Here, the terms attaching to McCutcheon's shares do not give him that right. Instead, he is given the right to continue to receive dividends so long as the company cannot pay him. The articles relating to the shares held by SYH contain a similar provision. In addition, Article 4.3(b), respecting the retraction of the shares, indicates that if the directors have acted in good faith in making a determination that the number of shares the corporation is permitted to redeem is zero, then the corporation is not liable in the event this determination proves inaccurate. This would hardly be the position vis à vis an ordinary creditor.

4) Article 8 and a similar provision in the articles relating to the shares held by SYH provide that upon a sale of all or a substantial part of the company's undertaking, the preferred shareholders have a right to receive notice of and to be present at the meeting called to consider this sale. The farmers in East Chilliwack do not appear to have had any similar right.

5) Article 7 provides that in the event of a liquidation, dissolution or winding-up of the Corporation the preferred shareholders have a right to receive $25 per Series B Senior Preferred Share before the corporation pays any money or distributes assets to shareholders in any class subordinate or junior to the Series B Senior Preferred Shares. Similarly, SYH, as the holder of Series A and B Junior Preferred shares has the right, upon the dissolution or winding up of the corporation, to receive a sum equivalent to the redemption amount for each series junior preferred share. This right is subject to the rights of shares ranking in priority to the shares of these series, but is ahead of the rights of the holders of common shares.

Nothing in the articles concerning the retraction date affects the right of McCucheon and SYH to participate in Central Capital's liquidation. The participation of the farmer in East Chilliwack ceased once he had given notice to redeem. Article 4.4 of Central Capital provides that once the shares have been tendered for retraction this election is irrevocable on the part of the holder. In the event that payment of the retraction price was not made, however, the holder had the right to have all deposited share certificates returned. Central Capital offered to return McCutcheon's shares to him, but he refused. Because McCutcheon retained all the rights and privileges of a preferred shareholder after the retraction date, the fact that he refused to take back his share certificates cannot alter the true nature of the relationship. The refusal was merely evidence of a dispute concerning what the relationship was. SYH also retained its full status as a shareholder until the date of the reorganization. This was not the situation in East Chilliwack.

By way of summary, on the date of the reorganization McCutcheon and SYH had not ceased to be preferred shareholders of Central Capital. The rights attaching to their retractable preferred shares entitled them to continue to share in the profits of the company when these were declared as dividends, to vote at shareholders meetings to elect directors so long as dividends remained unpaid for a specified period of time, and, on a winding up of the company, to participate in the distribution of assets that remained after the creditors were paid according to the ranking of the series of their shares. The company's obligation to redeem its shares was not absolute. Instead, the articles provided for what was realistically a "best efforts" buy-back based on solvency and continuation as a shareholder to the extent a buy-back could not take place. In East Chilliwack, because the farmer ceased to be a shareholder, the articles do not appear to make any provision for continued participation or for the postponement of payment depending on the solvency of the co-op.

c) Evidence of a debtor-creditor relationship is lacking in the articles.

Digitized by Google

Looked at another way, after the retraction date and at the time of the reorganization, the common features of a debtor-creditor relationship are not in evidence in Central Capital's articles. The agreements between the parties contain no express provision that the redemption of the shares is in repayment of a loan. The corporation was not obliged to create any fund or debt instrument to ensure that it could redeem the shares on the retraction date. There is no indemnity in the event that the money is not repaid on the retraction date. There is no provision for the payment of any interest after the retraction date in the event that the money is not repaid on the retraction date. There is no provision that after the retraction date and in the event of insolvency, the appellants would have the right to have the company wound up. (See R. v. Imperial General Properties Ltd., 1985 CanLII 7 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 288 for a case where the articles of the company contained this right.) There is no provision that upon a winding up or insolvency the parties are entitled to rank pari passu with the creditors as was the case in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, supra.

d) The effect of the reorganization

Finlayson J.A. is of the view that it is immaterial that the articles provide, in the event of the liquidation, dissolution or winding-up of the company, that the appellants are only entitled to rank after the creditors but ahead of the junior ranking shareholders. In his view, this provision is irrelevant because we are not dealing with a liquidation but with a reorganization. He finds it significant that, like debtors, the preferred shareholders are not entitled to participate in any surplus once they have been paid. I am of the view that this provision in the articles is significant. It represents a clear indication that the holders of the retractable shares were not to be dealt with on the same footing as ordinary creditors even after the retraction date. Instead, they were to be dealt with as shareholders, albeit an elevated class. Under the CBCA all shares carry equal rights. Words used in the articles to differentiate a class of shares are nothing more than authorized deviations from this statutory position of equality: Welling, supra, at p.683.

The appellants submit that a winding-up or liquidation is not the same as a reorganization. This is true. Both, however, are methods of dealing with insolvency. Both are methods for secured creditors to enforce their claims by seizing the assets in which they hold security interests. If the value of the corporation as a going concern exceeds the liquidation value of the assets, it is in the interest of all the debt holders that the corporation be preserved as a going concern. The purpose of both a liquidation and a reorganization is to permit the rehabilitation of the insolvent person unfettered by debt: Vachon v. Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, 1985 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 417. By virtue of s. 20 of the CCAA, arrangements under the Act mesh with the reorganization provisions of the CBCA so as to affect the company's relations with its shareholders. Shareholders have no right to dissent to a reorganization: s. 191(7), CBCA. On a reorganization, among other things, the articles may be amended to alter or remove rights and privileges attaching to a class of shares and to create new classes of shares: s. 173, CBCA. These statutory provisions provide a clear indication that, on a reorganization, the interests of all shareholders, including shareholders with a right of redemption, are subordinated to the interests of the creditors. Where the debts exceed the assets of the company, a sound commercial result militates in favour of resolving this problem in a manner that allows creditors to obtain repayment of their debt in the manner which is most advantageous to them.

The similarities between a liquidation and a reorganization, together with the express statement in the articles of Central Capital with respect to what is to happen on a winding-up, dictate that the interests of the holders of retractable shares, McCutcheon and SYH, are subordinated to the creditors and they are not entitled to claim under the CCAA equally with the creditors. This position is also consistent with the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Winding-Up Act. In the case of an insolvency where the debts to creditors clearly exceed the assets of the company, the policy of federal insolvency legislation appears to be clear that shareholders do not have the right to look to the assets of the corporation until the creditors have been paid.

Dividends

Although dividends were payable on the shares of McCutchon and SYH, no dividends were in fact declared. The appellants contend that the dividends, which have accrued but which were not declared, are a debt or liability because they were stipulated to be part of the retraction price.

Article 7 of Central Capital respecting McCutcheon's shares states that in the event of a liquidation, dissolution or winding up of the corporation, the shareholders are entitled to receive not only the $25 per Series B preferred share, but "all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon, whether or not declared ... before any amount is paid by the Corporation or any assets of the Corporation are distributed to the holders of any shares...ranking as to capital junior to the Series B Senior preferred Shares."

Digitized by Google

It is trite law that a dividend may only be declared if a company is solvent. For corporations governed by the CBCA, it appears that the common law tests for solvency have all been subsumed or overruled: R. v. McClurg, 1990 CanLII 28 (SCC), [1991] 2 W.W.R. 244 at 259, 260 (S.C.C.).
Section 42 of the CBCA provides:
A corporation shall not declare or pay a dividend if there are reasonable grounds for believing that
(a) the corporation is, or would after the payment be, unable to pay its liabilities as they become due; or
(b) the realizable value of the corporation's assets would thereby be less than the aggregate of its liabilities and stated capital of all classes.

Section 42 prevents the corporation from declaring or paying a dividend when it does not meet certain solvency requirements. There was no declaration of a dividend in the present case. Any obligation to pay a dividend as part of the retraction price cannot therefore be enforced when the company is insolvent. Dividends which have accrued but which are unpaid are not considered to be a debt because, on reading the articles as a whole, the provision for payment is not one which is made independant of the ability to pay: see Welling, supra, at p. 689, citing International Power Co. Ltd. v. McMaster University and Montreal Trust Co., 1946 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1946] S.C.R. 178 where it was held there was no guarantee of payment and hence the accrued but unpaid dividends were not a debt. Instead, accrued but unpaid dividends are considered to be akin to a return of capital. Making these accrued dividends part of the retraction price does not alter this.
By way of analogy to the treatment of dividends, it could be said that until the company has declared it will redeem the shares which are tendered to it the obligation to redeem them is not a debt or liability. The promise to pay in the articles of Central Capital is not made independent of any ability to pay.
In the event that I am wrong in my conclusion that the true nature of the relationship is one of equity, I shall now consider the position in the event that a debt has been created.
3. If the nature of the relationship is not an equity relationship are the appellants entitled to be claimants under the CCAA.?

The parties agree that the effect of s. 36 renders the agreement to redeem their preferred shares unenforceable. It is the position of the appellants, however, that s. 36 does not extinguish Central Capital's obligation to repay them. Their position is that Central Capital's obligation to repay them is a contingent liability and therefore gives them a claim provable in bankruptcy, bringing them under s. 12(1) of the CCAA.
The Meaning of Debt
Debt is defined in a very broad manner in Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed. (1990) at p. 403. It is the position of the appellants that this definition of "debt" is broad enough to include McCutcheon's right to have Central Capital redeem his shares. In the case of SYH, it is submitted that the right to redemption constitutes a future liability. It is the appellants' position that Feldman J. erred in holding that to have a provable claim, McCutcheon and Central Capital must be able to obtain a judgment against Central Capital for the retraction price and be entitled to seek payment on the judgment. Finlayson J.A. agrees with the appellant's position.
Debt is defined in Black's Law Dictionary, supra, as:

A sum of money due by certain and express agreement. A specified sum of money owing to one person from another, including not only obligation of debtor to pay but right of creditor to receive and enforce payment.
A fixed and certain obligation to pay money or some other valuable thing or things, either in the present or in the future. In a still more general sense, that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services. In a broad sense, any duty to respond to another in money, labour, or service; it may be even a moral or honorary obligation, unenforceable by legal action. Also, sometimes an aggregate of separate debts, or the total sum of the existing claims against person or company. Thus we speak of the "national debt", the "bonded debt" of a corporation, etc.
It will be readily apparent that in Black's the term "debt" is defined in two distinct ways. In order to constitute a debt as defined in the first paragraph, the obligation must be enforceable. In the second paragraph debt is defined more broadly as any duty or obligation even if unenforceable by legal action. Feldman J. considered the first portion of the definition in her reasons. If the first portion of the definition applies, no debt is created because the obligation is not enforeceable under the CBCA. The appellants rely on the second portion of the definition. They also rely on the definition of of the word "liability" in Black's which is also defined very broadly.

In one sense, support for the position of the appellants is found in s. 40 of the CBCA. Section 40 states that a contract with a corporation providing for the purchase of shares of the corporation is specifically enforceable against the corporation except to the extent that the corporation cannot perform the contract without being in breach of ss. 34 or 35. Section 34 contains the solvency requirements concerning the redemption by a company of its own shares other than those carrying a right of redemption. Section 35 deals with shares which have been issued to settle or compromise a debt. In s. 2, "liability" is defined as including "a debt of a corporation arising under section 40 ...."

Section 40 does not include any reference to the obligation of a company to repurchase redeemable shares under s. 36. As a result s. 36 is not incorporated by reference into the definition of liability. While it might be suggested that this is a legislative oversight, the omission is also consistent with the position that only the articles of the corporation govern the relationships between the company and the holders of the retractable shares under s. 36. I have already stated my opinion that the articles of Central Capital do not make the obligation to redeem the shares a debt or, for that matter, a liability. Moreover, even if a provision like s. 40 is implied with respect to redeemable preferred shares, it would also be necessary to imply a provision like s. 40(3) which states that in the event of liquidation where the company has not performed its contract to redeem, the other party is entitled to be ranked subordinate to the rights of creditors but in priority to the shareholders. This is a clear expression of legislative intention that on insolvency the claim of those entitled to have their shares redeemed should not be placed on the same footing with the claims of creditors but should rank subordinate to them: see Nelson v. Rentown Enterprises Inc., 1994 ABCA 47 (CanLII), [1994] 4 W.W.R. 579 (Alta. C.A.), adopting the reasons of Hunt J. at 96 D.L.R. (4th) 586 (Alta. Q.B.). Policy reasons would again militate in favour of the result being the same on a reorganization.

Claims in Bankruptcy

Even if the broader definitions of a debt or liability in Black's are adopted, the appellants still do not have a claim provable in bankruptcy.

Persuasive authority already exists to the effect that in order to be a provable claim within the meaning of s. 121 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act the claim must be one recoverable by legal process: Farm Credit Corporation v. Holowach (Trustee of), 1988 ABCA 216 (CanLII), [1988] 5 W.W.R. 87 at 90 (Alta. C.A.), leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed at [1989] 4 W.W.R. lxx.

In Holowach, the seven members of the court were dealing with a situation in which some persons borrowed money from a mortgagee and mortgaged certain lands as security for repayment of the loan. The mortgagors then made an assignment in bankruptcy. The mortgagee filed a proof of claim for the full amount of the deficiency, that is, the amount of the indebtedness less the value of the land which the mortgagee was permitted to purchase. The Alberta Law of Property Act, R.S.A. 1980, c.L-8 precluded deficiency claims against individuals in foreclosure actions, although the effect of the legislation was not to extinguish or satisfy the debt. The mortgagee argued that it had a claim provable in bankruptcy under s. 95(1), now s. 121(1), of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The court rejected this argument, holding that a provable claim must be one recoverable by legal process. In coming to its conclusion, the court relied on Ref. re Debt Adjustment Act, 1937, [1943] 1 All E.R. 240, (P.C.) and a number of decisions at the trial level which are collected at p. 91 of the decision.

Here, the contract to repurchase the shares, while perfectly valid, is without effect to the extent that there is a conflict between the corporation's promise to redeem the shares and its statutory obligation under s. 36 of the CBCA not to reduce its capital where it is insolvent. As was the case in the Holowach decision, this statutory overlay renders Central Capital's promise to redeem the appellants' preferred shares unenforceable. Although there is a right to receive payment, the effect of the solvency provision of the CBCA means that there is no right to enforce payment. Inasmuch as there is no right to enforce payment, the promise is not one which can be proved as a claim.

It could be suggested that the decision in Holowach can be distinguished from the instant case on the basis that in Holowach the claim is made unenforceable forever by statute whereas under the CCAA the claim is unenforceable only so long as the corporation does not meet the solvency requirements of s. 36 of the CBCA. I do not believe this is a valid distinction for three reasons. First, the relevant date for determining any contingent liability is not the future but the past, namely, September 8, 1992, the date by which proofs of claim had to be submitted. On that date, Central Capital was insolvent. Second, it is only because the lenders were willing to convert their debt obligations into equity in the reorganization that Central Capital is now solvent. Central Capital is not the same company and its liabilities are not the same. The redeemable shares no longer exist. Third, in order to be profitable, the assets of a company must be managed. Any value in the assets after the insolvency of the company is, in this case, due to the new management and not to the preferred shareholders extending credit to the company by having their claim for redemption postponed.

Digitized by Google

Even if Central Capital's obligation to redeem the shares of the appellants created a debt or liability, the appellants do not have a claim provable within the meaning of s. 121 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

CONCLUSION

I would dismiss the appeal. For the reasons I have given, the retraction amounts do not constitute a debt or liability within the meaning of s. 121 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Even if I am wrong in my conclusion and a debt or liability is created, it is not a claim within the meaning of the CCAA. This is a case of first impression. For these reasons, I would not award any costs of this appeal.

[1] There is a discrepancy in the materials before this court on the relevant date for establishing a claim provable against Central Capital: S.Y.H. Corporation used May, 1992, the date of the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement whereas McCutcheon and the unsecured creditors of Central Capital Corporation used June 15, 1992, the date of the court-ordered stay of proceedings against Central Capital. I have used the May 1992 date but nothing turns on the use of this date as opposed to the June 15, 1992 date.

THE COURT: (ORAL) This is an application by the banks (lenders) for an order allowing them to make demand upon Charbonnages de France international and Charbonnages de France (CdFI and CdF) for the amount of their guarantees to Quintette. Quintette does not oppose the application provided that it can be assured that in the voting on any reorganization plan under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (CCAA) CdFI does not have a special class. That is, that CdFI is part of the class to which the lenders belong. CdFI take the position that they should, because of certain terms in the guarantee, be in a separate class.

The guarantees are in the vicinity of ten million dollars while the indebtedness of Quintette to the banks exceeds six hundred million dollars. The Japanese Steel industry (JSI) also have a claim against Quintette exceeding thirty-five million dollars, and there are other major trade creditors. The only opposition to this motion is from CdFI and CdF, to whom I will refer as CdFI.

The court approval for Quintette to proceed with a reorganization plan under CCAA was given on June 13, 1990. It provided that Quintette would file within six months of the order a formal plan of compromise between itself and its creditors. Such a plan has been filed but it is being renegotiated with the hopes that a mutually acceptable plan can be devised. Consequently no application has yet been made to set the classes of creditors nor to hold a vote upon the plari pursuant to the terms of the CCAA. A further complication is that Quintette is in the throes of a management change, and until the new management is in place it would be premature to conclude the proceedings. However, it appears that progress is being made on all fronts and that within the near future finalization of the reorganization is possible.

CdFI asked for an adjournment of this application but this was refused. I also considered reserving judgment on the motion in order to prepare tailored reasons. However, I see time as a significant factor, and for the same reasons that I rejected the application to adjourn, I feel compelled to deliver these reasons without any delay. I would not want any delay by the court to prejudice any party or the plan in general. Nothing should be done that will make a successful reorganization less likely.

By way of preamble I will note that I am inclined to a broad view of proceedings under the CCAA. As I mentioned during submissions the court is involved in the process of trying to arrive at an economically sensible decision and that the strict lines that are often drawn in court proceedings are somewhat blurred. The paramount interest of all parties and the court must be to successfully conclude a reorganization wherein Quintette survives and wherein the various creditors lose as little as possible and retain the potential benefit of continuing to be suppliers and lenders to Quintette and thereby somewhat mitigate their losses.

In using the word "creditors" it is difficult not to so visualize CdFI. You will see, as my reasons go along, that on a common sense approach it would be a narrow and unrealistic approach to do otherwise. if CdFI was before the court as the applicant, setting forth its position as guarantor and asking for some role in these proceedings, it is difficult to visualize denying it status that allowed them to participate. Why then should it change if the shoe is on the other foot? It should not unless there is binding legal precedent against such participation. CdFI has put forth legal precedents and consequently I have approached this matter by trying to analyze the legal impediments and if they are not a bar then I will resort to the general philosophy which I have set forth.

The application by the lenders asks (a) that part of my order of June 13, 1990 that said:

"And this Court further orders that all creditors of the Petitioner be enjoined from making demand for payment upon the Petitioner or upon any guarantor of an obligation of the Petitioner until further order of this court";

Be amended to read:

"And this Court further orders that all creditors of the Petitioner be enjoined from making demand for payment upon the Petitioner save for the purpose of making a demand upon any guarantor of an obligation of the petitioner";

(b) A declaration that, for the purpose of voting on a Reorganization Plan as defined in the CCAA Order, Charbonnages de France international S.A. ("CdFI") be a member of the same class of creditors as the lenders but with no right to vote on any reorganization plan unless and to the extent that CdFI has, prior to any such vote, discharged its obligations to the lenders pursuant to the guarantee dated December 15, 1982 of the debts of the Petitioner granted by CdFI to the lenders (the "CdFI Guarantee");

(c) in the alternative, a declaration that, for the purpose of voting on any such Reorganization Plan, CdFI be a member of the same class of creditors as the lenders provided that, prior to any such voting, CdFI has discharged in full its obligation to the lenders pursuant to the CdFI guarantee; and

(d) A declaration that nothing in the CCAA order or any other order made in these proceedings including, without restriction, any order to be made herein approving any Reorganization Plan and nothing in any such Reorganization Plan, shall impair, alter or otherwise affect the rights of the lenders against CdFI and Charbonnages de France ("CdFI") and in particular, but without limitation, no such order or Reorganization Plan shall directly or indirectly reduce or diminish or have the effect of reducing or diminishing the amounts of the "obligations" as defined in the CdFI guarantee and in the guarantee dated January 4, 1983 of the debts of CdFI granted by CdF; Subparagraph (d) of the Notice of Motion was not argued before me and is thereby adjourned.

On January 11, 1991 an application was made by the lenders to amend that order to allow them to make a demand on CdFI. At that time I ruled that a demand could be made on Quintette, but on the urging of counsel for Quintette I added that no demand could be made on CdFI until the Reorganization Plan had been voted upon. I put a time limit upon that and consequently ordered that the demand could not be made upon CdFI until either the Reorganization Plan had been voted upon, or April 12, 1991, whichever was earlier.

No party to these proceedings suggests that any trade creditor, that any lender, that the Japanese steel industry nor Quintette have proceeded in any way other than in an honest and straightforward manner to arrive at a reorganization. But I must observe that the protection that was given to CdFI in the earlier order was at the behest of Quintette and that it was based solely on their fear that CdFI would form a separate class for voting purposes. Counsel for CdFI offered to seek instructions softening their position and possibly answer this worry of Quintette. However, counsel for both Quintette and the lenders said that adjourning to obtain their clients' instructions would not resolve the matter as they were sure that the instructions sought would not result in a change of position by the lenders or Quintette. Indeed they quite forcefully put forth the position that an adjournment was simply one more step by CdFI to gain an advantage through the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act proceedings. CdFI is seen as wanting to escape their obligations under the guarantees by taking advantage of the proceedings herein. Whether this is so is not for me to decide. While I view this procedure as one wherein the Court is a partner in the process of attempting to arrive at a solution, the role of the Court is somewhat uncomfortable in that when the crunch comes it is the Court that must make a decision that will be unpopular with at least one of the parties. The position of CdFI was that if I make any order of variation it will result in an appeal and that this in itself will cause delays and add to the chances of a compromise not being successful. This is a chance that I will have to take and I view this CdFI position as more of a threat than a constructive approach.

The lenders' first position is that CdFI is now a creditor of Quintette. This is based upon the proposition that a claim of a guarantor in a bankruptcy is a contingent claim that as such is provable in bankruptcy and that a link exists between bankruptcy legislation and the Companies' Credit Arrangement Act which extends this principle to proceedings within the Act.

I was referred to McGuinness in the Law of Guarantee, 1986. It is stated under "Principles in Bankruptcy" that:

"A surety is a creditor of the principle within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act even prior to payment and even though his claim at that time is only contingent as he has not been called upon to pay."

The lenders referred me to Ex parte Read (1981) 1 QB 71. The reasons of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams are contained at page 72 and I have taken them into account. Within those reasons he said:

"In my judgment, when once I arrive at that reason I must come to the conclusion that the word 'creditor' in Section 48 must mean a person who would be entitled to prove and to share in that distribution."

Paraphrasing further, Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams said that he thought that the word creditor means a person who at the date of payment would have had to come in and prove and rank with other creditors in a bankruptcy and:

"A surety would be such a person."

I will note two other cases supporting that general proposition: in Re Blackpool Motor Car Company Limited (1901), 1 Chancery 77, and Cuchuran vs. Dubitz (1945) 3 Western Weekly Reports 541. A case that received more attention in the hearing was in Re Froment vs. Alberta Department of Agriculture (1925) 3 DLR 377. There is at page 384 a paragraph which was particularly relied upon which commences by referring to the Bankruptcy Act of Canada. After making reference to the appropriate section in the legislation and referring back to historical bankruptcy acts, Mr. Justice Tweedie said:

"It is now established, notwithstanding the doubts expressed in In re Parrott (1891) 8 Morr. 49 that the contingent liability of a surety who has not been called upon to pay, or who has not in fact paid, forms a debt provable in bankruptcy of a principal debtor."

Finally on this point the lenders referred to Re Film House Limited (1974) 19 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports 231. That decision from the Supreme Court of Ontario referred to in Re Froment and Mr. Justice Holding in giving oral reasons said that:

"If the surety had paid off the bank, it would be entitled to receive the security in the possession of the principal creditor. And if this happened, there is no doubt that in voting the claim Section 90 would apply, and the surety would have to give credit for the security received from the principal creditor. The fact that it has not paid off the claim, when it is permitted to vote the claim by reason of the principal creditors election not to vote it, should not in my opinion affect the situation."

Counsel for the lender then linked these decisions to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act by way of Section 12.1. That section reads as follows:

"For the purposes of this act 'claim' means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that, if unsecured, would be a debt provable in bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act."

Digitized by Google

The lenders say that if CdFI has a claim provable in bankruptcy then this makes the link and it has a claim under the CCAA.

Counsel for the lenders conceded that the major legal impediment to their position is by way of the finding of the Ontario High Court in Quebec Steel Products (Industries) Ltd. v. James United Steel Ltd. (1969) 5 DLR (3rd) 374. The headnote reads as follows:

"Plaintiff, which had contracted with defendant for the sale of certain goods to be manufactured by defendant, was awaiting performance when defendant was placed into receivership by its secured creditors. The receiver having informed plaintiffs that defendant would not be performing the contract, plaintiff obtained alternative goods elsewhere at higher cost and brought this action for damages. Defendant pleaded the order of the Court confirming the compromise of defendant's obligations under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 54, which had not been appealed or collaterally attacked by plaintiff. Defendant's receiver admitted not having given notice of the meeting of creditors to plaintiff or any other persons having contracts with the defendant.

Held, plaintiff was not bound by the compromise, it appearing either that it was not a 'creditor' of defendant at the time the arrangement was made (being unaware that the defendant was going to repudiate its contract and thus having at best only a potential claim for unliquidated damages) or, in the alternative, that plaintiff was a creditor of a wholly distinct class which was not bound by the compromise because not given notice of it. Unlike the related (but distinct) federal statutes governing insolvency, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act does not contain an extended definition of the term 'creditor' which must therefore be construed in its common law sense as excluding persons with mere claims for unliquidated damages. A provision in the company's compromise, for the resolution of disputed unliquidated claims could hardly affect plaintiff's position when it was not given notice of the arrangement proceedings."

The lenders relied upon the following passages from the Reasons of Mr. Justice Parker:

"The first issue that I must decide is whether the plaintiff was an unsecured creditor as of January 17, 1965, under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. The interpretation section of that Act [s. 2(g) (since repealed 1952-53, c. 3. s. 5)] provides:

(g) 'unsecured creditor' means any creditor of a company who is not a secured creditor, whether resident or domiciled within or without Canada.

No one claims that the plaintiff is a secured creditor.

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that since no extended definition is given by the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act to the word 'creditor', the common law definition should govern. Other statutes do give extended meanings to this word. For example, under the Bankruptcy Act, s. 2(h) provides:

(h) 'creditor' means a person having a claim, preferred, secured or unsecured, provable as a claim under this Act; (The italics are mine.) Under this Act you disregard the normal creditor-debtor relationship and look to what constitutes a provable claim. What is a provable claim is set out in s. 83(1) of the Bankruptcy Act:

83(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the bankruptcy or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

So a contract not breached at the date of bankruptcy but repudiated before the discharge in which there is a possible claim for unliquidated damages would be a claim provable under the Bankruptcy Act and such a claimant would be a creditor under that Act.

The Winding-up Act has somewhat similar provisions and also contains an extended definition of 'creditor'. Section 2(3) reads:

(e) 'creditor' includes all persons having any claim against the company present or future, certain, ascertained, or contingent, for liquidated or unliquidated damages; and in all proceedings for determining the persons who are to be deemed creditors it includes any person making such claim."

The lenders noted that at the time of the judgment what is now Section 12 of the CCAA was included in Section 11. They say that this makes a significant difference, because Section 11 as it then was is concerned only with the "amount" of the claim. This is an important distinction. Mr. Justice Parker said:

"Once a creditor establishes his status under s. 3 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the compromise is sanctioned by the Court under s. 5, then (my underlining) s. 11 applies to determine this amount."

He then quoted s. 11 and went on:

"This section clearly refers to amount. In the present case we are not concerned with the amount . . . ."

Section 11 as it then was commenced by stating that "the amount . . . shall be determined as follows" and then set forth what is now s. 12(1). Section 12(1) defines "claim" as any "obligation of any kind that, if unsecured, would be a debt provable in bankruptcy with the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act."

CdFI submitted that they are not a creditor. They based their argument upon the Quebec Steel case, in particular the remarks of Mr. Justice Parker commencing at page 377:

"The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 111, also defines who may be creditors under that Act, s. 2(e):

(e) 'creditor' includes a secured creditor and any person to whom a farmer owes any debt and includes the Crown, as well in right of any province as in right of Canada;

Section 2(2) provides:

2(2) Unless it is otherwise provided, expressions contained in this Act have the same meaning as in the Bankruptcy Act, and this Act shall be read and construed as one with the Bankruptcy Act, but shall have full force and effect notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy Act, and the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and Bankruptcy Rules, except as in this Act or in the regulations otherwise provided, apply mutatis mutandis in the case of proceedings hereunder including meetings of creditors.

No such extended definition is contained in the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. Since Parliament carefully set forth the meaning it intended in the Bankruptcy Act, the Winding-up Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, it is difficult to presume that any such extended meaning was intended in the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. Had Parliament intended to give such an extended meaning to the word 'creditor' in the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act it could have said so. No case was submitted to me where the Courts have given the word 'creditor' a wider meaning except where the meaning was extended by statute."

CdFI conceded that I am not bound by that decision, but said that it is persuasive authority. I am not convinced that if Mr. Justice Parker had the present placement (that is in Section 12 instead of Section 11) in front of him that he would come to the same decision. He preferred to resort to a common law definition of "claim" because he found that the definition in the CCAA was restricted to that section concerned with amount. The legislation has been amended and we must assume with purpose. The concepts of claim and amount are no longer tethered together. "Claim" is visualized with a future prospect i.e. "would be a debt" and in my opinion clearly envisages giving potential creditors a role in the CCAA proceedings. CdFI do not want a role and if that is their ultimate choice so be it. But as a matter of law it exists.

Furthermore Parker, J. had a situation wherein "The plaintiff did not know of the plan of compromise or the holding of a meeting to approve it. The defendant, having admitted the breach, now submits that the plaintiff was an unsecured creditor as of January 17th and, therefore, is bound by the compromise." This is a most significant factual difference to the case at bar wherein CdFI are informed, have received a benefit under the original order, have appeared, and want the continued protection with no offsetting obligations.

I must also consider that in the Northland Properties Limited cases and in the Court of Appeal of British Columbia in this case and in Chef Ready Foods Ltd. vs. Hongkong Bank of Canada, the courts have commented upon the purpose of the CCAA. It may be that this Court is taking a liberal approach to interpretation in favour of trying to arrive at an economically sensible result. That appears to be the approach of the courts in Western Canada which after all is the area responsible for the promulgation of the legislation in the first place.

In the case at bar an appeal was taken from my judgment dismissing an application by the Japanese steel industry for an order setting aside part of my order made on June 13, 1990. The appeal reasons were delivered by Mr. Justice Gibbs. They reinforce, in my mind, the considerations governing our approach to the Act. In the result I am convinced that it is illogical to consider CdFI anything other than a creditor for the purposes of the CCAA proceedings.

Quintette argued that it is unnecessary to make a determination whether or not CdFI is a creditor. They said this matter could be left open as long as there is a ruling that CdFI will be a member of the lender class if it becomes a creditor. I accept this submission and my ruling with respect to class is not dependent upon my decision that CdFI is now a creditor for the purposes of the CCAA.

The lenders and Quintette asked for an order that CdFI is in the same class as the lenders for the purposes of voting upon the plan pursuant to the provisions of the CCAA. CdFI said that they are not a creditor and therefore the Court has no jurisdiction to make any orders that affect CdFI. I am still struggling with the logic of that argument. Surely if this is correct then there was no jurisdiction in the Court to make that part of the June 13, 1991 order that protects CdFI from demands. Yet CdFI argued strenuously to protect that provision. I believe that the Court has jurisdiction to make orders that affect parties such as CdFI. Further, CdFI conceded that there is jurisdiction to define the class into which creditors fall and that if I find CdFI to be a creditor then the jurisdiction exists for its classification. It said that it is now premature to do this, but I reject that contention.

Quintette's position regarding the lenders is founded upon the classification of CdFI being the same as that of the lenders. The Japanese steel industry and the other major creditors take the same position. After months of negotiation all of these parties have concluded that, this would be a positive step toward arriving at an acceptable plan.

Furthermore, it is obvious that if no demand is made upon CdFI then CdFI is not going to pay upon the guarantees. It follows that the lenders will prove the full amount of the indebtedness and CdFI will not be able to vote because of the principle of double proof. Therefore, as pointed out by Quintette, the issue of the class into which CdFI falls will not be determined. If a demand is made upon CdFI then it should be known into what class it will fall. If I do not determine the classification then I would be most reluctant to vary the order as requested. I do not think that the court should be so handicapped particularly in that it can as easily be determined now as later.

Quintette referred me to Savage v. Amoco Acquisition Company Ltd. (1988) 68 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports 154. It noted that this is not a decision made under the CCAA, but rather under the Business Corporation Act, and that it does not involve creditors, but it involves shareholders. But they nevertheless referred me to those portions of the Reasons of Mr. Justice Rerans as they appear commencing at page 195:

"It is then said for the preferred shareholders that they should be classed separately, or at least Class A and B preferred shareholders should be classed separately. The learned Queen's Bench judge directed a common meeting of all shareholders as a class but that the votes of preferred shares be recorded separately. He expressed concern that, otherwise, a very small group - the preferred shares represent less than two per cent of the holdings - would have a 'virtual veto'. Mr. Sternberg now assures us that his clients would not ask that the tail wag the dog in this way, as he says. He nevertheless wants us to direct that the preferred shareholders are a separate class. Mr. O'Connor supports the order on the ground that the recognition of the preferred shareholders as a separate class predetermines the issue to be decided at the approval hearing, that being whether in these circumstances their shares have value and should be granted a preference. He concedes, however, that a meeting could be held without necessarily declaring the shares to be a distinct class. Both counsel argue the psychological effect of these choices on the shareholders and on the public. We think that, at this stage, the least misleading alternative is not to disturb the order made. We note that, if, as Mr. Sternberg says, the preferred shareholders have things to discuss 'alone', they are quite capable of holding their own meeting. We think it was not an error to refuse to direct such a meeting not to refuse to create a separate class at the preliminary stage. We reject this ground of appeal."

In that passage it will be noted that the comment is, made by counsel that his client "would not ask that the tail wag the dog." What is being suggested here is that a $10 million guarantor should be put into a separate class thereby giving it significant power and possibly veto power over she proceedings. CdFI as a $10 million tail wants to be allowed to wag the $600 million dog.

I was also referred by counsel for Quintette to Norcen Energy Resources Limited v. Oakwood Petroleum Ltd. This is a judgment of the Alberta Queen's Bench at (1988) 72 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports page 20. That is a significant judgment in my mind on the question of classification and I will quote at length from that case and the following quotations commence at page 24:

"The very narrow issue which I must address concerns the propriety of classifying all the secured creditors of the company into one group. Counsel for Oakwood and Sceptre have attempted to justify their classifications by reference to the 'commonality of interests test' described in Sovereign Life Assur. Co. v. Dodd, [1892] 2 Q.B. 573 (C.A.). That test received the approval of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Savage v. Amoco Acquisition Co. 1988 ABCA 148 (CanLII), (1988), 59 Alta. L.R. (2d) 260, 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 154, 87 A.R. 321, where Kerans J.A., on behalf of the court stated [pp. 264-65]:

We agree that the basic rule for the creation of groups for the consideration of fundamental corporate changes was expressed by Lord Esher in Sovereign Life Assur. Co. v. Dodd, [supra] when he said, speaking about creditors:

'. . . if we find a different state of facts existing among different creditors which may differently affect their minds and their judgments, they must be divided into different classes.'

In the case of Sovereign Life Assur. Co. Bowen, L.J. went on to state at p. 583 that the class:

'. . . must be confined to those persons whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest.'

To put the issue in another light, what I must decide is whether the holding of distinct security by each creditor necessitates a separate class of creditor for each, or whether notwithstanding this factor that they each share, nevertheless this factor does not override the grouping into one class of creditors. In my opinion, this decision cannot be made without considering the underlying purpose of the CCAA.

In Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. v. Oakwood Petroleums Ltd., Calgary No. 8801- 14453, 17th November 1988 [now reported ante, p. 1, 63 Alta. L.R. (2d) 361], after canvassing the few authorities on point, I concluded that the purpose of the CCAA is to allow debtor companies to continue to carry on their business and that necessarily incidental to that purpose is the power to interfere with contractual relations. In referring to the case authority

Re Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; A.G. Can. v. A.G. Que., 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] SCR 659, 16 CBR 1, [1934] 4 DLR 75, I stated at pp. 24 and 25 [p.15]:

It was held in that case that the Act was valid as relating to bankruptcy and insolvency rather than property and civil rights. At p. 664, Cannon J. held;

'Therefore, if the proceedings under this new Act of 1933 are not, strictly speaking, 'bankruptcy' proceedings, because they had not for object the sale and division of the assets of the debtor, they may, however, be considered as 'insolvency proceedings' with the object of preventing a declaration of bankruptcy and the sale of these assets. If the creditors directly interested for the time being reach the conclusion that an opportune arrangement to avoid such sale would better protect their interest, as a whole or in part, provisions for the settlement of the liabilities of the insolvent are an essential element of any insolvency legislation . . .'

I went on to note:

The CCAA is an Act designed to continue, rather than liquidate companies . . . The critical part of the decision is that federal legislation pertaining to assisting in the continuing operation of companies is constitutionally valid. In effect the Supreme Court of Canada has given the term 'insolvency' a broad meaning in the constitutional sense by bringing within that term an Act designed to promote the continuation of an insolvent company. [emphasis added]

In this regard, I would make extensive reference to the article by Mr. Robertson, Q.C., where, in discussing the classification of creditors under the CCAA and after stating the proposition referred to by counsel for the Hongkong Bank and Bank of America, he states at p. 16 in his article:

An initial, almost instinctive, response that differences in claims and property subject to security automatically means segregation into different classes does not necessarily make economic or legal sense in the context of an act such as the CCAA.

And later at pp. 19 and 20, in commenting on the article by Mr. Edwards, he states:

However, if the trend of Edwards' suggestions that secured creditors can only be classed together when they held security of the same priority, that perhaps classes should be subdivided into further groups according to whether or not a member of the class also holds some other security or form of interest in the debtor company, the multiplicity of discrete classes or subclasses classes might be so compounded as to defeat the object of the act. As Edwards himself says, the subdivision of voting groups and the counting of angels on the heads of pins must top somewhere and some forms of differences must surely be disregarded.

In summarizing his discussion, he states on pp. 20-21:

From the foregoing one can perceive at least two potentially conflicting approaches to the issue of classification. On the one hand there is the concept that members of a class ought to have the same 'interest' in the company, out to be only creditors entitled to look to the same 'source' or 'fund' for payment, and ought to encompass all of the creditors who do have such an identity of legal rights. On the other hand, there is recognition that the legislative intent is to facilitate reorganization, that excessive fragmentation of classes may be counter-productive and that some degree of difference between claims should no preclude creditors being put in the same class.

It is fundamental to any imposed plan or reorganization that strict legal rights are going to be altered and that such alteration may be imposed against the will of at least some creditors. When one considers the complexity and magnitude of contemporary large business organizations, and the potential consequences of their failure it may be that the courts will be compelled to focus less on whether there is any identity of legal rights and rather focus on whether or not those constituting the class are persons, to use Lord Esher's phrase, 'whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest' . . .

If the plan of reorganization is such that the creditors' particular priorities and securities are preserved, especially in the event of ultimate failure, it may be that the courts will, for example, in an apt case decide that creditors who have basically made the same kinds of loans against the same kind of security, even though on different terms and against different particular secured assets, do have a sufficient similarity of interest to warrant being put into one class and being made subject to the will of the required majority of that class. [emphasis added]

These comments may be reduced to two cogent points. First, it is clear that the CCAA grants a court the authority to alter the legal rights of parties other than the debtor company without their consent. Second, the primary purpose of the Act is to facilitate reorganizations and this factor must be given due consideration at every stage of the process, including the classification of creditors made under a proposed plan. To accept the > 'identity of interest' proposition as a starting point in the classification of creditors necessarily results in a 'multiplicity of discrete classes' which would make any reorganization difficult, if not impossible to achieve.

> In the result, given that this planned reorganization arises under the CCAA, I must reject the arguments put forth by the Hongkong Bank and the Bank of America, that since they hold separate security over different assets, they must therefore be classified as a separate class creditors."

I was also referred to Re Northland Properties Limited, the trial decision of Mr. Justice Trainor of this court at (1988) 72 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports 175 and the appeal decision at (1989) 73 Canadian Bankruptcy Reports 195. They have an impact on my thinking and I refer specifically to the Reasons of Chief Justice McEachern at pages 203 and 204. I also note that the Chief Justice adopted the words of Mr. Justice Forsyth in Norcen.

Quintette submitted that it is improper to create a separate class if no conflict of interest arises by having a specific party in a certain class. They said this applies to CdFI and that they simply fall into the shoes of the lenders possibly by subrogation and they should rank no better. In presenting this submission counsel for Quintette set forth some background as to the guarantees and I find it worthwhile to summarize that brief digest as given to me. It was stated that CdFI guaranteed the Tranche B debt of approximately $10 million U.S. and that other guarantors had satisfied their guarantees and that the Tranche A debt is for the balance to the lender of approximately $600 million U.S.

The CdFI guarantee is contained in a contract, but the lenders were not satisfied with the strength of CdFI, therefore, the lenders requested that CdF "guarantee the guarantee".

Counsel for Quintette said that normally if CdFI paid they would be subrogated to the rights of the lenders, but for CdF there is a separate subrogation contract, because whereas if the guarantor made payment there would be automatic subrogation, but if the guarantor of a guarantor pays there may be an argument as to this principle.

Mr. Tysoe noted that both contracts of guarantee have provisions that give rise to CdFI's claim for a separate class. If CdFI makes payment then they are not entitled to claim indemnity from Quintette until the lenders are paid the balance of the indebtedness, that is, the Tranche A debt. He referred to this as a "deferral" of the subrogation rights. He said that if there was no deferral and if CdFI was entitled to share equitably with the others than clearly they would be in the same class, consequently the Reorganization Plan as it is at this time specifically takes away the deferral provisions.

The lenders' submission is that:

> "At every stage of the process, including the classification of creditors, it must be borne in mind that the primary purpose of the CCAA is to facilitate reorganization."

The lenders then quoted from Norcen. The lenders further stated:

> "A tiny minority should not, if possible, be given a veto over a reorganization plan."

They then referred to Norcen and as well to the words of Mr. Justice Forsyth in Amoco and to the words of Mr. Justice Gibbs in the Quintette appeal to which I earlier referred.

The lenders further stated that:

> "To the extent possible, creditors should be bound by their pre CCAA arrangement as long as the CCAA proceedings cause no additional prejudice. Due to its subrogated rights, CdFI enjoy 'identity of interest" with the lenders. For CdFI to be in the same class as the lenders is not oppressive: It is precisely what CdFI bargained for.
> If CdFI were to form a separate class the 'minority veto test' would not be met. There would be a tyranny of the minority. The court should be vigilant in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction to ensure that such a situation does not arise."

CdFI submitted that they were clearly entitled to be a separate class, but their only foundation for this was the deferral aspect of the guarantees. I accept the submission of the lenders and the major creditors of Quintette and JSI and hold that CdFI shall at this time be part of the lender class.

The reasons for the protection clause in the earlier order have now been removed, it was there only because of the concern of Quintette as to the class to which a demand might place CdFI. A determination of the class into which CdFI falls has now been met. There is no objection to the variation from anyone other than CdFI who say that I had no jurisdiction to make the order in the first place. If I did have the jurisdiction to make it, then I have jurisdiction to vary it and I do and I vary it in accordance with the Part (a) of the application.

With respect to the class I make the variation in accord with Part (b) of the application.

(SUBMISSIONS BY COUNSEL)

Mr. Edgson and Ms. Adair have made a point on behalf of their clients with respect to potential prejudice to their clients. JSI drafted a paragraph which did not appear to meet with opposition. The position on that will have to be worked out and in that Mr. McAllister is not here it will be adjourned to come back before me as soon as possible, provided it cannot be resolved by consent.

On appeal from the order of Justice James M. Farley of the Superior Court of Justice dated December 10, 2001.

ROSENBERG J.A.:

[1] This appeal from an Order of Farley J. concerns the application of legal and equitable set-off in the context of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended. On April 23, 2001, the respondent Algoma Steel Inc. obtained an initial order under the CCAA. At that time, Algoma was indebted to the appellant Union Gas Limited under two contracts (the 2000 contracts) for gas services in March and April of 2001 amounting to just under $2 million. At the same time, Algoma was entitled to a rebate from Union of approximately $2.2 million plus interest as a result of an overpayment for gas services in 1999. Union sought to set off amounts owed to it by Algoma against the 1999 rebate. The motions judge held that Union had not established a claim for legal set-off. He held that Union had made out a claim for an equitable set-off but only in relation to one of the contracts in the amount of $461,244. Because of various orders made in the CCAA proceedings this means that Union must pay the entire amount of the 1999 rebate less the $461,244 and is not entitled to payment of $1,265,934 owed to it under the 2000 contract. Union submits that the motions judge erred in refusing to allow legal set-off and, in the alternative, erred in limiting the scope of equitable set-off.

[2] In my view, the motions judge did not err with respect to legal set-off but did err with respect to equitable set-off. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal with costs.

THE FACTS

The relationship between Algoma and Union

[3] The facts are based entirely upon affidavits filed by two employees of Union. Algoma filed no affidavits and did not cross-examine the Union employees. I begin with a summary of the facts that lead to Algoma's entitlement to the $2.2 million rebate. In 1999, Algoma obtained gas on a buy/sell arrangement under which Algoma bought natural gas from a resource supplier (presumably in Western Canada) and sold the gas to Union. Union arranged for the transportation of the gas on its own account and then sold the gas back to Algoma in Ontario when it was needed. In 1999, the relationship between Union and Algoma was governed by a contract commencing November 1, 1998 and terminating on October 31, 1999. This contract was subject to automatic renewal for successive one-year periods.[1]

[4] Under the 1998 contract, Algoma was required to pay for the gas services in accordance with Union's rate schedule as approved by the Ontario Energy Board. These rates are based on many factors including projected costs of gas. If those projections are found to be either too high or too low following the end of a calendar year, Algoma may have either overpaid or underpaid Union. To track actual costs with projected costs, Union established deferral accounts for the various classes of customers. Algoma is in a Rate 100 class. As it happened, in 1999, Algoma and the other Rate 100 customers overpaid and were entitled to a rebate. However, Union could not repay its customers without approval from the Board. Union therefore made an application to the Board in which it proposed to pay the rebates to the customers. The total rebate for the Rate 100 class is just under $4 million. According to the affidavit of the Union employee, Algoma's share of the rebate "approximates $2.2 million". Algoma is also entitled to interest on the rebate accruing from January 1, 2000 at a rate set by the Board.

[5] In its July 21, 2001 decision, the Board approved Union's proposal. But instead of authorizing immediate payment, the Board directed Union to bring forward the balances in all of the year 2000 deferral accounts for review. In a further decision dated October 16, 2001, the Board directed Union to continue to hold the balances in the deferral accounts until the 2001 and 2002 rates are implemented and 2000 and 2001 deferral balances are disposed of. According to the Union employee's affidavit, this will not affect Algoma's rebate because it is not entitled to share in the 2000 and 2001 deferral accounts. By the time of the hearing before the motions judge, the Board had not yet indicated when Union could pay the rebate to its customers, including Algoma.

[6] I will now deal with the contracts that governed the Union/Algoma relationship when the CCAA orders were made. In 2000, Algoma changed its relationship with Union so that it no longer had a buy-sell arrangement. In October 2000, the parties entered into two new contracts. These contracts may conveniently be referred to as the 2000 gas services contract and the assignment agreement. Both contracts covered almost the same period; from November 1, 2000 to October 31, 2001 for the 2000 gas services contract and November 1, 2000 to November 1, 2001 for the assignment agreement. As a result of the new arrangement, Algoma no longer sold the gas to Union and repurchased it from Union in Ontario. Rather, Union assigned its right to access gas transportation capacity directly from TransCanada Pipelines Limited ("TCPL") through Union's contract with TCPL. Algoma thus paid TCPL directly. Importantly, however, if Algoma failed to pay TCPL for use of gas transportation capacity being accessed by it, Union was required to pay TCPL. Algoma was then required to indemnify Union.

[7] Under the 2000 gas services contract, Union continued to transport the gas from Union's metering station at the TCPL pipeline to the Algoma plant. That contract included this term:

> This agreement is contingent upon the TCPL Assignment Agreement which is attached as Schedule D and forms an integral part of this arrangement. In the event either of these agreements terminate, the other agreement shall also terminate, unless agreed to otherwise by the parties.

[8] As of the April 23, 2001 CCAA order, Algoma owed Union $461,244 under the 2000 gas services contract. Further, because Algoma failed to pay TCPL for gas transportation services obtained by Algoma under the assignment agreement, Union was obliged to indemnify TCPL in the amount of $1,265,934. It is these two amounts that Union seeks to set off against the 1999 rebate. As indicated, the motions judge only allowed Union to set off the former amount.

The CCAA Proceedings

[9] On April 23, 2001, Algoma obtained an initial order under the CCAA. As part of that order, the right of any claimant to assert, enforce or exercise any right of set-off or consolidation of accounts was stayed during the stay period. On November 9, 2001, while the stay period was still in force, Algoma obtained an order to authorize meetings of its creditors to consider its Plan of Arrangement, to establish a process for proving claims and for the subsequent barring of those claims in return for participating in the Plan. Under this order, an unsecured creditor that had not filed a proof of claim was deemed to have filed one in the amount as valued by Algoma. The creditor was then barred from making or enforcing any such deemed claim after December 12, 2001. Union did not file a proof of claim since it took the view that there was no net balance due from Algoma to Union once the 1999 rebate was factored in. Algoma denied that Union was entitled to a set-off and deemed Union's claim to be in the amounts of $461,244 and $1,265,934.

[10] As a result, on November 27, 2001, Union moved before Farley J. for a declaration that its rights of set-off referable to its dealings with Algoma up to April 23, 2001 were not affected by the CCAA proceedings. In this way, it sought to prevent its claims from being deemed to have been the subject of a proof of claim and then deemed to have been barred after December 12, 2001. Union relied upon s. 18.1 of the CCAA, which preserves rights of set-off. I will set out that section in full below.

THE REASONS OF THE MOTIONS JUDGE

[11] The motions judge noted that a condition for application of legal set-off is that the obligations must be debts, in the sense that they are liquidated amounts. After reviewing the Board rulings and various letters by Union to Algoma, the motions judge concluded that the 1999 rebate was not a liquidated amount. He noted that in the Union employee's affidavit the rebate "approximates $2.2 million". Further communications between Union and its Rate 100 customers suggested that there might not even be a rebate, depending on the decision of the Board. He therefore held that legal set-off had not been made out.

[12] As to equitable set-off, the motions judge held that the 2000 gas services contract was in substance a continuation of the 1998 contract. He concluded that there was a "close connection sufficient to ground equitable set-off as to the gas supply portion of the October 15, 2000 Agreement vis-à-vis any rebate which is authorized by the Board, but not any monies owing by Algoma to Union as a result of the November 1, 2000 Transportation Agreement." He therefore limited the equitable set-off as indicated above.

ANALYSIS

General Principles

Digitized by Google

[13] Algoma does not dispute that the law of set-off applies notwithstanding the CCAA proceedings. Section 18.1 of the Act makes this clear:

> The law of set-off applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

[14] Algoma does, however, submit that set-off claims should be carefully scrutinized where CCAA proceedings are underway because the effect is to give preference to certain creditors. As Rowles J.A. said in Cam-Net Communications v. Vancouver Telephone Co. 1999 BCCA 751 (CanLII), (1999), 71 B.C.L.R. (3d) 226 (C.A.) at 235:

> Using, or rather misusing, the law of set-off is one example of how persons with a claim against the company in reorganization might attempt to escape the CCAA compromise. A party claiming set-off ... realizes its claim on a dollar-for-dollar basis while other creditors, who participated in the CCAA proceedings, have their claims reduced substantially. For this reason, the legislative intent animating the CCAA reorganization regime requires that courts remain vigilant to claims of set-off in the reorganization context.

[15] I accept this principle, but I do not see it as a concern in this case. Union operates within a highly regulated regime and the disposition of the rebate is subject to scrutiny by a specialized tribunal. The amounts owing by Algoma to Union are not in doubt.

[16] There was some dispute between the parties about the standard of review by this court of the decision of the motions judge. Counsel for Union seemed to suggest that because there is no right of appeal in CCAA proceedings and appeals are relatively rare, it was open to this court to review the decision of the motions judge on a standard of correctness even where that decision turned on findings of fact and inferences to be drawn from those facts. In my view, the usual standard of review in appeal proceedings applies and this court is required to give deference to the findings of the motions judge even where, as here, the decision is based on a paper record. The fact that there is no right of appeal and the appeal is only with leave under s. 13 of the Act only reinforces that conclusion. Decisions in the CCAA context must often be made quickly. They are, as in this case, usually made by a judge with considerable expertise in the area who has been managing the CCAA proceedings and is intimately familiar with the context and the issues at stake.

[17] This court and the Supreme Court of Canada have variously described the standard of appellate review. In Equity Waste Management of Canada v. Halton Hills (Town) 1997 CanLII 2742 (ON CA), (1997), 35 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.) at 336, Laskin J.A. wrote as follows:

> Therefore, although the entire record before a trial judge or a motion judge consists of documentary or written evidence, as it does in this case, the judge's factual findings are entitled to deference on appeal. What standard of deference applies in such a case? It is not easy to articulate a standard less deferential than "manifest error" but falling short of "correctness". I suggest that it may simply be a matter of weight or emphasis, or that, plausibly, a uniform standard of appellate review should be applied to a trial judge's findings of fact, whether the evidence is entirely oral, entirely documentary or, more typically, a combination of the two.
> What is important for this appeal is the kind of error that justifies intervention by an appellate court. An error of law obviously justifies intervention. An appellate court may interfere with a finding of fact if the trial judge or motion judge disregarded, misapprehended, or failed to appreciate relevant evidence, made a finding not reasonably supported by the evidence, or drew an unreasonable inference from the evidence.

[18] More recently the Supreme Court in Housen v. Nikolaisen 2002 SCC 33 (CanLII), (2002), 211 D.L.R. (4th) 577, discussed at some length the standard of appellate review where the appellate court is called upon to review inferences from facts. The court concluded that the standard is one of considerable deference. Iacobucci and Major JJ. described the standard at para. 23 as follows:

> We reiterate that it is not the role of appellate courts to second-guess the weight to be assigned to the various items of evidence. If there is no palpable and overriding error with respect to the underlying facts that the trial judge relies on to draw the inference, then it is only where the inference-drawing process itself is palpably in error that an appellate court can interfere with the factual conclusion. The appellate court is not free to interfere with a factual conclusion that it disagrees with where such disagreement stems > from a difference of opinion over the weight to be assigned to the underlying facts [emphasis added].

[19] On the other hand, where the issue concerns application of a legal standard to a set of facts the question is one of mixed fact and law and a somewhat less deferential standard may be appropriate, although not the standard of correctness required for questions of law. This was described as follows at para. 28:

> However, where the error does not amount to an error of law, a higher standard is mandated. Where the trier of fact has considered all the evidence that the law requires him or her to consider and still comes to the wrong conclusion, then this amounts to an error of mixed law and fact and is subject to a more stringent standard of review: Southam, supra, at paras. 41 and 45. While easy to state, this distinction can be difficult in practice because matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity. This difficulty was pointed out in Southam, supra, at para. 37:
> > ... the matrices of facts at issue in some cases are so particular, indeed so unique, that decisions about whether they satisfy legal tests do not have any great precedential value. If a court were to decide that driving at a certain speed on a certain road under certain conditions was negligent, its decision would not have any great value as a precedent. In short, as the level of generality of the challenged proposition approaches utter particularity, the matter approaches pure application, and hence draws nigh to being an unqualified question of mixed law and fact. See R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), at pp. 103-108. Of course, it is not easy to say precisely where the line should be drawn; though in most cases it should be sufficiently clear whether the dispute is over a general proposition that might qualify as a principle of law or over a very particular set of circumstances that is not apt to be of much interest to judges and lawyers in the future [emphasis added].

[20] It seems to me that this appeal concerns both inferences from facts and a question of mixed fact and law. The motions judge's decision about the application of legal set-off turned exclusively on the inferences to be drawn from the undisputed facts in the affidavits. His decision that Union had not shown the rebate as a debt was fact specific. Although Union argues that the motions judge overlooked important facts and misapprehended certain facts, I am not persuaded that the motions judge made any palpable or overriding error. To the contrary, I am satisfied that his decision is supported by the evidence.

[21] The decision about equitable set-off is somewhat different since it involves application of a legal standard to a set of facts. As such, it is a question of mixed law and fact. While the assessment by the motions judge is entitled to deference, I am nevertheless of the view that the motions judge erred in his application of the test for equitable set-off to these particular facts.

Legal Set-Off

[22] Section 111 of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43 provides the statutory framework for legal set-off. Subsections (1) and (2) provide:

> (1) In an action for payment of a debt, the defendant may, by way of defence, claim the right to set off against the plaintiff's claim a debt owed by the plaintiff to the defendant.

[23] The only question on the application of legal set-off in this case was whether the rebate was a debt for the purpose of s. 111. Union accepts that debt means a liquidated sum and argues that the rebate is a liquidated sum because the amount is ascertainable and, save for interest, can neither increase nor decrease. Union submits that the amount is ascertainable and fixed because the Board has accepted its proposal for calculating the amount of the rebate. It also relies on the affidavit evidence that Algoma's share of the rebate for Rate 100 customers will be unaffected by the adjustments for the years 2000 and 2001 deferral accounts.

[24] The motions judge, however, was not prepared to draw that inference from the affidavit evidence. He relied upon the fact that Union only provided an estimate of the rebate and his reading of the Board decisions that did not explicitly state that Algoma or any of the other customers would receive a rebate. He also relied upon Union's own communications to its Rate 100 customers that suggested the amount of the rebate was not fixed. In his submissions, counsel for Algoma pointed out a number of facts upon which the decision by the motions judge could rest and that could support the inferences drawn. Counsel pointed out that to overturn the decision of the motions judge, this court would have to be satisfied of the following:

> (1) That it was appropriate to sever off the interest part of the rebate, since the rate had not yet been set by the Board.
> (2) That no significance should be attached to the use of the term "approximate" in the Union employee's description of the amount of the rebate.
> (3) That no significance should be attached to the fact that Union had not provided an exact figure for the amount of the rebate.
> (4) That the communications by Union to Algoma and its other customers concerning the uncertainty of the amount of the rebate had no significance.
> (5) That there is no significance to the fact that the Board continues to prevent Union from releasing the rebate to Algoma; put another way, that the Board has no good reason for holding up disposition of the rebate.

[25] I am not prepared to say that the motions judge's decision disclosed a palpable and overriding error. Since his decision is supported by the evidence, the evidence supplied by Union itself, this aspect of the appeal must be dismissed.

Equitable Set-Off

[26] Equitable set-off is available where there is a claim for a sum whether liquidated or unliquidated. In Telford v. Holt 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1987), 41 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C.) at 398-99, Wilson J., speaking for the court, approved a statement of the applicable principles for equitable set-off found in Coba Industries Ltd. v. Millie's Holdings (Canada) Ltd. 1985 CanLII 144 (BC CA), (1985), 20 D.L.R. (4th) 689 (B.C.C.A.) at 696-97. Those principles can be summarized as follows:

> 1. The party relying on a set-off must show some equitable ground for being protected against the adversary's demands.
> 2. The equitable ground must go to the very root of the plaintiff's claim.
> 3. A cross-claim must be so clearly connected with the demand of the plaintiff that it would be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into consideration the cross-claim.
> 4. The plaintiff's claim and the cross-claim need not arise out of the same contract.
> 5. Unliquidated claims are on the same footing as liquidated claims.

[27] In one way or another the first three principles, but particularly the third, are in issue in this case. Put shortly, is the 1999 rebate from the 1998 gas services contract so clearly connected with the amounts owing under the 2000 assignment agreement that it would be manifestly unjust to enforce payment of the rebate without taking into account the amounts owing under the assignment agreement? The motions judge recognized that the assignment agreement was integral to the 2000 gas services agreement, but he refused equitable set-off for the amounts owing under the assignment agreement because it was not the same type of contract as the supply of gas by Union. In my view, this was not a sufficient reason to refuse equitable set-off given the interrelationship between the two 2000 agreements.

[28] Kelly R. Palmer in The Law of Set-Off in Canada (1993) traces the evolution of the doctrine of equitable set-off from a very strict test in which the "claim raised in set-off had to impeach the title of the plaintiff's claim" [at p. 89] to a somewhat more flexible approach based upon fairness. The leading cases describing, in some fashion, the more modern test are Coba Industries; Telford and Federal Commerce & Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Molena Alpha Inc., [1978] 3 All E.R. 1066 (C.A.) [affirmed on other grounds at [1979] A.C. 757 (H.L.)].

[29] It seems to me that a very helpful test is set out in a passage from the reasons of Lord Denning in Federal Commerce at p. 1078 and which was quoted with apparent approval by Wilson J. in Telford at p. 400:

> We have to ask ourselves: what should we do now so as to ensure fair dealing between the parties? ... This question must be asked in each case as it arises for decision; and then, from case to case, we shall build up a series of precedents to guide those who come after us. But one thing is quite clear: it is not every cross-claim which can be deducted. It is only cross-claims that arise out of the same transaction or are closely connected with it. And it is only cross-claims which go directly to impeach the plaintiff's demands, that is, so closely connected with his demands that it would be manifestly unjust to allow him to enforce payment without taking into account the cross-claim [emphasis added].

[30] In my view, there is such a close connection between the 2000 gas services contract and the 2000 assignment agreement, that the amounts owing on them cannot be severed for the purposes of equitable set-off. The assignment agreement is attached as a schedule to the 2000 gas services contract and in the event either of the agreements terminates, the other terminates, unless otherwise agreed to by the parties. The parties agreed in the 2000 gas services contract that it was "contingent upon" the assignment agreement and that the latter formed an integral part of the latter. Accepting the correctness of the motion judge's determination that the 1998 and 2000 gas services contracts exhibit a sufficient degree of connection to justify equitable set-off, it seems to me that it would be manifestly unjust to allow Algoma to insist on payment of the rebate arising under the former without allowing Union to set-off all the amounts owing under the 2000 arrangement.

[31] The relationship between the parties under the 2000 contracts is different than the relationship under the 1998 contract but they are in a sense nothing more than a successor arrangement to accomplish what had been done under the 1998 contract. Admittedly, under the 2000 assignment agreement, the underlying relationship was between TCPL and Union. Union only became entitled to collect from Algoma because Algoma failed to pay the charges that TCPL was entitled to collect from Union. Under the agreement, Algoma agreed to indemnify Union in those circumstances. However, there is a close connection between the 1998 contract and both of the 2000 contracts because they all, in one way or another, facilitate the supply of gas to Algoma.

[32] A helpful example is Coba Industries, which was approved by Wilson J. in Telford. Palmer describes the facts of Coba Industries at p. 133 of his text:

> Hp entered a sale and leaseback of property with the defendant, in the course of which Hp obtained a second mortgage over the property and granted a lease to the defendant. The lease payments were calculated to be sufficient to cover the mortgage payments. Hp assigned the mortgage to the plaintiff who notified the assignment to the defendant. When Hp fell into arrears on the lease, the defendant ceased making mortgage payments. The plaintiff sued for foreclosure, and was met with a claim for set-off.

[33] Macfarlane J.A., writing for the court in Coba Industries, found several facts that established the close connection necessary for equitable set-off. He wrote at p. 700:

> I think this evidence demonstrates that, from the outset, it was at the heart of any liability on the part of [the defendant] that [Hp] provide and assure payments under the leases sufficient to satisfy payments from time to time under both mortgages.

[34] The 1998 contract and 2000 agreements exhibit this kind of connection. Given that the motions judge found that it would be manifestly unjust not to permit Union to set off the amounts owing on the 2000 gas services contract, I conclude that it would be manifestly unjust to allow Algoma to enforce payment of the 2000 rebate without taking into account its liability to Union under the assignment agreement, which formed an integral part of the arrangement between the parties.

DISPOSITION

[35] Accordingly, I would allow the appeal with costs on a partial indemnity basis. In accordance with the written submissions of the parties, costs are fixed at $33,111.29.

IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF ALBERTA
JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF CALGARY
IN THE MATTER OF THE COMPANIES' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT, R.S.C.1985, c. C-36, AS AMENDED
AND IN THE MATTER OF A PLAN OF COMPROMISE OR ARRANGEMENT OF BLUE RANGE RESOURCE CORPORATION

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
of the
HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE S.J. LoVECCHIO

INTRODUCTION

[1] This decision relates to the applications for advice and directions brought by three gas marketing companies regarding their dealings with Blue Range Resource Corporation. Blue Range is subject to an Order dated March 2, 1999, under the Companies' Creditors Arrangements Act[1].

BACKGROUND

[2] Blue Range is a producer of natural gas. It holds leases for natural gas producing properties and over the years entered into a number of long term natural gas supply agreements with various gas marketing companies. Among these companies are Engage Energy Canada, L.P., Duke Energy Marketing Limited Partnership and CanWest Gas Supply Inc.

[3] On March 2, 1999, Blue Range petitioned the Court and was granted an order staying proceedings against it pursuant to section 11 of the CCAA. PricewaterhouseCoopers was named the Monitor for Blue Range under the Order. Certain provisions of that Order are germane to this application. They are:

> 3. b. all Persons having arrangements or agreements, written or oral, with Blue Range for the supply of goods and/or services by or to Blue Range...are hereby restrained from accelerating, terminating, suspending, modifying or cancelling any such agreements, arrangements or supply of goods and services, and are also hereby restrained from exercising any right of distress, recission, set-off or consolidation of accounts in relation to any indebtedness or obligation in favour of Blue Range...without the prior written consent of Blue Range ...or leave of this Honourable Court.
> c. notwithstanding subparagraph 3(b) hereof, this Order shall not prohibit any party to an "eligible financial contract" (as defined in section 11.1(1) of the CCAA), which contract was entered into before the date of this Order, from terminating, amending or claiming an accelerated payment under such eligible financial contract and setting off the obligations between Blue Range and such other party in accordance with its provisions, provided that if the "net termination value" (as defined in section 11.1(1) of the CCAA) determined in accordance with the eligible financial contract is owed by Blue Range to another party to the eligible financial contract, the other party shall be deemed to be a creditor of Blue Range with a claim in respect of that net termination value;

> d. proceed with an orderly liquidation of such of its Property as Blue Range deems appropriate... provided that any sale of any real or personal property outside the ordinary course of business... shall require... the approval of the Court;
> e. terminate such of its arrangements or agreements of any nature whatsoever, including without limitation contracts for the purchase or sale of commodities, marketing agreements, transportation agreements, and service agreements, whether oral or written, as Blue Range deems appropriate and to make provision for any consequences thereof in the Plan (as hereinafter defined), > all of the foregoing to permit Blue Range to proceed with an orderly restructuring of its business, property and affairs (the "Restructuring").
> 17. In order to facilitate the Restructuring, Blue Range shall be permitted to carry on its business in the manner and to the extent determined by it, to dispose of any or all of its inventory and other assets, all subject to paragraph 16(d) hereof, wherever situate, and, for greater certainty, Blue Range shall have the right to realize upon its assets in such manner as Blue Range deems suitable or desirable for the purpose of maximizing the proceeds and recovery therefrom.

[4] As part of a restructuring plan, Blue Range may sell certain of its petroleum leases the lands and reserves under which were "dedicated" to the supply of natural gas under the aforementioned long term natural gas supply agreements.

[5] Some of the agreements provide for the sale of natural gas at prices below today's spot prices for natural gas. As such, the leases might command a higher price if they were sold after the existing contractual supply obligations had been terminated and Blue Range called for bids for the leases based on that assumption.

[6] After supplying natural gas in accordance with the terms of the existing contractual supply obligations for both February and March, on March 31, 1999, Blue Range terminated some of its natural gas supply contracts as permitted by paragraph 16.e of the Order including those with Engage, Duke and CanWest.

[7] While the precise terms of the various contracts may differ slightly, it is generally the case that the payment for a month's supply of natural gas becomes payable on the 25th day of the following month. Thus the payment for the February supply of natural gas was due on March 25th and the payment for the March supply of natural gas was due on April 25th.

[8] At the time of the hearing, Duke and Engage had not paid Blue Range for February or March. Duke has, however, reserving its right to argue set-off, paid the amount owing for its February delivery to the Monitor. Engage, while permitted to pay on the same basis, did not. No indication was given at the hearing how Duke or Engage would deal with the payment for March deliveries. The principles of this decision would however be applicable to that payment as well.

[9] Payment to the Monitor on this basis had been authorized by the Court pursuant to an order dated March 25th, 1999. The purpose for permitting this mode of payment was twofold. It was to prevent Blue Range from arguing that the creditor was in default for non-payment of natural gas which had been delivered thereby giving termination rights due to that fact and, at the same time, to protect the funds paid by the creditor while the issue of set-off was being decided by the Court.

[10] All of the companies may suffer substantial losses as a result of the termination of the existing natural gas supply contracts as, prior to the termination of the agreements, they had the right to purchase natural gas below the current spot market price for natural gas and that natural gas will have to be replaced by purchases of natural gas at prices that at present are higher.

THE APPLICATIONS

[11] The different companies have made a number of applications with respect to the March 2nd Order. These applications were all made before Blue Range terminated the agreements.

[12] Engage and CanWest have each applied for a declaration that, if any of the leases which are dedicated to their respective supply contracts are sold, the terminations of the contracts are to be declared ineffective with the corresponding result that the leases will remain subject to the pricing provisions and the "dedication" contained in the agreements.

[13] In the alternative, Engage and CanWest, joined by Duke, seek a variation of the stay order such that Blue Range would be able to terminate the contracts only on certain conditions. The conditions sought being that Blue Range could only terminate if it was incapable of performing them or that termination is essential to the success of the restructuring.

Digitized by Google

[14] Duke and Engage have also each applied for an order permitting them to set-off the damages that they anticipate suffering, as a result of Blue Range terminating the supply contracts, against the payments due to Blue Range for the February and March deliveries of natural gas.

[15] Lastly, Engage and Duke seek to have their respective agreements declared "eligible financial contracts" as defined in the CCAA. This last issue, however, has been adjourned with the agreement of all of the interested parties. This decision is predicated on the assumption that the contracts in question will not be considered "eligible financial contracts".

ISSUES

(1) Should the "dedication" of the natural gas reserves contained in the pre-existing natural gas supply contracts be found to be an interest running with the land thereby giving rise to an encumbrance on the leases which Blue Range listed for sale?

(2) Have CanWest, Engage and Duke satisfied the Court that it is appropriate to vary the Order such that Blue Range should only be permitted to terminate the contracts if Blue Range is found to be incapable of performing them or that termination is essential to the success of the restructuring?

(3) Should Engage and/or Duke be entitled to set-off their anticipated damages for non-delivery against the payments that they owe for the natural gas deliveries of February and March?

DECISION - ISSUE (1)

[17] For the reasons which follow, the "dedication" of the natural gas reserves contained in the pre-existing natural gas supply contracts does not, in the circumstances of this case, constitute an interest running with the land thereby giving rise to an encumbrance on the leases which Blue Range listed for sale.

DISCUSSION

[18] Counsel for CanWest conceded in argument that the natural gas supply contracts in question do not contain the type of words which would normally be associated with either the creation of a security interest or the creation of an interest in land with the result that the entire foundation for their argument is based on the legal interpretation to be given to the word "dedicate" in the contracts. Counsel also candidly agreed that there are at present no authorities in support of the legal position they postulate.

[19] The word "dedicate" appears in a slightly different way in the various agreements filed in these proceedings. CanWest provided the various relevant provisions in Exhibit A to the Affidavit of Janet Vellutini.

In certain of the contracts, the following appears:

> "Seller herein agrees to dedicate Seller's share of the Remaining Recoverable Reserves to Buyer and Buyer herein agrees to accept such reserve dedication from Seller".

In seven of the nine contracts, the following appears:

> "3. The Assignee [Blue Range] covenants and agrees with CanWest that it now owns and possesses a right, title, interest and estate in the lands and leases formerly owned by the Assignor and dedicated to the Contract(s) as set out in the attached Schedule "A"."

In one of the contracts, the following appears:

> "Seller shall dedicate sufficient lands and gas reserves in the Silver area attached hereto as Schedule "A", ..."

[20] The ordinary meaning of the word dedicate, according to the Canadian Oxford Dictionary (1998, Oxford University Press, Toronto) includes:

b. commit, contribute, or set apart resources etc. for a particular cause or effort.

This word does not connote a transfer or assignment of an interest. Use of a word which connotes these elements would be more indicative of an intention to create an interest in land. In my view, the word "dedicate" alone, without more, should not be seen as creating anything other than a contractual covenant in favour of the other party to the contract.

[21] This word connotes to me only an intention by Blue Range to give an assurance of its ability to perform. By dedicating or setting apart reserves, Blue Range provides comfort to CanWest and the others that it has sufficient reserves so that it will be in a position to perform several years into the future.

[22] The necessity for and the value of a covenant of this nature would depend on the particular circumstances. If CanWest were dealing with a company that had very significant volumes of proven and probable reserves and the contracted volumes of CanWest were very small relative to those reserves, then the necessity for such a covenant might be diminished. On the other hand, if CanWest were dealing with a producer whose volumes of proven and probable reserves were not as significant and the contracted volumes represented a significant portion of those reserves then the value of or comfort gained by such a covenant might be increased.

[23] I make this observation as, in my view, there is nothing in our law which would prevent the parties if they so desired from using words which would manifest an intention to create an encumbrance in appropriate circumstances thereby giving more than mere comfort from the assurance.

[24] This situation is not unlike that in Scurry-Rainbow Oil Ltd. et al. v. Galloway Estate[2] in which Hunt J., as she then was, decided that certain royalty interests could amount to interests in land but that it depended on the specific language used. The case was appealed[3] and the Court described her analysis at page 69 as follows:

> ...Firstly, having concluded that the retention of the right of reversion in a give P.& N.G. lease could amount to an interest in land, she held that she then had to look at each of the subject leases to see if in fact that had been done;
> ...We find no reversible error in the learned trial judge's analysis...

[25] Moreover, according to Paragraph 15 of the Affidavit of Janet Vellutini of CanWest, eight of the nine CanWest contracts contain a restriction on assignment identical or similar to the following provision.

> Each party undertakes to the other party that it shall not assign this Agreement or any of its rights hereunder without the consent in writing of such other party, which consent shall not be withheld, if the proposed assignee undertakes in form satisfactory to such other party that each of its rights acquired by such assignment is subject to the rights, title and interest of such other party herein set forth.

Paragraph 16 of that same Affidavit says that six of the contracts contain a specific restriction on Blue Range disposing of its interest in the petroleum and natural gas leases covered by the Contracts identical or similar to the following provision:

> Seller's undertaking to sell Raw Gas (as set forth in Article VI hereof) is subject to the following reservations:
> > e. the right to dispose of Said Lands, or any part thereof, provided that such disposition is made subject to this agreement...

Only one of the nine contracts does not have such a provision. It apparently provides that Blue Range "can assign with consent if all lands [are] acquired"[4]. CanWest argues that these provisions are consistent with an intention to create an interest in land.

[26] In my view, these provisions do not assist their argument. Really, the contrary is true. If the word dedicate were found to constitute a legal encumbrance running with the land, there would be no need to have such covenants restricting assignment without consent or requiring a purchaser to honour the covenant. The later requirement, which is contractual in nature, indicates to me that the parties understood such a purchaser would not be so bound without specifically agreeing to be bound.

[27] As I said, I would not view the use of the word "dedicate" alone as manifesting such an intention but I see no reason why such an interest could not be created in appropriate circumstances by the use of appropriate language.

[28] Counsel referred me to the case of Bank of Montreal v. Dynex Petroleum Ltd.[5], where Rooke J. decided that royalty and net profit interest holders, whose rights were granted by a petroleum lessee, did not have interests in land. At page 70 he concluded that:

> ...the requirement for an interest in land, as held by a number of authorities and jurists in this jurisdiction and the Supreme Court of Canada, is, in simple language, that, as a matter of law, a lessee of an oil and gas lease (which is a profit a prendre), which is in itself an interest in land, obtained from a lessor (whether the Crown or freehold), cannot in law pass on an interest in land to a third party.[emphasis added]

[29] Applying that logic to this situation, the interest which the applicants want me to conclude that the parties intended to create could not have been created. As I have decided that, regardless of the principles in the above passage, the language of the instrument was insufficient to establish an intention to create an interest in land, I need not consider the application of the Dynex case to this case. That argument will be left for another day.

DECISION - ISSUE (2)

[30] For the reasons which follow, CanWest, Engage and Duke have not satisfied the Court that it is appropriate to vary the Order such that Blue Range should only be permitted to terminate the contracts if Blue Range is found to be incapable of performing them or that termination is essential to the success of the restructuring.

DISCUSSION

[31] CanWest and Engage have applied in the alternative, and they are joined in this argument by Duke, for an order either deleting entirely or amending accordingly clause 16.e of the March 2nd Order such that Blue Range would be prevented from terminating any of the applicable contracts without satisfying the Court that certain conditions have been satisfied.

[32] In view of my decision on the first issue, this second issue must be addressed in the context of the contracts being ordinary contractual arrangements between the marketing companies and Blue Range.

[33] The Applicants submit that it is unfair for Blue Range to be permitted to terminate its contracts pursuant to the March 2nd Order, when Blue Range has the natural gas to deliver and is capable of performing the contracts. The only rationale for allowing Blue Range to terminate the contracts, they say, is because they are below market and, as a result, Blue Range could increase its cash flow by selling natural gas under new contracts at today's higher rates.

[34] CanWest also submits that section 11 of the CCAA does not allow the Court to permit a debtor company to terminate contracts as part of a stay order.

[35] On the other hand, Blue Range's position, and it is shared by the Banks, is that the termination of the contracts should not be prevented as it is crucial to the reorganization of Blue Range.

[36] The purpose of the CCAA proceedings generally and the stay in particular is to permit a company time to reorganize its affairs. This reorganization may take many forms and they need not be listed in this decision. A common denominator in all of them is frequently the variation of existing contractual relationships. Blue Range might, as any person might, breach a contract to which they are a party. They must however bear the consequences. This is essentially what has happened here.

[37] A unilateral termination, as in any case of breach, may or may not give rise to a legitimate claim in damages. Although the Order contemplates and to a certain extent permits unilateral termination, nothing in section 16 .e or in any other part of the Order would suggest that Blue Range is to be relieved of this consequence; indeed Blue Range's liability for damages seems to have been assumed by Duke and Engage in their set-off argument. The application amounts to a request for an order of specific performance or an injunction which ought not to be available indirectly. In my view, an order authorizing the termination of contracts is appropriate in a restructuring, particularly given that it does not affect the creditors' rights to claim for damages.

[38] The Applicants are needless to say not happy about having to look to a frail and struggling company for a potentially significant damages claim. They will be relegated to the ranks of unsecured judgment creditors and may not, indeed likely will not, have their judgments satisfied in full. While I sympathise with the Applicants' positions, they ought not to, in the name of equity, the guide in CCAA proceedings, be able to elevate their claim for damages above the claims of all the other unsecured creditors through this route.

[39] As I said, one of the objectives of the CCAA is to provide relief to a beleaguered company from its obligations to individual creditors and to allow the detrimental repercussions of that relief to be dealt with as equitably as possible under a court approved plan.

[40] I will now turn briefly to CanWest's suggestion that the Court has no jurisdiction to countenance the termination by a debtor of its contracts. This is not the first time that such a provision has been included in a section 11 stay order.

[41] In Re Dylex Limited[6] Farley J. upheld an order which authorised the debtor to break a number of retail leases in shopping malls under which it was the tenant. Farley J. considered the equities of the situation and had regard to the relative commercial stamina of the parties before saying at p.110:

> I am therefore of the view that in weighing the balancing of interests in a CCAA context, the nod should continue to be given to Dylex which is in a precarious position as opposed to Cambridge which is in a sound financial condition...
> It is clear that s.11 of the CCAA gives the power to the court to sanction a plan which includes the termination of leases as part of a debtor's plan of arrangement... In the interim between the filing and the approval of a plan, the court has the inherent jurisdiction to fill in gaps in legislation so as to give effect to the objects of the CCAA, including the survival program of a debtor until it can present a plan.

[42] The termination of these contracts by Blue Range, as an adjunct to the disposition of the leases on favourable economic terms, is necessary to the company's survival program and I am satisfied that the Court has the necessary jurisdiction to permit termination. As to the broad discretion of the Courts under section 11 of the CCAA, reference should also be made to the discussion under Issue (3).

DECISION - ISSUE (3)

[44] For the reasons which follow, Engage and/or Duke are not entitled to set-off their anticipated damages for non-delivery against the payments that they owe for the natural gas deliveries of February and March.

DISCUSSION

Digitized by Google

[45] Engage and Duke seek to vary the March 2nd Order to allow them to set-off the payments that they owe for February and March, 1999, against anticipated damages arising from Blue Range's future non-performance.

[46] Factually the cases of the two companies vary slightly because Duke paid the amounts owing into court on the understanding that it would preserve its right to argue set-off and Engage did not.

[47] Further, the Duke contracts provided for the setting-off of anticipated damages from supply replacement against delivery payments upon receiving notice of the anticipated supply failures. The relevant clause of that contract is 6.1(g) which reads:

> (g) Any Alternate Gas Supply Damages payable hereunder shall be paid by Seller to Buyer on the 25th day of each month following the month in which they were incurred. The amount of Alternate Gas Supply Damages properly payable by Seller to Buyer hereunder may be offset by Buyer against amounts payable by Buyer hereunder as contemplated in Section 11.3....

[48] Additionally, the Engage contracts provided for a period of delay after non-payment for supply before the expiration of which Blue Range could not terminate the agreements for non-payment.

[49] Section 18.1 of the CCAA provides that the law of set-off applies to claims by and against the debtor company. It reads:

> 18.1. The law of set-off applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

[50] This section was added in 1997 by An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act[7]. It is clear from the wording of this passage that it neither prohibits nor requires the setting-off of obligations by a Court but merely states that the law of set-off, with its usual implications, applies to debtor companies. It is necessary then, to look to the principles of set-off in general.

[51] Quintette Coal Limited v. Nippon Steel Corporation[8] is one of the most helpful cases dealing with set-off in a CCAA context. In that case, the debtor company owned a coal mine which sold coal to a Japanese steel conglomerate. The conglomerate was the sole purchaser of the coal generated by the mine which would otherwise not have been an economic facility. Following a demand for payment of a debt to the conglomerate, the debtor company received CCAA protection with a stay order that, amongst other things, specifically prevented the Japanese conglomerate from exercising rights of set-off.

[52] The conglomerate was owed approximately $46 million as a result of favourable decision on a retroactive pricing arbitration and sought to set-off this amount against payments for coal deliveries, some already received and some yet to be received.

[53] On an application to vary the specific prohibition and thus allow set-off, Thackray J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court stated:

> Nor do I accept the proposition that the order forces an overpayment by J.S.I. for future coal deliveries. They are obliged to pay, and Quintette is obliged to accept, a price set pursuant to the arbitration award or any variation thereof pursuant to any appeal of that award [the damages owed by the debtor co]. The award has created a debt owed by Quintette to J.S.I. and I see that as completely distinguishable from the debts incurred by J.S.I. for future coal deliveries.
> Mr. G. Muench, in his short but able presentation, said that he could not see why J.S.I. should be treated any differently than any other creditor of Quintette. In spite of the able arguments of Mr. McAlpine, neither can I.[9]

The reasoning underlying this decision also emerges from the following passage:

> Unless there is a sound legal principle for doing so, I must not carve out one portion of the order and give an advantage to one creditor over another[10].

[54] The British Columbia Court of Appeal[11] affirmed the decision of Thackray J. One of the issues on the appeal was whether the power to stay set-off rights was granted to a Court by section 11 of the CCAA. The Court held that it was and relied upon the wide discretion conferred upon the Courts to achieve the CCAA's purpose of holding creditors at bay to assist a debtor company in surviving as a going concern.

[55] Counsel for Duke and Engage argued that section 18.1 came into being after the Quintette decision and that it therefore brings the continued usefulness of the decision into question. While I am inclined to agree with Thackray J. in the B.C.S.C. decision that allowing set-off runs contrary to the purpose of the CCAA by unfairly subordinating the rights of other creditors, I do not, in view of section 18.1, consider that reason as a ground for this decision.

[56] Parliament has specifically mandated that, notwithstanding the well known purpose of the Act as a whole, namely to share amongst all of the creditors the asset shortfall, the general law of set-off is to apply to debts owed or claimed by the debtor company.

Digitized by Google

[57] That this is the appropriate way to approach the problem is supported by the analysis of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Citibank Canada and Confederation Life Insurance Company in Liquidation et al.[12]. In that case, a company sought to set-off against amounts owed by it to a debtor company in liquidation under the Winding Up Act[13] part of the debtor's liability to it arising from the termination of certain swap agreements.

[58] While the Winding Up Act provided for set-off, it is clear that the Court had the same reservations as are expressed here about effectively granting priority to one creditor over the other creditors.

The Court stated:

> "Citibank seeks a set-off to have the moneys owing to it paid in full and, in the process, reduce its indebtedness. Citibank would thereby gain a distinct advantage over the other creditors who must stand behind the policy holders and wait to recover pari passu in accordance with the priorities established under the Act. There would be little, if any recovery for the other creditors.
> Section 73 of the Winding Up Act preserves the right of set-off on a winding up. It provides as follows:
> > 73. The law of set-off, as administered by the Courts, whether of law or equity, applies to all claims on the estate of a company, and to all proceedings for the recovery of debts due or accruing due to a company at the commencement of the winding-up of the company, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the business of the company was not being wound up under this Act.
> A right of set-off can arise by agreement, at law or in equity...There is no question of an agreement to set-off in this case. Further, Citibank concedes on this appeal that it cannot meet the test for equitable set-off...Therefore, the question is whether there can be set-off at law"[14].

[59] The Court of Appeal held that there could be no legal set-off as the claims were not sufficiently certain to be liquidated claims. What is important to note is that, notwithstanding the same policy concerns as to priority, where the legislation had mandated the applicability of the law of set-off, the Court proceeded to consider whether the claim for set-off should be allowed in the circumstances of the case.

[60] Blair J. who heard the application in first instance[15] also discussed the effect of set-off on priorities. After quoting section 73 of the Winding Up Act, Blair J. said at paragraph 29:

> "This provision - along with a similar (although not identical) provision in section 97(3) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, as amended - preserves the law of set -off as administered by the courts, in such insolvency situations. In this fashion set-off becomes the policy mechanism whereby the competing "equities" emerging from the dilemma outlined at the beginning of these reasons are balanced.
> In insolvency situations, set-off provides a creditor with an advantage which other creditors, ranking pari passu except for the set-off, do not have. It puts the advantaged creditor in what is tantamount to a secured position, something which was not a part of the bargain with the insolvent company in the first place. On the other hand, there is an inherent unfairness where a debtor/creditor is required to pay the liquidator everything that is legitimately owed to the insolvent company but is only able to collect a fraction of what is equally legitimately owing by the insolvent company, if anything".

[61] The Court concluded that the legislature had resolved this issue in favour of the application of the general law of set-off and proceeded to apply the law. With the advent of section 18.1 of the CCAA, the same answer holds in this case and I am bound to consider the question of set-off without reference to the policy concern of potentially creating priorities between various creditors.

[62] Counsel on all sides rely upon the same authorities and there appears not to be any disagreement as to the principles upon which determinations of set-off are made. It is not contended that legal set-off is available in this case as the claims to be set-off are unliquidated.

[63] Conversely, "equitable set-off is available where there is a claim for a money sum whether liquidated or unliquidated"[16]. With respect to equitable set-off, Counsel refer to the Supreme Court of Canada's application of the law of equitable set-off as found in Telford v. Holt[17]. In that case, two parties exchanged two parcels of land and granted each other mortgages with the difference to be set-off and netted-out. However, before closing, one party assigned its mortgage to a third party who subsequently foreclosed on the property and sought to enforce the entire amount of the mortgage.

[64] The Supreme Court found that equitable, but not legal, set-off applied to the claim. I note that that case and the authorities discussed therein are concerned primarily with the application of equitable set-off to situations in which one of the two parties to a contract (usually a mortgage) has assigned its rights under that contract to a third party.

Digitized by Google

[65] Counsel for both the Banks and for Duke refer to five enumerated principles found at page 398 of that case as standing for the state of the law of equitable set-off.

> 1. The party relying on a set-off must show some equitable ground for being protected against his adversary's demands: Rawson et al. v. Samuel (1841), Cr. & Ph. 161, 41 E.R. 451.
> 2. The equitable ground must go to the very root of the plaintiff's claim before a set-off will be allowed: [Br. Anzani (Felixstowe) Ltd. v. Int'l Marine Mgmt (U.K.) Ltd., [1980] Q.B. 137, [1979] 3 W.L.R. 451, [1979] 2 All E.R. 1063]
> 3. A cross-claim must be so clearly connected with the demand of the plaintiff that it would be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into consideration the cross claim: [Federal Commerce & Navigation Ltd. v. Molena Alpha Inc., [1978] Q.B. 927, [1978] 3 W.L.R. 309, [1978] 3 All E.R. 1066].
> 4. The plaintiff's claim and the cross-claim need not arise out of the same contract: Bankes v. Jarvis, [1903] 1 K.B. 549 (Div.Ct.); Br. Anzani.
> 5. Unliquidated claims are on the same footing as liquidated claims: [Nfld. V. Nfld. Ry. Co. (1888), 13 App.Cas. 199 (P.C.)].

[66] I should point out that those principles appeared in the Court's discussion of prior cases as part of a quote from the British Columbia Court of Appeal's decision in Coba Industries Ltd. v. Millie's Holdings (Canada) Ltd.[18].

[67] Nevertheless, both counsel contend that it is a correct statement of the law to be applied to the issues at hand and I concur. The Court decided that the debts should be set-off since they arose out of the same contract or closely interrelated contracts such that it would be unfair to enforce only one side of the land exchange agreement[19].

[68] It is clear that the overriding concern for a court faced with an application for equitable set-off is fairness whether it be formulated as "manifestly unfair[20]", "unfair[21]", "unjust and unreasonable[22]", "unconscionable[23]" or as any of the other descriptions that have been invoked in support of the doctrine's application.

[69] Counsel for Duke favours the formulation found in British Anzani (Felixstowe) Ltd. v. Int's marine Management (U.K.) Ltd.[24] in which Forbes J. stated at p.1076 that:

> "It would in my view be manifestly unjust to allow the landlord to recover his rent without taking into account the damages which it is alleged the tenant has suffered through failure by the landlord to perform his part of the agreement".

Spry, The Principles of Equitable Remedies fifth ed. (1997, Carswell, Agincourt) at p. 173 introduces the topic of equitable set-off with the following words at page 173:

> ...To decide that there is an equitable set-off is to decide that, on grounds that are set out hereunder, it would be unjust to order the specific enforcement of a particular obligation without lessening or reducing it by reference to a related obligation of the plaintiff to the defendant or making specific enforcement conditional on performance of that related obligation.

[70] A passage from the fourth edition is quoted by the Alberta Court of Appeal in 420093 B.C.Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal[25].

[71] The case was predominantly concerned with the operation of the doctrine of res judicata and the Court decided that if the claims could have been raised as matters of equitable set-off, the claims were res judicata. The Court, did, however, at page 500 make the following comments by way of obiter dicta:

> The nature of equitable set-off is explained in I.C.G. Spry, The Principles of Equitable Remedies, 4th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1990). After observing that it is not sufficient to assert an unrelated cross-claim or even to plead a claim which arises out of the same transaction as the plaintiff's claim, the author states at p. 174:
> > What must be established is a relationship between the respective claims of the parties which is such that the claim of the defendant has been brought about by, or has been contributed to by, or is otherwise closely bound up with, the rights that are relied on by the plaintiff and which is also such that it would be unconscionable that he should proceed without permitting a set-off. Thus if conduct of the plaintiff is such as to induce the defendant to incur an obligation in favour of the plaintiff, and the conduct itself is fraudulent, negligent or otherwise wrongful so as to give a cause of action to the defendant, the plaintiff is not ordinarily permitted to proceed until he has made good the material claims of the defendant.
> > In other cases also it will, where appropriate, be held that an equitable set off lies, provided that it appears that the claim of the defendant does in truth impeach that of the plaintiff, for the application of the principles that are here in question should not be > arbitrarily restricted. Thus the better view is that this category of equitable set-offs extends to cases where a relevant claim is, not for a sum of money, but for the possession of property or some other non-pecuniary item.

In Bank of Boston Connecticut v. European Grain and Shipping Ltd. [1989] 2 W.L.R. 440, the House of Lords held at p.452 that the test is to determine whether the cross-claim in question is one "flowing out of and being inseparably connected with the transaction", that is, the transaction giving rise to the plaintiff's claim. Spry says that this apparently new and more generous test is merely an instance of the traditional one which requires the defendant's claim to be "so closely connected with his [the plaintiff's] demands that it would be manifestly unjust to allow him to enforce payment without taking into account the cross claim": (p.176). [emphasis added]

[72] Therefore, I conclude that the question to be asked is whether the anticipated damages are so closely connected to the payments for February and March natural gas that it would be manifestly unjust or unfair to require Duke and Engage to pay Blue Range for the natural gas without permitting Duke and Engage to set-off their claims for unliquidated damages.

[73] The obligation to pay for the gas delivered in February and March arose upon its delivery. At the point in time of each of the deliveries, there were no damages. Thus, Engage and Duke had a contractual obligation to pay for the natural gas at a point in time when they had suffered no damages albeit there was trouble on the horizon.

[74] The anticipated damages for the higher cost of replacement natural gas only arise later and the cause of them is the prospective termination of the contract with the resulting failure of the delivery of natural gas from April onwards. They do not arise from a problem with the February and March deliveries.

[75] Fundamentally, Engage and Duke contracted to buy natural gas from Blue Range. They contracted to pay for it on a month to month basis. They were delivered natural gas. They accepted the natural gas delivered and have sold or otherwise utilized the natural gas received.

[76] Now, when payment is due they do not want to pay for it. The reason they give is that Blue Range's suspension of future deliveries will make them incur future damages. In my view, the future damages from the non-deliveries are sufficiently independent that it is not manifestly unjust to require Engage and Duke to pay for the natural gas that they have received.

[77] Counsel for Duke, in argument, cited the Duke contract which provided for the setting-off of replacement cost damages against delivery payments. There was, however, notwithstanding this clause, no serious attempt to argue contractual set-off. This, I presume, is because the provision allowed for damages for a given month to be set-off only against payments for the same month.

[78] If anything, this provision serves to reinforce the view that damages for future non-deliveries are not so closely connected to past deliveries that fairness demands their being set-off against payments for previous deliveries.

[79] While Counsel for Engage and Duke have endeavoured valiantly to distinguish the Quintette case, they have not succeeded on one part of the decision. It is to be remembered that the purchasing company wanted to set off past debts of the insolvent company (from the retroactive price review) against their future obligation to pay the insolvent company for ongoing coal deliveries. This was the exact inverse of the situation at bar where the companies wish to set off future damages owed them against their past payment obligations.

[80] In my view, while the chronology is reversed, the principle is the same. The situation in that case led the Supreme Court to say, at p.296:

> The award has created a debt owed by Quintette to J.S.I. and I see that as completely distinguishable from the debts incurred by J.S.I. for future coal deliveries.

[81] This observation is not affected by the change in the CCAA provisions to allow set-off. The legislature has spoken. In this case, the principles of set-off are to be applied. The issue for the Court is whether through the application of those principles a set-off should be permitted in the circumstances of this case.

[82] The anticipated damages arise after the completion of the deliveries. They arise after the stay order. They become an unsecured claim just like the claim of any other unsecured creditor of Blue Range and lack the necessary relatedness to the deliveries and the consequent unfairness to take them out of this category.

[83] Quite to the contrary, the applicants should share with the other unsecured creditors the burden of the reorganization and to hold otherwise would be potentially unfair to the other creditors.

[84] In any event, although this was not argued before me with much emphasis (other than indirectly at paragraph 4.c. of the Blue Range Brief), as regards the March deliveries (which for all but one day occurred after the order was issued), it seems to me that it ought to have been well known to both Engage and Duke that trade taking place with a debtor company in CCAA protection after the implementation of a stay order is generally conducted on a cash basis.

Digitized by Google

[85] Indeed paragraph 34 of the March 2nd Order stipulates that post-petition creditors supplying goods or services to Blue Range after the order are entitled to be paid in accordance with their terms of credit. It further provides that, where the supply spans time before and after the order, they are a post-petition creditor only for the portion of the supply made after the order. In short, trade is to be conducted on a cash basis.

[86] Since Blue Range is not purely a consumer of goods and supplies it is implicit in this paragraph of the order that sales by Blue Range will be conducted on the same cash basis as sales to Blue Range. This would require Engage and Duke to pay their post-order delivery debts as they became due, notwithstanding any potential damage claims.

CONCLUSION

COSTS

[88] While Blue Range has been put to the expense of contesting these applications, Blue Range will benefit significantly from the result in that it will be entitled to receive significant payments for the February and March deliveries. On the other hand, Duke and Engage have raised significant issues of more general import and will potentially suffer significant costs in finding replacement natural gas. This being so, it is not my intention to award any costs in these applications to any of the parties who appeared and made representations.

DATED at Calgary, Alberta this 18th day of June, 1999.

INTRODUCTION

Digitized by Google

[1] On March 24, 2000, the initial order in these proceedings was made by Moore C.J., providing for, inter alia, a stay of proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA").

[2] On June 2, 2000, Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia ("B.C. Government") filed a Voting/Distribution Dispute Notice with Canadian Airlines Corporation and Canadian Airlines International Ltd. (collectively, "Canadian"), claiming tax liabilities owed to it by Canadian. Canadian rejected that notice as it was presented past the Claims Bar Date of May 5, 2000 established under the amended plan of arrangement ("Plan"). By my order dated June 28, 2000, the B.C. Government received an extension to June 30, 2000 to file the notice.

[3] On June 29, 2000 the B.C. Government filed a Voting/Distribution Dispute Notice ("Dispute Notice") with Canadian in the amount of $1,859,777.53.

[4] The Dispute Notice also identified tax refunds owing to Canadian by the B.C. Government. The amount of the refunds owing at June 29, 2000 was $1,732,268.47.

[5] The B.C. Government asserted a right to set-off any refunds owed to Canadian against the tax liabilities owed by Canadian pursuant to section 18.1 of the CCAA, which states:

> The law of set-off applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

[6] The Alberta Court of Appeal recently considered this section in Blue Range Resource Corp. (Re), 2000 ABCA 200 (CanLII), 2000 ABCA 200 and confirmed that notwithstanding the application of the section may have the result of preferring one creditor over others, Parliament, by enacting s. 18.1, made the decision that the general law of set-off is to apply in CCAA proceedings.

[7] Canadian denied the entitlement to set-off and the matter was brought before the Claims Officer appointed in these proceedings. The Claims Officer determined that only a portion of Canadian's tax liabilities were capable of being set-off against tax refunds owing to it by the B.C. Government. The B.C. Government appeals from this decision.

II. BACKGROUND FACTS

[8] The Dispute Notice claims the following tax liabilities owed to the B.C. Government by Canadian:

a. $1,673,299.42 under the Social Services Tax Act , R.S.B.C., 1996, c.431 (tax relating to the sale of consumables, capital additions, liquor and uniform), including penalties and interest; and

b. $187,478.11 under the Motor Fuel Tax Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 317(tax relating to unauthorized use of coloured fuel) including interest.

[9] The Dispute Notice also identified tax refunds owing to Canadian. At March 24, 2000, the refunds totalled $645,320.92. As noted, as at June 29, 2000, the date of the Dispute Notice, the refunds totalled $1,732,268.47. The refunds all arise under the Motor Fuel Tax Act and represent a rebate of a three-cent/litre tax embedded in the purchase price of jet fuel, payable on the basis that the fuel was used on international flights.

[10] The B.C. Government claimed that it is entitled to set-off the Motor Fuel Tax Act refunds against both the Motor Fuel Tax Act and the Social Services Tax Act liabilities, based on legal, equitable or statutory set-off. It argued that the Claims Officer's decision was wrong and that the court is entitled to substitute its discretion for his as this is a de novo application.

[11] Canadian asserted that the Claims Officer's decision is to be afforded a high degree of deference. It went on to argue that the B.C. Government's rights to set-off are restricted to those contained in the very specific provisions of the Social Services Tax Act, the Motor Fuel Tax Act and the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation and that the B.C. Government is not entitled to set-off under those provisions. Alternatively, Canadian argued that if legal and equitable set-off are available, the B.C. Government failed to meet the respective tests.

III. ISSUES

1. What is the standard of review of the decision of the Claims Officer?
2. Is the B.C. Government entitled to legal set-off?
3. Is the B.C. Government entitled to equitable set-off?
4. Is the B.C. Government entitled to statutory set-off?
5. If set-off is available, what tax liabilities in which period of time are subject to be set-off against what refunds?

IV. ANALYSIS

1. Standard of Review

Digitized by Google

[12] The B.C. Government relies on two decisions to support its argument that this hearing is de novo: Westminer Canada Holdings Ltd.* v. *Coughlan reflex, (1990), 73 D.L.R. (4th) 584 (Ont. C.A.) and Olympia and York Developments Ltd. (Re), [1994] O.J. No. 1335 (Gen. Div.) online: QL (OJ).

[13] Westminer, supra is not a CCAA case. It simply applies Stoicevski* v. *Casement (1983), 43 O.R. (2d) 436, in which the Ontario Court of Appeal held that while ordinarily interlocutory orders made by the exercise of judicial discretion will not be interfered with unless they are clearly wrong, if the interlocutory order relates to a "vital" issue, the appellate court can substitute its own discretion for that of the court below. In Olympia and York Developments Ltd. supra, which was a CCAA case, Farley J. also applied Stoicevski. He described the decision of the claims officer in determining the quantum of a claim which could have ultimately defeated the plan in question, as "knife edge vital". He also commented on the short time available to the claims officer to make the determination as strengthening his decision to substitute his own discretion for that of the claims officer.

[14] The law in Alberta relating to appeals of interlocutory orders differs from the law in Ontario, at least vis-`a-vis appeals from a Master. In Alberta, such appeals are de novo: Wright* v. *Disposal Services Ltd. and Marsh 1977 CanLII 619 (AB QB), (1978), 4 Alta. L.R.(2d) 173 (Q.B.) at. 177-78. The court in that case found that the discretionary jurisdiction possessed by a superior court trial judge by virtue of his federal appointment cannot be fettered in any way by a previous decision of a Master, who is appointed by the provincial Crown.

[15] An appointment by a Queen's Bench justice of a claims officer to handle disputes in the CCAA claims process and thereby save time and expense, cannot include a grant of the sort of deference that is impeded by the Constitution when it comes to decisions of Masters of this court, as described in Wright, supra. Canadian argued that if the appeal is de novo, then what is the point of having a claims officer? On that logic, one might also question the utility of Masters. Just as Masters fulfill a critical role in the Court of Queen's Bench, so do claims officers in CCAA proceedings. It does not follow from this, however, that the appeal from the claims officer will be a true appeal and not de novo. Unlike a specialized tribunal with unique knowledge to which the court may defer, the Claims Officer in these proceedings was appointed for the purpose of expediting a process which by necessity must be summary. This summary nature is not to operate so as to fetter the court's discretion.

[16] While Canadian's counsel did argue that the decision of the Claims Officer ought to be afforded significant deference, he acknowledged that Canadian's filing of a further affidavit in addition to that before the Claims Officer weakened its position that the appeal before me was not de novo.

[17] In my view, the ruling of the Claims Officer certainly deserves the court's respect. However, the court is free to substitute its own discretion.

[18] I now turn to the three bases upon which the B.C. Government claims an entitlement to set-off.

2. Legal set-off

[19] The test for legal set-off has been variously described by courts across the country. In its simplest form, legal set-off requires "the fulfilment of two conditions. The first is that both obligations must be debts. The second is that both debts must be mutual cross-obligations": Telford* v. Holt 1987 CanLII 18 (SCC), (1987), 41 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C.) at 393 , adopting Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. *Tuckerr Industries Inc. 1983 CanLII 302 (BC CA), (1983), 149 D.L.R. (3d) 172 at p. 174 (B.C.C.A.) . However, as stated by K. Palmer in The Law of Set-Off in Canada (Aurora: Canada Law Book, 1993) at 21, each of these elements has its own problems and parts. Mr. Palmer goes on to provide a neat summary of the various expressions of the test that reflects these:

> 1. The cross claims must be enforceable in debt, which entails setting up a claim which is liquidated, enforceable and mature.
> 2. The mutual claims for any rights to set-off must have accrued to the original creditor and debtor prior to any assignment to the existing plaintiff or defendant. (p. 21)

I will consider each of these elements in turn.

a. enforceable in debt

[20] Canadian has objected to a small portion of one assessment relating to the taxation of Canadian's use of aircraft fluids in the amount of $133, 938.34 and to its liability for any penalties on all of the assessments. As a result, Canadian argued that the validity and quantum of the tax liabilities have been placed into question and therefore are not liquidated. This dispute will be adjudicated by consent under the normal statutory and legislative processes in place in British Columbia and until that is completed, Canadian argued, it cannot be said that there is a specified sum that is payable by Canadian to the B.C. Government. Canadian essentially suggested that due to its objection to the claim by the B.C. Government, the tax liabilities are not liquidated until a court confirms the liabilities are "debts" and rules on the amount for which Canadian is liable to pay.

Digitized by Google

[21] I cannot agree that the tax liabilities are not "debts". There are many definitions of debt contained in Canadian jurisprudence and academic commentary, such as:

> ..."mutual debts" mean practically debts due from either party to the other for liquidated sums, or money demands which can be ascertained with certainty at the time of pleading": Telford* v. *Holt, supra at p. 393-394, citing Royal Trust* v. *Holden (1915), 22 D.L.R. 660 (Ont. C.A.) at 662-663;
> "a sum payable in respect of a liquidated money demand, recoverable by action": Diewold* v. *Diewold, [1941] 1 D.L.R. 561(S.C.C.) at 564;
> "in substance there is a liquidated demand in money": National Bank fur Deutschland* v. *Blucher, 1927 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1927] S.C.R. 420 at 426;
> "What is a debt but merely a duty, an obligation to pay?": Love* v. *Bell Piano (Furniture) Co. (1909), 10 W.L.R. 657 at 659 (Alta. T.D.);
> "the word "debt" is not today a term of art with a clear, never-changing denotation. Instead of trying to define a core meaning, it would seem better to agree with the editors of the Corpus Juris Secundum that "[the word] takes shades of meaning from the occasion of its use, and color from accompanying use, and it is used in different statutes and constitutions in senses varying from a very restricted to a very general one". One can say that the most common use of the word "debt" is to describe an obligation to pay a sum certain or a sum readily reducible to a certainty... but to this writer the essence of the term is that, if there is an obligation to pay a certain or ascertainable sum, the courts should tend not to concern themselves with the precise nature of the cause of action": C.R.B. Dunlop, Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1995) at 16.

[22] The amounts contained in the Dispute Notice are plain; it is clear that a liquidated sum has been claimed as owing by the B.C. Government. On any of these definitions, the B.C. Government's claim is in debt as distinct from damages or a property claim, both of which are excluded from legal set-off under this first requirement.

[23] The governing legislation similarly makes it plain that the assessments issued by the B.C. Government represent obligations that must be paid notwithstanding any appeals. Section 115 of the Social Services Tax Act provides for the issuing of an assessment for tax that is payable and s.120 provides that any liability for payment under the Act, including an assessment, is not delayed by virtue of the appeal process. Sections 43 and 52 of the Motor Fuel Tax Act are similarly phrased. In other words, simply because Canadian disagrees that it is liable for a portion of the assessments and has embarked on an appeal process, it is still required to pay the amounts set out in the assessments. Section 120(2) of the Social Services Tax Act and s. 52(2) of the Motor Fuel Tax Act provide a remedy to the taxpayer who succeeds on appeal after being made to pay what the government has said is owing under the statute; a refund will be made of the excess amount of tax paid plus any interest or penalties imposed. The obligation to pay is not removed or suspended until the appeal process has been exhausted.

[24] As noted, Canadian does not object to the entirety of the tax liabilities. It has consented to have its liability for payment of the disputed portion adjudicated in British Columbia according to the procedure set out in the governing legislation. Simply because Canadian has taken the position that it is not liable to pay a portion of the tax liabilities, however, does not change the nature of the B.C. Government's claim. It is still a debt that according to the relevant legislation is payable now despite Canadian's objection. It cannot be right that simply by challenging an assessment, an insolvent taxpayer can erect an effectively permanent roadblock to the government's right to set-off. While there are many examples in the case law of legal set-off failing because the debt in question had not matured or was subject to an unfulfilled condition precedent at the material time, Canadian provided no authority suggesting that a challenged debt under a statutory regime such as that contained in the Social Services Tax Act and Motor Fuel Tax Act is not a liquidated debt for the purposes of legal set-off . Even if such authority had been provided, however, it would have been entirely appropriate in the circumstances of this case to carve out the disputed portion of the tax liabilities and leave the unchallenged balance available for set-off.

[25] Canadian next argued that the B.C. Government did not issue an assessment for the tax liability under the Motor Fuel Tax Act and seemed to suggest that this prevented the liability under that statute from being liquidated. While the amount claimed under the Motor Fuel Tax Act is as specific and plain as the amount claimed under the Social Services Tax Act, s. 43 of the Motor Fuel Tax Act appears to require an assessment. Without it, a question is raised about the enforceability of the tax liabilities under the Motor Fuel Tax Act. Counsel for the B.C. Government did not respond to Canadian's argument in this regard and I am not satisfied that the claim for tax liabilities under the Motor Fuel Tax Act meets the first requirement of legal set-off.

[26] Counsel agreed that the refunds arose from an embedded tax contained in the price of fuel purchased by Canadian. There is no issue between the parties that the refunds represented a liquidated debt.

Digitized by Google

[27] I find that the tax liabilities under the Social Services Tax Act and the refunds under the Motor Fuel Tax Act satisfy the first requirement of legal set-off.

b. mutuality

[28] Canadian conceded that the cross - obligations in issue existed between the same parties - Canadian and the B.C. Government.

[29] However, Canadian suggested that the distinct statutory regimes and factual bases under which the bulk of the tax liabilities and the entirety of the refunds arose prevented the obligations from being "in the same right", a necessary element of mutuality based on the following expression of this second requirement of legal set-off contained in Citibank Canada v. Confederation Life Insurance Co. 1996 CanLII 8269 (ON SC), (1996), 42 C.B.R. (3d) 288 (Ont. Gen. Div.) at p. 298, aff'd (1998), O.R.(3d) 226 (C.A.):

> For set-off at law to occur, the following circumstances must arise:
> 1. The obligations existing between the two parties must be debts, and they must be debts which are for liquidated sums or money demands which can be ascertained with certainty; and
> 2. Both debts must be mutual cross-obligations, i.e. cross-claims between the same parties and in the same right. (emphasis added)

[30] As the discussion later in these reasons illustrates, there is indeed a close connection between the cross-obligations. However, with respect, Canadian's interpretation of "in the same right" is incorrect. To accept it would be to import a connection requirement into legal set-off. It is important to remember that the connection requirement appears to have developed as a basis upon which it would be fair to allow set-off in the absence of liquidated claims and/or existing mutuality between the parties. K. Palmer states at p. 21 of The Law of Set-Off in Canada, supra, as follows:

> There is no requirement in legal set-off that the debts be connected in any manner. This is probably the most important difference remaining between equitable and legal set-off which allows a claim in legal set-off to have any effect.

[31] The Alberta Court of Appeal recognized this in Aboussafy v. Abacus Cities Ltd. (1981), 39 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 at 10:

> There was no set-off at common law. It was introduced into the law of England by statute...and made to apply only as between liquidated claims, although these claims may be unrelated. This is what he [sic] might call legal set-off. (emphasis added)

[32] I accept the explanation of "in the same right"contained at pp. 46-47 of The Law of Set-off in Canada, as follows:

> Whether debts exist in the same right refers to whether the debtor and creditor are liable solely to each other or to each other jointly with third parties. Again, this is simply a question of mutuality: if a debt is held jointly, rather than jointly and severally, it is not immediately clear how responsibility for the debt may be fairly divided when a set-off is claimed by a debtor who has not dealt with all the joint parties. What burden or benefit must the joint debtholders bear or receive due to the actions of one of their group? The presence of any such uncertainty generally will disallow set-off for the debts not being in the same right.

[33] Accordingly, I find that the second requirement of legal set-off is also met in this case and that Canadian is entitled at law to set off the refunds against the Social Services Tax Act liabilities.

3. Equitable set-off

[34] If I am incorrect that legal set-off is available, I find that the B.C. Government would be entitled to exercise equitable set-off in any case.

[35] The parties agreed with the principles of equitable set-off expressed in Coba Industries Ltd. v. Millie's Holdings (Canada) Ltd. 1985 CanLII 144 (BC CA), (1985), 20 D.L.R. (4th) 689 (B.C.C.A.), approved in Telford v. Holt, supra at pp. 398-399:

> 1. The party relying on set-off must show some equitable ground for being protected against his adversary's demands: Rawson et al. v. Samuel (1841)., Cr. & Ph. 161, 41 E.R. 451.
> 2. The equitable ground must go to the very root of the plaintiff's claim before a set-off will be allowed: [Br. Anzani (Felixstowe) Ltd. v. Int'l Marine Mgmt (U.K.) Ltd., [1980] Q.B. 137, [1979] 3 W.L.R. 451, [1979] 2 All E.R. 1063].
> 3. A cross-claim must be so clearly connected with the demand of the plaintiff that it would be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiff to enforce payment without taking into consideration the cross-claim:[Federal Commerce & Navigation Ltd. v. Molena Alpha Inc., [1978] Q.B. 927, [1978] 3 W.L.R. 309, [1978] 3 All E.R. 1066].
> 4. The plaintiff's claim and the cross-claim need not arise out of the same contract: Bankes v. Jarvis, [1903] 1 K.B. 549 (Div. Ct.); Br. Anzani

Digitized by Google

5. Unliquidated claims are on the same footing as liquidated claims: [Nfld v. Nfld. Ry. Co. (1888), 13 App. Cas. 199 (P.C.)].

[36] Just as was the case before the Alberta Court of Appeal in Blue Range, supra, the only contentious aspect of the assertion of equitable set-off in this case is the "close connection" between the cross-obligations. As stated in Blue Range, that is the "important point for invoking equitable set-off" (para. 19).

[37] Canadian emphasized that the bulk of the tax liabilities and all of the refunds respectively arose under distinct statutory taxation regimes governing different types of taxes and embodying different policy motives. Canadian noted that the refunds represent payments due to Canadian by way of a rebate of an embedded tax on jet fuel, pursuant to the Motor Fuel Tax Act and Motor Fuel Tax Regulation, while the majority of the tax liabilities represent an assessed underpayment by Canadian with respect to previous purchases of goods or services, such as liquor and uniforms, pursuant to the Social Services Tax Act. Canadian therefore argued that the cross-obligations were not sufficiently connected. The Claims Officer was persuaded by this argument and found that "while the two pieces of legislation do not establish complete codes of the rights as between the parties, it is clear that the two statutes establish different regimes for the payment of tax".

[38] I do not find those arguments persuasive. To the extent that the Social Services Tax Act and the Motor Fuel Tax Act create distinct taxation regimes, I would expect no less as otherwise management of the various taxes they address would become impossible. Canadian also emphasized that distinct branches of the B.C. Government administered the Social Services Tax Act and the Motor Fuel Tax Act liabilities in support of its argument that there was an insufficient connection to support equitable set-off. Canadian conceded, however, in the context of its submissions on the application of legal set-off, that government departments are not separately incorporated and therefore are not distinct legal entities. An action taken against a particular department of the government is still considered an action against the Crown (see for example, Glaxo Canada* v. Canada reflex, (1987), 11 F.T.R. 121 (T.D.), citing Perepelytz v. *Department of Highways for Ontario (1958), 12 D.L.R. (2d) 81 (S.C.C.)) and therefore it is reasonable to treat the Crown as one entity for the purposes of set-off.

[39] In short, the taxes may arise under separate acts and be administered separately by different departments, but these are artificial bases on which to sever the fundamental connection of the taxpayer-tax collector relationship in this case that is also reflected in the connection between the cross-obligations themselves. The obligation owed by Canadian is for tax and the obligation owed by the B.C. Government is for refunds of tax and these cross-obligations arise out of the same relationship between these two parties. As well, the funds flow in and out of the same source - the coffers of the B.C. Government as taxing authority - and in effect, Canadian is seeking to make a withdrawal from that fund without paying in full what it owes to that fund.

[40] A similar approach was taken by the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench in National Bank of Canada* v. *Saskatchewan Property Management Corp. reflex, [1993], 7 W.W.R. 636. In that case, the bankrupt GeoData owed Education and Health tax to the Saskatchewan government but was also owed money by the Saskatchewan Property Management Corp., a Crown agency entirely funded with tax revenues. The court held at page 640:

> Through various taxation statutes, including The Education and Health Tax Act, R.S.S. 1978, c.E-3, as amended, the Crown is able to generate revenue. Revenue that is used by various provincial departments of government and by Crown corporations. The basis of S.P.M.C.'s funding is tax revenue. GeoData's liability is more than a simple liability for the payment of a debt. It is a liability for the payment of taxes. In the particular circumstances I consider the connection between the claims to be close enough to warrant the application of equitable set-off.
> It is not fair to allow National (GeoData's assignee) to obtain payment, from funds generated by tax revenue, of a GeoData receivable, without ensuring that GeoData's tax liability is paid.

[41] The relationship between the parties and the cross-obligations in this case is more direct than that in National Bank. In that case there was no mutuality but the court found the requisite connection in the fact that the money that the Crown agency was using to pay the debtor was generated by tax revenue. Here, we are dealing solely with the B.C. Government and the same relationship - that of taxpayer-tax collector - is the basis of both cross-obligations.

[42] Canadian also argued that section 11(3) of the Crown Proceedings Act , R.S.B.C. 1996, c.89, which prohibits taxpayers from raising set-off against taxes owing, destroys any connection that otherwise might exist between taxes and refunds. The flaw in that argument is that it is not the taxpayer seeking to set-off, but the tax collector, in the CCAA context. Just because the Crown Proceedings Act precludes set-off by the taxpayer does not similarly preclude the B.C. Government from setting-off refunds owing to Canadian.

[43] In Cam-Net Communications* v. *Vancouver Telephone Co., 1999 BCCA 751 (CanLII), 1999 BCCA 751 the British Columbia Court of Appeal recognized equitable set-off in the CCAA context and found that it would be unjust to separate the cross-claims in issue there.

Digitized by Google

[44] Similarly, I find in this case that it would be manifestly unfair for a taxpayer not to pay taxes under one statute, while collecting a refund of tax under another statute, each involving the same tax collector.

[45] For these reasons, I find that the B.C. Government would be entitled in equity to set-off the refunds against the tax liabilities.

4. Statutory Set-off

[46] The B.C. Government submitted that if the court found that legal and equitable set-off were not available, then s. 38 of the Financial Administration Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 138 creates an additional, statutory right of set-off. Section 38 provides that:

> 38 The Treasury Board may, by directive, authorize the Comptroller General to retain money by way of set-off, out of any money due or payable to a person by the government or out of a trust fund, if
> (a) that person owes money to the government,
> (b) an overpayment has been made by the government to that person, or
> (c) an advance made to that person under section 36 has not been repaid or accounted for.

[47] This section on its face appears to describe a broad right of set-off. Arguably the directive does not create the right, but the authority of the Comptroller General to set-off funds. However, in either case, the invoking of this section on August 5, 2000, well after the Effective Date of the Plan and the compromise of claims was effected, is inappropriate. The directive cannot be utilized retrospectively to effectively negate (in the absence of set-off on other grounds) the terms of the sanctioning order insofar as the B.C. Government is concerned.

[48] It is also necessary in the context of statutory set-off to consider the impact of the Social Services Tax Act, Motor Fuel Tax Act and the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation on the B.C. Government's general rights of set-off.

[49] Canadian's primary argument in this application was that since the provisions in this legislation are so specific and detailed in their delineation of when set-off may occur, that the B.C. Government is limited to asserting set-off only in those delineated situations. In other words, Canadian argued that the machinery in the legislation replaces the ordinary law of set-off.

[50] Canadian relied on the following passage from Re White Motor Corporation of Canada Ltd. (1981, Ont. S.C.) to support its argument in this regard:

> Moreover, if it should occur that the minister reassesses the debtor's tax for the 1979 tax year and an overpayment is determined, the minister has by s. 164(2) of the Income Tax Act a discretion to apply the overpayment against other liability of the debtor under that Act. The statute therefore gives him this specific right in settling the accounting between the Crown and the taxpayer. As a matter of law between them the ordinary law of set-off is not available to the taxpayer but is replaced by the machinery in s. 164 of the Income Tax Act. In my opinion this is not set aside by the Bankruptcy Act. (emphasis added)

[51] However appealing this statement may be in suggesting that the B.C. Government is stuck with the regime it set up regarding set-off, a careful review shows that the court in Re White was limiting the taxpayer to the statutory machinery; the court did not say the Crown was similarly limited. K. Palmer, in The Law of Set-off in Canada comments on this difference at p. 255:

> For those who consider themselves students of Canadian governments (or just those who are affected by their actions) it should come as no great surprise that the government powers with respect to taxation and set-off are rather one-sided. The right to set-off is widely available to the Crown and wholly unavailable to the taxpayer. The thrust of the statutory powers granted in this area are similar to those described above in the Financial Administration Act, where a broad power of set-off is granted....
> Amounts owing for taxation can therefore be withheld by the Crown from any payment due from the Crown to the taxpayer.
> The situation, unfortunately, does not work in the reverse. A taxpayer cannot withhold from taxes due an amount which the Crown owes to the taxpayer. This was considered in R. v. Lamothe, where the defendant as an employer failed to remit deductions from wages for income tax, claiming that he had set these off against a tax refund owed to him personally. The set-off was not allowed by the court, which noted that the Income Tax Act created a statutory duty to pay taxes, against which set-off was not available as a defence:
> > That duty is not qualified in any way, and the mere fact that the Receiver-General may owe the person paying money does not, it seems to me quite apart from any question of set-off, afford a defence to an information alleging a failure to observe an obligation imposed by statute.
> The same conclusion was reached in Re White Motor Corp. of Canada Ltd., which noted that this statutory duty replaced the ordinary rules of set-off which would otherwise apply to the Crown. (emphasis added)

[52] While White does not stand for the proposition suggested by Canadian, it is appropriate to review the legislation in question and determine whether it modifies the legal and equitable rights of set-off and if so, to the extent that the B.C. Government is not able to access those general rights.

[53] The Social Services Tax Act does speak very specifically to credits and refunds in cases of particular scenarios (for example, it provides for a refund of tax involved in the sale of a horse), but counsel did not refer the court to any provision that addresses the situation at bar. Similarly, counsel did not rely on any section of the Motor Fuel Tax Act that would apply to the particular set-off being claimed by the B.C. Government. The statutes provide variously for refunds, credits and applications of payments from taxpayers, using a mixture of imperative and permissive language. It might be argued that the legislation modifies to some extent the B.C. Government's existing rights of legal and equitable set-off in particular scenarios, but it does not follow in this context that the failure to refer to a particular scenario in the legislation means that there are absolutely no set-off rights with respect to that scenario. Quite simply, because these circumstances are not included in the statutes, the set-off rights have not been modified by the statutes.

[54] Canadian argued that there is no provision in either the Social Services Tax Act or the Motor Fuel Tax Act authorizing the B.C. Government to set-off refunds owing to taxpayers under other enactments as against liabilities arising thereunder and that therefore such a set-off is not permitted. I disagree that statutory permission is required.

[55] The B.C. Government conceded that the refunds in question fall under sections 4.2 (3) and 4.3 (4) of the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation. These subsections respectively provide that where tax is paid on jet fuel, the director:

> "shall, on application, refund from the consolidated revenue fund to the person who paid the tax a refund of 3[CENTS] for every litre of fuel for which tax was paid under section 7(1)(a) o f the Act."(s. 4.2 (3))
> "shall, on application, provide from the consolidated revenue fund to the person who paid the tax a refund calculated in accordance with the following formula...". (s.4.3 (4))

[56] Canadian did apply for the refunds on a monthly basis from February - June, 2000, the very months for which the B.C. Government is arguing it is entitled to set-off the refunds.

[57] The word "shall" in the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation is to be construed as imperative: Interpretation Act R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 238, s. 29. The plain meaning of these provisions is therefore that the B.C. Government is obliged to provide a refund to the taxpayer. While the provisions do not expressly rule out setting-off the refunds, I cannot consider them in a vacuum. As referenced above, the Motor Fuel Tax Act, the statute under which the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation was enacted, contains both imperative and permissive language in its treatment of the provision of refunds. However, counsel did not refer the court to any provision of the Motor Fuel Tax Act which addressed the application or crediting of refunds by the B.C. Government; its ability to set-off is not expressly addressed. Were this not the case, I might have been more inclined to find that the absence of references to set-off in the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation reflected the deliberate intention on the part of the B.C. legislature to exclude any ability of the B.C. Government to use refunds to set-off tax liability. However, simple use of the imperative "shall" instead of "may" in this context does not rule out the possibility of set-off. Further, allowing the exercise of set-off in these circumstances does not violate either the letter or the spirit of the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation. The set-off *recognize*s the refund rather than disregarding it.

[58] In addition, interpreting the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation in the way Canadian suggests would entirely remove the B.C. Government's common law right of legal set-off as well as its equitable right in this regard. I am unable to read the statutory language as disclosing an intention by Parliament to effect such a fundamental change in the B.C. Government's legal rights when the presumption, at least vis-`a-vis the common law, is that legislation is not meant to interfere with common law rights, nor, generally, to change the common law. In Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of Canada v. T. Eaton Co., 1956 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1956] S.C.R. 610 at 614, Fauteux J. held that:

> ...a Legislature is not presumed to depart from the general system of the law without expressing its intentions to do so with irresistible clearness, failing which the law remains undisturbed.

[59] More recently this principle was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. T., 1992 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 749 at 763-764, where L'Heureux-Dube J. adopted the following statement in P.B. Maxwell, Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 12th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1969) at page 116:

> It is presumed that the legislature does not intend to make any change in the existing law beyond that which is expressly stated in, or follows by necessary implication from, the language of the statute in question.

[60] L'Heureux-Dube J. went on to find that while it was open to Parliament, subject to constitutional restraints, to change the law as it likes, the legislation that makes the alterations must be drafted such that its intention is "in no way in doubt" (p. 764).

[61] In my view, the wording contained in the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation does not expressly or impliedly rule out the B.C. Government raising a set-off in response to an application for a refund, as it has here.

[62] Canadian also asserted that the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation creates an absolute and immutable right to payment without set-off. It referred to the discussion in R. v. Lamothe (1957), 119 C.C.C. 330 (Ont. H.C.) of the statutory duty of a taxpayer to pay taxes (p. 336) and suggested that the mandatory language of the refund provisions in the Motor Fuel Tax Act Regulation created a similar duty to pay refunds which replaces the ordinary rules of set-off available to the B.C. Government. I note that the legislation in R. v. Lamothe went beyond a direction to pay the taxes and created an offence for failure to do so. Obviously there is no associated offence with respect to failure of the B.C. Government to provide a refund to a taxpayer. Canadian was not able to provide any authority supporting the creation of such a duty and without more, on my interpretation of the legislation, I am not prepared in these particular circumstances to elevate the obligation of the B.C. Government to provide a refund to the level of a duty which prohibits set-off. As noted above, the set-off rights of government relating to unpaid taxes are frequently one-sided and while various taxing statutes expressly remove the taxpayer's right to set-off, such provisions do not exist here with respect to the B.C. Government's ability to set-off tax liabilities against the refunds in question.

5. Timing of Set-Off

[63] Canadian asserted that if set-off applied in this case, the B.C. Government should be restricted to setting off the tax liabilities against the refunds of tax that were in existence at the time the initial stay order was granted. It argued that the March 24, 2000 order restricted set-off to cross-obligations in existence as at that date.

[64] The distinction Canadian seeks to make between pre- and post- petition refunds cannot be maintained in this particular case, for two reasons: first, all of the refunds arose before the Effective Date under the Plan, and second, the connection between the obligations is such that the issuance of the initial order on March 24, 2000 is insufficient to sever it.

[65] The Plan approved by the requisite number of creditors and sanctioned by this court on June 27, 2000 contemplated that all amounts due and owing up to and including the Effective Date of July 5, 2000 would be included in the Plan, as reflected in the Plan definitions of "Tax"/"Taxes" and "Tax Claims" and the releases contained in s. 6.2 of the Plan, as follows:

> "Tax" or "Taxes" shall mean any and all federal, provincial, municipal, local and foreign taxes, assessments, reassessments and other governmental charges, duties, impositions and liabilities...
> "Tax Claims"means any and all claims for Taxes by any federal, provincial, territorial, municipal, local or foreign authority, agency or government...in respect of any taxation year or period ending on or before the Effective Date including, without limitation, any Taxes arising out of or attributable to any transaction to be completed in accordance with this Plan and, in the case where a current taxation year does not end on the Effective Date, any Taxes due in respect of or attributable to that portion of the period commencing at the beginning of such current taxation year up to and including the Effective Date;(emphasis added)
> 6.2(1) As of the Effective Date, the Applicants will be deemed to forever release, waive and discharge all claims, obligations, suits, judgments, damages, demands, debts, rights, causes of action and liabilities (other than the rights of the Applicants to enforce the Plan and the contracts, instruments, releases and other agreements and documents delivered thereunder) whether liquidated or unliquidated, fixed or contingent, matured or unmatured, known or unknown, forseen or unforseen, then existing or thereafter arising, in law, equity or otherwise that are based in whole or in part on any act, omission, transaction, event or other occurrence taking place on or prior to the Effective Date in any way relating to the Applicants or the Subsidiaries, the parties released pursuant to this Section 6.2(1), the CCAA Proceedings or the Plan, and that could have been asserted by or on behalf of the Applicants against former directors, officers and employees of the Applicants in each case, as of the Date of Filing or that have become officers and/or directors thereafter but prior to the Effective Date (other than for indebtedness owed by any such directors, officers, or employees to any of the Applicants) and the Applicants' agents and professionals (including, for greater certainty, the Monitor). (emphasis added)
> 6.2(2) As of the Effective Date, each of the Affected Creditors will be deemed to forever release, waive and discharge all claims, obligations, suits, judgments, damages, demands, debts, rights, causes of action and liabilities (other than the rights to enforce the Applicants' obligations under the Plan and the securities, contracts, instruments, releases and other agreements and documents delivered thereunder), whether liquidated or unliquidated, fixed or contingent, matured or unmatured, known or unknown, forseen or unforseen, then existing or thereafter arising, in law, equity or otherwise that are based in whole or in part on any act, omission, transaction, event or other occurrence taking place on or prior to the Effective Date ...(emphasis added)

[66] But for set-off, the tax liabilities owing to the B.C. Government up to and including the Effective Date would be compromised at that date. All of the refunds had arisen prior to that time. Clearly the Effective Date was pinpointed by Canadian as the settlement date for its liabilities. The result that the B.C. Government can ultimately set-off tax liabilities against all of the refunds is therefore not inconsistent with the Plan nor with the prospective nature of paragraph 5(e) of Moore C.J.'s March 24, 2000 order in these proceedings:

> Until the Stay Termination Date or further order of this Court and subject to other provisions of this Order:...Subject to Section 18.1 of the CCAA, no person shall exercise any right of set-off with respect to any accounts of the petitioners, or any combination of accounts in relation to amounts due or accruing due in respect of or arising from any indebtedness or obligation of the petitioners...(emphasis added).

[67] The Alberta Court of Appeal in Blue Range, supra was faced with a decision of a chambers judge that was based in part upon the distinction between pre-petition and post-petition obligations. The court did not approve of this distinction in that case and expressly found that the "connection" between the pre- and post- petition obligations was sufficient to support equitable set-off, regardless of the fact that one of the obligations arose after the stay instituted by the initial CCAA order. The Court of Appeal stated at paragraph 19 that "[the fact that the damages owed to Duke and Engage arise after the stay order is not relevant when the obligations arise out of the same contracts".

[68] In this case, the cross- obligations do not arise contractually, but from a single tax payer- tax collector relationship. As described earlier in these reasons, this relationship between the B.C. Government and Canadian that is reflected in the taxes and refunds of taxes owed supports the close connection that is a hallmark of equitable set-off. To disregard this relationship would be to disregard the law of set-off which Parliament has legislated is to continue to apply in the CCAA context.

[69] While the distinction between pre- and post- petition claims may have significance in determining whether a close connection exists in certain circumstances, it is not significant here given the terms of the Plan and the close connection that exists between the cross-claims in issue.

[70] Although Blue Range suggests that it is inappropriate to consider prejudice to other creditors in prohibiting set-off, the court did not go so far as to say that a court in determining a close connection is prohibited from considering whether the intention of the CCAA will be entirely defeated. Allowing set-off in this case will not have such an effect, insofar as the refund which will be applied against Canadian's tax liabilities does not form any part of the fund established by Air Canada to pay dividends to creditors. Further, there is also no evidence before me, nor was any submission made by counsel that would suggest that allowing the set-off in this case would defeat the intention of the CCAA to permit debtor companies to continue in business for the currency of the proceedings and afterward, where possible.

[71] In this case I have found that the cross-obligations in question are capable of legal or alternatively equitable set-off. The wording of the Plan, the March 24, 2000 order and s. 18.1 of the CCAA support this result.

V. CONCLUSION

[72] The B.C. Government is entitled to set-off the refunds owing to Canadian against Social Services Tax Act liabilities owed by Canadian, as those amounts stand as at July 5, 2000, the Effective Date under the Plan. Canadian has challenged its liability to pay a portion of the tax liabilities and has consented to have that issue resolved by the B.C. court. To the extent that Canadian is successful to any degree in that regard, further accounting may have to take place. If there is any disagreement between the parties at that point, they may see me.

CLASSES OF CREDITORS

Company may establish classes - Sec 22
22. (1) A debtor company may divide its creditors into classes for the purpose of a meeting to be held under section 4 or 5 in respect of a compromise or arrangement relating to the company and, if it does so, it is to apply to the court for approval of the division before the meeting is held.

Factors - Sec 22(2)
(2) For the purpose of subsection (1), creditors may be included in the same class if their interests or rights are sufficiently similar to give them a commonality of interest, taking into account
(a) the nature of the debts, liabilities or obligations giving rise to their claims;
(b) the nature and rank of any security in respect of their claims;
(c) the remedies available to the creditors in the absence of the compromise or arrangement being sanctioned, and the extent to which the creditors would recover their claims by exercising those remedies; and
(d) any further criteria, consistent with those set out in paragraphs (a) to (c), that are prescribed.

INTRODUCTION

The Petitioners ("Woodward's") apply for an order approving the classes of creditors designated in their plan of arrangement under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA") filed on April 7, 1993 (the "Reorganization Plan"). Woodward's proposes to hold meetings of these classes of creditors during the first part of May 1993 for the purpose of voting on the Reorganization Plan.

The classes of creditors designated by the Reorganization Plan are Secured Creditors, Noteholders, Landlords and General Creditors. Each of these terms is defined in the Reorganization Plan. There is no issue as to the appropriateness of classes of secured creditors, noteholders, landlords and general creditors. The question is whether or not there should be additional classes.

The definitions in the Reorganization Plan of the classes of creditors are as follows:

"Secured Creditors" means the Secured Trustee as holder of the Secured Notes;

"Noteholders" means the A & F Debentureholders, the Stores Debentureholders, the 9% Noteholders and the 10% Noteholders;

"Landlord" means any landlord, head lessor, sublessor or owner of premises which has entered into any Lease with any member of the Woodward's Group and includes any mortgagee or successor in title of such premises who has taken possession of such premises or is collecting rent in respect of such premises as well as any party who has taken an assignment of rents or assignment of lease in respect of such premises, whether as security or otherwise; provided, however, that if more than one person would otherwise come within this definition of Landlord in respect of any particular Lease, the rights and claims of all such persons in respect of such Lease will be dealt with collectively under this Plan and each reference herein to such Landlord shall be construed as a collective reference to all such persons;

Digitized by Google

"General Creditors" means all persons with unsecured claims for any Indebtedness against Woodward's Group as at the General Creditor Meeting Date, including the Pre-Filing Trade Creditors, Employee Creditors, the Landlords and the Equipment Financiers but, for the Landlords and the Equipment Financiers, only to the extent of their claims to be dealt with in the General Creditor class as provided herein, and specifically excluding Post-Filing Trade Creditors, the Noteholders and the holders of the Unaffected Obligations.

The additional classes that have been proposed are as follows:

(a) employees of Woodward's that have been terminated since the commencement of these proceedings on December 11, 1992 (these employees made a formal application for separate classification);

(b) Royal Trust Corporation of Canada which holds a debenture creating a fixed charge against certain equipment purchased by Woodward's with the financing provided by Royal Trust;

(c) equipment financiers (which could include Royal Trust);

(d) creditors of Woodward Stores Limited (the "Operating Company") that hold the guarantee or joint covenant of its holding company, Woodward's Limited (the "Holding Company");

There is the potential that two parties having agreements to lease with Woodward's will want to make submissions that they should be in a separate or different class. These parties were only served with the Petition in this proceeding recently and it was agreed that my ruling would not affect their ability to make submissions at a subsequent time. It was also agreed that General Electric Capital Canada Inc. would not be bound by my ruling and could make submissions that it should be in a separate or different class or that it should be considered to be a holder of an Unaffected Obligation.

I will return to the positions of the various parties but I think it will be useful to first review the authorities setting forth the general principles applicable to the issue of creditor classification.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The starting point of the case authorities is the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Sovereign Life Assurance Company v. Dodd, [1892] 2 Q.B. 573 where Lord Esher said the following at pp. 579-80 in relation to the meeting of creditors to consider a plan of arrangement under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act:

The Act says that the persons to be summoned to the meeting (all of whom, be it said in passing, are creditors) are persons who can be divided into different classes - classes which the Act of Parliament recognizes, though it does not define them. This, therefore, must be done: they must be divided into different classes. What is the reason for such a course? It is because the creditors composing the different classes have different interests; and, therefore, if we find a different state of facts existing among different creditors which may differently affect their minds and their judgment, they must be divided into different classes.

The word "class" is vague, and to find out what is meant by it we must look at the scope of the section, which is a section enabling the Court to order a meeting of a class or classes to be called. It seems plain that we must give such a meaning to the term "class" as will prevent the section being so worked as to result in confiscation and injustice, and that it must be confined to those persons whose rights are not so dissimilar as to make it impossible for them to consult together with a view to their common interest.

There has been some jurisprudence over the years regarding creditor classification but, like the jurisprudence on other issues under the CCAA, it has intensified over the past five to ten years. One of the earlier cases of the present wave of jurisprudence dealing with creditor classification is Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. v. Oakwood Petroleums Ltd. (1988), 72 C.B.R. 20 (A.Q.B.). In that case Forsyth J. rejected the argument that different secured creditors should be placed in separate classes because they held separate security over different assets or because the relative values of their security were different. The Court rejected the "identity of interest" approach which involves each class only containing creditors with identical interests. Instead, the Court followed the approach which I will call the "non-fragmentation" approach. This approach avoids the creation of a multiplicity of classes by including creditors with different legal rights in the same class as long as their legal rights are not so dissimilar that it is not possible for them to vote with a common interest. This is essentially the approach that was suggested by Bowen L.J. in the passage from the Sovereign Life quoted above (although his words have been incorrectly attributed to Lord Esher in at least one case authority and one article).

The approach taken in the Oakwood Petroleums case has been specifically adopted by the B.C. Court of Appeal in Northland Properties Limited v. Excelsior Life Insurance Company of Canada (1989), 73 C.B.R. 195. In the lower court decision in that case the Court considered the similarities and dissimilarities of various mortgagees holding mortgages against different properties and concluded that they should be in the same class. Dealing with the points of dissimilarity, Trainor J. said as follows at p. 192 of 73 C.B.R.:

> The points of dissimilarity are that they are separate properties and that there are deficiencies in value of security for the loan, which vary accordingly for particular priority mortgagees. Specifically with respect to Guardian and Excelsior, they are both in a deficiency position.
> Now, either of the reasons for points of dissimilarity, if effect was given to them, could result in fragmentation to the extent that a plan would be a realistic impossibility. The distinction which is sought is based on property values, not on contractual rights or legal interests.

After the Court of Appeal in Northland Properties quoted the above passage, it said the following (at p. 203):

> I agree with that, but I wish to add that in any complicated plan under this Act, there will often be some secured creditors who appear to be oversecured, some who do not know if they are fully secured or not, and some who appear not to be fully secured. This is a variable cause arising not by any difference in legal interests, but rather as a consequence of bad lending, or market values, or both.

As the B.C. Court of Appeal has specifically adopted the reasoning in Oakwood Petroleums, the approach which I have called the "non-fragmentation" approach is the one to be followed in British Columbia. As will be seen shortly, the "non-fragmentation" approach has also been preferred over the "identity of interest" approach by the Ontario courts.

There have been two recent cases that are particularly relevant because they deal with employees, landlords and equipment lessors in circumstances that are similar to the situation at hand. The first of these cases is Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corp. v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 312 (O.C.J.) where one of the proposed classes consisted of all creditors other than two secured creditors, including holders of unsecured debentures, terminated employees, landlords whose leases had been repudiated and equipment lessors whose leases were to be repudiated (although the report does not specifically say it, I assume that the proposed class also included the general trade creditors). The Court rejected the argument of one of the landlords that there should be a separate class of creditors consisting of the landlords and the equipment lessors. Borins J. utilized the "non-fragmentation" approach as illustrated by the following passage on pp. 317-8:

> In my view, an important principle to consider in approaching ss. 4 and 5 of the C.C.A.A. is that followed in Re Wellington Building Corp., 16 C.B.R. 48, [1934] O.R. 653, [1934] 4 D.L.R. 626 (S.C.), in which it was emphasized that the object of ss. 4 and 5 is not confiscation but is to enable compromises to be made for the common benefit of the creditors as creditors, of for the common benefit of some class of creditors as such. To this I would add that recognition must be given to the legislative intent to facilitate corporate re-organization and that in the modern world of large and complicated business enterprises the excessive fragmentation of classes could be counter-productive to the fulfilment of this intent. In this regard, to approach the classification of creditors on the basis of identity of interest, as suggested by counsel for H & R Properties, would in some instances result in the multiplicity of classes, which would make any re-organization difficult, if not impossible, to achieve. In my view, in placing a broad and purposive interpretation upon the provisions of the C.C.A.A. the court should take care to resist approaches which would potentially fragment creditors and thereby jeopardize potentially viable plans of arrangement, such as the plan advanced in this application.

The other recent decision is Re Grafton-Fraser Inc. and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1992), 90 D.L.R. (4th) 285 (Ont. Gen. Div.). In that case Houlden J.A. approved the classification of creditors into secured creditors, landlords and unsecured creditors. It appears from the report that the plan contemplated that some leases would be repudiated and there would be rent reductions in respect of certain of the continuing premises. I am told that the final plan of Grafton-Fraser Inc. did not include the landlords with continuing leases at reduced rental rates in the same class as the landlords whose leases were repudiated, but the decision of Houlden J.A. appears to be predicated on the fact that the two types of landlords would be in the same class. It had been argued that the landlords should be in the same class as the unsecured creditors. Houlden J.A. felt that it was appropriate to have the landlords in a separate class for two reasons; namely, there would be great difficulty in ascertaining the amounts of the claims of the landlords and the plan enjoined the landlords from exercising their contractual and statutory remedies.

Before I apply the general principles outlined above to the circumstances of this case, I wish to add some comments regarding the classification of creditors. The case authorities focus on the differences in the legal rights of the creditors in determining whether their interests are sufficiently similar or dissimilar to warrant creditors being placed in the same class or separate classes. I agree that it is the legal rights of the creditors that must be considered and that other external matters that could influence the interests of a creditor are not to be taken in account. However, it is my view that the legal rights should not be considered in isolation and that they must be considered within the context of the provisions of the reorganization plan. It would be appropriate to segregate two sets of creditors with similar legal interests into separate classes if the plan treats them differently. Conversely, it may be appropriate to include two sets of creditors with different legal rights in the same class if the plan treats them in a fashion that gives them a commonality of interest despite their different legal rights. In addition, when the Court is assessing whether there is a sufficient commonality of interest to include two sets of creditors in the same class, it is necessary in my view to examine their legal rights within the context of the potential failure of the reorganization plan. The treatment of the two sets of creditors under the plan should be compared to the rights they would have in the event of the failure of the plan (i.e., bankruptcy or other liquidation).

TERMINATED EMPLOYEES

The first set of creditors that submitted that it should be in a separate class is the group of former employees of Woodward's who were terminated after December 11, 1992, the date of commencement of these CCAA proceedings. These former employees all have claims against Woodward's for damages as a result of Woodward's failure to give them reasonable notice of termination. The Reorganization Plan includes the terminated employees in the class of General Creditors which also includes the trade suppliers and other unsecured claims of the Operating Company. The Reorganization Plan proposes that the General Creditors receive 37% of the principal amounts of their proven claims.

The two counsel acting for former employees on this application submitted that their clients should comprise a separate class of creditors for several reasons. They say that the terminated employees are largely middle-aged, long service employees with limited education who have little prospect of finding alternate employment. They point to the fact that the courts recognize the difference between a contract of employment and an ordinary commercial contract. They further make reference to the fact that the trade suppliers will be selling merchandise to the reorganized company and that they will have a potentially continuing relationship which may influence the manner in which they vote on the plan. Finally, they say that the trade suppliers have the ability to "write off" their losses and that they will receive different income tax treatment in respect of their losses than the terminated employees.

In arguing that the terminated employees should form their own class, counsel relied on the article Reorganizations under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (1947) 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587 by Stanley E. Edwards. This article has been relied upon extensively by the courts in interpreting the CCAA. However, the article has not been followed with respect to the classification of creditors. Mr. Edwards proposes the "identity of interest" approach which was not been adopted by the Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario courts. The preferred approach is the "non-fragmentation" approach.

The legal rights of the terminated employees are the same as the legal rights of the trade suppliers. They are both creditors with unsecured claims against the Operating Company (the secured and preferred amounts payable to employees under provincial legislation and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act have already been paid to the terminated employees). In a bankruptcy or other liquidation they would both receive the same pro rata amount of their claims. They are to receive the same pro rata amount of their claims under the Reorganization Plan.

The fact that there is a recognized difference between contracts of employment and ordinary commercial contracts is not relevant because the contracts of employment of the terminated employees have come to an end. The terminated employees have claims for damages against Woodward's for wrongful dismissal. Once the amount of damages for an employee has been agreed upon or determined by the Court, the difference between the two types of contracts becomes historical and the employee has the same rights as any other unsecured creditor. The differences between the two types of contracts may result in the employees receiving higher amounts of damages but the differences do not warrant the terminated employees being entitled to a higher distribution than the other unsecured creditors.

I am satisfied that there is a sufficient commonality of interest between the terminated employees and the other members of the General Creditors class that they should be included in the same class.

EQUIPMENT FINANCIERS AND ROYAL TRUST CORPORATION OF CANADA

It is convenient to deal with the submissions of the equipment lessors and Royal Trust at the same time because if Royal Trust is not put in a class of its own, its alternate position was that it should be included in a class with the equipment lessors.

The term "Equipment Financiers" is defined in the Reorganization Plan. In brief, the term means any person who has provided financing for the acquisition or installation of office equipment or trade fixtures and who has retained a security interest by way of a lease or a security instrument. Woodward's has notified or will be notifying certain equipment financiers that it no longer requires their equipment. These equipment financiers will then have a claim against Woodward's for damages resulting from the repudiation of their contractual arrangements. It is these equipment financiers who wish to be in a separate class. The Reorganization Plan proposes that the terminated equipment financiers be treated as General Creditors and that they receive 37% of the amounts of their claims. The amount of each claim would presumably be the discounted value of future payments owing by Woodward's to the equipment financier less the present value of the equipment.

Most of the equipment financiers are parties that bought the equipment and are leasing it to Woodward's on a normal type of term lease. The equipment financiers who are lessors include National Bank Leasing, North American Trust Company and Royal Bank Leasing. Royal Trust also falls within the definition of "Equipment Financier" but it is not a lessor. It financed the acquisition by Woodward's of certain equipment by way of a traditional financing arrangement. It loaned money to Woodward's on a term basis and it took security in the form of a debenture creating a fixed charge against the equipment that it financed.

In other contexts under the CCAA the treatment of equipment leases in relation to the treatment of security documents causes me considerable doubts. Should equipment leases be treated the same as security instruments in all or some cases? Does it make a difference whether the lease is classified as an operating lease or a capital lease? Should the extent of depreciation of the subject asset be taken into account? Fortunately these questions can be left for another time because they do not need to be resolved in order to deal with the classification issue.

Lessors and debentureholders do have different legal rights but the question to be answered is whether the different rights result in a lack of commonality of interest. In a bankruptcy a lessor is entitled to retake possession of the leased goods upon default and, if the lease is worded properly, the lessor is entitled to prove as an unsecured creditor for its damages. In the case of a debentureholder in a bankruptcy situation, the debentureholder has the right to cause the charged assets to be sold and it is entitled to prove as an unsecured creditor for the deficiency on its loan. In most cases the damages of the lessor and the deficiency on the debentureholder's loan will be equivalent; namely, the difference between the present value of the monies that are owed and the value of the leased goods or the charged assets. Hence, the rights of an equipment lessor and the rights of a debentureholder with a fixed charge on financed equipment in a bankruptcy situation are roughly the same. The equipment lessors and Royal Trust are being treated the same under the Reorganization Plan. Therefore, there is a sufficient commonality of interest for Royal Trust to be included in the same class as the equipment lessors.

Some submissions were made with respect to the priority between Royal Trust and The R-M Trust Company which is the sole Secured Creditor under the Reorganization Plan. I do not accept the contention that Royal Trust has priority over The R-M Trust Company on any of Woodward's assets other than the ones that are covered by the fixed charge in favour of Royal Trust.

The question then becomes whether the equipment financiers (including Royal Trust) belong in a separate class or in the class of General Creditors. This is an example of why the legal rights of the parties must be examined within the context of the Reorganization Plan. In isolation the rights of the equipment financiers and the rights of unsecured creditors are very different. But the treatment of the two groups in the Reorganization Plan could affect their interests.

If the Reorganization Plan provided that Woodward's was to retain the financed equipment and the equipment financiers were to be paid the same proportion of their indebtedness as the unsecured creditors, the equipment financiers would be entitled to be included in a different class from the unsecured creditors. They would be losing their proprietary or security rights in the equipment and they would be receiving the same pro rata distribution as unsecured creditors who do not have same rights. However, that is not what the Reorganization Plan is proposing.

The Reorganization Plan does not affect any of the proprietary or security rights of the equipment financiers. Woodward's is allowing the equipment financiers to fully exercise those rights outside of the Reorganization Plan. All the Reorganization Plan is purporting to affect are the claims of the equipment financiers for damages or the deficiencies on loans. These claims are unsecured claims and there is no reason why they should be treated any differently than the claims of unsecured creditors. There is a sufficient commonality of interest between the unsecured creditors and the equipment financiers with respect to their unsecured claims for damages or the deficiencies on loans. It is appropriate to include the equipment financiers in the class of General Creditors with respect to these claims.

This classification of the equipment financiers is consistent with the decision in Sklar-Peppler, supra, where the Ontario Court of Justice approved the grouping of equipment lessors in the same class as the unsecured creditors.

HOLDERS OF GUARANTEES OR JOINT COVENANTS

The class of General Creditors is comprised of creditors of the Operating Company. However, at least two of these creditors hold a guarantee or joint covenant of the Holding Company. National Bank Leasing holds a guarantee from the Holding Company and the debenture held by Royal Trust is a joint debenture from the Operating Company and the Holding Company. For ease of reference I will refer to a creditor holding a guarantee or joint covenant of the Holding Company as the holder of a guarantee and such reference shall also include the holder of a joint covenant.

The Holding Company does not own any tangible assets. Other than the shares in the Operating Company, the only asset owned by the Holding Company is an inter-company account owed to it by the Operating Company. This inter-company account means that upon the bankruptcy or other liquidation of the Operating Company, the Holding Company would be an unsecured creditor entitled to share on a pro rata basis in distributions to the unsecured creditors of the Operating Company. If the Holding Company was also to be liquidated, the money received on account of the inter-company receivable would be distributed to the creditors of the Holding Company, including creditors of the Operating Company with guarantees from the Holding Company and other unsecured creditors if sufficient monies were available to fully satisfy the secured and preferred creditors of the Holding Company. The result is that unsecured creditors of the Operating Company with guarantees from the Holding Company may receive more money than the other unsecured creditors of the Operating Company in the event of bankruptcies or other liquidations of the two companies.

On April 16, 1993 the Monitor appointed in these proceedings issued a report confirming that upon a liquidation of the two companies, the unsecured creditors of the Holding Company would receive a distribution. The Monitor estimates a liquidatation distribution for the unsecured creditors of the Holding Company to be in the range from 2% to 12%.

The distinction between the interests of the unsecured creditors of the Operating Company and the interests of the unsecured creditors of the Holding Company is recognized in the classification of the creditors in the Reorganization Plan. The unsecured creditors of the Holding Company are included in the class of Noteholders which is a different class from the General Creditors, the class that includes the unsecured creditors of the Operating Company. It is proposed in the Reorganization Plan that the Noteholders receive 32% of their indebtedness.

The Reorganization Plan ignores the fact that the holders of guarantees are unsecured creditors of both companies. It proposes that they receive the same 37% proportion of their indebtedness as the other General Creditors and their status as creditors of the Holding Company is not reflected.

In view of the fact that the holders of guarantees do have different legal rights from the other members of the class of General Creditors, it is necessary to decide whether the rights are so dissimilar that they cannot vote on the Reorganization Plan with a common interest. It was submitted by counsel for Woodward's that there is a common interest because the holders of guarantees will still receive more under the Reorganization Plan than they will be paid upon a liquidation of the two companies. I do not think that this is sufficient to create a commonality of interest with the other members in the class of General Creditors who have lesser legal rights. To the contrary, I believe that this is an example of what Bowen L.J. had in mind in the Sovereign Life case, supra, when he used the term "confiscation". By being a minority in the class of General Creditors, the holders of guarantees can have their guarantees confiscated by a vote of the requisite majority of the class who do not have the same rights. The holders of guarantees could be forced to accept the same proportionate amount as the other members of the class and to receive no value in respect of legal rights that they uniquely enjoy and that would have value in a liquidation of the two companies.

The passage from Sklar-Peppler quoted above made reference to the decision in Re Wellington Building Corp., supra. In that case the Court was asked to approve a scheme of arrangement under the CCAA that had one class of secured creditors which included bondholders, lienholders, third mortgagee and fourth mortgagees. The Court refused to approve the scheme on the basis that there should have been more than one class of secured creditors. Kingstone J. said the following at p. 54 of 16 C.B.R.:

... it was necessary under the Act that they should vote in classes and that three-fourths of the value of each class should be obtained in support of the scheme before the Court could or should approve of it. Particularly is this the case where the holders of the senior securities' (in this case the bondholders') rights are seriously affected by the proposal as they are deprived of the arrears of interest on their bonds if the proposal is carried through. It was never the intention under the Act, I am convinced, to deprive creditors in the position of the bondholders of their right to approve as a class by the necessary majority of a scheme propounded by the company which would permit the holders of junior securities to put through a scheme inimicable to this class and amounting to confiscation of the vested interest of the bondholders.

In Re 229531 B.C. Ltd. (1989), 72 C.B.R. 310 (B.C.S.C.) the Court refused to approve a plan of arrangement under the CCAA for numerous reasons. One of the reasons was that a guarantee held by one creditor was to be released as a result of the reorganization plan and the creditor was to receive the same proportionate distribution as all of the other unsecured creditors. In other words, the guarantee was being confiscated by the vote of other creditors who did not enjoy the same rights as the creditor which held the guarantee.

If it was clear that no monies would be available to unsecured creditors upon a liquidation of the Holding Company, the legal rights of the holders of the guarantees would have no practical value and there would then be no objection to their inclusion in the class of General Creditors. There is also a point where the prospects of the unsecured creditors of the Holding Company receiving any monies upon its liquidation would be so uncertain that the commonality of interest between the holders of the guarantees and the other members of the class of General Creditors would not be affected. However, I am not satisfied in this case that such prospects are so uncertain that the holders of guarantees should be forced to be in the same class as the other unsecured creditors of the Operating Company. In making this statement, I note that the unsecured creditors of the Holding Company are to receive 32% of their indebtedness under the Reorganization Plan.

I should stress that it is important in my view that there is only one difference between the rights of the holders of the guarantees and the rights of the other members of the class of General Creditors. It is clear that the one additional right enjoyed by the holders of the guarantees is not being given any value under the Reorganization Plan. The result could be different if the other members of the class of General Creditors had additional rights that were not enjoyed by the holders of the guarantees. There could be a trade-off between the rights that were not commonly shared and the groups could have a sufficient commonality of interest to be included in the same class. Here, there is no potential trade-off between the two groups and the one additional right of the holders of the guarantees is being confiscated without compensation.

Counsel for Woodward's suggested that the issue of the guarantees be left to the fairness hearing (i.e., the hearing to consider the sanctioning of the Reorganization Plan). As I believe that the holders of guarantees have a sufficiently different legal right to warrant a separate classification, it follows that I would consider the Reorganization Plan to be unfair to them if they are included in the class of General Creditors. I should not order meetings for the creditors to vote on the Reorganization Plan when I know that those meetings would be fruitless because I would refuse to approve the outcome of the meetings.

LANDLORDS

Counsel for Triple Five Corporation Limited submitted that there should be two classes of landlords, one class consisting of landlords with anchor tenants whose leases are being repudiated and the other class consisting of the remaining landlords. Counsel for Bucci Investment Corporation and Prospero International Realty Inc. submitted that there should be three classes of landlords, one class consisting of landlords with anchor tenants whose leases are being repudiated, a second class consisting of landlords without anchor tenants whose leases are being repudiated and the third class consisting of the remaining landlords.

Counsel for Triple Five Corporation Limited put forward three reasons in support of his position. A fourth reason was also put forward initially but it was withdrawn and reserved for the fairness hearing. The three reasons are as follows:

(a)a repudiation of a lease by an anchor tenant will cause the landlord to be in breach of other contractual obligations and the consequences of such a repudiation go beyond the liquidated damages that result from the repudiation of a lease by a tenant other than an anchor tenant;

(b)there is no precedent for the selective repudiation of leases under the CCAA and Woodward's has chosen not utilize the proposal provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act that now has a procedure for the repudiation of leases;

(c)Zellers Inc. (and its parent, The Hudson's Bay Company) is a stranger to the relationship between Woodward's and its creditors and its involvement in Woodward's reorganization (by way of a merger with the reorganized company) requires a higher degree of fairness.

In my view, none of these reasons is a valid justification for the creation of a separate class of landlords:

(a)the additional consequences of a repudiation by an anchor tenant flow from external considerations and the different consequences to different landlords does not result from different legal rights existing between the landlords and Woodward's. As was held in Northland Properties, supra, separate creditor classification must be based on a difference in legal interests or rights;

(b)Sklar-Peppler, supra, and Grafton-Fraser, supra, are both examples of reorganizations involving repudiations of leases. The fact that the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act now specifically provides for the repudiation of leases does not mean that a reorganization involving lease repudiation cannot be attempted under the CCAA and it certainly does not mean that there should be separate classes of landlords;

(c)the aspect of fairness is a matter to be considered on the application for the Court to sanction the Reorganization Plan. The application is commonly called the fairness hearing. There is nothing in the involvement of Zellers Inc. that requires the creation of separate classes for landlords.

Counsel for Bucci and Prospero did not put forward any independent grounds for the creation of separate landlord classes. His point was that if there was justification for the creation of a separate class for landlords with anchor tenants whose leases were being repudiated, there was equal justification for the creation of a separate class for the other landlords whose leases were being repudiated.

There was one point that bothered me about the grouping of all the landlords into a single class. In addition to including landlords whose leases were being repudiated, the class includes landlords who are having their leases partially repudiated by the unilateral reduction in the amount of leased space and landlords who are having the rent under their leases unilaterally reduced. Both of these two groups of landlords would be having a continuing relationship with Woodward's. Unlike the trade suppliers, the continuing relationship between these landlords and Woodward's is based on legal rights. I was concerned that the continuing legal relationship between these landlords and Woodward's may give them a different interest from interests of the landlords whose leases are being wholly repudiated. For example, the continuing landlords may be more willing to vote in favour of the Reorganization Plan because they will be able to recoup some of their losses from the profits generated out of the continuing relationship with Woodward's. The answer to my concern is that the rent under all of the continuing leases is to be adjusted to market rent. The landlords whose leases are being repudiated will also be leasing their premises to new tenants at market rent. Accordingly, the landlords with continuing leases will not have any advantage over the other landlords and there will be sufficient commonality of interest to include all of the landlords in one class.

During submissions I queried whether the landlords should be included in the class of General Creditors. At first blush a landlord whose lease is being repudiated is in the same position as the other unsecured creditors of the Operating Company. The reason why it is appropriate for the Landlords to be in a different class is that they receive different treatment under the Reorganization Plan. The General Creditors are to be paid 37% of their claims while the Landlords are to paid an amount equal to six months' rent. One reason for the different treatment is the fact that it is very difficult to properly quantify the claims of the Landlords and the efforts of the Landlords to mitigate their damages will not be known prior to the implementation of the Reorganization Plan. This rationale was accepted in Grafton-Fraser, supra, where the Court approved a separate classification for the landlords. Another justification for the different treatment is the fact that the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act provides that landlords whose leases are repudiated are entitled to compensation equal to six months' rent.

In the Grafton-Fraser case, supra, the Court approved a landlord class which, at least at the time of the decision, appeared to include both landlords with repudiated leases and landlords with continuing leases at reduced rental rates.

It is my view that there is sufficient commonality of interest among the landlords for all of them to be included in a single class. I am reinforced in my decision by the positions of the other landlords represented by counsel at the hearing. Mr. Kuhn, Mr. Knowles and Mr. Mitchell, who each represent landlords in each of the three proposed landlord classes, all supported the single class for the landlords and that position in itself demonstrates that the landlords do have a commonality of interest.

CONCLUSION

I approve the classes of creditors designated in the Reorganization Plan with the exception that the class of General Creditors should not include creditors of the Operating Company who hold guarantees or joint covenants from the Holding Company. I dismiss the application of the terminated employees for separate classification and I reject the other submissions for separate classifications.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Levine:

Introduction

[1] The appellant, Gerald Esau, appeals from the order of a Supreme Court chambers judge made May 3, 2007, in the course of proceedings involving the respondent, West Bay SonShip Yachts Ltd., under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). Mr. Esau claims, among other grounds of appeal, that the chambers judge erred in ruling that he was a creditor subject to the terms of the Plan of Arrangement (the "Plan").

[2] For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

Background

Facts

[3] On December 16, 2005, West Bay filed for protection under the CCAA. Mr. Esau had been an employee of West Bay since 1991. On January 17, 2006, he received notice that his employment in the position of Vice President, Production, would be terminated, effective June 6, 2006. Mr. Esau sued West Bay for damages for wrongful dismissal, but did not file a Proof of Claim in the CCAA restructuring. West Bay sought a declaration that Mr. Esau's claim was compromised by the Plan, and an order that the wrongful dismissal action be stayed.

The CCAA Proceedings

[4] In the initial order in the CCAA proceedings, made on December 16, 2005 (the "Filing Date"), the court imposed a stay of proceedings against West Bay, including any proceeding pursuant to labour or employment standards legislation (s. 2(c)). The initial order provided for West Bay to continue to pay obligations incurred by it after the Filing Date, including wages and "other monies owing to or in respect of its employees", but expressly prohibited the payment of "any amounts that are due on account of severance pay arising at law or under Statute" (s. 5). The order permitted West Bay to downsize its operations and terminate its employees. The financial consequences of downsizing were to be dealt with in the Plan to be filed (s. 6):

> 5. THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that all obligations incurred by the Petitioner after the Filing Date, including without limitation, all obligations to persons who advance or supply goods or services to the Petitioner after the Filing Date (including those under purchase orders outstanding at the Filing Date but excluding any interest on the Petitioner's existing obligations incurred prior to the Filing Date) shall be paid or otherwise satisfied by the Petitioner and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, that the Petitioner shall pay all wages, source deductions, benefits (including long and short term disability payments), expenses, omissions, vacation pay, and other monies owing to or in respect of its employees (including any independent contractor providing employment related services to the Petitioner) irrespective of whether such obligations arose or were earned before or after the Filing Date but not including any amounts that are due on account of severance pay arising at law or under Statute (hereinafter collectively referred to as "Wages").
> 6. THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that, subject to the terms of this Order, the Petitioner shall remain in possession of its undertaking, property and assets, wherever situate (collectively, the "Assets") with full power and authority to relocate to British Columbia those Assets currently situated within other jurisdictions including, without limitation, the State of California, the State of Florida and the State of Washington and shall continue to carry on its business in the ordinary course, provided that:
> (b) it shall have the right without further Order of this Court, but subject to the consent of the Monitor, to proceed with an orderly disposition of such of its Assets outside of the ordinary course of its business as it deems appropriate in order to facilitate the downsizing of its business and operations ("Downsizing"), including:
> (i) terminating the employment of such of its employees or temporarily laying off such of its employees, as it deems appropriate;
> all without interference of any kind from third parties, including its landlords and notwithstanding the provisions of any lease, mortgage other instrument or law affecting or limiting the rights of the Petitioner to move or liquidate Assets from leased premises, and may take any Downsizing steps at any time after the Filing Date irrespective of whether or not payments have been made subsequent to the Filing Date under any lease or mortgage, provided that the financial obligations, if any, of the Petitioner to creditors affected by such Downsizing shall be provided for and dealt with in the Plan of Arrangement to be filed by the Petitioner.

[5] By final order in the CCAA proceedings, pronounced June 23, 2006, the court approved West Bay's Plan. All claims falling within the definition of "Claim" in Article 1.1 of the Plan were compromised as against West Bay and others:

> "Claim" means a claim for an amount alleged by a person to be owed to it by the Company, or a claim in relation to any obligation, enforceable right, duty or liability, contingent, accrued, vested or otherwise, (including any claim whether contingent or accrued on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen in right of the Dominion of Canada or any Province or any municipality) against the Company which was in existence in whole or in part as of the Filing Date, including any claim in relation to any liability, loss or damage arising from any such claim after the Filing Date, or any cause of action against the Company or its assets and property calculated either as at the Filing Date, or, in the case of claims under executory contracts arising subsequent to the Filing Date as a result of the termination of such contracts in accordance with an order of the Court made prior to the date of the Meeting, as at the date of such termination, either:
> (a) as set forth in a Proof of Claim which has either:
> (i) been admitted by the Company pursuant to the Plan for all purposes; or
> (ii) been determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction to be a proper obligation of either or both of the Company; or
> (b) for which a valid Proof of Claim could have been filed with the Company, but which Proof of Claim was not so filed prior to the Claims Bar Date;
> provided that a Claim shall not include the amount due or accruing due to a Post Filing Creditor in respect of Post Filing Creditor Claims, nor shall the Claim include interest for the period subsequent to the Filing Date. [Emphasis added]

The Reasons of the Chambers Judge

[6] The chambers judge held that Mr. Esau's claim for damages for wrongful dismissal was a "contingent liability" at the Filing Date, and, as such, fell within the definition of "Claim" in the Plan. She relied on two superior court decisions, British Columbia (Director of Employment Standards) v. Eland Distributors Ltd. (Trustee of) 1996 CanLII 3025 (BC SC), (1996), 21 B.C.L.R. (3d) 91 (S.C.), and Rizzo and Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re) reflex, (1991), 6 O.R. (3d) 441 (Gen. Div.), aff'd. (on other grounds), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, in concluding that the claim for damages for breach of Mr. Esau's employment contract accrued from the outset of his employment, and was therefore a liability of West Bay at the Filing Date.

[7] The chambers judge ordered that Mr. Esau's claim was a "pre-filing claim" and was compromised by the Plan. She permanently stayed the action, and refused to grant Mr. Esau an extension of time to file a Proof of Claim.

[8] Her reasons may be found at West Bay SonShip Yachts Ltd. (Re), 2007 BCSC 1553 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 1553, 37 C.B.R. (5th) 253.

Issues on Appeal

[9] On appeal, the parties joined issue on two alternative interpretations of the definition of "Claim" in the Plan, under which Mr. Esau's claim for damages for wrongful dismissal may be considered to be a "pre-filing claim": if it was a contingent liability at the Filing Date, or it was a claim under an executory contract.

[10] Thus, there are two issues in this appeal:

1. Is a wrongful dismissal claim a contingent liability prior to the termination of employment?
2. Is an employment contract an executory contract?

Analysis

Contingent Liability

[11] Mr. Esau takes the position that his claim for damages for breach of his employment contract did not accrue throughout his employment, but only arose when he was terminated. Thus, he argues, West Bay had no liability, contingent or otherwise, until the termination of his employment, which occurred after West Bay filed for protection under the CCAA. Thus, he says, his claim for damages is not compromised by the Plan.

[12] West Bay argues that while Mr. Esau's right to bring an action for damages for wrongful dismissal may not have crystallized until notice of termination was given, West Bay's obligation to pay severance was in existence "in whole or in part" as of the filing date. Thus, Mr. Esau's claim for damages for wrongful dismissal is a pre-filing claim and is compromised by the Plan.

[13] Both Eland Distributors and Rizzo and Rizzo Shoes, relied on by the chambers judge and West Bay, dealt with severance under employment standards legislation. The present case, however, involves a common law claim for damages for wrongful dismissal. As explored in three recent decisions of the British Columbia Employment Standards Tribunal, citing the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Barrette v. Crabtree Estate, 1993 CanLII 127 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 1027, this distinction is significant.

[14] In Sitter (Re), [2000] B.C.E.S.T.D. No. 515 at paras. 11 and 14, the adjudicator drew the following distinction between statutory and common law claims:

Digitized by Google

> Compensation for length of service payable under section 63 of the [Employment Standards] Act is a form of deferred contingent compensation that is intended "to compensate long-serving employees for their years of service and investment in the employer's business and for the special losses they suffer when their employment ends" (see Re Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27). Consistent with it being a service-based benefit, the amount of compensation for length of service payable by an employer increases in lockstep with an employee's tenure. However, "an amount payable in lieu of [contractual] notice does not flow from services performed for the corporation, but rather from the damage arising from non-performance of a contractual obligation to give sufficient notice" (see Barrette v. Crabtree Estate, 1993 CanLII 127 (SCC), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 1027).
> "Wages", as defined in section 1 of the Act, includes monies payable as compensation for length of service. Since compensation for length of service represents compensation for "years of service" (see Rizzo, supra.) it is, in fact, deferred compensation that is paid for "work" (see definition, section 1). On the other hand, damages for breach of a contractual notice provision are not paid for "work" but, rather, are paid (subject to mitigation) for "non-performance of a contractual obligation to give sufficient notice" (Barrette, supra.). An employee's right to sue for damages for breach of contract, even though the proper amount of compensation for length of service has been paid to the employee, is preserved by section 118 of the Act.

[15] This view was affirmed in Rupert Title Search Ltd. (Re), [2003] B.C.E.S.T.D. No. 70 at paras. 25 and 32, and in Taylor (Re), [2003] B.C.E.S.T.D. No. 82 at para. 11. In Rupert Title Search, the Tribunal described the statutory liability of an employer as "an 'earned' benefit to the employee that accumulates as the length of service of the employee increases", and distinguished this "length of service compensation" from common law damages for wrongful dismissal.

[16] Sitter, Rupert Title Search, and Taylor were recently approved by this Court in Colak v. UV Systems Technology Inc., 2007 BCCA 220 (CanLII), 2007 BCCA 220, 66 B.C.L.R. (4th) 373 at paras. 5-7. Madam Justice Huddart, for the Court, held that the Tribunal's understanding of the Employment Standards Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 113, and the distinction between statutory compensation payments and reasonable notice under an employment contract "merits respect". Common law claims for damages for wrongful dismissal are distinguishable from statutory claims for severance under employment standards legislation in terms of how they arise and are calculated.

[17] It is not necessary for the purpose of this appeal to determine whether a statutory claim for severance is properly characterized as a contingent liability prior to termination of employment. For present purposes, it is sufficient to conclude that Eland Distributors and Rizzo and Rizzo Shoes do not assist in the analysis of Mr. Esau's claim.

[18] The first step in determining whether Mr. Esau's claim for damages for breach of his employment contract represents a contingent liability is to consider the meaning of that term. This was recently discussed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Canada v. McLarty, 2008 SCC 26 (CanLII), 2008 SCC 26, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 79 at paras. 17–18, where Rothstein J. for the majority referred to the "well-accepted test for a contingent liability" as that described by Lord Guest in Winter v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1963] A.C. 235 at 262 (H.L.):

> I should define a contingency as an event which may or may not occur and a contingent liability as a liability which depends for its existence upon an event which may or may not happen.

[19] Similarly, Black's Law Dictionary, 8th ed. 2004, defines contingent liability as a "liability that will occur only if a specific event happens; a liability that depends on the occurrence of a future and uncertain event."

[20] For financial reporting purposes, threatened and pending litigation are considered to be contingent liabilities of a company: Institute of Chartered Accountants Handbook, looseleaf (Toronto: Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, 1981) at s. 3290; Errol C. Soriano, Understanding Financial Analysis in Litigation (Scarborough: Carswell, 2004) at 64-65; Levy-Russell Ltd. v. Shieldings Inc. 2004 CanLII 66297 (ON SC), (2004), 48 B.L.R. (3d) 28 at para. 126 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]). That is, threatened or pending litigation is characterized as a contingent liability. Actual liability will arise only when there is a judgment against the company.

[21] The question that arises in this case is whether the existence of a contractual obligation, and the corresponding potential for a claim for damages for its breach, is a contingent liability of the party who may commit the breach. I conclude that, although there is the potential of a claim for damages, there can be no liability, contingent or otherwise, where there is no present cause of action. That is, until there is a breach of contract, there is no legal basis for any claim or any corresponding liability.

[22] This conclusion finds support in the following definition of "liability" from Royal Trust Co. v. H.A. Roberts Group Ltd., 1995 CanLII 6094 (SK QB), [1995] 4 W.W.R. 305 at para. 119 (Sask. Q.B.):

> These statutory provisions [s. 125(1) and (3) of The Land Titles Act] envisage three kinds of obligations that can be secured by a registrable mortgage: a debt, a loan, or a liability that is future or contingent. No > case was cited to me that clarifies what is meant by these terms used in s. 125. The term "liability" is a broad term and is most often used to describe an unliquidated or unspecified legal obligation which arises due to negligence, breach of contract, etc. The term "debt" is a narrower term and means a specific kind of obligation for a liquidated or certain sum incurred pursuant to an agreement. The term "loan" is even narrower and means a specific type of debt. [emphasis added]

[23] Further support can be found in the American case of Grant-Howard Associates v. General Housewares, 472 N.E.2d 1 at 3-4 (N.Y. 1984), approved in Climatrol Industries Inc. v. Fedders Corp., 501 N.E.2d 292 at 294-295 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 1986), in the context of a product liability claim:

> An uninjured party simply is not a "contingent liability" in the usual sense of that term (see, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary [5th ed.], p. 291 ["A potential liability; e.g. pending lawsuit"]). There is no liability or claim before injury occurs. Granted that "contingency" invokes uncertain events, the uncertainty should be restricted to the success of asserting an existing claim, rather than expanding it to include the altogether unpredictable event that an injury will occur. [emphasis added]

[24] I conclude that the liability to pay damages if an employment contract is breached for failing to give reasonable notice of termination is not a contingent liability within the ordinary meaning of that term. Until the termination of employment without adequate notice, there is no injury. The possibility of a breach of contract is not sufficient to give rise to a contingent liability.

[25] Therefore, Mr. Esau's wrongful dismissal claim did not accrue from the outset of his employment and it did not represent a contingent liability of West Bay at the Filing Date. Consequently, Mr. Esau's claim is not a pre-filing claim on this basis.

Executory Contract

[26] West Bay argues in the alternative that Mr. Esau's contract of employment was an executory contract. As a result, it maintains that his claim for damages for its termination after the Filing Date and before the date of the meeting of General Creditors to approve the Plan on June 12, 2006 (the "Meeting"), was a "Claim" within the meaning of, and compromised by, the Plan. It says that the characterization of an employment contract as an executory contract is consistent with the legal definition of executory contracts and the purpose of the CCAA.

[27] Mr. Esau submits that when his employment contract was terminated it was not an executory contract because the only remaining performance to be tendered was the payment of money. He cites in support of his argument re U.S. Metalsource Corp., 163 B.R. 260 at 269 (Bankr. W.D. Pa. 1993), in which it was held that where the only obligation of the debtor was the obligation to pay severance pay to terminated employees, "[t]his type of contractual duty to pay a debt is insufficient to create an executory contract."

[28] If the contract was an executory contract at the Filing Date, however, a claim arising subsequent to that date as a result of termination of the contract is a "Claim" as of the date of termination. That is, if Mr. Esau's contract of employment was an executory contract at the Filing Date, his claim for damages for wrongful dismissal, arising as a result of his termination subsequent to that date and before the Meeting, became a "Claim" as of the date of termination.

[29] Thus, the question is whether a contract of employment such as Mr. Esau's, under which he promised to render services in return for West Bay's promise to pay him, was an executory contract at the Filing Date.

[30] The Alberta Court of Appeal recently considered the meaning of "executory contract" in Kary Investment Corp. v. Tremblay, 2005 ABCA 273 (CanLII), 2005 ABCA 273 at para. 19, 371 A.R. 339:

> A contract is said to be executory if anything remains to be done under it by any party, and executed when it has been wholly performed by all parties: Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 9(1) (London: Butterworths, 1998) at 341, para. 606; S. W. Mackay & Associates Ltd. v. Park Lane Ventures Ltd. 1997 CanLII 2051 (BC SC), (1997), 32 B.C.L.R. (3d) 338 at para. 8 (S.C.).
> [Emphasis added]

[31] In "A Joint Report of the Insolvency Institute of Canada and the Canadian Association of Insolvency and Restructuring Professionals – Joint Task Force on Business Insolvency Law Reform – March 15, 2002", the authors cited the following meanings for "executory contract":

> What is an executory contract? Neither the CCAA nor the BIA use the expression, but the United States Bankruptcy Code does in s. 365 ("Code, s. 365"). In general contract law, "executory contract" means a contract under which one or both parties still have obligations to perform. However, in U.S. bankruptcy law the expression is normally given a narrower meaning. According to the most widely accepted definition in the United States, an executory contract for the purposes of Code s. 365 is: > a contract under which both the obligations of the bankrupt ["A"] under the contract and the other party to the contract ["B"] are so far unperformed that the failure of either to complete performance would constitute a material breach excusing the performance of the other.

(Countryman, "Executory Contracts in Bankruptcy" (1974) 57 Minnesota Law Review 439 (Part 1), at 460).

[32] The authors included an employment contract as an executory contract in this sense. See also: Debtors and Creditors Sharing the Burden: A Review of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, a Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, November 2003, at 131, and Janis Sarra, Rescue!: The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (Toronto: Carswell, 2007) at 177-178, where employment contracts were characterized as executory contracts in the context of the discussion of insolvency laws. Professor Sarra noted (at 178-179) that damage claims resulting from termination or repudiation of executory contracts after the initial order are unsecured claims for damages.

[33] None of these sources discussed the application of the U.S. definition of executory contract for bankruptcy purposes to an employment contract. It is not clear to me, because of the nature of the employment relationship, that that definition will generally apply. As a matter of contract law, if the employee fails to provide the promised services, or the employer fails to pay for services rendered, subject to any other terms of the contract, that would ordinarily be a material breach excusing the performance of the other party. Whether that conclusion would ordinarily apply to an employment contract is, however, a question I do not need to decide for the purposes of this case. The ordinary legal definition of executory contract covers these circumstances.

[34] An ongoing employment contract, under which an employee has promised to render services in return for the employer's promise to pay for those services, is an executory contract as there are obligations on both parties that are yet to be completed. Thus, Mr. Esau's employment contract was, at the Filing Date, an executory contract.

[35] Accordingly, Mr. Esau's claim against West Bay for damages for wrongful dismissal fell within the definition of "Claim" in the Plan.

[36] That Mr. Esau's rights arising on termination of his employment contract were compromised under the Plan is consistent with the purpose of the CCAA, as recently considered by this Court in Skeena Cellulose Inc. v. Clear Creek Contracting Ltd., 2003 BCCA 344 (CanLII), 2003 BCCA 344, (sub nom. Skeena Cellulose Inc. (Re)) 13 B.C.L.R. (4th) 236 at para. 34:

> ...[C]ourts appear to have given full effect to the "broad public policy objectives" of the [CCAA], which in the phrase of a venerable article on the topic (Stanley E. Edwards, "Reorganizations under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act", (1947) 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587) are to "keep the company going despite insolvency" for the benefit of creditors, shareholders and others who depend on the debtor's continued viability for their economic success. As the author commented:
> > Hon. C.H. Cahan when he introduced the bill into the House of Commons indicated that it was designed to permit a corporation through reorganization to continue its business, and thereby to prevent its organization being disrupted and its goodwill lost. It may be that the main value of the assets of a company is derived from their being fitted together into one system and that individually they are worth little. The trade connections associated with the system and held by the management may also be valuable. In the case of a large company it is probable that no buyer can be found who would be able and willing to buy the enterprise as a whole and pay its going concern value. The alternative to reorganization then is often the sale of the property piecemeal for an amount which would yield little satisfaction to the creditors and none at all to the shareholders.
> > Reorganization may give to those who have a financial stake in the company an opportunity to salvage its intangible assets. To accomplish this they must ordinarily give up some of their nominal rights, in order to keep the enterprise going until business is better or defects in the management can be remedied. This object may be furthered by providing in the reorganization plan for such matters as a shift in control of the company or reduction of the fixed charges to such a degree as to make it possible to raise new money through new issues of bonds or shares. It may therefore be in the interest of all parties concerned to give up their claims against an insolvent company in exchange for new securities of lower nominal amount and later maturity date.

[37] The Plan permitted West Bay to rationalize its business affairs with a view to a reorganization that would make it viable in the future. The stated purpose of the Plan was to allow West Bay to "settle payment of its liabilities arising both before and after the Filing Date and to compromise the indebtedness owed to Creditors of the Company on a fair and equitable basis" (Plan, s. 2.1). It needed to retain its employees in order to complete existing orders for the construction of yachts, and to use the sale proceeds from the yachts to fund payments to its creditors on a compromised basis, on the basis that all of its creditors would "derive a greater benefit from the Plan than would result from the bankruptcy of the Company and so as to allow the Company to continue in business in the future". West Bay's tangible assets were sold to a related company to provide cash to further fund payments to creditors. It was intended that the company would remain in business using a revised production financing model, using private capital raised after the effective date of the Plan.

[38] In Skeena, the issue addressed by the Court was whether the termination of replaceable forest contracts, which could have "disastrous consequences for many individuals, local governments and communities", supplanted the intent and purpose of the CCAA to stave off a bankruptcy. The Court upheld the trial judge's decision that terminated employees were not to be placed in a better position than other creditors (at para. 22), and noted that "[i]n the exercise of their 'broad discretion' under the CCAA, it has now become common for courts to sanction the indefinite, or even permanent, affecting of contractual rights" (at para. 37). In considering whether the arrangement under the CCAA, as a whole, was "fair, reasonable and equitable", the Court noted that "equity" is not necessarily "equality" and that the courts looks to all of the creditors to see if rights are compromised in an attempt to balance interests (at para. 59). The Court concluded (at para. 60):

> As the Chief Justice noted, many individuals and corporations, as well as the Province, incurred major losses under the Plan. Each of them might also ask "Why me?" However, as he also noted, that is a frequent and unfortunate fact of life in CCAA cases, where the only "upside" is the possibility that bankruptcy and even greater losses will be averted.

Mr. Esau's Claim

[39] Mr. Esau's claim was thus subject to the terms of the Plan, which required creditors to file a "Proof of Claim" in accordance with the procedure and before the times set out in the relevant court orders. Mr. Esau did not file a Proof of Claim at any time. He did not receive a "Proof of Claim Package", as did other creditors, providing notice to file a Proof of Claim. However, West Bay published the notice to creditors, as ordered by the court, in the Vancouver Sun, and on its website. Mr. Esau was advised, through his counsel, that he was not entitled to bring an action against the company because of the stay of proceedings, that his claim as a creditor was compromised in the Plan, and that he could apply for an extension of time to file a Proof of Claim.

[40] In West Bay's application that is the subject of this appeal, it sought an order extending the time for Mr. Esau to file a Proof of Claim. It was only during the hearing of West Bay's application that Mr. Esau took the position that the time should be extended.

[41] The chambers judge denied the application for the extension of time, after considering the factors enumerated in Blue Range Resources Corp. (Re), 2000 ABCA 285 (CanLII), 2000 ABCA 285, 271 A.R. 138 at para. 26:

1. Was the delay caused by inadvertence and if so, did the claimant act in good faith?
2. What is the effect of permitting the claim in terms of the existence and impact of any relevant prejudice caused by the delay?
3. If relevant prejudice is found can it be alleviated by attaching appropriate conditions to an order permitting late filing?
4. If relevant prejudice is found which cannot be alleviated, are there any other considerations which may nonetheless warrant an order permitting late filing?

[42] She concluded that the delay was significant, and was not caused by inadvertence. She further concluded that permitting the claim would result in prejudice that could not reasonably be alleviated (at paras. 32-36).

[43] The chambers judge's decision to deny an extension of time to file a Proof of Claim was discretionary, reviewable by this Court only if it was clearly wrong or has worked a substantial injustice: see Meuller v. Coronation Insurance (1995), 12 B.C.L.R. (3d) 90 (C.A.).

[44] Mr. Esau has not shown that the chambers judge's decision was clearly wrong, and she was in the best position, as the judge supervising the CCAA proceedings, to weigh the relative prejudice to all parties if his claim was allowed to be litigated while all other matters involving West Bay's creditors had been finalized.

[45] I see no basis to interfere with the chambers judge's decision not to extend the time to file the Proof of Claim.

Conclusion

[46] Mr. Esau's claim for damages for wrongful dismissal was a claim under an executory contract, and as such was stayed and compromised by the CCAA proceedings. There is no basis to interfere with the chambers judge's decision not to extend the time to file a Proof of Claim, nor to consider Mr. Esau's claim for misrepresentation.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
of the

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an application for determination of three preliminary issues relating to a claim made by Big Bear Exploration Ltd. against Blue Range Resource Corporation, a company to which the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-36, as amended, applies. Big Bear is the sole shareholder of Blue Range, and submits that its claim should rank equally with claims of unsecured creditors. The preliminary issues relate to the ranking of Big Bear's claim, the scope of its entitlement to pursue its claim and whether Big Bear is the proper party to advance the major portion of the claim.

[2] The Applicants are the Creditors' Committee of Blue Range and Enron Canada Corp., a major creditor. Big Bear is the Respondent, together with the MRF 1998 II Limited Partnership, whose partners are in a similar situation to Big Bear.

FACTS

[3] Between October 27, 1998 and February 2, 1999, Big Bear took the following steps:

(a) it purchased shares of Blue Range for cash through The Toronto Stock Exchange on October 27 and 29, 1998;

(b) it undertook a hostile takeover bid on November 13, 1998, by which it sought to acquire all of the issued and outstanding Blue Range shares;

(c) it paid for the Blue Range shares sought through the takeover bid by way of a share exchange: Blue Range shareholders accepting Big Bear's offer received 11 Big Bear shares for each Blue Range share;

[4] The takeover bid was accepted by Blue Range shareholders and on December 12, 1998, Big Bear acquired control of Blue Range. It is now the sole shareholder of Blue Range.

[5] Big Bear says that its decision to undertake the takeover was made in reliance upon information publicly disclosed by Blue Range regarding its financial situation. It says that after the takeover, it discovered that the information disclosed by Blue Range was misleading, and in fact the Blue Range shares were essentially worthless.

[6] Big Bear as the sole shareholder of Blue Range entered into a Unanimous Shareholders' Agreement pursuant to which Big Bear replaced and took on all the rights, duties and obligations of the Blue Range directors. Using its authority under the Unanimous Shareholders' Agreement, Big Bear caused Blue Range to apply for protection under the CCAA. An order stipulating that Blue Range is a company to which the CCAA applies was granted on March 2, 1999.

[7] On April 6, 1999, LoVecchio, J. issued an order which provides, in part, that:

(a) all claims of any nature must be proved by filing with the Monitor a Notice of Claim with supporting documentation, and

(b) claims not received by the Monitor by May 7, 1999, or not proved in accordance with the prescribed procedures, are forever barred and extinguished.

[8] Big Bear submitted a Notice of Claim to the Monitor dated May 5, 1999 in the amount of $151,317,298 as an unsecured claim. It also filed a Notice of Motion on May 5, 1999, seeking an order lifting the stay of proceedings granted by the March 2, 1999 order for the purpose of filing a statement of claim against Blue Range. Big Bear's application for leave to file its statement of claim was denied by LoVecchio, J. on May 11, 1999.

[9] On May 21, 1999, the Monitor issued a Notice of Dispute disputing in full the Big Bear claim. Big Bear filed a Notice of Motion on May 31, 1999 for:

(a) a declaration that the unsecured claim of Big Bear is a meritorious claim against Blue Range; and

(b) an order directing the expeditious trial and determination of the issues raised by the unsecured claim of Big Bear.

[10] On October 4, 1999, LoVecchio, J. directed that there be a determination of two issues in respect of the Big Bear unsecured claim by way of a preliminary application. On October 28, 1999, I defined the two issues and added a third one.

[11] Big Bear's Notice of Claim sets out the nature and amount of its claim against Blue Range. The amount is particularized by the schedule attached to the Notice of Claim, which identifies the claim as being comprised of the following components:

(a) the price of shares acquired for cash on October 27 and 29, 1998 ($724,454.91);

Digitized by Google

(b) the value of shares acquired by means of the share exchange of Big Bear treasury shares for Blue Range shares held by Blue Range shareholders ($147,687,298); and

(c) "transaction costs," being costs incurred by Big Bear for consultants, professional advisers, filings, financial services, and like matters incidental to the share purchases generally, and the takeover bid in particular ($3,729,498).

ISSUE #1

[12] With respect to the alleged share exchange loss, without considering the principle of equitable subordination, is Big Bear:

(a) an unsecured creditor of Blue Range that ranks equally with the unsecured creditors of Blue Range; or

[13] At the hearing, this question was expanded to include reference to the transaction costs and cash share purchase damage claims in addition to the alleged share exchange loss.

Summary of Decision

[14] The nature of the Big Bear claim against Blue Range for an alleged share exchange loss, transaction costs and cash share purchase damages is in substance a claim by a shareholder for a return of what it invested qua shareholder. The claim therefore ranks after the claims of unsecured creditors of Blue Range.

Analysis

[15] The position of the Applicants is that the share exchange itself was clearly an investment in capital, and that the claim for the share exchange loss derives solely from and is inextricably intertwined with Big Bear's interest as a shareholder of Blue Range. The Applicants submit that there are therefore good policy reasons why the claim should rank after the claims of unsecured creditors of Blue Range, and that basic corporate principles, fairness and American case law support these policy reasons. Big Bear submits that its claim is a tort claim, allowable under the CCAA, and that there is no good reason to rank the claim other than equally with unsecured creditors. Big Bear submits that the American cases cited are inappropriate to a Canadian CCAA proceeding, as they are inconsistent with Canadian law.

[16] There is no Canadian law that deals directly with the issue of whether a shareholder allegedly induced by fraud to purchase shares of a debtor corporation is able to assert its claim in such a way as to achieve parity with other unsecured creditors in a CCAA proceeding. It is therefore necessary to start with basic principles governing priority disputes.

[17] It is clear that in common law shareholders are not entitled to share in the assets of an insolvent corporation until after all the ordinary creditors have been paid in full: Re: Central Capital Corp. 1996 CanLII 1521 (ON CA), (1996), 132 D.L.R. (4th) 223 (Ont. C.A.) at page 245; Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank 1992 CanLII 49 (SCC), (1992), 97 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (S.C.C.) at pages 402 and 408. In that sense, Big Bear acquired not only rights but restrictions under corporate law when it acquired the Blue Range shares.

[18] There is no doubt that Big Bear has exercised its rights as a shareholder of Blue Range. Pursuant to the Unanimous Shareholders' Agreement, it authorized Blue Range to file an application under the CCAA "to attempt to preserve the equity value of [Blue Range] for the benefit of the sole shareholder of [Blue Range]" (Bourchier November 1, 1999 affidavit). It now attempts to recover its alleged share exchange loss through the claims approval process and rank with unsecured creditors on its claim. The issue is whether this is a collateral attempt to obtain a return on an investment in equity through equal status with ordinary creditors that could not be accomplished through its status as a shareholder.

[19] In Canada Deposit Insurance (supra), the Supreme Court of Canada considered whether emergency financial assistance provided to the Canadian Commercial Bank by a group of lending institutions and government was properly categorized as a loan or as an equity investment for the purpose of determining whether the group was entitled to rank pari passu with unsecured creditors in an insolvency. The court found that, although the arrangement was hybrid in nature, combining elements of both debt and equity, it was in substance a loan and not a capital investment. It is noteworthy that the equity component of the arrangement was incidental, and in fact had never come into effect, and that the agreements between the parties clearly supported the characterization of the arrangement as a loan.

[20] Central Capital (supra) deals with the issue of whether the holders of retractable preferred shares should be treated as creditors rather than shareholders under the CCAA because of the retraction feature of the shares. Weiler, J.A. commented at page 247 of the decision that it is necessary to characterize the true nature of a transaction in order to decide whether a claim is a claim provable in either bankruptcy or under the CCAA. She stated that a court must look to the surrounding circumstances to determine "whether the true nature of the relationship is that of a shareholder who has equity in the company or whether it is that of a creditor owed a debt or liability."

[21] The court in Central Capital found that the true nature of the relationship between the preferred shareholders and the debtor company was that of shareholders. In doing so, it considered the statutory provision that prevents a corporation from redeeming its shares while insolvent, the articles of the corporation, and policy considerations. In relation to the latter factor, the court commented that in an insolvency where debts will exceed assets, the policy of federal insolvency legislation precludes shareholders from looking to the assets until the creditors have been paid (supra, page 257).

[22] In this case, the true nature of Big Bear's claim is more difficult to characterize. There may well be scenarios where the fact that a party with a claim in tort or debt is a shareholder is coincidental and incidental, such as where a shareholder is also a regular trade creditor of a corporation, or slips and falls outside the corporate office and thus has a claim in negligence against the corporation. In the current situation, however, the very core of the claim is the acquisition of Blue Range shares by Big Bear and whether the consideration paid for such shares was based on misrepresentation. Big Bear had no cause of action until it acquired shares of Blue Range, which it did through share purchases for cash prior to becoming a majority shareholder, as it suffered no damage until it acquired such shares. This tort claim derives from Big Bear's status as a shareholder, and not from a tort unrelated to that status. The claim for misrepresentation therefore is hybrid in nature and combines elements of both a claim in tort and a claim as shareholder. It must be determined what character it has in substance.

[23] It is true that Big Bear does not claim recission. Therefore, this is not a claim for return of capital in the direct sense. What is being claimed, however, is an award of damages measured as the difference between the "true" value of Blue Range shares and their "misrepresented" value - in other words, money back from what Big Bear "paid" by way of consideration. Although the matter is complicated by reason that the consideration paid for Blue Range shares by Big Bear was Big Bear treasury shares, the Notice of Claim filed by Big Bear quantifies the loss by assigning a value to the treasury shares. A tort award to Big Bear could only represent a return of what Big Bear invested in equity of Blue Range. It is that kind of return that is limited by the basic common law principal that shareholders rank after creditors in respect of any return on their equity investment. Whether payment of the tort liability by Blue Range would affect Blue Range's stated capital account is irrelevant, since the shares were not acquired from Blue Range but from its shareholders.

[24] In considering the question of the characterization of this claim, it is noteworthy that Mr. Tonken in his March 2, 1999 affidavit in support of Blue Range's application to apply the CCAA did not include the Big Bear claim in his list of estimated outstanding debt, accounts payable and other liabilities. The affidavit does, however, set out details of the alleged mispresentations.

[25] I find that the alleged share exchange loss derives from and is inextricably intertwined with Big Bear's shareholder interest in Blue Range. The nature of the claim is in substance a claim by a shareholder for a return of what it invested qua shareholder, rather than an ordinary tort claim.

[26] Given the true nature of the claim, where should it rank relative to the claims of unsecured creditors?

[27] The CCAA does not provide a statutory scheme for distribution, as it is based on the premise that a Plan of Arrangement will provide a classification of claims which will be presented to creditors for approval. The Plan of Arrangement presented by CNRL in the Blue Range situation has been approved by creditors and sanctioned by the Court. Section 3.1 of the Plan states that claims shall be grouped into two classes: one for Class A Claimants and one for Class B Claimants, which are described as claimants that are "unsecured creditors" within the meaning of the CCAA, but do not include " a Person with a Claim which, pursuant to Applicable Law, is subordinate to claims of trade creditors of any Blue Range Entities." The defined term "Claims" includes indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind. Applicable Law includes orders of this Court.

[28] Although there are no binding authorities directly on point on the issue of ranking, the Applicants submit that there are a number of policy reasons for finding that the Big Bear claim should rank subordinate to the claims of unsecured creditors.

[29] The first policy reason is based on the fundamental corporate principle that claims of shareholders should rank below those of creditors on an insolvency. Even though this claim is a tort claim on its face, it is in substance a claim by a shareholder for a return of what it paid for shares by way of damages. The Articles of Blue Range state that a holder of Class A Voting Common Shares is entitled to receive the "remaining property of the corporation upon dissolution in equal rank with the holders of all other common shares of the Corporation". As pointed out by Laskin, J. in Central Capital (supra at page 274):

> Holding that the appellants do not have provable claims accords with sound corporate policy. On the insolvency of a company the claims of creditors have always ranked ahead of the claims of shareholders for the return of their capital. Case law and statute law protect creditors by preventing companies from > using their funds to prejudice creditors' chances of repayment. Creditors rely on these protections in making loans to companies.

[30] Although what is envisaged here is not that Blue Range will pay out funds to retract shares, the result is the same: Blue Range would be paying out funds to the benefit of its sole shareholder to the prejudice of third-party creditors.

[31] It should be noted that this is not a case, as in the recent restructuring of Eatons under the CCAA, where a payment to the shareholders was clearly set out in the Plan of Arrangement and approved by the creditors and the court.

[32] As counsel for Engage Energy, one of the trade creditors, stated on May 11, 1999 during Big Bear's application for an order lifting the stay order under the CCAA and allowing Big Bear to file a statement of claim:

> We've gone along in this process with a general understanding in our mind as to what the creditor pool is, and as recently as middle of April, long after the evidence will show that Big Bear was identifying in its own mind the existence of this claim, public statements were continuing to be made, setting out the creditor pool, which did not include this claim. And this makes a significant difference in how people react to supporting an ongoing plan...

[33] Another policy reason which supports subordinating the Big Bear claim is a recognition that creditors conduct business with corporations on the assumption that they will be given priority over shareholders in the event of an insolvency. This assumption was referred to by Laskin, J. in Central Capital (supra), in legal textbooks (Hadden, Forbes and Simmonds, Canadian Business Organizations Law Toronto: Butterworths, 1984 at 310, 311), and has been explicitly recognized in American case law. The court in In the Matter of Stirling Homex Corporation, 579 F. 2d 206 (1978) U.S.C.A. 2nd Cir. at page 211 referred to this assumption as follows:

> Defrauded stockholder claimants in the purchase of stock are presumed to have been bargaining for equity type profits and assumed equity type risks. Conventional creditors are presumed to have dealt with the corporation with the reasonable expectation that they would have a senior position against its assets, to that of alleged stockholder claims based on fraud.

[34] The identification of risk-taking assumed by shareholders and creditors is not only relevant in a general sense, but can be illustrated by the behaviour of Big Bear in this particular case. In the evidence put before me, Big Bear's president described how, in the course of Big Bear's hostile takeover of Blue Range, it sought access to Blue Range's books and records for information, but had its requests denied. Nevertheless, Big Bear decided to pursue the takeover in the absence of information it knew would have been prudent to obtain. Should the creditors be required to share the result of that type of risk-taking with Big Bear? The creditors are already suffering the results of misrepresentation, if it occurred, in the inability of Blue Range to make full payment on its trade obligations.

[35] The Applicants submit that a decision to allow Big Bear to stand pari passu with ordinary creditors would create a fundamental change in the assumptions upon which business is carried on between corporations and creditors, requiring creditors to re-evaluate the need to obtain secured status. It was this concern, in part, that led the court in Stirling Homex to find that it was fair and equitable that conventional creditors should take precedence over defrauded shareholder claims (supra at page 208).

[36] The Applicants also submit that the reasoning underlying the Central Capital case (where the court found that retraction rights in shares do not create a debt that can stand equally with the debt of shareholders) and the cases where shareholders have attempted to rescind their shareholdings after a corporation has been found insolvent is analogous to the Big Bear situation, and the same result should ensue.

[37] It is clear that, both in Canada and in the United Kingdom, once a company is insolvent, shareholders are not allowed to rescind their shares on the basis of misrepresentation: McAskill v. The Northwestern Trust Company, 1926 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1926] S.C.R. 412 at 419; Milne v. Durham Hosiery Mills Ltd., [1925] 3 D.L.R. 725 (Ont. S.C.A.D.); Trusts and Guarantee Co. v. Smith (1923), 54 O.L.R. 144 (Ont. S.C.A.D.); Re: National Stadium Ltd. (1924), 55 O.L.R. 199 (Ont. S.C.); Oaks v. Turquend [1861-73] All E.R. Rep. 738 (H.L.) at page 743-744.

[38] The court in McAskill (supra at page 419) in obiter dicta refers to a claim of recission for fraud, and comments that the right to rescind in such a case may be lost due to a change of circumstances making it unjust to exercise the right. Duff, J. then refers to the long settled principle that a shareholder who has the right to rescind his shares on the ground of misrepresentation will lose that right if he fails to exercise it before the commencement of winding-up proceedings, and comments:

> The basis of this is that the winding-up order creates an entirely new situation, by altering the relations, not only between the creditors and the shareholders, but also among the shareholders inter se.

[39] This is an explicit recognition that in an insolvency, a corporation may not be able to satisfy the claims of all creditors, thus changing the entire complexion of the corporation, and rights that a shareholder may have been entitled to prior to an insolvency can be lost or limited.

[40] In the Blue Range situation, Big Bear has actively embraced its shareholder status despite the allegations of misrepresentation, putting Blue Range under the CCAA in an attempt to preserve its equity value and, in the result, holding Blue Range's creditors at bay. Through the provision of management services, Big Bear has participated in adjudicating on the validity of creditor claims, and has then used that same CCAA claim approval process to attempt to prove its claim for misrepresentation. It may well be inequitable to allow Big Bear to exercise all of the rights it had arising from its status as shareholder before CCAA proceedings had commenced without recognition of Blue Range's profound change of status once the stay order was granted. Certainly, given the weight of authority, Big Bear would not likely have been entitled to rescind its purchase of shares on the basis of misrepresentation, had the Blue Range shares been issued from treasury.

[41] Finally, the Applicants submit that it is appropriate to take guidance from certain American cases which are directly on point on this issue.

[42] The question I was asked to address expressly excludes consideration of the principle of "equitable subordination". The Applicants submit that the principle of equitable subordination that is excluded for the purpose of this application is the statutory principle codified in the U.S. Bankruptcy Code in 1978 (Bankruptcy Code, Rules and Forms (1999 Ed.) West Group, Subchapter 1, Section 510 (b)). This statutory provision requires notice and a full hearing, and relates to the ability of a court to subordinate an allowed claim to another claim using the principles of equitable subordination set out and defined in case law. The Applicants submit, however, that I should look to three American cases that preceded this statutory codification and that dealt with subordination of claims by defrauded shareholders to the claims of ordinary unsecured creditors on an equitable basis.

[43] The first of these cases is Stirling Homex (supra). The issue dealt with by the United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, is directly on point: whether claims filed by allegedly defrauded shareholders of a debtor corporation should be subordinated to claims filed by ordinary unsecured creditors for the purposes of formulating a reorganization plan. The court referred to the decision of Pepper v. Litton (308 U.S. 295 at page 305, 60 S.Ct. 238, 84 L. Ed. 281 (1939)) where the Supreme Court commented that the mere fact that a shareholder has a claim against the bankrupt company does not mean it must be accorded pari passu status with other creditors, and that the subordination of that claim may be necessitated by principles of equity. Elaborating on this, the court in Stirling Homex (supra at page 213) stated that where the debtor corporation is insolvent, the equities favour the general creditors rather than the allegedly defrauded shareholders, since in this case, the real party against which the shareholders are seeking relief is the general creditors whose percentage of realization will be reduced if relief is given to the shareholders. The court quotes a comment made by an earlier Court of Appeals (Newton National Bank v. Newbegin, 74 F. 135, 140 (8th Cir. 1896):

> When a corporation becomes bankrupt, the temptation to lay aside the garb of a stockholder, on one pretense or another, and to assume the role of creditor, is very strong, and all attempts of that kind should be viewed with suspicion.

[44] Although the court in Stirling Homex refers to its responsibility under US bankruptcy law to ensure that a plan of reorganization is "fair and equitable" and to the "absolute priority" rule of classification under US bankruptcy principles, it is clear that the basis for its decision is the general rule of equity, a "sense of simple fairness" (supra, page 215). Despite the differences that may exist between Canadian and American insolvency law in this area, this case is persuasive for its reasoning based on equitable principles.

[45] If Big Bear's claim is allowed to rank equally with unsecured creditors, this will open the door in many insolvency scenarios for aggrieved shareholders to claim misrepresentation or fraud. There may be many situations where it could be argued that there should have been better disclosure of the corporation's declining fortunes, for who would deliberately have invested in a corporation that has become insolvent. Although the recognition that this may greatly complicate the process of adjudicating claims under the CCAA is not of itself sufficient to subordinate Big Bear's claim, it is a factor that may be taken into account.

[46] The Applicants also cite the case of In re U.S. Financial Incorporated 648 F. 2d 515 (1980)(U.S.C.A. 9th Cir.). This case is less useful, as it was decided primarily on the basis of the absolute priority rule, but while the case was not decided on equitable grounds, the court commented that support for its decision was found in the recognition of the importance of recognizing differences in expectations between creditors and shareholders when classifying claims (supra at page 524). The court also stated that although both creditors and shareholders had been victimized by fraud, it was equitable to impose the risks of insolvency and illegality on the shareholders whose investment, by its very nature, was a risky one.

[47] The final case cited to me on this issue is In re THC Financial 679 F. 2d 784 (1982) (U.S.C.A. 9th Cir.), where again the court concluded that claims of defrauded shareholders must be subordinated to the claims of the general creditors. The court commented that the claimant shareholders had bargained for equity-type profits and equity-type risks in purchasing their shares, and one such risk was the risk of fraud. As pointed out previously, Big Bear had an appreciation of the risks of proceeding with its takeover bid without access to the books and records of Blue Range and took the deliberate risk of proceeding in any event.

[48] In THC Financial, the claimants argued that since they had a number of possible causes of action in addition to their claim of fraud, they should not subordinated merely because they were shareholders. The court found, however, that their claim was essentially that of defrauded shareholders and not as victims of an independent tort. All of the claimants' theories of recovery were based on the same operative facts - the fraudulent scheme.

[49] Big Bear submits that ascribing some legal impediment to a shareholder pursuing a remedy in tort against a company in which it holds shares violates the principle set out in Salomon v. Salomon and Company, Limited [1897] A.C. 22 (H.L.) that corporations are separate and distinct entities from their shareholders. In my view, this is not in issue. What is being sought here is not to limit a tort action by a shareholder against a corporation but to subordinate claims made qua shareholder to claims made by creditors in an insolvency situation. That shareholder rights with respect to claims against a corporation are not unlimited has already been established by the cases on rescission and recognized by statutory limitations on redemption and retraction. In this case, the issue is not the right to assert the claim, but the right to rank with creditors in the distribution of the proceeds of a pool of assets that will be insufficient to cover all claims. No piercing of the corporate veil is being suggested or would result.

[50] Counsel for Big Bear cautions against the adoption of principles set out in the American cases on the basis that some decisions on equitable subordination require inequitable conduct by the claimant as a precondition to subordinating a claim, referring to a three-part test set out in a number of cases. This discussion of the inequitable conduct precondition takes place in the broader context of equitable subordination for any cause as it is codified under Section 510 of the US Bankruptcy Code. In any event, it appears that more recent American cases do not restrict the use of equitable subordination to cases of claimant misconduct, citing, specifically, that stock redemption claims have been subordinated in a number of cases even when there is no inequitable conduct by the shareholder. "Stock redemption" is the term used for cases involving fraud or misrepresentation: U.S. v. First Truck Lines, Inc. (1996) 517 U.S. 535; SPC Plastics Corporation et al v. Griffiths et al (1998) 6th Circuit Case No. 88-21236. Some of the American cases draw a distinction between cases where misconduct is generally required before subordination will be imposed and cases where "the claim itself is of a status susceptible to subordination, such as...a claim for damages arising from the purchase ... of a security of the debtor": U.S. v. First Truck Lines, Inc. (supra, at paragraph 542).

[51] The issue of whether equitable subordination as codified in Section 510 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code should form part of the law in Canada has been raised in several cases but left undecided. Big Bear submits that these cases establish that if equitable subordination is to be part of Canadian law, it should be on the basis of the U.S. three-part test which includes the condition of inequitable conduct. Again, I cannot accept this submission. It is true that Iacobucci, J. in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp., while he expressly refrains from deciding whether a comparable doctrine should exist in Canada, refers to the three-part test and states that he does not view the facts of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. case as giving rise to inequitable conduct. It should be noted, however, that that case did not involve a claim by a shareholder at all, since the lenders had never received the securities that were an option under the agreements, and that the relationship had at this point in the case been characterized as a debtor/creditor relationship.

[52] At any rate, this case, together with Olympia and York Developments Ltd. v. Royal Trust Co. [1993] O.J. No. 181 (Ont. G.D.) and Unisource Canada Inc. v. HongKong Bank of Canada [1998] O.J. No. 5586 (Ont. H.C.) all refer to the doctrine of equitable subordination codified in the U.S. Bankruptcy Code which is not in issue here. The latter two cases appear to have accepted the erroneous proposition that inequitable misconduct is required in all cases under the American doctrine.

[53] Big Bear also submits that the equitable principles that exist in U.S. law which have led the courts to ignore separate corporate personality in the case of subsidiary corporations are related to equitable principles used to subordinate shareholder claims. The basis for this submission appears to be a reference by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in B.G. Preeco I (Pacific Coast) Ltd. v. Bon Street Holdings Ltd. et al (1989) 43 B.L.R. 68 (1989) to the Pepper v. Litton case (supra) and the so-called "Deep Rock doctrine" under American law. I do not see a link between the comments made in Pepper v. Litton and referred to in B.C. Preeco on an entirely different issue and comments concerning the court's equitable jurisdiction in the case of claims by shareholders against insolvent corporations.

[54] I acknowledge that caution must be used in following the approach taken in American cases to ensure that the principles underlying such approach do not arise from differences between U.S. and Canadian law. However, I find that the comments made by the American courts in these cases relating to the policy reasons for subordinating defrauded shareholder claims to those of ordinary creditors are persuasive, as they are rooted in principles of equity that are very similar to the equitable principles used by Canadian courts.

[55] American cases are particularly useful in the areas of commercial and insolvency law given that the larger economy in the United States generates a wider variety of issues that are adjudicated by the courts. There is precedent for the use of such cases: Laskin, J. in Central Capital Corp. (supra) used the analysis set out in American case law on whether preferred shareholders can claim as creditors in an insolvency to help him reach his conclusion.

[56] The three American cases decided on this direct issue before the 1978 statutory codification of the law of equitable subordination are not based on a doctrine of American law that is inconsistent with or foreign to Canadian common law. It is not necessary to adopt the U.S. absolute priority rule to follow the approach they espouse, which is based on equitable principles of fairness and policy. There is no principled reason to disregard the approach set out in these cases, which have application to Canadian business and economy, and I have found them useful in considering this issue.

[57] Based on my characterization of the claim, the equitable principles and considerations set out in the American cases, the general expectations of creditors and shareholders with respect to priority and assumption of risk, and the basic equitable principle that claims of defrauded shareholders should rank after the claims of ordinary creditors in a situation where there are inadequate assets to satisfy all claims, I find that Big Bear must rank after the unsecured creditors of Blue Range in respect to the alleged share exchange loss, the claim for transaction costs and the claim for cash share purchase damages.

[58] Assuming (without admitting) misrepresentation by Blue Range and reliance on it by Big Bear, is the alleged share exchange loss a loss or damage incurred by Big Bear and, accordingly, is Big Bear a proper party to advance the claim for such a loss?

Summary of Decision

[59] As the alleged share exchange loss is not a loss incurred by Big Bear, Big Bear is not the proper party to advance this claim.

Analysis

[60] The Applicants submit that negligence is only actionable if a plaintiff can prove that it suffered damages, as the purpose of awarding damages in tort is to compensate for actual loss. This is a significant difference between damages in tort and damages in contract. In order for a plaintiff to have a cause of action in negligent misrepresentation, it must satisfy the court as to the usual elements of duty of care and breach thereof, and it must establish that it has sustained damages from that breach.

[61] The Applicants argue that Big Bear did not suffer any damages arising from the share exchange. The Big Bear shares used in the share exchange came from treasury: Big Bear did not use any corporate funds or corporate assets to purchase the Blue Range shares. As the shares used in the exchange did not exist prior to the transaction, Big Bear was essentially in the same financial position pre-issuance as it was post-issuance in terms of its assets and liabilities. The nature and composition of Big Bear's assets did not change as the treasury shares were created and issued for the sole purpose of the share exchange. Therefore, Big Bear did not sustain a loss in the amount of the value of the shares. The Applicants submit that the only potential loss is that of the pre-takeover shareholders of Big Bear, as the value of their shares may have been diluted as a result of the share exchange. However, even if there was such a loss, Big Bear is not the proper party to pursue such an action. Just as shareholders may not bring an action for a loss which properly belongs to the corporation, a corporation may not bring an action for a loss directly incurred by its shareholders.

[62] Big Bear claims that it is entitled to recover the value of the Big Bear shares that were issued in furtherance of the share exchange. It says that it can prove all the elements of negligent misrepresentation: there was a special relationship; material misrepresentations were made to Big Bear; those representations were made negligently; Big Bear relied on those representations; and Big Bear suffered damage.

[63] It submits that damages for negligent misrepresentation are calculated as the difference between the represented value of the shares less their sale value. Big Bear contends that it matters not that the consideration for the Blue Range shares was Big Bear shares issued from treasury. As long as the consideration is adequate consideration for legal purposes, its form does not affect the measure of damages awarded by the courts for negligent misrepresentation.

Digitized by Google

Big Bear says that it bargained for a company with a certain value, and, in doing so, it gave up its own shares worth that value. Therefore, Big Bear submits that it clearly incurred a loss.

[64] Big Bear submits that it is the proper party to pursue this head of damages. While the corporation has met the test for negligent misrepresentation, the shareholders likely could not, as the representations in questions were not made to them. In any event, Big Bear indicates that it does not claim for any damages caused by dilution of the shares. It also notes that a claim for dilution would not be the same as the face value of the shares issued in the share exchange, which is the amount claimed in the Notice of Claim.

[65] Big Bear's claim is in tort, not contract. This is an important distinction, as the issue at hand concerns the measure of damages. The measure of damages is not necessarily the same in contract as it is in tort.

[66] It is a first principle of tort law that a person is entitled to be put in the position, insofar as possible, that he or she was before the tort occurred. While the courts were historically loath to award damages for pure economic loss, this position was softened in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd.* v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465 (H.L.) where the court confirmed that damages could be recovered in this type of case. When assessing damages for negligent misrepresentation resulting in pure economic loss, the goal is to put the party who relied on the misrepresentation in the position which it would have been in had the misrepresentation not occurred. While the parties to this application appear to agree on this principle, it is the application thereof with which they disagree.

[67] The proper measure of damages in cases of misrepresentation is discussed in S.M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (Toronto: Canada Law Book Inc., Looseleaf, Dec. 1998), where the author states:

> The English and Canadian cases have consistently held that the proper measure [with respect to fraudulent misrepresentation] is the tortious measure, that is the amount of money required to put the plaintiff in the position that would have been occupied not if the statement had been true but if the statement had not been made. The point was made clearly in McConnel v. Wright , [1903] 1 Ch. 546 (C.A.):
> > It is not an action for breach of contract, and, therefore, no damages in respect of prospective gains which the person contracting was entitled by his contract to expect come in, but it is an action of tort - it is an action for a wrong done whereby the plaintiff was tricked out of certain money in his pocket; and therefore, prima facie, the highest limit of his damages is the whole extent of his loss, and that loss is measured by the money which was in his pocket and is now in the pocket of the company. That is the ultimate, final, highest standard of his loss. (at 5-19, 5-20)

> Since the decision of the House of Lords in 1963 in Hedley Byrne Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465 (H.L.) it has been established that an action lies for negligent misrepresentation causing economic loss. It naturally follows from acceptance of out-of pocket loss rather than the contractual measure as the basic measure of damages for fraud, that the same basic measure applies to negligent misrepresentation. (at 5-28).

[68] Big Bear claims to be entitled to the difference between the actual value and the exchange value of the shares. The flaw in this assertion is that it focuses on what Big Bear bargained for as opposed to what it actually received, which is akin to a contractual measure of damages. Big Bear clearly states that it is not maintaining an action in contract, only in tort. Damages in tort are limited to the losses which a plaintiff actually incurs as a result of the misrepresentation. Thus, Big Bear is not entitled to recover what it expected to receive as a result of the transaction; it is entitled to be compensated only for that which it actually lost. In other words, what did Big Bear have before the loss which it did not have afterwards? To determine what losses Big Bear actually sustained, its position after the share exchange must be compared with its position prior to the share exchange.

[69] The situation at hand is unique. Due to a negligent misrepresentation, Big Bear was induced to give up something which, although it had value, was of substantially no cost to the corporation, and in fact did not even exist but for the misrepresentation. Big Bear created shares which had a value for the purpose of the share exchange, in that Blue Range shareholders were willing to accept them in exchange for Blue Range shares. However, outside of transaction costs, those shares had no actual cost to Big Bear, as compared to the obvious costs associated with a payment by way of cash or tangible assets. Big Bear cannot say that after the share exchange, it had lost approximately $150 million dollars, because the shares essentially did not exist prior to the transaction, and the cost of creating those shares is not equivalent to their face value. Big Bear retains the ability to issue a limitless number of shares from treasury in the future; any loss in this regard would not be equivalent to the actual value of the shares. Therefore, all that is required to return Big Bear to its pre-misrepresentation position is compensation for the actual costs associated with issuing the shares.

[70] That Big Bear has not incurred a loss in the face value of the exchanged shares is demonstrated by comparing the existing facts with hypothetical situations in which such a loss may be found. Had Big Bear been required to pay for the shares used in the exchange, for instance, by purchasing shares from existing Big Bear shareholders, there would have been a clear loss of funds evidenced in the Big Bear financial statements. Big Bear's financial position prior to the exchange would have been significantly better than its position afterwards. However, no such difference results from the mere exchange of newly-issued shares. If there had been evidence that Big Bear was or could be compelled to redeem or retract the new shares at the value assigned to them at the time of the share exchange, Big Bear may have a loss in the amount of the exchange value of the shares. However, there is no evidence of such a redemption or retraction feature attaching to these shares.

[71] In sum, Big Bear's position prior to the share exchange is that the Big Bear shares issued as part of the exchange did not exist. As a result of the alleged misrepresentation, Big Bear issued shares from treasury. These shares would not have been issued but for the misrepresentation. All that is required to put Big Bear back into the position it was in prior to the negligent misrepresentation is compensation for the cost of issuing the shares, which is not the same as the exchange value of those shares. Although this is somewhat of an anomalous situation, it is consistent with the accepted tort principle that, except in cases warranting punitive damages, damages in tort are awarded to compensate for actual loss. A party may not recover in tort for a loss of something it never had. Indeed, if Big Bear was awarded damages for the share exchange equal to what it has claimed, it would be in a better position financially than it was prior to the exchange. To the extent that shareholders would indirectly benefit, they would not only be Big Bear's pre-exchange shareholders, who may have suffered a dilution loss, but a new group of shareholders, including former Blue Range shareholders who participated in the exchange.

[72] Big Bear submits that it incurred other losses as a result of the misrepresentation. Transaction costs incurred in the share exchange may be properly characterized as damages in tort, as those costs would not have been incurred but for the negligent misrepresentation. The same is true for the Big Bear claim for cash expended to purchase Blue Range shares prior to the share exchange. However, as I have indicated in my decision on Issue #1, Big Bear's claim for transaction costs and for cash share purchase damages ranks after the claims of other unsecured creditors. There may also be losses such as loss of ability to raise equity. There was no evidence of this before me in this application, and I have addressed Big Bear's ability to advance a claim for this type of loss in the decision relating to Issue #3.

[73] Finally, there may also be a loss in the form of dilution of the value of the Big Bear shares. However, as Big Bear admits in its submissions, no such claim is made by the corporation, and any loss relating to a diluted share value would not be the same amount as the exchange value of the shares.

[74] In the result, I find that Big Bear is not the proper party to pursue a claim for the alleged share exchange loss.

ISSUE #3

Is Big Bear entitled to make or advance by way of argument in these proceedings the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft Statement of Claim set out at Exhibit "F" to the affidavit of A. Jeffrey Tonken dated June 25, 1999?

[75] In addition to claims for damages for negligent misrepresentation, the claims that are set out in the draft Statement of Claim are claims for remedies for oppressive and unfairly prejudicial conduct and claims for loss of opportunity to pursue valuable investments and endeavours and loss of ability to raise equity.

Summary of Decision

[76] Given the orders made by LoVecchio, J. on April 6, 1999 and May 11, 1999, Big Bear is not entitled to advance the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft Statement of Claim other than as set out in its Notice of Claim.

Analysis

[77] Big Bear submits that it is clear that, in an appropriate case, a complex liability issue that arises in the context of CCAA proceedings may be determined by a trial, including provision for production and discovery: Algoma Steel Corp. v. Royal Bank of Canada [1992] O.J. No. 889 (Ont. C.A.). Big Bear also submits that the court has the jurisdiction to overlook technical complaints about the contents of a Notice of Claim. The CCAA does not prescribe a claim form, nor set the rules for completion and contexts of a claim form, and it is common ground that in this case, the form used for the "Notice of Claim" was not approved by any order of the court. At any rate, Big Bear submits that it is not seeking to amend its claim to add new claims or to claim additional amounts.

[78] It makes that assertion apparently on the basis that the major parties concerned with CCAA proceedings in the Blue Range matter were aware of the nature of Big Bear's additional claims by reason of the draft Statement of Claim attached to Mr. Tonken's May 5, 1999 affidavit, although that affidavit was filed in support of an application to lift the stay imposed under the CCAA, an application which was dismissed by LoVecchio, J. on May 11, 1999.

Digitized by Google

[79] Big Bear characterizes the issue as whether it must prove the exact amount claimed in its Notice of Claim or otherwise have its claim barred forever. It submits that the bare contents of the Notice of Claim cannot be construed as a fixed election barring a determination and assessment of an unliquidated claim for tort damages, and that it would be inequitable to deny Big Bear a hearing on the substance of its claim based on a perceived technical deficiency in the contents of the Notice of Claim.

[80] In summary, Big Bear asks that the court direct an expedited trial for the hearing of its claim as outlined in the draft Statement of Claim.

[81] The Applicants submit that, by attempting now to make claims other than the claims set out in the Notice of Claim, Big Bear is attempting to indirectly and collaterally attack the orders of LoVecchio, J. dated April 6, 1999 and May 11, 1999, specifically:

a) by adding claims for alleged heads of damage other than those specified in the Notice of Claim contrary to the claims bar order of April 6, 1999; and

b) by attempting to include portions of the draft Statement of Claim relating to other alleged heads of damage in the Notice of Claim contrary to the May 11, 1999 order dismissing leave to file the draft Statement of Claim.

[82] While it is true that a court has jurisdiction to overlook technical irregularities in a Notice of Claim, the issue is not whether the court should overlook technical non-compliance with, or ambiguity in, a form, but whether it is appropriate to do so in this case where previous orders have been made relating to these issues. Here, Big Bear chose to pursue its claims through two different routes. It filed a Notice of Claim alleging damages for a share exchange loss, transaction costs and the cost of shares purchased before the takeover bid, all damage claims that can reasonably be identified as being related to an action for negligent misrepresentation. At about the same time, it brought an application to lift the stay granted under the CCAA and file a Statement of Claim that alleged other causes of action. That application was dismissed, and the order dismissing it was never appealed. This is not a situation as in Re Cohen reflex, (1956) 19 W.W.R. 14 (Alta. C.A.) where a claim made on one basis was later sought to be made on a different basis, nor an issue of Big Bear lacking the necessary information to make its claim, although quantification of damage may have been difficult to determine. Given the previous application by Big Bear, this is a collateral or indirect attack on the effectiveness of LoVecchio, J.'s orders, and should not be allowed: Wilson v. The Queen (1983) 4 D.L.R. (4th) at 599). The effect of the two orders made by LoVecchio, J. is to prevent Big Bear from advancing its claim other than as identified in its Notice of Claim, which cannot reasonably be interpreted to extend beyond the claims for damages for negligent misrepresentation.

[83] It is true that the Notice of Claim form is not designed for unliquidated tort claims. I do not accept, however, that it was not possible for Big Bear to include claims under other heads of damages in the claim process by, for example, attaching the draft Statement of Claim to the Notice of Claim, or by incorporating such claims by way of schedule or appendix, as was done with respect to the claims for damages for negligent misrepresentation.

[84] I note that LoVecchio, J. issued a judgment after this application was heard relating to claims for relief from the impact of the claims procedure established by the court by a number of creditors who filed late or wished to amend their claims after the claims bar date of May 7, 1999 had passed. Although LoVecchio, J. allowed these claims, and found that it was appropriate in the circumstances to grant flexibility with respect to the applications before him, he noted that total amount of the applications made to him would be less than 1.4 million dollars, and the impact of allowing the applications was minimal to the remaining creditors. The applications before him do not appear to involve issues which had been the subject of previous court orders, as in the current situation, nor would they have the same implication to creditors as would Big Bear's claim. The decision of LoVecchio, J. in the circumstances of the applications before him is distinguishable from this issue.

Banks and banking operations -- Winding-up -- Bank facing solvency crisis -- Support group providing emergency financial assistance -- Whether money advanced was in nature of a loan or of a capital investment -- Whether participants rank pari passu with other unsecured creditors on winding-up.

Banks and banking operations -- Winding-up -- Postponement of claims -- Doctrine of equitable subordination -- Bank facing solvency crisis -- Support group providing emergency financial assistance -- Money advanced being in nature of a loan -- Whether loan comes within postponement provision in Partnerships Act -- If not, whether claim should nonetheless be postponed under doctrine of equitable subordination -- Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.5, ss. 3(3)(d), 4.

In early 1985 Canadian Commercial Bank ("CCB") faced a solvency crisis owing to a sharp deterioration in its loan portfolio. A support group consisting of the governments of Canada and of Alberta, the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corp. and six major Canadian banks (the "participants") entered into an arrangement to provide the emergency financial assistance requested. They essentially agreed to purchase from CCB an undivided interest by way of participation in a portion (the "syndicated portion") of a portfolio of assets it held, the participation interest of each being proportionate to its own financial contribution. The parties also agreed that the participants would receive from CCB on a proportionate basis the money recovered on the syndicated portion of the portfolio assets as well as 50 percent of CCB's pre-tax income, or alternatively 100 percent of CCB's pre-tax income plus interest at the prime rate, until such time as the money advanced had been repaid. CCB undertook to indemnify each participant against any loss experienced under the support program up to the amount paid by them to CCB. It was agreed that, in the event of the insolvency or winding-up of CCB, any amount remaining unpaid "shall constitute indebtedness of CCB to the members of the Support Group". Finally, the parties agreed that each participant would receive from CCB, on a proportionate basis, warrants to purchase common shares of CCB, although the exercise of this option was contingent on shareholder, regulatory and legislative approval. The warrants were to expire 10 years after the date on which CCB had repaid the full amount advanced. Despite this financial assistance, CCB's financial status continued to deteriorate and the Court of Queen's Bench ordered that it be wound up. On an application by the liquidator for advice on the validity and ranking of the participants' claims, the chambers judge considered the injection of funds by the participants to have been a capital investment. He held that they were entitled to repayment of sums recovered on the syndicated portion of the portfolio assets but otherwise not entitled to recovery of their advances until after all ordinary creditors were paid in full. The Court of Appeal reversed the latter part of this judgment. It characterized the advance as a loan and concluded that the participants were entitled to rank pari passu with CCB's other unsecured creditors for all monies advanced and not repaid from the syndicated portion of the portfolio assets. This appeal is to determine (1) whether the Court of Appeal was correct in characterizing the advance by the participants to CCB as a loan; if so, (2) whether the loan comes within the postponement provision found in s. 4 of the Ontario Partnerships Act; and (3) if the Partnerships Act does not apply, whether the respondents' claim for the money loaned under the participation agreement should nonetheless be postponed to the claims of CCB's other unsecured creditors based on the doctrine of equitable subordination.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Both the wording of the agreements and the surrounding circumstances clearly support the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the $255 million advance was in substance a loan and not a capital investment. Although the transaction did have an equity component (the warrants), this aspect alone does not in the circumstances of this case transform the essential nature of the advance from a loan to an investment. Nor does the fact that CCB's pre-tax income was the main source for repayment affect this characterization as the amount to be repaid from this source was limited to the sum advanced to CCB. Thus, the respondents are creditors of CCB and, as such, are entitled to rank pari passu with the other unsecured creditors of CCB in the distribution of CCB's assets.

The Court of Appeal properly declined to postpone the respondents' claims for the moneys not repaid until the claims of the other ordinary creditors of CCB were satisfied. The postponement provision in s. 4 of the Ontario Partnerships Act applies only where "money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in section 3". Section 3(3)(a) makes no reference to a "contract" and is thus beyond the scope of s. 4. Section 3(3)(d) applies where "the lender is to receive . . . a share of the profits arising from carrying on the business". Any fixed debt to be repaid out of profits does not in itself constitute a "share of the profits" within the meaning of this provision. A lender does not share in profits unless he or she is entitled to be paid amounts referable to profits other than in repayment of the principal amount of the loan. Here the participants had a fixed debt which would be repaid in part by the moneys received from the syndicated portion of the portfolio assets and in part by CCB's pre-tax income. With the exception of the contingent interest at prime rate, under no circumstance were the payments from the pre-tax income to be applied to anything but the repayment of the loan. Once the loan was fully repaid, all payments from CCB's pre-tax income were to stop. Accordingly, the participants were not to receive a "share of the profits" of CCB within the meaning of s. 3(3)(d) by virtue of the repayment scheme for the advance. The contemplated granting of warrants under the highly contingent circumstances of this case does not alter this conclusion.

The principles of equitable subordination have no application to the facts of this case. Assuming that Canadian courts have the power in insolvency matters to subordinate otherwise valid claims to those of other creditors on equitable grounds relating to the conduct of these creditors inter se, the exercise of such a power is not justified in the present case. The reasons and limited evidence advanced before this Court disclose neither inequitable conduct on the part of the participants nor injury to the ordinary creditors of CCB as a result of the alleged misconduct.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by IACOBUCCI J. -- In September of 1985, the Canadian public witnessed what fortunately has been an infrequent occurrence in Canadian banking. Early that month, a chartered bank known as the Canadian Commercial Bank ("CCB") became insolvent and was ordered to be wound up pursuant to the provisions of the Winding-up Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. W-11 (formerly R.S.C. 1970, c. W-10). This appeal concerns the characterization of the unique and complex financial arrangement entered into by the Governments of Canada and of Alberta, six major Canadian financial institutions, the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation ("CDIC") and CCB in the spring of 1985 in an attempt to prevent its winding-up. The main issue is whether, in substance, the $255 million advanced to CCB under this arrangement was in the nature of a loan, in which case the "lenders" thereof would rank pari passu with the other unsecured creditors of CCB, or whether it was in the nature of a capital investment in the business of CCB, in which case such unsecured creditors would have priority over the "investors". If the former characterization is adopted, as I believe it should be, subsidiary issues concerning the postponement of claims under s. 4 of the Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.5, and the doctrine of equitable subordination are also raised.

I. Facts

Although they are relatively uncomplicated, the facts of this case are rather extensive and warrant a full review. CCB was a chartered bank involved primarily in commercial lending. In early 1985, CCB faced a solvency crisis owing to a sharp deterioration in its loan portfolio. Many of its outstanding loans had become non-performing. On March 14, 1985, CCB's Chief Executive Officer reported this crisis to the Office of the Inspector General of Banks and announced the inability of CCB to continue in operation without outside assistance. At the request of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, a government and banking industry funded support initiative was undertaken to assist CCB and to avoid the loss of public confidence in Canada's banking system.

On March 24, 1985, a support group comprising Her Majesty in right of Canada ("Canada"), Her Majesty in right of Alberta ("Alberta"), CDIC and what I shall sometimes refer to as the "Bank Group", consisting of the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Montreal, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, and the National Bank of Canada, entered into a Memorandum of Intent to provide the "emergency financial assistance" requested by CCB "on certain terms".

In essence, Canada, Alberta, CDIC and the Bank Group, collectively referred to as the "Participants", agreed to purchase from CCB, at a total price of $255 million, an undivided interest by way of participation in a portfolio of assets held by CCB consisting of loans and related security having a nominal value, on the books of CCB, of over $500 million ("Portfolio Assets"). The participation interest of each Participant was proportional to its own financial contribution and was to be evidenced by Participation Certificates issued by CCB. The parties also agreed in principle that the Participants would receive from CCB on a proportionate basis, and until such a time as the Participants received the amount they paid for their Participation Certificates, a portion of the money received on account of each Portfolio Asset as well as 50 percent of CCB's pre-tax income, or alternatively 100 percent of CCB's pre-tax income plus interest. In other words, it was agreed that the $255 million advanced by the Participants would be repaid by CCB. After repayment, the payments from the Portfolio Assets and from CCB's pre-tax income would cease.

Under the Memorandum of Intent, CCB undertook to indemnify each Participant against any loss experienced under the support program up to the amount paid by them to CCB. It was agreed that in the event of the insolvency or winding-up of CCB, any amount remaining unpaid "shall constitute indebtedness of CCB to the members of the Support Group". Finally, the parties agreed in principle that each Participant would receive from CCB, on a proportionate basis, transferable rights or warrants to purchase common shares of CCB at a price of $0.25 per share. The warrants were to expire 10 years after the day that CCB had repaid the full amount advanced for the Participation Certificates.

On March 25, 1985, the Department of Finance issued a press release announcing a joint agreement involving "an infusion of capital with repayment provisions . . . designed to provide the Canadian Commercial Bank with sufficient funds to ensure solvency following a recent and sharp deterioration in its U.S. loan portfolio". The agreement was described as resulting in the "purchase by the support group of a package of nonperforming loans", leaving CCB "in a strong position of solvency in order to support its deposit base". After setting out the general terms of the support program, the Minister of State (Finance) said she had "full confidence" that this program "involving Canada's largest chartered banks and the two Governments will permit the Canadian Commercial Bank to continue its active and important role in the growing economy of Western Canada". The Minister concluded that the support program represented "a strong collective vote of confidence in the health of the economy of Western Canada".

In order to carry out the letter and spirit of the Memorandum of Intent, the Participants and CCB were to execute, among other documents, a "Participation Agreement" (also referred to as "P.A."), an "Equity Agreement" (also referred to as "E.A.") and an "Amending and Subordination Agreement". These agreements, which incorporate and refine the general principles agreed to earlier in the Memorandum of Intent, were ultimately entered into as of April 29, 1985. The Participation Agreement and the Equity Agreement formed the core of the support program. There are no relevant inconsistencies between these documents and the Memorandum of Intent. I will, however, review in closer detail the former documents as their provisions are of crucial importance to the resolution of the issues raised by this appeal.

Section 2 of the Participation Agreement provided for the Participants to purchase from CCB, at a total price of $255 million, an undivided interest by way of participation in 255,000,000 units in the Portfolio Assets of CCB. Each Participant's interest was proportional to its financial contribution. For example, CDIC advanced $75 million and received a participation interest in 75,000,000 units. The total participation in the Portfolio Assets was divided into 529,798,627 units, with the portion of 255,000,000 units purchased by the Participants commonly referred to as the "Syndicated Portion". CCB retained beneficially an undivided participation interest in the remaining 274,798,627 units which comprised the aggregate of the "CCB Portion" of the Portfolio Assets.

Under s. 5 of the Participation Agreement, CCB warranted that the CCB Portion for each Portfolio Asset represented its "best estimate of the amount likely to be recovered from or with respect to that Portfolio Asset". Thus, as found by the learned chambers judge, the Participants purchased, in essence, a portfolio of bad loans or that portion of a loan not likely to be recovered.

CCB was appointed and authorized to act as agent to administer the Portfolio Assets (P.A. s. 6(a)). Pursuant to s. 9 of the Participation Agreement, all money received by CCB on account of each Portfolio Asset, whether principal, interest or otherwise, was first to be retained by CCB until the CCB Portion of that Portfolio Asset was completely recovered; then to be paid to the Participants (except CDIC) proportionately to reduce or retire their respective advances; then to be paid to CDIC to reduce or retire its proportionate share; and finally to be retained by CCB. Each Participant was entitled to receive these proceeds up until such time as it received an amount which, when taken together with all amounts received by that Participant from CCB's pre-tax income pursuant to s. 10, was equal to the price paid by that Participant for its Participation Certificate.

In addition to proceeds from CCB's Portfolio Assets, the Participants were entitled to receive proportionately from CCB, on a quarterly basis, an amount equal to 50 percent of CCB's pre-tax income (P.A. s. 10). CCB's "pre-tax income" was defined in s. 10 of the Participation Agreement as CCB's "net income . . . before making any allowance for the payments to be made pursuant to this section, accrued interest on any presently existing bank debenture of CCB or any provision for income taxes payable to Canada, the United States of America and any political division of either". Again, CCB's obligation to make such payments would terminate after each Participant received an amount pursuant to ss. 9 and 10 equal to the price paid by such Participant for its Participation Certificate (P.A. s. 10).

Under s. 11 of the Participation Agreement, if CCB failed by October 31, 1985, to obtain the shareholder and regulatory approval necessary for it to increase its authorized capital to the extent required for it to perform the Equity Agreement, as discussed below, then s. 10 of the Participation Agreement would be deemed to have been amended and would be construed as requiring CCB to pay to the Participants 100 percent of CCB's pre-tax income. This obligation would continue until such time as the total amount received by each Participant from the Portfolio Assets and CCB's pre-tax income satisfied the amount paid by that Participant for its Participation Certificate, together with interest at prime rate. It should be noted that this was the only circumstance under which CCB was to pay interest to the Participants.

Section 8 of the Participation Agreement provided that CCB indemnified each Participant against any loss suffered by it by reason of the amounts realized from the Portfolio Assets and from 50 percent of CCB's pre-tax income failing to equal the price paid by that Participant for its Participation Certificate. This indemnity was to be paid only by payments of the amount and source described in ss. 10 and 11, with one important exception: "if CCB becomes insolvent or is wound up, any amount remaining unpaid and required to be paid in order to indemnify that Participant completely in accordance with the foregoing indemnity, shall constitute indebtedness of CCB, to which the provisions of section 13 shall apply."

The relevant parts of s. 13 of the Participation Agreement read as follows:

13. Priorities on Insolvency

(a) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 277 of the Bank Act [which otherwise gives Canada and a province a first and second charge respectively on the assets of an insolvent bank] or any other rule of law, each of the Participants agrees that, in the case of the insolvency or winding-up of CCB:

(i) neither Canada, CDIC nor Alberta shall, in connection with any money owing to it under this agreement, claim any charge on the assets of CCB;

(ii) the right of each of the Participants other than CDIC to money owing to it under this agreement shall rank pari passu with the right of the depositors of CCB to payment in full of the deposit liabilities of CCB;

(iii) the right of CDIC to money owing to it by CCB, under this agreement but not by reason of the subrogation of CDIC to the claims of depositors of CCB (if any) shall be subordinate in right of payment to the prior payment in full of all money owing to the other Participants under this agreement and to the depositors of CCB, but shall rank in priority to any outstanding bank debentures of CCB.

Each of Canada, CDIC and Alberta acknowledges that it has waived, as set out above, any priority to which it would otherwise be entitled. Each Participant agrees that this section 13 is intended to benefit the depositors of CCB, and to enure to the benefit of the successors of CCB and any curator, liquidator or receiver that may be appointed to supervise or to wind up the business of CCB. [Emphasis added.]

Moreover, s. 13 provided that each Participant would rank pari passu with each other except CDIC and that each would, as necessary, redistribute payments received by it in order to achieve this ranking.

Pursuant to s. 12 of the Participation Agreement, CCB could not, without the consent of the Participants, declare or pay any dividend or reduce its issued capital until such time as CCB paid to each Participant its purchase price, and any additional amount (interest at prime rate) payable under s. 11. Moreover, the Participants required as a condition to their purchase, inter alia: (1) the execution of an Amending and Subordination Agreement; (2) the execution of the Equity Agreement; and (3) the opinion of the Inspector General of Banks that CCB would be solvent following the purchase (P.A. ss. 14 and 16). Finally, the parties expressly declared that the Participants were not partners or joint venturers with each other (P.A. s. 18(j)) and that the law governing the agreement would be the law applicable in the Province of Ontario (P.A. s. 18(d)).

The Equity Agreement gave the Participants warrants providing for the right to subscribe to a total of 24,062,517 common shares of CCB at a price of $0.25 per share, on a basis proportionate to each Participant's participation interest (E.A. ss. 2, 3, 5 and 6). At the date of the agreement, CCB had an authorized capital of 10,000,000 common shares with a par value of $10 each, of which 6,529,768 were issued and outstanding (E.A. s. 4). If all outstanding employee stock options to purchase common shares were exercised and all issued convertible preferred shares were converted into common shares, the issued capital of CCB would consist of a total of 8,020,839 common shares (E.A. s. 4). Thus, if the warrants were fully exercised, the Participants would own 75 percent of CCB's common shares.

Shareholder and regulatory approval were required to increase CCB's authorized capital from its current level of 10,000,000 common shares to the 32,100,000 required in order to give full effect to the Equity Agreement. Pursuant to s. 15 thereof, CCB had to first obtain shareholder approval no later than October 31, 1985, and next had to apply to the Minister of Finance pursuant to the Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1 (formerly S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 40) for the necessary change in its authorized capital. If such an application was not made by October 31, 1985, the provisions of s. 11 of the Participation Agreement (100 percent pre-tax income plus interest) were triggered. In s. 8 of the Memorandum of Intent, Canada had agreed that "an application for such alteration in capital when made shall be approved for purposes of the Bank Act".

The limited authorized capital of CCB was not the only obstacle to the issuance of common shares to the Participants. Under present law, the chartered banks which were Participants could not legally exercise their right to subscribe to common shares of CCB. This was recognized by the parties in paragraph (d) of the preamble to the Equity Agreement as well as in s. 10 of the agreement. Under s. 8 of the Equity Agreement, the warrants were made fully assignable and it was the declared intention of the Participants, as recorded in the preamble, "that unless the present law is materially changed, they shall assign such rights".

The Participants' right to purchase these shares was to continue for a period of 10 years after the date on which each Participant had been repaid the full amount it had advanced under the terms of the Participation Agreement (E.A. ss. 1 and 12). Again, this agreement would be governed by and construed in accordance with the law applicable in the Province of Ontario (E.A. s. 19).

Finally, under the Amending and Subordination Agreement, the holders of all outstanding subordinated debentures issued by CCB pursuant to s. 132 of the Bank Act (i.e. Canada, British Columbia, Alberta and the Workers' Compensation Board of British Columbia) agreed to postpone the repayment of the amounts represented by their debentures until such time as CCB had paid to each Participant an amount equal to the price paid by that Participant for its Participation Certificate.

To summarize, the Participants were to receive in return for the $255 million advanced under the support program, proportionally to their own financial contribution and up to that amount: (1) payments from the Portfolio Assets; (2) (a) 50 percent of CCB's pre-tax income and warrants to buy up to 75 percent of CCB's common shares, or (b) 100 percent of CCB's pre-tax income, with interest on the amount contributed; and (3) an indemnity for any losses caused. Under these agreements, the Participants could receive a return which was greater than their contribution only in two ways, namely by exercising or assigning their warrants up to 10 years after full repayment (however, this option was contingent on shareholder, regulatory and legislative approval) or, if these warrants could not be granted, by receiving interest on the amount advanced at the prime rate.

CCB was advised by the Office of the Inspector General of Banks, by a letter dated April 24, 1985, as to the appropriate accounting treatment to be applied to these transactions. Following these guidelines, CCB wrote down its loan assets by $255 million, charged the write-down to tax-allowable appropriations for contingencies and credited the $255 million received from the Participants to tax-paid appropriations for contingencies. CCB was not specifically directed by the Inspector General of Banks to record its indemnity towards the Participants as a liability, nor did CCB do so. By effectively "selling" that portion of its loan portfolio not likely to be recovered and by not recording its indemnity obligation under the Participation Agreement to repay the $255 million as a liability, CCB was able to restore a position of solvency on its books, thereby allowing it to remain in business, which was, after all, the raison d'être of the support program.

Despite this financial assistance, CCB's financial status continued to deteriorate. For reasons beyond the scope of this appeal, the support program was unsuccessful in ensuring CCB's long-term solvency. By an Order made September 3, 1985, on a petition by CDIC, Wachowich J. of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench ordered CCB to be wound up pursuant to the Winding-up Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. W-10. At that point, none of the Participants had exercised or assigned (or even been granted) any of their warrants under the Equity Agreement as the preliminary conditions of shareholder and regulatory approval for the authorization and issuance of additional common shares had not been fulfilled. Price Waterhouse Limited was appointed, and remains, the sole Liquidator of CCB ("Liquidator").

As of August 18, 1987, the Liquidator had recovered approximately $112 million on account from CCB's Portfolio Assets, of which $5 million was attributable to the portion thereof beneficially owned by the Participants (namely, the Syndicated Portion). The Liquidator brought an application before Wachowich J. for advice and direction as to the interpretation of the support agreements. In particular, the Liquidator sought to determine the validity and ranking of the claims of the Participants pursuant to the Participation Agreement.

In a judgment rendered on December 7, 1987, Wachowich J. held the Participants to be entitled to the repayment of sums recovered by the Liquidator on the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets (the $5 million), but otherwise not entitled to recover their advances until after all ordinary creditors, including unsecured creditors, were paid in full. Wachowich J. interpreted the injection of funds by the Participants to have been a capital investment. The Participants, apart from Canada and CDIC, the respondents in this appeal, successfully appealed the latter part of this judgment. The Alberta Court of Appeal disagreed with Wachowich J., preferring to characterize the advance of $255 million as a loan. The Court of Appeal concluded that the Participants were entitled to rank pari passu with CCB's unsecured creditors for all monies advanced to CCB pursuant to the Participation Agreement and not repaid by monies recovered from the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets.

On an application by the Liquidator, Wachowich J. directed the Liquidator to present an application to this Court for leave to appeal from the Court of Appeal's decision. Wachowich J. further ordered that Lerner & Associates be appointed as Legal Representative ("Legal Representative") of CCB's general body of creditors, other than the Participants, for purposes of the application for leave to appeal and further on the appeal. Leave to appeal to this Court was granted on March 14, 1991, [1991] 1 S.C.R. vi. The Liquidator, as an officer of the Court and as the representative of all the creditors of CCB, takes no position in this appeal. The Bank Group and Alberta, the respondents before this Court, made separate written and oral submissions.

II. Judgments in the Courts Below

A. Alberta Court of Queen's Bench (1987), 83 A.R. 122

On the initial application, the Participants took the position that they were entitled under the terms of the support agreements: (1) to receive their proportionate shares of the moneys received by the Liquidator or CCB on account of the Portfolio Assets; and (2) to rank pari passu with all the other unsecured creditors of CCB for any amounts not recovered from the Portfolio Assets and still owing to them pursuant to the Participation Agreement. Wachowich J. agreed with the first proposition but rejected the second.

According to Wachowich J., the Participants' first submission involved a consideration of the validity of the Participation Agreement. The learned chambers judge confessed it was a "difficult task" to determine the position of the Participants with respect to CCB's estate given the "extraordinary nature of the agreement" involved (at p. 126). He noted there were no precedents dealing with similar commercial agreements. In his view, the Participation Agreement in question was not prohibited by ss. 173 and 174 of the Bank Act. While the agreement did not relate to business in which a bank would normally or commonly engage, he noted that "given the unique circumstances and the stated purpose of the Participation Agreement as a whole, one can hardly regard this as an invalid transaction" (at p. 127). He found it was a valid contractual document binding on all parties and held that the Participants were entitled to receive their proportionate share from moneys recovered by the Liquidator from the Portfolio Assets, in the manner provided for in s. 9 of the Participation Agreement (i.e. to the extent such recoveries exceed the CCB Portion).

Next, Wachowich J. turned to a consideration of the ranking of the Participants with the general body of creditors of CCB for any amounts not recovered from the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets, and still owing pursuant to the Participation Agreement. He noted that the Participants would have "valid claims" under the terms of the Participation Agreement for such amounts (at p. 128). However, whether they could rank pari passu with other unsecured creditors depended on the interpretation of the agreement taken as a whole and a determination of the "real basis upon which the $255 million was paid to CCB" (at p. 128).

In Wachowich J.'s view, the essence of the Participation Agreement was not the creation of a mere purchase and sale of assets with an added indemnity as to the value of those assets. Rather, the transaction reflected an investment of capital into CCB (at p. 129):

> The agreement, as evidenced by all the surrounding circumstances, was really to effect an infusion of capital into C.C.B. whereby the Participants would be risking their monies in hope that the C.C.B. would continue as a viable and profitable business. If this in fact had occurred, the Support Group Participants stood to gain a healthy return on their investments.

The learned chambers judge found support for his characterization in the following: (1) the portion of the Portfolio Assets purchased by the Participants was of little value; (2) s. 2 of the Participation Agreement masked the true nature of the transaction, that is, the investment of working capital into CCB; (3) the indemnity provision and repayment structure set up by the agreement were directly connected to the profits and income of CCB; (4) the repayment of the purchase price was to come not only from the Portfolio Assets, but mainly from CCB's pre-tax income; (5) if CCB's business was successful, the Participants would benefit not only in recovering their purchase price, but as well by purchasing common shares in CCB under the Equity Agreement; (6) "[w]hile the transaction may not be a typical investment situation, where for example there is an outright purchase of shares, it is difficult to ignore the investment features of the agreement" (p. 130); (7) while the accounting treatment had to be looked at with caution, the fact there was no liability to the Participants recorded on the balance sheet of CCB, as created by the indemnity provisions of the agreement, supported the conclusion that the transaction was an investment; (8) the cases of Laronge Realty Ltd. v. Golconda Investments Ltd. 1986 CanLII 756 (BC CA), (1986), 7 B.C.L.R. (2d) 90 (C.A.) ("Laronge Realty"), In re Dickie Estate (1924), 5 C.B.R. 214 (N.S.S.C.), and In re Meade, [1951] 1 Ch. D. 774, "stand for the general proposition that advances of monies will be classed as capital investments where the monies were used in the business and the business was carried on for the joint benefit of the parties involved" (at p. 131); and (9) the Participants here did have a stake in the continued profitability of CCB in that (a) the repayment of the money advanced would come from the income of CCB and (b) their warrants allowed them to "continue to share in the profits of C.C.B." (at p. 131).

Thus, according to Wachowich J., the Participants could not rank pari passu with the ordinary creditors of CCB, including unsecured creditors, for the amounts not recovered from the Portfolio Assets. In so doing, he applied the principle that "if a person contributes capital to a business, even though that person is not a partner in the business and may have received no share of the profits, they cannot prove their claim in bankruptcy in competition with the creditors of the business" (at p. 131): Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd ed.), vol. 2, at p. 495; Laronge Realty, supra; and In re Beale (1876), 4 Ch.D. 246.

In concluding, Wachowich J. held the provisions of the Participation Agreement which attempt to rank the Participants pari passu and to create a debt on insolvency are ineffective to alter the "existing legal nature of their relationship" with CCB. These provisions would be void as they are an attempt to alter insolvency laws through a private agreement: British Eagle International Airlines Ltd. v. Compagnie Nationale Air France, [1975] 2 All E.R. 390 (H.L.).

B. Alberta Court of Appeal 1990 ABCA 139 (CanLII), (1990), 107 A.R. 199

The respondents (the Participants apart from Canada and CDIC) appealed from Wachowich J.'s conclusion with respect to their ranking on insolvency, whereas the then Legal Representative cross-appealed from the conclusion that the Participants could receive funds from the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets. Harradence J.A. (writing for the Court of Appeal) began by stating that the learned chambers judge had erred in law in his interpretation of the decisions in Laronge Realty, supra, In re Dickie Estate, supra, and In re Meade, supra (at p. 207):

> I have examined closely the cases relied upon as well as others to which I have been referred and the inescapable conclusion to be reached is that the proposition as stated [by Wachowich J.] can only be correct where one implies into the term "monies were used in the business" a necessary condition that the investor has not expressly stipulated a requirement for the repayment of monies advanced. A failure to imply this term into the proposition results in a misstatement of the appropriate test and, further, is inconsistent with the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Sukloff v. Rushforth (1964), 45 D.L.R. (2d) 510 (S.C.C.).

Digitized by Google

Harradence J.A. reviewed the cases cited by Wachowich J. and noted that, unlike the case at bar, none of them involved transactions where provisions for the repayment of the money advanced had been included by the parties. Turning specifically to Sukloff v. A. H. Rushforth & Co., 1964 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 459 ("Sukloff v. Rushforth"), Harradence J.A. said that while it was "difficult to glean" from that case the exact reason for concluding that the transaction under consideration therein was a loan rather than a capital investment, "the only reasonable conclusion to be reached is that the provision for repayment was determinative of the nature of the transaction" (at p. 209). He concluded his review of the jurisprudence by stating (at p. 210): "where, as in this case, the evidence indicated that monies advanced to a business are to be repaid, and particularly when the terms of repayment are specified, the transaction is classified as a loan".

Harradence J.A. next turned to the interpretation of the Participation Agreement. He noted at the outset the rule prohibiting extrinsic evidence from contradicting express contractual terms. He reviewed a number of factors favouring interpreting the agreement as a loan, namely: (1) there is nothing in the express terms of the agreement which supports a conclusion that the money was advanced as an investment; (2) there are express provisions pointing to the opposite conclusion, including provisions for repayment and for an indemnity that full repayment will be made; (3) pursuant to the Participation Agreement, upon insolvency or winding-up, any amount remaining unpaid was to constitute indebtedness and, in such circumstances, the Participants were to rank pari passu with other creditors; and (4) the intention of the Participants was consistent with a "loan" characterization. He did not find it necessary to determine whether the accounting treatment was consistent with an investment, holding that such a factor is not determinative of the legal relationship of the parties.

Harradence J.A. found that repayment of the money advanced was intended and was coupled with express repayment provisions. Thus, relying on Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, and the other cases cited, he concluded that the $255 million advanced was not to be characterized as an investment in capital but rather as a "loan coupled with a purchase agreement to CCB" (at p. 211).

The observation made by the learned chambers judge that the business of CCB was carried on for the "joint benefit" of CCB and the Participants, because (1) repayment was to come from the income of CCB and (2) the warrants, if exercised, would allow the Participants to continue to share in the profits of CCB, was next addressed. With respect to the first factor, Harradence J.A. held that Wachowich J. erred in considering the source of the funds for repayment in concluding that the Participants would be sharing in CCB's profits. His comments warrant citation (at p. 211):

> It is important to recognize that while repayment was to be made from pre-tax income of C.C.B., there was no direct link between the success of the C.C.B. and the overall quantum of the amount due to or payable to the Support Group Participants. I have been referred to no authority which supports the proposition that a repayment, the instalments of which are referable to the quantum of the income of the debtor, is a situation of "joint benefit". Since the sums to be received by the Participants were limited to repayment of monies advanced, with a contingent right to interest, the source of the repayment monies is not relevant and, with respect, the learned Chambers Judge erred in concluding the Participants were "sharing in profits" in this respect.

As for the second factor, Harradence J.A. summarily rejected it as an indicium of investment and "joint benefit" mainly because of the contingent nature of the warrants in question, as recognized by both the Participation Agreement and the Equity Agreement. He added (at p. 212): "Had shares actually been issued or even approval obtained, or if there was an obligation to purchase or if a purchase had been made, then the `joint benefit' argument might have some merit and it would have been necessary to fully address this issue."

Finally, Harradence J.A. considered whether repayment to the respondents was nevertheless postponed pursuant to what are now s. 139 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3, and s. 4 of the Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.5. In his view, the application of these provisions was precluded by his earlier conclusion that the Participants were not to receive a rate of interest varying with the profits of CCB or a share in the profits of CCB.

Thus, the appeal was allowed and it was ordered that the respondents were entitled to rank pari passu with the ordinary creditors of CCB for all monies advanced to CCB pursuant to the Participation Agreement and not repaid by monies recovered from the Portfolio Assets. In view of this result, the cross-appeal brought by the then Legal Representative, alleging an inconsistency in Wachowich J.'s conclusions, was dismissed.

III. Issues

There are many ways of characterizing the issues raised by this appeal. As I see it, the three main questions which need to be addressed are:

(1) Was the Court of Appeal correct in characterizing the advance of $255 million by the Participants to CCB as a loan, as opposed to an investment in capital, thereby creating a debtor-creditor relationship between the parties?

(2) If the true legal nature of this transaction is indeed a loan, does this loan come within the postponement provision found in s. 4 of the Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.5?

Digitized by Google

(3) If the Partnerships Act does not apply, should the respondents' claim for the money loaned under the Participation Agreement nonetheless be postponed to the claims of the general body of CCB unsecured creditors, other than the Participants, based on the United States doctrine of equitable subordination?

The Legal Representative raises a subsidiary issue concerning the portion of the moneys recovered attributable to the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets:

(4) Was the Court of Appeal correct in upholding the conclusion of the learned chambers judge that the Participants are entitled to receive from the Liquidator, pursuant to the Participation Agreement, the sums recovered on the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets?

For the reasons that follow, it is my view that the first and fourth questions should be answered in the affirmative while the second and third should be answered in the negative. In summary, the words chosen by the parties in their agreements clearly support the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the assistance program involved, in substance, a loan of $255 million and not a capital investment. The surrounding circumstances provide additional support for, rather than detract from, this conclusion. Although the transaction did have an equity component (the warrants), this aspect alone does not, in the circumstances of this case, transform the essential nature of the advance from a loan to an investment. Put another way, while it is true that this transaction does have "investment features", these features were incidental to the debt features of the arrangement and do not alter the substance of the debtor-creditor relationship that was created by the parties with respect to the $255 million advanced by the Participants to CCB. Moreover, the fact that CCB's pre-tax income was the main source for repayment does not affect this characterization as the amount to be repaid from this source was limited to the sum advanced to CCB, plus a contingent interest at prime rate. Thus, the respondents are creditors of CCB and, as such, are entitled to what may be called a "prima facie" pari passu ranking with the other unsecured creditors of CCB in the distribution of CCB's assets.

In the circumstances of this case, this prima facie ranking is not altered by the principles of law and equity relied upon by the Legal Representative. Indeed, the loan in question does not fall within the ambit of the Ontario Partnerships Act (ss. 3(3)(d), 4) as the Participants were to receive neither a "rate of interest varying with the profits" of CCB nor a "share of the profits arising from carrying on the business" of CCB. In my view, the principles of equitable subordination have no application to the facts of this case. Finally, in light of these conclusions, the Legal Representative's subsidiary issue concerning the moneys recovered on the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets must also fail. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

IV. Relevant Statutory Provisions

Winding-up Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. W-11:

Distribution of Assets

93. The property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its debts and liabilities, and the charges, costs and expenses incurred in winding-up its affairs.

94. All costs, charges and expenses properly incurred in the winding-up of a company, including the remuneration of the liquidator, are payable out of the assets of the company, in priority to all other claims.

95. The court shall distribute among the persons entitled thereto any surplus that remains after the satisfaction of the debts and liabilities of the company and the winding-up charges, costs and expenses, and unless otherwise provided by law or by the Act, charter or instrument of incorporation of the company, any property or assets remaining after the satisfaction shall be distributed among the members or shareholders according to their rights and interests in the company.

Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.5:

3. In determining whether a partnership does or does not exist, regard shall be had to the following rules:

3. The receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is proof, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the person is a partner in the business, but the receipt of such a share or payment, contingent on or varying with the profits of a business, does not of itself make him or her a partner in the business, and in particular,

(a)the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business does not of itself make him or her a partner in the business or liable as such;

(d)the advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged or about to engage in a business on a contract with that person that the lender is to receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or is to receive a share of the profits arising from carrying on the business, does not of itself make the lender a partner with the person or persons carrying on the business or liable as such, provided that the contract is in writing and signed by or on behalf of all parties thereto;

> 4. In the event of a person to whom money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in section 3, or of a buyer of the goodwill in consideration of a share of the profits of the business, becoming insolvent or entering into an arrangement to pay his or her creditors less than 100 cents on the dollar or dying in insolvent circumstances, the lender of the loan is not entitled to recover anything in respect of the loan, and the seller of the goodwill is not entitled to recover anything in respect of the share of profits contracted for, until the claims of the other creditors of the borrower or buyer, for valuable consideration in money or money's worth, are satisfied.

V. Analysis

A. Characterization of the $255 Million Advanced: Capital Investment or Loan?

The first and foremost issue in this appeal concerns the determination of the true nature of the transaction in question between the Participants and CCB. Was the $255 million advanced by the Participants in the nature of a loan, as found by the Court of Appeal, or in the nature of an investment of capital, as found by the learned chambers judge? If the Court of Appeal was correct in describing the transaction as a loan, it follows that the Participants are creditors of CCB and as such, pursuant to both the Participation Agreement and ss. 93 to 95 of the Winding-up Act, they would be entitled, subject to the statutory (s. 4 of the Partnerships Act) and equity ("equitable subordination") principles raised by the Legal Representative, to rank pari passu with the other ordinary creditors of CCB in the distribution of CCB's assets. If, however, Wachowich J.'s characterization is to be preferred, then, relying on an old common law principle, it is argued the Participants would not be creditors entitled to an equal ranking with CCB's true creditors: In re Beale, supra; In re Meade, supra; Laronge Realty, supra; and Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed.), vol. 3(2), at p. 315. Under this approach, it is said the Participants would have an equitable right to share in the distribution of the assets of CCB, but only at such time as the ordinary creditors have been paid in full.

The principal argument raised by the Legal Representative in favour of finding the transaction to have been that of a capital infusion is the potential for unlimited returns and control over CCB by reason of the warrants granted to the Participants under the Equity Agreement. Other indicia of capital investment are also suggested. First, CCB's accounts did not show their obligation to the Participants as a liability. It is submitted that, if the financial statements could have led creditors, including depositors, to believe that there was adequate capitalization, this should be taken into consideration in determining the rights of the ordinary creditors and the respondents. Second, it is argued that the Court of Appeal's interpretation of ss. 8 and 13 of the Participation Agreement fails to recognize that the rights of differing classes of people who provide funds for the use of a business crystallize prior to insolvency, and cannot be altered by an agreement. It is argued that the Court of Appeal erred in assuming that the characterization by the Participants and CCB of their rights and obligations inter se should be determinative of the relative priority of the claims of the Participants and the ordinary creditors of CCB. According to the Legal Representative, "[s]ection 13 should be disregarded by the Courts, as being a self-serving attempt by the Participants to enhance their position for distribution purposes in the event of insolvency." Finally, the Legal Representative argues that the Court of Appeal erred in its interpretation of Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, which, according to him, stands for the proposition that, if someone has an interest in a business, in the sense that his or her potential for return is unlimited except by the enterprise's actual ability to generate profits, that person may not rank as a creditor if the business becomes insolvent. The key, according to the Legal Representative, is the right or potential to an unlimited return, not the right to repayment.

The respondent Alberta, on the other hand, submits that the advance was a loan and offers the following arguments: (1) the agreement for the advance contained no express provision that the advance was an investment in capital but did contain express provisions to the contrary, including provisions for repayment and an indemnity for that repayment; (2) the parties intended the advance to be repayable; (3) CCB was contingently liable to pay interest; (4) in its financial statements CCB accounted for the advance as being a debt by disclosing the outstanding balance of the advance at the opening, repayments during, and the obligation for the outstanding balance at the closing of each reporting period; (5) Mr. Justice Estey considered the advance to be a loan in the Report of the Inquiry into the Collapse of the CCB and Northland Bank (1986) ("Estey Report"), at pp. 115, 118 and 125; (6) the Participants could not and did not invest in CCB's equity capital; (7) the decision of this Court in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, as correctly demonstrated by the Court of Appeal, supports the conclusion that the advance to CCB was a loan; and (8) according to Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, and other decisions, an advance of money which is to be repaid, without more, is a loan and not an investment in equity capital or the supply of capital for the business of the recipient for the joint benefit of the advancer of money and the recipient, even if it is described as an investment of capital or if the person advancing the money is to share the profits or to receive shares of the recipient or if the advance is repayable when funds are available or out of profits. Alberta also takes issue with the Legal Representative's characterization of s. 13 of the Participation Agreement. It submits that this is a common provision in loans and, rather than enhance the Participants' ranking on insolvency, has the effect of reducing the otherwise priority ranking of Canada, Alberta and CDIC.

For their part, the Bank Group note that the agreements in question represent a unique response to a unique situation, and thus, cannot be perceived as a normal investment in a business. For the reasons given therein, they commend the Court of Appeal's characterization of the advances as a loan in the form of a purchase of doubtful assets. Specifically, they submit that Harradence J.A. was correct in finding that, because of the contingent nature of the warrants, the support agreements did not provide a right to share in profits or for a rate of interest that varied with profits. They characterize the Equity Agreement as a mere "sweetener". The Bank Group submits that the cases, including Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, do not support the conclusion that a contingent right to profits in circumstances like the case at bar can represent an interest in the business. With respect to the accounting issue, they argue that they should be considered on a basis different from the other Participants because they were prohibited from controlling or attempting to control CCB. Indeed, they had no control over how CCB showed its obligations to them in its financial statements. Further, such a factor should not determine the nature of the legal relationship between the parties to the agreement.

For my part, I agree in essence with the position advanced by Alberta and the Bank Group. Briefly put, the words chosen by the parties in their agreements strongly support the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the financial assistance program involved, in substance, a loan of $255 million rather than a capital investment and there is nothing in the surrounding circumstances which distracts from this characterization. On the contrary, the surrounding circumstances offer additional support for the Court of Appeal's conclusion. As noted by Wachowich J. and the Legal Representative, the transaction did indeed have an equity component (the warrants) and did involve a repayment scheme linked to the profits of CCB. However, for reasons which I shall elaborate, these aspects are insufficient to justify the conclusion reached by Wachowich J. Similarly, the other indicia of capital investment put forward by the Legal Representative, such as the accounting treatment given to the advance, do not affect the substance of this transaction.

As in any case involving contractual interpretation, the characterization issue facing this Court must be decided by determining the intention of the parties to the support agreements. This task, perplexing as it sometimes proves to be, depends primarily on the meaning of the words chosen by the parties to reflect their intention. When the words alone are insufficient to reach a conclusion as to the true nature of the agreement, or when outside support for a particular characterization is required, a consideration of admissible surrounding circumstances may be appropriate.

In the case at bar, it should be noted that the circumstances surrounding the financial arrangements between CCB and the Participants, and the agreements themselves, are somewhat unique. At the heart of this matter is the attempted rescue of a Canadian chartered bank. Recourse to emergency measures in order to preserve the solvency of a bank is, fortunately, relatively rare in our country. I say this not because financial support programs are harmful (quite the contrary), but because the events surrounding the CCB rescue in the mid-1980's infrequently arise. Part of the result, however, is that the task of ascertaining the intention of the Participants and of CCB with respect to the advance of $255 million is not particularly simple. Indeed, the learned chambers judge described the Participation Agreement as a "unique document based on a unique set of facts" as well as an "extraordinary transaction", and he found it "most difficult" to characterize (at pp. 132 and 126). Similarly, Harradence J.A. said that "[t]he unique situation of C.C.B. and the Participants resulted in novel and complex documentation, the interpretation and characterization of which is a challenging and difficult task" (at p. 206).

It is evident from reviewing the agreements in question that characteristics associated with both debt and equity financing are present. The most obvious examples are, on the one hand, ss. 8 and 13 of the Participation Agreement pertaining to CCB's indemnity towards the Participants and their ranking in the event of a winding-up and, on the other hand, the provisions of the Equity Agreement concerning the warrants granted by CCB to the Participants. Such a duality is apparently quite common in loan participation agreements. Indeed, in an article entitled "Characterization of Loan Participation Agreements" (1988), 14 Can. Bus. L.J. 336, Professor Ziegel uses the heterogeneity in some loan participations to explain, in part, the divergence of judicial and academic opinion in the United States on the proper characterization of a participation agreement (at p. 337):

> This issue [the characterization of the participation agreement] has provoked a large body of case law and textbook and periodical literature, most of it American, and the conclusions are not always the same. At one time or another one or more of the following descriptions have been applied to a participation agreement: a simple debtor-creditor relationship, with or without the benefit of a security; an agency agreement; a partnership or joint venture; a trust; and, finally, a sale or assignment of an undivided interest in the loan.
> It is easy to see why there should be this divergence of opinion. As with any agreement, the parties are free to verbalize it as they see fit and ambiguous or neutral language may reflect their unwillingness to answer hard questions, perhaps in the hope that the need to do so may never arise. Frequently, the several parts of a participation agreement lend themselves to different characterizations and the agreement is really a composite of cumulative legal elements. Finally, there is a significant overlap between such flexible concepts as a secured loan or trust and the sale or assignment of an undivided share of a loan, and the language of the agreement may be consistent with more than one of them. Faced with such ambiguity, the job of the adjudicator, when a dispute arises, is to find the characterization that best seems to fit the parties' intentions as derived from the total agreement and all the surrounding circumstances.

As I see it, the fact that the transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, pose an insurmountable obstacle to characterizing the advance of $255 million. Instead of trying to pigeonhole the entire agreement between the Participants and CCB in one of two categories, I see nothing wrong in recognizing the arrangement for what it is, namely, one of a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity but which, in substance, reflects a debtor-creditor relationship. Financial and capital markets have been most creative in the variety of investments and securities that have been fashioned to meet the needs and interests of those who participate in those markets. It is not because an agreement has certain equity features that a court must either ignore these features as if they did not exist or characterize the transaction on the whole as an investment. There is an alternative. It is permissible, and often required, or desirable, for debt and equity to co-exist in a given financial transaction without altering the substance of the agreement. Furthermore, it does not follow that each and every aspect of such an agreement must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue. Again, it is not because there are equity features that it is necessarily an investment in capital. This is particularly true when, as here, the equity features are nothing more than supplementary to and not definitive of the essence of the transaction. When a court is searching for the substance of a particular transaction, it should not too easily be distracted by aspects which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement.

The weight to be given to one aspect of the support agreements over another in assessing the true intention of the parties underlies the difference in opinion between the learned chambers judge and the Court of Appeal's characterization of the transaction. Wachowich J. emphasized both the fact that the recovery by the Participants of their contribution was dependent upon the income generated by CCB and the Participants' potential to share in the future success of CCB by the warrants, even after having been repaid, as evidencing that the essence of the transaction was that of a capital investment. The Court of Appeal, however, largely dismissed the relevance of the Equity Agreement because of its contingent nature and emphasized instead that the Participants were only entitled to receive from CCB the amount advanced to it and that the parties had included specific provisions in the Participation Agreement referring to debt; all of which amounted to a very strong indicium of a loan.

In the circumstances of this case, it is my view that the learned chambers judge and the Legal Representative give far too much weight to the equity features associated with the Equity Agreement in characterizing the overall nature of the advance of $255 million. It is true the Participants received warrants to purchase common shares of CCB through the Equity Agreement. It is also true, at least in theory, that by fully exercising their warrants the Participants would own 75 percent of the common shares issued by CCB. However, it is evident on the face of the record that this possibility was not only a mere hypothesis, but it was unlikely to occur. As noted by the respondents and the Court of Appeal, shareholder and regulatory approval was required to permit an increase in CCB's authorized capital and, unless the warrants were assigned, an amendment to the Bank Act was necessary before the Participants who are chartered banks could fully exercise their rights to purchase shares. It is not without significance that none of the Participants ever exercised any of their warrants nor did they assign them. In these circumstances, I agree with the Court of Appeal that the true effectiveness of the Equity Agreement was highly contingent and that the learned chambers judge erred in not considering the warrants for what they really were, namely so-called "sweeteners" or "kickers" with respect to the advance of $255 million which were simply additional features to the underlying loan arrangement between the parties. Undoubtedly, the warrants are an equity feature of the transaction supporting a conclusion that the advance was an investment. However, in the facts of this case, only minimal weight should be given to this factor in the overall characterization of the agreement. Alone, the highly contingent warrants are surely insufficient to tip the scales when faced with the strong indicia of debt present here as identified by the Court of Appeal.

Wachowich J. also erred in concluding that the Participants would be "sharing in the profits" of CCB under the support agreements. The Participation Agreement simply referred to CCB's profits (i.e. pre-tax income) as one of the sources for repayment. The other source for repayment, the moneys recovered on the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets, was not linked with CCB's profits. While full repayment from the Portfolio Assets alone was unlikely, the fact remains that the amount of money to be paid to the Participants from both sources was fixed at the amount advanced by each for their Participation Certificate. Regardless of where the repayments were coming from, they remained mere repayments for moneys advanced. Of course, the Participants would benefit from the success of CCB's business; however, this benefit would be capped by the amount of the advance. I shall examine in greater detail the "sharing in profits" argument of the Legal Representative when I deal with s. 4 of the Partnerships Act. For now, it is sufficient to state that, in the circumstances of this case, the source from which CCB was to repay the advance made does not carry any weight in favour of a finding that said advance was an investment in capital rather than what it appears to be on the face of the agreements, namely a loan of $255 million coupled with an equity "sweetener" or "kicker".

Another error committed by the learned chambers judge relates to his reliance on the decisions of Laronge Realty, supra, and In re Meade, supra. The latter case together with In re Beale, supra, are said to have established the common law principle applied in Laronge Realty and upon which Wachowich J. relied in order to deny ranking the Participants pari passu with CCB's unsecured creditors other than the Participants. This principle is stated as follows in Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed.), vol. 3(2) (at p. 315):

> If a person advances money to another, not by way of loan but as a contribution to the capital of a business carried on for their joint benefit, the person who has made the advance, even though he is not a partner in the business and has received no share of the profits as such, is debarred from proving in the bankruptcy of the recipient of the money in competition with the creditors of the business.

Briefly, I agree with Harradence J.A.'s conclusion that none of the agreements at issue in the cases relied upon by Wachowich J. contained express provisions for the repayment of the money advanced and that such a factor was crucial to the conclusions reached therein. I also agree that the express repayment scheme set out in the Participation Agreement clearly distinguishes the case at bar from those in which the common law rule relied upon by Wachowich J. has been applied.

This rule was referred to, but not applied, by this Court in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, a case upon which the Legal Representative strongly relies. There, Ritchie J. declined to apply the common law rule since he found that the money advanced by Mr. Sukloff was more in the nature of a loan, thereby creating a debtor-creditor relationship between the parties. Indeed, just after citing the above excerpt, Ritchie J. stated (at p. 467): "As I have indicated, I do not construe Mr. Sukloff's role as that of one who was supplying capital for a business carried on for the joint benefit of himself and the two limited companies." Earlier, he had specifically agreed with the trial judge's finding that Mr. Sukloff's relationship with the companies in question "was confined to that of a lender or financier who had a right to share in the profits, if any, of the undertakings of these companies" (at pp. 465-66) (emphasis added). This "share in the profits" aspect was later used by Ritchie J. in order to postpone part of the money advanced by Mr. Sukloff (the unsecured $10,000 upon which the Legal Representative asks this Court to focus) under what was then s. 98 (now s. 139) of the Bankruptcy Act, a provision similar to s. 4 of the Partnerships Act. However, this aspect had no effect whatsoever on the characterization of the true nature of the transaction involved and on the application of the common law rule set out in In re Beale, supra, and In re Meade, supra, and applied in Laronge Realty, supra. As found on the evidence, the advances in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, amounted to a loan.

As observed by Harradence J.A. in the case at bar, it is somewhat difficult to discern what specific evidence Ritchie J. was referring to when he agreed with the finding of the trial judge in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra. However, I would note, as did Harradence J.A., that the agreements involved therein contained express repayment provisions similar to those contained in the Participation Agreement. It is not unreasonable to suggest that these provisions played an important role in the characterization of the advances as a loan. In any event, what is most important for our purposes is the fact that none of the moneys advanced by Mr. Sukloff was "postponed" under the common law principle advanced by Wachowich J. and the Legal Representative. The only part which was indeed postponed (the $10,000), was done so under the Bankruptcy Act and not following In re Meade, supra. I will explain in the context of my analysis of s. 4 of the Partnerships Act why, contrary to Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, such statutory postponement has no application to the facts of this case (namely, because there is no profit sharing in the case at bar, simply a repayment out of profits). Suffice it here to say that, contrary to the Legal Representative's submissions, Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, has no bearing on the characterization issue facing this Court.

Similarly, contrary to the Legal Representative's submissions, the accounting treatment is not by itself of great weight in the characterization of the advance. I agree with the learned chambers judge that this "evidence" should be "looked at with caution" (at p. 130). I say this for the following interrelated reasons. First, CCB was following the express directives given by the Office of the Inspector General of Banks, who is not a party to any of the agreements, in using the accounting methods it did. Second, as noted by the Bank Group, the accounting methods used by CCB were beyond the control of many of the Participants. Third, the Legal Representative is really asking us to look at the conduct of one party, after an arrangement has been signed, in order to discern the common intention of all contracting parties at the time of signing. This type of unilateral and after the fact "evidence" is clearly of little relevance and reliability with respect to the issues before this Court. Fourth, as previously noted, the accounting treatment used and the success of the support program were closely linked and it is unwise to draw inferences on the legal relationship of the parties therefrom. For all these reasons, I would not place much weight on the accounting treatment used by CCB in determining the true nature of the advance of $255 million. In so concluding, I do not wish to say that there may not be other cases where the accounting treatment could be helpful in determining the nature of a given transaction.

Finally, I cannot agree with Wachowich J. about the relevance to the characterization issue of the fact that the portion of the Portfolio Assets purchased by the Participants was of little value. Even assuming that courts are entitled to weigh the value of the consideration given for a particular promise when characterizing an agreement, there was more to the support agreements than the mere purchase of participations in bad loans. Regardless of the true value of the Syndicated Portion, the Participants were to be repaid the entire $255 million they had advanced to purchase their Participation Certificates. The source of this repayment was also the profits of CCB and the parties agreed that any amount remaining unpaid upon insolvency would be considered an indebtedness by CCB towards the Participants.

On the other hand, the factors noted by the Court of Appeal of Alberta and the respondents as providing indicia of the "loan" nature of the advance of $255 million are clearly relevant to the characterization issue and they strongly support such a conclusion. I have already referred to these factors in summarizing the reasons of Harradence J.A. and the submissions made by Alberta and the Bank Group. To repeat the most important ones: (1) there is nothing in the express terms of the agreements which supports a conclusion that the money was advanced as an investment; and (2) there are express provisions supporting a characterization of the advance as a loan, including provisions for repayment (P.A. ss. 9-11), for an indemnity should full repayment not be made from the sources contemplated (P.A. s. 8), and for equal ranking with the ordinary creditors of CCB (P.A. s. 13).

It is interesting to note that my conclusion that the $255 million advance was a loan also accords with the views of Mr. Justice Estey in his report. The relevant passages are found at pp. 115, 118 and 125 of the Estey Report:

> The $255M reduced the bank's debt to the Bank of Canada, but itself became an obligation to be retired by collections on the Support Package loans or on liquidation, out of the assets of the bankrupt bank. The receipt of the $255M therefore is irrelevant to the presence or absence of solvency. Whatever state the bank was in at that time remained unaffected by the receipt of the Support Package moneys. The Inspector General, therefore, was in error in finding the bank to be solvent upon receipt of the $255M. It should be borne in mind that the $255M, by the terms of the interim and final agreements, remains an obligation in debt of the CCB.
> The Support Package should have classified these moneys as an unrecoverable purchase price, as a capital grant of some nature or as a subordinated loan, repayable out of earnings only. What CCB needed at this time of crisis was a loan without recourse in the nature of a capital grant repayable only from future profits and not a loan which would retain that characteristic and revive when the bank ran into further difficulties.
> The object of this Support Program therefore was to replace lost income and thereby protect and renew capital. The banks could not in law contribute equity capital, and the government agencies likewise were not in a position, either legally or practically, to do so. Resort was had to what amounted to a long-term loan repayable out of the prospects of collections from bad debts and future earnings. The money infused, therefore, could not be treated as capital, but only serve to reduce liquidity advances.

Contrary to the Legal Representative's submissions, s. 13 of the Participation Agreement is not an attempt to enhance the ranking of the Participants upon CCB's insolvency. As evidenced by the passages from this clause which I earlier emphasized, the main purpose and effect of s. 13 is to reduce, rather than enhance, the ranking of certain of the Participants (Canada and Alberta) upon insolvency as the parties agreed to do away with s. 277 of the Bank Act. As for the other Participants, there is nothing in s. 13 other than a confirmation that the ordinary principles of common law and of ss. 93 to 95 of the Winding-up Act apply upon insolvency, namely the Participants, as unsecured creditors of CCB, are entitled to rank pari passu with the other ordinary creditors of CCB.

For all the foregoing reasons, I find that the Court of Appeal did not err in characterizing the advance of $255 million to CCB as being, in substance, a loan rather than an investment of capital. While indicia supporting both conclusions are present, the overall balance clearly tilts in favour of the characterization put forward by the respondents. Accordingly, I would dismiss this first ground of appeal.

B. Postponement Under Section 4 of the Partnerships Act

In the alternative, the Legal Representative submits that, even if the advance of $255 million was properly characterized as a loan, the Court of Appeal erred in declining to postpone, under existing statutory and common law principles, the respondents' claims for the moneys not repaid until the claims of the other ordinary creditors of CCB were satisfied. Relying on ss. 3(3)(d) and 4 of the Partnerships Act, he argues that, where a lender advances money to a business borrower under a contract providing that the lender shall "participate in the profits of that business", and the borrower subsequently becomes insolvent, the lender is not entitled to recover anything in respect of the loan until the claims of all other creditors of the borrower have been satisfied. It is submitted that the support agreements in question are contracts of such a nature because the Participants contracted to be repaid their advances out of CCB's pre-tax income (either 50 percent or 100 percent plus interest, depending on whether the Equity Agreement could be carried out), and because of the potential for profits inherent in the warrants granted to the Participants under the Equity Agreement.

As noted earlier, the Alberta Court of Appeal rejected a similar argument on the grounds that, notwithstanding the source for repayment and the warrants, the Participants were not to receive under the agreements a "rate of interest varying with the profits" or a "share of profits" (at p. 212). In other words, the loan in question was not one to which s. 4 of the Partnerships Act applied. The respondents before this Court adopt a similar position on this issue.

Alberta argues, persuasively in my view, that a lender does not receive a "share of the profits" within the meaning of ss. 3(3)(d) and 4 of the Ontario Partnerships Act unless he or she is entitled to be paid amounts referable to profits other than in repayment of the principal amount of the loan. It is submitted that a lender does not share in profits merely by having a contingent right to acquire or possibly even by having the right to acquire or by owning shares of the borrower. In the case at bar, Alberta submits that all amounts which the Participants were entitled to be paid were to be applied only in repayment of the principal amount due and hence they were not entitled to and did not share in CCB's profits. As for the Bank Group, it is submitted that in the case of the insolvency of a bank, the Winding-up Act and not the Partnerships Act or the Bankruptcy Act determines the priority of claims. Moreover, they argue that the transaction at hand is not one to which the Partnerships Act applies because the Participation Agreement referred to profits only as a means of determining the source of the Participants' right to repayment, and because any alleged "share of the profits" would stop when the sum advanced was repaid.

I have already found that the Court of Appeal was correct in characterizing the advance of $255 million under the support program as a loan. In order to determine the applicability of s. 4 of the Partnerships Act to the facts of this case, a provision which may apply regardless of whether a partnership exists, the general question to be answered is whether this loan was made "upon such a contract as is mentioned in section 3" of the Act. If so, then, subject to any constitutional arguments not made herein, the respondents would not be entitled to recover anything in respect of the loan until the claims of the other ordinary creditors of CCB are satisfied.

The only provisions in s. 3 of the Partnerships Act which make specific reference to a "contract" are ss. 3(3)(b) and (d). Section 3(3)(b) is clearly irrelevant to this appeal. Thus, at least at first glance, the contracts in the case at bar must fall within the ambit of s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act in order to trigger the application of s. 4. The specific question then becomes whether or not the support agreements provided that the Participants were to receive a "rate of interest varying with the profits" of CCB, or a "share of the profits arising from carrying on the business" of CCB. While the Legal Representative originally structured his s. 4 argument exclusively around the wording in s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act, he expanded this argument during oral submissions to include s. 3(3)(a). He submitted that, even if the transaction does not fall within the ambit of the former subsection, it clearly falls within the latter. Accordingly, another specific question to be considered is whether s. 4 of the Partnerships Act can be triggered by "the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business" which does not involve a contract of the sort described in s. 3(3)(d). I will deal with both of these questions in turn.

Sections 3(3)(d) and 4 of the Partnerships Act originate from the now repealed 1865 Act to Amend the Law of Partnership (U.K.), 28 & 29 Vict., c. 86 ("Bovill's Act"). The intent of what is now s. 3 of the Partnerships Act was evidently to mitigate the harshness of the old common law rule, which was that any person who shared in the profits of the partnership was deemed to be a partner, and so liable for any debts of the partnership on insolvency: Grace v. Smith (1775), 2 Wm. Bl. 997, 96 E.R. 587 (at p. 588 per De Grey C.J.: "[e]very man who has a share of the profits of a trade ought also to bear his share of the loss"); and Waugh v. Carver (1793), 2 Hy. Bl. 235, 126 E.R. 525.

The old common law rule was first modified by the decision in Cox v. Hickman (1860), 8 H.L.C. 268, 11 E.R. 431, which in some respects was very similar on the facts to the present case. The company of Smith and Son fell into financial difficulties and was unable to pay its creditors. The Smiths entered into an arrangement with five of its creditors assigning the company to them (as trustees for all of the creditors), for a term of 21 years. During that period, the trustees were to carry on the business of the company "and to pay the net income, after answering all expenses; which net income was always to be deemed the property of the two Smiths, among [all] the creditors of the Smiths" (at p. 432 E.R.). In other words, the creditors "were to be paid their debts out of the profits of their debtors' business" (Lindley on the Law of Partnership (15th ed. 1984), at p. 104). The most significant fact for our purposes is that the repayment was to be only to the extent of the debts; when all the debts had been paid, the trustees were to hold the estate in trust for the Smiths. Financial troubles continued under the new management, and the company once again became unable to pay its debts.

Since at that time the law was thought to be that a person who shared in the profits was liable as a partner, the question in Cox v. Hickman, supra, was not, as here, whether those creditors who were being paid out of profits were to be ranked equally with subsequent creditors, but whether the former group were to be themselves liable as partners to subsequent creditors. In deciding that they were not so liable, the House of Lords is considered to have established, amongst other things, that receipt of a share of the profits is not conclusive proof of a partnership as was previously thought (Lindley on the Law of Partnership, supra, at p. 104).

However, it is interesting to note one excerpt of the opinion of Wightman J. (one of the judges who came to advise the House of Lords in Cox v. Hickman) who, instead of modifying the old common rule, would simply have not applied it to the facts of the case (at p. 443 E.R.):

> It is said that a person who shares in net profits is a partner; that may be so in some cases, but not in all; and it may be material to consider in what sense the words, "sharing in the profits" are used. In the present case, I greatly doubt whether the creditor, who merely obtains payment of a debt incurred in the business by being paid the exact amount of his debt, and no more, out of the profits of the business, can be said to share the profits. If in the present case, the property of the Smiths had been assigned to the trustees to carry on the business, and > divide the net profits, not amongst those creditors who signed the deed, but amongst all the creditors, until their debts were paid, would a creditor, by receiving from time to time a rateable proportion out of the net profits, become a partner? I should think not.

In my view, the undesirability of the result foreseen by Wightman J. is equally compelling in the context of ss. 3(3)(d) and 4 of the Partnerships Act.

Historically, s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act appears to refer to loans similar to those involved in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, namely loans in which the creditor advances money to the debtor on the terms that it shall be repaid with interest, and in addition the creditor is to receive a share of the profits over and above any payments on principal until the amount is paid off, as opposed to loans such as those in the present case where the share of the profits is used solely to repay the principal. In other words, s. 3(3)(d) applied to loans which had no cap or limit on the amount to be paid to the creditor from the profits of the debtor's business or which had a cap unrelated to the principal owing on the debt.

It is not entirely clear in Sukloff v. Rushforth, supra, whether the lender actually received any of the profits of the company via the arrangement for 50 percent of the profits. However, in many older cases it is clear that the lender did receive interest and the stated share of the profits for a period, and then claimed for the entire amount of the principal on bankruptcy of the debtor. In these cases ss. 2(3)(d) and 3 of the Partnership Act, 1890 (U.K.), 53 & 54 Vict., c. 39 (similar to ss. 3(3)(d) and 4 of the Partnerships Act) were applied to subordinate the claims: see Ex parte Taylor; In re Grason (1879), 12 Ch.D. 366; In re Stone (1886), 33 Ch.D. 541; Re Hildesheim, [1893] 2 Q.B. 357; In re Mason; Ex parte Bing, [1899] 1 Q.B. 810; and In re Fort; Ex parte Schofield, [1897] 2 Q.B. 495. These sections of the Partnership Act, 1890 essentially repeated Bovill's Act so it seems reasonable that this was the specific situation envisaged by the Act.

Contrary to the oral submission of the Legal Representative, In re Young; Ex parte Jones, [1896] 2 Q.B. 484, is not inconsistent with the distinction I am drawing. There, Mr. Jones lent money to Mr. Young which was to be used to pay the expenses of Mr. Young's business. The terms of the agreement provided that, in return for the use of this sum, Jones was to be paid a fixed weekly sum out of the profits of the business. When Young became insolvent, Jones claimed for the entire amount of principal, without making allowance for the amounts received by virtue of the weekly payments. In other words, the weekly sum received by Jones out of profits was not for the purpose of repaying the principal sum on the debt. Thus, In re Young is clearly distinguishable from the facts of this case and should not be seen as foreclosing the interpretation of s. 3(3)(d) that I am advancing.

In addition, s. 3(3)(a) of the Partnerships Act provides strong support for the distinction between profits as the source of repayment, and a share in the profits, with any repayment of a fixed debt falling into the former category. Indeed, it provides that:

> (a)the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business does not of itself make him or her a partner in the business or liable as such;

This seems to preclude any reading of s. 3(3)(d) which would catch debts which are to be repaid "out of profits". In this respect, it is interesting to note that the authors of Lindley on the Law of Partnership are of the view that the equivalent of s. 3(3)(a), not s. 3(3)(d), applies to cases such as Cox v. Hickman, supra, where, as we have seen, an arrangement similar to the one at bar was involved (at p. 108).

For the foregoing reasons, I would conclude that any fixed debt to be repaid out of profits does not in itself constitute a "share of the profits" within the meaning of s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act. As argued by Alberta, a lender does not receive a "share of the profits" under this provision unless he or she is entitled to be paid amounts referable to profits other than in repayment of the principal amount of the loan.

Having said this, the question of whether the support agreements provided that the Participants were to receive a "rate of interest varying with the profits" of CCB, or a "share of the profits arising from carrying on the business" of CCB, as to trigger s. 4 of the Partnerships Act, may be readily answered. Clearly, the Participants were not to receive in return for the advance of $255 million a rate of interest varying with CCB's profits. The rate of interest to be paid was fixed according to the prime rate and was contingent on whether or not the Equity Agreement could be carried out. As for CCB's profits, they merely represented the source from which the Participants were to be repaid their advance. In this respect, I entirely agree with the following excerpt taken from the reasons of Harradence J.A. in the case at bar (at p. 211):

> It is important to recognize that while repayment was to be made from pre-tax income of CCB, there was no direct link between the success of the CCB and the overall quantum of the amount due to or payable to the Support Group Participants. I have been referred to no authority which supports the proposition that a repayment, the instalments of which are referable to the quantum of the income of the debtor, is a situation of "joint benefit". Since the sums to be received by the Participants were limited to repayment of monies advanced, with a contingent right to interest, the source of the repayment monies is not relevant and, with respect, the learned Chambers Judge erred in concluding the Participants were "sharing the profits" in this respect.

Digitized by Google

The Participants had a fixed debt which would be repaid in part by the moneys received from the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets and in part by CCB's pre-tax income. With the exception of the contingent interest at prime rate, under no circumstance were the payments from the pre-tax income to be applied to anything but the repayment of the loan. All amounts that the Participants were entitled to be paid were to be applied only in repayment of the principal amount of the loan. Once the loan was fully repaid, all payments from CCB's pre-tax income were to stop. Accordingly, I find that the Participants were not to receive a "share of the profits" of CCB within the meaning of s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act by virtue of the repayment scheme for the $255 million advance. I also do not accept that the contemplated granting of warrants under the highly contingent circumstances of this case alters this conclusion.

The question then is whether s. 4 of the Partnerships Act can be triggered by an arrangement falling under s. 3(3)(a). Indeed, as previously noted, the Legal Representative takes the alternative position that, even if s. 3(3)(d) does not apply, the transaction in this case is surely one contemplating "the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business". While one cannot seriously dispute this proposition, the fact remains that s. 4 cannot apply unless "money has been advanced by way of loan upon such a contract as is mentioned in section 3". The first point to note is that s. 3(3)(a) of the Partnerships Act makes no reference whatsoever to a "contract" and thus appears to be beyond the realm of s. 4. Clearly, the legislature could have chosen a more general term than "contract" in s. 4 had it wished this postponement provision to apply to every transaction described in s. 3. The same could also be said about the absence of the word "loan" in s. 3(3)(a). It is not without significance that we were not presented with any jurisprudence in which a person who had a fixed debt to be paid out of profits (i.e., who would fall under s. 3(3)(a) and not s. 3(3)(d)) was subordinated under the Act.

Further, if the policy on which s. 4 of the Partnerships Act is based is that a person who reaps the rewards of profits must share some risk, then this would not apply to a creditor with a fixed debt, notwithstanding that the fund or source of repayment is profits, because his or her total return will not vary with the profitability of the company.

From the above, I conclude that s. 4 of the Partnerships Act cannot be triggered by what is described in s. 3(3)(a) as "the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business", which does not involve a contract of the sort described in s. 3(3)(d). The present case may very well fall within s. 3(3)(a) of the Act. However, that section only deals with a guideline for determining whether or not a partnership has been created, an issue which is not raised in this appeal. Contrary to s. 3(3)(d) of the Partnerships Act, s. 3(3)(a) does not have the added function of triggering the postponement provision of the Act. As the Participants were not to receive a "rate of interest varying with the profits" of CCB or a "share of the profits arising from carrying on the business" of CCB, their claims for the return of the moneys advanced cannot be postponed under s. 4.

Accordingly, I would dismiss this ground of appeal. The Court of Appeal did not err in declining to postpone the respondents' claims under s. 4 of the Partnerships Act.

C. Equitable Subordination

In the further alternative, the Legal Representative submits that even if the transaction in question is a loan and the Partnerships Act does not apply, the Participants' claims should be subordinated on equitable grounds based on the United States doctrine of "equitable subordination".

More specifically, it is argued that the equitable jurisdiction of superior courts gives them authority in insolvency matters to subordinate claims that, while valid as against the insolvent's estate, arise from or are connected with conduct prejudicial to the interests of other creditors. While the Legal Representative does not assert that the conduct of the Participants was fraudulent or worthy of censure, he argues that the Participants acted to the detriment of the ordinary creditors of CCB in ways (which I shall outline below) that should invoke this equitable jurisdiction. Both the Bank Group and Alberta challenge the proposition that equitable subordination is available under Canadian law in insolvency matters. In addition, the respondents argue that the facts of this case do not call for the application of equitable principles.

This issue does not appear to have been raised before Wachowich J. or the Court of Appeal and consequently this Court does not have the benefit of any findings of fact as to the actual or potential prejudice suffered by CCB's depositors and other creditors as a result of the conduct of the Participants. In this respect, the evidence presented to this Court by the Legal Representative is limited to certain excerpts of the Estey Report, incorporated by reference in the affidavit of Mr. Allan Taylor of the Royal Bank of Canada (C.O.A. at pp. 236-41). The excerpts in question are those found at pp. 114-21 of the Estey Report under the heading "Flaws in the Support Program".

This Court also does not have the benefit of the insight of the courts below as to whether or not, in the first place, the doctrine of equitable subordination should become part of Canadian insolvency law. As I see the matter, however, it is not necessary in the circumstances of this case to answer the question of whether a comparable equitable doctrine should exist in Canadian law and I expressly refrain from doing so. Assuming, for the sake of argument only, that Canadian courts have the power in insolvency matters to subordinate otherwise valid claims to those of other creditors on equitable grounds relating to the conduct of these creditors inter se, this Court has been presented with insufficient grounds to justify the exercise of such a power in the case at bar. Briefly put, the reasons and limited evidence advanced by the Legal Representative before this Court disclose neither inequitable conduct on the part of the Participants nor injury to the ordinary creditors of CCB as a result of the alleged misconduct.

As I understand it, in the United States there are three requirements for a successful claim of equitable subordination: (1) the claimant must have engaged in some type of inequitable conduct; (2) the misconduct must have resulted in injury to the creditors of the bankrupt or conferred an unfair advantage on the claimant; and (3) equitable subordination of the claim must not be inconsistent with the provisions of the bankruptcy statute. See In re Mobile Steel Co., 563 F.2d 692 (5th Cir. 1977), at p. 700; In re Multiponics Inc., 622 F.2d 709 (5th Cir. 1980); A. DeNatale and P. B. Abram, "The Doctrine of Equitable Subordination as Applied to Nonmanagement Creditors" (1985), 40 Bus. Law. 417, at p. 423; and L. J. Crozier, "Equitable Subordination of Claims in Canadian Bankruptcy Law" (1992), 7 C.B.R. (3d) 40, at pp. 41-42. Even if this Court were to accept that a comparable doctrine to equitable subordination should exist in Canadian law, I do not view the facts of this case as giving rise to the "inequitable conduct" and ensuing "detriment" necessary to trigger its application.

In this regard, the actions cited by the Legal Representative as being detrimental to the ordinary creditors of CCB, thereby giving rise to equitable subordination, come down to two elements: (1) the press release of March 25, 1985, issued by the Department of Finance announcing to the general public that the support program would leave CCB "in a strong position of solvency" and that sufficient funds were being advanced "to ensure solvency"; and (2) the flaws in the support program outlined in the Estey Report and described by the Legal Representative as (a) the inadequacy of the support program to ensure CCB's solvency, (b) the accounting treatment disguised the fact that the Participation Agreement required the entire amount advanced to be repaid, (c) the accounting treatment used by the Bank Group gave rise to tax benefits not available to ordinary depositors, (d) the Participation Agreement allegedly obliged CCB to apply all amounts received on the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets to the Participants, (e) the warrants would have the effect of prohibiting CCB from raising funds in the equity market since they would enable the Participants to acquire 75 percent of the common shares of CCB up to 10 years after the advances had been paid in full, and (f) after making their advances and receiving their Participation Certificates, the Bank Group ceased dealing with CCB in the normal manner.

At the outset, I note that many of the actions relied on by the Legal Representative cannot be attributable to the Participants. For example, the press release was not issued by the respondents and the accounting treatment given by CCB to the advance of $255 million simply followed the instructions given by the Office of the Inspector General of Banks. Thus, even if some inequitable connotation could be given to these actions, they would not represent misconduct on the part of the respondents to whom the ordinary creditors of CCB are now attempting to rank in priority.

Another difficulty with the Legal Representative's submission, however, is that I fail to see anything remotely inequitable in the conduct complained of. With respect to the press release, the evidence does not show that the Participants were necessarily of a different opinion from that set out in the press release. Certainly, they advanced the funds on the condition that the Inspector General of Banks provide them with an opinion letter confirming the solvency of CCB on the infusion of the proposed funds. As for the flaws in the support program, there is nothing to show that the Participants' plans were other than well intentioned. As stated at the beginning of these reasons, it is beyond the scope of this appeal to engage in a detailed review of the reasons which led to the failure of the support program. Suffice it to say that the assertions of the Legal Representative in substance do not show wrongdoing or unfairness on the part of the Participants, but merely show that the support program did not work and, perhaps with hindsight, offer some explanations as to why.

In any event, it does not appear to have been suggested at any time in the courts below nor was any evidence led to suggest that any creditor of CCB was misled by any of the above actions or that the press release, accounting treatment or any flaw in the support program operated to cause any creditor to act to its detriment. Thus, even if this Court were to find that the Participants acted in an inequitable manner in their dealings with CCB and its depositors and other creditors, we do not have a shred of evidence upon which to conclude that the improper conduct resulted in actual harm to the ordinary creditors of CCB now before this Court. One can only speculate that depositors and other creditors relied on the press release or accounting treatment and thereby suffered damages. We have been offered no United States decision in which mere speculation of harm to other creditors has been found sufficient to meet the second requirement of the doctrine of equitable subordination. Of course, the ordinary creditors of CCB who appear before this Court have, to a varying extent, suffered from the winding-up of CCB, just as any creditor (including the Participants) suffer following an insolvency or bankruptcy. The Legal Representative has not shown, however, that these ordinary creditors have suffered identifiable prejudice attributable specifically to the alleged misconduct of the Participants.

Accordingly, I would reject this alternative ground of appeal. Even if equitable subordination is available under Canadian law, a question which I leave open for another day, the facts of this case do not call for an intervention with the pari passu ranking of the respondents in the name of equity.

D. The $5 Million Attributable to the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets

Digitized by Google

The last matter to be addressed pertains to the moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets and attributable to the Syndicated Portion thereof. In his oral submissions, the Legal Representative argued that the learned chambers judge erred in allowing the Participants to recover funds from the Syndicated Portion of the Portfolio Assets. A similar submission was made in the Alberta Court of Appeal but was summarily rejected (at p. 212). As I understand it, the argument is one of inconsistency between the treatment given, on the one hand, to the respondents' claim for their portion of the moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets and, on the other hand, to the respondents' claim for all moneys advanced to CCB pursuant to the Participation Agreement and not repaid by moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets. According to the Legal Representative, these two claims stem from the same financial arrangement and cannot be given different legal effects. It is argued that, if the advance of $255 million is really an investment of capital, as found by Wachowich J., then it is wrong to rank the respondents behind the ordinary creditors of CCB only with respect to the claim for what is not repaid by moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets. Similarly, if the transaction is really a loan but the loan is one to which s. 4 of the Partnerships Act applies, then both claims ought to be postponed.

This submission has already been answered by my conclusion that the advance of $255 million to CCB was substantially in the nature of a loan and that the Partnerships Act does not apply to postpone the loan.

VI. Disposition

For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs here and in the courts below. As found by the learned chambers judge and upheld by the Court of Appeal, the Participants are entitled to their proportionate share of the moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets of CCB in the manner set out in the Participation Agreement, that is, to the extent such recoveries exceed the CCB Portion of each of the Portfolio Assets. Moreover, as found by the Court of Appeal, the respondents are entitled to rank pari passu with the ordinary creditors of CCB for all moneys advanced pursuant to the Participation Agreement and not repaid by moneys recovered from the Portfolio Assets.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[1] This is an application for directions respecting the process for the determination of the amount of Pine Valley Mining Corporation's ("PVM") claim against Falls Mountain Coal Inc. ("FMC") within a proceeding under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. C-36, as amended, (the "CCAA Proceeding"), in which both PVM and FMC are related parties and petitioners.

[2] FMC is a wholly-owned subsidiary of PVM. PVM claims that FMC owes PVM $37,692,218. The other major creditors of FMC dispute that amount largely on the basis that the advances made to FMC are properly characterized as capital investment in FMC, not debt, and therefore PVM should rank behind the other unsecured creditors in the distribution of FMC assets. The Monitor appointed by this Court in the CCAA Proceeding has reviewed the accounts of PVM and FMC and determined that $27,070,166 is properly owed to PVM by FMC as debt.

[3] On this application the Court is asked to determine two issues:

1. Who bears the onus of proof of the amount and character of PVM's claim?
2. Should the trial be a summary trial or a conventional trial with viva voce witnesses, or some combination of those two procedures?

[4] The relevant factual background to the matter may be stated as follows:

- FMC is the wholly-owned subsidiary of PVM.
- FMC operated the Willow Creek Coal Mine.
- On October 20, 2006, PVM and FMC petitioned this Court for a general stay of proceedings under the CCAA. The order they sought was granted, and extended from time to time since the initial order.
- The Petition did not disclose an inter-company debt as between the two petitioners. All financial reporting was done on a consolidated basis. When the Monitor requested unconsolidated financial statements for each of the petitioners the inter-company debt was revealed. In recounting this history I make no adverse finding of fact on this point. That is a matter for the trial judge.
- On January 19, 2007, PVM filed a claim with the Monitor stating that FMC was indebted to PVM in the amount of $41,658,441.
- On March 16, 2007, the Monitor issued its Fourth Report to the Court. That report contained a detailed review of the transactions underlying the PVM claim. As already noted, as a result of his investigations the Monitor "[proposed] to allow a revised PVM Claim against FMC in the amount of $27,070,166".
- Some of the creditors objected to the claim, including the revised claim, and agreed that the counsel for the largest creditor, Tercon, would have standing to defend the PVM claim and to raise all defences available to FMC and to creditors of FMC. The other main creditors have maintained - if I may describe it thus - an active watching brief.

[5] A ten-day trial has been reserved for May of this year. The parties have reached an impasse on the two issues mentioned above. Mr. Sandrelli, counsel for PVM, says that "deference is owed to the Monitor's ... conclusions ... in [his] Fourth Report, such that the onus to challenge the Monitor's findings lies on the party appealing the Monitor's findings; and if deference is owed to the Monitor's findings, what standard of review applies to those findings".

[6] I understood Mr. Sandrelli to use the term "appeal" in a loose sense. He acknowledged that this is not an appeal because Tercon did not participate in the original decision making process of the Monitor. He said in submissions that the process is more akin to a review on a correctness standard of review. He concluded his submissions by contending that Tercon should bear the onus of displacing the finding of the Monitor that PVM is owed $27 Million by FMC, and that PVM bears the onus of displacing the Monitor's finding that PVM is not entitled to the additional approximate $11 million it claims.

[7] Mr. McLean, counsel for Tercon, contends that "the burden of proof lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue": Phipson on Evidence,14th ed. He says that PVM seeks to prove that it is a creditor of FMC and it must carry the burden of proof of that whole claim.

[8] Mr. Sandrelli argues that in the special context of a CCAA proceeding the Monitor, who is appointed by the court, should be accorded deference and that the review of his decision is akin to a review of a CCAA claims officer's decision in a CCAA proceeding. He relies for this proposition on dicta in Olympia & York Developments Ltd. (Re) reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 1; Air Canada (Re.) 2004 CanLII 6674 (ON SC), (2004), 2 C.B.R. (5th) 23; Canadian Airlines (Re), 2001 ABQB 146 (CanLII), 2001 ABQB 146; Matte v. Roux, 2007 BCSC 902 (CanLII), 2007 BCSC 902; Triton Tubular Components Corp v. Steelcase Inc., [2005] O.J. No. 3926 (S.C.J.) (QL); and Muscletech Research & Development Inc. 2006 CanLII 34344 (ON SC), (2006), 25 C.B.R. (5th) 231.

[9] In Olympia & York, the decision under review was that made by a claims officer. The claims officer is akin to a judicial officer. The proceeding before him is an adversarial one and naturally he should be granted some deference. That decision is distinguishable on the grounds that the court appointed Monitor in this proceeding, while undoubtedly an impartial agent of the court, reviews the claim but is in no way engaged to conduct a hearing or any type of adversarial or quasi-judicial type proceeding. Similarly, Air Canada involved an appeal from a decision of a claims officer appointed in the CCAA proceeding in which the claims officer had dismissed a contingent claim. The appeal was dismissed. The Air Canada case is distinguishable for the same reasons as the Olympia & York case. In Canadian Airlines, the decision under review was also that of a claims officer appointed to determine disputed claims within a CCAA proceeding. Paperny J., as she then was, held that the review was a trial de novo, but that was because the law in Alberta differed from Ontario. The Matte case involved the standard of review of a master's decision and for the same reasons, I find it unhelpful and distinguishable. Triton also involved the review of a claims officer's decision. The court determined that the standard of review was correctness but, for the same reasons as above, the case is distinguishable. The Muscletech case is similarly distinguishable.

[10] In none of the cases cited above was the decision under review one of a monitor, not engaged in an adversarial process.

[11] Paragraph 17 of the Claims Procedure Order pronounced December 8, 2006, provides:

> Where a Creditor delivers a Dispute Notice in accordance with the terms of this Order, such dispute shall be resolved as directed by this Court or as the Creditor in question, the Petitioners and Monitor may agree.

[12] Section 12(2) of the CCAA provides in part as follows:

> For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor shall be determined as follows:
> (a) the amount of the unsecured claim shall be the amount
> (iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor;

[13] I conclude from the CCAA and the Claims Procedure Order that the function of the Monitor, that is relevant to this application, is to determine the validity and amount of a claim on the basis of the evidence submitted. The Monitor's process in doing so is in no way akin to an adversarial process. Although his findings and opinion should be respectfully considered, he is not entitled to deference in the sense that would alter the burden of proof ordinarily imposed on the claimant. Counsel have not called my attention to any authority for either of the following propositions, either that the CCAA claim process alters substantive law that would otherwise apply to the determination of such a claim, or that a monitor appointed on the terms here is entitled to the deference accorded a quasi-judicial officer like a court appointed claims officer. It follows that PVM has the burden of proving its claim. PVM shall file a statement of claim. Tercon, with standing to defend on behalf of FMC, shall file a statement of defence.

[15] The Monitor has spent a good deal of time investigating the PVM claim. His report documents the numerous transactions that are at issue, and provides a very useful framework for the court. There is much in the report that may be of use to the parties at the hearing of this matter. In exercising my jurisdiction to give directions for a summary determination of this matter I order that either party is at liberty to use the Monitor's report or part of the report at the trial of this matter, as an expert report, provided the necessary notice is given to the other. The Monitor may be required to be cross-examined on the report.

[16] The second issue I have been asked to determine is the question of the format of this trial. Section 12 of the CCAA requires a summary trial. I recognize that in some cases, courts have held that that does not preclude a conventional trial. (See Algoma Steel Corporation v. Royal Bank of Canada reflex, (1992), 8 O.R. (3d) 449 (C.A.). I do not understand Mr. McLean to object in principle to an order that this matter be determined in a summary way but, rather, I think he reserves his right to object to the suitability of such a procedure depending on how the evidence unfolds. It is my view that s.12 of the CCAA informs any decision the court must make as to the format of a trial and that trial must surely be as the section dictates, a summary trial, unless to do otherwise would be unjust, or there is some other compelling reason against a summary trial. I am not persuaded that this claim cannot be tried summarily on the date reserved in May of this year. The parties have one week to work out an agreement as to a time line for the necessary steps to prepare for that trial, including the exchange of pleadings, disclosure of documents as requested by Tercon, agreed facts, delivery of affidavits, expert reports (including notice of reliance on all or part of the Monitor's reports), delivery and responses to notices to admit, examination for discovery if consented to, and delivery of written arguments. I acknowledge that many of these steps are underway.

[17] Mr. Sandrelli says he will now have to marshall all the evidence to prove his claim from ground zero as opposed to simply relying in the first instance on the Monitor's report. As I have said, he may rely on all or part of the Monitor's report. I am not persuaded yet that he cannot marshall his evidence in the time remaining before the May trial date. I will hear submissions on the trial schedule if, by March 21, 2008, the parties have been unable to reach agreement on it. The parties may contact the registry to arrange such a hearing prior to ordinary court hours. Either party has leave to apply to cross-examine the deponent of an affidavit out of court or in court. Either party has leave to apply to convert this summary trial to a conventional trial but I expect the parties to make their best efforts to manage this generally as a summary trial.

[18] The parties have each proposed somewhat differing forms of order, concerning various procedural matters relevant to the conduct and hearing of the inter-company claim. Also Mr. Watson, for CN, objects to the following clause proposed by PVC:

> No other creditor, claimant or counsel therefore shall be entitled to participate by having representation in the proceedings concerning the determination of the Issues and in relation to the claim of PVM against FMC without leave of the Court, which application for leave,if any, shall be made on 4 days' notice to PVM and Tercon by no later than March 31, 2008.

[19] Mr. Watson, counsel for CN, one of the creditors, contends that his client should be exempted from the limitation imposed on all other creditors contemplated by this last mentioned clause in the draft order. I agree with Mr. Sandrelli that it is necessary for the orderly conduct of the resolution of the claim that PVM and Tercon have some certainty as to what counsel are involved. On the other hand, CN and Petro-Canada have maintained what I earlier described as an active watching brief on the progress of the inter-company claim resolution. They should have the ability to continue to do so. Their submissions have generally been helpful and consequently I see no prejudice in permitting them to continue in that role, at least until shortly before the hearing. I will leave it to counsel to work out a date by which those two creditors will be barred from seeking leave to participate. I have in mind something like two weeks before the hearing but if counsel cannot agree they may make further submissions on this point.

[20] I will leave it to the parties to work out the balance of the terms of the order. They have leave to speak to the matter if those terms cannot be agreed upon.

AGREEMENTS

Disclaimer or resiliation of agreements - Sec 32
32. (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), a debtor company may — on notice given in the prescribed form and manner to the other parties to the agreement and the monitor — disclaim or resiliate any agreement to which the company is a party on the day on which proceedings commence under this Act. The company may not give notice unless the monitor approves the proposed disclaimer or resiliation.

Court may prohibit disclaimer or resiliation - Sec 32(2)
(2) Within 15 days after the day on which the company gives notice under subsection (1), a party to the agreement may, on notice to the other parties to the agreement and the monitor, apply to a court for an order that the agreement is not to be disclaimed or resiliated.

Court-ordered disclaimer or resiliation - Sec 32(3)
(3) If the monitor does not approve the proposed disclaimer or resiliation, the company may, on notice to the other parties to the agreement and the monitor, apply to a court for an order that the agreement be disclaimed or resiliated.

Factors to be considered - Sec 32(4)
(4) In deciding whether to make the order, the court is to consider, among other things,

- (a) whether the monitor approved the proposed disclaimer or resiliation;
- (b) whether the disclaimer or resiliation would enhance the prospects of a viable compromise or arrangement being made in respect of the company; and
- (c) whether the disclaimer or resiliation would likely cause significant financial hardship to a party to the agreement.

Date of disclaimer or resiliation - Sec 32(5)
(5) An agreement is disclaimed or resiliated

Intellectual property - Sec 32(6)
(6) If the company has granted a right to use intellectual property to a party to an agreement, the disclaimer or resiliation does not affect the party's right to use the intellectual property — including the party's right to enforce an exclusive use — during the term of the agreement, including any period for which the party extends the agreement as of right, as long as the party continues to perform its obligations under the agreement in relation to the use of the intellectual property.

Loss related to disclaimer or resiliation - Sec 32(7)
(7) If an agreement is disclaimed or resiliated, a party to the agreement who suffers a loss in relation to the disclaimer or resiliation is considered to have a provable claim.

Application for authorization to serve notice to bargain - Sec 33(2)
(2) A debtor company that is a party to a collective agreement and that is unable to reach a voluntary agreement with the bargaining agent to revise any of the provisions of the collective agreement may, on giving five days notice to the bargaining agent, apply to the court for an order authorizing the company to serve a notice to bargain under the laws of the jurisdiction governing collective bargaining between the company and the bargaining agent.

(b) the company has made good faith efforts to renegotiate the provisions of the collective agreement; and
(c) a failure to issue the order is likely to result in irreparable damage to the company.

No delay on vote - Sec 33(4)
(4) The vote of the creditors in respect of a compromise or an arrangement may not be delayed solely because the period provided in the laws of the jurisdiction governing collective bargaining between the company and the bargaining agent has not expired.

Claims arising from termination or amendment - Sec 33(5)
(5) If the parties to the collective agreement agree to revise the collective agreement after proceedings have been commenced under this Act in respect of the company, the bargaining agent that is a party to the agreement is deemed to have a claim, as an unsecured creditor, for an amount equal to the value of concessions granted by the bargaining agent with respect to the remaining term of the collective agreement.

Order to disclose information - Sec 33(6)
(6) On the application of the bargaining agent and on notice to the person to whom the application relates, the court may, subject to any terms and conditions it specifies, make an order requiring the person to make available to the bargaining agent any information specified by the court in the person's possession or control that relates to the company's business or financial affairs and that is relevant to the collective bargaining between the company and the bargaining agent. The court may make the order only after the company has been authorized to serve a notice to bargain under subsection (2).

Parties - Sec 33(7)
(7) For the purpose of this section, the parties to a collective agreement are the debtor company and the bargaining agent that are bound by the collective agreement.

Unrevised collective agreements remain in force - Sec 33(8)
(8) For greater certainty, any collective agreement that the company and the bargaining agent have not agreed to revise remains in force, and the court shall not alter its terms.

(c) [Repealed, 2012, c. 31, s. 421]

Powers of court - Sec 34(6)
(6) On application by a party to an agreement or by a public utility, the court may declare that this section does not apply — or applies only to the extent declared by the court — if the applicant satisfies the court that the operation of this section would likely cause the applicant significant financial hardship.

Eligible financial contracts - Sec 34(7)
(7) Subsection (1) does not apply

Factors to be considered - Sec 36(3)
(3) In deciding whether to grant the authorization, the court is to consider, among other things,

- (a) whether the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition was reasonable in the circumstances;
- (b) whether the monitor approved the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition;
- (c) whether the monitor filed with the court a report stating that in their opinion the sale or disposition would be more beneficial to the creditors than a sale or disposition under a bankruptcy;
- (d) the extent to which the creditors were consulted;
- (e) the effects of the proposed sale or disposition on the creditors and other interested parties; and
- (f) whether the consideration to be received for the assets is reasonable and fair, taking into account their market value.

and for the purpose of this subsection, any provision of a law of a province that creates a deemed trust is, despite any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as the corresponding federal provision.

Bankruptcy and Insolvency — Priorities — Crown applying on eve of bankruptcy of debtor company to have GST monies held in trust paid to Receiver General of Canada — Whether deemed trust in favour of Crown under Excise Tax Act prevails over provisions of Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act purporting to nullify deemed trusts in favour of Crown — Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, s. 18.3(1) — Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15, s. 222(3).

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Procedure — Whether chambers judge had authority to make order partially lifting stay of proceedings to allow debtor company to make assignment in bankruptcy and to stay Crown's right to enforce GST deemed trust — Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, s. 11.

Trusts — Express trusts — GST collected but unremitted to Crown — Judge ordering that GST be held by Monitor in trust account — Whether segregation of Crown's GST claim in Monitor's account created an express trust in favour of Crown.

The debtor company commenced proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"), obtaining a stay of proceedings to allow it time to reorganize its financial affairs. One of the debtor company's outstanding debts at the commencement of the reorganization was an amount of unremitted Goods and Services Tax ("GST") payable to the Crown. Section 222(3) of the Excise Tax Act ("ETA") created a deemed trust over unremitted GST, which operated despite any other enactment of Canada except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"). However, s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA provided that any statutory deemed trusts in favour of the Crown did not operate under the CCAA, subject to certain exceptions, none of which mentioned GST.

Pursuant to an order of the CCAA chambers judge, a payment not exceeding $5 million was approved to the debtor company's major secured creditor, Century Services. However, the chambers judge also ordered the debtor company to hold back and segregate in the Monitor's trust account an amount equal to the unremitted GST pending the outcome of the reorganization. On concluding that reorganization was not possible, the debtor company sought leave of the court to partially lift the stay of proceedings so it could make an assignment in bankruptcy under the BIA. The Crown moved for immediate payment of unremitted GST to the Receiver General. The chambers judge denied the Crown's motion, and allowed the assignment in bankruptcy. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on two grounds. First, it reasoned that once reorganization efforts had failed, the chambers judge was bound under the priority scheme provided by the ETA to allow payment of unremitted GST to the Crown and had no discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA to continue the stay against the Crown's claim. Second, the Court of Appeal concluded that by ordering the GST funds segregated in the Monitor's trust account, the chambers judge had created an express trust in favour of the Crown.

Held (Abella J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: The apparent conflict between s. 222(3) of the ETA and s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA can be resolved through an interpretation that properly recognizes the history of the CCAA, its function amidst the body of insolvency legislation enacted by Parliament and the principles for interpreting the CCAA that have been recognized in the jurisprudence. The history of the CCAA distinguishes it from the BIA because although these statutes share the same remedial purpose of avoiding the social and economic costs of liquidating a debtor's assets, the CCAA offers more flexibility and greater judicial discretion than the rules-based mechanism under the BIA, making the former more responsive to complex reorganizations. Because the CCAA is silent on what happens if reorganization fails, the BIA scheme of liquidation and distribution necessarily provides the backdrop against which creditors assess their priority in the event of bankruptcy. The contemporary thrust of legislative reform has been towards harmonizing aspects of insolvency law common to the CCAA and the BIA, and one of its important features has been a cutback in Crown priorities. Accordingly, the CCAA and the BIA both contain provisions nullifying statutory deemed trusts in favour of the Crown, and both contain explicit exceptions exempting source deductions deemed trusts from this general rule. Meanwhile, both Acts are harmonious in treating other Crown claims as unsecured. No such clear and express language exists in those Acts carving out an exception for GST claims.

When faced with the apparent conflict between s. 222(3) of the ETA and s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA, courts have been inclined to follow Ottawa Senators Hockey Club Corp. (Re) and resolve the conflict in favour of the ETA. Ottawa Senators should not be followed. Rather, the CCAA provides the rule. Section 222(3) of the ETA evinces no explicit intention of Parliament to repeal CCAA s. 18.3. Where Parliament has sought to protect certain Crown claims through statutory deemed trusts and intended that these deemed trusts continue in insolvency, it has legislated so expressly and elaborately. Meanwhile, there is no express statutory basis for concluding that GST claims enjoy a preferred treatment under the CCAA or the BIA. The internal logic of the CCAA appears to subject a GST deemed trust to the waiver by Parliament of its priority. A strange asymmetry would result if differing treatments of GST deemed trusts under the CCAA and the BIA were found to exist, as this would encourage statute shopping, undermine the CCAA's remedial purpose and invite the very social ills that the statute was enacted to avert. The later in time enactment of the more general s. 222(3) of the ETA does not require application of the doctrine of implied repeal to the earlier and more specific s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA in the circumstances of this case. In any event, recent amendments to the CCAA in 2005 resulted in s. 18.3 of the Act being renumbered and reformulated, making it the later in time provision. This confirms that Parliament's intent with respect to GST deemed trusts is to be found in the CCAA. The conflict between the ETA and the CCAA is more apparent than real.

The exercise of judicial discretion has allowed the CCAA to adapt and evolve to meet contemporary business and social needs. As reorganizations become increasingly complex, CCAA courts have been called upon to innovate. In determining their jurisdiction to sanction measures in a CCAA proceeding, courts should first interpret the provisions of the CCAA before turning to their inherent or equitable jurisdiction. Noteworthy in this regard is the expansive interpretation the language of the CCAA is capable of supporting. The general language of the CCAA should not be read as being restricted by the availability of more specific orders. The requirements of appropriateness, good faith and due diligence are baseline considerations that a court should always bear in mind when exercising CCAA authority. The question is whether the order will usefully further efforts to avoid the social and economic losses resulting from liquidation of an insolvent company, which extends to both the purpose of the order and the means it employs. Here, the chambers judge's order staying the Crown's GST claim was in furtherance of the CCAA's objectives because it blunted the impulse of creditors to interfere in an orderly liquidation and fostered a harmonious transition from the CCAA to the BIA, meeting the objective of a single proceeding that is common to both statutes. The transition from the CCAA to the BIA may require the partial lifting of a stay of proceedings under the CCAA to allow commencement of BIA proceedings, but no gap exists between the two statutes because they operate in tandem and creditors in both cases look to the BIA scheme of distribution to foreshadow how they will fare if the reorganization is unsuccessful. The breadth of the court's discretion under the CCAA is sufficient to construct a bridge to liquidation under the BIA. Hence, the chambers judge's order was authorized.

No express trust was created by the chambers judge's order in this case because there is no certainty of object inferrable from his order. Creation of an express trust requires certainty of intention, subject matter and object. At the time the chambers judge accepted the proposal to segregate the monies in the Monitor's trust account there was no certainty that the Crown would be the beneficiary, or object, of the trust because exactly who might take the money in the final result was in doubt. In any event, no dispute over the money would even arise under the interpretation of s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA established above, because the Crown's deemed trust priority over GST claims would be lost under the CCAA and the Crown would rank as an unsecured creditor for this amount.

Per Fish J.: The GST monies collected by the debtor are not subject to a deemed trust or priority in favour of the Crown. In recent years, Parliament has given detailed consideration to the Canadian insolvency scheme but has declined to amend the provisions at issue in this case, a deliberate exercise of legislative discretion. On the other hand, in upholding deemed trusts created by the ETA notwithstanding insolvency proceedings, courts have been unduly protective of Crown interests which Parliament itself has chosen to subordinate to competing prioritized claims. In the context of the Canadian insolvency regime, deemed trusts exist only where there is a statutory provision creating the trust and a CCAA or BIA provision explicitly confirming its effective operation. The Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan and the Employment Insurance Act all contain deemed trust provisions that are strikingly similar to that in s. 222 of the ETA but they are all also confirmed in s. 37 of the CCAA and in s. 67(3) of the BIA in clear and unmistakeable terms. The same is not true of the deemed trust created under the ETA. Although Parliament created a deemed trust in favour of the Crown to hold unremitted GST monies, and although it purports to maintain this trust notwithstanding any contrary federal or provincial legislation, it did not confirm the continued operation of the trust in either the BIA or the CCAA, reflecting Parliament's intention to allow the deemed trust to lapse with the commencement of insolvency proceedings.

Per Abella J. (dissenting): Section 222(3) of the ETA gives priority during CCAA proceedings to the Crown's deemed trust in unremitted GST. This provision unequivocally defines its boundaries in the clearest possible terms and excludes only the BIA from its legislative grasp. The language used reflects a clear legislative intention that s. 222(3) would prevail if in conflict with any other law except the BIA. This is borne out by the fact that following the enactment of s. 222(3), amendments to the CCAA were introduced, and despite requests from various constituencies, s. 18.3(1) was not amended to make the priorities in the CCAA consistent with those in the BIA. This indicates a deliberate legislative choice to protect the deemed trust in s. 222(3) from the reach of s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA.

The application of other principles of interpretation reinforces this conclusion. An earlier, specific provision may be overruled by a subsequent general statute if the legislature indicates, through its language, an intention that the general provision prevails. Section 222(3) achieves this through the use of language stating that it prevails despite any law of Canada, of a province, or "any other law" other than the BIA. Section 18.3(1) of the CCAA is thereby rendered inoperative for purposes of s. 222(3). By operation of s. 44(f) of the Interpretation Act, the transformation of s. 18.3(1) into s. 37(1) after the enactment of s. 222(3) of the ETA has no effect on the interpretive queue, and s. 222(3) of the ETA remains the "later in time" provision. This means that the deemed trust provision in s. 222(3) of the ETA takes precedence over s. 18.3(1) during CCAA proceedings. While s. 11 gives a court discretion to make orders notwithstanding the BIA and the Winding-up Act, that discretion is not liberated from the operation of any other federal statute. Any exercise of discretion is therefore circumscribed by whatever limits are imposed by statutes other than the BIA and the Winding-up Act. That includes the ETA. The chambers judge in this case was, therefore, required to respect the priority regime set out in s. 222(3) of the ETA. Neither s. 18.3(1) nor s. 11 of the CCAA gave him the authority to ignore it. He could not, as a result, deny the Crown's request for payment of the GST funds during the CCAA proceedings.

[1] Deschamps J. — For the first time this Court is called upon to directly interpret the provisions of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). In that respect, two questions are raised. The first requires reconciliation of provisions of the CCAA and the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 ("ETA"), which lower courts have held to be in conflict with one another. The second concerns the scope of a court's discretion when supervising reorganization. The relevant statutory provisions are reproduced in the Appendix. On the first question, having considered the evolution of Crown priorities in the context of insolvency and the wording of the various statutes creating Crown priorities, I conclude that it is the CCAA and not the ETA that provides the rule. On the second question, I conclude that the broad discretionary jurisdiction conferred on the supervising judge must be interpreted having regard to the remedial nature of the CCAA and insolvency legislation generally. Consequently, the court had the discretion to partially lift a stay of proceedings to allow the debtor to make an assignment under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"). I would allow the appeal.

1. Facts and Decisions of the Courts Below

[2] Ted LeRoy Trucking Ltd. ("LeRoy Trucking") commenced proceedings under the CCAA in the Supreme Court of British Columbia on December 13, 2007, obtaining a stay of proceedings with a view to reorganizing its financial affairs. LeRoy Trucking sold certain redundant assets as authorized by the order.

[3] Amongst the debts owed by LeRoy Trucking was an amount for Goods and Services Tax ("GST") collected but unremitted to the Crown. The ETA creates a deemed trust in favour of the Crown for amounts collected in respect of GST. The deemed trust extends to any property or proceeds held by the person collecting GST and any property of that person held by a secured creditor, requiring that property to be paid to the Crown in priority to all security interests. The ETA provides that the deemed trust operates despite any other enactment of Canada except the BIA. However, the CCAA also provides that subject to certain exceptions, none of which mentions GST, deemed trusts in favour of the Crown do not operate under the CCAA. Accordingly, under the CCAA the Crown ranks as an unsecured creditor in respect of GST. Nonetheless, at the time LeRoy Trucking commenced CCAA proceedings the leading line of jurisprudence held that the ETA took precedence over the CCAA such that the Crown enjoyed priority for GST claims under the CCAA, even though it would have lost that same priority under the BIA. The CCAA underwent substantial amendments in 2005 in which some of the provisions at issue in this appeal were renumbered and reformulated (S.C.

Digitized by Google

2005, c. 47). However, these amendments only came into force on September 18, 2009. I will refer to the amended provisions only where relevant.

[4] On April 29, 2008, Brenner C.J.S.C., in the context of the CCAA proceedings, approved a payment not exceeding $5 million, the proceeds of redundant asset sales, to Century Services, the debtor's major secured creditor. LeRoy Trucking proposed to hold back an amount equal to the GST monies collected but unremitted to the Crown and place it in the Monitor's trust account until the outcome of the reorganization was known. In order to maintain the status quo while the success of the reorganization was uncertain, Brenner C.J.S.C. agreed to the proposal and ordered that an amount of $305,202.30 be held by the Monitor in its trust account.

[5] On September 3, 2008, having concluded that reorganization was not possible, LeRoy Trucking sought leave to make an assignment in bankruptcy under the BIA. The Crown sought an order that the GST monies held by the Monitor be paid to the Receiver General of Canada. Brenner C.J.S.C. dismissed the latter application. Reasoning that the purpose of segregating the funds with the Monitor was "to facilitate an ultimate payment of the GST monies which were owed pre-filing, but only if a viable plan emerged", the failure of such a reorganization, followed by an assignment in bankruptcy, meant the Crown would lose priority under the BIA 2008 BCSC 1805 (CanLII), (2008 BCSC 1805, [2008] G.S.T.C. 221).

[6] The Crown's appeal was allowed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal 2009 BCCA 205 (CanLII), (2009 BCCA 205, 270 B.C.A.C. 167). Tysoe J.A. for a unanimous court found two independent bases for allowing the Crown's appeal.

[7] First, the court's authority under s. 11 of the CCAA was held not to extend to staying the Crown's application for immediate payment of the GST funds subject to the deemed trust after it was clear that reorganization efforts had failed and that bankruptcy was inevitable. As restructuring was no longer a possibility, staying the Crown's claim to the GST funds no longer served a purpose under the CCAA and the court was bound under the priority scheme provided by the ETA to allow payment to the Crown. In so holding, Tysoe J.A. adopted the reasoning in Ottawa Senators Hockey Club Corp. (Re) 2005 CanLII 21 (ON CA), (2005), 73 O.R. (3d) 737 (C.A.), which found that the ETA deemed trust for GST established Crown priority over secured creditors under the CCAA.

[8] Second, Tysoe J.A. concluded that by ordering the GST funds segregated in the Monitor's trust account on April 29, 2008, the judge had created an express trust in favour of the Crown from which the monies in question could not be diverted for any other purposes. The Court of Appeal therefore ordered that the money held by the Monitor in trust be paid to the Receiver General.

2. Issues

[9] This appeal raises three broad issues which are addressed in turn:

(1) Did s. 222(3) of the ETA displace s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA and give priority to the Crown's ETA deemed trust during CCAA proceedings as held in Ottawa Senators?

(2) Did the court exceed its CCAA authority by lifting the stay to allow the debtor to make an assignment in bankruptcy?

(3) Did the court's order of April 29, 2008 requiring segregation of the Crown's GST claim in the Monitor's trust account create an express trust in favour of the Crown in respect of those funds?

3. Analysis

[10] The first issue concerns Crown priorities in the context of insolvency. As will be seen, the ETA provides for a deemed trust in favour of the Crown in respect of GST owed by a debtor "[d]espite . . . any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act)" (s. 222(3)), while the CCAA stated at the relevant time that "notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be [so] regarded" (s. 18.3(1)). It is difficult to imagine two statutory provisions more apparently in conflict. However, as is often the case, the apparent conflict can be resolved through interpretation.

[11] In order to properly interpret the provisions, it is necessary to examine the history of the CCAA, its function amidst the body of insolvency legislation enacted by Parliament, and the principles that have been recognized in the jurisprudence. It will be seen that Crown priorities in the insolvency context have been significantly pared down. The resolution of the second issue is also rooted in the context of the CCAA, but its purpose and the manner in which it has been interpreted in the case law are also key. After examining the first two issues in this case, I will address Tysoe J.A.'s conclusion that an express trust in favour of the Crown was created by the court's order of April 29, 2008.

3.1 Purpose and Scope of Insolvency Law

[12] Insolvency is the factual situation that arises when a debtor is unable to pay creditors (see generally, R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2009), at p. 16). Certain legal proceedings become available upon insolvency, which typically allow a debtor to obtain a court order staying its creditors' enforcement actions and attempt to obtain a binding compromise with creditors to adjust the payment conditions to something more realistic. Alternatively, the debtor's assets may be liquidated and debts paid from the proceeds according to statutory priority rules. The former is usually referred to as reorganization or restructuring while the latter is termed liquidation.

[13] Canadian commercial insolvency law is not codified in one exhaustive statute. Instead, Parliament has enacted multiple insolvency statutes, the main one being the BIA. The BIA offers a self-contained legal regime providing for both reorganization and liquidation. Although bankruptcy legislation has a long history, the BIA itself is a fairly recent statute — it was enacted in 1992. It is characterized by a rules-based approach to proceedings. The BIA is available to insolvent debtors owing $1000 or more, regardless of whether they are natural or legal persons. It contains mechanisms for debtors to make proposals to their creditors for the adjustment of debts. If a proposal fails, the BIA contains a bridge to bankruptcy whereby the debtor's assets are liquidated and the proceeds paid to creditors in accordance with the statutory scheme of distribution.

[14] Access to the CCAA is more restrictive. A debtor must be a company with liabilities in excess of $5 million. Unlike the BIA, the CCAA contains no provisions for liquidation of a debtor's assets if reorganization fails. There are three ways of exiting CCAA proceedings. The best outcome is achieved when the stay of proceedings provides the debtor with some breathing space during which solvency is restored and the CCAA process terminates without reorganization being needed. The second most desirable outcome occurs when the debtor's compromise or arrangement is accepted by its creditors and the reorganized company emerges from the CCAA proceedings as a going concern. Lastly, if the compromise or arrangement fails, either the company or its creditors usually seek to have the debtor's assets liquidated under the applicable provisions of the BIA or to place the debtor into receivership. As discussed in greater detail below, the key difference between the reorganization regimes under the BIA and the CCAA is that the latter offers a more flexible mechanism with greater judicial discretion, making it more responsive to complex reorganizations.

[15] As I will discuss at greater length below, the purpose of the CCAA — Canada's first reorganization statute — is to permit the debtor to continue to carry on business and, where possible, avoid the social and economic costs of liquidating its assets. Proposals to creditors under the BIA serve the same remedial purpose, though this is achieved through a rules-based mechanism that offers less flexibility. Where reorganization is impossible, the BIA may be employed to provide an orderly mechanism for the distribution of a debtor's assets to satisfy creditor claims according to predetermined priority rules.

[16] Prior to the enactment of the CCAA in 1933 (S.C. 1932-33, c. 36), practice under existing commercial insolvency legislation tended heavily towards the liquidation of a debtor company (J. Sarra, Creditor Rights and the Public Interest: Restructuring Insolvent Corporations (2003), at p. 12). The battering visited upon Canadian businesses by the Great Depression and the absence of an effective mechanism for reaching a compromise between debtors and creditors to avoid liquidation required a legislative response. The CCAA was innovative as it allowed the insolvent debtor to attempt reorganization under judicial supervision outside the existing insolvency legislation which, once engaged, almost invariably resulted in liquidation (Reference re Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 659, at pp. 660-61; Sarra, Creditor Rights, at pp. 12-13).

[17] Parliament understood when adopting the CCAA that liquidation of an insolvent company was harmful for most of those it affected — notably creditors and employees — and that a workout which allowed the company to survive was optimal (Sarra, Creditor Rights, at pp. 13-15).

[18] Early commentary and jurisprudence also endorsed the CCAA's remedial objectives. It recognized that companies retain more value as going concerns while underscoring that intangible losses, such as the evaporation of the companies' goodwill, result from liquidation (S. E. Edwards, "Reorganizations Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act" (1947), 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587, at p. 592). Reorganization serves the public interest by facilitating the survival of companies supplying goods or services crucial to the health of the economy or saving large numbers of jobs (ibid., at p. 593). Insolvency could be so widely felt as to impact stakeholders other than creditors and employees. Variants of these views resonate today, with reorganization justified in terms of rehabilitating companies that are key elements in a complex web of interdependent economic relationships in order to avoid the negative consequences of liquidation.

[19] The CCAA fell into disuse during the next several decades, likely because amendments to the Act in 1953 restricted its use to companies issuing bonds (S.C. 1952-53, c. 3). During the economic downturn of the early 1980s, insolvency lawyers and courts adapting to the resulting wave of insolvencies resurrected the statute and deployed it in response to new economic challenges. Participants in insolvency proceedings grew to recognize and appreciate the statute's distinguishing feature: a grant of broad and flexible authority to the supervising court to make the orders necessary to facilitate the reorganization of the debtor and achieve the CCAA's objectives. The manner in which courts have used CCAA jurisdiction in increasingly creative and flexible ways is explored in greater detail below.

[20] Efforts to evolve insolvency law were not restricted to the courts during this period. In 1970, a government-commissioned panel produced an extensive study recommending sweeping reform but Parliament failed to act (see Bankruptcy and Insolvency: Report of the Study Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency Legislation (1970)). Another panel of experts produced more limited recommendations in 1986 which eventually resulted in enactment of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act of 1992 (S.C. 1992, c. 27) (see Proposed Bankruptcy Act Amendments: Report of the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency (1986)). Broader provisions for reorganizing insolvent debtors were then included in Canada's bankruptcy statute. Although the 1970 and 1986 reports made no specific recommendations with respect to the CCAA, the House of Commons committee studying the BIA's predecessor bill, C-22, seemed to accept expert testimony that the BIA's new reorganization scheme would shortly supplant the CCAA, which could then be repealed, with commercial insolvency and bankruptcy being governed by a single statute (Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, Issue No. 15, 3rd Sess., 34th Parl., October 3, 1991, at 15:15-15:16).

[21] In retrospect, this conclusion by the House of Commons committee was out of step with reality. It overlooked the renewed vitality the CCAA enjoyed in contemporary practice and the advantage that a flexible judicially supervised reorganization process presented in the face of increasingly complex reorganizations, when compared to the stricter rules-based scheme contained in the BIA. The "flexibility of the CCAA [was seen as] a great benefit, allowing for creative and effective decisions" (Industry Canada, Marketplace Framework Policy Branch, Report on the Operation and Administration of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2002), at p. 41). Over the past three decades, resurrection of the CCAA has thus been the mainspring of a process through which, one author concludes, "the legal setting for Canadian insolvency restructuring has evolved from a rather blunt instrument to one of the most sophisticated systems in the developed world" (R. B. Jones, "The Evolution of Canadian Restructuring: Challenges for the Rule of Law", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2005 (2006), 481, at p. 481).

[22] While insolvency proceedings may be governed by different statutory schemes, they share some commonalities. The most prominent of these is the single proceeding model. The nature and purpose of the single proceeding model are described by Professor Wood in Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law:

They all provide a collective proceeding that supersedes the usual civil process available to creditors to enforce their claims. The creditors' remedies are collectivized in order to prevent the free-for-all that would otherwise prevail if creditors were permitted to exercise their remedies. In the absence of a collective process, each creditor is armed with the knowledge that if they do not strike hard and swift to seize the debtor's assets, they will be beat out by other creditors. [pp. 2-3]

The single proceeding model avoids the inefficiency and chaos that would attend insolvency if each creditor initiated proceedings to recover its debt. Grouping all possible actions against the debtor into a single proceeding controlled in a single forum facilitates negotiation with creditors because it places them all on an equal footing, rather than exposing them to the risk that a more aggressive creditor will realize its claims against the debtor's limited assets while the other creditors attempt a compromise. With a view to achieving that purpose, both the CCAA and the BIA allow a court to order all actions against a debtor to be stayed while a compromise is sought.

[23] Another point of convergence of the CCAA and the BIA relates to priorities. Because the CCAA is silent about what happens if reorganization fails, the BIA scheme of liquidation and distribution necessarily supplies the backdrop for what will happen if a CCAA reorganization is ultimately unsuccessful. In addition, one of the important features of legislative reform of both statutes since the enactment of the BIA in 1992 has been a cutback in Crown priorities (S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 39; S.C. 1997, c. 12, ss. 73 and 125; S.C. 2000, c. 30, s. 148; S.C. 2005, c. 47, ss. 69 and 131; S.C. 2009, c. 33, s. 25; see also Quebec (Revenue) v. Caisse populaire Desjardins de Montmagny, 2009 SCC 49 (CanLII), 2009 SCC 49, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 286; Deputy Minister of Revenue v. Rainville, 1979 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 35; Proposed Bankruptcy Act Amendments: Report of the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency).

[24] With parallel CCAA and BIA restructuring schemes now an accepted feature of the insolvency law landscape, the contemporary thrust of legislative reform has been towards harmonizing aspects of insolvency law common to the two statutory schemes to the extent possible and encouraging reorganization over liquidation (see An Act to establish the Wage Earner Protection Program Act, to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and to make consequential amendments to other Acts, S.C. 2005, c. 47; Gauntlet Energy Corp., Re, 2003 ABQB 894 (CanLII), 2003 ABQB 894, 30 Alta. L.R. (4th) 192, at para. 19).

[25] Mindful of the historical background of the CCAA and BIA, I now turn to the first question at issue.

3.2 GST Deemed Trust Under the CCAA

[26] The Court of Appeal proceeded on the basis that the ETA precluded the court from staying the Crown's enforcement of the GST deemed trust when partially lifting the stay to allow the debtor to enter bankruptcy. In so doing, it adopted the reasoning in a line of cases culminating in Ottawa Senators, which held that an ETA deemed trust remains enforceable during CCAA reorganization despite language in the CCAA that suggests otherwise.

[27] The Crown relies heavily on the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Ottawa Senators and argues that the later in time provision of the ETA creating the GST deemed trust trumps the provision of the CCAA purporting to nullify most statutory deemed trusts. The Court of Appeal in this case accepted this reasoning but not all provincial courts follow it (see, e.g., Komunik Corp. (Arrangement relatif à), 2009 QCCS 6332 (CanLII), 2009 QCCS 6332 (CanLII), leave to appeal granted, 2010 QCCA 183 (CanLII), 2010 QCCA 183 (CanLII)). Century Services relied, in its written submissions to this Court, on the argument that the court had authority under the CCAA to continue the stay against the Crown's claim for unremitted GST. In oral argument, the question of whether Ottawa Senators was correctly decided nonetheless arose. After the hearing, the parties were asked to make further written submissions on this point. As appears evident from the reasons of my colleague Abella J., this issue has become prominent before this Court. In those circumstances, this Court needs to determine the correctness of the reasoning in Ottawa Senators.

[28] The policy backdrop to this question involves the Crown's priority as a creditor in insolvency situations which, as I mentioned above, has evolved considerably. Prior to the 1990s, Crown claims largely enjoyed priority in insolvency. This was widely seen as unsatisfactory as shown by both the 1970 and 1986 insolvency reform proposals, which recommended that Crown claims receive no preferential treatment. A closely related matter was whether the CCAA was binding at all upon the Crown. Amendments to the CCAA in 1997 confirmed that it did indeed bind the Crown (see CCAA, s. 21, as added by S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 126).

[29] Claims of priority by the state in insolvency situations receive different treatment across jurisdictions worldwide. For example, in Germany and Australia, the state is given no priority at all, while the state enjoys wide priority in the United States and France (see B. K. Morgan, "Should the Sovereign be Paid First? A Comparative International Analysis of the Priority for Tax Claims in Bankruptcy" (2000), 74 Am. Bankr. L.J. 461, at p. 500). Canada adopted a middle course through legislative reform of Crown priority initiated in 1992. The Crown retained priority for source deductions of income tax, Employment Insurance ("EI") and Canada Pension Plan ("CPP") premiums, but ranks as an ordinary unsecured creditor for most other claims.

[30] Parliament has frequently enacted statutory mechanisms to secure Crown claims and permit their enforcement. The two most common are statutory deemed trusts and powers to garnish funds third parties owe the debtor (see F. L. Lamer, Priority of Crown Claims in Insolvency (loose-leaf), at §2).

[31] With respect to GST collected, Parliament has enacted a deemed trust. The ETA states that every person who collects an amount on account of GST is deemed to hold that amount in trust for the Crown (s. 222(1)). The deemed trust extends to other property of the person collecting the tax equal in value to the amount deemed to be in trust if that amount has not been remitted in accordance with the ETA. The deemed trust also extends to property held by a secured creditor that, but for the security interest, would be property of the person collecting the tax (s. 222(3)).

[32] Parliament has created similar deemed trusts using almost identical language in respect of source deductions of income tax, EI premiums and CPP premiums (see s. 227(4) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"), ss. 86(2) and (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23, and ss. 23(3) and (4) of the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-8). I will refer to income tax, EI and CPP deductions as "source deductions".

[33] In Royal Bank of Canada v. Sparrow Electric Corp., 1997 CanLII 377 (SCC), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 411, this Court addressed a priority dispute between a deemed trust for source deductions under the ITA and security interests taken under both the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46, and the Alberta Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988, c. P-4.05 ("PPSA"). As then worded, an ITA deemed trust over the debtor's property equivalent to the amount owing in respect of income tax became effective at the time of liquidation, receivership, or assignment in bankruptcy. Sparrow Electric held that the ITA deemed trust could not prevail over the security interests because, being fixed charges, the latter attached as soon as the debtor acquired rights in the property such that the ITA deemed trust had no property on which to attach when it subsequently arose. Later, in First Vancouver Finance v. M.N.R., 2002 SCC 49 (CanLII), 2002 SCC 49, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 720, this Court observed that Parliament had legislated to strengthen the statutory deemed trust in the ITA by deeming it to operate from the moment the deductions were not paid to the Crown as required by the ITA, and by granting the Crown priority over all security interests (paras. 27-29) (the "Sparrow Electric amendment").

[34] The amended text of s. 227(4.1) of the ITA and concordant source deductions deemed trusts in the Canada Pension Plan and the Employment Insurance Act state that the deemed trust operates notwithstanding any other enactment of Canada, except ss. 81.1 and 81.2 of the BIA. The ETA deemed trust at issue in this case is similarly worded, but it excepts the BIA in its entirety. The provision reads as follows:

Digitized by Google

(3) Despite any other provision of this Act (except subsection (4)), any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), any enactment of a province or any other law, if at any time an amount deemed by subsection (1) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn in the manner and at the time provided under this Part, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust, is deemed . . . .

[35] The Crown submits that the Sparrow Electric amendment, added by Parliament to the ETA in 2000, was intended to preserve the Crown's priority over collected GST under the CCAA while subordinating the Crown to the status of an unsecured creditor in respect of GST only under the BIA. This is because the ETA provides that the GST deemed trust is effective "despite" any other enactment except the BIA.

[36] The language used in the ETA for the GST deemed trust creates an apparent conflict with the CCAA, which provides that subject to certain exceptions, property deemed by statute to be held in trust for the Crown shall not be so regarded.

[37] Through a 1997 amendment to the CCAA (S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 125), Parliament appears to have, subject to specific exceptions, nullified deemed trusts in favour of the Crown once reorganization proceedings are commenced under the Act. The relevant provision reads:

18.3 (1) Subject to subsection (2), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

This nullification of deemed trusts was continued in further amendments to the CCAA (S.C. 2005, c. 47), where s. 18.3(1) was renumbered and reformulated as s. 37(1):

37. (1) Subject to subsection (2), despite any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as being held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

[38] An analogous provision exists in the BIA, which, subject to the same specific exceptions, nullifies statutory deemed trusts and makes property of the bankrupt that would otherwise be subject to a deemed trust part of the debtor's estate and available to creditors (S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 39; S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 73; BIA, s. 67(2)). It is noteworthy that in both the CCAA and the BIA, the exceptions concern source deductions (CCAA, s. 18.3(2); BIA, s. 67(3)). The relevant provision of the CCAA reads:

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsection 86(2) or (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act . . . .

Thus, the Crown's deemed trust and corresponding priority in source deductions remain effective both in reorganization and in bankruptcy.

[39] Meanwhile, in both s. 18.4(1) of the CCAA and s. 86(1) of the BIA, other Crown claims are treated as unsecured. These provisions, establishing the Crown's status as an unsecured creditor, explicitly exempt statutory deemed trusts in source deductions (CCAA, s. 18.4(3); BIA, s. 86(3)). The CCAA provision reads as follows:

(3) Subsection (1) [Crown ranking as unsecured creditor] does not affect the operation of

(a) subsections 224(1.2) and (1.3) of the Income Tax Act,

(b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution . . . .

Therefore, not only does the CCAA provide that Crown claims do not enjoy priority over the claims of other creditors (s. 18.3(1)), but the exceptions to this rule (i.e., that Crown priority is maintained for source deductions) are repeatedly stated in the statute.

[40] The apparent conflict in this case is whether the rule in the CCAA first enacted as s. 18.3 in 1997, which provides that subject to certain explicit exceptions, statutory deemed trusts are ineffective under the CCAA, is overridden by the one in the ETA enacted in 2000 stating that GST deemed trusts operate despite any enactment of Canada except the BIA. With respect for my colleague Fish J., I do not think the apparent conflict can be resolved by denying it and creating a rule requiring both a statutory provision enacting the deemed trust, and a second statutory provision confirming it. Such a rule is unknown to the law. Courts must recognize conflicts, apparent or real, and resolve them when possible.

[41] A line of jurisprudence across Canada has resolved the apparent conflict in favour of the ETA, thereby maintaining GST deemed trusts under the CCAA. Ottawa Senators, the leading case, decided the matter by invoking the doctrine of implied repeal to hold that the later in time provision of the ETA should take precedence over the CCAA (see also Solid Resources Ltd., Re reflex, (2002), 40 C.B.R. (4th) 219 (Alta. Q.B.); Gauntlet).

[42] The Ontario Court of Appeal in Ottawa Senators rested its conclusion on two considerations. First, it was persuaded that by explicitly mentioning the BIA in ETA s. 222(3), but not the CCAA, Parliament made a deliberate choice. In the words of MacPherson J.A.:

The BIA and the CCAA are closely related federal statutes. I cannot conceive that Parliament would specifically identify the BIA as an exception, but accidentally fail to consider the CCAA as a possible second exception. In my view, the omission of the CCAA from s. 222(3) of the ETA was almost certainly a considered omission. [para. 43]

[43] Second, the Ontario Court of Appeal compared the conflict between the ETA and the CCAA to that before this Court in Doré v. Verdun (City), 1997 CanLII 315 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 862, and found them to be "identical" (para. 46). It therefore considered Doré binding (para. 49). In Doré, a limitations provision in the more general and recently enacted Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 ("C.C.Q."), was held to have repealed a more specific provision of the earlier Quebec Cities and Towns Act, R.S.Q., c. C-19, with which it conflicted. By analogy, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the later in time and more general provision, s. 222(3) of the ETA, impliedly repealed the more specific and earlier in time provision, s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA (paras. 47-49).

[44] Viewing this issue in its entire context, several considerations lead me to conclude that neither the reasoning nor the result in Ottawa Senators can stand. While a conflict may exist at the level of the statutes' wording, a purposive and contextual analysis to determine Parliament's true intent yields the conclusion that Parliament could not have intended to restore the Crown's deemed trust priority in GST claims under the CCAA when it amended the ETA in 2000 with the Sparrow Electric amendment.

[45] I begin by recalling that Parliament has shown its willingness to move away from asserting priority for Crown claims in insolvency law. Section 18.3(1) of the CCAA (subject to the s. 18.3(2) exceptions) provides that the Crown's deemed trusts have no effect under the CCAA. Where Parliament has sought to protect certain Crown claims through statutory deemed trusts and intended that these deemed trusts continue in insolvency, it has legislated so explicitly and elaborately. For example, s. 18.3(2) of the CCAA and s. 67(3) of the BIA expressly provide that deemed trusts for source deductions remain effective in insolvency. Parliament has, therefore, clearly carved out exceptions from the general rule that deemed trusts are ineffective in insolvency. The CCAA and BIA are in harmony, preserving deemed trusts and asserting Crown priority only in respect of source deductions. Meanwhile, there is no express statutory basis for concluding that GST claims enjoy a preferred treatment under the CCAA or the BIA. Unlike source deductions, which are clearly and expressly dealt with under both these insolvency statutes, no such clear and express language exists in those Acts carving out an exception for GST claims.

[46] The internal logic of the CCAA also militates against upholding the ETA deemed trust for GST. The CCAA imposes limits on a suspension by the court of the Crown's rights in respect of source deductions but does not mention the ETA (s. 11.4). Since source deductions deemed trusts are granted explicit protection under the CCAA, it would be inconsistent to afford a better protection to the ETA deemed trust absent explicit language in the CCAA. Thus, the logic of the CCAA appears to subject the ETA deemed trust to the waiver by Parliament of its priority (s. 18.4).

[47] Moreover, a strange asymmetry would arise if the interpretation giving the ETA priority over the CCAA urged by the Crown is adopted here: the Crown would retain priority over GST claims during CCAA proceedings but not in bankruptcy. As courts have reflected, this can only encourage statute shopping by secured creditors in cases such as this one where the debtor's assets cannot satisfy both the secured creditors' and the Crown's claims (Gauntlet, at para. 21). If creditors' claims were better protected by liquidation under the BIA, creditors' incentives would lie overwhelmingly with avoiding proceedings under the CCAA and not risking a failed reorganization. Giving a key player in any insolvency such skewed incentives against reorganizing under the CCAA can only undermine that statute's remedial objectives and risk inviting the very social ills that it was enacted to avert.

[48] Arguably, the effect of Ottawa Senators is mitigated if restructuring is attempted under the BIA instead of the CCAA, but it is not cured. If Ottawa Senators were to be followed, Crown priority over GST would differ depending on whether restructuring took place under the CCAA or the BIA. The anomaly of this result is made manifest by the fact that it would deprive companies of the option to restructure under the more flexible and responsive CCAA regime, which has been the statute of choice for complex reorganizations.

[49] Evidence that Parliament intended different treatments for GST claims in reorganization and bankruptcy is scant, if it exists at all. Section 222(3) of the ETA was enacted as part of a wide-ranging budget implementation bill in 2000. The summary accompanying that bill does not indicate that Parliament intended to elevate Crown priority over GST claims under the CCAA to the same or a higher level than source deductions claims. Indeed, the summary for deemed trusts states only that amendments to existing provisions are aimed at "ensuring that employment insurance premiums and Canada Pension Plan contributions that are required to be remitted by an employer are fully recoverable by the Crown in the case of the bankruptcy of the employer" (Summary to S.C. 2000, c. 30, at p. 4a). The wording of GST deemed trusts resembles that of statutory deemed trusts for source deductions and incorporates the same overriding language and reference to the BIA. However, as noted above, Parliament's express intent is that only source deductions deemed trusts remain operative. An exception for the BIA in the statutory language establishing the source deductions deemed trusts accomplishes very little, because the explicit language of the BIA itself (and the CCAA) carves out these source deductions deemed trusts and maintains their effect. It is however noteworthy that no equivalent language maintaining GST deemed trusts exists under either the BIA or the CCAA.

[50] It seems more likely that by adopting the same language for creating GST deemed trusts in the ETA as it did for deemed trusts for source deductions, and by overlooking the inclusion of an exception for the CCAA alongside the BIA in s. 222(3) of the ETA, Parliament may have inadvertently succumbed to a drafting anomaly. Because of a statutory lacuna in the ETA, the GST deemed trust could be seen as remaining effective in the CCAA, while ceasing to have any effect under the BIA, thus creating an apparent conflict with the wording of the CCAA. However, it should be seen for what it is: a facial conflict only, capable of resolution by looking at the broader approach taken to Crown priorities and by giving precedence to the statutory language of s. 18.3 of the CCAA in a manner that does not produce an anomalous outcome.

[51] Section 222(3) of the ETA evinces no explicit intention of Parliament to repeal CCAA s. 18.3. It merely creates an apparent conflict that must be resolved by statutory interpretation. Parliament's intent when it enacted ETA s. 222(3) was therefore far from unambiguous. Had it sought to give the Crown a priority for GST claims, it could have done so explicitly as it did for source deductions. Instead, one is left to infer from the language of ETA s. 222(3) that the GST deemed trust was intended to be effective under the CCAA.

[52] I am not persuaded that the reasoning in Doré requires the application of the doctrine of implied repeal in the circumstances of this case. The main issue in Doré concerned the impact of the adoption of the C.C.Q. on the administrative law rules with respect to municipalities. While Gonthier J. concluded in that case that the limitation provision in art. 2930 C.C.Q. had repealed by implication a limitation provision in the Cities and Towns Act, he did so on the basis of more than a textual analysis. The conclusion in Doré was reached after thorough contextual analysis of both pieces of legislation, including an extensive review of the relevant legislative history (paras. 31-41). Consequently, the circumstances before this Court in Doré are far from "identical" to those in the present case, in terms of text, context and legislative history. Accordingly, Doré cannot be said to require the automatic application of the rule of repeal by implication.

[53] A noteworthy indicator of Parliament's overall intent is the fact that in subsequent amendments it has not displaced the rule set out in the CCAA. Indeed, as indicated above, the recent amendments to the CCAA in 2005 resulted in the rule previously found in s. 18.3 being renumbered and reformulated as s. 37. Thus, to the extent the interpretation allowing the GST deemed trust to remain effective under the CCAA depends on ETA s. 222(3) having impliedly repealed CCAA s. 18.3(1) because it is later in time, we have come full circle. Parliament has renumbered and reformulated the provision of the CCAA stating that, subject to exceptions for source deductions, deemed trusts do not survive the CCAA proceedings and thus the CCAA is now the later in time statute. This confirms that Parliament's intent with respect to GST deemed trusts is to be found in the CCAA.

[54] I do not agree with my colleague Abella J. that s. 44(f) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, can be used to interpret the 2005 amendments as having no effect. The new statute can hardly be said to be a mere re-enactment of the former statute. Indeed, the CCAA underwent a substantial review in 2005. Notably, acting consistently with its goal of treating both the BIA and the CCAA as sharing the same approach to insolvency, Parliament made parallel amendments to both statutes with respect to corporate proposals. In addition, new provisions were introduced regarding the treatment of contracts, collective agreements, interim financing and governance agreements. The appointment and role of the Monitor was also clarified. Noteworthy are the limits imposed by CCAA s. 11.09 on the court's discretion to make an order staying the Crown's source deductions deemed trusts, which were formerly found in s. 11.4. No mention whatsoever is made of GST deemed trusts (see Summary to S.C. 2005, c. 47). The review went as far as looking at the very expression used to describe the statutory override of deemed trusts. The comments cited by my colleague only emphasize the clear intent of Parliament to maintain its policy that only source deductions deemed trusts survive in CCAA proceedings.

[55] In the case at bar, the legislative context informs the determination of Parliament's legislative intent and supports the conclusion that ETA s. 222(3) was not intended to narrow the scope of the CCAA's override provision. Viewed in its entire context, the conflict between the ETA and the CCAA is more apparent than real. I would therefore not follow the reasoning in Ottawa Senators and affirm that CCAA s. 18.3 remained effective.

[56] My conclusion is reinforced by the purpose of the CCAA as part of Canadian remedial insolvency legislation. As this aspect is particularly relevant to the second issue, I will now discuss how courts have interpreted the scope of their discretionary powers in supervising a CCAA reorganization and how Parliament has largely endorsed this interpretation. Indeed, the interpretation courts have given to the CCAA helps in understanding how the CCAA grew to occupy such a prominent role in Canadian insolvency law.

3.3 Discretionary Power of a Court Supervising a CCAA Reorganization

[57] Courts frequently observe that "[t]he CCAA is skeletal in nature" and does not "contain a comprehensive code that lays out all that is permitted or barred" (Metcalfe & Mansfield Alternative Investments II Corp. (Re), 2008 ONCA 587 (CanLII), 2008 ONCA 587, 92 O.R. (3d) 513, at para. 44, per Blair J.A.). Accordingly, "[t]he history of CCAA law has been an evolution of judicial interpretation" (Dylex Ltd., Re 1995 CanLII 7370 (ON SC), (1995), 31 C.B.R. (3d) 106 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 10, per Farley J.).

[58] CCAA decisions are often based on discretionary grants of jurisdiction. The incremental exercise of judicial discretion in commercial courts under conditions one practitioner aptly describes as "the hothouse of real-time litigation" has been the primary method by which the CCAA has been adapted and has evolved to meet contemporary business and social needs (see Jones, at p. 484).

[59] Judicial discretion must of course be exercised in furtherance of the CCAA's purposes. The remedial purpose I referred to in the historical overview of the Act is recognized over and over again in the jurisprudence. To cite one early example:

The legislation is remedial in the purest sense in that it provides a means whereby the devastating social and economic effects of bankruptcy or creditor initiated termination of ongoing business operations can be avoided while a court-supervised attempt to reorganize the financial affairs of the debtor company is made.

(Elan Corp. v. Comiskey reflex, (1990), 41 O.A.C. 282, at para. 57, per Doherty J.A., dissenting)

[60] Judicial decision making under the CCAA takes many forms. A court must first of all provide the conditions under which the debtor can attempt to reorganize. This can be achieved by staying enforcement actions by creditors to allow the debtor's business to continue, preserving the status quo while the debtor plans the compromise or arrangement to be presented to creditors, and supervising the process and advancing it to the point where it can be determined whether it will succeed (see, e.g., Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Can. 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 84 (C.A.), at pp. 88-89; Pacific National Lease Holding Corp., Re (1992), 19 B.C.A.C. 134, at para. 27). In doing so, the court must often be cognizant of the various interests at stake in the reorganization, which can extend beyond those of the debtor and creditors to include employees, directors, shareholders, and even other parties doing business with the insolvent company (see, e.g., Canadian Airlines Corp., Re, 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), 2000 ABQB 442, 84 Alta. L.R. (3d) 9, at para. 144, per Paperny J. (as she then was); Air Canada, Re 2003 CanLII 64269 (ON SC), (2003), 42 C.B.R. (4th) 173 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 3; Air Canada, Re, 2003 CanLII 49366 (ON SC), 2003 CanLII 49366 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 13, per Farley J.; Sarra, Creditor Rights, at pp. 181-92 and 217-26). In addition, courts must recognize that on occasion the broader public interest will be engaged by aspects of the reorganization and may be a factor against which the decision of whether to allow a particular action will be weighed (see, e.g., Canadian Red Cross Society/Société Canadienne de la Croix Rouge, Re 2000 CanLII 22488 (ON SC), (2000), 19 C.B.R. (4th) 158 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 2, per Blair J. (as he then was); Sarra, Creditor Rights, at pp. 195-214).

[61] When large companies encounter difficulty, reorganizations become increasingly complex. CCAA courts have been called upon to innovate accordingly in exercising their jurisdiction beyond merely staying proceedings against the debtor to allow breathing room for reorganization. They have been asked to sanction measures for which there is no explicit authority in the CCAA. Without exhaustively cataloguing the various measures taken under the authority of the CCAA, it is useful to refer briefly to a few examples to illustrate the flexibility the statute affords supervising courts.

[62] Perhaps the most creative use of CCAA authority has been the increasing willingness of courts to authorize post-filing security for debtor in possession financing or super-priority charges on the debtor's assets when necessary for the continuation of the debtor's business during the reorganization (see, e.g., Skydome Corp., Re reflex, (1998), 16 C.B.R. (4th) 118 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)); United Used Auto & Truck Parts Ltd., Re, 2000 BCCA 146 (CanLII), 2000 BCCA 146, 135 B.C.A.C. 96, aff'g 1999 CanLII 5374 (BC SC), (1999), 12 C.B.R. (4th) 144 (S.C.); and generally, J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2007), at pp. 93-115). The CCAA has also been used to release claims against third parties as part of approving a comprehensive plan of arrangement and compromise, even over the objections of some dissenting creditors (see Metcalfe & Mansfield). As well, the appointment of a Monitor to oversee the reorganization was originally a measure taken pursuant to the CCAA's supervisory authority; Parliament responded, making the mechanism mandatory by legislative amendment.

[63] Judicial innovation during CCAA proceedings has not been without controversy. At least two questions it raises are directly relevant to the case at bar: (1) What are the sources of a court's authority during CCAA proceedings? (2) What are the limits of this authority?

[64] The first question concerns the boundary between a court's statutory authority under the CCAA and a court's residual authority under its inherent and equitable jurisdiction when supervising a reorganization. In authorizing measures during CCAA proceedings, courts have on occasion purported to rely upon their equitable jurisdiction to advance the purposes of the Act or their inherent jurisdiction to fill gaps in the statute. Recent appellate decisions have counselled against purporting to rely on inherent jurisdiction, holding that the better view is that courts are in most cases simply construing the authority supplied by the CCAA itself (see, e.g., Skeena Cellulose Inc., Re, 2003 BCCA 344 (CanLII), 2003 BCCA 344, 13 B.C.L.R. (4th) 236, at paras. 45-47, per Newbury J.A.; Stelco Inc. (Re) 2005 CanLII 8671 (ON CA), (2005), 75 O.R. (3d) 5 (C.A.), at paras. 31-33, per Blair J.A.).

[65] I agree with Justice Georgina R. Jackson and Professor Janis Sarra that the most appropriate approach is a hierarchical one in which courts rely first on an interpretation of the provisions of the CCAA text before turning to inherent or equitable jurisdiction to anchor measures taken in a CCAA proceeding (see G. R. Jackson and J. Sarra, "Selecting the Judicial Tool to get the Job Done: An Examination of Statutory Interpretation, Discretionary Power and Inherent Jurisdiction in Insolvency Matters", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2007 (2008), 41, at p. 42). The authors conclude that when given an appropriately purposive and liberal interpretation, the CCAA will be sufficient in most instances to ground measures necessary to achieve its objectives (p. 94).

[66] Having examined the pertinent parts of the CCAA and the recent history of the legislation, I accept that in most instances the issuance of an order during CCAA proceedings should be considered an exercise in statutory interpretation. Particularly noteworthy in this regard is the expansive interpretation the language of the statute at issue is capable of supporting.

[67] The initial grant of authority under the CCAA empowered a court "where an application is made under this Act in respect of a company . . . on the application of any person interested in the matter, . . . subject to this Act, [to] make an order under this section" (CCAA, s. 11(1)). The plain language of the statute was very broad.

[68] In this regard, though not strictly applicable to the case at bar, I note that Parliament has in recent amendments changed the wording contained in s. 11(1), making explicit the discretionary authority of the court under the CCAA. Thus, in s. 11 of the CCAA as currently enacted, a court may, "subject to the restrictions set out in this Act, . . . make any order that it considers appropriate in the circumstances" (S.C. 2005, c. 47, s. 128). Parliament appears to have endorsed the broad reading of CCAA authority developed by the jurisprudence.

[69] The CCAA also explicitly provides for certain orders. Both an order made on an initial application and an order on subsequent applications may stay, restrain, or prohibit existing or new proceedings against the debtor. The burden is on the applicant to satisfy the court that the order is appropriate in the circumstances and that the applicant has been acting in good faith and with due diligence (CCAA, ss. 11(3), (4) and (6)).

[70] The general language of the CCAA should not be read as being restricted by the availability of more specific orders. However, the requirements of appropriateness, good faith, and due diligence are baseline considerations that a court should always bear in mind when exercising CCAA authority. Appropriateness under the CCAA is assessed by inquiring whether the order sought advances the policy objectives underlying the CCAA. The question is whether the order will usefully further efforts to achieve the remedial purpose of the CCAA — avoiding the social and economic losses resulting from liquidation of an insolvent company. I would add that appropriateness extends not only to the purpose of the order, but also to the means it employs. Courts should be mindful that chances for successful reorganizations are enhanced where participants achieve common ground and all stakeholders are treated as advantageously and fairly as the circumstances permit.

[71] It is well established that efforts to reorganize under the CCAA can be terminated and the stay of proceedings against the debtor lifted if the reorganization is "doomed to failure" (see Chef Ready, at p. 88; Philip's Manufacturing Ltd., Re 1992 CanLII 2174 (BC CA), (1992), 9 C.B.R. (3d) 25 (B.C.C.A.), at paras. 6-7). However, when an order is sought that does realistically advance the CCAA's purposes, the ability to make it is within the discretion of a CCAA court.

[72] The preceding discussion assists in determining whether the court had authority under the CCAA to continue the stay of proceedings against the Crown once it was apparent that reorganization would fail and bankruptcy was the inevitable next step.

[73] In the Court of Appeal, Tysoe J.A. held that no authority existed under the CCAA to continue staying the Crown's enforcement of the GST deemed trust once efforts at reorganization had come to an end. The appellant submits that in so holding, Tysoe J.A. failed to consider the underlying purpose of the CCAA and give the statute an appropriately purposive and liberal interpretation under which the order was permissible. The Crown submits that Tysoe

J.A. correctly held that the mandatory language of the ETA gave the court no option but to permit enforcement of the GST deemed trust when lifting the CCAA stay to permit the debtor to make an assignment under the BIA. Whether the ETA has a mandatory effect in the context of a CCAA proceeding has already been discussed. I will now address the question of whether the order was authorized by the CCAA.

[74] It is beyond dispute that the CCAA imposes no explicit temporal limitations upon proceedings commenced under the Act that would prohibit ordering a continuation of the stay of the Crown's GST claims while lifting the general stay of proceedings temporarily to allow the debtor to make an assignment in bankruptcy.

[75] The question remains whether the order advanced the underlying purpose of the CCAA. The Court of Appeal held that it did not because the reorganization efforts had come to an end and the CCAA was accordingly spent. I disagree.

[76] There is no doubt that had reorganization been commenced under the BIA instead of the CCAA, the Crown's deemed trust priority for the GST funds would have been lost. Similarly, the Crown does not dispute that under the scheme of distribution in bankruptcy under the BIA the deemed trust for GST ceases to have effect. Thus, after reorganization under the CCAA failed, creditors would have had a strong incentive to seek immediate bankruptcy and distribution of the debtor's assets under the BIA. In order to conclude that the discretion does not extend to partially lifting the stay in order to allow for an assignment in bankruptcy, one would have to assume a gap between the CCAA and the BIA proceedings. Brenner C.J.S.C.'s order staying Crown enforcement of the GST claim ensured that creditors would not be disadvantaged by the attempted reorganization under the CCAA. The effect of his order was to blunt any impulse of creditors to interfere in an orderly liquidation. His order was thus in furtherance of the CCAA's objectives to the extent that it allowed a bridge between the CCAA and BIA proceedings. This interpretation of the tribunal's discretionary power is buttressed by s. 20 of the CCAA. That section provides that the CCAA "may be applied together with the provisions of any Act of Parliament . . . that authorizes or makes provision for the sanction of compromises or arrangements between a company and its shareholders or any class of them", such as the BIA. Section 20 clearly indicates the intention of Parliament for the CCAA to operate in tandem with other insolvency legislation, such as the BIA.

[77] The CCAA creates conditions for preserving the status quo while attempts are made to find common ground amongst stakeholders for a reorganization that is fair to all. Because the alternative to reorganization is often bankruptcy, participants will measure the impact of a reorganization against the position they would enjoy in liquidation. In the case at bar, the order fostered a harmonious transition between reorganization and liquidation while meeting the objective of a single collective proceeding that is common to both statutes.

[78] Tysoe J.A. therefore erred in my view by treating the CCAA and the BIA as distinct regimes subject to a temporal gap between the two, rather than as forming part of an integrated body of insolvency law. Parliament's decision to maintain two statutory schemes for reorganization, the BIA and the CCAA, reflects the reality that reorganizations of differing complexity require different legal mechanisms. By contrast, only one statutory scheme has been found to be needed to liquidate a bankrupt debtor's estate. The transition from the CCAA to the BIA may require the partial lifting of a stay of proceedings under the CCAA to allow commencement of the BIA proceedings. However, as Laskin J.A. for the Ontario Court of Appeal noted in a similar competition between secured creditors and the Ontario Superintendent of Financial Services seeking to enforce a deemed trust, "[t]he two statutes are related" and no "gap" exists between the two statutes which would allow the enforcement of property interests at the conclusion of CCAA proceedings that would be lost in bankruptcy (Ivaco Inc. (Re) 2006 CanLII 34551 (ON CA), (2006), 83 O.R. (3d) 108, at paras. 62-63).

[79] The Crown's priority in claims pursuant to source deductions deemed trusts does not undermine this conclusion. Source deductions deemed trusts survive under both the CCAA and the BIA. Accordingly, creditors' incentives to prefer one Act over another will not be affected. While a court has a broad discretion to stay source deductions deemed trusts in the CCAA context, this discretion is nevertheless subject to specific limitations applicable only to source deductions deemed trusts (CCAA, s. 11.4). Thus, if CCAA reorganization fails (e.g., either the creditors or the court refuse a proposed reorganization), the Crown can immediately assert its claim in unremitted source deductions. But this should not be understood to affect a seamless transition into bankruptcy or create any "gap" between the CCAA and the BIA for the simple reason that, regardless of what statute the reorganization had been commenced under, creditors' claims in both instances would have been subject to the priority of the Crown's source deductions deemed trust.

[80] Source deductions deemed trusts aside, the comprehensive and exhaustive mechanism under the BIA must control the distribution of the debtor's assets once liquidation is inevitable. Indeed, an orderly transition to liquidation is mandatory under the BIA where a proposal is rejected by creditors. The CCAA is silent on the transition into liquidation but the breadth of the court's discretion under the Act is sufficient to construct a bridge to liquidation under the BIA. The court must do so in a manner that does not subvert the scheme of distribution under the BIA. Transition to liquidation requires partially lifting the CCAA stay to commence proceedings under the BIA. This necessary partial lifting of the stay should not trigger a race to the courthouse in an effort to obtain priority unavailable under the BIA.

[81] I therefore conclude that Brenner C.J.S.C. had the authority under the CCAA to lift the stay to allow entry into liquidation.

3.4 Express Trust

[82] The last issue in this case is whether Brenner C.J.S.C. created an express trust in favour of the Crown when he ordered on April 29, 2008, that proceeds from the sale of LeRoy Trucking's assets equal to the amount of unremitted GST be held back in the Monitor's trust account until the results of the reorganization were known. Tysoe J.A. in the Court of Appeal concluded as an alternative ground for allowing the Crown's appeal that it was the beneficiary of an express trust. I disagree.

[83] Creation of an express trust requires the presence of three certainties: intention, subject matter, and object. Express or "true trusts" arise from the acts and intentions of the settlor and are distinguishable from other trusts arising by operation of law (see D. W. M. Waters, M. R. Gillen and L. D. Smith, eds., Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada (3rd ed. 2005), at pp. 28-29, especially fn. 42).

[84] Here, there is no certainty to the object (i.e. the beneficiary) inferrable from the court's order of April 29, 2008 sufficient to support an express trust.

[85] At the time of the order, there was a dispute between Century Services and the Crown over part of the proceeds from the sale of the debtor's assets. The court's solution was to accept LeRoy Trucking's proposal to segregate those monies until that dispute could be resolved. Thus, there was no certainty that the Crown would actually be the beneficiary, or object, of the trust.

[86] The fact that the location chosen to segregate those monies was the Monitor's trust account has no independent effect such that it would overcome the lack of a clear beneficiary. In any event, under the interpretation of CCAA s. 18.3(1) established above, no such priority dispute would even arise because the Crown's deemed trust priority over GST claims would be lost under the CCAA and the Crown would rank as an unsecured creditor for this amount. However, Brenner C.J.S.C. may well have been proceeding on the basis that, in accordance with Ottawa Senators, the Crown's GST claim would remain effective if reorganization was successful, which would not be the case if transition to the liquidation process of the BIA was allowed. An amount equivalent to that claim would accordingly be set aside pending the outcome of reorganization.

[87] Thus, uncertainty surrounding the outcome of the CCAA restructuring eliminates the existence of any certainty to permanently vest in the Crown a beneficial interest in the funds. That much is clear from the oral reasons of Brenner C.J.S.C. on April 29, 2008, when he said: "Given the fact that [CCAA proceedings] are known to fail and filings in bankruptcy result, it seems to me that maintaining the status quo in the case at bar supports the proposal to have the monitor hold these funds in trust." Exactly who might take the money in the final result was therefore evidently in doubt. Brenner C.J.S.C.'s subsequent order of September 3, 2008 denying the Crown's application to enforce the trust once it was clear that bankruptcy was inevitable, confirms the absence of a clear beneficiary required to ground an express trust.

4. Conclusion

[88] I conclude that Brenner C.J.S.C. had the discretion under the CCAA to continue the stay of the Crown's claim for enforcement of the GST deemed trust while otherwise lifting it to permit LeRoy Trucking to make an assignment in bankruptcy. My conclusion that s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA nullified the GST deemed trust while proceedings under that Act were pending confirms that the discretionary jurisdiction under s. 11 utilized by the court was not limited by the Crown's asserted GST priority, because there is no such priority under the CCAA.

[89] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and declare that the $305,202.30 collected by LeRoy Trucking in respect of GST but not yet remitted to the Receiver General of Canada is not subject to deemed trust or priority in favour of the Crown. Nor is this amount subject to an express trust. Costs are awarded for this appeal and the appeal in the court below.

The following are the reasons delivered by

I

[90] I am in general agreement with the reasons of Justice Deschamps and would dispose of the appeal as she suggests.

[91] More particularly, I share my colleague's interpretation of the scope of the judge's discretion under s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). And I share my colleague's conclusion that Brenner C.J.S.C. did not create an express trust in favour of the Crown when he segregated GST funds into the Monitor's trust account 2008 BCSC 1805 (CanLII), (2008 BCSC 1805, [2008] G.S.T.C. 221).

[92] I nonetheless feel bound to add brief reasons of my own regarding the interaction between the CCAA and the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 ("ETA").

[93] In upholding deemed trusts created by the ETA notwithstanding insolvency proceedings, Ottawa Senators Hockey Club Corp. (Re) 2005 CanLII 21 (ON CA), (2005), 73 O.R. (3d) 737 (C.A.), and its progeny have been unduly protective of Crown interests which Parliament itself has chosen to subordinate to competing prioritized claims. In my respectful view, a clearly marked departure from that jurisprudential approach is warranted in this case.

[94] Justice Deschamps develops important historical and policy reasons in support of this position and I have nothing to add in that regard. I do wish, however, to explain why a comparative analysis of related statutory provisions adds support to our shared conclusion.

[95] Parliament has in recent years given detailed consideration to the Canadian insolvency scheme. It has declined to amend the provisions at issue in this case. Ours is not to wonder why, but rather to treat Parliament's preservation of the relevant provisions as a deliberate exercise of the legislative discretion that is Parliament's alone. With respect, I reject any suggestion that we should instead characterize the apparent conflict between s. 18.3(1) (now s. 37(1)) of the CCAA and s. 222 of the ETA as a drafting anomaly or statutory lacuna properly subject to judicial correction or repair.

II

[96] In the context of the Canadian insolvency regime, a deemed trust will be found to exist only where two complementary elements co-exist: first, a statutory provision creating the trust; and second, a CCAA or Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA") provision confirming — or explicitly preserving — its effective operation.

[97] This interpretation is reflected in three federal statutes. Each contains a deemed trust provision framed in terms strikingly similar to the wording of s. 222 of the ETA.

[98] The first is the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) ("ITA"), where s. 227(4) creates a deemed trust:

(4) Every person who deducts or withholds an amount under this Act is deemed, notwithstanding any security interest (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) in the amount so deducted or withheld, to hold the amount separate and apart from the property of the person and from property held by any secured creditor (as defined in subsection 224(1.3)) of that person that but for the security interest would be property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty and for payment to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act. [Here and below, the emphasis is of course my own.]

[99] In the next subsection, Parliament has taken care to make clear that this trust is unaffected by federal or provincial legislation to the contrary:

(4.1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (except sections 81.1 and 81.2 of that Act), any other enactment of Canada, any enactment of a province or any other law, where at any time an amount deemed by subsection 227(4) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not paid to Her Majesty in the manner and at the time provided under this Act, property of the person . . . equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust is deemed

(a) to be held, from the time the amount was deducted or withheld by the person, separate and apart from the property of the person, in trust for Her Majesty whether or not the property is subject to such a security interest, . . .

. . . and the proceeds of such property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all such security interests.

[100] The continued operation of this deemed trust is expressly confirmed in s. 18.3 of the CCAA:

18.3 (1) Subject to subsection (2), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsection 86(2) or (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act . . . .

[101] The operation of the ITA deemed trust is also confirmed in s. 67 of the BIA:

(2) Subject to subsection (3), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a bankrupt shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty for the purpose of paragraph (1)(a) unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

(3) Subsection (2) does not apply in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsection 86(2) or (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act . . . .

[102] Thus, Parliament has first created and then confirmed the continued operation of the Crown's ITA deemed trust under both the CCAA and the BIA regimes.

Digitized by Google

[103] The second federal statute for which this scheme holds true is the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-8 ("CPP"). At s. 23, Parliament creates a deemed trust in favour of the Crown and specifies that it exists despite all contrary provisions in any other Canadian statute. Finally, and in almost identical terms, the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23 ("EIA"), creates a deemed trust in favour of the Crown: see ss. 86(2) and (2.1).

[104] As we have seen, the survival of the deemed trusts created under these provisions of the ITA, the CPP and the EIA is confirmed in s. 18.3(2) of the CCAA and in s. 67(3) of the BIA. In all three cases, Parliament's intent to enforce the Crown's deemed trust through insolvency proceedings is expressed in clear and unmistakable terms.

[105] The same is not true with regard to the deemed trust created under the ETA. Although Parliament creates a deemed trust in favour of the Crown to hold unremitted GST monies, and although it purports to maintain this trust notwithstanding any contrary federal or provincial legislation, it does not confirm the trust — or expressly provide for its continued operation — in either the BIA or the CCAA. The second of the two mandatory elements I have mentioned is thus absent reflecting Parliament's intention to allow the deemed trust to lapse with the commencement of insolvency proceedings.

[106] The language of the relevant ETA provisions is identical in substance to that of the ITA, CPP, and EIA provisions:

222. (1) Subject to subsection (1.1), every person who collects an amount as or on account of tax under Division II is deemed, for all purposes and despite any security interest in the amount, to hold the amount in trust for Her Majesty in right of Canada, separate and apart from the property of the person and from property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, until the amount is remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn under subsection (2).

(3) Despite any other provision of this Act (except subsection (4)), any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), any enactment of a province or any other law, if at any time an amount deemed by subsection (1) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn in the manner and at the time provided under this Part, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust, is deemed

(a) to be held, from the time the amount was collected by the person, in trust for Her Majesty, separate and apart from the property of the person, whether or not the property is subject to a security interest, . . .

. . . and the proceeds of the property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all security interests.

[107] Yet no provision of the CCAA provides for the continuation of this deemed trust after the CCAA is brought into play.

[108] In short, Parliament has imposed two explicit conditions, or "building blocks", for survival under the CCAA of deemed trusts created by the ITA, CPP, and EIA. Had Parliament intended to likewise preserve under the CCAA deemed trusts created by the ETA, it would have included in the CCAA the sort of confirmatory provision that explicitly preserves other deemed trusts.

[109] With respect, unlike Tysoe J.A., I do not find it "inconceivable that Parliament would specifically identify the BIA as an exception when enacting the current version of s. 222(3) of the ETA without considering the CCAA as a possible second exception" 2009 BCCA 205 (CanLII), (2009 BCCA 205, 98 B.C.L.R. (4th) 242, at para. 37). All of the deemed trust provisions excerpted above make explicit reference to the BIA. Section 222 of the ETA does not break the pattern. Given the near-identical wording of the four deemed trust provisions, it would have been surprising indeed had Parliament not addressed the BIA at all in the ETA.

[110] Parliament's evident intent was to render GST deemed trusts inoperative upon the institution of insolvency proceedings. Accordingly, s. 222 mentions the BIA so as to exclude it from its ambit — rather than to include it, as do the ITA, the CPP, and the EIA.

[111] Conversely, I note that none of these statutes mentions the CCAA expressly. Their specific reference to the BIA has no bearing on their interaction with the CCAA. Again, it is the confirmatory provisions in the insolvency statutes that determine whether a given deemed trust will subsist during insolvency proceedings.

[112] Finally, I believe that chambers judges should not segregate GST monies into the Monitor's trust account during CCAA proceedings, as was done in this case. The result of Justice Deschamps's reasoning is that GST claims become unsecured under the CCAA. Parliament has deliberately chosen to nullify certain Crown super-priorities during insolvency; this is one such instance.

[113] For these reasons, like Justice Deschamps, I would allow the appeal with costs in this Court and in the courts below and order that the $305,202.30 collected by LeRoy Trucking in respect of GST but not yet remitted to the Receiver General of Canada be subject to no deemed trust or priority in favour of the Crown.

[115] Section 11[1] of the CCAA stated:

11. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Winding-up Act, where an application is made under this Act in respect of a company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, subject to this Act, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit, make an order under this section.

To decide the scope of the court's discretion under s. 11, it is necessary to first determine the priority issue. Section 222(3), the provision of the ETA at issue in this case, states:

(3) Despite any other provision of this Act (except subsection (4)), any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), any enactment of a province or any other law, if at any time an amount deemed by subsection (1) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn in the manner and at the time provided under this Part, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust, is deemed

(a) to be held, from the time the amount was collected by the person, in trust for Her Majesty, separate and apart from the property of the person, whether or not the property is subject to a security interest, and

(b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was collected, whether or not the property has in fact been kept separate and apart from the estate or property of the person and whether or not the property is subject to a security interest and is property beneficially owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada despite any security interest in the property or in the proceeds thereof and the proceeds of the property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all security interests.

[116] Century Services argued that the CCAA's general override provision, s. 18.3(1), prevailed, and that the deeming provisions in s. 222 of the ETA were, accordingly, inapplicable during CCAA proceedings. Section 18.3(1) states:

18.3 (1) . . . [N]otwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

[117] As MacPherson J.A. correctly observed in Ottawa Senators Hockey Club Corp. (Re) 2005 CanLII 21 (ON CA), (2005), 73 O.R. (3d) 737 (C.A.), s. 222(3) of the ETA is in "clear conflict" with s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA (para. 31). Resolving the conflict between the two provisions is, essentially, what seems to me to be a relatively uncomplicated exercise in statutory interpretation: Does the language reflect a clear legislative intention? In my view it does. The deemed trust provision, s. 222(3) of the ETA, has unambiguous language stating that it operates notwithstanding any law except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA").

[118] By expressly excluding only one statute from its legislative grasp, and by unequivocally stating that it applies despite any other law anywhere in Canada except the BIA, s. 222(3) has defined its boundaries in the clearest possible terms. I am in complete agreement with the following comments of MacPherson J.A. in Ottawa Senators:

The legislative intent of s. 222(3) of the ETA is clear. If there is a conflict with "any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act)", s. 222(3) prevails. In these words Parliament did two things: it decided that s. 222(3) should trump all other federal laws and, importantly, it addressed the topic of exceptions to its trumping decision and identified a single exception, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act . . . . The BIA and the CCAA are closely related federal statutes. I cannot conceive that Parliament would specifically identify the BIA as an exception, but accidentally fail to consider the CCAA as a possible second exception. In my view, the omission of the CCAA from s. 222(3) of the ETA was almost certainly a considered omission. [para. 43]

[119] MacPherson J.A.'s view that the failure to exempt the CCAA from the operation of the ETA is a reflection of a clear legislative intention, is borne out by how the CCAA was subsequently changed after s. 18.3(1) was enacted in 1997. In 2000, when s. 222(3) of the ETA came into force, amendments were also introduced to the CCAA. Section 18.3(1) was not amended.

[120] The failure to amend s. 18.3(1) is notable because its effect was to protect the legislative status quo, notwithstanding repeated requests from various constituencies that s. 18.3(1) be amended to make the priorities in the CCAA consistent with those in the BIA. In 2002, for example, when Industry Canada conducted a review of the BIA and the CCAA, the Insolvency Institute of Canada and the Canadian Association of Insolvency and Restructuring Professionals recommended that the priority regime under the BIA be extended to the CCAA (Joint Task Force on Business Insolvency Law Reform, Report (March 15, 2002), Sch. B, proposal 71). The same recommendations were made by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in its 2003 report, Debtors and Creditors Sharing the Burden: A Review of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; by the Legislative Review Task Force (Commercial) of the Insolvency Institute of Canada and the Canadian Association of Insolvency and Restructuring Professionals in its 2005 Report on the Commercial Provisions of Bill C-55; and in 2007 by the Insolvency Institute of Canada in a submission to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce commenting on reforms then under consideration.

[121] Yet the BIA remains the only exempted statute under s. 222(3) of the ETA. Even after the 2005 decision in Ottawa Senators which confirmed that the ETA took precedence over the CCAA, there was no responsive legislative revision. I see this lack of response as relevant in this case, as it was in Tele-Mobile Co. v. Ontario, 2008 SCC 12 (CanLII), 2008 SCC 12, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 305, where this Court stated:

While it cannot be said that legislative silence is necessarily determinative of legislative intention, in this case the silence is Parliament's answer to the consistent urging of Telus and other affected businesses and organizations that there be express language in the legislation to ensure that businesses can be reimbursed for the reasonable costs of complying with evidence-gathering orders. I see the legislative history as reflecting Parliament's intention that compensation not be paid for compliance with production orders. [para. 42]

[122] All this leads to a clear inference of a deliberate legislative choice to protect the deemed trust in s. 222(3) from the reach of s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA.

[123] Nor do I see any "policy" justification for interfering, through interpretation, with this clarity of legislative intention. I can do no better by way of explaining why I think the policy argument cannot succeed in this case, than to repeat the words of Tysoe J.A. who said:

I do not dispute that there are valid policy reasons for encouraging insolvent companies to attempt to restructure their affairs so that their business can continue with as little disruption to employees and other stakeholders as possible. It is appropriate for the courts to take such policy considerations into account, but only if it is in connection with a matter that has not been considered by Parliament. Here, Parliament must be taken to have weighed policy considerations when it enacted the amendments to the CCAA and ETA described above. As Mr. Justice MacPherson observed at para. 43 of Ottawa Senators, it is inconceivable that Parliament would specifically identify the BIA as an exception when enacting the current version of s. 222(3) of the ETA without considering the CCAA as a possible second exception. I also make the observation that the 1992 set of amendments to the BIA enabled proposals to be binding on secured creditors and, while there is more flexibility under the CCAA, it is possible for an insolvent company to attempt to restructure under the auspices of the BIA. [para. 37]

[124] Despite my view that the clarity of the language in s. 222(3) is dispositive, it is also my view that even the application of other principles of interpretation reinforces this conclusion. In their submissions, the parties raised the following as being particularly relevant: the Crown relied on the principle that the statute which is "later in time" prevails; and Century Services based its argument on the principle that the general provision gives way to the specific (generalia specialibus non derogant).

[125] The "later in time" principle gives priority to a more recent statute, based on the theory that the legislature is presumed to be aware of the content of existing legislation. If a new enactment is inconsistent with a prior one, therefore, the legislature is presumed to have intended to derogate from the earlier provisions (Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th ed. 2008), at pp. 346-47; Pierre-André Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (3rd ed. 2000), at p. 358).

[126] The exception to this presumptive displacement of pre-existing inconsistent legislation, is the generalia specialibus non derogant principle that "[a] more recent, general provision will not be construed as affecting an earlier, special provision" (Côté, at p. 359). Like a Russian Doll, there is also an exception within this exception, namely, that an earlier, specific provision may in fact be "overruled" by a subsequent general statute if the legislature indicates, through its language, an intention that the general provision prevails (Doré v. Verdun (City), 1997 CanLII 315 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 862).

[127] The primary purpose of these interpretive principles is to assist in the performance of the task of determining the intention of the legislature. This was confirmed by MacPherson J.A. in Ottawa Senators, at para. 42:

. . . the overarching rule of statutory interpretation is that statutory provisions should be interpreted to give effect to the intention of the legislature in enacting the law. This primary rule takes precedence over all maxims or canons or aids relating to statutory interpretation, including the maxim that the specific prevails over the general (generalia specialibus non derogant). As expressed by Hudson J. in Canada v. Williams, 1944 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1944] S.C.R. 226, . . . at p. 239 . . . :

The maxim generalia specialibus non derogant is relied on as a rule which should dispose of the question, but the maxim is not a rule of law but a rule of construction and bows to the intention of the legislature, if such intention can reasonably be gathered from all of the relevant legislation.

(See also Côté, at p. 358, and Pierre-Andre Côté, with the collaboration of S. Beaulac and M. Devinat, Interprétation des lois (4th ed. 2009), at para. 1335.)

[128] I accept the Crown's argument that the "later in time" principle is conclusive in this case. Since s. 222(3) of the ETA was enacted in 2000 and s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA was introduced in 1997, s. 222(3) is, on its face, the later provision. This chronological victory can be displaced, as Century Services argues, if it is shown that the more recent provision, s. 222(3) of the ETA, is a general one, in which case the earlier, specific provision, s. 18.3(1), prevails (generalia specialibus non derogant). But, as previously explained, the prior specific provision does not take precedence if the subsequent general provision appears to "overrule" it. This, it seems to me, is precisely what s. 222(3) achieves through the use of language stating that it prevails despite any law of Canada, of a province, or "any other law" other than the BIA. Section 18.3(1) of the CCAA is thereby rendered inoperative for purposes of s. 222(3).

[129] It is true that when the CCAA was amended in 2005,[2] s. 18.3(1) was re-enacted as s. 37(1) (S.C. 2005, c. 47, s. 131). Deschamps J. suggests that this makes s. 37(1) the new, "later in time" provision. With respect, her observation is refuted by the operation of s. 44(f) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, which expressly deals with the (non) effect of re-enacting, without significant substantive changes, a repealed provision (see Attorney General of Canada v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, [1977] 2 F.C. 663, dealing with the predecessor provision to s. 44(f)). It directs that new enactments not be construed as "new law" unless they differ in substance from the repealed provision:

44. Where an enactment, in this section called the "former enactment", is repealed and another enactment, in this section called the "new enactment", is substituted therefor,

(f) except to the extent that the provisions of the new enactment are not in substance the same as those of the former enactment, the new enactment shall not be held to operate as new law, but shall be construed and have effect as a consolidation and as declaratory of the law as contained in the former enactment;

Section 2 of the Interpretation Act defines an "enactment" as "an Act or regulation or any portion of an Act or regulation".

[130] Section 37(1) of the current CCAA is almost identical to s. 18.3(1). These provisions are set out for ease of comparison, with the differences between them underlined:

37. (1) Subject to subsection (2), despite any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as being held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

18.3 (1) Subject to subsection (2), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

[131] The application of s. 44(f) of the Interpretation Act simply confirms the government's clearly expressed intent, found in Industry Canada's clause-by-clause review of Bill C-55, where s. 37(1) was identified as "a technical amendment to re-order the provisions of this Act". During second reading, the Hon. Bill Rompkey, then the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, confirmed that s. 37(1) represented only a technical change:

On a technical note relating to the treatment of deemed trusts for taxes, the bill [sic] makes no changes to the underlying policy intent, despite the fact that in the case of a restructuring under the CCAA, sections of the act [sic] were repealed and substituted with renumbered versions due to the extensive reworking of the CCAA.

[132] Had the substance of s. 18.3(1) altered in any material way when it was replaced by s. 37(1), I would share Deschamps J.'s view that it should be considered a new provision. But since s. 18.3(1) and s. 37(1) are the same in substance, the transformation of s. 18.3(1) into s. 37(1) has no effect on the interpretive queue, and s. 222(3) of the ETA remains the "later in time" provision (Sullivan, at p. 347).

[133] This means that the deemed trust provision in s. 222(3) of the ETA takes precedence over s. 18.3(1) during CCAA proceedings. The question then is how that priority affects the discretion of a court under s. 11 of the CCAA.

[134] While s. 11 gives a court discretion to make orders notwithstanding the BIA and the Winding-up Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11, that discretion is not liberated from the operation of any other federal statute. Any exercise of discretion is therefore circumscribed by whatever limits are imposed by statutes other than the BIA and the Winding-up Act. That includes the ETA. The chambers judge in this case was, therefore, required to respect the priority regime set out in s. 222(3) of the ETA. Neither s. 18.3(1) nor s. 11 of the CCAA gave him the authority to ignore it. He could not, as a result, deny the Crown's request for payment of the GST funds during the CCAA proceedings.

APPENDIX

Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (as at December 13, 2007)

11. (1) [Powers of court] Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Winding-up Act, where an application is made under this Act in respect of a company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, subject to this Act, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit, make an order under this section.

(3) [Initial application court orders] A court may, on an initial application in respect of a company, make an order on such terms as it may impose, effective for such period as the court deems necessary not exceeding thirty days,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under an Act referred to in subsection (1);

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company; and

(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of or proceeding with any other action, suit or proceeding against the company.

(4) [Other than initial application court orders] A court may, on an application in respect of a company other than an initial application, make an order on such terms as it may impose,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, for such period as the court deems necessary, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under an Act referred to in subsection (1);

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company; and

(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of or proceeding with any other action, suit or proceeding against the company.

(6) [Burden of proof on application] The court shall not make an order under subsection (3) or (4) unless

(a) the applicant satisfies the court that circumstances exist that make such an order appropriate; and

(b) in the case of an order under subsection (4), the applicant also satisfies the court that the applicant has acted, and is acting, in good faith and with due diligence.

11.4 (1) [Her Majesty affected] An order made under section 11 may provide that

(a) Her Majesty in right of Canada may not exercise rights under subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act or any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, or an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, in respect of the company if the company is a tax debtor under that subsection or provision, for such period as the court considers appropriate but ending not later than

(i) the expiration of the order,

(ii) the refusal of a proposed compromise by the creditors or the court,

(iii) six months following the court sanction of a compromise or arrangement,

(iv) the default by the company on any term of a compromise or arrangement, or

(v) the performance of a compromise or arrangement in respect of the company; and

(b) Her Majesty in right of a province may not exercise rights under any provision of provincial legislation in respect of the company where the company is a debtor under that legislation and the provision has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum

(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or for such period as the court considers appropriate but ending not later than the occurrence or time referred to in whichever of subparagraphs (a)(i) to (v) may apply.

(2) [When order ceases to be in effect] An order referred to in subsection (1) ceases to be in effect if
(a) the company defaults on payment of any amount that becomes due to Her Majesty after the order is made and could be subject to a demand under
(i) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act,
(ii) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, or an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, or
(iii) under any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum
(A) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or
(B) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection; or
(b) any other creditor is or becomes entitled to realize a security on any property that could be claimed by Her Majesty in exercising rights under
(i) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act,
(ii) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, or an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, or
(iii) any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum
(A) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or
(B) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection.
(3) [Operation of similar legislation] An order made under section 11, other than an order referred to in subsection (1) of this section, does not affect the operation of
(a) subsections 224(1.2) and (1.3) of the Income Tax Act,
(b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, or an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, or
(c) any provision of provincial legislation that has a similar purpose to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, where the sum
(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or
and for the purpose of paragraph (c), the provision of provincial legislation is, despite any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act in respect of a sum referred to in subparagraph (c)(i), or as subsection 23(2) of the Canada Pension Plan in respect of a sum referred to in subparagraph (c)(ii), and in respect of any related interest, penalties or other amounts.
18.3 (1) [Deemed trusts] Subject to subsection (2), notwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision.

(2) [Exceptions] Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan or subsection 86(2) or (2.1) of the Employment Insurance Act (each of which is in this subsection referred to as a "federal provision") nor in respect of amounts deemed to be held in trust under any law of a province that creates a deemed trust the sole purpose of which is to ensure remittance to Her Majesty in right of the province of amounts deducted or withheld under a law of the province where

(a) that law of the province imposes a tax similar in nature to the tax imposed under the Income Tax Act and the amounts deducted or withheld under that law of the province are of the same nature as the amounts referred to in subsection 227(4) or (4.1) of the Income Tax Act, or

(b) the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan, that law of the province establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection and the amounts deducted or withheld under that law of the province are of the same nature as amounts referred to in subsection 23(3) or (4) of the Canada Pension Plan, and for the purpose of this subsection, any provision of a law of a province that creates a deemed trust is, notwithstanding any Act of Canada or of a province or any other law, deemed to have the same effect and scope against any creditor, however secured, as the corresponding federal provision.

Introduction

[1] This appeal raises a pure question of law: Does the Landlord's Rights on Bankruptcy Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-5 (LRBA) apply to the determination of a landlord's claim when the debtor tenant has received protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (CCAA).

Facts

[2] The respondent, Remington Development Corporation (Remington) is agent for the landlord of the appellant, Alternative Fuel Systems Inc. (AFS). Remington had two agreements with AFS to lease commercial space in Calgary from August 1, 2000 to January 31, 2016. Finding itself in financial difficulty, AFS petitioned and on April 9, 2003 received the order that it was a company to which the CCAA applies and could file a plan of compromise or arrangement under the CCAA. As part of its restructuring, AFS surrendered the leased premises to Remington in May 2003.

[3] Both Remington and AFS sought a valuation of the landlord's claim and a determination whether, as an unsecured creditor, the claim should form part of the unsecured creditor class in the CCAA. Before the chambers judge, AFS calculated Remington's claim under the LRBA was approximately $96,000 without considering offsets for prepaid rent and other items. On a full accounting, the sum could be further reduced to $15,000. A non-discounted mitigated claim for the unexpired term of the leases would be about $4.2 million, although, as a result of mitigation the largest portion of Remington's claim has now been reduced to $1.1 million while the smaller portion currently remains at $400,000.

[4] The chambers judge held that the LRBA does not automatically apply to limit or quantify the landlord's claim in CCAA proceedings.

Appellant's position

[5] The thrust of the appellant's submission, broadly stated, is that under the CCAA the amount of a landlord's claim in Alberta is the same amount as would be calculated in a bankruptcy. More specifically, the appellant submits that an unbreakable thread connects the CCAA to the LRBA. The thread begins with the plain meaning of s. 12(1) of the CCAA which refers to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (BIA) to define claims under the CCAA. The thread continues to s. 12(2) of the CCAA which provides for a determination of the amount represented by a claim in three different ways. In this appeal, the applicable sub-clause, s. 12(2)(a)(iii) provides that amount is that which might be proven under the BIA. A third link is s. 136 of the BIA which sets a priority for payment to a bankrupt's creditors and specifically, s. 136(f), which includes a landlord for priority payment, but limits the amount which may be claimed by a landlord. The next connection, says the appellant, is s. 146 of the BIA which further provides that in addition to ss. 136 and 73(4) of the BIA, rights of landlords are determined according to the law of the province in which leased premises are situated. In Alberta, that law includes the LRBA which further limits a landlord's rights in bankruptcy. Through this series of statutory provisions, it submits Parliament has provided that the landlord's rights under the CCAA are identical to those under the BIA and thus, under the LRBA.

Relevant legislation

[6] The relevant provision in the CCAA is s. 12 which provides:

> 12. (1) For the purposes of this Act, "claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that, if unsecured, would be a debt provable in bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

(a) the amount of an unsecured claim shall be the amount

(i) in the case of a company in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act,

(ii) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a receiving order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act, or

(iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor; and

(b) the amount of a secured claim shall be the amount, proof of which might be made in respect thereof under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act if the claim were unsecured, but the amount if not admitted by the company shall, in the case of a company subject to pending proceedings under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, be established by proof in the same manner as an unsecured claim under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, as the case may be, and in the case of any other company the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or the creditor.

Admission of claims

(3) Notwithstanding subsection (2), the company may admit the amount of a claim for voting purposes under reserve of the right to contest liability on the claim for other purposes, and nothing in this Act, the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act prevents a secured creditor from voting at a meeting of secured creditors or any class of them in respect of the total amount of a claim as admitted.

[7] The following provisions in the BIA are also relevant:

Scheme of Distribution

Priority of claims

136. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

(f) the landlord for arrears of rent for a period of three months immediately preceding the bankruptcy and accelerated rent for a period not exceeding three months following the bankruptcy if entitled thereto under the lease, but the total amount so payable shall not exceed the realization from the property on the premises under lease, and any payment made on account of accelerated rent shall be credited against the amount payable by the trustee for occupation rent;

...

Application of provincial law to landlords' rights

146. Subject to priority of ranking as provided by section 136 and subject to subsection 73(4), the rights of landlords shall be determined according to the laws of the province in which the leased premises are situated.

[8] The provisions in the LRBA which the appellant submits are relevant are:

Assignment of property

1 A lessee against or by whom a receiving order or assignment is made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) is deemed to have made an assignment of all the lessee's property for the general benefit of the lessee's creditors before the date of the receiving order or assignment.

Payment of rent after assignment

2 As soon as the receiving order or assignment is made

(a) the landlord of the lessee is not afterwards entitled to distrain or realize the rent by distress, and

(b) the trustee in whom the property of the lessee vests under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) shall pay to the landlord in priority to all other debts

Digitized by Google

(i) an amount not exceeding in value the distrainable assets of the lessee and not exceeding 3 months' rent accrued due before the date of the receiving order or assignment, and

Surplus rent

3 The lessee is a debtor to the landlord

(a) for all surplus rent in excess of the 3 months' rent accrued due at the date of the receiving order or assignment, and

(b) for any accelerated rent to which the landlord may be entitled under the lease but not exceeding an amount equal to 3 months' rent.

When landlord unable to claim from lessee

4 Subject to section 3, the landlord has no right to claim as a debt any money due to the landlord from the lessee for any portion of the unexpired term of the lessee's lease.

Analysis

[9] As a pure question of law, the standard of review is correctness. I agree with the Chambers Judge that the LRBA does not apply to limit or quantify the landlord's claim in CCAA proceedings.

[10] I arrive at this conclusion on the basis, first, that the condition precedent set out in the LRBA for its application (and mirrored in its correlative, Part II of the BIA, which deals with Receiving Orders and Assignments) is not satisfied when the debtor is not the subject of a receiving order or an assignment, nor does the LRBA fit within the scheme and intent of the CCAA. Second, the interpretation of s. 12 of the CCAA does not direct the importation of all the provisions of the BIA into the CCAA when determining the amount of the claim. Third and most significantly, the objects of the BIA and CCAA are distinct and each must be interpreted with their respective purposes in mind.

The condition precedent for application of the LRBA

[11] That provincial legislation can deal with a landlord's rights upon the bankruptcy of a tenant if it does not conflict with the BIA (Principal Plaza Leasehold Ltd. v. Principal Group Ltd. (1996), 188 A.R. 187 (Q.B.)) is not in dispute. There is no question that the LRBA properly operates within a bankruptcy context, when the debtor is the subject of either a receiving order or an assignment.

[12] In such a case, s. 136(1)(f) of the BIA confers on the landlord a preferred claim for arrears of rent for a specified period and provincial legislation is called into operation pursuant to s. 146. Consequently the LRBA's provisions are invoked.

[13] The appellant seeks to invoke these provisions when a debtor is not the subject of a receiving order or an assignment, but rather, proposes a plan of arrangement under the CCAA. In my view, the LRBA's provisions are not invoked in such circumstances.

[14] The LRBA sets out the conditions under which the provisions of the Act operate. The triggering condition is that a receiving order or assignment under the BIA be made against or by the lessee. Section 1 describes the effect of a receiving order or assignment into bankruptcy. Section 2 operates "as soon as the receiving order or assignment is made", making it clear that the pre-condition is the receiving order or assignment.

[15] The entire LRBA should be read as relying upon the operation and effect of a receiving order or assignment under the BIA. Sections 3 and 4 of the LRBA, which limit the landlord's debt, must be interpreted as requiring the condition precedent of a receiving order or assignment. Nothing in the wording of the LRBA suggests it applies in the absence of a receiving order or assignment into bankruptcy, and no receiving order or assignment is made while a company attempts to restructure under the CCAA.

Section 12 of the CCAA

[16] The specific sub-clause at issue in this appeal is s. 12(2)(a)(iii), which appears under the heading "Determination of amount of claim". Omitting the irrelevant sub-clauses, it states:

> For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor shall be determined as follows: (a) the amount of an unsecured claim shall be the amount...(iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor.

[17] It is the appellant's position that this sub-clause must be interpreted as mandating the importation of the BIA and LRBA to expressly calculate the amount provable. I reject that interpretation for the three reasons set out below.

Use of the Word "Might" Conveying Discretion

[18] The first basis for my disagreement stems from Parliament's use of the words "might be made" (in sub-clause iii) which per se confers flexibility. This is underscored and reinforced when contrasted with the imperative "has been made" specified in the other two sub-clauses, (i) and (ii). In my view, "might" should be understood as meaning "could", i.e., the claim may be capable of being proven under the BIA.

[19] This interpretation is consistent with a long line of unassailable authorities. In Algoma Steel Corp. v. Royal Bank of Canada reflex, (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 11 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Farley J. held that the word "shall" in s. 12(2) which then stated that "the amount represented by a claim...shall be defined as follows..." should be interpreted as "may" when one appreciates that the debtor companies and all affected stakeholders are entitled to a broad and liberal interpretation of the jurisdiction of the court under the CCAA.

[20] Ten years later, the following statement by Houlden and Morawetz in 2003 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 2002) at 1100 is analogous to the issue before us. Citing In re Parisian Cleaners and Laundry Ltd. v. Blondin (1938), 20 C.B.R. 452 (Que. C.A.), they stated: "The purpose of s. 12(2) [of the CCAA] is to provide a means of determining the amount of a claim, not to incorporate the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act as to what constitutes a preferred or unsecured claim.". (Emphasis added) The same proposition is also supported by Québec (Sous-ministre du revenu) v. Wynden Canada Inc. (1983), 47 C.B.R. (N.S.) 76 (Que. S.C.), and Quebec Steel Products (Industries) Ltd. v. James United Steel Ltd. (1969), 5 D.L.R. (3d) 374 (Ont. H.C.).

[21] In my view, the words "might be made under the BIA" should be understood to mean "could be made". In other words, the claim may be, but must not necessarily be, capable of being proven under the BIA.

Use of the Word "Determined" Conveying "Methodology"

[22] My second disagreement stems from my broader interpretation of the word "determined" as used in the opening sentence of s. 12(2). The interpretation urged upon us by the appellant is that "determined" should be interpreted as meaning "calculated". However, reference to the BIA indicates that use of the term has two meanings: it can mean either a "methodology" or a "calculation", i.e., a formula for calculating a specific amount.

[23] That "determination" is used to mean "methodology" is illustrated by the following example. Section s. 121(1) broadly defines "claims provable" and the subsequent sub-sections add more specificity. Section 121(2) states that the "determination" of whether contingent and unliquidated claims are provable claims and their valuation is in made accordance with s. 135. The term "determination" in s. 121(2) clearly refers to a methodology, since s. 135 does not provide a formula for calculation of the amount, but rather a methodology at s. 135(1.1):

> Claims provable
> 121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.
> Contingent and unliquidated claims
> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.
> Determination of provable claims
> 135(1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[24] When Parliament directed that the claims of unsecured creditors are those that might be proven under the BIA, it did not refer to the quantification or calculation of the amount provable in bankruptcy. In my view, it was intended to define who is included in the scheme of the CCAA, so as to override conflicting common law definitions.

The Dilemma of Which Section of the BIA To Invoke to Calculate Quantum

[25] This interpretation is supported by my third area of disagreement with the appellant. Were one to adopt the appellant's interpretation of sub-clause (iii), i.e., that the amount of the claim must be calculated in accordance with the methodology for calculating such claims under the BIA/LRBA, the issue then raised is: should one apply the method set out in s. 65.2 or that in s. 136, both of which apply to landlords? Each method yields substantially different results.

[26] As a preface, and at the risk of stating the obvious, the BIA governs two types of debtors. Part III, titled "Proposals", is similar to the scheme and object of the CCAA, and is intended to govern those debtors who, with the support their creditors, have a reasonable hope of returning to financial viability. In contrast, Part II, titled "Receiving Orders and Assignments" and its companion section, Part V ("Administration of Estates") govern situations where the debtor has no hope of returning to financial viability, but rather, its assets are vested in a trustee for distribution among the debtors' creditors. These two discrete objects of the BIA are essential to the analysis that follows.

[27] For landlords, the direction in s. 12(1)(a)(iii) of the CCAA cannot be read as requiring the valuation of the amount of the claim as set out in the BIA because the BIA itself provides two different methods and amounts that may be applicable to landlords' claims.

[28] The first is s. 65.2 (in Part III, Proposals), which makes provisions for disclaiming commercial leases. If the disclaimer of the lease is in accordance with the requirements of the section, s. 65.2(4) sets out the amount the landlord may claim as follows:

> Effects of disclaimer
> (4) Where a lease is disclaimed under subsection (1),
> (a) the landlord has no claim for accelerated rent;
> (b) the proposal must indicate whether the landlord may file a proof of claim for the actual losses resulting from the disclaimer, or for an amount equal to the lesser of
> (i) the aggregate of
> (A) the rent provided for in the lease for the first year of the lease following the date on which the disclaimer becomes effective, and
> (B) fifteen percent of the rent for the remainder of the term of the lease after that year, and > (ii) three year's rent; and
> (c) the landlord may file a proof of claim as indicated in the proposal.

[29] Section 65.2 limits a landlord's claim under a proposal and provides for a larger amount than when the debtor is the subject of a receiving order or assignment. This accords with authorities which suggest that proposals must offer creditors some better advantage than a bankruptcy: Re Pateman reflex, (1991), 5 C.B.R. (3d) 115 (Man. Q.B.), Re Sumner Co. (1984) Limited (1987), 64 C.B.R. 219, In Re Allen Theatres Ltd. (1922), 3 C.B.R. 145 (Ont. S.C.).

[30] Section 136 (in Part V) provides a scheme for the distribution of the assets of a bankrupt who is the subject of a receiving order or an assignment under Part II. Landlords are specifically provided for at s. 136(1)(f) as follows:

> Priority of claims
> 136. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:
> (f) the landlord for arrears of rent for a period of three months immediately preceding the bankruptcy and accelerated rent for a period not exceeding three months following the bankruptcy if entitled thereto under the lease, but the total amount so payable shall not exceed the realization from the property on the premises under lease, and any payment made on account of accelerated rent shall be credited against the amount payable by the trustee for occupation rent;

[31] This is the section that the appellant urges upon us as being part of the unbreakable thread. In my view, nothing in the wording of s. 136 assists it's position. On the contrary, the limitation on the amount a landlord may claim in s. 136(f) appears under the heading "priority of claim". As appellant's counsel explained, there is a trade off, the amount which the landlord receives is reduced from the full amount which could be claimed under a lease and in return, the landlord receives a priority position when the proceeds of the bankrupt's property is paid out. Section 136 requires payment of the enumerated claims in full in the order specified before any other unsecured creditor receives payment.

[32] However, there is no scheme for priority payment of claims set out in the CCAA. Thus, the effect on the landlord, were this interpretation accepted, is to compromise the claim not once, but twice, without the benefit of any priority, as noted by the Chambers Judge.

[33] If s. 65.2 were to be applied, it assumes that the proposal provisions, Part III of the BIA, applies to CCAA and not Parts II and V, the bankruptcy provisions. Section 146 of the BIA which allows for the application of provincial law is also included in Part V and its provisions are in reference to s. 136 which sets out distribution in bankruptcy proceedings, not proposals.

[34] If s. 12(2)(a)(iii) of the CCAA requires calculation of an amount in accordance with the BIA, as submitted by the appellant, it would have to stipulate which of ss. 65.2 or 136 is applicable. It does not, providing further support that the BIA does not direct the calculation of the amount of a landlord's claim in a CCAA proceeding or that the CCAA requires s. 136 of the BIA be applied.

[35] During oral argument, the appellant sought to distinguish cases involving Ontario's provincial legislation which is not as restrictive as the Alberta LRBA. But the provincial legislation setting out the rights of landlords in bankruptcy proceedings is irrelevant if ss. 136 and 146 of the BIA do not apply to the CCAA.

[36] There are numerous cases dealing with landlords' claims that have treated the CCAA as an autonomous statute and did not look to s. 12 as directing the use of BIA provisions to determine the amount of the claim. Re Woodward's Limited 1993 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1993), 20 C.B.R. (3d) 74 (B.C.S.C.), is an example of the purposive approach taken by courts under the CCAA in dealing with creditors.

[37] Decisions in Re Agnew Group Inc. unreported February 4, 1994 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 621 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Grafton-Fraser Inc. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1992), 90 D.L.R. (4th) 285 (Ont. Gen. Div.), and Ambro Enterprises Inc. (Re) reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 80 (Ont. Gen. Div.), all treated landlord's claims very differently than the BIA and took a broad approach to the classification and quantification of landlords' claims to facilitate the object and purpose of the CCAA.

[38] The appellant was unable to cite any authority to compel us to a different conclusion. The appellant submits that the Court's decision in Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd. 1999 ABCA 179 (CanLII), (1999), 175 D.L.R. (4th) 703, determined that s. 12(2) provides that an amount of a claim must be that amount as provided for under the BIA. I disagree. The issue in Smoky River (supra) was whether a CCAA judge had the discretion to establish a procedure for resolving a dispute between parties who had agreed by contract to arbitrate their disputes. This required that the dispute fall within the jurisdiction of the CCAA. In other words, the plaintiffs in the dispute had to be considered "creditors" for the purpose of the CCAA. The court's focus was on s. 12(1) of the CCAA, not s. 12(2). This Court looked to the similar wording between the BIA and CCAA referring to "debt provable in bankruptcy" and "claim provable in bankruptcy" to conclude that the plaintiffs, who had a contingent and unliquidated claim, were creditors. Valuation of the amount was not an issue since the claim was contingent and unliquidated. The issue was solely one of the court's discretion to establish a process to resolve the amount of the claim.

[39] The wording in s. 12(2)(a)(iii) is intended to be and must be general. That sub-clause captures all the unsecured claims of a company not subject to a receiving order or assignment or winding up. These unsecured claims include landlords as creditors, but also capture a host of unliquidated and contingent claims, the latter of which would not be defined as creditors at common law. Thus, the phrase "proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act" directs that the various methods within the BIA to determine claims are to be employed to cover the wide range of potential claims. This clause is intended to define who is included in the scheme of the CCAA and override conflicting common law definitions.

[40] Moreover, amendments to both the BIA and CCAA in 1997 and 1998 were intended to harmonize the two pieces of legislation. Changes were made to the BIA to enhance the rights given to landlords, but no change in either legislation amended or introduced provisions to apply the BIA to landlords in CCAA proceedings.

[41] More recently, in November 2003, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce released "Debtors and Creditors Sharing the Burden: A Review of the BIA and the CCAA", a report calling for substantial reform of the federal insolvency statutes (the "Report"). Twenty-two of the Committee's recommendations apply specifically to commercial insolvencies.

[42] A very broad range of stakeholders provided input on virtually all elements of the two Acts. The Committee concluded that [p. 173]: "We believe that the need for flexibility is paramount with the CCAA....". As a consequence, they recommend that the BIA and the CCAA continue to operate as separate statutes.

[43] The Report also considered the existence of contracts, including leases, and how these should be dealt with under the legislation. The Joint Task Force on Business Insolvency Law Reform was of the view that the ability set out in the BIA to disclaim executory contracts including real property leases should apply to all bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings. The Committee's final recommendation was that:

> The BIA and the CCAA be amended to permit disclaimer of executory contracts in existence in the date of commencement of proceedings under the Acts. This disclaimer should apply to all contracts, provided that a number of conditions are met. In particular: the debtor should be obliged to establish inability or serious hardship in restructuring the enterprise without the disclaimer; the co-contracting party should be permitted to file a claim in damages in the restructuring [and other conditions specific to collective agreements].

[44] The Report recognized that the CCAA treats landlords differently than the BIA and harmonization in respect of this difference was recommended. Significantly, no such recommendations were made with respect to implementing a consistent approach for the valuation of a landlord's claim.

Purposes of the BIA and CCAA

[45] Assuming the words are capable of bearing the interpretation urged upon us by the appellant, statutory interpretation requires that s. 12 be read in the context of the scheme, the object, and the intention of Parliament in passing the CCAA and where the CCAA refers to the BIA, regard must also be given to the scheme, object and intention of that Act.

[46] The proper approach to statutory interpretation requires that words be read contextually to give effect to the purpose and intent of the legislation. As the Supreme Court of Canada recently stated in Harvard College v. Canada (Commissioner of Patents), 2002 SCC 76 (CanLII), [2002] 4 S.C.R. 45 at para. 154, "This Court has on many occasions expressed the view that statutory interpretation cannot be based on the wording of the legislation alone (Rizzo& Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27)". When interpreting specific provisions, a court must pay sufficient attention to the scheme of an act, its objects or the intention of the legislature.

[47] The BIA is a comprehensive legislative scheme largely designed to facilitate the orderly liquidation of the estate of a bankrupt. The purposes of the Act include conducting the liquidation in a manner that maximizes recovery for the general benefit of the creditors, treating similarly situated creditors fairly and in accordance with the Act. The Act sets out priorities and a detailed process, making the BIA a logical choice when the only possible outcome is dissolution. It provides a high degree of certainty for all creditors.

[48] The CCAA is a very brief piece of legislation with a purpose described in Elan Corp. v. Comiskey reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289 (C.A.) as follows:

> The legislation is remedial in the purest sense in that it provides a means whereby devastating, social and economic effects of bankruptcy or creditor–initiated detriments of ongoing business operations can be avoided while court-supervised attempt to reorganize the financial affairs of the debtor is made.

[49] The very brevity of the Act and the fact that it is silent on details permits a wide and liberal construction to enable the Act to serve its remedial purpose: Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Canada, 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), [1991] 2 W.W.R. 136 (B.C.C.A.).

[50] The role of the CCAA is unique. It affords the debtor company an opportunity to restructure its affairs in a manner that will permit it to continue as a going concern without intervention by creditors which might hamper or prevent the restructuring process. Its ultimate goal is to avoid bankruptcy, thereby maximizing creditor compensation, reducing the inevitable loss of employment precipitated by bankruptcy and, if successful, offering the prospect of shareholder equity. The debtor remains in possession and control of the company under the supervision of a court appointed monitor. See for example, Re Canadian Airlines Corp., 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), [2000] 10 W.W.R. 269, 2000 ABQB 442, leave denied, 2000 ABCA 238 (CanLII), [2000] 10 W.W.R. 314, 2000 ABCA 238, leave denied [2001] S.C.C.A. No. 60; Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Insurance Co. of Canada, 1989 CanLII 2672 (BC CA), [1989] 3 W.W.R. 363 (B.C.C.A.).

[51] The decision to seek protection under the CCAA is that of the debtor. There are numerous considerations in choosing the CCAA as opposed to utilizing the proposal provisions of the BIA, however, one significant factor is the high degree of flexibility the CCAA offers in terms of plan fundamentals and process. The BIA is highly rule driven with clearly defined standards and processes for developing a proposal. Thus, the debtor company under CCAA has far broader latitude within which to propose a plan capable of winning creditor support.

[52] A company which invokes the CCAA process retains a great deal of control over it. Under the CCAA claims process, the company, not the monitor, initially accepts or rejects claims. Section 12(2)(a)(iii) states, "if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor".

[53] Section 12(2)(a)(iii) permits different treatment of different claims. The company can admit a claim, or refer it to a court to determine by summary application or trial. In recent cases, recognizing the need for expedited valuation of claims to facilitate the process, the courts have begun appointing a claims officer to make this determination.

[54] Rehabilitation of a company under the CCAA is furthered by a climate that allows for commercial realities and variables to be considered and negotiated among and by the affected parties. The debtor company, through the operation of the stay, is given the breathing room to explore alternatives and to structure a proposed plan that will find favour with creditors, sufficient to support the restructuring.

[55] To maximize flexibility, it is unwise and unnecessary to incorporate, by oblique reference, portions of the BIA or the LRBA that may not assist the process. What the CCAA requires is that the end result, the plan of arrangement, be fair and reasonable. Only when those conditions are met, will a plan of arrangement be approved by a court. What constitutes fairness is largely determined by the circumstances of each case. An important measure of fairness is the degree to which creditors approve it. Creditor support can create an inference that assenting creditors see the plan as viable and commercially reasonable given other available alternatives. The courts generally accept the view that the creditors are in a better position to determine whether the plan is in their own best interests.

The implications of incorporating all BIA provisions into the CCAA

[56] If the appellant's interpretation of s. 12 of the CCAA is accepted, such an interpretation would not be limited to claims by landlords but would include all other unsecured creditors who fall within the provisions of the BIA. At minimum, tax claimants, employees claims, and workers compensation indebtedness as provided in s. 136 of the BIA would apply to the CCAA, thereby increasing the rigidity and reducing the options for compromise.

[57] Under the BIA, the claims receiving priority after secured creditors are enumerated in s. 136 and have ten categories, each ranking behind the other. All must be paid in full before unsecured creditors recover anything. If the appellant is correct, arguably, those claims must be quantified under the BIA but without priority and subject to possible further compromise.

[58] Two other examples illustrate the uncertainty and difficulty that would arise if the appellant's submission was adopted. First, federal excise tax legislation gives Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) a deemed trust for amounts due to it for GST and prohibits any legislation other than the BIA from overriding the deemed trust. There is no deemed trust in a bankruptcy, but cases including this proceeding have held a deemed trust exists in a CCAA restructuring. If the appellant is correct, then excise tax claims must be treated the same in CCAA and a deemed trust would be overridden.

[59] A second example that would import complex and unsettled issues in bankruptcy law is a severance claim. These claims raise thorny issues such as whether the bankruptcy itself triggers termination of employment without cause and thereby gives rise to a provable claim, whether legislation which continues a collective agreement gives rise to a severance claim, and whether a bankruptcy triggered by a creditor and not the bankrupt is to be distinguished. Under the CCAA, employees' claims for severance avoid those issues by treating employees as claimants and capable of being compromised under the CCAA. In Re Woodward's Ltd., a British Columbia case, the court recognized the claims of employees who were terminated and included them in the class of general creditors maintaining that once the amount of the claim had been agreed upon or determined by a court, the employees had the same rights as any other unsecured creditor.

The inconsistency of the BIA and LRBA with the objectives of the CCAA

[60] Automatically applying the LRBA when protection is sought under the CCAA results in the immediate compromise of a landlord's claim prior to the formulation of a plan. Its effect could be to isolate the landlord's claim, treating it differently and potentially unfairly by automatically compromising it without consideration of the plan as a whole. There is no compelling reason for such an a priori blanket regime for landlords in a CCAA proceeding that is intended to preserve the status quo pending the approval of a plan.

[61] There is no reported decision of a court applying s. 136 of the BIA, the LRBA or other provincial legislation equivalent to the LRBA. Instead, case law shows those provisions are not applied and courts have agreed with Farley J., who stated in Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. at para. 11, "Amounts owing to landlords in respect of arrears of rent or unpaid rent for the unexpired portion of lease terms are properly dealt with in a plan of compromise or arrangement: see Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation reflex, (1992), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 312 (Ont. Gen. Div.) especially at p. 318."

[62] Landlords' claims have been a source of difficulty under the CCAA and have spawned considerable academic comment on the problems and potential ways to resolve them. The chambers judge and the respondent have noted many including the following: Moffat, "Treatment of Landlords in Commercial Re-organizations" (1997) 10 Comm. Insol. R. 14; Rotsztain and Kraft, "Landlords and Leases in Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act Reorganizations" [1994] ICR 2005; Marantz, "Retail Revival: The Eaton's Restructuring" (1998), 10 Comm. Insol. R. 37; Birkness, "Re Woodward's Limited – The Contextual Commonality of Interest Approach to Classification of Creditors" (1993) 20 C.B.R. (3d) 91; Kulidjian, Sheldon and Peck, "Potential Creditors Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act" (1996) 13 National I. R. 4; Marantz, "Dealing with Proposals: Acting for the Creditor in CCAA and the New Bankruptcy Act Proposals" (Ontario: Canadian Bar Association C.L.E., 1993); Hayes, "Landlords' Rights on Bankruptcy and in Restructuring Proceedings" in The Failing Smaller Business: Essential Debtor - Creditor Practice (Law Society of Upper Canada, 1994); and Johnston and Campbell, "Using the CCAA to 'Cram Down' Landlords: Sklar-Pepplar Furniture Corporation v. Bank of Nova Scotia and its Aftermath" (1992) 1 Nat. Real Property L. Rev. (2d) 181.

[63] Much of the comment accords with those of Moffat, "Treatment of Landlords in Commercial Re-organizations", where the author states at 16:

> Unlike the proposal provisions of Part II of the BIA, the CCAA does not make any special provision for the valuation or classification of landlord claims under a plan. This does not give the debtor the power to compromise a landlord's claim in any way it chooses; the courts have placed limits on the method by which landlord claims may be valued and classified under a plan. A landlord which objects to its treatment > under a plan may pursue a number of remedies, including seeking amendment of the plan prior to the meeting of creditors held to vote upon the plan, voting against the plan at the creditors' meeting, and opposing court approval of the plan at the sanction hearing.

[64] Courts have approved a variety of solutions to quantifying landlord's claims without reliance on the BIA or provincial legislation. In Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation v. Bank of Nova Scotia, the court classified the landlords among the general class of unsecured creditors for both outstanding rent and any contingent claim for damages arising from repudiation of the lease. The court permitted the termination of certain leases upon the plan's approval and limited damages to three months arrears of rent, three months' rent after a protection order and share pro rata with other ordinary creditors for the balance of their claims. Borins J. stated at 318:

> [R]ecognition must be given to the legislative intent to facilitate corporate re-organization and that in the modern world of large and complex business enterprises the excessive fragmentation of classes could be counter-productive to the fulfilment of this intent....In my view, in placing a broad and purposive interpretation upon the provisions of the CCAA the court should take care to resist approaches which would potentially fragment creditors and thereby jeopardize potentially viable plans of arrangement, such as the plan advance in this application.

[65] In Grafton Fraser and in Re Agnew Group Inc., the landlords were granted claims based on the present value of the unexpired terms of the abandoned leases. In Agnew, with the exception of one landlord with a particularly long term lease, landlords received a maximum of six months' rent.

[66] Rotsztain and Kraft in "Landlords and Leases in BIA and CCAA Reorganizations" commenting on Agnew and Grafton-Fraser note at 5-31 that, "A claim based on the present value of the unexpired term of the lease is something which landlords generally look upon more favourably than a straight payment of a few months' rent." The authors explain that this is because this approach recognizes the significant long term impact termination can have on landlords and allows the factoring in of tenant inducements which are generally built into rental payments over the entire lease.

[67] On this appeal, the appellant suggests incorporating the LRBA serves a useful purpose because without the LRBA limitations, the landlord's claim is so potentially large that it makes a restructuring impossible, and requires too much time to mitigate and thus to quantify the landlord's claim.

[68] Speaking generally, I disagree that the magnitude or quantification issues arising from a landlord's claim make restructuring impossible. Treatment of a landlord's claim under a plan may produce the same result as that under the LRBA and such plan might be approved by both the landlord and the court. Similarly, treatment under the plan could be less than or more than the amount provided for under the LRBA. But these are issues for negotiation and ultimately, court approval.

[69] In the absence of legislation, the unique and distinct purpose of the CCAA has been and must remain the focus for judicial interpretation and discretion. Where there is neither statutory direction nor demonstrated need, it is undesirable to import statutory provisions that may have a negative affect on the flexibility afforded by the CCAA and thus become an impediment to its creative use. Adopting the LRBA as determinative of a landlord's claim under the CCAA is an example of narrowing the benefit of a broad statute in favour of a certainty. As a general proposition and without considering the merits of that position in a particular plan, such an approach is to be discouraged.

Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd.,
Date: 2000-02-25
In the Matter of Section 18.6 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended
In the Matter of Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd.

Ontario Superior Court of Justice [Commercial List] Farley J.
Heard: February 25, 2000
Judgment: February 25, 2000
Docket: 00-CL-3667
Derrick Toy, for Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd.
Paul Macdonald, for Citibank North America Inc., Lenders under the Post-Petition Credit Agreement.

Farley J.*:
[1] I have had the opportunity to reflect on this matter which involves an aspect of the recent amendments to the insolvency legislation of Canada, which amendments have not yet been otherwise dealt with as to their substance. The applicant, Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd. ("BW Canada"), a solvent company, has applied for an interim order under s. 18.6 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"):

> (a) that the proceedings commenced by BW Canada's parent U.S. corporation and certain other U.S. related corporations (collectively "BWUS") for protection under Chapter 11 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code in connection with mass asbestos claims before the U.S. Bankruptcy Court be recognized as a "foreign proceeding" for the purposes of s. 18.6;
> (b) that BW Canada be declared a company which is entitled to avail itself of the provisions of s. 18.6;
> (c) that there be a stay against suits and enforcements until May 1, 2000 (or such later date as the Court may order) as to asbestos related proceedings against BW Canada, its property and its directors;
> (d) that BW Canada be authorized to guarantee the obligations of its parent to the DIP Lender (debtor in possession lender) and grant security therefor in favour of the DIP Lender; and

[2] In Chapter 11 proceedings under the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New Orleans issued a temporary restraining order on February 22, 2000 wherein it was noted that BW Canada may be subject to actions in Canada similar to the U.S. asbestos claims. U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Brown's temporary restraining order was directed against certain named U.S. resident plaintiffs in the asbestos litigation:

> ...and towards all plaintiffs and potential plaintiffs in Other Derivative Actions, that they are hereby restrained further prosecuting Pending Actions or further prosecuting or commencing Other Derivative Actions against Non-Debtor Affiliates, until the Court decides whether to grant the Debtors' request for a preliminary injunction.

Judge Brown further requested the aid and assistance of the Canadian courts in carrying out the U.S. Bankruptcy Court's orders. The "Non-Debtor Affiliates" would include BW Canada.
[3] Under the 1994 amendments to the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, the concept of the establishment of a trust sufficient to meet the court determined liability for a mass torts situations was introduced. I am advised that after many years of successfully resolving the overwhelming majority of claims against it on an individual basis by settlement on terms BWUS considered reasonable, BWUS has determined, as a result of a spike in claims with escalating demands when it was expecting a decrease in claims, that it is appropriate to resort to the mass tort trust concept. Hence its application earlier this week to Judge Brown with a view to eventually working out a global process, including incorporating any Canadian claims. This would be done in conjunction with its joint pool of insurance which covers both BWUS and BW Canada. Chapter 11 proceedings do not require an applicant thereunder to be insolvent; thus BWUS was able to make an application with a view towards the 1994 amendments (including s. 524(g)). This subsection would permit the U.S. Bankruptcy Court on confirmation of a plan of reorganization under Chapter 11 with a view towards rehabilitation in the sense of avoiding insolvency in a mass torts situation to:

> ...enjoin entities from taking legal action for the purpose of directly or indirectly collecting, recovering, or receiving payment or recovery with respect to any claims or demand that, under a plan of reorganization, is to be paid in whole or in part by a trust.

[4] In 1997, ss. 267-275 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended ("BIA") and s. 18.6 of the CCAA were enacted to address the rising number of international insolvencies ("1997 Amendments"). The 1997 Amendments were introduced after a lengthy consultation process with the insolvency profession and others. Previous to the 1997 Amendments, Canadian courts essentially would rely on the evolving common law principles of comity which permitted the Canadian court to recognize and enforce in Canada the judicial acts of other jurisdictions.

[5] La Forest J in Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), (1990), 76 D.L.R. (4th) 256 (S.C.C.), at p. 269 described the principle of comity as:

> "Comity" in the legal sense, is neither a matter of absolute obligation, on the one hand, nor of mere courtesy and goodwill, upon the other. But it is the recognition which one nation allows within its territory to the legislative, executive or judicial acts of another nation, having due regard both to international duty and convenience, and to the rights of its own citizens or of other persons who are under the protections of its laws…

[6] In ATL Industries Inc. v. Han Eol Ind. Co. (1995), 36 C.P.C. (3d) 288 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]), at pp. 302-3 I noted the following:

> Allow me to start off by stating that I agree with the analysis of MacPherson J. in Arrowmaster Inc. v. Unique Forming Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 O.R. (3d) 407 (Gen. Div.) when in discussing Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077, 76 D.L.R. (4th) 256, 52 B.C.L.R. (2d) 160, 122 N.R. 81, [1991] 2 W.W.R. 217, 46 C.P.C. (2d) 1, 15 R.P.R. (2d) 1, he states at p.411:
> > The leading case dealing with the enforcement of "foreign" judgments is the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Morguard Investments, supra. The question in that case was whether, and the circumstances in which, the judgment of an Alberta court could be enforced in British Columbia. A unanimous court, speaking through La Forest J., held in favour of enforceability and, in so doing, discussed in some detail the doctrinal principles governing inter-jurisdictional enforcement of orders. I think it fair to say that the overarching theme of La Forest J.'s reasons is the necessity and desirability, in a mobile global society, for governments and courts to respect the orders made by courts in foreign jurisdictions with comparable legal systems, including substantive laws and rules of procedure. He expressed this theme in these words, at p. 1095:
> > > Modern states, however, cannot live in splendid isolation and do give effect to judgments given in other countries in certain circumstances. Thus a judgment in rem, such as a decree of divorce granted by the courts of one state to persons domiciled there, will be recognized by the courts of other states. In certain circumstances, as well, our courts will enforce personal judgments given in other states. Thus, we saw, our courts will enforce an action for breach of contract given by the courts of another country if the defendant was present there at the time of the action or has agreed to the foreign court's exercise of jurisdiction. This, it was thought, was in conformity with the requirements of comity, the informing principle of private international law, which has been stated to be the deference and respect due by other states to the actions of a state legitimately taken within its territory. Since the slate where the judgment was given has power over the litigants, the judgments of its courts should be respected. (emphasis added in original)
> > Morguard Investments* was, as stated earlier, a case dealing with the enforcement of a court order across provincial boundaries. However, the historical analysis in La Forest J.'s judgment, of both the United Kingdom and Canadian jurisprudence, and the doctrinal principles enunciated by the court are equally applicable, in my view, in a situation where the judgment has been rendered by a court in a foreign jurisdiction. This should not be an absolute rule - there will be some foreign court orders that should not be enforced in Ontario, perhaps because the substantive law in the foreign country is so different from Ontario's or perhaps because the legal process that generates the foreign order diverges radically from Ontario's process. (my emphasis added)

Certainly the substantive and procedural aspects of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code including its 1994 amendments are not so different and do not radically diverge from our system.

[7] After reviewing La Forest J.'s definition of comity, I went on to observe at p. 316:

> As was discussed by J.G. Castel, Canadian Conflicts of Laws, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1994) at p. 270, there is a presumption of validity attaching to a foreign judgment unless and until it is established to be invalid. It would seem that the same type of evidence would be required to impeach a foreign judgment as a domestic one: fraud practiced on the court or tribunal: see Sun Alliance Insurance Co. v. Thompson (1981), 56 N.S.R. (2d) 619, 117 A.P.R. 619 (T.D.), Sopinka, supra, at p. 992.

La Forest J. went on to observe in Morguard at pp. 269-70:

> In a word, the rules of private international law are grounded in the need in modern times to facilitate the flow of wealth, skills and people across state lines in a fair and orderly manner.

> Accommodating the flow of wealth, skills and people across state lines has now become imperative. Under these circumstances, our approach to the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments would appear ripe for reappraisal.

See also Hunt v. T & N plc 1993 CanLII 43 (SCC), (1993), 109 D.L.R. (4th) 16 (S.C.C.), at p. 39.

[8] While Morguard was an interprovincial case, there is no doubt that the principles in that case are equally applicable to international matters in the view of MacPherson J. and myself in Arrowmaster reflex, (1993), 17 O.R. (3d) 407 (Ont. Gen. Div.), and ATL respectively. Indeed the analysis by La Forest J. was on an international plane. As a country whose well-being is so heavily founded on international trade and investment, Canada of necessity is very conscious of the desirability of invoking comity in appropriate cases.

[9] In the context of cross-border insolvencies, Canadian and U.S. Courts have made efforts to complement, coordinate and where appropriate accommodate the proceedings of the other. Examples of this would include Olympia& York Developments Ltd., Ever fresh Beverages Inc. and Loewen Group Inc. v. Continental Insurance Co. of Canada (1997), 48 C.C.L.I. (2d) 119 (B.C. S.C.). Other examples involve the situation where a multi-jurisdictional proceeding is specifically connected to one jurisdiction with that jurisdiction's court being allowed to exercise principal control over the insolvency process: see Roberts v. Picture Butte Municipal Hospital (1998), 23 C.P.C. (4th) 300 (Alta. Q.B.), at pp. 5-7 [[1998] A.J. No. 817]; Microbiz Corp. v. Classic Software Systems Inc. 1996 CanLII 8276 (ON SC), (1996), 45 C.B.R. (3d) 40 (Ont. Gen. Div.), at p. 4; Tradewell Inc. v. American Sensors Electronics, Inc., 1997 WL 423075 (S.D.N.Y. 1997).

[10] In Roberts, Forsythe J. at pp. 5-7 noted that steps within the proceedings themselves are also subject to the dictates of comity in recognizing and enforcing a U.S. Bankruptcy Court stay in the Dow Corning litigation [Taylor v. Dow Corning Australia Pty. Ltd. (December 19, 1997), Doc. 8438/95 (Australia Vic. Sup. Ct.)] as to a debtor in Canada so as to promote greater efficiency, certainty and consistency in connection with the debtor's restructuring efforts. Foreign claimants were provided for in the U.S. corporation's plan. Forsyth J. stated:

> Comity and cooperation are increasingly important in the bankruptcy context. As internationalization increases, more parties have assets and carry on activities in several jurisdictions. Without some coordination there would be multiple proceedings, inconsistent judgments and general uncertainty.
> …I find that common sense dictates that these matters would be best dealt with by one court, and in the interest of promoting international comity it seems the forum for this case is in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court. Thus, in either case, whether there has been an attornment or not, I conclude it is appropriate for me to exercise my discretion and apply the principles of comity and grant the Defendant's stay application. I reach this conclusion based on all the circumstances, including the clear wording of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code provision, the similar philosophies and procedures in Canada and the U.S., the Plaintiffs attornment to the jurisdiction of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court, and the incredible number of claims outstanding… (emphasis added)

[11] The CCAA as remedial legislation should be given a liberal interpretation to facilitate its objectives. See Hongkong Bank of Canada v. Chef Ready Foods Ltd. 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (B.C. C.A.), at p. 320; Lehndorff General Partner Ltd., Re reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]).

[12] David Tobin, the Director General, Corporate Governance Branch, Department of Industry in testifying before the Standing Committee on Industry regarding Bill C-5, An Act to amend the BIA, the CCAA and the Income Tax Act, stated at 1600:

> Provisions in Bill C-5 attempt to actually codify, which has always been the practice in Canada. They include the Court recognition of foreign representatives; Court authority to make orders to facilitate and coordinate international insolvencies; provisions that would make it clear that foreign representatives are allowed to commence proceedings in Canada, as per Canadian rules – however, they clarify that foreign stays of proceedings are not applicable but a foreign representative can apply to a court for a stay in Canada; and Canadian creditors and assets are protected by the bankruptcy and insolvency rules.

The philosophy of the practice in international matters relating to the CCAA is set forth in Olympia & York Developments Ltd. v. Royal Trust Co. reflex, (1993), 20 C.B.R. (3d) 165 (Ont. Gen. Div.), at p. 167 where Blair J. stated:

> The Olympia & York re-organization involves proceedings in three different jurisdictions: Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom. Insolvency disputes with international overtones and involving property and assets in a multiplicity of jurisdictions are becoming increasingly frequent. Often there are differences in legal concepts – sometimes substantive, sometimes procedural – between the jurisdictions. The Courts of the various jurisdictions should seek to cooperate amongst themselves, in my view, in facilitating the trans-border resolution of such disputes as a whole, where that can be done in a fashion consistent with their own fundamental principles of > jurisprudence. The interests of international cooperation and comity, and the interests of developing at least some degree of certitude in international business and commerce, call for nothing less.

Blair J. then proceeded to invoke inherent jurisdiction to implement the Protocol between the U.S. Bankruptcy Court and the Ontario Court. See also my endorsement of December 20, 1995, in Everfresh Beverages Inc. where I observed: "I would think that this Protocol demonstrates the 'essence of comity' between the Courts of Canada and the United States of America." Everfresh was an example of the effective and efficient use of the Cross-Border Insolvency Concordat, adopted by the Council of the International Bar Association on May 31, 1996 (after being adopted by its Section on Business Law Council on September 17, 1995), which Concordat deals with, inter alia, principal administration of a debtor's reorganization and ancillary jurisdiction. See also the UNCITRAL Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency.

[13] Thus it seems to me that this application by BW Canada should be reviewed in light of (i) the doctrine of comity as analyzed in Morguard, Arrowmaster and ATL, supra, in regard to its international aspects; (ii) inherent jurisdiction; (iii) the aspect of the liberal interpretation of the CCAA generally; and (iv) the assistance and codification of the 1997 Amendments.

"Foreign proceeding" is defined in s. 18.6(1) as:

> In this section,
> "foreign proceeding" means a judicial or administrative proceeding commenced outside Canada in respect of a debtor under a law relating to bankruptcy or insolvency and dealing with the collective interests of creditors generally;...

Certainly a U.S. Chapter 11 proceeding would fit this definition subject to the question of "debtor". It is important to note that the definition of "foreign proceeding" in s. 18.6 of the CCAA contains no specific requirement that the debtor be insolvent. In contrast, the BIA defines a "debtor" in the context of a foreign proceeding (Part XIII of the BIA) as follows:

> "debtor" means an insolvent person who has property in Canada, a bankrupt who has property in Canada or a person who has the status of a bankrupt under foreign law in a foreign proceeding and has property in Canada;... (emphasis added)

I think it a fair observation that the BIA is a rather defined code which goes into extensive detail. This should be contrasted with the CCAA which is a very short general statute which has been utilized to give flexibility to meet what might be described as the peculiar and unusual situation circumstances. A general categorization (which of course is never completely accurate) is that the BIA may be seen as being used for more run of the mill cases whereas the CCAA may be seen as facilitating the more unique or complicated cases. Certainly the CCAA provides the flexibility to deal with the thornier questions. Thus I do not think it unusual that the draftees of the 1997 Amendments would have it in their minds that the provisions of the CCAA dealing with foreign proceedings should continue to reflect this broader and more flexible approach in keeping with the general provisions of the CCAA, in contrast with the corresponding provisions under the BIA. In particular, it would appear to me to be a reasonably plain reading interpretation of s. 18.6 that recourse may be had to s. 18.6 of the CCAA in the case of a solvent debtor. Thus I would conclude that the aspect of insolvency is not a condition precedent vis-a-vis the "debtor" in the foreign proceedings (here the Chapter 11 proceedings) for the proceedings in Louisiana to be a foreign proceeding under the definition of s. 18.6. I therefore declare that those proceedings are to be recognized as a "foreign proceeding" for the purposes of s. 18.6 of the CCAA.

[14] It appears to me that my conclusion above is reinforced by an analysis of s. 18.6(2) which deals with concurrent filings by a debtor under the CCAA in Canada and corresponding bankruptcy or insolvency legislation in a foreign jurisdiction. This is not the situation here, but it would be applicable in the Loewen case. That subsection deals with the coordination of proceedings as to a "debtor company" initiated pursuant to the CCAA and the foreign legislation.

> s. 18.6(2). The court may, in respect of a debtor company, make such orders and grant such relief as it considers appropriate to facilitate, approve or implement arrangements that will result in a coordination of proceedings under the Act with any foreign proceeding. (emphasis added)

[15] The definition of "debtor company" is found in the general definition section of the CCAA, namely s. 2 and that definition incorporates the concept of insolvency. Section 18.6(2) refers to a "debtor company" since only a "debtor company" can file under the CCAA to propose a compromise with its unsecured or secured creditors: ss. 3, 4 and 5 CCAA. See also s. 18.6(8) which deals with currency concessions "[w]here a compromise or arrangement is proposed in respect of a debtor company...". I note that "debtor company" is not otherwise referred to in s. 18.6; however "debtor" is referred to in both definitions under s. 18.6(1).

[16] However, s. 18.6(4) provides a basis pursuant to which a company such as BW Canada, a solvent corporation, may seek judicial assistance and protection in connection with a foreign proceeding. Unlike s. 18.6(2), s. 18.6(4) does not contemplate a full filing under the CCAA. Rather s. 18.6(4) may be utilized to deal with situations where, notwithstanding that a full filing is not being made under the CCAA, ancillary relief is required in connection with a foreign proceeding.

> s. 18.6(4) Nothing in this section prevents the court, on the application of a foreign representative or any other interested persons, from applying such legal or equitable rules governing the recognition of foreign insolvency orders and assistance to foreign representatives as are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. (emphasis added)

BW Canada would fit within "any interested person" to bring the subject application to apply the principles of comity and cooperation. It would not appear to me that the relief requested is of a nature contrary to the provisions of the CCAA.

[17] Additionally there is s. 18.6(3) whereby once it has been established that there is a foreign proceeding within the meaning of s. 18.6(1) (as I have concluded there is), then this court is given broad powers and wide latitude, all of which is consistent with the general judicial analysis of the CCAA overall, to make any order it thinks appropriate in the circumstances.

> s. 18.6(3) An order of the court under this Section may be made on such terms and conditions as the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

This subsection reinforces the view expressed previously that the 1997 Amendments contemplated that it would be inappropriate to pigeonhole or otherwise constrain the interpretation of s. 18.6 since it would be not only impracticable but also impossible to contemplate the myriad of circumstances arising under a wide variety of foreign legislation which deal generally and essentially with bankruptcy and insolvency but not exclusively so. Thus, the Court was entrusted to exercise its discretion, but of course in a judicial manner.

[18] Even aside from that, I note that the Courts of this country have utilized inherent jurisdiction to fill in any gaps in the legislation and to promote the objectives of the CCAA. Where there is a gap which requires bridging, then the question to be considered is what will be the most practical common sense approach to establishing the connection between the parts of the legislation so as to reach a just and reasonable solution. See Westar Mining Ltd., Re 1992 CanLII 1863 (BC SC), (1992), 14 C.B.R. (3d) 88 (B.C. S.C.), at pp. 93-4; *Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. v. [19] The Chapter 11 proceedings are intended to resolve the mass asbestos related tort claims which seriously threaten the long term viability of BWUS and its subsidiaries including BW Canada. BW Canada is a significant participant in the overall Babcock & Wilcox international organization. From the record before me it appears reasonably clear that there is an interdependence between BWUS and BW Canada as to facilities and services. In addition there is the fundamental element of financial and business stability. This interdependence has been increased by the financial assistance given by the BW Canada guarantee of BWUS' obligations.

[20] To date the overwhelming thrust of the asbestos related litigation has been focussed in the U.S. In contradistinction BW Canada has not in essence been involved in asbestos litigation to date. The 1994 amendments to the U.S. Bankruptcy Code have provided a specific regime which is designed to deal with the mass tort claims (which number in the hundreds of thousands of claims in the U.S.) which appear to be endemic in the U.S. litigation arena involving asbestos related claims as well as other types of mass torts. This Court's assistance however is being sought to stay asbestos related claims against BW Canada with a view to this stay facilitating an environment in which a global solution may be worked out within the context of the Chapter 11 proceedings trust.

[21] In my view, s. 18.6(3) and (4) permit BW Canada to apply to this Court for such a stay and other appropriate relief. Relying upon the existing law on the recognition of foreign insolvency orders and proceedings, the principles and practicalities discussed and illustrated in the Cross-Border Insolvency Concordat and the UNCITRAL Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvencies and inherent jurisdiction, all as discussed above, I would think that the following may be of assistance in advancing guidelines as to how s. 18.6 should be applied. I do not intend the factors listed below to be exclusive or exhaustive but merely an initial attempt to provide guidance:

> (a) The recognition of comity and cooperation between the courts of various jurisdictions are to be encouraged.
> (b) Respect should be accorded to the overall thrust of foreign bankruptcy and insolvency legislation in any analysis, unless in substance generally it is so different from the bankruptcy and insolvency law of Canada or perhaps because the legal process that generates the foreign order diverges radically from the process here in Canada.
> (c) All stakeholders are to be treated equitably, and to the extent reasonably possible, common or like stakeholders are to be treated equally, regardless of the jurisdiction in which they reside.
> (d) The enterprise is to be permitted to implement a plan so as to reorganize as a global unit, especially where there is an established interdependence on a transnational basis of the enterprise and to the extent reasonably practicable, one jurisdiction should take charge of the principal administration of the enterprise's reorganization, where such principal type approach will facilitate a potential reorganization and which respects the claims of the stakeholders and does not inappropriately detract from the net benefits which may be available from alternative approaches.

Digitized by Google

(e) The role of the court and the extent of the jurisdiction it exercises will vary on a case by case basis and depend to a significant degree upon the court's nexus to that enterprise; in considering the appropriate level of its involvement, the court would consider:

(i) the location of the debtor's principal operations, undertaking and assets;

(ii) the location of the debtor's stakeholders;

(iii) the development of the law in each jurisdiction to address the specific problems of the debtor and the enterprise;

(iv) the substantive and procedural law which may be applied so that the aspect of undue prejudice may be analyzed;

(v) such other factors as may be appropriate in the instant circumstances.

(f) Where one jurisdiction has an ancillary role,

(i) the court in the ancillary jurisdiction should be provided with information on an ongoing basis and be kept apprised of developments in respect of that debtor's reorganizational efforts in the foreign jurisdiction;

(ii) stakeholders in the ancillary jurisdiction should be afforded appropriate access to the proceedings in the principal jurisdiction.

(g) As effective notice as is reasonably practicable in the circumstances should be given to all affected stakeholders, with an opportunity for such stakeholders to come back into the court to review the granted order with a view, if thought desirable, to rescind or vary the granted order or to obtain any other appropriate relief in the circumstances.

[22] Taking these factors into consideration, and with the determination that the Chapter 11 proceedings are a "foreign proceeding" within the meaning of s. 18.6 of the CCAA and that it is appropriate to declare that BW Canada is entitled to avail itself of the provisions of s. 18.6, I would also grant the following relief. There is to be a stay against suits and enforcement as requested; the initial time period would appear reasonable in the circumstances to allow BWUS to return to the U.S. Bankruptcy Court. Assuming the injunctive relief is continued there, this will provide some additional time to more fully prepare an initial draft approach with respect to ongoing matters. It should also be recognized that if such future relief is not granted in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court, any interested person could avail themselves of the "comeback" clause in the draft order presented to me and which I find reasonable in the circumstances. It appears appropriate, in the circumstances that BW Canada guarantee BWUS' obligations as aforesaid and to grant security in respect thereof, recognizing that same is permitted pursuant to the general corporate legislation affecting BW Canada, namely the Business Corporations Act (Ontario). I note that there is also a provision for an "Information Officer" who will give quarterly reports to this Court. Notices are to be published in the Globe & Mail (National Edition) and the National Post. In accordance with my suggestion at the hearing, the draft order notice has been revised to note that persons are alerted to the fact that they may become a participant in these Canadian proceedings and further that, if so, they may make representations as to pursuing their remedies regarding asbestos related claims in Canada as opposed to the U.S. As discussed above the draft order also includes an appropriate "comeback" clause. This Court (and I specifically) look forward to working in a cooperative judicial way with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court (and Judge Brown specifically).

[23] I am satisfied that it is appropriate in these circumstances to grant an order in the form of the revised draft (a copy of which is attached to these reasons for the easy reference of others who may be interested in this area of s. 18.6 of the CCAA).

Application granted.

PLEASE TAKE NOTICE that this notice is being published pursuant to an Order of the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario made February 25, 2000. History of the CCAA

Digitized by Google

Originally enacted in 1993, the CCAA offers corporations a viable alternative to bankruptcy or receivership through a voluntary attempt to restructure their debt load and arrange equitable and orderly payments to creditors.

The last amendment to the CCAA (Bill C-5) on September 30, 1997, made the Act binding on the Crown.

Purpose of the CCAA

The CCAA is a remedial process which provides an insolvent company with an opportunity to address financial difficulties that may otherwise result in bankruptcy or receivership. This process is an attractive option to debtors offering more flexible options than the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, while still providing the same creditor protection.

Benefits of CCAA include:

- protecting the interest of creditors and permitting an orderly distribution of the debtor company's affairs
- maintaining the status quo while the insolvent company attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for a proposed arrangement
- permitting equal treatment of creditors of the same class
- preserving the insolvent company as a viable operation
- protecting an insolvent company from proceedings by creditors which would prevent it from carrying out the terms of a compromise or arrangement
- promoting a structured environment for the negotiation of compromises between a debtor company and its creditors
- permitting an insolvent company to remain in business

For further details, refer to Directive ARD-03-09, The Relationship between Bankruptcy and Insolvency Events.

Criteria to use the CCAA

The CCAA is only available to a company or affiliated companies with total liabilities in excess of $5 million.

The company or affiliated companies must:

- be incorporated under an Act of Parliament or the legislature of a province
- be incorporated or affiliated having assets or doing business in Canada
- be either bankrupt or insolvent
- have an outstanding issue of secured or unsecured bonds issued under a trust deed (the reorganization plan must include a compromise or arrangement with the holders of the bond)

Digitized by Google

Note: As affiliated companies are included in this legislation, it is important to check the entire Order to identify any and all affiliated companies.

The companies may not be:

- a bank
- a loan company
- an insurance company
- a railway company

For further details, refer to Directive ARD-01-02, The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Initial Application

When a debtor company decides to undertake a CCAA proceeding, it files an "initial application" with the Court. The Court receives and reviews the application and determines if the company:

- is eligible to proceed under the CCAA, and
- is viable

At that point the court will issue the Initial Order.

Initial Order

The Initial Order outlines the criteria for continuing in the CCAA process. It may include the following:

- terms, if any, of a Stay of Proceedings
- permission and deadline for the company to file the Plan of Arrangement
- appointment and duties of a monitor
- requirements for the service of documents
- any other such terms as the court sees fit

Stay of Proceedings

Unlike the BIA, the CCAA does not provide for an automatic Stay of Proceedings against all creditors. It is at the discretion of the Court to decide whether a Stay applies as well as the scope of the Stay. Details regarding the Stay are outlined in the Initial Order.

A Stay under a CCAA may require certain conditions to be followed, including the following:

- creditors are not permitted to start or continue any legal actions
- the CRA is not permitted to issue Enhanced Requirements to Pay
- no actions may be taken against the directors

Digitized by Google

- landlords may not terminate leases
- utilities may not discontinue services
- suppliers must continue to honour contracts
- limited rights of set-off

Note: The Stay from an Initial Order can not extend beyond thirty (30) days.

For further details refer to: Enhanced Requirement to Pay under the *Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and Directive RCD-00-22, The Rights of Unpaid Suppliers in a Bankruptcy or an Insolvency.

Related Topics:

- Lifting the Stay of Proceedings
- When the Stay Ceases

Lifting the Stay of Proceedings

Since the terms of the Stay are outlined in the Initial Order of the Court, any party taking collection action may be held in contempt of court. However, any creditor, including the CRA, may apply to the court to have the Stay varied or lifted under certain circumstances. Some of those circumstances are:

- a creditor with the voting power to defeat the arrangement intends to do so
- the debtor is not acting in good faith
- the company intends to liquidate rather than restructure

For further details refer to: Obtaining Leave of the Court.

When the Stay Ceases

The Stay automatically ceases when:

- the timeline, as stated in the Initial Order, has expired
- the arrangement is voted down by creditors
- there is a default in the arrangement
- the arrangement has been completed

For payroll debts, the Stay automatically ceases if:

- the company defaults on payment of any amount that becomes due to after the order and could be subject to a demand under s. 224(1.2) of the ITA, or
- any other creditor is, or becomes entitled to realize a security on any property that could be claimed by the CRA under s. 224(1.2) of the ITA

Digitized by Google

The Plan of Arrangement

The Plan of Arrangement is prepared by the debtor company with the assistance of the monitor and, if applicable, the restructuring officer. A completed plan includes the following:

- a description of the arrangement as it affects the creditors, shareholders, and any debenture holders
- last audited financial statements
- value of the tax debtor's assets when the plan was filed
- list of the company's secured creditors
- types of security held
- projected cash flow
- a description of the proposed changes to the existing outstanding shares or to the share capital of the company, where applicable
- a description of the outstanding court actions

Where an Initial Order provides for a stay of proceedings that prevents the Agency's from exercising its rights under section 224(1.2) of the ITA, or section of the CPP or EI Act that refer to section 224(1.2) of the ITA, or similar provincial legislation, an Arrangement requires that the amounts subject to these sections be paid in full within 6 months of court approval, unless otherwise authorized by the Crown.

The Meeting of Creditors

Once the Plan of Arrangement has been prepared and submitted to the Court, the Court sets a date for the creditors to meet and vote on the plan.

Voting on the Plan of Arrangement

In order to vote on the Plan of Arrangement, a creditor must:

- have filed an accepted Proof of Claim
- be present at the creditor's meeting either in person or by proxy

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-022, Amendments/Corrections to the Delegations Legislative and Policy Matrices.

When a Plan is approved

A Plan of Arrangement is not just a description of the monetary repayments that the debtor company must pay to creditors; rather it is a detailed business plan for the restructuring of the company. For a Plan to be approved by creditors, or a class of creditors, there must be:

- acceptance by a majority in numbers with 2/3 in dollar value of proven claims

If any class of creditors rejects the Plan, the Plan may still be approved by the court, however it will not be binding on that class of creditors rejecting it and that class may commence or continue legal action against the debtor company once the plan becomes operative or fully performed if the stay remains in effect.

When a Plan is Rejected

When a Plan of Arrangement has been rejected, there are two issues to consider:

- the applicant is not automatically bankrupt
- the Stay of Proceedings against the applicant is lifted

At this point, the debtor company will have to file a voluntary assignment into bankruptcy.

Court Approval
Once the Plan is approved by creditors, it is presented to the Court for approval and authorization. The Court ensures that the plan is fair and reasonable to all creditors, that compliance with all statutory requirements, including the provision for payment of the entire source deductions claim within 6 months, is achieved, and nothing has been done outside the scope of the Act.

Policy
This section provides policies related to CCAA.

- Impact on the Crown
- Effect of Court Order
- Effect on Collection Action
- Impact on Director's Liability
- Impact on Set-off

Impact on the Crown

Where applicable, the provisions of the CCAA are binding on the CRA.

Effect of Court Order

Once the Agency becomes aware of a court order, it must obey the court order, unless the CRA is successful in getting the Court Order changed

Refer to the procedures Obtaining Leave of the Court for further detail.

Effect on Collection Action

When a corporate debtor is under the protection of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (CCAA) do not:

- disobey or ignore a court order
- initiate or continue collection actions regardless of whether the Crown or the CRA are specifically named in the order
- vote in favour of the plan, unless directed to do so by the delegated authority

Digitized by Google

If a Collection Officer becomes aware of a court order and continues to pursue collection, the individual could be found to be in contempt of court.

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-022, Amendments/Corrections to the Delegations Legislative and Policy Matrices.

Impact on Director's Liability

Directors are not liable for trust funds unless the CRA has demonstrated it has met one of the following three preconditions:

a) the return of an unsatisfied certificate for the amount of the corporation's liability which was registered in the Federal Court

b) proved a claim against the corporation within six months following the date of dissolution or liquidation proceedings began

c) proved a claim against the corporation within six months following the date of bankruptcy

A CCAA filing could disrupt the events of b) and c) (above) since the Agency is prevented from assessing the directors if more than two years have passed since the person last ceased to be a director of the corporation. As a result, for a director to be held liable, it may be necessary to invoke a) (above). Before this can be done, consult the Department of Justice to see if leave of the court must be sought.

If the CCAA proceeding becomes a liquidation, precondition b) would apply.

The Proof of Claim must be filed as soon as possible. If the Agency files a Proof of Claim with the monitor in a CCAA proceeding, it has proven a claim.

If the Agency waits for the actual plan of arrangement to be filed, six months could easily have passed.

Refer to: Department of Justice Opinions for further detail.

For additional details, refer to the procedure, Proving a Director's Liability Claim Under the *Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Impact on Set-Off

The Court Order may state that creditors are not entitled to receive funds as a result of the issuance of a Statutory Set-off or use the right of offset to recover amounts owing to the debtor. In such a case, contact the Department of Justice who may petition the courts to have the Order varied.

A 1997 amendment to the CCAA (section 18.1) allows the law of set off to apply. This allows the CRA to set off amounts payable to a tax debtor against the tax debtor's indebtedness to it. These provisions contain the requirement of mutuality, that being the Crown and the debtor owe each other in the same time period.

Where a Debt is Established

Hold credit amounts if the two following conditions exist:

- the CRA has an established debt
- a Notice of Assessment is issued prior to the CCAA coming into effect

A credit is held, but will not be set-off or offset against agency debts as this may appear contrary to the court order. The credit amounts are held and distributed once the restructuring plan is implemented or upon the approval of senior management of a Tax Services Office (TSO).

Where No Debt is Established

Credit amounts are not withheld if there is no debt on any related account, provided all related accounts are filed up to date.

Changes to the Income Tax Act and Excise Tax Act, effective April 1, 2007, permit the CRA to withhold credits or refunds until such time as all required returns are filed.

For further details refer to Communication TSDMB-2007-038, Amendments to different Acts in the 2006 Budget.

Actioning Accounts under CCAA

When an account is under the CCAA the Collections Officer must complete specific steps to ensure the proper procedures are actioned. There are two phases of actioning an account.

Related Topics:

- Preparation
- Working the File

Preparation

Upon notification of CCAA filing

1. Immediately contact and advise the Department of Justice

For further details, refer to: Department of Justice Opinions.

2. Advise Headquarters

For further details, refer to: Preparing the Memorandum for Headquarters.

3. Request Trust Exam and Audit

   - ensure outstanding audits are given priority
   - ensure outstanding objections and appeals are resolved on a priority basis

Working the File

When advised of an account under the CCAA, the Agency will need to follow these steps:

- suspend but do not withdraw current legal actions including garnishments issued under the Excise Tax Act section 317 (3) or the Income Tax Act subsection 224 (1.2)
- do not initiate further collection actions
- file a Proof of Claim

  Note: As no template exists on ELCS, contact Field Support for assistance.
- follow up with Audit and Trust Exam and ensure all filings are current
- review File in detail
- centralize related accounts from all TSOs (preferably in Headquarters)
- liaise with affected federal and provincial departments and agencies to ensure government claims are put in a separate class from other creditors
- identify the affiliated companies
  Note: Keep local management fully apprised on the status of companies filing under the CCAA.
- research information on directors including names at the time the debt was incurred and dates when these directors resigned.

Department of Justice Opinions

It is imperative that the Department of Justice review the Initial Order as they represent and act for the Agency in all legal aspects of the CCAA proceedings including:

- challenging the Court's Initial Order
- defeating requests for directors' reduced claims
- putting the Crown's claim in a separate class
- varying a Stay to effect set-off or to allow the issuance of Enhanced Requirements to Pay pursuant to subsection 317(3) of the ETA

Headquarters

Obtaining Leave of the Court

When a Court Order imposes a Stay of Proceedings, the Collection Officer should forward a memorandum, including all relevant information, to the Department of Justice requesting an opinion as to whether the CRA should:

- seek leave of the court to vary the order
- initiate or continue with regular collection actions

Once Department of Justice determines that the CRA should move forward to obtain leave of the court, the Collection Officer must:

- obtain approval from Headquarters to proceed with obtaining the variance
- assist the Department of Justice in the preparation of an affidavit if leave of the court is sought

Statistical Reporting

While relatively few filings occur under CCAA, they often represent substantial risk, and involve significant balances owing to the Agency. These factors, along with potential legislative impacts surrounding this sensitive area, point to the need for statistical tracking. Taxpayer Services and Debt Management Branch is developing processes to capture statistical information as it relates to insolvency workloads.

Submission of statistical information for all current and future filings must occur in two stages, initial and final.

Related Topics:

- Initial Stage
- Final Stage

Initial Stage

After receiving notification of a CCAA filing, complete an initial review and submit a summary to:

Accounts Receivable Division
Insolvency and International Section
Headquarters

Include in the submission

- debtor profile
- account history (collections and compliance)
- collection actions outstanding
- amount of debt outstanding
- a copy of the court order and other applicable documentation

The submission should highlight GST/HST deemed trust amounts owing to the Agency.

Final Stage

Upon final disposition of the file, record in the ACSES diary a breakdown of all amounts recovered including deemed trust amounts. The Insolvency and International Section will review and follow up on these accounts.

Statistical Checklist

The information for continuous tracking must be submitted on a statistical reporting checklist, which is broken into two parts:

Part I-CCAA filing information - requires basic information relating to the CCAA filing details.

Digitized by Google

Part II- Account Information - requires information relating to all accounts involved, including all related accounts, subsidiary and related companies that are indebted or are about to become indebted to the Agency.

In keeping with the CRA's Electronic Networks Policy Guidelines, and Policy on the Management of Protected Client Information, send all submissions via use of WINZIP 9, providing that all WINZIP 9 policies and procedures are adhered to. Alternatively, transmission by secure fax or inter-office mail, to the following, may also be utilized.

Written Reasons by:
The Honourable Chief Justice Finch

Concurred in by:
The Honourable Mr. Justice Lowry
The Honourable Mr. Justice Groberman
Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Chief Justice Finch:
I. Introduction
[1] Braydon Investments Ltd. ("Braydon") appeals from the order of the Supreme Court of British Columbia pronounced 14 November 2008, holding the transfer of assets from Botham Holdings Ltd. ("BHL") to Braydon, pursuant to an agreement made 31 October 2005, to be void and of no effect as against the plaintiff Abakhan, the trustee in bankruptcy of BHL.
[2] Following a trial on affidavit evidence under Rule 18A, the learned summary trial judge held that one purpose of the asset transfer was to put BHL's assets out of reach of its creditors, and the transfer was therefore a fraudulent conveyance within the meaning of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, 1996, R.S.B.C. c.163. The trial judge held this to be so, despite the fact that BHL's and Braydon's principal, William Botham, had no dishonest intent, or mala fides, and acted on professional advice to effect legitimate business purposes.
[3] I respectfully agree with the conclusion of the learned summary trial judge, and would dismiss the defendant's appeal.
II. Facts
[4] The background leading to the asset transfer of 31 October 2005 was described by the learned trial judge this way:
[3] Mr. William Botham was the directing mind of BHL. That company had been incorporated many years earlier and had accumulated substantial worth such that its equity in real property was worth approximately $20 million at the time of the Transaction. The shareholders in BHL were Mr. Botham and the Botham Grandchildren's Trust (the "Family Trust"), although that changed after the Transaction to include Braydon.
[4] Mr. Botham was also the directing mind of Braydon. Braydon was incorporated on October 25, 2005. The shareholders of Braydon were Mr. Botham and the Family Trust.

Digitized by Google

[5] In 2004, BHL sold a substantial real estate asset at a profit. BHL therefore paid a large amount of capital gains tax.

[6] In 2005, Mr. Botham was looking for an opportunity to invest the funds realized by BHL's sale of its real estate asset. He had discussions with a friend, Jordan Welsh, who had had many years' experience in the car leasing business. He encouraged Mr. Botham to invest in a new business, involving the selling and leasing of motor vehicles.

[7] Mr. Welsh proposed that they form a new business called "JW Auto Group" and acquire a portfolio of leased vehicles from a failed business, Totem Ford.

[8] The proposed investment would have the tax benefit of generating capital cost allowance claims. This would enable BHL to obtain refunds of capital gains tax which it had previously paid.

[9] However, BHL could only claim this tax benefit if it became a general partner in the new business, and only if the new business were its major source of revenue.

[10] As a general partner of JW Auto Group, however, BHL would be responsible for any debts incurred by the partnership. But BHL had substantial assets which far exceeded what Mr. Botham wished to invest in the new venture.

[5] William Botham was advised that he could both protect BHL's assets from creditors' claims, and qualify for the tax benefits of capital cost allowance claims by transferring BHL's assets to a new corporation, Braydon, and using BHL to invest as a general partner in JW Auto.

[6] The mechanisms for achieving these ends were complicated, and are reviewed in the trial judge's reasons at paras. 17-27. An intermediary company, Silverspoon Developments Limited (SSDL) was used in the transaction. The trial judge said the transaction was summarized by BHL and William Botham's solicitor as follows:

1. Bill Botham and a family trust sold to Braydon preferred shares of Botham Holdings Ltd., having a redemption value, in total, of $18,700,000. The redemption values track the fair market value of the real estate owned by BHL. Thus, at this step in the reorganization, Braydon owned preferred shares of BHL, having a redemption value of approximately $18,700,000.

2. BHL sold its real estate to Braydon for consideration which included assumption of debt owing to third parties of approximately $4,300,000, and a promissory note of approximately $12,100,000, plus preferred shares having a redemption value of approximately $6,900,000; at this point, BHL had virtually no debt, had a promissory note in the amount of $12,160,000 from Braydon and preferred shares having an aggregate redemption value of $6,900,000.

3. The preferred shares of Braydon owned by BHL were redeemed for a promissory note of approximately $6,900,000.

4. The preferred shares of BHL owned by Braydon were then redeemed and a promissory note for approximately $18,000,000 was issued by BHL in favour of Braydon, representing the redemption proceeds.

5. The promissory notes were then cancelled off against each other.

6. In the end result, Braydon owed approximately $350,000 to BHL as the promissory notes differed by that amount; Braydon and Silverspoon used their rights of offset to cancel that note against the amounts to Silverspoon owing by BHL as a partner of JW Auto Group.

[7] The effect of the transaction was described as follows:

On October 31, 2005, two months after the Partnership [JW Auto] had been formed and commenced operations, BHL and Braydon completed the BHL-Braydon Transaction. While the BHL-Braydon Transaction is complicated in its structure, and required a substantial number of transitional documents, its effect was to transfer all of BHL's assets to Braydon, without triggering capital gains tax on the disposition, and leaving BHL with effectively no assets except for BHL's interest in the Partnership, which...had a nominal or negative value.

[8] The trial judge recorded:

[30] At the time of the transaction, October 31, 2005, BHL did have several creditors. Its indebtedness to AIG exceeded $4 million. It owed SSDL $5.2 million. It was the guarantor of indebtedness to the Bank of Montreal of $2.1 million.

[31] Ultimately, BHL's investment in JW Auto Group was a failure. Within seven months, as of May 31, 2006, the partnership had operating losses of more than $5 million. By May 2007, both the partnership and BHL were assigned into bankruptcy. Creditors' claims currently exceed $20 million.

[9] William Botham admitted on his examination for discovery at Q. 333 that:

Q. ... The purpose and intent and effect of the transaction was to make sure that the assets of BHL were removed from BHL so that creditors of JW Auto couldn't have access to them to satisfy their claim?

A. That's what I understood.

[10] However, the plaintiff conceded that William Botham had no "dishonest intent" or any intent to "defraud" creditors. And in addition to his wish to protect his and his family's assets, William Botham also testified that the asset transfer was done in order to take advantage of the tax free rollover available under s. 85 of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985 (5th Supp.), c.1.

[11] The trial judge concluded that the asset transfer was a fraudulent conveyance. He said:

[77] Based on the foregoing, I find that BHL did engage in a fraudulent conveyance, despite Mr. Botham's lack of dishonest intent. A transaction which is the result of an honest intent to defeat one's creditors is precisely one of the situations caught by the Fraudulent Conveyance Act.

[78] I have also considered the defendant's argument that the plaintiff's position, if accepted, would place judge-made restrictions on a taxpayer's right to avail him or herself of s. 85 tax-free rollovers under the Income Tax Act and on the right of a corporation to redeem shares under ss. 77 and 79 of the Business Corporations Act.

[79] I disagree. These statutory provisions do not provide a license to engage in transactions which are counter to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. ...

[12] The judge held that the defendant had no defence under s. 2 of the Act:

[80] There are three parts to this defence. It requires that the disposition be made (1) for good consideration, (2) in good faith, and (3) to a person who had no notice or knowledge of the fraud. The defence does not apply in the case at bar. I find that there was no good consideration which passed from Braydon to BHL for the assets. At the end of the Transaction, BHL was left with virtually no assets while Braydon had obtained $19 million in assets. The Transaction was clearly not in good faith based on the direct evidence of Mr. Botham's intent with regards to BHL's assets. Finally, given that Mr. Botham was the directing mind of both Braydon and BHL, it cannot be said that the transferee had no notice or knowledge of the fraud.

III.

[14] The issue on this appeal is whether the learned summary trial judge erred in setting aside the 31 October 2005 transaction as a fraudulent conveyance. More precisely, the question may be framed as whether a transfer of property made with a view to protecting assets from creditors, present or future, if made honestly, without moral blameworthiness, and for other legitimate business purposes, is prohibited by the Fraudulent Conveyance Act.

IV. The Parties' Positions

A. The Appellant Braydon

[15] Braydon says the learned trial judge erred both in fact and law in holding the transfer of assets from BHL to Braydon to be a fraudulent conveyance.

[16] The appellant says the legal error was in interpreting s. 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act as requiring only an intent in the transferor to put assets out of the reach of creditors. The appellant says that a fraudulent or dishonest intent must be proven. The appellant points to the language of s. 1 in the Act which renders void a disposition made to "delay, hinder or defraud" creditors "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud".

[17] The appellant says the section has been interpreted, correctly, to mean that there must be "mala fides" in the intent of the transaction: See Westinghouse Canada Limited v. Caldwell (1979), 31 C.B.R. (N.S.) 276 (B.C.S.C.) at p. 282; First Royal Enterprises Ltd. v. Armadillo's Restaurant Ltd. 1995 CanLII 605 (BC CA), (1995), 15 B.C.L.R. (3d) 254 (C.A.) at paras. 23, 35 and 36; and Mandryk v. Merko (1971), 19 D.L.R. (3d) 238 (Man. C.A.) at pp. 241-242. Here the appellant says the trial judge erred in holding that an "honest intent to defeat ones creditors" was, as a matter of law, an intent sufficient to meet the requirements of s. 1.

[18] The appellant also says the trial judge erred in fact in finding that the plaintiff had proven the intent proscribed by s. 1. The appellant says that on the whole of the evidence William Botham's intent was an honest and prudent one, to take advantage of the tax benefits provided by the "rollover" plan devised by his professional advisors. The appellant says that by focusing on William Botham's answers on his examinations for discovery to questions 395 and 396 where he agreed that the "whole motivation" behind the transfer was to "ensure that creditors wouldn't get the assets of the estate", the trial judge ignored or failed to give effect to the whole of the evidence which showed Mr. Botham's "innocent and reasonable intentions in engaging in the rollover".

[19] As expressed in the appellant's factum: "... the plan was to empty an old company of its assets unrelated to auto leasing, and use the old company for the partnership rather than incorporate a new one, because using the old company allowed for a tax benefit".

[20] The appellant says that if a new company controlled by Mr. Botham had been incorporated and used as the general partner there would be no question of a fraudulent conveyance. They say that is so because, first, there would have been no conveyance and, secondly, there could be nothing fraudulent in engaging in a partnership by way of a private, limited liability company. By extension, this argument appears to be that effecting the same intention by way of a conveyance cannot, therefore, be considered fraudulent. The appellant contends that what was done in this case is no different and no more "fraudulent" than what has routinely been done by persons seeking to limit personal liability by incorporation. (citing C.R.B. Dunlop, Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, looseleaf, Toronto (Carswell, 1995, 2nd ed.) at 592.

[21] The appellant distinguishes the facts of this case from others where a fraudulent intent has been found because at the time of the asset transfer no creditor had an outstanding demand against BHL that it could not satisfy. Neither BHL nor JW Auto were under any financial pressure from which a fraudulent intent could be inferred. The appellant says the transfer of assets in the rollover was not "voluntary" but was rather for "valuable" consideration, and that while the "nature" of BHL's assets changed as a result of the transfer, its net financial position did not.

[22] The appellant submits that no creditors of JW Auto relied on the asset holdings of BHL in deciding to advance credit to JW Auto and that no creditors of BHL were prejudiced by the asset transfer. The appellant further contends that its asset transfer to Braydon following redemption of Braydon's preferred shares was a bona fide payment to a creditor.

[23] The appellant therefore contends that, in any event, its conduct falls within the defence to an allegation of a fraudulent conveyance afforded by s. 2 of the Act, in that the transfer was for good consideration, made in good faith, and made to a person (William Botham was the directing mind of Braydon as well as BHL) who had no notice or knowledge of any collusion or fraud.

B. The Respondent's Position

[24] On the question of how to construe s. 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, counsel for the respondent says the words "collusion, guile, malice or fraud" add little or nothing to the meaning of the section. The respondent says the only intent necessary to contravene the section is the intent to put assets out of the reach of one's creditors. If there is an intent to delay or hinder a creditor's rights, the transfer is void as against the creditor. The respondent says that even if the transferor has other legitimate intentions, so long as one intent is to put assets out of a creditor's reach, that is sufficient to void the disposition. So the respondent says despite the fact that BHL (through William Botham) intended to obtain a tax advantage from the deal, the transfer is nonetheless a contravention of s. 1 if its intent and effect is to defeat creditors' claims.

[25] The respondent says the meaning attributed by the trial judge to the words of s. 1 is consistent with a long line of cases, both in British Columbia and elsewhere. Counsel says there was no legal error in the judge's interpretation of s. 1.

[26] As to whether the appellant had an intention prohibited by s. 1, the respondent says that is a question of fact on which this Court should defer to the judge's findings unless the appellant establishes a palpable and overriding error. Here the respondent says there was ample evidence, including the admissions of William Botham himself, on which the proscribed intent could be found.

[27] The effect of the transfer was to place all of BHL's real estate assets in the hands of Braydon. BHL was left with the preferred shares it acquired as consideration for the real estate transfer. And in addition, BHL was left with the debts it owed previously to CFI, Shamrock and the Bank of Montreal, as well as its indebtedness to SSDL as a result of the transaction. BHL also became liable, as a general partner, to all of JW Auto's creditors.

[28] The respondent says it is no answer for the appellant to say that no creditor was pressing for payment at the time of the transfer, and that it is wrong to say that no creditor was prejudiced by the transfer. The fact is that the real assets were put out of reach of BHL's creditors, and that they were prejudiced because it was far more difficult to execute against the preferred shares than it would have been to execute against the real estate.

[29] The respondent concedes that it would have been perfectly lawful for BHL to limit its liability by incorporating a new company to invest in JW Auto. But, the respondent points out, that is what BHL explicitly decided not to do because of its desire to obtain both limited liability and tax advantages.

[30] The respondent says that the defence available to transferors under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act is not available to the appellant on the facts of this case. To say, as the appellant suggests, that the transfer to Braydon was payment to an existing creditor, has no air of reality. Braydon was created for the sole purpose of receiving BHL's assets. The consideration for the transfer, even if "good consideration", was by no means of the same nature or quality as the assets Braydon received. In the result, Braydon ultimately paid nothing and BHL was left with nothing of value.

[31] In any event, the respondent says the transfer could not be said to be in good faith because the controlling mind of both BHL and Braydon was William Botham, and his intent to defeat BHL's creditors must also be attributed to Braydon. And for the same reason, Braydon is fixed with notice of BHL's improper intent (see Chan v. Stanwood).

[32] The respondent says that neither legitimate business goals, nor tax or estate planning advantages can excuse a fraudulent conveyance. That is especially so here where the only "estate planning" achieved by the transaction was to protect BHL's assets from its creditors.

V. The Provisions of the Statute

[33] The Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c.163, provides, in full:

Fraudulent conveyance to avoid debt or duty of others

Digitized by Google

1 If made to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies
(a) a disposition of property, by writing or otherwise,
(b) a bond,
(c) a proceeding, or
(d) an order

is void and of no effect against a person or the person's assignee or personal representative whose rights and obligations by collusion, guile, malice or fraud are or might be disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded, despite a pretence or other matter to the contrary.

Application of Act

2 This Act does not apply to a disposition of property for good consideration and in good faith lawfully transferred to a person who, at the time of the transfer, has no notice or knowledge of collusion or fraud.

[Emphasis added.]

VI. Analysis

[34] The defendant points to the words in s. 1, "... by collusion, guile, malice or fraud ..." as showing a clear legislative requirement for a morally blameworthy intent, or mala fides, on the part of the transferor in order to constitute the conduct proscribed by the Act.

[35] Here, the plaintiff conceded and the trial judge found that William Botham had no "dishonest intent". The question, then, is whether the mere intent to delay or hinder creditors is sufficient or whether mala fides must be established under s. 1 of the Act.

A. Legislative History

[36] It is generally acknowledged that the fraudulent conveyance statutes enacted in British Columbia have their roots in the Statute of Elizabeth, 1571 (13 Eliz. 1), c.5. In a feasibility study written for the Uniform Law Conference of Canada, Civil Law Section (August, 2004), Professor C.R.B. Dunlop wrote:

[6] English law on fraudulent conveyances dates back to the Middle Ages, but the first comprehensive attempt at prohibition may be the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, 1571, usually referred to as the Statute of Elizabeth. The Statute sought to avoid "feigned, covinous and fraudulent" transfers of land and personalty entered into with the intent to "delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others" of their just and lawful claims. S. 2 provided that such conveyances should be "clearly and utterly void, frustrate and of no effect" as against "creditors and others" whose claims might be delayed by such conveyances. S. 6 contained the important proviso that the Act did not extend to a conveyance for "good consideration" entered into bona fide and without notice of the fraud. The Statute of Elizabeth on its face created a criminal offence, but the courts quickly saw its potential as the foundation for a civil action to avoid fraudulent conveyances of exigible property by debtors. Since 1571, the courts have been active in creating a large and complex body of law which purports to interpret the Statute but which in reality constructs a new right in "creditors and others" to challenge and avoid fraudulent conveyances.

[37] The Statute of Elizabeth was, in Dunlop's view, "... intended primarily to create a crime, not a civil cause of action" (at para. 36).

[38] The first Fraudulent Conveyance Act in British Columbia was enacted in 1897 (R.S.B.C. 1897, c. 86). It adopted the language of the Statute of Elizabeth, including the words "contrived of malice, fraud, covin, collusion or guile". The original B.C. statute also included, in s. 3, the penal provision of the Statute of Elizabeth, imposing penalties and forfeitures for the fraud, including imprisonment.

[39] The penal provision remained in the British Columbia statute through successive amendments and re-enactments until it was formally repealed by the Legislature in 1987 (Miscellaneous Statute Amendment (No.2) Act, S.B.C. 1987, c. 43).

[40] The penal provision of the 1960 Act was contained in s. 3, which concluded with the words:

... and also, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer imprisonment for one half year without bail or mainprize.

[41] In 1965, the constitutionality of this legislation was challenged. In Allison & Burnham Concrete Ltd. v. Mountain View Construction Ltd. et al, 54 D.L.R. (2d) 67 (B.C.S.C.); [1965] B.C.J. No. 157, Mr. Justice Ruttan said:

14 Section 3 then imposes penalties and forfeitures for the fraud and concludes with these words: "... and also, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer imprisonment for one-half year without bail or mainprize."

15 There is no doubt that the portion just quoted from s. 3 of the Act is beyond the jurisdiction of a Provincial Legislature. It refers to a criminal process resulting in a term of imprisonment and as such is entirely within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government in criminal law. In R. v. Smith (1852), 6 Cox C.C. 31 at p. 37, Maule, J., had this to say about the identical words as they appear in the English statute:

It surely could never be contended that the meaning of the statute is, that when such a court has given judgment for the damages, it should proceed to award to the defendant the punishment of imprisonment for half a year. The humanity of our law has established a clear distinction between civil and criminal proceedings, and this act of Parliament cannot be supposed to sanction so anomalous a course as that. It is obvious that by some means or another, imprisonment is to be awarded after a proper conviction before a recognised tribunal. How then can that be done, otherwise than by indictment?

16 This section, of course, would never be invoked in criminal prosecutions for the same subject-matter is covered in the Criminal Code of Canada. But I do not agree with counsel for the defendant that because the statute has ventured to legislate in part in the field of criminal law the whole statute is therefore "in pith and substance" to be deemed a criminal one and therefore ultra vires in toto. Mr. Vogel cites the Alberta decision of Connors v. Egli, reflex, [1924] 2 D.L.R. 59, 20 A.L.R. 205, [1924] 1 W.W.R. 1050, where it was held by the Alberta Court of Appeal that s. 3 of the statute is criminal law and the ground having been occupied by the Criminal Code of Canada, is not now in force in the Province of Alberta.

[42] Ruttan J. concluded that while the imprisonment portion of s. 3 was "clearly within the scope of criminal law and invalid in a provincial statute, the remainder of s. 3 is clearly a matter of civil suit and therefore intra vires the Provincial Legislature." (at para. 18, citations omitted).

[43] Despite this declaration of invalidity, the British Columbia statute retained a penal provision in the 1979 revision. Section 3 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c.142 provided:

A fraudulent disposition under this Act is an offence punishable on conviction by 6 months imprisonment.

[44] Finally, in 1987 the Provincial Legislature repealed ss. 2 and 3 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1987, c.43.

[45] The repeal of ss. 2 and 3 of the Act left remaining s. 1 and what had been s. 4. They now appear as ss. 1 and 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c.163, quoted in full above at para. 34.

[46] As is evident, the words in s. 1 "... by collusion, guile, malice or fraud ..." remain in the Act to the present time.

B. Case Law

[47] The appellant relies heavily on two British Columbia decisions as support for its submission that a dishonest or quasi-criminal intent in the transferor is required before a conveyance may be set aside under s. 1.

[48] In Westinghouse Canada Limited v. Caldwell, Hickman (1979), 31 C.B.R. (N.S.) 276 (B.C.S.C); [1979] B.C.J. No. 604, Taylor J., applying the provisions of the 1960 version of the Act said at p. 282:

> ... A careful reading of the legislation as a whole discloses an intention to visit with criminal as well as civil consequences transfers of property which have been contrived so as to "delay, hinder or defraud" creditors and "other persons". It not only declares such conveyances void as against persons thereby "disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded" but condemns the parties responsible for such transactions to six months imprisonment and also to substantial monetary penalties. Thus the conduct at which the statute is aimed is conduct deserving of criminal sanction. It deals, albeit somewhat more broadly, with the offence now described in s. 350 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, which carries a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment.
> Insofar as it forms a valid part of the law of British Columbia, the Fraudulent Conveyances Act may be regarded as providing a civil remedy to those persons who have been the victims of conduct of a criminal, or at least quasi-criminal, character designed to defeat creditors. There must, it seems, be mala fides in the intent of the transaction.

[49] The underlined paragraph was quoted, with apparent approval, by this Court in First Royal Enterprises Ltd. v. Armadillo's Restaurant Ltd. 1995 CanLII 605 (BC CA), (1995), 15 B.C.L.R. (3d) 254 (C.A.) at para. 23.

[50] I would make the following observations about these two judgments. In Westinghouse, the learned judge concluded that the Act was aimed at providing a remedy for victims of conduct that was criminal or quasi-criminal in nature and that "mala fides in the intent" was, therefore, a necessary element. This conclusion is clearly based on the presence of the penal provision which formed part of the 1960 statute that he was applying.

[51] It does not appear that the decision of Mr. Justice Ruttan in Allison & Burnham Concrete Ltd. was drawn to the attention of the Court in Westinghouse. If the learned judge there had had his mind directed to the earlier judgment, and to Ruttan J.'s declaration that the imprisonment portion of s. 3 was ultra vires the province, he could not have relied on it to support his reasoning.

[52] Similarly, in First Royal Enterprises, the Court was apparently not made aware of the judgment in Allison & Burnham Concrete Ltd. The Court there was applying the 1979 version of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act which retained the imprisonment provision in s. 3. There is no indication in the judgment that the imprisonment portion of s. 3 had been declared ultra vires in 1965.

[53] I am therefore of the view that neither Westinghouse nor First Royal Enterprises can be considered as sound authority for the proposition that a dishonest intent, or mala fides, is necessary to the application of s. 1 of the Act. In any event, with the repeal of s. 3 in 1987, such authority would no longer be applicable to the modern Act.

Digitized by Google

[54] Counsel for the appellant referred to Havel v. Galemar Holdings Ltd. and Fabbro (1981), 36 O.R. (2d) 348 (H.C.J.), but I do not read that case as authority for the proposition that anything more than an intent to defeat creditors is required in order to render a transfer void under the equivalent Ontario statute.

[55] Counsel for the appellant also relied extensively on Mandryk v. Merko (1971), 19 D.L.R. (3d) 238 (Man. C.A.). As I understand the judgment in Mandryk, the Court held that the intent required to render a transfer void was the intent to defeat creditors; that such an intent could be inferred from evidence of the transaction and other circumstances; that the direct evidence of the transferor must be considered; and that any inference or "presumption" to be drawn from the effect of the transfer was not conclusive.

[56] I do not read Mandryk as holding that a subjectively dishonest or fraudulent state of mind in the transferor is required to render the transfer void. In simple terms, the action in Mandryk failed because the plaintiff failed to prove, as a matter of fact, the transferor's intent to delay, defeat or hinder his creditors.

[57] In considering what meaning, if any, is to be given to the words "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud" in s. 1, it is instructive to consider the substantial body of authority holding it unnecessary to establish mala fides on the part of the transferor to commit fraud. The focus in the case law has been on the provision of a civil remedy for creditors disadvantaged by the conduct of their debtors.

[58] In Freeman v. Pope (1870), L.R. 5 Ch App 538, Lord Hatherley stated at pg. 540 that the principle on which the Fraudulent Conveyance Act is based is "that persons must be just before they are generous, and that debts must be paid before gifts can be made". As a result, if the necessary effect of a conveyance was to defeat, hinder or delay the creditors, that necessary effect was to be considered as showing an intention to do so. Such intention was sufficient to establish a fraudulent conveyance.

[59] Freeman was applied in Mackay v. Douglas (1872) L.R. 14 E.Q. 106, where Vice-Chancellor Malins said at p. 120:

... It is not at all necessary to shew that a man had any fraudulent intent in making a settlement as the law is now settled. ... The statute speaks of cases where the creditors "are, shall, or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered, delayed, or defrauded," and it is not necessary to shew an intention to do that, because if the settlement must have that effect the Court presumes the intention and will attribute it to the settlor. ... So I dare say that Mr. Douglas had no fraudulent intention, according to his view, in making the settlement, and that he thought it a prudent thing to protect his wife and children. But in doing that he has, within the meaning of this statute, committed a fraudulent act, because, going into trade, he was taking away the only property which would be available for his creditors.

[60] In this Province, there are several cases articulating the intent required by s. 1 to render a disposition void. In Ocean Construction Supplies Ltd. v. Creative Prosperity Capital Corp. 1995 CanLII 740 (BC SC), (1995), 34 C.B.R. (3d) 241, 1995 CanLII 740 (B.C.S.C.), Madam Justice Baker said:

25 In essence, a fraudulent conveyance is a transfer of an interest in property which is made with the intention, and which has the effect, of hindering or impairing the right of a creditor or other person to satisfy a claim against the transferor. It is not necessary for the person seeking relief to show that the transferor was insolvent at the time the transfer was made, and the applicant need not establish that he or she was a creditor, or an unsecured creditor, at the time the transfer was made: Re Skinner (1960), 27 D.L.R. (2d) 74 (B.C.S.C.).

26 All that the applicant must show is that the transferor, in making the gift or transfer, did so with intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors or others: Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Ash (1964), 47 D.L.R. (2d) 620 (B.C.S.C.); Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Boukalis 1987 CanLII 2694 (BC CA), (1987), 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 190 (C.A.).

[61] In Jaston & Co. v. McCarthy 1996 CanLII 2982 (BC SC), (1996), 41 C.B.R. (3d) 212, 1996 CanLII 2982 (B.C.S.C.), Mr. Justice K. Smith said much the same thing:

85 The plaintiffs' case on this claim is made out on the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. McCarthy. Each testified that their intention was to distance the shares in McCarthy Realty (72) Ltd. and Dev-Gro Holdings Ltd. from potential claims by clients of Mr. McCarthy's notary practice. That intention resulted, they say, from advice they received at a notaries' convention to shelter their assets from such claims because of a reduction in the limit of third party liability insurance available to notaries. Thus, the transfer of these shares was not bona fide but was made for the purpose of avoiding future claims of creditors.

86 It is sufficient to fix the defendants with liability if they foresaw potential creditors who might be defeated by the conveyance: Newlands Sawmills Ltd. v. Bateman, 31 B.C.R. 351, reflex, [1922] 3 W.W.R. 649, 70 D.L.R. 165 (C.A.), appl'd Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Boukalis 1987 CanLII 2694 (BC CA), (1987), 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 190 (C.A.), at p. 196; Bank of Montreal v. Kelliher (1980), 36 C.B.R.) (N.S.) 205 (B.C.S.C.) at p. 210. On their own evidence they foresaw such creditors here.

However, the other provincial statutes all refer to some sort of "conveyance" or "disposition "of "property" with the "intent to defeat" creditors' claims. All the provincial fraud provisions are clearly remedial in nature, and their purpose is to ensure that creditors may set aside a broad range of transactions involving a broad range of property interests, where such transactions were effected for the purpose of defeating the legitimate claims of creditors. Therefore, the statutes should be given the fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation that best ensures the attainment of their objects as required by provincial statutory interpretation legislation ... I agree with the following observation by Professor Dunlop in Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1995), at p. 598, that the purpose of fraudulent conveyance legislation:

... is to strike down all conveyances of property made with the intention of delaying, hindering or defrauding creditors and others except for conveyances made for good consideration and bona fide to persons not having notice of such fraud. The legislation is couched in very general terms and should be interpreted liberally. [Emphasis added by Gonthier J.]

[63] In Chan v. Stanwood, 2002 BCCA 474 (CanLII), 2002 BCCA 474, 6 B.C.L.R. (4th) 273, Madam Justice Newbury, giving the judgment of this Court, noted the differences in the intent required between cases where consideration for a transfer was inadequate or nominal, and those where "valuable" consideration had passed. She said:

20 The Commission's report also stated, however, that the significance of consideration lies both in its relation to the intention behind the transaction and in relation to its effect. Where the consideration is inadequate or nominal, a creditor need only show that the Transferor intended to delay, hinder or defraud the creditor of his remedies. Where on the other hand valuable consideration has passed, the creditor must also show that the transferee actively participated in the fraud. As stated by this court in Meeker Cedar Products Ltd. v. Edge (1968), 68 D.L.R. (2d) 294 (B.C.C.A.) (aff'd at (1968), 1 D.L.R. (3d) 240 (S.C.C.)):

... it is clear as a matter of interpretation of the statute as a whole and upon authority that where a sale is made for good and valuable consideration the transaction will not be void by reason of the purchaser's having notice of knowledge of the vendor's intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others unless it be proved that the purchase was actually privy to the fraud, i.e., a party to carrying out the fraudulent intention and purpose. [at 299; emphasis added.]

21 Where valuable consideration has passed, then, the focus is not on the sufficiency of that consideration but on the intentions of both parties to the transaction. The trial judge rightly stated at para. 36 of her Reasons that in this case, the intention of the holding companies must be taken to have been the intention of the Stanwoods. Further, she found it was clear on the evidence that the Stanwoods had intended to delay and defeat their creditors by exchanging their exigible assets for shares which were "not effectively exigible".

22 I agree with these conclusions. ... Although exigible in theory, the various restrictions and obstacles placed in the way of any 'unfriendly' holder meant that in fact they were not worth executing against. The exchange of exigible assets for the Preferred shares delayed, hindered or defrauded the Chans – and did so by design. This "design" or "purpose" constitutes the "fraudulent intent" required by the Act ...

[64] Most recently, in Royal Bank of Canada v. Clarke, 2009 BCSC 481 (CanLII), 2009 BCSC 481, Madam Justice Griffin said:

[21] I am bound by the authorities that have clearly held that it is unnecessary to show any dishonest intention, other than the intention to move the property out of reach of potential creditors, for the Act to apply: Jaston & Co. v. McCarthy 1996 CanLII 2982 (BC SC), (1996), 41 C.B.R. (3d) 212 (B.C.S.C.) as cited in Abakhan at para. 75.

[65] In my respectful opinion, a review of the case law amply demonstrates that a dishonest intent, or mala fides, is not necessary to avoid a transaction under s. 1 of the Act.

C. Principles of Statutory Interpretation

[66] The guiding principle of statutory interpretation is that the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament: Bell Express Vu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), 2002 SCC 42 at para. 26.

[67] Mr. Justice Gonthier in Royal Bank of Canada v. North American Life Assurance Co. (supra) said that the fraud provisions in provincial statutes "are clearly remedial in nature". The cases reviewed above support the remedial purpose of the legislation. They have essentially ignored the words "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud".

[68] In Springman, M.A. et al, Fraudulent Conveyances And Preferences, looseleaf, Toronto (Carswell, 2009), the learned author comments on the inclusion of the words "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud" in s. 1 of the B.C. Statute. The learned author says:

Furthermore, the addition of the concepts of "collusion, guile, malice or fraud," arguably as a way of adding some flesh to the earlier description of the transferor's intent, is also interesting. But would the addition of these concepts mean that a disposition, etc. with the intent "to delay, hinder or defraud," but somehow not animated by "collusion, guile, malice or fraud", would be immune from impeachment under the Act? And if the response is that, in the very nature of things, the transferor could never have the intent "to delay, hinder or defraud" without "collusion, guile, malice or fraud" being involved, then what is the value of the latter words? Perhaps there are simply too many words used to describe the legislators' more simple purpose here. At the very least, s.1 would seem to leave itself open to a host of possible arid arguments. [Footnote 23 at 1-13 to 1-14]

[69] In the period when dispositions under the Act attracted penal consequences, it was at least arguable that a dishonest intention in the transferor was a necessary element of the prohibited transaction.

[70] However, for many years, and certainly since the repeal of the penal provisions in 1987, the purpose and scheme of the B.C. Fraudulent Conveyance Act has been to provide a civil remedy to creditors. Its purpose is to protect creditors where property dispositions by debtors "... were effected for the purpose of defeating the legitimate claims of creditors" per Sykes (supra). As a result, the words "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud" no longer perform a meaningful function in the text.

[71] Thus, as stated in Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 5th ed. (Markham: LexisNexis, 2008) at pp. 178-179, in circumstances where:

... courts encounter words in a legislative text for which no satisfactory interpretation can be offered ... courts may strike out the offending language if the text makes sense without it. ... In effect, the court must conclude that the words to be struck perform no meaningful function in the text, contrary to the presumption against tautology; their presence is simply a mistake.

[72] The Act not only makes sense after removal of these words, but accords with the modern purpose and scheme of the Act. Therefore, the words "by collusion, guile, malice or fraud" should be struck.

[73] The only intent now necessary to avoid a transaction under the modern version of the Act is the intent to "put one's assets out of the reach of one's creditors" (per RBC v. Clarke). No further dishonest or morally blameworthy intent is required.

D. Proof of Intent

[75] For example, in Mackay v. Douglas (supra), Malins, V.C. said (at p. 120) that where a disposition had the effect of hindering or delaying or defeating creditors, "the Court presumes the intention and will attribute it to the settlor". That was held to be sufficient proof of the intent even though Mr. Douglas apparently gave evidence and "had no fraudulent intention". Mr. Douglas thought he had made a settlement of property as "a prudent thing to protect his wife and children" (p. 120). Despite this, it was held to be a fraudulent conveyance.

[76] In Ocean Construction (supra), Baker J. said this about proof of fraudulent intent:

27 Fraudulent intent is essentially a matter of fact to be proved in the circumstances of each particular case. Proof that the transferor intended to defeat or delay its creditors usually involves drawing inferences from the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Where some consideration has flowed from the transferee to the transferor, the court may consider the adequacy of the consideration in relation to the issue of intent, since a transfer at an undervalue raises suspicions about motive. Inadequate consideration may be considered to be a badge of fraud.

[77] In that case, the controlling mind of the defendant company, Mr. Lee, gave evidence as to the debtor's solvency, which the court did not accept (para. 37). The transfer was held to be void based on the inference drawn from the transfer itself and other circumstances (para. 39) despite Mr. Lee's evidence to the contrary.

[78] In Jaston v. MCarthy (supra) the defendants testified that their intention to protect assets was based on advice concerning potential risks arising from reduced insurance coverage (para. 85). The Supreme Court of British Columbia held that the defendants contravened the prohibition in s. 1 because they foresaw that potential creditors might be defeated by the impugned conveyance.

[79] In Chan v. Stanwood (supra) the intent to delay or defeat creditors was inferred at trial from evidence that "exigible assets" were exchanged "for shares" which were "not effectively exigible". The defendants' intent to put assets beyond the reach of their creditors was inferred from the effect of the transaction, and despite the fact that the defendants acted on professional advice.

[80] In many of the cases cited there is no direct evidence of the grantor's intent. Intent could only be proven by drawing an inference from the grantor's conduct, the effect of the transfer or other circumstances. However, in some cases where the grantor has given evidence, there may be direct evidence of his intent and the question of proof then turns on the weight or credit given to the direct evidence, viewed in light of the other circumstances and the inferences to be drawn.

VII. Application of the Law to the Facts of This Case

Digitized by Google

[81] Having established that the intent to delay or hinder creditors is sufficient under s. 1 of the Act, it is now necessary to assess the trial judge's finding that the disposition in this case was a fraudulent conveyance.

[82] The trial judge found that on the whole of the evidence, Mr. Botham had the requisite intent to delay and hinder creditors. He stated:

[65] Proof of intent to defeat or delay creditors typically requires drawing inferences from the circumstances surrounding the transaction. However, it is not necessary in this case to draw an inference at all. Here, there is direct evidence of the intent of Mr. Botham and his solicitors. Mr. Botham's answers on examination for discovery and in his affidavit make his intent patently clear:

395. Q. Okay. Well here's my suggestion. This BHL - Braydon transaction had nothing to do with estate planning unless you would say that the protection of your assets from claims of creditors is part of estate planning?

A. That I could agree with.

396. Q. All right. And the whole motivation behind the BHL - Braydon transaction again was to ensure that creditors wouldn't get assets of the estate?

A. Yes.

[66] The letter from Owen Bird dated October 31, 2005 describes the objectives and purpose of the Transaction as follows:

1. Move the real property of BHL to a new company ("Newco") to ensure that BHL's real property and other assets are not exposed to its new leasing venture; and

2. Limit the activities and gross revenue of BHL to its interest in the JW Auto Group partnership.

[emphasis added]

[67] In his affidavit sworn October 3, 2007 in Action No. S076370, Mr. Botham stated:

...I did not want to cause BHL to go into the partnership with the nine properties at risk of execution by creditors of the partnership.

[68] In the same affidavit Mr. Botham deposed that it was not his "objective...to deprive creditors of any remedies against BHL... ." However, this statement is inconsistent with all of the evidence in this case and cannot be accepted.

[69] For these reasons, it is not necessary to attempt to draw an inference. Mr. Botham's evidence, taken as a whole, is conclusive as to his intent to defeat BHL's creditors and must result in the finding that the Transaction was a fraudulent conveyance.

[83] As a result, the trial judge concluded:

[77] Based on the foregoing, I find that BHL did engage in a fraudulent conveyance, despite Mr. Botham's lack of dishonest intent. A transaction which is the result of an honest intent to defeat one's creditors is precisely one of the situations caught by the Fraudulent Conveyance Act.

[84] Counsel for the appellant argues that the judge made a palpable and overriding error in relying on Mr. Botham's evidence on examination for discovery. He argues that those answers suggest that Mr. Botham and BHL had only one intention, namely to protect the assets from creditors' claims. He argues that there was other evidence of Mr. Botham's legitimate business purposes, namely to gain the benefit of the s. 85 tax rollover. Counsel for the appellant placed much emphasis on the facts that the appellant was pursuing a prudent and legitimate business strategy in attempting to take advantage of the capital cost allowance claims available under s. 85 of the Income Tax Act, and in attempting to limit his liability when investing in the new venture, JW Auto.

[85] Such arguments do not establish a palpable and overriding error. As this Court put it in Chan v. Stanwood, "the question in every case is whether it was carried out 'to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies'." While Botham may have been pursuing other business objectives, such as trying to obtain tax advantages, it is nevertheless clear that he had the intent to put BHL's assets beyond the reach of JW Auto's creditors. This is what the trial judge found, stating:

BHL entered into the partnership with Mr. Welsh at a time when BHL had substantial assets. As a partner, BHL was responsible for all debts incurred by the partnership. BHL then acted to shelter its assets from the claims of present and future creditors of the partnership. BHL did this by transferring its assets to Braydon, a related company, for little to no consideration. (para. 81).

[86] This is a clear finding of fact that is supported by the evidence. The trial judge's findings cannot be characterized as palpable and overriding errors.

[87] There is also no dispute that the effect of the transfer was to delay and hinder the creditors of BHL, both present and future. Section 1 captures transfers intended to defeat the rights of creditors and "others," which includes future creditors: Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Bukalis 1987 CanLII 2694 (BC CA), (1987), 34 D.L.R. (4th) 481, 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 190 (C.A.) at 484. As a general partner of JW Auto, BHL was, as the trial judge found, "responsible for all debts incurred by the partnership." Therefore, by transferring its assets to Braydon, BHL was not only hindering its creditors, but was hindering the present and future creditors of JW Auto. As the trial judge found, at para. 81, creditors' claims currently exceed $20 million.

[88] The appellant also argues that it is legitimate to limit the assets which one puts at risk in a business venture, otherwise corporations would be illegal. However, the trial judge correctly found, at para. 81 of his reasons, that while BHL could have limited its liability by incorporating a new corporation, it made the explicit choice not to do so. It would have been legitimate for BHL to limit its liability in the new venture by incorporating a new corporation to act as the general partner in JW Auto. However, Botham and BHL wanted to achieve two objectives, one being to limit liability and the other being to obtain the tax advantages under s. 85 of the ITA. By incorporating a new corporation, it was possible to limit liability, but it would not have been possible to obtain the tax advantages. Therefore, Botham and BHL made the choice to try to achieve both the limited liability and tax advantages by transferring the assets of BHL out of the company and into Braydon. As the appellant states in its factum, "...the plan was to empty an old company of its assets unrelated to auto leasing, and use the old company for the partnership rather than incorporate a new one, because using the old company allowed for a tax benefit." However, in doing this and in choosing not to incorporate a new company, BHL engaged in a fraudulent conveyance.

[89] Finally, the trial judge cannot be said to have made a palpable and overriding error in his factual findings relating to the defence in s. 2. The trial judge stated:

[80] There are three parts to this defence. It requires that the disposition be made (1) for good consideration, (2) in good faith, and (3) to a person who had no notice or knowledge of the fraud. The defence does not apply in the case at bar. I find that there was no good consideration which passed from Braydon to BHL for the assets. At the end of the Transaction, BHL was left with virtually no assets while Braydon had obtained $19 million in assets. The Transaction was clearly not in good faith based on the direct evidence of Mr. Botham's intent with regards to BHL's assets. Finally, given that Mr. Botham was the directing mind of both Braydon and BHL, it cannot be said that the transferee had no notice or knowledge of the fraud.

[90] In my view, there was evidence on which the judge could properly find that none of the elements in s. 2 had been established. While the parties disagree on appeal as to whether or not there was good consideration, it does not affect the disposition because Braydon cannot establish the other two elements under s. 2. As the trial judge stated, because Botham controlled both BHL and Braydon, his knowledge and intent to delay and hinder BHL's creditors must be imputed to both corporations.

Ontario Supreme Court
Bank of Montreal v. Chu
Date: 1994-02-28

Bank of Montreal and Chu et al.

Ontario Court (General Division), Wilson J. February 28, 1994
Mark Hartman, for plaintiff.
Kirk M. Baert, for defendants.

[1] WILSON J.:—In this action, a motion for default judgment was granted by the Honourable Mr. Justice Wright on April 13, 1993 (the conveyance judgment). Affidavit material was filed by the plaintiff in support of its request for default judgment. The matrimonial home, municipally known as 22 Patrick Boulevard, North York (the home) was acquired in 1988 by the defendants as joint tenants. The deed dated May 2, 1989, and registered December 9, 1991, transferred the joint tenancy interest of Eva M. Chu (Eva) to her husband Jim Chung-Len Chu (Jim) (the transfer). The conveyance judgment set aside the transfer as fraudulent contrary to the provisions of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.29 (the Act). In this motion, Eva seeks to set aside the conveyance judgment pursuant to rule 19.08(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure. This motion raises the following issues:

1. What is the test for determining whether the defendant has raised a defence on the merits for the purpose of setting aside a default judgment?

2. Does the evidence of Eva's circumstances in 1989 or in 1991 lead to an inference of fraudulent intent?

3. In a fraudulent conveyance action, is the appropriate time frame for considering the intent of Eva and Jim the time the deed was executed in 1989, or the time the deed was registered in 1991? It is acknowledged that there was a significant deterioration in Eva's financial situation between 1989 and 1991 and different inferences may fairly be drawn from the circumstances at the two time frames.

The facts

[2] Many of the facts are not in dispute. I will begin with the uncontested facts and will then consider the contested facts.

[3] In May of 1988, Eva arranged for a $50,000 bank loan for her business (the loan). On May 22, 1988, a personal financial statement was prepared with the representative of the bank. The personal financial statement indicates equity of $260,000 for the old house and a $20,000 deposit on the new house. When the personal financial statement was prepared, Eva had signed the agreement of purchase and sale for the acquisition of the home as a joint tenant with Jim. She intended to, and did, in fact, take title to the home as a joint tenant. The former matrimonial home was registered in Jim's name alone. The bank states that they relied upon the information in the personal financial statement, particularly on her interest in the home, in lending funds to Eva. In spite of requests, Eva did not provide updated financial disclosure. In January 1992, Eva defaulted on the loan.

[4] On October 6, 1992, the bank obtained default judgment against Eva in the amount of $51,967.04 as a consequence of her default on the loan. As well, the bank obtained judgment on October 6, 1992, against Jim in the amount of $15,820.66 pursuant to his written guarantee of Eva's loan. These judgments are not being disputed.

[5] The transfer is dated May 2, 1989, but was registered on December 9, 1991. It is to be noted that the land transfer tax affidavit appears on its face to have been initially dated 1989, later changed to 1991 and subsequently changed to May 2, 1989. The affidavit is commissioned by a lawyer who was not acting for the defendants in May of 1989. The reasonable inference may be drawn that the affidavit of land transfer tax was backdated from 1991 to May 2, 1989. There is, however, no evidence to dispute the defendants' evidence that the transfer was executed May 2, 1989.

[6] The transfer was prepared by Mr. Frank Seto who was a solicitor with McMillan Binch. Mr. Seto's file was produced as an exhibit in this motion. It is evident from the file that Eva's intention in retaining Seto was to attempt to limit her personal liability by incorporating a limited company to conduct her business. As the landlord and the franchisor refused to permit the substitution of the limited company for Eva's sole proprietorship without personal guarantees, Eva decided not to proceed with the transfer of the assets of the business to a limited company.

[7] As part of the plan to limit personal liability, the transfer was prepared and signed. However, Mr. Seto left the country soon after May 2, 1989, and the transfer was not registered. Eva became aware that the transfer was not registered in 1991 when she retained a new solicitor, Mr. Chong. The transfer was registered shortly thereafter, on December 9, 1991. Mr. Chong apparently backdated the commissioning signature of the affidavit of land transfer tax.

[8] The applicant has explained the delay, and the circumstances leading to the default. Eva states that the effect of the transfer did not render her insolvent and unable to pay creditors. She states further by way of defence that there was no fraudulent intent in the transfer. The transfer was made to give effect to the Chinese tradition that the male in a marriage hold property, and to recognize and protect $100,000 advanced in 1988 by Jim's parents to him for the acquisition of the home.

Issue 1: Appropriate test to establish a defence on the merits

[9] This motion is to set aside the default judgment of Justice Wright granted April 13, 1993, pursuant to rule 19.05 of the Rules of Civil Procedure. Affidavit material was filed in support of that request for judgment. The judge was satisfied that the conveyance was fraudulent. This is not a motion to set aside a default judgment of the Registrar pursuant to rule 19.04, supported only by a requisition for default judgment. Rule 19.05(1), (2) and (3) is reproduced below:

19.05(1) Where a defendant has been noted in default, the plaintiff may move before a judge for judgment against the defendant on the statement of claim in respect of any claim for which default judgment has not been signed.

(2) A motion for judgment under subrule (1) shall be supported by evidence given by affidavit if the claim is for unliquidated damages, a divorce or a declaration of the invalidity of a marriage.

(3) On a motion for judgment under subrule (1), the judge may grant judgment, dismiss the action or order that the action proceed to trial and that oral evidence be presented.

[10] This default judgment may be set aside pursuant to rule 19.08(2):

19.08(2) A judgment against a defendant who has been noted in default that is obtained on a motion for judgment on the statement of claim under rule 19.05 or that is obtained after trial may be set aside or varied by a judge on such terms as are just.

[11] In deciding whether discretion will be exercised to set aside default judgment, a court will consider three factors. They are: whether the motion was made as soon as possible, whether the circumstances giving rise to the default are adequately explained, and a consideration of the defence on the merits: James Sturino Realty Ltd. v. Andrew Michaels Group Ltd. reflex, (1988), 64 O.R. (2d) 410, 28 O.A.C. 354 (Div. Ct.).

[12] Of importance in this motion is the last factor. What is intended by "the defence on the merits", or a "triable issue" referred to in the case law?

[13] In assessing the defence on the merits, the relationship between the test used under rule 19.08 and the test used in a motion for judgment under Rule 20 of the Rules of Civil Procedure has not yet been explored. It is useful to consider the possible relationship between the tests utilized under the two rules.

[14] The root decision reflecting a changed approach to motions for summary judgment is the often-quoted Pizza Pizza Ltd. v. Gillespie 1990 CanLII 4023 (ON SC), (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 225, 33 C.P.R. (3d) 515 (Gen. Div.). In that case, Henry J., at pp. 237-38, emphasized the need for a genuine issue for trial and the requirement of taking a good, hard look at the merits of the defence.

[15] Some of the cases decided pursuant to rule 19.08 indicate that the court should take a close look at the merits of the defence. The principles developed and routinely applied under Rule 20 motions are implicitly applied in assessing the merits of the defence in a motion to set aside a default judgment under rule 19.08: see Mantia v. Honour Oak Investments Ltd. reflex, (1985), 50 O.R. (2d) 788 at p. 790, 3 C.P.C. (2d) 28 (H.C.J.), and Allfur Trading Ltd. v. Polizos (1991), 7 C.P.C. (3d) 39 (Master) at p. 41.

[16] In this motion, affidavit material was filed by Eva explaining from her perspective the absence of delay, a reason for the default, and her defence on the merits. I find that the explanations concerning delay and the reason for the default are adequate. In connection with the defence on the merits, the evidence before the court is similar to the kind one would find in a motion for summary judgment. Cross-examinations have taken place upon the affidavits.

[17] I support and adopt the principles enunciated in Emblematic Jewellery Products of Canada Inc. v. Marchant, unreported (December 1, 1992), O.J. No. 2766, where Hockin J., quoting from Dealers Supply (Agriculture) Ltd. v. Tweed Farm & Garden Supplies Ltd. (1987), 22 C.P.C. (2d) 257 (Ont. Dist. Ct.) [at p. 263], states at p. 5:

There is, I believe, good authority for the proposition that, in determining whether or not these requirements have been met, the Judge ought to lean in favour of an affirmative answer simply because prima facie no one should suffer judgment against him except after a full hearing and after a careful determination on the merits. At the same time I think the cases make it clear as well that the satisfaction of these requirements does not automatically dictate success to the applicant. There is still the broad obligation to look at all the circumstances and to be satisfied that no injustice is done to the innocent party—the respondent to the motion—in any order that is finally made.

[18] The principle of a right to a full hearing must be balanced with the emerging belief that if there is no genuine issue for trial, all litigants should be spared the cost and disruption of litigation. I echo the words of Morden A.C.J.O., in Irving Ungerman Ltd. v. Galanis reflex, (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 545 at pp. 550-51, 83 D.L.R. (4th) 734 (C.A.):

Digitized by Google

A litigant's "day in court", in the sense of a trial, may have traditionally been regarded as the essence of procedural justice and its deprivation the mark of procedural injustice. There can, however, be proceedings in which, because they do not involve any genuine issue which requires a trial, the holding of a trial is unnecessary and, accordingly, represents a failure of procedural justice. In such proceedings the successful party has been both unnecessarily delayed in the obtaining of substantive justice and been obliged to incur added expense.

[19] Consistent with the policy of balancing the applicant's right to a trial with the respondent's rights to a speedy resolution is one in which the defence itself is examined. In order to give full and fair consideration to the issue of whether the application has a defence on the merits, the principles applicable in a motion for summary judgment should be considered in assessing whether a default judgment ought to be set aside. Does the defence on the merits raise a genuine issue for trial? Does the defence have an air of reality about it in light of the evidence brought forward in the motion? Are there real credibility issues relating to important facts? These tests are enunciated in Irving Ungerman Ltd. v. Galanis, supra, at pp. 549-52, and Pizza Pizza Ltd. v. Gillespie supra, at p. 238.

[20] Applying these principles encourages a consistent approach in the application of the Rules of Civil Procedure. As well, the rights of an applicant to a trial and the rights of a respondent to a prompt resolution are balanced. The appropriateness of this approach is emphasized in this case where a judge has granted judgment after considering affidavit material in support of the motion. The judgment ought not to be aside unless the defence suggested raises a genuine issue for trial, having about it an air of reality in the context of all of the evidence. If there are credibility issues relating to important facts in issue, the matter ought to be determined in the context of a trial, rather than a motion.

Issue 2: The Fraudulent Conveyances Act and relevant findings of fact

[21] Sections 2 to 4 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act provide as follows:

2. Every conveyance of real property or personal property and every bond, suit, judgment and execution heretofore or hereinafter made with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or defraud creditors or others of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties or forfeitures are void as against such persons and their assigns.

3. Section 2 does not apply to an estate or interest in real property or personal property conveyed upon good consideration and in good faith to a person not having at the time of the conveyance to him notice or knowledge of the intent set forth in that section.

4. Section 2 applies to every conveyance executed with the intent set forth in that section notwithstanding that it was executed upon a valuable consideration and with the intention, as between the parties to it, of actually transferring to and for the benefit of the transferee the interest expressed to be thereby transferred, unless it is protected under section 3 by reason of good faith and want of notice or knowledge on the part of the purchaser.

[22] A fraudulent conveyance as defined in s. 2 of the Act is a conveyance of real property made with the intent to defeat creditors. Eva's financial situation in May 1989 and December 1991 is obviously relevant to the issue of a fraudulent conveyance. For reasons to be outlined, I find that the inferences that may be drawn in 1989 differ from those in 1991. I outline first the principles that apply.

[23] Regardless of a party's actual intention, fraudulent intent may be inferred from the facts and circumstances at the time of a transfer. If a debtor gives away substantially all assets and has no means by which creditors can be satisfied, the intention to defraud creditors may be implied: Perry v. Perry (1923), 53 O.L.R. 502, [1924] 1 D.L.R. 665 (H.C.J.), reversed 54 O.L.R. 613, [1924] 4 D.L.R. 1177 (C.A.). If the effect of a conveyance is to make the transferor insolvent then the conveyance is void regardless of the intent of the transferor: Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada v. Elliott 1900 CanLII 32 (SCC), (1900), 31 S.C.R. 91.

[24] I conclude that if the evidence on the motion supports the inference of fraudulent intent, or if the conveyance results in Eva being insolvent, then the judgment of Wright J. ought not be set aside. If the evidence does not clearly show that the inference of fraudulent intent must be drawn, and if issues of credibility are involved, then the judgment ought to be set aside on terms, and a trial permitted.

[26] In May 1989, Eva was working in her business known as Koya, Japan in the North York City Centre. There is evidence of some financial difficulty in May 1989, including arrears in royalty payments, potential arrears in lease and capital payments, and funds owing to the landlord. There is, therefore, evidence that Eva was financially vulnerable in 1989 when the transfer was signed. However, there is no evidence before me of Eva's assets in 1989, assuming the transfer is effective from that date.

[27] I cannot then conclude from the evidence before me that Eva was unable to pay her creditors in May 1989. Further details of her finances, including her assets and debts, would be required prior to the adverse inference being drawn that the 1989 transfer is a fraudulent conveyance.

[28] The defendant further and alternatively seeks to rely on s. 3 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act as saving the transfer in question. Section 3 provides that s. 2 will not apply in the case of a transfer for good consideration to a bona fide third party without notice of the fraudulent intent at the time of the transfer.

[29] The defendant states that the husband's parents advanced the sum of $100,000 in 1988. Eva states that the transfer to Jim in May 1989 was made to recognize this advance, as well as to reflect the Chinese tradition that the male in a marriage hold the property. The purpose of the $100,000 was either to acquire the home or, alternatively, to conduct renovations on the home. Eva states that this was valuable consideration flowing through [30] Jim's parents to him and that the property was to be registered in Jim's name to protect the parents' funds.

[31] Although the evidence is uncontradicted that a $100,000 advance was made in 1988, the deed executing the transfer between Eva and Jim was signed in 1989, almost one year later. Generally, past consideration is no consideration: see Eastwood v. Kenyon (1840), 11 Ad. & El. 438, 113 E.R. 482. A line of cases developed at common law to modify this strict principle where a just result required it. The case of Bank of Nova Scotia v. Gaudreau reflex, (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 478 at p. 504, 27 B.L.R. 101 (H.C.J.), submitted by counsel for Eva reflects a group of cases that state that a prior debt was consideration for a subsequent promise, if the promise is incorporated in a bill of exchange, such as a promissory note. This rule is codified by the Bills of Exchange Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-4, s. 52. No promissory note or other bill of exchange exists in this case to permit the conclusion that the $100,000 is consideration for a subsequent promise to transfer the home.

[32] As well, the alleged consideration falls far short of adequate consideration for a 50 per cent interest in the home. Moreover, it is very difficult for Jim to argue that he was a bona fide third party without notice of his spouse's intent. Courts will closely scrutinize transfers between husband and wife, particularly when both spouses continue to enjoy the benefit, use and enjoyment of the asset after the date of the conveyance in question. Section 3 was intended to protect arm's length bona fide purchasers for value. I conclude that s. 3 does not apply.

[33] Nor am I persuaded by Eva's assertion that title was taken in Jim's name to reflect the Chinese tradition that the male in a marriage hold property. Eva was a licensed real estate agent at the time of the acquisition of the home. On several occasions, including when the loan application and financial disclosure was made, documents were signed expressing the intention to take title as joint tenants. The Chinese tradition explanation is transparent and lacks an air of reality. It is not accepted in light of the consistent and contradictory trail of documents.

[34] Although I do not accept Eva's arguments about the $100,000 payment, consideration and Chinese tradition, it is not clear on the evidence before me as to her financial situation if the transfer was effective from May 2, 1989. She states that even after the transfer, she had adequate assets at the time to pay her creditors. Therefore, I conclude that the first ground of a defence advanced by Eva raises a triable issue requiring further inquiry.

[35] The situation in December 1991 is different. By this time, Eva's financial situation had deteriorated significantly. It is clear from the evidence that the effect of the transfer rendered Eva insolvent and unable to satisfy her creditors. Her debts significantly exceeded her assets. In January 1992, perhaps relying on the transfer registered in December 1991, Eva defaulted on her loan payments. I infer the obvious. The effect of the transfer in 1991 rendered Eva insolvent. Regardless of the intention of Eva and Jim, in accordance with Sun Life Assurance Co. v. Elliott, supra, the transaction is a fraudulent conveyance. Alternatively, fraudulent intention may be inferred since Eva, by registering the transfer, gave away substantially all her assets. She had insufficient remaining assets at that time to satisfy creditors: Perry v. Perry, supra.

[36] I reiterate my comments on Eva's defence of consideration and a s. 3 exemption, and the defence concerning Chinese tradition. These two assertions do not meet the test of raising a good defence on the merits.

[37] I conclude that if the intent of the transfer is to be established in December 1991, the inference may clearly be drawn that the transfer is a fraudulent conveyance and ought to be set aside. The judgment of Wright J. should therefore not be set aside.

[38] I have reached a different conclusion for the purpose of this motion in connection with Eva's unestablished financial situation in May 1989.I now turn to the issue of whether the intent of the transfer ought to be assessed at the date the transfer was signed, or at the date the transfer was registered.

Issue 3: Is intent of a conveyance determined at the date of execution or at the date of registration?

[39] After reviewing the relevant statutory provisions and the case law, I conclude that a deed is effective between the parties at the time of its execution, notwithstanding that it is not effective against subsequent purchasers or encumbrancers in the registry system. I review first the relevant statutory provisions followed by the case law.

[40] Section 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act provides that every conveyance made with intent to defeat creditors is void. The transfer was signed May 2, 1989, but not registered, apparently due to an oversight by a solicitor. It was registered December 9, 1991, as instrument No. C74977-9 in the land registry office for the Land Titles Division of Metropolitan Toronto. Sections 78(4) and 86(2) of the Land Titles Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.5, provide as follows:

78(4) When registered, an instrument shall be deemed to be embodied in the register and to be effective according to its nature and intent, and to create, transfer, charge or discharge, as the case requires, the land or estate or interest therein mentioned in the register.

86(2) The transfer shall be completed by the land registrar entering on the register the transferee as owner of the land transferred, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain owner of the land until the registration of the transfer has been completed in accordance with this Act.

[41] At first blush, looking only at the statutory provisions, it appears that the intention of a conveyance is to be determined at the point of registration. However, a review of the case law under both the registry and land titles systems confirms that intention and validity of an instrument as between the parties is determined on the date of execution rather than registration.

[42] In Stonehouse v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1961 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1962] S.C.R. 103, 31 D.L.R. (2d) 118, Ritchie J. found that an executed but unregistered instrument is operative between the parties. In that case, it had the effect of severing the joint tenancy. Similarly, the Ontario Court of Appeal in Hooper v. Hooper, [1953] O.R. 753, [1953] 4 D.L.R. 443, found that a deed was effective between the parties in equity at the date of execution and before registration in the land titles system. Pickup C.J.O. states, at pp. 758-59:

While the system may be said to be a system for registration of title, not of deeds, execution and delivery of the instrument of transfer in the prescribed form, particularly when accompanied by the affidavits requisite for registration, confers a title in equity until registration, and I think that such title is good for all purposes except as against some other title which may obtain priority by being recorded in the land titles office.

[43] The case in the British Columbia Supreme Court, Re Skinner (1960), 27 D.L.R. (2d) 74, deals with the issue of when intent is established for the purposes of the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 156. Wilson J. states [at p. 76]:

There is no proof that the intention of the debtor when he instructed his lawyer in March, 1959 to arrange to convey the property to his wife was a guilty or fraudulent one. Through delay on the part of his solicitor, no fault of his, the instruction was not carried out until a few days after he had signed the guarantee on which he has been found liable.

[44] Although the court found at p. 77 that the presumption of fraud applied, the date on which intention was inferred was the date of execution of the deed, rather than the date of registration:

... it must not be forgotten that, since he occupied the home with his wife, he could derive benefit from having the property execution-proof.

Therefore I think that his earlier honest decision is irrelevant; the things that matter are the things that were, or should have been, in his mind at the date the deed was signed (not, as suggested by counsel, the date of registration, because registration was a matter over which he had no control). Those things, as I have already said were such as to raise a presumption of fraud and that presumption has not been rebutted.

[45] I concur with the approach taken by Wilson J. in Re Skinner and apply the principles enunciated in Hooper and Stonehouse. The date on which fraudulent intent is to be assessed is the date the transfer was executed. The fact that the transfer was not registered in a timely way through a solicitor's inadvertence is not within the control of the applicant. The respondent bank should not benefit gratuitously as a result of a solicitor's error.

Conclusion

[46] For reasons given, the intention of Eva and Jim is to be determined at the date the transfer was signed on May 2, 1989. Based upon the evidence before me, I find that the defendant has met the onus of raising a genuine issue for trial and that the judgment of Wright J. ought to be set aside. In the interim, I grant the bank's request for a certificate of pending litigation on the home. If, between now and the time of trial, the property is sold, the total amount in dispute shall be paid into court to the credit of this action.

[47] It is acknowledged that the costs of this motion for both the applicant and respondent shall be borne by the Law Society of Upper Canada on behalf of Mr. Seto and Mr. Chong. If the parties are unable to agree on the amount of costs of this motion, written submissions may be made to me within 30 days of the release of these reasons.

[48] This is a case-managed matter. The cross-examinations conducted to date shall stand in lieu of discovery; any further discoveries to be completed by March 30, 1994; the pre-trial conference to be scheduled no later than May 30, 1994, at which time a trial date will be set.

ENDORSEMENT—APRIL 13, 1994

[49] I have carefully reviewed the extensive submissions made by counsel for the parties and by Mr. Caplan for Weir and Foulds on behalf of Mr. David Chong and the Law Society of Upper Canada.
[50] After reviewing the written submissions, I asked Mr. Caplan whether he wished an opportunity to argue the matter. He declined.
[51] I note that the defendants served notice on their former solicitor, Mr. Chong, that the defendants were going to seek an order under rule 57.07(1)(c) of the Rules of Civil Procedure that he be personally responsible to pay any costs of the defendants for bringing this motion, and the costs incurred by the plaintiff in bringing its motion for default judgment and resisting the defendants' motion.
[52] The letter of Mr. Caplan dated January 17, 1994 was filed before me in the motion. I had understood that the Law Society was acknowledging responsibility for payment of the legal costs associated with the motion of both the defendants and the plaintiff. I have been corrected by the submissions of Mr. Caplan and make this order based on the principles outlined in s. 131(1) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, and rule 57.07(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.
[53] It appears to me abundantly clear that Mr. Chong, through his conduct, has caused the costs to be incurred for this motion, including the problems of delay and negligence. As well, it appears that Mr. Chong has gone well beyond mere negligence by apparently backdating his signature commissioning the signatures in the deed in question.
[54] It appears to me clear that Mr. Chong should be responsible for the defendants' reasonable costs as well as the plaintiff's reasonable costs in defending the motion and their costs in bringing their motion for default judgment. I have reviewed the submissions concerning the quantum of costs. Although costs should be reasonable, I do not think that this motion warrants costs on a solicitor-client basis.
[55] Although the motion was not argued over a lengthy period of time, there were extensive submissions, factums and two sets of examinations. I am aware of the significant solicitor-client costs incurred by each side based on the submissions before me. I find that an appropriate amount for costs is the amount of $7,500 plus G.S.T. payable by Mr. Chong personally to each of the defendants and the plaintiff.
Motion granted.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Newbury:

[1] In the summer of 1998, the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Stanwood were facing the prospect of bankruptcy. The plaintiffs Mr. and Mrs. Chan had just obtained a judgment against them in the amount of $264,242 plus interest, and other creditors, including the law firm that had represented the Stanwoods in the Chans' litigation, were owed additional sums. The Stanwoods' assets — the family home, three strata lots, two vehicles, and interests in a limited partnership — would for the most part be easily exigible by the Chans, who were pressing for immediate payment of their judgment.

[2] The Stanwoods, who were particularly anxious to continue living with their children in their family home, consulted the defendant Mr. Davis, a solicitor, in July 1998. He provided them with a paper he had written entitled "The Family Holding Company as an Estate Planning and Asset Protection Vehicle for the Living". In it, Mr. Davis advocated the use of a "family holding company to organize ones' [sic] assets in such a way so as to make the use of them available only to the person or persons who created them in the first place while at the same time placing those same assets out of the reach of those strangers who covet them (Like banks and the Queen!)". He described a modification of the usual estate freeze which he described as "the way to keep the creditor from realizing and seizing debtors' assets". The paper continued:

> We are not talking about planning what you want to happen to your assets after you are dead. We are talking about planning what you want to do with your assets while you are alive, working and when you retire. We are talking about keeping those assets in a place where they are available only to you and your family and not available [to] those who do not have your interests at heart. We are talking about changing the nature of your assets without changing your net worth. Finally we are talking about all of the above without losing absolute control over all the assets you worked so hard to accumulate over your lifetime. [Emphasis added.]

[3] The paper described the steps involved in carrying out such a 'freeze': the client would cause a private company to be incorporated, obtain an expert valuation of his or her assets, and then transfer them to the company. It would pay fair market value for the assets by issuing Preferred shares to the client having a value "exactly equal to the value of the assets" transferred to the company. Once this was done, Mr. Davis's paper stated, a creditor could not obtain the client's former assets because the client would no longer own them. He continued:

> What [the creditor] is entitled to get though is the preferred shares you got from the [family holding company]. (There is a way to make it hard for the creditor to collect on the shares but you will have to ask me in person ... this way we know if you have actually read this.) The effect of all this is that you have limited your exposure to your creditors to the value of the assets you have at the time that you make the transfer. From then on, rather than working for yourself and making a bigger pot of assets available to your creditors, you go to work for [the family holding company] and guide it to expanding the asset base you sold it.

The paper emphasized that although a debtor could not intentionally diminish his or her net worth to the prejudice of creditors, unsecured creditors could not insist that assets be preserved in any particular form.

[4] Apparently relying on Mr. Davis's advice, the Stanwoods decided to proceed with the transfer of their assets as described in his paper. In August, they became the shareholders of two private British Columbia companies, the corporate defendants in this action. I will refer in these Reasons to the share structure and ownership of only one of them, 566942 B.C. Ltd., since the majority of the assets were transferred to that company. A similar scheme was used for G&G Stanwood Consulting Inc. ("G&G").

[5] The numbered company had authorized capital consisting of Class A and B voting (non-equity) shares, Class C equity shares (these were non-voting but a shareholder of three years' standing could elect to add a voting right), and three classes of Preferred shares. Unusually, a special resolution of the company required the approval of 85 percent of the voting shares. The Class A and Class B shareholders were each entitled as a class to appoint one of two directors. One director was always either Mr. or Mrs. Stanwood and the second was a person "friendly" to them. (At the time of the transfers, the friendly person was Mr. Corney, Mrs. Stanwood's brother. Later, he was replaced by Mr. Davis.) The directors were entitled under the Articles to refuse to register any transfer of shares in their "absolute discretion", and all shares were subject to a pre-emptive right.

[6] The Preferred shares were non-voting and carried a 10 percent preferential dividend on their redemption amount ($1,000 per share in the case of First Preferreds, and $1 per share in the case of the Second and Third Preferreds), which dividend was cumulative during the first five years of issue of such shares. Any redemption required the unanimous consent of the directors. The shares were retractable (i.e., redeemable at the option of the holder) only after the holder had held the shares for five years.

Digitized by Google

[7] Following the transfers by the Stanwoods of their assets to the companies and following other allotments, the issued share capital of the numbered company was as follows:

	Class A Voting	Class B Voting	Class C Non-Voting	Second Preferred	Third Preferred
Mr. Stanwood	40			153,803
Mrs. Stanwood	40				133,803
Mr. Corney		20	10
Gregory Stanwood (son)			495
Michelle Stanwood (daughter)			495
Total	80	20	1,000	153,803	133,803

[8] As Mr. Davis deposed, the transactions ensured "the accommodation of the Stanwood children [in the family home] ... for five years, at least." Mr. and Mrs. Stanwood remained in effective control of the transferred assets through their de facto control of the boards of directors of the companies and indeed continued to use those assets as before, although they paid what is said to have been a fair market rent in return. Any creditor who sought to execute against their shares in the companies would encounter major obstacles: the pre-emptive right on share transfers; the right of the directors to refuse to register a transfer of shares; the requirement for 85 percent approval of a special resolution; the five-year waiting period attached to dividends on the Preferred shares and to rights of retraction of those shares; and the ability of the Class C shareholders to elect to make their shares voting shares – a means by which members of the Stanwood family could defeat any attempt by a creditor to elect a board of directors through control of the Class A and B shares.

[9] The Stanwoods' control was reinforced later in 1998, when they subscribed for additional Second and Third Preferred shares and received options to acquire the balance (999,000) of the Class C shares at $.001 per share. As well, certain creditors who were "friendly" to the Stanwoods, including Mr. Corney, advanced further funds to the companies which were used to pay legal fees and other miscellaneous debts. In return, these creditors received promissory notes secured by the hypothecation of some of the Preferred shares held by the Stanwoods. (Mr. Davis acted as escrow agent.) Obviously, these steps had the effect of reducing the number of Preferred shares that could be executed against by unsecured creditors such as the Chans. The trial judge noted at para. 22 of her Reasons that there was no evidence that any of these creditors (other than the Chans) "were pressing for repayment or had the intention to do so."

[10] On learning of the transactions, the Chans made no attempt to execute against the Stanwoods' Preferred shares in the holding companies. They also declined offers of payment over time with security in the interim. Instead, they commenced proceedings under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163 (the "Act"). They alleged that the intention and effect of the freeze had been "to delay, hinder and defraud the Plaintiffs of their lawful remedy for the collection of [the Chans'] Judgment and delay, hinder and defraud other creditors contrary to the Act." As well, they joined Mr. Davis as a defendant, alleging that he had breached a "duty of care" and fiduciary duty (which claims are not being pursued in this court), committed an "intentional tort", and "wrongfully advised and induced" the Stanwoods to carry out the transfers. The Chans sought, inter alia, a declaration that the transfers were fraudulent within the meaning of the Act and therefore of no force or effect; injunctive relief to restrain the holding companies from disposing of, encumbering or dealing with the assets; and damages, including punitive damages. Last, they sought special costs — which prayer is the subject of a separate appeal to which I will return in due course.

THE CASE AGAINST THE STANWOODS

The Trial Judgment

[11] The action was heard by summary trial under R. 18A after the parties agreed the matter was appropriate to be heard summarily. Affidavit evidence, as well as transcripts of the defendants' examinations for discovery were adduced. Mr. Davis deposed that in advising the Stanwoods, he had "specifically rejected any options which in [his] opinion transgressed creditors' rights legislation such as the Fraudulent Preferences Act or the Fraudulent Conveyances Act both of which were specifically discussed with the Stanwoods." Further, he said, he told his clients that "provided the net value of their assets remained equal, the creditors would not be delayed or hindered." At the same time, he stated in discovery that an exception had been made in this case to the usual practice of keeping one's principal residence in one's own name since "that asset was exposed to [the Stanwoods'] creditors." His counsel instructed him not to answer the question of whether he knew his clients' property "would not be available for the Chans to execute against" following the transfer to the numbered company.

Digitized by Google

[12] For their part, the Stanwoods maintained that their intention had not been to hinder or delay their creditors. Mr. Stanwood deposed:

> 8. The intent of the plan, which we ultimately selected, was to freeze our estate at that point in time. In other words, the entire value of our estate could be converted to exigible shares reflecting the actual cash value of our entire estate. These shares, in turn, could be rateably apportioned to each of our creditors in accordance with the amounts owing. In addition, we could provide certain unsecured creditors with the equity preference shares as security for further advances of much needed cash. At all material times, we were well advised that our assets, in the form of preference shares, could be seized by creditors to satisfy debts, and that they provided a ready means of making the value of assets available to creditors.

and Mrs. Stanwood deposed to similar effect:

> 14. At all material times, we were well advised that our assets in the form of preference shares, could be seized by creditors to satisfy debts, and that they provided a ready means of making the value of assets available to creditors. We acted in the belief that we were permitted to preserve our assets in any form chosen as our unsecured creditors do not have a right to dictate the form upon which the value of our assets was maintained.

Like Mr. Davis's evidence, then, their evidence focused on the form of their property and appeared to assume that the shares they received were exigible by creditors. They described Mr. Davis's plan simply as an "estate planning tool" and said it was "coincidental" that it had had the effect of delaying or hindering the Chans.

[13] Another important item of evidence was an opinion prepared for the Stanwoods by a business valuator, Mr. McMann. After describing the transactions in his letter of opinion, he wrote regarding the numbered company:

> In summary, immediately after the transfer of assets to the [numbered] Company the vendors held shares issued for the net equity so transferred. They held voting shares to elect one of two directors although at the time of the sale of assets to the Company they were both directors. They held an option which when exercised would increase their equity position.
> They could demand redemption of their Preferred shares five years hence at $1.00 per share plus $0.50 in dividends if the Preferred share dividend had not been paid in the five year period.
> While I have not been engaged to specifically provide opinions on either asset or share values, it is my opinion that the data and circumstances described herein are sufficient to conclude that:
> a) Consideration received [sic] was valuable.
> b) Was worth more than a nominal value.
> c) In the circumstances was a fair and reasonable value.

[14] Although this portion of Mr. McMann's letter is rather oblique, it appears from his transmittal letter that the "Consideration received" to which he was referring was the consideration received by the Stanwoods in return for their assets — i.e., the Preferred shares. As the trial judge noted at para. 35 of her Reasons, Mr. McMann did not express an opinion as to the fair market value of the shares. (Nor did he comment on the value of the assets, but instead assumed the correctness of the values given to him by his clients. It was not argued in this court or in the court below, however, that these values were incorrect.)

[15] The trial judge naturally began her Reasons by describing the transactions. She then recited the operative provisions of the Act, which I reproduce below for convenience:

> 1 If made to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies
> (a) a disposition of property, by writing or otherwise,
> (b) a bond,
> (c) a proceeding, or
> (d) an order
> is void and of no effect against a person or the person's assignee or personal representative whose rights and obligations by collusion, guile, malice or fraud are or might be disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded, despite a pretence or other matter to the contrary.

[16] The trial judge considered the defendants' argument, based on Mr. McMann's opinion, that the companies had given consideration which was "valuable, was worth more than a nominal value and was a fair and reasonable relative value at the time of sale"; but she also emphasized that he had not valued the shares received by the Stanwoods in return for their assets. In her analysis:

> I have difficulty understanding what Mr. McMann means by a fair and reasonable relative value. To give an opinion as to relative value, one is presumably drawing a comparison. Even it were to be assumed that the assets have the value which was ascribed to them by the Stanwoods, a comparison could not be drawn without valuing the preferred shares. Nor is an opinion that consideration has more than a nominal value of particular assistance. That is a conclusion for the court to draw or not, based on evidence. As Mr. McMann did not value the shares, I do not take his opinion to mean that their value was not much below the value of the assets. If he is using the word "nominal" to mean not real or virtually nothing, his opinion is not helpful. The assets which were transferred had a value in excess of $300,000.
> As a final comment on Mr. McMann's opinion and report, he did not express an opinion as to fair market value which is defined as the highest price available in an open and unrestricted market between informed, prudent parties acting at arms' length and under no compulsion to act, expressed in terms of money or monies' worth. The Stanwoods and the holding company are obviously not at arms' length. Relying on common sense, the conclusion must be that the value of the preferred shares to the Stanwoods far exceeds their fair market value given their ownership of voting shares, their entitlement to elect director[s] and their option to acquire shares. [paras. 34-5; emphasis added.]

[17] The trial judge accepted that even though valuable consideration had passed between the Stanwoods and the companies, the plaintiffs could succeed if they were able to prove the Stanwoods had intended to delay or hinder their creditors. This was made clear in Gresham v. Gresham 1993 CanLII 1421 (BC CA), (1993) 18 C.B.R. (3d) 201 at 203-4, where this court cited Re Johnson; Golden v. Gillam (1881) 20 Ch. D. 389 (aff'd (1882) 51 L.J. Ch. 503 (C.A.)) for the proposition that a plaintiff may "undertake to impeach for mala fides a deed which has been executed for valuable consideration", although such an undertaking is likely to be one of "great difficulty."

[18] The trial judge then stated her findings regarding the Stanwoods' intentions in carrying out the transfers, and the effect of the transfers vis à vis their creditors:

> The Stanwoods went to Mr. Davis within weeks of the Chan judgment, which was in excess of $325,000. They correctly believed that unlike their other creditors, the Chans wanted to be paid. The assets of the Stanwoods were clearly at risk and what was of the greatest concern to them was that they would lose their family home. It was not merely the residence of their children but their most valuable asset with equity of approximately $200,000. As Mr. Davis expressed it, bankruptcy would not have met his client's objectives. As the Stanwoods deposed, they did not want to lose their home. The scheme proposed by Mr. Davis had the advantages described in his letter and paper, which have been referred to extensively, and in his affidavit. The assets would remain available to the Stanwoods and not to those, like the Chans, who in Mr. Davis's words did not have the interests of the Stanwoods at heart. The assets have remained available to them. I do not understand how Mr. Davis or the Stanwoods can dispute that the preferred shares are unattractive to creditors. That was Mr. Davis's view. The exchange of assets for shares is the reason why the assets of the Stanwoods have remained available to them.
> The argument of the plaintiffs is that they were delayed and hindered as the transferred assets were no longer available for execution. Although the preferred shares in the corporate defendants are exigible, they are not effectively exigible as by virtue of their special rights and restrictions, they are not redeemable for five years. Further, almost two-thirds of the shares were encumbered as part of this scheme and are now held in escrow by Mr. Davis. Moreover, the corporate defendants and their assets are controlled by the Stanwoods. If seized and sold, the remaining preferred shares would yield little recovery.
> I agree with these submissions. In my view, the plaintiffs have established the necessary intention and are entitled to declarations that the transfers of the real property, motor vehicles, shares and equipment are void and of no effect as against them. [paras. 38-40; emphasis added.]

On Appeal

[19] In this court, Mr. Sewell argued on behalf of the Stanwoods that the trial judge erred in two main respects — in finding the conveyance of the assets to be fraudulent notwithstanding the fact that the companies gave "valuable consideration" for the assets; and in finding fraudulent intent on the part of the Stanwoods notwithstanding that the transfers were not a "sham". On the first issue, counsel cited the following passage from the Report of the Law Reform Commission of British Columbia on Fraudulent Conveyances and Preferences, issued in 1988:

> The test of inadequacy of consideration has been expressed in a number of different ways. It has been said that the inadequacy must be "so palpable that it must be taken to have been a fraudulent contrivance." Other cases have referred to "gross inadequacy," but temper that test by refusing in cases of sales between relatives to call consideration grossly inadequate if it is supplemented by considerations of "natural love and affection," even though such "meritorious consideration" will not bring a conveyance within section 4 [now s. 2] of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act on its own.
> Whatever formula is used to distinguish "good" consideration from "inadequate" consideration, the policy is clear. To bring a transaction within section 4 [now s. 2], it is unnecessary to show that there exists a one-to-one correspondence between the market value of the property transferred and the consideration supplied. To do so would constitute too great a restraint on the transferability of property. The question is, therefore, one of degree, in which the subjective position of grantor and grantee cannot be entirely overlooked. [at 21; emphasis added.]

[20] The Commission's report also stated, however, that the significance of consideration lies both in its relation to the intention behind the transaction and in relation to its effect. Where the consideration is inadequate or nominal, a creditor need only show that the transferor intended to delay, hinder or defraud the creditor of his remedies. Where on the other hand valuable consideration has passed, the creditor must also show that the transferee actively participated in the fraud. As stated by this court in Meeker Cedar Products Ltd. v. Edge (1968) 68 D.L.R. (2d) 294 (aff'd at (1968) 1 D.L.R. (3d) 240 (S.C.C.)):

> . . . it is clear as a matter of interpretation of the statute as a whole and upon authority that where a sale is made for good and valuable consideration the transaction will not be void by reason of the purchaser's having notice or knowledge of the vendor's intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others unless it be proved that the purchaser was actually privy to the fraud, i.e., a party to carrying out the fraudulent intention and purpose. [at 299; emphasis added.]

[21] Where valuable consideration has passed, then, the focus is not on the sufficiency of that consideration but on the intentions of both parties to the transaction. The trial judge rightly stated at para. 36 of her Reasons that in this case, the intention of the holding companies must be taken to have been the intention of the Stanwoods. Further, she found it was clear on the evidence that the Stanwoods had intended to delay and defeat their creditors by exchanging their exigible assets for shares which were "not effectively exigible".

[22] I agree with these conclusions. The Fraudulent Conveyance Act, like its sister statute, the Fraudulent Preference Act, must be applied in a manner consistent with modern commerce and common sense. Even if one assumes that the Preferred shares of the companies had substantial value, it simply could not be said on any realistic view that all the defendants did was exchange one form of asset for another and that the effect on creditors was neutral or negligible. The whole purpose of the transaction, as acknowledged by the defendants in discovery, was to permit the Stanwoods to continue to enjoy the use of their family home (and, one may add, their other assets) for at least five years. To do this, the assets had to be put beyond the reach of the Chans. This was done by designing specific rights and restrictions attached to the shares of the companies and by issuing the shares in such numbers and classes as to retain control even if 'unfriendly' persons succeeded in executing against the shares. Although exigible in theory, the various restrictions and obstacles placed in the way of any 'unfriendly' holder meant that in fact they were not worth executing against. The exchange of exigible assets for the Preferred shares delayed, hindered or defrauded the Chans — and did so by design. This "design" or "purpose" constitutes the "fraudulent intent" required by the Act: see Law Reform Commission Report, supra, at 16.

[23] As his second ground of appeal, Mr. Sewell submitted that in order to attract the operation of the Act, the transfer must be shown to have been a "sham" — i.e., one not intended to operate as it appears. (See Snook v. London and West Riding Investments Ltd. [1967] 2 Q.B. 786 at 802.) In this regard, he relied on a comment of the English Court of Appeal in Glegg v. Bromley [1912] 3 K.B. 474. At 485 of that case, Fletcher Moulton L.J. stated:

> The covenous assignments referred to in the 13 Elizabeth are mock assignments whereby in some form or other the assignor reserves some benefit to himself, but an out and out assignment by way of charge > to secure an actual existing creditor is not within the class of assignments which are affected by that statute, . . . [Emphasis added.]

In the same case, Vaughan Williams L.J. noted Alton v. Harrison (1869) L.R. 4 Ch. 622, and stated:

> First there is Alton v. Harrison, where Giffard L.J. says: "If the deed of mortgage and bill of sale was executed by Harrison honestly for the purpose of giving a security to the five creditors and was not a contrivance resorted to for his own personal benefit, it is not void, but must have effect." Again, "If the deed is bona fide — that is, if it is not a mere cloak for retaining a benefit to the grantor — it is a good deed under the statute of Elizabeth." Compare per Parker J. in Wigan v. English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Association [[1909] 1 Ch. 297]. [At 479, emphasis added.]

Building on these observations, Mr. Sewell submitted that in order to constitute a fraudulent conveyance, the transfer in question must have been designed to allow the debtor to remain the apparent "owner" of the asset and entitled to the full benefit and enjoyment of the asset. That did not occur here, since the transfers were fully documented, and the Stanwoods have been paying the companies rent for the use of them. The companies and their directors may deal with the assets only in a manner consistent with the companies' best interests.

[24] I do not find the "sham" argument persuasive. First, it is apparent the Court in Glegg v. Bromley was not purporting to provide a comprehensive definition of fraudulent conveyances — these may be as varied as the imagination of a creative debtor allows. Many actions under the Act have succeeded without proof of a sham. Further, as Mr. McLean submitted, the facts of Glegg v. Bromley were quite different from the facts of this case. In Glegg, the debtor's husband, who was already a substantial creditor of his wife, advanced funds to her for legal fees and sought more security for the advance. She granted an assignment to him shortly before being adjudged liable in a lawsuit brought against her. The question was whether the assignment was bona fide. The Court held that it was good consideration in the form of the further advance having been shown. In the words of Parker J.:

> I think that where a creditor asks for and obtains a security for an existing debt the inference is that, but for obtaining the security, he would have taken action which he forbears to take on the strength of the security, and I cannot think that this inference is rebutted by the fact that the reason why he asks for the further security is his desire to obtain a benefit for himself at the expense of another creditor who may shortly be in a position to take the subject-matter of the proposed security in execution. The Court below appears to have adopted the Master's finding that the mortgage was a valid and operative assignment at any rate as against the mortgagor, a finding which involved the existence of consideration, but at the same time they held that as against the respondent the mortgage was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5 on the ground that it was a voluntary assignment. If the assignment was operative at all, it can only have been on the ground that it was not voluntary, but that there was good consideration for it. [at 491-2]

In the case at bar, in contrast, the transferees of the property were shelf companies; they were not existing creditors; and they did not advance any funds to the Stanwoods. The companies were the Stanwoods' creatures — their intentions were the Stanwoods' intentions.

[25] Further, as noted by the Law Reform Commission in its Report, supra, the references in some cases to "sham" transactions as offending the Act seem simply to mean that to be saved by what is now s. 2, the transaction must be carried out in "good faith" or without notice of collusion or fraud on the part of the transferee. The Commission stated:

> The term "good faith" only has meaning if it is used to characterize the intent of the parties with respect to the passing of property under the disposition. When a debtor transfers his property away, he may wish only to present the appearance of a transfer. His true intent may be to reserve some interest to himself, by way of a secret instrument, oral agreement, or understanding with the transferee. In such a case the conveyance is not made in good faith, since it is a sham. . . .
> This interpretation of the words "good faith" probably lies at the root of a number of cases in which courts have held that a conveyance is barred by the Fraudulent Conveyance Act if the grantor intended to retain some interest in the property transferred. [at 23-4]

Digitized by Google

[26] Thus although no sham transaction can be said to have been carried out in "good faith", a transaction need not be a sham to contravene the Act. Again returning to the wording of the statute, the question in every case is whether it was carried out "to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies" — not whether the transfer was intended to have real effect or not.

[27] Accordingly, I see no error in the trial judge's conclusions that the transfers offended the Act. I would dismiss the Stanwoods' appeal from the order of the court below declaring the transfers void and of no force and effect insofar as they affected the rights of the Chans.

THE ACTION AGAINST MR. DAVIS

The Trial Judgment

[28] The second part of the trial judge's Reasons dealt with the action as against Mr. Davis. The portions of the plaintiffs' Statement of Claim relevant to Mr. Davis were as follows:

> 20. Davis, with the knowledge and intention that the Transfers would delay, hinder and defraud the Plaintiffs of their lawful remedy for the collection of the Judgment, and delay, hinder and defraud other creditors, contrary to the Act, wrongfully advised and induced the Stanwoods to the effect the Transfers.
> 21. Davis had a legal obligation or duty or a fiduciary duty to the Plaintiffs in respect of the Transfers, which Transfers were contrary to the Act, which he knew or is deemed to have known.
> 22. Davis, in his state of knowledge, had a legal obligation or duty or fiduciary duty to the Plaintiffs which he breached:
> (a) to refrain from counselling and advising the Stanwoods to effect the Transfers; and
> 22.1 By reason of his conduct, Davis made himself a party to the torts committed by the other Defendants herein. Further or in the alternative, Davis induced the torts committed by the other Defendants herein.
> . . .
> 23.1 Liability arises for the Defendants in intentional tort and, or alternatively, in negligence. Further or in the alternative as against the Defendant Davis, liability arises for breach of fiduciary duty. [Emphasis added.]

Obviously, the pleading did not "name" a tort in the usual way. The Chans' allegations were elaborated upon in their written argument in the court below:

> In designing the scheme, counselling and inducing the other defendants to carry out the scheme in his state of knowledge, and effecting the scheme on behalf of the other defendants, Davis committed a tort against the Chans. He participated in the fraud, and in fact was the principal party responsible for carrying out the scheme. Davis cannot escape liability by asserting that he was the Stanwoods' solicitor and as such owed no duty of care qua solicitor to the Chans. His duty of care to the Chans stands on a different footing: it is required as a matter of public policy. [Emphasis added.]

(As earlier mentioned, neither breach of fiduciary duty nor negligence was pressed on appeal.)

[29] We were told that the trial judge repeatedly questioned the Chans' counsel about the cause of action alleged against Mr. Davis. Counsel responded that they were not required to attach a name to the tort being relied upon or to identify a known cause of action, but that they could rely on the phrase "intentional tort" or "participation in a fraudulent conveyance". We were also told that counsel for the Chans stated in the court below that his clients were not alleging fraud on Mr. Davis's part — apparently drawing a distinction between "fraud" and "participation in" or "counselling" a fraudulent conveyance.

[30] In the following passages, the trial judge decided both the substantive and the procedural issues of the case brought against Mr. Davis by the plaintiffs:

> Leaving aside for the moment any difficulty with the pleadings, the fundamental assertion is that an intentional tort was committed by all defendants. Mr. Davis has deposed that he held the opinion that this was not a fraudulent conveyance. I obviously do not agree with his opinion, but I cannot conclude that it was not honestly held. As this matter proceeded under Rule 18A, I have not even had the benefit of listening to Mr. Davis or of cross examination. I do not understand how Mr. Davis could be liable for an intentional tort when he was of the view that the transactions did not offend any legislation.
> If the plaintiffs are truly alleging participation in a fraud or a conspiracy to defraud, there must be a specific plea. I cannot agree that the plaintiffs are not required to attach a name to the tort they allege, as was submitted by Mr. Postman on behalf of the Chans. In that regard, I note the comments of

> Nordheimer J. in J.G. Young & Son Ltd. v. Tec Park Ltd., [infra], a decision relied upon by Mr. Postman. [paras. 47 and 49; emphasis added.]

[31] In J.G. Young & Son Ltd. v. Tec Park Ltd. [1999] O.J. No. 4066 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), the pleadings had referred to four causes of action — conspiracy, fraud, intentional interference with contractual relations, and breach of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act of Ontario. Nordheimer J. ruled that none of the defendants would be able to tell from the Statement of Claim which category of wrong was alleged against them. Further, he said, it was not sufficient to "merely plead the facts required for a claim under the Fraudulent Conveyances Act and then simply add a claim for damages for fraud to the prayer for relief." (para. 13) In the case at bar, the trial judge noted, the prayer for relief did not even claim damages for fraud or for conspiracy to defraud. For the reasons quoted above, she dismissed the Chans' claim against Mr. Davis.

On Appeal

[32] On appeal, the Chans argue that the trial judge erred both on the substantive level, in concluding that Mr. Davis held the opinion his clients' transactions would not offend the Act, and on the procedural level, in requiring that the "tort" alleged against Mr. Davis be identified. On the substantive level, I am of the view, with all due respect to the trial judge, that Mr. Davis's statement concerning his opinion runs counter to the weight of all the other evidence, including his own. He could not reasonably have believed that the Preferred shares received by the Stanwoods for their assets were of equal value, in any market, to those assets or that the effect of the transaction was neutral from anyone's viewpoint — the creditors' or his clients'. Mr. Davis himself wrote the paper relied on by the Stanwoods which described how to keep "assets in a place where they are available only to you and your family and not available [to] those who do not have your interests at heart", as well as how to "make it hard for the creditor to collect on the shares"; and he stated in discovery that the purpose of the plan was to ensure that the Stanwood children would be accommodated in the family home "for five years at least." This must, in my view, be taken as tantamount to an admission that the transactions he was counselling would delay and hinder the Stanwoods' creditors at a time when his clients were insolvent, and that that was the purpose of the transactions.

[33] On the assumption, then, that Mr. Davis, at least, knew what he was doing, can he as a lawyer who has counselled clients to commit what turns out to be an illegal act, be found liable for the consequences of that act? This is obviously an important and far-reaching question. Mr. Ward, counsel for Mr. Davis, argued that the imposition of any liability on a lawyer for advice given to a client would interfere with the lawyer's duty to advise his or her client as appropriate and to consider and act only in the client's best interest. He noted that courts have been careful to restrict the circumstances in which lawyers have been found to owe duties of care to persons dealing with, or adverse in interest to, their clients. (In this regard, see the judgment of this court in Kamahap Enterprises Ltd. v. Chu's Central Market Ltd. 1989 CanLII 242 (BC CA), (1989) 64 D.L.R. (4th) 167, a case decided prior to the opening up of liability in negligence for pure economic loss), at 169-170.)

[34] But it cannot be suggested that a lawyer may hide behind his or her profession to commit illegal acts. The Handbook of Professional Conduct issued by the Law Society of British Columbia states at Rule 1(1) of Chapter 1 that a lawyer should not aid, counsel or assist any person to act in any way contrary to the law, and at Rule 6 of Chapter 4 that "A lawyer shall not knowingly assist a client to make, receive or participate in a fraudulent conveyance, preference or settlement."

[35] So I return to the procedural question of whether the plaintiffs' pleadings were sufficient to disclose a cause of action. In arguing that they were, counsel for the Chans relies on the principle, recently affirmed by this court in Alford v. Canada (Attorney General) [1998] B.C.J. No. 2965, that the Rules of Court do not require a pleader to identify or "name" the cause of action being advanced as long as the material facts on which the pleader relies, together with the relief sought, are set out in the Statement of Claim. (Cf. Homalco Indian Band v. British Columbia (1998) 25 C.P.C. (4th) 107 (B.C.S.C.).) But the question is not merely one of sufficiency of pleadings. Rather, it is whether having gone through the trial disavowing an allegation of fraud, the Chans may now change their position and allege it for the first time in this court. In my view, the moral stain attached to fraud, coupled with the potential effect of such a finding on the reputation of any professional person, require that if such an allegation is made, it be made clearly, and at trial. Thus I agree with Mr. Ward's submission that the Chans should not be permitted to make such a "clarification" at this late stage. No motion to amend the Statement of Claim was advanced, and I doubt such a motion would have succeeded in the present circumstances.

[36] Setting aside the tort of fraud, then, the next question is whether an allegation that Mr. Davis "wrongfully advised and induced the Stanwoods to effect the Transfers" can give rise to any other actionable wrong. I have considered whether the tort of conspiracy, which consists of an "agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means" (see L.N. Klar, Tort Law (2nd ed., 1996) at 514) was described in the plaintiffs' pleadings. Whilst an argument might be made to this effect, it was not made by counsel here or below, and it would have been a tortuous one if it had been made. Again, given the unusual nature of this tort, it would be inappropriate to set out down this winding road at this late stage without proper foundations being laid or argument being made.

[37] The remaining question is whether advising another to carry out a breach of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act constitutes a civil wrong (other than fraud or conspiracy) in the same way as "counselling" a crime is itself a crime. (See Criminal Code, s. 22; V. Gordon Rose, Parties to an Offence (1982) at 122-4.) Counsel did not bring to our attention any authority for the proposition that "counselling" or "inducing" a breach of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act is a "tort" as that term is generally understood, and I have located none. It is true that in Centre Star Mining Co. v. Rossland Miners Union (1905) 11 B.C.R. 194 (B.C.S.C.), Chief Justice Hunter suggested that it was a "common law offence" to breach the Act and for a lawyer to counsel such an offence, but he cited no authority. In fact there is authority that even effecting a fraudulent conveyance may not be a "tort". Halsbury's (4th ed., v. 31, §868) notes Upton v. Basset (1595) 78 E.R. 685, where it was said that "[a]t the common law, there was not any fraud remedied, which should defeat an after purchase, but that only which was committed to defraud a former interest." More recently, the question was canvassed by the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench in Suncorp Realty Inc. v. PLN Investments Inc. reflex, [1986] 1 W.W.R. 619. There, Jewers J. referred to Anchor Elevator Co. v. Heney (1908) 18 Man. R. 96, where the Manitoba Court of Appeal held that a preference prohibited by the Manitoba Assignments Act did not give rise to a claim in tort, and therefore could not be the subject of an order granting service ex juris. In Suncorp, the Court concluded that in a fraudulent conveyance action:

> There is no claim for damages. The whole idea of the proceeding is to simply avoid the transaction as against the creditors so they can have access to the property in question to satisfy their claims.
> Because of the absence of a possible claim for unliquidated damages — or any damages at all — I would not be prepared to classify a fraudulent conveyance as a tort. [at 631; emphasis added.]

[38] Mr. McLean referred us to cases in which courts have awarded damages to plaintiffs in fraudulent conveyance actions where the assets are no longer available: see, e.g. Sale v. Roper Construction Ltd. [1989] B.C.J. No. 2017 (B.C.Co.Ct.) and Gooseaire Humidification Ltd. v. Knowles Brothers Ltd. (1979) 27 N.B.R. (2d) 541 (N.B.Q.B.). However, the damage remedy in those cases was simply a substitute for the reconveyance of the property; a new "tort" was not thereby created, in my view. In the case at bar, no damages were proven in the summary trial. Instead the Act served its purpose — the setting aside of the transfers of assets vis à vis the plaintiffs.

[39] In the result, I conclude that in the absence of a pleading of fraud or conspiracy, the trial judge did not err in dismissing the action against Mr. Davis on the evidence before her. I would dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal against the dismissal of their action against Mr. Davis.

COSTS

[40] Following the issuance of her Reasons in the main action, the trial judge gave the parties an opportunity to make submissions in writing regarding costs. The plaintiffs sought special costs as against the Stanwoods and the holding companies, relying on various cases in which special costs were awarded in successful fraudulent conveyance actions. However, the trial judge found — reluctantly — that because Mr. Davis had advised the Stanwoods that the transactions did not contravene any law, an order of special costs against them was not appropriate.

[41] On appeal, the plaintiffs submit that the conduct of the Stanwoods and their companies was sufficiently "reprehensible" to warrant an award of special costs, consistent with the judgment of this court in Stiles v. British Columbia (W.C.B.) 1989 CanLII 235 (BC CA), (1989) 38 B.C.L.R. (2d) 307. Further, they say special costs have been consistently awarded in other cases involving fraudulent conveyances on the basis that the proceedings were necessitated by the defendants' fraudulent intentions. (See Tracy Estate v. Wobick [1999] B.C.J. No. 2530 (B.C.S.C.); L.K.B. v. G.J.T. [1997] B.C.J. No. 348 (B.C.S.C.); and Rohani v. Rohani [1999] B.C.J. No. 2059 (B.C.S.C.) at para. 27; aff'd at [2002] B.C.J. No. 809.)

[42] I do not read any of those cases, however, to mean that a trial judge does not have a discretion to decline to make an award of special costs in a case involving fraud. The trial judge in this case properly stated the applicable law and it does not appear she acted on any misapprehension of principle in reaching the conclusion she did. I see no basis for interfering with her award of costs at Scale 3 against the Stanwoods and the corporate defendants.

[43] In connection with the costs of the appeal in the action against him, Mr. Davis seeks special costs in his favour. I am not of a mind to make such an order, given the fact that he must have known that the transfers carried out on his advice were prohibited. Mr. Davis should bear his own costs of the appeal.

LASKIN J.A.:

A. OVERVIEW

[1] The plaintiff, Prudential Securities Credit Corp., LLC, claimed against Robert Laba on a guarantee, and against Robert Laba and his wife, Angela Laba, on the ground that Robert's transfer of his interest in two properties to Angela were fraudulent conveyances and thus void under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.29. The action was tried by a judge alone.

[2] At the end of Prudential's case, both Robert Laba and Angela Laba brought motions for a non-suit and elected to call no evidence. The trial judge dismissed Robert Laba's motion and granted Angela Laba's motion, with reasons to follow. Later, and without hearing further submissions, he delivered reasons granting Prudential judgment against Robert Laba on his guarantee in the amount of its claim (US $639,348.32 and Can $600.00, together with prejudgment interest of US $139,189.45), and dismissing Prudential's claim against Angela Laba.

[3] Both Robert Laba and Prudential have appealed. On his appeal, Robert Laba makes a single submission: the trial judge failed to give him an opportunity to make closing argument. Robert Laba submits that this failure amounted to a miscarriage of justice and must be remedied by a new trial.

[4] On its appeal, Prudential submits that in dismissing its action against Angela Laba, the trial judge made three errors. First, he applied the wrong legal test on a non-suit motion. Second, he applied the wrong test for establishing a fraudulent conveyance. And third, he failed to properly assess the evidence in support of Prudential's claim.

B. BACKGROUND FACTS

[5] In 1996, Robert Laba became the chief financial officer and a 50 per cent shareholder in T.B. Extreme Foods Limited. Over the next three years, T.B. Extreme acquired twenty-six Taco Bell franchises. In 1999, the defendant, Cobrand Foods Ltd. was incorporated to acquire additional Taco Bell franchises. Robert Laba became the chief financial officer and a director of Cobrand. He was sued on a written guarantee that he gave in connection with a loan from Captec Financial Group Inc. to Cobrand. Prudential is Captec's assignee.

[6] Captec was in the business of making loans to franchised restaurant operators for the purchase of restaurant equipment. In November 1999, Captec agreed to finance Cobrand's purchase of equipment for a Taco Bell / Pizza Hut restaurant in Toronto. In April 2000, Captec advanced the loan in the amount of US $523,680.00, and Cobrand gave Captec a promissory note and security over the equipment. Robert Laba guaranteed payment of Cobrand's debts and liabilities in respect of the Captec loan.

[7] In March 2001, Cobrand defaulted on the loan. In February 2002, Prudential began this action. It obtained a default judgment against Cobrand, and proceeded to trial against Robert and Angela Laba.

C. ANALYSIS

I. Robert Laba's Appeal

1) Did the trial judge's failure to give Robert Laba an opportunity to make closing argument amount to a miscarriage of justice?

[8] The non-suit motions were argued over two and a half days in late July 2004. The trial judge reserved his decision on the motions. Before adjourning court, however, he advised counsel that if the non-suit motions were unsuccessful they should be ready to re-attend for closing argument. On July 30, 2004, the trial judge issued a brief endorsement. He dismissed Robert Laba's non-suit motion and granted Angela Laba's motion, and said, "Written reasons with respect to both motions will follow."

[9] The trial judge apparently forgot about reconvening for final argument. Instead, on March 29, 2005, he delivered written reasons in which he not only explained his decision on the non-suit motions, but also went farther, granting judgment against Robert Laba and dismissing the action against Angela Laba.

[10] In finding Robert Laba liable on his guarantee, the trial judge said at para. 35 of his reasons:

[35] For the foregoing reasons, I am satisfied that the plaintiff has raised a prima facie case. Accordingly, the motion for non-suit must be dismissed. In fact, as set out above, I am satisfied that the plaintiff has established well beyond a balance of probabilities that Robert Laba is liable on the Guarantee.

[11] Robert Laba submits that the right to make closing argument is a substantive right, essential to a fair trial. As he was deprived of this right, albeit inadvertently, he was denied the opportunity to fully present his case. He points out that though he presented argument on the non-suit motion, a plaintiff's burden to defeat a non-suit differs from and is less onerous than its burden to obtain judgment on its claim. Thus, Robert Laba contends that the result of being denied the right to make closing argument amounts to a miscarriage of justice, which can be remedied only by an order for a new trial.

[12] Before addressing Robert Laba's submission, I want to say a few words about non-suit motions in civil non-jury trials. The term "non-suit" refers to a motion brought by the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's evidence to dismiss the action on the ground that the plaintiff has failed to make out a case for the defendant to answer. Neither the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, nor the Rules of Civil Procedure specifically provides for non-suit motions, but judges continue to have a recognized jurisdiction to entertain these motions.

[13] Still, I question whether in this province a non-suit motion in a civil non-jury trial has much value. In Ontario, when a defendant moves for a non-suit, the defendant must elect whether to call evidence. See Ontario v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union (OPSEU) reflex, (1990), 37 O.A.C. 218 at para. 40 (Div. Ct.). If the defendant elects to call evidence, the judge reserves on the motion until the end of the case. If the defendant elects to call no evidence – as Robert Laba elected in this case – then the judge rules on the motion immediately after it has been made.

[14] A non-suit motion adds to the time and expense of a trial. And because of the election requirement, it has little practical value. Perhaps a defendant bringing the motion sees a tactical advantage in being able to argue first. To succeed on the motion, however, the defendant must show that the plaintiff has put forward no case to answer, in most lawsuits an onerous task. Why not simply take on the less onerous task of showing that the plaintiff's claim should fail? It is small wonder that most commentators consider that in civil judge alone trials, non-suit motions gain little and are becoming obsolete. See Phipson on Evidence, 16th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2005) at 274, and John Sopinka, Donald B. Houston& Melanie Sopinka, The Trial of an Action, 2d ed. (Toronto: Butterworths Canada, 1999) at 151-52.

[15] In this case, I agree with Robert Laba on three points. First, as my discussion above signals, Prudential's burden on the non-suit motion differed from and was less onerous than its burden to obtain judgment on its claim. To defeat the non-suit motion, Prudential had to satisfy the trial judge that it had put forward a prima facie case – that it had put forward evidence, which, if believed, would allow the trial judge to decide in its favour. To obtain judgment, Prudential, of course, had to establish its claim on a balance of probabilities.

[16] Second, I agree with Robert Laba that the opportunity to make closing argument is a substantive right. And third, I agree that though he did so inadvertently and not deliberately, the trial judge erred in depriving Robert Laba of that opportunity. Because of this error, Robert Laba asks for a new trial.

[17] Not every error by a trial judge entitles an aggrieved party to a new trial. Section 134(6) of the Courts of Justice Act stipulates that this court should order a new trial only where "some substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice has occurred." This stringent standard reflects the underlying policy that new trials ordinarily are contrary to the public interest. New trials cause increased costs or wasted costs as well as delay in resolving disputes, and are therefore to be avoided unless plainly required by the interests of justice. See Arland and Arland v. Taylor, [1955] O.R. 131 (C.A.).

[18] Thus, the narrow question on this appeal is whether the trial judge's failure to give Robert Laba an opportunity to make a closing argument caused a miscarriage of justice. I would answer that question, no.

[19] There are decisions of this court standing for the proposition that a litigant has a substantive right to present closing argument, and where that right is denied, we should order a new trial. The main case, followed many times, is Felker v. Felker, [1946] O.W.N. 368 (Ont. C.A.). In that case, this court held that the defendant was deprived of her substantive right to have her case fully presented because the trial judge gave judgment without giving her an opportunity to present argument. The court ordered a new trial.

[20] In the appeal before us, I come to a different conclusion. In doing so, I do not intend in any way to depart from Felker and its progeny. But, as is invariably the case, context matters. Here, the context includes three important considerations.

[21] First, Robert Laba cannot say that he had no opportunity to present argument after all the evidence was in. To the contrary, he fully argued over the course of two and a half days all the defences to the guarantee available to him. Although he did so on his non-suit motion instead of in final argument, he nonetheless had an opportunity to fully present his side of the case. It seems to me that is all Felker requires. Indeed, the trial judge's reasons show that even on the non-suit motion, Robert Laba argued Prudential had not established its claim against him on a balance of probabilities. At para. 25 of his reasons, the trial judge set out Robert Laba's principal argument: "The principal argument of the defendant is that the plaintiff has failed to prove, on a balance of probabilities, that the Guarantee relates to the Loan."

[22] Second, and critically important, Robert Laba has not shown that if he had been given an opportunity to make closing argument, the result would have been different. On appeal, his trial counsel filed an affidavit stating that he expected to have the opportunity to make closing submissions. But, his affidavit is silent on any new arguments that he might have presented.

[23] In his factum on appeal, Robert Laba raised but one defence: his guarantee was meant to be an "interim measure", to end once the landlord of the restaurant premises agreed – as it eventually did – to subordinate its interest in Cobrand's equipment to that of Captec. This defence was not even pressed at trial, and was quickly and correctly disposed of by the trial judge at para. 13 of his reasons:

[13] While Robert Laba has pleaded that he understood the Guarantee to be effective only until the landlord waiver issue was finalized to the satisfaction of Captec, this was not seriously argued at trial and there is no evidence to support this position.

[24] Third, when the trial judge released his reasons granting judgment, Robert Laba did not write to him or go back to him to complain that he had been prejudiced in any way by being deprived of the opportunity to make closing argument.

[25] In the light of these considerations, I am not persuaded that a miscarriage of justice has occurred. Had Robert Laba been given the opportunity to present a closing argument, I am not satisfied that the result would have been different. I would dismiss his appeal.

II. Prudential's Appeal

1) Did the trial judge apply the wrong test on Angela Laba's non-suit motion?

[26] In October 2000, Robert Laba transferred his interest in two properties to his wife, Angela. In its action, Prudential alleged that the transfers were void because they were made with intent to defeat its claim as creditor, contrary to s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act. Section 2 states:

Every conveyance of real property or personal property and every bond, suit, judgment and execution heretofore or hereafter made with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or defraud creditors or others of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties or forfeitures are void as against such persons and their assigns.

[27] At the end of Prudential's case, Angela Laba moved for a non-suit, which the trial judge granted. Prudential submits that by doing so the trial judge applied the wrong test. The factual background of this submission is briefly as follows.

Digitized by Google

[28] As I have said, Robert Laba was a 50 per cent shareholder in T.B. Extreme. T.B. Extreme's lender was the Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC"). In May 1998, Robert Laba gave RBC a personal guarantee of T.B. Extreme's indebtedness limited to $1 million. By 1999, T.B. Extreme was in financial difficulty. In April 2000, Robert Laba gave Captec his personal guarantee of Cobrand's indebtedness.

[29] At the time he gave these two guarantees, Robert Laba had an interest in two properties. He held a 50 per cent interest in the matrimonial home at 4 Lyon Court in Leamington, Ontario. Angela Laba held the other 50 per cent. He also held a 50 per cent interest in the property at 39 Erie Street South in Leamington. His father held the other 50 per cent.

[30] In the summer of 2000, because of T.B. Extreme's financial difficulties, RBC asked for additional security and threatened to put in a monitor. In July 2000, the Labas entered into a transfer agreement in which Angela consented to a $500,000 mortgage in favour of RBC on a property at 10 Hillview Crescent in Leamington owned by her numbered company, 1220812 Ontario Inc. ("122"). In return, Robert Laba agreed to transfer his interest in 4 Lyon Court and 39 Erie Street South to Angela. Robert transferred his interest in the properties in October 2000. The trial judge found that when Robert Laba gave his guarantee to Captec, his interest in the two properties was worth approximately $562,000.

[31] In February 2001, T.B. Extreme was assigned into bankruptcy. RBC claimed against Robert Laba on his guarantee and against 122 to enforce the mortgage. 122 defended the action, contending that the mortgage was invalid.

[32] In resisting Angela's non-suit motion, Prudential put forward what it claimed were numerous "badges of fraud" associated with the transfers. The trial judge itemized these badges at para. 61 of his reasons:

[61] The plaintiff says Robert Laba conveyed the property "with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or defraud his creditors and others". It says the following "badges of fraud" raise an evidentiary burden on Robert Laba which he has not discharged:

1. the conveyance represented substantially all of his remaining assets at the time;
2. Robert Laba continued in possession and used the Properties after the transfers;
3. the transfers were made at a time when RBC was putting in place a monitor over TB Extreme whose debts Robert Laba had guaranteed;
4. the deeds refer to nominal consideration which the plaintiff says is untrue if the true consideration was the granting of a mortgage by 122 if called upon in the future;
5. unusual haste to make the transfers in October, 2000;
6. retention by Robert Laba of some benefits in 4 Lyon, reflected in his receipt of funds from a later mortgage on 4 Lyon in 2002;
7. the close relationship between the parties as husband and wife; and
8. an alleged lack of good consideration.

[33] The trial judge nonetheless granted Angela Laba's motion. He concluded, at para. 71, that the "badges of fraud do not, on a balance of probabilities, evidence fraud when considered against the background of the purpose of the Transfer Agreement." According to the trial judge, at para. 69, "it is at least as likely that the Transfer Agreement and the transfers of the Properties were entered into by Robert Laba with a view to having 122 grant the RBC Mortgage in favour of RBC, one of his two creditors, rather than with an intent to defeat, hinder, delay or defraud his creditors."

[34] Prudential submits that the trial judge applied the wrong test on the non-suit motion. It argues that the trial judge should not have weighed the competing inferences available from the evidence to determine whether fraud had been established on a balance of probabilities. Instead, he should simply have determined whether Prudential's evidence, assuming it was believed, made out a prima facie case, a case for Angela Laba to answer. I agree with this submission.

[35] On a non-suit motion, the trial judge undertakes a limited inquiry. Two relevant principles that guide this inquiry are these. First, if a plaintiff puts forward some evidence on all elements of its claim, the judge must dismiss the motion. Second, in assessing whether a plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the judge must assume the evidence to be true and must assign "the most favourable meaning" to evidence capable of giving rise to competing inferences. This court discussed this latter principle in Hall et al. v. Pemberton (1974), 5 O.R. (2d) 438 at 438-9, quoting Parfitt v. Lawless (1872), 41 L.J.P. & M. 68 at 71-72:

I conceive, therefore, that in judging whether there is in any case evidence for a jury the Judge must weigh the evidence given, must assign what he conceives to be the most favourable meaning which can reasonably be attributed to any ambiguous statements, and determine on the whole what tendency the evidence has to establish the issue.

From every fact that is proved, legitimate and reasonable inferences may of course be drawn, and all that is fairly deducible from the evidence is as much proved, for the purpose of a prima facie case, as if it had been proved directly. I conceive, therefore, that in discussing whether there is in any case evidence to go to the jury, what the Court has to consider is this, whether, assuming the evidence to be true, and adding to the direct proof all such inferences of fact as in the exercise of a reasonable intelligence the jury would be warranted in drawing from it, there is sufficient to support the issue.

[36] In other words, on a non-suit motion the trial judge should not determine whether the competing inferences available to the defendant on the evidence rebut the plaintiff's prima facie case. The trial judge should make that determination at the end of the trial, not on the non-suit motion. See John Sopinka, Sidney N. Lederman & Alan W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada, 2d ed. (Toronto: Butterworths Canada, 1999) at 139.

[37] In granting Angela Laba's motion, the trial judge went beyond his limited mandate and failed to apply either of the two principles set out above. Ordinarily, where an appellate court reverses a decision to grant a non-suit in a judge alone trial, a new trial is ordered. Prudential, however, does not want a new trial. Instead, it wants this court to decide whether the trial judge erred in concluding that it had not established that the transfers were fraudulent conveyances. Furthermore, although Prudential does request, in the alternative, that the case be sent back for a new trial, in my view, that remedy is not warranted as the trial judge's reasons provide a sufficient basis for this court to determine the merits of Prudential's action.

2) Did the trial judge apply the wrong test for establishing a fraudulent conveyance claim?

[38] Prudential submits that by putting the onus on it to establish fraud on a balance of probabilities, the trial judge applied the wrong test. Prudential argues that the trial judge should have engaged in a two-step analysis. First, he should have concluded that the "badges of fraud", on which Prudential relied, gave rise to an inference of fraud and that that inference then put a "burden of explanation" on Angela Laba to show that her husband did not act with an intent to defeat his creditors. See Rinaldo v. Rosenfeld (Trustee of), [2001] O.J. No. 4189 (C.A.). Second, as neither Robert nor Angela Laba put forward any evidence to meet their burden, the trial judge should have found that Prudential was entitled to a judgment against Angela Laba and declared the transfers void. I do not accept Prudential's submission.

[39] The crucial question in any fraudulent conveyance action is whether the plaintiff has proved the fraudulent intent of the debtor. While the legal burden to prove fraudulent intent remains on the plaintiff throughout the trial, the plaintiff can raise an inference of fraud sufficient to put a "burden of explanation" on the defendant debtor. The plaintiff typically raises an inference of fraud by putting forward "badges of fraud." These "badges of fraud" vary from case to case. They are no more than typical and suspicious facts that may allow the court to make a finding of fraud absent an explanation from the debtor. See C.R.B. Dunlop, Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, 2d ed. (Toronto: Thomson Canada, 1995) at 613-15.

[40] The court, however, is not compelled to draw this inference of fraudulent intent from badges of fraud pleaded by the plaintiff. See Koop v. Smith 1915 CanLII 26 (SCC), (1915), 51 S.C.R. 554 at 558-59. The court may dismiss a fraudulent conveyance action because it has decided that the surrounding circumstances taken as a whole explain away the plaintiff's evidence. It seems to me that is what the trial judge did in this case.

[41] It is clear from his reasons that the trial judge was well aware that it was within his discretion to draw an inference of fraudulent intent from Prudential's alleged badges of fraud. Unfortunately, the trial judge's reasons are not entirely clear on whether he drew this inference. One or two paragraphs in his judgment suggest that he did. On balance, however, on my reading of his reasons, it appears that the trial judge decided not to draw an inference of fraudulent intent and thus not to place the "burden of explanation" on Angela Laba. Instead, he decided Prudential's claim on the basis it had the burden of proof to establish a fraudulent conveyance on a balance of probabilities and did not have the benefit of an inference of fraudulent intent. He looked at all the circumstances surrounding the badges of fraud and drew inferences that explained away Prudential's evidence. He therefore concluded that Prudential had not made out its case.

[42] For example, at para. 69 of his reasons, in a passage I have already quoted, he said, "it is at least as likely" that the transfers were made to facilitate the RBC mortgage rather than to defeat his creditors. Implicitly, he concluded Prudential did not establish a fraudulent intent on a balance of probabilities. Also, at para. 71, he found, "the facts which the plaintiff submits represents badges of fraud do not, on a balance of probabilities, evidence fraud." Again, he determined that Prudential failed to meet its burden. And, more importantly, in several paragraphs, which I discuss below, the trial judge rejected a number of the badges of fraud alleged by Prudential. In my view, these passages demonstrate, as in Rinaldo, supra, that the trial judge concluded, in the circumstances before him, that Prudential had not met the threshold necessary to put the burden of explanation on Angela Laba. In my view, it was open to him to do so.

[43] In the next section of these reasons, I discuss the inferences that the trial judge did draw. On this ground of appeal, it is sufficient to say that the trial judge did not and was entitled not to draw the permissive inference of fraudulent intent. I am therefore not persuaded that he applied the wrong test for establishing a fraudulent conveyance.

3) Did the trial judge fail to properly assess Prudential's evidence?

[44] Even accepting that it had the burden throughout to establish that the transfers were fraudulent on a balance of probabilities, Prudential contends that in finding against it the trial judge failed to properly assess the evidence. Central to this contention is Prudential's submission that, as the entire fraudulent conveyance case against Angela Laba was based on a written record, the principle of appellate deference to a trial judge's fact-finding and inference-drawing does not apply.

[45] The principle of deference means that an appellate court may substitute its own view of the evidence and draw its own inferences only if the trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error or made findings of fact or drew inferences that are unreasonable or unsupported by the evidence. See H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25 (CanLII), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401 at para. 4. However, because the relevant evidence in this case is written, Prudential submits that this court may make its own findings of fact and draw its own inferences without giving any deference to the trial judge.

[46] That submission has been overtaken by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada and this court. See Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, Schwartz v. Canada, 1996 CanLII 217 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 254, Equity Waste Management of Canada v. Halton Hills (Town) 1997 CanLII 2742 (ON CA), (1997), 35 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.), Gottardo Properties (Dome) Inc. v. Toronto (City) 1998 CanLII 6184 (ON CA), (1998), 162 D.L.R. (4th) 574 (Ont. C.A.), and Waxman v. Waxman 2004 CanLII 39040 (ON CA), (2004), 44 B.L.R. (3d) 165 (Ont. C.A.). The principle of appellate deference to a trial judge's fact-finding and inference-drawing applies even when the entire trial record is in writing. That is so because the principle of deference is grounded in more than a trial judge's ability to see and hear the witnesses. Deference recognizes that even on a written record, the trial judge "lives through" the trial while a court of appeal reviews the record only through the lens of appellate review. Deference also preserves the integrity of the trial process, maintains the confidence of litigants in that process, reduces the number and length of appeals and therefore, the cost of litigation, and appropriately presumes that trial judges are just as competent as appellate judges to resolve disputes justly.

[47] The principle of deference, therefore, applies to the trial judge's finding that Prudential failed to establish that the transfers were fraudulent. That finding was based on inferences the trial judge drew from the factual record. In drawing those inferences, the trial judge rejected as evidence of fraudulent intent a number of the badges of fraud put forward by Prudential.

[48] For example, at para. 66 of his reasons, the trial judge refused to infer that Robert Laba selected 10 Hillview Crescent to defeat his creditors. Instead, he inferred that RBC selected the security on 10 Hillview Crescent for reasons that do not impeach the transfers. At para. 73, the trial judge also drew the inference that Angela Laba would not have consented to the RBC mortgage if she had not received consideration roughly equal in value to the equity in 10 Hillview Crescent.

[49] And, faced with a choice of whether the transfers showed an intent to defeat creditors or an attempt to meet the demands of T.B. Extreme's lender, at para. 69, the trial judge drew the inference that the latter was at least as likely as the former. Prudential contends that favouring one creditor over another amounted to a fraudulent conveyance under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act. Although this court has held that this statute may apply to conveyances made for the benefit of other creditors, the trial judge correctly concluded that s. 2 requires a fraudulent intent on the part of the debtor regardless of whether one creditor is "favoured" over another. See Optical Recording Laboratories Inc. v. Digital Recording Corp. reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 131 at 139 (C.A.). He refused to find that intent in this case.

[50] Finally, at para. 72, the trial judge refused to draw an inference of fraud either from the mere fact that Robert and Angela Laba were husband and wife or from the fact that she later permitted him to take some of the mortgage proceeds on the matrimonial home at 4 Lyon Court for his personal use.

[51] Thus, the only question on this branch of the appeal is whether the inferences drawn by the trial judge on which he based his ultimate finding are supported by the evidence or, I might add, by the absence of evidence put forward by Prudential. See H.L., supra, at para. 74. In my view, they are.

[52] When the transfers took place, neither Robert Laba nor Cobrand was insolvent. Neither was in breach of any obligation to Captec. The transfers themselves gave RBC access to about the same amount of security as it would have had access to if Robert Laba had not conveyed the two properties to his wife. Prudential led no evidence to show or suggest that Angela Laba would have consented to the mortgage on 10 Hillview Crescent even if she had received nothing in return. And, Prudential led no evidence to show that Robert and Angela Laba chose 10 Hillview Crescent with a view to defeating his creditors.

[53] The trial judge found that the badges of fraud put forward by Prudential did not establish a fraudulent intent on a balance of probabilities. In the light of the record before him, I do not think that the trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error in so finding. I would dismiss Prudential's appeal.

D. CONCLUSION

[54] I would dismiss both Robert Laba's appeal and Prudential's appeal. Although the trial judge erred by not giving Robert Laba an opportunity to make a closing argument, in the context of this case, I do not think that this error caused a miscarriage of justice.

[55] The trial judge also erred by going beyond his limited mandate on Angela Laba's non-suit motion. However, in dismissing the action against her, he applied the correct legal test and drew inferences that are reasonably supported by the record.

[56] Prudential is entitled to the costs of Robert Laba's appeal, which I would fix in the amount of $6,000, inclusive of disbursements and GST. Angela Laba is entitled to the costs of Prudential's appeal. I would also fix those costs in the amount of $6,000, inclusive of disbursements and GST, but I would then deduct $1,000 for Angela Laba's abandoned cross-appeal on costs. Angela Laba is therefore entitled to $5,000 in costs.

1 Creative Prosperity Capital Corp. ("Creative") owns two pieces of land at 375 Terminal Avenue in Vancouver legally described as Lot G, Block G, District Lot 2037, Plan 21789, and Lot H, Block G, District Lot 2037, Plan 22525 ("the lands").

2 On August 12, 1994, Creative granted a mortgage over Lot H to the respondent Pacific Trade Centre Inc. ("Pacific") in the amount of $1,000,000 and also gave Pacific an assignment of rents. The mortgage and assignment of rents were registered on the title to Lot H on August 12, 1994 under numbers BH300573 and BH300574, respectively.

3 The petitioner Ocean Construction Supplies Limited ("Ocean"), and Suhwa Kan, who has entered an appearance in this proceeding, are judgment creditors of Creative. They allege the mortgage and assignment of rents are void by operation of section 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 142 or section 3 of the Fraudulent Preference Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 143.

4 All counsel agreed that the Petition should be heard and disposed of on the affidavit evidence filed. No party considered it necessary to have a trial of the issues.

FACTS

5 Ocean obtained judgment against Creative and Leaders Construction Corp. ("Leaders") for $274,377.89 on October 5, 1994 and registered the judgment on the title to Lot G on October 20, 1994, and on the title to Lot H on October 31, 1994.

6 Suhwa Kan obtained judgment against Creative for $326,531.50 on December 7, 1994 and registered the judgment against the titles to Lots G and H on December 12, 1994.

7 Creative was incorporated in August 1979 under the Company Act of British Columbia. It has an interest in an affiliated company called Vancouver Trade Mart Inc. (VTM) which operates an industrial commercial building on Terminal Avenue in Vancouver known as the Vancouver Trade Mart.

8 Creative, Pacific, VTM, and Leaders are all members of the Creative Group of companies owned and controlled by businessman H. George Lee. Mr. Lee is the President and a director of Creative, Pacific and VTM. He is the only director and the President and Secretary of Leaders.

9 Lots G and H are adjacent to property on which VTM operates the Vancouver Trade Mart. In 1991, Creative acquired Lots G and H and commenced construction of a commercial project called the Vancouver Trade Mart Phase II. Ocean contracted in October 1991 to supply concrete for the construction of the project. Construction was suspended in August 1992, when Creative was unable to obtain financing to continue the project. By that time, Ocean was owed over $250,000 for concrete it had supplied to the project.

10 Mr. Lee concedes that after Creative suspended construction on the lands in August 1992, it had no source of income. Creative's financial statements for the year ended December 31, 1993, prepared sometime after May 11, 1994, present a bleak picture of Creative's financial situation in 1992, 1993 and early 1994. The statements reveal that Creative had net losses of $603,255 in 1992 and $731,634 in 1993. At the end of 1992, Creative had liabilities of $9,562,366 exceeding its assets of $8,234,246 by $1,328,120. By the end of 1993, Creative's deficit picture had worsened, with liabilities exceeding assets by $2,084,226.

11 As of May 11, 1994, construction of the Vancouver Trade Mart Phase II was still suspended, and no contracts had been tendered for the completion of the development. Creative had been unable to arrange new construction financing or long term financing, and was engaged in disputes with contractors and suppliers. The company had been unable to redeem preferred shares due for redemption in 1992 and 1993, and had been unable to repay promissory notes due on September 17, 1993.

12 Creative's investment in Vancouver Trade Mart Inc. was also in jeopardy. VTM had been unable to redeem its shares, resulting in litigation, and had defaulted on a promissory note due after December 31, 1992, casting doubt on Creative's ability to recover its investment in VTM.

13 The notes to Creative's 1993 financial statements indicate that Creative hoped to raise the funds necessary to complete the development by attracting foreign immigrant investors. In an attempt to facilitate this, Pacific had been incorporated and had received approval as a privately administered investment syndicate under the Immigration Investment Program, established by Employment and Immigration Canada. Creative hoped that Pacific would be able to raise $10,000,000 to complete the project, but the notes to the financial statements describe Creative's future as "uncertain".

14 There is other evidence of Creative's dismal financial circumstances. The B.C. Assessment authority assessed the value of Lot H in 1994 at $1,779,000, but Mr. Lee says the assessment was appealed and the assessed value was reduced to $1,500,000. There are two other mortgages on the title to Lot H, registered prior to the mortgage to Pacific. Aetna Trust Company is owed $1,050,000 on its first mortgage and Carpe Investments Corporation is owed $253,000 on a second mortgage.

15 The assessed value of Lot G is not disclosed in the material. The title reveals that there is a mortgage to Edelweiss Credit Union on the title. $720,000 is owed to Edelweiss.

16 There are also several claims of builder's lien, certificates of pending litigation, and judgments filed against the title to Lot G. The first certificate of lis pendens was registered April 1, 1993; the first claim of builder's lien was registered July 30, 1993 and the first judgment was registered July 28, 1994, by Harris Steel Ltd. In an affidavit sworn April 7, 1995, Mr. Lee deposed that creditors other than Ocean and Mr. Kan have judgments against Creative totalling $1,034,000. Harris Steel Ltd. has obtained an order to offer the Creative lands for sale to satisfy its judgment.

17 Mr. Lee concedes that when Creative granted the $1,000,000 mortgage and the assignment of rents to Pacific on August 12, 1994, Pacific did not advance any money to Creative. In fact, Pacific never advanced or loaned any money to Creative. Mr. Lee says he caused Creative to grant the mortgage to Pacific to secure loans he personally made to Creative between September 199l and February 1995. He says that by the time the mortgage and assignment of rents were executed in August 12, 1994, Creative owed Mr. Lee in excess of $2,000,000.

18 Mr. Lee says that in September 1991 he loaned $1,800,000 to Creative, to be used, in part, to purchase Lots G and H. The loan was unsecured. Mr. Lee did produce a cancelled cheque for $1,641,697.62, dated July 31, 1991, drawn on an account in the name of Vancouver Trade Mart Inc. Mr. Lee says that this amount was deducted from his shareholder's loan to VTM.

19 Mr. Lee says that after August 1992 when construction was suspended, he personally made the payments due under the mortgages on Creative's lands, totalling about $12,000 per month. He considered these payments to be unsecured shareholder loans to Creative. Creative's 1993 year-end financial statements do contain a note indicating that Creative's mortgages were all current as of May 11, 1994.

20 Mr. Lee has produced photocopies of the front only of numerous cheques made payable to Creative. According to these cheques, Mr. Lee advanced $775,000 to Creative during 1992. Mr. Lee advanced $80,500 to Creative in 1993 - $80,000 in March and April, and a further $500 on September 15.

21 Mr. Lee advanced $128,050 to Creative in 1994 prior to August 12, the date on which Creative granted the mortgage to Pacific, and approximately $160,000 more by the end of 1994. In 1995, Mr. Lee advanced approximately $28,000 to Creative; the last advance was made on February 28, 1995. Mr. Lee stopped loaning money to Creative in February 1995 because his funds were exhausted.

22 Mr. Lee says that sometime in 1993 he decided he would make no further unsecured loans to Creative. He says he told the company's accountant this and advised the accountant he intended to take mortgage security from Creative. There is a reference in the notes to the December 31, 1993 year-end financial statements of Creative as follows:

6. Due to a Shareholder

The shareholder has personally borrowed funds and made advances to the Company. These amounts are unsecured, bear interest at the shareholder's borrowing cost plus 3% and have no fixed terms of repayment. Up to this point the shareholder has waived in part the interest incurred. The company paid $93,911 (1992 - $11,220) in interest charges to Mr. George H. Lee. It is the intention of the shareholder to register a charge against the Company's assets to secure this amount.

(underlining added)

23 Mr. Lee says that sometime in 1994 a resolution of the directors of Creative was passed, authorizing the granting of a mortgage to him. This resolution is not in evidence. Mr. Lee decided in August 1994 to put the mortgage and assignment of rents in the name of Pacific. He says this was done to give Pacific assets which would enable it to pursue funding for an attempt to purchase the Vancouver Trade Mart building at 333 Terminal Avenue. A mortgage and assignment of rents was executed by Creative in favour of Pacific on August 12, 1994, and registered against the title to Lot H on the same day.

THE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE ACT

24 The Fraudulent Conveyance Act consists of two sections. The relevant portions follow:

1. A disposition of property, by writing or otherwise, ... at any time made, to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies, shall be void and of no effect as against a person.....whose rights and obligations by collusion, guile, malice or fraudulent devices and practices are or might be, in any way, disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded, notwithstanding a pretence or other matter to the contrary.

4. This Act does not apply to a disposition of property for good consideration and in good faith lawfully transferred to a person not having, at the time of the transfer to him, any notice or knowledge of collusion or fraud.

25 In essence, a fraudulent conveyance is a transfer of an interest in property which is made with the intention, and which has the effect, of hindering or impairing the right of a creditor or other person to satisfy a claim against the transferor. It is not necessary for the person seeking relief to show that the transferor was insolvent at the time the transfer was made, and the applicant need not establish that he or she was a creditor, or an unsecured creditor, at the time the transfer was made. Re Skinner (1960), 27 D.L.R. (2d) 74 (B.C.S.C.).

26 All that the applicant must show is that the transferor, in making the gift or transfer, did so with intent to delay, hinder or defraud creditors or others. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Ash, (1964), 47 D.L.R. (2d) 620 (B.C.S.C.); C.I.B.C. v. Boukalis, 1987 CanLII 2694 (BC CA), (1987) 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 190 (C.A.).

27 Fraudulent intent is essentially a matter of fact to be proved in the circumstances of each particular case. Proof that the transferor intended to defeat or delay its creditors usually involves drawing inferences from the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Where some consideration has flowed from the transferee to the transferor, the court may consider the adequacy of the consideration in relation to the issue of intent, since a transfer at an undervalue raises suspicions about motive. Inadequate consideration may be considered to be a badge of fraud.

28 Where a transaction renders the transferor insolvent, the circumstances may also be considered suspicious. Freeman v. Pope (1870), L.R. 5 Ch. App. 538. If a transferor with debts makes a transfer the effect of which is to render him unable to meet his then existing liabilities, that circumstance furnishes very strong evidence of an intent to defraud his creditors. Manryk v. Merko (1971), 19 D.L.R. (3d) 238, (Man. C.A.). This case is also authority for the proposition that where parties to a transaction are related to each other, and the circumstances are suspicious, the burden of explanation falls on the related parties. In such a case the testimony of the related parties must be scrutinized with care and suspicion, and a judge may reject the evidence absent corroboration. As Justice Duff said in Koop v. Smith, 1915 CanLII 26 (SCC), (1915) 51 S.C.R. 55, 8 W.W.R. 1203, 25 D.L.R. 355, at page 1204:

> ....it is very seldom that such evidence can safely be acted upon as in itself sufficient.

Later on the same page, Justice Duff said:

> ...I think the true rule is that suspicious circumstances, coupled with relationship, make a case of res ipsa loquitur which the tribunal of fact may and will generally treat as a sufficient prima facie case, but that it is not strictly in law bound to do so; and that the question of the necessity for corroboration is strictly a question of fact.

THE FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE ACT

29 The sections of the Fraudulent Preference Act relied upon by the parties are reproduced below:

3. Subject to section 6, a disposition of property by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances, is unable to pay his debts in full, or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency, is void as against an injured creditor, if made

(a) with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice creditors, or some of them; and
(b) to or for a creditor with intent to give the creditor preference over other creditors or some of them.

6. (4) .....Nothing in this section invalidates a security given to a creditor for an existing debt where, by reason or on account of the giving of the security, an advance in money is made to the debtor by the creditor in the belief in good faith that the advance will enable the debtor to continue his business and to pay his debts in full.

30 In order to attack a transaction or conveyance under the Fraudulent Preference Act, the applicant must have had the status of creditor at the time the allegedly preferential transaction took place. As well, the applicant must establish that the preferential transfer or conveyance was to, or for, another creditor of the transferor. Re Skinner, cited above, approved in C.I.B.C. v. Boukalis, also cited above.

31 The applicant must also establish that at the time of the preferential transfer the transferor was insolvent, on the eve of insolvency or unable to pay its debts in full.

ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSION

32 Pacific did not advance any money to Creative, before or after the August 12, 1994 mortgage was granted. Looked at in this light, Pacific is not a creditor, and the mortgage to Pacific cannot be attacked under the Fraudulent Preference Act.

Digitized by Google

33 However, the transaction is void under the provisions of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. The evidence establishes beyond any doubt that when Creative granted the mortgage to Pacific, Creative was insolvent, whatever definition of insolvency is applied. Creative's liabilities exceeded its assets; it was not carrying on the business for which it had been incorporated or any other business; and it was not paying its debts as they came due.

34 The granting of the mortgage to Pacific did reduce Creative's ability to satisfy the legitimate claims of its creditors, including Mr. Kan and Ocean, and has hindered and delayed them in the pursuit of their just and lawful remedies.

35 Did Creative intend to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others, within the meaning of section 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, when it granted the mortgage to Pacific? There are suspicious circumstances surrounding the transaction from which the court may infer an intent to defraud Creative's creditors. Pacific and Creative are related companies, part of the group of companies owned or controlled by Mr. Lee. Mr. Lee refers to Pacific in one of his affidavits as "my company". From Creative's financial statements, it appears that Mr. Lee is the only holder of common shares in Creative since the notes to the statements refer to him as "the shareholder".

36 There can be no doubt that Mr. Lee knew that Creative was insolvent in August 1994, and that knowledge is attributed to Pacific, since Mr. Lee is the President and a director of both companies.

37 Mr. Lee did not depose that Creative was or believed itself to be solvent in 1993 or 1994. He did depose, in his affidavit sworn April 7, 1995, that Creative is presently able to pay all of its creditors and is not insolvent, but that assertion is simply not true. Creative has not paid its debts, and it has no present ability to do so.

38 Presumably Mr. Lee's assertion of solvency is based on a belief that if Creative is able to sell Lots G and H, all its creditors can be paid, but there is no proof, such as appraisal evidence, offered in support of that assertion, and the fact that the liabilities of the company already exceeded its assets by more than $2,000,000 by the end of 1993 strongly suggests the contrary.

39 All of these circumstances justify the inference that the mortgage to Pacific was granted with the intent to delay, hinder or defraud Ocean, Kan and others of their remedies against Creative.

40 The respondents say, however, that the mortgage and assignment of rents were lawfully granted to Pacific for good consideration and in good faith, because there was an agreement between Mr. Lee and Creative that he would be given security for loans he had already made to Creative, in return for his promise to continue to advance money to the company. Mr. Lee says that this agreement was made sometime in 1993; that he did continue to advance money to Creative in 1994; and that he continued to advance money to Creative after the mortgage and assignment of rents were executed on August 12, 1994.

41 There are problems with Mr. Lee's assertion that the granting of the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific was to secure Creative's debt to him. There is no evidence that the debt owed to Mr. Lee by Creative was ever assigned to Pacific. Mr. Lee did not claim to have assigned the debt. In his affidavit he said only that he decided in August 1994 to have the mortgage and assignment of rents granted to Pacific, instead of himself.

42 If the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific were made to secure a debt owed to Mr Lee, the applicants may rely on the Fraudulent Preference Act, as well as the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, because the former Act applies to dispositions of property made to or for a creditor, if the evidence establishes that when Creative gave the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific, it did so to delay, hinder or defraud creditors of their just and lawful remedies, and with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice Creative's creditors, by preferring Mr. Lee over those other creditors.

43 I have already stated my conclusion that Creative was in insolvent circumstances and unable to pay its debts in full on August 12, 1994 when the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific were executed and registered on Creative's lands. In response to this, Mr. Lee says that when the security was granted to Pacific, Creative was carrying out its obligations under an agreement made between Mr. Lee and Creative earlier, in 1993.

44 This assertion does not assist Pacific because Creative was also insolvent in 1993, and an agreement to grant security to a creditor in 1993 is also a disposition of property which may be attacked as a fraudulent preference. As well, if there was an agreement in 1993 to grant security to someone, it was not to Pacific. Mr. Lee deposed in his affidavit that the decision to name Pacific as the mortgagee was not made until August 1994.

45 Mr. Lee has failed to establish that Creative agreed in 1993 that it would grant a mortgage and assignment of rents to anyone. He has not said that Creative agreed to give a mortgage in 1994; he only deposed that he advised Creative's accountant of his intention to obtain mortgage security from Creative. Mr. Lee is not the only director of Creative. I have already noted that no directors' resolution of Creative has been put in evidence, but Mr. Lee deposed, in any event, that the directors' resolution was not passed until 1994. The financial statements do not prove an agreement by Creative to grant mortgage security. They simply state that Mr. Lee intends to register "a charge" against the Company's assets to secure amounts due to him.

46 Have the applicants established that Creative intended to prefer Mr. Lee, and to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice other creditors? Creative and Mr. Lee must have known that Creative was insolvent in 1993 and on August 12, 1994. This was not an arms' length transaction between creditor and debtor such as that in Ex parte Wilkinson, In re Berry, (1882) 22 Ch.D. 788, relied upon by the respondents, where the court concluded that a supplier of cotton to an insolvent business was unaware, when it obtained security for an existing debt, that the debtor was insolvent.

47 The respondent relies on section 6(4) of the Fraudulent Preference Act. It is clear that the $1,000,000 debt secured by the mortgage in August 1994 was existing debt. Mr. Lee had advanced $1.6 million dollars to Creative through VTM in 1991 and he has deposed that by the time Creative granted the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific, he was owed over $2,000,000. It is true that Mr. Lee made further advances to Creative after August 12, 1994. However, I find that those advances were not made in the belief in good faith that the advances would enable Creative to continue its business and pay its debts in full.

48 Mr. Lee has not offered any evidence that he did believe that the advances would enable Creative to continue its business and pay its debts in full. He has not suggested that he or Creative had any realistic plan to extricate Creative from its ongoing financial problems, let alone enable it to pay its debts in full. In fact, all that Mr. Lee has claimed is that he advanced funds to Creative to keep the first and second mortgages in good standing.

49 Mr. Lee deposed that if Creative's mortgages were not kept current, Creative would almost certainly have been foreclosed and unable to continue its business. But keeping the mortgages current did not enable Creative to continue its business of constructing and operating the Vancouver Trade Mart Phase II development.

And Mr. Lee had a direct personal interest in seeing that the mortgage payments were made - he had personally guaranteed the mortgages to Carpe and Edelweiss. If Creative did not pay the mortgages payments due to Carpe and Edelweiss, he would have been required to do so personally. And if the first mortgagee, Aetna, started foreclosure proceedings, Carpe and Edelweiss might well have called upon Mr. Lee to honour his personal guarantees.

50 From the evidence it may also be inferred that Mr. Lee knew, when he caused Creative to grant the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific, that he would be unable to advance sufficient funds to allow Creative to continue its business, and to pay its debts in full. Creative needed $10,000,000 to complete the construction. And Mr. Lee did not have that kind of money left. The total of sums claimed against Mr. Lee personally in actions commenced in 1992, 1993 and in the months prior to August 12, 1994, is in excess of $3,500,000, according to the records of the Vancouver Registry of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. Mr. Lee borrowed against a life insurance policy to advance monies to Creative in early October 1994, and he was unable to make any further advances to Creative after February 1995.

51 The inescapable inference is that Mr. Lee knew when he decided to obtain security from Creative for the existing debt, and when he caused Creative to grant the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific, that he was doing nothing more than delaying the inevitable financial collapse of Creative while significantly improving his own position as a creditor, to the prejudice of other creditors.

52 Ocean and Mr. Kan have been injured by the granting of the mortgage to Pacific. Instead of sharing pro rata with Mr. Lee the assets of Creative available to unsecured creditors, Mr. Lee acquired a priority for himself by the mortgage and assignment of rents.

53 Mr. Kan and Ocean have established that if Pacific is not a creditor of Creative, the mortgage and assignment of rents to Pacific are void by operation of section 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, and are not saved by section 4 of that Act. And if the mortgage was granted to Pacific for Mr. Lee, the applicants have established that the mortgage and assignment of rents are void by operation of section 3 of the Fraudulent Preference Act, and are not saved by section 6 of that Act. In either circumstance, the mortgage and assignment of rents are void as against the lien and charge created by the registration in the land title office of the judgments of Ocean and Kan. There shall be a declaration to that effect.

54 Counsel for Ocean originally sought an order that Lot H be sold to pay Ocean's judgment, but adjourned that application on May 12, 1995. Ocean is at liberty to renew the application, and to seek further directions if required. I am not seized of any further applications.

55 Ocean and Kan are entitled to their costs against the respondents, to be taxed on Scale 3.

property by his wife upon his death. The trial judge held that he could not, and set aside the inter vivos conveyances to the children. They appealed. For the reasons which follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

FACTS

[2] The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Stone was the second for each of them following the deaths of their respective spouses, and they each had children from their first marriages. They lived a very comfortable life together over 24 years of marriage, which included a nice home, a condominium in Florida, and travel, until Mr. Stone's death in 1995.

[3] Mr. Stone had a business and several real estate investment holdings. His son, Ian Stone, managed all of the businesses. Mr. Stone had an estate plan, the purpose and goal of which were that ultimately all of his assets would belong to his two children, Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower. Although during his marriage to Mrs. Stone, Mr. Stone had transferred some properties and shares to his children, he maintained control over the assets through a voting trust and through the retention of the last $1.9 million. He did not want any of his assets to go to Mrs. Stone's children, and to that end, nothing was held by Mrs. Stone in her own name. Mr. Stone was aware that Mrs. Stone's assets would consist of approximately $116,000 in cash at the date of his death. The matrimonial home was held in Mr. Stone's name. The condominium in Florida had been once in both names, but when Mrs. Stone was diagnosed with breast cancer, she agreed to transfer her interest to him in April 1994, although once her health improved, the deed was not registered.

[4] In March 1995, Mr. and Mrs. Stone returned to London early from Florida as Mr. Stone was quite ill. He went straight to hospital where he was diagnosed with lung cancer and told that he only had weeks or months to live and that he should get his affairs in order. Mr. Stone then told his doctor that his children would be receiving everything from him before his will, and that is exactly the plan that he proceeded to implement. In that conversation Mr. Stone also told the doctor that he expected that some day there would be litigation over what he did.

[5] Before this time, Mr. Stone had made a will dated June 18, 1991 wherein he left life estates in the matrimonial home and the Florida condominium to Mrs. Stone, a specific gift of $25,000 to a stepson and the residue to be split between Mrs. Stone and his two children, Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower. The children were named executors and were given the specific power to settle any dispute with Mrs. Stone in the event that she elected to take an equalization payment under the Family Law Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F-3 rather than her legacy under the will.

[6] Through his grandson, an articling student, Mr. Stone retained a new lawyer, Mr. Fischer, who did not have any conflict with Mrs. Stone, to assist him in carrying out his intentions with respect to his property.

[7] Mr. Fischer attended on Mr. Stone in the hospital on March 30, 1995. At that time, Mr. Stone indicated that he was unsure whether he or Mrs. Stone would die first. On this issue, the trial judge found that by this time Mrs. Stone's condition had improved after a mastectomy and therapy, that her death was not imminent, and that to everyone's knowledge, she was almost certainly going to survive Mr. Stone. However, Mr. Stone's suggestion to Mr. Fischer was to leave his wife a life estate in the matrimonial home, along with a life interest in the income on $125,000 from which, together with her own funds, she would support herself and keep up the home. Mr. Fischer advised that the figure was too low and suggested $175,000. He also explained that under the Family Law Act, Mrs. Stone could elect an equalization payment rather than take under the will [1] . Mr. Stone responded that "I'm going to do what I'm going to do". They also discussed the concept of using the Florida condominium as a "bargaining chip".

[8] Mr. Stone was discharged from hospital by the end of March, and on April 3 he attended on Mr. Fischer at his office. A will was prepared and signed leaving Mrs. Stone $250,000 together with a life tenancy in the matrimonial home "if it was owned by me at my death." Mrs. Stone was to pay all taxes, insurance and maintenance on the home. After the will was signed, Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower joined their father in the lawyer's office where they discussed the immediate transfer of all of Mr. Stone's business assets to them. The paperwork for the transfers was completed on April 10. On the same date, Mr. Stone signed a deed conveying the Florida condominium to his two children. On April 26, Ian Stone instructed Mr. Fischer to prepare a transfer of the matrimonial home from Mr. Stone to Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower. This was executed by Mr. Stone on May 4, 1995 and registered on May 15, 1995 without compliance with s. 21 of the Family Law Act. [2] The registration was noted as "subject to spousal".

[9] Over this time, there was some discussion with Mrs. Stone about what was going to be left to her. First Mr. Stone told her he would leave her $100,000 plus a one-quarter interest in his antique shop, and a life interest in the matrimonial home. Mrs. Stone told him that was inadequate. He later told her she would receive $250,000. He was told that this was also inadequate. Mrs. Stone was never told that the matrimonial home or the Florida condominium would be conveyed to Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower, nor that the business assets had been conveyed to them by inter vivos transfer.

[10] Mr. Stone died on July 21, 1995, leaving virtually nothing in his estate. Mrs. Stone elected under s. 6 of the Family Law Act not to take her legacy under Mr. Stone's will but instead to take her entitlement to equalization under s. 5 of the Act. She also proceeded with a successful motion for an order setting aside the transfer of the matrimonial home.

[11] The action for equalization was brought under s. 7 of the Family Law Act. [3] For the purpose of determining the value of Mr. Stone's net family property at the day before his death and Mrs. Stone's entitlement to an effective order for the amount she was entitled to receive, Mrs. Stone claimed that the inter vivos transfers to Ian Stone and Maxine Ordower since March, 1995 were made with intent to defeat her entitlement to the equalization payment and were therefore void as against her under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F-29.

[12] The trial judge held that the Fraudulent Conveyances Act could be applied in conjunction with the Family Law Act and that the inter vivos transfers by Mr. Stone to his children were void as against Mrs. Stone. He ordered that those assets therefore be returned to the estate, and that an equalization payment of $851,937.74 be made to Mrs. Stone. He also ordered costs in her favour on a solicitor and client basis. He reduced the prejudgment interest rate to 2.5%, instead of 5%, in light of the fact that Mrs. Stone was being paid support to the time of trial and she occupied the matrimonial home.

[13] The appellants appeal from the judgment and award of costs. The respondent cross-appeals on inter alia, the prejudgment interest rate and the failure of the trial judge to award punitive damages.

ISSUES

[14] On the main appeal, Mr. Strosberg posed three issues for the court:

(1) Did the trial judge err in concluding that the Family Law Act creates a debtor/creditor relationship between spouses as a running account which becomes settled on the date of separation or the date before death?

(2) Did the trial judge err in failing to apply ss. 5(6) of the Family Law Act? (an unequal division based on unconscionability)

(3) Does the Fraudulent Conveyances Act apply in the context of the Family Law Act, and if so, in what way?

[15] In his argument, Mr. Strosberg made the following submission with respect to the issues and the operation of the two Acts: Spouses do not have a debtor/creditor relationship on an ongoing basis during co-habitation based on a running account between them. If they did, no spouse would be able to transfer his or her own property during co-habitation free of the claims of the other. During co-habitation, unless an order has been made under s. 5(3), one spouse is not the creditor of the other. Until there is a debtor/creditor relationship, there can be no order under the Fraudulent Conveyances Act to set aside any conveyance as void against a spouse.

[16] The appellants submit that improvident or fraudulent transfers are intended to be taken into account under ss. 5(6)(d) of the Family Law Act. Under that section, the court may order an "unequal" equalization amount if it would be unconscionable to merely equalize, having regard to a spouse's intentional or reckless depletion of his or her net family property. The court must weigh all of the circumstances surrounding the transfers in order to determine whether it would be unconscionable to make an equal division between Mr. and Mrs. Stone. In this case, one such factor is the legitimate objective of Mr. Stone to see his children and not Mrs. Stone's children end up with his assets and businesses.

[17] If the trial judge concluded that an unequal division was appropriate and ordered an equalization amount that was more than the estate had available to pay, based on the fact that Mrs. Stone would then have become a judgment creditor of the estate, she could at that time seek to set aside the conveyances.

[18] The essence of the appellants' submission is that the Family Law Act is a self-contained code intended to regulate financial relations between spouses and that there is no room for the Fraudulent Conveyances Act to operate on the rights of the spouses in respect of each other's property, i.e., the right to a one-half interest in the difference between their net family property amounts that arises on separation. [4]

[19] The appellants therefore say that the trial judge erred in applying the Fraudulent Conveyances Act to bring back into his net family property calculation, the assets Mr. Stone transferred to his children; and the trial judge further erred in failing to deal with the issue of those transfers under s. 5(6) of the Family Law Act as a factor in determining whether there should be an unequal division of the difference between the net family property amounts of the two spouses.

[21] The relevant section of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act is s. 2, which provides:

s. 2. Every conveyance of real property or personal property and every bond, suit, judgment and execution heretofore or hereafter made with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or defraud creditors or others of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties or forfeitures are void as against such persons and their assigns.

Section 5 is the relevant section of the Family Law Act. It provides:

5. (1) When a divorce is granted or a marriage is declared a nullity, or when the spouses are separated and there is no reasonable prospect that they will resume cohabitation, the spouse whose net family property is the lesser of the two net family properties is entitled to one-half the difference between them.

(2) When a spouse dies, if the net family property of the deceased spouse exceeds the net family property of the surviving spouse, the surviving spouse is entitled to one-half the difference between them.

Digitized by Google

(3) When spouses are cohabiting, if there is a serious danger that one spouse may improvidently deplete his or her net family property, the other spouse may on an application under section 7 have the difference between the net family properties divided as if the spouses were separated and there were no reasonable prospect that they would resume cohabitation.

. . . .

(6) The court may award a spouse an amount that is more or less than half the difference between the net family properties if the court is of the opinion that equalizing the net family properties would be unconscionable, having regard to,

. . . .

(d) a spouse's intentional or reckless depletion of his or her net family property;

(h) any other circumstance relating to the acquisition, disposition, preservation, maintenance or improvement of property.

[22] The first issue to be determined is whether, and if so, when is a spouse a "creditor or other" of the other spouse in respect of the right to an interest in the net family property of the other spouse, within the meaning of s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act.

The Fraudulent Conveyances Act

[23] Longstanding case law decided under the Fraudulent Conveyances Act has addressed the issue of who is a "creditor or other" for the purpose of s. 2. In Hopkinson v. Westerman (1919), 45 O.L.R. 208 (C.A.) at 211, the court held that "others" extended to persons who, though not judgment creditors, had pending actions in which they were sure to recover damages. In that case, the person who transferred the land was a defendant in a tort action. In Bell v. Williamson and Moulton, [1945] O.R. 844 (C.A.) the court similarly held that the claimant need not be a judgment creditor at the time of the conveyance, but a person may fall within the words "or others" even if the person has, at the time of the impugned transaction, only a claim for unliquidated damages in contract or in tort. Robertson C.J.O. stated at p. 848:

I do not doubt for a moment that a transaction may be null and void within s. 2 of The Fraudulent Conveyances Act, although the plaintiff who brings the action attacking it may, at the time of the transaction, and even when action is brought attacking it, have had nothing more than a claim for unliquidated damages in contract or in tort. The effect of the words "or others" following the word "creditors" is to give to such persons a right of action to have a transaction set aside as null and void as against them, if made with the required intent. . . .

[24] This interpretation of the phrase "creditors or others" has been applied many times including in the family law context: See for example: Shephard v. Shephard (1925), 56 O.L.R. 556 (C.A.); Ferguson v. Lastewka, [1946] O.R. 577 (H.C.J.); Oliver v. McLaughlin (1893), 24 O.R. 41 (Q.B.); Murdoch v. Murdoch (1976), 26 R.F.L. 1 (Alta. S.C.); Chan v. Chan, [1993] B.C.J. No. 442 (B.C.S.C.); and Lepore v. Lepore, [1998] O.J. No. 733 (Dist. Ct.), aff'd by Ontario Court of Appeal (October 22, 1990).

[25] Therefore, in order for a spouse to qualify as a person who is intended to be protected from conveyances of property made with intent to defeat her interest, she must have had an existing claim against her husband at the time of the impugned conveyances, that is a right which she could have asserted in an action.

The Family Law Act

[26] The nature of the property regime established as between spouses under the Family Law Act was clearly described by Cory J. in Rawluk v. Rawluk, 1990 CanLII 152 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 70 and by Galligan J.A. in Berdette v. Berdette reflex, (1991), 3 O.R. (3d) 513 (C.A.). Spouses each own their separate property throughout the marriage. However, upon the happening of one of the five triggering events, there is a valuation date. If at that date the net family property of one spouse is less than that of the other, then the spouse with the lesser net family property is "entitled to one-half the difference between them": (s. 5(1)). The five events are outlined in s. 4(1): (1) the date of separation with no reasonable prospect of resuming co-habitation; (2) the date of divorce; (3) the date of declaration of nullity; (4) the date one of the spouses commences an application under s. 5(3) for improvident depletion of net family property, if the application is granted; and (5) the date before the death of the spouse with the greater net family property.

[27] In this case, Mr. and Mrs. Stone were not separated at the time Mr. Stone transferred his assets to his children. However, Mr. Stone knew his death was imminent. He also knew that the value of his wife's assets was significantly less than the value of his. He had been specifically advised that on his death his wife could elect not to take under his will but instead, to take an equalization payment based on the difference between their respective net family properties. Furthermore, Mr. Stone anticipated litigation over his will and transfers and Mrs. Stone specifically told him that she would contest a legacy that was not sufficient for her, such as the amount he told her he was leaving her.

[28] Mrs. Stone did not initiate an application under s. 5(3) of the Act which provides:

5. (3) When spouses are cohabiting, if there is a serious danger that one spouse may improvidently deplete his or her net family property, the other spouse may on an application under section 7 have the difference between the net family

properties divided as if the spouses were separated and there was no reasonable prospect that they would resume cohabitation.

[29] Mrs. Stone did not have an opportunity to initiate an application because the transfers were kept secret from her. She had no knowledge of the transfer of any of the assets including the business assets, the matrimonial home and the Florida condominium. The secret was such that she was permitted to believe she still had an ownership interest in the Florida condominium. She even continued to pay the associated expenses until she learned some months later that the property had been transferred.

[30] Because Mr. Stone's death was known by all to be imminent, Mrs. Stone's claim to a right to equalization was also imminent and would have been triggered by his death. One of the effects of s. 5(3) of the Act is to provide a remedy to a spouse in those circumstances where the other spouse seeks to divest himself or herself of his or her property in anticipation of death and in order to defeat the spouse's claim to equalization. Had Mrs. Stone exercised that remedy by commencing an application, she would have been a "creditor or other" of Mr. Stone within the meaning of s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act on the date she commenced the application.

. . . It is clear to me that Mrs. Stone may well have resorted to this provision and was at least entitled to the chance but of course Mr. Stone kept the full extent and nature of his dealings a secret from her. . . .(Stone v. Stone 1999 CanLII 15094 (ON SC), (1999), 46 O.R. (3d) 31 at 59 (S.C.J.))

[32] That finding is fully supported by the evidence including Mrs. Stone's stated intention to contest the will and, of course, by this litigation. I agree with the trial judge that Mr. Stone and his children could not, by deliberate non-disclosure, deprive Mrs. Stone of her ability to establish the legal status of "creditor or other". Because she had the right to apply for equalization at the time of the transfers, but was deprived of her ability to exercise that right by the actions of Mr. Stone and his children, the parties to the transfers, she was a "creditor or other" within the meaning of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act.

[33] The trial judge also based his conclusion that Mrs. Stone was a "creditor" of Mr. Stone at the time of the transfers on the following statement of law:

...the [Family Law] Act creates a creditor-debtor relationship which takes the form of an open or running account which becomes a settled account on separation or death.

With respect to the trial judge, I do not agree that that statement is an accurate reflection of the law. To characterize spouses as being in a constant debtor-creditor relationship would require clear legislative expression. There is nothing in the Act which suggests such a relationship. To the contrary, the provision of the five alternative triggering events for the valuation date and the right to equalization only on one of those dates indicates that the debtor-creditor relationship arises only on the valuation date.

[34] Having said that, it is unnecessary in this case to decide how far the concept of "creditor or other" may extend in the family law context, apart from s. 5(3) of the Family Law Act.

[35] In this case, for the reasons set out, I find that Mrs. Stone was a "creditor or other" of Mr. Stone at the time of his inter vivos transfers and therefore entitled to set those transfers aside under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act.

Section 5(6) of the Family Law Act

[36] The second branch of the appellants' argument is that the trial judge erred by applying the Fraudulent Conveyances Act in conjunction with the equalization procedure under the Family Law Act. The appellant submits that the Family Law Act is a code unto itself and to the extent that it contains anti-avoidance provisions, [5] the legislature intended only those provisions to apply to the family law context. Therefore, the trial judge should have first determined the equalization amount based on the net family property of each spouse on the day before Mr. Stone's death (i.e. without setting aside the inter vivos transfers) and then considered whether Mr. Stone's conduct in transferring his assets to his children to avoid the equalization process was unconscionable and warranted an unequal division. In that regard, ss. 5(6)(d) and (h) are set out again:

5. (6) The court may award a spouse an amount that is more or less than half the difference between the net family properties if the court is of the opinion that equalizing the net family properties would be unconscionable, having regard to,

(d) a spouse's intentional or reckless depletion of his or her net family property;

(h) any other circumstance relating to the acquisition, disposition, preservation, maintenance or improvement of property.

[37] The appellants submit further that in assessing the issue of unconscionability, the court would also consider the long-standing estate plan of Mr. Stone and the legitimacy of wanting to see his assets end up in the hands of his children, as well as all of the other circumstances.

[38] Counsel suggested that only after judgment was awarded, could the Fraudulent Conveyances Act be used to set aside any transfer, if necessary to give effect to the judgment.

First, this court in Berdette, supra, clearly set out the correct method for determining net family property and the application of s. 5(6). The first step is to establish the net family property of each spouse under s. 4 of the Act by determining and valuing the property each owned on the valuation date. The next step is to apply s. 5(1) and determine whether one spouse's net family property is greater than the other's, and what the equalization payment would be. Then the court decides whether it would be unconscionable to equalize the net family property. If so, the court will order a payment of more or less than one half the difference. Otherwise the court will order equalization by payment of one half. Galligan J. A. clearly rejected the approach suggested by counsel in the following conclusion:

In the above-quoted extract from Rawluk, Cory J. held that the third step [application of s. 5(6)] is to be kept distinct from the determination of ownership of property. Ownership of property is determined in the first step. It is therefore my opinion that the considerations set out in subparagraphs (a) through (h) of s. 5(6) are irrelevant to determining the net family properties of each spouse. This opinion, I think, is additionally supported by reference to the structure of Part I. The provisions of s. 5 are all founded upon the concept of net family property, and assume that net family property has been established. There is nothing in s. 4 which incorporates consideration of elements of s. 5(6) into the determination of which spouse owned what property on valuation day. Moreover, my reading of the judgments in Rawluk v. Rawluk at trial (reflex, (1986), 55 O.R. (2d) 704, 3 R.F.L. (3d) 113 (H.C.J.)) and in this court (reflex, (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 637, 10 R.F.L. (3d) 113)) is that it was assumed that the provisions of s. 5(6) had no bearing upon the ownership issues essential to the determination of the net family properties under s. 4(1). (p. 526)

[40] Second, in this case, had the fraudulent conveyances not been set aside as of the valuation date in order to calculate the net family property of Mr. Stone, then without those assets Mrs. Stone's net family property would have been greater than Mr. Stone's. There would therefore have been no basis for Mrs. Stone to claim entitlement to equalization under s. 5(1), and therefore no opportunity for the court to consider the unconscionability provisions. The same conclusion was reached by Galligan J.A. in Berdette, supra where, without the finding sought by the wife of a constructive trust of gifts made by her to her husband during the marriage, the wife could not have applied for equalization, as her net family property was equal to his.

[41] Third, as discussed above, it is not necessary to be a judgment creditor in order to qualify as a "creditor or other" under s. 2 of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act. Therefore there is no need to wait until an equalization payment has been ordered before applying the Act. In any event, the timing of such an order, being well after the date of the impugned transfers, would not relate back to the date of the transfers and therefore would not provide a basis for setting them aside.

[42] Fourth, section 5(6) of the Family Law Act only empowers the court to order an unequal division of the difference in value of net family property. It is not a provision which can be used to set aside previous dispositions of property to third parties. Consequently, any order must be based on the net family property amounts of the spouses as determined under s. 4. The order cannot reflect the value of any property which is not part of that net family property value. As a result, although the reckless depletion of assets by one spouse can be used by the court as a factor in assessing unconscionable conduct and making an unequal distribution, the section will only be useful if the spouse who made the transfers of property has sufficient property left on the valuation date to make an order for an unequal sharing an effective remedy for the wronged spouse.

[43] Finally, In Rawluk v. Rawluk, 1990 CanLII 152 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 70, Cory J. made the following statement regarding how ownership of property is to be determined under the Family Law Act:

The Family Law Act, 1986 does not constitute an exclusive code for determining the ownership of matrimonial property. The legislators must have been aware of the existence and effect of the constructive trust remedy in matrimonial cases when the Act was proposed. Yet neither by direct reference nor by necessary implication does the Act prohibit the use of the constructive trust remedy. . . . (p. 97)

[44] I am satisfied that as with the constructive trust, the Family Law Act does not exclude other applicable statutory or common law remedies which deal with the ownership of property at law and in equity, including the Fraudulent Conveyances Act. It is true that the legislature has not proceeded, as suggested by the 1993 Ontario Law Reform Commission Report on Family Law [6] , to extend and codify within the Family Law Act itself, what will constitute a fraudulent disposal of property by a spouse during cohabitation, made in order to defeat the potential interests of the other spouse, and which can therefore be set aside. However, where on the facts, the Fraudulent Conveyances Act can apply, there is nothing in the Family Law Act which ousts the operation of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act as part of the process to determine the net family property of each spouse as of the applicable valuation date.

[45] For the above reasons, the trial judge did not err by applying the Fraudulent Conveyances Act or in his conclusion that s.5(6) of the Family Law Act had no application in this case as a remedy for Mrs. Stone.

OTHER ISSUES

[46] The appellants raised three other issues on appeal. First, the appellants challenged the trial judge's ruling regarding the late introduction of new appraisal evidence of the value of certain lands. I agree with the respondent that there is no basis to interfere with the trial judge's exercise of discretion in respect of this ruling. The new appraisal was obtained by the appellants after the respondent had closed her case and committed to values for all of the properties. It was sought to be introduced by Canada Trust on behalf of the estate and not by the appellants, and after Canada Trust had also closed its case. The trial judge was entitled to find that admitting the new appraisal at that point in the trial and thereby allowing Canada Trust to re-open its case with a different position would have created prejudice and unfairness to the respondent.

[47] Second, the appellants say that the trial judge erred by failing to have Mrs. Stone properly account for monies she received as interim support and for the benefit she received by occupying the matrimonial home pending trial. I see no basis to interfere with the trial judge's treatment of these amounts. These matters were reflected in a reduced rate for prejudgment interest.

[48] Finally, the appellants also appeal from the award of solicitor and client costs. Again, I would not interfere with the view of the trial judge that because of the fraudulent conveyances and the intention of the appellants to defeat Mrs. Stone's legitimate interests, the costs award on that scale was justified.

THE CROSS-APPEAL

[49] The cross-appeal involves queries with respect to the valuation treatment of certain assets, an appeal from the denial of a punitive damages award and an appeal from the rate of prejudgment interest. These matters were not pursued in oral argument but left with the court on the basis of the factum alone.

[50] I am not satisfied that the trial judge made a reversible error on any of the issues raised on the cross-appeal. The valuation findings were made by the trial judge based on hearing and weighing all of the relevant evidence. The cross-appellant has not pointed to any misapprehension of the evidence which would warrant the interference of this court.

[51] The trial judge declined to award punitive damages. This was within his prerogative. He expressed his opprobrium of the appellants' conduct by the award of solicitor and client costs.

[52] There is also no basis to interfere with the award of prejudgment interest. The trial judge exercised his discretion and as noted, did take into account other benefits received by Mrs. Stone pending trial as an off-set for some of the prejudgment interest.

CONCLUSION

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Mackenzie:

[1] This is an appeal from the orders of Lander J. directing that Myfam Holdings Ltd. ("Myfam") and 451300 B.C. Ltd. ("451300") be added as parties to the divorce action between the respondent Shideh Rohani ("the wife") and Ata Rohani ("the husband"), that Myfam and 451300 be restrained from disposing of assets or issuing dividends until a compensation order in favour of the wife against the husband has been satisfied, and directing that Myfam and 451300 provide security for payment in the form of mortgages of their assets. The appellants contend that the orders offend basic principles of separate corporate identity laid down by Salomon v. Salomon, [1897] A.C.22 (H.L.).

The Litigation History

[2] These proceedings have a lengthy and complex history which must be set out in some detail to frame the limited issues raised on this appeal.

[3] The husband and wife were married in November 1987; they separated finally in November 1992. It was a second marriage for both of them and they had no children together. The husband had four adult children from his first marriage, three of whom are now parties to these proceedings. The wife's children from her first marriage are not involved in the litigation. The husband died after the trial of the actions but his estate has continued to be represented.

[4] The wife initially petitioned for divorce in 1990 and revived those proceedings in 1995 after the parties' final separation. In 1997 she commenced a separate action under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163 and the Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 128, against the husband, three of his children, Myfam, 451300, and Eagle West Canada Enterprises Ltd., alleging that the husband had fraudulently transferred or conveyed assets to the other defendants in order to defeat her claims to family assets. These actions were tried together before the late Mr. Justice Lysyk over 36 days between November 1997 and July 1998. Reasons for judgment were delivered in August 1998. In the fraudulent conveyance action Lysyk J. set aside the transfer of an 11/20 interest in a townhouse on Folkestone Way, West Vancouver ("the Folkestone Way property") by Myfam to the husband's daughter, the defendant Maryam Rohani. He also set aside the transfer of 25 shares in 451300 from Myfam to another daughter, the defendant Yasse Egdami. 451300 was otherwise a wholly owned subsidiary of Myfam and it owned property on Clyde Avenue in West Vancouver ("the Clyde Avenue property").

[5] In the divorce action Lysyk J. concluded that the Class A shares of Myfam were a family asset but the evidence of the value of the shares was inadequate to effect a division. The parties came back before him in February 1999. They agreed that the value of Myfam was $1,078,891 consisting of shareholder loans of $133,333 and attributed value to the Class A and Class B common shares of $945,518. Lysyk J. concluded that only nominal value should be attributed to the Class B shares held by the husband's children, and the value of Myfam's equity was properly attributable to the Class A shares held by the husband. After making a deduction for the equal division of proceeds of sale of the matrimonial home (not otherwise relevant to these reasons) Lysyk J. valued Myfam at $790,000 and he ordered that the wife be paid $230,000 compensation in lieu of her share of family assets, an amount which reflected a 30 percent interest in Myfam. The parties returned to Lysyk J. again in June 1999 on the wife's application for an order against Myfam securing her compensation order and costs. In supplementary reasons dated 13 September 1999, Lysyk J. ordered that Myfam be restrained from disposing of its assets or issuing dividends until the wife's compensation order was satisfied and that Myfam provide security for payment in the form of mortgages attached to the order. He gave the wife special costs against the husband in both actions.

[6] The husband and the other defendants appealed in both actions. The husband died before the appeal was heard but counsel continued to be retained on behalf of his estate. The orders of Lysyk J. were upheld with the exception of grounds five and six, directed to the compensation order, which were remitted back to the trial court. As this remit frames the issues before us I set out the reasons of Rowles J.A. for the Court on those grounds in their entirety:

> XIII. Did the trial judge err in piercing the corporate veil of Myfam and did he err in ordering Myfam to provide security for the compensation order in favour of the wife?
> [89] Subsection 66(2)(c) of the F.R.A. provides that the court may "order a spouse to pay compensation to the other spouse...", and subsection 66(2)(f) provides that the court may "order that a spouse give security for the performance of an obligation imposed by order under this section...."
> [90] The appellants argue that the trial judge erred when ordering Myfam to provide security for the payment of the compensation order when Myfam was not a party to the action in the divorce and the F.R.A. action in which the compensation order was made and when Myfam was not and could not be a "spouse".
> [91] The appellants also argue on a number of grounds that the trial judge was in error when he pierced the corporate veil for the purpose of ordering security.

Digitized by Google

> [92] I do not propose to consider the arguments made by appellants' counsel on the difficult questions raised in grounds five and six because the orders made by the trial judge requiring security to be provided by Myfam for the payment of compensation were made without all of the persons whose interests might be affected by that order having been given notice or an opportunity to be heard.
> [93] I would set aside the orders in both actions requiring Myfam to post security for payment of the compensation ordered as well as the order directed to Myfam that no dividends be issued until the compensation ordered is paid. I would remit the question of payment of the compensation ordered and the issue of security for payment to the trial court.

[7] The remit was heard by Lander J. in August 2003. Myfam is solvent but the husband filed for bankruptcy before his death. We were informed by counsel that the estate has been discharged from bankruptcy but the trustee continues to hold the Class A shares of Myfam. The trustee has been given notice of proceedings since the bankruptcy but he has not appeared. We must therefore assume that he claims no interest in Myfam's Class A shares.

[8] Lander J. ordered that Myfam be joined in the divorce action and he confirmed the order for security against Myfam. He said:

> [28] I have considered the submissions made on behalf of Myfam, Yasse Eghdami, Eagle West (Canada) Enterprises Ltd., Majid Rohani and Maryam Rohani. I find that counsel's submission in paragraph 11 of his court brief wherein it is stated that this is not a case for [sic] the corporate veil should be pierced. That argument has no merit in that Mr. Justice Lysyk found that that was so and the Court of Appeal has agreed with that determination.

The Business and Corporate Background

[9] The business and corporate history of the husband is related in detail in the reasons of Lysyk J. It is necessary to summarize it briefly for the purpose of these reasons. The husband was a successful developer in Iran before the revolution. Together with his brother Aziz and another business associate, the husband incorporated a B.C. company in 1974 which became Sigma Investments Ltd. ("Sigma"). Each of the three was issued one third of the Class A shares of Sigma and the children of each were given Class B shares. Sigma constructed an office building at 747 Fort Street, Victoria in 1978. The husband contributed $2 million to the cost through funds from Iran and his associate contributed the balance of about $1 million. The husband took back a $2 million mortgage for his contribution and assigned one-half of it to his four children. The other half was assigned to the children of Aziz. The assignment was described as a gift, but the husband continued to use the mortgage as security for his business dealings, apparently with his children's passive acquiescence. Sigma sold the Fort Street building for $9,750,000 in December 1990 and Myfam was incorporated as part of an Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), s. 85 "rollover". The husband exchanged his Class A shares of Sigma for Class A voting shares of Myfam and the children exchanged their Class B shares of Sigma for Class B non-voting shares of Myfam. The other two principals of Sigma followed a similar course with separate companies. The husband made all the business decisions for Myfam although his two daughters joined him as directors in 1991 and remain directors.

[10] 451300 was incorporated in 1993 and acquired the Clyde Avenue property. Initially Myfam held a 60 percent interest in 451300 and the remaining 40 percent was held by a company controlled by a business associate of the husband. Myfam purchased the other 40 percent interest in 1996 and 451300 became a wholly owned subsidiary of Myfam. The husband later arranged a transfer of 25 shares of 451300 from Myfam to his daughter, Yasse Egdami. Lysyk J. set aside this transfer as a fraudulent conveyance and consequently Myfam continues to own all of the shares of 451300.

[11] Myfam also held the Folkestone Way property, a condominium occupied by the husband after he moved out of the matrimonial home in late 1992. Initially Myfam had a majority interest in the Folkestone Way property and the husband held a minority interest directly. According to his solicitor, he held the minority interest for the purpose of obtaining a property tax homeowner grant. That interest was later transferred to Myfam. In January 1996, Myfam transferred an 11/20th interest in the Folkestone Way property to Maryam Rohani. Lysyk J. set aside that transfer to his daughter as a fraudulent conveyance.

[12] The status of Myfam following the findings of Lysyk J. which are not now in issue may be summarized as follows. Myfam is a holding company without active business operations. It owns the Folkestone Way property and, through its wholly owned subsidiary 451300, it owns the Clyde Avenue property. It has no other significant assets or liabilities, apart from a shareholders' loan discussed below. All of the Class A shares of Myfam were held by the husband. He exercised complete control of Myfam's affairs, without consultation with other directors or shareholders. He funded substantial gifts to the wife from Myfam during the marriage and also used its funds and assets for living expenses before and after the separation. He had routinely used other companies in a similar manner and he treated interests nominally transferred to the children as his own for the purpose of arranging bank financing for his projects.

[13] Lysyk J. found that the Class A shares of Myfam were a family asset and virtually all of Myfam's equity should be allocated to those shares for valuation purposes. As 451300 is a wholly owned subsidiary of Myfam it can be treated as indistinguishable from Myfam. The valuation of Myfam and the wife's share of the equity, quantified in the amount of the compensation order, are no longer in issue. It is the security interest in the assets of Myfam that remains controversial. This Court left that issue open on the remit, in part because all of the persons whose interests could be affected had not been given the opportunity to be heard. That opportunity was provided in the hearing before Lander J.

Analysis

[14] The problem that faced Lysyk J. was how to effect payment of the compensation order in circumstances where the husband had no exigible assets apart from Myfam and he controlled Myfam. His prior history provided ample reason for the trial judge to conclude that the husband would frustrate payment by any available means. He had attempted to move assets out of Myfam through fraudulent conveyances to avoid the wife's claims, acts which justified the order in the fraudulent conveyance action restraining Myfam from disposing of its assets or issuing dividends before the compensation order was satisfied.

[15] The controversial part of his order was the charge directly on the assets of Myfam. Lysyk J. recognized in making that order he was piercing Myfam's corporate veil. The appellants contend that his order, confirmed by Lander J., failed to satisfy the conditions for piercing the corporate veil outlined by this Court in B.G. Preeco I (Pacific Coast) Ltd. v. Bon Street Holdings Limited 1989 CanLII 230 (BC CA), (1987), 37 B.C.L.R. (2d) 258 (C.A.).

[16] Lysyk J. referred to Myfam as the alter ego of the husband. He said:

> [8] As to piercing the corporate veil, I concluded on the evidence that the Husband routinely drew funds from Myfam to finance his own living expenses and those of the Wife: see the 1998 Reasons, para. 188. He treated Myfam as his alter ego and at all material times he made the decisions that guided its corporate affairs.

[17] The wife contends this finding is one of fact and it is determinative of the corporate veil issue. Lander J. appears to have concluded that the issue was no longer open. With some reluctance, the appellants accepted that the alter ego designation of Myfam is not open to review on this appeal but they submit that it is merely descriptive of the facts summarized in the context of the reference, namely that the husband used Myfam's funds for his own and the wife's living expenses and he made Myfam's corporate decisions. They contend that those facts are insufficient to pierce the corporate veil and the reference to alter ego cannot foreclose the issue.

[18] In my respectful view, Lander J. misconstrued the terms of the remit set by this Court. He relied on certain passages from the reasons of Rowles J.A. that were directed to the issues of whether the Class A shares of Myfam were family assets and the valuation of those shares. Those matters are no longer in dispute. However, the determination that the shares are family assets does not decide the corporate veil issue. As I read the reasons related to the remit quoted above, that issue was sent back for re-argument. I agree with the appellants' position that the reference to alter ego in its context was simply a label applied to the facts as found: the issue is whether those facts could support piercing Myfam's corporate veil. I therefore turn to that issue.

[19] The Supreme Court of Canada considered the basic implications of separate corporate existence in Kosmopoulos v. Constitution Insurance Co. of Canada, 1987 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 2. The case involved a fire loss insurance claim by a company and its sole shareholder. The company held the assets damaged in the fire but the policy was issued in the shareholder's name. While the Court allowed the claim on an alternative basis, the majority declined to lift the corporate veil between the company and the shareholder. Wilson J., writing for five of the six member Court observed (at paras. 12 and 13):

> [12] As a general rule a corporation is a legal entity distinct from its shareholders: Salomon v. Salomon & Co., [1897] A.C. 22 (H.L.). The law on when a court may disregard this principle by "lifting the corporate veil" and regarding the company as a mere "agent" or "puppet" of its controlling shareholder or parent corporation follows no consistent principle. The best that can be said is that the "separate entities" principle is not enforced when it would yield a result "too flagrantly opposed to justice, convenience or the interests of the Revenue": L.C.B. Gower, Modern Company Law (4th ed. 1979) at p. 112. I have no [page11] doubt that theoretically the veil could be lifted in this case to do justice, as was done in American Indemnity Co. v. Southern Missionary College, supra, cited by the Court of Appeal of Ontario. But a number of factors lead me to think it would be unwise to do so.
> [13] There is a persuasive argument that "those who have chosen the benefits of incorporation must bear the corresponding burdens, so that if the veil is to be lifted at all that should only be done in the interests of third parties who would otherwise suffer as a result of that choice": Gower, supra, at p. 138. Mr. Kosmopoulos was advised by a competent solicitor to incorporate > his business in order to protect his personal assets and there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that his decision to secure the benefits of incorporation was not a genuine one. Having chosen to receive the benefits of incorporation, he should not be allowed to escape its burdens. He should not be permitted to "blow hot and cold" at the same time.

[20] Applying this reasoning to the circumstances here, the use of Myfam as a corporate vehicle pre-dates the separation and it had legitimate business, succession, and tax planning objectives. It was a genuine incorporation. While the wife had no direct interest in Myfam she benefited from its existence during the marriage to the extent that it presumably provided a tax shelter for assets and income and was used by the husband to fund family living expenses and gifts to the wife. The use for family purposes was central to the conclusion that the Class A shares were family assets. While the husband's use of company funds may have been questionable by others, the wife was not defrauded or prejudiced on that account. To paraphrase Wilson J., the wife, having received the benefits of incorporation, should not be allowed to escape the burden of its existence by looking directly to its assets as if they were personal assets of the husband. Serious and far reaching implications could result from piercing the separate corporate existence of a company created and operated for legitimate business and tax planning purposes simply on the ground of irregular use of corporate funds for personal expenses of its principals.

[21] The majority judgment of this Court in Evetts v. Evetts, [1996] B.C.J. No. 2614, is consistent with this view. That was a family law case involving apportionment of the interest in a closely held corporation. Lambert J.A., for the majority, stated (at para. 17):

> I think that the application of s-s. 45(3)(a) [now s. 58(3)(a) of the Family Relations Act] may present different problems where the corporation in question is widely held than it does where the corporation is closely held. In a case where all the shares of the corporation are held by one of the spouses, I think that the application of s-s. 45(3)(a) is comparatively straightforward. The corporation is regarded as eliminated and the assets are considered to have been directly held by the spouse. It seems to me that all accumulations and payments must be treated as they would have been treated if the assets had been directly held by that spouse. The corporate veil is retained to the extent that the court, after looking through the corporate veil to the underlying assets for the purpose of characterization and division of family assets, must accomplish any such division through a reapportionment of the shares in the corporation, rather than of the underlying assets.

[Underlining added.]

[22] Newbury J.A. dissented from the conclusion that the shares of Mr. Evetts' corporation were family assets but her reasons did not address the point at issue here. In the present case, unlike Evetts, the husband owned only the voting Class A shares, but Lysyk J. followed a similar approach to valuation of those shares. He made the compensation order as a substitute for the wife's apportioned interest in the Class A shares. It is the shares that are apportioned, not the underlying assets. The substitution of a compensation order for the shares does not eliminate that distinction.

[23] In B.G. Preeco, Seaton J.A. considered the limited circumstances where the corporate veil can be pierced for "fraud or improper conduct", the relevant heading in Gower's Modern Company Law, 4th ed. He stated (at p. 268):

> The cases in which the corporate veil is pierced on the ground of "fraud or improper conduct" deal with instances where a corporation is used to effect a purpose or commit an act which the shareholder could not effect or commit.

[24] In this case, the husband's fraud was not moving assets into Myfam to escape the wife's claims: it was moving assets out of Myfam. This pattern reinforces the conclusion that Myfam was not created to avoid the wife's claims, nor did it acquire its assets for that purpose. Myfam's asset holdings are consistent with the husband's long-term practice of using corporate vehicles to hold real property and to use company funds for personal and family living expenses. Using the company as a "piggy-bank" may create difficulties for him (and now his estate) elsewhere, but it does not support the conclusion that Myfam was a sham intended to avoid the wife's claims. On the authorities to which we have been referred I do not think the facts meet the standard required to pierce Myfam's corporate veil. Accordingly, I do not think that the order granting security directly in the assets of Myfam can be supported.

[25] The question is then whether the wife is to be left without any means of payment from Myfam. Section 66(1) of the Family Relations Act authorizes the court "to make orders which are necessary, reasonable or ancillary" to a determination and disposition of family assets. The compensation order here is intended to be a substitute for the wife's interest in the equity of Myfam. It is a hollow order if payment cannot be effected. Myfam is the only available source of payment. The simplest expedient would be to cause Myfam to declare and pay a dividend sufficient to pay the compensation order and have it paid to the wife in satisfaction of the order. There are two complicating factors. The first is the wife's entitlement to costs of the protracted litigation which now substantially exceed the net amount of the order. The other complication is the intervening bankruptcy of the husband which we are told has placed the Class A shares in the hands of his bankruptcy trustee, notwithstanding the husband's later discharge from bankruptcy. Even without these complications, the likelihood of the husband voluntarily adopting that course of action was remote.

[26] In my view, the wife was entitled to ancillary remedies necessary to effect payment of her compensation order, consistent with the continued separate legal existence of Myfam. Causing the winding up of Myfam is not an option because most of the distribution on a winding up would go to the Class B shareholders and be inconsistent with the valuation of the Class A shares. In my view, the wife should be granted a constructive trust of the Class A shares of Myfam, allowing her to effect payment of a dividend sufficient to pay the compensation order, including interest and special costs, and to cause Myfam to sell assets for that purpose if necessary. The unaudited financial statements of Myfam used by the experts for the purposes of valuation indicate that there are already "advances to shareholders", and that the amount of those advances at the date of valuation, $133,333, was later increased to $843,903. These advances apparently represent dividends declared and unpaid on the husband's Class A shares, and as such they could be the first source for payment. Declaration of a further dividend on the Class A shares under the constructive trust should be required only to the extent that obligations to the wife under the compensation order exceed that amount. The trust would extend to the dividend declared and paid on all the Class A shares for that purpose. The declaration and payment of the dividend would be limited by Myfam's legal capacity to pay the dividend in the event that the amount of the compensation order exceeds Myfam's dividend paying capacity.

[27] The appellants have contested joining Myfam as a party in the divorce action, contending specifically that Myfam cannot be a "spouse", required for authority to make an order under s. 66(2)(c) and (e) of the Family Relations Act. The constructive trust of the shares is directed to the husband's interest in the shares and does not extend to Myfam's assets directly. The injunction restraining dividends or asset dispositions by Myfam can be maintained in the divorce action under s. 66(1) which authorizes the court to "make orders which are necessary, reasonable or ancillary to give effect to [a property] determination." Joining Myfam for the limited purpose of preserving the status quo in Myfam until the wife can take the steps required under the constructive trust of the shares is reasonably ancillary to the trust and does not depend on any spousal status. I am satisfied that Myfam was properly joined in the divorce action for that purpose.

[28] In the result, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order for security in the assets of Myfam, and order a constructive trust of the Class A shares of Myfam on the terms outlined above. The trust should extend to include the interest on the compensation and costs awarded. As the trust is in substitution for the asset security originally ordered by Lysyk J., this order should take effect as of the date of that order, 13 September 1999, pursuant to s. 9(1)(a) of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 77. The injunction restraining dividends and asset dispositions by Myfam should be continued until payment except as modified to give effect to the constructive trust.

[29] As success on this appeal may be considered to be divided, there should be no costs of the appeal to any party.

Court of Appeal
C.I.B.C. v. Boukalis
Date: 1987-01-30

S.R. Schachter and A.C. Whitcombe, for appellant.

J.W. Elwick and J.A. Adelaar, for respondents.

(Vancouver No. CA006136)

January 30, 1987. The judgment of the court was delivered by

[1] SEATON J.A.:— At issue in this appeal is whether one who is not an unsecured creditor at the time of a conveyance has status to challenge the conveyance under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 142.

[2] In the action the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce seeks to set aside a second mortgage granted on 29th June 1983 by the defendant Vasilios Boukalis, to his brother, the defendant John Boukalis, for the sum of $550,000. On 29th June 1983 Vasilios Boukalis was indebted to the bank but the indebtedness was secured and the bank has not shown that the security was inadequate at that time. At the time of trial, the security had proved to be inadequate and the bank had several outstanding judgments against Vasilios Boukalis.

[3] In his reasons [[1986] B.C.W.L.D. 2896], the trial judge first posed this issue:

> To succeed in its action to set aside the second mortgage as a fraudulent conveyance, the plaintiff must show that it was granted with intent to delay, hinder or defraud the plaintiff as a creditor of just and lawful remedies.

After carefully reviewing the evidence, the trial judge said:

> Vasilios granted the second mortgage, impugned by these proceedings, at a time when the business of Alpine Carpets Ltd. was failing, when real estate values were falling and when his Granville Street residence, supposed to be built for $125,000, had swallowed up almost $600,000. I am quite satisfied that the mortgage figure of $550,000 was chosen to exhaust the apparent equity. So Vasilios' intent to hinder or delay the plaintiff is shown. I also find that John Boukalis had that intent in accepting the mortgage because I do not accept his evidence that Vasilios owed him that amount of money, but rather something less, and because as brothers their close relationship demands an explanation which, on John Boukalis' part, is unsatisfactory.

The trial judge concluded that that was not enough:

> There is, however, a hurdle of law which the bank is unable to overcome in this case. It is that a creditor who was fully secured at the time of an impugned transaction is not permitted to take the benefit of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. Much argument, supported by numerous authorities, was devoted to this problem by both counsel.

The trial judge concluded that the bank had not shown that it was unsecured on 29th June 1983 and, therefore, he dismissed the action.

[4] Counsel for the bank conceded that there are decisions of the Supreme Court of British Columbia that support the conclusion reached by the trial judge and that there are decisions of this court that seemed to support that result. He therefore sought and was granted a court composed of five justices of appeal to consider the question.

[5] In the first line of authority that impelled the trial judge to say that the bank could not succeed unless it was unsecured on 29th June 1983 there is confusion between two statutory provisions; in the second line of authority there is confusion between two steps in one proceeding.

[6] Cases in the first group treat fraudulent conveyance questions the same as fraudulent preference questions. Royal Bank of Can. v. Dunsmuir (1978), 5 R.P.R. 74, 85 D.L.R. (3d) 549 at 553 (B.C.S.C.), is an example of this:

Digitized by Google

> The significant date for establishing the status of the secured or unsecured creditor is the date when the transaction took place, i.e., the conveyance from husband to wife. I follow here with respect the judgment of my brother Anderson in Re Ehattesaht Co-operative Enterprises Ass'n and Vancouver Equipment Corp. Ltd. 1977 CanLII 353 (BC SC), (1977), 3 B.C.L.R. 117 at p. 120, where he says:
> "In my view a 'secured creditor' cannot bring proceedings under the Act unless at the date the preference was given there were moneys owing for which there was no security."
> Anderson, J., was there dealing with an application under the Fraudulent Preferences Act, but I agree with counsel for the defendant that the principle is the same whether the application be launched under the Fraudulent Conveyances Act or the Fraudulent Preferences Act.

[7] The language used in the two Acts is different. The Fraudulent Preference Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 143, s. 3, provides:

> 3. Subject to section 6, a disposition of property by a person at a time when he is in insolvent circumstances, is unable to pay his debts in full, or knows that he is on the eve of insolvency, is void as against an injured creditor, if made
> (a) with intent to defeat, hinder, delay or prejudice creditors or some of them; and
> (b) to or for a creditor with intent to give the creditor preference over other creditors or some of them. [emphasis added]

Section 1 of the Fraudulent Conveyance Act is not the same:

> 1. A disposition of property, by writing or otherwise, and a bond, proceeding and order, at any time made, to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful remedies, shall be void and of no effect as against a person, his personal representative and assignee whose rights and obligations by collusion, guile, malice or fraudulent devices and practices are or might be, in any way, disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded, notwithstanding a pretence or other matter to the contrary. [emphasis added]

[8] The different language indicates that there is a different group to be protected, and that is consistent with the fact that the Acts have different purposes.

[9] This part of the Fraudulent Preference Act deals with preferences in favour of certain creditors. A plaintiff cannot be a prejudiced creditor if he was not a creditor at the time the preference was given. The thrust of these sections is to ban the preference of one creditor over another or others. Thus, the Act refers to "creditors or some of them".

[10] The Fraudulent Conveyance Act has a different thrust. It is designed to ban the disposing of property to hinder or delay creditors and those who might become creditors. Thus, the Act refers to "creditors and others".

[11] The two Acts have similarities, but they have differences and those differences should be respected. In Re Skinner (1960), 27 D.L.R. (2d) 74 (B.C.S.C.), Wilson J. (as he then was) dealt with an application under s. 7 of the Fraudulent Preferences Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 156, the predecessor to the present s. 9. He distinguished between a fraudulent preference and a fraudulent conveyance (at p. 78):

> This is not an attempt by one creditor to set aside a preferential transfer to another creditor. It is a bid by a judgment creditor to set aside a conveyance as being, in the words of s. 7 "made to defeat, hinder, delay, prejudice, or defraud creditors".
> I can see that in the preference cases it is only logical that if one creditor is to attack a payment to another as preferential when made then he, the attacking creditor, must also have had the status of creditor at that time. If he had not, there could be no preference, because the debt to the attacking creditor did not exist at the time. Therefore it could not be said that another creditor was preferred over him.

[13] The second line of authority adopts language without respect for the context in which it is found.

[14] The trial judge found on the evidence that there was the necessary intention to hinder or delay. In many cases, that finding cannot be made except by drawing an inference from the circumstances. The inference of fraud is drawn because of the existence of creditors at the time of the conveyance. If the existing creditors are well secured, one is unlikely to infer that the conveyance was made in order to defeat them. Of course, the time for considering intent is the time of the conveyance. The cases, therefore, which are concerned with whether or not the creditors were secured at that time, are not deciding whether or not the plaintiff has status to bring the proceedings, but are deciding whether or not the impugned conveyance was made with the intent to hinder or delay. Some cases have employed language that appears to support the view that creditors to have standing must be creditors at the time of the conveyance. The context surrounding that language shows, however, that it was used in relation to intent.

[15] Vice-Chancellor Blake detected this problem in Reid v. Kennedy (1874), 21 Gr. 86 (at pp. 90-91):

> Looking at the Statute alone, apart from the authorities, I should have thought its effect to be, that where an intention to defraud creditors or other persons was shewn at the time of the execution of the deed, then it mattered not whether the creditor attacking the deed existed at the time of its execution or not. In its inception the deed was fraudulent, it remained so, unless cured by some subsequent act, and was liable to be impeached by a subsequent creditor, whose potential equity has not been lost by some matter ex post facto. Totten v. Douglas [18 Gr. 341], is an instance of such an equity being lost. There is some inconsistency in the decided cases, but from them I think the opinion I have formed as above expressed is correct
> In many of the cases fraud can only be inferred from the effect of the conveyance; the rule adopted being that a grantor must be taken to have intended the natural result of his act. Where there were no creditors at the time of the impeached conveyance, or all those then in existence have been satisfied, it has been frequently argued that the inference of fraud which might be otherwise drawn has been rebutted by the absence of these debts. If the grantor be insolvent at the time of the impeached conveyance, it is clear it is fraudulent and void. But why is this so? Because as there are creditors, and the effect of the instrument must be to defeat or delay, it is therefore concluded mat with this intention the grantor executed it In other words, direct evidence of the fraudulent intent is wanting; but this may be, and is inferred, and therefore the transaction can be impeached. But here, that which in the cases referred to is inferred, is proved. The admission made by the parties shew the object they had in view was covinous, collusive, and guileful, and the result that should flow from this must be to find such conveyance "Void, frustrate, and of none effect," as against a person whose action is thereby hindered, delayed, or defrauded. The words in the Act are "creditors and others," and, proving that the conveyance was tainted with fraud once, I do not think it loses this stain, but remains a conveyance with this infirmity which prevents it being set up as against a creditor whose debt arises yean after the instrument was executed. The words "and others" extend the operation of the Act if the word creditors confined it to those existing when the deed was made.

The Vice-Chancellor reviewed a number of decisions that fully justified the statement he had made.

[16] Those who would revitalize the argument rejected by Vice-Chancellor Blake rely on this sentence from the judgment of Sedgewick J. in Sun Life Assur. Co. of Can. v. Elliott 1900 CanLII 32 (SCC), (1900), 31 S.C.R. 91 [B.C.] (at pp. 95-96):

> If, however, he is a secured creditor, if he has sufficient of the assets of the debtor in his hands to fully cover the indebtedness, then undoubtedly the statute was not intended for him, but for the general and unsecured creditors.

The language is found in a discussion about whether or not to infer intent. The sentence is preceded by a quotation from Freeman v. Pope (1870), 5 Ch. App. 538, dealing with the inference of intention in the absence of direct proof of intention. It is followed by a reference to Crombie v. Young (1894), 26 O.R. 194 (C.A.), and this statement (at p. 96):

> In that case it was shewn that at the time of the impeached transaction, a donation from a husband to his wife, the settlor was perfectly solvent after the conveyance, still possessing other lands and a large interest in the mortgaged property, far in excess of the mortgage. And it was held, whether rightly or wrongly, that under these circumstances, any intent to hinder or delay could not be imputed to him. As already shown the facts here are the reverse of those in Crombie v. Young. At the time of the impeached conveyances (and all evidence of intent except at that particular time is irrelevant), the mortgaged lands were probably wholly insufficient to pay the mortgage debt, and the voluntary conveyances themselves forever precluded the settlor from having any means of making up the shortage. [emphasis added]

[17] Interpreting the language of Sedgewick J. as barring a creditor who was secured at the date of the conveyance is inconsistent with the remainder of the language used in the judgment and inconsistent with the conclusion reached by the court.

[18] The Crombie judgment referred to by Sedgewick J. dealt entirely with intent. MacMahon J. set out why he was considering the adequacy of the security (at p. 200):

Digitized by Google

> One of the tests to apply in this case in considering whether the settlements though voluntary, are fraudulent and void, is whether at the time of the settlements in favour of the wife the property mortgaged was insufficient to pay and satisfy the mortgage debt....

He concluded that there was no intention to defraud.

[19] Rose J. said (at p. 208):

> I do not, on the evidence, find it at all safe to infer that there was any intention to defraud these mortgagees when the impeached transfers were made. My mind turns the other way.

[21] The conclusion is also inconsistent with the interpretation of the Act found in other cases. The suggestion that a creditor secured at the time of the conveyance is forever barred from claiming under the Act is inconsistent with the cases that say that a subsequent creditor, a person not a creditor at the time of the conveyance, may claim under it. No reason has been offered why an unsecured creditor who was a secured creditor at the time of the transaction has no status, whereas an unsecured creditor who was not a creditor at all at the time of the transaction has status.

[22] A conveyance can be set aside even if there were no creditors when it was made. The judgment of Macdonald C.J.A. in Newlands Sawmills Ltd. v. Bateman, 31 B.C.R. 351 at 354, reflex, [1922] 3 W.W.R. 649, 70 D.L.R. 165 (C.A.), concisely sets out the facts and the decision of this court:

> This action was brought to set aside a conveyance by James Edward Bateman to his wife, Minnie Bateman, of a farm, being the principal item of the assets of the grantor, on the ground that the same was made to defeat the plaintiff, which subsequently became the creditor of Bateman.
> Just previous to the date of the conveyance Bateman had entered into a contract with the plaintiff to cut and boom logs. The contract was rather an extensive one, considering the financial position of the defendant Bateman, and was, in my opinion, a hazardous one within the meaning of that term as used in cases of this kind. It is to be noted that the contract calls for the commencement of logging operations on the 10th of May, 1920, and that the conveyance in question in this action was made on the 22nd of May of the same year.
> The submission of counsel for the defendants was that as Bateman had no creditors at the time he entered into the contract he was entitled to make a voluntary conveyance to his wile of the property in question. The authorities to which we were referred do not sustain this contention. It is a question to be decided upon the proper inference to be drawn from the facts and circumstances of the particular case as to whether there was an intention to defeat creditors or not, and if there was the intention to defeat creditors, then it does not matter whether it was to defeat present or future creditors.

[23] I conclude that it was not an essential step in the action for the bank to prove that it was an unsecured creditor at the time of the conveyance.

[24] The trial judge felt bound by the decision of this court in Bank of N.S. v. Scott 1985 CanLII 243 (BC CA), (1985), 67 B.C.L.R. 145. The only issue argued there was whether or not the bank was a secured creditor. This court concluded that it was, The issue now before the court was not raised. The Scott case is not authority for the proposition that a creditor secured at the time of the conveyance cannot have recourse to the Fraudulent Conveyance Act. To the extent that it may imply that that is so, and to the extent that other cases such as Royal Bank of Can. v. Dunsmuir, supra, and Delbreuck & Co. v. Muenzenberg 1984 CanLII 881 (BC SC), (1984), 54 B.C.L.R. 264, 44 C.P.C. 36 (S.C.), so hold, they should be considered overruled.

Appeal allowed.

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act require that the Minister of Industry report to Parliament on the provisions and operation of both Acts in 2014. I am pleased to table this report in fulfillment of that responsibility.

The Government of Canada launched a public consultation in May 2014, with the release of a Discussion Paper seeking input on key aspects of Canada's insolvency regime and its administration. The public consultations built on previous research and analysis of economic and insolvency trends by departmental officials, as well as contributions from stakeholders. The results of the review activities are captured in this report.

Insolvency laws are important marketplace framework legislation that have an impact on Canada's competitiveness. An efficient, well-functioning insolvency regime is vital to Canada's continued economic prosperity. Stakeholders told us that Canada's insolvency laws have responded well to the needs of Canadian consumers and businesses, particularly during the recent recession. At the same time, Canada's insolvency laws must evolve to meet the needs of the economy and changes in the global marketplace. Our government is committed to ensuring that Canadian insolvency legislation maintains its status among the most modern regimes in the world.

In tabling this report, I would like to thank the many Canadians who participated in the review. The extensive public feedback in response to the Discussion Paper, including input from insolvency experts, academics, and other stakeholder groups, will inform our work as the review continues in the coming parliamentary session.

The Honourable James Moore
Minister of Industry

Introduction

In 2008, the world experienced one of the deepest economic downturns since the Great Depression. Canada was not spared as we experienced a recession that was felt across Canada, a record number of personal insolvencies and the failure or restructuring of numerous businesses.

Canada's post-2008 performance led G7 countries with the highest level of job creation and one of the best growth rates coming out of the recession. Canada experienced a positive macroeconomic environment, including a low federal government debt-to-gross domestic product ratio, the lowest overall tax rate on new business investment among G7 countries, a sound approach to regulation of financial institutions and a stable, low inflation environment. These factors were reinforced by the Economic Action Plan, which responded to the global crisis by reducing taxes, investing in infrastructure, enhancing skills training, supporting sectoral and regional adjustment and facilitating business lending. Despite lingering turmoil in certain countries, Canada is projected to continue its stable growth as domestic firms reinvest to enhance their competitiveness.

Even in a growing economy, Canadians will face challenges: one of the highest consumer debt-to-income ratios in the G20 and changing demographic trends that are increasingly imposing financial burdens on the "sandwich" generation will test consumers' resilience; and globalization will present new business opportunities but also greater challenges from international competitors.

In this context, Canada's insolvency environment continues to evolve: relationship lending, which was once predominant, is declining; new players, including private equity and distressed debt traders, are presenting unique challenges to corporate restructuring efforts; financial market innovations, such as credit and other derivatives, are shifting parties' interests and incentives; and the growth in cross-border insolvency proceedings is increasing the complexity of cases and bringing new competing interests for scarce resources.

What remains constant is that there will be individuals and businesses who, for various reasons, find themselves overwhelmed by debt. For them, and for the benefit of the economy, an effective insolvency regime is necessary to ensure an efficient process to settle debts and, where appropriate, provide individuals with a fresh start and businesses with an opportunity for financial rehabilitation.

Canada's insolvency laws are well-regarded internationally and are frequently cited as a model in international insolvency panels, such as the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL). While these laws proved robust during the 2008 downturn, it is critical to ensure that they remain responsive to new challenges in the constantly evolving domestic and global economic landscapes. To that end, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[1] (BIA) and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act[2] (CCAA) include a statutory provision that requires their periodic review. This report is a step in the review process.

Canada's Insolvency Framework

Canada's insolvency regime is composed primarily of two Acts, the BIA and the CCAA. The BIA provides the legislative framework to address personal and corporate insolvency. In a bankruptcy, a trustee liquidates the bankrupt's assets and distributes the proceeds in a fair and orderly way among the creditors. Alternatively, the BIA provides procedures for insolvent consumers and businesses to avoid bankruptcy by negotiating an agreement with their creditors to reorganize their financial affairs. This is referred to as a "proposal". The CCAA provides the legislative framework for insolvent companies with more than $5 million in debt to reorganize under court supervision. It enables the insolvent company to seek a court order staying its creditors from taking action against it while it negotiates an arrangement to reorganize its financial affairs. A monitor is appointed by the Court to watch over the restructuring and provide information to the Court and creditors. While corporate restructurings can occur under either Act, the CCAA's court-driven process provides greater flexibility for judges to deal with the specific issues in the cases before them.

> "Reorganization serves the public interest by facilitating the survival of companies supplying goods or services crucial to the health of the economy or saving large numbers of jobs." [3]

The Superintendent of Bankruptcy (the Superintendent) is part of the administrative framework, overseeing the functioning of the insolvency regime and ensuring its integrity. The Superintendent has statutory responsibility to supervise the administration of all estates and matters under the BIA, and regulates the trustees who administer consumer and commercial bankruptcies and proposals. The Superintendent also has certain functions under the CCAA, including maintaining a public record of CCAA proceedings and investigating complaints regarding the conduct of monitors. In fulfilling his mandate, the Superintendent sets standards and provides guidance to stakeholders regarding expected conduct through directives, notices, position papers and compliance programs.

I. History

The BIA has its roots in the Bankruptcy Act of 1919, which was substantially reformed in 1949. The BIA was further amended in 1992, 1997 and 2008-2009. The CCAA came into force in 1933 but only became a commonly used restructuring statute in the 1980's. It was amended in 1997 and 2009.

The 1992 reforms focussed on maximizing creditor value through reorganization and rehabilitation, improving the equitable distribution to suppliers and employees and improving the administration of the BIA. The 1997 reforms encouraged consumer debtor responsibility, and improved the reorganization provisions and the administration of the Acts, including the introduction of specialized provisions related to securities firms and international insolvencies.

The most recent legislative reforms, which came into force in 2009, had four main objectives: to encourage the restructuring of viable, but financially troubled, companies; to better protect workers' claims for unpaid wages and vacation pay; to make the bankruptcy system fairer and reduce abuse; and, to improve the administration of the system. Best practices that developed under the CCAA were codified in order to enhance certainty in restructuring proceedings. Unpaid wages of up to $2,000 per employee and unremitted pension contribution claims were prioritized ahead of secured creditors and collective agreements were protected. Debtors who had high income-tax debt were denied an automatic discharge from bankruptcy and those with surplus income were required to pay more into their estate and remain in bankruptcy for a longer period of time.

II. Economic Implications

Insolvency legislation is a key component of Canada's marketplace framework legislation that governs commercial relationships for both consumers and businesses. Certain and reliable rules provide security for investors and lenders that, in turn, influences the cost and availability of credit in the Canadian marketplace.[5] This can help attract higher levels of domestic and foreign investment while the fresh start provided by bankruptcy offers a safety net that promotes entrepreneurship.[6] Efficient bankruptcy and insolvency processes help to ensure that debtors' assets can be returned to productive use quickly, improving Canada's overall economic performance.[7] Equitable treatment of stakeholders and transparent processes also help to protect the integrity of the insolvency regime.

"Capital and credit, in their myriad of forms, are the lifeblood of modern commerce." [4]

Although broad economic considerations are important, it is essential to not lose sight of the individuals and businesses affected by these events and who must be dealt with equitably.

III. Objectives of Insolvency Policy

In a dynamic, market-based economy, insolvency is a fact of life. From time to time, individuals and businesses will encounter financial difficulty, as a result of choices made, economic downturns or personal misfortune beyond their control.

"Despite the proven wisdom of the policies underpinning the insolvency legislation, it is understandable that few appreciate the 'haircuts' or even outright losses that bankruptcies trigger." [8]

Countries have traditionally taken different approaches to the social and legal consequences of excessive debt. Canada adopted a "fresh start" policy for consumers, which relieves honest but unfortunate debtors of excessive debts. In recent years, there has been movement internationally towards the fresh start approach, which reduces costs for creditors and the negative social consequences for individuals faced with unmanageable debts.

Digitized by Google

Within the commercial insolvency sphere, Canada has encouraged the financial rehabilitation of viable, but financially distressed, businesses as that typically increases recoveries for creditors, maintains supplier relationships and protects jobs. Other countries are moving in a similar direction.

The objectives underlying the BIA and CCAA include minimizing the impact of a debtor's insolvency on all stakeholders by pursuing an equitable distribution of the debtor's assets and, where possible, by rehabilitation of the debtor. This is achieved by legislation that:

- provides certainty to promote economic stability and growth;
- maximizes the value of assets;
- strikes a balance between liquidation and reorganization;
- ensures equitable treatment of similarly situated creditors;
- provides for timely, efficient and impartial resolution of insolvency;
- preserves the insolvency estate to allow equitable distribution to creditors;
- ensures transparent and predictable insolvency laws that contain incentives for gathering and dispensing information; and
- recognizes existing creditor rights and establishes clear rules for ranking of priority claims. [9]

Insolvency Trends

I. Consumer

The Canadian consumer insolvency rate (the number of consumer insolvencies per 1,000 residents aged 18 years or older) has trended higher over the past few decades. This may be due to greater comfort with, and easier access to, consumer credit and reduced stigma related to bankruptcy. While the period of 2002-2007 saw a relatively stable consumer insolvency rate, the 2008 downturn pushed it to a new peak in 2009. Since that time, the rate has trended back towards pre-recession levels.

The rate of insolvencies is not evenly distributed among Canadians when viewed by age. Those aged 35-54 are at the highest risk of insolvency. Since 2008 two potentially significant trends have appeared. The consumer insolvency rates for Canadians older than 35 are higher than prior to the recession and insolvency rates for Canadians younger than 35 are lower. This could be indicative of delayed transition to financial autonomy by offspring placing greater financial burdens on parents. It is too early to determine whether the trend is an anomaly or indicative of a longer-term change.

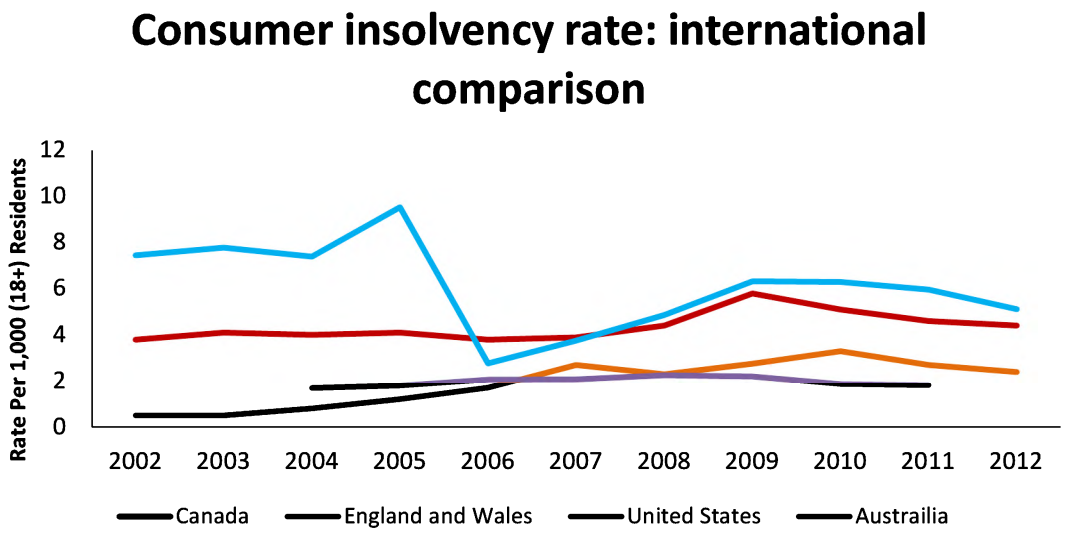
Internationally, it can be difficult to compare consumer insolvency rates because countries have taken different approaches to the social and legal consequences of excessive debt. Different levels of social stigma related to insolvency may also impact consumer insolvency rates. That being said, Canada's consumer insolvency rate appears high compared to some other developed countries.



Sources: Statistics Canada, OECD, American Bankruptcy Institute, United Kingdom Office of National Statistics, Australian Bureau of Statistics, with Industry Canada calculations.

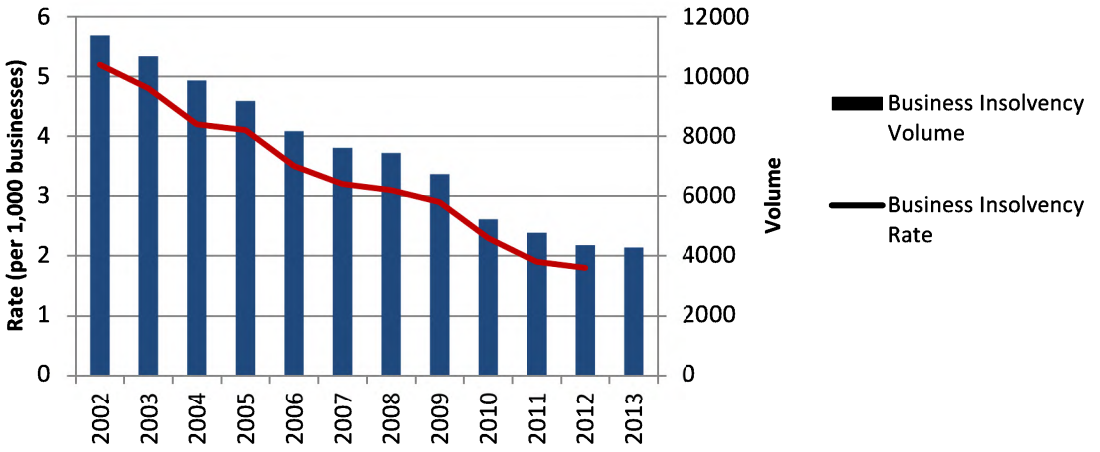
This could be a sign that Canada's insolvency regime is readily accessible, providing Canadians overwhelmed by debt with the fresh start they need. Alternatively, it could be a sign that Canadians are not managing their use of credit appropriately. Furthermore, because Canadians have the highest debt-to-income ratio among G7 countries, consumers are more susceptible to economic shocks, such as job loss or other negative life events.

II. Business

In contrast to the consumer insolvency trends, the business insolvency rate (the number of business insolvencies per 1,000 businesses operating in Canada) has fallen nearly 70 percent since 2002.

Digitized by Google

Business Insolvency Rate and Volume



Source: Office of Superintendent of Bankruptcy

It is unclear why the business insolvency rate continues to trend downwards. It may be related to the relatively low cost of credit during the past decade, although other countries experienced low credit cost yet saw their business insolvency rates climb. It could also be attributed to closer monitoring by lenders, resulting in remedial actions before businesses reach the tipping point into insolvency. Finally, the cost of formal insolvency proceedings may have encouraged more private workouts or business closures.

Of note, unlike other periods of economic downturn, the 2008 recession did not result in an increase in the business insolvency volume. This is consistent with anecdotal evidence that suggests lenders were hesitant to trigger defaults post-2008 as there was a very limited market for distressed assets.

Internationally, Canada has a lower per capita business insolvency rate (the number of business insolvencies per 100,000 individuals) than comparable countries. The 2008 downturn resulted in spikes in business insolvencies in both the United States and United Kingdom whereas Canada maintained its downward trend. Australia's business insolvency rate continued to climb throughout the period.

Review Process

The 2009 reforms to both the BIA and CCAA require the Minister of Industry to lay before Parliament a report on the provisions and operation of the Acts.[10] Industry Canada has monitored the Canadian insolvency marketplace to identify emerging trends and issues. In early 2013, a systematic environmental scan was initiated in order to gain a comprehensive understanding of how Canada's insolvency laws are functioning. The review included an examination of academic research and expert commentary, of insolvency proceedings and judicial decisions, and of domestic and international economic and insolvency trends. It was complemented by a broad outreach effort to an array of key stakeholders, including insolvency practitioners and academics, industry associations and employee and retiree groups, among others.

In May 2014, Industry Canada launched an on-line public consultation based on a wide-ranging discussion paper (the Discussion Paper) in order to obtain the views of Canadians. More than 70 individuals and organizations made submissions on a variety of issues. Interested stakeholders were also given the opportunity to meet with Industry Canada officials to share their views in person or by teleconference. Annex A provides a list of written submissions received by the Department. The Discussion Paper and submissions may be found at:

This report fulfills the Minister of Industry's statutory obligation. Pursuant to the BIA and CCAA, this report is to be referred to a Parliamentary committee designated to review it and report back to Parliament within one year or such further time authorized by Parliament.

What Canadians Said

Overall, most stakeholders are generally satisfied that the BIA and CCAA achieve their objectives in an efficient manner. That being said, Industry Canada received submissions regarding a large number of issues that could be addressed to improve the functionality of Canada's insolvency regime. Below are descriptions of several key issues that generated significant stakeholder commentary. The list is not intended to be exhaustive nor is it intended to exclude other issues. Industry Canada intends to continue to examine all matters raised in the public consultations.

I. Consumer Issues

Registered Disability Savings Plans – When an individual becomes bankrupt, the trustee gathers together the bankrupt's assets for distribution to the bankrupt's creditors. The BIA, however, provides that the bankrupt is entitled to keep certain property that is exempt under provincial law and the BIA (e.g. personal belongings, work tools, pension entitlements and funds held in registered retirement savings plans).

Stakeholders expressed a strong preference to see an exemption added to the BIA for registered disability savings plans, which are intended to provide for the financial needs of severely disabled individuals when those who care for them are no longer able to provide support.

Licence Denial Regimes – Provinces are responsible for issuing licences or permitting Canadians to engage in certain activities, such as driving. Some provinces have linked the ability to obtain or renew a licence to the payment of debts owed to the province or other specified entities. While this is within the province's authority in normal circumstances, it creates a conflict with the bankruptcy regime if the provincial legislation permits a creditor to demand payment outside the insolvency process, instead of inside the process like all the other unsecured creditors.

There was stakeholder consensus that licence denial regimes – to the extent they purport to apply to debts released in bankruptcy – violate the fresh start principle and could have a significant, negative impact on the bankrupt and other creditors. As a result, stakeholders suggested that such regimes should not apply to debts released in bankruptcy.

Family Law and Equalization – Family law and insolvency proceedings often intersect. In recognition of the social importance of family-related obligations, the BIA provides that spousal and child support orders are not releasable in bankruptcy. In a recent case before the Supreme Court of Canada, [11] a spousal claim for an equalization payment against property that was exempt from seizure under provincial law as against other creditors – but not as against a claim for equalization – was defeated. The Court suggested that as a matter of fairness insolvency law should ensure that such claims are protected in the future.

Stakeholders agreed with the Court's assessment that the BIA should expressly protect equalization claims against exempt property held by the bankrupt.

Reaffirmation Agreements – Through bankruptcy proceedings, an individual can have most of his or her debts released. In some cases, however, the bankrupt may wish to "reaffirm" (i.e. reinstate) a debt obligation for specific reasons. For example, anecdotal evidence suggests that car loans are often reaffirmed in order to permit the bankrupt to continue to use a vehicle that is required for work, especially in rural areas. Currently, a bankrupt may reaffirm a debt either through a written contract or by conduct (e.g. by making a payment on the debt following discharge from bankruptcy).

Stakeholders expressed concern that reaffirmation defeats the fresh start principle. There was also concern that bankrupts might not realize the consequences of reaffirmation by conduct. As a result, the majority of stakeholders were supportive of limitations in the BIA on reaffirmation by conduct.

There was no consensus regarding other consumer issues that were identified in the Discussion Paper, including responsible lending, consumer deposits, implementation of a federal exemption list and discharge of student loans.

II. Commercial Issues

Intellectual Property – The knowledge-based economy continues to expand in importance in addition to the manufacturing-based, bricks-and-mortar economy. Stakeholders told us that it is crucial that Canada's insolvency laws respond as effectively to financial distress involving intangible and intellectual property as they do to "hard" assets, such as real estate, equipment and inventory.

On this topic there was substantial consensus that Canada's insolvency laws require significant modernization. It was recognized that amendments implemented in 2009 were a positive first step but that they were not broad enough to address all of the shortfalls. There remain aspects related to intellectual property for which there were calls for change, including modernizing the language related to the existing provisions on copyright and patents and ensuring that all types of intellectual property are recognized and properly treated.

Priorities – Bankruptcy is often described as a "zero-sum game" because there are finite and insufficient assets available to satisfy the bankrupt's debts and liabilities. Changing the ranking according to which creditors are entitled to be paid would impact all creditors. This could, in turn, affect the cost and availability of credit for Canadians. As noted by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, "…the availability of credit at reasonable cost has implications for the levels of domestic and foreign investment, entrepreneurship and innovations, and personal investment and consumption."[12]

In response to the Discussion Paper, there were calls from employee groups, pensioners, fresh produce sellers, small businesses and tax authorities seeking priority payment on the basis that they experience different vulnerabilities and, therefore, are in need of special protection. It was conveyed that there is a need to consider the unique risks and challenges in different sectors of the economy. On the other hand, lenders and insolvency practitioners suggested caution in considering these types of requests due to the potential impacts on credit cost and availability, particularly for financing of inventory that is related to farming. Some stakeholders recommended that options outside of insolvency should be considered in order to offer more secure protection for socially important claims and to protect the integrity of insolvency proceedings.

Streamlined Proceedings – Insolvency proceedings, particularly corporate restructurings, can be complex, requiring significant time, effort and expertise. As a result, one of the key issues for insolvency law is to put in place efficient processes that permit a quick resolution, while ensuring fairness through necessary checks and balances.

In the CCAA context, most stakeholders supported streamlining measures, such as reducing the need for court approval of interim actions. Better disclosure of professional fees was also raised although there was no consensus on concrete actions that should be taken.

Stakeholders also suggested that the cost of restructuring under existing mechanisms is often too high for small and medium-sized businesses. This would suggest a more streamlined proceeding may be warranted, especially given the importance of small business entrepreneurs in driving the economy.

Cross-border Insolvencies – Globalization continues to transform the world's economy and create new markets and opportunities for Canadian workers and businesses. At the same time, as business becomes more international, the number of cross-border insolvencies has also increased.

Some stakeholders suggested that reforms may be necessary to ensure Canada's insolvency laws keep pace with globalization trends. They pointed to work being undertaken by UNCITRAL's insolvency working group, in which Canada is an active participant. Others, however, cautioned that any potential reforms should take into account the conditions necessary to promote investment in Canada and to protect the legitimate interests of Canadian firms in global markets.

Financial Contracts – Innovation in the financial markets has resulted in continual evolution of products that assist business and investors in managing risks, including credit risk. It is in the intersection of these financial instruments and insolvency law that stakeholders are seeing emerging issues that may require policy responses to ensure that the balance in insolvency proceedings is maintained.

Most stakeholders indicated support for measured disclosure requirements, which would provide greater transparency for other creditors and the courts. There was no consensus regarding possible changes to rebalance the competing interests between those who use these financial products and other insolvency stakeholders.

III. Administrative Issues

Accessibility – The insolvency regime provides Canadians with unmanageable debts a potential for a fresh start. The administration of files is carried out by private sector trustees. This means that the cost of accessing the insolvency system is based, to a certain extent, on market forces. Existing measures, such as the Bankruptcy Assistance Program and agreements to pay trustee fees post-discharge under the BIA, are intended to ensure access to bankruptcy.

Some stakeholders have suggested that there may still be accessibility issues as the cost of a simple bankruptcy, estimated to be as high as $1,500, may be too high for low and no-income individuals. They suggested that new options could be developed to ensure better access to the insolvency regime.

Legislative Structures – Currently, Canada's insolvency regime is implemented by a number of different laws under the mandate of different Ministers: the BIA, CCAA and the Canada Business Corporations Act fall under the responsibility of the Minister of Industry; the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, which can be used by certain corporations and financial institutions, falls under the shared responsibility of the Ministers of Industry and Finance; the Canada Transportation Act, under the Minister of Transport, can be used to resolve the insolvency of certain railway companies; and, the Farm Debt Mediation Act, under the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, is available to insolvent Canadian farmers.

While there was little consensus as to concrete action, many stakeholders expressed support for rationalization of the current legislative structure.

Modernization – The BIA was last comprehensively reformed in 1949, with significant amendments being made on several occasions since 1992. Some stakeholders suggested that a comprehensive review of the BIA may be warranted in order to remove outdated concepts and provisions. Other stakeholders suggested that the role and powers of the Superintendent could be enhanced.

Stakeholders also raised a number of issues that are tangential to insolvency law policy, including taxation issues, the operation of the Wage Earner Protection Program, and regulation of pensions. These matters could impact on the effectiveness and efficiency of the insolvency regime and could be considered in the context of the review.

Conclusion

The 2008 economic downturn led many developed economies into a deep recession. Canada's experience was better than most as a result of positive actions taken to address the downturn yet, still, a significant number of Canadians suffered personal insolvency and major firms failed. The BIA and CCAA were up to the challenge and played their part by providing individuals with the needed fresh start and offering viable but financially troubled firms the opportunity to restructure.

That being said, stakeholders have been clear in expressing the need for the BIA and CCAA to be reviewed and updated periodically due to the evolving insolvency environment. As key marketplace framework legislation, the BIA and CCAA play an important role in Canada's economic performance. They also affect the lives and livelihoods of hundreds of thousands of Canadians every year. It is imperative that legislation of this significance is reviewed and updated to ensure it continues to meet its objectives.

This report and the review that supported it is one important step towards that goal. A parliamentary committee review and report stage will occur next. During this time, Industry Canada will continue to reach out to stakeholders, including academics and insolvency experts, and conduct further study and analysis. Decisions regarding any potential reforms will be made following the parliamentary committee report stage.
