is targeted, in the author's opinion, exclusively at income paid or payable at the moment of death and serves to preclude a possible deferral of the income recognition that would otherwise result under Sec. 104(24)(c)⁴⁷².

Income payable only at the end of the trust's tax year will be recognized by the estate via Sec. 104(13), 468. Would it be possible to argue that, since the income interest can be recognized as a capital property, pursuant to Gadsden v. M.N.R., 1983 C.T.C. 2132 TRB, and the implicit need for legislative abolishment of its capital nature in Sec. 106(1), that the interest is a capital property and thus exempt from Sec. 70(2), even though when realized or disposed of would produce only an income inclusion? See Sec. 96(1.4) in respect of rights to partnership income deemed not to be capital property straight out while Sec. 106(2) deems only the capital gain/loss on the disposition of a trust income interest to be nil but doesn't comment on the type of property.

469 A beneficiary under an unadministered estate who is entitled to the income of the residue and that which accrues during the administration has a capital interest in the estate in respect of the income accruing and an income interest in respect of that to be realized once administration is complete. Should the beneficiary die while the estate is being administered the latter will be captured by Sec. 70(2) but not the former and thus the expected duration of administration, amount of debt and probability of the interest's ademption become relevant in ascertaining the value of the right for Sec. 70(2) purposes.

470 For some unfathomable reason Finance made this provision only applicable to testamentary trusts and not those inter vivos, though Heaven knows why.

471. The provision has been ambiguously phrased in this respect in that it is possible to construe the target as the taxpayer having income from the trust...at any time during the trust's tax year but regardless it would be unreasonable, in the face of the alternate elections and the general scheme of the death dispositions, to equate post mortem accounting with a pre mortem legal ability to enforce a payment.

472 which causes income recognition in the year in which the trust's tax year ends however, that income right devolving to the executors, when and if realized by the testator would have caused an income inclusion and would thus also be recognized in the testator's income via Sec. 70(2), unless there is a roll through.⁴⁷³ The Sec. 104(23)(d) alternative election must be filed before April 30th of the calendar year following death or within 6 months of the death whichever is later in order to avoid late filing penalties.

"Testamentary trusts – Sec. 104(23)"

(23) In the case of a testamentary trust, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the following rules apply:

(a) the taxation year of the trust is the period for which the accounts of the trust are made up for purposes of assessment under this Act, but no such period may exceed 12 months and no change in the time when such a period ends may be made for the purposes of this Act without the concurrence of the Minister;

(b) when a taxation year is referred to by reference to a calendar year, the reference is to the taxation year or years coinciding with, or ending in, that year;

(c) the income of a person for a taxation year from the trust shall be deemed to be the person's benefits from or under the trust for the taxation year or years of the trust that ended in the year determined as provided by this section and section 105;

(d) where an individual having income from the trust died after the end of a taxation year of the trust but before the end of the calendar year in which the taxation year ended, the individual's income from the trust for the period commencing immediately after the end of the taxation year and ending at the time of death shall be included in computing the individual's income for the individual's taxation year in which the individual died unless the individual's legal representative has elected otherwise, in which case the legal representative shall file a separate return of income for the period under this Part and pay the tax for the period under this Part as if

(i) the individual were another person,

(ii) the period were a taxation year,

(iii) that other person's only income for the period were the individual's income from the trust for that period, and

(iv) subject to sections 114.2 and 118.93, that other person were entitled to the deductions to which the individual was entitled under sections 110, 118 to 118.7 and 118.9 for the period in computing the individual's taxable income or tax payable under this Part, as the case may be, for the period; and

(e) in lieu of making the payments required by sections 155, 156 and 156.1, the trust shall pay to the Receiver General within 90 days after the end of each taxation year, the tax payable under this Part by it for the year.

Conditions Precedent.

The will may provide that in order for a particular beneficiary to acquire the "right or thing" he must furnish the trust/estate with a capital sum which may be passed on to other beneficiaries who would otherwise have received the "right or thing". Such an expenditure would be added on to the cost of the "right or thing" as per Sec. 69(1.1)(b)(ii) while causing the estate to only possibly lose its testamentary status. Since the Sec. 70(3) provision is applicable the testator will avoid the recognition of a taxable disposition, (in the form of a testamentary sale). The funds can then be distributed, as capital, to other beneficiaries and the acquiror will recognize a deductible cost that will reduce the amount of income inclusions when the "right or thing" is ⁴⁷³ Subsection 4(4) would not operate in the instance where the testator recognizes a Sec. 70(2) inclusion in respect of a current year trust's income not payable until the end of the trust's tax year and the estate subsequently recognizes that income under Sec. 104(13) since there are two taxpayers recognizing the income. If instead the income interest is rolled through to a beneficiary in such a way that the Sec. 70(3) provision applies Sec. 4(4) can be relied on by the beneficiary to negate a double inclusion. In IT 278R para 14 the Department administratively allows a Sec. 96(1.1) partnership income right to have a cost to a beneficiary equal to the Sec. 70(2) inclusion when it suffers such upon the death of the testator: this should also be the administrative policy of the Department in this respect so as to allow for a Sec. 106(1) deduction.

realized. If the payment is made directly to a beneficiary Sec. 105(1) may apply. The only requirement that must be met for the bump up in cost is that the expenditure must have been made or incurred (not payable or "incurable"), by the taxpayer in order for him to acquire the property and if the deceased explicitly provides in his will that certain beneficiaries are to receive the rights or things only after paying a capital sum to another person other than the general estate, (the conditional bequest), then that capital sum will be paid so as to acquire the property (which the will could provide will be bequeathed to someone else if not accepted by the former).^{474 475}

Such a condition precedent will allow the deceased to extend the scope and meticulously arrange the benefits to be realized from his death by the parties however the direct beneficiary recipient of the payment just cited would be required to recognize it in income fully under Sec. 105(1) without a deduction to the trust, or the recipient of the right or thing if it wasn't as a condition of the acceptance of the property. By matching it to, and making it conditional upon, the acquisition of the right or thing at least there is some tax equity in that a deduction is allowed for an otherwise non-deductible income inclusion.⁴⁷⁶ The better route would be then to have the payment made to the trust/estate and then to the beneficiary since how can an estate/trust realize a benefit in respect of itself.

If the condition precedent calls for the payment of consideration to a taxpayer who does not recognize Part I income⁴⁷⁷ then Sec. 105(1) will not apply and the Sec. 69(1.1) cost bump will be "tax free". Such an instance occurs where the payment is to be made to "y'er Aunt 'Calypso' Betty getting together and feeling alright" in Jamaica since Auntie 'Cal' would then be non-resident and Sec. 105(1) does not apply to non-residents nor does it give rise to withholding tax as per Sec. 212(1)(c).⁴⁷⁸

The transfer of the right or thing could be made conditional on the payment by the recipient of an amount, to an offspring of his immediate family, that would lead to a Sec. 105(1) inclusion but which would be negated by the minor's unused personal tax credits. If the terms of the will provide that the recipient is to set up a trust with deferred entitlements for the benefit of the offspring then the Sec. 105(1) provision may apply to those entitlements, in the author's opinion, in that they are benefits to be realized under and in respect of an estate or trust, even though the subdivision k rules will apply to beneficiaries of the second trust since Sec. 105(1) targets their benefit that is not otherwise includable in income for that year. The benefit they realize will, however, only be in the future when the trust makes distributions or when they sell their interest or realize any other form of benefit independent from the trust hence the advantage of a time deferred inclusion though present deduction is available, unless CRA can invent a way to say that the mere holding of an interest in a trust is an annual benefit when its holder receives nothing for it.⁴⁷⁹

474. The connection between the payment and the receipt may have to be direct being a payment to qualify as a participant in a discretionary class or a beneficiary whom receives the property upon an exercise of a dispositive power may not be considered "to acquire the right" but instead to be considered as a possible recipient.

475 Can CRA argue that a trust arising out of property part of which comprise proceeds received as a condition precedent by the originating estate not be "testamentary" by virtue of the fact that the end trust is receiving property not by virtue of death? Is it important when the definition of testamentary trust explicitly recognizes that the trust can receive property other than by virtue of the death of the settling testator? Does CRA Rulings, when it's not giving fractured opinion, consider an estate and the trust that arises out of it distinct given that the Act makes multiple references to both and in many cases jointly? See Wilson v. Minister of National Revenue, [1955] S.C.R. 352 where an annuity was treated as a business expense against a business premise devised to a resident, under the IWTA..

476 This can also only be done equitably with rights or things and not property subject to the Sec. 70(5)-(6)-107(2) mechanics: if a conditional devise based on a condition precedent is linked to the devolution of capital property Sec. 107(2) will not offer equitable treatment to the beneficiaries in a situation where one will be required to recognize a Sec. 105(1) inclusion, if resident, and the other no income/gain deduction. If the interest being satisfied has been acquired for consideration payable there may be some degree of capital loss creation if there is an equitable charge placed on the property but not where there must be a payment made to receive it from the trust. See Baradosh et al. v M.N.R., 93 D.T.C. 1436.

477 See Cowan v. Allen, 26 S.C.R. 292.

478 Subsection 214(3) does not cause the benefit recognizable under Sec. 105(1) to be a deemed dividend as it does to Sec. 15(1) benefits as per paragraph 214(3)(a). There is no targeting of subsection 105(1) benefits for non-resident withholding tax rates.

479 Where the payment is made to the estate/trust could the Department successfully argue that the transfer was a sale initiated by the testator and carried through by his executors? See "Testamentary Options" in Testamentary Spousal Roll-overs. In T.I. 910214/910786 provided Apr. 1991 by the Business and General Section it was held with respect to whether a taxable benefit could accrue to employees under Sec. 149(1)(l), 105(1), or 6(1)(a) when amounts were contributed to a training fund for them:

Once the right or thing is realized or disposed of the cost under Sec. 69(1.1) will be deductible against the income inclusion, which, depending on the amount and cost deductible, could result in a significant net income reduction. If the beneficiary recognizes the proceeds of the right or thing as per Sec. 70(3) he will always do so on an income basis while if the right or thing is recognized under Sec. 70(2) by the deceased in either of the two possible returns the ultimate recipient of the right or thing, being the estate or trust will recognize the proceeds as capital regardless of whether the deceased's business etc. is carried on by the estate/trust. Income rights under existing trusts are "rights or things" however if the trust deed provides that the right is to terminate on death (forgiven), instead of being distributable to an estate beneficiary and continuing to be enforceable by the subsequent person, the value of the "right" upon death will be significantly reduced and the effect of Sec. 70(2) will be seriously negated. Subsection 70(2) targets property the taxpayer had at the time of death however only the value at the time of death will be includable.⁴⁸⁰

If the trust deed provides that excess depreciation/incorporation may occur and thus reduce the income to which the right pertains following the continuity of it through to the beneficiary at least the deceased's beneficiaries will be able to deduct any undeducted cost upon subsequent discretionary income allocations, possibly pursuant to a condition that a certain percentage thereof be contributed to a trust for a specified beneficiary's benefit, while if the interest were to terminate upon death any unabsorbed cost would be lost.⁴⁸¹

It would appear that the beneficiary could receive the beneficial ownership of the right and realize the income tax free absorbing a Sec. 106(1) deductible cost while within 36 months pursuant to Sec. 248(8)(c) & (a) he could release the right back to the estate without recognizing a Sec. 106(1) taxable disposition.

A bump in the tax cost of the property results where the taxpayer has made "any expenditures...to acquire the property" as compared to expenditures made to receive it. The distinction in the terminology is arguably indicative. As per Sec. 44(3) compensation for property unlawfully taken, for property destroyed and any amount payable under a policy of insurance in respect of loss or destruction of property, or property taken under statutory authority etc. will not be eligible for Sec. 70(3) treatment and instead must be recognized by the testator for purposes of capital cost allowance and capital gains taxation.

Given that Finance Canada feels comfortable leaving the possible recognition of "any [unqualified] expenditures" to be off-set against the realization of a right or thing it's a hell ova way to knit non-deductible estate expenses directly against a full income inclusion. The author thinks of probate fees, executrix fees and all those other things on CRA's no-go list if required to be satisfied or assumed as a condition of receiving the right or thing specifically as stated by the will.

Distributions to Non-Residents.

Qualified recipients may be non-resident and thus ultimate realizations of the "rights or things" may be subject to either Sec. 115(1) or section 212 inclusions and withholdings. If the right relates to an income amount the source of which is in a foreign jurisdiction then when that amount is realized neither of the above set of provisions will apply to it to cause Canadian tax imposition. If the resident trust were to realize the "right" and then distribute the proceeds they would usually be caught for withholding tax under Sec. 212(1)(c), (unless they were capitalized), while some relief could be available under the international tax treaties. If the assent to

"It is our further opinion that a taxable benefit is not enjoyed by an employee at the time of contribution to a TTF by either an employer, an employee association or by Employment and Immigration Canada. Further, it would appear unlikely that a benefit accrues to an employee at the time that the employee receives training sponsored or funded by a TTF. We believe that, in most cases, the primary beneficiary of training may be the employer rather than the employee. A definitive response may only be given on a case by case basis as obviously course objectives, content and so forth determines whether training is to primarily benefit the employer, industry in general or an individual employee."

480 See Trustees, Exors., & Agency Co. v. Commr., 65 C.L.R. 33, for an example of where the value of a life interest was seriously reduced.

481 There should be no problem in bumping the deductible cost of an income interest passing through Sec. 70(3) by imposing a condition precedent, in the form of a requirement to make a payment to a third party, upon its vesting. Subsection 106(1.1) notwithstanding the application of Sec. 69(1)(c) only but the provision allows a deductible cost for purposes of Sec. 106(1) if the interest was acquired from a beneficiary; it does not require that the deductible cost actually be limited to the amount paid to that beneficiary. This allows Sec. 69(1.1) expenditures to bump the Sec. 106(1) deductible cost.

the transfer of non-resident based rights or things occurs so as to cause them to be transferred to a non-resident Part I tax well be avoided thereupon if the recipient is an inter vivos trust resident in a tax free jurisdiction that is to capitalize the realizations and distribute them to Canadian residents.⁴⁸² If the trust doesn't contain discretionary distributive powers Sec. 94(1)(d) will apply while by virtue of Sec. 95(1)(e)(i) the trust can receive up to $5,000 in income without exposing its Canadian resident beneficiary to a F.A.P.I. inclusion.⁴⁸³ Section 94.1 should not apply to the trust since the purpose of the trust isn't to derive a benefit from portfolio investments but is simply to capitalize a dividend or interest stream temporarily, (the share/bond property generating the right or thing doesn't necessarily have to be transferred to it as well). Depending on the rate of Canadian withholding tax on the dividend/interest and the immediate effective rate of taxation of those ultimately to derive the benefit it may be beneficial to have Canadian source rights or things transferred out of the country in the same way. The deductible cost of the right or thing as well as the unused tax credits of the potential beneficiaries should be thoroughly examined in contemplating any such strategy.

Reintroduction of Inter Vivos Trust Income Interest Cost?

An income interest in a trust is a right or thing subject to Sec. 70(2) the cost of which, recognizable under Sec. 106(1.1), with cost which may be deducted under Sec. 106(1) against Sec. 104(13) income inclusions however under that provision the cost of the interest that may be deducted in any given year cannot exceed the cost thereof net of any deductible cost in a previous period thus if a Sec. 106(1) deduction isn't taken the deductible cost will none-the-less be reduced. Subsection 106(1.1) does not provide that the Sec. 69(1.1) resulting cost will be recognized as the deductible cost for beneficiaries who receive the right under the pretence of Sec. 70(3) however the provision does not operate to preclude such from occurring.⁴⁸⁴ Subparagraph 69(1.1)(b)(i) recognizes that the cost of the income interest to the beneficiary by virtue of the Sec. 70(3) roll through will be based on "the cost thereof to the taxpayer who has died as had not been deducted by him in computing his income for any year..." and with this one has to ask; if the testator did not take the Sec. 106(1) deductions when available previously, will such a cost, which as per Sec. 106(1) ceased to be deductible, become deductible by the beneficiary? Such amounts were not deducted by the taxpayer although they did reduce his deductible cost in his hands and the provision does not specifically pass through the deductible cost of the interest, only the cost that was not actually deducted by the deceased taxpayer.

Since subsection 106(1.1) doesn't prescribe that the deductible cost of an interest acquired from a beneficiary will be restricted to amounts included in computing that beneficiary's income, acting in concert with the fact that only Sec. 69(1)(c) is precluded from applying, it would seem plausible that the above recreation of deductible cost was at least recognized by the draftsmen.⁴⁸⁵

482. Whether or not the Department can attack the distribution from the unadministered estate of the right or thing with Sec. 107(5) depends on whether the beneficiary can be recognized to have a right to trust capital within the context of Sec. 108(1)(c) as based on the right to trust law capital as implied by the Sec. 108(1)(e) and 108(3) basis of the income interest. There may be authority to argue that rights or things to income accrued to the date of death become rights to capital in fact since the estate does not realize those amounts as income having instead been income inter vivos. In such a case Sec. 107(5) could apply to cause a disposition of the right the conveyance of which is assented to so as to tax any accrued gain. (It's to be noted that Sec. 70(2) refers to property other than capital property to the deceased, not property that becomes capital property to the estate.) It could be argued that the Sec. 70(2)-(3) mechanics concern only who recognizes the income accrued to the date of death and that the section 107 distribution provisions concern distributions of capital property created upon death even in the face of the Sec. 70(3)(b) explicit roll through to the beneficiaries. Where the right/thing passes through a personal estate Sec. 107(2) would not create any tax consequences to anyone but where Sec. 107(5) applied what a.c.b. would the property have..Nil? This is only of concern when the right or thing would not otherwise become taxable Canadian property within the Sec. 115(1)(b) & 248(1) definitions and it's to be noted that inventory/non-capital property can be distributed under Sec. 107(5).

483 In a T.I. provided in April 1984 by the Specialty Corporations Rulings Division it was held that when a non-resident testamentary trust is created under a will and Sec. 94(1) applies to it the resident beneficiary's capital interest's a.c.b. will suffer "bumps" and "grinds" under section 53 while Sec. 108(1)(d) will prevent the interest from having an a.c.b. for purposes of disposition and commutations attended to under Sec. 107(1)-(1.1)-(2) though in the author's opinion if the trust corpus is distributed to the beneficiary Sec. 107(2) will apply to prevent tax consequences to the trust but Sec. 108(1)(d) working in unison with Sec. 107(1)(a) and the closing amble of Sec. 107(1) will cause the beneficiary a capital gain.

484. Bequests under Sec. 69(1)(c) are specifically precluded however this is due to the fact that if otherwise the tax cost of the interest would be inflated to its fair market value, while the testator would have to recognize only its net market value in his income under Sec. 70(2).

485 The Sec. 248(1) definition of "cost amount" is inapplicable in this case. Do mere words mean anything here? This

Not only that, a taxpayer can directly tack on costs to his secondary trusts' income interest realized through a Sec. 70(3)-69(1.1) roll-through by incurring any "unqualified" "expenditure" cited in Sec. 69(1.1)(b) such as payment of probate, conditions precedent payments, et, cet, er, a.⁴⁸⁶

Avoidance.

One of the best ways to avoid a Sec. 70(2) inclusion is simply not to have the taxpayer own the right or thing in a personal capacity but instead as a trustee. Such was the case in *Tunley v. Commr.*⁴⁸⁷ where a taxpayer declared inter vivos to hold the income of shares recently subscribed for on trust for a religious institution while the remainder interest in the shares remained his personally.⁴⁸⁸ The income potential was not assessable for succession duty upon his death and if such were structured in Canada Sec. 70(2) would not apply to the income right.⁴⁸⁹ The income could be accumulated and be considered payable to a minor but for his age thus allowing Sec. 104(18) to operate so as to preclude the trust from recognizing the income while assessing the minor's unused personal tax credits, (...if he has any left by the time I'd finish with him). The settlor could retain a power of appointment over the accumulated income without having Sec. 75(2) cause any damage and appoint it to himself as he needs it.⁴⁹⁰ Subsection 70(2) refers to rights or things that when realized or disposed of would produce an income inclusion and in this respect powers of appointment over income interests as such will be captured by it. This was the case in *Commr. of S. D. v. Donaldson*⁴⁹¹ where an income interest terminated but the taxpayer could extend it simply by asking. The interest wasn't extended in the year of death is an Act, not an act: maybe Finance should be more verbal with the term "deductible" since that one set of syllables knocks down two birds here.

⁴⁸⁶ Keep up: on approaching death taxpayers hive off ownership of income producing properties to inter vivos trusts giving to-be-testator income interests therein, on contract, that once he dies he passes income interests to settlors' non-arm's lengths, with specification that payments also be made by the to non-residents for various purposes including to establish non-resident trusts by the rights or things beneficiaries. Taxpayer dies, the rights 'n things are bequeathed to specified parties who make the payments. Any previously deducted income interest cost is reestablished and is added on to the "expenditures" incurred by the beneficiaries and just how much Cdn. exposed income is eliminated. One word missed ("deductible" cost, Sec. 69(1.1), one word missing ("deductible" expenditure", Sec. 69(1.1)(b)). And Sec. 105(1) doesn't cause withholding on payments going out. And life, is like that.

Income interest in trust - Sec. 106(1)

(1) Where an amount in respect of a taxpayer's income interest in a trust has been included in computing the taxpayer's income for a taxation year by reason of subsection 106(2) or 104(13), except to the extent that an amount in respect of that income interest has been deducted in computing the taxpayer's taxable income pursuant to subsection 112(1) or 138(6), there may be deducted in computing the taxpayer's income for the year the lesser of

- (a) the amount so included in computing the taxpayer's income for the year, and
- (b) the amount, if any, by which the cost to the taxpayer of the income interest exceeds the total of all amounts in respect of the interest that were deductible under this subsection in computing the taxpayer's income for previous taxation years.

Idem, where s. 70(3) applies – Sec. 69(1.1)

(1.1) Where a taxpayer has acquired property that is a right or thing to which subsection 70(3) applies, the following rules apply:

- (a) paragraph 69(1)(c) is not applicable to that property; and
- (b) the taxpayer shall be deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the total of
 - (i) such part, if any, of the cost thereof to the taxpayer who has died as had not been deducted by the taxpayer in computing the taxpayer's income for any year, and
 - (ii) any expenditures made or incurred by the taxpayer to acquire the property.

⁴⁸⁷ 39 C.L.R. 528,

⁴⁸⁸ What is even more interesting is that the income interest was contingent and upon his death it was to revert to is estate. This is highly valuable in the ITA context.

⁴⁸⁹ Attention must be paid so as to impose a trust on the income right and not the income from the right. Subjecting a legal life interest to a trust will cause the initial holder or grantor to incur a capital disposition. The fact that the right to income is held on trust for an offspring and all income is attributed back to the settlor does not negate the fact that there is a trust in respect of the right and the settlor doesn't hold it in his personal capacity.

⁴⁹⁰ The power would not preclude vesting: Public Trustee v. Wolf, 1923 A.C. 544 (HL). It has not, in the author's opinion, been conclusively determined whether Sec. 104(18) requires indefeasible vesting. The Department has expressed a non-binding opinion in I.T. 286R para. 7 but the Australian courts have produced jurisprudence to the contrary in respect of a very similarly worded and purposed provision. See "Minor Income Entitlements" in the Chapter Income Recognition Mechanics.

⁴⁹¹ 39 C.L.R. 539

but the power was captured for succession duty upon death. In the author's opinion such a power would definitely be subject to Sec. 70(2) upon the death of its holder, however, if it only relates to capitalized income then it would not be.⁴⁹² It is a property that has, as its base, a stream of income and would be recognizable as income when realized.

Some Case Law on Sales of Rights or Things.

The most authoritative of cases concerning the Sec. 70(2)-(3) roll through mechanism consists of *Tory Estate v. M.N.R.*⁴⁹³ when accounts receivable were transferred from an estate, (essentially in the midst of administration), to a beneficiary in return for her payment of $380,000 and surrender of a $90,000 legacy claim to the estate. The value of the A.R. was approx $483,350 and when the executors attempted to recognize Sec. 70(3) roll-through treatment the Minister contended that $90,000 worth of book receivables had been transferred in satisfaction of the $90,000 balance of the legacy owing, and that the $380,000 amount of the A.R. transferred was by virtue of a sale and not a "distribution" within the context of Sec. 70(3). It's important to note that the transfers were the consequence of an agreement made between the beneficiary and the executors and were not prescribed by the will. Speaking for the majority of the Appeal Court, Bastin, D.J. provided:

"In the case at bar, the assignment to Mrs. Denton of $90,000 of the accounts receivable was a distribution pursuant to the terms of the will but the assignment of the balance of the accounts receivable was, in fact, a sale to Mrs. Denton for valuable consideration. To the extent of $90,000 the assignment was made in satisfaction of the balance of her bequest... The value of the rights or things is therefore restricted to the amount of the inheritance of the beneficiary. If he acquires more than that he takes as a purchaser for value and the estate is taxable on the amount so transferred."

While previously he had held:

"...The words "distributed to beneficiaries" clearly restrict the value of the rights or things to be conveyed to each beneficiary to the amount of the bequest to which he is entitled.⁴⁹⁴ If what was contemplated by Parliament was a sale of accounts receivable or similar things, to a person who happened to be a beneficiary, the word "distributed" would be quite inappropriate."⁴⁹⁵

The "sale" in Tory Estate was performed through an agreement entered into by the executors and the legatee while had the provision for such a transfer been made in the will by the testator potentially different results would have occurred. The entire balance of the A.R. could be recognized to be purchased for consideration approximately equal to its value however what would occur if the testator had required, as per the terms of his will, that the beneficiary receive the entirety of the A.R. upon the payment of a certain percentage of its value to the trust, while if that particular beneficiary did not make such a payment the A.R.

492 See also Public Trustee v. I.R.C., 1960 1 All E.R. 1 (HL).

493. 73 D.T.C. 5354, (aff'd by S.C. at 76 D.T.C. 6312)

494 To make sense in light of the fact that Sec. 107(2) also uses the term "distribute" in a testamentary context when debt is to be assumed this comment would be appropriate in respect of the gross value of the estate to which beneficial entitlement exists, not net of conditions precedent or subsequent.

495 Similar opinions were expressed in Passant v. Jackson, 1985 S.T.C. 133 ChD, where to realize a particular property from an estate as a residuary legatee the taxpayer mortgaged it after the executor assented to its unencumbered disposition to the taxpayer whereafter the proceeds were given directly to the executor with which to satisfy the estate's liabilities. The testator contended to no avail that the cost of the property to him for subsequent disposition purposes of the property amounted to both its fair market value under a Sec. 70(5) cost bump-like provision extracting estate taxes plus the amount he paid to the estate by way of the mortgage but only the former was recognized as a cost. Speaking of the assent the court held:

"Although the executor, as a matter of form and convenience, transferred the property to the taxpayer by an assent, the resulting position was just the same as if the taxpayer had paid the executor 6000 pounds for the property, that being the agreed value a little over a year before, and had borrowed the purchase price, as to part on a short term loan, and had then repaid the short term loan on the distribution of the net balance of the estate, being a sum of 3160 pounds or thereabouts. It was not in truth a bare assent but machinery for giving effect to what was in substance a sale."

The issue in the case exclusively concerned the cost of the property and not how it was acquired though it is expected that this reasoning could be equally applicable to cases involving the use of testamentary debt to fine tune the Sec. 70(3) recognition to be discussed subsequently.

would be realized, taxed in the hands of the trust, and capitalized for the ultimate benefit of that particular beneficiary. If the payment wasn't made the particular beneficiary would exclusively eventually realize the benefit of the bequest, equal to the value of the A.R., while if the payment, say of 30% of the value etc., was made he would receive the balance, and eventually the amount he paid. (The paid amount could then be used to generate income for other beneficiaries before it is returned to the payor.)

Following the reasoning in Tory Estate the value of the bequest to the beneficiary would equal the gross amount of the income right, however in the instance where she pays as a condition a returnable sum to the trust some of that value will be a return of capital while in the case where she doesn't pay anything the entire sum will be distributed as capital. If the will provides that $100,000 worth of A.R. will be distributed to a particular beneficiary immediately provided she pay $20,000 which will be returned to her in five years a "sale for value" cannot be recognizable since the transfer of the value is aggregately gratuitous however, the $20,000 she pays as a condition could be added on to the cost of the A.R. (rights) by virtue of Sec. 69(1.1)(ii), as an expenditure made or incurred to acquire the property, and will thus reduce the net income inclusion when the right is realized subsequently. Creating cost out of a condition precedent to receive the right and then have the net proceeds transferred back out of the estate to the same beneficiary as out of the estate's general account seems to be plausible within the workings of the statutes, merely because its possibility hasn't been closed off. Subparagraph 69(1.1)(ii) requires that the expenditure be made to acquire the rights while it doesn't preclude from effect expenditures the substance of which may be returned. If the Minister argues the point then the return of the capital paid could be expressed in some form of contingency clause. If this isn't sufficient to make the sum expended qualify the trust deed could provide a power of appointment exercisable in respect of the sum, instead of providing the payer a capital interest contingent or otherwise, which when exercised would allow the sum to be distributable to the payer. The payment will reduce income realized, will not be included in the trust's income as consideration for a sale for value, and will be returned to the payor subsequently thus insuring that the cumulative effect is a gratuitous distribution of the right or things. The important factors to recognize are that the will should specify that absolutely no amount of the rights (A.R.) can be distributed unless by virtue of the deposit of the expressed amount whereby the entire amount is distributed, while these factors should be set out in the will/trust agreement and should not be the product of executor-beneficiary negotiations. If the indivisible conveyance of the above as a condition is not expressed then the Minister may be successful at contending that part of the conveyance was a sale and the other part a transfer.⁴⁹⁶

In *Driol v. M.N.R.*⁴⁹⁷ a taxpayer paid $26,045 to the executrices in respect of an agreement under which the executrices of the estate withdrew their claim to a pension plan benefit that was in dispute. As a result of the withdrawal the taxpayer was able to receive the pension benefit without her right thereto being contested. Rip. T.C.J. concluded with respect to the payment:

"It is obvious that the payment to the executrices of Mr. George's estate did not bring her right to be paid income from the estate or any other asset or advantage into existence. Contributions had been made to the pension plan over the years by Mr. George and the City of Regina. The aggregate of these amounts constitutes the assets of the pension plan which entitled Ms. Driol to a pension. Her right to a pension was not derived from any judgment of a court or the settlement of a dispute between her and the executrices of the estate. Her right was derived from her capacity as widow of Mr. George. The dispute between Ms. Driol and the executrices of Mr. George's estate was to which of them had a valid right to payment under the pension plan. Because of the payment by Ms. Driol to the executrices, the executrices ceased to prosecute their claim; the City of Regina accepted Ms. Driol's claim for a pension as a valid one under the pension plan and she received income from the pension plan."

This was a case where the right was the subject of the Matrimonial Property Act which allowed the taxpayer 496 See Coleman Trust v. M.N.R., 87 D.T.C. 664 (TCC). In the author's opinion the Sec. 70(3) transfer need not be made solely in respect of a beneficiary's interest: if it were there would be dictum similar to that in Sec. 107(2), ("in satisfaction of all or any part of his capital interest"). If the rights or things are transferred to the "wrong" beneficiary Sec. 70(3) should apply while the same holds for where the trust is wound up within the roll through period and the property is transferred to any beneficiary. The provision doesn't require that the recipient be beneficially interested in the right or thing, only the estate or trust. A variation of the will in respect of the right or thing could occur. See Hawk Estate.

497 89 D.T.C. 122 (TCC)

to have a right to the pension regardless of the agreement reached. The Minister's counsel, in arguing that the payment wasn't deductible under Sec. 18(1)(a) contended that the payment was a gift but the judge found otherwise. The pension right in this case would not be considerable as a "right or thing" described under Sec. 70(2) since the deceased taxpayer would not recognize it as receivable before death, however the principles involved can definitely be applied to the Sec. 70(3) mechanics. If the taxpayer has a right as provided by the will to a "right or thing" and that will was contested, and payment was made so as to settle the dispute would the payment not be recognized as an expenditure of the taxpayer needed to acquire the right and thus bump up the cost of the right or thing as per Sec. 69(1.1)(b)? If it wasn't then what possible reason would Parliament have for implementing the Sec. 69(1.1)(b) bump up? More importantly what is the nature of the payment in the hands of the recipient and can it be subject to a Sec. 105(1) income inclusion of a benefit? In *A. Sigerstrom v. M.N.R.*⁴⁹⁸ a taxpayer launched a claim in respect of a capital asset held in an estate the legal title of which was bequeathed to another taxpayer and rather than have the will contested the executors finally paid the man $10,000 to settle his claim. The Minister attempted to assess the amount in the recipient's hands as income but the Income Tax Appeal Board found that it had the nature of a capital receipt since the right being contested could only be enforceable in respect of a capital property. This case has very little relevance in the present tax environment since Sec. 105(1) could easily have been applied to cause the full amount to be included in the recipient's income unless the frustrated heir was non-resident: the recipient was not a capital or income beneficiary and there was a realization of a benefit.

The Extinguishment of Debt on Rights or Things as a Condition Precedent.

If a trust deed/will allows a trustee/executor to use the rights or things acquired by him as collateral to secure loans the substance of which will be expressly allowed to be distributed to capital beneficiaries then the trustee has not overstepped his powers in raising the loans however he may be compelled to extinguish them out of the substance which forms the basis of the capital beneficiary's entitlement. If the will/trust agreement provides that certain beneficiaries will receive the rights or things and be required to extinguish any loans that have been obtained using them as collateral there is a specific bequest of the property though encumbered with a charge. The trust deed could even allow the trustee some latitude in determining what amount of debt will have to be assumed while on the other hand the trustee could be restricted from raising too much debt with respect to the property.

In order for this to be successful at getting a cost bump the beneficiary must extinguish the debt while the trust is liable for it since the Sec. 69(1.1) bump up does not provide treatment in respect of debt assumed as does section 107 in respect of capital interests.⁴⁹⁹ With this in mind is it possible for the trust to be exposed to a Sec. 105(1) benefit inclusion in respect of the debt extinguishment? It seems unlikely due to the fact that such would not occur in respect of section 107. In either case the rights or things are to be "distributed or transferred to the beneficiary" and if the recipient extinguishes the loans then such an expenditure will have been made by him to acquire the property since if he didn't agree to pay off the loans he wouldn't have received the property.⁵⁰⁰

Such amounts will inflate the cost of the right or thing under Sec. 69(1.1)(b)(ii) and will reduce the ultimate income inclusion when it is realized. Such property has also been "transferred or distributed" within the context of Sec. 70(3) since the recipient did not acquire it through a purchase negotiated with the trustees after the death or through an exercise of an option and one only has to look to section 107 to find an example of the use of the term "distribute" to a beneficiary in light of that beneficiary's need to assume debt and thus reduce the value of his inheritance. The loan proceeds raised by the trustees could be distributed out to capital beneficiaries through the section 107 mechanics where they could be received tax free, while understandably the loans would actually have to be extinguished by the recipient of the rights in order to bump the cost thereof in that Sec. 69(1.1) refers only to expenditures made or incurred and not incurable. Since a payment on account of the extinguishment of a debt is a payment of capital it will not be taxed in the hands of its recipient

498 56 D.T.C. 117 (ITAB)

499. See Passant v. Jackson, 1985 S.T.C. 133, for a case on issue.

500 See paragraph 7(d) of IT 349R2 for the recognition of this type of instance.

as income while since the creditor is not realizing a benefit in respect of a trust/estate, contrary to the T.A.B. opinion expressed in Lyons v. M.N.R., he will not recognize a Sec. 105(1) inclusion in respect of the payment.⁵⁰¹ Structuring debt in such a way offers the advantage of not being tax neutral such as is the case in respect of condition precedent payments directly to alternate beneficiaries. The payer gets the full Sec. 69(1.1)(b) bump-up while the recipient doesn't recognize any tax consequences.

The trustee need not do the above mortgaging and the testator could actually arrange it himself. The cash received on the loan by a non-arm's length party could be distributed to the beneficiary who is to primarily receive the rights or things without the testator recognizing substantial tax consequences under Sec. 70(5). The beneficiary could then use the funds to satisfy the loan and receive the Sec. 69(1.1)(b) cost bump up while if the funds are bequeathed to the beneficiary's spouse or offspring the economic receipt will be passed on in the same direction but the beneficiary would not have to be concerned with the possible application of section 245.

Variations.

The Sec. 70(3) provision recognizes eligible recipients of the rights or things as those beneficially interested under the estate or trust but if the legal ownership of the right or thing remains held by the trust for the benefit of the beneficiary there may be grounds to say that the right or thing has not been legally transferred or distributed to the beneficiary within the context of Sec. 70(3).⁵⁰²

501 See Brown and Secretary, Department of Family and Community Services [2004] AATA 48 (22 January 2004) for an interesting case.

502 "Rights or things transferred to beneficiaries – Sec. 70(3)"

(3) Where before the time for making an election under subsection 70(2) has expired, a right or thing to which that subsection would otherwise apply has been transferred or distributed to beneficiaries or other persons beneficially interested in the estate or trust,

(a) subsection 70(2) is not applicable to that right or thing; and

(b) an amount received by one of the beneficiaries or persons on the realization or disposition of the right or thing shall be included in computing the income of the beneficiary or person for the taxation year in which the beneficiary or person received it.

"Beneficially interested – Sec. 248(25)"

(25) For the purposes of this Act,

(a) a person or partnership beneficially interested in a particular trust includes any person or partnership that has any right (whether immediate or future, whether absolute or contingent or whether conditional on or subject to the exercise of any discretion by any person or partnership) as a beneficiary under a trust to receive any of the income or capital of the particular trust either directly from the particular trust or indirectly through one or more trusts or partnerships;

(b) except for the purpose of this paragraph, a particular person or partnership is deemed to be beneficially interested in a particular trust at a particular time where

(i) the particular person or partnership is not beneficially interested in the particular trust at the particular time,

(ii) because of the terms or conditions of the particular trust or any arrangement in respect of the particular trust at the particular time, the particular person or partnership might, because of the exercise of any discretion by any person or partnership, become beneficially interested in the particular trust at the particular time or at a later time, and

(iii) at or before the particular time, either

(A) the particular trust has acquired property, directly or indirectly in any manner whatever, from

(I) the particular person or partnership,

(II) another person with whom the particular person or partnership, or a member of the particular partnership, does not deal at arm's length,

(III) a person or partnership with whom the other person referred to in subclause 248(25)(b)(iii)(A)(II) does not deal at arm's length,

(IV) a controlled foreign affiliate of the particular person or of another person with whom the particular person or partnership, or a member of the particular partnership, does not deal at arm's length, or

(V) a non-resident corporation that would, if the particular partnership were a corporation resident in Canada, be a controlled foreign affiliate of the particular partnership, or

(B) a person or partnership described in any of subclauses 248(25)(b)(iii)(A)(I) to 248(25)(b)(iii)(A)(V) has given a guarantee on behalf of the particular trust or provided any other financial assistance whatever to the particular trust; and

(c) a member of a partnership that is beneficially interested in a trust is deemed to be beneficially interested in the trust.

In *Hawk Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁰³ a testator left rights or things in trust for his wife while upon her death the residue was to be transferred to his offspring. The widow and the offspring entered into an agreement with respect to the cattle and grain whereby the offspring began to treat such as their own and came into de facto control of them. While the agreement wasn't in writing the Appeal Board found that it was validated through performance and acceptance and found that the rights/things had been transferred to the beneficiaries for purposes of the former provisions identical to Sec. 70(3). Subsection 70(3) doesn't require that the rights/things be transferred/distributed as a consequence of death⁵⁰⁴ and in Hawk the reason that they were transferred to the offspring was due to the variation agreement reached by the parties. In this respect a variation within the time limits imposed upon the Sec. 70(3) roll through will not affect the applicability of that provision.

More Trust Rights.

If the beneficiary dies while the right held by the trust has not been realized, and he is the only person beneficially entitled to the income when realized, as per the reasoning in *Tait Estate et al. v. M.N.R.*⁵⁰⁵ the deceased and his estate will benefit from the Sec. 70(2) election. In that case the deceased was the spouse in respect of a spousal trust and the estate had yet to realize substantial earnings on a harvest of grain, the income of which would be payable to the deceased. When the deceased died the Sec. 70(2) election was attempted in respect of the amount of grain that had not been realized and the Minister contended that it was not available in that the "right or thing" was owned by the spousal trust which could not avail itself of the Sec. 70(2) alternate reporting election, and evidence was not provided as to who actually performed the farming. Brulé, T.C.J., provided:

"If the spousal trust through the executor was responsible for the farming then I agree that a rights and things return could not be filed respecting the grain according to the provisions of Subsection 70(2) of the Income Tax Act as pointed out by counsel for the Minister."

"The determination of the ownership of the grain, if the estate farmed the property, is to be made based on the rights of a life tenant as opposed to a remainderman."

"In either case the grain on hand was produced. If it had been sold then Christina Tait would have received the proceeds, but it was not. I cannot conceive that this makes any difference. If I may hypothesis, suppose a bond case coming due on say a Monday and the life tenant's estate is still entitled to the proceeds. In each estate the trustee prepares on the death of a life tenant a statement of "net paid and accrued income" representing what has been paid and what owned at the date of death."⁵⁰⁶

He concluded that since the underlying spouse would be exclusively entitled to the income when it was realized the Sec. 70(2) alternate return election should be available to her in respect of the grain owned by the trust. The interesting aspect about this case is that there appeared to be no evaluation of whether in fact, in the particular instance, the income when realized would be payable to her, which would not occur if the trustee had to make good out of that income revenue losses previously incurred or use it to replenish capital drawn upon under a power of encroachment. The "right or thing" the spouse had in this case was a right under a trust agreement/will which is not the same as a right of legal ownership to receive the income itself. Under subsection 70(3) will only the transfer or distribution of the rights to income in specie be allowed roll-through treatment? In the above case that subsection would not apply to the right to the income from the grain since that is retained by the trustee but the Sec. 70(3) roll-through would be available in respect of the right to receive that income from the estate if it was transferred or distributed accordingly. If the beneficiary has full beneficial ownership of the rights transferred to the trust upon death it would seem unnecessary that legal title also be registered in his name as well.

503. 57 D.T.C. 207

504 There cannot be a sale, there must be a transfer as a consequence of testamentary devolution

505. 89 D.T.C. 309 (TCC)

506 Recognizing that the estate in this instance is a spousal trust, one should infer that Brulé T.C.J. understood the Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) phrase; "income of the trust that arises before the spouse's death", to mean income realized or accrued.

The Question of Assent.

In *Dushinsky Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁰⁷ it was held by the Tax Court that the Sec. 70(3) roll over did not apply where the executor had not assented to the bequest when the beneficiary directed that the right or thing was to be disposed of. The assent and thus creation of beneficial ownership in specie is critical to an agent(executor) disposition. If beneficial ownership of the right becomes instilled in the beneficiary it would appear that the roll through would be available.⁵⁰⁸ *Re: Campbell*⁵⁰⁹ provides an excellent discussion of the importance of an assent, express or implied by the conduct, in order for favourable testamentary roll over provisions to be applicable. In that case the executor liquidated the roll over property to gain funds to satisfy substantial estate liabilities and passed the excess proceeds to the beneficiaries and the court held that a beneficial estate or interest must be acquired by the qualifying recipient in order for the roll over to be available-though this requirement was termed-"passes or is deemed to have passed to" the taxpayer-perhaps as nebulous as "transferred or distributed".⁵¹⁰ Assent in this case was doubted due to the nature of the accounts kept by the executor, (which reflected the fact that an assent had not occurred with respect to its disposition and that the property was still considered part of the unadministered estate), the on-going advertising, and how the sale was executed and proceeds used, (they were credited to the executor directly and then used to satisfy the estate's fiscal liabilities).⁵¹¹ The fact that the residuary beneficiary was to a certain degree actively involved with the sale did not give rise to an implied assent while it was held by the court that it is the will and the assent that create the proprietary interest acquired once administration is completed and assent forthcoming.

In *Boger Estate v. The Queen*⁵¹² it was held that "transferred" in the context of Sec. 70(9) meant the vesting of legal title of the property in the executrix and trustee pursuant to the will regardless of the fact that the legal title was not transferred to the beneficiaries before the property was sold. Beneficial title vested immediately upon the death and the fact that property in specie was not stated to be bequeathed but only "the residue" did not prevent the transfer in specie from occurring. The fact that an application under the Family Relief Act was made did not prevent the offspring beneficiaries' interests from being vested while property unaffected by orders made under that legislation was found to have been transferred at the time of death. In this case the property was disposed of by the executor as agent for the beneficial owner-beneficiary as is established Alberta estate practice rather than have legal title registered in the beneficiaries' names then disposed of.

Partnership Interests on Death, Separate Returns.

A partnership is determinable upon the death of one of its partners unless the contract provides otherwise and consequently its tax year terminates and the accounts are taken and the partner recognizes the income under Sec. 96(1). If the partnership isn't determined⁵¹³ the partner could recognize a Sec. 70(2) inclusion in respect of partnership income accrued to date⁵¹⁴. It must be noted that if the partnership doesn't determine on the death there will be double taxation of the value of the right or thing in respect of the partner's share of the revenue net of expenses to the date of death: such will be included in computing his terminal income under Sec. 70(2) and when the partnership year closes the estate will recognize a Sec. 96(1)(f) inclusion. Regardless of whether or not the partnership is dissolved the ACB of the partnership interest is increased immediately

507. 90 D.T.C. 1391 commented upon subsequently,

508 See Cochrane v. I.R.C., 1974 S.T.C. 335.

509 1968 V.R. 46 (SCV)

510 See also Trustees, Exors., and Agency Co. Ltd. v. F.C.T., 65 C.L.R. 134 at 140, A.G. v. Milne, 1914 A.C. 765, Nevill v. I.R.C., 1924 A.C. 385.

511 As per Doe v. Harris, 1847 16 M. & W. 517, an ambiguous statement will not evidence an assent on itself while as per Cray v. Willis, 1729 2 P. Wms. 531, assent will be presumed when there is a lack of evidence to support the presumption that the executors have additional duties to perform, while as per Daw v. I.R.C., 14 T.C. 58, and Carlish v. I.R.C., 38 T.C. 37, if the beneficiary takes possession or control of the estate property without the complaint of the executor assent will be presumed. The rule where there is ambiguity is to look to the acts of the executor and if they are consistent with that on an executor assent cannot be inferred. See also "Assents", E. & T. Q., 1988-89, Vol. 9, pg. 83, Practice Note by "A.H.O."

512 91 D.T.C. 5506 FCTD

513. which may be the case where the contract provides for such and the provincial legislation allows it before death by the value cited in Sec. 70(2) via Sec. 53(1)(e)(v) thus reducing a Sec. 70(5) capital gain on the deemed disposition of the interest. If a Sec. 70(2) inclusion isn't recognized it appears that there is a bump in the cost of the interest anyway since Sec. 53(1)(e)(v) doesn't require an income inclusion under Sec. 70(2); only the value to be established. In I.T. 278R the Department takes the opinion that if before the right to partnership income has been transferred to a beneficiary the income is accredited to the partner's(estate's) capital account the Sec. 70(3) roll-over isn't available. The right to income of a partnership isn't severable from the partnership interest itself though if the partnership continues and the will provides that a beneficiary is to receive the income therefrom equitable ownership may arise upon the assent so as to allow the Sec. 70(3) roll to operate notwithstanding the beneficiary may not ascend to the status of partner.⁵¹⁵ The fact that the income is accredited to the capital account within the period of the roll over, in the author's opinion, is of no relevance in taxing the right at the date of death and since this is the particular targeting of Sec. 70(2) and upon which Sec. 70(3) focuses the fact that the accounts are ascertained in the interim does not preclude the roll over. Subsection 70(3) targets the transfer of rights at the date of death that would have been recognized in income; it doesn't target how those rights are received.

514 It must be assumed that the disposal cited in Sec. 70(2) refers to an assignment under which the assignee ascends to being a partner thus dissolving the partnership: otherwise the stub period income may not be recognizable, hypothetically, by the testator upon the disposal.

On aspect that should be noted here is the break-down in the cost/income integration in respect of the partnership interest. The interest is deemed disposed of immediately before death and if the partnership year terminates upon death there will not be an ACB bump under Sec. 53(1)(e) for the interest in respect of the income recognized thus that income will also increase a capital gain. Until this weakness is corrected with the appropriate statutory amendment it could prove favourable to have the partnership suffer a termination upon the death if a loss is otherwise recognizable by the deceased partner since in such an instance the ACB of the partnership interest is not reduced by the loss immediately before death and thus the loss can be effectively recognized one and three-quarter times rather than just once. The partnership deed could provide that this isn't to occur if the deceased would otherwise suffer income while it is to be noted that a loss could be created by having the deed call for excessive C.C.A./E.C.E.A. deductions etc. in the year of death.

"Death of partner or proprietor – Sec. 150(4)"

(4) Where

(a) subsection 34.1(9) or 34.2(8) applies in computing an individual's income for a taxation year from a business, or

(b) an individual who carries on a business in a taxation year dies in the year and after the end of a fiscal period of the business that ends in the year, another fiscal period of the business (in this subsection referred to as the "short period") ends in the year because of the individual's death, and the individual's legal representative elects that this subsection apply, the individual's income from businesses for short periods, if any, shall not be included in computing the individual's income for the year and the individual's legal representative shall file an additional return of income for the year in respect of the individual as if the return were filed in respect of another person and shall pay the tax payable under this Part by that other person for the year computed as if

(c) the other person's only income for the year were the amount determined by the formula

A + B - C

where

A is the total of all amounts each of which is the individual's income from a business for a short fiscal period, ⁵¹⁵ One technicality is interesting in respect of the roll through of a continuing partnership interest when the partnership doesn't dissolve: the Sec. 70(2) recognition can be avoided with a Sec. 70(3) assent and the a.c.b. of the partnership interest is bumped immediately before death via Sec. 53(1)(e)(v). The beneficiary receives the partnership interest and ascends to being a partner whereby he'll recognize the Sec. 96(1) inclusion in respect of income all the way back to the last partnership year end which includes the value rolled through under Sec. 70(3). Technically the beneficiary will recognize a Sec. 70(3) and Sec. 96(1) inclusion but he may rely on Sec. 4(4) to eliminate the double inclusion of the income from the same source but the Sec. 53(1)(e)(v) cost bump will still have occurred reducing any capital gain/increasing capital loss on the Sec. 70(5) disposition of the interests, though it is doubted that there will be a double a.c.b. bump as well.

B is the total of all amounts each of which is an amount deducted under subsection 34.2(8) in computing the individual's income for the taxation year in which the individual dies, and
C is the total of all amounts each of which is an amount included under subsection 34.1(9) in computing the individual's income for the taxation year in which the individual dies, and
(d) subject to sections 114.2 and 118.93, that other person were entitled to the deductions to which the individual is entitled under sections 110, 118 to 118.7 and 118.9 for the year in computing the individual's taxable income or tax payable under this Part, as the case may be, for the year.

Dispositions during the Executor's Year

Subsection 164(6) allows the transfer of the consequences of capital dispositions by an unadministered estate during its first year – the statutory executor's year recognized in various provincial estate devolution/administration Acts, to the testator. It also allows for the taking into account of various estate administration fees such as probate, executor will-reading, transfer costs etc., to be taken into consideration in arriving at the testator's to-be-adjusted terminal tax return. This is an elemental feature that should be considered when dealing with an estate since it only lasts for the first year after death and it should cause you to focus on where the property is going and be expeditious in the dealing of the interests that arise in the will.

Subsection 164(6) interacts completely with the section 107 trust property roll-out provisions so that any costs incurred to transfer property within the executor's year, to any beneficiary, are affected back to the testator's terminal return. It's interesting that as recently as *Estate of Jean White v. The Queen*⁵¹⁶ the "trap" in respect of the deductibility of these fees against the testator's income was recognized. Given the interaction with the section 107 estate/trust roll-out mechanics, which causes estate/trust cost amount dispositions of its property this provision allows for the carry-back of consequential capital loss/terminal loss carry-back to the testator's return, if they occur in the executor's year. Unfortunately, in the case of spousal recipients (spouse and/or spousal trust) the ITA deems the testator's property not to have "gone near the estate" under Sec. 70(6) to be commented on but directly to the recipient hence there is considerable disparity here – the property doesn't go through a section 107 roll-out to cause taxable dispositions: in such a case there should be planning for which testator assets are to be spousal and those not and calculation of financial and legal consequences.

Given this provision, and its ability to transfer back the tax affects of dispositions that are not chargeable on a terminal return, given that they relate to title transfer that happens after death, with the testator ceasing to statutorily own the property immediately before death, depending on the property being dealt with, it's prudent to accelerate transfers, if possible, to draw down a deceased's tax. While estate fees etc. described in Pappas Estate are costs incurred to make distributions of estate property which are dispositions under section 107 they can get locked in an estate to no effect if all of the property is to be transferred out to beneficiaries: by making indemnifications to the executrix when all property is to be directly bequeathed and accelerating the transfers within the first year testator tax is recoverable on the terminal return.

As previously noted is there any merit to drawing attention to the fact that an estate and trust are not to be treated as equivalent given the Sec. 70(7)-(8) tainted spousal trust mechanics and the underlying numerous references in various other articles of the ITA of both: can argument be made here that when an estate is crystallized into an enduring trust there is a recognizable disposition (solidification of 516 T-875-93 where the Tax Court held, considering subsequent charges incurred by the estate outside of the executor's year:

"[7] Mr. White contended that the costs regarding the sale of the lots from the time of death to the sale dates should be included. This would result in costs of $43,152.21 thereby reducing the value of the lots from $35,000.00 to $29,849.56. Mr. White is concerned with the notion of double taxation. However, the Income Tax Act provides for a deemed disposition on death. While there is a deemed disposition on death, it must also be recognized that the estate is taxed separately, and there is no authority for the proposition that Mr. White takes."

in specie title in the hands of the beneficiaries in the trust's property) that would draw the application of the provision on the estate's "disposition"? Clearly Parliament recognized the relevancy of the common-law executor's year during which prevents the beneficiary to call for clear crystallized title but if such occurs through assent to a will's dispositions that cause legal title transfer to settle an enduring trust, and resulting interests thereunder, does that warrant application of the provision? Is there "a disposition" within the meaning of the Sec. 248(1) definition – paragraph (e), for these purposes, from general estate to the enduring trust and in order for the beneficial availability of the subsection does legal title actually have to be transferred to an end beneficiary under an estate to begin with but merely assented to be held clear, in trust, instead?^{517 518} When the executor transfers legal title of a property in specie to a trustee per the will has he not equally "disposed of it", as described in the subsection, in the exact same manner that he has to a 3rd party or a beneficiary: there is no qualification on who the recipient has to be? Is this an instance where s. 107(2) could apply to cause a tax-free roll-out to the trust of the estate property? Can the estate even then elect under s. 107(2.001) to cause FMV disposition in its hands?

Does the enduring trust qualify as a beneficiary for purposes of s. 164(6) when there is no qualification as to who that recipient can be?

Is it possible to shift capital losses/gains in this environment: when the estate gains the benefit of recognition of a disposition within the meaning of the subsection what proceeds are realized from the enduring trust? Do they have any alienable value to any one? And if the proceeds are legally recognizable as "nil", allowing the testator to completely eliminate any gain recognition under s. 70(5), then the property in the enduring trust's hands equally have that cost amount. This can really upset the transfer of cost recognition in this nebulous situation since the testator's terminal reporting can be materially warped and the surviving trust's tax exposure significantly deferred and/or transferred to an end beneficiary thereunder per s. 107(2) for further deferral.

Has this provision kept abreast of other evolution in the Act, since even the subs. 248(1) definition of "disposition" can be argued to exempt this "disposition" as having occurred, it lies outside subdivision k only where the two are legally "equal", and refers exclusively to inter-trust transfers, not between estate and trust, thus doesn't apply?

Equally, clearly the provision applies only to estates during administration: if debt ascertainment has reached a point at which the quantum of beneficial title to the estate property has crystallized and is measurable then "the estate" is not any more and the trust comes into being, regardless of whether such happens in the executor's year. The provision lies outside of subdivision k: only therein an estate is equal to a trust and vice versa. And based on the argument above, is this then not an instance where all of the estate's property is "disposed of" between "estate" and "trust", differentiated throughout the Act, allowing all to benefit from s. 164(6), if occurring within the first year of the estate?

The author is of the opinion that there should be an entire set of supporting provisions that match this environment to what happens in the actual environment so that, in the present situation, s. 164(6) cannot be improperly accessed given its "loose" wording.

Where disposition of property by legal representative of deceased taxpayer – Sec. 164(6)

(6) Where in the course of administering the estate of a deceased taxpayer, the taxpayer's legal representative has, within the first taxation year of the estate,

(a) disposed of capital property of the estate so that the total of all amounts each of which is

⁵¹⁷ In the author's opinion there should be 4 ownership bases through which property flows in a testamentary tax setting: testator to, estate, to trust (if not but for tiny amount of time pending distribution to) then to, beneficiary as opposed to in many instances what exists now which is the 3 of, testator to, estate OR trust, to beneficiary.

⁵¹⁸ See "Testamentary Planning to Avoid Double Taxation" by H. Elise Rees in Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 20 Pg. 11 for some further discussion regarding Sec. 164(6) in the estate planning environment.

a capital loss from the disposition of a property exceeds the total of all amounts each of which is a capital gain from the disposition of a property, or

(b) disposed of all of the depreciable property of a prescribed class of the estate so that the undepreciated capital cost to the estate of property of that class at the end of the first taxation year of the estate is, by virtue of subsection 20(16) or any regulation made under paragraph 20(1)(a), deductible in computing the income of the estate for that year, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the following rules apply:

(c) such parts of one or more capital losses of the estate from the disposition of properties in the year (the total of which is not to exceed the excess referred to in paragraph 164(6)(a)) as the legal representative so elects, in prescribed manner and within a prescribed time, are deemed (except for the purpose of subsection 112(3) and this paragraph) to be capital losses of the deceased taxpayer from the disposition of the properties by the taxpayer in the taxpayer's last taxation year and not to be capital losses of the estate from the disposition of those properties,

(d) such part of the amount of any deduction described in paragraph 16(6)(b) (not exceeding the amount that, but for this subsection, would be the total of the non-capital loss and the farm loss of the estate for its first taxation year) as the legal representative so elects, in prescribed manner and within a prescribed time, shall be deductible in computing the income of the taxpayer for the taxpayer's taxation year in which the taxpayer died and shall not be an amount deductible in computing any loss of the estate for its first taxation year,

(e) the legal representative shall, at or before the time prescribed for filing the election referred to in paragraphs 164(6)(c) and 164(6)(d), file an amended return of income for the deceased taxpayer for the taxpayer's taxation year in which the taxpayer died to give effect to the rules in those paragraphs, and

(f) in computing the taxable income of the deceased taxpayer for a taxation year preceding the year in which the taxpayer died, no amount may be deducted in respect of an amount referred to in paragraph 164(6)(c) or 164(6)(d).⁵¹⁹

519 Subsection 164(6.1) further provides a provision applicable to the testamentary exercise of stock options that allows some consideration of the economic effect.

Realization of deceased employees' options

(6.1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, if a right to acquire securities (as defined in subsection 7(7)) under an agreement in respect of which a benefit was deemed by paragraph 7(1)(e) to have been received by a taxpayer (in this subsection referred to as "the right") is exercised or disposed of by the taxpayer's legal representative within the first taxation year of the estate of the taxpayer and the representative so elects in prescribed manner and on or before a prescribed day,

(a) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the amount of the benefit deemed by paragraph 7(1)(e) to have been received by the taxpayer in respect of the right exceeds the total of

(ii) the amount, if any, by which the value of the right immediately before the time it was exercised or disposed of exceeds the amount, if any, paid by the taxpayer to acquire the right, and

(iii) where in computing the taxpayer's taxable income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died an amount was deducted under paragraph 110(1)(d) in respect of the benefit deemed by paragraph 7(1)(e) to have been received by the taxpayer in that year by reason of paragraph 7(1)(e) in respect of that right, 1/2 of the amount, if any, by which the amount determined under subparagraph 164(6.1)(a)(i) exceeds the amount determined under subparagraph 164(6.1)(a)(ii), shall be deemed to be a loss of the taxpayer from employment for the year in which the taxpayer died;

Non-Residents.

Subsection 70(5), 70(5.1), 70(5.2), as well as Sec. 70(2) and (1) apply where a taxpayer dies regardless of his residence and thus if the deceased was non-resident, through the effect of the testamentary provisions, he may have to recognize income etc. under the Division D rules, Sec. 115(1) in particular. Though the latter subsections of section 70 cause deemed dispositions of property that may be taxable Canadian property Sec. 70(1)-(2) do not cause deemed dispositions just income inclusions.

Division D regulates how a non-resident is taxed and subsection 115(1) does not target Sec. 70(1)-(2) inclusions consequently rights or things held by a non-resident do not cause Part I tax consequences upon the taxpayer's death. This isn't the case with deemed property dispositions since such property may be described as Sec. 115(1)(b) taxable Canadian property. The tax treaties prevailing between the Canadian and foreign governments may however cause the negation of the possible application of the provisions. This was the case in *Gladden Estate v. The Queen*⁵²⁰ where the Federal Court-Trial Division had to decide whether the effect of Sec. 70(5), as it could apply to an American resident's deemed disposition of shares of a Canadian corporation, could be overridden by the Canada-U.S. 1942 Convention and Protocol, (in particular Article VIII therein causing "sales or exchanges" to be exempt under the ITA in that they would be taxed under the I.R.C.). Judge Addy concluded upon a review of the history of the applicable treaty provision and Sec. 70(5) that:

"As to the surrounding circumstances when the treaty was signed, Canada had no capital gains tax legislation and the U.S. legislation at the time used the term "sale or exchange". This accounts for the reason why those very words were used in the treaty. There seems to be little doubt, however, that the general intention was to exempt non-residents of each of the contracting countries from capital gain taxes generally. With regard to paragraph (6) of Article 32 of the Vienna Convention, (concerning the interpretation of treaties), regarding the avoidance of a result which might be manifestly unreasonable or absurd, to hold that a deemed disposition would, as acclaimed by the Minister, be taxable as a capital gain while a true sale or exchange would not, would be both unreasonable and absurd. Real commercial transactions would be taxable while artificially created ones would not. In the case at bar, for instance, it is abundantly clear that had the deceased disposed of the shares immediately before his death in consideration of payment of the full market value thereof, his estate would not have been taxable in any way on a capital gain. Yet, because he died and there is deemed to be a disposition of the shares, the result would be that his estate would be taxable although no real "sale or exchange" or other disposition actually took place."

He found the deemed disposition non-taxable under the 1942 Convention.

In *Krafve v. M.N.R.*⁵²¹ the opposite conclusion was reached by the Tax Court with respect to a deemed disposition prescribed to have occurred under Sec. 69(1) when a non-resident gifted shares to a Canadian resident trust. In direct opposition to Gladden Estate, (occurring at a later date), the gift was found not to have been a "sale or exchange" and thus the disposition was not exempt from Part I tax treatment.

The Canada-U.S. Income Tax Convention 1980 with respect to the Sec. 70(5) provision (as well as all of the others under section 70), is quite different from 1942 version mainly because the former refers to gains from "the alienation" of property, real or personal, while the latter referred to only "sales or exchanges". Although the latter is a subset of the former category of actions the diction that causes section 70 deemed dispositions to be taxed in Canada in respect of a non-resident's death is the term "alienation" which as

(b) there shall be deducted in computing the adjusted cost base to the estate of the right at any time the amount of the loss that would be determined under paragraph 164(6.1)(a) if that paragraph were read without reference to subparagraph 164(6.1)(a)(iii); and

(c) the legal representative shall, at or before the time prescribed for filing the election under this subsection, file an amended return of income for the taxpayer for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died to give effect to paragraph 164(6.1)(a).

See The Estate of Carl Edward Miller and Her Majesty The Queen, 1999-2987(IT)G, for further detail.

520. 85 D.T.C. 5188

521 84 D.T.C. 1002

recognized for tax statute interpretation in this sense includes dispositions deemed to have occurred. This is also the case in respect of the Canada-U.K. Tax Convention (1978), Art XIII para. (1).

Paragraph 4 of Article XIII of the Canada-U.S. Convention 1980 recognizes that gains from the alienation of property other than that having the real property or business property characteristics described in para. (1)-(3) will be taxed in the alienator's country of residence only. Real property is taxed in the country in which it is situated while under para. (3) an interest in a trust or estate, the value of the interest being derived principally from real property situated in Canada, will be considered real property, regardless of the residence of the trust or estate. This targeting does not necessitate the trust/estate to actually hold legal title to the real property in order for the interest to be subject. The same holds true under Article XIII para. (1) and (5) of the Canada-U.K. Convention (1978) in respect of non-residents however under para.(6)(b) if the testator, solely or with related or connected persons, is interested in less than 10% of the income and capital of a trust the interest will not be subject to Canadian taxation while the value of the interest need not be derived from that real property. The provision does not describe where the related or connected parties may reside, where the trust may reside, nor does it define "income" or "capital" of the trust, nor does it differentiate between trusts and estates. This last aspect is interesting since there isn't a single reference to "estates" under Art. XIII of the Can.-U.K. 78 Convention while Art. XX, concerning income of non-residents from estates and trusts, refers, consistently, to both. Apparently if the U.K. resident dies holding an interest in an estate resident in Canada which is in the midst of being administered he will not be caught by Sec. 70(5), (especially when one recognizes that Sec. 115(1)(b) refers to disposition of capital interest in trusts only, not in estates).

The Sec. 248(1) definition of taxable Canadian property includes but doesn't mean the four types of property specified while subparagraph 115(1)(b) describes taxable Canadian property for purposes of Division D. The latter includes specific types of property and interests in the property specified but with respect to estates in the midst of administration the rights the beneficiaries have are not interests in the estate property, but are only choices in action enforceable against the executor. While a choice in action is definitely a "property", as per Sec. 248(1), it is not a property that is statutorily targeted by Sec. 248(1) or 115(1)(b) as taxable Canadian property.⁵²² Rights to specific bequests may include interest in the property since technically the property can be looked upon as being held both in trust and subject to the estate and subsequent liabilities. As per Ex parte. Dr. Barnardo's Homes⁵²³ income received from a specific bequest of specific property that has not yet been transferred to the beneficiary may be received as income when paid to him, while the property is still subject to the administration of the estate. This isn't the case with residual bequests.

Both major tax conventions refer to the alienation of real or immoveable property situated in Canada however it would seem that the particular Canadian situated property would also need to be a taxable Canadian property within the definition in Sec. 248(1) and 115(1)(b); otherwise upon death of the non-resident Sec. 115(1)(b) could not be applied properly. (This was an underlying factor in Gladden Estate v. The Queen, supra.) The situs of the legatee's choice in action in respect of the estate and whether that estate had been fully administered were the issue of *The Queen v. Eide Estate*⁵²⁴. In the author's opinion the situs of the choice in action, though relevant for purposes of the Estate Tax Act is not to be equated with taxable Canadian property status under the I.T.A..

The tax treaties offer relief from double income taxation where the legal title of the property disposed of was held by the non-resident, not if he holds a beneficial interest therein. If he holds beneficial ownership then the treaty's protections will be available but not so if he is merely beneficially interested by way of being a beneficiary under a trust.⁵²⁵ This was proven in *Kelly Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵²⁶ when a trust residing in Alberta with ⁵²² Perhaps this is one of the purposes that the Sec. 115(1)(b)(vi) taxable Canadian property target doesn't capture interests in estates. Due to this technicality, regardless of the actual residence of the estate, the non-resident may suffer foreign jurisdiction taxation when the interest is disposed of, as well as Canadian "departure tax" under section 48 when he becomes non-resident while owning the estate interest. This would be a good question for a future Roundtable Discussion.

⁵²³ 7 T.C. 646

⁵²⁴ 74 D.T.C. 6286

⁵²⁵ See T.I. 5-0051 of Apr. 1980 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division to the Ottawa District Office Source Deductions Section.

⁵²⁶ 87 D.T.C. 160

U.S. resident beneficiaries disposed of foreign situated land and recognized capital gains. The Tax Court of Canada recognized that the U.S. resident beneficiaries were contingently interested, (though presently vested), in the funds but that it was the executors who had disposed of the land, not the beneficiaries and although they indirectly benefitted from the property they did not have beneficial ownership and were thus not able to obtain treaty protection.

"If Counsel for the appellant is correct one must determine the beneficiary of the gain. This person must be the absolute owner of the lands, that is, his right of ownership in the lands is unrestricted; his right of ownership is unfettered and he can enjoy and dispose of the Lands in the most absolute manner. Article VIII cannot contemplate a situation where a person's ownership of an asset may be taken away on the happening of a future event, for example."⁵²⁷

In this particular case the gain had to be recognized by the trust under Part I. If the proceeds are distributable to the non-resident beneficiaries in the year of disposition or recognition of the gain the taxable capital gain portion will constitute income subject to Sec. 212(1)(c) of Part I upon which withholding tax must be withheld.⁵²⁸

Testamentary Spousal Transfers and Trusts

A General Overview.

Subsection 70(6), (and (5.2)(d) and (f)) allow for effective tax-free transfers of depreciable and non-depreciable capital property, Canadian and foreign resource property and land inventory used in a business of the deceased, by the deceased, to either a spouse who was resident in Canada immediately before his death or to a trust created by his will whereunder his spouse is entitled to receive all of the trust law trust income that arises before her death and under which no one but the spouse may obtain the use of or receive income or capital of the trust while she's living. Since the provision is one of the only two which offers a tax-free method to the deceased of transferring non-farm property (even if not principally for the benefit of the spouse) upon his death eligibility for its treatment should always be a target in terminal tax planning, though with some balance for the properties being dealt with.⁵²⁹

There are five basic conditions that have to be in existence immediately before or after the time of death in order for the provision to apply and depending on which one doesn't exist either the applicability of the provision to the particular property may not prevail, or, inapplicability due to the recipients, regardless of how they receive the property may result. Where Sec. 70(6) isn't applicable Sec. 70(5) will apply while since Sec. 70(5.2)(d) and (f) apply only if the conditions described in Sec. 70(6) exist, Sec. 70(5.2)(a) and (e) will apply to cause fair market value basis dispositions if they don't.

"Where transfer or distribution to spouse or spouse trust – Sec. 70(6)"

(6) Where any property of a taxpayer who was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death that is a property to which subsection 70(5) would otherwise apply is, as a consequence of the death, transferred or distributed to

(a) the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner who was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death, or

(b) a trust, created by the taxpayer's will, that was resident in Canada immediately after the time the property vested indefeasibly in the trust and under which ⁵²⁷ See also Frampton v. I.R.C., 1985 S.T.C. 186, for similar a case where beneficiaries did not recognize disposition against which a capital gains exemption could be applied when the trust disposed of the property to which they were not absolutely entitled.

⁵²⁸ See T.I. provided March 1980 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division where it was provided that non-Canadian source income in the form of capital gain will not attract Canadian Part XIII tax when flowed through a Canadian trust to U.S. beneficiaries and that the geographic source of the gain arising from the jurisdiction of the transaction is generally determinative.

⁵²⁹ For an appreciation of how well our ITA is phrased to attend to this scenario one needs to consider Frankland v Inland Revenue, [1997] EWCA Civ 2674 where the UK Ct. of Appeal had to consider the intricacies of spousal roll-over provisions in their Inheritance Tax legislation.

- (i) the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the spouse's or common-law partner's death, and
- (ii) no person except the spouse or common-law partner may, before the spouse's or common-law partner's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust,

if it can be shown, within the period ending 36 months after the death of the taxpayer or, where written application therefor has been made to the Minister by the taxpayer's legal representative within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances, that the property has become vested indefeasibly in the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, the following rules apply:

(c) paragraphs 70(5)(a) and 70(5)(b) do not apply in respect of the property,

(d) subject to paragraph 70(6)(d.1), the taxpayer shall be deemed to have, immediately before the taxpayer's death, disposed of the property and received proceeds of disposition therefor equal to

(i) where the property was depreciable property of a prescribed class, the lesser of the capital cost and the cost amount to the taxpayer of the property immediately before the death, and

(ii) in any other case, its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the death, and the spouse or common-law partner or trust, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to those proceeds,

(d.1) where the property is an interest in a partnership (other than an interest in a partnership to which subsection 100(3) applies),

(i) the taxpayer shall, except for the purposes of paragraph 98(5)(g), be deemed not to have disposed of the property as a consequence of the taxpayer's death,

(ii) the spouse or common-law partner or the trust, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have acquired the property at the time of the death at a cost equal to its cost to the taxpayer, and

(iii) each amount added or deducted in computing the adjusted cost base to the taxpayer of the property shall be deemed to be required by subsection 53(1) or 53(2) to be added or deducted, as the case may be, in computing the adjusted cost base to the spouse or common-law partner or the trust, as the case may be, of the property; and

(e) where the property was depreciable property of the taxpayer of a prescribed class, paragraph (5)(c) applies as if the references therein to "paragraph 70(6)(a)" and to "paragraph 70(6)(b)" were read as references to "paragraph 70(6)(d)".

The five conditions are obviously:

1. . that the taxpayer who died was resident in Canada immediately before her death, but not necessarily throughout her tax year,
2. . that on or after and as a consequence of her death capital property owned by her before her death was transferred or distributed to certain parties,
3. . that those parties could have been; her spouse (and not spouse-to-be or former spouse) who was resident in Canada immediately before her death regardless of where she is resident when she receives the legal title to the property, or, a trust created under the taxpayer's will, that was resident in Canada immediately after the property became indefeasibly vested in it,
4. . the trust must have been created under which the deceased's spouse is entitled to receive all of the trust's income arising before her death and under which no person other than the spouse may, before her death, receive or obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, while such a creation can either be as a result of the will or the application of certain provincial dependant relief statutes,
5. . and that the legal representative must, within 36 months after the death, (or such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable upon written application to him within the 3 year period), be able to show that the property has indefeasibly vested in the spouse or the trust as the case may be.

Where these conditions can be shown to exist the deceased taxpayer will be able to enjoy the tax-free dispositions of his capital property (and the other property cited in Sec. 70(5.2), as per para. (d) and (f)). It should be recognized however that if the spouse chooses to accept an equalization payment under the appropriate provincial Family Law Act, (as is the case in Ontario and Sec. 6(1) therein), or Matrimonial Property Act, the will provisions with respect to the spouse will be overridden and thus a spousal trust may not have a chance to be constituted.⁵³⁰

The property transferred or distributed to the spouse or trust (held under residuary estate) need not be situated in Canada and thus the deceased may still recognize a disposition under a foreign jurisdiction's tax law when he dies, (the same as Sec. 70(5) applies to non-resident), however in order for Sec. 70(6) to be available the deceased must have at least been resident in Canada immediately before his death, which doesn't preclude him from also being resident in another country. By becoming resident in Canada just prior to death and retaining residency in the U.S. through the retention of common law residency characteristics the taxpayer would then be able to avoid deemed dispositions of taxable Canadian property under Sec. 70(5) that would subject him to Sec. 115(1)(b) income inclusions however he would also be caught by the foreign country's testamentary disposition provisions. Depending on the composition of the property he owned situated in either country dual residency on death could prove favorable.⁵³¹ ⁵³² Deemed dispositions under Part I of property upon death do not give rise to foreign tax liabilities but do in Canada.

The property described under Sec. 70(6), (or (5.2)), must have been transferred or distributed "on or after his death" but necessarily as a consequence of the death and in this case there appears to be some leverage allowed to the executors of the will as a necessity so as to allow them to settle the estate through the extinguishment of debts, free from possible personal exposure due to an early distribution. One does have to ask oneself however, (and it is extremely important as will be seen), how long after the death the applicability of the provision ceases if the property isn't transferred. In the author's opinion the property need not be transferred or distributed within 36 months after death if it can be shown to be vested indefeasibly in the spouse /trust as required but this is only if there are not any reasonable hindrances encountered in winding-up the estate, for which the Minister can give an extension upon application.⁵³³ Obviously the cause of the transfer after his death must be because of the taxpayer's death and in this regard testamentary based buy-sell agreements will function as a consequence of the death but will not cause a transfer or distribution to occur within the context of Sec. 70(6) and will thus not gain Sec. 70(6) treatment due to their contractual foundation while the property that is transferred to the parties as a consequence of the death must be that owned by the taxpayer in his personal capacity immediately before.⁵³⁴

Once the spouse under a spousal trust dies the trust ceases to be a spousal trust described in Sec. 73(1) or 70(6) but continues to be such under Sec. 104(4). This is entirely due to the structuring of the phrases in Sec. 70(6)(b) and 73(1)(c) which require not only that the trust have the spousal characteristics when the property is received but that she continue to have such entitlements. If subsequently she doesn't, due to their sale, renunciation, disclaiming, etc. the trust will cease to be of the nature described in the two subsections but will continue to be such under Sec. 104(4)(a). The difference is critical when one examines numerous targeting preambles throughout the Act, such as once the underlying spouse dies the trust is deemed to have disposed of for FMV all of its capital property.

Disclaimers, Renunciations and Allocation Powers.

If a will sets out that property is to be transferred to and vested indefeasibly in an offspring and if disclaimed, ⁵³⁰ The FLA/MPA may be used to demolish a tainted spousal trust however the roll to the spouse will not benefit from Sec. 70(6).

⁵³¹ while perhaps the best approach would be inter vivos incorporation of the property so as to preclude him from owning it.

⁵³² In order to be resident at the time immediately before his death the taxpayer must be able to satisfy at that time a residency definition under Sec. 250(1)(a) etc, or (3). As Kim Neufeld CA LLB BCL opened her Tax I class with.

⁵³³ This was also the opinion of the Small Business and General Division of Specialty Rulings (5-5002) in Jan. 1988 when it held citing IT 449 that the property need not be actually transferred within the 36 month period.

⁵³⁴ There may be some advantage in streaming ownership of some types of property to a testator immediately before death to have them go through a Sec. 70(6) roll-over in the context of a larger estate planning scenario. The property need not be free of mortgages and other conditions strapped to it.

to a spouse will a transfer to a spouse be considered as a consequence of a taxpayer's death if his offspring, evaluating the equitable charges attached to the bequest, disclaims it? Clearly it is a result of the disclaiming of the bequest that causes the property to be transferred to the spouse/spousal trust, not as a result of the death, however, subsection 248(8) deems the consequences as that resulting from the death for purposes of the Act even when at common law they are not.⁵³⁵

“Occurrences as a consequence of death. - Sec. 248(8)”

(8) For the purposes of this Act,

- (a) a transfer, distribution or acquisition of property under or as a consequence of the terms of the will or other testamentary instrument of a taxpayer or his spouse or as a consequence of the law governing the intestacy of a taxpayer or his spouse shall be considered to be a transfer, distribution or acquisition of the property as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer or the taxpayer's death, as the case may be;
- (b) a transfer, distribution or acquisition of property as a consequence of a disclaimer, release or surrender by a person who was a beneficiary under the will or other testamentary instrument or on the intestacy of a taxpayer or his spouse shall be considered to be a transfer, distribution or acquisition of the property as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer or the taxpayer's spouse, as the case may be; and
- (c) a release or surrender by a beneficiary under the will or other testamentary instrument or on the intestacy of a taxpayer with respect to any property that was property of the taxpayer immediately before his death shall be considered not to be a disposition of the property by the beneficiary.

Sec. 248(9)

(9) Definition. In subsection (8),

"disclaimer" - "disclaimer" includes a renunciation of a succession under Quebec Civil Law as long as it is not made in favour of any person.

"release or surrender" - "release or surrender" means

(a) a release or surrender made under the laws of a province (other than the Province of Quebec) that does not direct in any manner who is entitled to benefit therefrom, or,

(b) a gift inter vivos made under the laws of the Province of Quebec of an interest in, or right to property of, a succession that is made to the person or persons who would have benefitted if the donor had made a renunciation of the succession that was not made in favour of any person, and that is made within the period ending 36 months after the death of the taxpayer or, where written application therefor has been made to the Minister by the taxpayer's legal representative within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances.

Subparagraph 248(8)(a) provides effectively that a transfer, distribution or acquisition of property under or as a consequence of the terms of the will (or other testamentary instrument) or as a consequence of intestacy law governing the taxpayer shall be considered to be a transfer, distribution or acquisition of property as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer while paragraph (b) effectively provides that a transfer, distribution, or acquisition as a consequence of a disclaimer, release, or surrender by a beneficiary under a will (or other testamentary document), or on the intestacy of the taxpayer shall be considered as a transfer, distribution or acquisition of the property as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer for purposes of the Act. Paragraph (a) effectively allows the granting of testamentary options to the spouse so as to allow Sec. 70(6) to apply to the property upon the option's exercise⁵³⁶. In order for Sec. 70(6) to apply the former must be recognized to be the case. Paragraph (c) of Sec. 248(8) provides that where a beneficiary has made such a release or ⁵³⁵ See "Dealing with Disclaimers and Forfeitures", Barry S. Corbin, Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 24, Pg. 70 for additional commentary of planning for disclaimers and other "monkey-wrenches" in testamentary planning.

⁵³⁶ regardless of whether Canadian tax jurisprudence evolves to the extent that it recognizes an acquisition by a beneficiary or as a purchaser upon the exercise, see subsequently surrender as cited above he will not be considered to have disposed of the property while implicit in the fact that a disclaimer isn't mentioned is the fact that a disclaimer cannot be a disposition by its very nature, while a renunciation or release is just that.

The 36 month time period is given to settle the estate and if a disclaimer of an interest is made after the 36 month period and the Minister has not authorized an extension then even if it causes the legal or beneficial title of the subject property to fall back to the spouse or spousal trust it will not allow it to qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment. So, you have 36 mths post-mortum to settle the issues of what goes where when an estate plan has gone off track before the "disclaimer window" closes down and you're "fixed in place". It is obvious that a properly drafted will/estate plan will incorporate a large list of possible out-comes attending to a dynamic environment that has numerous outcomes depending on disclaimers occurring. It is to be noted that the disclaimer can actually trigger other streaming of ownership when the interest disclaimed is in no relation to the property being disclaimed: there is no statutory connection between the recognition of a transfer as a consequence of death and the interest being disclaimed: only that a disclaimer that prompts a redirection of beneficial interest will allow any property to be a transfer, distribution or acquisition as a consequence of death so if a will is structured it can set off multiple and recurring shifts of interests within the 36 mth period.⁵³⁷

If the taxpayer dies intestate and the courts have to decide who gets what then the Sec. 248(8)(a) provision will still cause resulting distributions to spouse or spousal trust to be recognized as a consequence of the death and thus allow them to qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment. If through a disclaimer, release or surrender the executor of the deed has directed that the property or the interest therein will then become another person's, regardless of whether such an expression is contrary or not to the then operative auxiliary will provisions or court orders, the deed will not be recognized as such and the deceased will recognize a disposition and the property will not qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment. If the former beneficiary renounces or releases an interest in a property after the 36 month period and it reverts to the spousal trust as per the terms of the will or intestate court order then the trust may be disqualified from being a testamentary by virtue of the fact that it has received a contribution from a person other than on and as a consequence of his death.⁵³⁸ (This is not the case where it is disclaimed.) If he makes it within the prescribed time limits then he cannot be considered a contributor for purposes of the Act since, as per Sec. 248(8)(c), he has not disposed of anything previously owned which if done is the very essence of a contribution. If the testamentary status is lost the trust will be exposed to the higher inter vivos trust tax rate but will still retain its spousal characteristic.

Since the disclaiming/renouncing party is probably not receiving any consideration for her act the estate/trust to which the property reverts and becomes subject to the personal character of the trust will remain but if the renouncer receives consideration is it possible that CRA can argue that a contributor to the trust has received consideration for an interest and thus make the estate/trust non-personal subjecting it to harsh income recognition/distribution mechanics?

If the spouse renounces but doesn't disclaim her interest under the spousal trust properly constituted within 36 months the trust will continue to be spousal⁵³⁹ but the spouse will not avoid tax consequences on ceasing to be a beneficiary. She can renounce for consideration and if the interests in the spousal trust or estate are splintered up enough she can be selective in what she renounces and what the consideration can be.⁵⁴⁰ This assumes that the trust was fully constituted as spousal prior to the renunciation⁵⁴¹ and the property vested indefeasibly in it since in such an instance the Sec. 70(6) provisions would be satisfied though maybe not subsequently.⁵⁴² Subparagraph 248(8)(c) provides that a release or surrender with respect to the devise of ⁵³⁷ Sort of like the Joker testator getting his beneficial parties to "disclaim for the meat". And live with each other!

⁵³⁸ See Stannus v. C.S.D., 1947 N.Z.L.R. 1, for an instance where a release was recognized to be a gift.

⁵³⁹ under Sec. 104(4)(a) only

⁵⁴⁰ In the case of the general estate the spouse could choose which property she renounces or receives directly and consequently which is transferred to the spousal trust, or, in respect of a spousal trust under which she must be entitled, the other general characteristics thereof must be ensured to exist before she renounces and accelerates an interest that would disqualify the trust. "Good draftsman needed"

541 and it continues to exist

⁵⁴² In Re: Metcalfe, 1972 3 O.R. 598, a disclaimer was given retroactive effect to the date of death but in A.N. Gilbert property owned by a testator will not cause the party releasing to be recognized to have disposed of the property however the property in this case does not include the interest in it or the right to receive it. On a surrender of an interest in an unadministered estate or residuary trust the beneficiary will recognize a disposition of the interest and may recognize taxable capital gains but he will not be recognized to have disposed of the property interested in. The value of the income interest that the spouse may surrender may be artificially adjusted through excessive discretionary depreciation powers held by the trustee, incorporation of income property with accumulation of income in the corporate shell, etc.. If the spouse can avoid her principal interest through the disclaimer the trust will not be spousal: she must be entitled with the particular characteristics in order for Sec. 70(6) to be available and her disclaiming which arguably relates back to the creation of the trust, would prevent this. A disclaimer may not operate with retroactive effect to the date of death⁵⁴³ it has been argued and in fact up until the spouse disclaims the interest in the spousal trust upon first becoming aware of it the trust will be spousal.⁵⁴⁴ Is this reasoning material in applying the roll over provision? It should also be noted that the Sec. 248(8) provision applies for purposes of the Act.⁵⁴⁵

If the spouse disclaims her capital interests in the spousal trust the FMV of those given to non-resident beneficiaries may explode whereby subsequently they could become resident and benefit from the Sec. 128.1(1) cost bump, (only if the spousal trust becomes temporarily non-resident). If the trust interest is reacquired through retraction of the disclaimer by the spouse there may not be tax consequences under Sec. 107(1)(a) to the beneficiary and the FMV cost will flow through to the trust property's cost when it is distributed ultimately under Sec. 107(2).⁵⁴⁶ If the trust contains a power to appoint additional capital to the spouse an exercise thereof may create ultimate capital losses for the newly resident capital beneficiaries when the trust property is depleted and the cost of the interest has been bumped.

Unfortunately subsections 248(8)-(9) do not comment on where an executor or legal representative is granted a power to decide which assets will go to which parties and in respect of such transfers one has to rely on common law principles to determine the source and force of the transfer being; if a will provides a special power of allocation to an executor/personal representative, whereby he will decide whether a particular property is to be transferred to a particular party (spousal or not) both particular details of which are addressed in the will explicitly, once the executor exercises his power the result should be "read back" into the will and not be recognized as having as its source the executor's decision. (The beneficiary's rights however will not relate back to the death but only to the time at which the power is exercised for it is only at that time that the executor has assented to the bequest.⁵⁴⁷) If the will however allows the executor to decide, out of all of the

v. M.N.R., 83 D.T.C. 645, a disclaiming of benefits realizable under a power of advancement was held not to have changed the terms of the will setting out the trust. As per the reasoning in Gilbert it would appear possible for the spouse to disclaim and still have the trust recognized to have the spousal characteristics as created under the will. Renunciations do not operate ab initio.

543 See Hillis in "Timing of Vesting" in Testamentary Spousal Transfers for one such Canadian example.

544 The fact that she isn't aware of her rights under a secret trust does not detract from it being spousal and she may disclaim the interest substantially after the creation of the trust as spousal.

545 For an interesting case of "going the other way" see MSPNominées Pty Limited and Anor v. CMMR Of Stamps (SA), [1999] 198 C.L.R. 494 HCA, where a trustee unilaterally chose to terminate interests and they were not recognized to be transferred statutorily by the beneficiaries.

546. This will allow the testator to create a tax free cost bump in respect of taxable Canadian property passed to the spousal trust: Sec. 128.1(1) doesn't apply to it when the trust ceases to be resident: the spouse doesn't recognize tax consequences on the renunciation/disclaimer, the non-spousal beneficiaries recognize no tax consequences on a Sec. 107(1)(a) disposal of their capital interests to the spouse: the consideration is paid to the offspring beneficiary by the spouse and she receives the property with a f.m.v. cost transferred through via Sec. 107(2). The offspring does have to become resident when the trust is non-resident in order for this to operate effectively and the consideration paid effectively is the substance disclaimed.

547 Pursuant to Muir v. Muir, 1943 A.C. 468, citing Stewart's Trustees v. Whitelaw, 1926 S.C. 701, which referred to In re: Fane, 1913 1 Ch. 404 at 413, the result of the exercise of the power does not relate back to the time the power was created though the interest created does in testing the validity of the gift:

"It is very material to note with regard to the proposition which Lord Sands derives from Fane v. Fane that it appears to be contradicted, or at any rate qualified, by another rule laid down by Farwell [on Powers] at p. 313, namely, that; "although the appointment is to be read into the instrument creating the power as part of that instrument, it is not to be so read in as to relate back in point of time to the creation of the power (Duke of Marlborough v. Lord Godolphin, 1750 2 Ves. Sen. 61, 78), and again at p. 331 where it is laid down that 'the appointee's estate, though derived from the power, vests not at the time of the creation of the power, but at the estate, at his own discretion, which property will go to a particular beneficiary, even though the testator has expressed that a minimum amount must be set aside for a trust, it is still the executor who is deciding which property should be received by which particular beneficiary thus it is the actions of the executor which are causing the particular property to be transferred, not the will.⁵⁴⁸ As per I.T. 305R3, para. 8, the Department takes a very lenient position on this issue allowing the trust to constitute a spousal trust for purposes of Sec. 70(6). Paragraph 6 of I.T. 449R expresses more or less the same point. In the author's opinion a special power of appointment can effect a qualifying transfer while a general one cannot, though this contradicts the Department's opinion in I.T. 449R, para. 6.⁵⁴⁹ If the tax consequences of the power are expressed to be of major motivation in the allocation of the property the executor will know which trustee concerns are of importance and the will can even provide that he shall be immune from actions by disgruntled beneficiaries if a certain majority thereof agree to a certain allocation, thus ensuring unhindered allocation.

Until the Transfer is Made: Questions of Spousal Residency, Interest Acquisitions and C.C.A.

The first possible recipient under Sec. 70(6)(or 70(5.2)(d) & (f)) which allows a transfer to be eligible for Sec. 70(6) treatment is the taxpayer's "spouse who was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death..." but the property must have been transferred or distributed to her "on or after his death and as a consequence thereof...", while it must also be proven that the property has been vested indefeasibly in her within the 36 months (or more).⁵⁵⁰ The very first aspect that one should notice about this targeting is that it would appear that the spouse need not be resident in Canada when the property is actually received by her. While the second possible recipient, the trust, is specifically caught by "a trust, created by the taxpayer's will, that was resident in Canada immediately after the time the property vested indefeasibly" therein which requires that it be resident when the title is vested, there is no such requirement imposed in respect of the spouse as to the time at which the property becomes vested.

time when it its execution takes effect'."

See also Pedley-Smith v. Pedley-Smith, 88 C.L.R. 177.

⁵⁴⁸ In Long v. Comp. of Stamps, 1964 V.R. 796, an executor with the consent of the beneficiaries apportioned certain estate assets for the exclusive use/benefit of the widow's income rights however the estate as a whole was to be the source of the income. The future interests of the offspring were accelerated and the Stamp Duties authority contended that such was a resettlement when powers of apportionment exercisable prior to terminal distributions were not implicitly instilled in the executor via the will or statute. Citing numerous instances where appropriation powers were validly exercised: Re: Beverley, 1901 1 Ch. 681, Re: Richardson, 1896 1 Ch. 512, the court held that such amounted to a resettlement of the beneficiaries' interests and stamp duty was assessable in respect of it. Also noted was that the deed operated to destroy the widow's life tenancy in certain property indicative of more than a mere apportionment. Concluding the court held that the argument that the appropriations were a result of a special power of appointment exercisable under the will derived from a statutory appropriation provision was invalid since the statute didn't provide for such a use/effect. Since the deed varied the whole of the estate the whole was assessable for stamp duty. Buzza and Others v. Comp. of Stamps, 83 C.L.R. 286 (HCA), is also an instance where an indenture between executor and beneficiary operated to vary the trust and resettle it exposing it to stamp duty, while Austin Mack Estate, 1956 73 W.N. 218, illustrates drafting narrowness disallowing certain appropriations to be outside the terms of the will. See also Re: Lepine, 1892 1 Ch. 210, Pughe and Qd. Trustees Ltd. v. Brodribb, 1921 St. R. Qd. 163, Davidson v. Armytage, 4 C.L.R. 205, Davidson v. Chirside, 7 C.L.R. 324, and Scott v. Comp. of Stamps, 1967 V.R. 122. In Bowman v. Commr. of S.D., 1981 12 A.T.C. 446, a special power of appointment was exercised so as to transfer property to a widow to gain stamp duty exemptions but the N.S.W. Sup. Ct. held that the property was not "passed under the will" within the context of the Act which made exemption in the case of Testator's Family Maintenance Act arrangements. The power was exercised well later than the death and the legislation was targeted to provide exemption to gifts which could be established at the time of death under the will, not under a power of appointment exercised well after it.

⁵⁴⁹ In Re: Pilkington's Will Trusts, 1964 A.C. 612, the House of Lords had to ascertain, amongst other issues, who created a trust created via power of advancement treated in the same way as a special power of appointment and it held: "When one asks what person can be regarded as the settlor of Miss Penelope's proposed settlement, I do not see how it is possible to say that she is herself or that the trustees are. She is the passive recipient of the benefit extracted for her from the original trusts; the trustees are merely exercising a fiduciary power in arranging for the desired limitations. It is not their property that constitutes the funds of Miss Penelope's settlement; it is the property subjected to the trusts by the will of the testator and passed over into the new settlement through the instrumentality of a power which by statute is made appendant to those trusts."

This passage was cited in Minden Trust (Cayman) Ltd. v. I.R.C., 1984 S.T.C. 434, where it was held that "a settlement" under U.K. capital transfer tax legislation could be effected by both the original disposition and a power drawing from that disposition to arrange the interests.

⁵⁵⁰ If there is to be habitual changes in residence by the spouse the will should provide that the property will be rolled to a spousal trust, if the spouse is non-resident at the time of death, and then to her so as to preserve the availability of the roll-over.

From the language used concerning the timing of the property transfer, (ie; "on or after his death..."), one concludes that the Department recognized that property is not transferable instantaneously upon death and it will allow three years to go by without denying the application and although it expressly provided a residency requirement in respect of the trust it did not feel such an expressed residency requirement applied to the spouse. In effect, all the provision calls for is that the spouse be resident immediately before the taxpayer's death, nothing more. Hence it would appear that Sec. 70(6) applies to transfers of property to a spouse resident in a foreign jurisdiction as long as she was resident in Canada at this critical time. In the case of specific bequests unless the will provides that the property is to be held for a certain length of time such as 30 days, or one year etc. before it is actually distributable to the spouse, the will will usually be read as transferring the property that she ultimately receives, at the time of death but if she becomes non-resident as a general or residual beneficiary under a will under which the property is to be transferred immediately after the liabilities have been extinguished and is not to be held, she will not be regarded as owning whatever property she received at the later time, at the time of ceasing to be resident.

In respect of the applicability of the concept of relation back in respect of residuary or specific bequests one has to examine perhaps the landmark case, *Ex. parte Barnardo's Homes National Incorporated Association*⁵⁵¹ where Atkin L.J., concurred with by Lord Sterndale and Younger L.J. as well as all of the House of Lords on appeal, held that, with respect to residual beneficiaries:

"They were left the residue of this estate; and it appears to me plain that they did not become entitled to that residue until the residue came into existence, and was ascertained, in other words, until the estate was administered so that the executors were able to know what fund was which they were eventually bound to hand over to the Association. On that simple ground I think that the claim must fail.

It is said, however, that though that might have been so at the particular moment at which the interest was deducted, and the dividends were received by the executors, yet the title of the Association related back to the testator's death as soon as the executors had fully administered the estate, and had intimated to the beneficiaries that they had so administered the estate, and pointed out to them what the exact amount of the residue was, in other words, said they assented to the legacy. Now in respect of that matter there has been no authority produced before us at all to establish that the doctrine of relation back of the legatee's title upon the assent by the executors to the legacy in the case of a specific legacy, applies in the case of a residuary bequest, and on principle one is not surprised that there should be that lack of authority. The two things appear to differ, and differ in the very root of things, because whereas in the one case of a specific legacy there is something which has existed at the date of death, and which the testator intended the legatee to receive in that form; on the other hand in the case of a residue there is something which did not exist at the date of death, and which the testator did not intend the legatee to receive in any form in which he possessed it or at that particular time. It is not merely that the amount of the legacy is not ascertained but that the legacy is not even in existence in the form in which it is bequeathed to the legatee. It appears to me that there is no authority for the proposition that the title of a residuary legatee relates back to the death as soon as the executor has ascertained the amount and has intimated to the legatee what that amount is.

I think on principle there should be no relation back."

The exception to the relation back rule arises only in respect of non-specific bequests of property, regardless of whether there has been conversion or not and the distinction between specific and residuary bequests can usually be drawn from the structuring of the will.⁵⁵² The particular form of property of the residue as cash verses property owned by the testator isn't important since the residue could consist of the testator's property that have not been converted to satisfy debts. In the instance that particular property isn't converted but is to be treated as residue and potentially convertible to cover debt the residuary beneficiary, (the spouse), would still not obtain specific equitable title until the executor assents after the provision for, or extinguishment of, debt.

⁵⁵¹ 7 T.C. 646

⁵⁵² Hillis v. M.N.R., 83 D.T.C. 5365, concerned the time of vesting of property under the Saskatchewan Intestate Succession Act and a court order made under that province's Dependant's Relief Act so as to vest the spouse with more property but the gist of the Appeal Court reasoning seems to endorse the inapplicability of the relation back principle to residuary bequests.

Paragraph 6 of I.T. 449R provides that the fact that the legal representative may wield power over which beneficiary acquires which asset doesn't restrict the fact that the property that is ultimately acquired was acquired as a consequence of the death but the interesting question remains whether, until that discretionary allocation power is exercised, the spouse can be found to have beneficial or equitable ownership of the property that is ultimately transferred to her thus causing it to be subject to the subsection 128.1(1) mechanics when she becomes non-resident while holding it. Paragraph 2 of the same Interpretation Bulletin provides, accordingly, that the ownership of property of a specific bequest will vest immediately after the death of the testator⁵⁵³ however it goes on to provide, again accordingly, that the ownership of a non-specific bequest will vest when such property has been identified and the beneficiary has a binding right to receive it restating the essence of Dr. Barnardo's and it could easily be argued that until that time, should she become non-resident, Sec. 128.1(1) cannot apply to property that only after becoming non-resident she gained beneficial ownership of. This can occur in the case of executor discretionary allocation powers and in the case where disclaimers exercised by other beneficiaries within the 36 month period previously cited operate to change the course of beneficial ownership of the subject property and cause it to vest in the spouse, by that time non-resident.⁵⁵⁴ If the capital interest is taxable Canadian property then she need not recognize a Sec. 128.1(1) disposition in respect of it although she could elect to do so and realize a capital gain since the estate property's fair market value would most likely exceed the interest's cost amount as determined under Sec. 108(1)(d)(ii) which usually forms the basis of it's ACB as per Sec. 107(1), if disposed of. By the very fact that capital interests in unadministered estates are not expressly recognized as taxable Canadian property it would seem that such are to be captured by Sec. 128.1(1) when the spouse ceases to reside in Canada though establishing the interest's fair market value may be a subjective exercise. The right the spouse has in the unadministered estate will be a capital interest by virtue of Sec. 108(1)(c)(ii) even if the estate ceases to be testamentary as per Sec. 108(1)(i). Since it is a capital interest Sec. 107(1)(a) will apply if the estate is personal to artificially boost the interest's ACB so as to reduce tax consequences under Sec. 128.1(1).⁵⁵⁵ If the estate ceases to be personal then the right will have a nil cost and may cause a whopping capital gain via Sec. 128.1(1).

Subsection 70(6) refers to transfers or distributions on or after the death to the qualifying parties while section 107, in particular Sec. 107(5), describes rules that are applicable when an estate or trust transfers property to a beneficiary in satisfaction of his capital interest and in this particular case one must derive Parliament's intent as to how the distribution of the property to the spouse/spousal trust will be effected under the Act. Subsection 70(6) doesn't just prescribe rules applicable to how the deceased will be deemed to have disposed of the property on his death; it also prescribes rules as to how that property will be ultimately received by the spouse/spousal trust. The word "ultimately" is used due to the fact that upon death the deceased's will will take effect spelling out the technicalities of the administration of his estate and Parliament has made full recognition of the fact that the property will pass through the estate and after the death be transferred to the spouse. With these mechanics can it be reasonably argued that Sec. 107(5) can apply to estate distribution to spouses after they have become non-resident? In the author's opinion definitely not, especially when one considers the diction that Parliament has used to expressly require that the spousal trust be resident in Canada immediately after being indefeasibly vested with the property but is conspicuously silent on the requirements imposed on the spouse. It could be reasonable to say, with respect to the spirit of the Act as a whole and especially the purpose of Sec. 70(6), that if the spouse receives property on or after the death of her spouse, ⁵⁵³ In Re: Neeld, [1962] 2 All E.R. 335, the Court of Appeal found that a beneficiary under an estate obtained immediately upon the testator's death a beneficial interest in the specific bequest.

⁵⁵⁴ Even though the spouse may be argued to have only a right to force the administration of the estate that right is a capital interest within the Sec. 108(1)(c) definition though not subject to Sec. 128.1(1). Are there adequate grounds to argue that a capital interest in an estate is not considered a taxable Canadian property since the Sec. 115(1)(b) definition, lying outside of subdivision k, refers only to capital interests in trusts resident in Canada? It would seem so since the phrase "...in a trust" is qualified so as to refer only to trusts and thus Parliament made special note to various forms of agreement referred to as "trust" in subdivision K so as to qualify them but did not expressly qualify "estates" outside of subdivision K, in particular Sec. 115(1)(b). See Fletcher v. M.N.R., [1987] 2 C.T.C. 2341.

⁵⁵⁵ This may be affected by estate debt claims yet to be established as valid that will reduce the Sec. 108(1)(d) "cost amount" of the interest: will the Department reassess where they are recognized and reduce the cost latently?

when she is non-resident, she will not suffer the effect of Sec. 107(5). Is it reasonable to assume that Sec. 107(2) applies to the testamentary distribution of property to a spouse when Sec. 70(6) also applies? Can it? Subsection 70(6) allows plenty of room for a spouse to acquire other estate beneficiaries' equitable rights to her husband's estate and have the property which is subsequently transferred gain Sec. 70(6) treatment. The will need not transfer it to her initially and she can acquire the rights so that the property is distributed to her. All the provision requires is that the title thereto vest indefeasibly in the spouse within 36 months, not that it vest under her initial stated entitlements. It does get transferred or distributed to her as a direct consequence of his death and she does receive as a beneficiary.

One must distinguish between the right in respect of the transfer or distribution and the subject of that distribution or transfer itself. If the spouse acquires additional rights other than that which she is initially given under the will the property is distributed as a consequence of those rights arising under the will though distributed to her. The property has been distributed or transferred as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer and it has been transferred or distributed to the spouse though she did not receive the rights thereto under the will directly.⁵⁵⁶ In the author's opinion, as the provision now stands, if the spouse acquires the rights to the property in specie from other beneficiaries, even though she hasn't been named as expressed recipient thereof, the property should still be allowed Sec. 70(6) treatment since it is still being "transferred or distributed" in response to rights given under the will thereto, thus satisfying present judicial dicta on how the provision must operate. The fact that she has subsequently acquired the rights not initially given to her does not reflect on why the property is being transferred in the first place.⁵⁵⁷ If the provision is not to operate as such then perhaps the draughtsman should have specified how the spouse was to have acquired the qualifying rights instead of leaving it open to question. On the other hand if the provision is to be read as only allowing the rights acquired as a consequence of the death to qualify rather than cause the property to be transferred or distributed then this approach is in error however the provisions and the cases don't seem to contradict it.⁵⁵⁸

Subparagraph 70(6)(d) provides that if the conditions specified are satisfied the deceased will be deemed to have disposed of, immediately before his death, his particular property for proceeds equal those described while the last two lines of para. (d) provide that the spouse or spousal trust will be deemed to have acquired the property for consideration equal to those proceeds but it does go on to deem the property to have been acquired at that time of death. Compare this to Sec. 70(5) and then the other "tax free" roll over provisions in section 70 as well as instances where deemed dispositions are to be recognized such as in section 128.1. Subsection 70(6) describes how the spouse, (or spousal trust), is to acquire the property, and it leaves no room for the application of Sec. 107(2), and the strength is that the former does deem the spousal recipient to have acquired the property immediately at the time of death. This is also the case with all of the other "tax free" roll-overs in the latter subsections of section 70. If this is not the case, and Sec. 107(2) applies, then when the capital interest in an unadministered estate is caught by Sec. 128.1(1) on a cessation in residency a subsequent distribution of taxable Canadian property would allow the spouse to tack on the excess ACB of the interest to the property. The same would occur if a Canadian resident spouse has purchased interests in the estate from other beneficiaries.

If the spouse pays consideration for the interest directly in the estate as per Sec. 107(1)(a) the disposer may not be required to recognize an eventual capital gain while if the spouse subsequently assumes outstanding estate debt as a condition of receiving legal title to the property the Sec. 107(2)(c) provision could not be applicable to allow her to recognize a capital loss at the same time realizing the property under the Sec. 70(6) provision. Subsection 70(6) and the section 107 roll-through mechanics do not jointly apply: the former ranks and the latter has no effect.

⁵⁵⁶ "As a consequence" of the death relates to the transfer, not who acquires the rights.

⁵⁵⁷ The transaction is not a purchase of the property, it is a purchase of the rights arising out of the will that will eventually be satisfied upon residue establishment. If the right is in the form of a specific bequest this may not be valid argument.

⁵⁵⁸ The Director of the Rulings Directorate has taken the latter view in Technical Interpretation 5-2267 provided in Dec. 1986 where he held that property transferred as a consequence of its assignment by another beneficiary cannot benefit from Sec. 70(6) since it wasn't transferred as a consequence of death, but again, there is a difference between acquiring the property and acquiring another beneficiary's rights to receive the property once administration is completed.

There are two types of property to consider here: the property transferred to the trust, the trust interest held by the spouse. If the property recognizes a Sec. 70(6) roll-over the spouse under the trust need not be resident in order for the roll-over to occur while the trust must be resident. If the trust severs residency and incurs some tax consequences it can manage, the spouse can then become resident under a non-resident trust and have FMV statutorily ascribed to her interest's cost so that when property is transferred out to her she gets a tax-free cost bump. The section 107 roll-out mechanics on trust property operate between the spouse and her trust, but not between the estate and the trust set-up under the will. Obviously the global tax exposure must be calculated here on the relevant properties.

In *Hillis v. The Queen*⁵⁵⁹ a question of indefeasible vesting existed when two sons disclaimed their interests and a court order was made under a Dependant's Relief Act. The spouse contended that as a consequence of both actions the estate vested indefeasibly in the spouse upon the death, although one son disclaimed and the court order was made after the vesting period ended. The court order vested the estate retroactively at the time of death. Clements D.J. and especially Pratte J. of the Appeal Court found that although the order was to have retroactive effect it could still not cause, when issued after the end of the vesting period, the spouse to be regarded as vested indefeasibly with the necessary rights, within the vesting period. As per Clement D.J.:

"There is no justification or need to assign to these disclaimers a retrospective operation, they took effect in reality upon their execution which was posterior to the prescribed 15 month period.⁵⁶⁰ The effect, in my view, was an accretion to the interest of the spouse of whatever net estate might then be left."

Pratte J., held with respect to the effect of the disclaimers:

"It is only when the disclaimers were executed and a court order was pronounced that Mrs. Hillis became entitled to the whole of her husband's estate with retroactive effect to the date of his death. If therefor, the disclaimers and the Court order had as contended by the Appellants, the effect of vesting the estate in Mrs. Hillis, the effect did not take place within the 15 months after the death of Mr. Hillis."

Subsection 252(3) has been amended to define the term "spouse" for purposes of Sec. 70(6) to be only spouses that are parties to a voidable marriage.

The second potential recipient, other than the spouse directly, consists of a spousal trust that was resident in Canada immediately after the property vested indefeasibly in it and which had the spousal characteristics. If the property vests, possibly defeasibly, in a non-resident trustee that becomes resident in Canada then the Sec. 128.1(1) bump-up in the cost of the property will apply to bump the cost of the property to its FMV however if the property vests indefeasibly when the trust is resident, as a consequence of obtaining the Sec. 70(6) roll-over, the property's cost to the trust will be deemed to be equivalent to that of the testator. If the legal representative makes the Sec. 70(6.2) election⁵⁶¹ so as to preclude the Sec. 70(6) roll-over from applying then the cost bump will occur but the testator will recognize a Sec. 70(5) disposition. An election may thus be advantageously contemplated when there has been a substantial increase in the FMV of the property after death though the Sec. 70(6.2) election must be made in the deceased's terminal return hence planned alterations in f.m.v and residency must occur quickly. If the election isn't made and Sec. 70(6) subsequently automatically applies due to vesting and residency there will not be a cost bump in the underlying property. If the property vests fairly quickly in a non-resident trust, and that trust becomes resident obtaining the Sec. 128.1(1) bump in the cost of the property, a subsequent divesting of the property from the non-spousal trust, due to any legitimate reason, will allow the recognition of a capital loss, (if no proceeds are received), if the trust is dealing at arm's length with the party in whom the property subsequently vests – this is the case where the trust fails due to a disclaimer/renunciation. Such a divesting will not be a distribution in respect of a capital

⁵⁵⁹ 83 D.T.C. 5365 (FCA)

⁵⁶⁰ See also footnote "Disclaimers and Renunciations" in the chapter "Variations" for lack of retroactivity in certain instances.

⁵⁶¹ and the property would normally qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment interest but since it vested indefeasibly when the trust was non-resident Sec. 70(6) will not apply to it.⁵⁶²

If the spouse under a resident trust becomes resident there is no disposition of his interest in the estate or trust to allow it to have its cost set at its FMV since the trust/estate is resident: if the executors are non-resident it is still possible to get a cost-bump in the estate interest by becoming resident, but, is the interest in an (non-resident) estate in the midst of administration the same as an interest in the (resident) spousal trust that arises out of it within the realm of our ITA?

Indefeasible vesting occurs at a certain point in time either in law or in fact possibly regardless of the appearance of the actions of the executor/trustee and since the roll over is available only if the trust is resident immediately after it occurs one would want to play it safe and get any relevant non-resident trustees resident as quickly as possible, probably through office transfer, so as to obtain the roll over.⁵⁶³

A basic definition of indefeasibly vesting is that the legal or beneficial ownership of a property has crystallized to a point where no legal or equitable events can occur to undermine it.⁵⁶⁴

Creation of the Trust.

Serial transfers of property to a spousal trust described in the subsection by the executors/administrators are a completely separate activity from the proper constituting of the trust so that it will qualify as spousal.

Under paragraph 70(6)(b) the trust must have been created by the taxpayer's will, must have been resident in Canada immediately after the transferred property vested indefeasibly in it, must have had the meticulously described spousal characteristics at the moment it was created, and finally, only then if it receives the property on or after and as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer will Sec. 70(6) apply to the property. By virtue of the provisions related to disclaimers trusts created by way of a disclaimer by a beneficiary under the will will not qualify: those provisions do not express that the trust has been set-up, they comment as a focus only on transfers as a consequence of death. This was expressly commented on in *A.N. Gilbert v. M.N.R.*⁵⁶⁵ where under the will a trust was to be set up under which the benefits, (income and capital rights), were to be primarily paid to the testator's spouse however over which the trustees had a discretionary power of advancement whereupon its exercise the son of the testator could benefit from the trust before the spouse died. Once the Minister reassessed the estate as not qualifying under Sec. 70(6) as a spousal trust the son disclaimed the beneficial "interest" he had, (to receive the capital allocations upon exercise of the discretionary power), however Bonner M.J. of the Tax Review Board held that such an action was ineffective at qualifying a tainted spousal trust:

"The trust, as we have seen, was tainted because it permitted Bruce Gilbert to receive capital before the ⁵⁶² A taxpayer states that a certain property is to be held in a non-resident trust, the fmV explodes on death due to various possible conditions that trigger it, and the trust immigrates realizing a tax-free cost bump to fmV merely for being owned by an immigrating trustee. With its inflated cost a power is exercised over it, a beneficiary "upstream" disclaims and divests the property from the trust and a capital loss is realized in the trust.

⁵⁶³ Alternative Canadian resident trustee appointments would alleviate this problem. See previous notes on issues regarding trust residency.

⁵⁶⁴ See Guaranty Trust Company of Canada v. Minister of National Revenue, [1967] S.C.R. 133, for a Supreme Ct. analysis of the term "indefeasible" in the context of estate tax legislation. It held:

"In my respectful opinion, the reasons for judgment of Thurlow J. in Halley Estate v. M.N.R.[20] which were endorsed without further comment by this Court[21] appear to me to be entirely relevant to the present case and I adopt them as explaining the true meaning of the word "absolute" as used in s. 7(1)(d). Mr. Justice Thurlow there said of the provisions of s. 7(1)(d) as it then read:

The intention of this provision is apparently to permit the deduction of the value of what is given to the particular recipients and with this in mind it seems to me that it is more natural to interpret the word 'absolute' in the paragraph from the point of view of the recipient than from the point of view of the deceased and as referring to the irrevocable and undefeatable vesting of the subject matter of the gift in the recipient rather than to the unlimited extent of the interest given to the recipient... Moreover while I can see no reason why Parliament should have intended to draw a distinction between a gift of an unlimited interest and an indefeasible gift for a lesser interest and to permit deduction of the value in the one case but not in the other it is not difficult to understand that in authorizing the deduction of the value of a gift to such a body Parliament would be concerned to ensure that the deduction should not be permitted when because of the provisions attaching to the gift, the body referred to in s. 7(1)(d) might never receive it. The word used is an apt one to make such a distinction and secure this object. I am accordingly of the opinion that the word 'absolute' in s. 7(1)(d) should be interpreted as meaning vested and indefeasible."

⁵⁶⁵ 83 D.T.C. 645 (TRB)

death of his mother (the spouse). The disclaimer does not change that feature of the trust. While it is true that s donee need not accept a gift, as was reiterated in the Cossitt case, (Cossitt v. M.N.R. 49 D.T.C. 617), that principle has no application to clause 7 of the will. The trustees did not exercise their discretion to make any payment out of capital to the son. Had they done so, B.G. could have refused to accept that gift. What B. Gilbert could not do, by disclaimer or otherwise, was to change the terms of the trust.⁵⁶⁶

From Sec. 248(8) it can clearly be seen that a direct devise may be disclaimed by its initial beneficiary whereby if the will is structured properly, it will qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment if it ends up then being transferred to the spouse or the spousal trust. If a non-spousal trust is structured unfavorably with respect to a particular beneficiary causing him to disclaim his interest which in effect causes the trust to fail and be unconstitutable, then its property may qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment if they roll through, as a result of the construction of the will, to a spouse or spousal trust.⁵⁶⁷ If a spousal trust is created under the terms of the taxpayer's will it will qualify as a spousal trust for purposes of Sec. 70(6) however if it is effectively varied through the disclaiming of interests so that it has the ultimate character of a spousal trust but was not created as such under the will then it will not qualify. If a spousal trust is created by the taxpayer's will it will lose its spousal nature if the spouse executes a Sec. 248(8) disclaimer of her interest so it's important to attend to possible variations in the parties actions post-mortum, otherwise it could easily mess-up your handiwork. Such an event could be to take property under a matrimonial property act by the spouse directly.⁵⁶⁸

Not with Variations.

The effective application of a trust agreement may be altered through disclaimer/releases et cetera by the beneficiaries but the agreement itself may be altered under an application to court under the relevant provincial Variation of Trusts statute law (where all of the ascertained beneficiaries under the trust are of one, sound and legally competent mind). But will the resulting trust after the variation be treated as having been created, as a spousal trust, under the taxpayer's will? First of all a court order made pursuant to provincial statute law focused at providing relief to or support of a dependant under a will is substantially different from a variation of trust court endorsement in that the former can be made regardless of any of the beneficiaries opposition while the variation can only be endorsed, and not enforced by a court only after all of the beneficiaries thereunder agree.⁵⁶⁹ By a review of the commentary on the variations of trusts through court acknowledgements in the chapter on Trust Variations and Disclaimers it can be ascertained that such alterations may cause the recognition of a cessation of one trust and a creation of a distinct separate other (if the conditions are right) or it may cause only a variation in the one on-going trust however the trust resulting from the execution is almost always seen to have come into existence either at the time of the order or at the time of the initial trust creation however the resulting trusts in their final form were not created under the ⁵⁶⁶ See F.C.T. v. Vegners, 89 A.T.C. 5274, for similar jurisprudence concerning disclaimers of interests under powers, as well as A.G. v. Brackenbury, 1863 1 H. & C. 782, H.M. Advocate v. Routledge's Trustees, 1907 44 Sc. L.R. 305, for attempts to avoid estate duty. It is possible to destroy a power with the disclaimer of any benefit arising out of it though a clear expression must be made that this is to be one of the intended effects of the disclaimer: I.R.C. v. Cookson, 1977 1 W.L.R. 962 & Re: Stone's Estate, 1869 3 Ir. Eq. 621. The power in Gilbert was exercisable in respect of both spouse and offspring and could not be destroyed by a disclaimer of only one of the parties. Regardless of the manner used to terminate the power (trustee release, beneficiary disclaimer of benefit, removal through variation, determination or satisfaction of purpose or exercise), the fact that the trust was created under the will as having the power precludes favorable roll-over treatment, unless the trust can be made to fail and the property becomes subject to a new trust.

⁵⁶⁷ If however the disclaimers are not executed within 36 months from time of death this will not occur.

⁵⁶⁸ The effect of Sec. 248(8) does not cause the spousal trust to lose its status as per Gilbert v. M.N.R.. The disclaimer will operate retroactively to cause the will to be read as creating a trust underwhich the spouse is not entitled to the income. A release/surrender however does not cause such to happen ab initio but only from the date of the release/surrender. Since a disposition is not prevented from being recognized under Sec. 248(8) the spouse could receive income from the trust for the three years, renounce the right but not avoid a Sec. 106(2) disposition. As long as the income or capital is not payable to a non-spousal party before her death the trust will remain spousal and Sec. 70(6) applicable. After the right is renounced the trust could be varied to accelerate the interest or be wound up though Sec. 107(4) will cause a recognition of the accrued tax liabilities on the dissolution.

⁵⁶⁹ Under a Dependant's Relief Act application a court will act against a testator's wishes explicitly in rearranging his testament while under Variation of Trust statutes the court will partially protect the settlor's intention and it is the beneficiaries who initiate the action against it.

terms of the taxpayer's will and thus *unless variation statutes can be successfully argued to be dependant support/relief statutes, (which they are not due to the very basic difference in their purpose and application), a variation of a tainted testamentary spousal trust will not suffice to allow it to qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment.*⁵⁷⁰

A special power of appointment is not a variation of a trust hence it may give some flexibility to add one to create a spousal trust and have it qualify. See one of the following chapters for the nature of special powers of appointment over estate/trust property.

Subsections 248(22)-(23.1) attends to situations where the spouse chooses to take property directly under a matrimonial property regime that recognizes his property rights and thus allows the property to benefit from a Sec. 70(6) roll-through. It does not, however, go the distance in creating a trust recognizable as created by the deceased, if the court so directs in the case of the creation of a trust in respect of the spouse.

Indefeasibly Vest.

In the case of a testamentary spousal trust the property transferred to the spousal trust it must "indefeasibly vest" in the trust, and immediately after that time the trust must be resident in Canada, however it need not have been resident throughout the time since its creation nor need it remain resident afterwards. The Department provides an opinion, on what it comprehends to be "indefeasibly vested", in I.T. 449R, which is that property becomes vested indefeasibly at a time in a spouse or spousal trust when such a person obtains a right to absolute ownership thereof which cannot be defeated by any subsequent event or action, regardless of whether such a right carries with it a right to possession (or immediate enjoyment of the benefits coming from the property), or whether the right is immediately enforceable or not. The I.T. then goes on to provide that the Department will consider that property is vested indefeasibly in the person to whom it is bequeathed when that person has an unassailable right to ownership that is enforceable, even when the formal legal conveyance and registration of ownership of the property is not executed. In *Sachs v. The Queen*⁵⁷¹ Thurlow C.J. describes seven different manners in which a trust interest could simply be held to be "vested"; vested in possession, vested in remainder, vested in interest, vested absolutely, vested but subject to defeasance, and contingently or suspensively vested.

In the author's opinion the fact that the trust upon receipt of the property must then operate to convey it to certain parties or must convert it to cash does not cause the property to vest contingently. The indefeasible vesting of the property relates to what can happen to it so as to divest it from the trust after, as per the will, it has been transferred to it as due to the conditions of the transfer and the environment that existed when it occurred. Estate debt, quantum meruit claims, beneficiary disputes can all operate to preclude the property from vesting in the trust indefeasibly but the two above transactions relate to how the trust operates, not how it receives the property. Subsection 70(6) concerns the receipt of the property, not how the trust operates after it receives it.

There is a difference in the direction to the executors to dispose of the property in order to ascertain the ⁵⁷⁰ The inapplicability of a variation to qualify a spousal trust was recognized in a Technical Interpretation provided in April 1991 by the Financial Industries Division (5-910290). The same occurred in March 1990 (5-9610) where the same Division held: "We question whether a transfer of property under a court ordered variation of a will made at the request of any beneficiary of an estate, and for his benefit, would satisfy (the transfer as a consequence of the death)." T.I. 5-7677 addressed the situation where a consensual variation was informally pursued by estate beneficiaries to adjust their entitlements to avoid a F.L.A. application where shares were to be distributed as a result to the spouse. The same Division specifically held that the shares wouldn't devolve as a consequence of death but as a result of a separate beneficiary agreement. In the same opinion it was held that a F.L.A. payment which resulted in the same would so qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment. In a T.I. provided in Feb. 1983 by the same Division it was held that a variation to remove an direction to the executors to sell the estate property at the first opportune time, though allowing the property to consequently vest indefeasibly in the beneficiaries, would not satisfy the "as a consequence of death" requirements. The property would vest as a consequence of the variation. A variation of a trust has as its source the beneficiaries themselves. See Re: Holmden's Settlement Trusts, [1968] A.C. 685 (HL), where Lord Reid held: "... So the arrangement must be regarded as an arrangement made by the beneficiaries themselves." See Russell and Another v. I.R.C., 1988 1 W.L.R. 834, for an example of where a variation subsequent to the death of a U.K. resident taxpayer was effective at altering his will for capital tax purposes imposed upon death though where such was expressly provided for in the legislation. In Williams and Another v. Commr. of S.D., 1943 N.Z.L.R. 88, an executor was to make dispositions pursuant to the expressed wishes of the testator known to him but not expressed in the will. An agreement to establish certain testamentary dispositions was held valid at reducing death duties when favorable roll-over provisions were accessed.

⁵⁷¹ 80 D.T.C. 6291 (FCA)

residue of the estate and a direction to the trustees of the residuary estate (trust) to dispose of the property following the ascertainment of the residue. Under the former Sec. 70(6) will not apply to the disposed property since it is not vesting indefeasibly in the residuary trust while under the latter it will since the trust arises and its terms operate to cause the disposition - assent to the vesting in the office of trustee has occurred though may be subject to a latently arising/to-be-extinguished debt. That is exactly why the tainted spousal trust rules were formulated in Sec. 70(7)-(8).

In *Dontigny v. The Queen*⁵⁷² a bequest was conditional upon the beneficiary remaining a widow and if she remarried the property would then devolve to her children. Pratte, J. of the Federal Court held with respect to the defeasibility of her interest:

"As I interpret the law, the property is not vested indefeasibly in a spouse when it is bequeathed under the condition that the spouse not remarry."

Thus the right of the spouse to the property was contingent, (or conditional), upon her remaining a widow and if she didn't and remarried her right would be defeated. In *Devitt Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁷³ the deceased bequeathed 50% of his residual estate to his wife "for her own use absolutely" while in another clause the testator "created a trust" from "all" of his estate under which the spouse would be able to use the house and accompanying lands until she remarried, notified the trustees that she no longer wanted to benefit from the arrangement, or died, whichever occurred first. The Minister contended that the property consisting of 50% of the residual estate had not become indefeasibly vested due to the fact that the will went further to qualify "all" of the estate's use by the spouse, while M. Boisvert, Q.C. of the Tax Review Board held that it had vested indefeasibly (absolutely), by expressing:

"I am of the opinion that upon Mr. Devitt's death, the above property passed from Mr. Devitt to Mrs. Devitt absolutely and indefeasibly through the trustees who were appointed by the testator to carry out the directions and request in his will. The trustees had only the administration of the estate for the benefit of the heirs. They had no power to make defeasible the property given by the deceased to his wife. It is not in vain that the testator twice in his will, used the word "absolutely"."

If the trust agreement granted a power of appointment or advancement or encroachment et cetera with which through its use, depending on the discretion of the exercisor, could allocate the trust property to another beneficiary other than the spouse during her life quite likely its mere existence could disqualify the otherwise absolute right held by the spouse to the particular property although if that power ceased to exist 35 months after the death then any property which was not affected by a previous exercise to which the spouse had an absolute right, would receive Sec. 70(6) treatment. Having the powers collapse within 35 months of death is thus an interesting incidental tool to create some flexibility while availing oneself of the roll-over.

In Devitt Estate v. M.N.R. the judge cited *Halley Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁷⁴ when evaluating the indefeasibility of the spousal right while in that case Thurlow J. provided two methods of measuring the absolute nature of the vesting of a right in possession or interest being; the lack of limitation of the extent or duration of the interest or the freedom of the interest from dependence on other "things" or persons. He then went on, after giving examples of each, to provide that an "absolute" gift should be taken to be a vested and indefeasible gift, (and that it indicated a certainty that the gift would come into possession)⁵⁷⁵. From the criteria cited by Thurlow J. in Halley Estate it would appear that property becomes vested indefeasibly when it cannot be reacquired by a right by the giftor, nor is it to be vested only for a specific period of time which would in substance make it contingent without "an event". It must be independent from other "things" or "persons" thus discretionary powers, powers of appointment, advancement, encroachment held by anyone affecting the particular property could cause it to be vested subject to defeasance, temporarily or permanently.⁵⁷⁶

572 73 D.T.C. 5398 (FCTD)

573 72 D.T.C. 1337

574 63 D.T.C. 1090 (ExC)

575 See also Towle Estate v. M.N.R., 67 D.T.C. 5003 (S.C.), for similar dicta as well as Boles et al. v. M.N.R., 13 E.T.R. 6, for further issues.

576 A distinction must be drawn between dispositive powers vested in the executors under the will and those granted to trustees under the trust created under the will out of the residue etc.. The former affects the residuary estate and must cease to exist within the 36 month period in order for the roll over to apply but it ceases to apply to property transferred to the trust, and severed from the estate. The latter is operative after the property vests indefeasibly in the trust and can taint

If an interest/right in a trust's income is exclusively granted to the spouse but is to divest upon her remarriage, bankruptcy etc. it cannot be said that she is entitled to receive all of the trust's income that arises prior to her death since her interest is defeasible. If her rights to the trust capital are defeasible only if other beneficiaries have immediately enforceable interests to the capital before she dies, regardless of if they are acted upon, will the trust lose its spousal character. If she lost rights to the trust capital then Sec. 70(6) will continue to apply however the trust deed could go even further; it could grant the trustees a power in trust to convert the income producing property held by the trust into capital appreciating property if the spouse were to remarry thus severely reducing the amount of trust income to which she will have sole interest in and this would not offend the spousal trust character. If only capital appreciating property is held then there won't be too much income for her to have rights to.⁵⁷⁷ In the author's opinion such contingency clauses do not operate to render the vesting of title in the spousal trust defeasible within the context of Sec. 70(6) since they relate only to how the trust is to operate after title has vested indefeasibly.

An interesting note should be made concerning the Department's opinion as expressed in para. 1 of I.T. 449 where it held that:

"Where property is held in trust for the benefit of one or more persons it is the Department's view that such property normally vests in the trust and not the beneficiary thereof. However, where the Department is satisfied where a property is held in trust solely to carry out the terms of a will under which the ultimate and absolute ownership of that property is bequeathed to a particular individual and the trust arrangement is such that the individual's ownership rights cannot be defeated by any future event and no other person has any right whatsoever to an immediate or future benefit from that property or that trust, the property will be considered to vest indefeasibly in that individual."

Is this to say that property rolled to an otherwise fully qualifying spousal trust that has as its sole trustee a non-resident person, (thus making it non-resident), whereunder the sole beneficiary of that trust has an absolute vested interest in the property, is the spouse, and is resident immediately before the death, will qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment by virtue of the fact that the Department will consider the property to vest indefeasibly in the spouse, regardless of the trust? The roll-over will thus qualify, as per that opinion, on the grounds that the recipient is a spouse resident in Canada immediately before the death of the taxpayer. Since the trust is disregarded as a vesting base its residency immediately after the time of vesting "in the spouse" will also be irrelevant. If the spouse becomes non-resident after the death she will still not own the property for purposes of Sec. 128.1(1) by virtue of the fact that the trust owns it however if the trust is non-resident her interest therein will be subject to Sec. 128.1(1) with the same effect.⁵⁷⁸ The I.T. should obviously be properly qualified.

The indefeasible vesting of property in a spousal trust was the critical issue in *Hrycej Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁷⁹ where the testator bequeathed certain farm property to trustees to be held upon certain trusts however his will extended a testamentary option to an offspring allowing her to purchase the property within 60 days after the death from the estate while the residual estate was to form the spousal trust, if the spouse(widow) survived 30 days after death. The daughter exercised the option and purchased from the estate, (which was still being administered), the property and the widow survived hence the spousal estate resulted while what came into question was the fact that the executors of the estate wanted the Sec. 70(6) provision to apply to provide roll-over treatment to the deceased in respect of the farm property and have the net estate recognize the sale to the offspring, which was denied by the Minister. Taylor, T.C.J. of the Tax Court of Canada decided that the equipment had never vested in the spouse, (spousal trust), because it could do so only after the spouse survived the thirty day period and after the daughter didn't exercise the option but allowed it to expire. If the daughter had done so there would have been no question as to the indefeasible vesting of the property which would allow it to gain Sec. 70(6) treatment. If the spouse didn't survive the thirty day period then again the the trust if allowed to be exercised in respect of a non-spousal party.

⁵⁷⁷ The power in trust to dispose need not be used but instead the trustees may be compelled by the trust deed to alter the accounting methods to be used in computing the income with the same result or possibly to incorporate and capitalize income. Compulsory inflated depreciation charges may have limited usage.

⁵⁷⁸ What would be the Department's response to loaded questions in the form of advanced tax rulings possibly, in respect of this topic?

⁵⁷⁹ 84 D.T.C. 1089

vesting wouldn't have been held to be indefeasible and the testator would not be able to benefit from Sec. 70(6). If the daughter would have purchased the property on the 61st day after death through a voluntary sale by the estate then there wouldn't have been any problem since indefeasible vesting would have occurred.

In *Mr. Lucky v. M.N.R.*⁵⁸⁰ *Mr. Lucky*⁵⁸¹, a 47 year old gentleman, married an 84 year old woman one month prior to her death, but, a few days after the marriage⁵⁸² the deceased made a will whereby Mr. Lucky was to receive the entirety of her estate as executor and beneficiary, whereafter she "passed away". The deceased's two cousins wished to have the validity of the will challenged on the presumption that Mr. Lucky had exerted "undue influence" on the deceased when she made her will.⁵⁸³ The negotiations between the solicitors of Mr. Lucky and the cousins resulted in the cousins dropping the allegations reported in the affidavits filed in Surrogate Court against the will, after they had received $225,000 from Mr. Lucky. The Minister charged that the estate had thus not been indefeasibly vested in Mr. Lucky, a requirement of Sec. 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act in that Mr. Lucky had to pay the $225,000 to secure claim and escape the "shark attack". Maurice Boisvert Q.C., of the Tax Review Board provided that:

"The fact that persons, by way of affidavits were threatening to attack the validity of the marriage and of the will does not preclude the sole heir from being vested with the property which passed at the death of his wife. From the moment the will was probated the appellant had an absolute title to the estate. He had the right to use it at his discretion. It was vested indefeasibly and he did not need to wait six months before establishing his title. There was nothing in the will which could render his vested property defeasible. He took possession of the property. Since his property could have been alienated for any purpose he was free to compromise with the frustrated heirs who were living in the United States. That compromise consisted not in a deal from the estate's property but from his own property...", thus the whole estate gained the Sec. 7(1)(b) exemption. The exemption was gained by the sole reason that the transfer of $225,000 was a voluntary payment made by Mr L. that was not an equitable charge placed on the estate becoming vested in the sole heir. The fact that the provision for such a payment was not foreseen in the will is critical in that it did not place an obligation upon the spouse, as a condition of acceptance of the devise, to make a payment to the other heirs which would have resulted in only the net amount (net of the $225,000) of the estate gaining the Sec. 7(1)(b) exemption. Subsection 105(1) would most likely be applied if this situation occurred today since the frustrated heirs could be found not to have an interest in the estate and what they received was a benefit in respect of an estate other than which related to a capital interest held by them or that had not yet been included in computing their income. If they are not resident Sec. 105(1) would not apply while if they were the taxation of that receipt, at full inclusion, would be harsh. If a condition precedent or subsequent is placed on the vesting of the bequest then it is only when that condition is extinguished that vesting indefeasibly will occur.

Is there a requirement that the beneficial title to the testamentary property vest indefeasibly in the spousal party within the 36 month period or is the requirement only that the spousal party must have acquired an indefeasible right to that legal title within that time period? Obviously on a strict reading of the provision in Sec. 70(6) the property must have been transferred to the spousal party however is it the legal or beneficial ownership that must be transferred and recognized as indefeasibly vested? In I.T. 437 the Department is of the opinion that the Act applies on beneficial rather than legal ownership basis and thus in respect of Sec. 70(6) is it possible for only the beneficial ownership of a property to be transferred to the spouse or spousal trust, with the legal ownership held by some other party and still have the subsection apply, (if the beneficial ownership is indefeasibly vested)? In the author's opinion surely such an arrangement will not run afoul of Sec. 70(6) requirements, especially given the Department's opinion expressed in I.T. 449, para. 1, previously

580 72 D.T.C. 1369

581 who was so in two respects and not in one

582 being apparently the first available time

583 Try not to think about how. ...and you thought a book on income taxation of trusts was going to be boring, well "You'll never know what you'll find!"

commented on.⁵⁸⁴ If this is the case, as the author thinks it is given the expression of Departmental opinion, then it would be possible, under a will, to transfer legal ownership of property to one party and beneficial ownership to the spousal party, satisfying the Sec. 70(6) provision, and thus utilize a non-spousal trust setting. If the holding trust was personal then the spousal party could dispose of its beneficial ownership, (as a form of a capital interest), and through playing around with the composition of the property in the trust, in light of Sec. 108(1)(d), adjust the beneficial ownership/capital interest cost amount arbitrarily thus allowing the spousal party to greatly benefit from the application of Sec. 107(1) and reduce its capital gain otherwise recognizable, had it disposed of the legal title to the property.

If the Department flags this as offensive due to the fact that the legal title hasn't been transferred to the spousal trust in this case, then the will could create a spousal trust which instills a special power of appointment in a trustee allowing him to set up a sub-trust out of trust property, again having the spousal characteristics. Since such a transfer may not cause a change in beneficial ownership with respect to the particular property the recognition of a disposition could be avoided when property is transferred via an exercise. There may be solid grounds to argue that the exercise of a special power of appointment will create a capital interest the distribution in satisfaction of which would be subject to Sec. 107(4).

The interest in the sub-trust taken back by the spouse could be disposed of in the same way; the reduction of the tax consequences of which would depend on the nature of the property appointed to the trust. In both instances indefeasible vesting has occurred while in the latter, legal and beneficial title has been transferred to the spousal trust, though in respect of certain appointed property, obviously it has not been retained.

Whether or not a property vests indefeasibly in a spouse or a spousal trust where there is an implied contingency in the gift is a question of fact measured from the intention of the testator. It is possible for the trust to provide for the accumulation of income for a period of years however the spouse must be entitled to receive it during her life and the basis of her entitlement may be deferred and contingent on various events. In *The Queen v. Green Estate*⁵⁸⁵, a case involving Sec. 7(1)(c) of the Estate Tax Act⁵⁸⁶, a testatrix set up a trust whereunder the trustees were given discretionary power to use capital or income for the advancement and education of the offspring while it also provided:

"When there shall no longer be any child of mine living and under the age of 21 years, to divide the said residue of my estate or the amount thereof remaining among my children then alive in equal shares per stirpes."

With respect to the above clause the Minister contended that the gifts were contingent and conditional on the children attaining the age when the personal representatives attempted to elect for Sec. 7(1)(c), (similar to 70(6)), treatment. The trust property did not vest indefeasibly in the children within 6 months as required by the statute. Smith, D.J., of the Trial Division commented on one of the primary rules of interpretation, quoting from Williams on Executors and Administrators, 12 ed. pg. 791:

"Where the bequest is in terms immediate, and the payment alone postponed, the legacy is vested." and then went on to provide:

"There are no words of immediate gift to the children. There is a provision for the trustees to use the income from the residue of the estate of the testatrix any amount or amounts of the capital that their trustees deem advisable for the advancement and education of the children or of one or more of them, in such proportions and in such manner as the trustees in their absolute discretion consider advisable. This does not vest any ascertainable parts of the income, nor any share of the capital in any child. In fact there are no words of gift to the children at any time until the youngest of them who survives to the age of 21 attains that age. At that date the trustees are directed to divide the residue, including accumulation of unused income, among the children then surviving in equal shares." "...As the will contains no immediate gift to the children I am unable to say that the first rule, quoted above from Williams, can be invoked to hold that the children's rights to the residue became vested on the death of the testatrix."

Continuing on with the second rule of determining immediate or postponement of vesting Smith D.J. quoted 584 Property will be considered to vest indefeasibly in a beneficiary under a trust, as per the terms of a will, where ultimate and absolute ownership is that of the beneficiary and cannot be defeated in any way.

585 78 D.T.C. 6324 (FCTD)

586 being considerably similar to Sec. 70(6) of the ITA with respect to vesting requirements from Williams:

"If the words "payable" or "to be paid" are omitted, and the legacy is given at twenty-one, or if, when, in case, or provided the legatee attains twenty-one, or "on" his attaining that age, or any other future definite period, this confers on him a contingent interest, which depends for its vesting, and its transmissibility to his executors or administrators, on his being alive at the period specified."

"This rule states conditions very similar to what is said in clause 3(c) of the will in the present case. As we have seen, in this case there is no word of gift, such as "bequest" or "give", in relation to the children with payment to take place at a later date. The only words from which a gift to them can be discovered are found in the direction to divide the residue among the children in equal shares at the time indicated in the clause, viz: "when there shall be no longer be any children of mine living and under the age of twenty-one years." To my mind these words have precisely the same meaning as "when the youngest of my children who survive to the age of twenty-one years has attained that age." Stated in this form the legacy would seem clearly to fall within the rule."

As per Williams as quoted by Smith D.J.:

"When a testator bequeaths a legacy to a person at a future time, and either gives him an intermediate interest, or directs it to be applied for his benefit, the Court then considers the disposition of the interest to be an indication of the testator's intention that the legatee should at all events have the principle, and on this ground holds such legacies to be vested."

However the Judge could not find an indication of how this exception could apply in the case. After examining applicable case law authority on interpretation of wills concerning early vesting he concluded, appropriately:

"There is no gift of anything to all or any of the children prior to the date at which distribution is to take place, except for what the trustees in their absolute discretion may use, of income or capital, for the advancement and education of the children or one or more of them. Until the date of distribution the residuary estate is to remain one whole fund, to which any unused income is to be added...The date for dividing the residue among the children is "when there shall be no longer any child of mine living under the age of twenty-one years". There is further contingency, because the division is to be in equal shares to the children then alive who are to share and who they will be cannot be determined until the time for division has arrived."

When the trust is created the spouse must be entitled to receive the income accumulated or otherwise and her right thereto must be vested and indefeasible at that time.

In *Lewis Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁸⁷ a testator directed under his will:

"(6) To give my wife all the rents and profits from my farm on Lot 8 and part of Lot 9, Concession 11, Township of McGillvray, until my grandson Todd Lewis reaches the age of twenty years old.

(7) To convey my farm on Lot 8 and part of Lot 9, Concession 11 Township of McGillvray, to my grandsons Terry David Lewis and Todd Lewis when Todd Lewis reaches the age of twenty years on the condition that they pay the sum of $1000 to their sister Bonnie."

and the when executors attempted to claim the Sec. 70(9) tax free testamentary roll-over treatment, which is identical with Sec. 70(6) with respect to indefeasible vesting, the Minister contended that such vesting in the grandsons had not occurred due to their interest being contingent, not only on the grounds that they were not to receive it until that time but also incidentally that the $1,000 payment would have to be made in order for the conveyancing to occur. They also contended that "vested indefeasibly" in the Sec. 70(9) context (identical to the use in Sec. 70(6)), means vested in possession and not simply vested in interest or transmissibility. The executors contended that the property had vested indefeasibly in the grandsons within the 36 month time limit, and that vesting in possession was not required. They also contended that in any case vesting occurred in the grandsons without contingency as per subsection 9(1) of the Ontario Estate Administration Act, R.S.O. 1980, Ch. 143 within three years of death by virtue of them being beneficially entitled irrespective of whether the legal title vested in the personal representatives in common law or devolved directly to them. Kempo, T.C.J. was unable to interpret the grandsons' rights as laid out in the will as being contingent upon their attaining any age: quoting from Re: Traill⁵⁸⁸ he provided:

"Each gift begins with these words: "I bequeath also the following sums viz," which words are followed by such words as "May Hamilton one thousand dollars their only son one thousand dollars on his becoming of age." Without any great stretching of interpretation in favour of immediate vesting, may it not be considered that the first words make an immediate gift and that the subsequent limiting words have reference to the time when the legatee shall receive the gift?"

"... There is no expressed gift-over in contemplation of Todd's death before he attains 20 years of age, and accordingly it has been shown by the terms and words used in the Will that the vested interest acquired by the grandsons on the testator's death was intended to be divested upon Todd's demise prior to the conveyance date. In this situation if either of the grandsons died before Todd reached 20 years of age had he lived, their respective interests would descend to their respective heirs-in-law."

The Judge further commented upon the appellant's contention that under Sec. 9(1) of the Estate Administration Act vesting had occurred spontaneously within three years in the grandsons:

"Dealing with Appellant Counsel's argument that Subsection 9(1) of the Estates Administration Act supra, would resolve the vesting matter, it is my opinion that it is not applicable here. The opening words of that provision encompass real property "not disposed of". However here there has been a disposition of the farm property by the Will itself. That disposition was as to an indefeasible vesting of an interest in fee simple to the grandsons, the disposition being one in civil law as a vested legacy debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro, subject only to a fixed-term tenancy in favour of the widow."

With respect to the Minister's submission that the property must both vest indefeasibly and in possession the Court held:

" Further, I am unable to rule out the conclusion that an indefeasible vesting of an interest in real property given by a will is sufficient to satisfy Parliament's intent in subsection 70(9) of the Act given the terminology "devolus irrevocablement" used in the French text. I believe this phraseology incorporates the aforesaid classic meaning to be that of vested indefeasibly in interest in circumstances where that vesting is not defeasible under the terms of the Will by any other person having a right, contingent or otherwise, to the subject farm property. This is especially so where there is no gift-over provision in the Will.⁵⁸⁹

If Respondent's counsel's further interpretative argument is correct concerning the coexistence of two circumstances, that is of conveyance (ie; transfer or distribution) and of vesting indefeasibly (ie; in possession), then no fiscal roll-over could be had where a trust will for infants was involved, with the exception perhaps of where a trust is terminable under the principles of Saunders v. Vautier, (1841) Cr. & Ph. 240, 41 E.R. 482, and then only when such was accomplished within the prescribed fiscal time constraints because the winding up of a trust is not normally regarded as an administrative act or function qua the beneficiaries."⁵⁹⁰

588 (1927) 32 O.W.N. 449

589 English law provides that "vest" means "vested in interest" though not necessarily in possession: See Halsbury's 4th Ed., Vol. 50, para. 588, though as per Marks v. Trustees, Exors. and Agency Co. Ltd., 77 C.L.R. 497, the context in which the word is used determines how it will be construed. The Law of Real Property, (1975) 4th Ed. by Megarry and Wade provides:

"An interest is "vested in possession" when it gives the right of present enjoyment; but of course it is not then a future interest. If it is vested in interest but not in possession (for which situation the term "vested" is ordinarily used by itself) it is a "future interest", since the right of enjoyment is postponed, yet it is also an already subsisting right in property vested in its owner: it is a present right to future enjoyment. By contrast with a vested interest, a contingent interest is one which will give no right at all unless some future event happens".

In Re: Legh's Settlement Trusts, 1938 1 Ch. 39, at 52, McKinnon J. held:

"...a future estate or interest is vested when there is person who has an immediate right to that interest upon the cessation of the present or previous interest. But a future interest is contingent if the person to whom it is limited remains uncertain until the cessation of the previous interest."

590 One of the most surprising opinions of the Court came by way of the finding that the condition of the payment of the ancillary bequest to "Bonnie", (the $1,000 amount), was not a condition on the gift itself rather only on its ultimate delivery of legal title:

"There being no specific divestiture to be found in the will itself, expressly or by implication, it is reasonable to infer from a contextual reading of the testator's words in light of the will as a whole, that the payment of the bequest to Bonnie was intended merely as a condition precedent to the conveyance of the legal title to the grandsons and that it was not intended to operate as a condition precedent to the very gift itself such as to render it contingent on its entirety, either ab initio or at the date of distribution or transfer of the legal title by the

There must be an indefeasible vesting of the interest in the property in its ultimate recipient only, in the author's opinion, in order for Sec. 70(6) to apply.

A Very Limited and Focused Definition of Indefeasibly Vested for Spousal Capture

"Vested indefeasibly – Sec. 248(9.2)"

248 (9.2) For the purposes of this Act, property shall be deemed not to have vested indefeasibly

(a) in a trust under which a taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner is a beneficiary, where the trust is created by the will of the taxpayer, unless the property vested indefeasibly in the trust before the death of the spouse or common-law partner; and

(b) in an individual (other than a trust), unless the property vested indefeasibly in the individual before the death of the individual.⁵⁹¹

Subsection 248(9.2) now captures instances where the spouse under a spousal trust dies out from underneath it before the property vests in it thus allowing the property to avoid a FMV deemed disposition under Sec. 104(4). Without it it would be possible to argue that the property is still being transferred to a spousal trust under the pretence of Sec. 70(6) allowing it for tax-free roll-over though if the spouse died under the trust the trust would still not own the property at that time subjecting it to a Sec. 104(4) FMV disposition, allowing it to be owned for a considerable period of time before accrued tax consequences are recognized. The provision recognizes only trusts created by wills since a court order made under a family maintenance Act et cetera can be read as being read back into the will and thus allows it to qualify.

"Narrow" Indefeasible Vesting and the Relief Acts.

Boger Estate v. The Queen⁵⁹² provides excellent analysis of the effect of relief - family law legislation in respect of general and specific devises directed at alternate parties. In this case farm property was bequeathed, as a residue, to offspring and the spouse made an application under the Alberta Family Relief Act for a larger chunk of the estate. The court order granting her more property was made 29 months after the date of death and the Minister contended that the offsprings' interest in the property was not indefeasibly vested until the application under the Relief Act had been settled since until that time an order to redirect the ownership of the property to the spouse could be made. The submissions by the parties as stated by Jerome A.C.J. are:

"The plaintiff submits that the Property had "vested indefeasibly" in the children, notwithstanding the spouse's application under the Family Relief Act. As "vesting" is a concept known in Equity, equitable concepts must be applied to determine its meaning. Accordingly, the Plaintiff submits that an interest is "vested indefeasibly" if the gift is not contingent upon a condition precedent or subject to a condition subsequent or determining event. The statutory power to re-arrange beneficial interests as found in the Family Relief Act is irrelevant to the concept of "vested indefeasibly" in that, according to the common law of real property, an interest which has vested can only be defeasible if there is a condition subsequent contained in the document creating the interest. The Plaintiff submits that if this were not the case, the mere existence of dependent relief legislation, or any other statutory power to re-arrange beneficial interests (such as expropriation and municipal taxation statutes which provide for the forfeit of property in the event of a failure to pay municipal property taxes), would defeat the vested interest whether or not an application is made. Thus no roll-over would ever be available to a deceased taxpayer.

The Plaintiff states that the fact that in Hillis the widow's interest under the provincial succession legislation personal representatives."

For the Green and Tait cases it should be obvious that when bequeathing property the terms used should definitely avoid the inference of a contingent gift, while there is room to structure a contingency, if need be, in that a 3 year vesting period is provided for.

591 See "Vested Indefeasibly: Its Importance for Tax Purposes" by Catherine Brown in The Canadian Tax Journal.

592. 91 D.T.C. 5506 FCTD

could not be reduced by an order under the dependant's relief legislation was not critical to the Court's determination that such interest had vested indefeasibly. The Saskatchewan Dependant's Relief Act is extraordinary in that corresponding legislation in other provinces does not contain a similar provision maintaining that a widow's portion is irreducible. thus, if irreducibility were the test for indefeasibly, then roll-overs under the Income Tax Act would only be available to widows in Saskatchewan. similarly, because provincial dependant relief legislation does not grant an irreducible share to children, no roll-overs could ever operate in favour of children.

If, however, the dependant relief legislation is deemed to have the same effect as a condition subsequent, the Plaintiff submits that the children are entitled to the roll-over with respect to the property which they actually received and which was not affected by the Order. Because only successful application under the Family Relief Act is operative to divest the beneficiaries of their interests under the original will, the Order does not affect the remaining portion of the property left to the Children. Therefore, the roll-over applies to the Property not affected by the Order as it was always vested in the children and remains so even after the Order. the Plaintiff suggests that if, as in Hillis, the widow was not vested with the incremental property until the actual date of the Order, it must follow that the children were not divested of their interest therein until the same date.

The Defendant submits that even if the Property had vested in the beneficiaries immediately upon the death of the Taxpayer, it was not capable of "vesting indefeasibly" until the application was settled and an Order was issued under the Alberta family Relief Act within the time limits set out in s. 70(9). Although the children acquired rights to the residue under the terms of the will, the particulars of those rights were not ascertained until after the Court order was made. The Family Relief Act allows a dependant to make an application within six months of the grant of probate of a will and provides that, upon notice of the application to the executor, the distribution of the estate shall not proceed otherwise than in accordance with the Act. By virtue of s. 5, the Court has power to divest title to property left to a beneficiary under a will. Therefore, the Defendant submits that, in Alberta, property can only vest indefeasibly in a beneficiary either upon the expiry of the six month period where no application has been made or upon Court order. Until then, the children do not have a specific or certain interest in the Property."

The indefeasible vesting of the property interest can only arise due to the terms of the documents creating it as goes the argument but in the case of buy-sell agreements this is clearly not the case since the interest of the beneficiary in the shares is not limited anywhere in the will: previously effected and quite separate aspects have been created that may not be disclosed of anywhere in the will. As stated, unless an actual order is made to divest the offsprings' interest their entitlement to the property is indefeasible on the moment of death as created under the testamentary disposition however, in the author's opinion, this must be qualified in that excessive debt may require the property's disposition for proceeds in which case the interest surely isn't vested indefeasibly, regardless of the purported rights expressed in the will, until provision for the debt is made and the executor assents to the disposition. As the argument went, a Relief Act court order can redirect the course of ownership of the estate property however until such an order is made, independent of the terms of the will, the interest remains indefeasibly vested. Obviously this follows the taxpayer's contention that effectively if all legislation is to be taken into consideration in evaluating the interest's indefeasibility few would be established and "the narrow" meaning of "indefeasible vesting", the interest resulting from the specific terms of the particular disposition, is to be followed. The Trial Court held this appropriate concluding:

"A vested interest is liable to be defeated or "defeasible" if it is subject to a condition subsequent or determinable limitation. There is ample authority for the proposition that the condition or limitation must be contained in the grant. For instance, in Oosterhoff & Rayner, Anger & Honsberger on Real Property (2nd Ed.) (Canada Law Book, 1985), p. 125 it is stated that "[a] condition subsequent is created by the addition of a condition to a grant which may cut the estate short at the instance of the grantor." It thus appears that to be vested "indefeasibly" an interest must not be subject to a condition subsequent or a determinable limitation set out in the grant.

Here, the interest in the Property is unquestionably vested: there is no condition precedent to be fulfilled before the gift can take effect; the children; the persons entitled to it, are ascertained; and, they are ready to take possession forthwith, there being no prior interest in existence. The children's' vested interest is also not defeasible as it is not subject to a condition subsequent contained in the will. Clearly the Taxpayer has not otherwise restricted the children's' right to retain, deal with, or sell the Property, as they have done in this instance. The interest is then "vested indefeasibly" in accordance with the ascribed meanings of the terms. This is consistent with the decision of Clement, D.J. in Hillis, that upon the death of the intestate, the provisions of the Intestate Succession Act become operative and effect an indefeasible vesting in the beneficiary of the interest provided therein.

Here, the children's' property interest under the Will, as amended by the Order, had vested indefeasibly in accordance with s. 70(9). An application under dependant relief legislation, of course, may result in a transfer of the interest away from the children. Nevertheless, if as held by Clement, D.J. and Pratte, J. in Hillis, additional property received pursuant to an order under dependent relief legislation, does not vest until the actual date of the order, it follows here that the children are not divested of their interest therein until that date as well. Thus, the interest given to the children under the Will that is not affected by the Order must certainly be found to have been vested indefeasibly in the children."

There are a couple of weaknesses in the above comments one of which is that there appears to be no recognition of Finance's intention when they extended the vesting period from 15 to 36 months and from 6 to 15 months prior to that and in Hillis it was noted that the Revenue authorities did recognize that the provincial legislation relating to the devolution of property was to govern the applicability of Sec. 70(6). The fact that Sec. 70(6) was amended after the Hillis appeal to extend the vesting date to 36 months would seem to suggest that the Department was concerned with the tardiness of orders granted under dependent/family relief legislation and that the provincial laws should govern the effect of Sec. 70(6). It is questionable whether a court would find indefeasible vesting in an instance where the testator directed that his residue be transferred to his offspring etc. when massive inter vivos tax liabilities would prevent the executor from assenting to the disposition and instead disposing of property to extinguish them.

While "common" definitions of the term "indefeasible vesting" are to be adhered to in applying the provision in its context such would include not just the classic definitions dealing with real property, but also normal meanings derived from popular usage and it's doubted whether anyone familiar with estate practice or otherwise would be satisfied that a property interest is indefeasibly vested when statutory law could operate to specifically divest it as an objective from its preconceived recipient. In the author's opinion vesting indefeasibly plainly doesn't occur until the time limits for making applications under all of the relevant legislation that could redirect the beneficial entitlements has passed. This is regardless of whether applications are in fact made and this is still a very functional definition of the term within the context of Sec. 70(6) (or the other roll-overs). If the "narrow" definition were adhered to very few interests would not be indefeasibly vested within the context of the provision and when fairly common court orders redirect the ownership to alternate recipients the application of Sec. 70(6) would be obtained "illegitimately". Essentially everything could be given to the spouse followed with immediate application under the dependant's relief statutes and the entire estate would gain Sec. 70(6) treatment even though a substantially reduced amount of it would remain for the spouse after the appropriate order. By extending the vesting date in Sec. 70(6) so that the family law/dependant relief legislation can be fully applied the provision's availability to the appropriate circumstances is more ensured. It is suspected that this was one of the underlying reasons for the extension, (and the possibility of the extension in the time in which proof of vesting can be provided for that matter). The Trial Court's evaluation lacks the concern for policy as well as intention of the Department was indicated in the wording of Sec. 70(6), (as well as certain other provisions in the Act and their relation to Sec. 70(6)).

Subject: Meaning of "Vested Indefeasibly"

IT-449R Date: September 25, 1987

This bulletin replaces and cancels IT-449 dated June 13, 1980. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

Summary

This bulletin deals with the meaning of the expression "vested indefeasibly" used in provisions of the Act which deal with the rollover of certain properties from one taxpayer to another. The bulletin also includes comments concerning requirements that must be met before the provisions referred to above can apply. Examples are given describing some circumstances in which the issue of whether property has vested indefeasibly is relevant.

1. The Act does not define the term "vested indefeasibly". Accordingly, the meaning of this term must be construed within the context of the provisions where it is used. In all the provisions indicated above "vested indefeasibly" refers to the unassailable right to ownership of a particular property that, in consequence of death of the owner, has been transferred or distributed either to a spouse, a spouse trust or a child of the deceased. In the Department's view a property vested indefeasibly in a spouse or child of the deceased when such a person obtains a right to absolute ownership of that property in such a manner that such right cannot be defeated by any future event, even though that person may not be entitled to the immediate enjoyment of all the benefits arising from that right. Where property is held in trust for the benefit of one or more persons it is the Department's view that such property normally vests indefeasibly in the trust and not in a beneficiary thereof. However, where the Department is satisfied that a property is held in trust solely to carry out the terms of a will under which the ultimate and absolute ownership of that property is bequeathed to a particular individual and the trust arrangement is such that the individual's ownership rights cannot be defeated by any future event and no other person has any right whatsoever to an immediate or future benefit from that property or that trust, the property will be considered to vested indefeasibly in that individual.

2. Property is considered to vested indefeasibly in the person to whom it is bequeathed when that person has an enforceable right or claim to the ownership thereof. This will be so even though the formal legal conveyance and registration of ownership of the property has not been completed. Accordingly, the ownership of property described in a specific bequest in a will will vest in the beneficiary immediately after the death of the testator. The ownership of property emanating out of a non-specific bequest will vest in the beneficiary when such property has been identified and the beneficiary has a binding right to receive it.

Note: In the following paragraphs, references to subsections 70(9.4), (9.5) and descriptions of requirements thereunder are applicable only with respect to transfer and dispositions made before 1988. Subsections 70(9.4) and (9.5) were repealed with respect to transfer and dispositions made after 1987 as a consequence of the introduction of the lifetime capital gains deduction.

3. The rollover provisions in subsections 70(5.2), (6), (9) and (9.2) of the Act and ITAR 26(18) (as well as 70(9.4) of the Act with respect to transfers and dispositions occurring before 1988) will apply

(a) with respect to deaths occurring after 1984 if, within the period of 36 months after the death of a taxpayer it can be shown that property owned by the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death has, on or after the taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof (see 4 below), been transferred or distributed and has become vested indefeasibly in the transferee or distributee described in the relevant subsection. (If the Minister considers it reasonable in the circumstances, a period longer than 36 months may be allowed if requested in writing by the deceased's legal representative before the end of the 36 month period following the date of the taxpayer's death), and

(b) with respect to deaths occurring before 1985 if the property can, within 15 months after the death of the taxpayer or such longer period as is reasonable, be established to have become vested indefeasibly within 15 month period in the transferee or distributee described in the relevant subsection. However, with respect to a death occurring after 1981 and before 1985, the longer period for vesting, as described in (a) above, was available with respect to the deceased's property provided that the deceased's legal representative and each person to whom an interest in the property was transferred or distributed as a consequence of the death of the deceased had jointly elected on or before January 27, 1986 to have such longer period apply. The period of time allowed for vesting (including any approved extension tot hat period) as described in this paragraph is referred to hereafter as "the relevant vesting period".

4. Subsection 248(8) applies to transfers, distributions and acquisitions occurring after 1981. This subsection provides that a transfer, distribution or acquisition of property shall be deemed to have occurred as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer where such transfer, distribution or acquisition was made

(a) pursuant to the terms of a will or other testamentary instrument of the taxpayer or of the application of provincial statutory provisions governing intestate succession (in this bulletin referred to as "intestate succession provisions") to the estate, or

(b) as a consequence of a disclaimer, release or surrender by a person who was a beneficiary under a will or other testamentary instrument of the taxpayer or under intestate succession provisions.

Subsection 248(8) also provides that where a beneficiary under a will or other testamentary instrument of a taxpayer or on the intestacy of a taxpayer, release or surrenders any property that was property of the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death, such release or surrender shall not be considered to be a disposition of that property by the beneficiary provided that such release or surrender is made within the relevant vesting period.

5. The rollover provisions in subsections 70(9.1), 70(9.3)(as well as 70(9.5) with respect to transfers and dispositions of property that occur before 1988) apply only where

- (a) property has been transferred by a taxpayer to a spouse trust described in subsection 70(6) or 73(1),
- (b) the taxpayer's child is a capital beneficiary of the spouse trust and resident in Canada immediately before the death of the spouse, and
- (c) the property has, upon and as a consequence of the death (see 4 above) of the spouse, been transferred or distributed to and become vested indefeasibly in a child of the taxpayer. (This vesting requirements contrasts with the longer period of time permitted for the vesting of property under subsections 70(5.2), (6), (9) and (9.2) of the Act and ITAR 26(18).)

6. Where a taxpayer dies with or without a will and the taxpayer's assets are allocated by the legal representatives among the beneficiaries within the relevant vesting period in accordance either with discretions in the will or with intestate succession provisions, there is no requirement that property be left specifically to a particular beneficiary either under the will or by operation of the intestate succession provisions for those subsections to apply. The fact that the legal representatives exercised discretion in allocating assets among beneficiaries does not diminish the fact that the beneficiaries obtained the assets as a consequence of the deceased's death.

7. Where ownership of the deceased's property passes to a person pursuant to a court order given under a statute such as a dependents' relief Act or family law Act, it is the Department's position that ownership of such property for purposes of subsection 70(6), (9), (9.2) and (9.4) of the Act and ITAR 26(18) will be considered to vested indefeasibly in that person within the relevant vesting period provided that the court order is actually given within that period. Generally where an application has been made to a court under a dependents' relief Act or a family law Act and within the aforementioned period of 36 months an application is made to the Minister for an extension of time the fact that the application to the court is pending would mean that a delay in the vesting of the property until the judgment of the court is received would be regarded as reasonable in the circumstances.

8. The following examples describe some circumstances in which the issue of whether property has vested indefeasibly is relevant:

- (a) A man who wishes to ensure that the absolute ownership of his farm land will ultimately pass to his child after his widow has had the use of the property during her lifetime, could achieve this result by the terms of his will as follows:
 - (i) he could direct his executors to convey the land to his widow as life tenant and to his child as remainderman. This would not involve the use of a trust.
 - (ii) he could direct his executors to hold the land in a spouse trust for the use and enjoyment of his widow during her lifetime and, on her death to convey the land to his child.

Since (i) above does not involve a trust the provisions of paragraph 70(6)(b) do not apply. It is the department's position that the farm land vested indefeasibly in the child in the death of the father. This same result would occur if it is a condition that the widow's interest in the land terminate on her remarriage.

Since the trust described in (ii) above is a spouse trust, if the entire interest in the land becomes indefeasibly vested in the trustees of the spouse trust within the relevant vesting period, the cost of the land to the trustees will be its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer. Upon the death of the widow if the land is transferred or distributed to the child and becomes vested indefeasibly in the child as a consequence of the widow's death and if the child was resident in Canada immediately before the widow's death, subsection 70(9.1) provides that there will be a rollover of the land from the trustees to the child at the adjusted cost base of the land to the trust.

- (b) Under the terms of his will, a man directs that his farm land be held in a spouse trust for his widow during her lifetime and, on her death, that it be transferred to those of his children who survive his widow.

Since the trust is a spouse trust, the trustees of the trust will acquire the land at its adjusted cost base to the deceased. If on the widow's death and as a consequence thereof the land becomes indefeasibly vested in those of the taxpayer's children who are then alive, the land will be rolled out of the trust to the children at its adjusted cost base to the trust pursuant to subsection 70(9.1).

- (c) Pursuant to the terms of a taxpayer's will, farm land is directed to be held in a trust for the benefit of the taxpayer's child, to be distributed to the child when the child reaches a specified age and, if the child should die before that age, to be distributed to the child's estate.

The Department considers that the property vested indefeasibly in the child at the time of the taxpayer's death. Whether the child on attaining the age of majority could demand the conveyance of the land even though the specified age had not been attained, will depend upon provincial law. If the taxpayer's will had provided that the land would be distributed to other persons, for example the taxpayer's grandchildren, if the child should die before attaining the specified age, the land would not vest indefeasibly in the child until the child attained the specified age.

- (d) A taxpayer by her will directs that certain shares owned by her immediately before her death are to be distributed to a beneficiary. The shares, however, are subject to a buy-sell agreement.

Where the terms of the buy-sell agreement provide that it is compulsory for the executor of the taxpayer's estate to sell and the other party to buy the shares, the shares will not be considered to vested indefeasibly in the beneficiary. Where, however, the terms of the buy-sell agreement merely give the other party an option to acquire the taxpayer's shares which may or may not be exercised and the taxpayer's executors transfer the shares to the beneficiary before the option is exercised, the shares will be considered to vested indefeasibly in the beneficiary at the time of the transfer. These same comments will apply where the beneficiary is a trust created by the taxpayer's will and the executors are also trustees of the trust.

If the taxpayer in her will directs her executors to sell shares before setting her estate, the shares will not be considered to vested indefeasibly in any beneficiary.

- (e) A taxpayer in her will directs that her farm land is to be transferred to her child but that before that happens a mortgage or charge is to be put upon the land in order to provide funds to satisfy bequests to other beneficiaries.

Notwithstanding the fact that title to the land is encumbered by the mortgage or charge, the land will be considered to vested indefeasibly in the child.

Dependent's Relief Acts

In *Bain's Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁹³ wherein a testator's residuary estate was tainted and thus not eligible for Sec. 7(1)(b) treatment under the old Estate Tax Act, (substantially similar to Sec. 70(6) of the ITA), the will had initially provided that the widow was to be paid all of the estate's income arising before her death, or time of remarriage, whichever came first thus clearly the estate was tainted under the Sec. 7(1)(b) conditions however the widow was successful, through an application under the B.C. Testator's Family Maintenance Act, in obtaining the court order providing that the will should not be read with the remarriage clause, thus cleansing the tainted trust. The Tax Review Board found, upon the question of whether the amended estate would qualify for Sec. 7(1)(b) treatment:

"It seems also that the provisions of the B.C. Testator's Family Maintenance Act (which in substance part of which became the present Wills Variation Act) gave the Court the right to change or alter the will for the benefit of the widow of the deceased, and that the court did do so in this case... To me it would make no sense to read the provision of the Provincial Statute if one did not read them in the light of their application to the will as of the date of death, and that the Order and the Will should be read as one, in which case the result has to be an altered testamentary document and one which would meet the requirements of Section 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act..."

593. 75 D.T.C. 135 (TRB)

It is only due to the fact that a court order obtained under an appropriate provincial dependent support/relief statute can be construed as altering the very terms of a will that it may be accepted as a means of setting up a spousal trust, (or as in the above case, cleansing one). The order was made nunc pro tunc. Presently most Testator's Family Maintenance Acts (Manitoba: Sec. 12, N.B.: Sec. 11, N.S.: Sec. 10) provide that when an order is made under the Act the will will be deemed, for purposes of "succession duties" to have been executed with the variations in it for full effect from the time of death.⁵⁹⁴

In *Tassie Estate v. M.N.R.*⁵⁹⁵ the taxpayer left by her will the estate for the use of her widower but he in effect wasn't provided with an income interest and thus was not entitled to receive anything from the estate except the use of its property (a dwelling and incidentals). The widower required funds and petitioned the courts under the B.C. Testator's Family Maintenance Act whereby he was awarded an order calling for a $2,500 capital payment to him and a right to receive the net income of the estate until his death, (as well the will was altered to instill in the executor's a discretionary power of encroachment exercisable in respect of the widower). The order was made nunc pro tunc, (read to take effect at the date of death), and when the executor's attempted to have the favorable Sec. 7(1)(b) of the Estate Tax Act applied the Minister refused contending that the amended will created an estate that wasn't of the nature created by the taxpayer's will. The Tax Review Board found that the court order was to be read into the will thus the character of the amended will was to be regarded as that created by the original will, thus qualifying for Sec. 7(1)(b) treatment. If this were to occur again would the Minister not have a basis for assessing the widower as being entitled to enforce a distribution of income of the trust in those years in which the court order covered, so as to cause him to become liable for the income tax on the trust's income via Sec. 104(24)-(13)(a), regardless of whether it was paid to him or not? Since the court order operated retroactively it would cause him to be recognized as an absolute and immediately interested income beneficiary in those years thus exposing him to a tax liability. A retroactive dependent support/relief court order shouldn't qualify an estate/trust at the same time that it exposes the spouse to possible retroactive income inclusions. Following the reasoning in Hillis concerning the retroactivity of court orders, in the author's opinion, the beneficiary may not have to recognize a Sec. 104(13) income inclusion in a tax year during which he had no right to sue for the income's distribution. Will this change if the court offers retroactive income disbursements to the beneficiary? Not necessarily.⁵⁹⁶

"How trust created – 248(9.1)"

For the purposes of this Act, a trust shall be considered to be created by a taxpayer's will if the trust is created

(a) under the terms of the taxpayer's will; or

(b) by an order of a court in relation to the taxpayer's estate made under any law of a province that provides for the relief or support of dependants.

There isn't any need to have a trust created as a spousal trust "under the taxpayer's will" retain that characteristic indefinitely and it is entirely possible to have the trust varied so as to have offspring, new spouses, added as beneficiaries without endangering the previous application of Sec. 70(6). These variations however will not preclude the trust from being treated as a spousal trust in respect of two major subsequent events; the reoccurring deemed dispositions under Sec. 104(4), (5) and the Sec. 107(4) capital distribution provision, and of course they would cause implicit dispositions of various capital or income rights to be recognized by the former beneficiaries even if income to be accumulated following the spouse beneficiary's death is then to be payable currently following her death.

⁵⁹⁴ See Re: Bishop, 1952 V.L.R. 543, Union Fidelity Trustee Co. of Australia Ltd. v. Montgomery, 1976 1 N.S.W.L.R. 134, & McLeod v. Johns, 1981 1 N.S.W.L.R. 347, for instances where order did not vary terms of will but the benefit of the beneficiary was derived from the order.

⁵⁹⁵ 73 D.T.C. 180 (TRB)

⁵⁹⁶ See Tindal in Retroactive Income Entitlements for an instance when decretal order did not produce retroactive tax liability when made nunc pro tunc. See also C.I.R. v. Earl of Haddington, 8 T.C. 711, and Ford v. Nauts, 1928 1 U.S.T.C. 272.

If the testator's will grants a power of appointment over any of the residuary estate tainted spousal trust to the executor will he be able to exercise the power and create splinter settlements some of which will be purely spousal in character, and have Sec. 70(6) apply to the transfer? If a "general" unrestricted power of appointment is exercised so as to create a sub-trust then that sub-trust draws its creation from the exercise of the power, not from the terms of the initial settlement that instilled such a power in the exerciser and thus it is not to be "read back" into the original settlement and the trust cannot be a spousal trust created under the will. If the power of appointment is restricted, (special), so as to allow the exerciser to create spousal trusts with its use, then any spousal trust that results from its use will be read back into it, and considered as arising from, the original settlement.⁵⁹⁷ The fact that the special power of appointment arises from a tainted spousal trust and causes the sub-trust to be read back into that trust does not preclude the trust from arising as a consequence of the death and pursuant to the terms of the taxpayer's will when the tainted spousal trust is irrevocably terminated following the exercise. Obviously this can prove to be a major trust planning tool in that it allows the executor or trustee to decide whether extra spousal trusts should be set up, (and in many but not all instances "the more, the merrier"), or whether there will be a spousal trust at all arising out of an otherwise disqualified residuary estate. Understandably one would want to ensure the special power is based on the requirement that its exercise can only result in the creation of a trust with spousal characteristics for if it isn't so meticulously targeted there may be grounds to debate that the spousal character is a result of the exercisor's discretion, not the testator's secondary intention. Also, since the spousal sub-trust will be read back into the initial tainted trust there may be cause to provide that the sub-trust cannot ever rely in the initial trust's existence or provisions so as to cause it to be precluded from being merely another part of that tainted settlement.⁵⁹⁸

Family Law Act/Matrimonial Property Act Applications.

"Matrimonial regimes – Sec. 248(22)"

Sec. 248 (22) Where at any time property could, as a consequence of the dissolution of a matrimonial regime between 2 spouses or common-law partners, be the subject of a partition, for the purposes of this Act

(a) where that property was owned by one of the spouses or common-law partners immediately before it became subject to that regime and had not subsequently been disposed of before that time, it shall be deemed to be owned at that time by that spouse or common-law partner and not by the other spouse or common-law partner; and

(b) in any other case, the property shall be deemed to be owned by the spouse or common-law partner who has the administration of that property at that time and not by the other spouse or common-law partner.

"Dissolution of a matrimonial regime – Sec. 248(23)"

(23) Where, immediately after the dissolution of a matrimonial regime (other than a dissolution

⁵⁹⁷ See the chapter on Variation of Trusts and commentary on powers of appointment, advancement, encroachment. See Blausten v. I.R.C., 1972 1 All. E.R. 41 (C.A.) where a special power of appointment exercisable to create a sub-trust for the exclusive benefit of certain beneficiaries under the initial settlement allowed the trust setting to be cleansed of a power in the initial settlement, via the resettlement thereof, that would have caused income attribution. The power also would satisfy the Sec. 248(8)(a) requirements.

⁵⁹⁸ The Department has fostered a continual opinion that a spousal trust will gain from a Sec. 70(6) roll where: "the will directs the establishment and terms of a trust for a spouse and provides the executors with guidelines for identifying the properties which fall to the trust", where the trusts are created "but leaves the executor the discretion to select which assets are to be transferred to the trust to satisfy the specified total value of the assets or portion of the estate to be so transferred", or where the will creates the spousal trust "but leaves total discretion to the executor to select both the total value of and properties to be transferred to the trust". (T.I. 5-8832 of the F.I.D. in Nov. 1989). The same was provided in Feb. 1984 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division.

occurring as a consequence of death), the owner of a property that was subject to that regime is not the person, or the estate of the person, who is deemed by subsection 248(22) to have been the owner of the property immediately before the dissolution, the person shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have transferred the property to the person's spouse or common-law partner immediately before the dissolution.

"Transfers after death – Sec. 248(23.1)"

(23.1) Where, as a consequence of the laws of a province relating to spouses' or common-law partners'(sic) interests in respect of property as a result of marriage or common-law partnership, property is, after the death of a taxpayer,

(a) transferred or distributed to a person who was the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner at the time of the death, or acquired by that person, the property shall be deemed to have been so transferred, distributed or acquired, as the case may be, as a consequence of the death; or

(b) transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's estate, or acquired by the taxpayer's estate, the property shall be deemed to have been so transferred, distributed or acquired, as the case may be, immediately before the time that is immediately before the death.

Subsections 248(22)-(23.1) attends to situations where the spouse chooses to take property directly under a matrimonial property regime that recognizes his property rights and thus allows the property to benefit from a Sec. 70(6) roll-through. It does not, however, go the distance in creating a trust recognizable as created by the deceased, if the court so directs in the case of the creation of a trust in respect of the spouse.

If the spouse makes an election under the particular provincial Family Law or Matrimonial Property Act to take an "equalization payment" from the estate instead of any gifts to her a tax planned succession may be "blown to smithereens" unless such an election is properly planned for and attended to in contingency clauses. The result of such an election usually consists of the cash payment by the estate instantly, or spread out over many periods, to the spouse while in Ontario the amount of the payment is equal to 1/2 of the excess of the testator's increase in net worth since the time of marriage to the time of death over the same increase in respect of the spouse adjusted for debts owed by both parties. If the present fair market value of the gifts given to the spouse under the will exceed such the election shouldn't be made while if it is the estate may be faced with a serious liquidity problem and may have to dispose of property to satisfy the spouse's claim. One way of avoiding such a problem is to enter into a marriage contract which provides that the contemplated claims can be satisfied with the net fair market value of the estate property chosen by the executor so that the Sec. 70(6) roll-over will apply to it.⁵⁹⁹ (The Court can have very wide powers in choosing which property to vest in the spouse pursuant to an election though such may be restricted with marriage contracts.) The contract may also guarantee testamentary gifts equal to a certain value or in the most ideal case preclude the election from being made or certain property of the testator from being valued for purposes of the FLA. If this can't be done and the election route is sure to be taken the will could still create a spousal trust expressly out of property not used to satisfy the claim thus allowing Sec. 248(8) to recognize their passage to be as a consequence of the death whereunder property rolled to it could be incorporated with the trust taking back preferred shares and the non-spousal beneficiaries taking back dividend paying shares for nominal consideration.⁶⁰⁰ The spouse 599. See Swire v. Swire, 10 R.F.L. (3d) 399.

600 Additional spousal gifts in addition to the equalization election can be held valid in the face of an election as provided in Sec. 6(7) of the FLA though the income interest would be marginal and there is a danger a disgruntled spouse would disclaim it before the trust can be constituted to gain Sec. 70(6) roll-over treatment. In T.I. 5-910290 provided in Apr. 1991 by the F.I.D. it was provided that two spousal trusts may be created under a will and ancillary spousal F.L.A. application. It was provided:

"It is possible in our view for a spouse trust created under a will to co-exist with a spouse trust created by a court order under the FLA, but only in limited circumstances as explained in the following comments. Subsection 6(7) of the FLA would be entitled to the trust's income, which could be nil in most instances, while the tax free roll-over would apply and the beneficiaries could participate in the income generated.⁶⁰¹ All of the testator's property could be rolled this way for that matter.⁶⁰²

An equalization claim is not a creditor claim and continues to be a beneficiary claim, an obligation to pay, thus the assets of the estate could be distributed to the beneficiaries with the consent of the spouse on condition that the recipients pay the spouse a certain amount in settlement.⁶⁰³ In such a case the beneficiaries may recognize a capital loss on the distribution of the property under Sec. 107(2)(c) where the tax cost of the interest satisfied with the distribution was bumped up tax free, (such as in the case of the beneficiary becoming resident while the estate is non-resident). The tax cost of the property received via Sec. 107(2) will not be affected by the payment of the obligation⁶⁰⁴, while its cost amount will be bumped to its FMV.⁶⁰⁵

Another way to reduce the problem of liquidity is to give the executors the power to mortgage the property of the estate and then use the funds to satisfy the claim. If the cost amount of the interest has been bumped a subsequent assumption of the mortgage along with the receipt of the property may precipitate a capital loss to the beneficiary. In the extreme case the will could actually provide that upon the desire to elect that an annuity be set up out of the estate property, financed through the spousal trust, so that the present value of the future payments would exceed that of the present value of the equalization payment. This would eliminate such a desire.⁶⁰⁶ This may again seriously reduce the trust's liquidity but such could be structured via the spousal trust's incorporation of its Sec. 70(6) rolled assets for cumulative preferred shares so as to allow the beneficiaries to benefit to an extent greater than if she had chosen the equalization payment. The life expectancy of the elector is a consideration in valuing her life interest but not if upon her death a supplemental capital payment is made to her estate to increase the amount she ultimately realizes. In such an instance at least the testator could recognize a Sec. 70(6) roll.

If the spouse elects for the equalization payment she'll receive the property in the capacity of a beneficiary but with Sec. 248(23.1), she'll receive it as a consequence of the death, and not only as a consequence of the election.⁶⁰⁷ provides that where a surviving spouse elects to receive the entitlement under section 5 of the FLA, the gifts made to the spouse in the deceased taxpayer's will are revoked and the will shall be interpreted as if the surviving spouse had died first, unless the will expressly provides that the gifts are in addition to the entitlement under the FLA. It is therefore our view that a spouse trust created under a will can co-exist with a spouse trust created by a court order under the FLA only where the will provides that gifts to the surviving spouse thereunder are in addition to the spouse's entitlement under the FLA. The fact that the trustees might differ, or that the property of one trust might be located in a country different from that in which the property of the other trust is located, is in our view immaterial in and of itself." The same was provided in T.I. 901526 in March 1991 by the same Division. It was not asked in either case whether these two trusts would also be consolidated as one by virtue of Sec. 104(2) though it is arguable that they cannot be: there is a statutory allowance for the creation of the trust under the FLA as being created by the will of the taxpayer and when one asks what would happen if Sec. 70(6.1) didn't exist, and thus its need as recognized by the Department, the answer to consolidation is self-evident. Subsection 70(6.1) is targeted exclusively for purposes of Sec. 70(6) and 104(4) and nothing else: certainly not Sec. 104(2), and thus the two trusts are not created by the same individual.

601 Subsection 105(1) would not apply to the excessive dividends received since as per para. (a) therein the benefit is otherwise being included in computing the beneficiaries' incomes.

602 A substantial incentive for the spouse not to make the election can be an inter vivos trust previously created receiving life insurance proceeds realized on the death. Under it the spouse could have a contingent interest, to be vested if the election isn't made, whereby she receives the entire insurance proceeds or if she does make the election she gets no part of it and there's a gift over to the offspring. The inter vivos trust could be financed with cash contributions from the taxpayer, and could even receive inter vivos options to purchase critical assets with the insurance proceeds thus precluding the spouse from receiving them via an election.

603 Subparagraph 9(1)(b) of the FLA provides for this.

604 See Passant v. Jackson, 1985 S.T.C. 133.

605 The non-resident beneficiary should become resident prior to the spouse's M.P.A./F.L.A. application so as to achieve the maximum bump and this time period lasts only approx. 6 months after death. The equalization debt is deemed nunc pro tunc though such doesn't totally affect the value of the interest until the order is made.

606 In T.I. 5-7677 of Apr. 1989 the F.I.D. correctly provided that when an effort was made via executor, beneficiary and spousal agreement to have a will altered to increase the spouse's entitlement so as to avoid a FLA application the additional property would not gain Sec. 70(6) treatment (and the beneficiaries could be recognized to have realized a Sec. 107(1) disposition of their capital interests), however, if the will specifically provides for such without the consent of the beneficiaries Sec. 70(6) should apply to everything realized by the trust (or spousal trust).

607 Subsection 6(7) of the Ontario FLA provides that when the election is made the gifts made under the will will be revoked and the will will be read as if the elector predeceased the testator, while as per Sec. 6(11) the entitlement has virtual paramount status over other beneficial claims. It could be argued that the Sec. 70(6.1) trust created via prescribed

Severing Ownership Interests on the Roll-over.

Do all of the interests in a particular property have to be transferred or distributed to the spouse or spousal trust in order for Sec. 70(6) to apply to the capital element therein? Can the remainder interest in an income producing property be property subject to the Sec. 70(6) roll while the life interest of the property isn't transferred to the spousal party but can benefit from the Sec. 70(3) roll through or suffer from the Sec. 70(2) inclusion?⁶⁰⁸ orders made under legislation providing relief/support for dependents would include FLA trusts since the FLA does concern dependents as well as spouses on death while various other provinces' legislation are specifically targeted at providing support including support to the spouse as a dependant. Part III of the FLA concerns dependant support which qualifies the entire Act as dependant support legislation (though could it be argued that the Sec. 70(6.1)(b) reference to "law" be construed as to mean only parts of Acts)? This aspect was specifically addressed in T.I. 5-1744 provided in Oct. 1986 by the Small Business and General Division when it was held:

"It is our view that, in the absence of a reference to a specific provision of "a law of a province" in subsection 70(6.1) of the Act, the ordinary meaning of the word "law" is the law as a whole. Furthermore, paragraph 33(8)(d) of Part III (Support Obligations) of the FLA states "An order for the support of a spouse should relieve financial hardship, if this has not been done by orders under Parts I (Family Property) and II (Matrimonial Property)". It thus appears that the legislators of the FLA view Part I as providing relief in addition to equalizing net family property."

Various (but not all) provincial Dependant's Relief/Family Relief Acts provide expressly that the effects of an order awarded will be read into the will to adjust it nunc pro tunc for the purposes of succession duties and it could be argued that "succession duties" could include capital gains taxation arising on death since at the time the relevant Act was introduced Canada did not have testamentary capital gains taxation but succession duties. The effect of the order nunc pro tunc will cause the Sec. 248(8)(a) targeting to be complete, however some dependant's relief legislation do not make statutory nunc pro tunc orders in which case if a direct payment to the spouse is awarded the testator will not gain Sec. 70(6) treatment in respect of it.

CRA has taken a remarkably lenient position with respect to the results of a FLA order where property is transferred to the spouse directly. In the recent T.I. 901526 rendered in March 1991 by the F.I.D. it was stated as follows:

"The Department has taken the position that the revocation of any gifts in a will in consequence of the FLA election will constitute a disclaimer for purposes of section 248(8)(b) of the Act such that subsection 70(6)(a) of the Act will apply to any particular properties transferred to the surviving spouse in satisfaction of the election. The Department is prepared to apply this interpretation where the property is transferred in satisfaction of the elected FLA entitlement, and the transfer is made under court order. The Department is not prepared to allow this treatment to any transfers in excess of the elected amount or those that are not made in consequence of an application to the court."

This opinion was also provided in T.I. 5-902013 of Oct. 1990 provided by the F.I.D. provided vesting occurred within the 36 month period. It was also provided in T.I. 5-7677 in Apr. 1989 by the F.I.D.:

"However, if the widow elects to receive property under sections 5 and 6 of the Family Law Act, the property transferred to her would be in consequence of the death of X and would be eligible for the roll-over under Sec. 70(6) of the Act. It is our view that an election to receive under the Family Law Act is an act by which the widow refuses to accept the estate conveyed to her by will and constitutes a disclaimer under the will. Paragraph 248(8)(b) of the Act states that a transfer of property as a consequence of a disclaimer, release or surrender by a person who was a beneficiary under the will or other testamentary instrument or on the intestacy of a taxpayer shall be considered to be a transfer as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer."

while in Oct. 1986, (in T.I. 5-1710), the Small Business and General Section provided the same. (In T.I. 5-1500 provided in July 1986, the F.I.D. provided that property received pursuant to an order made under the Saskatchewan Matrimonial Property Act will qualify for Sec. 70(6) treatment if received by the widow but only if the action wasn't part of litigation (divorce, separation) between the parties.)

It is questionable how viable these opinions are in the face of the substance of Sec. 248(8). An election to take additional property operates to cause the will to be read as if without the original bequest to the spouse, but this doesn't necessarily constitute a disclaimer by the spouse unless the "disclaimer" inferred by the Department in Sec. 248(8)(b) is broader in definition than that in common law. A disclaimer refers to the specific and expressed avoidance of a gift exclusively phrased and the effect of section 6 of the FLA cannot fit within this definition. (See the discussion of disclaimers in the subsequent chapters. If this constitutes a "disclaimer" for Revenue then a lot of other acts that normally are not should also be so treated.) A release or surrender is also the expressed and exclusive act of forgoing future benefits from a right under a trust after benefits have been realized which often is directed to inure to the benefit of others by the releaser. The deemed alteration in the will under a FLA application also doesn't have these characteristics. The argument of an effective disclaimer via application can be countered with even more formidably with the fact that the FLA provides that the gifts may continue to the spouse if the FLA elimination of them is expressly to be disregarded: how can a "disclaimer", via the FLA application, as contended by the Department, be so complete as to allow the exact same gift to be provided in exactly the same way? Again in T.I. 901526 of March 1991 rendered by the F.I.D. it was held that the spouse who makes a FLA application for not even being named as any sort of beneficiary under the will will still acquire by virtue of Sec. 248(8) as if she was. Regardless it's reassuring to know that the Department is more than enthusiastic to provide favourable "administrative" interpretations when it seems complacent to have its statutes adjusted to attend to this very common phenomenon.

608. It could also be held on inter vivos trust, causing a disposition to the settlor: a full income inclusion, whereby income could be payable to the settlor until his death with gift over of the income right to the ultimate beneficiary to be determined by his will, or it could continue to be held in trust and the income distributions to the beneficiary via the will

There is a lack of Canadian tax jurisprudence on this issue, however it can easily be seen how it can operate to seriously reduce tax consequences and offer flexibility in the face of the spousal trust requirements.⁶⁰⁹ Perhaps it is for this reason that the Department has expressed in the answer to Question 55 of the 1990 Roundtable Discussions that it considers the Sec. 70(5)-(6) provisions to apply to all of the interests in the property and not to parts of the property that can be abstracted from the whole ownership. How would the courts interpret the context of the subsections on this issue? If the remainder interest goes to the spousal trust with the life interest going to the offspring the offspring isn't an income beneficiary under the trust since there isn't a trust relationship between the parties with respect to the property. Neither derives title from the other. The life tenant will acquire the right by virtue of the Sec. 70(3) roll-over without tax consequences to the testator if it is transferred within the statutory time period and such can be made conditional on payments to other parties previously discussed.⁶¹⁰ Ascertaining the value of a remainder interest may be important if Sec. 70(6.2)-(7)⁶¹¹ treatment is elected for in respect of it but the amount attributable to the life interest does not represent deductible cost for Sec. 69(1.1)(b) purposes. The fact that the testator doesn't own the remainder or life interest as distinct properties prior to death would seem to preclude Sec. 70(5)-(6) & 70(2)-(3) from applying to them when they are the subject of a testamentary fission.⁶¹²

Buy-Sell Agreements.

A question of indefeasible vesting arose in *Parkes Estate v. M.N.R.*⁶¹³ where the deceased taxpayer and could be made conditional on the payment of a sum to the estate, or any other person, thus gaining the Sec. 69(1.1)(b) bump up in the cost of the right. This compares well with steps that would have to be taken to get a non-spousal beneficiary in on the trust's income potential after it has been constituted. The spouse would have to recognize a taxable disposition of her income interest and although the beneficiary would be able to recognize a cost thereof the entire process would be revenue neutral. If the Sec. 69(1.1)(b) bump can be attained tax free, as is possible, there will be a tax benefit to be realized. There are one hundred and one variations of these procedures. Successive dispositions could absorb unused personal tax credits, losses, etc., of the testator while depending on the spouse's predicted incidence of taxation after death it could prove advantageous to simply endure an inter vivos tax exposure on the initial disposition without countervailing deductions.

609 See Western Aust. Trustee, Exor., & Agency Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of S.D., 32 A.L.R. 639.

610 If the taxpayer would have disposed of the right inter vivos proceeds would have been recognizable as income hence Sec. 70(2) applies to it however does this cause Sec. 70(2) to apply to the right to the income of a capital property inherent in its whole ownership when there isn't an ownership fission and the entire property attains a deferred Sec. 70(6) roll? Could it be argued that Sec. 70(2) cannot apply to the life estate created by the death since prior to the fission the right was inherent in the capital property which as per that subsection is exempt? The life estate is not a separate property prior to that time, and thus can it be transferred anytime after the death? Upon the fission in ownership upon death if the remainder interest is to gain Sec. 70(6) roll-over treatment the life interest must be subject to a Sec. 70(2) inclusion since both provisions suffer from the same problem in diction; not attending to the granting of legal life and remainder estates to different parties carved out of the original whole property. Note that the taxpayer does not own the interests as a particular type of property prior to the death. If the courts find that remainder interests gain Sec. 70(6) treatment one would expect substantial alteration in the manner in which the Minister assesses Sec. 70(5) dispositions of income producing property. Notwithstanding this CRA (Financial Industries Division) provided on Nov. 15, 1989, in a technical interpretation that Sec. 70(6) would be allowed to apply to an instance where the spouse would receive the legal life interest in the property while the children would realize the remainder on her death. The two types of rights were considered separate property. In the author's opinion there is a need to have an inter vivos fission of ownership interests in order to gain separate treatments, and this could produce substantial tax consequences (unless the severance occurred immediately after the property's acquisition). The property in specie is not that which would otherwise be disposed of under Sec. 70(5) and this is the target of Sec. 70(6). See West. Aust. Trustee, Exor., and Agency Co. v. Commr. of S.D., 80 A.T.C. 4567 for provision allowing for favorable creation of life estates. See also "The Capital Gains Provisions and Life Estates", Taxn. in Aust., Apr. 1990, 674, D.K. Raphael for some issues.

611 Note that the property listed under Sec. 70(7)(b) need not technically be that owned by the testator as a property prior to his death.

612 In Nov. 1989 T.I. 5-8706 rendered by the F.I.D. provided that if the remainder interest in testamentary property vested in non-spousal beneficiaries with the spouse receiving the life interest indefeasibly the Sec. 70(6) roll-over would be allowed however if such is acceptable why not in the vice versa? It was recognized however that the remainder and life interests were separate property. In T.I. 5-9747 rendered in July 1990 by the Bilingual Services and Resource Industries it was provided that when a testator in the province of Quebec creates a usufructuary under his will where his spouse was entitled to the income from property until her death there will be a Sec. 70(6) roll-over in respect of the usufructuary right where its a.c.b. will equal that of the whole property that the value of the usufructuary right is to the fair market value of the whole property while Sec. 70(5) will apply to the balance of the ownership rights that do not pass to the spouse. Capital gains will be computed on the rights transferred to the non-spousal parties based on the fair market value of those rights only.

613. 86 D.T.C. 1214 (TCC)

his brother each owned 50% of the capital stock of a corporation and before the death had entered into a buy-sell agreement whereby "upon the death of a shareholder each surviving shareholder shall purchase, and the executor or administrator ... of the deceased shareholder shall sell the shares of the company owned by the deceased shareholder immediately prior to his death, for the price and upon the terms and conditions herein stipulated...". To complicate matters, the spouse of the deceased, acting as executrix, transferred the shares of her husband's estate to her in her personal capacity and following that she entered into a buy-sell agreement with the brother whereafter upon the disposition she recognized the proceeds as a disposition on her behalf, and not on the behalf of the deceased's estate. The Minister, "cutting her off at the pass", took the position that the shares had never become vested indefeasibly in her in the first place thus Sec. 70(6) did not apply to the testator and thus the application of Sec. 70(5) could not be avoided. Goetz, T.C.J., held that:

"Unfortunately, the widow's right to have the title to the shares vest in her indefeasibly was precluded by the 1973 agreement which made it compulsory for her to sell the shares and compulsory for the deceased's brother to buy them. The 1973 agreement was effective up to the signing of the 1977 agreement hence the title to the shares did not vest indefeasibly with her..."⁶¹⁴

The nature of a buy-sell agreement operative upon death was the issue in *Van Son Estate v. M.N.R.*⁶¹⁵ where the testator had entered into an agreement with another shareholder whereby should he die the shareholder would be required to purchase his shares in the corporation however the agreement did not compel the deceased to purchase the other shareholder's shares if he predeceased him and the agreement did not specify that the estate of the deceased was obliged to sell the shares to the shareholder. When the Minister denied the application of Sec. 70(6) to the shares, when the spouse was entitled to the shares as sole remainderman under the estate, the Federal Court-Trial Division paid special attention to the fact that neither party had attempted to enforce the agreement. Finding the shares to have vested indefeasibly in the spouse the Court held with respect to the nature of the agreement that it was more of a consensual arrangement rather than a mutual irrevocable obligation in respect of both parties compelling them to sell and/or acquire each others' shares. The key was obviously the lack of the obligation of the estate to sell the shares upon enforcement of the agreement.⁶¹⁶ It's obvious that not to interfere with the issue of indefeasibly vesting that buy-sells collapse or are executable only within the 36 month period, otherwise they cover the period and taint the crystallizing of vesting.

It is possible to structure a shareholding buy-out and obtain the Sec. 70(6) roll if certain obligations and directions are arranged. One such method is to simply give a guarantee to the other shareholders that their shares will be purchased by the taxpayer's estate at a certain price if the taxpayer's shares are not offered for sale to them at a predetermined price by the estate within a certain period of time after death. The executors are not obliged to sell the shares but if they don't they have to purchase the other's, which may be financed with life insurance proceeds received directly, through the corporation, or by mortgaging property of the trust.⁶¹⁷

614 In T.I. 5-0116 provided Jan. 1986 by the Bilingual Services and Resource Industries Division it was held that if the beneficiary or the spousal trust is compelled to sell the shares as per the terms of the will indefeasible vesting will not occur. This was also opined in April 1981 by the Specialty Corporations Rulings Division.

615 90 D.T.C. 6183

616 In May 1981 the Non-Corporate Rulings Directorate held with respect to a hypothetical situation that when executors/spousal trust was not compelled to sell the shares even though another shareholder had the right to buy them their indefeasible vesting in the recipient would not be prevented.

617 In April 1981 the Specialty Corporation Rulings Directorate was confused in acceptable arrangements when it provided: "The Department will accept buy-sell agreements that include two options. One option gives the deceased's spouse the right to require the surviving shareholder to purchase her shares and a second option gives the surviving shareholders the right to require the spouse to sell her shares. Under such an agreement the shares will be considered to vest indefeasibly in the spouse provided the executor transfers the shares to the spouse before either of the options is exercised. It would seem to us that such an agreement would satisfy both the requirements of the deceased's spouse and the surviving shareholders." In June 1980 in an opinion of the Non-Corporate Rulings Division it was held that where the options of the above character are not exercised indefeasible vesting will not be prevented. The same was expressed in T.I. 5-9813 provided in May 1990 by the Bilingual Services and Resource Industries Division. The key apparently was that the exercise is discretionary while some agreements require a compulsory buy-out.

In a Technical interpretation provided in March 1981 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division it was provided that where a corporation has the option of redeeming its own shares which the deceased owned at the time of his death the shares will vest indefeasibly vest with his spouse. What a buy-sell agreement can't do directly can apparently be accomplished indirectly through the proper structuring of the corporation's share structure and contingency clauses embedded therein.

If the will requires the spousal recipient to enter into a put and a call agreement with the other major shareholders so as to receive the shares, whereby if such doesn't occur there will be a gift over to another party, in entering into the arrangement the vesting of the legal title will be made defeasible, as per the terms of the will.⁶¹⁸ If the shares are transferred to the spousal trust and vested indefeasibly therein the Sec. 70(6) roll-over is available to the deceased while if the spouse is required to enter into a buy-sell agreement in order to receive the shares from the trust the application of Sec. 70(6) will not be jeopardized. The spouse will not receive the shares via Sec. 70(6). If she doesn't enter into the agreement the spousal trust can operate to provide a future gift over of the shares to a non-spousal party and will thus be taxed on any accrued gain, (and will buy the outstanding shares). Indefeasibly vesting operates as an issue only with regards to how the trust receives the shares, not what it does with them afterwards per it's directions. If the buy-sell agreement is required to be operative at the moment the spouse receives the shares from the spousal trust⁶¹⁹ there will be a Sec. 70(6) tax free roll while the spouse will realize the proceeds. If the spouse doesn't pursuant to the specific will terms, (concerning the ultimate transfer price etc.), the trust could be allowed to transfer the shares directly out of its hands, for proceeds that may not equal the shares' FMV, to the shareholders though such couldn't exist in the form of a testamentary option or obligation of the trustee. Such could take the form of a right of first refusal offered to the other shareholders inter vivos by the testator or made by the trustees under express authorization. If this isn't advisable the spousal trust deed could provide that the trustees are to abstain from the voting of the shares until a non-spousal beneficiary enters into a buy-sell agreement with the other shareholders whereby the shares will then become distributable to that person upon the death of the spouse. The other shareholders would thus obtain immediate control of the corporation while the shares are held in the trust pending the death.

The shares may themselves not be the subject of the buy-sell agreement; instead the interest in them could be if the trust deed specifies that certain interests will be contingent rights to receive the shares if the buy-sell agreement is entered into by the specified beneficiaries. Since the shares cannot be distributed prior to the death of the spouse the external shareholders would have to wait for such an event to receive them or arrange to indemnify the trust for any tax consequences if an early roll-out is to be made following a variation. If the trust deed specifies that the trustees are not to vote the shares after the follow through on the agreement by a beneficiary the purchasing shareholders will be able to convert the shares indirectly via the exercise of control.⁶²⁰ If the result of the non-spousal beneficiary entering into the agreement is his requirement to purchase the shares of the other shareholders at a certain price a promissory note could be given as consideration while immediately upon the receipt of the shares a reorganization could occur, between the spousal trust and himself, so as to stream higher dividend yields out to him so as to pay off the note and interest, while control of the corporation could be retained or obtained by the trust via the reorg. and low paying preferred shares could be required to be taken back, (as per the trust deed).⁶²¹ If a non-spousal trust is created 618 Greenwood Estate v. The Queen, 90 D.T.C. 6690 FCTD, illustrates the importance of not compelling the executors to transfer the shares at any price pursuant to an inter vivos agreement or testamentary direction. In this case an inter vivos agreement was entered into between the testator's offspring and the testator compelling the offspring to purchase the testator's shares from his estate while the agreement could not be ignored by the executors.

"I have little doubt that this agreement prevents there being n indefeasible vesting of the shares.

Indefeasible vesting requires that the person in whom the property is vested have the rights to determine whether or not the property will be retained by him or disposed of to another. There is no such discretion or control in the trustees with respect to the shares in question. Mr. Greenwood's representatives, the executors under the will, were compelled on his death, by operation of paragraphs 1 and 9(e) of the purchase and sale agreement... to sell the shares to the sons."

The Sec. 70(6) roll-over wasn't available when the executors had to honor the agreement.

619 and not the general estate

620 Understandably the selling price of the shares or contingent interest relating to them should be settled, and possibly be even delivered, before any reorganization occurs. On a conversion the trust's shares could become low dividend paying and the corporation's earnings could be streamed out to the purchasers so as to finance their acquisition. The trust's share's f.m.v. ,may also be materially reduced and since the reorganization may cause tax consequences in some instances to the trust the acquiring shareholder could be compelled to indemnify the trust for such: if a particular status dependent on a contribution to trust is to be maintained it would prove more beneficial to prevent the trust from voting the shares to the detriment of the ultimately acquiring shareholders while differing classes of discretionary dividend paying shares may prove instrumental in streaming the corporate earnings away from the trust: obviously considerable planning in the characteristics of the instrument and their interaction with the relationships of the parties to be expected is required.

621 These concerns could be extensively covered in the will.

out of the estate and it has sufficient cash the promissory note route need not be pursued if the beneficiary receives a substantial capital distribution with which to finance the purchase, (possibly generated by insurance proceeds), whereby the reorg. entered into with the spousal trust would operate in the opposite direction with respect to the beneficiaries involved.

A variation of this approach could also consist of the spouse having to enter into a buy-sell agreement in order for the shares to be rolled to the spousal trust in the first place; and if she didn't the testator would recognize a Sec. 70(5) disposition and alternate instructions could operate to create a buy-sell agreement by the non-spousal trust with the other shareholders, whereby the spouse could be completely kept out of participating. If she agreed the shares would vest indefeasibly in the spousal trust and it could then transfer them to her immediately whereby the agreement would be executed one way or the other, while if she was required to purchase then cash could be distributed out to her, as per the deed, on condition that she execute a reorganization with the trust as above.

If the spouse realizes the shares from the spousal trust Sec. 107(2) will not bump their cost and she will recognize them to have an ACB equal to that of the testator. If the interest based specifically on the shares is given to an offspring the interest cannot be enforceable prior to the spouse's death in order for the trust to be spousal while if she purchases the interest from the offspring Sec. 107(1)(a)-108(1)(d) will reduce tax consequences otherwise recognizable by him, especially if a power of appointment over excessive insurance trust funds, contingent on the spouse's death, serves to inflate the cost amounts of the capital interests without actually creating any. If she purchases the interest it will have an ACB that reflects the share's fair market value, especially since, pursuant to the will, the interest becomes immediately enforceable if acquired only by the spouse. In such an instance the Sec. 107(2)(b) cost bump is available on the shares' roll out to the spouse⁶²² and she can then enter into the put-call/buy-sell agreement with the shareholders which is required pursuant to the terms of the trust allowing specie distribution. A great deal of structuring (obviously) can inflate the cost of the shares for the spouse so as to reduce tax consequences following a buy-sell subsequent to a Sec. 70(6) roll to a trust. It could prove more efficient to bequeath an interest in the shares to a non-resident trust, have the spousal trust become non-resident, then have the beneficiary trust become resident obtaining the Sec. 128.1(1) bump in the cost of its 'non' taxable Canadian property subsequent to which the interest is disposed of to the spouse allowing a Sec. 107(2)(b) bump on the roll out of the shares and avoiding a Sec. 107(4) disposition whereafter the buy-sell agreement is entered into pursuant to the will terms. Alternately the spouse could 'visit the islands', (cease to be resident), for a two year and one day period and return once the trust has become non-resident, obtaining the Sec. 128.1(1) bump in the cost of her interest in the trust's shares subsequent to which a Sec. 107(2)(b) bump will be available. If the spousal trust is composed exclusively of taxable Canadian property a Sec. 128.1(1) deemed disposition will not cause excessive tax consequences while multiple spousal trusts could be created under the will without fear of the application of Sec. 104(2) if properly structured. When a $50,000-$150,000 etc. tax liability will otherwise be incurable the above steps are worth the extra draftsmanship. The spouse doesn't have to inherit the testator's cost of the property.

If the trust deed specifies that in any manner the other shareholders can acquire the shares from the trust or a recipient beneficiary as a result of the buy-sell agreement the benefit realized on the purchase may be fully included in their income under Sec. 105(1) since clearly such is being derived from the trust deed. If as a consequence of the trust deed the beneficiary or the trust has to purchase the outstanding shares at a bargain price a benefit under Sec. 105(1) will be recognizable as well, (unless the party isn't resident). With respect to these types of buy-sell agreement approaches the other shareholders would have to be parties to a contract will or other obligation to act so as to enter into the agreement with whomever wishes to be the testamentary party otherwise executing an eventual sale of the shares could be a long and laborious process while the trust's terms as expressed above would become completely irrelevant.

Of concern in a testamentary buy-sell arrangement is Sec. 111(4)-(5) which precludes the corporation from deducting booked net capital losses, non-capital losses and farm losses in a period subsequent to a change in control of the corporation or from carrying those losses back against pre-change in control periods of income. Also, where the ACB of non-depreciable capital property exceeds the property's fair market value at the time of the change in control the ACB will be reduced to the fair market value. Subparagraphs 256(7)(a)(ii)-(iii) provide an exception to the rules whereby a change in control will not be recognizable when the shares are acquired by the executor, administrator, or trustee of the taxpayer's estate who acquired them by virtue of the death of any other taxpayer or where the person acquired the shares by virtue of a distribution from an estate of a taxpayer arising on his death if the recipient was related to the deceased, presumably at the time of death.⁶²³ One alternative to avoid problems in loss deductibility if the shares are to be bequeathed to an unrelated party is to have the trust estate hold them until the losses have been absorbed and if this is to be done the buy-sell agreement the shareholders enter into should reflect it via the restriction of the distribution of the earnings exempt from tax via the loss application to the estate, or through a price adjustment clause. The initial exception can be satisfied even when the testator does not legally own the shares but they are held by an inter vivos trust over which he has a power of appointment or income interest in. If the trust's terms are such that upon his death the shares are to be distributed to his estate then they have been acquired by virtue of his death allowing them to avoid the Sec. 70(5) deemed disposition and to benefit from the Sec. 107(2) roll out while allowing for the avoidance of a deemed change in control. Alternatively the shares need not be conveyed to the estate of the person who died but instead can be conveyed to someone else's estate as long as it is an estate apparently. It would appear that the shares can be contracted to be held in the estate and that their manner of acquisition need not be purely as a consequence of a testamentary disposition.

⁶²² The bump didn't produce tax consequences to the seller with the integrated use of the power of appointment.

Paragraph 5 of I.T. 302R2 provides the Department's opinion that a change in control will not result when there is a change in the party filling the office of trustee but not where there is a change in the beneficial interest in the estate. In the author's opinion, regardless of the change in beneficial interests in other estate property there will only be a change in control of the corporation if there is a change in the beneficial interest holder, as per Sec. 251(5)(b), but not where there is a disturbance of associated corporation status due to Sec. 256(1.2)(f), due to the alteration in the FMV of the beneficiaries' beneficial interests. If a variation in the estate is so substantial as to cause the recognition of its termination and a resettlement there may be a change in control.

In a spousal trust based buy-sell arrangement as previously described the control of the corporation⁶²⁴ can be transferred to the spouse, after which the agreement can be entered into, without a change in control. Once she disposes of them however there will be a change in control but there is a three year period during which the losses can be absorbed prior to indefeasible vesting in the spouse. If the expected rate at which losses may be absorbed is dismal the will may allow the executors to consent to a reorganization-subincorporation by the corporation during the period so as to create income to absorb the losses, (whereafter the corporation may become merely a holding corporation). Subsection 251(5)(b) should preclude the spousal beneficiary from satisfying the spousal trust distribution condition (enter into a buy-sell/put-call agreement) until the last possible moment since on entering into the agreement control will change, regardless of the time at which the agreement is actually executed. Of course the condition could be satisfied within an extended period of time and in fact the will could preclude any agreement initiated by the spouse prior to the absorption of losses from being effective at satisfying the condition precedent on the roll out thus avoiding a Sec. 251(5) change in control.

Perhaps when one examines the complexities of the possible arrangements it would be preferable to have the will provide the authority to the executors to consent to a subincorporation initiated by the other shareholders to absorb any losses via the Sec. 85(1) creation of income. The benefit of the cost bumps would inure to the other shareholders in the end.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Buy-sell agreements

IT-140R3

DATE: APRIL 14, 1989

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

⁶²³ If the beneficiary receives them as a purchaser a 'distribution' will not occur.

⁶²⁴ assuming it corresponds to the shares flowing through Sec. 70(6)-107(2)

Buy-sell agreements

REFERENCE: Subsection 70(5) (also subsection 164(6) and paragraph 69(1)(b))

Application

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-140R2 dated December 29, 1980. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

Summary

Taxpayers who own similar interests in a business or property often make such a similar interest subject to a buy-sell agreement. Although the form and content of buy-sell agreements may vary, they almost always provide for either the compulsory or optional sale of capital property by one person and either the compulsory or optional acquisition by another of the capital property owned by the former. The price may be certain, or may be determined as outlined in the agreement. This bulletin discusses buy-sell agreements that are in effect at the time of death of a person.

Discussion and Interpretation

1. The rules in subsection 70(5) apply to property that is subject to a buy-sell agreement, unless the property can be considered to vest indefeasibly in another person pursuant to subsection 70(6), 70(9), 70(9.2) or 70(9.6) or paragraph 70(5.2)(d) or (f). Whether the property vests indefeasibly in another person depends on the terms of the buy-sell agreement and the terms of the will (see the current issue of IT-449R).

2. When determining the proceeds deemed to have been received by the deceased pursuant to subsection 70(5), the fair market value of the property subject to the buy-sell agreement must be determined at the time immediately before death. The Department's view is that, where the deceased and the surviving party to the buy-sell agreement (survivor) did not deal at arm's length, it is a question of fact whether the fair market value for the purpose of subsection 70(5) will be determined with reference to the buy-sell agreement.

3. Where the deceased and a survivor did not deal at arm's length at the time the agreement was made, the Department's view is that paragraph 69(1)(b) applies when the estate sells the property to the survivor pursuant to the agreement and that it is a question of fact whether fair market value under paragraph 69(1)(b) will be determined with reference to the buy-sell agreement.

4. In fulfilling the obligation to sell the property to a survivor, the estate may realize a capital loss on non-depreciable capital property or may be permitted to deduct a terminal loss on depreciable property. Subsection 164(6) provides some relief where, within the first taxation year of the estate, the legal representatives of the deceased dispose of capital property of the estate and incur a net capital loss, or dispose of all the depreciable property of a prescribed class and incur a terminal loss. The legal representative may elect in accordance with the conditions prescribed in section 1000 of the Regulations to treat all or part of such losses as if they were incurred in the year of death rather than in the first taxation year OF THE ESTATE. NO PART OF SUCH LOSSES MAY BE DEDUCTED FOR A TAXATION year preceding the year in which the taxpayer died. (In the case of deaths occurring after 1984, an amended return for the year of death must be filed on behalf of the deceased to give effect to the application of such losses.) Any resulting refund would be paid or credited to the estate.

The Need to "Transfer or Distribute".

The ultimate transfer or distribution of the legal title to the property disposed of by the taxpayer pursuant to his testament is completely independent of the indefeasible vesting of the equitable interest in it however is it also a necessity? The distribution or transfer must be received in the capacity of a beneficiary only and not as a purchaser as per the reasoning in *Coleman Trust v. M.N.R.*⁶²⁵ where a "sale or transfer" of the property for its Valuation Day value by the estate as prescribed by the will was found to be ineligible for Sec. 70(9) treatment⁶²⁶. Taylor, T.C.J. held, in the case, (which could easily be in respect of the application of Sec. 70(6)), that:

"It seems quite clear that she intended the farm to go to Mr. Frances O'Rourke, but only after he had made available to the estate sufficient funds ($60,000) to carry out her wishes with regard to the other beneficiaries. I am not convinced that anything other than a sale to Mr. Frances O'Rourke (beneficiary) would have fulfilled the terms of the will, and it is difficult for me to conceive of a process whereby Mr. Frances O'Rourke could obtain the farm without payment of some kind to the beneficiaries (which would be very similar to a sale). As I see it Mr. Frances O'Rourke may have had an option under the will - but the option would have been to not pay the $60,000 and as a consequence thereof not own the farm."⁶²⁷

625. 87 D.T.C. 664

626 See notes on the apparent inapplicability of testamentary options in notes below for sales and buys here as well.

In *Boger Estate v. M.N.R.*⁶²⁸ a taxpayer left his estate to his wife and children, (the estate consisted of farm property, land and machinery), and the executrix attempted to file for Sec. 70(6) treatment for property transferred to her and for Sec. 70(9) treatment for farm property bequeathed to the children as a residue in specie. The equitable interests of the children in the subject property were vested indefeasibly in the property but at issue was whether the legal title to the property had been transferred or distributed to them.⁶²⁹ There had been a dispute amongst the executors and executrices concerning how the estate was to be settled which was eventually decided in court. The subject property had been sold by the executrix and the proceeds had been distributed to the appropriate beneficiaries, and on those grounds the Minister contended that Sec. 70(9) did not apply. Rip T.C.J., summed up the executor's argument as:

"Appellant's counsel argued that the words "transferred or distributed" in subsection 70(9) are not to be given their technical meaning, in particular they are not to be given the technical meaning of conveyance in the sense of documentation filed in a Land Titles office. In her view of the words the lands were "transferred and distributed" at the time the beneficiaries received equitable ownership of the properties and this occurred by operation of the will. As soon as the beneficiaries could call on the executrix for the properties, they are conveyed the property she said."

As to what form "a transfer and distribution" of property in specie must take he further held:

"It is not necessary, in my view, that formal conveyancing always takes place for there to be a transfer or a distribution of property as contemplated by subsection 70(9). What is necessary, however is that when the legal representative of the deceased has the power to act, she does so to divest herself of her rights and obligations in the property as legal representative of the deceased and the rights and obligation devolved to the beneficiaries of the deceased. Mrs. Boger acknowledged no transfer or distribution to the children could have taken place prior to August 4, 1981 without the Court's direction or consent because of the pending litigation between the executrix and the deceased's widow. Subsection 70(9) requires something more than a transfer of mere equitable ownership in the property. Otherwise the words "transferred or distributed" would be meaningless since equitable ownership of property is transferred on death to a beneficiary. The words "transferred and distributed" are used in the subsection to distinguish between a transfer and vesting. "Vested indefeasibly" in subsection 70(9) refers to absolute transfer of equitable interest; something more than this obviously is required for there to have been a transfer or distribution of the property. The transfer and the distribution of the property to, and the vesting of the property in, a beneficiary are mutually exclusive."

Quoting from Hrycej Estate v. M.N.R. earlier where an option was exercised to purchase property from an estate in respect of which a Sec. 70(6) election was attempted, Rip, T.C.J. pointed out the comment:

⁶²⁷ See also Tory Estate v. M.N.R., 76 D.T.C. 6312, for similar interpretation of "transfer or distribute" as well as Penner v. M.N.R., 84 D.T.C. 1444. Exercised inter vivos options obviously don't produce the required effect. Whether or not testamentary options to acquire produce the required status of the recipient is questionable even in the face of Coleman and Penner. In I.T. 349R2, para. 6, the Department is of the opinion that a sale called for by the will is a transfer or distribution as a consequence of the death via Sec. 248(8) though it would appear that such an option doesn't recognize that the beneficiary's status in respect of the property's receipt is just as important as per Tory Estate v. M.N.R. supra.. In the case of a sale the taxpayer doesn't receive as a beneficiary and thus the property isn't transferred or distributed to him within the context of the subsection.

⁶²⁸ 89 D.T.C. 15 (TCC)

⁶²⁹ The subsection 70(9) provision offers tax free testamentary disposition treatment of farm property if bequeathed directly to children of the testator and not held in a testamentary trust for them however this case could be held to validly illustrate the estate-testamentary trust relationship under the Sec. 70(6)(b) provision.

"That Mrs. Hrycej received the cash proceeds of the sale of the farm equipment as part of the residue does not, in my view, alter the fact that the farm equipment was never transferred or distributed to her and that the farm equipment was not vested in her."

Continuing he found that the executrix had not transferred the legal title to the property:

"The executrix had one year from the termination of the litigation with the deceased's wife to the sale of the land in August 1982 to affect a transfer and distribution of the land to the beneficiary; there was no convincing reason why the land could not have been transferred or distributed once the litigation was over. Thus, in the case at bar, the fact that the property was sold directly by the executrix, in her capacity as executrix, would seem to preclude the appellant from taking advantage of subsection 70(9)."⁶³⁰

It should be noted that Sec. 70(6) requires that the transfer/distribution be to a trust and not an estate which owns the property from the date of death. Lying outside of subdivision K the two terms cannot be equated with each other, especially when one considers that Parliament has gone to great lengths, as per the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanics, to recognize the distinctiveness of estates and trusts that arise out of them hence Boger could illustrate problems encounterable when an estate, while being administered, must dispose of property to satisfy creditors. (The author is at slight disagreement with Rip T.C.J. with respect to the quotation cited. Equitable ownership is not transferred on death to a beneficiary though equitable interest in the estate will be. Whole ownership resides with the personal representative/executor until the residue has been ascertained and it is only at that time that equitable ownership with respect to specific property may arise.⁶³¹ There is a difference between specific and residual bequests.)

In the case of the applicability of these principles to the testamentary spousal trust situation it would appear that if the estate of the deceased, while in the midst of being administered to the point of residue ascertainment, disposed of property subsection 70(6) could not be applied to that property even though some of the proceeds may have subsequently ended up in the spousal trust and/or being subject to the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanics.⁶³² If this was not the case then the effect of the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanics could be seriously negated in that the estate could dispose of the property and satisfy the "non-qualifying debt" before it was to be assumed by the residuary trust. Once the property, however, has gone through the administration process and has become indefeasibly vested in the spousal trust, (while also possibly being the subject of a Sec. 70(7) listing), its disposition by the trust will not cause the Sec. 70(6) provision to be inapplicable to it. Indefeasible vesting has occurred.

In *C.I.R. v. Clydesdale Bank and Another*⁶³³ assets were held by the executors of an estate which were to be divided amongst several beneficiaries after the residue had been ascertained (or liquidated) while the executors were also empowered "to allow any beneficiary to take over any of said assets at valuation." Part of the estate consisted of some land that the testator was negotiating to sell at the time of death and the executors continued to negotiate the sale however under a different pretence than being just executors of the estate. If the beneficiaries would have sold it there would have been aggregately less taxation. They decided that they would treat the land as being "allocated" to the beneficiaries and thus in common law, upon ascertainment of residue and allocation, a bare trust would arise however the will implicitly provided that there could be no allocation and no beneficial ownership of any property prior to the ascertainment of the residue. There was no provision for the creation of a trust in respect of the residue and upon its ascertainment and necessarily 630 Is this opinion similar to that provided in Lewis Estate. v. M.N.R. cited earlier, by Kempo T.C.J.?

631 Pagels v. MacDonald, 54 C.L.R. 519, Solomon v. Attenborough, 1913 A.C. 76. See also recognition of this in C.L. Leonhardt Estate v. M.N.R., 1990 1 C.T.C. 2198, at 2202, quoting Hanbury and Mandsley's Modern Equity, 11th Ed. pg. 163-165:

"A legatee or devise does not, on the testator's death, become equitable owner of any part of the estate. The executor takes full title to the testator's property, not merely a bare legal estate... A devisee or legatee may be said to become the equitable owner of specific property once property has been allocated by the executor for the purpose. In the case of a residuary gift or a claim on intestacy, the allocation cannot occur until the residuary accounts are prepared..."

632 See Re: Campbell, 1968 V.R. 46.

633 58 T.C. 120 (CS)

realization had to be distributed and not held under a bare trust.⁶³⁴ When the property was sold the executors contended, upon assessment by the Commissioner as a disposition in their hands qua executor, that the property was beneficially owned by the beneficiaries and that they had decided to treat as being allocated the title thereto however as per the will such an allocation was void.⁶³⁵ Perhaps even more damning was the fact that they had not informed the beneficiaries of this process and the beneficiaries had remained essentially ignorant of it. As per Lord Cameron:

" The respondents did not profess to 'allocate' or appropriate the land but merely to 'treat the land as being allocated and beneficially owned', the plain implication being that it was in fact and in law neither so allocated nor beneficially owned but was being treated as if it had been for purposes of fiscal advantage.

.... The Respondents were acting solely in discharge of their duty as executors. They could not at their own hands constitute themselves as agents for principals who had never instructed or authorized the action said to be taken in pursuance of that agency. Indeed, it was only by letters dated 4 December 1978, that the Respondents informed the residuary beneficiaries of what they had done and sought letters "instructing and authorizing" the respondents "to sign all documents necessary to complete the sale on the beneficiaries behalf." Each beneficiary obediently complied with this request.

...
At the time the 'allocation' so called was made, the residue had not been ascertained and therefore in strictness there was no residue fund in the true sense from which allocation could be made, an 'allocation' which, be it observed, was clearly intended to bring s. 28 of the 1976 Act, into play with the necessary effect of depriving the Respondents of any control over the disposal of the subjects put or held in trust-the exclusive-control being ipso facto placed in the hands of the defined beneficiaries themselves and removed from that of the Respondents.⁶³⁶ But further, it is no doubt that the Respondents were given certain powers as trustees. Powers, however, are given to trustees to be exercised for trust purposes as these may be ascertained from the testator's disposition for the discharge of their duties in carrying out his instructions. There was here, in this will, no duty which required or as a consequence permitted, the Respondents to set up or cause to be set up a trust in respect of any particular asset of the estate in favour of any particular beneficiary."

The Court found that the respondents had disposed of the land in the capacity of executors and not agents however this case illustrates a very interesting aspect that may be relevantly pursued in respect of the application of Sec. 70(6).⁶³⁷ As per the comments in Boger Estate (supra) of Rip T.C.J.: "It is not necessary, in my view, that formal conveyancing always takes place for there to be a transfer or a distribution of property as contemplated by subsection 70(9). What is necessary, however, is that when the legal representative of the deceased has the power to act, she does so to divest herself of her rights and obligations devolve to the beneficiaries of the deceased... Thus in the case at bar, the fact that the property was sold directly by the executrix, in her capacity as executrix, would seem to preclude the appellant from taking advantage of subsection 70(9)." The critical issue is that highlighted. If the executor had carried through the administration to a point where legal title was subject to the rights of the beneficiary, and beneficial ownership had arose to the beneficiary, and the beneficiary had directed that the property be disposed of and the proceeds transferred to the beneficiary then the executrix would have been acting as an agent with respect to the sale of the property and Sec. 70(9) would have been applicable since the executrix would have performed so as to divest herself of the right to the property and it would have devolved to the beneficiary but the legal title was retained at the direction of the beneficiary.⁶³⁸

634 The executors could distribute in specie but that was left to their discretion.

635 The executors were also not given the power to create splinter trusts with appropriations.

636 See Williams on Wills, Vol. 1 15th Ed., pg. 182, for the effect of an appropriation of property out of estate property: a trust arises and it may be bare. See also Re: Wedgewood, 1921 1 Ch. 601.

637 or any other tax free testamentary roll over requiring that property be "transferred or distributed" to the recipient. See also Cochrane's Exors. v. I.R.C., 1974 S.T.C. 335., 49 T.C. 299.

638 See also Public Trustee v. Kidd, 1931 N.Z.L.R. 1, Re: Donohue, 1933 N.Z.L.R. 477, Attenborough v. Solomon,

In *Dushinsky Estate v. M.N.R.*⁶³⁹ a herd of cattle, being rights or things, was bequeathed to a spouse in specie but the spouse found that she would not be capable of attending to them properly and asked the executor to dispose of them. The Minister reassessed the testator in respect of Sec. 70(2) when the executor disposed of the property and the executor contended that he was merely acting as an agent for the widow and that there had been a roll-over. When heard in the Tax Court he did not suggest that he had made any conscious decision to transfer legal title of the cattle to the widow and it was found that the proceeds hadn't even been transferred to the widow but had instead been deposited in the estate account. In fact he expressed that following legal advice he could not disburse proceeds until probate was granted which was complicated with the widow's application under the Family Relief Act of Alberta for a larger chunk of the estate. Bonner T.C.J. didn't spend much time analyzing the facts since it was obvious that the administration of the estate had not been completed and that in particular the widow's rights to the cattle in specie had not crystallized. At issue, accordingly, was the assent of the executor to the bequest of the cattle and whether it had occurred prior to the time at which the cattle were sold. The executor could only act as agent for a person who had beneficial ownership and Bonner T.C.J. referred to two maxims in Halsbury's Laws of England⁶⁴⁰,

"The bequest of a legacy, whether general or specific, transfers only an inchoate property to the legatee: the executor's assent is necessary to render it complete and perfect."

"An assent to the vesting of personal estate or of an equitable interest in real estate may be express or implied; it need not be in writing, nor need it be given in any particular form. Informal expressions, if sufficiently clear to indicate intention, may amount to an assent. The assent may also be implied from the executor's conduct."

He further quoted from *Attenborough v. Solomon*⁶⁴¹ at pg. 82, concerning the disposition/transfer of property as per a will and with respect to the executor's control thereof:

"He (executor) takes that, I say, by virtue of his office. The will becomes operative so far as its dispositions of personalty are concerned only if and when the executor assents to those dispositions."

From the conduct of the executor it was found that he had not assented to the bequest and thus on the sale of the cattle he could not act as agent for the widow and thus the Sec. 70(2) provision had to apply to the testator since there had been no roll-over of the rights or things.⁶⁴² The same principles would apply in respect of Sec. 70(6). Does this contradict the opinion of Rip. T.C.J. in Boger Estate where he held that transfer and distribution and indefeasible vesting are mutually exclusive? In Dushinsky Estate it seems the roll-over would have been available if the executor had assented to the bequest but had not got around to transferring legal ownership.⁶⁴³

Boger Estate v. The Queen as described previously was appealed to the Federal Court Trial Division⁶⁴⁴ with some startling results with respect to the issue of transfer and the submissions of the parties as stated by Jerome A.C.J. were as follows:

"The Plaintiff submits that, by virtue of the Will, which speaks from the moment before death, a 1913 A.C. 76, Re: Donkin, 1966 Qd. R. 96, Re: McPhail, 1971 V.R. 534, for the use of the terms "distribute" - "distribution" meaning completion of administration and assent to dispositions without legal conveyance.

639 90 D.T.C. 1391

640 4th Ed. Vol. 17, para. 1345 & 1347

641 [1913] A.C. 76

642 See Easterbrook v. Young, 13 A.L.R. 351, for the effect of assent and indicative behavior as well as Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th Ed. Vol. 17 para. 1355-56. See Re: Campbell, 1968 V.R. 46, for the withholding of assent and disposition so as to extinguish estate liabilities precluding favorable roll over treatment. The property didn't "pass" to the beneficiary without the assent and there was no roll over.

643 This seemed to be the basis of an opinion of the Non-Corporate Rulings Division provided in T.I. A0554 of Nov. 1984 when in respect of an incorporation of real estate out of an estate at the direction of the widow when it held: "... we are of the opinion that it is not necessary for the title to the above shares and real estate to be registered in the name of the widow in order for the property to be 'transferred or distributed' for the purposes of subsection 70(6) of the Act and that the title may be transferred directly from the deceased individual to his widow's holding company without affecting the availability (of) the provisions contained in that subsection."

In I.T. 282R para. 1 the Department opines however that a transfer is recognizable when the executor/trustee relinquishes control over the property to the beneficiary and not when the beneficiary acquires a right to it.

644 91 D.T.C. 5506

vested beneficial interest in the remaining farm land and depreciable property (the "Property") was effectively "transferred or distributed" to the children. The children's rights in the Property were determined immediately upon the Taxpayer's death and no further action was required to give them full ownership. She submits that the ordinary meanings of "transfer" and "distribute" are very broad and do not require a conveyance of legal title or physical possession. As well, no such requirement is found in s. 70(9) which provides for a transfer "on or at the instance of a taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof" and the Plaintiff notes that the term "property", as broadly defined in s. 248(1) must include property recognized under Equity. An executor under a will, therefore, need not take the superadded mechanical step or action to "transfer" the Property to the children. The Plaintiff submits that the fact that she held legal title to the Property as trustee, in accordance with s. 3 of the Devolution of Real Property Act, R.S.A. 1980 c. D-34, when it was sold to a third party does not, in this instance, affect the fact that the Property had been transferred to the children as a consequence of the Taxpayer's death. Once the debts of the Estate had been paid, the children were entitled to call for the property at any time and at that point, the Plaintiff became an agent for the children. The Property was sold by the Plaintiff to a third party on the instruction of and with the concurrence of the beneficial owners. In accordance with usual estate practice in Alberta, there was no actual conveyance of the legal title before it was transferred to the third party purchaser. Finally, the Plaintiff submits that the spouse's application under the Family Relief Act does not prevent the property from being "transferred or distributed" to the children immediately upon the Taxpayer's death for the purposes of the s. 70(9) roll-over although the possibility of such an application may prevent a personal representative from conveying the property.

The Defendant submits that because the Property was never conveyed to the Taxpayer's children and because the Property was sold by the Executor to a third party, it was not "transferred or distributed" to the children in accordance with s. 70(9). The Defendant submits that the definitions and judicial consideration of the terms "transferred or distributed" connote a legal conveyancing. Reference is made to Willis Estate v. M.N.R., 68 D.T.C. 204 (T.A.B.) at 210 where it was held that a court order directing an executor to transfer all property of a deceased does not, in itself, transfer the property. the order only empowers the executor to act and it is only when he actually gives effect to the direction that the transfer occurs. Relying on Mr. Justice Rip's decision in Hrycej v. M.N.R., [1984] C.T.C. 2115, 84 D.T.C. 1090 sic, 1089 the Defendant further submits that the fact that the property was sold by the Executor to a third party supports the position that it had never been transferred to the children. The Defendant notes as well that the Taxpayer did not leave specific pieces of land or equipment to his children. Rather, the Will provides that they are to receive the "residue" of the estate in equal shares. The Defendant suggests, therefore, that what was to be distributed to the children presumably was funds and not property subject to s. 70(9)."

In the author's, opinion, while there are severe weaknesses in the Defendant's submissions those of the Plaintiff are certainly not free of doubt especially with respect to the apparently exceedingly broad connotation of the term "transfer". If the term "transfer" can be referenced to the event in which the incidents and burdens of beneficial ownership are divested from one owner and vested in another a "transfer" to the beneficiary via a will, as inferred from the Plaintiff's submission itself, doesn't occur until the executor has assented to the disposition and until that time the beneficiary merely has the right to have the estate administered. Even in the case of specific devises such is still the ordering of steps by which property is transferred to a beneficiary: there must be an assent to the disposition by the executor. Until that time the offspring were not entitled to call for the legal ownership of the property and could not deal with its beneficial ownership which was retained fully by the executors to administer the estate: beneficial ownership would only pass on the assenting to the disposition by the will, not the death itself which made dispositions contingent upon it subject to debt extinguishment. Notwithstanding this the Trial Court held:

"Here, the Taxpayer's Will appointed the Plaintiff executrix and trustee and left all his property to the Plaintiff in trust for his wife and children. Therefore, upon his death the legal title to his property vested in the trustee to assist her to manage and administer the estate and the equitable or beneficial title vested in the beneficiaries. The Taxpayer had in this way divested himself of ownership in his property. In this instance, the creation of a valid will passing the Taxpayer's property to his spouse and children is a sufficient "transfer" for purposes of s. 70(9). The fact that the "residue" of the estate was left to the children does not, in my opinion, change the character of the property entitled to the roll-over. Surely Parliament did not intend that a specific bequest of each item of farm land and depreciable property be made before a "farm roll-over" could occur, the object of s. 70(9) being to provide a measure of tax relief when transferring these assets from one generation to another.

The Defendant, and the Tax Court below in Boger v. M.N.R., 89 D.T.C. 15 at 20, rely on Hrycej to support the position that, because the property was sold directly by the executrix in her capacity as executrix, "there was no transfer or distribution of the land to the children of the deceased". In Hrycej, the deceased taxpayer's will gave his daughter an option to purchase certain farm equipment which, if not exercised within a specified period, would fall into the residue of the estate left to his widow. the daughter exercised the option and the widow received the cash proceeds of sale. the estate claimed a s. 70(6) roll-over on the basis that the widow had been vested with the equipment upon the death of the taxpayer, however, Rip T.C.J., held that, because the farm equipment was subject to the option it was not vested in the widow. Although Rip T.C.J. stated that "the farm equipment was never transferred or distributed to the wife", I note that a specific finding on the transferred or distributed issue was not in fact made as the parties admitted that the farm equipment "remained in the possession of the executors and was not transferred or distributed to Mrs. Hrycej."

Finally, [at p. 5368] Clement, D.J. in Hillis also appears to have recognized that a formal conveyance may not be necessary:

"In effect the spouse must be able to establish that in law in the circumstances of the case the property vested indefeasibly in her within the prescribed 15 months. In the whole of the context it is clear that it is not necessary that actual conveyance of the property to her shall have been completed within that time: if she makes the required proof, then in law the conveyancing must follow as a matter of course and of right. What must inevitably occur is to be taken as having occurred. this interpretation affords an intelligible reconciliation of the phrase with the preceding phrase which speaks of property that has on or after the death been transferred or distributed: it gives some recognition to the difficulties and complexities attendant in some cases on the due administration and distribution of estate and which may have to be resolved, particularly when the construction and operation of a will is contested, before distribution can be made."

I find that the sale of the farm land to a third party by the trustee, was upon the direction and consent of the children and that she was not acting on behalf of the Taxpayer at that time but on behalf of the children as beneficial owners of the land. I note that, following the Order, title to the Home Quarter was transferred to the spouse on January 8, 1982. Presumably, title to the remaining farm lands could have been transferred as well to the beneficiaries when they were sold in August, 1982 and I accept the Plaintiff's explanation that title was not transferred to the children in accordance with "usual estate practice in Alberta". I therefore accept that "transfer or distribute" includes the passing of property under a Will and I am satisfied that the property was "transferred" to the Taxpayer's children in the sense required by s. 70(9)."

This situation should be compared to *C.L. Leonhardt Estate v. M.N.R.*⁶⁴⁵ where the Sec. 70(9.1) roll out of farm property from a spousal trust was attempted to be used. The property was to be divided amongst the kids after the spouse's death and when such occurred there was passage of a substantial period of time before the property was sold and the proceeds directly paid to the appropriate beneficiaries. The Minister contended that there hadn't been a transfer within the context of Sec. 70(9.1) since there wasn't a legal title conveyance while Judge Bonner provided:

645. 1990 1 C.T.C. 2198, (TCC)

"Nothing in the agreed statement of facts suggests that debts of Julius Leonhardt remained to be paid at the time of the death of Agnes Leonhardt or that there was anything else to be done by the executor save to convey legal title to the children. It is of course clear that legal title remained in the executor's hands at all times prior to the sale of the farm in 1984. On the other hand, the agreement for sale named the executor as vendor but provided for the division of the purchase price among the beneficiaries of the estate of Julius Leonhardt. As I see it the appellants have failed to establish the factual basis for the assertion that the only property which passed on the death of Agnes Leonhardt was a right to require due administration of the estate.

Counsel for the appellants turned next to the statutory requirement that on the death of the spouse the property be transferred or distributed to and become vested indefeasibly in the children. He referred to authorities including *Executors of the Estate of David Fasken v. M.N.R.*² and J.S.D. Tory Estate v. M.N.R.,³ as to the meaning of the word 'transfer' and he submitted that a change in ownership and conveyance is required. Nothing in the cases referred to is authority for the proposition that subsection 70(9.1) will operate to effect a roll-over only if, on the death of the spouse, there is a prompt conveyance to the children of the legal title of the property. I find no basis in the language of the subsection for such a construction. If it were so read, a capricious and illogical limitation on its operation would be imposed."⁶⁴⁶

The property transferred to the spouse/spousal trust may or may not be identical to the property owned by the testator at the time of death. The Department has held privately that where a legal life interest is given to the spouse with remainders to the offspring in the same property the Sec. 70(6) provision will apply to the entirety of the property. In a Technical Interpretation provided in June 1984 however the Non-Corporate Rulings Division provided that where a corporation was to suffer a dissolution upon the death of the taxpayer even though his shares were otherwise transferred to a spousal trust the Sec. 70(6) provision would not apply to them. If the corporation is wound-up as a consequence of death the shares can't vest indefeasibly in the spousal trust but if the dissolution is to be effected by the trustees upon the receipt of the shares indefeasible vesting for purposes of Sec. 70(6) will occur. What happens subsequently due to the directions in the trust deed doesn't reflect upon the conditions attached to the delivery of the property to the trustees. In T.I. A-5846 of Oct. 1981 rendered by the same Division it was held (correctly) that a shareholders' agreement that required an exchange of common shares by the estate for preferred shares via section 86 after which the special shares would be distributed to the spouse would prevent indefeasible vesting. In another T.I. provided in March 1981 it was held by the same Division that a redemption option of a corporation which could be exercised to redeem shares of a testator passing to his spouse did not prevent the indefeasible vesting of the ownership of the shares in the spouse, even though such clearly wasn't the case.⁶⁴⁷ The discretionary exercise of this option apparently allows the provisions to apply though if the redeeming was mandatory such would not occur.

The Use of Testamentary Options and those Dangerous Words "Buy" and "Sell".

It would appear that property transferred to a spouse directly may need to be transferred other than under the pretence of the exercise of a testamentary option to acquire estate property since upon the exercise of the option a sale would occur. These cases pivot on the instances where the testator has used the coinage "buy" and "sell" estate property to transfer it to her beneficiaries. This was the opinion of the Tax Court in *Penner v. M.N.R.*⁶⁴⁸ where the applicability of Sec. 70(9) to farm property transfers was restricted when the property

⁶⁴⁶ See also Lewis Estate v. M.N.R., 89 D.T.C. 291 (TCC), where possession also was recognized to be unnecessary providing:

"If vesting indefeasibly in possession as well as in interest was intended by Parliament it could have easily expressed that intent in clear and unambiguous words."

⁶⁴⁷ This provides an interesting alternative to the straight buy-sell which would prevent indefeasible vesting: if the share structure is such that classes of shares can be redeemed in certain situations to cause the same as a buy-sell Sec. 70(6) could be accessed.

⁶⁴⁸ 84 D.T.C. 1444

was acquired by way of an option and not a direct bequest, charged or otherwise.⁶⁴⁹ In respect of Sec. 70(6) if the spouse had been given an option to acquire property from a spousal trust to which the property of the deceased had been conveyed there would be no tax consequences in respect of Sec. 70(6).⁶⁵⁰

The validity of the dicta in Penner, and the case law it was based upon, is definitely subject to criticism when one reviews *Perpetual Exors. and Trustees Assc. of Aust. Ltd. v. Commr. of Probate Duties*⁶⁵¹ and *O'Neill v. O'Connell*⁶⁵² both cases of the Australian courts that have not gained attention in the U.K. or Canada that consist of an exhaustive evaluation of a multitude of U.K./Aust./N.Z. cases from various courts concerning testamentary options concluding with persuasive dicta to the effect that property is received in the capacity of a beneficiary when the option is exercised. Both cases deal specifically with the issue of statutory exemptions/roll-overs of the character in Sec. 70(6).

In O'Neill v. O'Connell a testator left land and directed that it be converted though his offspring was to be allowed the chance to "purchase" it (similar to the diction in Coleman Trust v. M.N.R.) from the executors for a price expressed in the will. The option was exercised and such a "purchase" purportedly directly contravened a certain provision of the National Security Regulations restricting purchases. In that Act there were specific provisions that exempted the restrictions on transfers "the purpose of which is to vest any property, or any interest in property, in any person beneficially entitled thereto or by virtue of any will or intestacy". Counsel for the beneficiary contended that the exercise was to satisfy a condition attached to a gift and that no contract had been entered into to purchase; the executors were bound by the terms of the will to convey and the land devolved to the beneficiary by the machinery of a testamentary gift. Speaking of the executors' and beneficiary's duties and rights Starke J. held:

"By the exercise of his option O'Neill became entitled, upon payment of the sum mentioned by the testator, to call for a transfer of the land and to an equitable interest therein (London and South Western Railway Co. v. Gomm.⁶⁵³). And it would be the duty of the personal representative of the testator to make this transfer in a due administration of the testator's estate, e.g., after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses. This duty arises not from any agreement or contract made by the personal representative of the testator, but from the disposition of the testator coupled with the exercise by Daniel O'Neill of the option given to him. No action would lie against the personal representative at law for the breach of any contract with the person to whom the option was given; the remedy for any refusal to carry out the disposition in the testator's codicil would be founded upon equitable principles.

...
A testator does not enter into transactions with anyone⁶⁵⁴, he makes dispositions of his property which in the case of devises of land often operated of their own force and still do in some cases: Cf. *Robertson v. Deputy Federal Commissioner of Land Tax*⁶⁵⁵. O'Neill

⁶⁴⁹ The will in Penner offered the taxpayer the right "to purchase my farm land for the sum of 100$ an acre.." and in the author's opinion the fact that the term "purchase" was used could be argued to imply that the taxpayer could have the title abstracted and not subject to the estate debt hence receive as purchaser albeit not subject to any contract: if the terms "receive my farm land upon the payment of 100$ an acre" were to have been employed it could more easily be interpreted to mean the taxpayer to receive a bequest subject to a condition precedent subject to abatement.

⁶⁵⁰ As previously stated the Department considers as per I.T. 349R2, para. 6, that a sale called for by the will will be recognized as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer if it satisfies the description of the transaction under Sec. 248(8) though it's important to recognize that this opinion was expressed in the frame of transfers as a consequence of death, not as to how the property is received. Obviously when the beneficiary has the ability to abstract the title of the property and obtain it without effect of estate debt it does not acquire as a beneficiary and thus does not acquire as a beneficiary within the context of the roll-over subsections. A very similar opinion was expressed in Coleman Trust v. M.N.R., 87 D.T.C. 664 previously discussed.

⁶⁵¹ 1981 V.R. 91

⁶⁵² 1946 72 C.L.R. 101

⁶⁵³ 1882 20 Ch. D. 562

⁶⁵⁴ This is in direct opposition with Lord Denning M.R. in Re: Harmsworth where he held: "I am disposed myself to think there is a contract here. Sir Leicester made an offer through his executors to his wife, just as much as if he had directed them to make it: and she accepted it when she accepted the conditional bequest. Even if there is no contract, however, I think there was a purchase..."

⁶⁵⁵ 1941 65 C.L.R. 338 at 347

purchased nothing, he took no option, he acquired nothing by any transaction with the testator or with his personal representatives. The terms of the testamentary disposition and the exercise by O'Neill of his option gave him whatever interest he has in the land."

Dixon J. gave more detailed analysis holding:

"The manner in which the option in the present case is expressed makes it plain that it was intended to confer upon the appellant an immediate right, if he should so elect, to become the owner of the land at the fixed price of 6,500$. Such a provision imparts to the donee of the option a beneficial right in reference to or an interest in the land. Substantially the same result might have been produced by a devise of the land conditional upon the devisee paying the sum named. A not very different result might have been produced by a direction to the executors or trustees to propose a contract of sale to the intended donee of the option upon the terms and conditions stated in the will or to be settled in some manner indicated by the will.

But in form the disposition now in question stands between a conditional devise and a direction to propose a contract. It gives an immediate, though innominate, beneficial interest, one of the many miscellaneous rights and interests which under the wide power of testamentary disposition allowed by English law a testator may create.

...

The donee of the option, by electing to take the property at the price fixed or upon the terms indicated by the will, incurs an equitable duty to preform the condition upon which, under the provisions of the will, he becomes entitled to the property: Cf. Attorney-General v. Wax Chandlers' Co. 1873 L.R. 6 H.L. 1 at 19; Messenger v. Andrews 1828 4 Russ. 478/38 E.R. 885. The obligation is independent of contract.

The exercise of a testamentary option by the donee makes absolute his right to the property, except in so far as the will makes payment of the price or the performance of any other obligation laid upon him an essential condition. His position becomes, of course, very similar to that of a purchaser. Indeed, questions have been raised as to how far, in connection with what may be called verification of title, rules implied upon an open contract of sale are applicable as between him and the executors or trustees of the will. But though it has been said that there "must be taken to be" the elements of contract, the relation does not rest upon contract. The executors' obligation arises from the terms of the will, not from any contractual promises made by them in exchange for promises made by the donee of the option. Of such promises there are none on either side.⁶⁵⁶ If a will, upon its proper interpretation, confers upon the donee of an option a right, upon exercising his option, to call upon the executors to give him a contract for the better evidencing or definition of his rights, a possible case where there are long terms of purchase, the execution of the contract may place the donee of the option on the actual footing of a contractual purchaser in all respects. But until the contract is entered into the rights of the executors and the beneficiary exercising the option do not arise ex contractu but depend upon the provisions of the will and the doctrines of equity operating upon the will. Considering the matter apart from the effect of the National Security (Economic Organization) Regulations, it appears to me that on the death of the testator the appellant became entitled to the option as an interest in or beneficial right in relation to the land. By his notices exercising the option he became entitled to the land subject to paying the purchase money and upon payment to call for a transfer."

Judge Williams pursued an exhaustive analysis of the case law pertaining to the ranking, nature and foundation of the optionee's rights in relation to those of other beneficiaries providing:

⁶⁵⁶ In re: Malpass, 1985 1 Ch. 42 at 49, citing Talbot v. Talbot, 1968 Ch. 1, Sir Robert Megarry V.C. held that in the case of a "direct gift of an option, the nature of the option sounds in the field of contract where it is present in terms of an offer and acceptance" and citing Harman L.J. in Talbot:

"...the principles of contract seem to me to apply to it, because the person given a property under a testamentary option obtains it by exercising the option and entering into a contract in that behalf with the executors."

He also held that where the option is framed in terms of an offer and acceptance its contractual nature seems to be a fortiori.

"The Chief Justice considered that an option given by a will to purchase property does not in itself and independently of its exercise give an equitable interest in that property, whether or not the right of the optionee can properly be described as itself being property; and that it is only if the option is exercised, and if in the proper course of administration the executors are in a position to make and do make a contract of sale to the optionee, that the optionee will then under the contract obtain an equitable interest in the property in respect of which the option is given. But with respect, I am unable to agree with this view. The authorities establish in my opinion that an option to purchase land whether created by an instrument inter vivos or by a will creates an immediate equitable interest in the land.⁶⁵⁷ A donee of an option to purchase land given by a will is a beneficiary of that beneficial interest.⁶⁵⁸ The executors have as against him the same overriding common law or statutory power as they have against a devisee to sell the land to pay the funeral and testamentary expenses, death duties and debts of the deceased. But the donee of the option is still entitled to exercise the option, and upon such exercise and performance of its conditions to follow the proceeds of sale in the hands of the executors.⁶⁵⁹ As Lord Romilly said in *Ex parte Hardy*⁶⁶⁰ referring to a compulsory purchase of land subject to such an option: "The option will remain, whether the fund continues, as it is, in stock, or is invested in land." This is because the option creates an equitable interest in the land at the date of death. The donee, therefore, upon exercising the option in accordance with the conditions contained in the will, acquires against the executors, irrespective of whether a contract is entered into or not, all the rights intended to be thereby conferred upon him, and if a contract is entered into, it cannot override, but will be subject to these conditions.⁶⁶¹ In this case, in the Court below, the option was described by Sir W. Page Wood, as he then was, as a trust to convey the property to the optionee provided he complied with conditions of the option, and in *Radnor (Earl of) v. Shafto*⁶⁶² Lord Eldon pointed out that the remedy of the optionee would be to bring suit to administer the trust. Thus, an option has been described by Lord St. Leonards in his book on Vendors and Purchasers, in a passage cited with approval in *In re: Davison and Torrens*⁶⁶³, as in substance a devise of the estate itself if the favoured objects elects to take it and in Williams on Vendor and Purchaser, 4th Ed. (1936) at p. 571, note(m), it is stated that "in order that an option to purchase land may be well exercised, the terms of the ... devise, which created the option, must in all respects be strictly pursued": Cf. also Seton's Judgments and Orders, 7th ed. (1912) vol. 2 at pp. 1487, 1488."

and concluded essentially that the optionee acquires a beneficial interest in the land and that this overrides the executors' power of sale until its exercised or forfeited. He also held that a contract need not be entered into to fulfil the terms of the devise.⁶⁶⁴

In Perp. Exors. and Trustees v. Commr. of Probate Duties, a partnership interest was the subject of an option to purchase given by the will and probate duty would not be applicable to it if it "passed" to persons related by blood or marriage to the deceased. The option was exercised and the executors contended that probate duty wasn't payable on the devise. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Victoria Booking J. held:

"It has been said that a testamentary option to purchase property is not a devise or bequest of property (Sharp v. The Union Trustee Co. of Aust. Ltd. 1944 69 C.L.R. 539 at 557 per Williams J.). On the other hand, a testamentary option to purchase land has been described as in the ⁶⁵⁷ Oppenheimer v. Minister of Transport, 1942 1 K.B. 242, In Re; Cant's Estate, 1859 4 DeG. & J. 503/45 E.R. 196, In Re; Kelly, 1889 W.N. (Eng.) 3, In Re: Armstrong's Will Trusts, 1943 Ch. 400, Commr. of Taxes v. Camphin, 1937 57 C.L.R. 127, Trustees Exors. & Agency Co. Ltd. v. F.C.T., 1944 69 C.L.R. 270, at 285. inter vivos options do create such interests as per the Supreme Court of Canada as well: Davidson v. Norstrant, 61 S.C.R. 493.

⁶⁵⁸ Re: Busby, 1930 30 S.R.(N.S.W.) 399

⁶⁵⁹ In Re: Armstrong's Will Trusts, supra.

⁶⁶⁰ 1861 30 Beav. 206 at p.208/54 E.R. 867 at 868.

⁶⁶¹ Brooke v. Garrod, 1857 3 K. & J. 608/ 44 E.R. 911.

⁶⁶² 1805 11 Ves. 448 at 454/ 32 E.R. 1160 at 1162.

⁶⁶³ 1866 17 Ir. Ch. 7 at 10

⁶⁶⁴ Could it be inferred from the reasoning that if the taxpayer's right to acquire the land cannot be abated in the case of excessive testamentary debt he does not stand in the capacity of a beneficiary?

nature of a conditional gift and as an executory devise (Oliver v. Oliver 1958 99 C.L.R. 20 at p. 26, per McTiernan, J.) and the grant of an option to take specific property, including real estate, in satisfaction of a share of residue has been held to be equivalent to a specific devise of the equitable fee in that real estate: Re Jolly 1901 17 T.L.R. 244; doubted in Re Lander decd., Lander v. Lander, 1951 Ch. 546 at p. 552. Eve J. appears to have been of opinion that one who acquired land by reason of a testamentary option could properly be described as taking under the will: Re Cockerill, 1929 2 Ch. 131 at p. 134.

In England the opinion has been expressed that upon the exercise of a testamentary option to purchase a contract of sale comes into existence: In re Eve, 1956 Ch. 479, at p.482; Re Harmsworth; Barclays Bank v. I.R.C., 1967 Ch. 826, at pp. 832, 851, 855,⁶⁶⁵; Talbot v. Talbot, 1968 Ch. 1, at p. 10,⁶⁶⁶; compare Pritchard (1974) 38 Conveyancer and Property Lawyer 8, at pp.18-9. In Australia this view has been rejected, it having been authoritatively laid down that the exercise of such an option does not itself give rise to any contract, the rights of the executors and the beneficiary exercising the option arising not from contract but from the provisions of the will and the operation of the doctrines of equity upon those provisions: O'Neill v. O'Connell, 1946 72 C.L.R. 101.

...

In Re Wilson, supra, there was a gift by will of the whole estate to trustees upon trust for sale and a codicil directing them "to allow" the testator's son "the option of purchasing" certain freeholds at a stated price. At (1908 1 Ch. 839) p.843 Warrington, J. had this to say of the codicil: "Reading that power in connection with the trust for sale and conversion which is given to the trustees, the trustees, having that power to sell to anyone they please, are bound in the first place to offer this property to the son. If he desires to have it and if he exercises his option, in my opinion he elects to become a purchaser and must be taken to have made an offer to the trustees which they are bound to accept and must be taken to have accepted. If they do not expressly accept it, it will be taken by intendment of the law that they have done so as if it was their duty to do so. Thus it will be inferred from the facts that there is a contract by the trustees to sell and by the son to purchase the houses."

Whatever the position may be where the testator in terms directs his trustees to propose a contract of sale to a specified person, a situation envisaged by Dixon, J. in O'Neill v. O'Connell 1946 72 C.L.R. 101 at pp. 119-20 and one concerning which I express no opinion, I am not prepared on the authority of the observations of Warrington J. set out above, to hold that in the present case a contract of sale arose upon the exercise of the option. It may be possible to distinguish Re Wilson, supra, as an example of a direction to the trustees to propose a contract for sale. In my opinion the judgments of the Full High Court in O'Neill v. O'Connell, supra, make it impossible to regard the observations of Warrington J. as correctly stating the effect of the exercise of the option with which I am concerned, to the extent to which ⁶⁶⁵ In Re: Harmsworth concerned what could be described as a textbook illustration of a conditional bequest and in that case the Court of Appeal held that there had been "a purchase" of a reversionary interest in an inter vivos trust fund settled by the devisee as a condition to receive the bequest. In the Chancery Buckley J. held that a purchase and sale need not be founded on a contract and that the fact that one party or the other is obliged to sell to the other does not negative the mutual intention of the parties to execute the type of transfer, and giving the case of a testamentary option as an illustration of the executors' obligations to make the sale held that in such a case there would be a mutuality of intention. Harman L.J. in the Appeal Court held that an option exercised forms a contract between the executors and the beneficiary. The conditional bequest was found to have placed the beneficiary and the executors in the purchaser-seller relationship.

⁶⁶⁶ Valuation of the property for purchase consideration was at issue and Harman J. held:
"Principally they say (and I think that really this is the pith and marrow of their plea) that this is a contract too vague to be entertained or specifically enforced by the court. I say "contract" because a testamentary option is something which potentially can become a contract on its exercise at any time by the person holding the option, and so the principles of contract seem to me to apply to it, because the person given a property under a testamentary option obtains it by exercising the option and entering into a contract in that behalf with the executors. That was decided, if there is need for authority, by this court the other day in Re: Harmsworth..."

Russell L.J. found the option to be a benefit/right conferred by the will the duties of the executor to take what steps are necessary to confer that benefit. See also In re: Price, 1950 Ch. 242, for quasi purchaser status.

those observations suggest that a contract of sale arises upon the exercise of the option."

He further held that, pursuant to O'Neill v. O'Connell, the donee of a testamentary option takes on the death an immediate equitable interest in the property⁶⁶⁷, that the obligation to be performed by the devisee is not contractual but equitable and the terms of the will govern the passage of title⁶⁶⁸, and that the executors' obligations arise from "the operation of the doctrines of equity upon the provisions of the will" and that "the exercise of the option does not give rise to any contract between the executors and the donee, though they may in fact in a particular case subsequently enter into a contract."

Concerning whether such a transfer was within the context of "pass" in the exempting provision⁶⁶⁹ he concluded:

"In my opinion, where there is a disposition by will, property may "pass" within the meaning of para.

(b) whether the disposition is by way of unconditional gift, or by way of gift subject to a condition requiring the donee to incur some detriment, (be it a detriment of a value that is less than or equals or exceeds the value of the property given), or by way of option to purchase. I see no difference, for the present purposes, between the grant to the brother of an option to purchase at the probate valuation and a gift to the brother upon condition that he pay to the executors, or to the residuary beneficiary, a specified sum (small or large) or the amount of the probate valuation of the property given.

In the result I have concluded that upon the exercise of the option to purchase by the giving of the notice dated 25 March 1974 the interest in the partnership which formed part of the estate of the deceased passed to the brother within the meaning of s. 24(7)(b), since by giving that notice the brother determined his election to take the property in question under the will upon the terms laid down in the will."

In Penner the Tax Court based its conclusion on the precedents of two English cases; *In re: Wilson*⁶⁷⁰ & *In re: Eve*⁶⁷¹ and did not examine case law other than these two cases. In the author's opinion pursuant to the jurisprudence above directly on the point the right the beneficiary acquires under the will without reference to the actions of the executors and not based on their actions taken is acquired as a testamentary gift and upon its exercise the terms of the will and not the terms of any contract would compel the trustees/executors to convey the property. There may not even be a contract entered into with the executor and by the terms of the testamentary disposition the option was acquired, not through negotiation with the testator or his executor while the executor's obligations arise under the will, not due to a contractual inter vivos arrangement.⁶⁷²

The treatment of testamentary options is very inequitable given the administrative liberal interpretations afforded FLA results and when one considers that in many instances, (such as Sec. 69(1.1)(b)), the Act recognizes that the beneficiary may have to make payments to obtain the bequest. Is there such a difference between a condition precedent requiring payment and a testamentary option requiring payment fiscally speaking that allows favourable treatment in respect of the former and not in respect of the latter? In the author's opinion the taxpayer in Penner folded too easily; especially given the case law available, and the Tax Court does not in this instance provide authoritative jurisprudence.

667 citing Cox v. Archer, 110 C.L.R. 1

668 failing the creation of an ancillary contract for such, as cited in O'Neill v. O'Connell, in the author's opinion

669 which could be equally relevant in respect of Sec. 70(6) and Sec. 70(3)

670 1908 1 Ch. 839

671 1956 Ch. 479

672 There has been no authoritative Canadian jurisprudence (that the author knows of) as to which country's law will be followed: Penner decided in the Tax Court is not authority in the author's opinion. Esders v. New Zealand Guardian Trust Co, 1 N.Z.L.R. 723 HC, illustrates various ranks of property/equitable interests where a testamentary option was arrested mid-exercise and some beneficiaries placed caveats on the underlying property, though is not reflective of the issue as to the true nature of the interest to act in the hands of the beneficiary.

On or after his death and as a consequence thereof and its implications.

In order for the Sec. 70(6) provision to apply to testamentary dispositions the subject property must have been owned by the deceased (in his personal capacity) and it must have "on or after his death and as a consequence thereof" been transferred to the spousal trust.⁶⁷³ The above phrase occurs in the Sec. 108(1)(i),(ii) and (iii) definition of testamentary trust whereby such contributions by any taxpayer will not taint an otherwise testamentary trust⁶⁷⁴. Whether or not a particular transfer is a testamentary disposition, ("as a consequence thereof"), was the issue in *National Trust Company and Robertshaw v. Robertshaw et al.*⁶⁷⁵ where a testator had previously contributed sums to an R.R.S.P. the designated beneficiary of which was his spouse whom he later divorced.⁶⁷⁶ While approaching death the testator transferred funds to the particular R.R.S.P. the terms of which made the divorced spouse the principal beneficiary upon his death. On his death, as per his will the standard opening phrase consisted of:

"I...hereby revoke all former testamentary dispositions made by me and declare this to be my ---- last will.",

while at the same time providing that his offspring were to be the beneficiaries of the particular R.R.S.P.. The former spouse contended that this would be impossible since the set-up of the R.R.S.P. was an inter vivos gift and that the opening phrase of the will could not operate to revoke it. Boyd L.J.S.C. of the B.C. Supreme Court attempted to resolve the main issue: whether the set up of the R.R.S.P. was a testamentary disposition thus revocable by will, and quoted from *Cock v. Cooke*⁶⁷⁷ concerning the description of a testamentary disposition:

"...whatever may be the form of a duly executed instrument, if the person executing it intends that it shall not take effect until after his death, and it is dependent upon his death for its vigour and effect, it is testamentary."

The plaintiffs maintained that the R.R.S.P. designation was a testamentary disposition since its revocation could have been operative until death, did not affect the property in the R.R.S.P. until the death, and conferred no right or interest upon the former spouse until the death, however the Judge thought otherwise:

"Notwithstanding the plaintiffs' counsel's able submission, I am not convinced that the designation in question amounts to a testamentary disposition. In my opinion, although the designation was revocable until death, and although there was no provision in the agreement requiring that the consent of the beneficiary be obtained before revocation, it does not necessarily follow that the designation was entirely dependent upon death to be effective. Rather, in my opinion, an immediate interest, albeit a contingent future interest, may well have been conferred upon the annuitant's wife by way of an inter vivos trust, when the plan was established."

Quoting from *Corlet v. Isle of Man Bank*⁶⁷⁸ concerning the validity of a non-testamentary disposition in the form of an inter vivos trust the comment of Ford, A.J. was noted:

"The fallacy in the argument based upon the "oft quoted words" of Sir J.P. Wilde in Cock v. Cooke, (1866) L.R. 1 P. & D. 241, lies in a misunderstanding of what the words "vigour and effect" are applicable to. They are clearly applicable not to the result to be obtained by, or to the performance of, the terms of the instrument, but to the instrument itself. The question is whether the instrument has vigour to effect, and does effect, or is "consummate" to create a trust praesenti, though to be performed after the death of donor it is not dependent upon his death for its vigour

673. In Penner v. M.N.R., 84 D.T.C. 1444, the Tax Court interpreted the term "consequence" as having the meaning provided by Black's Law Dictionary: "Consequence: The result following in natural sequence from an event which is adapted to produce, or to aid in producing, such result: - the correlative of "cause"."

674 while incidentally it should be noted that the spousal trust described under Sec. 70(6) need not be "testamentary" in the technical sense of the word but could receive contributions inter vivos from other taxpayers though thus suffering highest arbitrarily set tax rates as per Sec. 122(1)

675 [1986] 5 W.W.R. 695 (BCSC)

676 The R.R.S.P. administered by a trust company had been held judicially in the past to be an inter vivos trust created for the benefit of its designated beneficiaries. See also McFadden v. Public Trustee for Vic., 1981 1 N.S.W.L.R. 15, Commr. of Prob. Duties v. Mitchell, 105 C.L.R. 126, Re: Reynolds, 1931 V.L.R. 254, Shannon v. Shannon et al., 1985 50 O.R. 456, though Ralna Ltd. et al. v. Can. Life Assurance Co., 1985 51 O.R. 781. Such arrangements presently pass an interest while a will or potential trust under a will will not.

677 (1866) L.R. 1 P. & D. 241

678 [1937], 2 W.W.R. 209

and effect."

In Robertshaw the arrangement was found not to constitute a testamentary disposition though the case itself provides an excellent illustration of some of the concepts underlying the phrase "on or after and as a consequence of death".⁶⁷⁹

The spousal trust must also be created as per the terms of the taxpayer's will. In *Re: White*⁶⁸⁰ the High Court of Justice had to decide whether a disposition of property was testamentary or inter vivos in nature and Judge Oyen referred to *Carson et al. v. Wilson et al.*⁶⁸¹ and *Govenors & Guardian of Foundling Hospital v. Crane*⁶⁸² as well as *Habergham v. Vincent*⁶⁸³ quoting from the latter:

"But those cases have established, that an instrument, in any form, whether a deed poll, or indenture, if the obvious purpose is not to take place till after the death of the person making it, shall operate as a will. The cases for that are both at law and in equity; and in one of them --- there were express words of immediate grant and a consideration to support it as a grant; but, as upon the whole intention, that it should have a future operation after death, it was considered as a will."⁶⁸⁴

The ability to revoke the instrument is critical and if a contract is binding then it can't be testamentary: Palmer v. Bank of N.S.W.,⁶⁸⁵

In order for the property to gain subsection 70(6) treatment on the other hand it must have been owned by the deceased as per the phrase "where any property of a taxpayer...", however, one should also recognize that no such qualification exists with respect to the type of property that can be listed in the process of untainting a tainted spousal trust under the Sec. 70(7)(b) mechanics by virtue of the fact that the phrase describing the potential property to be listed concerns "one or more specified properties...that have, on or after the taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof, been transferred or distributed to the trust." Listing property which was conveyed under a testamentary exercise of a power of appointment will thus reduce the testator's tax consequences otherwise recognizable without causing additional ones to be recognized. The Sec. 70(6) phrase recognizes that such a transfer or distribution must occur on or after the taxpayer's death but the provision itself is silent as to how much time after the death the treatment will be allowed to a transfer occurring subsequently. As per the jurisprudence it must be capable of being established that vesting of the property in the trust has occurred within the statutory 36 month period. Specific bequests vest indefeasibly upon death while non specific bequests vest when the rights thereto of the beneficiaries have been established. By the fact that the phrase "on or after and as a consequence of death" reads as it does both types of bequests qualify.

Subparagraph 70(5)(c), the opening preamble of Sec. 70(5.1), 70(5.2)(d) & (f), 70(6) etc. all provide treatment to property that is transferred or distributed as a consequence of death and although buy-sell agreements, testamentary options (of a certain character), etc. may all cause a taxpayer to acquire a testator's property the ultimate transfer of legal title of the property will not be within the context "transfer or distribute" in the subsections since such relates to recipients receiving exclusively in the capacity of a beneficiary. There is a major difference however between purchasing property from an estate and purchasing the beneficiary's rights under that estate to receive that property and it would appear that if a spouse purchases offspring's rights under an unadministered estate property ultimately realized will gain Sec. 70(6) treatment since the property is being transferred or distributed as a consequence of death to a person who is receiving it in the ⁶⁷⁹ See also Re: Estate of Isles, 1947 47 S.R. (N.S.W.) 33.

⁶⁸⁰ 1987 59 O.R. (2d) 488

⁶⁸¹ 1961 O.R. 113

⁶⁸² [1911] 2 K.B. 367

⁶⁸³ (1793) 2 Ves. 204

⁶⁸⁴ See Re: Shepperd, 1893 5 Q.L.J. 116, Re: Reid, 1893 5 Q.L.J. 120, Re: Northcliffe, 1925 Ch. 651, Re: Dawson, 1890 24 S.A.L.R. 92, Re: Greenwood, 1918 Q.S.R. 58, & Beyer v. Beyer, 1960 V.R. 126, and In Re: Estate of Slavinsky, 1988 53 S.A.S.R. 221. The University of Saskatchewan has on display a red tractor fender that was ascribed with a key by a farmer who had lost an appendage in the field: great example of a holographic will.

⁶⁸⁵ 7 A.L.R. 671

capacity of a beneficiary. If this is the case, as the author thinks it is, then the interaction of Sec. 107(2), (1) and 70(6) in respect of the taxation of capital gains, breaks down and the spouse should not pay more than the tax cost of the property expected to be received in respect of the interest since Sec. 107(2) being inapplicable will not allow a bump up in the cost thereof however CRA may attack such transactions with Sec. 69(1) since rarely will the tax cost of the estate property equal its FMV however litigation over application of various Dependant/Family Relief/Maintenance Acts may adjust the FMV of the interest and the applications need not be followed up. Subsection 70(6.2) may be used to elect for Sec. 70(5) treatment for the testator in respect of certain property in order to allow Sec. 107(2) to operate but a multitude of factors need to be considered.

Subsection 248(8) broadens considerably, for purposes of the Act, the meaning of "as a consequence of the taxpayer's death". Paragraph (a) therein provides that any transfer, distribution or acquisition of property under, or as a consequence of the terms of the will or other testamentary document or as a consequence of intestacy law will be considered such as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer. This obviously allows conditions to be stacked in respect of any bequest without the bequest's receipt being considered as a consequence of the satisfaction of the condition and not due to the death. Transfers in specie made pursuant to intestacy court orders will also gain such treatment but if specific property is transferred as a result of a settlement of an order based claim for a certain value, and not for certain property, it may not satisfy the conditions expressed in para. (a) since it isn't being transferred pursuant to the law since the order was for value, not for certain property. As previously commented upon at the beginning of this chapter, transfers, distributions or acquisitions as a consequence of a disclaimer, release or surrender by a person who was a beneficiary under the will, or other testamentary document or on the intestacy of the taxpayer will be considered as a consequence of the death if the relevant actions satisfy the descriptions in Sec. 248(9), while as per para. (c) the latter two will not cause the beneficiary to recognize a disposition. If the testator has contracted inter vivos with the spouse to roll certain property to the spousal trust, possibly to avoid an equalization election, that property may not gain Sec. 70(6) treatment since it is being rolled by the executors pursuant to an inter vivos obligation.⁶⁸⁶

The Department has been lenient in at least one instance in the application of Sec., 70(6) to transfers pursuant to variations in the testator's will such as in *Re: Ridall's Estate*⁶⁸⁷. In that case the testator left his farm property on trust the income of which was to be payable to his widow until her death or age 65 whichever the earlier with remainder interests vested contingently in his offspring. If an offspring did not survive until the widow attained the age of 65 or died there would be a gift over of the share to the offspring's offspring or to his siblings if he/she didn't leave offspring. The trust was not technically a spousal trust due to the life of the income interest and the taxpayers agreed to wind it up. A Variation of Trust Act application was made to delete the gift over provision whereby the offspring would wind the trust up whereby the widow would receive legal title of the property and when the Court of Queen's Bench recognized that such transactions, endorsed with an advance tax ruling received from the Minister, would reduce the estate's tax bill by approx. $250,000 and that arrangements had been made between the parties to convey the property subsequently to the offspring the deletion was executed.⁶⁸⁸ Subsection 70(6) was then applicable to the Saunders v. Vautier common law wind-up of the trust⁶⁸⁹ whereafter the property passed to the spouse but in the author's opinion the ITA provisions do not provide for such in that the property passed to the widow as a consequence of the wind-up, not as a consequence of the death. Subsection 248(8) does not provide that as a consequence of the wind-up of a trust created by the death of the taxpayer by the beneficiaries thereunder, property realized by the beneficiaries will be as a consequence of the death, though if they disclaim or release their interests so that the trust completely fails any subsequent realizations by the spouse or spousal trust will gain Sec. 70(6)

⁶⁸⁶ See Schaefer v. Schuhman, 1972-3 A.L.R. 501, and Robertson v. Ramsay, 1891 24 S.A.L.R. 112.

⁶⁸⁷ 24 Sask. R. 16

⁶⁸⁸ Compare this to the deletion attempted in Re: Assie Estate, 24 E.T.R. 278.

⁶⁸⁹ which was restricted prior to the statutory variation due to the lack of the ability of the minor grandchildren or non-existence children to consent treatment⁶⁹⁰.

Spousal Entitlement.

In order to be a qualifying recipient trust created under a testator's will the testator's spouse must be entitled to receive all of the income of the trust arising before her death and no one except the spouse may, before her death, receive or obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust.⁶⁹¹ Subsection 108(3) provides that "income" in the Sec. 70(6)(d)(i), but not the 70(6)(b)(ii), provision as well as that in Sec. 73(1), means income of the trust computed without reference to the Act, thus trust law income, but it shall not include dividends that have been included that are not included in computing taxable income by reason of section 83 that are qualifying or capital dividends, or are those described under Sec. 131(1) as certain capital gains dividends from mutual fund corporations. The provision thus requires the spouse to be entitled to received all of the trust law income computed as per the terms of the trust agreement/will or as per the previous accounting practices of the deceased/settlor, or as the court provides.⁶⁹²

"Income of a trust in certain provisions – Sec. 108(3)"

(3) For the purposes of the definition "income interest" in subsection (1), the income of a trust is its income computed without reference to the provisions of this Act and, for the purposes of the definition "pre-1972 spousal trust" in subsection (1) and paragraphs 70(6)(b) and (6.1)(b), 73(1.01)(c) and 104(4)(a), the income of a trust is its income computed without reference to the provisions of this Act, minus any dividends included in that income

(a) that are amounts not included by reason of section 83 in computing the income of the trust for the purposes of the other provisions of this Act;

(b) that are described in subsection 131(1); or

(c) to which subsection 131(1) applies by reason of subsection 130(2).

No Need for A Sec. 104(13) Inclusion.

The first main characteristic of a spousal trust is that the "spouse is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before" her death and on this wording, given that "income" in the context is trust law income the spouse would appear not to have to be entitled to receive the trust law income "arising" on an annual basis⁶⁹³. If trust law income is to be accumulated by the trust and distributed to her every third calendar year

690 if the disclaimer/release is made within the 36 months after the death

691. These are also the identified characteristics required of an inter vivos spousal trust.

692 Subsection 108(4) adds some flexibility in that it precludes a person from being regarded as receiving or obtaining the use of income or capital of an otherwise qualifying spousal trust described under Sec. 70(6)(b), 73(1)(c), or 104(4) by reason only of the payment or provision for the payment of, estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable as a consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any or the trust property, in respect of any interest in the trust, or any income or profits tax payable by the trust in respect of any of its income. Thus it is possible to charge the trust with the payment of inheritance or succession taxes paid with respect to the interest in, or the property received by, the trust but not with the payment of income taxes relating to such property or persons when the property or interest is received by them. The spouse must still, however, continue to be entitled to all of the trusts's income. In general the provision offers an attractive method of relieving an estate that's being administered from disposing of property to satisfy such claims in order that they will not be chargeable against a resulting spousal trust. The scope of Sec. 108(4) limited to Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) also creates the requirement that non-spousal beneficiaries be disallowed from receiving either tax law income or capital from the trust prior to the spouse's death.

Sec. 108(4)

(4) Trust not disqualified reason only of payment of certain duties and taxes. For greater certainty, for the purposes of subparagraphs 70(6)(b)(ii), 73(1)(c)(ii) and 104(4)(a)(iv), where a trust has been created by a taxpayer whether by his will or otherwise, a person, other than the taxpayer's spouse, shall be deemed not to have received or otherwise obtained or to be entitled to receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, by reason only of the payment, or provision for payment, as the case may be, by the trust of

(a) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable, in consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any property of, or interest in, the trust; or

(b) any income or profits tax payable by the trust in respect of any income of the trust.

693 See Trustees of The Mrs P L Travers Will Trust v Revenue & Customs [2013] UKFTT 436 (TC) for an interesting instance of where income was determined/directed to be capital by the settlor and consequently the trustees that caused substantial tax consequences. The case is replete with other case for consideration.

with the balance before her death will she be considered to be "entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before" her death? The ambiguity arising in interpreting the provision results from the fact that the Department has not applied diction similar to that used to transfer tax liabilities on the income as that described in Sec. 104(24) and (13)(a) but instead made the income to which the spouse must be entitled to trust law income as described in Sec. 108(3), thus it is entirely possible for her to be entitled to receive all of the income of the trust arising after a particular length of time but not be in the position to enforce a distribution thereof before that period of time which is the basis of the Sec. 104(13) income inclusion.⁶⁹⁴

Trust law income may not be in realizable form to allow it to be distributable to the spouse in a given period and trust law income was specifically recognized as the basis if her entitlement in accompany with the term "arises": since Part I income was statutorily exempted from Sec. 70(6) targeting how can it be for Sec. 104(13) inclusion? The Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) provision requires that she be entitled to receive all of the trust law income that arises before her death but by the very fact that the basis of the entitlement is trust law income and not Division B income it would appear that she may receive this "income" in any form including what would be considered tax capital in that some of the trust law income could be treated under tax law as capital. The provision does not state that she must receive the trust income, in her hands, as income, but she may receive it in her hands as capital after it has been accumulated by the trust, and thus turned into capital.⁶⁹⁵ This could prove very favorable given the effective tax rates of the trust when it is testamentary and the spouse when she's recognizing substantial income. If the draughtsman of the provision wanted the spouse to be captured under Sec. 104(13) in respect of the trust's tax income on a yearly basis then why didn't the provision's diction conform with that used in the Sec. 104(13) inclusion provision or that in the Sec. 104(24) "amount payable" definition?⁶⁹⁶

694. This certainly isn't the opinion of the Reorganizations and Non-Resident Division when in T.I. 911730 it provided that only the spouse must be the party who decides if she receives income in the year. In the author's opinion the trustees could have full discretionary power to determine the extent of income distributable to her given any concern for the on-going cash requirements of the trust without the spousal trust being disqualified. Cash income could be distributed immediately while book income would be distributed when the trustee feels that he has distributable proceeds on hand subsequently.

695 If it were otherwise that the spouse be entitled to enforce the distribution of trust law income, every trust that due to accounting methods computes a book income that in trust law is undistributable would be prevented from being a spousal trust. This can arise in many situations where book revenue is recognized without the realization of distributable proceeds and is commonly encountered when the trust carries on business activities.

696 Simply put, the Sec. 104(24) provision recognizes income payable and thus includable in income under Sec. 104(13) if the beneficiary was entitled in the year to enforce payment thereof while all Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) requires is that she be entitled to receive all of the trust law income arising before her death (...in any form). In the author's opinion this doesn't require her to recognize virtually all of the trust's Division B income under Sec. 104(13) on an annual basis since there may be periods where she doesn't have the entitlement to enforce a payment thereof in the period but may be in such a position every two years but then have the right to enforce a distribution of all of the trust's income that arose during the two years. The Non-Corporate Rulings Division in June 1983 provided in T.I. A-8234 a clause that could operate to allow trustees to withhold trust income and restrict a spouse's current entitlement to it should she become bankrupt would disallow Sec. 70(6) from applying to the trust even though the accumulated income could be payable to her estate upon her death. The fact that the income could be applied for her benefit indirectly by the trustees was also held irrelevant. In March 1980 the Division held concerning the instance where a trustee could withhold income from the spouse "There is, of course, no reason why income cannot be accumulated in the trust but if the trust is to be a spouse trust, a current entitlement to it cannot be withheld from the spouse." In Sept. 1981 the Non-Corporate Rulings Division provided to the Audit Programs Division that the fact that a spouse is entitled to only receive after tax income from the trust disallows the trust from being a spousal trust since "A spousal trust is never subject to tax on its income because all of the income is payable to the spouse each year." In Jan. 1983 the same Division held that "It is our opinion that as a consequence of the combined effects of subsections 70(6), 108(3), 104(24), 104(13) and 104(6) of the Act, the spouse is taxable upon the income (in the trust sense) of a qualifying spousal trust and, may or may not be taxable upon the remainder of the income (computed under the I.T.A.)." Clearly the author of this opinion inferred that the legislators of Sec. 70(6) wished that the spouse was to recognize all of the income as income instead of being able to receive all of the benefits of the trust property, to the exclusion of everyone else, before her death. In the author's opinion, the opinion is wrong. In a Technical interpretation provided in June 1984 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division it was provided: "Depending upon the terms of the trust deed the income of the trust computed under the Act, to the extent that it exceeds the trust's income computed under trust rules, may be (a) paid or payable to the spouse in the year and taxed in her hands, (b) included in her income under a preferred beneficiary election, or, taxed in the hands of the trust." This opinion the author agrees with.

If the courts succeed in addressing the issue and decide that the provision is to be read as requiring the spouse to recognize all of the tax income net of taxable capital gains and other capital nature income inclusions the spouse's income inclusions may still be limited due to the fact that the trust law income is in not payable to her because it is not in distributable form or due to accounting loss carry-forwards which consequently reduce the shadow tax law income also recognizable. If the trust deed allows the trustee to measure the income but distribute it to the spouse in the subsequent period when

Powers of Encroachment and Effects on Income.

A testator cannot write in a power of encroachment in favour of anyone with recouping powers without the trust losing its spousal nature. If the powers of the trustee allow him to encroach on capital for the spousal beneficiary he cannot be allowed to accumulate subsequent income to boost back up the expended capital; the spouse would not be entitled to receive all of the trust income that arises before her death on the other hand.

If, on the other hand, the trust deed allowed the trustee to expend capital sums to acquire her divisible income rights to subsequent year's income Sec. 106(3) would allow a tax free roll-out of cash and the spousal nature of the trust would be retained, while the spouse would not recognize a Sec. 106(2) or 104(13) inclusion. The same result would occur if the trust deed specifies that the spouse is entitled only to the net income after the application of losses until her death the Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) provision shouldn't be offended since the spouse is receiving all of the income of the trust arising before her death. The income to which the spouse must be entitled should be, as per the phrasing, that which accrued over the period prior to her death and not that prior to the application of trust law deductible accounting losses sustained within that period of time.⁶⁹⁷

Remarriage Clauses.

A remarriage clause could jeopardize the indefeasible nature of the spouse's entitlement to income under the trust until her death, whereby if the income interest terminates upon remarriage the Sec. 70(6) roll-over will not be available.⁶⁹⁸ If upon a remarriage the trustees have the ability to convert the income producing assets of the trust into capital appreciating ones, possibly through incorporation, then some control exists over the spouse's income interest that will still allow the Sec. 70(6) provision to be available. This is also the case with spendthrift trusts where the spouse loses her income interest due to her bankruptcy or insolvency.

Spousal Trust Income and Entitlements to Receive or Enforce a Distribution.

Both subsections 73(1) and 70(6) require that, in order for the roll-over to be available, the spouse under the spousal trust must be "entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before" her death while subsection 108(3) provides that for purposes of these provisions (and Sec. 104(4)) the "income" of a trust is to be computed without reference to the ITA and where they have been included in the trust law income amount qualifying and capital dividends described in section 83 are to be deducted as well certain capital gains dividends described in Sec. 131(1).

One should immediately recognize that trust law income will rarely be equivalent with or computed similarly to tax law income as that described in section 3 for at least two broad reasons; the first being that the latter is particularly arbitrarily determined with instances where expenses may not be deductible even though they have been incurred to produce revenue and income may not be recognizable due to political good-will etc, while the trust law income may be computed as per the settlor's/testator's expressed or implied intentions, he being in the situation to determine so since it is he who is making the gift of legal title thereto. As per the provisions in Sec. 73(1) or 70(6) the spouse must also be entitled to receive all of the trust law income that considerable cash may exist the same would result.

Alternatively there is the issue of how broad a discretion a testator/settlor can give to the trustee in determining what is a trust law income receipt for purposes of the trust. There are certain limitations here however it depends on accurately the settlor defines the accounting for the trust and to which beneficiaries the increases in wealth are to inure.

697. See Re: Winter v. Irving, 84 C.L.R. 532. Trust law income can be computed in so many ways that it deserves to be commented on in a separate chapter following this one.

In a Technical interpretation provided in Jan. 1983 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division a guaranteed minimum income entitlements was addressed. A trust was to recognize income and pay the tax on it and that tax and trustees fees were to be deducted from the income to be added to the corpus of the trust. Five percent of the value of the capital of the trust was to be paid annually to the spouse, as valued at year end, while a special account was to absorb certain excesses: if the net income of the trust was in excess of the tax paid and trustee fees and the amount actually paid to the spouse it would be debited to the account, while in years of shortfall it would be deducted and paid. Any balance in the account would be payable to the remaindermen upon the spouse's death. It was held by the Division that the trust would not be spousal and that it could be if all the trust law income would be instead taxable in the spouse's hands.

698. The same occurs if the income interest becomes unenforceable because of the spouses bankruptcy, as per the trust terms, but the income is to be accumulated and passed to her estate upon her death.

arises before her death, and although in the absence of judicial opinion expressing otherwise it was previously commented that she may receive the income after it had been capitalized in a subsequent period, she still must be entitled to receive all of the trust law income that arises however that trust law income may not be payable to her because of the existing capital beneficiary-trust-income beneficiary equity standing and the fact that the trustee must, under common trust law, retain some income from the income beneficiary to boost the capital beneficiary's ultimate receivable amount which may have decreased for the benefit of the income beneficiary.

The major differences between trust law income and tax law income are described in a following chapter however here it is important to recognize how trust law income may be adjusted with explicit language in the trust deed so as to allow the spouse to receive less and less trust law income which will also allow her to recognize less and less tax law income payable and includable under Sec. 104(13)(a)-(c), thus allowing the trust to recognize more and more of the tax law income that is recognizable by the group.⁶⁹⁹

The income of a trust for purposes of trust law is to be computed as per the terms of the trust deed and its here that a "properly" drafted spousal trust deed can be highly beneficial. If the testator/settlor states explicitly that certain deductions are to be made from revenue being realized, (that gross income/revenue be recognized on a particular basis being anywhere from absolute accrual to absolute cash), then the courts will defend such an expression even if it operates to severely reduce the amount of net revenue that is subject to an income beneficiary's immediately and enforceable entitlement in a particular year; it is the settlor/testator who is making the gift of income/capital to which he formerly held legal title thus it is only he who can decide in what form the gifts should be computed and receivable. The key to this indication process is that the directions must be clear enough so as to allow whoever is validly involved, including trustee, capital and income beneficiaries, and possibly the courts, to have enough evidence to establish the steps that the trustee must take in determining the amount that represents the spouse's entitlement amount. If the testator/settlor uses particularly ambiguous terms such as "net income" or "income", "revenue" etc. depending upon the type of activity carried on by the trust the trustees may encounter serious interpretation limitations attempting to determine what type of expenses, if any, can be charged against this revenue (so as to maintain an even-hand between the capital and income beneficiaries in such a way that the expenses do not reduce one's ultimate benefits to be realized so as to benefit the others). In instances where this ambiguity and interpretation difficulty has been encountered the courts may be applied to for advice whereby they will usually evaluate the intentions of the testator from the speech he used to make the gift which includes the evaluation of factors such as the nature of the activity producing the revenue, what type of expenses are being encountered and to what property/activity they relate, and what, if any, was the manner in which the testator accounted for these expenses previously if he previously carried on the business as a proprietorship. It will be upon evaluating these factors, plus determining the nature of the capital beneficiaries' entitlements as a mutually exclusive variable and whether or not they have unjustly realized a decrease or increase in the value of their entitlements for the benefit or at the expense of an income beneficiary, that treatment of any particular expense/charge will be ascertained as equitable.⁷⁰⁰ In inter vivos trust situations the settlor may be asked directly rather than go through the courts. If the testator gives the executor/trustee the power to determine the nature of a receipt/expense in his own discretion the source of the payment or its reason will have to be evaluated in that the discretion is not absolute and is subject to the situation. This was the case in *Terrill Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷⁰¹ when such a power was contended by the Minister to have tainted a spousal trust since it could regulate the income recognizable by the spouse. T.C.J. Tremblay was not convinced and provided:

"...the decision to regard an amount as income or capital is not a purely arbitrarily decision made at the whim of the executors. This is a purely objective question based on the general principles of accounting."

"When it is a question of determining whether an amount received is in the nature of capital or income

699 This discussion is also relevant with respect to the determination of "amounts payable" to an income beneficiary given that the income beneficiary's income interest defined under Sec. 108(1)(e), is based, as per Sec. 108(3), on trust law income.

700 See McBride v. Hudson, 107 C.L.R. 604

701 87 D.T.C. 504, see also Re Wynn (dec'd); Public Trustee v Newborough [1952] 1 Ch 271, Wendt v Orr [2004] WASC 28, Orr v Wendt [2005] WASC 199. For further cases where the court could be approached to over-rule an executor's/trustee's determination.

the source must be considered. If the source is interest or rent collected, this is obviously income. If the source, on the other hand, is the proceeds from the sale of a house, it is just as obvious that this is capital. There is no way, in my view, that the executors can regard the proceeds of the sale of the house as income and distribute them to a beneficiary as income. There is no way either that the executors can decide that rents or interest are capital and not distribute them to a beneficiary."

The court found that the power could not disturb the spouse's right to income.⁷⁰² In *Miller v. I.R.C.*⁷⁰³ the court had to decide whether a widow's interest in the income of an estate was in possession when the executors/trustees could exercise a power to withhold income to cover depreciation on estate assets and other incidental expenses. The power was found to be merely administrative and not dispositive on a review of the will read as a whole and thus didn't interfere with the widow's rights to the income plus it was also held that the power was enforceable in respect of gross income and not net income to which the spouse was entitled. It could also not be used to accumulate income out of her reach and the expression in its creation did not operate to counter the absolute gift of the net income.

If no particular income recognition method is described in the trust deed (and the settlor's intentions are not ascertainable inter vivos) then the courts will endorse some sort of accounting method applicable to the activity being carried on which may be either an investment or business activity while the accounting treatment afforded the revenue being realized may be based on some sort of accrual system if the activity is a business carried on by the trust. In the instance where a business is carried on and an accrual revenue recognition is employed regardless of the level of expenses chargeable against it there may be instances where the net book income of the trust that is subject to a beneficiary's entitlement isn't distributable simply due to the lack of funds that have been got in. This phenomenon was of concern in *Taylor v. Clark*⁷⁰⁴ an often quoted case, wherein it was found that until income was actually received by the trust in distributable proceeds the trust deed operated only to calculate an amount of income to which the life tenant becomes entitled while it is only at the time that this income is received and distributable that it can be considered payable to the life tenant. Although the deferral of receipt will not jeopardize the spousal trust characteristics described in Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) in that the spouse will still receive the income when it is realized the major advantage in the accrual system comes in the form that Sec. 104(24)⁷⁰⁵ provides that the amount of income paid or in respect of which the beneficiary was entitled in the year to enforce payment thereof will be the amount included in the beneficiary's income under Sec. 104(13), thus if an amount of income measured has been credited to the beneficiary's income account, until its substance has been got in, since he can't enforce a payment thereof in the year, he will not have to recognize its Division B equivalent under Sec. 104(13). In order for the beneficiary not to be able to enforce a distribution the trust deed must preclude him from enforcing a conversion of property such as A.R., inventory, etc. by the trustee to obtain proceeds which he could then distribute. If the beneficiary isn't capable of enforcing a distribution of income until a later period then its Division B equivalent will be taxed in the hands of the trust and distributed as capital subsequently, the income beneficiary having then obtained a capital interest in the interim. If a preferred beneficiary election can be made in respect of the income beneficiary then the income recognition can be transferred to the beneficiary even though the income isn't payable however Sec. 104(15) and its accompanying Regs. may impose some parameters. If the beneficiary can act to enforce a distribution of the income item in specie against the wishes of the trustees then Sec. 106(3) will cause the disposition by the trust of that account receivable, inventory, etc., for proceeds equal to ⁷⁰² This is also the case in Re: Bronson, 14 D.L.R. (2d) 51, Re: Wynn, [1952] 1 Ch. 271, and Re: Fenwick, Fenwick v. Stewart, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1096. In T.I. 5-902411 from the F.I.D. dated Oct. 1990 it was held with respect to a discretionary power that allows the trustee to distinguish between income and capital:

"It is our view that such discretionary powers cannot change the nature of an amount of income or deductible expense into a capital receipt or expenditure or vice versa. As stated in para. 10 of I.T. 305R3 if the trust is a qualifying trust its income is determined for trust purposes under Sec. 108(3) of the Act to exclude amounts that are income for income tax purposes. (e.g., taxable capital gains). As such, the wording of the specific clause referred to above would have to be very specific, as the Department would not accept that the trustee would have the power to rule that income (eg interest) could be capital."

⁷⁰³ 1987 S.T.C. 108

⁷⁰⁴ 66 E.R. 990

⁷⁰⁵ the basis of the Sec. 104(13) inclusion its fair market value⁷⁰⁶ and the beneficiary will recognize a Sec. 104(13) income inclusion and not one under Sec. 106(2) if his interest isn't reduced in any way.

Accrual income recognition suffers from the characteristic that book income may exceed cash on hand which may be distributable to the beneficiaries thus although the income amount will be credited to the particular beneficiary's income account until it is actually received it will not be payable to him as income. This obviously affects the beneficiary's ability to enforce a payment of it, as per the Sec. 104(24) basis of the Sec. 104(13) income inclusion, in that the beneficiary may not, in a period, be entitled to enforce a payment of it. In *Federal Commissioner of Taxation v. Totledge*⁷⁰⁷ concerning an effectively equivalent charging provision under the Australian Income Tax Assessment Act 1936, Bowen C.J. and Deane Fitzgerald J.J. held in their judgment as to whether a beneficiary had a right to receive income, "presently entitled", when the income had gone to pay the creditors:

"The preferable construction of section 97(1) is to treat the requirement of present entitlement to a share of the income of the trust estate as not being concerned with distinctions between gross income as deprived and "surplus income"...but as referring to a present vested right to demand and receive payment of the whole or part of what has been received by the trustee as income and, retaining that character in his hands, is legally available to be distributed to those entitled to it as beneficiaries..."

See also *Taylor v. F.C.T.*⁷⁰⁸ where it was provided:

"...I think that 'presently entitled' refers to an interest in possession in an amount of income that is legally ready for distribution so that the beneficiary would have a right to obtain payment of it..."

The Australian Income Tax Assessment Act targets a beneficiary's "share" of a trust's assessable income independent of what is real or artificial and includes it in his income. Taylor J. described the difference very accurately in *F.C.T. v. Belford*⁷⁰⁹ with:

"The ascertainment of the total assessable income of the trust estate for any year is, of course, not concerned with payments by way of distribution to beneficiaries and the total assessable income of the trust estate will, in any particular case, be precisely the same whether the whole or some part only, or none of the estate income has, during the relevant year, been distributed to beneficiaries presently entitled to shares thereof. Yet in some cases, s. 97 requires that the appropriate share of the total assessable income of the trust estate shall be included in the assessable income of each beneficiary, and this is so whether any beneficiary has actually received the whole or some part, or none of the income. To my mind this is a clear indication that the Act intends, in such cases, that there shall be included in a beneficiary's assessable income, not the amount of his actual receipts of the estate income, but a proportion of the total assessable income of the trust which, for obvious reasons, may be a quite different amount."⁷¹⁰

If the trust deed expressly provides that the only amounts distributable to a life tenant are to be cash or cash equivalents then the basis of application of Sec. 104(13) can clearly be derived from the amount of cash the trust has on hand at year end or that has been distributed during the year, after the trustee has extinguished operating debt, etc. with the amounts that he may, if allowed, feel is sufficient. If the trust deed provides for it, the trustee may even have a discretionary power as to determine which income beneficiary may be more affected than others due to the provision for debt however, if the debt itself relates to a business expansion then some of the liability should be indemnified out of the capital beneficiaries' entitlements as well, since an expansion clearly is to their ultimate benefit as well.

If the trustee is not to carry on a business to realize it but instead is to liquidate immediately the debt that remains after partial extinguishment with the business's proceeds should be indemnified from any property on

⁷⁰⁶ which may essentially cause few tax consequences to the trust

⁷⁰⁷ (1982) 12 A.T.R. 830

⁷⁰⁸ 119 C.L.R. 444

⁷⁰⁹ 10 A.T.D. 105

⁷¹⁰ See also Davis & Anor. v. F.C.T., 89 A.T.C. 4377, 9 C.T.B.R. (N.S.) Case # 76, Case C36, 71 A.T.C. 156, & Case R32, 84 A.T.C. 298, for more proportional assessment. The concepts are fully discussed in: "Trusts and I.T. Concepts of Income.", L.G. Priddle, 1978 8 A.T.R., 91, "The Taxation of Trusts.", R.F. Edwards, 1981 15 Taxn. in Aust. 398, "Pitfalls in the Future Operation Of Trusts in Tax Planning.", T.W. Magney, (1978) 12 Taxn. in Aust. 650, "Contemporary Issues of Concern.", Munn, 1983 Taxn. in Aust. 362, "Developments in Taxation of Trusts.", G.L. Davis, July 1979 Taxn. in Aust. 3.

hand, however the courts may cause such an extinguishment to be executed even handedly⁷¹¹ between capital and income beneficiaries to the extent that they will benefit ultimately, but only if the trust deed is silent as to the possibility of certain gifts being protected from such encumbrances.

If a business is carried on by the trustees as per the terms of the trust, (in order to realize it or otherwise), trading debts may be incurred and accounting losses may occur which will have considerable effect on the trust law income realizable by the beneficiary in any particular year.⁷¹² In respect of the former, *Vacuum Oil Company Ltd. v. Wiltshire*⁷¹³ describes many different ways in which a trustee/executor may become personally liable for debts incurred in carrying on the business of a trust as per its terms however he is also entitled to indemnity in respect of the debts out of certain assets of the estate/trust.

Latham C.J. held:

"An executor is entitled (apart from any express authority given by the will) as against both beneficiaries and estate creditors to carry on the business of his testator for the purpose of realization, but only for that purpose (Collinson v. Lister, [(1855) 52 E.R. 639]). In respect of debts incurred by him in so carrying on the business he is personally liable to the trading creditors-the debts are his debts, and not the debts of his testator (Labouchere v. Tupper (2); Ex parte Garland (3)). But as against beneficiaries and both classes of creditors he is entitled to indemnity in respect of those debts out of the assets of the estate (Dowse v. Gorton (1891 A.C. 190))."

"If an executor is authorized by the will to carry on the business not merely for the purpose of realization, then it is still the case that debts incurred by him are his debts for which he is liable to the new creditors. The authority given to the testator is part of the disposition of his estate and binds beneficiaries under his will. Thus, as against the beneficiaries in such a case the executor is entitled to an indemnity against the new debts out of the assets of the estate which the testator authorized to be used for the purpose of carrying on the business and out of any assets acquired in the course of carrying on (ex parte Garland, [(1804) 32 E.R. 786])."

In *Octavo Investments Pty. Ltd. v. Knight*⁷¹⁴ Wilson, J.J. held:

"It is common ground that a trustee who in discharge of his trust enters into business transactions is personally liable for any debts that are incurred in the course of those transactions: Vacuum Oil Co. Pty. Ltd. v. Wiltshire, (1945) 72 C.L.R. 319. However he is entitled to be indemnified against those liabilities from the trust assets held by him and for the purpose of enforcing the indemnity the trustee possesses a charge on right of lien over those assets: Vacuum Oil Co. Pty. Ltd v. Wiltshire supra. The charge is not capable of differential application to certain only of such assets. It applies to the whole range of trust assets in the trustee's possession except for those assets, if any, which are under the terms of the trust deed the trustee is not authorized to use for the purposes of carrying on the business: Dowse v. Gorton, (1891) A.C. 190."

The debt must have been incurred in carrying on the business and not incurred to expand the business. If the trust does not provide any particular manner in which the trustee is restricted from being indemnified operating loans assisting the carrying out of business can be recouped from the revenue of the business since the loan was expressly incurred to produce revenue, thus the exercise of the discretion of the trustee (which may possibly be restricted by the trust terms) may cause the revenue to be applied to the loan thus extinguishing the liability hence the beneficiary will not be able to enforce a distribution of the income. As Wilson J.J. held in Octavo:

"In such a case there are two classes of persons having a beneficial interest in the trust assets: first cestuis que trustent, those for whose benefit the business was carried on; and secondly, the trustee in respect of his right to be indemnified out of the trust assets against personal liabilities incurred in the performance of the trust. The latter interest will be preferred to the former, so that the cestuis que trustent are not entitled to call for a distribution of trust assets which are subject to a charge in favour of the trustee

⁷¹¹ See Lottman et al. v. Stanford et al., [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1065, where the Supreme Court had to consider an action in respect of a disenfranchised income beneficiary.

⁷¹² See Massey v. Commr., 1929 R. & McG. 237.

⁷¹³ 72 C.L.R. 319 at pg. 325

⁷¹⁴ (1979), 54 A.L.J.R. 87

until the charge has been satisfied: Vacuum Oil Co. Pty. Ltd. v. Wiltshire Supra." If the trustee had the discretionary ability to determine what portion of the revenue would be used in any particular period to extinguish any particular revenue debt then that discretionary power could be used extremely effectively to determine the amount of net income, regardless of how computed, the beneficiaries would be entitled to, thus causing adjustment to their Sec. 104(13)(a) or (c) recognizable income. Such a recoupment power, however, would jeopardize the Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) requirement that the spouse be entitled to all of the income that arises before her death. If the trust was a personal trust, and the income beneficiary also had a "blanket" capital interest therein which was not acquired for consideration payable the trustees could distribute the proceeds of the debt, as capital to him, whereby neither Sec. 105(1) nor 53(2)(h) would apply thus allowing for a tax-free distribution. Upon the extinguishment of the debt with the income the trust would recognize the Part I tax liabilities in respect of it, and the beneficiary would not receive any income, (although he had previously received it all in the past).⁷¹⁵ If the revenue debt is required to be assumed by a capital beneficiary as a condition of receiving the personal trust's inventory in satisfaction of his capital interest then it may cause a capital loss to be recognizable by him under Sec. 107(2)(c) if the debt assumed is in excess of the tax cost of the property to the trust (possibly bumped up by excess interest ACB as per Sec. 107(2)), and if the taxpayer has been able to inflate the ACB of his interest through a sale or purchase or change in residency after he has received the tax-free distribution of debt proceeds through reliance on the Sec. 107(1), 108(1)(d) mechanics. Given that the particular beneficiary may have already received the debt proceeds tax-free, the above arrangement takes on a particularly offensive nature.

Depreciation and business loss carry forwards are discussed in a following chapter whereby it was commented that if certain conditions exist; (ie, the carrying on of a business and the actual decline in value of the depreciable property due to wear-and-tear etc), then a depreciation charge on income⁷¹⁶ would reduce the amount of trust law income payable ultimately, while it was also held that losses sustained in a previous period of the business, (that effectively reduced capital), could be applied against subsequent period's income so as to recoup that capital drain, thus reducing the trust law income payable as well. Both of these income charges could be limited in a particular year as per the terms of the trust deed however if the trustee is given unfettered discretionary powers fine tuning of trust law income payable, (as well as resulting Division B tax law income payable), could proceed. This is also the case with respect to the exercise of powers of encroachment where capital is distributed early and recouped from the recipient income beneficiary's subsequent entitlements. For purposes of subsection 70(6) and 73(1) the income to which a spouse must be entitled is to be computed without reference to the Act and although the trust deed may provide for several deductions chargeable against the revenue stream so as to derived "net income", in tax law not all of them may be deductible. In *English Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷¹⁷ the Income Tax Appeal Board allowed an executor of an estate to deduct from the estate's Division B income current repair expenses only when they were directly incurred to produce taxable income, and not capital expenses that would produce benefits over more than one period and were of a permanent improvement.

In order for the first spousal trust condition to be satisfied the spouse must be entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before her death however how much significance one has to pay to the term "arises" in this case is questionable. If the term should be taken to mean realized income, which in one form or another, means revenue net of expenses, then until the revenue is realized there can be no income however if it is taken to mean "accrues" then the revenue may be recognized before it is realized, as in the case where timber is growing, penned tuna or cattle are breeding, et cetera, or some other accretion activity is taking place, while on the other hand in the absence of a contrary expression in the trust deed, a certain degree of accretions may usually be taken to benefit the capital rather than the income beneficiaries.⁷¹⁸

In *McBride v. Hudson and another*⁷¹⁹ the High Court of Australia had to decide the scope of a life tenant's ⁷¹⁵ If a distribution of the borrowed capital takes place such as above interest costs would not be a deductible Part I expense.

⁷¹⁶ failing the expression, implied or otherwise, of a contrary in the trust deed rights with respect to the "income" of a pastoral business carried on by the executors. The particular provision in the will read:

⁷¹⁷ 56 D.T.C. 18

⁷¹⁸ See Hassell v. Perp. Exors., Trustees, & Agency Co, 86 C.L.R. 513, and Hughes v. Fripp, 30 C.L.R. 508, where partnership income becomes capital at will.

⁷¹⁹ [1961-62] 107 C.L.R. 604

"10, I direct that the net profits derived from the carrying on of my pastoral business during the lifetime of my wife shall be divided between my wife and my said son in equal shares and I declare that in ascertaining net profit available for division under this paragraph the salary or remuneration and expenses paid to my said son for managing my pastoral business shall first be deducted."

There had been an increase in the number of sheep of the estate since its inception and the estate of the life tenant contended that part of the natural increase was to inure to her, since the flock was considerably smaller at that time and had grown since by retaining the sheep rather than selling them. Taylor, J. held:

"Essentially question 1(c) is concerned with the rights of the parties in the circumstances as they were found to exist upon and immediately after the death of the testator's widow. Literally the question which is asked requires whether, upon the death of the widow, the estate of the testator was entitled to the whole of the sheep, some 4,346, the depastured on the property, or whether, on the contrary, it was entitled to only 1,850 of them."⁷²⁰

...

The contention that the interest of the estate was limited to 1,850 only of the sheep rested upon the circumstances already related, it being said that the sheep in excess of this number represented accrued profits of the business, and, in effect, that they belonged to the life tenants. But it is not possible to entertain the suggestion that the plaintiff and his mother at any time acquired any interest in the natural increase which was retained in order to build up the flock. Their interest was in the profits of the business, from time to time, and these, of course, could be ascertained only by taking into account the relative business operations. However, it may do less than justice to the plaintiff's argument to deal with the question in this way for, in spite of the form of the question, what was primarily asserted was, in effect, that upon the ultimate realization of the business assets, including the sheep in question, after the widow's death, the proceeds of the sale of the sheep in excess of 1,850 should be credited to the widow's estate and the plaintiff in equal shares. The ground upon which this contention was based was that, as was said in McIntyre v. McIntyre, (1914) 15, S.R. (N.S.W.) 45, and in Re Porter; Porter v. Porter, (1930) 31. S.R. (N.S.W.) 115, trustees carrying on a pastoral business are not justified in building up the number of livestock on the property at the expense of the life tenants. But the statements to this effect were concerned with defining the duties of trustees and not with defining or identifying the distributable profits of any such business. No doubt it is not for the trustees to build up the flock at the expense of the life tenants for the benefit of the remaindermen but it does not follow that whenever the number of sheep carried on a grazing property managed by trustees is increased by the retention of all or some part of the natural increase it can be asserted that the flock is being built up at the expense of the life tenants. Primarily the profits from a business such as that with which we are concerned is earned by the sale of wool and in the discharge of their duties to both life tenants and remaindermen it is of importance that the property shall be stocked to its full carrying capacity from time to time. In contrast with the return from the sale of wool the profits on the sale of surplus sheep are a matter of minor importance. Essentially it is a matter for the trustees to determine how the business should be carried on to the best advantage. In particular, it is for them to determine whether livestock shall be sold in the ordinary course of business and, in the present case, it is worthy of note that the trustees were authorized "in the carrying on of the said business to exercise all powers reasonably necessary or incidental thereto as fully and effectually as" the testator could, himself, exercise them "if alive and attending to the matter in question and in person."

The Court unanimously found that the life tenant's rights did not extend to the natural increase in the flock. This case did not deal with the rights of the life tenant to property built up through the reinvestment of earnings rather than through distribution in that the increase in the income producing property, (the sheep), was not the primary business activity but the production of wool was. The accretion in number inured to the benefit of the capital beneficiaries in the same way that it would have had the income producing property been a building or land. The accounting for the natural increase in the flock was not included in computing the profit from the wool production business.⁷²¹

⁷²⁰ The number existing at the time of the initial testator's death.

If an accrual revenue recognition method is used the life tenant's estate will be entitled to receive the income that has been credited to the deceased's income account before he died that is subsequently realized however if the year's accounting adjustments have not been made before the life tenant dies it would seem reasonable to apportion the period's income and credit to his account such amount that arose while he was alive, unless the trust deeds specifically requires that income be computed at year end and accredited to beneficiaries who are alive at that specific time. In the absence of such an expression the apportionment should proceed. In the U.K. the jurisprudence in respect of businesses entitled to be carried on is that only income ascertained at the end of the trust's fiscal year is subject to the entitlement of a life tenant at that time and if the entitlement is extinguished mid-term for whatever reason the entire period's income inures to the benefit of the other respectively entitled beneficiaries.⁷²² In Australia/New Zealand and Scotland the "broken period's" income is payable to the life tenant regardless of when within the period the right ceases to be enforceable⁷²³. Of course the terms of the will/deed may expressly provide another basis of measuring an entitlement in such a situation.

In *Tait Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷²⁴ the Tax Court Judge considered the income rights of the life tenant (who had died mid-term) under a spousal trust with respect to grain that had grown but had yet to be harvested:

"In each estate the trustee prepares on the death of a life tenant a statement of "net paid and accrued income" representing what has been paid and what was owing at the date of death. In this case, the grain is no different from the bond coupon. The trust must follow the equitable maxim of "treat as done that which ought to have been done". In no way can an asset on hand which is normally considered as income become a capital asset of a spousal trust nor can it remain as an income asset and not be the property of the life tenant...If the estate had farmed the property the grain unconverted to cash represented income from the capital asset of the farm and so belonged to the life tenant on a net paid and accrued basis."

Tait Estate is a rare case, and a recent one, which provided that income of a trust, for purposes of ascertaining beneficiaries' entitlements, is to be computed with the accrual method however if the trust deed specifies otherwise, or if the method of accounting for the activity formerly by the testator was not such, accrual accounting will not automatically apply. Implicit is the endorsement of the entitlement to the income of the stub period.

Structuring out Income Potential.

Through incorporation by a spousal trust of its income producing assets it's possible to structure out the income potential to non-spousal parties and thus circumvent the spousal characteristic of the non-spousal restrictions in income participation prior to her death: non-spousal beneficiaries and the trust can jointly contribute cash and income producing property respectively to a common corporation using Sec. 85(1) for common shares with differing dividend payment terms. The trust deed may specify what degree of control must be maintained by the trust however the structuring of the voting hierarchy amongst the shareholders as provided in the corporate charter may allow the trust to remain in control without rights to considerable levels of dividends. Preferred shares with fixed dividend rates may be subscribed for by the trust however of paramount concern is insuring that the non-spousal (or for that matter spousal) subscribers do not realize a benefit from the trust by virtue of their subscription for shares with a greater fair market value than the resources

721 See also Thornley v. Boyd, 36 C.L.R. 526, Kelly v. Perp. Trustee, 109 C.L.R. 258, Re: Bowman, 1955 S.A.S.R. 98, Hassell v. Perp. Trustee & Agency Co., 86 C.L.R. 513, Re: Archer, 1961 Tas. S.R. 1, Re: Buckley, 1941 G.L.R. 640, and latterly, Re: Richards, 1974 2 N.Z.L.R. 60, Union Trustee Co. of Aust. Ltd. v. Bartlan, 1948 A.C. 495, and Re: Hemi Matenga, 1942 G.L.R. 72, for endorsement of McBride principle. See Watson v. F.C.T., 42 A.L.R. 573, & Re: Porter, 1930 31 S.R. (N.S.W.) 115, for accretions of capital as compared to accumulations on income in unincorporated activities.

722 In Re: Cox's Trusts, 1878 9 Ch. D. 159, In Re: Robbins, 1941 Ch. 434, Browne v. Collins, L.R. 12 Eq. 586, Lambert v. Lambert, 22 W.R. 359. The opposite occurs in respect of investment income: Re: Winterstoke's Will Trusts, 1937 4 All E.R. 63.

723 In re: Havill, 1953 N.Z.L.R. 443, Re: Richards, 1974 2 N.Z.L.R. 60, Marshall v. I.R.C., 1960 N.Z.L.R. 972 (CA), Andrew's Estate v. Hallett, 1926 S.C. 1087.

724 89 D.T.C. 309

they are contributing to the corporation. Such resources include both cash/non-cash property as well as directorship responsibilities and management functions to be attended to and if the aggregate of such is greatly lesser in value than the shares obtained determined by their expected dividend streams and residual value a Sec. 105(1) benefit could be arguably realized. A trust may confer a benefit on share subscribers when it goes from a majority shareholder controlling the board to a minority player through successive share subscriptions by the outside beneficiaries however the benefit is realized only if the fair market value of the shares isn't offered for them. This conferring of a benefit may be recognized as a disposition to which Sec. 69(1) applies where an economic interest is passed for no consideration as was the case in *Ovis Brooks v. M.N.R.*⁷²⁵ or *M.N.R. v. Dufresne*⁷²⁶ whereby Sec. 69(1) will apply to the trust and Sec. 105(1) is not prevented from applying to its acquisition by the beneficiary.

To avoid the recognition of a benefit the beneficiaries must provide value of a magnitude for their shares that accurately reflects their fair market value and this consideration could include the above, (director responsibilities, top management functions, know-how, etc.), while another route would be to provide less for shares with less dividend participation though allow the beneficiaries to become employees and to receive a salary providing top management expertise. The latter would allow the same streaming off of income to the non-spousal parties though allowing them to recognize a different source of income.

Essentially the same may be obtained through the creation of a partnership whether general or limited whereby income producing property is managed actively by non-trust partners and earnings are only partially streamed off to the trust. Income sharing could depend on the relative amounts of the capital account balances and the trust could use excessive drawings to reduce its entitlement though of course the trust deed would have to be structured to allow such be legally flexible in the face of the requirement to deal without partiality with the interests of the trust's beneficiaries. The trust could become merely a limited partner and all parties could contribute to the partnership using Sec. 97(2) if all are resident in Canada while excessive drawings will not produce tax consequences to the limited partner trust. Since cash is being systematically withdrawn the trust could distribute it out to non-spousal beneficiaries without tax consequences under Sec. 107(4).

If incorporation is the option then the trust deed should expressly allow the trustees to vote themselves as directors and have the fiduciary duty of reducing taxable dividend distributions to the trust. Alternatively, the trust deed could compel the trustees to transfer the income producing property to another trust, created via a power etc., the terms of which are to accumulate income and distribute capital thus reducing the spousal trust's income which is payable to the spouse.⁷²⁷ The corporation's share structure and the nature of the head trust's beneficiaries could allow for "outside" parties to participate via the purchase of shares/receipt of income interests so as to directly benefit from the head trust or corporation and these characteristics should be expressly provided for in the spousal trust's contingency clauses so as to preclude actions against trustee purported partiality. In the author's opinion the fact that the trust deed compels the trustees to incorporate the assets does not jeopardize the Sec. 70(6) requirement of indefeasible vesting since the former concerns only how the trust is to operate after it has been fully constituted and received clear title and the latter concerns only how it is constituted and whether it receives clear title.⁷²⁸ Indefeasible vesting isn't undermined by a functioning of the trust deed as such; though it may be as a consequence of the administration of the estate that creates the trust.⁷²⁹ Likewise no non-spousal parties obtain the use of any of the trust's capital while the

⁷²⁵ 91 D.T.C. 639

⁷²⁶ 67 D.T.C. 5105, as well as Boardman et al. v. The Queen, 85 D.T.C. 5628, Perrault v. The Queen, 76 D.T.C. 6021, Levine v. M.N.R., 73 D.T.C. 5182

⁷²⁷ Subsection 75(2) should be reviewed in order to ensure it can't apply to this arrangement.

⁷²⁸ A power to appoint to new trusts will however taint the spousal character of the trust though it is possible to vary it in after the roll-over has been accepted.

⁷²⁹ The Non-Corporate Rulings Division was not of this opinion in April 1985 when in a technical interpretation it provided:

"Since the executor's transfer of the common shares to the holding company will be discretionary and not obligatory, it is our opinion that the proposed arrangement will not prevent the shares vesting indefeasibly in the spousal trust. Whether or not the trust is, in fact, a spousal trust within paragraph 70(6)(b) of the Income Tax Act is not so clear. Subparagraph 70(6)(b)(ii) of the Act denies anyone but the spouse the "...use of any of the income or capital of the trust" during the spouse's lifetime and while your proposal may not conflict with this requirement we have too little information to form an opinion upon the matter. That is, before expressing an opinion we would wish to review the terms of the will establishing the spousal trust and the extent that the excessive dividends are recognized by the non-spousal beneficiaries Sec. 105(1) will not apply to them due to para. (a) therein.⁷³⁰

Access to Capital.

The second requirement that must be satisfied in order for the trust to qualify is that no person other than the spouse could, may, possibly, be in a position, before her death, to receive or obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust. One can infer, perhaps correctly in the author's opinion, that the party cannot receive the capital in the capacity of a beneficiary only however how correct this opinion is depends on what intention the legislators had when they introduced Sec. 108(4). If the intention of the settlor was that the spouse should be entitled to income and that no one else should benefit from the trust capital then it would appear that the provision applies to those instances where the trustees are to incorporate or resettle on a head trust. The provision on the other hand does not specify benefits; only "obtain the use of" the capital and with this in mind it would appear possible to have incorporation/resettlement potential drafted into the trust deed since the corporation/trust is not obtaining the use of the capital as a beneficiary. It would be ludicrous to be of the opinion that the trust must keep all of its funds in a proverbial 'old sock' so as to preclude a bank from obtaining their use. Legitimate investments are obviously excluded from consideration, while so too are legitimate loans.⁷³¹ In such an instance property is not being distributed to either creditor or beneficiary whereby it is irretrievably gone but instead it is simply being altered in form.⁷³² There is no element of bounty in the arrangement.⁷³³ In the author's opinion the incorporation of the trust's property so as to give the beneficiaries extremely beneficial income participation through share structuring does not cause the Sec. 70(6)(b)(ii) provision to be offended since the beneficiaries are merely benefitting from the property; they are conditions which attach to each class of shares the spousal trust of the holding company. Also we would expect to be informed as to the nature of the property underlying the common shares which are to be transferred to the holding company. Whether or not someone other than the spouse has obtained the use of any of the capital of the spousal trust during her lifetime may depend upon more than the identity of the legal owner of the common shares; accordingly we propose to express an opinion only after we have examined all of the circumstances in each particular fact situation."

730 Since the f.m.v. of the shares may be excessive when compared to that consideration given to receive them the beneficiary may realize a benefit from the arrangement only if he disposes of the shares and not until then. If they are mortgaged it would appear that Sec. 105(1) can apply. An alternative to an upstream hive-off would be to have the spouses enter into domestic contracts restricting post-mortem remarriage.

731. In T.I. 5-1718 of the F.I.D. provided in Aug. 1986 the Department had to address the concern of whether a power given to the spousal trustees to lend money out of the testamentary estate to any beneficiary caused the spousal trust to be tainted and whether the fact that commercial rates of interest were to be applied made any difference. It held:

"In our opinion, if the will specifically grants a power to the trustees to make loans to any beneficiary, the spousal trust would be tainted. We have considered the reasoning that if a loan is made to a beneficiary on the same commercial terms as would be offered by an arm's length commercial enterprise then that loan should not taint the spousal trust. However, in our opinion, the problem with such reasoning is in determining what constitutes "reasonable commercial terms" (e.g. security required, degree of credit limits, etc.) in the context of the non-arm's length situation which exists between a trust and its beneficiaries. If reasonable commercial terms could be defined in this context, then we submit that it would not be necessary for the beneficiary to borrow from the trust in the first place, since he could then satisfy the requirements of a commercial arm's length institution with respect to obtaining a loan. Therefore, if a loan was to be made from the trust to a beneficiary (other than the spouse) it would not, in our opinion, be at "reasonable commercial terms".

We also have considered the reasoning that, if one was to interpret subparagraph 70(6)(b)(ii) of the Act literally and, given that "person" as defined by subsection 248(1) of the Act would include a financial institution, it could be said that if the will granted the trustees the power to make any loan, including loans to a bank, then the spousal trust would be tainted. However, it is our opinion that the intent of the Act was not to so restrict the investment opportunities of a spousal trust and to interpret the legislation in this manner would be unreasonable. However, for the reasons stated above, it is our view that if a will grants the trustees of a spousal trust the power to make loans to beneficiaries of the trust (other than the spouse) or to persons related to them, then the existence of this power would taint a spousal trust."

In T.I. 5-902601 of Nov. 1990 rendered by the Business and General Division of the Rulings Directorate it was held that fees paid to trustees out of capital will not contravene the Sec. 73(1), (equivalent to 70(6)(b)(ii)) provision while fees that are deductible in computing the trust's tax income will not affect the Sec. 73(1) (or 70(6)(b)(i)) requirement.

732 See Brown and Secretary, Department of Family and Community Services [2004] AATA 48 (22 January 2004).

733 If there is an element of bounty in the arrangement allowed by the trust terms (interest free loans to related parties etc.) the legitimacy of the use of the capital may be so tarnished as to cause it to be recognized to be a use of the trust property qua beneficiary.

not receiving or themselves obtaining its use though they are obtaining the benefits of its use. The Department's position as expressed in previous pages seems to be contradictory to this. Subsection 105(1) definitely isn't precluded from applying in such a situation, however, if the dividends received on the shares are included in income that subsection can't apply to them by virtue of para. (a) therein.

In *Jenkins v. I.R.C.*⁷³⁴ the U.K. Court of Appeal had to ascertain whether a trust's income was payable to the settlor of the trust "in any circumstance whatsoever". The trust was for the exclusive benefit of his offspring while the settlor loaned the trust so funds which were to be repaid with its income. Section 38 of the Finance Act, being very broadly targeted, caught the payment of income, but Lord Greene M.R. provided a comment very applicable in respect of Sec. 73(1)-70(6) non-spousal beneficiary entitlements:

"I put to counsel for the respondents in the course of his argument another case. I said: Suppose a settlement contained a power to the trustees to purchase a dwelling house under the result the trustees entered into a contract to buy a dwelling house from the settlor himself. I asked counsel for the respondent whether in the year in which that position arose it would be time to say that the terms of the settlement provided for the payment to the settlor of the purchase price of that house. He, very fairly, said, and I think he was bound on his argument to say, that that would be the case. It seems to me that the language cannot, on any of the consideration, lead to any such result. It would not be the terms of the settlement which provided for payment to the settlor; it would be the circumstances that the trustees, in pursuance of their powers, had happened to enter into a particular legal relationship which involved the payment of money and the person with whom they happened to enter into it was the settlor...."

This dicta is, in the author's opinion, extremely relevant in respect of Sec. 75(2) as well and illustrates the issue of where the Sec. 70(6), though perhaps not 105(1), rules are not offended merely because a non-arm's-length party obtains property on perhaps favorable terms⁷³⁵.

The question of who could benefit from a spousal trust was at issue in *Peardon Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷³⁶ wherein by the terms of the taxpayer's will a trust was created whereunder the trustees had the absolute discretion of making income or capital payments to the spouse for her maintenance however the will did not explicitly state how any excess income that wasn't distributed was to be handled. The Minister contended that the arrangement was not "spousal" in that the payments of income and capital were left to the absolute discretion of the executors. Brule T.C.J., of the Tax Court provided that:

"The provision that income and capital be paid to the spouse in the executors' absolute discretion presents another problem. Certainly there is no concern over capital because what is not used for her maintenance will pass on her death. However the treatment of income must be looked at carefully. As mentioned above, counsel for the Appellant offered that the meaning of "entitled" in subparagraph 70(6)(b)(i) means a "claim or right", and I find no objection to this.⁷³⁷ However, the will does not say that the spouse is "entitled" to the income or capital, only that the executors "may use any part of my estate". It does not say "all of the income". If the executors exercise their discretion and the wife is properly maintained the Courts presumably will not overrule their discretion as to quantum and the spouse would not be in a position to require the executors to pay her all the income if such was more than required for her proper maintenance. This principle is to be found in the case of Re; Sayers et al. and Philip, a decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal found in 38 D.L.R. (3rd) 602,...In the event that the income of the trust was more than adequate for the spouses maintenance, I ask "What would happen to the excess?" There is no provision for accumulation and in the absence of such a requirement it could well be that there would be an intestacy as to the surplus. If such were the case, perhaps the spouse would not be entitled to receive all the surplus. If not, then some other party or parties might benefit. If the testator wished his widow to receive all the income, he should have said so."

⁷³⁴ 1944 2 All E.R. 491

⁷³⁵ See also Ellis and Others v. C.I.R., 31 T.C. 178 (CA), as to the ability to use, and McCrone v. C.I.R., 44 T.C. 142.

⁷³⁶ 86 D.T.C. 1045 (TCC)

⁷³⁷ Remember this when reviewing powers of appointment and the interests that arise upon their exercise.

Thus the fact that the testator instilled an unrestricted discretionary power in the trustees caused the spouse to never be in the position to be entitled to receive all of the income, accumulated or otherwise.⁷³⁸ If the testator would have required the trustees to distribute the accumulated excess of trust law income over income applied for maintenance, every five years etc. and upon her death then in the author's opinion, even though over the short term she would not be entitled to receive due to the effect of the power, she would have been ultimately entitled to receive all of the income arising before her death.⁷³⁹

In a Technical Interpretation provided in March 1980 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division it was held that a trust that can be wound up prior to the death of the spouse will not be a spousal trust unless the property can be distributed exclusively to the spouse. Subsection 107(4) will also be prevented from applying to such a trust on the distribution since it will not be spousal. If the trust can be dissolved with the property going exclusively to the spouse but she is compelled as per its terms to mortgage it and settle a trust for the immediate benefit of the offspring Sec. 70(6) and 107(2) should apply to the flow of ownership to the spouse after the death and tax consequences will not be created for any party except the spouse upon the property's disposition of course. The mortgage proceeds could also be gifted directly to the offspring or whoever else the testator directs as expressed in his will: the fact that the spouse is prevented from benefiting exhaustively as any ordinary beneficiary under the trust does not prevent the trust from being spousal. The terms of the distribution require the conferment of a benefit on the secondary offspring but the beneficiary can enforce his rights only against the spouse while since the spouse is required to mortgage the property, or any property she owns, the offspring does not have any right to receive or otherwise obtain the use of any income or capital of the trust, only of the spouse, and where the spouse must mortgage property not received from the trust, the offspring certainly can't be said to benefit in any way from the trust capital. Needless to say Sec. 105(1) may be arguably applicable in this case since the offspring is in fact realizing a benefit in respect of a trust but whether this type of benefit can be captured by Sec. 105(1) is questionable. If agreements are entered into by the spouse and offspring quite independant of the trust deed, so as to ensure that proceeds are ultimately realized by the offspring CRA can't tax what they are not aware of.

Constructive Receipt.

It is important to note that subparagraph 70(6)(b)(i) requires that she only be entitled to receive all of the income arising before her death, but in fact she need not in fact receive it, however she must be entitled to receive it, and not simply have it applied for her benefit. Paragraph 12 of I.T. 305R3 provides the Department's opinion with regard to the latter aspect being that the Department will consider that the spouse is entitled to receive all of the income even when it is to be applied indirectly for the spouse's sole benefit, however the author wonders which hat they pulled this opinion out of given that the statute provision, which is the only relevant authority, recognizes that she must be entitled to receive the income herself. If the draughtsman of the provision wanted indirect beneficial application to be treated would he not have had the Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) provision read "his spouse is entitled to, or to receive, the income..." given that this is the manner that constructive though indirectly beneficial rights are recognized under the definition of "income interest" or "capital interest" in Sec. 108(1)(e) & (c) respectively? Once the Department has finished "playing with the keys to a Pandora's box" would they be able to describe just what kind of indirect constructive distributions can be considered "used solely for the benefit of the spouse", eg; do rental payments to a retirement home at which the spouse resides receive the same treatment as payments to the spouse's offspring to maintain her at their residence(?), how about payments to them, as a function of a discretionary power, in satisfaction of their desire to have the spouse committed to an asylum which is of clear benefit to her. ...The opinion should be changed, or at least properly qualified.⁷⁴⁰

Also, and perhaps more importantly, if income is applied for her benefit Sec. 105(1) may be applicable, 738 See Davies v. Perp. Trustees, 52 C.L.R. 604.

739 This was precisely what Brule was getting at when he questioned the destination of accumulated income. In this case a son was renting trust property for close to fair market value consideration and was found not to be deriving a benefit from the trust within the Sec. 70(6) context.

740. In June 1983 in T.I. A-8234 the Non-Corporate Rulings Division held essentially that indirect application of income, in a spouse beneficiary bankruptcy situation, though for her benefit did not qualify a spousal trust when the income could not be paid to her as per the trust deed.

(unless she's non-resident), so as to cause a full income inclusion rather than Sec. 104(13)-(6). In such an instance double taxation of the income applied would result. If the trust deed specifies that property is to be maintained with income of the trust the type of income should be specified to mean only that which isn't trust law income in that if not the spouse obviously won't have a right to all of the trust's income. If the trust deed specifies that property is to be maintained with income from the trust the type of income should be specified to mean only that that isn't trust law income in that if not the spouse obviously won't be entitled to receive all of the trust's income.

The Spouse as Trustee.

In *Bouck v. M.N.R.*⁷⁴¹ a testator provided in his will that the net revenue from the estate was to be paid to an income account, to which his spouse had access and that "the monies to the credit of the said account shall be under the sole control of my wife to be used by her to maintain a home for herself and my children, for the maintenance of my wife and my children, for the proper education of my children and otherwise for the benefit of my wife and my children as my wife in her sole discretion may from time to time determine."

The widow, in one of the subsequent years, apportioned, for reporting purposes, the amount of income drained from the "income account" between the offspring (2) and herself however the Minister contended that it was all hers in that it came under her "sole control" while the Supreme Court of Canada held:

"Where, as in the case at bar, income is placed under the control of a wife and mother for the benefit of herself and children, she being under obligation so to apply it, it would appear to be a contradiction in terms to say that her interest is absolute, and yet that, while her discretion will not be interfered with so long as it is being exercised bona fide, the court will interfere where she is not acting properly in the application of the income, or where the creditors intervene for the purpose of seizing it. ...I think equally, in the present case, that the wife, being obligated to apply the income needed for the benefit not only of herself but also for the children, although her discretion is absolute, as was that in the case just sighted, has an interest limited to that which she appropriates for herself, and the children become entitled to the remainder in the proportions she from time to time determines."

Although the spouse in this case did act under an obligation she did not act as a trustee of the income made available to her while it should be recognized just from the manner in which the Kellock, J., described the spouse's obligation that the court could jump in if the discretionary power is not exercised and maintenance isn't given to the children whereby they would uphold the offspring's' rights to be maintained, at some level of comfort, thus clearly the offspring had a right to the use of the trust income. The "give away" in effect that caused the children to have rights to the income was that the spouse was to use the proceeds in the income account for explicitly her and their benefit, and especially for their education. She could not in fact empty the income account and go for a cruise around the world or, even more restricted, purchase investment property, since the funds were to be used primarily to maintain the home and the family, and provide education. In such a case Sec. 70(6) could not apply since parties other than the spouse could receive the income of the trust as beneficiaries.

In *Tetreault Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷⁴² the spouse received a bequest of the whole of the testator's estate however the will declared that she was to undertake the instruction, education and care of the offspring of the marriage. The wife contended that the estate had indefeasibly invested in her while the Tax Review Board (Lucien Cardin Q.C.) held that the property had not vested indefeasibly in her in that she was to fulfill the condition of the bequest being the instruction, education, etc., before she could be considered to have received the estate indefeasibly. In *Clouston v. M.N.R.*⁷⁴³ the spouse was to receive as a bequest the sum of $9,600 per year from the estate but that the child, D.G. Clouston, was to be provided for in respect of pursuing education by a charge on the yearly sum. The will explicitly stated that:

"The foregoing provisions for my wife, however, to be charged with the support, maintenance

741. 52 D.T.C. 1090 (SCC)

742 73 D.T.C. 61 (TRB)

743 74 D.T.C. 1176 (TRB)

and education of my daughter, Diana Gertrude, in such manner as shall in the opinion of my executors and trustees be commensurate with her station in life... I direct that the annual income to be paid to my wife be supplemented by such amounts as may be required to enable my daughter, D.G., to pursue her education..."

Roland St. Onge Q.C. of the Tax Review Board found quite correctly that:

"I am certain that in the case of failure on the mother to maintain her child, the latter would have a right of action against the mother and the estate to obtain the necessary funds from the estate to provide for her education... Consequently this case is subject to a charge which allows a person other than the spouse to obtain, before the death of the spouse, any of the income from the settlement."

Thus due to the fact that the spouse could be regarded as a conduit through which the daughter had a choice in action against the estate, the trust was tainted in that the child could lay claim as a beneficiary, and have it administered favourably. Where there isn't a connection between the providing of support to the child and the exclusive entitlement of the spouse to receive all of the income of the trust it cannot be considered tainted on the above grounds.⁷⁴⁴ Where the trust deed/will does not attach an obligation/condition to the spouse's undivided interest then the trust/will can be read as being spousal for purposes of the ITA even though the spouse and offspring could have been parties to a domestic contract drawn up between the two, one to provide maintenance, education, etc. for the other, prior to the death/writing of the will/trust deed. If the trust deed/will doesn't make any reference to the domestic contract (ie; spouse's interest conditional upon its performance), regardless of whether the domestic contract makes any reference to the possible estate the estate can only be held to be spousal if the testator dictates that all of the income shall solely be paid to the spouse to see as she sees fit, and in arranging the circumstance this way the testator, with a bit of planning, can insure that the obvious result occurs. On the basis described in Mr. Lucky v. M.N.R. the arrangement will be de hors the trust arrangement and not caught by it. (In effect, the arrangement works on the principle that the offspring has a right against the spouse only, and not the trust.) If a spouse's interest in the income of the spousal trust is to be contingent upon her extinguishing an initial equitable charge then such a contingency should terminate within 36 months after the death so as to allow the spousal trust roll-over to apply. If the equitable charge is not fulfilled the trustees could be compelled to incorporate income producing property held, maintain the shares in the spousal trust, and thus control the amount of income that the trust receives and thus spouse is entitled to, and still allow the Sec. 70(6) roll-over to apply. If the equitable charge is fulfilled within the 36 months then incorporation will be restricted and the spouse's income rights will be resultantly increased in scope. (The offspring could be granted options to acquire the shares.) In either case in order to allow Sec. 70(6) to apply she must be entitled to receive the income from the trust that was realized in the contingency period.

One can structure testamentary or inter vivos trust income interests so as to create sub-trusts with respect to the application of the income of the head trust and still allow a spouse or settlor to control the income in the capacity of a trustee. The *Countess of Bective v. F.C.T.*⁷⁴⁵ illustrates four different situations and approaches taken by the courts of Australia in respect of income interests in head trusts primarily granted to spouses etc. though subject to the requirement that the income beneficiary use the income to maintain offspring. Dixon J. cited four different approaches in this case practically identical to Bouck v. M.N.R. where:

- "(1) The expression of purpose may be taken as but a statement of the donor's motive or of his expectation. If so, the first person takes the gift absolutely and incurs no legal or equitable obligation to fulfill the purpose.
- (2) The purpose may be so stated as to amount to a condition upon and subject to which the first person takes the gift beneficially. By accepting it the donee incurs an equitable duty to perform the condition which is annexed to the gift.
- (3) The first person may take the gift beneficially, but the statement of the purpose, particularly if it involves the payment of money, may operate as an equitable charge thereon in favour of the other or others. Bequests and devises to parents for maintenance and benefit of their children are from their very nature peculiarly susceptible of this interpretation.

⁷⁴⁴ See Green & Anor. v. Commr. of S.D.(NSW), 85 A.T.C. 4229 (SCNSW), for some issues of interests in estates retained upon conveyance.

⁷⁴⁵ 1932 47 C.L.R. 417 (HCA)

- (4) The direction to pay the first person may be regarded as conferring no beneficial interest upon him, and, whether he receives it strictly in the character of a trustee or in some other character such as guardian, the expression of the purpose may amount to a statement of objects to which he is bound to apply the fund."

The case goes on into depth in analyzing the approaches and how they arise however the judge provided generally:

"But an obligation to apply moneys in the maintenance of children or others does not involve the liability which arises from an ordinary trust. It is a general rule that guardians of infants, committees of the person of lunatics, and others who are entrusted with funds to be expended in the maintenance and support of persons under their care are not liable to account as trustees. They need not vouch the items of their expenditure, and, if they fulfill the obligation of maintenance in a manner commensurate with the income available to them for the purpose, an account will not be taken. Often the person to be maintained is a member of a family enjoying the advantages of a common establishment; always the end in view is to supply the daily wants of an individual, to provide for his comfort, edification and amusement, and to promote his happiness. It would defeat the very purpose for which the fund is provided, if its administration were to be hampered by the necessity of identifying, distinguishing, apportioning and recording every item of expenditure and vindicating its propriety. Although these considerations furnish an independent foundation for the general rule, yet, after all, it is a doctrine regulating the application of moneys payable under an instrument, whether a will, a settlement or an order of a Court of equity, and the operation of the doctrine must depend upon the provisions contained in the instrument, both express and implied. But the effect of the instrument will often be governed by the circumstances to which it was intended to apply, and, in particular, by a consideration of the nature of the actual abode, the condition of the household and the state of the family of the infant or other person to be maintained. Courts of equity have not disguised the fact that the general rule gives to a parent or guardian dispensing the fund an opportunity of gaining incidental benefits, but the nature and extent of the advantages permitted must depend peculiarly upon the intention ascribed to the instrument."⁷⁴⁶

Without going into in detail it is thus possible to have a secondary bequest be subject to a trust where the intermediary person acts as trustee providing the terms of the bequest are drawn up showing the intention of such. In Bective the court provided that the settlor's intention can be ascertained by measuring the extent of the intermediary's right to the use of the receipt, how the ultimate recipient is described, and if and how the intermediary's involvement terminates upon the occurrence of certain events and whether he has alternate interests. Obviously one would not want this to occur if the Sec. 70(6) roll-through provision is wished to be accessed since it doesn't apply to spousal recipients receiving in the capacity of a trustee.^{747, 748}

A testator can ensure that his offspring and spouse are provided for if he transfers all of his property to a spousal trust upon death if he has directed the trustees to incorporate the property if the spouse does not agree to vary the trust to accelerate the offspring's' interests. A disposal by her of her income interest will not produce major tax consequences if the directions call for capitalization of earnings rather than distribution to the trust.

⁷⁴⁶ See Mclsaac v. Beaton, 1906 37 S.C.R. 143, and Shearer v. Hogg, 46 S.C.R. 492, for related jurisprudence on the extent of personal gifts taken in spousal testamentary situations. Maintenance payments made to spouses inter vivos in respect of providing support for children do not create a trust nor does the offspring gain equitable interests: Stevens v. Tirard, 1939 4 All E.R. 186.

⁷⁴⁷ See also Re: Crepeau, 23 Sask. R. 170, for an example where a trust was recognized to exist in a situation similar to Tetreault Estate as well as Howey v. Commr., 44 C.L.R. 289, & Manning v. F.C.T., 40 C.L.R. 506. In Case Q3, 83 A.T.C. 7, the Aust. Bd. of Review held that a mother receiving a pension "in respect of" her children did not receive as trustee for them on account of the scheme of the pension legislation and use of the diction therein.

⁷⁴⁸ See also "Noik v. Noik Estate: A Case Note - Trust, Conditional Gift, Charge and Personal Obligation", Donovan Waters, Q. C., Estates, Trusts and Pensions, Vol. 28, Pg. 88 for additional notes on another Cdn. case.

Indirect Receipt of Capital.

The second major spousal trust condition described under para. 70(6)(b)(ii) or 73(1)(c)(ii) is that no person except the spouse may before her death "receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust..." however the provision does not preclude other individuals from benefitting from the trust income or capital without receiving or obtaining the use of it. If a remainderman has a capital interest that is enforceable against the specific amount of capital, that will exist, after the death of the spouse would he be using or receiving the trust capital or income if he were to receive a loan "collateralized" on the interest or sold the interest outright, or would he be receiving the benefit from the holding of the legal title to the equitable title to the capital? The key to the fact that, in the author's opinion, a taxpayer isn't receiving or otherwise obtaining the use of trust income or capital when he sells or mortgages his capital interest is that he has not indirectly obtained the use of any income or capital of the trust nor does the provision speak of receiving benefits from the income or capital's substitute property⁷⁴⁹. If the provision read, "...received or obtained the use of any of the trust income or capital, directly or indirectly, by means of a trust or by any other means whatsoever..." as the scope or the attribution provisions is termed then the ability to sell or mortgage the interest could not be seen as satisfying the conditions. If the provision read "...received or obtained the use of, indirectly or directly, any of the trustees income or capital, or any substitute property therefore..." then the ability to sell or mortgage the capital interest would definitely taint the trust at its creation. Thus, presently, the taxpayer can mortgage his interest and receive a benefit which he would not be able to otherwise receive from the trust (unless it was varied). To think otherwise would be to contend that Parliament wished testators to impose alienation restraints on the interests in spousal trusts created under their wills; a ridiculous idea.

The provision also does not specify how the other taxpayer can obtain the use of the capital of the trust although in the author's opinion interest free loans could constitute a benefit within the context. Does this require the initial trust deed to expressly preclude the extending of interest free loans to the non-spousal beneficiaries, even though none are initially contemplated? The benefit from the use of the capital and obtaining its use directly should not be confused. If the trust is to insure the life of one of its beneficiaries the beneficiary has not obtained the use of the trust's capital though his spouse will have realized a benefit if she is to be the proceeds recipient. Interest free loans to a beneficiary's holding corporation may eventually constitute a benefit for purposes of Sec. 105(1) but the beneficiary hasn't obtained the use of the trust's capital. The provision targets the receipt of the use of the trust capital or income, not benefits from its use. In *Peardon v. M.N.R.*⁷⁵⁰ an offspring was allowed the use of trust property, a dwelling, that was made available to him as a consequence of his renting accompanying land. The Tax Court didn't find this to offend the Sec. 70(6)(b)(ii) requirements but in that same case the trustees could allow certain other specified parties to use trust property gratuitously and on those grounds the provision was violated; other parties could obtain the use of the trust property.

Powers of Encroachment/Advancement/Appointment in Respect of Access to Capital.

A testator would want to ensure that the ability of the executors/trustees to use a power of appointment, advancement, maintenance, or encroachment instilled in them to redirect the benefits of a spousal trust away from the spouse during her life is limited following *Terrill Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷⁵¹ whereunder the deceased provided that the trustees could exercise powers of encroachment so as to pay capital to the present income beneficiary, while he also provided that the trustees were to pay the net annual income derived from the trust to the spouse until her death, while until that time the son and all the other beneficiaries would not be entitled to revenue from the estate. The Minister denied the application of Sec. 70(6)(b) to the arrangement on the 749 See the House of Lords decision in Ingram [2000] 1 AC 293. Lord Hoffman at page 304 said:

".... 'property' in section 102 is not something which has physical existence like a house but a specific interest in that property, a legal construct, which can coexist with other interests in the same physical object. Section 102 does not therefore prevent people from deriving benefit from the object in which they have given away an interest. It applies only when they derive the benefit from that interest."

750. 86 D.T.C. 1045

751. 87 D.T.C. 504 (TCC)

grounds that the will stated that the trustees and executors "shall always have the right to draw and encroach upon the capital of my estate for the benefit of my wife and son" and with that counsel contended that if the executors always have the right to encroach on capital for the benefit of the son, then they could do so when the spouse-mother was alive. Tremblay T.C.J. of the Tax Court of Canada held:

"However, it is while the executors are paying income to the wife, the son, or someone else, ("while they are paying revenues to..."), (as per the trust deed), that the encroachment on the capital can take place but "for the benefit of" the beneficiary, the wife or the son. Knowing that Terrill, Jr. cannot be a beneficiary (income) until after his mother died (clause b), it seems obvious to me that the testator's intention was to follow the logical order established by clauses 6a and 6b as argued by counsel for the appellant." "The word "always" must be interpreted as meaning at any time, for the benefit of a beneficiary, during the period in which he is entitled to the income."

Powers of encroachment operate only in respect of an income beneficiary who is entitled, at the time to income while a power of advancement may be exercised with respect to future or contingent capital beneficiaries whose entitlements have not become immediately enforceable, however the Sec. 70(6)(b)(ii) provision explicitly precludes trusts whereunder anyone other than the spouse may receive or obtain the use of any of the capital or income hence if the above case was based on a power of advancement or appointment the executors would have surely failed in their argument.⁷⁵² It's of paramount importance when drafting the testamentary spousal trust terms to place restrictions on any powers of appointment, advancement or maintenance by prohibiting their exercise before the death of the spouse. This applies regardless of if power holder is the spouse herself or not.⁷⁵³

Poor Drafting.

Simple failures to draft a concise and accurate will/trust deed can cause serious problems as well. In Johnson Estate v. M.N.R.⁷⁵⁴ the testator set up a trust fund whereby $600 was to be paid to the spouse per month from the income of the fund and if the trust revenue was insufficient for these purposes the trustees could draw on capital. Unfortunately the testator also expressed that in setting up the same fund upon which the spouse's income was to be earned "there shall be added thereto a sufficient sum to provide for education at university or school of post secondary education for" his sons and that "pending the utilization of such monies same shall be invested and reinvested and the income shall be added to the capital of the said Fund," being a singular trust. J.B. Goetz of the Tax Review Board found that:

"Trust Fund #1 for E.M. Johnson (the spouse) was subject, unfortunately, to other persons, namely N. Johnson and J. Johnson(sons), to make claims against the fund during E.M. Johnson's lifetime and during the life of Fund #1. The trust then, is subject to the encumbrance which allows others other than the spouse to obtain, before the death of the spouse, a portion of the capital or income from the Fund."

In Matson Estate v. M.N.R.⁷⁵⁵ the entitlement of the spouse to all of the income of a singular testamentary trust wherein two indefeasible life interests existed, (one for the payment to the widow of a fixed amount of income and the remaining amount of income after the testator's former initial spouse received a monthly payment of $50.00 from the trust and another equivalent amount from the estate), was at issue. The Minister successfully convinced A.J. Frost of the Tax Appeal Board that the widow spouse was not entitled to receive all of the income of the singular trust in that payments were to be made from it to the former spouse ($50.00) and thus the trust did not qualify for Sec. 7(1)(b) treatment under the E.T.A.. If the testator had set up two trusts, one for each of the income beneficiaries there would not have been a taint of the spousal one, and in this respect one should proceed cautiously when laying out beneficiary trust relationships in a testamentary document.

In Machacek Estate v. M.N.R.⁷⁵⁶ a testator provided that his estate was to be held on trust for his wife and ⁷⁵² Though see Re: Henderson's Trusts, 1969 3 All E.R. 769 (CA).

⁷⁵³ See also A.N. Gilbert v. M.N.R., 83 D.T.C. 645.

⁷⁵⁴ 82 D.T.C. 1381 (TRB)

⁷⁵⁵ 71 D.T.C. 504 (TAB)

⁷⁵⁶ 76 D.T.C. 1023 (TRB)

offspring whereby the spouse was to receive all of its income while he also gave the trustees the discretionary power to advance/encroach on capital or income for the maintenance education and benefit of the offspring. He also gave the trustees the power to determine the nature of any particular receipt, (as being either income or capital), and when the trustees attempted to secure the application of Sec. 7(1)(b) of the old E.T.A., (substantially similar, in respect of spousal trusts, to Sec. 70(6) of the ITA), the Minister understandably refused it on the grounds that the spouse's interest in the trust was not absolute and indefeasible. The Tax Review Board found, agreeing with Judge Flanigan in *Kamichik Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷⁵⁷ that:

"An encroachment clause for the benefit of children must impose more than a moral obligation to do what a natural parent would do for his children. I fully agree with Judge Flanigan that clauses of this nature do not detract from an otherwise indefeasible settlement under paragraph 7(1)(b) of the Act. In the case at bar, the words used - "for the advancement, maintenance, education or benefit of any infant." - are little more than a suggestion to look after the children in a natural way, and cannot be considered to deprive the widow of a tax benefit simply because they happened to be used in the will."

In the author's opinion, as an example of determining whether the estate had vested indefeasibly in the trust or spouse, this conclusion is wrong, and if as an example of determining whether anyone can obtain or use any capital of the trust prior to the spouse's death the conclusion is even more so wrong. Clearly, as a question of fact, the children could receive trust property, (capital or income), before the spouse's death, as beneficiaries, regardless of the reason. Clearly both vesting of interest was defeasible and potential benefits to beneficiaries prior to the widow's death were not limited to being received exclusively by her. If "push came to shove", and the children were not properly maintained or provided for, "in a natural way", they could have their rights to such upheld in court.⁷⁵⁸ In the above case, if as a question of form, the testator had not had in mind the support of offspring why did he not simply bequeath the funds to the parties instead of tagging on "the suggestion" of what would "naturally" follow. The trustees were given special powers to exercise in the case that the spouse did not act properly in respect of the offspring but this doesn't necessarily imply that the offspring did not have recourse even if the power was not exercised. If the power wasn't exercised, and it was obvious that the offspring were not being properly maintained or educated the courts could be used to order that the power be exercised for its intended purpose.⁷⁵⁹

In *The Queen v. Hewitt Estate*⁷⁶⁰ the trustees of a testamentary spousal trust were given the discretionary power of deciding whether to utilize income earned to sustain the trust's business operations and to pay the balance over to the widow. Essentially they could decide what the business's needed in terms of reinvested earnings while the surplus was to be paid to the spouse. The trustees applied for Sec. 7(1)(b) treatment under the E.T.A. and the Minister denied its applicability. No business activities were carried on by the trust since the testator had disposed of all of his business interests prior to death hence the discretionary power allowed to the trustees to reinvest earnings was of no effect and unexercisable. The wife was entitled, in fact, to all of the earnings.

Timing of Vesting.

In order for subsection 70(6) to apply to particular property it must be shown within a period ending 36 months after the death or longer if written application to the Minister in that period has been accepted to allow an extension, that the property has become vested indefeasibly in the spouse or the trust as the case may be and the 36 month plus period usually gives the executors plenty of time to wind-up the estate and have any

⁷⁵⁷ 73 D.T.C. 177

⁷⁵⁸ if the encroachment power was in the nature of a trust power

⁷⁵⁹ This was of issue in Singer v. Singer, (1915), 33 O.L.R. 602, Re: Blow, 1977 18 O.R. 516. See also Schipper v. Guaranty Trust, 1989 69 O.R. 386 (CA), where a spousal power was ordered exercised and it was held:

"We recognize that the court will generally refuse to interfere with the "uncontrolled" discretion of a trustee, where the trustee is acting bona fide. However, in our opinion, the court is entitled to interfere where the trustee is attempting to exercise its discretion to achieve a purpose not intended under the terms of the trust."

Even if the trustees could not be compelled to exercise the power of encroachment they could voluntarily before the death of the spouse. See "Control of Trustee Discretions", Parry, The Conveyancer, 1989 pg. 244 for more detail.

⁷⁶⁰ 78 D.T.C. 6123

spin-off trusts properly constituted. It must be shown to the Minister, if need be, through the appropriate documentation or legal implications that the property has vested indefeasibly within that 36 month period regardless of whether the actual conveyancing of legal title has occurred.⁷⁶¹ The timing of the vesting is critical in that the executors don't have to show proof immediately upon obtaining it that the indefeasible vesting has occurred, which allows them time to adjust the inheritance to take better advantage of the favorable ITA testamentary provisions while on the other hand they must be able to do so within the 36 months or extended period. The Minister will extend the vesting period to an amount that considers "reasonable" if properly informed in advance.

The timing of the indefeasible vesting was of critical issue in *Hillis Estate v. The Queen*⁷⁶² where two and one-half years after the date of death the totality of the estate finally became vested indefeasibly in the widow but only after the then statutorily recognized 15 month time limit had lapsed and the sons of the testator had disclaimed their interest therein and the spouse had obtained a vesting order under the Saskatchewan Dependents' Relief Act. W. Hillis died on February 21st, 1977. On June 15th 1979 one son disclaimed his interest in the estate and on July 4th of the same year the other son did the same. On Nov. 29th, 1979 the spouse applied under the province's Dependents' Relief Act for an order granting the entire estate to her and on Dec. 14th, 1979 she received that order. Since Mr. Hillis had died intestate the two previous disclaimers by the son resulted in their share remaining subject to the Intestate Succession Act whereafter application under the province's Dependant's Relief Act was made to vest the balance of the estate in the spouse. The order resulting under the D.R.A. deemed the balance to have been vested in the spouse from the time immediately after death thus allowing the condition in Sec. 70(6) to be satisfied, even though the arrangements were finally concluded 29 months after the death. Smith, D.J. of the Federal Court-Trial Division had few problems in finding the "appropriate conclusion" however he did consider one aspect of the case as such:

"The only ground of explanation for the delay in this case is that for a long time no lawyer was engaged to look after the legal steps of administering the estate. All such matters were left in the hands of an accountant who it seems did practically nothing.

...
In my view the foregoing explanation for the long delay which occurred in this case cannot be considered to be reasonable justification for that delay... The administrators probably were not aware of, or at least not well informed about the terms of Sec. 70(6) of the Income Tax Act particularly the conditions laid down in the last four lines thereof, but if so, ignorance of the law is not an excuse for the long delay that occurred... From the evidence I can see no reason why the estate could not easily have been fully administered and wound up within six or seven months following the death of the deceased. The administrators were entitled to wait for a reasonable period of time to permit the accountant, on whom they relied, to get on with the administration, but to allow matters to drag on for well over two years without any progress being shown, requires, in my opinion, much better grounds of justification than have been expressed here."

The application of Sec. 70(6) was not available to the executors through the Trial Division hence they took the issue to the Appeal Division⁷⁶³ where three justices provided varying opinions on the matter.

Clement D.J. provided with respect to the ability of the taxpayer to establish vesting:

"In this context, the verb "can" takes the meaning of "be able to". In effect the spouse must be able to establish that in law in the circumstances of the case the property vested indefeasibly in her within the prescribed 15 months. In the whole of the context it is clear that it is not necessary that actual conveyance of the property to her shall have been completed within that time; if she makes the required proof, then in law the conveyancing must follow as a matter of course and of right. This interpretation affords an intelligible reconciliation of the phrase with

761. The extension to the time period is in respect of the providing of proof that vesting has occurred within the 36 months and apparently in respect of actual vesting the 36 month period cannot be extended. (Memo from Non-Corporate Rulings Division to Audit Programming Division Nov. 1981)

762 82 D.T.C. 6249 (FCTD)

763 83 D.T.C. 5365

the preceding phrase which speaks of property that has on or after the death been transferred or distributed: it gives some recognition to the difficulties and complexities attendant in some cases on the due administration and distribution of estate and which may have to be resolved, particularly when the construction and operation of the will is contested, before distribution can be made. Then when necessary, the provision for the enlargement at the time may be invoked. If the circumstances warrant it, the required proof may be made within a reasonable time after the lapse of the prescribed 15 months whether or not conveyancing has been completed."

Following this he made a somewhat obvious comment concerning the retroactive application of the Intestate Succession Act (of Saskatchewan):

"In my opinion the provisions (of the Succession Act) came into operation upon the death of the intestate and effect an indefeasible vesting in the beneficiary of the interest (in the estate) provided to which the administration must give effect albeit subject to dealings with the vested interest by the beneficiary. In this view, the vesting of the interest is not dependent upon an order of the court granting administration of the intestate's estate; it takes place by force of imperative statutory provision operating at the moment of death of the intestate."

As per the Dependant's Relief Act he provided:

"It does not have force until an application for relief is made by or on behalf of a dependent, and then only for the purposes of the statute which cannot include federal income tax. And by S. 14(1) it is not until an order is made that the fictional will, modified as to the court may seem proper in the circumstances having regard to the purposes and directive of the statute, is to have effect. Then the deemed will is deemed to have effect from the date of death of the intestate. These provisions are stated to be for all purposes but obviously that can mean only for all provincial purposes..."

"Beyond this it may be observed that there was no certainty within the 15 month period that any part of the estate, beyond that already vested in her by the Intestate Succession Act, would be the subject of a relief order nor what terms the court might impose. During that period the sons had not disclaimed and the disclaimers do not appear to have been brought to the attention of the court making the relief order..."

"There is no justification or need to assign to these disclaimers a retrospective operation, they took effect in reality upon their execution which was posterior to the prescribed 15 month period. The effect, in my view, was an accretion to the interest of the spouse of whatever net estate might then be left, but at a time when the spouses right to relief from tax had crystallized under the provisions of the Intestate Succession Act."⁷⁶⁴

As a conclusion he provided that part of the property of the estate did vest indefeasibly in the spouse, being the part which vested indefeasibly in her only as a result of the operation of the Intestate Succession Act. As a closing comment the reasonableness of the time taken for the proper effects of the relevant Acts to be felt were analyzed:

"The purpose of Sec. 70(6) is to give a measure of tax relief to the surviving spouse of a family unit. This is laudable. One can well understand the reasons and motive that moved Parliament to its enactment. They set the spouse apart from the commercial aspects of the tax. What is enacted is a remission of tax burdens arising on the death of a taxpayer that would otherwise fall upon a surviving spouse. She (or he) is to be helped. The enlargement of time jurisdiction should be given a generous operation so that this purpose is not lightly defeated; it should not be construed stringently and unsympathetically to the purpose. The result of the enlargement is no more to enable the spouse to obtain the same tax relief which was available to her in the beginning. Nothing new, nothing offensive to the intent of Parliament. The time limit for establishing the case for relief is no doubt a departmental concern in bringing it to finality, but Parliament has recognized that there are cases in which 15 months (or 36) is inadequate."

⁷⁶⁴ This was also the basis of an opinion (5-0051) provided in Jan. 1981 by the Non-Corporate Rulings Division to the Audit Programs Division Technical Applications Section. Indefeasible vesting can't occur until the disclaimers are made.

Although the vesting period has been extended to 36 months since this case was heard the opinion of Clement D.J. could still hold.

Pratte J. came to a completely different conclusion based on the mere technicalities of the case being his basis of analysis concentrated practically exclusively on whether the evidence could be provided by the spouse within the period that could prove that indefeasible vesting had occurred.

"I will assume for the sake of discussion, that the order and the disclaimers had the effect of vesting indefeasibly the properties here in question in Mrs. Hillis; I will also assume that, underlying the law of Saskatchewan, the disclaimers as well as the order may under the Dependant's Relief Act had a retroactive effect to the date of Mr. Hillis' death. On the basis of these two assumptions, when did the estate become indefeasibly vested in Mrs. Hillis? In my view, when the disclaimers were executed and when the order was pronounced since the effects of the disclaimers and the court order, in spite of their retroactivity, did not exist as long as the disclaimers were not executed and the court order was not pronounced. It is only when the disclaimers were executed and the Court order was pronounced that Mrs. Hillis became entitled to the whole of her husband's estate with retroactive effect to the date of his death. If therefore, the disclaimers and the Court order had, as contended by the Appellants, the effect of vesting the estate in Mrs. Hillis, that effect did not take place within the 15 months after the death of Mr. Hillis."⁷⁶⁵

Concerning the estate rights of the spouse and their necessary character he held:

"...it is necessary to bear in mind that subsection 70(6) applies when some particular properties of the kind described in the subsection have been transferred to a widow as a consequence of her husband's death, if those properties become vested indefeasible in the widow within the 15 months of the death of the husband. In order for subsection 70(6) to apply, therefore, the widow must, within the 15 months, have become vested indefeasibly with the properties that were later transferred to her; it is not sufficient for the wife to have acquired, within the time prescribed, rights in the estate of her husband...From the mere fact, therefore, that Mrs. Hillis, on the death of her husband, acquired rights under the Intestate Succession Act, it cannot be inferred that she, thereby, became vested indefeasibly with the properties that were later transferred to her."

Pratte J. would have dismissed the appeal therefore entirely on those grounds.

Herald J., provided:

"I agree with appellant's counsel that the wording of subsection 70(6) of the Income Tax Act contemplates the disposition of property other than by will, as well as by will, since it deals with the transfer or distribution of property after the death of a taxpayer, and "...as a consequence thereof...". This wording in my view makes it clear that Parliament contemplated that the law of the provinces in respect of the disposition of property on or after death, being matters relating to property and civil rights, would apply so as to control the application of subsection 70(6) in accordance with the law of the particular province concerned."

He then went on to provide that since this aspect was implicit in the provision and since the antedating effect of the Court order under Dependant's Relief Act was such as to cause the property to be deemed vested indefeasibly the day after death in the spouse, then for purposes of Sec. 70(6) it would hold. In a particularly valid comment he held:

"If the indefeasible vesting required for the application of the subsection 70(6) exemption is to be effective only from the date of an order made under the Dependant's Relief Act...or the parallel legislation in effect in most of the other provinces, then a widow in the position of this widow, for whose maintenance reasonable provision has not been made, either because of intestacy or because of inadequate provision in the taxpayer's will will stand in jeopardy of losing the benefit of an exempting provision which Parliament, in my view, clearly intended to provide to persons in her circumstances."⁷⁶⁶

⁷⁶⁵ See Off. Rec. in Bank. v. Schultz & Ors., 170 C.L.R. 307 HCA, for a discussion of retroactivity of court orders made under widow maintenance provisions.

In respect of the reasonableness of the time period after the death in which the widow took to ascertain her rights he provided:

"The evidence clearly discloses that the widow first saw a lawyer in the fall of 1979 and only then became aware of her rights under the Dependant's Relief Act as a result of which the application under the Act was commenced on November 29th, 1979. In my view of this fact and the fact that prior to 1979, the administration of the estate was handled by an accountant, rather than by a solicitor, and that long delays occurred through his unsatisfactory handling of these matters, I think the conclusion reached by the Trial Judge supra was not reasonably opened to him on the evidence, particularly when the totality of that evidence is viewed from the perspective of the reasonableness of the delay."

Herald, J., thus would have allowed the entirety of the estate to qualify for the Sec. 70(6) exemption on the grounds that it had "vested indefeasibly" in the spouse on death. The Court however, taking the moderate approach, which was significantly influenced by the fact that the disclaimers of the sons were executed after the vesting period, allowed only the one third portion of the estate to be considered vested indefeasibly in her within the 15 month period, that part which was so regardless of the disclaimers and court order. It must be recognized that the Dependant's Relief Act court order could almost be considered as a sham transaction in this case since the sons had already disclaimed their interest allowing the whole of the estate to fall to the spouse regardless. Its only effect was to have such vesting be considered under provincial law to have occurred within the 15 month period. If the sons had disclaimed within the 15 month period the case wouldn't have had to go to the lengths it did simply due to the fact that the indefeasible vesting would have occurred within the prescribed time.⁷⁶⁷

Under numerous provincial Intestate Succession Acts rights to various amounts of the value of an estate that is intestate vest in the spouse or offspring from the time of death (but not particular property) while orders made pursuant to a Dependant's Relief Act/Testator's Family Maintenance Act may allow vesting of property to be recognized as from the time of death while in the case of Estate Administration Acts property vests in the personal representatives as trustees for persons by law beneficially entitled thereto however in the latter case beneficially interested parties need not have rights to the estate property in specie. Instead the testator may have bequeathed the residue of his estate, and allowed the executor a power of sale so as to generate funds to satisfy debt. In the case of the Intestate Succession Acts one should refer to Pratte J.'s comment in Hillis v. M.N.R., concerning vesting of property in specie:

"Under the Intestate Succession Act, Mrs. Hillis became entitled, on the death of her husband, to a sum of $10,000 and to one third of the residue of his estate. However, all the property of the deceased devolved and was vested in his personal representative. As Mrs. Hillis's rights under the Intestate Succession Act were merely rights to a sum of money and to a share of the residue, she had no specific interest in any of the property comprising in the estate until that residue had been ascertained in the due course of administration. From the mere fact, therefore, that Mrs. Hillis, on the death of her husband, acquired rights under the Intestate Succession Act, it cannot be inferred that she, thereby, became vested indefeasibly with the properties that were later transferred to her."

In instances where the provincial Intestate Succession Acts, Dependant's Relief Acts, Testator's Family Maintenance Acts, are not relevant, and the Estate Administration Acts and Trustees Acts are, it would appear that vesting of property of the residue is put off until after the residue has been ascertained as per the reasoning in *ex. parte Barnardo's Homes National Incorporated Association*⁷⁶⁸ and vesting of interest in specie does not ⁷⁶⁶ This comment is particularly relevant in the author's opinion and its substance may have led to the extension of the vesting period to 36 months after death.

⁷⁶⁷ In a Technical Interpretation rendered in July 1984 the Non-Corporate Rulings Directorate provided that when an application is made under a Dependant's Relief Act within the 15 month (36 mth. now) period but the vesting isn't awarded until after that time the roll-over isn't available.

⁷⁶⁸ 7 T.C. 646

arise until that time as well. Pratte J.'s comments are thus equally relevant to residuary gifts. Until the residue is ascertained (or ascertainable) there would appear to be grounds to contend that title to any particular property has not been indefeasibly vested in the beneficiary in law since in law the personal representative could liquidate the property to cover estate debt.

A lot of arguments in Hillis Estate v. The Queen would also be relevant where a special power of appointment is exercised by any person to vest indefeasibly in the spouse estate property that was otherwise not so vested, outside of the vesting period. The results of a special power exercise would stand as being derived as per the terms of the will since the effects of the special power are to be "read into" the will however if such an exercise takes place after the 36 month vesting period it could quite easily be argued, as per the reasoning of Pratte J. in Hillis Estate, that the vesting could not be shown to have occurred within the 36 month period.⁷⁶⁹ It is also essential that powers capable of divesting the estate property from the spouse/spousal estate be shown to have lost applicability prior to the end of the 36 month period.

A more recent case involving the issue of indefeasible vesting is *May Estate v. M.N.R.*⁷⁷⁰ where a testator left a holographic will and the widow contested the validity thereof and commenced an action, under the Saskatchewan Matrimonial Property Act to have the farm assets declared to be matrimonial property to which she would be entitled under Sec. 35(e) of the M.P.A.. On the same day and just previous to the trial between the executors and herself an agreement was reached whereby the executors were given certain rights in respect of three parcels of land, which were the three properties the Minister refused to apply the Sec. 70(6) roll-over to. The agreement was conditional upon the widow being vested with all of the property as per the court order, which had not yet been delivered, in that it opened with:

"And whereas it is a condition of obtaining the consents of Gerald May, Keith May, and Joyce Bowerman to the said settlement that they be granted certain rights with respect to certain lands, which said lands shall be ordered to vest in the Grantor as part of this said settlement;"

The other executors were given a first right of refusal upon the purchase of the land in question if the appellant received a bona fide purchase offer, and should such a right not be granted the agreement vested an irrevocable and binding option in the executors allowing them to purchase the land. Should the appellant still own the land at death she would be required to bequeath it to the executors⁷⁷¹. During the time of the agreement the executors, as per the agreement, were deemed to have an interest in the land and they did register and maintain a caveat against them. The Court handed down the order under the M.P.A., retroactively applicable to the same day of the agreement after 9 months, whereby all of the land⁷⁷² were vested in the appellant. The agreement was made on April 9th/86 the trial was held April 9th/86, and the order was issued Dec. 11th/86 and since the agreement provided for the vesting of title to the land in the appellant the Minister contended that she did not receive title by virtue of the order but by virtue of the agreement she entered into. Kempo, T.C.J., provided in conclusion:

"The conclusion at law is that the orders pronounced 9 April 1986 were effective as at the day and time of pronouncement and not at the later time when they were "issued" through the auspices of the Deputy Register on 11 Dec. 1986. These orders are unconditional and unreserved, and are not expressed to be on or by the consent of the parties. The fact that conditional consents had been exchanged between the parties prior to the orders being pronounced does not transpose, without more, otherwise unconditional orders into something else. The orders stand at face value until they have been effectively set aside in an action or proceeding directed to that special end. Accordingly, the subject property in fact and in law became the property of Phyllis May on 9 April 1986 and it was in that capacity that the Agreement, Exhibit A-5 supra, was actually made. Not only was this as a result of the effective date of the orders, it also accords with the fact that the parties themselves viewed her as the "grantor" of the rights given in the ⁷⁶⁹ There is consistent jurisprudence that though the result of the exercise of special power of appointment is to be read back to test the vesting period of the gift the result of the exercise isn't to be relate back to the time of the creation of the power only the time of its exercise.

⁷⁷⁰ 89 D.T.C. 534 (TCC)

⁷⁷¹ all of whom were the next of kin

⁷⁷² as well as buildings situated thereon and machinery/grain etc.

Agreement in her personal capacity and not as representative of the estate. In my opinion the Respondent has not made out his case that Phyllis May received the subject property by virtue of the Agreement rather than by virtue of the orders."

The Minister's counsel further submitted that since the agreement entered into between the parties served, to a certain extent, to limit the rights of the appellant given to her under the orders then the agreement could defeat the interest of the appellant directly and that her rights to the property would not be indefeasible. Kempo T.C.J., provided with respect to this, (quite appropriately):

"The granting of the right of first refusal which may be converted into an option to purchase on breach of the former does not, in my opinion, amount to a divestiture of Phyllis May's interest in the land per se. Unfettered legal and beneficial ownership permits such deals to be made, the consideration here being the resolution of various legal battles."

The essence of the agreement obviously convinced the executors to be lenient in their presentation when the order was asked for and thus rather than fall into protracted litigation the parties allowed for the benefit to be recognized by the testator and at the same time gain rights to the property. If they would have gotten into a bind the vesting period would have lapsed and the testator wouldn't have obtained the roll-over treatment.

While indefeasible vesting of property in a spousal trust created by the testator's will, (or intestate/dependant's relief court order), must occur within 36 months of the death the income producing property can generate income for non-spousal beneficiaries prior to such vesting without jeopardizing the rollover. Up to almost 3 years worth of income can be accumulated while the estate undergoes administration and be distributed upon complete administration to non-spousal parties while understandably vesting of the property in the spousal trust must be deferred as per the terms of the will in order for this to occur.⁷⁷³

The Roll-Over.

Paragraph 70(6)(c) provides that where the discussed conditions in Sec. 70(6) exist subsection 70(5)(a) to (d) but not (e) is not applicable to the property of the taxpayer and as per para (d) the taxpayer will be deemed to have disposed of the property immediately before his death for proceeds equal to its adjusted cost base at that time if it was a non-depreciable capital property or where the property was depreciable property of a prescribed class, the proportion of the undepreciated capital cost of the class immediately before his death from which the property came that the fair market value of the property is of the fair market value of all of the property of the class, at that time. Depreciable capital property not of a prescribed class (Part XVII of Regulations) will be deemed disposed of for its FMV. Since he is deemed to have disposed of his property immediately before his death, and since the taxpayer's terminal tax year ends at the date of death⁷⁷⁴ he will not be able to deduct C.C.A. in respect of the property. The spouse or spousal estate will be able to recognize a cost of the property equal to the proceeds recognized by the deceased being the initial cost, and adjusted cost of the property. As per para. (e) of Sec. 70(6), para. (e) of Sec. 70(5) is to be adapted to instances where the resulting capital cost to the spouse/spousal trust of depreciable capital property is less than its capital cost to the deceased. In such a case, for purposes only of the C.C.A./terminal loss provisions in sections 13 and 20, (and the accompanying Regs.), but not the section 39 or 40 capital gains provisions the excess shall be considered deducted by the recipient of the property as C.C.A. previously and the capital cost to the recipient of the property shall be deemed equal to that of the testator, thus exposing the recipient to recapture of C.C.A. taken by the deceased, when the property is disposed of to a third party.

With the reform of 1990 subparagraph (d.1) was added to Sec. 70(6), applicable in respect of transfers and distributions after Jan. 15, 1987, whereby there will be integrated roll-through of the tax cost of a partnership interest held by the testator other than an interest described in Sec. 100(3). That subsection refers to partnership interests acquired by virtue of the death of an individual where the taxpayer isn't a partner and doesn't become a partner by virtue of the acquisition of that particular interest however this doesn't apply where the interest was, immediately before the individual's death, a residual interest described in section 98.1. Thus the Sec. 70(6)(d.1) provision applies to residual partnership interests and interests acquired by the spouse/spousal trust that allow it to become a partner by virtue of the particular acquisition or where the recipient was already a partner. As per subpara. 70(6)(d.1)(i) the testator will be deemed not to have disposed of the interest, except for purposes of Sec. 98(5)(g), and will thus not suffer from a taxable disposition while as per subpara. (ii) the recipient will be deemed to have acquired the interest at a cost equal to that recognized by the testator while under subpara. (iii) in computing the ACB of the interest the Sec. 53(1)-(2) adjustments incurred by the testator will be added or deducted in computing the ACB of the interest in the recipient's hands. Negative partnership interest ACBs can thus pass through to the spousal recipient without tax consequences to the testator.

⁷⁷³ See para. 9 of I.T. 305R3.

⁷⁷⁴ as per Katz Estate v. The Queen, 76 D.T.C. 6377

If the interest is a residual partnership interest described in section 98.1 and the spousal recipient isn't a partner and doesn't become a partner by virtue of the acquisition the interest will pass through Sec. 70(6)(d) so as to possibly allow negative interest ACBs to be recognized as capital gains if the spousal party is the recipient while Sec. 100(3)(b) will then apply to cause the negative ACB to be retained by the recipient while section 98.2 will cause the same.

Under paragraph 70(5.2)(d) and (f) tax-free dispositions are available to a deceased when Canadian resource or foreign resource property or land inventory used in the business carried on by the deceased are rolled to a spouse or spousal trust under the conditions described in Sec. 70(6) whereby the recipient will be able to recognize a cost of the property equal to the deemed proceeds of the deceased which will equal the cost of the property to him, (for all intents and purposes). In respect of the resource property the legal representative may elect an amount of proceeds deemed to be recognized, up to the fair market value of the property, thus allowing the deceased to take advantage of the deductions available in respect of such properties when disposed of. Where land inventory is transferred it need not retain its income/inventorial characteristic to the trust⁷⁷⁵ and thus when it realizes the property the disposition will be on account of capital, thus reducing the effective taxation on the property's initial use.⁷⁷⁶ When the trust disposes of it a capital gain may result which could be negated at the trust level with a Sec. 104(21) designation which could be absorbed by the spouse's capital gains deduction balance.

Once the land inventory becomes a capital property of the trust the trust capital beneficiaries may receive it directly under Sec. 107(4) in satisfaction of their interest which would cause the trust to recognize substantial capital gains. If the capital beneficiary can inflate the ACB of the interest through circular disposition-acquisition, which can be performed tax-free under Sec. 107(1) through the variation of the trust's debt, use of powers etc., the trust's capital gain on the deemed disposition of the property under Sec. 107(4)(f) will not be lessened with a capital loss recognized by the beneficiary when he sells the property though this isn't the case if the spouse acquires the interest, realizes the Sec. 107(2) bump, liquidates the property and satisfies the note given to the other beneficiary on the acquisition of his interest.

Structured Payments to the Estate/Trust by the Beneficiaries.

There isn't one provision in the Act that precludes the spouse or spousal trust from being required to give consideration to the general estate in respect of the property transferred to it and in such a manner the benefits from the testator may be finely tuned so as to be spread over several parties without the disposition, (attracting tax results), of any property so as to obtain the capital to do so. Once property is severed from the estate to satisfy the terms of the will the asset amount of the estate is severely reduced however if the spouse or spousal trust provides consideration to the estate the distributable amount is boosted back up. By the mere fact that Finance has recognized an estate and the spousal trust arising out of it via all the mechanics in Sec. 70(7)-(8) it is impossible for CRA to legitimately argue that the two are the same.

Subparagraph 248(8)(a) effectively provides that where there is a transfer, distribution, or acquisition of property of a taxpayer as a consequence of the terms of his will it will be considered as a consequence of his death for purposes of the Act however this doesn't necessitate the recipient to act only in the capacity of a beneficiary but instead he can act instead exclusively in the capacity of a purchaser. The provision allows the beneficiary to make a payment of an amount to the estate to receive the bequest without upsetting the transfer's nature as being as a consequence of the death and not as a consequence of the payment. The testator can thus require that certain payments be made to the general estate or the trusts arising out of it as a condition of the receipt of the property however in the spousal circumstance it's important that such payments not constitute a selling price/consideration for a sale for if the transaction assumes such an appearance the Sec. 70(6) roll-over will not apply to the property's receipt.⁷⁷⁷ The spousal trust or the spouse can make payments to the estate to receive the property, while so too can the non-spousal beneficiaries. Unfortunately, the very actions taken by the spousal parties to ensure that the Sec. 70(6) roll-over applies upon the payment also automatically precludes the recipient estate/trust from being of the testamentary nature since in avoiding the status of purchaser the spousal party can only be regarded as making "a contribution" to the recipient; that isn't on or as a consequence of the spousal party's death. If the spouse makes the payment directly to the other beneficiary(ies) Sec. 105(1) may apply if the recipient is resident so as to cause a full income inclusion of the amount⁷⁷⁸ while the cost of the property to the acquirer will not reflect this taxation. If the payment is made to a non-spousal "flushing" trust set up under the will the same may occur, but if the general estate is to be wound up quickly, (or it isn't to recognize income on its own account), the loss of the testamentary status may not be of paramount importance. The only way the payment may avoid taxation is if the recipient is non-resident, (the will may set up a non-resident trust just for such purposes).

⁷⁷⁵ which may be structured so as to preclude it from carrying on the business of the taxpayer

⁷⁷⁶ The change in use rules do not apply here.

The amount that is to be required to transfer any particular asset to any particular beneficiary has its repercussions. If FMV consideration is paid the recipient trust/estate will retain its testamentary status while the Sec. 70(6) roll-over will not apply if the payer is spousal since such would constitute a sale. Financing the payment can taken many forms; the spouse may assign her income interest under the spousal trust for a lump sum and the amount will be paid off with the income realized while it is not possible to have the spousal trust set up under the will so as to pay its income to the recipient as consideration since as per the will the spouse will not be entitled to all of the trust's income. The property recipient could actually sell the property upon its receipt and extinguish any note payable given as consideration, while retaining any balance, or he could even mortgage it in which case the interest may be deductible. If this isn't possible then it can be possible for the testator to ensure the same effect occurs by mortgaging his property selectively or having the executors mortgage it and ensuring that certain beneficiaries can only receive the property if they assume the mortgage whereby the proceeds can be bequeathed to other parties.⁷⁷⁹ Subsections 70(7)-(8) may solve any problems perhaps with very little tax consequences that may occur with respect to the assignment of this debt to the spousal trust. Understandably cash or property with accrued tax benefits should be used to make such payments. Alternatively the will may provide that as a condition of the bequest to the spouse she must mortgage the property and create a trust of the cash proceeds for non-spousal beneficiaries. If she doesn't agree the property can, as per the terms of the will, fall back to be held in a spousal trust with gift over to the non-spousal beneficiaries or incorporation thereafter. Indefeasible vesting would have to be proven to have occurred within the 36 month period in either case.

One particularly interesting arrangement to benefit from the Sec. 70(6) roll-over to the maximum would be to have the will provide that as much cash and property with minimal accrued tax liabilities as possible be held in a non-spousal trust with non-spousal beneficiaries while those with the highest accrued tax liabilities are to be held in a spousal trust. If both trusts' terms are that the income producing properties are to be incorporated, via Sec. 85(1), into a common corporation with the spousal trust taking back non-cumulative preferred shares and the non-spousal trust taking back excessive dividend producing common shares then the income potential of the assets rolled to the spousal trust has been shifted out of the trust and the non-spousal beneficiaries can immediately participate. The spouse will continue to be sole immediate income beneficiary under the spousal trust, but realize and recognize less income, while she may also be an income/capital beneficiary under the non-spousal trust. Corporate control could reside with either trust party, (and specific directions should be given ⁷⁷⁷ Per Penner and the other Cdn cases involving testamentary options, until better reasoned foreign jurisprudence recognized.

⁷⁷⁸ even if the recipient has a contingent interest in the trust/estate if the spouse doesn't accept the terms; the trust isn't making the payment as to how that control is to be exercised and to what ends), while mortgage produced cash could actually be distributed to the spousal and non-spousal beneficiaries so as to allow them to acquire the shares directly and on condition that they do so. This latter aspect could facilitate more precise income sprinkling, especially when the trustees holding control of the voting shares have specific direction to do so.

⁷⁷⁹ See Passant v. Jackson for possible problems in substance being recognized instead of form.

Subsection 70(6.2) Fair Market Value Deemed Disposition Elections.

“Election – Sec. 70(6.2)”

(6.2) Subsection 70(6) or 70(6.1) does not apply to any property of a deceased taxpayer in respect of which the taxpayer’s legal representative elects, in the taxpayer’s return of income under this Part (other than a return of income filed under subsection 70(2) or 104(23), paragraph 128(2)(e) or subsection 150(4)) for the year in which the taxpayer died, to have subsection 70(5) or 70(5.4), as the case may be, apply.

Under subsection 70(6.2) the legal representative may elect in the deceased's terminal return of income to have Sec. 70(5) instead of Sec. 70(6) apply to the particular transfers or distributions of property to the spouse/spousal trust thus causing accrued tax benefits to be recognizable by the deceased.⁷⁸⁰ Subsection 54(i)(iii) provides, for purposes of the computation of capital gains or losses in subdivision C, that any loss created under section 70 cannot be treated as a non-deductible superficial loss hence Sec. 70(6.2) provides a means by which a deceased's terminal income can be manipulated and by recognizing both capital gains and negating them with capital losses initial costs of non-depreciable capital property to its recipient may be adjusted so as to be of ultimate benefit. The deceased's capital gains exemption under section 110.6 may also be drained through such elections, on a property by property basis, so as to benefit the property recipient while subsection 111(2) allows allowable capital losses to be applied against other income recognized adjusted for the amount of capital gains exemption taken in the year. If Sec. 70(5) is to be elected for the benefiting beneficiary should be expressed as well as how he is to benefit.⁷⁸¹ It is not possible to have a part of the property undergo a Sec. 70(5) transfer and the other part undergo a Sec. 70(6) roll: the provisions cannot be interpreted to apply to partial as well as whole interests in the property. The use of Sec. 70(6.2) may be warranted when the spouse has purchased offspring's or other parties' interests whereby if Sec. 70(6) is precluded from applying the spouse will get the benefit of the Sec. 107(2) bump-up in the cost of the property realized. Numerous factors must be considered in such an instance.⁷⁸²

Finally the subsection 70(6) terms are well set out and may be quite easily satisfied with proper drafting, however they still apply where non-income producing property is transferred to the possible recipient. If the property is capital property both appreciating and depreciating in value, and it doesn't produce any revenue, then neither the trust nor the spouse must recognize a tax expense in the interim until that property is disposed of. Since the spouse's income rights need only be enforceable against trust law income as per Sec. 108(3) and 70(6)(b)(i) a capital gain on the disposition of the property realized by the trust will not be recognizable by her but instead will be taxed in the hands of the trust. The trust may also be able to obtain the spousal trust capital gains deduction available under Sec. 110.6(12) in the year the spouse dies, which, to a limited extent, may reduce the tax consequences of such an actual disposition. Understandably to avoid taxable dispositions by both parties, (trust and capital beneficiary), the capital should not be distributable until the spouse dies (so as to avoid the application of Sec. 107(4)). In effect such an arrangement could operate only as a deferral method, under which the tax consequence ultimately realized by all parties may increase or decrease depending on what the value of the property does.⁷⁸³ If the spousal trust is set up with the spouse having the right to draw on the capital of the trust, and to have that right satisfied with either direct property distributions or distribution of proceeds received on the mortgaging of the property then an interesting situation may arise with respect to capital interest transfers and ultimate distribution. If the spouse is entitled to draw on 50% of the initial fair market value of capital for a period of five years, after which the interest expires she may decide to purchase the other capital interest issued to an offspring which becomes enforceable upon the death of the spouse or if she purchases it in the interim, after the five year period and termination of the interest originally issued to her. If, after the purchase of the offspring's interest, the trust property is mortgaged to produce funds to distribute to the spouse in respect of her original interest the funds can be received by her, in respect of her initial interest, tax free as per the Sec. 105(1)-53(2)(h) mechanics. Since she has paid for the acquired interest with cash, and the mortgage proceeds cannot be considered in satisfaction of the second acquired interest, upon an ultimate terminating distribution the spouse, if she assumes the mortgages as a condition of the property distribution in respect of the second capital interest, she will be in a position to recognize potential capital losses, as per the Sec. 107(2)(b) & (c), and the 107(1)(b) mechanics, when the debt assumed is large in relation to the legitimate ACB of her second interest and its Sec. 108(1)(d)(i) cost amount.⁷⁸⁴ This transaction would obviously be an abuse of form and the substance of the arrangement may attract recharacterization under section 245 if the section can apply to it.

⁷⁸⁰ There is no election in respect of eligible capital property or resource property since they are attended to by Sec. 70(5.2) (and thus to cause a f.m.v. disposition of that property in an instance where it is to be held by a spousal trust assent to its transfer must be without the 36 month period).

⁷⁸¹ The executor may wish this as a means of direction though it is questionable whether a beneficiary could base a claim of trustee negligence in not attending to the even hand rule where the beneficiary doesn't benefit from the election since the legal representative would be acting qua executor and not qua trustee in respect of the election.

⁷⁸² A Sec. 70(6.2) election ignorantly made by accountant and taxpayer may be appealed against successfully as was the case in Musslewhite Estate v. M.N.R., 85 D.T.C. 608, where "the blind yanked around the dumb" by making a Sec. 70(6.2) election without having a clue as to its effect.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin

Testamentary Spouse Trusts

IT-305R4

DATE: October 30, 1996

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Testamentary Spouse Trusts

REFERENCE: Subsections 70(6), (6.1), (7) and (8) (also subsections 12(10.2), 70(5), (5.4) and (6.2), 108(3) and (4), 248(3), (8), (9), (9.1) and (9.2) and 252(3) and (4) and paragraph 5 of Article XXIXB of the Canada-United States Income Tax Convention (1980))

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

This document is also available for download in PDF format.

Contents

Application

Summary

Discussion and Interpretation

General (¶s 1-4)

Establishment of Testamentary Spouse Trust (¶s 5-8)

Transfer or Distribution as a Consequence of Death and Trust Created by Will (¶s 9-12)

Requirements regarding the Income and Capital of a Spouse Trust (¶s 13-16)

"Tainted" Spouse Trust (¶s 17-29)

Transfer or Distribution of Net Income Stabilisation Account (NISA) to Spouse Trust (¶s 30-32)

Canada-United States Income Tax Convention (1980) (¶ 33)

Explanation of Changes

⁷⁸³ If the trust property doesn't produce excessive income her income interest has a reduced value and this could facilitate less tax costly variations that shift income rights to other beneficiaries.

⁷⁸⁴ See In re: Ralli's Settlements, 1966 A.C. 483 (PC), for case of two successive interests enforceable mutually exclusively held by one beneficiary.

Application

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-305R3, Establishment of Testamentary Spouse Trust, dated June 29, 1987. It also incorporates relevant comments from Interpretation Bulletin IT-207R, "Tainted" Spouse Trusts, dated March 26, 1979 and cancels that bulletin.

Summary

The purpose of subsection 70(6) is to allow a deferral of the tax consequences that would otherwise arise from the deemed dispositions of capital property occurring as a result of a taxpayer's death, if the property is transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's spouse or to a testamentary trust established in favour of the spouse and the other requirements of that provision are met.

This bulletin discusses the conditions which must be met for a trust to qualify as a spouse trust described in subsection 70(6) and the situations under which such a trust becomes "tainted." It also discusses the tax implications of a tainted spouse trust and how, if at all, a tainted spouse trust can be "untainted." Finally, the bulletin discusses a similar deferral, under subsection 70(6.1), of what would otherwise be the tax consequences of the deemed payments out of a NISA Fund No. 2 occurring as a result of death.

Discussion and Interpretation

General

¶ 1. Taxable capital gains, allowable capital losses, recaptures of capital cost allowance and terminal losses which would otherwise arise as a result of a taxpayer's death, by virtue of the deemed disposition of capital property under subsection 70(5), are generally deferred if, as a consequence of the taxpayer's death (see ¶s 9 to 12 below), the property is transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's spouse or to a trust established in favour of the taxpayer's spouse as described in subsection 70(6) (a "spouse trust").

¶ 2. When subsection 70(6) applies, the spouse or spouse trust which acquires a capital property as a consequence of the taxpayer's death generally assumes the taxpayer's tax cost of the property. This amount is also the deceased's proceeds of disposition of the property. The deceased taxpayer's legal representative may, however, elect under subsection 70(6.2) to have subsection 70(5), rather than subsection 70(6), apply to any capital property of the taxpayer. In these circumstances, the proceeds of disposition of the property to the deceased and its cost to the spouse or spouse trust are each equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before death. An election made under subsection 70(6.2) must be made in the deceased's regular income tax return for the year of death.

¶ 3. When a partnership interest of a deceased taxpayer is transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's spouse or to a spouse trust, as described in subsection 70(6), and the taxpayer's adjusted cost base of the interest was negative immediately before death, subsection 70(6) may not result in a complete tax-deferred transfer or distribution. For more information, see the current version of IT-278, Death of a Partner or of a Retired Partner.

¶ 4. By virtue of subsection 252(3), a taxpayer's spouse includes, for purposes of subsection 70(6), an individual of the opposite sex who is party to a voidable or void marriage with the taxpayer. Furthermore, subsection 252(4) extends the meaning of spouse, for purposes of the Act, to include what is generally referred to as a "common-law spouse."

Establishment of Testamentary Spouse Trust

¶ 5. A spouse trust, as described in subsection 70(6), is created by a taxpayer's will (see ¶s 11 and 12 below) and must entitle the spouse to receive all the income of the trust arising before the spouse's death. Furthermore, no one but the spouse may receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the trust's income or capital before the spouse's death (see also ¶s 13 to 16 below). For subsection 70(6) to apply, the capital property transferred or distributed to the spouse or spouse trust must vest indefeasibly in the spouse or spouse trust within 36 months of the taxpayer's death or, upon written application to the Minister within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances. In addition, by virtue of subsection 248(9.2), the property must vest indefeasibly in the spouse or spouse trust before the spouse's death. For information on the term "vest indefeasibly," see the current version of IT-449, Meaning of "Vested Indefeasibly."

¶ 6. For a testamentary trust to qualify as a spouse trust under subsection 70(6), the deceased must have been resident in Canada immediately before death and the trust created by the deceased's will must be resident in Canada immediately after the time the property vested indefeasibly in the trust.

¶ 7. An executor may have the discretion as to which properties are to be transferred to the spouse trust with the will specifying only the total value of the property or portion of the estate to be so transferred. The will may also provide for the establishment of more than one trust (for example, a spouse trust and a family trust) and specify the total value of property to be transferred to each trust while leaving to the executor's discretion the selection of specific property to be transferred to each trust. In other instances, the will may direct the establishment and terms of a spouse trust but leave total discretion to the executor to select both the total value of and property to be transferred to the trust. In the absence of any express directions in the will, the executor is governed by the law of the relevant jurisdiction in allocating the property of the estate to the various beneficiaries and trusts. These kinds of arrangements do not disqualify a trust otherwise qualifying as a spouse trust.

¶ 8. Once a trust qualifies as a spouse trust under the terms of subsection 70(6), it remains a spouse trust and is subject to the provisions affecting such trusts (for example, paragraph 104(4)(a)) even if its terms are varied by agreement, legal action or breach of trust. However, these events may cause other provisions of the Act to apply, such as paragraph 104(6)(b) and subsections 106(2) and 107(4).

Transfer or Distribution as a Consequence of Death and Trust Created by Will ¶ 9. By virtue of subsection 248(8), a property is considered to have been transferred or distributed to, and acquired by, a spouse or spouse trust as a consequence of a taxpayer's death when the transfer, distribution or acquisition was:

- (a) under, or as a consequence of, the terms of the will or other testamentary instrument of the taxpayer,
- (b) as a consequence of the law governing the intestacy of the taxpayer, or
- (c) as a consequence of a disclaimer, release or surrender (see ¶ 10 below) by a beneficiary under the will or other testamentary instrument or on the intestacy of the taxpayer.

¶ 10. Subsection 248(9) describes "disclaimer" and "release or surrender" for the purposes of subsection 248(8). A disclaimer involves an outright refusal to accept a gift, share or interest under a will, with no stipulation as to how the taxpayer's legal representatives should distribute the disclaimed property. A disclaimer of property in favour of another person is not a true disclaimer but an assignment. However, when such a disclaimer or assignment would achieve the same effect as a simple disclaimer without any assignment, a disclaimer is considered to have been made for the purposes of subsection 70(6). In Quebec a disclaimer includes a renunciation of a succession made under the laws of that province that is not made in favour of any person. For subsection 70(6) to apply, a disclaimer must be made within 36 months of the taxpayer's death or, upon written application to the Minister within that period, within such longer period as the Minister considers reasonable in the circumstances.

A release or surrender made under the laws of a province (other than the Province of Quebec) must not be in favour of a particular person. For the Province of Quebec, a release or surrender means an inter vivos gift of an interest in, or right to property of, a succession made to the person who would have benefited had the donor renounced the succession but not in favour of anyone. A release or surrender, whether made within the Province of Quebec or otherwise, must be made within the same time as a disclaimer is made, as described above.

¶ 11. In relation to the Province of Quebec, subsection 248(3) deems

- (a) a usufruct,
- (b) a right of use or habitation, or
- (c) a substitution,

to be a trust. The trust is deemed to be created by will where (a), (b) or (c) was established by will. The property subject to (a), (b) or (c) is deemed to have been transferred to and held by a trust. Furthermore, the transfer is deemed to have occurred on, and as a consequence of, the death of the testator when (a),

(b) or (c) arises on the death of that person. For more information on subsection 248(3), see the current version of IT-437, Ownership of Property (Principal Residence).

¶ 12. Whether or not a trust was created by a taxpayer's will, subsection 248(9.1) recognizes that a qualifying spouse trust may be established by a court order, in relation to the taxpayer's estate, made under any law of a province that provides for the relief or support of dependants. A similar result may not be achieved by a variation made by agreement among the beneficiaries, even under variation of trusts legislation since such a trust is not created as a consequence of death within the meaning of subsection 248(8).

Requirements regarding the Income and Capital of a Spouse Trust

¶ 13. As indicated in ¶ 5 above, to qualify as a spouse trust, the spouse must be entitled to receive all the income of the trust arising before the spouse's death and no one but the spouse may receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust before the spouse's death. For this purpose, subsection 108(3) provides that the income of the trust is its income calculated under trust rules (rather than in accordance with the Act) less any dividends included therein:

(a) that are not included in computing the trust's income, for other purposes of the Act, by reason of section 83,

(b) that are described in subsection 131(1), or

(c) to which subsection 131(1) applies by reason of subsection 130(2).

Consequently, a trust will not be precluded from qualifying as a spouse trust because of the fact that, under the terms of the trust, such dividends are not paid or payable to the spouse. Also, amounts such as taxable capital gains (that are not in the nature of income under trust rules) which were neither paid nor payable to the spouse under the terms of the trust, nor included in the spouse's income under a preferred beneficiary election, are necessarily taxed in the trust, since during the spouse's lifetime no one but the spouse may receive anything out of a qualifying spouse trust or make a preferred beneficiary election in connection with the trust's income.

¶ 14. Under subsection 108(4), a trust is not prevented from qualifying as a spouse trust solely because it is charged with the payment of

(a) any income or profits tax on any of its income computed in accordance with the Act, or

(b) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable in consequence of the testator's death on any property of the trust or any income or capital interest in it.

¶ 15. In interpreting the requirement that the spouse must be entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before the spouse's death, the doctrine of constructive receipt is applied. Consequently, the payment according to the will of, or the provision in the will for the payment of, any income of the trust to a person other than the spouse, on the condition that it be used solely for the benefit of the spouse, does not disqualify an otherwise qualifying spouse trust.

¶ 16. In interpreting the requirement that no person except the spouse may, before the spouse's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, the renting of real estate at market value or the lending of money on commercial terms (including market rates of interest, appropriate securities and a reasonable repayment schedule), does not generally mean that the person renting the real estate or borrowing the money has received or has the use of that property as the term is used in this requirement.

"Tainted" Spouse Trust

¶ 17. A trust created by a taxpayer's will in favour of a spouse that does not meet the qualifications of a spouse trust set out in subsection 70(6) is commonly referred to as a "tainted" spouse trust. One cause of a spouse trust being tainted is a direction in the will to pay out of the trust various debts, obligations or death duties, other than those to which subsection 108(4) applies (see ¶ 14 above).

¶ 18. Subsection 70(7) provides a method for untainting some types of tainted spouse trusts, thus permitting the rollover provided by subsection 70(6). This is possible when the debts, obligations and death duties referred to in ¶ 17 above are "testamentary debts" and the trust otherwise qualifies as a spouse trust. The term "testamentary debt," which is defined in paragraph 70(8)(c), means:

- (a) any debt of the taxpayer, or any other obligation of the taxpayer to pay an amount, that was outstanding immediately before his or her death, and
- (b) any amount payable by the estate in consequence of the taxpayer's death, other than any amount payable to any person as a beneficiary of the estate, including income or profits tax payable by or for the taxpayer for the taxation year in which he or she died and for any previous taxation year, and any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable in consequence of the taxpayer's death.

Testamentary debts also include funeral and testamentary expenses and compensation to representatives for carrying out those duties which are normally exercised by an executor or administrator, that is, up to the point the estate properties are transferred or distributed to the beneficiaries or to the trustee of the tainted spouse trust or any other trust arising on death.

¶ 19. A trust for the benefit of a spouse is tainted in a manner that cannot be remedied by the method provided in subsection 70(7) if certain types of obligations are to be met out of its property before the death of the spouse. Examples of such obligations include:

- (a) a contingent liability to make good any deficiency that may arise in another trust created under the same will,
- (b) a liability for the payment of trustee fees applicable to other trusts under the will,
- (c) an obligation to pay a bequest to another beneficiary out of the property of the estate that is held by the spouse trust, and
- (d) a remarriage clause which, if the spouse remarries, would result in someone other than the spouse being entitled to income or capital of the trust before the spouse's death.

The trust is not tainted in this manner, however, if the debt or obligation to be met is:

- (e) a testamentary debt (see ¶ 18 above),
- (f) a debt or obligation to the spouse,
- (g) a debt or obligation incurred for the benefit of the spouse, or
- (h) an obligation to pay fees to the trustee for the administration of the spouse trust.

¶ 20. In general terms, the method provided in subsection 70(7) to untaint a tainted spouse trust that is capable of being untainted is to total all testamentary debts of the trust and deduct:

- (a) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable, in consequence of the taxpayer's death, for any property of the trust, or for any interest in the trust (note that these amounts do not taint a spouse trust as explained in ¶ 14 above), and
- (b) any debt secured by a mortgage on property owned by the taxpayer immediately before his or her death.

The remaining debts are referred to in paragraph 70(8)(b) as non-qualifying debts. In the deceased taxpayer's regular income tax return for the year of death (that is, not a return filed under subsection 70(2), 104(23) or 150(4), or paragraph 128(2)(e)), the taxpayer's legal representative must elect to have the trust treated as a spouse trust and list one or more properties of the trust (other than a net income stabilization account) having a total fair market value immediately after the taxpayer's death at least equal to the total of the non-qualifying debts. The list may include money and if it alone is sufficient to cover the non-qualifying debts, no other properties need be listed. The trust is then deemed to be a spouse trust and capital properties listed against the non-qualifying debts are deemed to have been disposed of, by virtue of subsection 70(5), at fair market value immediately before the taxpayer's death. As a result, any gains, income or losses arising from such deemed dispositions are included in computing the deceased's income. The other capital properties transferred to the spouse trust qualify for the rollover provided in subsection 70(6). The following example illustrates how a tainted spouse trust may be untainted:

Testamentary debts

Income tax owing by the deceased	$ 10,000
Business debt of the deceased	25,000
Mortgage on apartment	80,000 building

Mortgage on land	10,000
Testamentary and funeral expenses	1,000	$ 126,000

To determine non-qualifying debts, deduct:

Mortgage on apartment building	$ 80,000
Mortgage on land	10,000	90,000
	-----	-----

Non-qualifying debts		$ 36,000
		=====

The executor then lists properties of the tainted spouse trust having a total fair market value immediately after death at least equal to these non-qualifying debts. For this purpose, paragraph 70(8)(a) defines the fair market value of a property as the amount, if any, by which its fair market value otherwise determined exceeds the amount of any debt secured by a mortgage on the property.

Listed property:

Shares -- Fair market value		$ 9,000
Land -- Fair market value	$ 41,000
Less: Mortgage on the land	10,000

Net fair market value of the land		31,000

Net fair market value of listed property		$ 40,000
		=====

Capital gain or loss:

Shares -- Fair market value	$ 9,000
Adjusted cost base to the deceased	6,000

Capital gain		$ 3,000
		=====
Land -- Fair market value	$ 41,000
Adjusted cost base to the deceased	30,000

Capital gain		$ 11,000
		=====

The deemed disposition rules in subsection 70(5) apply to the capital properties so listed and, in this example, the total capital gain before any reduction under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) (see ¶ 21 below) is $14,000 ($3,000 + $11,000).

¶ 21. When the fair market value of all the properties listed exceeds the total non-qualifying debts (this excess is referred to as the "listed value excess") and the taxpayer's legal representative designates one capital property so listed (other than money and depreciable property) in the taxpayer's return, the capital gain or loss on that property (from the deemed disposition under subsection 70(5)) will be reduced as a result of the formula in subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii). Under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii), the capital gain or loss on the property is:

Capital gain or		Fair market value of the one property minus
		the listed value excess
Loss	×	-----

otherwise determined		Fair market value of the one property immediately after death

¶ 22. The following examples illustrate the application of the rule in subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii).

Example 1:

The listed value excess in the example in ¶ 20 above is $4,000 ($40,000 - $36,000). In that example, assume that the legal representative has designated the shares that have been listed. Pursuant to subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii), the capital gain on the shares is calculated as follows:

$$\begin{array}{rcl}
 & ($9,000 & - \\
 & $4,000) & \\
 $3,000 \times \frac{\quad}{$9,000} & = & $1,667
 \end{array}$$

Therefore, the total capital gain to be included in the deceased's income is $12,667 ($1,667 + $11,000). The adjusted cost base of the two properties to the spouse trust is: land $41,000 (by virtue of paragraph 70(5)(b)) and shares $7,667 ($6,000 + $1,667, by virtue of clause 70(7)(b)(iv)(A)).

Example 2:

Same as example 1 above; however, assume that the adjusted cost base of the shares is $16,000 and that, consequently, the shares otherwise result in a capital loss of $7,000 ($9,000 - $16,000). The capital loss calculated in accordance with subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) is:

$$\begin{array}{rcl}
 & ($9,000 & - \\
 & $4,000) & \\
 $7,000 \times \frac{\quad}{$9,000} & = & $3,889
 \end{array}$$

Therefore, the net capital gain from the land and shares is $7,111 ($11,000 - $3,889). The adjusted cost base of the two properties to the spouse trust is: land $41,000 (by virtue of paragraph 70(5)(b)) and shares $12,111 ($16,000 - $3,889, by virtue of clause 70(7)(b)(iv)(B)).

¶ 23. Where non-qualifying debts include income tax payable by the deceased's representative for the income tax return for the year of death, the amount payable is calculated after giving effect to the provisions of paragraph 70(7)(b). It is therefore necessary to consider the effect that the listing of a particular property will have on the amount of tax payable. The adjustment of a capital gain or loss on a designated property pursuant to subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) may also have a significant effect in some circumstances. When the amount of the tax liability is a critical factor in the selection of properties to be listed (or the property to be designated), more than one notional tax calculation may be necessary.

¶ 24. The legal representative is not obliged to dispose of the listed properties of the trust to obtain the funds to pay the non-qualifying debts. They may be paid from any available source of funds.

¶ 25. The legal representative is responsible for calculating the non-qualifying debts and the fair market value of listed properties as accurately as possible from the facts available. When these calculations are subsequently determined to be incorrect, despite the reasonable efforts of the legal representative, and the value of the listed properties is actually less than the total of the non-qualifying debts, we will permit additional properties to be listed at that later time in order that the provisions of subsection 70(6) may still apply to the properties of the trust that are not listed.

¶ 26. It is arguable that a trust in favour of a spouse created under a taxpayer's will out of the residue of his or her estate is tainted by the distributions and payments necessary to establish the trust corpus. Under this interpretation, it is necessary to follow the procedures set out in subsection 70(7) when it is intended that the trust qualify as a spouse trust under subsection 70(6). Another view is that subsection 70(6) applies to such of the original properties of the estate as are retained to form a part of the trust corpus without the necessity of following the procedures described in subsection 70(7). Either interpretation is acceptable with the result that a trustee has the following options available when an otherwise qualifying spouse trust is created out of the residue of an estate:

(a) The trustee may choose to have the provisions of subsection 70(5) apply to all of the capital properties of the estate.

(b) By following the procedures described in subsection 70(7), the rules in subsection 70(6) will apply to those capital properties of the spouse trust that are not listed and the rules in subsection 70(5) will apply to listed properties of the estate, subject to adjustment for any "listed value excess" (see ¶ 21 above).

(c) The trustee may choose to have subsection 70(5) apply to all of the capital properties of the estate that are distributed or otherwise disposed of before the corpus of the spouse trust is established and have subsection 70(6) apply to such of the original capital properties of the estate as are retained as the property of the trust. The fact that, prior to the indefeasible vesting of the properties in the trust, income derived from these properties is used by the estate to pay specific bequests or testamentary debts does not preclude the trust from qualifying as a spouse trust.

The right to elect under subsection 70(6.2) (referred to in ¶ 2 above) is unaffected by the adoption of either option (b) or option (c).

¶ 27. Although the treatment for tax purposes applicable to the acquisition of listed properties by a trust differs from that applicable to the acquisition of the balance of the trust properties, listed properties are, nevertheless, properties of a spouse trust and subject to the special rules relating to spouse trusts found elsewhere in the Act (for example, the deemed disposition of such properties under paragraph 104(4)(a) upon the death of the spouse).

¶ 28. Whenever a tainted spouse trust capable of being untainted by subsection 70(7) is created, regardless of the simultaneous creation under the will of other trusts to which subsection 70(7) is irrelevant, the legal representative has up to 18 months from the date of death to file the deceased's final income tax return. This is the case whether or not such a trust is successfully untainted under paragraph 70(7)(b). This extended time for filing also applies to special returns that may be filed pursuant to subsection 150(4) and paragraph 104(23)(d). Although the due date for making an election under subsection 70(2), for rights or things of the deceased at the time of death, is indirectly extended if the extended filing date referred to above delays the mailing of a notice of assessment for the year of death, the basic rule (the later of one year after death and 90 days after the mailing of any notice of assessment for the year of death) remains unchanged. If death occurs on or before April 30 in a taxation year, the deceased's legal representative has up to 6 months from the date of death to file the deceased's income tax return for the immediately preceding taxation year. Otherwise, there are no extensions in the filing requirements for income tax returns of taxation years prior to the year of death.

Note: Bill C-36 contains a number of income tax measures announced in the February 27, 1995 budget. Among other things, the Bill will amend paragraphs 150(1)(b) and (d), applicable to the 1995 and later taxation years. As a result of these amendments, the due date for filing a deceased person's income tax return may be extended if the deceased person, or the deceased person's spouse, carried on a business in the year of death (except where the expenditures of the business are primarily the cost or capital cost of "tax shelters"). In such circumstances, the due date for filing the return is:

- on or before June 15 of the year following the year of death if the individual died during the period January 1 to December 15; and
- within six months after the date of death if the individual dies during the period December 16 to December 31 or during the period January 1 to June 14 of the following year (that is, before the individual's filing due date for the previous year had the individual not died).

¶ 29. Although the income tax return for the year of death may be filed within 18 months of death whenever a trust is untainted by an election provided for in subsection 70(7) so as to qualify as a spouse trust, interest at the prescribed rate will be assessed on any unpaid balance from the later of six months after death and April 30 of the year following death.

Transfer or Distribution of Net Income Stabilisation Account (NISA) to Spouse Trust

¶ 30. The income which would otherwise arise as a result of a taxpayer's death, by virtue of the deemed payment out of the taxpayer's NISA Fund No. 2 under subsection 70(5.4), is deferred if, on or after the death and as a consequence thereof, the taxpayer's NISA is transferred or distributed to his or her spouse or to a trust established in favour of his or her spouse and the requirements of subsection 70(6.1) are met. The requirements applicable to a spouse trust in subsection 70(6.1) are the same as those applicable to a spouse trust in subsection 70(6), with the exception that subsection 70(6.1) does not contain any residency requirements such as those described in ¶ 6 above.

¶ 31. The deceased taxpayer's legal representative may, however, elect under subsection 70(6.2) to have subsection 70(5.4), rather than subsection 70(6.1), apply to the deceased's NISA Fund No. 2. If subsection 70(5.4) applies, all amounts in the deceased's NISA Fund No. 2 will be deemed to have been paid out to the deceased immediately before death and such amounts will generally be required, under subsection 12(10.2), to be included in computing the deceased's income for the year of death. The election under subsection 70(6.2) must be made in the regular income tax return for the year of death.

¶ 32. When a trust, which would otherwise qualify as a spouse trust under subsection 70(6.1), is tainted as a result of the payment (or provision for payment) of a testamentary debt (see ¶s 17 to 19 above), subsection 70(7) may be used to untaint the trust (as explained in ¶s 20 to 29 above), thus permitting the rollover provided in subsection 70(6.1). It should be noted, however, that, as indicated in ¶ 20 above, when untainting the trust, a NISA cannot be a listed property.

Canada-United States Income Tax Convention (1980)

¶ 33. For subsection 70(6) to apply on the transfer or distribution of property to a taxpayer's spouse, the taxpayer and the taxpayer's spouse must be resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death and if the property is to be transferred or distributed to a spouse trust created by the taxpayer's will, the taxpayer must be resident in Canada immediately before death and the trust must be resident in Canada immediately after the time the property vests in the trust. Pursuant to paragraph 5 of Article XXIXB of the Canada-United States Income Tax Convention (1980), where an individual was a resident of the United States immediately before the individual's death, for the purposes of subsection 70(6), both the individual and the individual's spouse are deemed to have been resident in Canada immediately before the individual's death and, if certain conditions described in that paragraph are met, a trust for that spouse will also be treated as being resident in Canada.

Explanation of Changes

Introduction

The purpose of the Explanation of Changes is to give the reasons for the revisions to an interpretation bulletin. It outlines revisions that we have made as a result of changes to the law, as well as changes reflecting new or revised departmental interpretations.

Overview

We revised the bulletin to incorporate relevant comments from Interpretation Bulletin IT-207R, "Tainted" Spouse Trusts, dated March 26, 1979 and to cancel that bulletin. The revised bulletin also reflects amendments to the Income Tax Act by S.C. 1988, c.55 (formerly Bill C-139); S.C. 1991, c.49 (formerly Bill C-18); S.C. 1994, c.7 Schedule VIII (S.C. 1993, c.24 - formerly Bill C-92); and S.C. 1994, c. 21 (formerly Bill C-27). A note has been added following ¶ 28 to describe a proposed amendment to paragraphs 150(1)(b) and (d) contained in Bill C-36 (the February 27, 1995 Federal Budget). Except as described in the Note following ¶ 28, the comments in the bulletin are not affected by proposed legislation that was released before August 30, 1996.

Legislative and other changes

The title of the bulletin has been revised since, as indicated above, the bulletin has been broadened to include comments from IT-207R.

Throughout the bulletin we have made minor changes for clarification or readability purposes.

¶ 3 has been added to clarify that, in certain circumstances, subsection 70(6) will not result in a complete tax-deferred transfer to a spouse or spouse trust.

¶ 4 has been added to reflect the Bill C-92 amendment to subsection 252(3). As a result of this amendment, the extended meaning of spouse contained in subsection 252(3) also applies for purposes of subsection 70(6). ¶ 4 also reflects the Bill C-92 amendment which added the extended meaning of spouse contained in subsection 252(4).

¶ 5 replaces the second part of ¶ 1 of IT-305R3 and the first sentence of ¶ 1 of IT-207R. The information that applied to years which are now statute-barred has been deleted. Furthermore, the paragraph refers to subsection 248(9.2) which clarifies certain requirements that have to be met for property to become vested indefeasibly.

¶ 7 (¶ 8 of IT-305R3) addresses the situation in which a will directs the establishment and terms of a spouse trust but leaves total discretion to the executor to select both the total value of and property to be transferred to the trust.

¶ 8 contains the same information as ¶ 7 of IT-305R3, except that a reference to paragraph 104(6)(b) has been added to the last sentence. This reference has become relevant as a result of amendments to paragraph 104(6)(b) in Bill C-92.

¶ 11 has been added to reflect subsection 248(3). As a result of this provision, property subject to certain types of legal relationships in the Province of Quebec (a civil law jurisdiction) may be eligible for the rollover to a spouse trust provided in subsection 70(6).

¶ 12 (¶ 5 of IT-305R3) reflects subsection 248(9.1) added by Bill C-92. This provision explains the circumstances under which a trust shall be considered to be created by a taxpayer's will for purposes of the Act. This provision replaced a similar rule that was found in subsection 70(6.1) which applied for purposes of subsection 70(6) and paragraph 104(4)(a).

¶ 13 (¶ 10 of IT-305R3) reflects the Bill C-139 amendments to subsection 108(3) relating to the description of the types of dividends referred to in that provision.

¶ 16 has been added to clarify the implications, to a spouse trust, of the renting of real estate or the lending of money, in light of the requirement (in subsection 70(6)) that no person except the spouse may, before the spouse's death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust.

¶s 17 and 18 contain the same information as ¶s 3 and 4, respectively, of IT-207R.

¶ 19 is ¶ 5 of IT-207R, except that a new example of when a spouse trust cannot be "untainted" has been added.

¶ 20 replaces ¶ 6 of IT-207R and reflects relevant Bill C-92 amendments to subsections 70(5) and (7). Subsection 70(5) was amended to provide that the deemed disposition of a taxpayer's depreciable property, under that provision, would be for proceeds equal to the fair market value of the property immediately before the taxpayer's death. Prior to this amendment to subsection 70(5), depreciable property was essentially deemed to have been disposed of immediately before death for proceeds equal to midpoint between the undepreciated capital cost and the fair market value of the property immediately before death. Amendments to subsection 70(7) ensure that the election referred to in that provision is made in the regular income tax return for the year of death. The amendments provide that a net income stabilization account could not be listed for purposes of untainting a spouse trust and they delete the references to "specified" properties from subsection 70(7).

The example in ¶ 20 is essentially the same as in ¶ 6 of IT-207R, except that death duties have been removed from the example for simplification purposes since such duties are not common.

¶s 21 and 22 are a rewording and reorganization of ¶s 7 and 8 of IT-207R. The reference to "specified" capital property, in ¶ 7, has been deleted as a result of amendments to subsection 70(7) (see discussion in ¶ 20 above).

¶s 23 and 24 contain the same information as ¶s 9 and 10, respectively, of IT-207R.

¶ 25 replaces ¶ 11 of IT-207R and reflects the deletion by Bill C-92 of the references to "specified" properties from subsection 70(7).

¶ 26 contains the same information as ¶ 12 of IT-207R and ¶ 9 of IT-305R3.

¶ 27 contains the same information as ¶ 15 of IT-207R.

¶ 28 replaces ¶ 13 of IT-207R. The paragraph reflects the Bill C-18 amendment to paragraph 150(1)(b) for the filing deadline for a deceased's income tax returns for taxation years prior to the year of death. A Note has been added following the paragraph to reflect a proposed amendment to paragraphs 150(1)(b) and (d).

¶ 29 contains the same information as ¶ 14 of IT-207R.

¶s 30 and 31 reflect the addition of subsections 12(10.2), 70(5.4) and 70(6.1) and the amendment of subsection 70(6.2) by Bill C-92. The paragraphs briefly discuss the tax consequences for a deceased taxpayer, where amounts were held for or on behalf of the taxpayer in his or her NISA Fund No. 2 at the time of death. In particular, the paragraphs discuss subsection 70(6.1) which provides for a deferral of these tax consequences, where the taxpayer's NISA is transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's spouse or to a trust established in favour of the spouse and the other requirements of that provision are met.

¶ 32 reflects the reference to subsection 70(6.1) in subsection 70(7) which was amended by Bill C-92. As a result, subsection 70(7) may be used to "untaint" certain types of "tainted" spouse trusts in order to permit the rollover provided by subsection 70(6.1).

¶ 33 has been added to discuss paragraph 5 of Article XXIXB of the Canada-United States Income Tax Convention (1980).

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

Interpretation bulletins (ITs) provide Revenue Canada's technical interpretations of income tax law. Due to their technical nature, ITs are used primarily by departmental staff, tax specialists, and other individuals who have an interest in tax matters. For those readers who prefer a less technical explanation of the law, the Department offers other publications, such as tax guides and pamphlets.

While the ITs do not have the force of law, they can generally be relied upon as reflecting the Department's interpretation of the law to be applied on a consistent basis by departmental staff. In cases where an IT has not yet been revised to reflect legislative changes, readers should refer to the amended legislation and its effective date. Similarly, court decisions subsequent to the date of the IT should be considered when determining the relevancy of the comments in the IT.

An interpretation described in an IT applies as of the date the IT is published, unless otherwise specified. When there is a change in a previous interpretation and the change is beneficial to taxpayers, it is usually effective for all future assessments and reassessments. If the change is not favourable to taxpayers, it will normally be effective for the current and subsequent taxation years or for transactions entered into after the date of the IT.

A change in a departmental interpretation may also be announced in the Income Tax Technical News.

If you have any comments regarding matters discussed in this IT, please send them to:

Director, Business and Publications Division

Income Tax Rulings and Interpretations Directorate

Policy and Legislation Branch

Revenue Canada

Ottawa ON K1A 0L5

Tainted Spousal Trusts

The testamentary spousal trust roll-over provision in Sec. 70(6) is available when, amongst other factors, the spouse is entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arises before her death and no one except her can receive or obtain the use of any of its income or capital before her death and it is these two criteria that are so often violated, either unknowingly or unavoidably when constituting spousal trusts. Habitually the death of a taxpayer will result in the realization of a whole species of expenses that were not foreseeable and while the estate might be capable of extinguishing the smaller ones out of incidental pools of funds the larger debts of the testator may not be extinguishable in the same manner but instead may be required to be secured by property of the estate which may find its way into a spousal trust or may be transferred directly to an estate beneficiary. In the latter case the substantial debt may have been incurred by the taxpayer and secured upon specific property prior to his death hence quite possibly the repayment of it will have to be negotiated with the creditor when the taxpayer dies, thus enabling the beneficiary, the estate, or the trust to obtain similar benefits and burdens of repayment as were realized previously by the deceased. If the debt is secured upon property bequeathed to a beneficiary then that person will be required, habitually, by the terms of the will to assume that debt as a condition of the bequest while obviously any trusts arising out of the estate upon the ascertainment of the amount of its residue may serve as such recipients. The fact that an estate debt has yet to be extinguished does not preclude the ascertainment of a residue⁷⁸⁵ and hence a trust in respect of it if all that is to be done is the extinguishment of that debt. The crystallization of the beneficiary's equitable title has occurred. If the extinguishment of the debt out of the residue is not provided for, and the will allows the executors to maintain the liability then the residue will still be recognized as a trust and it will thus be charged until the liability is extinguished.⁷⁸⁶

The "Taint".

If the will of the deceased provides that certain terminal expenses which are larger debt are to be assumed and extinguished by a spousal trust either immediately or possibly "collateralized" with property that is rolled into the spousal trust, the spousal trust will be "tainted" in that some party other than the spouse will be able to receive or obtain the use of income or capital of the trust before her death. The Sec. 70(6)(b) criterion concerning the spousal entitlements operates not just with regards to the trust/beneficiary relationship that exists but also the creditor/debtor relationship that might exist when the trust is created.

The subsection 70(6)(b) and 73()(c) descriptions of spousal trusts refer to trusts created that have the spousal characteristics however they do not indicate that the trust must retain those characteristics after the settlor finishes dealing with the trust. If the will of a taxpayer immediately creates a trust having the spousal character out of some of the estate property will the trust remain spousal if after two years, upon the operation of a contingency clause or exercise of certain powers of assignment, a debt is assumed by the trust? The Sec. 70(6)(b) spousal trust cannot allow any person other than the spouse to receive capital/income before the spouses death but does it have to be structured so as to preclude it from ever being in that situation where, as per the operation of the trust as an arrangement itself, a non-spousal party can obtain capital/income? In the author's opinion not necessarily. If the trust purchases property it will not lose its spousal character. If the spouse however varies the nature of the trust herself, after it has been fully constituted as spousal, so as to allow it to assume debt that she herself would have to assume under the will, the Sec. 70(6)(b) conditions should be satisfied in that the trust was formerly constituted, thus the debt could be assumed without consequence. Subsections 70(7)-(8) apply only when the debt is to be assumed when the trust is constituted.⁷⁸⁷ If property which is subject to a mortgage or lien is transferred to a testamentary spousal trust it cannot be ⁷⁸⁵ See the chapter "Trusts Arising out of Estates".

⁷⁸⁶ This is the case with wills that do not express the creation of a residuary trust but under which the spouse is to take everything. If an estate is sustaining ongoing problems in administration and it is doubted that an appropriation can occur or a residue can be established within the 36 month vesting period in Sec. 70(6) an extension can be obtained if applied for within that 36 month period. the late vesting doesn't affect the application of Sec. 70(7)-(8).

⁷⁸⁷. See the substance of "testamentary debt" and the opening preamble of Sec. 70(7).

recognized as indefeasibly vested in the spouse or trust due to the fact that ownership thereof depends, to a further extent, on the repayment of the interest and debt, and if such repayment doesn't occur then the legal title may be divested. Where debt that does not constitute a lien on property transferred to the spousal trust is required to be assumed it still constitutes the ability of a non-spousal party to receive capital/income prior to her death but only where the debt's extinguishment is to occur prior to her death.⁷⁸⁸ If a creditor/debtor relationship evolves after the spousal trust has been fully constituted⁷⁸⁹ then the Sec. 70(6) tax free roll over will not be affected however if it exists at the time the T.S.T. is being created the trust will be tainted.^{790 791} If the trust deed allows, but doesn't compel the trustees to immediately mortgage property subject to the trust and pay/distribute the proceeds the Sec. 70(6) provision should still be available.⁷⁹²

The Exception.

A testamentary spousal trust will be "tainted" where certain terminal expenses or legal obligations to pay are sustained by it as a consequence of the operation of the will however subsection 108(4) provides an exception which allows the sustaining of certain expenses by a trust to have no effect. Under Sec. 70(6)(b) or 73(1)(c), where a spousal trust has been created by will or otherwise, any recipient will be deemed not to have received or obtained the benefit of income or capital of the trust provided the payment thereof was a payment of an estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable as a consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any property of, or interest in, that particular trust or any income or profits tax payable by the particular trust in respect of any income of that particular trust. Section 108(4) isn't widely targeted in that it relates solely to incidental current payables that were sustained directly in relation to the particular trust that is to pay them. Any estate, legacy, succession duty cannot be charged without effect to any particular trust but instead only those expenses that arose in respect of property that is of, or interests related to, that trust will be exempt. Provision for the payment of taxes or duty cannot thus be so easily redirected to a trust which has nothing to do with the particular tax or duty. Subsection 108(4) concerns only duties and taxes, not the subject of the duty or tax itself. The mere fact that Parliament enacted Sec. 108(4) to exempt certain non-beneficiary related obligations clearly indicates that all other non-beneficiary related obligations arising from creditor-borrower relationships at the time the trust is constituted or subsequently will affect the availability of Sec. 70(6).⁷⁹³

788 If a substantial debt is assumed and as per the terms of the loan contract the lender cannot call for the extinguishment thereof prior to the spouse's death it would appear that, as will be seen, it doesn't disqualify the spousal trust nor attracts the possible need of the application of Sec. 70(7)-(8).

789 possibly through mortgage of trust property so as to secure cash. This is the opinion of the author. The contrary opinion of the Financial Industries Division as stated in T.I. 5-4053 of December 1987 is that where the trust property is used as security as required by the will the spousal trust will be tainted and if the property is transferred encumbered as security to the trust the same results. There's a difference between an encumbered vesting of property in a spousal trust and a vesting with instructions, arbitrary or discretionary, that the property be encumbered and the context of Sec. 70(6) looks only at the transfer to the trust and not what happens after. Whether or not a non-spousal party receives or obtains the use of the trust capital before her death is another matter however but it would seem that where property is to be used as security the borrower has received its use.

790 This is fully provided in the substance of the definition of "testamentary debt" in Sec. 70(8) and it is the sustaining of testamentary debt that activates Sec. 70(7).

791 See Brown and Secretary, Department of Family and Community Services [2004] AATA 48 (22 January 2004) for an instance where beneficiaries tried to have it both ways.

792 What can't be achieved directly, have the trust become liable for the debt, can be indirectly, by having the trust raise the funds through mortgage, advance them to the spouse who is obliged to assume the debt if her capital interest is to vest, and have her satisfy the mortgage with the advanced funds of the same approx. amount.

793. As it was confirmed in T.I. 5-9105 of Dec. 1989 provided by the F.I.D. the exception does not apply in respect of the Sec. 70(6)(b)(i) requirement that the spouse be entitled to receive all of the (essentially) trust's trust law income arising before her death. Consequently if the trust's tax liability is to be satisfied with trust law income, regardless of whether it also tax law income, the trust will be tainted. though capital dividends and taxable capital gains may not constitute trust law income, and thus can be used to satisfy the liability, this technicality can causes considerable problems when the trust isn't realizing those types of trust law capital. In the above T.I. it was asked whether a Sec. 104(13.1)-(13.2) designation had an effect on the spousal trust status if as a consequence the trust was to pay the resulting income tax and it was held that payment of taxes out of capital gains would not taint the trust. In T.I. 5-902601 of Nov. 1990 rendered by the Business and General Division of Rulings it was opined that the payment of a tax liability created by a Sec. 104(13.1) designation out of trust income would not taint a spousal trust. Subsection 108(4) specifically provides for this.

“Trust not disqualified – Sec. 104(4)”

(4) For the purposes of the definition "pre-1972 spousal trust" in subsection (1), subparagraphs 70(6)(b)(ii) and (6.1)(b)(ii) and paragraphs 73(1.01)(c) and 104(4)(a), where a trust was created by a taxpayer whether by the taxpayer's will or otherwise, no person is deemed to have received or otherwise obtained or to be entitled to receive or otherwise obtain the use of any income or capital of the trust solely because of the payment, or provision for payment, as the case may be, by the trust of

- (a) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable, in consequence of the death of the taxpayer, or a spouse or common-law partner of the taxpayer who is a beneficiary under the trust, in respect of any property of, or interest in, the trust; or
- (b) any income or profits tax payable by the trust in respect of any income of the trust.

Unfortunately the payables described in Sec. 108(4) are only incidental expenses that arise as a direct result of the death of the taxpayer or from the realization of income by the trust and thus have virtually nothing to do with the debt that the testator owed at the time of his death to third parties that is to be charged upon property held by the trust or to be extinguished by the trust in any manner. When this debt is to be paid by a spousal trust then as previously commented, the trust will be "tainted" whereby the Sec. 70(6) provision would not apply to any property transferred to it,...were it not for subsection 70(7).

Subsection 70(7) provides a method by which a "tainted" spousal trust can be untainted and allow the testator to benefit from the Sec. 70(6) rules in certain instances. A trust will be tainted in such a manner that it can be untainted where it would, but for the payment of or provision for particular "testamentary debts" in respect of the particular deceased taxpayer, be a spousal trust described under Sec. 70(6), thus all of the conditions under Sec. 70(6) must be otherwise satisfied in order for the provision to apply. The entire subsection 70(7) applies only where the type of obligation to pay imposed upon the trust falls under the definition of "testamentary debt" and where it doesn't then the trust will be "tainted" in a manner that will not benefit from the Sec. 70(7) provision and thus the testator will not benefit from the Sec. 70(6)(b) provision in respect of property transferred to it. This will occur when the trust can pay capital to non-spousal beneficiaries prior to the spouse's death, the payment of trustee fees of other trusts, or the pledging of the spousal trust's property for the benefit of non-spousal parties (possibly since a guarantee-surety does not constitute an actual debt obligation).

“Special rules applicable in respect of trust for benefit of spouse – Sec. 70(7)”

(7) Where a trust created by a taxpayer's will would, but for the payment of, or provision for payment of, any particular testamentary debts in respect of the taxpayer, be a trust to which subsection 70(6) or 70(6.1) applies,

(a) for the purpose of determining the day on or before which a return (in this subsection referred to as the “taxpayer's return”) of the taxpayer's income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died is required to be filed by the taxpayer's legal representatives, subsection 150(1) shall be read without reference to paragraph 150(1)(b) and as if paragraph 150(1)(d) read as follows:

“150(1)(d) in the case of any other person, by the person's legal representative within 18 months after the person's death; or,” and

(b) where the taxpayer's legal representative so elects in the taxpayer's return (other than a return of income filed under subsection 70(2) or 104(23), paragraph 128(2)(e) or subsection 150(4)) and lists therein one or more properties (other than a net income stabilization account) that were, on or after the taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof, transferred or distributed to the trust, the total fair market value of which properties immediately after the taxpayer's death was not less than the total of the non-qualifying debts in respect of the taxpayer,

(i) subsection 70(6) does not apply in respect of the properties so listed, and

(ii) notwithstanding the payment of, or provision for payment of, any such particular testamentary debts, the trust shall be deemed to be a trust described in subsection 70(6),

except that, where the fair market value, immediately after the taxpayer's death, of all of the properties so listed exceeds the total of the non-qualifying debts in respect of the taxpayer (the amount of which excess is referred to in this subsection as the "listed value excess") and the taxpayer's legal representative designates in the taxpayer's return one property so listed (other than money) that is capital property other than depreciable property,

(iii) the amount of the taxpayer's capital gain or capital loss, as the case may be, from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer is that proportion of that capital gain or capital loss otherwise determined that

(A) the amount, if any, by which the fair market value of that property immediately after the taxpayer's death exceeds the listed value excess, is of

(B) the fair market value of that property immediately after the taxpayer's death, and

(iv) the cost to the trust of that property is

(A) where the taxpayer has a capital gain from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer, the total of

(I) its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death, and

(II) the amount determined under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) to be the taxpayer's capital gain from the disposition of that property, or

(B) where the taxpayer has a capital loss from the disposition of that property deemed by subsection 70(5) to have been made by the taxpayer, the amount by which

(I) its adjusted cost base to the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death exceeds

(II) the amount determined under subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) to be the taxpayer's capital loss from the disposition of that property.

"Meaning of certain expressions in s. (7) – Sec. 70(8)"

(8) In subsection 70(7),

(a) the "fair market value" " at any time of any property subject to a mortgage or hypothec is the amount, if any, by which the fair market value at that time of the property otherwise determined exceeds the amount outstanding at that time of the debt secured by the mortgage or hypothec, as the case may be;

(b) "non-qualifying debt" in respect of a taxpayer who has died and by whose will any trust has been created that would, but for the payment of, or provision for payment of, any particular testamentary debts in respect of the taxpayer, be a trust described in subsection 70(6), means any such particular testamentary debt in respect of the taxpayer other than

(i) any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable, in consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any property of, or interest in, the trust, or

(ii) any debt secured by a mortgage or hypothec on property owned by the taxpayer immediately before the taxpayer's death; and

(c) "testamentary debt" , in respect of a taxpayer who has died, means

(i) any debt owing by the taxpayer, or any other obligation of the taxpayer to pay an amount, that was outstanding immediately before the taxpayer's death, and

(ii) any amount payable (other than any amount payable to any person as a beneficiary of the taxpayer's estate) by the taxpayer's estate in consequence of the taxpayer's death, including any income or profits tax payable by or in respect of the taxpayer for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died or for any previous taxation year, and any estate, legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable in consequence of the taxpayer's death.

Testamentary Debt.

"Testamentary debt" is defined in Sec. 70(8)(c) to be a debt in respect of the particular taxpayer who had died which was a debt owing by that particular taxpayer⁷⁹⁴ that was outstanding immediately before his death or any amount payable by his estate as a consequence of his death⁷⁹⁵.

In order to qualify as testamentary debt the obligation must have been held primarily against the testator in his personal capacity prior to his death and it would seem that guarantees given by the testator on account of another person's debt will not constitute testamentary debt if such a guarantee is provided by the trust as a condition of its deed. It also includes any income or profits tax payable by or in respect of the particular taxpayer for any year and any estate legacy, succession or inheritance duty payable in consequence of his death.

If the debt is to be "testamentary" it must either have been outstanding immediately before his death or it must have arose and is payable by his estate as a consequence of the testator's death and it should be recognized that the debt outstanding at the time of his death may be owed to a person who may also become a beneficiary of the estate in which case this particular beneficiary could have a dual status under the estate as being both a creditor and a beneficiary.⁷⁹⁶ Where this creditor's entitlement is charged to the estate it would constitute an amount payable by the estate in consequence of the death of the taxpayer that is other than to a person as a beneficiary of the estate. As will be seen this dual status is critical in perfecting a particular debt transaction.

An interesting interpretational problem exists in respect of the definition of testamentary debt in that it includes amounts payable by the taxpayer's estate as a consequence of his death and not by the spousal testamentary trust that arises out of the property of that estate. If the debt is to be paid by a trust the property of which was severed from the general estate, as per the will via an appropriation/appointment, will it qualify as "amount payable...by his estate in consequence of his death"? Subsection 108(1) provides a definition of "testamentary trust" that applies only for purposes of subdivision k of the ITA which includes both the estate and resulting testamentary trust while "estate" defined through Sec. 248(1) to the definition in Sec. 104(1) is

⁷⁹⁴. or any obligation to pay any amount

⁷⁹⁵ that was not an amount payable to a person as a beneficiary of his estate

⁷⁹⁶ The party has the ability to take under the lower title of a testamentary donee: Doe d. Smyth v. Smyth, 1826 6 B. & C. 112.

ineffective in that the latter provision operates only as to assign the tax liability to the executor. Thus it would seem, that since "estate" and "trust" are two different legal arrangements, and the Act does, through Sec. 248(1), assign different definitions to them, amounts payable directly by the trust and not by the estate from which it arose will not satisfy the definition of "testamentary debt" solely on those grounds but instead would have to do so by the two other major characteristics.⁷⁹⁷

Under para. 4, I.T. 207R. the Department is of the opinion that any amount payable by the estate as a consequence of death such as funeral, testamentary expenses, compensation to representatives for carrying out duties which are normally exercised by an executor or administrator up to the point at which the property is transferred to the beneficiaries, or to the trustee of the tainted spousal trust or any other trust arising on death will qualify as "testamentary".⁷⁹⁸ Although the latter testamentary expenses may be unrelated to the trust or property that is being transferred to it they will still qualify as "testamentary debt" while they will cause some tax consequences as will be described.

It's important to recognize that any amount payable by the taxpayer's estate that was not owed by the testator immediately before his death or was not of the incidental taxes or duties also described, or, that was not payable as a consequence of his death will not qualify as a "testamentary debt". The linkage between the sustaining of the debt by the estate as a consequence of the death must be explicit hence where a debt was voluntarily sustained by the estate so as to provide more funds to the immediate estate capital beneficiaries, it will not qualify as testamentary debt.⁷⁹⁹

If this debt is assigned to the spousal testamentary trust, or to property that is being transferred to it then the trust will be tainted in such a manner that it cannot be untainted if the will does not specify that it must be incurred. If the will provides that the executors are to sustain the debt and either mortgage the property of the estate or not, distribute the cash proceeds to beneficiaries directly and transfer the encumbered property to a spousal trust then the amount will become payable by his estate as a consequence of his death since the vigour and effect of how it was sustained and possibly on the mortgage agreement, springs from the testator's death, not the voluntary actions of the executors.⁸⁰⁰

It is better to make sure that there is liquidity possibility in an estate by compelling the executor to raise debt like this, and give his discretion to assign it via mortgage: if it's compelled it satisfies the "testamentary debt" definition, though remains a "non-qualifying debt" which causes tax consequences, but by also allowing him to mortgage estate property to secure it exempts it from being "non-qualifying debt" against which property must be listed to cause FMV dispositions. This is a case of "wiggling between" the definitions since the definition of both "testamentary debt" is lacking in when it can be sustained, thus latent debt gets tucked in – only that it be as a consequence of the testator's death, and, the definition of "non-qualifying debt" is also lacking since it doesn't state that the debt in question has to be outstanding immediately before death – the paragraph (b)(ii) targets property owned immediately before death, not debt outstanding.

Non-qualifying Debt.

Subsection 70(7) applies where the testamentary spousal trust would have been so but for the provision for or payment of testamentary debts however the testamentary debts that will actually cause the tax consequences are those that are "non-qualifying debt" which are defined in Sec. 70(8)(b).

"Non-qualifying debt" means any testamentary debt in respect of the deceased that is not either an estate, legacy, succession, or inheritance duty payable in consequence of the taxpayer's death, in respect of any property of, or interest in, the trust, (and not in the estate), or any debt that was secured by a mortgage or hypothec on property owned by the taxpayer immediately before his death. The obvious exception should be noted in respect of this definition being that where a debt is owed to a person by the testator and it is secured by a mortgage on property owned by the testator before his death then the debt will not cause tax ⁷⁹⁷ This is further evidenced by the fact that para. 4(b) of I.T. 207R in the appendix, as follows, states that fees payable to executors only up to the point of transfer of property to the trust will qualify as testamentary debt.

⁷⁹⁸ The Department's opinion, and more importantly, the diction used in Sec. 70(7)-(8), clearly indicates that a trust is not to be equated with the estate out of which it arose and one need only examine the definition in Sec. 70(8)(c)(ii) and the use of the terms "trust" and "estate" to ascertain this.

⁷⁹⁹ There was an exercise of a discretion not the fulfillment of a direction having as its vigour and effect the death.

⁸⁰⁰ This is endorsed by the substance of Sec. 248(8)(a).

consequences when it's assumed by the testamentary spousal trust.

Interestingly the property upon which the mortgage is secured need not be transferred to the spousal trust in order for the debt to be excluded from being "non-qualifying" for under the opening preamble of the definition the scope thereof is to provisions for a payment of particular testamentary debt by the trust, not just such debt that relates to property which was transferred to the trust. This is particularly beneficial in that it allows for the assigning of debt to a spousal testamentary trust, without the transfer of property, without the sustaining of a tax consequence.

The mortgage also need not be outstanding and owing by the deceased before his death it would appear; all it has to be, in order to be excluded from being a non-qualifying debt, is secured by property owned by the taxpayer before his death, and payable by the estate as a consequence of his death. A debt secured as a mortgage on one property before the taxpayer's death may be altered after his death to be mortgaged upon trust property. The mortgagor may be any type of person but the critical aspect about the assignment/assumption of the debt⁸⁰¹ by the trust is that it will not cause tax consequences, since the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanics will not be activated in respect of it, while if a capital beneficiary under the personal trust is to assume it as a condition of a distribution in satisfaction of his capital interest, he may be able to recognize a capital loss, as per Sec. 107(2)(c) and 107(1)(b), depending on the ACB of his capital interest and the ACB of the property, to the trust, received.⁸⁰²

Structuring around the Definitions.

The substance of "non-qualifying" and "testamentary debt" should not be overlooked in possible application to allow tax effective "smooth" testamentary transfers.

Estate debt (notes payable), providing funds to the testator's estate which is secured via a mortgage upon any property owned by him prior to his death will not attract tax consequences when it is assigned to the trust. The funds which are realized by the sustaining of this debt can then be bequeathed to particular immediate estate capital beneficiaries who may also become ultimate capital beneficiaries of the resulting spousal trust. In this regard the taxpayer has been able to increase the amount of non-taxable immediate bequests made through Sec. 70(5) in that transfers of cash will never cause tax consequences under that subsection to either party. Where the creditor isn't an ultimate capital beneficiary of the spousal trust, in his role as creditor, he will be able to receive capital from the trust before the spouse dies, with varying tax consequences to the trust, thereby avoiding the possible taxation of that capital held in trust when the spouse does die, however when the trust transfers property in satisfaction of the debt it will recognize a disposition of that property for proceeds equal to its FMV. The recognition of any accrued gain may thus only be (substantially) deferred. The main advantage of the creditor is actually the ability to receive funds from the trust prior to the death of the spouse, which may be paid out gradually.

Mortgages assumed by the trust appear not to be of the character of relationship that would cause Sec. 70(6) to be inapplicable and they can be satisfied through the sale of any trust property rewarding proceeds however planning for the negating of the recognition of any gain recognizable on such a disposition is another matter.

If the debt directly relates to income producing property then the interest thereupon will be deductible by the trust, thus reducing its Division B income, however it should be noticed that the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanism refers primarily to debt/obligations to pay, existing prior to death or shortly following, and not those realized in respect of such debt, such as interest, after the death, hence by charging the trust with the payment of the interest on the debt the trust may be tainted in such a way that it cannot be untainted.⁸⁰³

If the debt is transferred out to the initial estate beneficiary, who realized the funds from that debt, as on

801. that isn't non-qualifying debt

802. Would it be a GAARable transaction to have the spouse transfer her capital interest to her off-spring prior to the debt being assigned thus allowing it to have a high relative FMV and cost amount thus reducing tax consequences, and then have the executor assign the debt to the trust so as to deflate the scenario and create capital loss for the off-spring on eventual wind-up?

803. (If the trust deed provides that distributable income is to be arrived at after discretionary debt sinking fund deductions then some control over the amount of income recognized by the spouse under Sec. 104(13) will be obtained.

condition of a capital distribution from a personal trust as described in Sec. 107(2)(c) then it may be extinguished without consequence or hardship but, as per the mechanics of Sec. 107(1)(b), 108(1)(d) and 107(2)(c), the beneficiary may be able to recognize a capital loss, effectively, if he has been able to inflate the ACB of the capital interest without tax cost to any party, (such as when he becomes resident).⁸⁰⁴

The Sec. 70(7)-(8) provisions operate in an ongoing fashion, until the estate has transferred to the spousal trust the property upon which the provisions operate (and it is entirely possible for more than one spousal trust to be constituted out of a general estate), however, in the interim the will may give the legal representative the power to assign to any severed trust or retain against the residuary estate the debt charge, and this is especially so if the legal rep. is also given the power to decide which property is to be held under which terms.

Upon a reading of the will a capital beneficiary (with a deferred interest only realizable upon her death in order to satisfy the Sec. 70(6) spousal trust mechanics proper) under a severed spousal trust, which has not been saddled with a debt, may wish to dispose of his capital interest to the spouse, and until the debt of the estate has been assigned to that trust the capital interest's cost amount, as per Sec. 108(1)(d)(ii) for purposes of the disposition provision in Sec. 107(1), may be inflated, effectively allowing the beneficiary to realize more tax free benefits in the form of the proceeds. When the trust is subsequently assigned a debt charge, the spouse capital interest holder, with the capital interest having an inflated real ACB as per Sec. 107(1.1), may be in a position to realize a substantial capital loss when the trust is wound up, as per the mechanics of Sec. 107(2)(c) and 107(1)(b). The subsection 107(2) provision will apply to a spousal trust roll out to the spouse but not to where the property is being transferred to the trust or spouse under Sec. 70(6). This can really warp the overall cost flow through mechanics and can be effected by selling the capital interest⁸⁰⁵ to the spouse (or if time isn't an issue a non-spousal party) before the debt is assigned. The substance of the debt, in cash, could of course be distributed tax free to the spouse by the testator previously.⁸⁰⁶

Also, while there is reference to the fact that Sec. 70(6) will not apply to the property listed, statutorily, there is no requirement that the property must be capital property held by the estate or testator: the provision merely states that Sec. 70(6) will not apply to it once listed against "non-qualifying debt" and that the adjustment property which conclusively integrates the FMV tax consequences of the listing must be a capital property other than a depreciable capital property.⁸⁰⁷ The fundamental question that causes the author to think that inventorial property can be listed against non-qualifying debt is that, isn't all Sec. 70(6) property "capital property" to begin with?⁸⁰⁸ The provision simply says that Sec. 70(6) doesn't apply to the property so

804. These latter points are being brought up here only due to the fact that they relate to the subject matter however they may also be instrumental in rigging favorable tax consequences in respect of non spousal testamentary trusts as well.

805 or have the non-resident become resident

806 If the interest is transferred to a non-spousal party he'll have to await the death of the spouse to realize property from the trust unless property with accrued benefits/cash is distributed to him after a variation in the trust prior to the spouse's death so as to avoid Sec. 107(4) inclusions.

807 See the Aust. case of Mark Gerard Ireland as Executor of the Estate of the late Charles Stuart Gordon v Sandra Jane Retallack & Ors [2011] NSWSC 846 (12 August 2011) where courts were petitioned to perfect a testamentary gift of property not technically owned by the taxpayer.

808 In statutory interpretation there is a presumption against redundancy. The governing principle has been described in Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed. (Markham: Butterworths, 2002) at 158:

It is presumed that the legislature avoids superfluous or meaningless words, that it does not pointlessly repeat itself or speak in vain. Every word in a statute is presumed to make sense and to have a specific role to play in advancing the legislative purpose.

As was opined in MNR v. TD Bank, 2004 FC 169:

"[26] Further, the wording of section 232.2(2) is clear and in my view does not permit an interpretation that disregards the literal meaning in favour of an interpretation which is considered more likely to advance the objectives of the Act, which might be possible in the case of less clear legislation.

[27] In Canada v. Antosko, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 312, at 326-327, the Supreme Court of Canada said:

While it is true that the courts must view discrete sections of the Income Tax Act in light of the other provisions of the Act and of the purpose of the legislation, and that they must analyze a given transaction in the context of economic and commercial reality, such techniques cannot alter the result where the words of the statute are clear and plain . . . [My emphasis.]

listed, and then further qualifies the operation of the mechanics by requiring that at least one property listed must be capital property to allow fine-tuning? Thus the next question is whether Sec. 70(2)-(3) rights or things can be rolled through to a spousal trust: can a spousal trust serve as a “beneficially interested” party in respect of the general estate within the scope of the Sec. 70(3) roll-through? And why not? Thus any inventory a testator had that went to her estate can be listed, in the author’s opinion.⁸⁰⁹

Another interesting arrangement is when a property is transferred to the spousal trust, and then a mortgage is granted on it by the general estate giving the spousal trust further cash, with the note transferred to another spousal trust as property that can be listed against further debt. If the will specifies that this is the route to take, are not all the steps as a consequence of death. The subsequent mortgaging of the property once inside the preliminary trust is not a step to which the section 70(7)-(8) rules apply and we have a creation of a property in the hands of the estate that can be used, with minimal tax impact. In such a case the note can be distributed out to the spouse thereunder the 2nd trust and the cash can be distributed out from the 1st and given that the Sec. 70(7)-(8) provisions do not specify that the mortgage must exist prior to the date, only the property upon which it is founded does one need excessive property holdings or that coming into the estate to off-set high testamentary debt? As Nathan Bedford Forrest could always predict – split up the sequencing of hurdles as they will come up, in your arrangements and analyze.

The overall manner in which the amount of non-qualifying debt in respect of a particular T.S.T. is determined is to subtract from testamentary debt that relates to the trust those amounts that represent death duties described in Sec. 108(4)(a) and mortgages/hypothecs secured by property owned by the testator immediately before the testator's death that have been charged to the trust. The amounts deducted in arriving at the non-qualifying debt amount may be charged to and payable by the trust without tax consequences.

The Listing Process.

Under subsection 70(7), in order to untaint the testamentary spousal trust of these non-qualifying obligations, the legal representative must elect in the deceased's return of income for such treatment and list "specified properties", which have on or after the death and as a consequence thereof been transferred to the trust, the fair market value of which immediately before death is not less than the aggregate amount of non-qualifying debt which will cause Sec. 70(6) not to apply to the "specified properties" and thus in respect of the properties so specified the tax free roll-over treatment will not be obtained. Effectively the legal representative will compute the aggregate of all non-qualifying debt that is to be assumed by the trust and will [28] In this regard, I adopt the comment on Antosko, supra, by Peter Hogg, cited with approval by Major J. in Friesen v. Canada, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 103, at 113-114:

. . . P.W. Hogg and J.E. Magee, Principles of Canadian Income Tax Law (1995), Section 22.3(c) "Strict and purposive interpretation", at pp. 453-54:

It would introduce intolerable uncertainty into the Income Tax Act if clear language in a detailed provision of the Act were to be qualified by unexpressed exceptions derived from a court's view of the object and purpose of the provision . . . [The Antosko case] is simply a recognition that "object and purpose" can play only a limited role in the interpretation of a statute that is as precise and detailed as the Income Tax Act.

[29] Further, as P.A. Côté stated in his text The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, 3d ed., at pages 624 and 625: The guideline affirming the primacy of the text is principally grounded on two arguments. First, the highly detailed style of drafting for this type of legislation naturally contributes to accentuate the importance of the text for the taxpayer and their counsellors. And, eventually for the official interpreter, the judge. Further, some fear that the tremendous possibility offered when doing away with the literal meaning of the text, in favour of a meaning deemed more apt to promote the objectives of the statute, will introduce too much uncertainty in an area of law where decisions are taken, daily, based on the letter of the provision."

809 While, in the author's opinion rights and things and inventorial property can be listed they cannot be used for the capital gains FMV disposition adjustment at the conclusion of the exercise. Why did the draughtsman choose to further qualify "the sink" property in the listing process as being "a capital property" when Sec. 70(6) can only apply to capital property to begin with? Clearly this is a situation where an extra word causes a bit too much damage since by qualifying "the sink" to opens the door to all the other types of property that may come into play.

then specify certain properties, including money, the fair market value of which exceeds the amount of non-qualifying debt, that are transferred to the trust. Where this is done, subsection 70(6) will not apply to those properties specified however the initial obvious and more permanent second obvious results are undeniable.

Eligible Property.

Where the legal representative has listed specified property which is capital property to which Sec. 70(6) would otherwise apply then a negation of the application of Sec. 70(6), (as per Sec. 70(7)(b)(i)), will result in the property being subject to deemed disposition treatment under Sec. 70(5). If the property listed is resource property or inventory of a business which is land then Sec. 70(6) would initially not have affected it in the first place. The tax free roll-over in respect of those two types of property are contained in Sec. 70(5.2), (d) and (f) hence where those types of properties are listed, the negation of the application of Sec. 70(6) will have no effect and the property will still enjoy the Sec. 70(5.2) tax-free roll-over treatment at the same time as untainting the trust.⁸¹⁰

Even more interesting is the fact that the property listed need not be property owned by the testator immediately before his death in that the Sec. 70(7)(b) provision refers exclusively to properties "that have, on or after the taxpayer's death and as a consequence thereof, been transferred or distributed to the trust" and not exclusively to properties owned by him. If the vigour and effect of a instrument causing the transfer of property to the trust, say under a power of appointment exercisable under will etc., springs from the death such property will qualify as potential property to be listed, regardless of the previous holder of their legal title however if the testator exercised the power under will the power may be subject to Sec. 70(5) with the same tax consequences as if the underlying property were in fact owned.⁸¹¹ Does this also apply to life insurance proceeds that are payable to the testator's general estate?

Alternatively a condition may be enforceable against the spousal or non-spousal beneficiaries requiring them to sell or contribute property to either the estate or trust.⁸¹² If it is sold to the estate and the taxpayer takes back a mortgage both may be transferred to the spousal trust as per the executor's allocation powers whereby the mortgage may cause tax consequences⁸¹³, the spousal trust and the estate will remain testamentary and the property can be listed.⁸¹⁴ If the property is contributed to the general estate gratuitously the estate will lose its testamentary character which may not be catastrophic. (The estate and trust are two distinct tax creatures obviously here – so the possible short-term loss of the general estate's testamentary status is not at all important here.) It can then be rolled to the spousal trust and listed. If the property is to be sold to the spousal trust it may not be "transferred or distributed"⁸¹⁵ even though it transfer will be as a consequence of the death as per Sec. 248(8)(a). It will not be "listable" but the trust will retain its testamentary nature and thus personal nature. If it is required to be contributed to the tainted spousal trust it will be transferred or distributed within the context of the subsection but the trust will lose its testamentary nature and if it is paid by the beneficiary to acquire, (though not necessarily accelerate or enhance), an interest in the trust, the trust will lose its personal nature resulting in extremely harsh tax consequences subsequently.

One better option would be to have the beneficiary sell or contribute the property to the general unadministered estate whereafter it is rolled into the T.S.T. and listed with no tax consequences. The trust remains testamentary and thus although the beneficial interest of the beneficiary becomes enforceable and is not acquired by virtue of the payment. As long as the beneficiary doesn't then acquire an interest in the estate both trust and estate will retain their personal character facilitating tax free distributions. Once the mortgaged property is loaded into the spousal trust it can be transferred to the creditor in satisfaction of the debt, without tax consequences to the trust since its cost thereto will approx. equal or be exactly equal to the cost of the 810. Subsection 70(7)(b)(i) prevents the roll-over in Sec. 70(6) from applying to the particular properties: it does not negative the spousal character of the trust which Sec. 70(5.2)(d)-(f) recognize whereby both provide completely separate roll-over treatment with respect to the trust referred to.

811 unless the power was held as a trustee. See Re: Carter, 1944 44 S.R.(N.S.W.) 285.

812 See Byrnes v. Comm. of Stamps, 11 S.R. (N.S.W.) 499.

813 though not where the mortgage is upon property previously owned by the testator

814 Under subdivision k the estate and trust are recognized as the same tax entity though outside of subd. k the two are recognized as distinct tax entities.

815 as per the reasoning in Tory Estate, 76 D.T.C. 6312.

property caused by its listing. If a condition precedent is the route to be taken whereby the property must be contributed to the estate so as to gain an enforceable capital interest in the trust the spousal trust's capital beneficiaries' entitlements may be adjusted to reflect the respective contribution however the estate will cease to be testamentary, not necessarily with insurmountable tax cost, but the spousal trust will remain testamentary. These factors are all relevant when the taxpayer habitually carries material amounts of unsecured personal debt that are to be assumed by the T.S.T.⁸¹⁶

A testamentary option granted by the testator's will is not property owned by the taxpayer but can be transferred and distributed to the spousal trust from the general estate so as to allow it to purchase property from the estate.⁸¹⁷ Property subsequently purchased may not gain Sec. 70(6) treatment however the option itself is a bequest to the trust and as such can be listed in the author's opinion since it is a property. The fair market value of the property immediately after the death will have to be ascertained in relation to the property in respect of which the option is exercisable though the fact that the option may be personal and incapable of alienation should not affect its FMV. If Canadian tax jurisprudence evolves to an extent where a testamentary option is held to be a bequest, a capital interest, could it be listed? Can a testamentary spousal trust have an interest in the actual estate it arises out of?⁸¹⁸ If not, why?

Debt held by the testator and transferred to the T.S.T. could be listed if it isn't forgiven by the testator under the will. It will be subject to the Sec. 70(5)-(6) provisions while if the debt is forgiven it will have a nil fair market value, nor will it be transferred even though the borrower will not recognize an income inclusion as per section 80. If the forgiving of the debt is conditional on the beneficiary performing some act etc. it will have a fair market value when transferred to the trust but the trust will become even more tainted if the debt can be forgiven prior to the death of the spouse.⁸¹⁹ If the debt is to be maintained, even upon satisfying the condition, with nominal interest payable to the trust Sec. 70(6) will not be violated and the debt can have some value for listing purposes depending on the probability of it being satisfied at the time legal ownership thereof is passed to the T.S.T.. If the debt cannot be forgiven prior to the death and it has a reduced rate of interest its FMV for Sec. 70(5) purposes may be less than its cost amount while its FMV for Sec. 104(4) purposes will be reduced⁸²⁰. Life insurance proceeds could also be listed if transferred to the trust from the recipient general estate however the general estate must be the designated recipient and not the T.S.T. itself since the transfer must be as a consequence of death; and not an inter vivos contract.⁸²¹

Subparagraph 70(7)(b) is the operative paragraph of the whole Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanism and while non-depreciable capital property and money are referred to as possible listing subjects the provisions do not explicitly state that property listed must have been otherwise qualified for Sec. 70(6) treatment.⁸²² The provisions do apply for purposes of Sec. 70(6), but they are not specifically restrictively structured to apply only in respect of property that would gain from Sec. 70(6) treatment. In the author's opinion the Sec. 70(7)-(8) provisions operate so as to allow the Department to ascertain the value of the capital property that vests for the benefit of the spouse under Sec. 70(6). If the provision's purpose is to operate as such; to determine the net amount of capital property that will vest for the benefit of the spouse, or any other party, for that matter, then when one recognizes that the Sec. 70(7) provision has not been restricted so as to apply explicitly only in respect of capital property it should become reasonable to assume that the draughtsmen were allowing room for non-capital property to be legitimately listed. Inventorial property, resource property, etc., have value

816 See Re: Chester, 1978 19 S.A.S.R. 247, for a classic example.

817 See Abbott v. Union Trustee Co. of Aust. Ltd., 41 C.L.R. 384.

818 inter vivos options are clearly "listable" and could be the property which must be contributed or sold as per the above arrangements.

819 The taxpayer will receive a bequest from the trust as a beneficiary prior to her death and thus the trust will not be spousal altogether. The author admits that this is a conceptually correct observation but whether the taxpayer can "receive or otherwise obtain the use of" the trust debt when it is canceled is an interesting question. In substance the debtor would receive trust capital in the form of that which the trust expected to realize on the extinguishment of the debt.

820 See Re: McClintock, 1976 12 O.R. 742, for discretionary forgiving of debt.

821 If the spousal trust is to receive it directly it will not be transferred as a consequence of the death: see Russell v. Scott, 55 C.L.R. 440, & Williams v. F.C.T., 81 C.L.R. 359.

822 It is also possible to list property which was transferred to the T.S.T. that was the subject of the Sec. 70(6.2) alternate treatment election.

that can be applied against the non-qualifying debt without the trustees having to resort to capital property that received Sec. 70(6) treatment in order to satisfy it. In some wills this is exactly the case and in fact when one examines many wills one may find that "major ticket items", property with substantial cost that is usually capital in the tax sense, will rarely be subject to an instruction to convert to cash so as to satisfy debt when other forms of property are available.

Is it possible to list rights or things that are realizable by a spousal trust given the wording of Sec. 70(3)? That provision speaks only of recipients being "beneficiaries or beneficially interested" hence give the broadness of the wording in possible recipients is it possible that a spousal trust can serve as either within this context? As will be pointed out, a "sink" must be provided at the end of the listing process that statutorily is required to be "a capital property" and if the draughtsman felt required to add that term as the sink to cause some FMV integration, and that Sec. 70(6) only applies to capital property to begin with, why wasn't the extra step taken to ensure that only capital property could be listed?

It is the amount of "non-qualifying debt" that will cause the negation of the Sec. 70(6) treatment to the particular type of property hence with the definition of "non-qualifying debt" it should seem obvious that where a mortgage has been arranged prior to death, (secured upon property owned), the proceeds of which were used to extinguish the non-qualifying debt existing the tax consequences therefrom may be negated without the harsh negation of the applicability of Sec. 70(6). Even more tax effective is the specifying of such cash under Sec. 70(7)(b) so as to untaint the trust, transfer the cash to the trust, and maintain the liability for the non-qualifying debt while maintaining the applicability of Sec. 70(6) to all other property. The cash could then be distributed to the spouse as under Sec. 107(2) or possibly be used to extinguish the claim of the mortgagee/creditor⁸²³. In either case through the sustaining of a mortgage on property owned prior to his death the deceased has managed to eliminate the tax consequences of the listing process simply by having sufficient cash on hand.⁸²⁴

By choosing the mortgagor the testator can also fine-tune to whom interest will be paid ahead of the spousal party under the trust, by knitting it to income production there is a tax-free generation of cash for sprinkling to beneficiaries to be chosen, a production of a debt does not draw consequences under the Sec. 70(7)-(8) and tax deduction for interest payable, and the under-cutting of income to which the spouse must be entitled under the trust.

The legal representative will thus list property the "fair market value" of which immediately before death exceeds the amount of non-qualifying debt however Sec. 70(8)(a) provides that the "fair market value" of property subject to a mortgage or hypothec is equal to the fair market value of that property that exceeds the amount of the debt outstanding in respect of it at that time thus where the taxpayer has secured mortgages then his legal representative might find himself having to list more property. As per Sec. 70(7) it is the "fair market value" of the property immediately after the taxpayer's death as opposed to immediately before that is to be recognized.⁸²⁵ It must be remembered that the application of Sec. 70(5) resulting from the listing process will have as its recognized amount a deemed disposition at actual fair market value hence the deceased will recognize far more substantial tax consequences if the legal representative has to list mortgaged property. Where the property wasn't subject to a mortgage lien but instead the debt was simply formerly guaranteed by the deceased then it will be considered a non-qualifying debt if it is to be assumed by the trust. It should be recognized that the Sec. 70(6.2) election which can be made by the legal representative causing the specified property not to be treated under Sec. 70(6) but instead under Sec. 70(5) is a process mutually exclusive of the listing process described under Sec. 70(7) however both that election, and the listing under Sec. 70(7) will be executed in the same return; the one for the taxpayer's terminal year.⁸²⁶

⁸²³ who may also be an ultimate capital beneficiary of the trust

⁸²⁴ Income tax refunds and rights thereto can be listed as well: see Perp. Exors. (Thomson's Case) v. Commr., 77 C.L.R. 1.

⁸²⁵ If a taxpayer has an interest in a trust that is discretionary during his life its value immediately before his death will be very subjectively determined while if, as per the trust terms, the interest vests upon his death so that his estate or heirs receive a vested interest then the Sec. 70(5) provision will be beneficially applied. This is of interest where the taxpayer has set up a spousal inter vivos trust, and wishes to retain some sort of trust law capital interest and have his testamentary trust benefit from the arrangement albeit there is a danger of the effect of Sec. 75(2).

It is also obvious that the property specified under Sec. 70(7)(b) need not be property that will cause the recognition of capital gain or income but may also cause tax benefits, through the deemed disposition, in the form of the recognition of accrued capital losses or terminal losses or income losses. Where non-depreciable capital property is "listed" the superficial loss provision under Sec. 54(i) would not operate to deny the recognition of a capital loss on a superficially unfavourable listing however it should be kept in mind that the listing of property should be done with full integrated use of the Sec. 70(6.2) election hence when possible, through the combined use of both, tax consequences from dispositions may net each other out. The even hand rule should be carefully observed in this process in two aspects; a listing of specific property will affect the ACB of the property for purposes of its subsequent disposition by the trust which will affect the ultimate beneficiary's realized benefit while the immediate consequences due to the application of Sec. 70(5) may or may not reduce or increase the amount of capital that is transferred to the trust or direct beneficiary due to the need to satisfy the resulting tax bill. Specific directions should be prudently provided in the will to attend to these issues, (if an intentional taint is to occur), whereby particular beneficiaries' entitlements are to be affected for the benefit of others. If not, via the listing process, the beneficiaries may not be treated equally.⁸²⁷

In the author's opinion these provisions should definitely be the focus of some fine-tuning of the terminology by which the subject matter is dealt with since per what the provisions now say there is very porous description of what property can be used to off-set the loading of debt into a spousal trust while there is too much leniency in when the debt can be incurred that allows for too much, arguably, unintentional flexibility.

Excessive Listings and Arbitrary Reductions.

The unfortunate aspect about the Sec. 70(7) listing process is that it operates on a property by property basis hence where limited large property items exist their listing may cause recognition of a disposition which would cause the resulting recognition of a substantial gain or loss, except where the property is a capital property other than depreciable property, (regardless of whether or not it's of a prescribed class), that isn't money. If the estate transferred does not consist of at least one non depreciable capital property other than money then the following cost adjustments cannot be made.

Where the fair market value of all of the property listed, regardless of its character, exceeds the aggregate of the non-qualifying debt the excess is the "listed value excess". If the legal representative has listed a non-depreciable capital property, other than money, then the capital gain or loss recognizable under Sec. 70(5) from the deemed disposition of that property will be that proportion of the capital gain or loss otherwise determined that the fair market value thereof that exceeds the listed value excess is of the fair market value of the property itself. Apparently, where the fair market value of the capital property does not exceed the listed value excess the proration breaks down and capital gain or loss will not be adjusted. Thus it is not enough to list a non-depreciable capital property to allow for an adjustment to take place, the property so listed must in fact have a fair market value that exceeds the listed value excess, (only one property is to be listed).⁸²⁸ If the designation is made the capital loss or gain realized from the disposition of that property will be reduced to that determined by the above formula. Understandably, where the capital gain or loss is cut back by the proration then under para. (iv) the cost to the trust of that particular capital property will be its cost to the taxpayer plus or minus the capital gain/loss ultimately to be recognized as per the proration. With this in mind the designation need not always be made such as in the instance where the capital loss otherwise recognized can be fully absorbed by the deceased or oppositely in respect of a capital gain, without immediate tax consequence. Effectively whatever the deceased recognizes as capital gain or loss will have a direct effect on the cost of the property to the trust. If the deceased can afford to realize capital gains and thus absorb capital losses that are ⁸²⁶ Property which was subject to the Sec. 70(6.2) alternative treatment is not precluded from being listed under Sec. 70(7) as well.

⁸²⁷ It is questionable whether in fact the legal representative must be concerned with offending the even-hand rule in this case since listing the property he may only be acting in the capacity of an executor/administrator and thus not have to worry about impartiality. Even still it may be better to be safe than sorry: someone should obtain a judicial opinion.

⁸²⁸ "Fair market value" in this case, as per Sec. 70(8)(a) is the fair market value of the property net of the value of any mortgages/hypothec liened upon it, immediately after the death.

"on the books" and would otherwise be lost then either the capital property should be listed under the Sec. 70(7) process or under Sec. 70(6.2) alternative treatment since the trust will be able to recognize the property as having a higher initial cost.⁸²⁹

Filing.

In order to have the Sec. 70(7) untainting process apply the legal representative must elect for such in the deceased's return of income for the terminal year and as per para. (a) of Sec. 70(7) the day that such a return is due is 18 months after the date of death however this applies even if the trust is unsuccessfully untainted. This extended period will also allow the legal representative extra time to ascertain that the trust is properly constituted as otherwise eligible for treatment under Sec. 70(6). This extended time period also applies to the special returns described under Sec. 150(4) or 104(23)(d) however such an extended filing date may affect the Sec. 70(2) election. Although the required filing time is extended to 18 months after death interest is still calculated on unpaid balances of tax payable from the date that is the later of six months after death and April 30th of the year following death.

With regards to the ultimate extinguishment of the non-qualifying debt the trust may utilize funds from any source and not just from dispositions of the previously listed property.

In the author's opinion a spousal trust untainted by the Sec. 70(7)-(8) mechanics is a spousal trust to which the Sec. 104(4) deemed disposition rules apply on a technical reading of the provisions. Subparagraph 70(7)(b)(ii) provides that such a purified trust will "be deemed to be a trust described in subsection (6)" and thus it will be deemed to be a trust under which no person other than the spouse may obtain or receive the use of the trust's capital or income. The Sec. 70(7)(b)(ii) provision does not apply solely for purposes of Sec. 70(6); statutory convention is that if it were to be it would be specified, hence it applies for purposes of the whole Act and thus the fact that the trust may have been constituted with creditors "on board" does not detract from the effect of the deeming for purposes of Sec. 104(4) etc..⁸³⁰

Subject: "Tainted" Spouse Trusts.

IT-207R Date: March 26, 1979

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-207 dated April 28, 1975. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

1. A spouse trust, as described in subsection 70(6), is created by a taxpayer's will entitling the spouse, during his or her lifetime, to receive all income of the trust and allowing no one but the spouse (prior to the spouse's death) to receive or obtain the use of any of its income or capital. A spouse trust is also considered to have been created by the taxpayer's will under subsection 70(6.1) where beneficiaries of the trust disclaim any interests that would otherwise disqualify the trust, or where the spouse trust is created by an order obtained under provincial dependents' relief legislation. Death duties payable in consequence of a taxpayer's death out of the assets of a spouse trust in respect of any property, or any interest in, that trust and any income or profits tax payable by it in respect of its income do not, by virtue of subsection 108(4), prevent the trust from qualifying under subsection 70(6).
2. Under subsection 70(6), capital property transferred to the spouse trust "rolls over" to the trust with the result that no capital gains or losses arise in respect of that property at the time of the taxpayer's death (unless an election is made under subsection 70(6.2) to have the deemed realization rules under subsection 70(5) apply to any property with respect to which the election has been made). Under the general rules contained in subsection 104(4), there is a deemed disposition of the non-depreciable capital property of the spouse trust for proceeds equal to fair market value at the time of the spouse's death. In the case of the deemed disposition of depreciable property, the proceeds are prescribed as the midpoint between undepreciated capital cost and fair market value at the time of death, pursuant to subsection 104(5).
3. A trust created by a taxpayer's will in favour of a spouse does not meet the qualifications of a spouse trust ⁸²⁹ If trusts are set up on an individual property/class of property basis obtaining the spousal characteristics in respect of any of them, given the above, may lose its importance.

⁸³⁰ See I.T. 349R2, para. 19, for the Department's recognition of this result.

set out in subsection 70(6) is colloquially referred to as a "tainted spouse trust". One cause of a spouse trust being tainted is a direction in the will to pay out of the trust various debts, obligations and death duties, other than those to which subsection 108(4) applies (see 1 above.).

4. Subsection 70(7) provides a method for untainting some types of tainted spouse trusts, thus permitting the rollover provided by subsection 70(6). This is possible when the debts, obligations and death duties referred to in 3 above are "testamentary debts" and the trust otherwise qualifies as a spouse trust described in 1 above. The term "testamentary debt", which is defined in paragraph 70(8)(c), includes:

- (a) . any debt of the taxpayer outstanding immediately before his or her death;
- (b) . any amount payable by the estate in consequence of death, including funeral and testamentary expenses and compensation to representatives for carrying out those duties which are normally exercised by an executor or administrator, i.e., up to the point the estate assets are transferred or distributed to the beneficiaries or to the trustee of the tainted spouse trust or any other trust arising on death;
- (c) . income or profits tax payable by or in respect of the taxpayer for the taxation year in which he or she died and for any previous taxation year for which it has not been paid;
- (d) . death duties payable in consequence of the taxpayer's death.

Testamentary debts do not include any amount payable to any person as beneficiary of the estate.

5. A trust for the benefit of a spouse is tainted in a manner that cannot be remedied by the method provided in subsection 70(7) if certain types of obligations are to be met out of its assets before the death of the spouse. Examples of such obligations include:

- (a) . a contingent liability to make good any deficiency that may arise in another trust created under the same will,
- (b) . a liability for the payment of trustee fees applicable to other trusts under the will, and
- (c) . an obligation to pay a bequest to another beneficiary out of the assets of the estate that are held by the spouse trust.

The trust is not tainted in this manner, however, if the debts or obligations to be met are:

- (d) . a testamentary debt (see 4 above),
- (e) . a debt or obligation to the spouse,
- (f) a debt or obligation incurred for the benefit of the spouse, or
- (g) . an obligation to pay fees to the trustee for the administration of the spouse trust.

6. In general terms, the method provided in subsection 70(7) to untaint a tainted spouse trust that is capable of being untainted (i.e., as described in 4 above) is to total all testamentary debts of the trust and deduct:

- (a) . death duties payable in respect of property bequeathed to the trust, or in respect of interests in the trust (note that these amounts do not taint a spouse trust; see 1 above), and
- (b) . debts secured by mortgage or hypothec on property owned by the deceased.

The remaining debts are referred to in paragraph 70(8)(b) as non-qualifying debts. In the return of income for the taxpayer's last taxation year, the taxpayer's legal representative must elect to have the trust treated as a spouse trust and listed one or more specified properties of the trust having a fair market value at death at least equal to the total of the non-qualifying debts. The list may include money and if it alone is sufficient to cover the non qualifying debts, no other properties need be listed. The trust is then deemed to be a spouse trust and the assets listed against the non-qualifying debts are deemed to have been disposed of at fair market value (or midpoint for depreciable property) immediately before the death of the deceased pursuant to subsection 70(5), with the result that the capital gains or losses arising therefrom are included in computing the deceased's income. The other assets transferred to the spouse trust qualify for the rollover provided in subsection 70(6). The foregoing procedure may be illustrated as follows:

Assumptions

Testamentary Debts

Income tax owing by the deceased	$10,000
Death duties on bequest to sister	10,000
Death duties payable on spouse's interest in trust	20,000

Death duties payable on remainderman's interest in the trust	40,000
Business Debt of the deceased	15,000
Mortgage on apartment building	80,000
Mortgage on land	10,000
Testamentary and Funeral expenses	1,000
	$186,000

To determine non-qualifying debts, deduct:

Death duties payable on spouse's interest in the trust	$20,000
Death duties payable on the remainderman's interest in the trust	40,000
Mortgage on apartment building	80,000
Mortgage on land	10,000
	$150,000

Non-qualifying debts	$36,000

The executor then specifies any properties of the tainted spouse trust having a fair market value at least equal to these non-qualifying debts. The fair market value of any property listed must be reduced by the amount of any debt secured by a mortgage or hypothec on the property.

Listed property:

Shares - Fair market value at death	$9,000
Land - Fair market value	$41,000
less mortgage thereon	10,000
Net fair market value at death	31,000
Net fair market value of listed property	$40,000

Capital gain or loss:

Shares - fair market value at death	$9,000
adjusted cost base to deceased	5,000
Capital Gain	$4,000
Land - fair market value at death	$41,000
Adjusted cost base to deceased	30,000
Capital gain	$11,000

he deemed realization rules in subsection 70(5) apply to the capital properties so listed, and in this example the capital gain is $15,000 ($4,000 + $11,000).

7. The deemed capital gain of one specified capital property other than depreciable property may be reduced according to a formula if the fair market value of all the property listed exceeds the non-qualifying debts. The excess is called the "listed value excess" and in the example in 6 above is $4,000 ($40,000 - 36,000). To illustrate how the reduction is calculated, assume that in the example above the legal representative has designated, in the taxpayer's return, the particular property to be the shares. The capital gain on the shares and their adjusted cost base to the trust are then calculated pursuant to subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) and (iv) as: Capital gain as otherwise determined x (Fair market value of the shares less the listed value excess) ÷ Fair market value of the shares.

$$$4,000 \times (9,000 - 4,000) \div 9,000 = $2,222$$

Therefore the total capital gain is $13,222 ($2,222 + 11,000). The adjusted cost base of the two properties to the spouse trust is:

land $41,000; shares $7,222 ($5,000 + 2,222).

8. A capital loss that arises by reason of the application of subsection 70(5) to a particular capital property (other than a depreciable property) that has been designated by the legal representative in respect of a "listed value excess" is reduced by the application of subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) if the transfer or distribution of the property to the trust occurs after May 25, 1976. To illustrate the application of this rule, assume in the example in 6 above that the adjusted cost base of the shares (being the designated property) was $15,000, resulting in a capital loss of $6,000. The capital loss calculated in accordance with subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) is as follows: Capital gain as otherwise determined x (Fair market value of the shares less the listed value excess) ÷ Fair market value of the shares.

$$6,000 \times (9,000 - 4,000) \div 9,000 = $3,333$

Therefore the net capital gain is $7,667 ($11,000 - 3,333). The adjusted cost base of the two properties to the spouse trust is: land $41,000; shares $11,667 ($15,000 - 3,333).

9. Where non-qualifying debts include income tax payable by the deceased's representative in respect of the return for the year of death, the amount payable is computed after giving effect to the provisions of paragraph 70(7)(b). It is therefore necessary to consider the effect that the listing of a particular property will have on the amount of tax payable. The adjustment of a capital gain or loss on a designated property pursuant to subparagraph 70(7)(b)(iii) may also have a significant effect in some circumstances. When the amount of the tax liability is a critical factor in the selection of assets to be listed (or the asset to be designated), more than one notional tax calculation may be necessary.

10. The legal representative is not obliged to dispose of the listed properties of the trust to obtain the funds to pay the non-qualifying debts. They may be paid from any available source of funds.

11. The legal representative is responsible for computing the non-qualifying debts and the fair market value of specified properties as accurately as possible from the facts available. Where these computations are subsequently determined to be incorrect, despite the reasonable efforts of the legal representative, and the value of the specified properties is actually less than the total of the non-qualifying debts, it is the practice of the Department to permit additional properties to be specified at that later time in order that the provisions of subsection 70(6) may still apply to the unspecified properties of the trust.

12. It is arguable that a trust in favour of a spouse created under a taxpayer's will out of the residue of his estate is tainted by the distributions and payments necessary to establish the trust corpus. Under the interpretation, it is necessary to follow the procedures set out in subsection 70(7) when it is intended that the trust qualify as an exclusive spouse trust under paragraph 70(6)(b). Another view is that subsection 70(6) applies to such of the original assets of the estate as are retained to form a part of the trust corpus without the necessity of following the procedures described in subsection 70(7). Either interpretation is acceptable to the Department with the result that a trustee has the following options available in respect of an estate involving a residuary spouse trust that otherwise satisfies the requirements of subsection 70(6).

- (a). The trustee may choose to have subsection 70(5) provisions apply to all of the assets of the estate.
- (b). By following the procedures described in subsection 70(7), subsection 70(6) rules will apply to those assets of the residuary spouse trust that are not listed as described in 6 above and subsection 70(5) rules will apply to all other assets of the estate, subject to adjustment in respect of any "listed value excess" (see 7 above).
- (c). The trustee may choose to have subsection 70(5) apply to all of the assets of the estate that are distributed or otherwise disposed of before the corpus of the residuary spouse trust is established and have subsection 70(6) apply to such of the original assets of the estate as are retained as the property of the trust.

The right to elect under subsection 70(6.2) (referred to in 2 above) is unaffected by the adoption of either option (b) or option (c).

13. Whenever a tainted spouse trust capable of being untainted by subsection 70(7) is created, regardless of the simultaneous creation under the will of other trusts to which subsection 70(7) is irrelevant, the legal representative has up to 18 months from the date of death to file the deceased's final return of income. This is the case whether or not such a trust is successfully untainted under paragraph 70(7)(b). This extended time for filing also applies to special returns that may be available pursuant to subsection 150(4) and paragraph 104(23)(d). Although the due date for making an election under subsection 70(2) in respect of rights or things of the deceased at the time of death is indirectly extended if the extended filing date referred to above delays the mailing of a notice of assessment, the basic rule (the later of one year after death and 90 days after mailing of an assessment notice) remains unchanged. Returns that the deceased failed to file for years prior to the year of death must be filed by his or her legal representative within six months of the date of death.

14. Although the return of income for the year of death may be filed within 18 months of death, interest at the prescribed rate commences to run on any unpaid balance from the later of six months after death and April 30th of the year following death.

15. Although the treatment for tax purposes applicable to the acquisition of listed properties by a trust differs from that applicable to the acquisition of the balance of the trust properties, listed properties are, nevertheless, properties of a trust which is deemed to be a spouse trust and subject to the special rules relating to spouse trusts found elsewhere in the Act (e.g., the deemed disposition of such properties under paragraph 104(4)(a) upon the death of the spouse).

Deemed Dispositions.

There's only so long that a trust can own property without it recognizing the tax consequences due to the deemed disposition rules below.⁸³¹

831

March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES Subsections 104(4) to (5.2) set out what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed realization rule" for trusts. The purpose of the rule is to prevent the use of trusts to defer indefinitely the recognition for tax purposes of gains accruing on capital properties, resource properties and land inventories. These subsections generally treat such properties as having been disposed of and reacquired by trust (other than certain trusts for the benefit of a spouse or common-law partner) every 21 years at the properties' fair market value. The first deemed disposition day for post-1971 spousal or common-law partner trusts, as provided under paragraph 104(4)(a), is the day on which the spouse or common-law partner beneficiary dies. The fair market value of property that is deemed to be disposed of on a day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.1), is determined with reference to the valuation rule for insurance policies in amended subsection 70(5.3) (see the commentary above on that provision).

Subsections 104(4) to (5.2) are amended so that the deemed realization rules do not apply to "exempt property" of a non-resident trust, as the expression is now defined in subsection 108(1). "Exempt property" is defined as property the income or gain from the disposition of which by a taxpayer is exempt from Canadian taxation for the taxpayer either because the taxpayer is not resident in Canada or because of a tax treaty. The purpose of this amendment is to prevent the deemed realization rules from being used to increase the cost of such property. The increased cost might be relevant in the event that a non-resident trust distributes such property to Canadian beneficiaries. These amendments apply to deemed disposition days that are after December 23, 1998. In the case of capital property (other than depreciable property), the amendments also apply to deemed disposition days that are after 1992, but only for the purpose of determining after December 23, 1998 the cost amount to a trust of property.

June 1992 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsections 104(4) to (5.2) set out what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed realization" rule for trusts. The purpose of the rule is to prevent the use of trusts to defer indefinitely the recognition for tax purposes of gains accruing on capital properties, resource properties and land inventories. These subsections generally treat such properties as having been disposed of and reacquired by trusts every 21 years at their fair market value (or in the case of depreciable property, at the mid-point between fair market value and undepreciated capital cost). However, this rule does not apply to unit trusts and certain trusts established to provide pension and other employee benefits. In addition, the 21-year deemed realization rule is modified in the case of certain spousal trusts.

June 1992 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Under the existing rules, the first deemed realization for those spousal trusts described in paragraph 104(4)(a) occurs on the day on which the beneficiary spouse dies. A spousal trust described in this paragraph includes a testamentary trust created as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer after 1971 under which the surviving spouse was exclusively entitled to the income of the trust before his or her death and no other person was entitled before that time to the capital of the trust. It also includes a similar trust created by a taxpayer during the taxpayer's lifetime for the benefit of the taxpayer's spouse, provided the trust was created after June 17, 1971 or was a trust created on or before that date which does not qualify for graduated rates of personal tax because of subsection 122(1).

Subsection 104(4) is amended to clarify that a deemed realization of non-depreciable capital property or land inventory on a day determined thereunder occurs at the end of the day. Subsection 104(5) is amended so that a deemed realization of depreciable property likewise occurs at the end of a day determined under subsection 104(4).

Subsection 104(4) is also amended so that it does not result in the realization of gains with respect to "excluded property", as defined in new paragraph 108(1)(d.12). "Excluded property" is a share of the capital stock of a non-resident-owned investment corporation (as defined in section 133) which does not constitute taxable Canadian property. This amendment is consistent with the other taxation rules with respect to such corporations in subsections 104(10) and (11), section 133 and subsection 212(9) which allow a trust holding such shares exclusively for the benefit of non-residents to be treated as a conduit for its beneficiaries.

Paragraph 104(4)(a) is amended so that a post-1971 spousal testamentary trust referred to therein includes a trust that, immediately after any capital property, Canadian or foreign resource property or land inventory vested indefeasibly in the trust on a rollover basis as a consequence of the death of a taxpayer, was a trust under which the surviving spouse of the taxpayer was exclusively entitled to the income of the trust before his or her death and no other person was entitled before such death to the capital of the trust. This amendment recognizes that subsections 70(5.2) and (6) allow beneficiaries of a trust to make disclaimers, releases and surrenders pursuant to subsection 248(8) in order for property to be transferred on a rollover basis on death of a taxpayer for the benefit of the taxpayer's spouse. It is thus appropriate that a deemed realization occurs with respect to such a trust when the beneficiary spouse dies. This amendment is applicable with respect to deaths of beneficiary spouses occurring after December 20, 1991.

Paragraph 104(4)(a) is also amended so that it will no longer apply to "tainted" inter vivos spousal trusts created before June 18, 1971 (i.e. those trusts that have failed to meet all the conditions set out in paragraphs 122(2)(b) to (e)). Such trusts would generally fall within the new category of "pre-1972 spousal trusts", as described below.

Under the rule introduced in new paragraph 104(4)(a.1), the first deemed realization for a trust that is a pre-1972 spousal trust on January 1, 1993 occurs on the later of the day on which the beneficiary spouse dies and January 1, 1993. The expression "pre-1972 spousal trust" is discussed in the commentary on new paragraph 108(1)(f.2).

Paragraph 104(4)(b) is amended so that it causes a deemed realization with respect to a pre-1972 spousal trust only 21 years after any deemed realization under paragraph 104(4)(a.1). This is consistent with the existing rule for post-1971 spousal trusts.

Paragraph 104(4)(c) provides for further deemed realizations 21 years after any other deemed disposition day under subsection 104(4). It is amended to avoid the determination of a deemed disposition day with respect to a spousal trust that is determined under paragraph 104(4)(b).

Except as noted above, these amendments are applicable to taxation years of trusts ending after February 11, 1991.

Sept. 1985 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(4) treats all non-depreciable capital property, resource property and land inventory of a trust as having been disposed of for fair market value and to have been reacquired for the same value at specified times. Generally, those times are on the death of a spouse and every 21 years thereafter in the case of a spousal trust, and every 21 years in the case of other trusts. A similar rule is provided in subsection 104(5) for depreciable properties. These provisions result in the realization by the trust of any accrued capital gains or losses and of depreciation recapture at the times specified. The existing provisions do not produce the intended result on the deemed disposition and reacquisition of resource properties because of the way in which the Act pools the costs of resource properties and the proceeds of disposition of such properties. Subsection 104(4) is amended so that it no longer applies to resource properties and new rules dealing with these properties are set out in new subsection 104(5.2).

1982 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(4) deems all non-depreciable capital property of a trust to have been disposed of for its fair market value at certain times. Generally, those times are on the death of a spouse and every 21 years thereafter, in the case of a spousal trust, and every 21 years, in the case of other trusts. The amendment to subsection 104(4) expands the properties of a trust to which the deemed disposition rules apply after November 12, 1981 to include resource properties and land inventories of a trust.

1976 Notice of Ways and Means Motion: That paragraph 104(4)(a) of the Act be revised so that

(a) where the spouse who is a beneficiary under a trust has died after December 31, 1975 if the trust was created before January 1, 1972 and fulfils certain other conditions the trust shall not be deemed to have disposed of each of its capital properties on the spouse's death, and

(b) for greater certainty, where the spouse who is a beneficiary under a trust has died after May 25, 1976 and the trust at any time after June 18, 1971 was a trust as described in that paragraph the trust shall be deemed to have disposed of each of its capital properties on the spouse's death.

March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Paragraph 104(4)(a) is amended to Provide the first deemed disposition day in respect of an inter vivos trust created after 1999 that at any time after 1999 was a trust for the exclusive benefit of the settlor during the settlor's lifetime (i.e., an "alter ego trust", as newly defined in subsection 248(1)) or a trust for the joint benefit of the settlor and the settlor's spouse or common-law partner during their lifetimes (i.e., a "joint spousal or common-law partner trust", as newly defined in subsection 248(1)). The first deemed disposition date in these circumstances, in the event that the settlor was at least 65 years of age at the time of the settlement, is generally the day on which the senior dies (or, in the case of a trust for the joint benefit of the settlor and spouse or common-law partner, the day on which the survivor dies). However, where a trust that would otherwise be an alter ego trust so elects under subparagraph 104(4)(a)(ii.1), the first deemed disposition date of the trust will generally be the 21st anniversary of the creation of the trust, as determined under paragraph 104(4)(b). For an explanation of the age 65 restriction, see the commentary on new subsection 73(1.02).

July 2010 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (Part 1 — technical): Subsection 104(4) sets out what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed realization rule" for trusts. The purpose of subsection 104(4) is to prevent the use of trusts to defer indefinitely the recognition for tax purposes of gains accruing on capital property. Subsection 104(4) generally treats capital property of a trust (other than certain trusts for the benefit of a spouse or common-law partner) as having been disposed of and reacquired by the trust every 21 years at the property's fair market value.

Subparagraph 104(4)(a)(i.1) is amended to apply to a trust to which property is transferred in circumstances to which paragraph 70(5.2)(c) applied. It is also amended to ensure that it continues to apply to a trust to which property was transferred in circumstances to which paragraph 70(5.2)(b) or (d) applied as those paragraphs read in their application to taxation years that began before 2007. This amendment applies to trust taxation years that begin after 2006.

Dec. 1997 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (technical): Subsection 104(4) contains provisions that relate to what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed realization" rule for trusts. Subparagraph 104(4)(a)(i.1), which deals with certain spousal trusts, refers to paragraph 70(5.2)(d) or (f). Those paragraphs were amended by the Statutes of Canada 1994, chapter 21 (Bill C-27), which restructured subsection 70(5.2). This amendment to subparagraph 104(4)(a)(i.1) updates the corresponding references so that they correctly reflect that restructuring. It applies to acquisitions and dispositions that occur after 1992, the same period to which the corresponding amendment to subsection 70(5.2) applies.

Dec. 1995 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsections 104(4) to (5.2) set out what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed disposition" rule for trusts. Under paragraph 104(4)(a.1), a deemed disposition for a trust that is a pre-1972 spousal trust on January 1, 1993 occurs on the later of the day on which the beneficiary spouse dies and January 1, 1993. The expression "pre-1972 spousal trust" is defined in subsection 108(1). Paragraph 104(4)(b) causes a deemed disposition with respect to a pre-1972 spousal trust 21 years after any deemed disposition under paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.1). Paragraph 104(4)(a.1) is amended to provide that a pre-1972 testamentary spousal trust is not subject to a deemed disposition under that paragraph, unless the beneficiary spouse was alive on January 1, 1976. Amended paragraph

“Deemed disposition by trust – Sec. 104(4)”

(4) Every trust is, at the end of each of the following days, deemed to have disposed of each property of the trust (other than exempt property) that was capital property (other than excluded property or depreciable property) or land included in the inventory of a business of the trust for proceeds equal to its fair market value (determined with reference to subsection 70(5.3)) at the end of that day and to have reacquired the property immediately after that day for an amount equal to that fair market value, and for the purposes of this Act those days are

(a) where the trust

(i) is a trust that was created by the will of a taxpayer who died after 1971 and that, at the time it was created, was a trust,

(i.1) is a trust that was created by the will of a taxpayer who died after 1971 to which property was transferred in circumstances to which paragraph 70(5.2)(b) or 70(5.2)(d) or 70(6)(d) applied and that, immediately after any such property vested indefeasibly in the trust as a consequence of the death of the taxpayer, was a trust,

(ii) is a trust that was created after June 17, 1971 by a taxpayer during the taxpayer’s lifetime that, at any time after 1971, was a trust, or

(ii.1) is a trust (other than a trust the terms of which are described in clause (iv)(A) that elects in its return of income under this Part for its first taxation year that this subparagraph not apply) that was created after 1999 by a taxpayer during the taxpayer’s lifetime and that, at any time after 1999, was a trust under which

(iii) the taxpayer’s spouse or common-law partner was entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arose before the spouse’s or common-law partner’s death and no person except the spouse or common-law partner could, before the spouse’s or common-law partner’s death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, or

(iv) in the case of a trust described in subparagraph (ii.1) created by a taxpayer who had attained 65 years of age at the time the trust was created,

(A) the taxpayer was entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arose before the taxpayer’s death and no person except the taxpayer could, before the taxpayer’s death, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust,

(B) the taxpayer or the taxpayer’s spouse was, in combination with the spouse or the taxpayer, as the case may be, entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arose before the later of the death of the taxpayer and the death of the 104(4)(a.1) also provides that a pre-1972 inter vivos spousal trust is not subject to deemed disposition under that paragraph unless the beneficiary spouse was alive on May 26, 1976. These amendments recognize that, in the event that a beneficiary spouse died after 1971 and before 1976 (or before May 26, 1976 in the case of an inter vivos trust), a pre-1972 spousal trust would have already been subject to a deemed disposition on the day the beneficiary spouse died because of the former wording of paragraph 104(4)(a). Paragraph 104(4)(b) is amended to clarify that, in these circumstances, such a trust is subject to a further deemed disposition on the day that is 21 years after the beneficiary spouse died.

spouse and no other person could, before the later of those deaths, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, or

(C) the taxpayer or the taxpayer's common-law partner was, in combination with the common-law partner or the taxpayer, as the case may be, entitled to receive all of the income of the trust that arose before the later of the death of the taxpayer and the death of the common-law partner and no other person could, before the later of those deaths, receive or otherwise obtain the use of any of the income or capital of the trust, the day on which the death or the later death, as the case may be, occurs;

(a.1) where the trust is a pre-1972 spousal trust on January 1, 1993 and the spouse or common-law partner referred to in the definition "pre-1972 spousal trust" in subsection 108(1) in respect of the trust was

(i) in the case of a trust created by the will of a taxpayer, alive on January 1, 1976, and

(ii) in the case of a trust created by a taxpayer during the taxpayer's lifetime, alive on May 26, 1976, the day that is the later of

(iii) the day on which that spouse or common-law partner dies, and

(iv) January 1, 1993;

(a.2) where the trust makes a distribution to a beneficiary in respect of the beneficiary's capital interest in the trust, it is reasonable to conclude that the distribution was financed by a liability of the trust and one of the purposes of incurring the liability was to avoid taxes otherwise payable under this Part as a consequence of the death of any individual, the day on which the distribution is made (determined as if a day ends for the trust immediately after the time at which each distribution is made by the trust to a beneficiary in respect of the beneficiary's capital interest in the trust)⁸³²;

832 March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Paragraph 104(4)(a.2) is introduced to provide for a deemed disposition day for a trust that distributes property financed by a liability of the trust. This measure only applies, however, if one of the purposes of the transaction was to avoid taxes otherwise payable as a consequence of the death of an individual. The deemed disposition under this paragraph occurs immediately after the distribution of the property (as the determination is made as if a day had ended immediately after each distribution). This amendment applies to deemed disposition days determined after December 17, 1999.

Paragraph 104(4)(a.3) is introduced to provide for a deemed disposition day for a trust in the event that an individual, after December 17, 1999, has transferred property to the trust in circumstances to which subsection 73(1) applies, it is reasonable to conclude that the property was so transferred in anticipation that the taxpayer would subsequently cease to reside in Canada and the individual subsequently ceases to reside in Canada. This measure does not apply, however, to property transferred that is exempt under amended subparagraphs 128.1(4)(b)(i) to (iii) from a deemed disposition on the transferor's emigration. The deemed disposition under paragraph 104(4)(a.3) occurs immediately after the individual ceases to be resident in Canada. This amendment applies to deemed disposition days determined after December 17, 1999.

Paragraph 104(4)(a.4) is introduced to provide the first deemed disposition day in respect of an inter vivos trust to which property was transferred by a taxpayer who is an individual (other than a trust) in circumstances in which section 73 or subsection 107.4(3) applied. Where the transfer does not result in a change in beneficial ownership of that property and no person (other than the taxpayer) or partnership has any absolute or contingent right as a beneficiary under the trust (determined with reference to subsection 104(1.1)), the first deemed disposition date of the trust property is the day on which the taxpayer dies. This amendment applies to the 2000 and subsequent taxation years, and, where a trust elects in (a.3) where property (other than property described in any of subparagraphs 128.1(4)(b)(i) to (iii)) has been transferred by a taxpayer after December 17, 1999 to the trust in circumstances to which subsection 73(1) applied, it is reasonable to conclude that the property was so transferred in anticipation that the taxpayer would subsequently cease to reside in Canada and the taxpayer subsequently ceases to reside in Canada, the first day after that transfer during which the taxpayer ceases to reside in Canada (determined as if a day ends for the trust immediately after each time at which the taxpayer ceases to be resident in Canada);

(a.4) where the trust is a trust to which property was transferred by a taxpayer who is an individual (other than a trust) in circumstances in which section 73 or subsection 107.4(3) applied, the transfer did not result in a change in beneficial ownership of that property and no person (other than the taxpayer) or partnership has any absolute or contingent right as a beneficiary under the trust (determined with reference to subsection (1.1)), the day on which the death of the taxpayer occurs⁸³³;

(b) the day that is 21 years after the latest of

(i) January 1, 1972,

(ii) the day on which the trust was created, and

(iii) where applicable, the day determined under paragraph (a), (a.1) or (a.4) as those paragraphs applied from time to time after 1971; and⁸³⁴ writing and files the election with the Minister of National Revenue on or before March 31, 2001 (or at a later time that is acceptable to the Minister), the amendment applies to days after December 23, 1998. For more detail on section 73, subsection 104(1.1) or section 107.4, see the commentary on those provisions.

833 Nov. 2006 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (Part 1 - NRTs and FIEs): Paragraph 104(4)(a.5.) i& ,introduced to provide for a deemed disposition day for a trust that is deemed by subsection 94(3) to be resident in Canada for a taxation year for the purpose of computing the trust's income for the year. The deemed disposition day is the day (in that taxation year) on which, because a "contributor" (as defined in subsection 94(1)) to the trust either ceases to be resident in Canada or ceases to be a contributor to, the trust because of the application at any time of paragraph 94(2)(t), there is no resident contributor to the trust (or the only resident contributors to the trust are entities .each of which is an entity the maximum amount recoverable from Which under the provisions referred to in paragraph 94(3)(d) is limited to the entities' recovery limits determined under, subsection 94(8)). However, no deemed disposition will occur under paragraph 104(4)(a.5) if subsection 94(5) applies in respect of the contributor ceasing on that day to be a resident contributor of the trust. For more information on section 94, see the commentary on that section.

834 May 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (Commons Finance Committee): Clause 78 of Bill C-22 deals with section 104 of the Act. This section provides rules governing the tax treatment of trusts and their beneficiaries.

Subclause 78(5) of Bill C-22 would provide, in paragraph 104(4)(b), for a deemed disposition of the property of certain trusts at the end of the day that is 21 years after the latest of January 1, 1972, the day on which the trust was created and the day determined under the paragraphs referred to in subparagraph 104(4)(b)(iii).

Paragraph (a) of this motion would replace the reference to a "time" a reference to a "day" being determined under the paragraphs mentioned in subparagraph 104(4)(b)(iii).

March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Paragraph 104(4)(b) provides for a deemed disposition of the property of certain trusts at the end of the day that is the 21 years after the latest of January 1, 1972, the day on which the trust was created, and, where applicable, the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.1) as those paragraphs applied from time to time after 1971. Subparagraph 104(4)(b)(iii) is amended to add a reference to new paragraph 104(4)(a.4). This will ensure that the first deemed disposition day of a trust that is determined under subsection 104(4) and that is after the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.4) in respect of the trust generally will be the day that is 21 years after the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.4). This amendment applies to the 2000 and subsequent taxation years, and, where a trust elects in writing and files the election with the Minister on or before March 31, 2001 (or at any later time that is acceptable to the Minister), to days after December 23, 1998. For more detail on section 73 or subsection 104(1.1) Or 107.4(3), see the commentary on those provisions.

(c) the day that is 21 years after any day (other than a day determined under any of paragraphs (a) to (a.4)) that is, because of this subsection, a day on which the trust is deemed to have disposed of each such property.⁸³⁵

These provisions disallow the taxpayer from “getting very far” in deferring the inherent tax liabilities in the streaming of property through a trust. Paragraph (a) captures for deemed dispositions on the date of death of the underlying spouse of a spousal trust. Paragraph (a.1) provides some grandfathering of the implementation of the new measures that cause recognitions in the hands of the trust when the underlying spouse dies.

Paragraph (a.2) targets those instances where there is a financing through mortgage etc. that even though qualify as “eligible off-sets” defined in section 107 allows the capital beneficiary receiving the property from the trust to have it fiscally considered. It’s to be noted that the targeting for deemed dispositions on distributions in Sec. 104(4) refers exclusively to liabilities of the trust and even though there is a purpose test ascribed to their creation, if the eligible off-set recognized in the section 107 definition is not an actual liability of the trust incurred to reduce taxes then the provision doesn’t apply. In the author’s opinion such would include instances where the trust is varied to allow conditions precedent to attach to property to pay alternative beneficiaries.

Paragraph (a.3) targets emigrating spouses who toss their property into an inter vivos Sec. 73(1) spousal trust and then leave the ship. The provision disallows them to avoid immediate deemed dispositions in the hands of the trust once they “pass the customs’ questions” (“flying into Los Angleeez”) by having a tax-free rolled-to trust hold onto it for them. I wonder what would happen if, “in anticipation” the taxpayer would transfer the property to her spouse directly and then have her set up a Sec. 73(1) trust for him, doing the “hot-potato” thing. Is this what the legislators were broadly speaking of when they chose to not specifically knit the actual trust with the emigrating taxpayer using instead to target the transfer as “in circumstances to which subsection 73(1) applied”? Even still, even in the face of very loose “multiple trust” rules, it could be beneficial to sprinkle ownership across multiple spousal trusts each with slightly different classes of beneficiaries so that when they all suffer deemed dispositions they are all in lower tax brackets: how many different trusts can own the same house at the same time? And, if the taxpayer comes back, the trust gets hit again for every time the particular taxpayer ceases to be resident: says a lot for going through customs on the 183rd day in Toronto doesn’t it Kim. Thankfully the opening preamble of Sec. 104(4) sets up the cost of the trust property equal to that FMV from that point on so it may prove better to simply own the property out-right and go through a section 128.1 deemed disposition and perform some sorcerers tricks while non-resident and then come back with an enhanced FMV rather than get it stuck in a trust in Canada.

Paragraph (a.4) causes FMV deemed dispositions on the death of a beneficial owner of property that has been transferred to the trust under an inter vivos roll-over cited. “Beneficial ownership” carries more weight in the dealing with trust property than merely being beneficially interested in it. It denotes instances where the beneficial owner can call for it to be mortgaged/disposed of/used at his discretion without any say from the trust documents while in converse the trustee has practically no power to deal with the property and merely has legal name registered with her.

Paragraph (b) and (c) are the “head’m off at the pass” provisions that cause every trust to recognize a FMV disposition every 21 years measured from the day it was created or the above events.

835 Nov. 2006 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (Part 1 - NRTs and FIEs): Paragraph 104(4)(c) is amended so that there is not a deemed disposition day for a trust 21 years after any day determined under new paragraph 104(4)(a.5). In effect, the time from which 21 years is counted under paragraph 104(4)(c) is determined without regard to days determined without regard to days determined under any of paragraphs 104(4)(a) to (a.5)

These amendments apply to trust taxation years that begin after 2006. They also apply to trust taxation years that begin after 2000, after 2001, after 2002, after 2003, after 2004 or after 2005 if the trust makes the appropriate election under the coming-into-force provision for new section 94.

March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Paragraph 104(4)(c) is amended so that there is not a deemed disposition day for a trust 21 years after, any day determined under new paragraph 104(4)(a.2), (a.3) or (a.4).

“Depreciable property – Sec. 104(5)”

(5) Every trust is, at the end of each day determined under subsection (4) in respect of the trust, deemed to have disposed of each property of the trust (other than exempt property) that was a depreciable property of a prescribed class of the trust for proceeds equal to its fair market value at the end of that day and to have reacquired the property immediately after that day at a capital cost (in this subsection referred to as the “deemed capital cost”) equal to that fair market value, except that

(a) where the amount that was the capital cost to the trust of the property immediately before the end of the day (in this paragraph referred to as the “actual capital cost”) exceeds the deemed capital cost to the trust of the property, for the purpose of sections 13 and 20 and any regulations made for the purpose of paragraph 20(1)(a) as they apply in respect of the property at any subsequent time,

(i) the capital cost to the trust of the property on its reacquisition shall be deemed to be the amount that was the actual capital cost to the trust of the property, and

(ii) the excess shall be deemed to have been allowed under paragraph 20(1)(a) to the trust in respect of the property in computing its income for taxation years that ended before the trust reacquired the property;

(b) for the purposes of this subsection, the reference to “at the end of a taxation year” in subsection 13(1) shall be read as a reference to “at the particular time a trust is deemed by subsection 104(5) to have disposed of depreciable property of a prescribed class”; and

(c) for the purpose of computing the excess, if any, referred to in subsection 13(1) at the end of the taxation year of a trust that included a day on which the trust is deemed by this subsection to have disposed of a depreciable property of a prescribed class, any amount that, on that day, was included in the trust’s income for the year under subsection 13(1) as it reads because of paragraph 104(5)(b), shall be deemed to be an amount included under section 13 in the trust’s income for a preceding taxation year.⁸³⁶

836 May 1994 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(5) provides rules that treat depreciable property of most trusts as having been disposed of at its fair market value every 21 years. This deemed realization is meant to prevent trusts from being used to defer indefinitely the recognition of taxable gains with respect to trust property. The first deemed realization for pre-1972 trusts occurs on January 1, 1993.

Subsection 104(5) is amended to clarify the computation of the amount (known as the “undepreciated capital cost”) that can be written-off by a trust subsequent to the deemed disposition in the event that the fair market value of depreciable property at the time of the deemed disposition is less than the original capital cost of the property. In these circumstances, this amendment ensures that the “undepreciated capital cost” of depreciable property after the reacquisition is equal to its “undepreciated capital cost” before the disposition plus any amount included in the trust’s income by virtue of the disposition.

The following example illustrates the effect of this amendment.

EXAMPLE

A pre-1972 trust owns a building having an original capital cost of $100,000. The undepreciated capital cost of the building is $30,000, as a consequence of the trust having earlier claimed in total $70,000 as capital cost allowance (CCA). The fair market value of the building on January, 1, 1993 is $80,000.

Result:

1. As a consequence of subsection 104(5), the trust includes in income “recaptured” CCA of $50,000 ($80,000 - $30,000).
2. The new undepreciated capital cost is equal to $80,000. This amount is determined as follows:

	(a)	$100,000 (original capital cost)
+	(b)	100,000 (capital cost on reacquisition)
+	(c)	50,000 (recaptured CCA)
-	(d)	70,000 (CCA previously claimed)
-	(e)	20,000 (CCA deemed to have been previously claimed)
-	(f)	80,000 (proceeds on deemed disposition)

Researched, Written and Published by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm©

1988-2013

1-888-498-8062

Digitized by Google

“Election – Sec. 104(5.3)”

(5.3) Where a trust files an election under this subsection in prescribed form with the Minister within 6 months after the end of a taxation year of the trust that includes a day before 1999 (in this subsection referred to as the “disposition day”) that would, but for this subsection, be determined in respect of the trust under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) in the case of a trust described in that paragraph, or under paragraph 104(4)(b) in any other case, and there is an exempt beneficiary under the trust on the disposition day,

(a) for the purposes of subsections 104(4) to 104(5.2), paragraph 104(6)(b) and subsection 159(6.1), the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b), as the case may be, in respect of the trust is deemed to be the earlier of

(i) January 1, 1999, and

(ii) the first day of the trust’s first taxation year that begins after the first day after the disposition day throughout which there is no exempt beneficiary under the trust;

(b) subsection 107(2) does not apply to a distribution made by the trust during the period

(i) beginning immediately after the disposition day, and

(ii) ending at the end of the first day after the disposition day that is determined in respect of the trust under subsection 104(4) to any beneficiary (other than an individual who is an exempt beneficiary under the trust immediately before the time of the distribution);

(b.1) where the trust filed the form before March 1995, paragraph 104(5.3)(b) does not apply to distributions made by the trust after February 1995; and

(c) subsection 107.4(3) does not apply to a disposition by the trust during the period

(i) beginning immediately after the disposition day, and

(ii) ending at the end of the first day after the disposition day that is determined in respect of the trust under subsection 104(4).

(d) [Repealed, 2001, c. 17, s. 78(11)]⁸³⁷

$80,000

3. In the absence of this change, it is arguable that the new undepreciated capital cost would have been computed without reference to items (a) and (d), above. This would clearly have been unintended.

Sept. 1985 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: The amendment to subsection 104(5) is strictly technical and ensures that the specified times for the deemed disposition of depreciable properties of a particular trust are those determined in relation to the circumstances of that trust.

837 March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(5.3) allowed the deferral of the 21-year deemed disposition date (determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or (b)) for certain family trusts. The measure has already been terminated under the existing rules, so that the deferred disposition date was no later than January 1, 1999.

Subject to paragraph 104(5.3)(d), paragraph 104(5.3)(c) ensures that the deemed disposition date cannot be deferred beyond January 1, 1999 (or an earlier date, where applicable) through a transfer of property from one trust to another that does not constitute a "disposition" because of existing paragraph (e) of the definition "disposition" in section 54.

Any trust-to-trust transfer in the period (referred to below as the "relevant period") that is after the original date of the deemed disposition and before the date of the deferred deemed disposition is considered to be a "disposition" (i.e., a taxable event) for a trust that has made an election under subsection 104(5.3). Paragraph 104(5.3)(d) provides for relief from paragraph 104(5.3)(c) where, essentially, one trust is replaced by another trust with the same terms and beneficiaries. In this case, the new trust is deemed to be the same trust as, and a continuation of, the original trust.

Paragraph 104(5.3)(c) is amended to eliminate the reference to the existing definition of "disposition" in section 54, as a consequence of the repeal of that definition and its replacement by a new definition of "disposition" in subsection 248(1).

Paragraph 104(5.3)(c) is also amended so that it only applies where there is a "disposition" of property (as now defined in subsection 248(1)). The only relevant "trust-to-trust" transfer where there is no "disposition" is one to which paragraph (f) of the new definition "disposition" applies. Where paragraph (f) of that definition applies, the transferee trust is considered under subsection 248(25.1) to be the same as and a continuation of the transferor trust.

Paragraph 104(5.3)(d) is repealed, consequential to the introduction of paragraph (f) of the new definition "disposition" and new subsection 248(25.1).

Dec. 1995 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsections 104(4), (5) and (5.2) set out what is generally referred to as the "21-year deemed realization" rule for trusts. These subsections generally treat trust assets as having been disposed of and reacquired by trusts at their fair market value every 21 years. Subsection 104(5.3) provides an exception to the 21-year deemed realization rule. This exception applies where a trust elects to have the rules in paragraphs 104(5.3)(a) to (d) apply. The election must be made in prescribed form and filed with Revenue Canada within 6 months after the end of the trust's taxation year which includes the day that, but for the election, would be its first deemed realization day (or its second realization day in the case of a post-1971 spousal trust to which the rules in paragraph 104(4)(a) apply). Where the trust so elects and, at the end of such day, any individual is an exempt beneficiary under the trust, the deemed realization of a trust's property would generally be postponed to the first day of the first taxation year following the death of the last surviving "exempt beneficiary". In addition, because of existing paragraph 104(5.3)(b), rollovers from a trust Under subsection 107(2) are available only to exempt beneficiaries during the period for which the 21-year deemed realization rule is postponed. An "exempt beneficiary" under a trust is defined in subsection 104(5.4).

Subsection 104(5.3) is amended so that no election is available to postpone deemed disposition days that occur after 1998.

Paragraph 104(5.3)(a) is amended to modify the tax consequences for trusts which have elected under subsection 104(5.3) to postpone the 21-year deemed realization rule. Under amended paragraph 104(5.3)(a), a trust which has so elected will generally be subject to a deemed realization of its assets at fair market value on January 1, 1999 (or, if earlier, the first day of the first taxation year following the death of the last surviving exempt beneficiary).

Paragraph 104(5.3)(b.1) is introduced so that rollovers under subsection 107(2) to all beneficiaries under a trust are available after February 1995 where the prescribed form containing the election under subsection 104(5.3) was filed before March 1995. This measure, in conjunction with new subsection 104(5.31), ensures that trusts are not penalized by having made an election under subsection 104(5.3).

New subsection 104(5.31) allows a trust to apply before 1997 to the Minister of National Revenue to revoke an election that was filed under subsection 104(5.3) before July 1995. Where the Minister grants permission to revoke an election under subsection 104(5.3), paragraph 104(5.31)(a) provides that it is to be treated as if it were never made.

New paragraph 104(5.31)(b) provides that a trust is not liable to any penalty under the Act to the extent that the liability would otherwise have increased because of the revocation of the election under subsection 104(5.3).

New paragraph 104(5.31)(c) requires the Minister to assess each taxation year of any taxpayer to take into consideration the consequences of the revocation of an election under subsection 104(5.3), even if the normal reassessment period for that year has expired.

1995 FINANCE NOTICE OF WAYS AND MEANS MOTION: (10) That

(a) the election that allows for the postponement of the day on which trust assets are considered by the 21-year rule to be disposed of not be available after 1998, and

(b) capital property, land inventory and resource property held on January 1, 1999 by a trust that has made that election be deemed to be disposed of by the trust on that day for proceeds equal to its fair market value.

1995 BUDGET SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION: The Taxation of Family Trusts

Family trust arrangements allow property to be held by a trust for the benefit of beneficiaries under the trust. Trusts are used for many purposes, including succession planning for businesses and dealing with the needs of beneficiaries in special circumstances, such as age and disability. The budget proposes two changes to the taxation of family trusts to ensure that they do not provide any undue tax advantages.

21-Year Deemed Disposition Rule

The existing provisions relating to the taxation of trusts generally require trust assets to be treated for tax purposes as if they were disposed of every 21 years. This measure accompanied the introduction of capital gains taxation in 1972 to prevent trusts from being used to avoid the taxation of capital gains on death.

The previous government enacted a special election that permitted an extension of the 21-year rule and the postponement of capital gains taxation on trust property until the death of the last "exempt beneficiary" under the trust. An exempt beneficiary is essentially a family member no more than one generation removed from the person who established the trust.

Effective January 1, 1999, the budget proposes to eliminate this special election. Those trusts which have at any time before that date elected to postpone capital gains taxation will be subject to a deemed realization of trust assets at fair market value on that date. This will not apply where all the trust property has been distributed to beneficiaries before that date. Where property is distributed from a trust to an exempt beneficiary, capital gains would be realized when the exempt beneficiary disposes of the property or when the exempt beneficiary (or the exempt beneficiary's spouse) dies.

June 1992 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(5.3) is introduced to provide a further exception to the 21-year deemed realization rule.

This exception applies where a trust so elects in prescribed form, filed with Revenue Canada Within 6 months after the end of its taxation year that includes the day that, but for the election, would be its first deemed realization day (or its second deemed realization day in the case of a post-1971 spousal trust to which the rules in paragraph 104(4)(a) apply) Where the trust elects and; at the end of such day, any individual is an exempt beneficiary under the trust, the deemed realization day is postponed to the first day of the first taxation year of the trust beginning after the first day throughout which there is no exempt beneficiary under the trust. (This deemed realization day may be advanced under new subsection 104(5.8), however, if property is transferred to the trust from another trust.) Thus, a deemed realization of a trust's property would generally be postponed to the, first day of the first, taxation year following the death of the last-surviving exempt beneficiary.

Where an election is made by a trust under subsection 104(5.3), a rollover of trust property, to a beneficiary on a tax-free basis under subsection 107(2) may, in the period after the otherwise determined 21-year deemed realization, date and before the day after the newly determined 21-year deemed realization date, be made only to an individual who is an exempt beneficiary. Any other distribution of trust property in that period would be treated as a disposition at fair market value under subsection 107(2.1).

A further consequence of an election by a trust under subsection 104(5.3) is 'that transfers of capital property from one trust to another, in the period described above in respect of the trust, may not be made on a tax-free basis under paragraph 54(c)(v). An exception to this rule is provided where there is merely a change in trustees with respect to transferred property. If the property is regarded as being transferred from one trust to another in these circumstances, subparagraph 54(c)(v) will still apply and the transferee, trust will be regarded as the same trust as the transferor trust.

"Exempt beneficiary"

For the purpose of the rules described above, an "exempt beneficiary" under a trust is defined in new subsection 104(5.4) as a living beneficiary under the trust, where the following two conditions are satisfied:

- (a) in the case of a trust created after February 11, 1991, the beneficiary or a brother or sister of the beneficiary was alive at the time the trust was created (or, if earlier, the creation time of all other trusts transferring land inventory, capital property or resource properties to the trust in circumstances to which new subsection 104(5.8) applies), and
- (b) either

- the beneficiary or the beneficiary's spouse or former spouse was the designated contributor in respect of the trust, or
- the beneficiary or the beneficiary's spouse or former spouse' was a grandparent, parent; brother, sister, child, niece or nephew of the designated contributor of the trust or of the spouse or former spouse of the designated contributor in respect of the trust.

The expressions "beneficiary" and "designated contributor", as used in subsection 104(5.4), are defined in new subsections 104(5.5) and (5.6).

"Beneficiary"

For the purposes of determining whether an individual is an "exempt beneficiary", a beneficiary 'under new subsections 104(5.5) and 248(25) is generally a person who has any contingent or absolute right under the trust. However, under paragraph 104(5.5)(a), no individual will be regarded as an exempt beneficiary under certain trusts in which all of the interests of individuals 'who are exempt beneficiaries(determined without reference to the paragraph) depend on the exercise of discretion. This paragraph applies where this discretion could result in the interests of all such individuals (and other individuals who are children of deceased individuals who were exempt beneficiaries under the trust) terminating before the death of the last survivor of such individuals and the other individuals and without any of such individuals or the other individuals enjoying any future benefit in respect of their interests. This paragraph applies only to trusts created or materially varied after February 11, 1991.

Under paragraph 104(5.5)(b), a beneficiary's right under a trust will also be disregarded for the purposes of the "exempt beneficiary" definition if it is reasonable to consider that one of the main purposes for creating the right was to defer the day determined in respect of the trust under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or (b). This could be the case, for example, where an individual is given a nominal absolute interest under the trust or a contingent interest which is virtually certain not to vest.

"Designated contributor"

The "designated contributor" in respect of a spousal trust is the individual who created, or whose will created, the trust. Where the trust is a non-spousal testamentary trust, as of the end of a taxation year for which an election is made under subsection 104(5.3), the designated contributor is the individual as a consequence of whose death the trust was created. In any other case, the "designated contributor" in respect of a trust is an individual who was, or was related to a beneficiary under the trust, is designated by the trust and qualifies under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(i), (ii) or (iii).

An individual generally qualifies as a designated contributor in respect of an inter vivos trust under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(i) where, at each time in the relevant period in respect of the trust (as defined in paragraph 104(5.7)(a)), the total amount of property previously transferred or loaned before that time by the designated individual to the trust

- was greater than the total amount so transferred or loaned before that time by each other individual who was born before the designated individual and who was related to a beneficiary of the trust, and
- was greater than or equal to the total amount so transferred or loaned before that time by each other individual who was born after the designated individual and who was related to a beneficiary of the trust.

Paragraph 104(5.7)(a) provides that the relevant period in respect of a trust, for the purposes of subsection 104(5.6), is the period commencing one year after the day that the trust was created and ending on the day that, but for the trust's election, would be its deemed realization day under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or (b). In addition, under paragraph 104(5.7)(b), two individuals are considered to be related to each other, for the purposes of subsection 104(5.6), if one of them is the aunt, great-aunt, uncle or great-uncle of the other.

Where no individual qualifies under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(i), an individual who transferred or loaned money to the trust may nevertheless be designated under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(ii) if he or she was born before all other individuals who are related to the beneficiaries of the trust and who transferred or loaned property to the trust.

An individual also generally qualifies as a designated contributor under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(iii) where, throughout the relevant period in respect of the trust, the property of the trust consisted primarily of

- (a) shares of the capital stock of a corporation controlled, at the time the trust was created or at the beginning of the relevant period in respect of the trust, by such individual or, where no single individual controlled such corporation, by such individual and one or more other individuals born after, and related to, such individual;
- (b) shares of the capital stock of a corporation all or substantially all of the value of which derived, throughout the relevant period, from property transferred to the corporation by such individual or by such individual and one or more other individuals born after, and related to, such individual;
- (c) shares in a holding corporation all or substantially all of the value of which derived, throughout such part of that period during which the holding corporation shares were held by the trust, from the shares described in paragraph (a) or (b) above;
- (d) property substituted for the shares described above;
- (e) property attributable to profits, gains or distributions with respect to the properties described above; or
- (f) any combination of the properties described above.

For the purposes of paragraphs (b) and (c) above, new paragraph 104(5.7)(d) provides that, in determining whether the value of shares is derived from other property, the other property is deemed to include property substituted for the other property and property attributable to profits, gains and distributions with respect to the other property and the substituted property.

New paragraph 104(5.7)(c) provides that an individual shall not be considered to be a designated contributor with respect to a trust where it is reasonable to consider that one of the main purposes of a series of transactions or events that includes a borrowing or an acquisition of any property by an individual was to defer the application of the 21-year deemed realization rule under paragraph 104(4)(b). This anti-avoidance rule also applies where an individual is made trustee of a trust to allow the individual to be a designated contributor under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(iii).

The application of the new election in subsection 104(5.3) is illustrated below.

Example 1

Trust A is a testamentary trust created on the death of Mrs. A prior to 1972. The beneficiaries of the trust are Mrs. A's children, nieces and grandchildren all of whom are alive on January 1, 1993.

- Result:
1. The trust may elect under subsection 104(5.3) in its 1993 income tax return to defer the application of the 21-year rule deemed disposition rule.
 2. Mrs. A is the "designated contributor" (paragraph 104(5.6)(b)) in respect of the trust. The children and nieces of Mrs. A are "exempt beneficiaries" under paragraph 104(5.4)(b).
 3. The election will result in the deemed realization of the trust property being delayed until the first day of the first taxation year of the trust commencing after the death of all of Mrs. A's children and nieces or the termination of their interests in the trust.

Example 2

Trust B is an inter vivos trust created before 1972 the beneficiaries of which are the children and grandchildren of Mr. B. Mr. B sold property with a fair market value of $1,000 to the trust 6 months after it was created. Mr. B's two children each subsequently loaned (i) $600, or (ii) $1,200 to the trust in 1974 which has been repaid. No other property was transferred or loaned to the trust in the relevant period.

- Result:
1. The trust may designate Mr. B as the designated contributor under paragraph 104(5.6)(c). If $600 was subsequently loaned by the two children, Mr. B is the designated contributor under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(i) by reason of having transferred or loaned more than each of his sons throughout the relevant period. If $1,200 was subsequently loaned, then Mr. B is the designated contributor under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(ii) by reason of being the oldest individual who loaned or contributed property to the trust during the relevant period.
 2. If the trust elects under subsection 104(5.3), it may elect Mr. B as the designated contributor in which case Mr. B's children will be exempt beneficiaries. The grandchildren, will not be exempt beneficiaries.
 3. The election will result in the deemed realization of trust property being delayed until the first day of the first taxation year of the trust commencing after the death of all of Mr. B's children or the termination of their interests in the trust.

Example 3

Opco Corporation is controlled by Mr. K. Opco undergoes a corporate freeze at the end of 1973. In March, 1974 Opco issues common shares to an inter vivos trust created on January 11 1974. The trust beneficiaries are Mr. K's children. The

“Revocation of election – Sec. 104(5.31)”

(5.31) Where a trust that has filed an election under subsection 104(5.3) before July 1995 applies before 1997 to the Minister in writing for permission to revoke the election and the Minister grants permission to revoke the election, common shares appreciate between 1974 and 1995. The trust's assets in that period consist primarily of those shares and public company shares acquired through dividends paid on Opco shares.

Result:

1. The trust may elect under subsection 104(5.3) in its 1995 income tax return to defer the application of the 21-year rule deemed disposition rule.
2. Mr. K is the "designated contributor" in respect of the trust under subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(iii). Mr. K's children are "exempt beneficiaries".
3. The election will result in the deemed realization of the trust property being delayed until the first day of the first taxation year of the trust commencing after the death of all of Mr. K's children or the termination of their interests in the trust.

These amendments apply after February 11, 1991, except as noted above.

Feb. 1991 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES (trusts): The draft legislation released today responds essentially to five concerns with respect to the 21-year deemed realization rule.

First, the existing rule is unduly broad in its application and, as such, interferes with the use of trusts in non-tax related matters. Thus, for example, trusts established by parents exclusively for the benefit of their disabled children are subject to the rule. If properly were transferred directly to a child in such circumstances, rather than merely made available under a trust, the gain arising after the time of transfer would only be recognized on the death of the child or when disposed of by the child.

Second, the existing rule may impose a tax liability on a trust which does not have any reasonable means by which to satisfy the liability. For example, a trust which holds a control block of shares in a private corporation may be forced to liquidate its holdings to satisfy the tax liability resulting from the rule. This concern is of particular relevance in respect of trusts established before the announcement of the rule in 1971, since such trusts would not have been structured to take into account such a rule.

Third, the existing rule is arbitrary. While other rules in the Income Tax Act deem realizations in the event of death, emigration from Canada or change in property use, such deemed realizations are seen as necessary ways in which the Canadian tax system recognizes real events. By contrast, the 21-year deemed realizations occur on dates that are of relevance solely for tax purposes.

Fourth, the existing rule may result in a deemed realization for tax purposes of property used by a beneficiary as a principal residence. In this regard, it should be noted that trusts are generally not allowed to claim the principal residence exemption even where a beneficiary inhabits property, held by a trust.

The final concern with the existing rule is that transfers between trusts may be arranged to avoid its application. Under such an arrangement, for example, property could be transferred on a tax-free basis from one trust to another trust established shortly before the application of the rule in respect of the first trust. While such an arrangement may now be subject to the general anti-avoidance rule (GAAR), it would not always be clear in what manner a trust's tax liability would be assessed if GAAR were to apply.

The proposals may be summarized as follows.

(1) A trust will generally be allowed to elect to defer the application of the rule where it has an "exempt beneficiary" at the end of the year for which the rule would otherwise apply. An exempt beneficiary includes the spouse and the grandparents, parents, brothers, sisters, children, nieces and nephews of the trust's "designated contributor". The "designated contributor" in relation to a testamentary trust is the individual on whose death a testamentary trust was created or, in the case of an inter vivos trust, generally an individual designated by the trust who contributed or loaned property to the trust from which more than half of the trust property derived. In the event that the trust does so elect, the date of the first 21-year deemed realization will be deferred so that it arises on the first day on which there is no exempt beneficiary under the trust (for example, by virtue of the death of all such beneficiaries). If the trust does so elect, it will be allowed to transfer property on a tax-free basis only to exempt beneficiaries, and it would not be allowed to allocate income arising under the delayed 21-year realization under the preferred beneficiary election rules.

(2) A trust will be allowed to pay the tax arising from the application of the rule, with applicable interest, in up to 10 annual instalments.

(3) A trust will generally be allowed to claim property as a principal residence where the property was used as such by one of its beneficiaries.

(4) A measure is proposed to address transactions involving transfers between trusts which result in a deferral of the application of the rule. A trust which receives property in these circumstances will generally face the application of the rule on the projected date the transferor trust will be subject to the deemed realization. This measure would generally apply only where that date is earlier than the date on which the recipient trust would otherwise have faced the application of the rule.

(a) the election is deemed, otherwise than for the purposes of this subsection, never to have been made;

(b) the trust is not liable to any penalty under this Act to the extent that the liability would, but for this paragraph, have increased because of the revocation of the election; and

(c) notwithstanding subsections 152(4) to 152(5), such assessments of tax, interest and penalties under this Act shall be made as are necessary to take into account the consequences of the revocation of the election.

“Exempt beneficiary – Sec. 104(5.4)”

(5.4) For the purpose of subsection 104(5.3), an “exempt beneficiary” under a trust at a particular time is an individual who is alive and a beneficiary under the trust at the particular time, where

(a) in the case of a trust that was created after February 11, 1991, the individual, or an individual who, otherwise than because of subsection 252(2), is the brother or sister of the individual, was alive at the earlier of

(i) the time the trust was created, and

(ii) the earliest of all times each of which is the time that another trust was created that, before the particular time and the end of the day that would, but for subsection 104(5.3), be determined in respect of the trust under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b), transferred property to the trust either

(A) directly, or

(B) indirectly through one or more trusts, in circumstances in which subsection 104(5.8) applies; and

(b) the individual or the individual’s spouse or common-law partner or former spouse or common-law partner was

(i) the designated contributor in respect of the trust, or

(ii) a grandparent, parent, brother, sister, child, niece or nephew

(A) of the designated contributor in respect of the trust, or

(B) of the spouse or common-law partner or former spouse or common-law partner of the designated contributor in respect of the trust.

“Beneficiary – Sec. 104(5.5)”

(5.5) For the purpose of subsection 104(5.4), a beneficiary under a trust is an individual who is beneficially interested in the trust, except that an individual shall be deemed not to be a beneficiary under a trust at a particular time

(a) where

(i) the interests in the trust at the particular time of all individuals who would, if this Act were read without reference to this paragraph, be exempt beneficiaries under the trust are conditional on or subject to the exercise of a discretionary power by a person,

(ii) by the exercise of (or the failure to exercise) such power under the terms of the trust after the particular time, all interests in the trust of

(A) those individuals, and

(B) other individuals who are children of deceased individuals who, if this Act were read without reference to this paragraph, would have been exempt beneficiaries under the trust at any time before the particular time may terminate before the time at which the last of those individuals and the other individuals dies and without any of those individuals or the other individuals enjoying any benefit under the trust after the particular time, and

(iii) the trust was created after February 11, 1991 or subparagraph 104(5.5)(a)(ii) applies in respect of the trust because of a variation of the terms of the trust occurring after February 11, 1991; or

(b) where it is reasonable to consider that one of the main purposes for the creation of the interest of the individual in the trust was to defer the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b) in respect of the trust.

“Designated contributor – Sec. 104(5.6)”

(5.6) For the purpose of subsection 104(5.4), a designated contributor in respect of a trust is

(a) where the trust is described in paragraph 104(4)(a) or was, on December 20, 1991, a pre-1972 spousal trust, the individual who created (or whose will created) the trust;

(b) where paragraph 104(5.6)(a) does not apply and the trust is a testamentary trust at the end of the taxation year for which it makes an election under subsection 104(5.3), the individual as a consequence of whose death the trust was created; and

(c) in the case of any other trust, the individual who was, or who was related to, an individual beneficially interested in the trust and who is designated by the trust in its election under subsection 104(5.3)

(i) where, at each time in the relevant period, the total amount of property transferred or loaned before that time by the designated individual (either directly or through another trust) to the trust

(A) exceeded the total amount of property so transferred or loaned before that time by each other individual who was born before the designated individual and who, at any time, was related to any individual beneficially interested in the trust, and

(B) was not less than the total amount of property so transferred or loaned before that time by each other individual who was born after the designated individual and who, at any time, was related to any individual beneficially interested in the trust,

(ii) where

(A) no individual may be designated in respect of the trust because of subparagraph 104(5.6)(c)(i),

(B) the designated individual transferred or loaned property (either directly or through another trust) to the trust at any time before the end of the relevant period, and

(C) the designated individual was born before all other individuals who

(I) at any time were related to any individual beneficially interested in the trust or to any individual who transferred or loaned property to the trust before the end of the relevant period, and

(II) transferred or loaned property (either directly or through another trust) to the trust at any time before the end of the relevant period, or

(iii) where throughout the relevant period the property of the trust consisted primarily of

(A) shares of the capital stock of a corporation

(I) controlled, on the day that the trust was created or at the beginning of the relevant period, by the designated individual or by the designated individual and one or more other individuals born after, and related to, the designated individual, or

(II) all or substantially all of the value of which throughout the relevant period derived from property transferred to the corporation by the designated individual or by the designated individual and one or more other individuals born after, and related to, the designated individual,

(B) shares of the capital stock of a corporation all or substantially all of the value of which, throughout the part of the relevant period throughout which the shares were held by the trust, derived from shares described in clause 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(A),

(C) property substituted for the shares described in clause 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(A) or 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(B),

(D) property attributable to profits, gains or distributions in respect of property described in clause 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(A), 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(B) or 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(C), or

(E) any combination of the properties described in clauses 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(A) to 104(5.6)(c)(iii)(D).

“Idem – Sec. 104(5.7)”

(5.7) For the purpose of subsection 104(5.6),

(a) the relevant period in respect of a trust is the period that begins one year after the day on which the trust was created and ends at the end of the day that would, but for the election of the trust under subsection 104(5.3), be determined in respect of the trust under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b), as the case may be;

(b) 2 individuals shall be deemed to be related to each other where one of them is the aunt, great aunt, uncle or great uncle of the other individual;

(c) an individual shall be deemed not to be a designated contributor in respect of a trust where it is reasonable to consider that one of the main purposes of a series of transactions or events that includes

(i) an individual becoming a trustee in respect of trust property, or

(ii) an acquisition of property or a borrowing by any individual was to defer the day determined under paragraph 104(4)(b) in respect of the trust; and

(d) in determining whether all or substantially all of the value of shares of the capital stock of a corporation is derived from other property, the other property shall be deemed to include property substituted for the other property and property attributable to profits, gains or distributions in respect of the other property and the substituted property.

“Trust transfers – Sec. 104(5.8)”

(5.8) Where capital property (other than excluded property), land included in inventory, Canadian resource property or foreign resource property is transferred at a particular time by a trust (in this subsection referred to as the “transferor trust”) to another trust (in this subsection referred to as the “transferee trust”) in circumstances in which subsection 107(2) or 107.4(3) or paragraph (f) of the definition “disposition” in subsection 248(1) applies,

(a) for the purposes of applying subsections 104(4) to 104(5.2) after the particular time,

(i) subject to paragraphs (b) to (b.3), the first day (in this subsection referred to as the “disposition day”) that ends at or after the particular time that would, if this section were read without reference to paragraphs (4)(a.2) and (a.3), be determined in respect of the transferee trust is deemed to be the earliest of

(A) the first day ending at or after the particular time that would be determined under subsection 104(4) in respect of the transferor trust without regard to the transfer and any transaction or event occurring after the particular time,

(B) the first day ending at or after the particular time that would otherwise be determined under subsection 104(4) in respect of the transferee trust without regard to any transaction or event occurring after the particular time,

(C) the first day that ends at or after the particular time, where

(I) the transferor trust is a joint spousal or common-law partner trust, a post-1971 spousal or common-law partner trust or a trust described in the definition “pre-1972 spousal trust” in subsection 108(1), and

(II) the spouse or common-law partner referred to in paragraph (4)(a) or in the definition “pre-1972 spousal trust” in subsection 108(1) is alive at the particular time,

(C.1) the first day that ends at or after the particular time, where

(I) the transferor trust is an alter ego trust, a trust to which paragraph (4)(a.4) applies or a joint spousal or common-law partner trust, and

(II) the taxpayer referred to in paragraph (4)(a) or (a.4), as the case may be, is alive at the particular time, and

(D) where

(I) the disposition day would, but for the application of this subsection to the transfer, be determined under paragraph 104(5.3)(a) in respect of the transferee trust, and

(II) the particular time is after the day that would, but for subsection 104(5.3), be determined under paragraph 104(4)(b) in respect of the transferee trust, the first day ending at or after the particular time, and

(ii) where the disposition day determined in respect of the transferee trust under subparagraph 104(5.8)(a)(i) is earlier than the day referred to in clause 104(5.8)(a)(i)(B) in respect of the transferee trust, subsections 104(4) to 104(5.2) do not apply to the transferee trust on the day referred to in clause 104(5.8)(a)(i)(B) in respect of the transferee trust;

(b) paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the transfer where

(i) the transferor trust is a post-1971 spousal or common-law partner trust or a trust described in the definition “pre-1972 spousal trust” in subsection 108(1),

(ii) the spouse or common-law partner referred to in paragraph (4)(a) or in the definition “pre-1972 spousal trust” in subsection 108(1) is alive at the particular time,

and

(iii) the transferee trust is a post-1971 spousal or common-law partner trust or a trust described in the definition "pre-1972 spousal trust" in subsection 108(1);

(b.1) paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the transfer where

(i) the transferor trust is an alter ego trust,

(ii) the taxpayer referred to in paragraph (4)(a) is alive at the particular time, and

(iii) the transferee trust is an alter ego trust;

(b.2) paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the transfer where

(i) the transferor trust is a joint spousal or common-law partner trust,

(ii) either the taxpayer referred to in paragraph (4)(a), or the spouse or common-law partner referred to in that paragraph, is alive at the particular time, and

(iii) the transferee trust is a joint spousal or common-law partner trust;

(b.3) paragraph (a) does not apply in respect of the transfer where

(i) the transferor trust is a trust to which paragraph (4)(a.4) applies,

(ii) the taxpayer referred to in paragraph (4)(a.4) is alive at the particular time, and

(iii) the transferee trust is a trust to which paragraph (4)(a.4) applies; and

(c) for the purposes of subsection 104(5.3), unless a day ending before the particular time has been determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b) or would, but for subsection 104(5.3), have been so determined, a day determined under subparagraph 104(5.8)(a)(i) shall be deemed to be a day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or 104(4)(b), as the case may be, in respect of the transferee trust. ⁸³⁸

838 March 2001 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: Subsection 104(5.8) is a special rule designed to prevent the avoidance of the 21-year rule through the use of trust-to-trust transfers that do not involve dispositions of property at fair market value. Subsection 104(5.8) generally provides for a transferee trust to assume the next deemed disposition day of the transferor, if that day is earlier than the transferee's next deemed disposition day. In the case of trusts for the benefit of a spouse or common-law partner under which the beneficiary spouse or common-law partner is still alive, subsection 104(5.8) provides a deemed disposition as soon as the transfer is completed unless relief is provided under paragraph 104(5.8)(b). Paragraph 104(5.8)(b) provides relief where both the transferor and transferee trusts are trusts to which paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.1) applies and under which the spouse or common-law partner beneficiary is alive.

Subsection 104(5.8) is amended to eliminate a reference to trust transfers under paragraph (e) of the definition "disposition" in section 54, as a consequence of the repeal of that definition. Subsection 104(5.8) is also amended so that it now covers transfers under new paragraph (f) of the definition "disposition" in subsection 248(1) and under new subsection 107.4(3). Subsection 104(5.8) is amended so that it does not apply to transfers between trusts, if the transferee trust was, at the time of the transfer, described in paragraph (g) of the definition "trust" in subsection 108(1). This amendment, which is made as a consequence of the introduction of subparagraph (g)(iv) of that definition, applies only to transfers made after February 11, 1991 and before December 24, 1998. Subparagraph (g)(iv) of that definition has the effect of limiting an exemption from the 21-year deemed disposition rule for a trust in which interests are vested indefeasibly, in the event that non-resident beneficiaries own more than 20% of the interests in the trust.

Subparagraph 104(5.8)(a)(i) is amended to ensure that the determination of a deemed disposition day for a transferee trust will not preclude any earlier deemed disposition day under new paragraph 104(4)(a.2) or (a.3).

“Trusts in favour of spouse, common-law partner or self – Sec. 107(4)”

(4) Subsection (2.1) applies (and subsection (2) does not apply) at any time to property distributed to a beneficiary by a trust described in paragraph 104(4)(a) where

(a) the beneficiary is not

(i) in the case of a post-1971 spousal or common-law partner trust, the spouse or common-law partner referred to in paragraph 104(4)(a),

(ii) in the case of an alter ego trust, the taxpayer referred to in paragraph 104(4)(a), and

(iii) in the case of a joint spousal or common-law partner trust, the taxpayer, spouse or common-law partner referred to in paragraph 104(4)(a); and

Subsection 104(5.8) is further amended to extend its existing rules for transfers from trusts for the benefit of a spouse or common-law partner to transfers from other specified trusts. The additional trusts so specified are:

- those created after 1999 by a settlor (Aged 65 years or more) for the exclusive benefit of the settlor during the settlor's lifetime (i.e., an "alter ego trust", as newly defined in subsection 248(1)) or for the joint benefit of the settlor and the senior's spouse or common-law partner during their joint lifetimes (i.e., a "joint spousal or common-law partner trust", as newly defined in subsection 248(1)); and
- trusts to which paragraph 104(4)(a.4) applies (i.e., a trust to which property was transferred by a taxpayer who is an individual (other than a trust) in circumstances in which section 73 or subsection 107.4(3) applied, where the transfer does not result in a change in beneficial ownership of that property and no person (other than the taxpayer) or partnership has any absolute or contingent right as a beneficiary under the trust (determined with reference to subsection 104(1.1)).

Where the settlor of an alter ego trust is still alive (or, in the case of a joint spousal or common-law partner trust, where the senior or the spouse or common-law partner is still alive), a deemed disposition day for the trust may occur once a transfer from the trust is completed. However, amended paragraph 104(5.8)(b) and new paragraphs 104(5.8)(b.1) to (b.3) provide for no deemed disposition day in the case of a transfer from one of the additional specified trusts where the transferee trust is the same type of specified trust to which paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.4), as the case may be, applies and the senior (or, in the case of a joint spousal or common-law partner trust, either the senior or that spouse or common-law partner) or taxpayer, as the case may be, is alive. These amendments apply to transfers made after 1999. For further detail on new rules for alter ego trusts and joint spousal or common-law partner trusts, see the commentary on amended subsection 73(1) and paragraph 104(4)(a). For further detail on paragraph 104(4)(a.4), see the commentary on that paragraph. These amendments also reflect changes effected by the Modernization of Benefits and Obligations Act.

June 1992 FINANCE TECHNICAL NOTES: New subsection 104(5.8) is a special rule designed to prevent the avoidance of the 21-year deemed realization rule through the use of trust transfers. It generally applies where a trust transfers property to which the 21-year deemed realization rule applies to another trust on a rollover basis and the first deemed realization date after the transfer in respect of the transferee trust would otherwise occur after such date determined in respect of the transferor trust.

In these circumstances, the first deemed realization date for the transferee trust is generally advanced to such date in respect of the transferor trust. However, the deemed realization date for the transferee trust is advanced to the day after the transfer in two cases. The first case is where the transferor trust is a pre-1972 spousal trust described in paragraph 108(1)(f.2) [now 108(1)"pre-1972 spousal trust" - ed.] or a spousal trust described in paragraph 104(4)(a) the beneficiary spouse of which is still alive at the time of the transfer from the transferor trust. The second case is where the deemed realization date of the transferee trust is determined (without reference to the transfer rule in subsection 104(5.8)) as of the time of the transfer under new subsection 104(5.3). In neither of these cases would it be possible to determine whether a deemed realization in respect of the transferee trust would occur, without reference to the transfer rule in subsection 104(5.8), before or after a deemed realization in respect of the transferor trust.

Paragraph 104(5.8)(b) applies where paragraph 104(5.8)(a) would otherwise apply in the first case described above. In these circumstances, paragraph 104(5.8)(b) provides that paragraph 104(5.8)(a) does not apply where the transferee trust is also a spousal trust described in paragraph 104(4)(a) or (a.1) in respect of which the beneficiary spouse is still alive at the time of the transfer.

Paragraph 104(5.8)(c) provides that an advanced deemed realization date under subparagraph 104(5.8)(a)(i) is considered for the purposes of subsection 104(5.3) to be a day determined under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or (b). The purpose of this rule is to allow a transferee trust to which subsection 104(5.8) applies the capacity to make a subsection 104(5.3) election. However, the election will not be available where the transferee trust has previously had a deemed realization under paragraph 104(4)(a.1) or (b) and thus previously had the opportunity to make such an election.

This amendment is applicable in respect of property transferred after February 11, 1991. However, the rules do not apply to transfers on or before December 20, 1991 where either the transferor trust or the transferee trust is a spousal trust in respect of which the beneficiary spouse is still alive.

(b) a taxpayer, spouse or common-law partner referred to in subparagraph (a)(i),
(ii) or (iii), as the case may be, is alive on the day of the distribution. ⁸³⁹

It should be noted that when one sees the term variation in a trust to cause it to have the same identity as that from which it was varied such doesn't apply to a special power of appointment that operates to resettle the property under a different trust per the parameters of the special power grantor. It is recognized that the beneficiaries or statute law are not making the variation, but the property is being resettled pursuant to the intentions of the settlor inherent in the special power.

⁸³⁹ Following the reasoning in Pexton v. Bell, 1976 2 All E.R. 914, and Crowe v. Appleby, 1975 3 All E.R. 529, it's important to ascertain exactly the extent of the singular spousal trust which is to suffer the dispositions. If the head trust settles cash on a sub-trust taking back an income interest the interest wouldn't be subject to Sec. 104(4) nor would the sub-trust's property. If a will creates more than one trust, with one being spousal and the others feeding income interests to it the spouse may be provided for through the head trust only but the only property which will gain roll-over treatment is that which was transferred to the head trust.

Principal Residence Trust Transfers.

In computing the taxable capital gain on the disposition of property which is a principal residence paragraph 40(2)(b) provides an exempting provision whereby where the disposer is an individual, his gain otherwise computed from the disposition of the property which is/was a principal residence at any time after Dec. 31st, 1971 and the day on which he last acquired it, whichever is later, will be the gain otherwise determined under the Sec. 40(1) rules less that proportion thereof that one plus the number of taxation years ending after the acquisition date for which the property was his principal residence and during which he was resident in Canada is of the number of tax years ending after the acquisition date during which he "owned" the property whether jointly with another person or not. Obviously this provision can quite easily negate a possible gain from being recognized if the conditions are maintained by the owner while para. (c) thereunder provides an ancillary rule concerning the disposition of land used in a farming business carried on by the taxpayer which includes such a principal residence. Under that rule his gain for the year is his gain otherwise computed from the disposition of just the land, (not including the principal residence), plus the gain computed as per the just mentioned rule in respect of his principal residence, or, if the taxpayer elects in respect of the land and the principal residence as a unit the total gain otherwise computed as per the general Sec. 40(1)(a) rules, less the aggregate of $1,000 and $1,000 for each tax year ending after the acquisition date during which the property was his principal residence and in which he was resident in Canada. A further technical exemption comes in the form of subsection 40(6) whereunder if the property (principal residence) was owned, jointly or otherwise, at the end of the 1981 calendar year, and continuously until it was disposed by the taxpayer the amount of capital gain determined as per the rules in Sec. 40(2)(b) shall not exceed the aggregate of two amounts which exceeds a third amount. The first amount equals the gain that would have been recognizable after the application of Sec. 40(2)(b) had the taxpayer disposed of the property for proceeds equal to its fair market value on Dec. 31st, 1981, and the second amount equals the gain otherwise computed under Sec. 40(2)(b) on the assumption that the taxpayer acquired the property on Jan. 1st, 1982, for a cost equal to the proceeds previously recognized, as if the apportioning numerator in Sec. 40(2)(b) were read without the reference to the singular additional year, and the third amount which reduces the gross amount is equal to the amount if any by which the fair market value of the property on Dec. 31st, 1981, exceeds the proceeds of disposition that the taxpayer actually realized on the disposition of the property after 1981.

These three provisions provide the basis by which principal residences can be transferred effectively tax-free in Canada, while under paragraph 54(g) a "principal residence" is defined to be a housing unit, a leasehold interest therein, or share of the capital stock of a co-operative housing corporation, which was owned jointly or otherwise but only if the housing unit was, or the share acquired for the sole purpose of acquiring the right to inhabit a housing unit owned by the corporation that was, ordinarily inhabited in the year by one of several parties now provided for if Press Release 91-018 dated Feb. 11th, 1991, becomes law.⁸⁴⁰

The old rules provided that the property had to be ordinarily inhabited by the taxpayer, taxpayer's spouse, former spouse, or child or a property in respect of which the taxpayer has elected upon under Sec. 45(2) or (3) where there was a change of use.⁸⁴¹ By definition a principal residence is a non-listed personal property and thus any loss recognized on a disposition isn't deductible against Division B income. The definition went on to provide that except where section 54.1 concerning changes of residence upon employment relocation is applicable a housing unit or share or interest etc. would not be considered a principal residence unless it was designated as such by the disposer in prescribed form for a particular year and no other potential residence has been designated by him for the particular year, or by his spouse or child, (unless the spouse was throughout the year living apart from and was separated pursuant to a judicial separation or written separation agreement or the child was 18 years or older or married). If the designator wasn't married at any time during 840 A "superficiarie" under Quebec civil law owns the building which is situated upon the land owned by another and as per the Bilingual Services & Resource Industries Division on March 14th, 1990, the owner thereof will be able to recognize it as a P.R. if the building has the appropriate character. It opined however, that the taxpayer must have all the incidents of ownership of the building in order for it to qualify and that if the taxpayer can't dispose of, or mortgage it, or if he doesn't suffer from all of the burdens of ownership of it it may not be regardable as owned for the purposes of the subsection.

841 See Thomson v. M.N.R., 1946 C.T.C. 15 (SCC), for a definition of ordinarily inhabited.

the year, and was under 18 years old, a person who was his mother, father, brother or sister and who was not during the year a married person or a person 18 years old or over was also precluded from designating another P.R. if he designates one.

With the Press Release the number of parties who can designate the property as a P.R. has been substantially extended, primarily in the case of trusts.⁸⁴² Where the taxpayer is an individual other than a personal trust the former parties will be eligible to designate the property. If the taxpayer disposing of the property is a personal trust and "a specified beneficiary", his spouse, former spouse or child ordinarily inhabited the property in the calendar year ending in the particular year the trust designates for P.R. treatment the property will gain P.R. treatment. Where the disponent is a personal trust or an individual other than a personal trust the property need not be ordinarily inhabited by anyone if there has been a Sec. 45(2) or (3) election made preserving its P.R. status for 4 years.

These rules are further exemplified in that where the taxpayer is an individual other than a personal trust the property must be designated by the disposing taxpayer as being his principal residence for the calendar year and no other property has been so designated by the taxpayer, the taxpayer's spouse if she was such throughout the year designated⁸⁴³, by the taxpayer's child, (other than those who were at any time in the year married or over 18 years of age or older), while if the disponent was not married or 18 or older at any time in the designated year a designation cannot have been made by his mother or father, brother or sister, (if they were under 18 or not married at any time in the year designated). The primary thrust of the new legislation allows personal trusts to designate property it owns that was ordinarily inhabited by a beneficiary and while this treatment was formerly available to only Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) spousal trusts, with the amendments, all personal trusts will qualify if they can meet very limited conditions. The property in the year of disposition must be designated by the trust to be its principal residence for a given designation year while the trust must also designate each individual who had a beneficial interest in the trust at any time in the calendar year ending in the designated year and who ordinarily inhabited the housing unit, or had a spouse, former spouse, or child who inhabited it during that time.⁸⁴⁴ To restrict the exemption from being available in respect of corporations and partnerships such parties cannot hold beneficial interests in the trust during the calendar year ending in the designated year though of course they may have previous to the acquisition of the property or after its disposition. Trusts that hold interests in trusts that hold principal residences can have as their beneficiaries partnerships or corporations without effect apparently. The trust's designation will not be valid if for the calendar year ending in the trust's particular designated year another property was designated by any specified beneficiary⁸⁴⁵, by a person who was his spouse,⁸⁴⁶ by the specified beneficiary's child⁸⁴⁷, while if the specified beneficiary isn't 18 or older nor married at any time in the calendar year, by his parents or siblings.

If the trust wasn't personal all is not lost, but the P.R.E. is very limited in that if the trust is inter vivos, other than a Sec. 73(1) spousal trust, the property owned by the trust must have been contributed to it by an individual, and either that individual and any spouse or former spouse of the individual held no beneficial interest in the trust during its designation year or that individual or spouse or former spouse but not child was a specified beneficiary for that calendar year ending in the trust's tax year for which the designation is made.⁸⁴⁸

Pursuant to paragraph (vi) a property designated by a personal trust for a year shall be deemed to be a property designated by each specified beneficiary of the trust for the calendar year ending in the trust's tax year designated hence the P.R.E. cannot be excessively accessed through the use of the trust. A very similar result was created in respect of a spousal trust prior to the amendments.

⁸⁴² The new rules apply to dispositions after 1990.

⁸⁴³ unless the couple were living apart throughout the year pursuant to a judicial or written separation agreement

⁸⁴⁴ The inhabitant need not have a beneficial interest if she falls under the latter larger category.

⁸⁴⁵ past or present?

⁸⁴⁶ other than those living part and separated pursuant to a judicial or written agreement throughout the calendar year

⁸⁴⁷ other than those during the year who were 18 or older or married

⁸⁴⁸ Of course interests in the inter vivos trust can be held by other trusts for the benefit of the contributor individual while this treatment does not apply to spousal trusts though it doesn't make the P.R.E. available to non-personal trusts since a non-personal trust cannot "inhabit" a building within the context of the Sec. 54(g)(i) paragraph.

Subparagraph (v) provides that the principal residence is deemed to include, except where it is a share of a cooperative housing corporation, the land adjacent to the housing unit or that which is contiguous that may reasonably be regarded as contributing to the use and enjoyment of the building as a residence, while if such land exceeds a half hectare the taxpayer will have to prove that the excess contributes to the use and enjoyment thereof in order to be treated as part of it. It should be noted that the designation of years applies only back to 1982 whereby in respect of years prior to that time the taxpayer could possibly have designated in respect of two principal residences however he can designate only one in respect of each tax year. In order to appreciate the intricacy of the mechanics of the provision one should study I.T. 120R3, since the general mechanics are far too complex to go into it in length here however it can be generalized that in designating properties which are to be disposed of one would want to designate in respect of any particular year the property in which the largest gain accrued as based on the potential capital gains to be realized on all properties divided by the number of years of ownership.

The section 40 and 54 provisions allow the P.R. exemptions to be available to owners of the property and while they specify that such ownership may be jointly with others they do not preclude beneficial ownership while para. 5 of I.T. 437 expresses the Department's opinion that if a beneficiary under a trust has the right of possession and use of the property, control over the trust and its property can be sold/mortgaged only upon the beneficiary's concurrence or direction, or the trust can be wound up by the beneficiary, he will be considered to be the owner of the P.R. and not the trust for purposes of sections 40 and 54. Thus by transferring the legal ownership of the P.R. to a trust in which the taxpayer takes back a life interest for the use of the property and satisfies the above conditions the property will be able to continue to benefit from the P.R. provisions when disposed of by the trust. The same may apply where he didn't normally use (inhabit) the property but his spouse or underage unmarried child did and the right he takes back allows them to continue to inhabit it. If the contributor acquires beneficial ownership as evidenced by the abilities expressed in the I.T. the trust will be able to have another P.R. subject to certain restrictions in Sec. 54(g)(v).

In *Smellie v. M.N.R.*⁸⁴⁹ a testator allowed his wife as per the terms of the will, to inhabit his house, (her being also one of two executors), which she did until 1974, three years after the death of the taxpayer. The house was provided under a tainted spousal trust situation. When the house was subsequently sold after her death the tainted spousal trust was denied the application of the principal residence designation even though the widow had satisfied the criteria (ordinary inhabitation) in her personal capacity and as an executor of the trust. The tainted spousal trust, however, had never filed any of the required forms declaring the property in question to be its principle residence and thus, as a requirement of a very literal interpretation supposedly demanded of the provisions the property could not serve as either a P.R. for the trust or the spouse.

Under subsection 40(4) where a taxpayer has disposed of property to an individual in circumstances where Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) applied being spouse, former spouse, spousal trust, or certain dependant recipients, for purposes of computing that individual's gain from the disposition of the property under the main Sec. 40(2)(b) or (c) P.R. rules that spousal recipient individual will be deemed to have owned the property throughout the period in which the taxpayer owned it, the property shall be deemed to have been that individual's principal residence in, in the case of an inter vivos spousal transfer, any tax year for which it was the taxpayer's P.R. while, in the case of a testamentary spousal transfer, for any tax year for which it would have been the taxpayer's principle residence had he designated it so in prescribed manner, and if the individual above is a trust, the trust shall be deemed to have been resident in Canada during each tax year during which the - taxpayer settlor was resident in Canada.⁸⁵⁰ If the settlor becomes non-resident then the inter vivos trust will not be considered to be non-resident for purposes of the general P.R. rules. If the property is transferred under Sec. 73(1) the settlor should fill out an election form prescribed and hand it over to the trustees, though it need not be immediately filed while if it is transferred via Sec. 70(6) a listing of the testator's previously elected designation years in respect of other property disposed of when he owned the particular P.R. should be obtained by the trustees so that they'll know what years they can designate and decided whether there is to be a disposition of the property.

⁸⁴⁹ 1 E.T.R. 74

⁸⁵⁰ Why is the latter treatment not available in respect of spouses? Obviously if the spouse was non-resident during a previous designation period it would be preferable to transfer the property to a spousal trust resident in Canada since the P.R. exemption would be maintained.

“Disposal of principal residence to spouse or trust for spouse. – Sec. 40(4)”

(4) Where a taxpayer has, after 1971, disposed of property to an individual in circumstances to which subsection 70(6) or 73(1) applied, for the purposes of computing the individual's gain from the disposition of the property under paragraph (2)(b) or (c), as the case may be,

(a) the individual shall be deemed to have owned the property throughout the period during which the taxpayer owned it;

(b) the property shall be deemed to have been the individual's principal residence

(i) in any case where subsection 70(6) is applicable, for any taxation year for which it would, if the taxpayer had designated it in prescribed manner to have been his principal residence for that year, have been the taxpayer's principal residence, and

(ii) in any case where subsection 73(1) is applicable, for any taxation year for which it was the taxpayer's principal residence; and

(c) where the individual is a trust, the trust shall be deemed to have been resident in Canada during each taxation year during which the taxpayer was resident in Canada.

“Where principal residence is property of trust for spouse. - Sec. 40(5)”

(5) For the purposes of determining whether any property of a trust described in subsection 70(6) or 73(1) was its principal residence for any taxation year, the reference in subparagraph 54(g)(i) to “the taxpayer” shall be read as if it were a reference to the spouse referred to in subparagraph 70(6)(b)(i) or 73(1)(c)(i), as the case may be.

“Distribution of principal residence – Sec. 107(2.01)”

(2.01) Where property that would, if a personal trust had designated the property under paragraph (c.1) of the definition “principal residence” in section 54, be a principal residence (within the meaning of that definition) of the trust for a taxation year, is at any time (in this subsection referred to as “that time”) distributed by the trust to a taxpayer in circumstances in which subsection (2) applies and the trust so elects in its return of income for the taxation year that includes that time,

(a) the trust shall be deemed to have disposed of the property immediately before the particular time that is immediately before that time for proceeds of disposition equal to the fair market value of the property at that time; and

(b) the trust shall be deemed to have reacquired the property at the particular time at a cost equal to that fair market value.

If upon the transfer to the trust the settlor or personal representative through the power instilled in him chooses not to have Sec. 73(1) or 70(6) apply to the transfer, as is possible under the Sec. 73(1) and 70(6.2) elections, the spousal trust will not benefit from the Sec. 40(2)(b) & (c) rules when it disposes of the property subsequently. The Sec. 73(1) or 70(6) provisions must apply to the particular property which becomes the trust's deemed principal residence for those prior years as per Sec. 40(4)(b), in order for the carry-through to apply, and while those two provisions operate to cause a disposition for proceeds equal to the property's ACB, thus avoiding a gain and bump up in ACB, Sec. 40(4)(a) provides effectively that the trust will be allowed to designate years in which the taxpayer-contributor owned it, hence the taxpayer's position in respect to the P.R. is entirely transposed to the trust without tax consequences.

Spousal Recipients.

Under former Sec. 40(5), for purposes of determining whether a property was a spousal trust's principal residence to which it was transferred via Sec. 70(6)-73(1), the spouse under the trust must have ordinarily inhabited the property, or her spouse, former spouse or child must have done so, as per the application of para. (i) of the Sec. 54(g) definition.⁸⁵¹ Although the balance of the restrictive definition other than that under para. (i) didn't apply directly to the spouse, under para.(vi), specifically for purposes of para. (iii) which served to limit a designation of a singular P.R. to one family etc., where a property was designated as a P.R. by a spousal trust it would be deemed to have been also designated by the spouse who is a beneficiary under the trust, while if he made a designation in respect of it the trust would be deemed to have designated in respect of the property. Thus even though the spouse under the trust benefitted from the provisions they also limited the designations that could be made by related parties, including other spousal trusts. A spouse would not be able to designate in respect of a principal residence certain years for which a spousal trust under which she is a beneficiary designated in respect of another principal residence. If the spouse ceased to be a beneficiary under the trust it would cease to be a spousal trust described in Sec. 73(1), (though not in Sec. 104(4)), and thus the trust would not be able to benefit from a P.R. exemption in respect of its own property. Alternatively if the property is subsequently rolled out after the spouse's death Sec. 107(2.01) cannot apply. Subparagraph 54(g)(i), then read in conjunction with Sec. 40(5), required the "trust's spouse", her spouse or her child to reside in the trust's dwelling in order for it to qualify as a P.R. however their relationship to the property was not specified; could they rent it from the trust, inhabit it while making payments to other beneficiaries, etc.? It was questionable whether they had to reside in it by virtue of the rights they had under the trust agreement, by virtue of a beneficiary status, however the agreement could require, in the author's opinion, them to make payments to other beneficiaries for the dwellings' use without harming the P.R. status. Distinguishing between an equitable charge and a rental charge may be difficult in such an instance, however if it is paid directly to a Canadian resident beneficiary Sec. 105(1) will apply to it. With the draft legislation of Feb. 11th, 1991, effective for dispositions occurring after 1990 subsection 40(5) is repealed and thus the spousal preservation of the P.R. as such is eliminated though it is replaced with the new rules previously described which offer the P.R.E. to certain trusts. Understandably where the trust isn't spousal the testator/settlor would have usually suffered a FMV disposition of the property on its contribution to the trust.

The property need not have been situated in Canada though its ownership must have been resident in order to gain the P.R.E.. In the case of personal trusts the property could be situated anywhere and the inhabiting beneficiary could be non-resident and the resident trust would still benefit from the P.R.E.. There is no qualification placed on the residency of the specified beneficiary though the trust must have been resident during the designated years. The use of a personal trust in a situation where the parents of a family are to become non-resident for any length of time while the kids stay to study in Canada is obvious: rolled to a personal trust the P.R.E. is initially utilized by the parent while the kids continue to inhabit it and thus the personal trust can recognize the property as a P.R.. the parents are then free to "become permanent beach fixtures" without the fear of losing the P.R.E. on the disposal of the property: the tax free proceeds could be rolled out to them as residual beneficiaries under Sec. 107(5) after the property is realized. In the case of spousal trusts and the Sec. 40(4) carry through of the P.R. from the contributor/giftor residency of the parties is a more complicated issue. If the trust is to become non-resident for an extended period of time, as per the favourable provision under Sec. 40(7), it could transfer the property out to the spouse in satisfaction of her capital interest or part thereof whereby if the trust is personal and the recipient is the spouse identified with respect to the spousal trust described under Sec. 70(6) or 73(1); the spouse will be deemed to have owned the property continuously since the trust acquired it which will include the period during which the settlor/testator owned it, as per Sec. 40(4)(a). Of course this will only be beneficial if the spouse herself continues to be resident in Canada, and where during that period otherwise eligible for designation stretching all the way back to the time the settlor originally acquired the property she, her spouse, or former spouse or a minor unmarried child of hers did not make a designation in respect of another P.R., since in doing so, as per new para. (iii.1) of the definition of P.R.⁸⁵² it would restrict her ability to designate in respect of the P.R. distribution. If the spouse wasn't resident throughout the designation years since the original settlor acquired the property then she will not be able to designate in respect of the years she wasn't resident in that although Sec. 40(7) allows her to be deemed to have owned the property since the resident trust acquired it it does not deem her to have been resident during the time in which the settlor or trust owned it. Subsection 40(4)(c) deems a trust which received the P.R. on a Sec. 70(6)-73(1) roll to have been resident during the years in which the contributor was resident but such treatment is not afforded to the spousal beneficiary. She herself must be resident in those years during which the contributor and trust were resident in order to take the maximum P.R.E., otherwise it could prove beneficial to have the trust dispose of the property or take the new Sec. 107(2.01) election. In such a case the trust would absorb any P.R. gain and the spouse would start off with a clean slate or receive the proceeds.

851. It would appear that the inhabitation need not be provided for by the trust deed but possibly via alternate arrangement: see Samson and Anor. v. Peay, 52 T.C. 1, for some issues.

Subsection 40(7) allows a capital beneficiary who has received property in satisfaction of part or all of his capital interest in a personal trust to be recognized as having acquired the property at the time the trust acquired it and does not apply only in respect of spousal trusts, but applies wherever Sec. 107(4), providing special capital distribution rules for spousal trusts, doesn't apply.⁸⁵³ If the property when transferred to the trust could not receive Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) treatment the settlor would have recognized a capital gain,⁸⁵⁴ and Sec. 40(4) would not have applied to allow for the transposing of the ACB/P.R. position to the trust. Upon a transfer of the property out to the non-spousal beneficiary whereby he would recognize it as his principal residence only at that time the denominator in respect of the Sec. 40(2)(b) computation for the recipient at the time of a subsequent disposition will be extended by the years that the trust owned it and the numerator would be restricted to the number of years in which it was his principal residence, which results in the gain from the property upon its disposition to a third party by the beneficiary being reduced less.⁸⁵⁵ This only arises where the property received the tax-free distribution afforded capital interest under personal trusts while it would be possible to inflate the ACB of the capital interest, before it is satisfied, above the ACB of the property, whereby the ACB of the property to the recipient would be bumped by the excess as per the Sec. 107(2)(b) rule.⁸⁵⁶ It is also to be noted that the Sec. 40(7) provision does not equate the residence of the recipient beneficiary with that of the trust for the years in which the trust owned the property thus the beneficiary would have to also be resident during the relevant years to obtain the maximum P.R. exemption.⁸⁵⁷ If the recipient had beneficial ownership of the P.R. from the moment the trust acquired it, as per Sec. 54(g), it would appear that it could qualify as his P.R. for those years when it was owned by the trust, when he subsequently disposes of it only if he or his spouse/offspring ordinarily inhabited it. This isn't the case with just being merely beneficially interested in it. Subsection 40(7), the cause of the potential problem, will not apply where the property is distributed in satisfaction of an income interest as per Sec. 106(3) whereby the recipient will not recognize any tax consequences, however the trust will be deemed to have disposed of it for its fair market value at that time and thus it will possibly become liable for the tax expense. With the new rules it is possible for the trust to designate in respect of the property if a specified beneficiary resided in it during the designation year.

“Property in satisfaction of interest in trust - Sec. 40(7)”

(7) Where property has been acquired by a taxpayer in satisfaction of all or any part of his capital interest in a trust, in circumstances to which subparagraph 107(2) applies and subsection 107(4) does not apply, for the purposes of paragraphs (2)(b) and 54(g) he shall be deemed to have owned the

852 which describes the one residence per year designation limit

853 The provision applies for purposes of the Sec. 54(g) definition and Sec. 40(2)(b), (the exemption).

854 or benefit from the P.R.E. himself.

855 in which case he could have to recognize more capital gain

856 One can't create a deductible capital loss with a principal residence: personal use property.

857 He could be non-resident for one year without tax effect actually.

property continuously since the trust last acquired it.

With respect to property flowing through a spousal personal trust the beneficiary, if he is to receive the property in specie in satisfaction of his capital interest and recognize it as his principal residence upon a subsequent disposition, (due to the fact that he, his spouse, or his child ordinarily inhabited it), one would be acting prudently with respect to dispositions of property that qualify as a principal residence by him in the interim, to measure the gain accruing on the property in the trust and the gain accrued to him with respect to the property he disposes of, on an annual basis, and designate the years to the respective property which showed the largest gain increment in the designation year. He would thus be wiping out the largest amount of gains allowable to be realized from the two properties.

Regulation 2300 prescribes the manner in which the election under Sec. 40(2) or 54(g) must be made however it should be recognized that they only apply when the disposer wished to elect upon the occurrence of a gain upon disposition.

Both the section 40 computation provisions and the Sec. 54(g) definition recognize that a property which serves as a principal residence of one joint owner may not carry the status for the other joint owner(s) however if a joint owner is to be able to designate the property as such he, his spouse, or underaged unmarried child must have ordinarily inhabited the property. Where the property is sold to a third party the gain would be apportioned on the basis of the ownership and the respective taxpayer could elect under section 40-54 etc. however as per para. 6 and 11 of I.T. 366R the Department's opinion seems to be that once a singular designation in respect of the P.R. is made it causes the property in its entirety to be treated as such for both owners and this can have advantages and disadvantages. Since the second joint owner or his spouse or child has to be ordinarily inhabiting the property in order for him to have the property gain the P.R. status his otherwise fully taxable gain could be favourably negated, however, although he hasn't himself made the appropriate election he should none-the-less be recognized to have treated the property as a P.R. in the subject years so that when he disposes of another property which is in fact his P.R. he will not be able to apply the designation years in respect of it.

Under subparagraph 49(1)(a) the granting of an option to acquire or dispose of a principal residence is not considered a disposition of property for purposes of subdivision C and thus doesn't cause tax consequences to the option grantor. It also offers an incidental method by which capital may be obtained by a trust and allows an otherwise testamentary trust to retain its status.

With the 1990 amendments the Department introduced Sec. 107(2.01) which allows a spousal trust to roll property out to any beneficiary in instances where Sec. 107(2) would have applied and if Sec. 107(4) doesn't and recognize a deemed disposition thereof for proceeds equal to the P.R.'s FMV when distributed. The deemed disposition is not mandatory but is to be elected by the trust and the trust must be of the character described in Sec. 70(6) or 73(1) at the time of the distribution and not simply Sec. 104(4) and essentially when elected for the trust is allowed to recognize a spontaneous deemed FMV disposition and thus take the P.R. exemption itself so as to negate any income inclusion and consequently cost bump the property.⁸⁵⁸ The Sec. 107(2) provision then operates to allow the beneficiary to acquire the property for its ACB to the trust, which is its FMV and thus the beneficiary can start with a "clean slate" without any implicit tax liability however the property must have the characteristic of a P.R. in the trust's hands thus the spouse couldn't have made a Sec. 54(g) designation in respect of another property during the years that the trust designated the property in order to be a tax free roll out. If she has then there will not be a virtual tax free disposition by the trust. Actually the spouse may designate one year in respect of another property without affecting the Sec. 107(2.01) roll-over. The provision definitely allows the spouse to remain or become non-resident in the period in which the trust holds the property without sacrificing the P.R. exemption on a subsequent roll out to her. If she wasn't resident she can't designate the property but the Sec. 107(2.01) provision bumps the cost up for her.⁸⁵⁹

⁸⁵⁸. Implicitly the P.R. need not have been rolled into the trust via Sec. 73(1)-70(6) in order for the trust's P.R.E. to be maintained though the trust must have been spousal.

⁸⁵⁹ The offspring can reside in it in order for it to qualify. The author doesn't understand why the draftsmen didn't number the provision 107(2.000001) so as to be sure to maintain numerical continuity and "leave space for other provisions".

Although the new rules are meant for pre-1972 trusts under which the spouse has died and which have not recognized the Sec. 104(4) deemed dispositions they may be applied in respect of any spousal trust to which the Sec. 107(2) distribution provision would apply.⁸⁶⁰ It's applicable in respect of distributions occurring after May 9th, 1985 however the election can be back dated to apply to distributions occurring before Royal Assent if notice is made by the trust to M.N.R. in writing before Apr. 1st, 1992.

Principal Residence - Transfer to Spouse, Spouse Trust or Certain Other Individuals

IT-366R

Date: May 4, 1984

This bulletin replaces and cancels Interpretation Bulletin IT-366 dated March 38, 1977. Current revisions are designated by vertical lines.

1. This bulletin outlines the effect of subsection 40(4) in the computation of the principal resident exemption under paragraph 40(2)(b) or (c) where an individual disposes of a principal residence which was previously acquired in a transaction described in 2 below. In addition, new provisions relating to the disposition of a principal residence after 1981 are also dealt with herein to the extent that they affect this bulletin. IT-120R3, "Principal Residence," discusses other matters concerning the principal residence exemption.
2. Subsection 40(4) applies on the disposition of a principal residence by an individual only if that principal residence was previously acquired from a taxpayer in a transaction to which the rollover provisions of subsection 70(6) or 73(1) applied. Subsection 70(6) applies to a transfer of property on death to a spouse or spouse trust while subsection 73(1) applies (in the absence of an election to the contrary thereunder) to an inter vivos transfer of property to a spouse, a former spouse in settlement of rights arising out of their marriage, a spouse trust or, after 1977, to an individual referred to in paragraph 73(1)(d), such as a former common-law partner, by virtue of a court order under certain provincial legislation. For the purpose of this bulletin, the person who made the original transfer 73(1) is referred to as "the taxpayer" and the person to whom the principal residence was transferred is referred to as "the individual".
3. Subsection 40(4) provides that, for the purpose of computing the gain under paragraph 40(2)(b) or (c) on the subsequent disposition of a property by an individual, the property is deemed
 - (a) to have been owned by the individual for the period during which it was owned by the taxpayer, and
 - (b) to have been the principal residence of the individual for any year in the period in (a) above if, in respect of that year, the taxpayer
 - (i) has designated it to be a principal residence, in the case of an inter vivos transfer, or
 - (ii) was eligible to designate it to be a principal residence, in the case of a transfer on death.
4. Pursuant to the provisions described in 3 above, the number of taxation years ending after the taxpayer's acquisition date during which the taxpayer owned the property are included in the denominator of the fraction used when computing the individual's exemption under paragraph 40(2)(b) or subparagraph 40(2)(c)(i) on the disposition of the property. The acquisition date is the later of December 31, 1971 or the date on which the taxpayer last acquired or reacquired the residence or is deemed to have last acquired or reacquired it. Also, the numerator of that fraction (or where subparagraph 40(2)(c)(ii) applies, the number of years for which the individual is entitled to the $1,000 per year exemption) includes the number of taxation years ending after the taxpayer's acquisition date during which the taxpayer was resident in Canada and the property was his principal residence.
5. If the transferred property is not deemed to be the principal residence of the individual (i.e. the requirements of 3(b) above are not met) for each year after the taxpayer's acquisition date, a gain arising on the disposition of the property by the individual will not be fully exempt under paragraph 40(2)(b) or (c) unless the conditions described in 6 below are met.

Co-Ownership of Property

6. Where the taxpayer and the individual (spouse, former spouse, spouse trust, former common law partner, etc.) had co-ownership of the transferred property (as joint tenants or tenants in common or, in Quebec, as co-owners or having undivided ownership) in a year prior to the transfer and during that year the individual ordinarily inhabited the property, the individual is entitled to designate it to be a principal residence for that year in the normal way. If the individual is so entitled in respect of the years referred to in 5 above, a gain on the disposition of the transferred property may thus be fully exempt. However, where the individual is the taxpayer's spouse, the comments in 11 below should be noted for the 1982 and subsequent taxation years.

⁸⁶⁰ It's intended to correct the technical deficiency whereby as a consequence of Sec. 40(7) the beneficiary's P.R. denominator increased by the period of trust ownership which reduces the P.R.E. available to him.

Transfer to Spouse Trust

7. For purposes of paragraphs 40(2) and (c), paragraph 40(4)(c) deems a spouse trust (as described in paragraph 70(6)(b) or subsection 73(1)) to have been resident in Canada for each year in which the taxpayer was so resident. Therefore, where subsection 40(4) deems a spouse trust to have owned a property during a period prior to its transfer from a taxpayer, the trust will meet the residence requirements of paragraphs 40(2)(b) and (c) for any year in that period during which the taxpayer owned the property and was resident in Canada.
8. As provided in subsection 40(5), a property transferred to a spouse trust may qualify as a principal residence of the trust for each year while owned by it
 - (a) during which the taxpayer's spouse ordinarily inhabited the property and
 - (b) for which both the spouse and the trust designate the property to be their principal residence.

Thus, for each year subsequent to the year of transfer to the spouse trust, the taxpayer's spouse may designate as a principal residence either the trust property (to meet the condition in (b) above) or another property which otherwise qualifies under paragraph 54(g), but the taxpayer's spouse may not designate both such properties in respect of the same year.

Designation as a Principal Residence

9. It is the Department's administrative position that the designation of a property as a taxpayer's principal residence in respect of one or more years (form T2091) is required to be filed with the return of income for the year in which the property was disposed of only where a gain remains after applying the exempting provisions of paragraph 40(2)(b) or (c). Thus, on an inter vivos transfer to which subsection 40(4) applies, the designation need not be filed at that time, although the taxpayer may do so. However, if the taxpayer chooses to designate the property as a principal residence for one or more of the years during which the taxpayer owned it, the taxpayer should, in any case, complete the designation form. It should be retained by the individual referred to in subsection 40(4) and filed, if necessary, on the subsequent disposition of the property. At that time, if a gain remains after applying paragraphs 40(2)(b) or (c), both the taxpayer's designation and the designation of the individual, where applicable, should be filed accordingly. If no gain remains, the individual should, in any case, retain these designations to support the underlying calculations.

Attribution Rules

10. When property transferred inter vivos is disposed of by the spouse or spouse trust, the provisions of subsection 74(2) will apply during the lifetime of the taxpayer, while the taxpayer is resident in Canada and the transferee is the taxpayer's spouse. However, the amount of taxable capital gain which would be attributed to the taxpayer is based on the calculation of the gain under paragraph 40(2)(b) or (c), and thus may be nil. Whether or not there is an amount attributable pursuant to subsection 74(2), where the proceeds of disposition are used by the transferee to purchase other property, part or all of any income or capital gain realized from that substituted property may be attributed to the taxpayer (the transferor). (See IT-258R2, "Transfer of Property to a Spouse", for a discussion of these provisions.)

Dispositions after 1981

11. The definition of "principal residence" contained in paragraph 54(g) was amended effective January 1, 1982. This amendment limits the designation to one principal residence per family unit. Consequently the comments in 6 above will be affected after 1981 as a result of this amendment. Where a property is held under co-ownership it will continue to be fully exempt with only one designation required but, where two such properties are held under co-ownership, or both husband and wife each own such a property outright, only one will qualify for principal residence status after 1981.

12. Because of the amendment to paragraph 54(g), dispositions after 1981 of a property that previously qualified as a principal residence may result in a part of the capital gain otherwise determined being taxable. For example, where a husband and wife living together throughout the period each owned a property from 1981 through 1983, when one of the properties is disposed of, both properties may have qualified for principal residence status up until 1982 but from 1982 to the time of disposal, the family is restricted to claiming principal residence status on only one of the properties. Accordingly, in disposal of the non-qualifying property in 1983, a portion of the capital gain will be taxable.

13. The transitional rules for determining the capital gain on the disposition, after 1981, of a principal residence owned at the end of 1981, are contained in subsection 40(6). This subsection, in effect, provides that the capital gain realized after 1981 on the disposal of a property which is, or was before 1982, a principal residence, cannot exceed the amount of the gain calculated as if it were determined in two parts - that part of the accrued gain, if any, calculated to the end of 1981 on the basis of the old principal residence rules, plus the gain, if any, accrued after 1981 in accordance with the new rules.

Income Tax Interpretation Bulletin Ownership of Property (Principal Residence)

IT-437R

DATE: February 21, 1994

SUBJECT: INCOME TAX ACT

Ownership of Property (Principal Residence)

REFERENCE: Paragraph 54(g) and subsection 248(3) (also subsections 40(7), 248(22) and 248(23))

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

This document is also available for download in PDF format.

Ownership of Property (Principal Residence)

Contents

Application

Summary

Discussion and Interpretation

General (¶s 1-17)

Explanation of Changes

Application

This bulletin cancels and replaces Interpretation Bulletin IT-437, Ownership of Dwelling Property, dated September 10, 1979.

Summary

This bulletin provides guidelines for determining ownership of property for purposes of claiming a principal residence exemption. The bulletin should be read in conjunction with the current version of IT-120, Principal Residence, which fully discusses the principal residence exemption, including the types of property which qualify for that exemption.

The concepts of "beneficial ownership" and "legal ownership" as recognized under the common law jurisdictions are discussed in this bulletin. Also discussed are provisions in the Income Tax Act which particularly relate to the province of Quebec because it is a civil law jurisdiction.

The bulletin also contains comments concerning membership in a corporation or association holding residential property (including co-operative housing corporations), as well as comments regarding condominiums, agreements for sale, lease-option agreements and other related topics.

The final two paragraphs of the bulletin briefly mention rules that are relevant if the property is held by a personal trust, including a spousal trust, and refer the reader to other materials published by the Department which set out those rules.

Discussion and Interpretation

General

¶ 1. Paragraph 54(g) of the Income Tax Act, which determines whether a property is a taxpayer's "principal residence" for a particular taxation year, requires that the property be owned by the taxpayer at any time in the year. (All of the requirements, including this ownership requirement, that must be satisfied for purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption are discussed in the current version of IT-120, Principal Residence.) The Act does not define the term "owned"; however, for purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption, the ownership requirement in paragraph 54(g) is met where the taxpayer is the legal owner or the beneficial owner of the property. These terms are discussed in detail below.

¶ 2. In the common law jurisdictions, two forms of property ownership are recognized -- legal and beneficial. Normally "legal ownership" exists when title is transferred to, recorded in, registered in or otherwise carried in the name of a person. Legal owners are generally entitled to enforce their ownership rights against all other persons.

¶ 3. One person's legal ownership of a property may, however, be subject to another person's beneficial ownership of that property. The term "beneficial ownership" is used to describe the type of ownership of a person who is entitled to the use and benefit of the property whether or not that person has concurrent legal ownership. A person who has beneficial ownership rights but not legal ownership can enforce those rights against the holder of the legal title. For example, beneficial ownership frequently arises when property is held in trust for a person in circumstances where, according to the terms of the trust, that person has authority to instruct the trustee to deal with the property as requested. (Where a personal trust, including a spousal trust, is involved, see also the rules mentioned in ¶s 16 and 17 below.)

¶ 4. Beneficial ownership must be distinguished, however, from the other types of physical possession of property which a person may enjoy. For example, a tenant of a property, or a person who is allowed to occupy it only because the true owner has no objection, is not the beneficial owner of the property. In determining whether a person has beneficial ownership, one should consider such factors as the right to possession, the right to collect rents, the right to call for the mortgaging of the property, the right to transfer title by sale or by will, the obligation to repair, the obligation to pay property taxes and other relevant rights and obligations. Not all of these incidents of ownership need occur concurrently before it is concluded that the person has beneficial ownership of the property, which is a question of fact in each particular case (subject to any determination under the law regarding beneficial ownership such as, for example, in the manner described in ¶s 6, 8 or 9 below).

¶ 5. Since in most cases the same person has both legal and beneficial ownership, determining ownership on the basis of beneficial ownership alone is not often required. Comments below deal with some situations where a taxpayer is considered to own, and other situations where a taxpayer is considered not to own, a property for purposes of the principal residence exemption.

¶ 6. Because the province of Quebec is a civil law jurisdiction, not a common law jurisdiction, subsection 248(3) of the Income Tax Act provides a special set of rules for income tax purposes in relation to that province. Subsection 248(3) deems

(a) a usufruct (see ¶ 7 below);

(b) a right of use or habitation; or

(c) a substitution (see ¶ 7 below);

to be a trust. The trust is deemed to be created by will where (a), (b) or (c) was established by will. The property subject to (a), (b) or (c) is deemed to have been transferred to, and to be held in trust by, the trust. The transfer is deemed to have occurred on, and as a consequence of, the death of the testator where (a), (b) or (c) arises on the death of that person. If the property is the type of property that can otherwise qualify as a principal residence (i.e., a housing unit, leasehold interest or co-operative housing corporation shares -- see the current version of IT-120 and also ¶ 10 below), the deemed trust may be able to use the rules referred to in ¶17 below to claim the principal residence exemption to reduce or eliminate any gain that would otherwise occur (for tax purposes) as a result of a disposition of the property. Subsection 248(3) also deems any person who has a right (whether immediate or future and whether absolute or contingent) to receive all or any part of the income or the capital in respect of property subject to (a), (b) or (c) to be a person who is beneficially interested in the deemed trust. Finally, subsection 248(3) deems property in relation to which any person has, at any time,

(d) the right of ownership;

(e) a right as a lessee in an emphyteutic lease (see ¶17 below); or

(f) a right as a beneficiary in a trust (including a right as a deemed beneficiary of a deemed trust described above); to be beneficially owned by that person, whether or not the property is subject to a servitude. Thus, if a person sells his or her rights with respect to property which is subject to (a), (b), (c), (d) or (e) above and the property itself is a property that can otherwise qualify as a principal residence (i.e., a housing unit, leasehold interest or co-operative housing corporation shares), that person might be able to use the principal residence exemption to reduce or eliminate any gain that would otherwise occur (for tax purposes) as a result of that disposition of rights. In order for this to occur, of course, all the other requirements of paragraph 54(g), as described in the current version of IT-120, would have to have been met. (For example, the "ordinarily inhabited" requirement could have been satisfied by the person who sold the rights with respect to the property having inhabited the property during the relevant years.)

¶ 7. Some of the legal terms used in ¶6 above are briefly explained as follows:

An emphyteutic lease is a lease of real property for a relatively long period of time -- as of the date of issuance of this bulletin, there may be emphyteutic leases in existence in the province of Quebec with terms ranging anywhere from "more than 9 years" to 100 years in length. During the term of the emphyteutic lease, the lessee has the full benefit and enjoyment of the real property and undertakes to make improvements to the property and, generally, to pay annual rent to the owner. The current version of IT-324, Capital Cost Allowance -- Emphyteutic Lease, discusses this matter in greater detail.

Under a usufruct, the usufructuary has a right to enjoy all the benefits, advantages and profits of property that is owned by another person.

Under a substitution, a designated person, called the institute, inherits property under a will, or acquires it as a gift inter vivos, but with a directive that he or she shall pass it over to another designated person, who is called the substitute.

¶ 8. For purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption for a property, paragraph 54(g) requires that the taxpayer own the property "jointly with another person or otherwise". These words include sole ownership, joint tenancy, tenancy-in-common and co-ownership. Provincial laws relating to marital property are often relevant in determining the ownership of property for this purpose and should, therefore, be considered along with the comments in this bulletin. In the province of Quebec, the question as to whether spouses own real property "jointly with another person or otherwise" may depend upon

(a) the matrimonial property regime which applies to them (e.g., involving community of property);

(b) the family patrimony (if applicable); or

(c) the terms of their marriage contract.

It should be noted, however, that subsections 248(22) and (23) of the Income Tax Act contain provisions that can "deem" (determine) for purposes of the Act which spouse is the owner of a property at any particular time after July 13, 1990 if the property is or was the subject of a matrimonial property regime in Quebec (or another civil law jurisdiction) involving some common interest between the spouses, such as community of property. For further discussion on these provisions, see the current version of IT-325, Property Transfers After Separation, Divorce and Annulment.

¶ 9. When a taxpayer's ownership of property is in dispute or in doubt, he or she may resort to the courts for a resolution of the question. In a situation involving a marriage dissolution, for example, one spouse may request the courts to resolve the ownership of property considered to be owned by the other spouse. In such a case, where the first-mentioned spouse acquires ownership pursuant to a court order, such ownership will generally be considered to have been acquired on the effective date specified in the court order regardless of the legal basis or reasons for the order, or on such other date as is considered reasonable if no effective date is specified in the order.

¶ 10. A share in the capital stock of a co-operative housing corporation can qualify as a principal residence property provided that the share was acquired for the sole purpose of obtaining the right to inhabit a housing unit owned by the corporation and the other requirements of paragraph 54(g), as discussed in the current version of IT-120, are met. In any event, where a corporation or an association formed solely to hold residential property is really a bare trustee of the property and the terms of the trust arrangement give the beneficiary, i.e., shareholder of the corporation or member of the association,

(a) the same rights of possession and use of a particular housing unit as the beneficial owner of any housing unit would normally enjoy, and

(b) the right to require the corporation or association to deal with the housing unit (e.g., sell or mortgage it) as instructed by the shareholder or member, the shareholder or member is considered to be the beneficial owner of the housing unit. These comments do not apply to ownership of a condominium unit that usually vests in the person acquiring it. However, see ¶ 12 below concerning the time of acquisition of ownership of a condominium unit.

¶ 11. A purchaser's interest in property under an enforceable agreement for sale will, subject to ¶ 12 below, be considered to constitute ownership of the property. A purchaser's interest in a house bought under the Veterans Land Act will also be considered to be ownership of property. In these instances, the taxpayer has made a down payment and entered into an obligation to make monthly payments. When the total purchase price is paid, the taxpayer is entitled to acquire title in his or her name.

¶ 12. When acquiring a residential condominium unit, it is not unusual for a taxpayer to make a down payment, to enter into an agreement of purchase and sale, to enter into an occupancy agreement and to take possession prior to the registration of the condominium. The occupancy agreement may provide for payments which reflect the carrying costs of the condominium until the purchase transaction can be completed. Normally in such a situation, the taxpayer does not own (either beneficially or legally) the condominium unit until the condominium is registered under the relevant provincial legislation and the purchase transaction has closed.

¶ 13. A taxpayer may in some cases be considered to own, for purposes of the principal residence exemption, a housing unit situated on land not owned by the taxpayer in circumstances where, by reason of the law or according to the terms of the lease, he or she has a leasehold interest in the land. This can occur, for example, in any of the following circumstances:

(a) the taxpayer is assigned the leasehold interest in government-owned land and pays a builder to construct a house on the land,

(b) the taxpayer builds a house on leased land, or

(c) the taxpayer "purchases" (i.e., pays what amounts to a purchase price for) a house on leased land.

¶ 14. A taxpayer who occupies a housing unit under a genuine lease-option agreement is not considered to be the owner of the housing unit. On the other hand, the taxpayer is considered to be the beneficial owner of the housing unit where the agreement is a conditional sales contract. It is always a question of fact, based on the written terms of the agreement as well as the circumstances under which it is made and the manner in which it is executed, as to whether the agreement is actually a lease for the property with an option to buy or an agreement for sale. The current version of IT-233, Lease-Option Agreements; Sale-Leaseback Agreements, discusses this subject in greater detail.

¶ 15. A taxpayer acquires ownership of property by way of gift or inheritance on the date he or she obtains a right to possess the property for his or her enjoyment.

¶ 16. Where a personal trust, including a spousal trust, distributes a property to a beneficiary who subsequently disposes of the property, the beneficiary may be deemed by subsection 40(7), for the purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption, to have owned the property since the trust last acquired it. An illustration of how this provision works is contained in the current version of IT-120.

¶ 17. As indicated in ¶ 1 above, the ownership requirement for the principal residence exemption contained in paragraph 54(g) can be met by the legal owner of the property. This is so even where the legal owner, e.g., a trust, is not the beneficial owner. However, as discussed in the current version of IT-120, there are other requirements that must be satisfied for a taxpayer to be able to claim the principal residence exemption. There are special provisions in the Act which make it possible for any personal trust, including a spousal trust, to claim the principal residence exemption if it disposes of the property. For more information on these rules, see Form T1079, Designation of a Property as a Principal Residence by a Personal Trust.

Explanation of Changes

Introduction

The purpose of the Explanation of Changes is to give the reasons for the revisions to an interpretation bulletin. It outlines revisions that we have made as a result of changes to the law, as well as changes reflecting new or revised departmental interpretations.

Overview

This bulletin discusses ownership of property for purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption. We have revised the bulletin primarily:

because of changes, in S.C. 1991, c. 49 (formerly Bill C-18), to provisions in the Income Tax Act that pertain to the ownership of property in the province of Quebec; and to discontinue the discussion of ownership of property as it pertained to the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan (RHOSP) rules, which have been repealed.

The comments in the bulletin are not affected by proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act contained in Bill C-9, which received first reading in the House of Commons on February 4, 1994, or in the draft legislation released on August 30, 1993 (a Bill for this legislation will likely be introduced in the House in the current session of Parliament).

Legislative and Other Changes

New ¶ 1 (replaces old ¶ 1): The introduction in new ¶ 1 replaces the introduction found in old ¶ 1 and part of the first sentence of old ¶ 2. The old introduction indicated that the term "ownership" in the Income Tax Act should be given the meaning of "beneficial ownership". This position was particularly important in applying the RHOSP rules. In new ¶ 1, we have removed the reference to the repealed RHOSP provision and have now indicated that the ownership requirement under the principal residence rules is met where the taxpayer is the legal owner or the beneficial owner of the property. (The reference to "legal ownership" is significant when the property is held by a personal trust, as briefly mentioned later in the bulletin.)

New ¶s 2 to 5 (replace old ¶ 2): We have split up old ¶ 2 into new ¶s 2 to 5 for easier reading. These paragraphs describe and compare "legal ownership" and "beneficial ownership" as those two terms are used in common law jurisdictions. We have made some wording changes and rearranged some of the sentences for purposes of clarification only, without changing the substance of what was said in old ¶ 2.

New ¶s 6 and 7 (replace most of old ¶ 3): These paragraphs replace the major part of old ¶ 3. New ¶ 6 discusses the principal residence exemption in relation to a residence property which is subject to subsection 248(3) as amended under Bill C-18. That provision specifically governs the income tax treatment of property subject to certain types of legal relationships in the province of Quebec, which is a civil law jurisdiction. The explanations found in new ¶ 7 of three of these types of legal relationships are essentially the same as found in old ¶ 3.

New ¶ 8 (replaces old ¶s 11 and 14 and the second sentence of old ¶ 3): The first three sentences of new ¶ 8 are similar to old ¶s 11 and 14 except that they do not contain a reference to the repealed RHOSP provision and they now tie in more specifically with the principal residence rules. The fourth sentence of new ¶ 8 is similar to the second sentence of old ¶ 3. The last part of new ¶ 8 mentions provisions added to the Income Tax Act under Bill C-18 that can deem which of two spouses is the owner of certain property in Quebec and refers the reader to another bulletin which discusses these provisions in detail.

New ¶ 9 (replaces old ¶ 13): The words in the last sentence of old ¶ 13 "or on the date on which the order is made if no effective date is specified in the order" reflected an administrative position that was favourable to some taxpayers for purposes of the RHOSP rules. However, as the RHOSP legislation has been repealed and the above-mentioned administrative position could actually be unfavourable in some cases for purposes of claiming the principal residence exemption, it is replaced in new ¶ 9 with the words "or on such other date as is considered reasonable if no effective date is specified in the order".

New ¶ 10 (replaces old ¶ 4): This paragraph has been revised to more specifically tie in with the principal residence rules. Also, the comments in old ¶ 4 that were particularly relevant for the repealed RHOSP rules have not been continued in new ¶ 10.

Old ¶ 5: This paragraph is not continued in the new bulletin because the RHOSP legislation has been repealed and because the paragraph now has little, if any, relevance with respect to principal residences because of the rules mentioned in new ¶s 16 and 17 that can apply where the property is held by a personal trust.

New ¶s 11 to 14 (replace old ¶s 6 to 9): We have made some wording changes for purposes of clarification only.

Old ¶ 10: This paragraph was written specifically with regard to the repealed RHOSP provisions and is therefore not included in the new bulletin.

New ¶ 15 (replaces old ¶ 12): There have been some wording changes for purposes of clarification only.

New ¶s 16 and 17: These paragraphs briefly mention rules, enacted under Bills C-72 and C-92, that can apply for purposes of the principal residence exemption where the property has been held by a personal trust, including a spousal trust. The reader is then referred to other materials published by the Department that set out these rules.

Notice -- Bulletins do not have the force of law

Interpretation bulletins (ITs) provide Revenue Canada's technical interpretations of income tax law. Due to their technical nature, ITs are used primarily by departmental staff, tax specialists, and other individuals who have an interest in tax matters. For those readers who prefer a less technical explanation of the law, the Department offers other publications, such as tax guides and pamphlets.

While the ITs do not have the force of law, they can generally be relied upon as reflecting the Department's interpretation of the law to be applied on a consistent basis by departmental staff. In cases where an IT has not yet been revised to reflect legislative changes, readers should refer to the amended legislation and its effective date. Similarly, court decisions subsequent to the date of the IT should be considered when determining the relevancy of the comments in the IT.

An interpretation described in an IT applies as of the date the IT is published, unless otherwise specified. When there is a change in a previous interpretation and the change is beneficial to taxpayers, it is usually effective for all future assessments and reassessments. If the change is not favourable to taxpayers, it will normally be effective for the current and subsequent taxation years or for transactions entered into after the date of the IT.

A change in a departmental interpretation may also be announced in the Income Tax Technical News.

If you have any comments regarding matters discussed in this IT, please send them to:

Director, Business and Publications Division

Income Tax Rulings Directorate

Policy and Legislation Branch

Revenue Canada

Ottawa ON K1A 0L5

Changes in Use and the Deemed Disposition.

Subsection 45(1) provides disposition rules applicable where a property's use has been changed from the use which was the purpose of its acquisition, to some other use, (such as from income producing to personal use and vice versa), and thus it clearly applies where a trust has acquired a property that is to be used as a principal residence, in the common sense of the term, by one of its beneficiaries, and subsequently uses it as a rental property, or vice versa.

As per para. (a) of Sec. 45(1) where the change in use occurs the taxpayer will be deemed to have disposed of the property, (or a part thereof as computed under para. (b)), for proceeds equal to its fair market value at that time, and to have acquired it immediately after that time at a cost equal to its fair market value. Obviously this will cause deemed dispositions to occur when a beneficiary ceases to use it as a personal residence provided under a trust, (such as when a spouse commences habitation of a retirement home etc.), but only when the trust itself ceases to treat the property as a benefit to be provided under the agreement and starts to use it to produce income/gain etc.. Subsection 45(2) provides an exception to the deemed disposition which can apply where the property was acquired for personal use and then was used to produce income, (but not the other way around), if the taxpayer elects in his return for the year in which the change occurred, whereby the change will be deemed not to have occurred, except where subsequently the taxpayer rescinds his election, whereby the deemed disposition will be recognized prospectively in the year of rescission. As per Sec. 54(g)(ii) the property may be considered a principal residence while the election is effective while under para. (iv) the property will not be considered a P.R. if by virtue of subpara. (ii) the dwelling would have been his P.R. for four or more previous tax years. Thus the life of the election in Sec. 45(2) (and 45(3)) is limited to four years before its effect, vis-a-vis the P.R. exemptions, is lost. It should be noted that there is no need apparently to satisfy the other conditions described in subpara. (i)-(iii), since subpara. (i) and (ii), (iii) and (iv) operate mutually exclusively.

Under subsection 45(3), the only exception allowed, where the use of property upon its acquisition was changed from that of producing income to personal use, is extended in respect of property which becomes a principal residence of the taxpayer and only when the taxpayer notifies the Minister in writing on the earlier of 90 days after the Minister demands one or April 30 following the year in which the property is actually disposed of. Again there is a maximum time period during which the property could produce income/gain before it irreparably disqualifies itself, (four years as per Sec. 54(g)(iv)), however, Sec. 45(4) provides that such an election will not be valid where a deduction has been taken in respect of the property, after 1984 and on or before the change in use, as allowed under the regulations relating to Sec. 20(1)(a), (C.C.A.), by the taxpayer, his spouse, or a trust under which he or his spouse is a beneficiary.

Reserves on Death.

Subsection 72(1) provides that a taxpayer who has died will not be allowed to take certain income reserves in the year of death, such as those provided in Sec. 20(1)(n), 32(1), 64(1), 64(1.1) and most notably the specified capital gains reserve in Sec. 40(1)(a) as well as that in Sec. 44(1)(e)(iii), hence the testator may recognize significant increases in his terminal income regardless of whether the rights to the reserve amount become immediately enforceable by his estate or not. Both the capital gains reserve in respect of normal capital property and that adapted under Sec. 40(1.1) in respect of farm property can be rolled. Under subsection 72(2) some roll-through ability is extended to the testator where the right to receive the reserve amount is transferred or distributed on or after and as a consequence of his death to his spouse as described in Sec. 70(6)(a) or spousal trust described in Sec. 70(6)(b) however this is available only when the testator was resident in Canada at the time of death and his legal representative and transferee have jointly elected for the roll-through to apply on Form T2069 a copy of which must be filed with both the testator's normal return and the recipient's normal return for the first tax year ending after the date of death. Where the election is made any specified reserve other than the capital gains reserve, may be deducted by the testator in his terminal return and will be included in computing the transferee's income in the first tax year ending after the year of death while its character will also be maintained in that person's hands. In the case of the capital gains reserve the spouse or spousal trust will recognize the amount of reserve in its first tax year ending after the year of death and the testator will enjoy the respective reserve in the year of death, while as per paragraph (c) the spouse or spousal trust is placed in a position identical to that formerly of the testator and may claim the Sec. 40(1)(a)(iii) or Sec. 44(1)(e) reserves in the balance of the years.⁸⁶¹

The provisions do not specify any particular time limit after death within which the right must be transferred or distributed nor does it require that if transferred to the spousal trust it must vest indefeasibly in it. The subsection 70(6) character of the recipients is described but the only operative terms similar to Sec. 70(6) is that the right be transferred or distributed as a consequence of the death on or after the death. It can't be redirected through will variation though a taxpayer may have a special power of appointment over it. In the case of the capital gains reserve the note receivable substantiating the right would be considered a capital property subject to the roll-through provision in Sec. 70(6) and also eligible for Sec. 70(7) listing to untaint tainted spousal trusts. The note receivable would have an ACB equal to the FMV of the property given being equal to the taxpayer's cost but its FMV could be argued to be less depending on the prevailing interest rates applicable on the inherent risk of the instrument and the length of the deferral in payment. The fact that the testator hasn't recognized the inherent tax liabilities in the creation of the instrument's cost should not reduce it.

In the year before death a capital property is disposed of for a note to be extinguished 5 years later and the testator takes the maximum Sec. 40(1)(a) reserve possible in respect of the proceeds deferred. On his death it is rolled to a spousal trust and his executors list it as a Sec. 70(7) untainting property. The underlying property has already been transferred to the non-spousal family member/acquaintance and the note cleanses non-qualifying debt going into the spousal trust. Since the whole amount isn't receivable for another 4 years the FMV of the note may be less than its ACB and will such create a capital loss when listed? How discounted can you make a 5 year note receivable create a capital loss in the testator's hands, be used to cover non-qualifying debt being assumed by a spousal trust, and again, if you desire, have it terminate with resulting loss in the trust by being forgiven per trust deed or discretion, when the spouse dies from under the spousal trust, as you've avoided the FMV disposition on property that wasn't going to the spouse anyway? The debtor would recognize full inclusion but the trust would recognize full deduction if that were to happen: it's a question of what you want to happen.

"Reserves, etc., for year of death – Sec. 72(1)" (1) Where in a taxation year a taxpayer has died, 861. This is also the case in respect of the Sec. 20(1)(n) and section 64 reserves.

- (a) paragraph 20(1)(n) does not apply to allow, in computing the income of the taxpayer for the year from a business, the deduction of any amount as a reserve in respect of property sold in the course of the business;
- (b) no amount is deductible under subsection 32(1) as a reserve in respect of unearned commissions in computing the taxpayer's income for the year;
- (c) no amount may be claimed under subparagraph 40(1)(a)(iii), paragraph 40(1.01)(c) or subparagraph 44(1)(e)(iii) in computing any gain of the taxpayer for the year;
- (d) subsection 64(1) does not apply to allow, in computing the income of the taxpayer for the year, the deduction of any amount as a reserve in respect of the disposition of any property; and
- (e) subsection 64(1.1) does not apply to allow, in computing the income of the taxpayer for the year, the deduction of any amount as a reserve in respect of the disposition of any property.

“Election by legal representative and transferee re reserves – Sec. 72(2)”

(2) Where property of a taxpayer that is a right to receive any amount has, on or after the death of the taxpayer and as a consequence thereof, been transferred or distributed to the taxpayer's spouse or common-law partner described in paragraph 70(6)(a) or to a trust described in paragraph 70(6)(b) (in this subsection referred to as the “transferee”), if the taxpayer was resident in Canada immediately before the taxpayer's death and the taxpayer's legal representative and the transferee have executed jointly an election in respect of the property in prescribed form,

(a) any amount in respect of the property that would, but for paragraph 72(1)(a), (b), (d) or (e), as the case may be, have been deductible as a reserve in computing the taxpayer's income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died shall,

(i) notwithstanding subsection 72(1), be deducted in computing the taxpayer's income for the taxation year in which the taxpayer died,

(ii) be included in computing the transferee's income for the transferee's first taxation year ending after the death of the taxpayer, and

(iii) be deemed to be

(A) an amount that has been included in computing the transferee's income from a business for a previous year in respect of property sold in the course of the business,

(B) an amount that has been included in computing the transferee's income for a previous year as a commission in respect of an insurance contract, other than a life insurance contract,

(C) an amount that by virtue of subsection 59(1) has been included in computing the transferee's income for a preceding taxation year, or

(D) for the purposes of subsection 64(1.1), an amount that by virtue of paragraph 59(3.2)(c) has been included in computing the transferee's income for a preceding taxation year and to be an amount deducted by the transferee pursuant to paragraph 64(1.1)(a) in computing the transferee's income for the transferee's last taxation year ending before the death, as the case may be;

(b) any amount in respect of the property that could, but for paragraph 72(1)(c), have been claimed under subparagraph 40(1)(a)(iii) or 44(1)(e)(iii) in computing the amount of any gain of the taxpayer for the year shall,

- (i) notwithstanding paragraph 72(1)(c), be deemed to have been so claimed, and
 - (ii) for the purpose of computing the transferee's income for the transferee's first taxation year ending after the death of the taxpayer and any subsequent taxation year, be deemed to have been
 - (A) proceeds of the disposition of capital property disposed of by the transferee in that first taxation year, and
 - (B) the amount determined under subparagraph 40(1)(a)(i) or 44(1)(e)(i), as the case may be, in respect of the capital property referred to in clause (A); and
 - (c) notwithstanding paragraphs 72(2)(a) (b), where any property had been disposed of by the taxpayer, in computing the income of the transferee for any taxation year ending after the death of the taxpayer,
 - (i) the amount of the transferee's deduction under paragraph 20(1)(n) as a reserve in respect of the property sold in the course of business,
 - (ii) the amount of the transferee's claim under subparagraph 40(1)(a)(iii) or 44(1)(e)(iii) in respect of the disposition of the property, and
 - (iii) the amount of the transferee's deduction under section 64 as a reserve in respect of the disposition of the property
- shall be computed as if the transferee were the taxpayer who had disposed of the property and as if the property were disposed of by the transferee at the time it was disposed of by the taxpayer.

How will CRA assess a taxpayer when such a note, payable by an offspring, is rolled to a spouse directly but it must be forgiven by her, following a payment of interest by the offspring, as a condition subsequent if she is to receive a certain amount of proceeds from a spousal trust or from the estate directly? Subsection 72(2) doesn't require indefeasible vesting so the roll-over is available while since the cancellation of the debt can be described as a bequest conditional on the spouse's desire for the greater benefits Sec. 80(1)(h) should operate to prevent the debtor from recognizing an income inclusion and the spouse will recognize the balance of the reserve in her income after the note is forgiven even though no proceeds are realizable. The Sec. 40(1)(a)(iii) reserve is equal to the amount of proceeds not realizable/receivable or 1/5th of the proceeds. If the note is rolled to a spousal trust the trust must be structured so as to prevent it from being forgiven prior to the death of the spouse since such would operate as a distribution of property to a beneficiary (as a bequest). If the property is acquired by the spouse on a FMV sale and the note is the consideration on the death it can be transferred to a spousal trust to be realized subsequently and access the Sec. 72(2) reserve roll through while if the trust must forgive the debt as a condition if the spouse accepts to perform or not perform certain activities such as making of an election under the FLA Sec. 80(1)(h) will prevent the spouse from recognizing an income inclusion, the spousal trust won't be structured so as to be tainted, the reserve roll-over will be preserved so as to prevent the testator from recognizing the gain, the underlying property will have its cost bumped accordingly to its FMV, and the trust will have to recognize the balance of the reserve. Until the note is forgiven its tax cost (FMV thereof at the time of the testamentary transfer) will substantiate the Sec. 108(1)(d) tax cost of other capital interests allowing the interests acquisition by the spouse to produce less tax consequences to their disponers whereby subsequently the property can be distributed to the spouse under Sec. 107(2) allowing a cost bump if the property with less tax consequences. Spreading the migrated tax cost of a large note receivable transferred into a spousal trust around the non-spousal beneficiaries for tax-free dispositions of their interests on all-fold-back to spouse and then collapse of trust with losses in spouse's hands is an interesting premise, Thanks for the reserves.

The fact that the debt may be forgiven may materially reduce the FMV and thus proportionate tax costs of the non-spousal capital interests and if the debt is to substantiate an exclusive interest its reduced FMV may shift the debt's tax cost to substantiate interests based on other trust property and when they are purchased by the spouse and commutated the subsequent forgiving of the spousal debt will result in a tax free cost bump of the trust property realized by the spouse under Sec. 107(2)(b). Does this abuse or misuse any of the provisions of the Act and was it not structured with a bona fide purpose other than a tax motivation?

There is no provision in the Act that allows a trust to roll a reserve out to its beneficiaries on a wind-up or otherwise hence even though proceeds from a sale of property are not fully recognizable in computing income, if the underlying right/note receivable is distributed to the beneficiary the trust will not have the reserve available thus the deferral will be lost while the beneficiary will not be able to take any sort of reserve even if a Sec. 104(21) taxable capital gains designation has been made in respect of the amount and beneficiary since that provision applies only for purposes of sections 3 and 111 bypassing the Sec. 40(1)(a) reserve deduction. If the property is to be disposed of so as to distribute the proceeds as per the trust deed this aspect may represent a serious problem even if the note received by the trust can be divisible so as to be distributed to a group of beneficiaries individually. If the property is distributed out to a beneficiary on condition that he sell it and pay a tax adjusted share of the proceeds to the other beneficiaries with respect to their trust entitlements Sec. 105(1) will apply to the proceeds transferred to cause full income inclusion as benefits, even though the Sec. 40(1)(a) reserve could be available, (unless the recipients were non-resident); definitely not a tax effective strategy. It would be possible to transfer co-ownership interests in the property to the beneficiaries in satisfaction of their interests whereafter they may dispose of them as they wish to recognize the gains though given the Department's opinion in the answer to Question 55 of the 1990 Roundtable Discussions⁸⁶² the Sec. 107(2) roll-out treatment may not be gained in such an instance.

862 The Sec. 70(6.2) election cannot be made in respect of part of the property rolled to a spousal recipient.

Deductibility of Executor, Trustee, and Probate Fees.

In No. 579 v. M.N.R.⁸⁶³ the fees payable to the two groups of trustees were to be measured on two bases, a percentage of the income accruing to the trust plus a percentage of the book value of non-income producing property, and a percentage of the book value of its property and the Minister disallowed the trust from deducting that amount paid that related to the book value of the properties but did allow the deductions of that amount computed upon the income accruing. The trustees were unsuccessful in attempting to convince that their advice constituted advice of investment counsel, which was granted at the time special deduction status, (equivalent to that under Sec. 20(1)(bb) presently). R.S.W. Fordham Q.C. provided that:

"Be all this as it may, the fact remains that, strange as it may seem, the Income Tax Act contains no provision for the deduction of trustee's fees as such. In order to qualify as deductible items, compensation paid to trustees must be readily classifiable as "an outlay or expense" identifiable with the income-earning process. Unless this test is met, there can be no deduction from taxable income.

...The settlor may allow to the trustees whatever fees he pleases, of course, but their deductibility, or otherwise, from the income of the trust is quite another matter."

The reason why the "investment counsel" argument failed is because the particular trustees attempting to use it did not carry on as a principal business, the provision of investment advice, as was needed under Sec. 11(14) at that time, and would apply the same way as per present Sec. 20(1)(bb). The important note to be made is that the Minister in that case did allow the deduction of remuneration calculated upon the income accruing to the trust, even though there was not at question the issue of whether the trustees activities were directly related to and needed for the production of that income.

In A.B. Bardsley Trust v. M.N.R.⁸⁶⁴ two apparently very competent trustees instituted investment decisions, their remuneration to be based on the awarding compensation afforded trustees on the passing of accounts pursuant to The Trustee Act R.S.O., 1970 Ch. 470 (being a mix of income and book value basis). The Minister did not allow a deduction to the trust under neither Sec. 18(1)(a) nor 20(1)(bb) on the grounds that the trustee's principal business was other than the providing of investment advice, (essentially what is required under the Sec. 20(1)(bb) deduction), while J.B. Goetz, the Chairman of the Tax Review Board, quoting from No. 579 v. M.N.R. provided:

"There is much to be said for the appellant's submission that the manner in which the trustee's fees were calculated does not settle the purpose for which the fees were paid."

It is with respect to this latter point that the fees were not deductible under Sec. 18(1)(a) being that the fees were paid to the trustees, as trustees, while they were not paid to the trustees as an expense incurred to produce business or property income.⁸⁶⁵ Regardless of how effective the trustees exercised their discretion, and regardless of the amount of income earned by the trust, if it did any, there was no direct link between the realization of that income and payment of the fees. The payment of the fees had as its purpose the remuneration of trustees, not investment counsel.⁸⁶⁶

In Greenstone Estate v. M.N.R.⁸⁶⁷ an executor attempted to deduct from his estate's taxable income $12,500 in administrator's fees that he had charged the estate while the estate consisted of some income producing property. The Tax Court judge would have allowed for their deduction as per a reading of Sec. 9(1) however he didn't seem to recognize Sec. 18(1)(a) as restricting such or any of the reasoning in Bardsley Trust cited. (The expense was not deductible eventually due to vague vouchering.)

The fact that the estate/trust consists exclusively of businesses or income producing property does not warrant the deduction of administrator's fees as such. The fees are paid to administer the estate as such; they

⁸⁶³ 58 D.T.C. 734

⁸⁶⁴ 82 D.T.C. 1659 (TRB)

⁸⁶⁵ See subsequent sub-chapter on how to avoid this reasoning by altering the capacity in which the trustee receives the income.

⁸⁶⁶ See Revenue and Customs Comrs v. Peter Clay [2009] 2 All E.R. 683 CA, where the court had to consider whether to apportion the trustee, investment, bank, custodian and professional accountancy and administration fees between income and capital of a trust. One must be careful of exactly why a fee was incurred. This case is very relevant in the Cdn. context since even if a fee is generally deductible under a provision in the ITA the aspect of the trust to which it was incurred must be considered: for capital or income beneficiaries.

⁸⁶⁷ 90 D.T.C. 1001

are not paid to a taxpayer as an agent to carry on the business/attend to the property since such services are not that which the administrator has offered per se; and they certainly weren't incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income.⁸⁶⁸

868 See also Clapham's Trusts v. Belton, 37 T.C. 26, and C.I.R. v. McIntosh, 36 T.C. 334. This was certainly properly provided in The Estate Of Sholto Walmsley v. MNR, 97-1557-IT-G, whereby the Tax Court provided:

8. In so assessing the Appellant, the Minister relied, on, inter alia, the following assumptions:

a) the facts stated and admitted herein;

b) trustee fee expenses in excess of the amount allowed by the Minister were not incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from a business or property;

c) trustee fee expenses in excess of the amount allowed by the Minister were not current expenses, but were expenses that were capital in nature;

d) trustee fee expenses in excess of the amount allowed by the Minister were not expenses that were reasonable in the circumstances;

e) the trustee fees paid by the Appellant in the 1992 and 1994 taxation years were not paid to a person whose principal business is advising others as to the advisability of purchasing or selling specific shares or securities;

f) the trustee fees paid by the Appellant in the 1992 and 1994 taxation years were not paid to a person whose principal business includes the provision of services in respect of the administration or management of shares or securities.

B. ISSUE TO BE DECIDED

9. The issue is whether the Minister properly disallowed expenses for trustee fees claimed by the Appellant in the amounts of $916.00 and $69,892.00 in the 1992 and 1994 taxation years, respectively.

C. STATUTORY PROVISIONS RELIED ON

10. He relies on sections 3, 9 and 67, subsection 20(1) and paragraphs 18(1)(a), 18(1)(b) and 18(1)(h) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), as amended (the "Act").

D. GROUNDS RELIED ON AND RELIEF SOUGHT

11. He respectfully submits that the disallowed trustee fee expenses were not incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from a business or property within the meaning of paragraph 18(1)(a) of the Act but were expenses that were capital in nature within the meaning of paragraph 18(1)(b) of the Act.

12. He respectfully submits that the trustee fee expenses disallowed by the Minister were not expenses that were reasonable in the circumstances within the meaning of section 67 of the Act.

13. He respectfully submits that the trustee fees paid by the Appellant in the 1992 and 1994 taxation years were not paid to a person whose principal business is advising others as to the advisability of purchasing or selling specific shares or securities pursuant to subparagraph 20(1)(bb)(iii) of the Act.

14. He respectfully submits that the trustee fees paid by the Appellant in the 1992 and 1994 taxation years were not paid to a person whose principal business includes the provision of services in respect of the administration or management of shares or securities pursuant to subparagraph 20(1)(bb)(iv) of the Act.

Paragraphs 13 and 14 of the Reply are correct. Mark's occupation did not fall within subparagraphs 20(1)(bb)(iii) or (iv) of the Act.

[7] The Appellant called Mr. Yuile of Victoria who testified as to fees he charges for professional investment advice. Essentially he charges an annual fee based on the total value of assets administered. It is 1% of the first $250,000, ¾ of 1% of the second $250,000; ½ of 1% of the third $250,000 and ¼ of 1% thereafter. In Vancouver and in the investment advisor industry the fees generally range from 1% to 2% per annum based on the value of the financial assets administered.

[8] Mark Walmsley did not break down his services or fees among the portions spent attending to Margery Walmsley's needs, the portion spent on income matters, on capital matters or on administrative or any other matter or matters. Essentially he simply charged his fees based upon the terms of Exhibits A-1 and A-2 which are quoted on a gross basis.

[9] Mark did not give any detail respecting his fees to the auditor when he was asked for detail. As a result, the auditor calculated the fees he allowed based upon the Ontario tariff of fees allowed for executors and administrators, based upon the income of the estate and the taxable capital gains of the estate. Although Mr. Poon's calculations based upon taxable capital gains may be questionable, the Appellant did not present detailed evidence in support of an alternative method of calculating the fees related to income or other gains earned by the estate. The rationale presented by the Appellant was that the estate increased remarkably in value and therefore the fees are deductible. The failure in this rationale is that the trustee had to administer the care of Margery and administer the estate generally (and wind it up) in addition to attempting to earn income and to

Perhaps the opinion of the Tax Court in *Pappas Estate v. M.N.R.*⁸⁶⁹ will conclude the matter of the deductibility of probate/estate expenses from the estate's income, (though perhaps not). In this case the estate incurred probate fees, legal expenses ascertaining beneficiaries' entitlements, "management costs", and tax planning costs and the executors attempted to deduct all $132,000 thereof against the estate's income. The Minister denied the deduction and T.C. Judge Bonner concurred. The executors relied upon the possible deduction under Sec. 18(1)(a) but the judge held quite accurately;

"The taking of possession of the property of the deceased, the obtaining of probate and, where required, supplementary or foreign probate, the location and payment of creditors and the distribution of the property of the deceased to persons beneficially entitled are actions quite unrelated to the earning of income from a business or property. Such operations are not commercial in nature. They do not involve the generation of fees or other revenues payable to the estate and therefore are not carried on with view to earning a profit. From the standpoint of the estate such activities are a cost of distributing the worldly possessions of the deceased in accordance with his wishes."

It was also held that the Sec. 20(1)(bb) deduction in respect of investment counsel was not available since such activity was not the principal activity of the executors. The executors/estate had also incurred expenses in managing and supervising the activities of corporations the shares of which were held and were to be distributed and these as well were found not to be deductible since as per the precedent in *D.W.S. Corp. v. M.N.R.*⁸⁷⁰ "the possibility that a shareholder may receive dividends or other income arising from expenditures made by him for his company's benefit is too remote to warrant a finding that the expenditures are made to earn income." He did say, "distributing", accurately.

In *C.I.R. v. Richard's Executors*⁸⁷¹ the executors attempted to take two deductions: the cost of the taking of the inventory of the estate so as to make appropriate estate tax returns so as to secure their title to the property while also commissions paid to them to sell the property were also contended to be deductible against a deemed disposition of the estate's property. Argued to the House of Lords it was finally concluded that the costs incurred to take inventory so as to gain valid title to dispose of the inventory amounted to costs deductible under the particular taxation Act by the estate on a disposition. Such was by analogy said in respect of the securing of probate to prove the will and allow the legitimate dealing with of the estate.⁸⁷² The commissions retaining or increasing the value of the estate assets. He performed a mixture of duties, only some of which were related to earning income. But he did not give any evidence which broke down the fees he charged for activities performed in order to earn income for the estate.

869 90 D.T.C. 1646

870 68 D.T.C. 5045

871 46 T.C. 626 H.L.

872 The particular provision of the Act allowed costs incurred to protect one's title to be deductible against the proceeds of disposition when the property was disposed of but the same could be said viz-a-viz the securing of title so as to deal with the property so as to dispose of it. The ITA allows such to be deductible. On a further point regarding this see Estate Of Gordon Noik And Her Majesty The Queen, 2008TCC109, where the TCC considered the instance where an executor had to defend challenges to the wealth of the estate and attempted to deduct the legal costs. It held:

[6] The legal bill dated May 28, 2003 (see item (iv) in paragraph 4 above) was based almost exclusively on services rendered defending the Estate against Klara's claim before the hearing judge in May 2003. Gad Noik, as Executor of the Estate, settled the legal bill of May 28, 2003 by making one lump sum payment of $15,000. The aggregate legal expenses of $18,770 in dispute in this appeal comprise the following amounts paid by the Executor of the Estate:

(i) Legal bill December 19, 2002 $1,459.62

(ii) Legal bill February 25, 2003 $1,276.70

(iii) Legal bill April 28, 2003 $1,033.79

(iv) Legal bill May 28, 2003 $15,000.00

Total $18,770.11

[7] Exhibit R-3 is the T3 Trust Income Tax Return for the first fiscal period of the Estate from October 19, 2002 to May 31, 2003. Exhibit R-3 shows that the income of the Estate for that fiscal period was derived from only four sources:

Taxable capital gains	$15,365

Investment Income (Interest)	2,341

Researched, Written and Published by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm©

1988-2013

1-888-498-8062

Digitized by Google

paid to the executors were also held to be deductible, again, on the FMV disposition, notwithstanding that such were also paid to them quo executor.

There are two dispositions the ITA recognizes in any situation where the testator's property devolves to a non-spousal recipient: that under Sec. 70(5) and under section 107. While it has been held that legal title transfer fees incurred on a distribution cannot be deductible against a Sec. 70(5) deemed disposition, (since they are incurred by a party which isn't technically recognizing the Sec. 70(5) disposition), all probate/administration fees related to property that passes through a section 107 disposition/commutation should be deductible as an outlay incurred for the purpose of making the disposition as described in Sec. 40(1)(a)(1) and may create a capital loss for the estate in the instance where the Sec. 107(2) roll out applies⁸⁷³. The obtaining of probate, advertising and administration fees as described in the quote

Net Rental Income	5,960
CPP Death Benefit	2,094
Total Income	$25,760

[8] There is no evidence that any part of the aggregate legal fees in dispute ($18,770) was paid or incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from property. Those legal fees were all paid to a Toronto law firm. Any legal fees paid in connection with the disposition of the rental properties in North Bay were probably paid to a North Bay lawyer and, in any event, would have been taken into account in determining the capital gain or loss realized on the disposition of each property.

[9] There is evidence that the aggregate legal fees in dispute were paid to obtain probate of Gordon Noik's will, and to defend an action brought by his widow (Klara) for monthly payments of $1,300 under paragraph 3(e) of the will. Legal fees paid for those purposes are not ordinarily deductible in computing income. In Pappas Estate v. M.N.R., [1990] T.C.J. 601, Bonner J. considered whether certain legal fees were deductible in computing estate income and stated:

It is clear that the costs falling into the first two categories are not deductible. Indeed counsel for the Appellant conceded that the portion of the fees of the estate solicitors related to the securing of probate are not properly deductible. Paragraph 18(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act provides:

18(1) In computing the income of a taxpayer from a business or deduction shall be made in respect of

(a) an outlay or expense except to the extent that it was made or incurred by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from the business or property."

The taking of possession of the property of the deceased, the obtaining of probate and, where required, supplementary or foreign probate, the location and payment of creditors and the distribution of the property of a deceased to persons beneficially entitled are actions quite unrelated to the earning of income from a business or property. Such operations are not commercial in nature. They do not involve the generation of fees or other revenues payable to the estate and therefore are not carried on with a view to earning a profit. From the standpoint of the estate such activities are a cost of distributing the worldly possessions of the deceased in accordance with his wishes.

It's interesting that the TCJ didn't recognize that the obtaining of probate is to enable statutory disposition of the estate property under s. 107(2), even when Pappas Estate made the connection very accurately. And, argument could be further made that costs to protect the estate have direct effect on the gains to be recognized on that disposition.

873 This is further provided for in the recent case of Estate of David Currie v. Her Majesty the Queen, 2004TCC125, where the TCC refused to allow such as outlay or expense though only for lack of proper documentation with:

[9] The remaining issue is whether legal fees in the amounts of $2,620.91, $458, and $1,633.56 as well as the balance of the administrator's fees have been properly established as expenses incurred on the disposition of the land. The provisions of subsection 40(1) provide that any outlay or expense, including items such as legal or accounting fees, incurred for the purpose of making the disposition of a property may be added to the adjusted cost base of the property in calculating the amount of the capital gain, capital loss, terminal loss or business investment loss, as the case may be, arising from the disposition. Counsel for the Minister quite properly noted that the circumstances in this case necessitated that a second administration of David Currie's estate had to be undertaken and that was the reason why Salmon was appointed administrator and a portion of the legal fees must have been incurred in this context. There is no evidence before the Court from which one could reasonably determine the extent to which the expenses related to the in Pappas are all incurred to convey the property to the beneficiaries (prove the will, satisfy the creditors and maintain the property) and without them the property may not have been capable of being transferred in the form it is. Probate has as its purpose the proving of a document that provides how property is to be disposed of by technically both the testator and his estate and if it is not proven the latter disposition, (from the estate to the beneficiary recognized separately under the ITA), may be invalidated/ineffective or not made at all.⁸⁷⁴ In the absence of a will the intestate laws will become applicable to effect dispositions to alternate parties. The purpose for which the fees are incurred is to distribute the property to the beneficiaries under section 107 or to solidify the executor's title so as to allow for the dealing with the estate property and its disposition exactly within the Richard's Executors context.⁸⁷⁵

The same could be said about fees paid to tax counsel for tax minimization planning involving which beneficiary receives what property, and if the will is of the character, the magnitude of the benefit. In Pappas the tax minimization fees were partially related to the conveyance of the testator's property but in fact fees paid to wind down the corporations and tax planning being the reason could be argued to be related to the distribution of the assets and their preparation for distribution if the property/shares were not to be held but conveyed as specific bequests. When the estate is to be held on residuary trust the tax minimization fees leading to the disposition of the property/winding up of the corporation should be deductible as ordinary under Sec. 40(1)(a).

In respect of probate, administration, trustees' and executors', and investing fees incurred in respect of a residuary trust that are or are not directly related to delivering legal title to the beneficiaries one could still argue that the reason for which that were incurred were to effect a testamentary disposition of property regardless of how long the trust existed. If the estate is for conversion could it be argued that probate fees were incurred to prove that direction and thus as a cost of disposing of the property?⁸⁷⁶

If the expenses are deducted against a tax free roll-out the estate will recognize a capital loss on the distribution and to utilize it either the estate must have capital gains that will be taxed or Sec. 164(6) may be utilized in limited situations to carry back the nominal loss to the testator. Fees related to the assenting to the disposition of personal use property or any property for that matter should be deductible against the tax free roll-over of that property.

If the Sec. 70(6) roll over in respect of spousal trusts is attempted unfortunately there will not be the second disposition against which the fees may be deducted: subsection 70(6) sets up the receipt by the spouse and the disposition by the testator as one disposition. This would make a spousal roll over an obvious deterrent to the deduction of fees allocated to particular property transferred to a spousal recipient. Whether or not fees related to the roll over or recognition of rights or things under Sec. 70(2)-(3) are deductible against a section 107 distribution depends on whether or not section 107 can even apply to the receipt of the right or thing. Rights or things recognized by the testator under Sec. 70(2) arguably become estate capital and when acquisition and the taking possession of the property of David Currie, the obtaining of letters of administration, the distribution of the assets to the legal heirs, etc. While some of the expenditures incurred might properly come within the purview of subsection 40(1) of the Act, the evidence before the Court falls far short of providing the information necessary to enable the Court to determine which expenses or a portion thereof fall within the context of that subsection. Absent such evidence, the Appellant's claim with respect to these expenses must be dismissed.

874 In C.I.R. v. Richard's Exors. it was provided by Lord Upton:

"My Lords. as everyone knows, on every death, in order to obtain confirmation in Scotland or probate in England, the personal representatives of the deceased have to present an Inland Revenue affidavit in the proper form which sets out the value of the estate, and this, together with a remittance of the estate duty thereby found to be due, has to be sent to the Estate Duty Office. When that has been done and accepted then confirmation or probate follows, and only then have the executors legal power to deal with the estate, where proof of title is required, sell assets, assent to the vesting of property and so on."

In Richard's Exors. there had to be dealt with the very contentious issue of whether the inventory valuations, investigations, etc. which had to be made in order that estate duty be paid so that probate could be obtained were incurred "wholly and exclusively" to establish, preserve and defend the executors' title. Even in that case the purpose of the sustaining of the expenses was to obtain probate ... and probating a will validates a disposition and allows for it.

875 Pursuant to C.I.R. v. Chubb's Exors., 47 T.C. 353, costs incurred to vary a settlement which gives rise to a deemed disposition on a distribution of property to a beneficiary will be deductible against the deemed proceeds of the disposition.

876 Definitely as per the House of Lords in Richard's Exors..

distributed should fall under section 107 and can thus create a disposition against which the related fees may be deducted. Rights rolled through under Sec. 70(3) do not give rise to a disposition at any point and thus expenses related to such will not be deductible against a notional or real disposition since neither is recognized under the Act. In such a case, if they are to have any tax effect, the will should be written to require the beneficiary to satisfy them themselves: that way they become an expenditure described in Sec. 69(1.1)(b).

Effect on Trust Law Income Filters Through, in Splintering

The ITA does not restrict the settlor/testator's ability to provide that the above fees be deducted by the trustees at computing trust law income payable thus if they reduce the trust law income payable they will also reduce the tax law income recognized as payable under Sec., 104(24)-(13). However, this merely shifts the revenue recognition from in the beneficiaries' hands into that of the trust's. Taken to the extreme, if investment/repair/trustee fees totally eliminate the amount of trust law income payable to the spouse so that she cannot receive any income from the trust how much tax law income recognized by the trust will be payable to her? Actually as per the commentary on reconciliations between tax law and trust law income payable described in a following chapter the inherent taxable amount of the revenue will be recognized by her if the revenue is receivable at trust law by her, however she will simply not benefit from a reduced taxable element due to the non-deductibility of the expenses. Since she will, at trust law, be entitled to less revenue, (due to the real payment of the expenses), she will also be required to recognize a lesser absolute amount of taxable element in respect that revenue amount. Thus although the deductions are not available under Division B directly they will filter their way in to cause a reduced Sec. 104(13) recognition.⁸⁷⁷ Whether or not the trust will have to continue to recognize the income that is payable/paid to the trustee is debatably as per the following. The exact same can be said about non-spousal trusts: by taking a trust law based deduction of trustee fees the actual income that becomes payable is also reduced leading to a reduced Sec. 104(6)-(13) flow-through of that income in the beneficiary's hands.

Depending on whether the trustee or executor recognizes the income from an office/employment or from a business is critical when it is expected that it will incur expenses on its personal behalf in executing the function. In Q. 39 of the 1979 Roundtables the Department opined that legal fees incurred by an executor who holds an office rather than carries on the activity as a business would not be deductible against his office income however it provided "It would seem that if the advice aids the estate as well as the executor then the expense might be charged to the estate", and if it wasn't, and it was incurred exclusively with respect to the executor's performing of his functions he should have rights of indemnity to collect the amount from the estate. Whether or not he can also collect a reimbursement for the tax the lack of deductibility causes is an interesting question.

Trustee Income and the Alteration in Character of Trust Income Payable to "Beneficiaries".

If the trustee is made an income beneficiary with his nominal entitlement based on the amount of income earned by the trust is a Sec. 104(6) deduction available to the trust?⁸⁷⁸ In what capacity is the taxpayer receiving the income payment; by virtue of a gift charged with an ongoing condition or as remuneration for the office of the trustee?

In *Baxendale v. Murphy*⁸⁷⁹, *Hearn v. Morgan*⁸⁸⁰, & *Clapham's Trustees v. Belton*⁸⁸¹ it was held that income received by trustees conditional on their performance of trustees' duties was received as essentially a beneficiary though the opposite conclusion was reached in *Dale v. I.R.C.*⁸⁸² in a similar situation.⁸⁸³ In that case the executors suggested that they realized the income from the office of the executorship as "earned income and not investment income having as its source an annuity or bequest as the tax authorities contended.

⁸⁷⁷ See Nelson v. Adamson, 24 T.C. 36.

⁸⁷⁸. See In the Will of Oddie, 1976 1 N.S.W.L.R. 371, Re: Ross, 1976 3 W.W.R. 465, Re: Wolff, 1960 32 W.W.R. 550, & Re: Lendrum, 1915 9 W.W.R. 245, for general remuneration issues.

⁸⁷⁹ 9 T.C. 76

⁸⁸⁰ 26 T.C. 478

⁸⁸¹ 37 T.C. 26 (CA)

⁸⁸² 34 T.C. 468 (HL)

⁸⁸³ See also White v. Franklin, 42 T.C. 283 (CA), Re: Thurley, 1891 2 Ch. 613, Re: Pooley, 40 Ch. D. 1, Re: White, 1898 2 Ch. 217, Jones v. Wright, 13 T.C. 221, O'Reilly v. Casey, 1942 I.R. 378.

The will provided that £1000 was to be paid to each such trustee as long as he performed the office and finally decided in the House of Lords Lord Normand held:

"I think there is confusion here between the source of the payment, which is the testator's bounty as expressed in his will, and the quality of the payment as earned or not earned. There need be no incompatibility in saying that the income is the conditional gift of the testator but that it has to be earned by compliance with the testator's condition of serving as a trustee.

I would observe more generally that the question whether income is earned or not is a question which arises between the trustee and the Inland Revenue, and it has no relation either to the legal duty which a trustee owes to the trust and the beneficiaries, or to the legal conception that such a payment as that under consideration derives from a testator and can be regarded as a legacy. The source of the sum and its character as a receipt in the hands of the trustee are two separate and unconnected things."

In *Capital Trust Corp. Ltd. v. M.N.R.*⁸⁸⁴ the Supreme Court of Canada provided that the test to determine whether a payment to an executor, contingent on him functioning as an executor, is a bequest or a payment for services is to determine whether the entitlement of the taxpayer can be enforced if he refuses to act as executor.⁸⁸⁵ This was also endorsed in *Buckley v. M.N.R.*⁸⁸⁶. In both cases the payment contingent on them functioning as executors was found to be for services and not as a testamentary gift.⁸⁸⁷ In Capital Trust Corporation the issue of litigation was whether the income had the character of that received from an office which it does as can be readily admitted but the structure of the Income Tax Act provisions in that case concerned with were not of the character existing presently and at that time the receipt could either be one or the other.⁸⁸⁸

⁸⁸⁴ 1 D.T.C. 312-4 (SCC)

⁸⁸⁵ In that case the reasoning was also based with a view to the fact that the testator had recognized that by appointing additional executors the particular executor's remuneration would decrease thus the need to make that additional to what the Surrogate Judge would prescribe.

⁸⁸⁶ 61 D.T.C. 476

⁸⁸⁷ See also Widdifield on Exors. Accounts, 5th Ed. pg. 311-316 for comparisons of remuneration cases. Enormous importance seems to be placed on the wording of the expressions made in the will as reflecting the testator's intentions. This was expressly considered in Capital Trust Corp., Dale v. I.R.C., and Clapham's Trustees v. Belton, though the phrasing in the latter, treated as containing an element of benevolence, when the recipient was to act expressly "as agent". See also Goldman v. Minister of National Revenue, [1953] 1 S.C.R. 211 for some incidental material on determination of via gift or service for acting for committees.

⁸⁸⁸ See also Goldman v. Minister of National Revenue, [1953] 1 S.C.R. 211 for some issues of how remuneration from office vs. gift were evaluated from the stand-points of the parties (payor/payee) looking to substantial jurisprudence though heard only at the Exchequer Court level. See also Jean-Claude Messier v. The Queen, 2007-3624(IT) for a similar situation in the Quebec environment where the testator knit the office of executor to the gift. The Tax Court held:

[6] In the case at bar, the question that arises is whether the amount of $15,000 that each of the Appellants received constitutes remuneration for the performance of the duties of their office (a remunerative legacy) or, rather, a particular legacy (a mere liberality) in which case the amount received would not be taxable because it would not be income from an office within the meaning of section 5 of the ITA.

[7] The best guidance in drawing this distinction is the testator's intent, as expressed in the provision of the will. Here is what one author has stated on the subject:

[TRANSLATION]

How does one distinguish between a remunerative legacy and a mere liberality contained in a particular legacy? The testator's intent, as expressed in the provision of the will, remains the best guide, and it is only if the terms are worded carefully and precisely that this intent can be understood clearly.^[56] [1]

56. M. Roy, "Chronique testamentaire – La rémunération de l'exécuteur testamentaire" (1983) 5 R.P.F.S. 206-207.

[8] Another author writes:

[TRANSLATION]

Consequently, in interpreting the provisions of the will as a whole, a certain amount of caution must be exercised with respect to the compensation of testamentary executors. The testator's intent is very important in this regard, and it is only through careful drafting that this intent will emerge clearly from the terms used in a will that provides for such remuneration.

For example, a specific legacy of $1,000 to an executor cannot be considered remuneration if the provisions of the will as a whole do not appear to refer to the executor's office. Rather, one would have to conclude that the legacy in question was merely a particular legacy that stems from a truly gratuitous intent to give. The situation is different if the will provides that the executor is entitled to a fee of $1,000 for work done as an executor. Even if the amount is not characterized as a fee, the fact that the testator intended to condition the payment upon acceptance of the office of executor would show that gratuitous intent was wholly lacking.

. . . . the provision of the will remains the sole writing capable of distinguishing between a remunerative legacy and mere liberality expressed in the form of a particular legacy. . . [2]

[9] In the instant case, the two Appellants are among 15 universal legatees of the succession of Raoul Messier. The will also provides for a whole series of particular legacies to nieces and nephews by marriage, and to various public institutions.

[10] In Article V of the will (Exhibit A-4), the two Appellants are designated liquidators of the succession. Article V reads:

[TRANSLATION]

ARTICLE V
LIQUIDATOR

1. DESIGNATION

I designate the said Jean-Claude and Pierre MESSIER as liquidators of my succession, and, if one of them should die, refuse to act or become legally incapable of acting, the remaining liquidator may act alone.

Should it be impossible to replace my liquidator as stated hereinabove, my legatees, by majority vote, shall make such replacement by notarial deed en minute, provided that they have all attained the age at which they may take their share and that none of them has been declared incapable; otherwise, the court may, upon an application by an interested party, appoint a liquidator.

2. RESIGNATION

My liquidator may, at any time, even after liquidation has begun, resign his office providing he renders an account of his administration, and such resignation is evidenced by notarial deed en minute. The cost of rendering account shall be borne by the succession.

3. LIQUIDATOR'S REMUNERATION

For the services to be rendered to my succession, whether in liquidating my succession or in administering the whole or part of the property thereof, my liquidator shall, upon submission of supporting documents, be entitled to the reimbursement of his expenses, travelling costs and loss of salary.

Each of my liquidators shall receive, for fulfilling the duties of his office, a legacy in the amount of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000), which may be collected from the succession capital.

4. PARTITION

My liquidator shall have the full power to carry out the partition of my succession whether in money or in kind.

He may carry out the composition, evaluation and allotment of shares alone and under the terms and conditions that he deems fair and reasonable.

Notwithstanding what is stipulated in my said Will, my liquidator may, as required to ensure the proper administration of my succession, defer the partition of the succession property in whole or in part.

5. ALIENATION

My liquidator may, alone, alienate by onerous title all my movable and immovable property, encumber it with real rights or change its destination, and perform all acts which are necessary or useful, including all manner of investments.

However, he shall not alienate property bequeathed as a particular legacy to a legatee of full age who is fully capable, but shall execute the delivery of such legacy as soon as conveniently possible, subject to the provisions pertaining to the reduction of particular legacies.

6. FULL ADMINISTRATION

My liquidator shall be charged with the full administration of the property of my succession.

7. RELEASE

My liquidator may grant releases with or without consideration.

8. LEGATEES WHO ARE NOT YET OF REQUISITE AGE OR ARE INCAPABLE OR UNDER PROTECTIVE SUPERVISION

My liquidator shall have the administration of all the property bequeathed herein to legatees who are not yet of requisite age, or are incapable or under protective supervision.

He shall deliver to each legatee their respective share at the time that they have attained the age of majority or when such incapacity has ceased. In the interval, my liquidator shall administer each of my said legatee's shares and may use the income or even encroach on the capital, if necessary, for such legatee's maintenance, support, education or other needs.

Until final delivery of each of my legatees' shares, my liquidator shall act as administrator charged with the full administration of the property of others.

However, my liquidator may terminate his administration in respect of a legatee who is under protective supervision, or is incapable and has a homologated mandate in the event of incapacity, by effecting remittance and rendering accounts to the legatee's tutor, curator or mandatary.

[11] Paragraph 3 of Article V specifically provides for the liquidator's remuneration. The liquidator is entitled not only to be reimbursed for his services to the succession, but also, to $15,000 in compensation for fulfilling the duties of his office.

[12] The Appellants submit that since the will states that the amount is [TRANSLATION] "a legacy", it does not constitute remuneration, but, rather, a particular legacy or a mere liberality. In my opinion, the Appellants' position does not reflect the testator's intent. The particular legacies are specifically set out in Article III of the will (Exhibit A-4).

[13] The amount of $15,000 allotted to each Appellant is referred to in Article V under the heading "Liquidator's Remuneration". In addition, the testator clearly states that [TRANSLATION] "[e]ach of my liquidators shall receive, for fulfilling the duties of his office, a legacy in the amount of fifteen thousand dollars ($15,000). [Emphasis added.]

[14] Moreover, Marielle Gagné, the notary who drafted this will, acknowledged in her testimony that the Appellants would not have been entitled to this amount if they had renounced the duties of their office. It is true that she testified that, in her view, the testator, Raoul Messier, was very grateful to his two nephews (the Appellants) and that he probably wanted to give them an additional gift. She also said that if the Appellants had renounced their responsibilities as liquidators, the other legatees would undoubtedly have agreed to give each of them $15,000.

[15] In my opinion, these last comments made by Ms. Gagné are mere assumptions, and do not reflect what is set out in the will.

[16] Ms. Gagné said that she usually employs different terminology where the testator wishes to remunerate the liquidator. She gave the following examples (Exhibit A-3):

[TRANSLATION]

For the services rendered to my succession by my liquidator, whether in liquidating my succession or in administering the whole or part of the property thereof, my liquidator shall be entitled, in addition to the reimbursement of his expenses, travelling costs and loss of salary, to a remuneration of _____ dollars ($).

As a token of my gratitude for the services to be rendered to my succession, whether in liquidating my succession or in administering the whole or part of the property thereof, my liquidator shall be entitled, in addition to the reimbursement of his expenses, travelling costs and loss of salary, to the sum of ____ hundred dollars ($ ____), which shall be indexed according to the inflation rate as established by Statistics Canada, the reference year being 2008.

Any person, other than my spouse, who acts as liquidator, shall receive the sum of _____ for fulfilling the duties of his office. Should there be more than one executor, the said amount shall be shared equally by them.

My liquidator shall not be remunerated for the services to be rendered to my succession, whether in liquidating my succession or in administering the whole or part of the property thereof; however, he shall be entitled to the reimbursement of his expenses, travelling costs and loss of salary.

[17] A reference was also made to the will of Albertine Messier, Raoul Messier's sister, which was also prepared by Ms. Gagné. Under the heading [TRANSLATION] "Liquidator's Remuneration", the following is stated:

3. LIQUIDATOR'S REMUNERATION

For the services to be rendered to my succession, whether in liquidating my succession or in administering the whole or part of the property thereof, my liquidator shall, upon submission of supporting documents, be entitled to the reimbursement of his expenses, travelling costs and loss of salary.

If the said Jean-Claude and Pierre Messier act as liquidators, they shall receive, for fulfilling the duties of their office, a legacy in the amount of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) each, which may be collected from the succession capital.

...

[18] Albertine Messier died in 1999, and the Appellants each received $10,000 under the above provision of the will. The Minister later reassessed the Appellants on the same basis as the instant matter, but, at the objection stage, the Minister ultimately agreed to consider the amount as a legacy (Exhibit A-1, Document F).

[19] The Minister is not bound by a previous decision of one of its officials, if that decision was erroneous. (For example, see Brenda G. Klassen v. The Queen, 2007 FCA 339, at paragraph 27.)

[20] In my opinion, Ms. Gagné's testimony cannot serve to put a different gloss on a testamentary provision which in my view speaks for itself. On the one hand, Ms. Gagné says that Raoul Messier's intent was to make a particular legacy, and that, if this had not been the case, she would have drafted differently the clause by which $15,000 is bequeathed to each of the Appellants.

[21] At the same time, she acknowledges that if the Appellants had refused to act as liquidators, they would not have been entitled to $15,000 each under the will. The other legatees' consent would have been required in such an event.

[22] Thus, Ms. Gagné implicitly acknowledges that the amount of $15,000 was bequeathed to each Appellant for fulfilling the duties of their office, which is what is clearly stated in the will. Unlike remuneration for the fulfilment of the duties of an office, a particular legacy does not entail any obligation or responsibility for a legatee.

[23] In my view, the will is clear enough in stating that the testator bequeaths $15,000 to each of the Appellants for their services to the succession, despite the use of the words [TRANSLATION] "a legacy", which follow the reference, at paragraph 3 of Article V of the will, to the fulfilment of the duties of their office.

[24] Given the way in which the will is drafted, I find that the amount of $15,000 received by each Appellant during the 2005 taxation year constitutes income from an office, which is taxable under the terms of paragraph 3(a), section 5, and the definition of "office" in section 248 of the ITA.

While see also Guy Boisvert v. The Queen, 2009-2005(IT)G, whereby the fact that the "fee"/inheritance was exceptionally large in relation to the effort extended allowed the Tax Court to consider with:

[16] Here, the appellant maintains that the legacy is inadequately described as, in reality, it was not a remunerative legacy but merely a particular legacy subject to some conditions that were not very onerous.

[17] The main argument in support of his claims is the fact that the value of what was received by way of the legacy, that is, the amount of the remuneration, is disproportionately higher than the value of the work performed and services rendered. It was even suggested that a reasonable consideration might have been around $15,000, whereas it was determined to be almost $70,000.

[18] The appellant's argument is certainly interesting, but, on the one hand, it is definitely not sufficient to allow the Court to find in his favour, and, on the other hand, it implies that the Court should disregard or brush aside the content of several clear and precise documents that are both relevant and significant with respect to the appellant's argument.

[19] Indeed, to begin with, the will, an authentic deed prepared by a notary, sets out and states in a precise and clear manner the nature and quality of the bequest to the appellant. Not only did the appellant expressly agree to the terms and conditions of the legacy, but he also actually performed the tasks and assumed the responsibilities that were his and which resulted from the office he had accepted.

[20] In hindsight, now that his obligations have been fulfilled, it is easy to argue that the consideration was substantially greater than the value of the services rendered. However, given the significant assets, it is equally easy to imagine the numerous potential problems that liquidating the estate could have involved.

[21] The testator, in his wisdom, being advised by a legal practitioner, set out and stated his wishes. His ability to pay enabled him to express his gratitude through generosity.

[22] It is not for the appellant to question the will of the deceased or to cast doubt in particular on the following documents:

- the authentic will bearing the Minister's number 13 663, signed before the notary Richard Doucet on September 3, 2004;
- the notarized estate inventory bearing the Minister's number 14 619, signed by the appellant before the notary Richard Doucet on October 16, 2006;
- the declaration of transmission signed by the appellant personally and as liquidator on November 23, 2007;
- the accounting in November 2008;
- the professional services contract signed by the appellant on May 18, 2006.

[23] As for the will, it has the merit of being based essentially on documents prepared by a legal practitioner with the knowledge and experience needed to express the testator's last wishes.

So, can you describe your trustee as a beneficiary and have the Sec. 104(6)-(13) mechanics apply on the flow-through of the recognition of the income? And if not, where is the line?

If there is a line somewhere, can you not shift it by changing hats and having the trustee act as an employee of the trust for high employment salary coupled with low trustee fee?⁸⁸⁹

Subsection 105(1) prevents any income from being included in any taxpayer's income as essentially income from a trust interest if it was included in computing the particular taxpayer's income under any provision in the Act not merely those described in subdivision K. Subsection 104(13) requires that a beneficiary recognize in his income the income of the trust that is payable or paid to him ... and it does not then state that such will not include that which was included under any other provision in the Act in computing his income. While the legislators felt compelled to ensure that Sec. 105(1) did not lead to a double inclusion they did not feel so with respect to the Sec. 104(13) inclusion by virtue of their lack of preparation for it hence it is possible to suffer a double income inclusion if the trustee is made a beneficiary under the trust entitled to income: the quality of the receipt in the trustee's hands does not detract from the fact that it was a payment of the trust's income to him quo beneficiary. Subsection 104(6)(b) offers to the trust a deduction in respect of the income that became payable to a beneficiary in its tax year and there is no qualification placed on the type of inclusion the payment must have caused in respect of the beneficiary though there is if it was expended to maintain a property. The fact that the trustee-beneficiary recognizes the payment as from an office or employment by virtue of other provisions in the Act does not prevent his status from being a beneficiary or the taking of the Sec. 104(6)(b) deduction since the quality of the payment must not be confused with its source and it is the source (the trust's income) that is of concern exclusively in Sec. 104(6).⁸⁹⁰

[24] Up to that point, the appellant had had no input. However, on the opening of the succession, the appellant could have renounced his legacy and thereby avoided all the consequences inherent in that legacy. Instead, he clearly accepted it willingly and, as a result, did all that was necessary to liquidate the estate and to be entitled to the remuneration stipulated.

[25] The two liquidators, one of whom was the appellant, went through the many steps in the liquidation process leading up to the settlement.

[26] According to a letter sent to the notary, everything proceeded normally and to the heirs' satisfaction.

[27] The testator had high regard and also a great deal of respect for the appellant and a colleague, who acted as co-liquidators. The responsibility he asked them to take on was significant and the context was special as well: the legatees were brothers, sisters, nieces and nephews and the amount to be shared was substantial.

[28] Given the estate assets, which exceeded $2 million, the remunerative legacy was not unreasonable. It was a reasonable consideration, especially if the testator had assumed that the legacy would be taxable. Of course, this is conjecture, but I reiterate that the will was prepared by a notary.

[29] The characterization of income is not based on its amount, but rather on its source: no formula or recipe exists for determining the reasonableness of remuneration, which is very often a function of an infinite number of particularities.

[30] In this case, the size of the estate to be settled, the estate's ability to pay, the testator's generosity and the kind of relationship that existed between the appellant and the deceased are all factors that reflect a reality that the appellant would like to depict differently. The appellant's arguments are not very convincing; they are rather feeble and have no legal basis, as they are founded essentially on what he defines as reasonableness, a subjective concept interpreted by a person strongly motivated by self-interest.

[31] In addition, the words used are not such as to create confusion. In a situation where a party dies after consulting a specialist to help that party formulate the party's last wishes with regard to its assets, it is foolhardy for the appellant to hypothesize, especially since his criticisms of the documents are essentially based on arguments whose basis is rather weak and certainly not very convincing.

