(b) where he deems it necessary to do so, vary the amounts to be paid by the debtor into court and the times of payment thereof in order to provide for the new claim; and
(c) enter the matters referred to in paragraphs (a) and (b) in the register.

Court to decide - Sec. 231(2)
(2) Where the debtor or any registered creditor disputes the claim of a creditor described in subsection (1), the clerk shall on notice of motion refer the matter to the court and the decision of the court shall be entered in the register.

Notice - Sec. 231(3)
(3) The clerk shall make such amendments to the consolidation order as may be necessary to give effect to any entries in the register made pursuant to this section, and shall give notice thereof to the registered creditors.

Creditor to share - Sec. 231(4)
(4) On the entry of a claim in the register pursuant to this section, the creditor shall share with the other creditors in any further distribution of moneys paid into court by or on behalf of the debtor.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 202.

Secured claims - Sec. 232
232. (1) A registered creditor holding security for a claim may, at any time, elect to rely on his security notwithstanding that the claim is included in a consolidation order.

Proceeds in excess - Sec. 232(2)

Digitized by Google

(2) Where the proceeds from the disposal of the security referred to in subsection (1) are in excess of the registered creditor's claim, the excess shall be paid into court and applied in payment of other judgments against the debtor.

Exemption - Sec. 232(3)
(3) Subsection (2) does not apply where the security is in the form of chattels exempt from seizure under any law in force in the province in which the consolidation order was issued.

Reduced claim - Sec. 232(4)
(4) Where the proceeds from the disposal of the security referred to in subsection (1) are less than the registered creditor's claim, the creditor remains entitled to the balance of his claim.

Exception - Sec. 232(5)
(5) Subsection (4) does not apply in a case where, under the law in force in the province in which the consolidation order was issued, a creditor

(a) who enforces his security by repossession or repossession and sale, or

(b) who seizes and sells the security under an execution issued pursuant to a judgment obtained against the debtor in respect of the claim so secured, is limited in his recovery of the claim to the security so repossessed or the proceeds of the sale thereof.

R.S., c. B-3, s. 203.

Enforcement of order in default of debtor - Sec. 233
233. (1) A registered creditor may apply by notice of motion to the court where

(a) a debtor defaults in complying with any order or direction of the court;

(b) any other proceeding for the recovery of money is brought against the debtor;

(c) the debtor has, after the consolidation order was made, incurred further debts totalling in excess of five hundred dollars;

(d) a judgment is recovered against the debtor larger in amount than a judgment to which this Part applies without the judgment creditor's consent, and the judgment creditor refuses to permit his name to be added to the register; or

(e) the debtor has property or funds that should be made available for the satisfaction of the consolidation order.

Ex parte application - Sec. 233(2)
(2) A registered creditor may apply ex parte to the court where a debtor

(a) is about to abscond or has absconded from the province in which the consolidation order was issued leaving personal property liable to seizure under execution; or

(b) with intent to defraud his creditors has attempted or is attempting to remove from the province in which the consolidation order was issued personal property liable to seizure under execution.

Proceedings authorized - Sec. 233(3)
(3) On the application referred to in subsection (1) or (2), the court may

(a) authorize the registered creditor making the application to take on behalf of all the registered creditors such proceedings to enforce the consolidation order as the court deems advisable; or
(b) where it deems it advisable and on notice to all parties, make an order permitting all the registered creditors to proceed each independently of the others for the enforcement of their claims under the consolidation order.

Moneys applied to judgment - Sec. 233(4)
(4) All moneys recovered as a result of proceedings taken pursuant to paragraph (3)(a) after payment of costs incurred thereby shall be paid into the court and shall be applied to the credit of the judgments against the debtor appearing in the register.

Proceedings where continuing default - Sec. 233(5)
(5) Where a debtor defaults in making any payment into court required to be made under a consolidation order and the default continues for a period of three months, all the registered creditors are entitled to proceed forthwith, each independently of the others and without reference to the court, for the enforcement of their claims under the consolidation order, unless the court otherwise directs on being satisfied, on application by the debtor, that the circumstances giving rise to the default and to its continuation were beyond the control of the debtor.

Debtor not entitled to relief - Sec. 233(6)
(6) Where any order has been made under paragraph (3)(b) or any proceedings have been commenced under subsection (5), the debtor under the consolidation order is not, without the leave of the court, entitled to any further relief under this Part during the currency of any claim against him entered in the register.
R.S., 1985, c. B-3, s. 233;
1997, c. 12, s. 116.

Re-examination of debtor - Sec. 234
234. (1) A debtor or any registered creditor may at any time apply ex parte to the clerk for a further examination and hearing of the debtor in respect of his financial circumstances.

Idem - Sec. 234(2)
(2) The further hearing referred to in subsection (1) may only be held
(a) with the leave of the clerk; or
(b) in the event of the refusal of the clerk, with leave of the court.

Notice of hearing - Sec. 234(3)
(3) The clerk shall give all parties to the consolidation order at least thirty days notice of the time appointed for the hearing referred to in subsection (1).

Clerk may vary order, etc. - Sec. 234(4)
(4) Where after considering the evidence presented at the further hearing referred to in subsection (1) the clerk is of the opinion that
(a) the terms of payment set out in the consolidation order, or

(b) the decision that the circumstances of the debtor do not warrant the immediate settling of any amounts or times of payment thereof, should be changed because of a change in the circumstances of the debtor, he may
(c) vary the order with respect to the amounts to be paid by the debtor into court or the times of payment thereof, or
(d) on notice of motion refer the matter to the court for settlement.

Application of section 227 - Sec. 234(2)
(5) Section 227 applies, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to a decision of the clerk under subsection (4).
1992, c. 1, s. 19.

Disposition of moneys paid into court - Sec. 235
235. (1) Subject to subsection (3), the clerk shall distribute the moneys paid into court on account of the debts of a debtor at least once every three months.

Idem - Sec. 235(2)
(2) The clerk shall distribute the money paid under subsection (1) rateably, or as nearly so as is practicable, among the registered creditors.

Payments less than five dollars - Sec. 235(3)
(3) Except in the case of a final payment under a consolidation order, the clerk is not required to make a payment to any creditor if the amount thereof is less than five dollars.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 206.

Oaths - Sec. 236
236. (1) The clerk may for the purposes of this Part examine any person under oath and may administer oaths.

Record - Sec. 236(2)
(2) The clerk shall make a written record in summary form of all evidence given at a hearing.
R.S., c. B-3, s. 207.

If assignment or bankruptcy order made - Sec. 237
237. (1) If a debtor in respect of whom a consolidation order has been issued under this Part makes an assignment under section 49, or if a bankruptcy order is made against the debtor under section 43, or if a proposal by the debtor is approved by the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under sections 59 to 61, any moneys that have been paid into court as required by the consolidation order and that have not yet been distributed to the registered creditors shall, immediately after the making of the assignment or bankruptcy order or the approval of the proposal, be distributed among those creditors by the clerk in the proportions to which they are entitled under the consolidation order.

Proceedings may be taken under other Parts - Sec. 237(2)
(2) The fact that proceedings have been taken under this Part does not prevent the taking of proceedings by or against the debtor under the provisions of any other Part of this Act.

PART XI

SECURED CREDITORS AND RECEIVERS

Court may appoint receiver - Sec. 243
243. (1) Subject to subsection (1.1), on application by a secured creditor, a court may appoint a receiver to do any or all of the following if it considers it to be just or convenient to do so:
(a) take possession of all or substantially all of the inventory, accounts receivable or other property of an insolvent person or bankrupt that was acquired for or used in relation to a business carried on by the insolvent person or bankrupt;
(b) exercise any control that the court considers advisable over that property and over the insolvent person's or bankrupt's business; or
(c) take any other action that the court considers advisable.

Restriction on appointment of receiver - Sec. 243(1.1)
(1.1) In the case of an insolvent person in respect of whose property a notice is to be sent under subsection 244(1), the court may not appoint a receiver under subsection (1) before the expiry of 10 days after the day on which the secured creditor sends the notice unless

(a) the insolvent person consents to an earlier enforcement under subsection 244(2); or
(b) the court considers it appropriate to appoint a receiver before then.

Definition of "receiver" - Sec. 243(2)
(2) Subject to subsections (3) and (4), in this Part, "receiver" means a person who
(a) is appointed under subsection (1); or
(b) is appointed to take or takes possession or control — of all or substantially all of the inventory, accounts receivable or other property of an insolvent person or bankrupt that was acquired for or used in relation to a business carried on by the insolvent person or bankrupt — under
(i) an agreement under which property becomes subject to a security (in this Part referred to as a "security agreement"), or
(ii) a court order made under another Act of Parliament, or an Act of a legislature of a province, that provides for or authorizes the appointment of a receiver or receiver-manager.

Definition of "receiver" — subsection 248(2) - Sec. 243(3)
(3) For the purposes of subsection 248(2), the definition "receiver" in subsection (2) is to be read without reference to paragraph (a) or subparagraph (b)(ii).

Trustee to be appointed - Sec. 243(4)
(4) Only a trustee may be appointed under subsection (1) or under an agreement or order referred to in paragraph (2)(b).

Place of filing - Sec. 243(5)
(5) The application is to be filed in a court having jurisdiction in the judicial district of the locality of the debtor.

Orders respecting fees and disbursements - Sec. 243(6)
(6) If a receiver is appointed under subsection (1), the court may make any order respecting the payment of fees and disbursements of the receiver that it considers proper, including one that gives the receiver a charge, ranking ahead of any or all of the secured creditors, over all or part of the property of the insolvent person or bankrupt in respect of the receiver's claim for fees or disbursements, but the court may not make the order unless it is satisfied that the secured creditors who would be materially affected by the order were given reasonable notice and an opportunity to make representations.

Meaning of "disbursements" - Sec. 243(7)
(7) In subsection (6), "disbursements" does not include payments made in the operation of a business of the insolvent person or bankrupt.
1992, c. 27, s. 89;
2005, c. 47, s. 115;
2007, c. 36, s. 58.

Advance notice - Sec. 244
244. (1) A secured creditor who intends to enforce a security on all or substantially all of

(a) the inventory,
(b) the accounts receivable, or
(c) the other property of an insolvent person that was acquired for, or is used in relation to, a business carried on by the insolvent person shall send to that insolvent person, in the prescribed form and manner, a notice of that intention.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE FRASER

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] Few things are as important to a business' ongoing success as the relationship it enjoys with its banker. And when the banker terminates the relationship by demanding repayment of loans and threatening to appoint a receiver, the effect on a business, even a viable one, will usually be immediate and negative. And if the banker also fails to give the business a reasonable time to repay the loans before appointing a receiver, the adverse effects will generally be more pronounced.

[2] On June 8, 1982 (demand date), just over a year after The Bank of Nova Scotia (Bank) had successfully induced Dunphy Leasing Enterprises Ltd. (Dunphy) to leave its previous lender, the Bank demanded that Dunphy repay all outstanding loans. It gave Dunphy 20 hours to pay over $5,000,000.00. When Dunphy did not meet this time limit, the Bank immediately appointed a receiver for Dunphy. The receiver began to liquidate Dunphy's assets and those of two subsidiaries, S&D Rent-A-Car Ltd. (S&D)' and 106315 Canada Inc. (106), both of whom were also customers of the Bank. As often happens in receiverships, the amounts realized were insufficient to discharge the Respondents' obligations to the Bank.

[3] Following a lengthy and complex trial, the trial judge concluded that the Bank was liable for trespass and conversion with respect to each Respondent:'1990 CanLII 5931 (AB QB), (1990) 105 A.R. 161 (Q.B.). The reasons: the Bank had failed to give Dunphy reasonable notice prior to appointing a receiver; it had seized S&D's assets without authority and it had failed to give 106 reasonable notice before withdrawing 106's overdraft privileges and seizing its inventory. In addition, in a decision with far-reaching implications for the lending industry in Canada, the trial judge also concluded the Bank had improperly calculated the interest the Respondents owed on their loans. In the result, each Respondent had paid more interest than it was obliged to do. The Bank was ordered to pay Dunphy and S&D damages totalling in excess of $1.1 million. The Bank appeals these decisions and other ancillary decisions the trial judge made.

[4] The Bank, both at trial and appeal, advanced alternative defences---it denied liability; it denied causation; and it disputed the extent of the Respondents' damages. The Bank contended it had every right to proceed in the manner it did. It argued Dunphy was in default of its obligations to the Bank on the demand date and in the circumstances of this case, 20 hours was reasonable notice. The Bank also asserted that even if it had not given Dunphy reasonable notice before appointing a receiver and it had not given 106 reasonable notice before withdrawing its overdraft privileges, any damages the Respondents suffered were not caused by these tortious acts. The Bank's rationale for this submission was based on its contention that the Respondents were insolvent on the demand date. Thus, in the Bank's view, any losses which the Respondents suffered resulted from their insolvent status and not from the absence of reasonable notice. What the Bank's argument comes to is this: the Respondents were drowning in debt. Whether the Bank's actions caused them to drown earlier than they otherwise would have is immaterial. They would have drowned anyway.

[5] I agree with the Bank that the trial judgment must be vacated. But unlike the Bank, I do not agree that certain decisions by the trial judge should be reversed. Instead, in my view, a new trial must be ordered because of reviewable errors in the trial judgment. The reviewable errors fall into four categories: first, problems with fact findings; second, failure to address and resolve the causation issue; third, failure to explain the rationale for accepting the Respondents' valuation of damages; and fourth, failure to consider and resolve several material issues. I do wish to acknowledge, however, the difficult task which confronted the trial judge given the complexities inherent in this case. Argument on appeal alone took almost two weeks. And without question, the issues which emerged during the course of argument were far better clarified on appeal than they had been at trial.

[6] Since a new trial is to take place, it is not essential to address the manner in which the Bank was obligated to calculate interest on the Respondents' outstanding loans. But given the implications of the trial decision, I shall do so. The principles of the mathematics of finance recognize that periodic interest can be calculated using one of two methods---the nominal rate (used by the Bank to calculate interest on the Respondents' loans)---and the effective rate (which the Respondents argue should have been used). The trial judge concluded that the Bank should have used the effective rate method. Both the Bank and the intervener, the Canadian Bankers' Association, disagree. Which method of interest calculation should apply where, as here, the loan documents are silent on this issue, is a troublesome question. It is one which has bedevilled experts intent on rationalizing theories of mathematical finance with the courts' historical approach to interest issues. Not surprisingly, because of its potential impact on debtor-creditor relations generally, the interest question consumed a disproportionate portion of both trial and appeal time.

[7] The interest question raises two separate issues. First, where interest is payable on a loan, should the contract providing for payment of interest be interpreted, in the absence of any term to the contrary, so as to require that interest be calculated by the effective rate method? Second, does s.4 of the Interest Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-18, apply even though the Bank's loan documentation states an annual rate of interest? The trial judge answered both questions in the affirmative. On both issues, I am of the view that the trial judge erred.

[8] I propose to review what I understand are certain non-contentious facts (Part II, below). Then I will summarize the reasons for a new trial (Part III). Next, I will review these reasons in detail. In that context, I will endeavour to identify concerns arising out of the trial judgment, dealing with both the factual (Part IV) and legal arguments (Parts V to VII) relating thereto. Finally, I will deal with the interest issue (Part VIII).

[9] In reviewing the reasons for a new trial, I shall deal with both the issues of causation and reasonable time. I do so for several reasons. The parties are entitled to know why, in spite of a careful and detailed trial judgment, a new trial is warranted. Further, addressing certain flaws in the legal arguments advanced on appeal maximizes the likelihood of avoiding errors during what is certain to be a lengthy and costly new trial. In addition, I want to give the parties the opportunity to settle by agreement, if possible, certain unresolved facts not addressed at the first trial and to narrow the scope of the issues to be canvassed during the new trial.

[10] Finally, and most importantly, each side has argued that it should now succeed on appeal on one point thereby effectively bypassing all of its opponent's objections. This is certainly the Bank's approach on causation. It argues that even if the Bank failed to give the Respondents reasonable notice before enforcing its loan security, this court should nevertheless now reverse all the trial judge's findings on the damages issue. This is because the Bank contends that the Respondents have not proven that any damages they suffered were caused by the absence of reasonable notice as opposed to their respective financial positions. In turn, the Respondents focus on the issue of reasonable notice and argue, in effect, that damages should be presumed to flow from the absence of reasonable notice. I shall explain why I am unable to take either of these shortcuts which the opposing sides contend should lead to a reversal or 3upholding of the trial judgment. And I have chosen not to address many other issues raised by this case on the basis they are best left for the trial judge to resolve in their entirety.

II. BACKGROUND INFORMATION

[11] The origins of this case began in the heady days of 1981. With Alberta's economy then booming, the Bank decided to expand its loan portfolio in this province. In pursuit of this goal, the Bank aggressively solicited new business. One of its targets was Dunphy, controlled by Duncan Phyper (Phyper). Dunphy was in the automotive leasing business and Phyper had been a highly-regarded customer of the Toronto Dominion Bank (TD) for a period of over 20 years.

[12] In January, 1981, Dunphy submitted to the Bank an application for financing in which it disclosed that Dunphy's financing requirements would reach a maximum of $6.3 million by January, 1983. It is noteworthy, and this was not disputed on appeal, that Bank personnel at the Branch level were then fully aware of the relationship between Dunphy and S&D. They knew that Dunphy leased vehicles to S&D and that S&D in turn leased the vehicles on a daily rental basis. On February 11, 1981, the Bank's Head Office advised its Calgary Regional Office of its decision to extend to Dunphy a $5.0 million line of credit. By commitment letter dated March 6, 1981 and accepted by Dunphy in mid-April, 1981, the Bank and Dunphy agreed on the terms and conditions of the Bank loan. Security documentation was executed by Dunphy in the Bank's favour.

[13] Dunphy bought and then leased vehicles for terms of 2 to 4 years. Dunphy financed the vehicles it bought through the Bank line of credit in a process referred to as "discounting leases". Dunphy was required to make monthly principal and interest payments on the credit extended for each vehicle it financed. Once a vehicle's lease terminated or expired, Dunphy then had to make a "balloon payment" to the Bank, representing the balance owing on the amount financed.

[14] During the early part of a lease, the monthly payments Dunphy received from the lessee of the vehicle would not be enough to meet the monthly principal and interest payments owing to the Bank for the vehicle. However, it was anticipated that as Dunphy's lease portfolio matured and the leases reached what was described as the "crossover point", Dunphy's cash flow would then become positive. At this point, the amount of the monthly lease payments Dunphy received for the leased vehicles would be greater than the monthly payments owing to the Bank. This would occur because the interest component of the monthly payments that Dunphy made to the Bank for a vehicle would decrease with the corresponding reduction in the principal amount outstanding. And as the interest payments decreased, the "crossover point" would be reached when the monthly lease payments (which were at a fixed rate per month) exceeded the amount of interest and principal that Dunphy owed on a given vehicle. Until this occurred, the cash shortfalls that Dunphy incurred would be funded by a number of sources. One of these would be the Bank.

[15] Phyper intended to increase the volume of Dunphy's business significantly. The Bank knew this was so. During the spring, summer and fall of 1981, Dunphy flourished. Phyper, whose dedication and enthusiasm for Dunphy was unquestioned, increased Dunphy's leasing portfolio at a speed not anticipated either by him or the Bank. With this rapid expansion came an increase in Dunphy's monthly cash shortfalls and the need for increased loans by the Bank. Initially, the Bank granted such increases.

[16] By February, 1982, the Alberta economy had changed markedly and the Bank's enthusiasm for expanding its loan portfolio in Alberta had waned---along with its enthusiasm for the new credit it had extended to Dunphy less than a year earlier. The Bank decided that it wanted out of the Dunphy financing. And the Bank took steps to see that it got out. But not before it had arranged to have all security irregularities of concern to it corrected with the full cooperation of Dunphy and Phyper. Just a few days after this was accomplished, on June 8, 1982, the Bank demanded that Dunphy repay its outstanding loans.

III. REASONS FOR NEW TRIAL

[17] First, the trial judgment contains a number of seemingly contradictory fact findings. These, in turn, impact on one or more of the numerous legal issues. This is not simply a case where the parties disagree on the proper inferences to be drawn from the facts as determined by the trial judge. The problem is more fundamental---the parties cannot even agree on what fact findings were made. And it is also evident that other key fact findings were not definitively resolved or were omitted. This latter problem, in itself, constitutes a serious flaw in the judgment: Colautti Constr. v. Ottawa reflex, (1984), 9 D.L.R. (4th) 265 at 271 (Ont. C.A.). And each would justify a new trial.

[18] Second, the trial judgment does not address and resolve the causation issue: did the Bank's actions in fact cause the damages claimed by the Respondents? Instead, it appears to be premised on an assumption. That is, once it was proven that the Bank failed to give Dunphy reasonable notice before appointing a receiver, the trial judgment presumes that damages flowed therefrom, without analyzing whether Dunphy had proven a causal connection between the failure and the damages. Similarly, the judgment assumes that S&D sustained damages as a result of the Bank's failure to secure the necessary judicial approvals for the seizure of S&D's assets. It also assumes that 106 did likewise as a result of the Bank's failure to give 106 reasonable notice before withdrawing its overdraft privileges. As with Dunphy, the trial judgment gives no consideration to whether these failures in fact caused the damages claimed by each of S&D and 106. In taking this approach, the trial judgment is in error for reasons explained in detail below.

[19] Third, the trial judgment concludes that the evidence of the Respondents' expert on damages, Mr. Richard C. Jarand, should be preferred over that of the Bank's expert, Mr. Michael Bowie. But one cannot deduce from the trial judgment the basis for this conclusion. This omission would not ordinarily be fatal. A trial judge may not be obliged to explain the reasons for choosing one expert's evidence over another's. This is certainly so where no dispute exists between the parties concerning the primary facts upon which an expert's opinion is based. Nor is it enough that the Bank establish that the appeal court might have assessed the facts of the case or the inferences to be drawn therefrom differently than the trial judge: Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K" 1975 CanLII 146 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802.

[20] However, the problem in this case is that the trial judgment appears to consistently approve Bowie's general approach and analysis on the damages issue but then, without explanation, proceeds to reject Bowie's conclusions and chooses Jarand's instead. The trial judgement's failure to explain the rationale for accepting Bowie's analysis but Jarand's conclusions constitutes reviewable error: Nova, An Alberta Corporation v. Guelph Engineering Company et al. 1989 ABCA 253 (CanLII), (1989), 70 Alta. L.R. (2d) 97 (C.A.). It may also be that the trial judge missed an issue (what is meant by the orderly liquidation of assets by management), or overlooked the real significance of the experts' evidence. The judgment suggests both may have occurred. These too would warrant a new trial: Maryland Casualty Co. v. Roland Roy Fourrures 1973 CanLII 141 (SCC), [1974] S.C.R. 52 at 55 and 56; Harper v. R. 1982 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 2 at 14 and 18.

[21] Fourth, and most importantly, the trial judgment does not conclusively determine two key issues (and possibly a third depending on the answer to the first two). The first omitted issue relates to the Bank's breaches of contract, as determined by the trial judge: what effect did the Bank's breaches have on Dunphy and its subsidiaries? The trial judgment makes no attempt to resolve this issue. Was the Bank entitled to call Dunphy's loans when it did? This is the second omitted issue. And if not, then this raises the third omitted issue. What is the effect on the Bank's alternative defences of the Bank's having called Dunphy's loans when it was not entitled to do so? The trial judgment says nothing about any of these omitted issues. Nor does it address the effect the answers to these critical issues may have on the issues with which they interlock: liability, causation and damages. Overlooking significant issues itself compels a new trial: Harper v. R., supra.

[22] Unlike most commercial financing arrangements, Dunphy's loans were not payable simply on demand. Instead, as the Bank conceded on appeal, its right to call Dunphy's loans was contingent upon Dunphy's then being in default of its contractual obligations to the Bank. Therefore, deciding whether the Bank was entitled to call Dunphy's loans involves consideration of a number of subsumed issues. The most Important one is what I consider to be the core question in this case: was Dunphy in default of its obligations to the Bank on the demand date? If the answer were yes, then it would be necessary to move on to the next issue---to what extent, if any, did the Bank's defaults cause or contribute to Dunphy's defaults?

[23] The trial judge's failure to conclusively determine whether Dunphy was in default of any of its obligations to the Bank on the demand date is explicable for several reasons. All relate to the manner in which the case was presented. First, much of counsel's attention focussed on what method should be used in calculating the amount of interest that Dunphy owed to the Bank. Dunphy's expert confirmed that Dunphy was not in default of its monetary obligations on the demand date assuming the Bank was obligated to use the effective rate method of interest calculation. The trial judgment accepts that the Bank was so obligated. It does not consider what the impact might have been on Dunphy's default position if, as I have concluded, the Bank was entitled to use the nominal rate method of interest calculation in determining Dunphy's interest charges.

[24] Second, the experts testifying on Dunphy's monetary defaults. Bowie and Dr. Charles Alfred Prentice, failed to factor into their respective analyses the implications of any contract breaches by the Bank, whether on Dunphy's ability to meet its monetary obligations or otherwise.

[25] Third, neither expert explained in detail how his opinion might be affected if the underlying assumptions on which his opinion was based were to change. This is exactly what happened in this case. The trial judge made a number of fact findings which differed from those which each expert assumed existed. And because of this deficiency in the experts' reports, the trial judge was deprived of any meaningful assistance in evaluating the effect which the changed assumptions might have had on the experts' opinions. Admittedly, the experts' task in these circumstances is a difficult one. Unless and until an expert knew what findings were to be made by the trial judge, the expert's attempt to provide an opinion based on the correct set of assumptions would prove highly problematic. But unfortunately, no way exists to avoid this thorny issue which will once again confront the trial judge on the new trial. However, since the onus lies on the Bank to prove that Dunphy was in default on the demand date, the problems inherent in dealing with all the permutations and combinations of the various assumptions fall largely onto the Bank's shoulders.

[26] Finally, at trial both sides proceeded on the assumption that even if the Bank had no right to call Dunphy's loans when it did, this would affect only one issue---reasonable notice. That was a mistaken assumption in my view. On appeal, the Bank maintained this position and intimated that whether Dunphy was in default on the demand date was not a watershed issue. I do not agree. As the Bank acknowledged on appeal, its ability to call Dunphy's loans was limited. These loans were not true demand loans. Dunphy first had to be in default of its obligations to the Bank in order for the Bank to call the loans. Therefore, in the context of this case, it is difficult to conceive of any issue that might impact more on causation and damages than the presence or absence of default. Whether the Bank was entitled to call Dunphy's loans at all on the demand date is far more important than the issue of whether the loans could be called even on reasonable notice. If the Bank had no right to call Dunphy's loans on the demand date, it would be unnecessary to even consider whether the Bank gave Dunphy reasonable notice before appointing a receiver. The Bank would have been unable to demand payment of the loans and appoint a receiver even on giving reasonable notice. What the trial judge would then have needed to consider is what effect the absence of any default by Dunphy had on the Bank's defences. The trial judgment addresses none of these questions.

[27] Given the complexity of this case, the length of trial time it required and the fact that many of the trial judge's findings and conclusions were not seriously challenged on appeal, I tried to determine the omitted issues, based on the trial judge's findings. I did so in the hope that a new trial could be avoided, at least on liability. The first step was to determine whether Dunphy was in default of its monetary obligations on the demand date. This required analyzing the extent to which the conclusions in the report (Bowie Report) of the Bank's expert, Bowie, should be altered to reflect the changes in Bowie's underlying assumptions mandated by the trial judge's findings. Unfortunately, this proved to be an impossible task.

[28] In any event, a further problem militates against limiting the scope of a new trial. The actions of a wrongdoer can give rise to liability both in contract and in tort: Central Trust v. Rafuse 1986 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R 147. If it should be determined that the Bank called Dunphy's loans when it had no right to do so, the Bank might be exposed to potential liability both in contract and in tort. This potential liability affects another issue: Dunphy's claim for exemplary damages. Insofar as exemplary damages are concerned, there is no need to prove causation. Exemplary damages are linked directly to liability. It is clear that Dunphy's claim for exemplary damages will continue to be vigorously asserted in the new trial. However, if the judge retrying the case were dealing only with causation and damages and not liability, the judge's ability to assess the claim for exemplary damages would be compromised. In these circumstances, there would be no factual context in which to place the exemplary damages claim.

[29] Further, and most importantly, the issues of liability, causation and damages are inextricably linked in this case. To deal with causation and damages, the trial judge must have a complete picture of the events leading up to the demand date. A snapshot view of the Respondents' financial status on the demand date would prove of little use to the trial judge in unravelling the issues of causation and damages. Without a complete understanding of the nature and extent of any breaches of contract by the Bank and their impact on each of the Respondents, a trial judge attempting to resolve these complex issues would be working in a partial vacuum. For all of these reasons, I have concluded that it would be impracticable, unworkable and unfair to restrict the scope of the new trial in any manner.

IV. FACT FINDINGS

[30] I propose to now highlight certain contradictory fact findings in the trial judgment and to identify a number of omitted fact findings which materially affect one or more legal issues. But I do not intend to exhaustively canvass all deficiencies in the primary fact findings. It is frequently unclear in the trial judgment whether a specific fact finding is being made, or whether a witness' evidence is simply being related as part of the narrative. This ambiguity may explain apparently contradictory fact findings. However, the difficulty is that one cannot always state with certainty into which category a statement falls: fact finding or narrative. This was evident during the appeal as the parties spent considerable time attempting to rationalize conflicting statements, in my view, without success.

1. AMENDMENTS TO LOAN AGREEMENT

[31] The Bank agreed to increase Dunphy's line of credit by $700,000 in July, 1981. Dunphy denied that, as a condition of the increase, it voluntarily agreed to repay the bank credit related to S&D vehicles at the increased rate of 2.75% per month. Instead, it contended that the Bank breached the loan agreement made between Dunphy and the Bank by requiring Dunphy to do so. Unfortunately, the trial judgment fails to satisfactorily resolve the question of what amendments, if any, Dunphy had agreed to as a condition of the increased line of credit. And without knowing whether the Bank was entitled to require stepped-up principal repayments on the S&D vehicles it financed, one cannot conclusively determine whether Dunphy would have been in default of its monetary obligations on the demand date.

[32] The trial judgment first indicates that Dunphy had agreed to a number of conditions in order to secure an increase in the Bank line of credit, one of which involved Dunphy's repaying the credits relating to vehicles leased to S&D at the rate of 2.75% per month. With reference to these conditions, the judgment provides:

> They were conditions agreed to by Dunphy Leasing in consideration for which the Bank agreed to the $700,000 overrun.

However, whether this statement was intended to be a fact finding is unclear because of later comments in the judgment. At one point, the trial judgment implies that a number of amendments were made to the loan agreement without Dunphy's agreement. One of the amendments mentioned is described as the Bank's decision to increase the principal repayment rate payable by Dunphy on loans for S&D vehicles. And then, at a later stage, as is apparent from the following excerpt, the trial judgment is ambiguous as to whether Dunphy had ever agreed to any such increase:

> It is impossible to ascertain the date on which the alleged oral agreement was made, the date on which it was to become effective or, most importantly, which of the terms of the loan agreement were amended, or how.
> The Bank did unilaterally amend the loan agreement and change the terms upon which it had agreed to lend to Dunphy Leasing.... There was never a written amending agreement, and the only suggestion of an oral agreement relates solely to principal repayment rate. I reject that Phyper, on behalf of Dunphy Leasing, agreed to any of the other amendments made by the Bank.

[33] Nor does the trial judgment resolve when the Bank imposed on Dunphy the requirement that the term of any leases to S&D be limited to no more than I year. If, as the trial judge found, Dunphy did not agree to this amendment, then vehicles Dunphy leased to S&D were coming off lease at dates earlier than would otherwise have been the case. The significance of the early termination of these S&D leases is that starting in May, 1982, Dunphy was obliged to begin making "balloon" payments to the Bank for the S&D vehicles coming off lease. The impact this might have had on Dunphy would be highly relevant to the issues of causation and damages. This is because Dunphy claimed the premature termination of the S&D leases exacerbated its cash flow during this period. The trial judgment gives no help on this question.

[34] Moreover, to properly evaluate how limiting the term of the S&D leases affects causation and damages, one would need other fact findings which were not made. One would need to know how many vehicles fell into this category. One would also need to know the reason why the balloon payments owing for vehicles leased to S&D began coming due in May, 1982. Did they arise because the S&D leases started terminating as a result of the Bank's insistence the leases to S&D be limited to a year in length? Or was it because Dunphy started selling the S&D vehicles as part of Phyper's decision to wind down S&D by September, 1982? Or was it a combination of the two? And even this information would be incomplete without knowing to what extent Phyper's decision to wind down S&D was itself the result of the Bank's limiting the terms of the S&D leases. These represent only a few of the obvious questions arising in these circumstances. The trial judgment answers none of these.

2. LEASE OPTION PRICE VS. BALLOON PAYMENT AMOUNT

[35] The Bank contended that the theory of Dunphy's leasing business did not conform to reality. And worse yet in the Bank's view, Dunphy failed to appreciate that the rationale underlying its business was flawed. The reason according to the Bank: contrary to Dunphy's expectations, the amounts Dunphy received when lessees' exercised their options to purchase leased vehicles were less than the balloon payments then owing to the Bank for the vehicles. Dunphy strenuously disagreed with this submission. The trial judgment proves of limited assistance in resolving this material fact issue, which impacts directly on the question of Dunphy's economic prospects and financial integrity following the demand date.

3. RESPONDENTS' FINANCIAL STATUS

[36] One of the Bank's primary grounds of appeal is Dunphy's failure to prove that the Bank's actions caused Dunphy's damages. That ground is premised on Dunphy's having been insolvent on the date that the receiver was appointed, June 9, 1982 (receivership date). The trial judgment makes no conclusive finding as to Dunphy's financial status on the critical dates. Leaving aside Dunphy's obligations vis-a-vis the Bank, all of Dunphy's financial obligations were current as of the demand date. Despite the fact that this was so, the Bank's expert, Bowie, had testified that Dunphy was insolvent on the receivership date. By his calculation, Dunphy's liabilities then exceeded its assets by approximately $540,000. The Bank took the following comments in the trial judgment to be an acceptance of the validity of Bowie's opinion:

> Bowie's evidence with respect to the insolvency of Dunphy Leasing is uncontroverted. No other witness gave evidence with respect to the issue of Dunphy Leasing's solvency.

[37] However, two pages later, the judgment makes a comment which implies it rejects Bowie's opinion. Preceding the comment is a discussion of the income Dunphy was generating because of the average "spread" Dunphy had been able to achieve between the interest rates it paid on its Bank loans and the higher interest rates payable to it by its lessees. After this discussion, the judgment states:

> Assuming loans of $5.5 Million, that spread would produce an annual gross income of $412,500, which equates to a gross monthly income of $34,000, without taking into consideration income from vehicles which were fully paid out. The existence of that monthly income is hardly consistent with Bowie's conclusion of insolvency, which approach had the effect of depriving Dunphy of the benefit of declining interest rates.

[38] The trial judgment does not attempt to rationalize these inconsistent comments. Nor am I now in a position to do so.

4. FEBRUARY 22, 1982 TELEPHONE CALL

Digitized by Google

[39] This telephone call between the Bank's representative, Einarson, and Phyper is dealt with in three different parts of the trial judgment. The Bank argued that it was during this call that Einarson told Phyper that the Bank wanted Dunphy to take its business elsewhere. Whether the Bank did so potentially impacts on at least two issues: liability and damages. Liability is affected this way: if reasonable notice becomes a live issue on the new trial, then whether the Bank put Dunphy on notice that it should find a new lender months before it appointed a receiver will strongly influence the decision as to what constitutes reasonable notice. Deciding whether the Bank invited Dunphy to find a new lender in February will also be relevant to the question of damages, including whether this is an appropriate case for an award of exemplary damages.

[40] The trial judgment is confusing as to what transpired during the call. In what is apparently a reference to the February 22, 1982 conversation, it states:

> Einarson did not tell Phyper that Dunphy Leasing's line of credit had been revoked, suspended, or cancelled... Einarson did not say that the Bank would be calling Dunphy Leasing's loans, he did not demand payment from the Borrowers nor did he make demands of any type.
> Nothing was communicated in the February 22nd telephone conversation which would give Phyper any indication that some three and one-half months later, after having made additional loans to Dunphy Leasing, the Bank would demand payment and appoint a receiver for Dunphy Leasing....

[41] Comments supporting these "findings" were also made later in the judgment where the February 22 conversation is dealt with in part in this manner:

[42] This much is now clear:

> 1. No demand for payment was made.
> 2. No notice was given from which Dunphy could or should infer that a demand would be made in the future....
> 4. Neither the Branch nor Regional Office was aware that the end had begun: each continued to recommend further accommodation for Dunphy.

[43] However, these apparent fact findings must be contrasted with comments made much later in the judgment when it returns to the February 22 phone conversation and observes:

> On February 22, 1982, Phyper was advised that the Bank "wished to see all business including that of S&D and 106315, removed from the Bank's books as soon as possible". The evidence points to the fact that from February 22nd onward, Phyper understood the precarious position of his companies in relation to the Bank.

[44] No attempt is made to reconcile the implications of these statements with those made earlier concerning the telephone call. And again, I cannot resolve this issue at this stage.

5.106'S ACCOUNTS RECEIVABLE

[45] The Bank's attempts to collect 106's accounts receivable proved disastrous. The trial judgment finds that out of approximately $104,000 in receivables, the Bank collected nothing. At least three questions arise from these facts: first, was the Bank entitled to realize on 106's accounts receivable when it did; second, if not, did any wrongful acts by the Bank cause the losses which 106 claims; and third, what is the "true value" of the losses which 106 sustained? The second question (one of those involved in the causation issue) is not addressed at all in the trial Judgment. And no clear answers to questions 1 and 3 emerge from the trial judgment. The trial judgment begins by outlining certain "facts" relating to 106's accounts receivable:

> 3. By July 12, 1982, the Bank had given notification under its assignment of book debts; thereafter, the Bank was solely entitled to enforce and receive payment of the receivables.
> 4. The collection files were referred to the Bank's solicitors on December 1, 1982, but collection action was inexcusably delayed to such an extent that nothing appears to have been collected.
> 5. No accounting has ever been provided by the Bank.

[46] But later, the judgment makes comments concerning the many difficulties involved in the Bank's collecting 106's accounts receivable:

> 106315's receivables were very old and were of extremely low quality. This was apparent before June of 1982.106315 itself had failed to collect these accounts and most of them had already been referred to litigation.
> The Bank spent a good deal of money in attempting to realize some money on the receivables before realizing that they were worthless. It did not have an obligation to send good money after bad in pursuing all these cases to trial. It is not the case that the failure to realize very much money from the receivables resulted from the negligence of the Bank or of its solicitors.
> The accounts receivable of 106315 had been validly assigned to the Bank. Whether the Bank realized all that they were worth is an entirely different issue. The Bank was unquestionably not a converter of the receivables.

[47] The trial judgment does not attempt to reconcile these apparently contradictory fact findings. It proceeds to award damages to 106 based on the full value of the accounts receivable. The explanation for doing so appears to be that the Bank's failure to account for its collection of the accounts receivable entitles 106 to value the receivable at face value. In support of this approach, the trial judge refers to Royal Bank of Canada v. First Pioneer Investments Ltd. (1979), 27 O.R. (2d) 352 (H.C.), aff'd (1981), 39 C.B.R. (N.S.) 147 (C.A.), reversed in part on other grounds, 1984 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 125. In that case, the court recognized the duty of a privately appointed receiver-manager to ensure that a proper accounting is ultimately made to the debtor. But the case did not address the effect a creditor's failure to account may have upon the valuation of the assets of the debtor. And to suggest that it automatically follows that upon failure to account, a creditor is liable for the book value of accounts receivable is not, in my opinion, a proper statement of the law.

[48] Once the court determines that a creditor has acted unlawfully (and the causation issue has been resolved against the creditor), then the burden of satisfying the court that the accounts receivable would have realized less than their book value does fall upon the creditor: Provincial Bank of Canada v. Gagnon 1981 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 98 at 112; and National Bank of Canada v. Corbeil 1991 CanLII 117 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 117 at 133.

[49] However, the true value of the accounts receivable represents the proper measure of damages: Corbeil, supra at 132. And in determining the true value, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the accounts receivable would be valued at the book value set by the debtor: National Bank of Canada v. Atomic Slipper Co. 1991 CanLII 105 (SCC), (1991), 80 D.L.R. (4th) 134 (S.C.C.). The problem in this case is that the trial judgment fails to resolve whether the apparent difficulties associated with the collection of 106's accounts receivable constitute evidence to the contrary. Certainly, the Bank's failure to account for collection of 106's accounts receivable will adversely impact on its attempts to establish that their value was not as claimed by 106. But the mere failure to account does not of itself mean that the Bank is precluded from proving through other evidence to the contrary that the book value of 106's accounts receivable did not represent their true value. Nor does the trial judgment make any attempt to assess the impact that other negative factors might have had upon the true value of the accounts receivable. And those comments that are made point to differing conclusions as to their value.

V. CAUSATION AND DAMAGES

1. BANK'S ARGUMENTS

[50] On appeal, the Bank stressed the failure of the trial judgment to deal with the causation issue. The Bank's attack here was two-pronged in effect. Firstly, it contended that Dunphy had no value on the receivership date (because it was insolvent) and therefore, Dunphy suffered no loss even if the court should determine that the receivership was improper.

[51] Secondly, the Bank submitted that even if it failed to give Dunphy reasonable notice, Dunphy cannot claim anything more than nominal damages. The reason---Dunphy is unable to establish that even with the giving of reasonable notice, it could have paid off the Bank's loans. Therefore, any losses which it suffered were not caused by the short notice but by Dunphy's precarious financial position. This submission appears to be premised on two alternative bases: either Dunphy was insolvent on the receivership date (and could never have secured the necessary financing to repay the Bank loans); or (even if solvent), Dunphy could not have secured alternative financing within a reasonable time.

[52] I consider both Bank arguments on causation to be overly expansive statements of the law and therefore invalid as stated. However, the Bank is correct that the causation issue was not addressed and resolved in the trial judgment. It should have been. To appreciate the impact which this issue might have on the resolution of this case requires an understanding of the linkage amongst the liability, causation and damages issues. In determining whether the Bank's actions caused the damages that the Respondents contend, knowing the financial status of each Respondent on the receivership date is important. But not for the reasons the Bank asserts. Nor will the solvency or insolvency of the Respondents affect the assessment of damages in the manner the Bank suggests. I shall now deal with each of the Bank's causation arguments and state why I am of the view that each is wrong in law.

2. INSOLVENCY AND ABILITY TO SUSTAIN DAMAGES

[53] The Bank contends that if Dunphy was insolvent---if it had no value----when any wrongful acts by the Bank occurred, Dunphy suffered no losses. Why? Because (in the Bank's view) the end result would have been the same with or without the Bank's wrongful acts: Dunphy would still be insolvent. The Bank effectively asserts that an insolvent debtor cannot be further damaged. I do not agree. A debtor's ability to sustain damages is not contingent on its being solvent when a wrongful act is committed.

[54] The flaw in the Bank's reasoning is the mistaken assumption that an insolvent debtor---one with no value---loses nothing as a result of a creditor's wrongful act. The Bank's position fails to recognize any distinction between degrees of insolvency. According to its theory, a deficiency of $1 is the same as a deficiency of $1,000,000. Once the debtor has drowned, what difference does it make how deep the water is? The answer is that it clearly does make a difference. Even an insolvent debtor remains obliged to discharge all its debts. Whether it has sufficient funds to do so is immaterial. What is important is that a debtor's ability to meet its obligations will most certainly be affected by the extent of the deficiency arising on liquidation of its assets.

[55] Further, the extent of the debtor's deficiency potentially impacts on another party---the guarantor of the debtor's obligations. The greater the deficiency, the greater the guarantor's exposure and liability. This possibility is not merely of academic interest. In this case, one of the Bank actions involves its attempts to recover more than $1 million from Phyper as guarantor of Dunphy's obligations. A guarantor has a valid and demonstrable interest in limiting the extent of a debtor's deficiency. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal has concluded that where a guarantor has been prejudiced by reason of a creditor's tortious actions vis-a-vis a debtor, the guarantor's obligations under the guarantee should be correspondingly reduced to the extent of the prejudice: Bank of N.S. v. Ham reflex, [1986] 5 W.W.R. 249 at 258-260.

3. EFFECT OF DEBTOR'S INSOLVENCY

[56] The second prong of the Bank's attack on causation is founded on the argument that to recover any damages, Dunphy must prove that with reasonable notice it could have paid off the Bank loans. Otherwise, Dunphy cannot prove in turn that the absence of reasonable notice caused its damages. And in the Bank's view, Dunphy is unable to meet this threshold requirement. It points to Bowie's opinion that Dunphy was insolvent on the demand date to justify its assertion that Dunphy's losses resulted from its insolvency and not from any Bank actions. As stated by the Bank: "To have given additional time would have been to no avail." [Similar arguments were advanced with respect to S&D and 106.] This argument that Dunphy was bound to fail anyway and that the Bank simply put Dunphy out of its misery at an earlier date has an appealing simplicity to it. And it may very well be that in many cases in which a creditor puts a financially troubled debtor into receivership, the argument will prove successful. But as often happens when one tries to simplify complex legal issues, the apparent simplicity is misleading.

[57] When a creditor fails to provide reasonable notice to a debtor before appointing a receiver and seizing the debtor's assets, the creditor is liable in tort for trespass and conversion: Ronald Elwyn Lister Limited et al v. Dunlop Canada Limited 1982 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 726. Liability in tort arises all the more so where the creditor had no right at all to appoint a receiver, even on giving reasonable notice. Causation in tort involves two different concepts: causation-in-fact and causation-in-law. Causation-in-law generally involves determining whether the damage which a party incurred was not "too remote" a consequence of the tortfeasor's wrongful acts. See Allen M. Linden, Canadian Tort Law. 4th ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1988) at 305-361. In this case, causation-in-law is not in issue. If the Bank had no right to call Dunphy's loans or if the Bank failed to give Dunphy reasonable notice prior to appointing a receiver, then either way, the Bank's appointment of a receiver led to the premature seizure and liquidation of Dunphy's assets. Thus, the causation-in-law bridge would be crossed---the premature appointment of a receiver and the subsequent seizure and liquidation of Dunphy's assets would be the direct and expected result of the Bank's wrongful actions. Similar consequences would flow with respect to S&D and 106 (assuming, of course, that the Bank's liability for tortious acts vis-a-vis these parties were established).

[58] In raising the causation issue, what the Bank is really disputing is causation-in-fact: it claims that the Respondents cannot prove that the Bank's actions, even if they were wrongful, in fact caused the losses the Respondents claim. Instead, the Bank asserts that the Respondents' losses were caused by their poor financial positions. What the Bank contends is this: Dunphy cannot establish the necessary causal relation between the Bank's actions and the losses claimed by Dunphy unless Dunphy first proves that it could have paid off the Bank loans had it been given a reasonable time to do so. I do not dispute that the evidence relating to a debtor's inability to pay off its loans may persuade a court to conclude that no damages resulted from the premature seizure: Kavcar Investments Ltd. v. Aetna Financial Services Ltd. reflex, (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 225 at 238 (C.A.). However, this conclusion does not inevitably follow. Nor does it follow that the creditor will automatically be restricted to liability for nominal damages where the debtor is unable to prove that it could have paid off its loans within a reasonable time.

[59] The fallacy in the Bank's argument to this effect is the premise on which it is based. The Bank assumes that an injured party may recover something more than nominal damages only if the creditor's tortious conduct was the sole cause of the debtor's losses. But that is not necessary. It is enough that the debtor prove that the creditor's conduct caused some of the losses either by contributing to or exacerbating the debtor's losses. While the debtor must show a causal connection between the creditor's tortious acts and the losses suffered, this can be accomplished by establishing that the tortious acts were "either 'the' cause ... or 'a' cause" of the losses sustained: Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada, supra at 323. Liability for damages can arise either way.

[60] Thus, even if it had been proven that Dunphy was either insolvent or doomed to fail on the receivership date, that would not have ended the causation and damages analysis. Nor would the fact that Dunphy could not establish that with reasonable time it could have paid off the Bank loans. It would simply have led to other avenues to explore. First, the trial judge would have needed to consider whether the circumstances warranted an award of damages for trespass of other than a nominal amount. There is no rule of law that restricts an award of damages for trespass to a nominal amount only. See Street on Torts. 8th ed., M. Brazier ed. (London: Butterworths, 1988) at464; G.W.K. Ltd. v. Duntop (1926), 42 T.L.R. 376 (K.B.); and Pearson v. Duke reflex, [1931] 2 W.W.R. 442 at 444 (Sask. C.A.). Therefore, depending on the circumstances of a given case, a court may determine that an award of damages for trespass should be more than a nominal sum. As explained by A.I. Ogus in The Law of Damages (London: Butterworths, 1973) at 23:

> Damages for torts actionable per se are said to be "at large", that is to say the Court, taking all the relevant circumstances into account, will reach an intuitive assessment of the loss which it considers the plaintiff has sustained.

[61] Moreover, to recover damages for trespass to goods, a plaintiff is not required to prove actual damage: Leitch& Co. v. Leydon [1931] A.C. 90 at 106 (H.L.). Liability flows from the act of trespass. G.H.L. Fridman, Q.C. in The Law of Torts in Canada. Vol. 1 at 7 (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) explains this principle in this way:

> Trespass in all its forms is actionable per se, i.e., without the need for the plaintiff to prove he has sustained actual damage.... [t]he absence of any requirement that damage must be shown before an action will lie is an important hallmark of trespass as contrasted with other torts.

[62] Next, the trial judge would have needed to consider the extent to which the Bank's trespass and conversion contributed to or exacerbated Dunph's losses (or demise). This would have involved an analysis of what Dunphy's prospects would have been absent the Bank's actions. The reason for this is that where a business has been liquidated as a result of the premature appointment of a receiver, and where causation-in-fact is in issue, the starting point for determining whether causation-in-fact has been proven involves assessing what the business' prospects would have been but for the trespass and conversion. In the context of this case, this means analyzing what would have happened to Dunphy (and S&D and 106) if the Bank had not taken the steps it did.

[63] One can easily see how this assessment will be affected by a debtor's financial status on the critical date. If a debtor is then insolvent or verging on insolvency, its ability to establish that it incurred the damages which it did only because of the absence of reasonable notice will be compromised. The creditor will seek to establish, as the Bank does in this case, that the debtor's losses would have occurred anyway. Why? Different theories might be advanced. The creditor could assert that the reasonable time, had it been given, would have been so short as to be meaningless. Nothing could have been done in the interim to save the debtor or to improve its prospects. It may even be contended that the premature appointment of a receiver will have been beneficial to the debtor. Arguably, this would be the case where the debtor is in an irreversible downward spiral, with losses mounting daily and no end in sight other than insolvency or bankruptcy. In this event, the debtor may be unable to establish the causal link between the wrongful acts and the damages it alleges it suffered. This was the conclusion in Pax Management Ltd. v. C.I.B.C. 1990 CanLII 727 (BC CA), (1990), 1 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (B.C.C.A.) where the court determined that the receivership minimized the guarantors' exposure and ended the debtor's ongoing losses. Therefore, in the end result, the court's award of damages for trespass and conversion may be nominal only.

[64] And if the Bank had the right to call Dunphy's loans, this analysis would also have involved a preliminary assessment as to what would have been a reasonable time. Deciding this question first would have permitted the trial judge to then test the validity of Dunphy's assertion that the Bank's failure to give reasonable time caused, contributed to or exacerbated its tosses. Likewise, it would have permitted the court to assess the Bank's defence that giving additional time would have accomplished nothing. Comparable analyses would be required for each of S&D and 106.

[65] However, if the Bank had no right to call Dunphy's loans when it did, then what would have been a reasonable time would be irrelevant. In these circumstances, Dunphy's task in proving its losses were caused by the wrongful seizure of its assets by the receiver that the Bank appointed would have been much easier. Correspondingly, the risks the Bank faced in defending the damages that Dunphy claimed by seeking to establish Dunphy would have failed anyway and that its losses were not caused in whole or in part by the Bank's conduct would have been significantly increased. None of this critical analysis has been undertaken in the trial judgment in respect of any of the Respondents.

4. RELATIONSHIP OF BANK'S DEFAULTS TO CAUSATION AND DAMAGES

[66] Nor are the causation and damages issues as simple in this case as the Bank claims. Both are complicated by another overlapping factor: the possible impact on these issues of any breaches of contract by the Bank. The trial judgment found that the Bank had defaulted in a number of its contractual obligations to Dunphy. But as already observed, the trial judgment does not address what effect these defaults might have had on Dunphy or its subsidiaries, or on the causation and damages issues. Nor does the trial judgment consider the causation issue, as it relates to any Bank breaches of contract, from the perspective of causation in contract. And I am not in a position to resolve these complex issues at this stage.

5. REASONABLE NOTICE

[67] The Bank stressed that even if reasonable notice had been given, Dunphy's claim for damages must fail because Dunphy cannot establish any causal connection between the Bank's failure to give reasonable notice and the losses which Dunphy incurred. [Throughout this judgment, I have used the terms "reasonable notice" and "reasonable time" interchangeably.] The trial judgment makes no finding as to what would have constituted reasonable time. What it did find is that 20 hours did not. It also found that Dunphy would have required 60 days to obtain financing. In the Bank's view, reasonable time under Canadian case law cannot be more than a few days and certainly nothing approaching the 60 days which Dunphy would have required. Therefore, Dunphy could not establish that had it been given the time, it could have paid off the loan.

[68] Depending on the fact findings made at the new trial, the issue of what constitutes reasonable time may not arise. However, given the importance attached to this issue on appeal, and given the possibility that it may become a relevant issue, I consider it appropriate to address the general proposition which the Bank advanced. I do not agree that as a matter of law, reasonable time cannot be anything more than a few days. In support of its position that this is so, the Bank relied upon the British Columbia Court of Appeal's decision in Whonnock Industries Limited v. National Bank of Canada 1987 CanLII 2644 (BC CA), (1987), 16 B.C.L.R. (2d) 320 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused (1988), 22 B.C.L.R. (2d) xxx. Seaton, J.A. discussed the relatively short time limits found to constitute reasonable time at 331:

> The Canadian law demonstrated in the decisions does not contemplate more than a few days and cannot encompass anything approaching 30 days. In the decisions noted nothing approaching the seven days permitted here [by the trial judge] has been classed as unreasonable. The cases in which the requirement for reasonable notice evolved deal with notices of an hour or less. None of them holds that a notice of more than one day was inadequate and none refers to the need for a notice of more than a few days.

[69] To the extent these comments were intended to summarize cases previously decided, I agree with them. But I do not accept that this decision stands for the proposition that reasonable time cannot ever constitute 30 days or longer. In Lister v. Dunlop, supra, the Supreme Court of Canada confirmed that reasonable notice is a question of fact. Under the law in Canada today, the concept of reasonable notice is not defined by or limited to any minimum or maximum length of time. Nor should it be. To judicially impose what would necessarily be arbitrary time limits in fixing these minimum or maximum periods would be a mistake. This type of compartmentalized approach to the concept of reasonable notice runs counter to the philosophy that what is reasonable cannot be determined in a vacuum. The reasonable notice concept is fact driven. It only makes sense in the context of the individual circumstances of a case. See Barclay Const. Corp. v. Bank of Montrealreflex, (1989), 41 B.C.LR. (2d) 239 at 245 (C.A.).

[70] Of course, in determining whether a creditor has failed to give reasonable notice to its debtor before appointing a receiver, the insolvency of the debtor on the date of demand for repayment of loans will undoubtedly figure prominently in the court's assessment of what constitutes reasonable notice: Kavcar, supra and C.I.B.C. v. Quesnel Machinery Ltd. (1985), 62 C.B.R. (N.S.) 91 (B.C.S.C.). What is reasonable notice may range from one extreme to the other. And there may well be circumstances in which reasonable notice may involve no time at all: Quesnel, supra; 263121 Ontario Ltd. v. Toronto Dominion Bank (September 27, 1984), (Ont. H.C. unreported); and Nobes v. Royal Bank(1981), 49 N.S.R. (2d) 634 at 636 (C.A.). Equally, however, there may be cases in which the circumstances are such that reasonable time is found to be of relatively long duration.

[71] In the leading case of Mister Broadloom Corporation (1968) Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal et al (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 198 at 208, Linden, J. listed the factors to be taken into account in assessing what constitutes reasonable time, including in his list "the potential ability to raise the money required in a short period". These factors which were implicitly approved by the Supreme Court in Lister v. Duniop, supra, would entitle the court to explore the question of how long it would have taken Dunphy (and its subsidiaries) to arrange replacement financing: Kavcar, supra, at 234-235.

[72] In the context of this case, a number of other factors would have been relevant to the Issue of reasonable time. The most important of these is whether Dunphy was in default on the demand date. Other than risk of loss to the lender, I can imagine no factor which would have more significance in assessing what constitutes reasonable time than whether a debtor is in default of any obligations to its creditor at the time of demand. If not, then the absence of default militates in favour of reasonable time being measured in weeks, rather than days.

[73] Prevailing local lending conditions may also affect the assessment of reasonable time. Commercial realities in the financial sector should not be ignored. What is a reasonable time in an urban area may not constitute a reasonable time in a rural area. And what constitutes a reasonable time in a large metropolitan area in which the head offices of many lending institutions are located may not constitute a reasonable time in another metropolitan area not similarly situated in terms of access to senior decision makers.

[74] if the creditor has given the debtor some prior indication that the creditor intends, or may be compelled, to terminate the lending relationship, this will also influence the reasonable time analysis. Oftentimes, a creditor's calling of its loans will have been preceded by discussions with the debtor focussing on the debtor's precarious position and the steps the creditor requires be taken. A creditor's request that a debtor take its business elsewhere prior to calling the debtor's loans will tend to shorten the period of reasonable time from what it might otherwise be absent this factor.

[75] A creditor's past conduct may also enter into the reasonable time equation. If the conduct before demand reflects the creditor's general lack of concern in terms of perception of its risk of loss, or acceptance of a status quo in which the debtor is in breach of its contractual relations, these factors would call into question the validity of the creditor's later claim that risk of loss motivated a restricted notice period. For example, a creditor might make a de facto decision to call a loan two months before it formally implemented its decision. Then, in the absence of any reason for the creditor's not placing the debtor on notice that its loan would be called and in the absence of intervening events, greater scrutiny of the creditor's stated reasons for limiting the period of reasonable time would be justified.

[76] Further, if the creditor, following demand and appointment of a receiver, permits the debtor or one of its principals to carry on in the ordinary course of business, this too will be a relevant factor tending to rebut any concerns the creditor might subsequently express about the debtor's character.

[77] Finally, another pertinent factor impacts on the assessment of reasonable time: whether the creditor's actions vis-a-vis the debtor prior to the date of demand have been characterized by an absence of good faith. I do not propose to enter into the problematic issue of whether a doctrine or duty of good faith exists as a standard of conduct in Canadian contract law since this complex issue was not fully argued on appeal. But whatever the answer to that question, I am of the view that the presence or absence of good faith by the contracting parties preceding the date of demand may properly influence a court's assessment of reasonable time. A creditor's absence of good faith in either its administration or calling of a debtor's loans would ordinarily be a highly relevant factor carrying some considerable weight in the reasonable time debate. Of course, good faith works both ways: a debtor's absence of good faith may be of equal importance in the resolution of this issue.

[78] The reasons for this conclusion are straightforward. The search for reasonable time employs the factual context in which the issue arises. And considering all the circumstances of the case necessarily includes an evaluation of the past conduct of the debtor and the creditor, and an assessment of whether either party's conduct has been characterized by an absence of good faith. In this sense therefore, the bad faith of either contracting party may be viewed as a variation on the theme that past conduct of the parties may be relevant to a reasonable time assessment.

VI. VALUATION

[79] The trial judgment did not explain why it chose Jarand's opinion over Bowie's concerning the amount of the underrealization resulting from the premature liquidation of Dunphy's assets. Bowie's opinion was that the underrealization totalled approximately $106,000, but Jarand concluded it totalled approximately $1,095,000. Each of Bowie's asset values were higher than the amounts Jarand allocated to the same assets except for two classes of assets: (1) Dunphy's investments in and advances to its subsidiaries, S&D and 106; and (2) Dunphy's main asset, its lease portfolio. It is in connection with the valuation of the lease portfolio that the tremendous discrepancy between Bowie's opinion on underrealization and Jarand's becomes evident. Each purportedly used the orderly liquidation by management approach in valuing Dunphy's lease portfolio.

[80] Bowie divided the leases into two categories for this purpose: the non-performing and the performing leases. The trial judgment refers to Bowie's valuation of both categories of leases with apparent approval. While other comments are made which arguably imply that neither valuation was fair to Dunphy, the trial judgment never definitively resolves what portion of Bowie's evidence has been accepted and what portion has been rejected. Nor does it explain why it then apparently rejects Bowie's conclusions in their entirety.

[81] Since there is to be a new trial, I do not propose to review in detail the concerns with each expert's report. However, I do consider it appropriate to make one observation. The trial judgment does not identify the principles to apply when valuing assets based on the orderly liquidation by management approach. I understand that evidence on the meaning of this concept was lacking at trial. Clearly, expert evidence as to what is meant by the orderly liquidation of assets by management is essential if one is to properly assess any damages flowing from the improper appointment of a receiver. For example, does orderly liquidation by management mean that one should value the leases on the basis of the cash flow projected to be generated over their lifetime assuming the leases would continue to their expiry date? Or should one value the leases on the basis of their being discounted to a purchaser within a reasonable time? And if so, what is the reasonable time that would be involved? These are only a few of the questions which should have been asked and answered. Undoubtedly, there are many more.

VII. OMITTED ISSUES

1. EFFECT OF BANK'S DEFAULTS

[82] Much of the trial judgment focusses on what was found to be the Bank's often contradictory, inconsistent and unilateral actions prior to the demand date---actions which the trial judge concludes constituted breaches of contract by the Bank. These actions were unrelated to what the trial judge determined to be the Bank's tortious conduct vis-a-vis each of the Respondents. Therefore, the trial judgment should have considered two further issues relating to the breaches. First, what impact did they have on the Respondents, including the ability of each to meet its monetary obligations to the Bank? The answer to this question is an essential component in assessing the interrelationship of the contract breaches and the issues of causation and damages. For example, would Dunphy have been a "going concern" on the receivership date had it not been for the Bank's defaults? And second, did such breaches in themselves result in any damages to the Respondents? The trial judgment avoids these issues entirely.

2. BANK'S RIGHT TO CALL LOANS

[83] The Bank stressed that Dunphy was in default of its monetary obligations to the Bank on the demand date. When pressed to substantiate this submission based on the trial findings, the Bank asserted that even if this were not so as of the demand date, Dunphy was, in any event, in default of other contractual obligations to the Bank. Dunphy denied any defaults. Alternatively, it argued that the defaults, if they existed, were caused by the Bank's breaches of contract.

[84] The trial judgment makes no definitive finding on whether Dunphy was in default of any of its obligations to the Bank on the demand date. Instead, the trial judgment says the "existence of default, if any" by Dunphy does not relieve the Bank of its obligation to give Dunphy reasonable time to pay the outstanding loans. The trial judgment concludes that the perceived existence of any default did not motivate the calling of Dunphy's loans. The judgment indicates that the Bank's decision to call the loans and appoint a receiver was "an exercise of what was then considered an unassailable Bank prerogative." This may have been so. However, I agree with the Bank that the reason for calling Dunphy's loans need not have been identified at the time of demand, as long as the Bank is able to establish after the fact that at the time of demand, an event of default existed: Kavcar, supra and Pax Management Ltd. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce [1988] B.C.W.L.D. 2239, and supplementary reasons on September 30, 1988, [1988] B.C.W.L.D. 328, overturned on appeal on other grounds, supra.

[85] But I would add two limitations to this general principle. Where the "default" on which the Bank seeks to rely is premised upon the Bank's having determined that it existed before calling the loans, the decision must have been made before the loans were called. For example, the chattel mortgages in this case provide the Bank can call the loans if the Bank, in good faith, determines that Ounphy's ability to pay the loans is impaired. The Bank cannot rely upon this right after the loans have been called if no good faith decision had been made to this effect before calling Dunphy's loans.

[86] Second, where the event of "default" is one which has existed throughout the relationship of the parties and has not been the subject of adverse comment by the lender, a question arises as to whether the lender will be permitted, in all the circumstances, to rely upon the existence of the "default." This will in turn raise other issues which will need to be considered including estoppel, waiver and acquiescence.

[87] To answer the question whether Dunphy was in default of any of its contractual obligations on the demand date, the trial judgment should have first determined what these obligations were. Simply deciding that in the event of conflict as to what constitutes a "default", one security instrument prevails, such as the commitment letter, does not complete the analysis. First, the trial judgment should have determined whether broader rights of default were granted to the Bank under any of the other security documents. And if the answer were yes, the trial judgment would then have needed to evaluate whether these additional rights conflicted with or undermined the default limitations contained in the commitment letter. The trial judgment fails to address these related issues.

A. DUNPHY'S MONETARY OBLIGATIONS

[88] The Bowie Report reflects that on the demand date, Dunphy was $273, 537.40 in default. Bowie defined "default" in the same manner the term was defined in the commitment letter---30 days past due. The parties agreed that this was a proper definition of monetary default. The trial judgment should have determined the extent, if any, to which the sum of approximately $273,000 (or any portion thereof) was 30 days past due on the demand date, given the fact findings made by the trial judge which differed from those Bowie assumed to exist. But this analysis was not undertaken. And it would have required assessing at least four factors.

a. Time for Principal Payment

[89] Bowie assumed that principal payments were due and payable on the 1st day of each month. Contrary to the trial judgment's finding, the commitment letter does specify the monthly principal payments that Dunphy was to make to the Bank. However, the commitment letter is silent as to when the payments were to be made and the trial judgment does not resolve this issue. Were they due on the same date as the interest payments, the 22nd of each month, or on some other date? I shall use one example to emphasize the importance of this issue. Of the approximately $273,000 Bowie concluded was 30 days past due on the demand date, approximately $140,000 represented regular principal payments Dunphy owed for May. But if these principal payments were not owing until the date for payment of interest, the 22nd of the month, then no portion of the $140,000 would have been due until May 22, 1982. And as of the demand date, the amount would not have been 30 days past due.

Digitized by Google

b. Due Date for Payments on Sale of Vehicles

[90] Bowie assumed Dunphy was to pay the Bank immediately on sale of a vehicle. The trial judgment found differently, deciding that payments were not due until the month following sale. When Dunphy was to pay the Bank for vehicles it sold is of critical importance in evaluating whether Dunphy was in default on the demand date. The Bowie Report indicates that of the approximately $273,000 that was thirty days past due on the demand date, approximately $48,000 related to vehicles Dunphy sold during the first six days of June, 1982. Accepting for the moment the trial judgment's finding, the payout amounts Dunphy owed to the Bank for the vehicles would not have been due until sometime in July, 1982 and would not have been 30 days past due until sometime in August.

[91] To take a further example, Exhibit 674 indicates that during the month of May, 1982, payments to the Bank for vehicles sold totalled approximately $157,000. The Bank apparently used monies in Dunphy's account to pay this amount. But if the monies for vehicles sold were not due till the month following sale, then the $157,000 would not have been owing until sometime in June, 1982 and would not have been 30 days past due until sometime in July, 1982. That in turn would mean that had the Bank not withdrawn these payments from Dunphy's account before they were due, the monies would have been available to pay all of the principal payment due for the month of May and a portion of the outstanding interest payments for April and May. Even these adjustments would be inadequate. For the trial judge to have had a complete picture of Dunphy's financial obligations vis-a-vis the Bank, the trial judge would have had to make similar adjustments for the preceding months in which Bowie made contrary assumptions to conform with the trial finding that monies were due not on sale but rather some time during the month following sale.

c. Impact of Bank's Withdrawal of Funds

[92] The trial judgment fails to consider the effect of the Bank's withdrawing monies from Dunphy's account in advance of when the monies were due. These withdrawals raise many unanswered questions. Did the withdrawals adversely affect Dunphy's cash flow? Did they result in Dunphy's incurring additional interest charges since the monies could not then be used to reduce the amount due and owing to the Bank? And if so, how much additional interest was incurred? What other effects did the premature withdrawal of monies have on Dunphy? Again, the trial judgment gives no assistance in answering these questions.

d. Other Considerations

[93] As noted earlier, the interrelationship between any of Dunphy's monetary defaults and any Bank defaults should also have been considered. It was not.

B. DUNPHY'S OTHER OBLIGATIONS

[94] On appeal, the Bank emphasized Dunphy's non-monetary defaults in its obligations to the Bank and referred to three disputed events of default not expressly dealt with in the trial judgment. These related to Dunphy's alleged breaches of its obligations under both Clause 1 (a) of the Debenture and Clause 7 of the standard chattel mortgage Dunphy granted to the Bank on the vehicles the Bank financed. In addition, the Bank asserted that it was entitled to call Dunphy's loans on the basis of the following provision in the commitment letter:

> This credit is subject to periodic review with no material adverse change occurring in the financial position of the Borrower.

The trial judgment does not resolve any of the issues raised by these submissions.

VIII. INTEREST ISSUE

[95] As noted earlier, the interest issue encompasses two distinct questions:

1. Should a contract be interpreted so as to require that any interest payable thereunder be calculated by the effective rate method of interest calculation, as opposed to the nominal rate method, unless the contract otherwise provides?
2. Does s. 4 of the Interest Act apply to any of the subject loan documentation?

The trial judgment concludes that the answer to both questions is yes. I do not agree.

[96] I propose to begin my analysis of these issues by outlining the relevant portions of the Bank's loan documentation (subpart 1, below). Next, I will briefly review a number of general principles, some of which clearly influenced the trial judgment (subpart 2). Then, I shall deal with the interpretation of the loan documentation as it relates to payment of interest and explain why I have concluded that the Bank was entitled to calculate interest at the stated rates in the contracts applying the nominal rate method of interest calculation (subpart 3). Finally, I shall explain why, in my view, s. 4 does not apply in this case (subpart 4).

1. RELEVANT INTEREST TERMS IN LOAN DOCUMENTATION

[97] I will set out the relevant portions of the interest provisions of each debt instrument that Dunphy executed, but will omit the chattel mortgages, which were not the subject of any argument on this point on appeal. These are the interest provisions:

1. In the Commitment Letter:

Digitized by Google

INTEREST RATE:- Interest will be payable on the outstanding principal amount as well after as before maturity at 3/4% per annum over the Bank's prime lending rate from time to time.

CALCULATION AND PAYMENT OF INTEREST:- Interest will be payable on the 22nd day of each month as calculated on each such day on the basis of a calendar year for the actual number of days elapsed.

2. In the Promissory Notes:

... with interest at the rate set out below calculated monthly and payable monthly as well after as before demand of payment.

FLOATING RATE - at the rate per annum equal to the prime lending rate of the Bank of Nova Scotia from time to time PLUS 1% per annum (present effective rate 19 1/4% per annum).

3. In the Debenture:

... and interest at the rate of 24% per annum, calculated and payable monthly, both before and after maturity and default, and interest on overdue interest at the rate aforesaid.

The promissory notes S&D and 106 executed were in the same form as the promissory notes referred to above which Dunphy executed.

2. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

[98] The principles of the mathematics of finance recognize that when interest is payable more frequently than once a year based on a stated annual rate, either one of two methods of interest calculation may be used: the nominal rate method or the effective rate method. Interest calculated by the nominal rate method results in a higher return to the lender than does interest calculated by the effective rate method. If the Bank were restricted to the effective rate method of interest calculation, then Dunphy has been overcharged interest totalling approximately $85,000. No comparable figures are available for S&D or 106.

[99] I agree that from a borrower's perspective, a nominal annual interest rate---for example that interest will be payable at the rate of prime + 3/4% per annum---is a relatively meaningless number. By itself, it tells the borrower almost nothing. To compute the actual interest payable on a loan, a borrower would need to know other relevant information: the frequency of the period of calculation of interest; the frequency of payment of interest; whether interest is to be calculated in advance; and whether the lender has the right to compound interest (and if so, upon what basis). And even if this information were disclosed, it is open to debate whether the average borrower would have the vaguest idea how to use the information to calculate the real costs of a loan.

[100] Interest calculated and paid semi-annually rather than annually will produce a greater yield to the lender; interest calculated and paid quarterly, monthly, weekly and daily, will produce progressively increased yields. The corollary of the fact that the lender's yields will be greater is that the "costs" to the borrower will be correspondingly increased with the increase in the frequency of the calculation and payment dates. This will be the case even though all the payments are made on time and therefore, no compounding of interest is involved. Acceptance that this is so recognizes the principle that money has time value. It does. And because it does, the principles of the mathematics of finance recognize that a payment due on one date does not have the same value as a payment of an equal amount due on a later date. Money due on a certain date is treated as having a dated value. As Prentice explained in Exhibit 629, the sum of a set of dated values, due on different dates, has no meaning. The dated values have to be replaced by equivalent dated values, due on the same date. What this means is that if one were to compare a series of monthly payments of principal and interest to a single annual payment of principal and interest, the only method of interest calculation which would equalize the two is the effective rate method utilizing compounding equal to the monthly payment period.

[101] But while I agree that this may all be so, it does not assist me in resolving the issues before this court. What is in dispute here is not whether, as a matter of policy, a lender should be obligated to make full disclosure to a borrower of the "real" interest costs of a loan. Nor am I concerned with whether these obligations should apply to all customers, sophisticated borrowers or not. Nor am I empowered to consider what full disclosure should entail in order for the information to be readily understandable by the public. Subject only to the limitations in valid legislation, lenders and borrowers may contract for whatever terms for payment of interest they wish. Therefore, my inquiry is a narrow one, directed as it is to the two issues I have identified: on what terms did the parties contract for payment of interest; and does s. 4 of the Interest Act apply in this case? (It is the only statutory provision of any possible application in these circumstances.)

[102] At this stage, I pause to discuss another critical point, the distinction between calculation of interest and compounding of interest. In my view, the source of much of the critical comments and confusion surrounding the manner in which the courts have dealt with interest computation problems results from the failure to distinguish between calculating and compounding of interest. When a debt instrument provides for interest to be both calculated and payable monthly, no interest compounding is involved. Compounding may arise if the debtor fails to make the required interest payments. if entitled to do so, the lender can add the unpaid interest to the principal, that is "compound" the interest. It may be that the date for calculation of interest will also be the same date as the date for compounding of interest. But the two need not be coincidental. And in fact, a given contract may or may not make any provision for compounding of interest. If the contract so provides, interest may be added to the principal and the interest in arrears will itself bear interest at the stated rate. If the contract does not expressly provide for interest to be added to principal in this fashion, then one must look to the terms of the loan documentation and arguably to the custom or usage in the banking industry to determine if compounding of interest will be permitted: National Bank of Greece SA v. Pinios Shipping Co. No. 1 and another, the Maira [1990] 1 All ER 78 (H.L.).

[103] There is however another sense in which "compounding" of interest is said to occur and that is when the dates for payment of interest under a contract are more frequent than the dates for calculating interest thereunder. When this happens, what has come to be known as the reinvestment principle (or deemed reinvestment principle) is said to apply. This principle and the very point that its application is akin to compounding of interest (though not compounding in the mathematical sense in which this word is ordinarily used) were explained by Mary Anne Waldron in "Sections 6 and 7 of the Canada Interest Act: Curiouser and Curiouser" (1984) 62 Can. Bar Rev. 146 at 171:

> The re-investment principle, in its simplest form, is a reflection of the basic fact of financial planning that a dollar payable today is worth more to a lender and costs more to a borrower than a dollar payable at some future date. Anyone who appreciates the value of deferring taxes appreciates that point.
> An example will illustrate. Suppose that ... I borrow $1,000 at 12% per annum, calculated annually.... If I pay $10 every month, by the end of the year I will have paid $120.... I have conferred upon my lender the opportunity of investing the interest paid before the calculation date.... The effect is that he will earn interest on interest, just as though he had been allowed to compound it. If interest is to be paid more frequently than it is to be calculated, then arguably the lender should charge less interest than the stipulated rate divided by the number of payment periods or, just as in more frequent compounding, he will receive a greater yield from the loan, with a consequent greater cost to the borrower.... The principle is known as the re-investment principle. [Emphasis added.]

[104] Frequently the terms "compounding" and "calculating" are used interchangeably. But understanding the distinction between the two terms that I have just outlined as well as the difference between the two uses of the term "compounding" is key to resolving these issues: first, rationalizing what might otherwise appear to be contradictory judicial authorities; and second, knowing when the reinvestment principle will be applied in a loan contract so as to require a creditor to calculate interest by the effective rate method where the contract is silent on this point.

3. INTERPRETATION OF CONTRACTS

[105] The trial judgment found that the subject contracts were capable of being construed so as to permit interest to be calculated using either the effective rate method or the nominal rate method of interest calculation. The trial judgment then determined that contracts requiring the payment of interest should be construed so as to require that interest be calculated by the effective rate method of interest calculation unless the contrary is expressly stated. This meant treating the annual interest rate stated in each contract as the effective annual interest rate. And that is precisely what the trial judgment did. With respect, I do not agree with that approach. Where interest may be calculated using either method and where a contract is silent as to which method of interest calculation should apply, to simply prefer one method of interest calculation, when the principles of the mathematics of finance recognize the possible application of two, cannot be justified. The principles of the mathematics of finance do not stipulate that one method prevails over the other. And in any event, the question is one of contractual interpretation: what did the parties intend when the subject contracts were executed?

[106] Dunphy urged that in interpreting the contracts, courts should not seek to determine the parties' intentions, but rather should interpret the contracts in a manner wholly consistent with mathematical principles of finance. Dunphy asks that 1 disregard what I determine to have been the parties' intentions. I cannot. To do so would be contrary to the basic principles of contract interpretation. Section 2 of the Interest Act recognizes the principle of freedom of contract and the corresponding right of contracting parties to reach any agreement they choose for calculation and payment of interest, subject only to the limitations prescribed therein. The fact that one method of interest calculation happens to be more advantageous to the lender is not, of itself, a reason for rejecting that method if it reflects what the parties have agreed to (unless the agreement is precluded by statute).

[108] The first step in determining the parties' intentions is to look at the contracts themselves. All of the contracts expressly provide that interest is to be both calculated and payable monthly. The commitment letter refers to interest being payable monthly and it requires that interest payable will be "as calculated" on the 22nd of each month. Similarly, the promissory notes provide for interest to be "calculated monthly and payable monthly". And finally, the Debenture refers to interest being "calculated and payable monthly". Therefore, to the extent that the trial judgment proceeds on the assumption that interest was to be calculated annually (and payable monthly) under the subject contracts, it is in error. Nothing in the documentation other than the reference to a stated rate per annum could justify this conclusion. And the mere reference to a stated rate per annum does not mandate a yearly calculation of interest in the face of express contractual terms to the contrary. Nothing could be clearer, given the express terms of the contracts, than the fact that the Bank and Dunphy (and S&D and 106) contractually agreed to both monthly calculation and monthly payment of interest.

[109] Dunphy disagrees. Despite these contractual terms, it insists that the Bank was not entitled to calculate and collect interest monthly. It raises a multi-faceted argument in support of its position. Dunphy starts from the principle that simple interest is payable at the end of a period. But what is the period in this case? That is the core question. Dunphy contends that the period contemplated under all the contracts is a year. In other words, argues Dunphy, interest is payable only at the end of the year and not monthly. The reason according to Dunphy is that when interest is stated at a rate per annum, as it is in all the contracts, interest is payable at the end of a year. Dunphy's argument comes to this: (1) each Respondent was required to make monthly payments of interest even though interest was not payable until the end of a year under the contracts; (2) compounding occurs whenever interest is converted into capital; and (3) therefore, the effect of the Bank's requiring Dunphy to make monthly interest payments was to compound interest monthly when it was not entitled to do so.

[110] Alternatively, Dunphy goes on to assert that the Bank, by requiring interest to be both calculated and paid monthly, contradicted the terms of the contracts. As Dunphy indicated in written argument: "By adding, 'calculated and payable monthly', the Bank converts an annual statement of rate into a contradictory monthly statement of a higher rate --- if 'calculated' means, (as the Bank contends) 'calculated by the nominal rate method'."

[111] And finally, Dunphy argues that, by calculating interest monthly using the nominal rate method, the Bank was calculating interest in advance. This argument also rests on the proposition that the Bank required interest to be payable monthly even though, in Dunphy's view, the contracts provided for interest to be payable yearly. By taking the payments early, the Bank converted interest into capital. In this sense, therefore, Dunphy argues that the Bank "compounded" interest when the contracts made no provision for it to do so. Dunphy submits that in order for the Bank to calculate interest monthly and require payment monthly using the nominal rate method of interest calculation, the Bank's loan documentation would have needed to provide that interest could be compounded monthly, not simply calculated monthly. And it did not.

[112] Numerous flaws exist in Dunphy's reasoning. The first relates to Dunphy's starting point. Dunphy confuses the concept of "payment" of simple interest with the question of when simple interest is "due". Dunphy argues that one of the principles of the mathematics of finance is that simple interest is payable at the end of the period. But the principle as expressed by R.P. Vichas in Handbook of Financial Mathematics. Formulas and Tables. (Inglewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979) at 48 is that "Simple interest... is due at the end of the period." That is, simple interest is to be calculated or computed at the end of the period. The period in question is the calculation period, not the payment period. And in this case, interest is to be calculated monthly, not annually.

[113] Dunphy's entire argument to the contrary rests on this submission: "The statement, 'interest at 24% per annum' means 24% payable at the end of the year." Therefore, according to Dunphy, the Bank was not entitled to calculate and collect interest monthly despite the wording to this effect in the contracts. But Dunphy's contention that 24% per annum means 24% payable at the end of the year is wrong. Although Dunphy uses the word "payable" at the end of the year, implicit in its argument is the fact that when interest is stated at a rate per annum, interest should only be calculated at the end of the year. By advancing this argument, Dunphy attempts to equate a stated rate per annum with at least two of the other material factors essential in calculating how much interest a borrower will pay: the frequency of payment of interest and the frequency of calculation of interest. None of the three are the same. I do not deny that if a contract merely provided for interest to be payable at a stated rate per annum and it made no mention of when interest payments were to be calculated or made, then a court might infer that the parties intended an annual calculation and payment of interest. Much would depend on the other factual circumstances. But in this case, no inferences need be made as to whether the Bank and the Respondents intended that interest be calculated or paid annually as opposed to monthly. All of the contracts made between the Bank and each Respondent are clear and unambiguous on their face: each expressly provides for monthly calculation and payment of interest.

[114] Dunphy's argument is wrong for other reasons. Dunphy asserts that there is an inherent contradiction in providing for a stated rate per annum, monthly calculation and payment of interest and the application of the nominal rate method of interest calculation. Again, I disagree. I do not find this combination to be self-contradictory. How to calculate the amount of interest that a debtor owes requires knowing not only the stated nominal rate, but also the frequency of calculation, the frequency of payment, whether interest is payable in advance and whether the lender can compound unpaid interest (and if so, on what basis). There is nothing inherently contradictory about expressly stating any of these components of the interest equation in a contract. Using this information, a borrower then has the necessary information from which it can compute its borrowing costs. By focussing only on the stated rate per annum, Dunphy treats this rate as if it were intended to cover not one but three elements of the interest equation; that is, not only the rate, but also the frequency of calculation and the frequency of payment. Nothing in the contracts evidences any such intention.

[115] What Dunphy appears to be arguing is this: because the Bank secures a higher real rate of return on the outstanding loans by requiring interest to be both calculated and paid monthly, the Respondents cannot have intended that the interest rate in the contracts would be the nominal rate. instead, the parties must have intended that the stated rate would be the effective rate. But the mere fact that the Bank's real rate of return is enhanced by requiring monthly calculation and payment of interest by the Respondents cannot itself be used as justification for concluding that the parties could not have intended this result. This point was made by Estey, J. in Re Metropolitan Trust v. Morenish Land Developments Ltd. 1981 CanLII 41 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 171 at 180:

> If, for example, the terms of the contract, given their plain meaning, have the effect of establishing a higher real rate of return on the principal sum, the result is not invalidated because of the difference between the nominal and the effective rate. This is of vital concern under the Interest Act but otherwise wholly dependent on the terms of the mortgage.

And if Dunphy were correct that a reference to a rate per annum meant that interest was only to be payable at the end of a year or to be calculated at the end of a year, one could never state a nominal annual interest rate and provide for it to be calculated and payable monthly unless an express stipulation to this effect were included in the contract. No principles of either law or mathematics of finance were cited in support of these propositions.

[116] Finally, and most importantly, Dunphy is in error in equating monthly calculation and payment of interest with compounding of interest. As noted, compounding occurs when a contract permits unpaid interest to be added to principal and itself bear interest at the prescribed rate. But the issue in this case is not whether the Bank could charge interest on unpaid interest. On appeal, there was no suggestion that the Bank in fact compounded interest in this fashion. As I understand, Dunphy made its interest payments when required to do so, either by using monies in its account for this purpose, or by drawing down additional monies on the Bank line of credit. Neither of these payment modes involved compounding of interest by the Bank. Nor would compounding be involved even if the Bank had removed monies from Dunphy's account and applied the monies against outstanding interest obligations. No compounding is involved when interest is applied against an outstanding interest obligation. Compounding occurs whenever unpaid interest is added to principal and thereafter bears interest at the prescribed rate.

[117] And even if the Bank had compounded interest by adding unpaid interest to principal, Dunphy would have faced two other partial hurdles. First, Dunphy contends that the contracts made no provision for interest to be added to principal and compounded in this fashion. However, this is not entirely correct. The Debenture expressly provides for interest to accrue on overdue interest at the rate stipulated therein although admittedly, the Debenture secured payment of only a portion of the outstanding loan. Second, the absence of any express reference in the contractual documentation to the Bank's right to compound unpaid interest would not necessarily preclude the Bank's compounding of interest: National Bank, supra.

[118] The other sense in which "compounding" is said to occur is, as noted earlier, when the dates for payment of interest are more frequent than the interest calculation periods. When interest payments are made more frequently than interest is permitted to be calculated, the effect is akin to the compounding of interest (as I have discussed earlier). In this event, the "reinvestment principle" should be applied in interpreting what the parties to a loan contract intended. The rationale for a court to apply the reinvestment principle in these circumstances was discussed by Waldron in "Sections 6 and 7 of the Canada Interest Act: Curiouser and Curiouser", supra, at 171-172:

> Where payments containing a component of interest are made more frequently than the interest is calculated, the total amount to be paid by the borrower and the amount of his payments required to extinguish the loan in a specified time are determined by using an interest rate per payment period somewhat less than the interest per calculation period divided by the number of payment periods it contains. In other words, the borrower is being given an interest credit on the amount of interest paid before the calculation date, as if that pre-paid interest were itself bearing interest in the hands of the lender.

[119] Therefore, where the payment dates for interest are more frequent than the calculation dates stipulated in an agreement, a court would be entitled to conclude (in the absence of contrary contractual terms) that a stated rate per annum in a contract was intended by the parties to be an effective annual interest rate and not a nominal annual interest rate. In other words, the reinvestment principle would be properly imported into the contract. Otherwise, the lender, by receiving interest payments before interest was to be calculated, that is before it was due, would be securing a greater return than that contracted for in these circumstances. Whether one were to treat this as a case of interest being paid in adyance of the due date or as a case of the lender compounding interest when not entitled to do so given the contractual terms, the end result would be the same. The reinvestment principle will be imported into the contract and any stated rate per annum will, in the absence of express contractual terms to the contrary, be treated as an effective annual interest rate.

[120] But where the calculation and payment dates for interest are one and the same, the reinvestment principle has no application. The fact that this is so is evident from the following classic passage by H. Woodard, Canadian Mortgages (Don Mills, Ont: Collins, 1959) at 193-194:

> For example, an interest rate may be expressed as "calculated semiannually", yet the borrower may contract to pay the interest monthly. The lender, in turn, may be charging the borrower's account with interest each month. There is nothing incorrect in such procedures, provided (and it is an important proviso) that the effective annual yield to the lender is not higher than that derived from the contractual interest rate. When Interest Is payable by the borrower more frequently than once each period of compounding as expressed in the contractual interest rate, all interest mathematics are based on the theory that the lender reinvests the interest received from time to time, at the same rate.... [Emphasis added.]

What is obvious from Woodard's comments is that they only apply where the calculation dates and the dates for payment of interest differ from one another---in other words, where the payment of interest is being made more frequently than interest is to be compounded (that is, calculated) under the debt instrument. It is in these circumstances that the reinvestment principle is operative and should properly be applied in determining what the parties to a contract intended. But these facts do not exist in this case: calculation of interest was to be made monthly and each Respondent was in turn obliged to pay interest monthly. The calculation and payment dates for interest coincided. Put in Woodard's terms, the interest payable by the Respondents was not payable more frequently than once each period of compounding (by this he means calculation) as expressed in the contractual interest rate because the contractual rate here expressly contemplated monthly calculation. Instead, the interest was payable at the same time as the monthly interest calculation.

[121] Apart from those circumstances in which the dates for payment of interest and the dates for calculation of interest differ, should the court apply the reinvestment principle in interpreting the terms of a loan contract? The answer is No. In Morenish, supra, at 178-181, Estey J. canvassed the scope of the reinvestment principle at length and concluded that it was not a rule or principle of law:

> The argument presented to this Court revolved around the application of what is shortly referred to as "the reinvestment principle". It has long been said ... that interest at the rate of ten percent per annum calculated monthly is more than ten percent per annum calculated yearly. This is so only if one assumes the recipient of the monthly payment puts the money to work during the balance of the year and consequently accumulates interest. Such is not the case if x percent per annum is payable annually. If one does not make the assumption that the interest is reinvested during the balance of the year then ten percent per annum is the same whether paid annually or monthly. Hence the issue here really involves the application, as a quasi-rule of law, of the reinvestment principle.
> [T]he text by H. Woodard, Canadian Mortgages (1959), is quoted by ... courts where interest computation has come up for examination, but it is of little or no assistance in resolving the problems here. It must be recognized at once that the learned author's observations on expressions frequently occurring in mortgages are predicated on the proposition that: "....all interest mathematics are based on the theory that the lender reinvests the interest received from time to time, at the same rate [as specified in the mortgage]." Aside from the fact that there is no such rule or principle of law.... the discussion of the reinvestment theory ... is directed to the circumstance arising where interest is payable more frequently than once in each compounding or computation interval. [Emphasis added.]

In this case, no "compounding" of interest is involved (in either sense in which this term may be used). Nor is this a case in which the Bank is collecting interest in advance. Both the dates for calculation of interest and the payment dates are the same. Therefore, the reinvestment principle is inapplicable.

[122] In fact, in Morenish, once the court decided that the parties intended that interest was to be calculated and payable monthly despite the fact the mortgage was silent as to when calculation of interest was to occur, the reinvestment principle had no application. This very point was made by Mary Anne Waldron in a case comment "Lynch and Utter v. Elford Estates Ltd.: Reinvestment Revisited"(1987) 45 The Advocate 893 at 894:

> Taken at a narrow reading, the Morenish case had nothing to say about deemed reinvestment at all. Once the court found the calculation date for the interest to be the same interval as the payments, it could not justify applying any other monthly rate than [the stated annual rate] divided by 12. The equivalent lesser rate would only apply if the two intervals were different. So the court had no need for any interest factors or for any entertaining or enlightening analogy to explain their use to the lay mind.

This is the exact situation in this case. What Waldron recognizes is that where, as here, the calculation dates and payment dates for interest are one and the same, the reinvestment principle does not apply. Therefore, since the Bank and each Respondent contractually agreed that interest was to be payable monthly and calculated monthly, the monthly rate that the Bank was entitled to charge in calculating interest was the stated annual rate divided by 12. No equivalent lesser monthly rate is warranted. In other words, the loan documentation contemplates that the interest rate stipulated therein is a nominal annual interest rate and not an effective annual interest rate.

[123] The only reason one might be driven to a different conclusion relates to the principle of the time value of money. However, I view this principle as simply a variation on the reinvestment principle. Or vice versa. I also recognize that the reinvestment principle is only an analogy. But as the Bank points out it is a useful analogy. What possible relevance would this analogy have in these circumstances? The answer: if one were to calculate what periodic monthly rate would compound to the stated annual rate in each of the contracts (which provide for interest to be calculated and payable monthly), this would involve the assumption that the Bank had reinvested the monthly interest payments it received at the same monthly interest rate prescribed in the contracts. And this is exactly what Dunphy's position is. That is, Dunphy argues that the rate stipulated in the contracts is the effective annual interest rate. Therefore, in its view, the monthly rate which the Bank was entitled to charge the Respondents is not the stated annual rate divided by 12 but rather that amount which when compounded monthly would equal the stated rate.

[124] But the contracts do not expressly provide for the application of the reinvestment principle. And Morenish, supra, confirms that this principle is not a rule of law. And the mere fact that it would be preferable from the borrower's perspective if interest were calculated and payable annually and not monthly does not lead to the conclusion that the parties intended that the interest rate in the subject contracts was to be an effective annual interest rate as opposed to a nominal annual interest rate. The express wording of the contracts points to the contrary conclusion. It provides for the stated interest rate to be calculated and payable monthly. If one were to accept Dunphy's position, the effect would be that the monthly interest would not be the stated rate divided by 12. Instead, it would be some lesser monthly rate than this which when compounded equalled the annual stated rate. When a contract is silent as to which method of interest calculation is contemplated, the contract should be construed so as to require that interest be calculated using the nominal rate method and not the effective rate method, unless, of course, some valid reason exists for importing the reinvestment principle into the contract. No such reason exists in this case.

[125] In addition, to conclude that the Bank and Dunphy intended that the stated annual interest rate in each contract would be the effective annual interest rate would be tantamount to assuming that the stated annual rate was chosen premised on the assumption that Dunphy would default in its monthly interest obligations (assuming, of course, that unpaid interest could be compounded monthly). Nothing in the documentation justifies the conclusion that the parties intended the stated rate to be equivalent to the rate which would be in effect if Dunphy failed to pay interest when due. This construction must be rejected. This does not mean that parties cannot contract for an effective annual interest rate, calculated and payable monthly. But if this is the parties' intention, then the contract must expressly provide that this is so. Otherwise, the plain wording of the contract will be given effect and the lender will be entitled to apply the nominal rate method of interest calculation to the stated rate. Therefore, where monthly calculation and payment of interest is provided for, the lender will be entitled to divide the stated rate by 12 to determine the rate to be used in calculating the monthly interest payments. Estey, J.'s comments in Morenish, supra, at 183-184 apply equally to this case:

> We are concerned here with an interest clause which prescribes a nominal rate of interest, that is to say a rate of interest which is unqualified by any provision requiring the lender to reinvest interest as and when paid during an interest calculation period. Interest received during a year is not, by the terms of the contract, required to be productively employed for the remainder of the year, and hence the rate is a nominal or pure rate of interest to be used in calculating the amount to be paid by the borrower.

[126] Nothing in Prentice's expert evidence leads me to a contrary conclusion. Prentice was in no position to give any evidence concerning the respective parties' intentions at the time of execution of the debt instruments. Nor did Prentice purport to give any opinion on the interpretation of s. 4. What he was asked to do was to make certain assumptions. I am satisfied from reviewing his evidence that he was asked to compare two different contracts: one providing for a single annual payment of interest to another in which interest would be payable monthly. To equalize the two, one would be required to apply the effective rate method utilizing compounding equal to the payment period since this is the only method of interest calculation which provides an annual equivalence for a series of periodic payments. But of course, as already observed, in this case the Bank's loan documentation does not provide for interest to be payable on an annual basis. Therefore, in this context, the concept of equivalence is irrelevant, unless, of course, s. 4 of the Interest Act applies to the contracts.

[127] The fact that it is entirely appropriate to apply the reinvestment principle so as to require that an interest rate in a contract be interpreted as an effective annual interest rate when interest is payable more frequently than interest is permitted to be calculated lies at the core of the reasoning in the many cases Dunphy relies upon in support of its position. These cases are all distinguishable because they represent factual situations in which the court concluded that calculation and payment dates did not coincide and the payment dates were more frequent than the calculation dates. Bunn et al v. Lockreflex, (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 772 (C.A.), Re Miglinn and Castleholm Construction Ltd. (1974), 5 O.R. (2d) 444 (C.A.) and Re Tilson et al. and Dougherty (1975), 8 O.R. (2d) 203 (Div. Ct.) all fall into this category.

[128] This distinction between calculation and payment dates also explains the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Standard Reliance Mortgage Corporation v. Stubbs 1917 CanLII 92 (SCC), (1917) 55 S.C.R. 422. The mortgage in that case provided for monthly principal and interest payments to be made and stated that the rate of interest chargeable on the outstanding principal was "ten per cent per annum as well after as before default". The mortgage contained no reference to the dates on which calculation of interest was to take place. Anglin, J.'s decision is the one most often cited. What he concluded was that when a per annum rate is stated without further qualification, it is implied that interest is to be calculated or computed yearly and not in advance. That situation should be contrasted with the facts of this case in which the contracts expressly provide for interest to be calculated and payable monthly.

[129] Dunphy argues that Estey, J.'s comments on the reinvestment principle in Morenish were obiter only and that this court should prefer the obiter comments of Anglin, J. in Standard Reliance, which comments, Dunphy asserts, recognize the general applicability of the reinvestment principle. But I do not agree that the two cases conflict with one another. In Standard Reliance, the majority of the court held that the contract required interest to be calculated annually even though monthly payments were required. However, in Morenish, the court construed the contract as requiring interest to be calculated monthly with interest payments to be made monthly. Whatever criticism may be levied of the court's conclusion in Morenish that interest was to be calculated monthly even though the contract failed to state a calculation date, the fact remains that Morenish is distinguishable from Standard Reliance. In Standard Reliance, interest payments were required to be made more frequently than the mortgagee was entitled to calculate interest. Therefore, the factual situation fell into the category of the exception postulated by Estey, J. in Morenish, supra, at 181:

> A different situation may well arise where the mortgage specifically provides for a calculation period different from the payment period. We are not here concerned with any such conflict....

[130] Viewed in this way, Morenish and Standard Reliance are reconcilable. The cases explain two different scenarios: when the reinvestment principle is imported into a contract (as it was in Standard Reliance) and when it is not (as in Morenish). What is required to apply the principle when a contract is silent on whether or not it is to be operative is that the contract provide for interest to be payable more frequently than it can be calculated under the contract. These circumstances do not exist in this case. The payment periods and the calculation periods for interest do not differ. Interest is not payable by the Respondents more frequently than the Bank is entitled to calculate the interest. The contracts which the Respondents executed are clear on their face. The period of calculation is stated expressly---it is to be monthly. The payment period is also stated expressly---and this too is to be monthly. The calculation and payment periods coincide. Thus, in these circumstances, the reinvestment principle has no application.

[131] Dunphy raises another argument to bolster its submission that the rate in the contracts should be construed as an effective annual interest rate. It points to the fact that the promissory notes provide that the "effective" annual rate is as stated therein. For this reason, Dunphy argues that the Bank is estopped from denying that the interest rate in each contract is an effective annual interest rate and not a nominal annual interest rate. But the evidence supports the conclusion that the "effective" rate disclosed in each note was intended to be nothing more than the total of the prime rate in effect at the time of execution of each note plus 3/4%. I do not consider this reference to represent anything more than this. The choice of words may be a poor one but this is all that it is.

[132] Therefore, for all these reasons, I have concluded that on a proper interpretation of the subject contracts, the interest rate specified in each contract is a nominal annual interest rate.

4. INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 4 OF THE INTEREST ACT

[133] The next issue to consider is whether s. 4 applies to the subject contracts. Over 100 years ago, in 1880, Parliament first enacted a portion of what is now the Interest Act An Act relating to Interest on moneys secured by Mortgage of Real Estate, S.C. 1880, c. 42. Then in 1897, Parliament passed s. 4 in substantially the same form it appears today: An Act respecting Interest, S.C. 1897, c. 8. The Revised Statutes of Canada, 1908, consolidated and revised the two former Acts. A minor amendment was made in 1917 and since then, Parliament has chosen to make no amendments to the Interest Act.

[134] The trial judgment concludes that s. 4 applies to each debt instrument which the Respondents executed. Section 4 states:

> Except as to mortgages on real estate, whenever any interest is, by the terms of any written or printed contract, whether under seal or not, made payable at a rate or percentage per day, week, month, or at any rate or percentage for any period less than a year, no interest exceeding the rate or percentage of five per cent per annum shall be chargeable, payable or recoverable on any part of the principal money unless the contract contains an express statement of the yearly rate or percentage of interest to which such other rate or percentage is equivalent. [Emphasis added.]

[135] In reaching this conclusion, the trial judgment says that what triggers s. 4 is the monthly payment of interest which each Respondent was required to make to the Bank:

> The Bank contends that s. 4 of the Interest Act has no application in the circumstances presently under consideration because the "contracts" under consideration stipulate for interest at a rate per annum, even though it is payable monthly. It is the monthly payment, however, which makes the Act applicable. That payment is "interest... payable at a rate ... for a period less than a year." The period in this case is one month. The rate is a stated rate per annum. The interest is therefore payable at a rate (stated rate per annum) for a period less than a year (monthly). The section is applicable. All that is required for compliance is that interest be calculated by the effective rate method, so that the stated rate is the same as the effective rate.

[136] The Respondents wholeheartedly endorse the trial judgment submitting that the fact that interest is made payable monthly is enough to engage s. 4. This argument which the Respondents advanced at trial is accepted in its entirety by the trial judgment. The intervener, The Borrower's Advocate Ltd. (Advocate) agrees that s. 4 applies to the subject contracts because interest is made payable monthly. But unlike the Respondents and contrary to the conclusion reached by the trial judgment, the Advocate contends that the interest rate stipulated in each contract is a nominal annual interest rate. And to meet the disclosure standard in s. 4, the Advocate submits that what must be disclosed is the effective annual interest rate and not (as the contracts provide), the nominal annual interest rate. Because the contracts do not disclose the effective annual interest rate, on the Advocate's analysis, s. 4 restricts the interest that the Bank can recover to 5% per annum. The Bank and the other intervener, The Canadian Bankers' Association disagree with both the Respondents and the Advocate. They argue that s. 4 does not apply where (as in this case) the loan documentation provides that interest is payable at a stated rate per annum, regardless of whether the stated rate represents the effective or nominal annual interest rate.

[137] The first question to answer is when s. 4 applies to a written contract for the payment of interest. With respect, I disagree with the trial judgment's decision that what triggers s. 4 is the fact that a contract provides for interest to be payable monthly as opposed to being payable at a rate or percentage per month. The difficulty with this approach is that it ignores the clear and unambiguous wording of the section. By failing to give any meaning to the words "at a rate or percentage" per month, this interpretation effectively reads out these words. And in doing so, it offends one of the basic principles of statutory interpretation:

> Not only must the whole Act be read, but every provision of the Act should, if possible, be given meaning; hence, if there are rival constructions the general principle is that the construction that gives effect to the whole of the statute, or to the provisions under consideration, should be adopted in preference to one that renders part thereof meaningless. [E.A. Driedger, in Construction of Statutes. 2d ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983) at 91]

If the trial judgment were correct and s. 4 were engaged simply because interest was payable monthly, no purpose would be served by referring to interest being made payable at a rate per month or at any rate for a period less than a year. These phrases would be redundant. If Parliament had intended s. 4 to apply whenever interest was to be paid periodically at intervals of less than a year, all it would have needed to stipulate was that s. 4 applied whenever interest was made payable monthly (or for some other periods of less than a year). It did not do so.

[138] Dunphy raises another argument in support of its contention that as long as a contract provided for interest to be payable monthly, that was enough to trigger the application of s. 4. It contends that the words "per month" modified both the words "payable" and the word "rate", or either of them. On this reasoning, s. 4 would be triggered as long as interest were payable "per month". But this interpretation is inconsistent with the plain words of this section and the grammatical context in which these words are used. The grammatical context clearly favours the interpretation that the words "per month" modify the words "rate or percentage" and only these words. Nothing in s. 4 indicates the contrary.

[139] Dunphy advances another argument to buttress its assertion that the contracts in this case triggered the application of s.4. It urges this court to accept the proposition that the reference to "rate" in s. 4 simply means a "standard or way of reckoning" since this is how the word is defined in The Concise Oxford Dictionary. 7th ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987). Maybe that is so. But I fail to see how this advances Dunphy's position. In no way would this eliminate the requirement that the loan documentation include a stated monthly "rate" (or percentage or monthly "standard" or monthly "way of reckoning" for calculation of interest) in order for s. 4 to apply. And none of these is stipulated in any of the contracts. All of the contracts provide for interest to be payable at a stated annual rate. A stated annual rate is not a rate per month even if the interest is, by the terms of the contract, required to be calculated and paid monthly. I do not dispute that one is able to calculate what the monthly interest "rate" is from the information in the contracts. But this is done by taking the stated annual rate and dividing it by 12 (a formula which is not expressed in any of the contracts). It is not done by using any monthly rate prescribed in the contracts (whether expressed as a rate, percentage, standard or some other way of reckoning). This argument too must fail.

[140] Therefore, I have concluded that what would be required to trigger s. 4 is not the fact that interest is required to be paid monthly. Section 4 applies only if interest is made payable at a monthly rate or at any rate for any other period of less than a year. The contracts made between Dunphy and each Respondent do not make interest payable at a rate for a period of less than a year. Because this is so, that is an end of the matter: s. 4 is not engaged. This interpretation of s. 4 has been taken by many different courts. However, I readily concede that oftentimes, no detailed analysis has been undertaken of the impact that monthly interest payments may have on the possible application of s. 4. Nonetheless, those cases which have considered the scope of s. 4 have uniformly rejected the submission that s. 4 should apply where a written contract contains no provision for payment of interest at a rate for a period of less than a year.

[141] In IAC v. Guerrieri reflex, (1982), 139 D.L.R. (3d) 352 at 357, the Ontario Court of Appeal concluded that s. 4 did not apply where specified monthly payments of principal and interest were to be made but no interest rate at all was stated in the loan documentation:

> If by the terms of the contract no interest is made payable at a rate or percentage per day, week, month or for any period of less than one year, s. 4 has no application. There is in this case no specification of a rate or percentage of Interest for any period of less than one year, although there is clearly an interest component built into the monthly instalments called for by the agreements.

[142] Dunphy regards this case as the root cause of subsequent judicial misinterpretations of s. 4. It asserts that this case should be distinguished on the basis that, unlike the loan documentation the Respondents executed, no interest rate at all was prescribed in the contract under review. I agree. There is a difference. But the fact that the contract in IAC mentioned no interest rate at all while the contracts here do (although only an annual rate) is not a valid basis for distinguishing IAC. Interest was payable monthly in IAC even though the principal and interest payments were blended. If the Act had the scope Dunphy contends; if s. 4 were to apply whenever a contract provided for monthly payments of interest, then s. 4 should apply regardless of whether the principal and interest components were blended or segregated. And yet the Ontario Court of Appeal found otherwise. The rationale underlying that court's decision---that s. 4 does not apply if the contract does not make interest payable at a rate or percentage for any period of less than a year---applies equally in this case. [In addition, for other cases reaching the same conclusion, see Re Keating [1937] O.W.N. 214 at 216 (C.A.); Royal Bank of Canada v. Reed and Wakefield Construction Ltd. 1982 CanLII 696 (BC SC), [1983] 2 W.W.R. 419 at 421 (B.C.S.C.); Norwood Construction Ltd. v. Post 83 Co-operative Housing Assn. (1988), 30 C.L.R. 231 at 241 (B.C.C.A.); and Niagara Air Bus Inc. v. Camerman reflex, (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 717 at 729 (H.C.), reversed on other grounds reflex, (1991), 3 O.R. (3d) 108 (C.A.).]

[143] Most recently, s. 4, and the trial judgment in this case, were analyzed by Craig, J. in Upper Yonge Ltd. et al v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 98 (H.C.). [The reasoning in Upper Yonge has now been approved by the Ontario Court of Appeal in McHugh v. Forbes reflex, (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 374.] After confirming that the IAC case was binding on him, Craig, J. then proceeded to explain why, in any event, s. 4 did not apply where interest was payable monthly based on a prescribed annual rate at 112:

> The point is not whether interest is payable monthly, but rather whether interest is payable at a monthly rate ("or at any rate... for any period less than a year"). In the circumstances of the instant case there is no basis upon which to order repayment of interest pursuant to s. 5.

[144] Dunphy argues that the Ontario and British Columbia cases are not good law and advances two reasons for rejecting them. First, it contends the decisions do not treat interest payable monthly as interest payable at a "rate per month". This is an accurate assessment of these decisions. But I see no flaw in this conclusion or in the reasoning underlying it. The mere fact that interest is payable monthly does not of itself attract s. 4 for the reasons canvassed above. Second, Dunphy argues that those decisions fail to demonstrate any understanding of the basics of the principles of the mathematics of finance. This criticism appears to be directed primarily at the manner in which the courts have interpreted the requirement that a lender disclose an equivalent annual rate if and when s. 4 does apply to a contract. Dunphy contends that "equivalent" in the context of s. 4 can only mean "effective annual interest rate". And, in Dunphy's view, those cases holding otherwise reflect a lack of understanding of the fundamental principles of the mathematics of finance.

Digitized by Google

[145] However, what one must keep in mind is that the issue of what interest rate should be disclosed does not even arise if s. 4 does not apply. Deciding whether the necessary conditions exist to trigger the application of s. 4 has nothing to do with the principles of the mathematics of finance. The court's mandate is to interpret the words "payable at a rate or percentage for any period less than a year". This task involves the application of principles of statutory interpretation. Simply because interest payments are to be calculated and paid more frequently than yearly and this results in higher yields to the lender and greater costs to the borrower does not engage the section. This may appear to be an unduly simplistic approach which narrows significantly the categories of cases to which s. 4 applies. I do not deny that this is so. But it is an approach dictated in my opinion by the express and unambiguous terms of the Act. Given the conclusions I have reached, it is unnecessary to determine in what circumstances the disclosure standard prescribed by s. 4 mandates disclosure of the effective annual interest rate as opposed to the nominal annual interest rate. And I therefore decline to do so.

IX. CONCLUSION

[146] For the reasons explored above, I have determined that a new trial must be ordered. I recognize the great cost and difficulties that this may pose for all parties but I see no other practical solution. In all the circumstances of this case, I decline to make any award of costs. Costs of the appeal shall be in the cause. Costs of the first trial are reserved to the justice presiding at the new trial.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE STRATTON

[147] I concur with Madam Justice Fraser's Reasons except insofar as they address the question of what would constitute reasonable notice of intention to call a loan in the absence of the loan agreement covering that point, it is unnecessary to consider that issue at this time as, in my view, it should await a more appropriate record than the one now before us.

HYMIE SIDNEY NEGIN and ALEXANDER BENJAMIN NEGIN
Defendants (Appellants) (Appellant) for the respondent
Heard: May 1 and 2, 1996

McKINLAY J.A.:

These two appeals from summary judgments were heard together. Each involves an action on the covenant in a mortgage, and on a guarantee included in the mortgage document. In the first appeal, the appellant, Hymie Sidney Negin, is the mortgagor and his brother, Alexander Benjamin Negin, is guarantor. In the second appeal, brought by Alexander Benjamin Negin, their roles are reversed.

The three issues common to both appeals are first, that the motions judge erred in not dismissing the bank's motion for summary judgment when the respondent bank had not served an affidavit of documents prior to bringing its motion; second, that since the bank changed the locks on the properties and gave notice of the tenants to attorn rents, both within ten days after giving notice under s. 244(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended, the appellants were deprived of opportunities to deal with the property and suffered loss as a result of the bank's actions; and third, that its continuation to collect rents following giving notice of sale under its power of sale constituted a "commencing" or "taking" of "further proceedings" contrary to s. 42(1) of the Mortgages Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.40. All of these issues, the appellants argue, could affect their liability as mortgagors and as guarantors, and are issues which could only be resolved at trial.

On the first issue, the motions judge stated that the only reason for the respondents' wishing to have the affidavit of documents was to buttress or substantiate their affidavits on the motion for summary judgment, and that this is not appropriate on a summary judgment motion. I do not agree with that, as a general proposition. Important evidence is often only in the possession of the party moving for summary judgment. If the responding party were denied the opportunity of reviewing relevant documents in the possession of an opposing party before examination on affidavits to be used on a motion for summary judgment, he would be deprived of information to which he is entitled under the Rules of Civil Procedure. In addition, it would mean that on a motion for summary judgment the responding party is not entitled to know the full evidence on which the opposing party bases its case. In this case, however, all relevant documents were before the court.

On the second issue, the facts are that the bank gave notice to the mortgagors, purportedly pursuant to s. 244(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, stating its intention to enforce its security, and stating also that the bank was not entitled to enforce the security until after the expiry of ten days following sending of the notice. Unfortunately, the bank changed the locks on the properties involved four days prior to the expiry of the ten day notice period. It also gave notice to tenants to attorn rents one day prior to the expiry of the notice period. However, it is not clear from the evidence on the motion for summary judgment that a notice under s. 244(1) was actually required because the evidence does not show either that the mortgagors were insolvent, or that the property involved constituted "all or substantially all" of the property of the mortgagor other than inventory or accounts receivable. It seems that the bank served the notice out of an abundance of caution.

On the facts of this case, the appellants were not prevented from dealing with the property until four days prior to the end of the notice period. Only acts of the bank during that four day period could possibly have supported a defence to its action on the mortgages. However, the real property was subsequently sold by the bank under its power of sale at a fair price, resulting in no prejudice to the appellants. Given this lack of prejudice, and given the lack of evidence fitting these transactions within s. 244(1), I do not consider the second issue raised by the appellants as a genuine one for trial.

The third issue need only be stated to be rejected. Continuing to collect rents by a mortgagee in possession cannot constitute either "commencing" or "taking" of "further proceedings".

The appellants, each as guarantor of the mortgage debt of the other, take the position that the above acts of the bank have the effect of releasing them from their guarantees. On the facts, none of these acts of the bank in any way prejudiced the appellants either as mortgagee or as guarantor, and none released them as guarantor. Thus, none raise a genuine issue for trial.

Guarantee by Hymie Sidney Negin of mortgage of his brother

Hymie Sidney Negin takes the position that he is not liable on his guarantee of the mortgage given by his brother because the bank renewed that mortgage without his consent. It was renewed for a period of six months beyond its original maturity date with the rate of interest reduced from 13.5% to 5.75%.

The relevant portion of the guarantee provisions in the mortgage reads:

> AND it is hereby expressly declared that although as between the Guarantor and the Mortgagor, the Guarantor is only surety for the payment by the Mortgagor of the moneys hereby > guaranteed, yet as between the Guarantor and the Mortgagee the Guarantor shall be considered as primarily liable therefor and that no release or releases of any portion or portions of the mortgaged premises, and no indulgence shown by the Mortgagee in respect of any default by the Mortgagor or any successor which may arise under this mortgage, and that no extension or extensions granted by the Mortgagee to the Mortgagor or any successor for payment of the mortgage moneys hereby secured or for the doing, observing or performing of any covenant, agreement, matter or thing herein contained, to be done, observed or performed by the Mortgagor or any successor nor any variation in or departure from the provisions of this mortgage nor any other dealings between the Mortgagor or any successor and Mortgagee nor any release of the Mortgagor or any other thing whatsoever whereby the Guarantor as surety only would or might have been released shall in any way modify, alter, vary or in any way prejudice the Mortgagee or affect the liability of the Guarantor in any way under this covenant, which [liability] shall continue and be binding on the Guarantor, and as well after as before maturity of this mortgage, until the said mortgage moneys are fully paid and satisfied. And it is hereby further expressly declared that the Mortgagee shall not be bound to exhaust its recourse against the Mortgagor or the mortgaged premises before being entitled to payment from the Guarantor of the amount hereby guaranteed by the Guarantor. [Emphasis added.]

This case was reserved to await the reasons of the Supreme Court of Canada in Manulife Bank of Canada v. Conlin (released October 31, 1996). As a result of the decision in that case, the guarantor was released. The reasons of the majority raise one major issue which must be considered in deciding this appeal, that is, whether a guarantor who, by the terms of the guarantee is liable as a principal debtor, has waived his rights as principal debtor to "have notice of material changes and consent to them."

Although the words in this guarantee are different from those in the guarantee in the Manulife case, there can be no doubt that the guarantee makes the guarantor liable as principal debtor. When the mortgage was renewed, the renewal form provided by the bank for execution was not signed by Hymie Negin, although there was a place for the signature of the guarantor.

In the Manulife case, Cory J., referring to an agreement to renew the mortgage, which was not signed by the guarantor, says at p. 13 of his reasons: "It must be assumed that all these standard form agreements prepared by the bank as a lending institution were meant to mesh with and complement each other." However, he also states at p. 11: "Of course, a guarantor who, by virtue of a principal debtor clause, has a right to notice of material changes, may, by the terms of the contract, waive these rights."

The mortgage in this case had gone into default, and the renewal granted was for six months only, at a substantially reduced rate of interest. The other mortgage was also renewed, but the guarantor of that mortgage signed an extension agreement. There is no evidence that either the bank or the guarantor considered the signature of the guarantor on the renewal agreement to be necessary in this case. Had the guarantor's signature been obtained, it might have provided additional comfort to the bank. However, that does not mean that it was required and, in my view, it was not. I do not take Cory J.'s reasons as stating that one can use the line in an extension or renewal agreement marked for execution by a guarantor to assist in the interpretion of another document. In any event, I am of the view that, in this case, the guarantee provisions of the mortgage are clear and unambiguous.

In the Manulife case, terms involving extension of time to pay and amendment of other terms of the mortgage were dealt with in a separate clause in the mortgage, not in the guarantee provisions. In that sense, the Manulife case was an unusual one.

This case is much different. There are numerous words in the guarantee in this case which indicate agreement of the guarantor, whether as guarantor of as primary debtor, to be bound regardless of changes in the terms of the mortgage and regardless of whether or not the bank insists on immediate payment by the mortgagor on maturity of the mortgage. Those words have been emphasized in the portion of the guarantee quoted above. Although an argument may be made for the application of any one of the phrases emphasized, the most compelling words, in my view, are those which state that the liability of the guarantor "shall continue and be binding on the guarantor, and as well after as before default and after as before maturity of this mortgage, until the said mortgage moneys are fully paid and satisfied." There is nothing in the renewal document that indicates that there is an intended extinction of the old mortgage agreement and the execution of a new one. There is simply a change in terms, albeit important ones, to which the guarantor, whether as guarantor or as principal debtor has agreed. If it could be said in this case that the amended terms were not agreed to (which I do not consider to be so), then there is nothing to extinguish the liability of the guarantor in any event. He has covenanted to pay the full amount owing on the mortgage as well after as before default, and those moneys have not been paid.

This was not an accommodation guarantee. Each brother guaranteed a mortgage of the other. Each did so knowing that he would be liable on the mortgage of the other until all amounts owing were paid. The only effect that I can see of treating the guarantor as primary debtor in this case is that he will have the benefit of the reduced interest rate from the date of the renewal agreement rather than having to pay the higher original rate until time of payment of the full amount due under the mortgage.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Powers of court - Sec. 248
248. (1) Where the court, on the application of the Superintendent, the insolvent person, the trustee (in the case of a bankrupt), a receiver or a creditor, is satisfied that the secured creditor, the receiver or the insolvent person is failing or has failed to carry out any duty imposed by sections 244 to 247, the court may make an order, on such terms as it considers proper,

(a) directing the secured creditor, receiver or insolvent person, as the case may be, to carry out that duty, or

(b) restraining the secured creditor or receiver, as the case may be, from realizing or otherwise dealing with the property of the insolvent person or bankrupt until that duty has been carried out, or both.

Idem - Sec. 248(2)
(2) On the application of the Superintendent, the insolvent person, the trustee (in the case of a bankrupt) or a creditor, made within six months after the statement of accounts was provided to the Superintendent pursuant to subsection 246(3), the court may order the receiver to submit the statement of accounts to the court for review, and the court may adjust, in such manner and to such extent as it considers proper, the fees and charges of the receiver as set out in the statement of accounts.
1992, c. 27, s. 89.

Receiver may apply to court for directions - Sec. 249
249. A receiver may apply to the court for directions in relation to any provision of this Part, and the court shall give, in writing, such directions, if any, as it considers proper in the circumstances.
1992, c. 27, s. 89.

Right to apply to court - Sec. 250
250. (1) An application may be made under section 248 or 249 notwithstanding any order of a court as defined in subsection 243(1).

Where inconsistency - Sec. 250(2)
(2) Where there is any inconsistency between an order made under section 248, or a direction given under section 249, and

(a) the security agreement or court order under which the receiver acts or was appointed, or

(b) any other order of the court that appointed the receiver, the order made under section 248 or the direction given under section 249, as the case may be, prevails to the extent of the inconsistency.

1992, c. 27, s. 89.

Protection of receivers - Sec. 251
251. No action lies against a receiver for loss or damage arising from the sending or providing by the receiver of a notice pursuant to section 245 or a statement or report pursuant to section 246, if done in good faith in compliance or intended compliance with those sections.

Receiverships

Collections Manual Updates

Overview

Receivership is the result of action taken by a secured creditor against specific assets of an insolvent debtor.

Legislation

This section identifies legislation related to receiverships:

- Bank Act (BA)
- Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA)
- Canada Pension Plan (CPP)
- Canadian Business Corporations Act (CBCA)
- Excise Tax Act (ETA), section 266
- Income Tax Act (ITA), subsection 227(4)
- Employment Insurance Act (EIA)
- Various provincial company and security acts

The Purpose of Receivership

The purpose of a receivership is for a secured creditor to access and sell those assets over which they hold a security agreement, to satisfy a debt.

Often the insolvent person can continue to operate, though they must do so without those assets which are subject to the security agreement.

Receiverships - Insolvent Persons

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (BIA) and the applicable provincial legislations regulate Receiverships and the enforcement of security against insolvent persons.

A person in receivership must be insolvent, defined by the BIA as:

"a person who is not bankrupt and who resides, carries on business or has property in Canada, whose liabilities to creditors provable as claims under this Act amount to one thousand dollars, and

a) who is for any reason unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due,

b) who has ceased paying his obligations in the ordinary course of business as they generally become due, or

c) the aggregate of whose property is not, at fair valuation, sufficient or, if disposed of at a fairly conducted sale under legal process, would not be sufficient to enable payment of all his obligations, due and accruing due."

Stages of Receivership

Receiverships can be broken down into two different stages:

- soft (or pre) receivership
    - the secured creditor has someone in place to "watch over" the business to protect its security, the business continues to operate as usual, under the "threat" of receivership

Note: This is not a requirement, but may be used as incentive for the debtor to avoid the receivership.

- formal receivership
    - the secured creditor, or the Court, has now appointed a receiver to take possession of the secured assets

What is a Receiver

A receiver is any person or corporation that is appointed by a Court or a creditor to:

- take control of property

Digitized by Google

- supervise liquidation proceedings
- remit the proceeds according to priorities established by common or statutory law

Under the Excise Tax Act (ETA) and the ITA, the term "receiver" includes a receiver-manager, receiver, monitor, liquidator, agent, committee, guardian or curator depending on the situation. Currently, it is not necessary for a receiver to be a licensed trustee.

Appointment of Receivers

There are two types of appointments:

- private appointment
- court appointment

The BIA applies to both types.

Related Topics:

- Privately Appointed Receiver
- Court Appointed Receiver

Privately Appointed Receiver

A secured creditor may appoint a receiver if:

- default in payment has occurred and a demand for payment/notice of default has been sent
- a notice of intention to enforce security has been sent to the debtor at least ten (10) days prior, and
- there is a perfected security agreement with a clause that allows for the appointment of a receiver

This receiver reports to, is responsible to and is compensated by the secured creditor.

Court Appointed Receiver

The court may appoint a receiver if:

- the privately appointed receiver is unable to take control of assets,
- there are competing claims against the same assets,
- the security agreement does not have a clause allowing the appointment of a receiver, or
- it is requested by a secured creditor

Any interested party may petition the court to appoint a receiver as long as they can prove they have a claim against the debtor.

The appointment of a receiver is made in accordance with:

Digitized by Google

- section 241(3)(b) of the Canada Business Corporations Act (CBCA)
- various Provincial Securities or Corporations Acts

Receivership Options

Once the receiver has been appointed they have three options for how to handle the business:

1. Liquidation
   - the receiver will shut down the business and dispose of the assets
2. Continued Operation
   - the receiver will temporarily take over day-to-day operations of the business with the intention of resolving the secured liabilities and allowing the business to continue to operate
3. Short-term operation then liquidation
   - the receiver takes over the day-to-day operations of the business to improve the sale value of the business and/or it's assets then proceeds with liquidation

Powers of Receivers

In a Court appointed receivership:

- the Court Order sets out the receiver's duties and authorities
- the Court may direct the disposition of surplus
- the receiver reports the status of realization to the Court and requests an Order permitting distribution of the proceeds
- the receiver is discharged when the terms of the Court Order are fulfilled
- the receiver has a fiduciary responsibility to all interested parties, including the debtor.

The privately appointed receiver obtains its powers and authority from the letter of appointment. The security instrument may empower the receiver to take actions in addition to those provided in common law or statute.

In both cases the receiver may have the authority to:

- take possession of the charged property
- manage, operate and conduct the business of the tax debtor
- borrow money in order to preserve charged property to carry on the business
- sell, lease, or dispose of the charged property either as a whole or in part by way of public auction, tender or private sale
- settle or compromise any indebtedness

Digitized by Google

- execute deeds and other instruments as an irrevocable attorney of the debtor for the carrying on of the business or for any sale
- preserve charged property including the right to make payments to prior charges or liens

Roles and Responsibilities of Receivers

Receivers have a duty to act honestly and in good faith and to deal with the property of the insolvent person in a commercially reasonable manner. However, they have no duty to operate the business, maintain its reputation or complete its contracts.

The roles and responsibilities of receivers both court and privately appointed, include:

- advising the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (OSB), and all known creditors of their appointment, no later than 10 days after becoming a receiver

Note: In the case of a bankrupt, the notice is only sent to the OSB and the trustee.

- preparing a prescribed statement of affairs containing the debtor's financial information for the OSB, the debtor or trustee and any creditor requesting a copy, including:
    - name and amount due to each creditor
    - listing of assets with book values
    - plan of action regarding assets under the receiver's control
        - preparing interim reports once every six months, for the OSB, the insolvent debtor or trustee and any creditor requesting a copy, including:
    - details of the property to be realized
    - interim statement of receipts and disbursements
    - any other information on the operation of the receivership
- preparing a Final Report and a Statement of Account, for the OSB, the insolvent debtor and any creditor requesting a copy, including:
    - details of how the proceeds were distributed
    - details of the disposition of the property not accounted for in the final statement of receipts and disbursements
    - final statement of receipts and disbursements
    - other information on the operation of the receivership
- sending all information and correspondence required under the BIA , the ETA and the ITA, to the attention of Revenue Collections of the tax services office in the locality of the tax debtor, including:
    - copy of the notice of receivership

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

- returns, remittances and payments

Note: The Receiver is responsible for any debits incurred while they were the receiver – this would be the "in receivership" accounts as well as the "post" receivership accounts.

- obtain a clearance certificate from the CRA in certain situations
- where surplus exists, the private receiver must obtain a clearance certificate from the CRA before distributing the property of the insolvent person

Receivers may be personally liable for the payment of the Departmental debt if they proceeded with the distribution of property without obtaining a clearance certificate.

Providing Tax Information to Receivers

The CRA may disclose tax information to receivers if:

- the information is reasonably regarded as necessary for the purposes of administration and/or enforcement of the ITA or the ETA
- the taxpayer in receivership to whom the tax information relates consents to the disclosure

For further details, refer to Directive RCD 95-03, Disclosure of Tax Information to Trustee and Receivers and Directive RCD-00-14, Disclosure of Confidential Information to Trustees-in-Bankruptcy and Receivers.

Types of Creditors

There are two types of creditors.

1. Secured creditors:
   - have preference over other creditors for amounts covered by their security
   - act only on security they hold
   - do not attempt to resolve the insolvency of the debtor
2. Unsecured Creditors, who fall into two sub-types:
   - Preferred:
     - have legal advantage over ordinary unsecured creditors by operation of law
     - rank behind secured creditors and ahead of ordinary unsecured creditors in legal distribution of funds
   - For example:
     - builder's liens
     - municipal taxes
     - provincial workers compensation.

Digitized by Google

- Ordinary:
  - hold no security for the debt
  - rank last in the distribution of funds

The status of Crown claims vary depending on the work that has been completed on the account before the insolvency event occurs.

Notice of Intention to Enforce Security

Secured creditors planning to enforce their security must send a notice of their intention 10 days prior to taking action. The following are exceptions to this rule:

- the debtor consents to early enforcement
- a receiver is already appointed in respect of the insolvent person
- the debtor is bankrupt
- the secured creditor's right to realize upon its security is protected because the debtor filed a proposal which did not include that secured creditor or the secured creditor is in a class of secured creditors which voted to refuse a proposal
- the Court is satisfied that a secured creditor is likely to be materially prejudiced by the continuance of the 10 days notice or that it is equitable on other grounds that the 10 days notice be lifted

Deemed Trust

All amounts held in trust under the ITA Subsection 227(4) or ETA Subsection 222 do not form part of the estate in a receivership and remain the property of the Crown.

For further details, refer to the Deemed Trust chapter within the Collections Manual, Directive RCD 98-4, Bill C-28 Impacts on Accounts Receivable Program, RCD 98-6, Lien and Charge Registration, RCD-00-07, Regulation 2201 - Prescribed Security Interest and Communication TSDMB-2008-099, Reduction to the Prescribed Security Interest ("PSI") when making a deemed trust claim.

Related Topic:

- Exception to Deemed Trust Priority

Exception to Deemed Trust Priority

The only exceptions that supersede the deemed trust provisions are:

- a prescribed security interest (mortgage)
- the right of an unpaid supplier of goods to repossess those goods as provided under sections 81.1 and 81.2 of the BIA

Digitized by Google

Unpaid Suppliers Rights

Section 81.1 of the BIA gives unpaid suppliers a statutory right of repossession of goods in the case the buyer becomes bankrupt or is in receivership. This statutory right ranks above every other claim or right, except where a buyer bought the goods later for value and in good faith, without knowing the supplier had demanded repossession of the goods.

The following conditions have to be fulfilled before a supplier repossesses the goods:

- supplier has to give the tax debtor, trustee/administrator or receiver a written demand for repossession within 30 days after the delivery of the goods
- goods have been sold for use in relation to the buyer's business
- goods cannot have been resold at arm's-length
- goods have to be identifiable as those delivered by the supplier and not fully paid
- goods have to be in the same state as they were on delivery

If these conditions are met, the suppliers have 10 days to repossess the goods after the buyer or receiver presents them with a written notice admitting that right. This ten-day period may be extended by mutual agreement.

For further details, refer to Directive, RCD 00-22, The Rights of Unpaid Suppliers in a Bankruptcy or an Insolvency.

Policy

This section provides policies related to Receiverships:

- Legal Status of Receivers
- Stay of Proceedings
- Multiple Receivers
- Use of Requirements to Pay in a Receivership
- Distribution in a Receivership
- Clearance Certificates
- Liability of the Directors
- Receiver's Reasonable Fees and Costs

Legal Status of Receivers

Though receivers take action for the benefit of secured creditors, there are certain actions that must be taken on behalf of the debtor such as:

- filing returns during the time of appointment and remitting appropriate amounts

Digitized by Google

- receiving any information that is necessary to determine the debtor's liabilities and obligations

The receiver and the tax debtor are jointly and severally liable for past debts and ongoing obligations, only to the extent of the property under the receiver's control.

Note: The receiver's liability is limited to the extent of property remaining after the priority claims have been paid.

Stay of Proceedings

Unlike other Proceedings under the BIA, there is no automatic Stay of Proceedings in a Receivership.

A Stay of Proceedings is only applicable if specified in a court order that appoints the receiver.

The Stay is applicable all unsecured creditors, including CRA. Secured creditors are entitled to liquidate only the assets they hold as security.

A creditor, including the CRA, affected by a Stay imposed under a Receivership may apply to the court to lift the Stay.

There is no Stay of Proceedings when there is a privately appointed receiver.

For further details, refer to Seeking Leave of the Court.

Multiple Receivers

It is possible that there will be multiple receivers or a combination of receiver(s) and a trustee in bankruptcy.

When multiple receivers have been appointed, it is important to determine the mandate of each receiver. The receiver who is responsible for a majority of assets will use the primary account (RT0001/RP0001).

The other receivers may be required to file returns for any taxable activity/income that is a result of their actions. If this should occur, there must be a divisional account opened for each additional receiver.

Use of Enhanced Requirements to Pay in a Receivership

If the Court Order, appointing the receiver, includes a Stay of Proceedings that appears to be binding on the Crown, do not issue an ERTP. Instead, refer the matter to the Department of Justice to have the Order varied.

As there is no Stay in a privately appointed receivership the CRA is able to issue the ERTP. The use of the ERTP in Receivership is flexible and should be decided on a case-by-case basis.

Where it is unclear whether the receiver is entitled to a specific account receivable, seek the advice of the Department of Justice.

In a Receivership, accounts receivable fall into three categories:

- funds payable to the CRA
- funds shared with the Receiver

Digitized by Google

- funds payable to the Receiver

Related Topics:

- Funds Payable to the CRA
- Funds Shared with the Receiver
- Funds Payable to the Receiver

Funds Payable to the CRA

If the accounts receivable were generated prior to the appointment of the receiver the CRA should enforce the Enhanced Requirement to Pay, regardless of whether it was issued before or after the appointment of a receiver. This may include situations where:

- the product was manufactured prior to the Receivership but;
- the product was delivered by the receiver, or
- the product was sold by the receiver

Funds Shared with the Receiver

The CRA may need to share ERTP funds with the receiver if the accounts receivable were partly generated by the receiver. For example:

- the existing inventory was partially manufactured or converted into a finished product and the receiver finished the work in process and delivered the goods
- the existing inventory was only partially manufactured or converted into a finished product and the receiver finished the work in process and generated the subsequent sale which resulted in the account receivable

In order to prove their entitlement to funds, the Receiver will have to provide the Collections Officer with a detailed accounting which shows that they did generate the accounts receivable.

Funds Payable to the Receiver

Accounts Receivable may be payable to the receiver if:

- the receiver purchased new inventory, manufactured or converted it into a finished product, and generated the subsequent sale which resulted in the account receivable

Again, in order to prove their entitlement to funds, the Receiver will have to provide the Collections Officer with a detailed accounting which shows that they did generate the accounts receivable.

In situations where the accounts receivable were completely generated by the receiver, the Enhanced Requirement to Pay stays in place in order to maintain the Crown's priority over other receivables, but the funds attributed to that specific receivable will be paid to the receiver.

Receivers Reasonable Fees and Costs

A court appointed receiver may recover reasonable fees and costs in situations where:

- the CRA benefits directly from the receiver's expertise in maximizing recovery of amounts due under Enhanced Requirements to Pay or deemed trusts
- there is recovery of amounts that the CRA might not have otherwise been successful in obtaining

For further details, refer to Directive RCD-95-08, Reasonable Fees and Costs.

- Indicators of Reasonable Fees and Costs
- Indicators of Unreasonable fees and Costs
- Requirements of Receiver's Invoice for Fees and Costs

Indicators of Reasonable Fees and Costs

Indicators of the reasonableness of such fees and costs are:

- the amount of time spent on the file
- the amount realized
- difficulties encountered in the realization
- urgency of the matters with which the practitioner has had to deal
- the necessary expenses incurred to fulfill the duties

Indicators of Unreasonable Fees and Costs

Fees that will not be permitted are:

- services that are illegal
- services or actions that had no positive results
- actions contrary to instructions
- regular office expenses

Requirements of Receiver's Invoice for Fees and Costs

In order to justify costs, the practitioner must keep detailed records of:

- work performed and actual time spent
- details of success vs. difficulties
- a complete accounting of amounts realized for the CRA

Digitized by Google

- an accounting of disbursements made to obtain the funds

Procedures

This section provides procedures related to Receivership:

- Investigating the Account
- Advising of Departmental Claim and Priority
- Opening an RT0002 or RP0002 account
- Seeking Leave of the Court
- Monitoring the Administration of the Receivership
- The Right of Off-Set
- Issuing a Clearance Certificate

Investigating the Account

Investigation of a Receivership consists of seven (7) basic steps:

1. Identify all related accounts and taxes owing for example:
   - T1 /T2
   - payroll
   - GST/HST
   - sub ledger
   - related companies
   - shareholders and directors

Note: High priority trust exams and audits must be requested to confirm deemed trust amounts.

2. Determine the mandate and nature of the Receivership.
   - For a private receivership verify the validity of the appointment and the security agreement by reviewing the following:
     - the letter of appointment
     - the security agreement
     - the statement of affairs

3. Review the following:
   - corporate search
   - director and shareholder registries
   - certificate of incorporation

Canadian Bankruptcy/Insolvency and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Law: Provisions, Precedents and Materials Compiled by Lyndon Maither, B.Comm

Digitized by Google

- trade styles
- annual reports

4. Complete a books and records review to:
   - confirm status of assets and liabilities
   - identify possible asset transfers
   - locate names and addresses of accounts receivable as well as amounts owed
   - identify possible collection sources
5. Amend current collections actions to reflect the following:
   - update the collections status code
   - change the address on the account to the Receiver's if necessary
   - respect the Stay of Proceedings if applicable
6. Account for all corporate assets:
   - compare current assets with those identified in the Receiver's statement and previous collection investigations
7. Investigate alternative legal actions:
   - consider the following when investigating alternative legal actions:
     - previous account history
     - prior write offs on the account
     - aggregate amount of related debts
     - non-arm's length transactions
   - consider issuing an assessment to the directors of the corporation if any of the following situations apply:
     - there are no remaining assets in the company
     - the balance outstanding is more than PROTECTED.
     - investigations confirm the directors' ability to pay the assessment

Advising of Departmental Claim and Priority

Once the trust exam and/or audit have been completed and the CRA has appropriate deemed trust figures, send one of the following to the receiver:

- ELCS letter # 19715 for payroll accounts
- ELCS letter # 19686 for GST/HST accounts

Digitized by Google

Note: It is critical to get these letters to the receiver as soon as possible. In the event that the receivership is followed by a bankruptcy, these letters will ensure the deemed trust payments are received out of the receivership.

If the CRA's trust claim is disallowed, send the appropriate documents to the Department of Justice for them to determine the extent of the claim.

All provable claims, including secured claims of the Crown, rank as unsecured unless the Crown has perfected their security.

For further details, refer to the Security chapter within the Collections Manual.

Opening an RT0002 or RP0002 Account

Receivers have three options for the filing and remitting of GST/HST and/or payroll:

1. They can use their own GST/HST number if:
   - they are liquidating some or all of the debtor's assets, regardless of whether or not the company will continue to operate afterwards
2. They can use the company's RT/RP 0001 number if:
   - they are liquidating assets, regardless of whether or not the company will continue to operate afterwards
   - they are operating the business in the short term with the intent to shut it down after liquidation
3. They open a divisional account if:
   - they are operating as receiver/manager and want to record the management activities separately
   - there are multiple receivers or a receiver/trustee combination

The use of the divisional account is largely at the discretion of the receiver. It is often the preference as it ensures that any ITC's are credited to the receiver's account. If the receiver decides to use the company's BN they are required to maintain the same filing requirements.

Seeking Leave of the Court

Collection actions must not be initiated or continued if a Court Ordered Receivership includes a Stay of Proceedings that appears to include the CRA. Instead:

1. Immediately forward copies of all documentation to the Department of Justice for an opinion as to what action CRA should take. Include:
   - the security agreement
   - the letter of appointment
   - the Court Order

Digitized by Google

2. If legal action is in progress, send a letter to the third parties informing them that collection action is suspended and compliance is not required for amounts payable after the date of appointment of the Receiver until further notice.

3. Assist the Department of Justice with the preparation of the affidavit.

Once the Stay of Proceedings order is varied to expressly exclude CRA, fresh collection actions may be initiated.

Monitoring the Administration of the Receivership

Proper monitoring of the account is required to minimize any CRA losses. The Collections officer should:

- input all pertinent information in the ACSES diary
- verify that all statements are accurate by:
    - conducting field visits
    - inspecting the receiver's and/or the company's books and records
- contact the receiver for updates on the liquidation of the assets and funds available
- refer to the Receiver's interim reports to:
    - analyze the possibility of surplus funds available upon termination of the receiver's mandate
    - question the realization made on certain assets
- refer to the final report to:
    - identify if any surplus of funds are available
    - review the fees and charges of the receiver

The Right of Off-Set

The CRA does not have the right to off-set credits or refunds generated during a post-receivership period, relating to post-receivership filing periods, against liabilities incurred in a pre-receivership period. In situations where there are multiple receivers, credits or refunds cannot be off-set from one receiver's account to another's.

Issuing a Clearance Certificate

Where there will be a distribution of funds to creditors other than the appointing creditor, the receiver must obtain a clearance certificate.

Clearance certificates are issued by the Audit division.

For further details refer to the Processing a Request for a Clearance Certificate section of the Collections Manual.

Glossary

Agent
A person authorized by another to act for or in place of that person; one entrusted with another's business.

Clearance Certificate
Document issued to the receiver confirming that the CRA's requirements have been fulfilled.

Committee
Persons appointed to manage and care for the affairs and assets of a person who is incapable of managing those affairs and assets.

Crystallize
Crystallization is the act of calling a debt. It makes a floating charge enforceable and changes the floating non-specific charge to a fixed charge on specific property. This occurs upon default, after demand for payment has occurred or when the creditor takes an action to enforce the charge.

Curator
Person appointed to manage and care for the affairs and assets of a person who is incapable of managing those affairs and assets.

Debenture
Sealed bond issued by a corporation or company in respect of a long-term loan.

Distribution in a Receivership
A distribution normally occurs when the responsible representative turns over to the shareholders, owners or creditors any residue of property after the payment of all property claims against that property.

Fixed Charge

Digitized by Google

A fixed charge is one that grants, assigns or transfers specific identifiable property from the debtor to the security holder as security for a debt or performance of an obligation. The holders of the security instrument do not have to invoke receivership in order to enforce their rights; they foreclose on real estate (with a judgment order) or seize the asset to satisfy the debtor's liability

Guardian
Person appointed to manage and care for the affairs and assets of a person who is incapable of managing those affairs and assets.

Letter of Appointment
Letter outlining the nature of the receiver's responsibilities over the debtor's assets and under which authority he/she has been appointed. The nature of the appointment of a receiver gives the CRA ability to ensure that the various legislative requirements imposed upon the receiver in the administration of an estate are complied with.

Liquidator
Person appointed to liquidate the debtor's assets or to wind-up the affairs of a corporation.

Monitor
Person appointed by a secured creditor as a consultant to review and report the cash flow, assets and accounts payable to the secured creditor.

Property
Property includes money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property, whether real or personal, legal or equitable, and whether situated in Canada or elsewhere, and includes obligations, easements and every description of estate, interest and profit, present or future, vested or contingent, in, arising out of or incident to property.

Receiver
Person appointed by a secured creditor or the court pursuant to a debenture, bond or other debt security instrument to administer and/or liquidate assets to retire a debtor's debt.

Receiver-manager
Person appointed under a debenture, bond or other debt security agreement or pursuant to a court order to manage a debtor's business according to the terms of the appointment with the purpose of either retiring the debt or operating the company to retire the debt.

Receivership
Legal or equitable proceeding in which a receiver is appointed for an insolvent corporation, partnership or individual to preserve its assets for the benefit of affected parties.

Security Instrument
A security instrument is a document (debenture, mortgage, assignment, etc.) that transfers an interest in a right or property from the debtor to the creditor.

Stay of Proceedings
The Stay requires a suspension of all collection action against the debtor or the debtor's property.

GENERAL

Application of other provisions - Sec. 254
254. (1) All of the provisions of this Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of claims by customers for securities and customer name securities as if customers were creditors in respect of such claims.

Application of transaction provisions - Sec. 254(2)
(2) Sections 91 to 101 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of transactions of a customer with or through a securities firm relating to securities.

Non-application - Sec. 254(3)
(3) This Part does not apply to proceedings under Part III.

Termination, netting or setting off or compensation - Sec. 254(4)
(4) Nothing in this Part affects the rights of a party to a contract, including an eligible financial contract, with respect to termination, netting or setting off or compensation.

Secured creditors - Sec. 254(5)
(5) The operation of this Part is subject to the rights of secured creditors.

Applications re securities firm - Sec. 256
256. (1) In addition to any creditor who may file an application in accordance with sections 43 to 45, an application for a bankruptcy order against a securities firm may be filed by

(a) a securities commission established under an enactment of a province, if

(i) the securities firm has committed an act of bankruptcy referred to in section 42 or subsection (2) of this section within the six months before the filing of the application and while the securities firm was licensed or registered by the securities commission to carry on business in Canada, and

(ii) in the case in which the act of bankruptcy was that referred to in subsection (2), the suspension referred to in that subsection is in effect when the application is filed;

(b) a securities exchange recognized by a provincial securities commission, if

(i) the securities firm has committed an act of bankruptcy referred to in section 42 or subsection (2) of this section within the six months before the filing of the application and while the securities firm was a member of the securities exchange, and

(ii) in the case in which the act of bankruptcy was that referred to in subsection (2), the suspension referred to in that subsection is in effect when the application is filed;

(c) a customer compensation body, if

(i) the securities firm has committed an act of bankruptcy referred to in section 42 or subsection (2) of this section within the six months before the filing of the application and while the securities firm had customers whose securities accounts were protected, in whole or in part, by the customer compensation body, and

(ii) in the case in which the act of bankruptcy was that referred to in subsection (2), the suspension referred to in that subsection is in effect when the application is filed; and

(d) a person who, in respect of property of a securities firm, is a receiver within the meaning of subsection 243(2), a receiver-manager, a liquidator or any other person with similar functions appointed under a federal or provincial enactment relating to securities that provides for the appointment of that other person, if the securities firm has committed an act of bankruptcy referred to in section 42 within the six months before the filing of the application.

Interpretation - Sec. 256(2)
(2) For the purposes of paragraphs (1)(a) to (c),

(a) the suspension by a securities commission referred to in paragraph (1)(a) of a securities firm's registration to trade in securities, or

(b) the suspension by a securities exchange referred to in paragraph (1)(b) of a securities firm's membership in that exchange constitutes an act of bankruptcy if the suspension is due to the failure of the firm to meet capital adequacy requirements.

Service on securities commission - Sec. 256(3)
(3) If

(a) a securities exchange files an application under paragraph (1)(b), or

(b) a customer compensation body files an application under paragraph (1)(c), a copy of the application must be served on the securities commission, if any, having jurisdiction in the locality of the securities firm where the application was filed, before

Statement of customer account - Sec. 257
257. The trustee of the estate of a securities firm shall send to customers a statement of customer accounts with the firm together with the notice under subsection 102(1).

Deferred customers - Sec. 258
258. (1) Where the trustee is of the opinion that a customer should be treated as a deferred customer, the trustee shall apply to the court for a ruling on the matter and shall send the customer a copy of the application, together with a statement of the reasons why the customer should be so treated, and the court may, on such notice as it considers appropriate, make such order as it considers appropriate in the circumstances.

Application by customer compensation body - Sec. 258(2)
(2) Where securities accounts of customers are protected by a customer compensation body, the customer compensation body may apply to the court for a ruling as to whether a customer should be treated as a deferred customer and, in the case of such an application,
(a) the customer compensation body shall send the customer a copy of the application together with a statement setting out the reasons why the customer should be so treated; and
(b) the court may, on such notice as it considers appropriate, make such order as it considers appropriate in the circumstances.
1997, c. 12, s. 118.

Trustee powers - Sec. 259
259. The trustee may, in respect of a bankruptcy under this Part, without the permission of inspectors until inspectors are appointed and thereafter with the permission of inspectors,
(a) exercise a power of attorney in respect of and transfer any security vested in the trustee;
(b) sell securities, other than customer name securities;
(c) purchase securities;
(d) discharge any security on securities vested in the trustee;
(e) complete open contractual commitments;
(f) maintain customers' securities accounts and meet margin calls;
(g) distribute cash and securities to customers;
(h) transfer securities accounts to another securities firm, to the extent practicable, comply with customer requests regarding the disposal of open contractual commitments and the transfer of open contractual commitments to another securities firm, and enter into agreements to indemnify the other securities firm against shortages of cash or securities in transferred accounts;
(i) liquidate any securities account without notice; and
(j) sell, without tender, assets of the securities firm essential to the carrying on of its business.

Determination of customer name securities - Sec. 260
260. The trustee shall
(a) determine which of the securities in customers' securities accounts are to be dealt with as customer name securities and those that are not to be dealt with as such; and
(b) advise customers with securities determined to be customer name securities of the determination as soon as possible thereafter.
1997, c. 12, s. 118.

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE

Vesting of securities, etc., in trustee - Sec. 261
261. (1) If a securities firm becomes bankrupt, the following securities and cash vest in the trustee:
(a) securities owned by the securities firm;
(b) securities and cash held by any person for the account of the securities firm; and
(c) securities and cash held by the securities firm for the account of a customer, other than customer name securities.

Establishment of a customer pool fund and a general fund - Sec. 261(2)
(2) Where a securities firm becomes bankrupt and property vests in a trustee under subsection (1) or under other provisions of this Act, the trustee shall establish
(a) a fund, in this Part called the "customer pool fund", including therein
(i) securities, including those obtained after the date of the bankruptcy, but excluding customer name securities and excluding eligible financial contracts to which the firm is a party, that are held by or for the account of the firm
(A) for a securities account of a customer,
(B) for an account of a person who has entered into an eligible financial contract with the firm and has deposited the securities with the firm to assure the performance of the person's obligations under the contract, or
(C) for the firm's own account,
(ii) cash, including cash obtained after the date of the bankruptcy, and including
(A) dividends, interest and other income in respect of securities referred to in subparagraph (i),
(B) proceeds of disposal of securities referred to in subparagraph (i), and
(C) proceeds of policies of insurance covering claims of customers to securities referred to in subparagraph (i), that is held by or for the account of the firm
(D) for a securities account of a customer,
(E) for an account of a person who has entered into an eligible financial contract with the firm and has deposited the cash with the firm to assure the performance of the person's obligations under the contract, or
(F) for the firm's own securities account, and
(iii) any investments of the securities firm in its subsidiaries that are not referred to in subparagraph (i) or (ii); and

Allocation and distribution of cash and securities in customer pool fund - Sec. 262

262. (1) Cash and securities in the customer pool fund shall be allocated in the following priority:

(a) for costs of administration referred to in paragraph 136(1)(b), to the extent that sufficient funds are not available in the general fund to pay such costs;

(b) to customers, other than deferred customers, in proportion to their net equity; and

(c) to the general fund.

(1.1) Where

(a) a person has, under the terms of an eligible financial contract with the securities firm, deposited property with the firm to assure the performance of the person's obligations under the contract, and

(b) that property is included in the customer pool fund pursuant to paragraph 261(2)(a),

that person shall share in the distribution of the customer pool fund as if the person were a customer of the firm with a claim for net equity equal to the net value of the property deposited that would have been returnable to the person after deducting any amount owing by the person under the contract.

(2) To the extent that securities of a particular type are available in the customer pool fund, the trustee shall distribute them to customers with claims to the securities, in proportion to their claims to the securities, up to the appropriate portion of their net equity, unless the trustee determines that, in the circumstances, it would be more appropriate to sell the securities and distribute the proceeds to the customers with claims to the securities in proportion to their claims to the securities.

Compensation in kind - Sec. 262(2.1)

(2.1) Subject to subsection (2), the trustee may satisfy all or part of a customer's claim to securities of a particular type by delivering to the customer securities of that type to which the customer was entitled at the date of bankruptcy. For greater certainty, the trustee may, for that purpose, exercise the trustee's power to purchase securities in accordance with section 259.

Allocation of property in the general fund - Sec. 262(3)

(3) Property in the general fund shall be allocated in the following priority:

(a) to preferred creditors in the order set out in subsection 136(1);

(b) rateably

(i) to customers, other than deferred customers, having claims for net equity remaining after distribution of property from the customer pool fund and property provided by a customer compensation body, where applicable, in proportion to claims for net equity remaining,

(ii) where applicable, to a customer compensation body to the extent that it paid or compensated customers in respect of their net equity, and
(iii) to creditors in proportion to the values of their claims;
(c) rateably to creditors referred to in section 137; and
(d) to deferred customers, in proportion to their claims for net equity.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 120.

Delivery of customer name securities - Sec. 263
263. (1) Where a customer is not indebted to a securities firm, the trustee shall deliver to the customer the customer name securities that belong to the customer.

Where customer indebted to securities firm - Sec. 263(2)
(2) Where a customer to whom customer name securities belong and who is indebted to the securities firm on account of customer name securities not fully paid for, or on another account, discharges their indebtedness in full, the trustee shall deliver to that customer the customer name securities that belong to the customer.

Customer indebted to securities firm - Sec. 263(3)
(3) If a customer to whom customer name securities belong and who is indebted to the securities firm on account of customer name securities not fully paid for, or on another account, does not discharge their indebtedness in full, the trustee may, on notice to the customer, sell sufficient customer name securities to discharge the indebtedness, and those securities are then free of any right, title or interest of the customer. If the trustee so discharges the customer's indebtedness, the trustee shall deliver any remaining customer name securities to the customer.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 121.

Trustee to consult customer compensation body - Sec. 264
264. Where the accounts of customers of a securities firm are protected, in whole or in part, by a customer compensation body, the trustee shall consult the customer compensation body on the administration of the bankruptcy, and the customer compensation body may designate an inspector to act on its behalf.

Late claims - Sec. 265
265. A customer may prove a claim after the distribution of cash and securities in the customer pool fund and is entitled to receive cash and securities in the hands of the trustee at the time the claim is proven up to the appropriate portion of the customer's net equity before further distribution is made to other customers, but no such claim shall affect the previous distribution of the customer pool fund or the general fund.
1997, c. 12, s. 118.

ACCOUNTING OF TRUSTEE

Statement of trustee required - Sec. 266

266. In addition to any other statement or report required to be prepared under this Act, a trustee shall prepare

(a) a statement indicating

(i) the distribution of property in the customer pool fund among customers who have proved their claims, and

(ii) the disposal of customer name securities; or

(b) such other report relating to that distribution or disposal as the court may direct.

1997, c. 12, s. 118.

PART XIII

CROSS-BORDER INSOLVENCIES

PURPOSE

Purpose - Sec. 267

267. The purpose of this Part is to provide mechanisms for dealing with cases of cross-border insolvencies and to promote

(a) cooperation between the courts and other competent authorities in Canada with those of foreign jurisdictions in cases of cross-border insolvencies;

(b) greater legal certainty for trade and investment;

(c) the fair and efficient administration of cross-border insolvencies that protects the interests of creditors and other interested persons, and those of debtors;

(d) the protection and the maximization of the value of debtors' property; and

(e) the rescue of financially troubled businesses to protect investment and preserve employment.

268. (1) The following definitions apply in this Part.

« tribunal étranger »
"foreign court" means a judicial or other authority competent to control or supervise a foreign proceeding.

"foreign main proceeding"
« principale »
"foreign main proceeding" means a foreign proceeding in a jurisdiction where the debtor has the centre of the debtor's main interests.

Digitized by Google

"foreign non-main proceeding"
« secondaire »
"foreign non-main proceeding" means a foreign proceeding, other than a foreign main proceeding.

« instances étrangères »
"foreign proceeding" means a judicial or an administrative proceeding, including an interim proceeding, in a jurisdiction outside Canada dealing with creditor's collective interests generally under any law relating to bankruptcy or insolvency in which a debtor's property and affairs are subject to control or supervision by a foreign court for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation.

"foreign representative"
« représentant étranger »
"foreign representative" means a person or body, including one appointed on an interim basis, who is authorized, in a foreign proceeding in respect of a debtor, to
(a) administer the debtor's property or affairs for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation; or
(b) act as a representative in respect of the foreign proceeding.

Centre of debtor's main interests - Sec. 268(2)
(2) For the purposes of this Part, in the absence of proof to the contrary, a debtor's registered office and, in the case of a debtor who is an individual, the debtor's ordinary place of residence are deemed to be the centre of the debtor's main interests.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2004, c. 25, s. 102;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

RECOGNITION OF FOREIGN PROCEEDING

Application for recognition of a foreign proceeding - Sec. 269
269. (1) A foreign representative may apply to the court for recognition of the foreign proceeding in respect of which he or she is a foreign representative.

Documents that must accompany application - Sec. 269(2)
(2) Subject to subsection (3), the application must be accompanied by

- (a) a certified copy of the instrument, however designated, that commenced the foreign proceeding or a certificate from the foreign court affirming the existence of the foreign proceeding;
- (b) a certified copy of the instrument, however designated, authorizing the foreign representative to act in that capacity or a certificate from the foreign court affirming the foreign representative's authority to act in that capacity; and
- (c) a statement identifying all foreign proceedings in respect of the debtor that are known to the foreign representative.

Documents may be considered as proof - Sec. 269(3)

Digitized by Google

(3) The court may, without further proof, accept the documents referred to in paragraphs (2)(a) and (b) as evidence that the proceeding to which they relate is a foreign proceeding and that the applicant is a foreign representative in respect of the foreign proceeding.

Other evidence - Sec. 269(4)
(4) In the absence of the documents referred to in paragraphs (2)(a) and (b), the court may accept any other evidence of the existence of the foreign proceeding and of the foreign representative's authority that it considers appropriate.

Translation - Sec. 269(5)
(5) The court may require a translation of any document accompanying the application.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Order recognizing foreign proceeding - Sec. 270
270. (1) If the court is satisfied that the application for the recognition of a foreign proceeding relates to a foreign proceeding and that the applicant is a foreign representative in respect of that foreign proceeding, the court shall make an order recognizing the foreign proceeding.

Nature of foreign proceeding to be specified - Sec. 270(2)
(2) The court shall specify in the order whether the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding or a foreign non-main proceeding.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Effects of recognition of a foreign main proceeding - Sec. 271
271. (1) Subject to subsections (2) to (4), on the making of an order recognizing a foreign proceeding that is specified to be a foreign main proceeding,

(a) no person shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings concerning the debtor's property, debts, liabilities or obligations;
(b) if the debtor carries on a business, the debtor shall not, outside the ordinary course of the business, sell or otherwise dispose of any of the debtor's property in Canada that relates to the business and shall not sell or otherwise dispose of any other property of the debtor in Canada; and
(c) if the debtor is an individual, the debtor shall not sell or otherwise dispose of any property of the debtor in Canada.

When subsection (1) does not apply - Sec. 271(2)
(2) Subsection (1) does not apply if any proceedings under this Act have been commenced in respect of the debtor at the time the order recognizing the foreign proceeding is made.

Exceptions - Sec. 271(3)
(3) The prohibitions in paragraphs (1)(a) and (b) are subject to the exceptions specified by the court in the order recognizing the foreign proceeding that would apply in Canada had the foreign proceeding taken place in Canada under this Act.

Digitized by Google

Application of this and other Acts - Sec. 271(4)
(4) Nothing in subsection (1) precludes the commencement or the continuation of proceedings under this Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act or the Winding-up and Restructuring Act in respect of the debtor.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Orders - Sec. 272
272. (1) If an order recognizing a foreign proceeding is made, the court may, on application by the foreign representative who applied for the order, if the court is satisfied that it is necessary for the protection of the debtor's property or the interests of a creditor or creditors, make any order that it considers appropriate, including an order

(a) if the foreign proceeding is a foreign non-main proceeding, imposing the prohibitions referred to in paragraphs 271(1)(a) to (c) and specifying the exceptions to those prohibitions, taking subsection 271(3) into account;
(b) respecting the examination of witnesses, the taking of evidence or the delivery of information concerning the debtor's property, affairs, debts, liabilities and obligations;
(c) entrusting the administration or realization of all or part of the debtor's property located in Canada to the foreign representative or to any other person designated by the court; and
(d) appointing a trustee as receiver of all or any part of the debtor's property in Canada, for any term that the court considers appropriate and directing the receiver to do all or any of the following, namely,

(i) to take possession of all or part of the debtor's property specified in the appointment and to exercise the control over the property and over the debtor's business that the court considers appropriate, and
(ii) to take any other action that the court considers appropriate.

Restriction - Sec. 272(2)
(2) If any proceedings under this Act have been commenced in respect of the debtor at the time an order recognizing the foreign proceeding is made, an order made under subsection (1) must be consistent with any order that may be made in any proceedings under this Act.

Application of this and other Acts - Sec. 272(3)
(3) The making of an order under paragraph (1)(a) does not preclude the commencement or the continuation of proceedings under this Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act or the Winding-up and Restructuring Act in respect of the debtor.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Terms and conditions of orders - Sec. 273
273. An order under this Part may be made on any terms and conditions that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Commencement or continuation of proceedings - Sec. 274

274. If an order recognizing a foreign proceeding is made, the foreign representative may commence or continue any proceedings under sections 43, 46 to 47.1 and 49 and subsections 50(1) and 50.4(1) in respect of a debtor as if the foreign representative were a creditor of the debtor, or the debtor, as the case may be.
1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2004, c. 25, s. 103;
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

OBLIGATIONS
Cooperation — court - Sec. 275
275. (1) If an order recognizing a foreign proceeding is made, the court shall cooperate, to the maximum extent possible, with the foreign representative and the foreign court involved in the foreign proceeding.

Cooperation — other authorities in Canada - Sec. 275(2)
(2) If any proceedings under this Act have been commenced in respect of a debtor and an order recognizing a foreign proceeding is made in respect of the debtor, every person who exercises any powers or performs duties and functions in any proceedings under this Act shall cooperate, to the maximum extent possible, with the foreign representative and the foreign court involved in the foreign proceeding.

Forms of cooperation - Sec. 275(3)
(3) For the purpose of this section, cooperation may be provided by any appropriate means, including

(a) the appointment of a person to act at the direction of the court;
(b) the communication of information by any means considered appropriate by the court;
(c) the coordination of the administration and supervision of the debtor's assets and affairs;
(d) the approval or implementation by courts of agreements concerning the coordination of proceedings; and
(e) the coordination of concurrent proceedings regarding the same debtor.

1997, c. 12, s. 118;
2005, c. 47, s. 122;
2007, c. 36, s. 59.

Obligations of foreign representative - Sec. 276
276. If an order recognizing a foreign proceeding is made, the foreign representative who applied for the order shall

(a) without delay, inform the court of
(i) any substantial change in the status of the recognized foreign proceeding,
(ii) any substantial change in the status of the foreign representative's authority to act in that capacity, and
(iii) any other foreign proceeding in respect of the same debtor that becomes known to the foreign representative; and
(b) publish, without delay after the order is made, once a week for two consecutive weeks, or as otherwise directed by the court, in one or more newspapers in Canada specified by the court, a notice containing the prescribed information.

2005, c. 47, s. 122.

MULTIPLE PROCEEDINGS

Concurrent proceedings - Sec. 277
277. If any proceedings under this Act in respect of a debtor are commenced at any time after an order recognizing the foreign proceeding is made,

(a) the court shall review any order made under section 272 and, if it determines that the order is inconsistent with any orders made in the proceedings under this Act, the court shall amend or revoke the order; and

(b) if the foreign proceeding is a foreign main proceeding, the court shall make an order terminating the application of the prohibitions in paragraphs 271(1)(a) to (c) if the court determines that those prohibitions are inconsistent with any similar prohibitions imposed in the proceedings under this Act.

Multiple foreign proceedings - Sec. 278
278. (1) If, at any time after an order is made in respect of a foreign non-main proceeding in respect of a debtor, an order recognizing a foreign main proceeding is made in respect of the debtor, the court shall review any order made under section 272 in respect of the foreign non-main proceeding and, if it determines that the order is inconsistent with any orders made under that section in respect of the foreign main proceedings, the court shall amend or revoke the order.

Multiple foreign proceedings - Sec. 278(2)
(2) If, at any time after an order is made in respect of a foreign non-main proceeding in respect of the debtor, an order recognizing another foreign non-main proceeding is made in respect of the debtor, the court shall, for the purpose of facilitating the coordination of the foreign non-main proceedings, review any order made under section 272 in respect of the first recognized proceeding and amend or revoke that order if it considers it appropriate.
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Authorization to act as representative of proceeding under this Act - Sec. 279
279. The court may authorize any person or body to act as a representative in respect of any proceeding under this Act for the purpose of having them recognized in a jurisdiction outside Canada.

Foreign representative status - Sec. 280
280. An application by a foreign representative for any order under this Part does not submit the foreign representative to the jurisdiction of the court for any other purpose except with regard to the costs of the proceedings, but the court may make any order under this Part conditional on the compliance by the foreign representative with any other court order.

Foreign proceeding appeals 281
281. A foreign representative is not prevented from making an application to the court under this Part by reason only that proceedings by way of appeal or review have been taken in a foreign proceeding, and the court may, on an application if such proceedings have been taken, grant relief as if the proceedings had not been taken.

Presumption of insolvency - Sec. 282
282. For the purposes of this Part, if a bankruptcy, an insolvency or a reorganization or a similar order has been made in respect of a debtor in a foreign proceeding, a certified copy of the order is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that the debtor is insolvent and proof of the appointment of the foreign representative made by the order.
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Credit for recovery in other jurisdictions - Sec. 283
283. (1) If a bankruptcy order, a proposal or an assignment is made in respect of a debtor under this Act, the following shall be taken into account in the distribution of dividends to the debtor's creditors in Canada as if they were a part of that distribution:

(a) the amount that a creditor receives or is entitled to receive outside Canada by way of a dividend in a foreign proceeding in respect of the debtor; and

(b) the value of any property of the debtor that the creditor acquires outside Canada on account of a provable claim of the creditor or that the creditor acquires outside Canada by way of a transfer that, if the transfer were subject to this Act, would be a preference over other creditors or a transfer at undervalue.

(2) Despite subsection (1), the creditor is not entitled to receive a dividend from the distribution in Canada until every other creditor who has a claim of equal rank in the order of priority established under this Act has received a dividend whose amount is the same percentage of that other creditor's claim as the aggregate of the amount referred to in paragraph (1)(a) and the value referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is of that creditor's claim.
2005, c. 47, s. 122.

Court not prevented from applying certain rules - Sec. 284
284. (1) Nothing in this Part prevents the court, on the application of a foreign representative or any other interested person, from applying any legal or equitable rules governing the recognition of foreign insolvency orders and assistance to foreign representatives that are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

Public policy exception - Sec. 284(2)
(2) Nothing in this Part prevents the court from refusing to do something that would be contrary to public policy.
2005, c. 47, s. 122;
2007, c. 36, s. 60.

PART XIV

REVIEW OF ACT

Review of Act - Sec. 285
285. (1) Within five years after the coming into force of this section, the Minister shall cause to be laid before both Houses of Parliament a report on the provisions and operation of this Act, including any recommendations for amendments to those provisions.

Reference to parliamentary committee - Sec. 285(2)
(2) The report stands referred to the committee of the Senate, the House of Commons or both Houses of Parliament that is designated or established for that purpose, which shall

(a) as soon as possible after the laying of the report, review the report; and

(b) report to the Senate, the House of Commons or both Houses of Parliament, as the case may be, within one year after the laying of the Minister's report, or any further time authorized by the Senate, the House of Commons or both Houses of Parliament.

(b) the charges are reasonable and, if applicable, are in accordance with the tariff;
(c) the legal services rendered are accounted for, and are not services that should have been rendered by the trustee; and
(d) the legal services have been authorized and approved in accordance with the Act, if the Act so requires.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 63(E).

22. When a bill of costs has been taxed, the taxing officer shall make a statement to that effect on the bill and shall sign that statement, and a bill of costs so signed has the same effect as a judgment of the court and may be enforced in the same manner as a judgment.
SOR/98-240, s. 1.

23. The court may, on ex parte application by a trustee, order a barrister or solicitor or, in the Province of Quebec, an advocate to submit a bill of costs to the trustee, or to bring the bill of costs into court to be taxed, and, if the barrister, solicitor or advocate fails to comply, the court may, on ex parte application by the trustee, order that the trustee distribute the proceeds of the estate that the trustee possesses without regard to the barrister, solicitor or advocate's bill of costs.
SOR/2007-61, s. 7.

24. (1) The barrister or solicitor or, in the Province of Quebec, the advocate shall give to the trustee, to any other person who is liable for payment of the bill of costs and, on request, to the Division Office, a notice of the time and place of the taxation, at least 10 days before the day set for the taxation.

(2) A certified copy of the bill of costs to be presented for taxation must be attached to the notice referred to in subsection (1).
SOR/2007-61, s. 8.

25. (1) A decision of a taxing officer on the taxation of a bill of costs may be appealed to the court if a notice stating the grounds of appeal is given to the opposite party and the Division Office within 10 days after the day of the decision.

(2) The judge who hears the appeal may retax the bill of costs as if it were being taxed for the first time.

(a) be made in prescribed form; and

(b) be accompanied by a copy of the notice of final dividend and application for discharge of trustee, a copy of the final statement of receipts and disbursements as taxed, both in prescribed form, and a dividend sheet.

(2) At the time of discharge, the trustee must satisfy the court that

(a) the statements made in connection with the discharge are true;

(b) the final statement of receipts and disbursements is an accurate and correct statement of the administration of the estate, and has been approved by the inspectors and taxed by the court;

(c) [Repealed, SOR/2009-218, s. 7]

(d) all the property of the bankrupt for which the trustee was accountable has been sold, realized or disposed of in the manner described in the final statement of receipts and disbursements;

(e) every claim subject to a dividend was properly examined and that

(i) to the best of the trustee's knowledge, the dividend sheet presented to the court contains a true and correct list of the claims of creditors entitled to share in the estate,

(ii) all payments shown on the dividend sheet have been duly made, and

(iii) unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds have been forwarded to the Superintendent by the trustee in accordance with subsection 154(1) of the Act;

(f) the trustee has not received, does not expect to receive, and has not been promised, any remuneration or consideration other than as shown in the final statement of receipts and disbursements;

(g) the trustee has complied with subsection 170(2) of the Act; and

(h) the final statement of receipts and disbursements, the dividend sheet and the notice of application for discharge of trustee have been sent to the registrar, the Division Office, the bankrupt and every creditor whose claim has been proved.

SOR/98-240, s. 1.

64. (1) If the Superintendent's letter of comment states that the Superintendent is not requesting the taxation of the trustee's accounts, the trustee shall, within 30 days after receipt of the letter of comment, send to each creditor who has proved a claim a notice of taxation of the trustee's accounts and discharge of the trustee, in prescribed form, attaching

(a) a copy of the trustee's final statement of receipts and disbursements;

(b) a copy of the dividend sheet, showing the dividends paid or to be paid to the creditors of the bankrupt; and

(c) the final dividend that is owed to the creditor, if the trustee is satisfied that no creditor will object to the taxation of the trustee's accounts and the discharge of the trustee.

(2) A creditor may, within 30 days after the day on which the notice referred to in subsection (1) is sent, object to the taxation of the trustee's accounts and the discharge of the trustee by

(a) serving a notice of objection on the trustee or sending a notice of objection to the trustee by registered mail or courier;

(b) filing a copy of the notice of objection with the registrar, along with any applicable fee provided by the tariff; and

(c) sending a copy of the notice of objection to the Division Office.

64.1 to 64.6 [Repealed, SOR/98-240, s. 1]

65. (1) If a trustee receives no notice of objection within the time limit set out in subsection 64(2), the trustee shall

(a) at the expiration of that time limit, take the trustee's fee;

(b) at the expiration of that time limit, if the trustee has not already done so, send a final dividend to each creditor to whom one is owed; and

(c) within three months after the day on which the notice referred to in subsection 64(1) is sent,

(i) close the bank account used in administering the estate of the bankrupt, if that account is not a consolidated account, or, if the account is a consolidated account, ensure that all estate funds have been withdrawn from it,

(ii) remit any unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds to the Superintendent, and

(iii) send to the Division Office a certificate of compliance and deemed discharge, in prescribed form.

(2) A trustee is deemed to be discharged on meeting the requirements of paragraphs (1)(b) and (c).

(3) If a trustee receives a notice of objection within the time limit set out in subsection 64(2), the trustee shall

(a) [Repealed, SOR/2009-218, s. 9]

(b) obtain a hearing date from the registrar; and

66. (1) If the Superintendent issues a letter of comment pursuant to section 63 requesting the taxation of a trustee's accounts, the trustee shall, after obtaining a hearing date from the registrar and within 30 days after the day of receipt of the letter of comment, send to each creditor who has proved a claim and to the Division Office

(a) a notice of hearing for the taxation of the trustee's accounts and the discharge of the trustee, in prescribed form, which notice must be sent at least 30 days before the date of the hearing;

(b) a copy of the trustee's final statement of receipts and disbursements; and

(c) a copy of the dividend sheet, showing the dividends paid or to be paid to the creditors of the bankrupt.

(2) A creditor may object to the taxation of the trustee's accounts and discharge of the trustee by

(a) serving a notice of objection on the trustee or sending a notice of objection to the trustee by registered mail or courier, which notice of objection must be received by the trustee before the start of the hearing;

(b) filing a copy of the notice of objection with the registrar, along with any applicable fee provided by the tariff; and

(c) sending a copy of the notice of objection to the Division Office.

SOR/2007-61, s. 63(E).

67. (1) At the time of the hearing, the registrar shall consider the creditors' objections and the letter of comment issued by the Superintendent, and shall tax the trustee's accounts accordingly.

(2) If the registrar taxes a trustee's accounts as submitted, the trustee shall

(a) take the trustee's fee as taxed;

(b) send a final dividend to each creditor to whom one is owed; and

(c) within two months after the date of the taxation order,

(i) close the bank account used in administering the estate of the bankrupt, if that account is not a consolidated account, or, if the account is a consolidated account, ensure that all estate funds have been withdrawn from it,

(ii) remit any unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds to the Superintendent, and

(iii) send to the Division Office a certificate of compliance and deemed discharge, in prescribed form.

(3) A trustee is deemed to be discharged on meeting the requirements of paragraphs (2)(b) and (c).

(4) If the registrar taxes a trustee's accounts otherwise than as submitted, the trustee shall

70. (1) A notice indicating the time and place of the hearing of the bankruptcy application, together with a certified copy of the application and of the affidavit referred to in subsection 43(3) of the Act, must be served on the debtor, on the trustee named in the application and on the Division Office at least 10 days, or any shorter period that the court may order, before the hearing.

(2) After service of an application in accordance with this section, a copy of that application must immediately be filed at the office of the registrar.

(3) Subject to section 71, service on the debtor under subsection (1) must be effected by personal service.

(4) For the purposes of paragraph 256(3)(c) of the Act, the interval is 10 days.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 15;
SOR/2009-218, s. 10.

71. (1) If the court determines that service of documents cannot, for cause, be effected by personal service as required by subsection 70(3), the court shall make an order stating the manner of service of the documents.

(2) As soon as an order is made pursuant to subsection (1), the documents shall be served together with the order.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 63(E).

72. Service of a bankruptcy application must be proved by affidavit or bailiff's return of service, attached to the original application and filed with the court at least two days before the date of the hearing set out in the application.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 16.

73. In the case of a deceased debtor, service of a bankruptcy application must be effected on the executor or administrator of the estate or the liquidator of the deceased debtor's succession.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 16.

74. A debtor who contests a bankruptcy application shall file with the court in which the application was filed a notice setting out the contested allegations contained in the application, the grounds for contesting them and the debtor's address, and shall serve a copy of the notice on the applicant or their barrister or solicitor or, in the Province of Quebec, their advocate, at least two days before the date of the hearing set out in the application.

INTERIM RECEIVER

77. [Repealed, SOR/2009-218, s. 11]

78. If a bankruptcy application is dismissed, the court may, on application presented within 30 days after the day of the dismissal, give judgment with respect to any claim for damages, or with respect to any claim other than a claim for damages arising out of the appointment of an interim receiver, and may make any orders that the court sees fit.
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 17.

79. (1) An interim receiver shall apply to the court for taxation of accounts and discharge within two months after completion of the interim receiver's duties, after giving notice to
- (a) the debtor, or in the case of a bankruptcy, the trustee;
- (b) every creditor; and
- (c) the Division Office.

(2) The notice referred to in subsection (1) must
- (a) be in prescribed form; and
- (b) have attached to it a copy of the interim receiver's statement of receipts and disbursements, in prescribed form and stating
  - (i) the number of hours spent, the tasks performed, the hourly rates and other factors for consideration in the calculation of fees, and
  - (ii) the expenses incurred by the interim receiver, attaching a copy of any bills of costs for legal services.

80. A person referred to in paragraph 79(1)(a) or (b) may object to the taxation of the accounts and discharge of the interim receiver by filing a notice of objection with the court within 30 days after the giving of the notice referred to in subsection 79(1).
SOR/98-240, s. 1.

81. If no objection is filed within 30 days after the giving of the notice referred to in subsection 79(1), the interim receiver's accounts are deemed to have been taxed and the interim receiver is deemed to be discharged, unless the court requires that the accounts be taxed on their own merit.
SOR/92-579, s. 15;
SOR/98-240, s. 1;
SOR/2007-61, s. 63(E).

82. (1) If an objection is filed within 30 days after the giving of the notice referred to in subsection 79(1), the interim receiver shall, within 10 days after the filing of the objection, apply to the court for a date for a hearing, and shall send a notice of the date of the hearing to the objecting party.

(2) The court, at the hearing, shall tax the interim receiver's accounts on their own merit and may discharge the interim receiver, who shall send the Division Office a copy of the court order relating to the taxation and discharge.

SOR/2007-61, s. 63(E).

99. The Superintendent shall examine all documents sent pursuant to section 98 and shall issue a letter of comment to the administrator, stating whether the Superintendent is requesting from the registrar the taxation of the administrator's accounts.
SOR/98-240, s. 1.

100. (1) If the Superintendent's letter of comment states that the Superintendent is not requesting the taxation of the administrator's accounts, the administrator shall, within 30 days after receipt of the letter of comment, send to each creditor who has proved a claim a notice of taxation of the administrator's accounts and discharge of the administrator, in prescribed form, attaching

(a) a copy of the administrator's final statement of receipts and disbursements;

(b) a copy of the dividend sheet, showing the dividends paid or to be paid to the creditors under the consumer proposal; and

(c) the final dividend that is owed to the creditor, if the administrator is satisfied that no creditor will object to the taxation of the administrator's accounts and the discharge of the administrator.

(2) A creditor may, within 30 days after the day on which the notice referred to in subsection (1) is sent, object to the taxation of the administrator's accounts and the discharge of the administrator by

(a) serving a notice of objection on the administrator or sending a notice of objection to the administrator by registered mail or courier;

(b) filing a copy of the notice of objection with the registrar, along with any applicable fee provided by the tariff; and

(c) sending a copy of the notice of objection to the Division Office.

(d) send to the Division Office a certificate of compliance and deemed discharge, in prescribed form.

(3) The administrator is deemed to be discharged on meeting the requirements of subsection (2).

(4) If the registrar taxes an administrator's accounts otherwise than as submitted, the administrator shall

(a) adjust the administrator's fee as taxed and, if that fee was reduced by the taxation, reimburse the difference to the bank account used in administering the consumer proposal; and

(b) within two months after the date of the taxation order,

(i) send each creditor the final dividend that is owed to them, in accordance with the taxation order,

(ii) close the bank account used in administering the consumer proposal, if that account is not a consolidated account, or, if the account is a consolidated account, ensure that all funds governed by the consumer proposal have been withdrawn from it,

(iii) remit any unclaimed dividends and undistributed funds to the Superintendent,

(iv) send to the Division Office and to each creditor a revised final statement of receipts and disbursements, a revised dividend sheet and a copy of the taxation order, and

(v) send to the Division Office and to the registrar a certificate of compliance and deemed discharge, in prescribed form.

(5) The administrator is deemed to be discharged on meeting the requirements of subsection (4).

PRESCRIBED REGULATORY BODY

103.1 A stock exchange that is regulated by an Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province, the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada and the Mutual Fund Dealers Association of Canada are prescribed for the purposes of section 69.6 of the Act.
SOR/2009-218, s. 16.

CONTRIBUTORIES

104. (1) In this section, "contributory" has the same meaning as in section 77 of the Act.

(2) The trustee may at any time, by written notice, demand payment from a contributory, within 30 days after the day of service or sending of the notice, of the amount that the contributory is liable to contribute under subsection 77(1) of the Act. The notice must include the relevant information on the contributory's right of dispute under subsection (4).

(3) The notice under subsection (2) must be served personally on the contributory, or sent by registered mail or courier to the contributory's latest known address or the address shown in the stock register or other books of the bankrupt corporation.

(4) Within the 30 days after the day on which notice was served or sent, the contributory may dispute their liability, in whole or in part, in respect of the amount to be contributed, by giving the trustee a written notice of dispute setting out the disputed items and the grounds for disputing them and, after this notice is given, except with leave of the court, the contributory may not plead any other ground of dispute in any proceedings brought against the contributory by the trustee.

(5) If the amount to be contributed is not paid, or a notice of dispute is not sent, within the 30 day period referred to in subsection (4), the trustee may take ex parte proceedings for the recovery of the amount from the contributory in question.

(6) When the trustee receives a notice of dispute, the trustee may apply to the court to decide the issue and, within 10 days after making that application, shall send the contributory a notice of hearing of the application.

MEDIATION

105. (1) For the purposes of subsections 68(8) and 170.1(2) of the Act, the procedures governing a mediation are as set out in this section.

(2) For the purposes of this section,
- (a) the bankrupt and the trustee are always parties to the mediation;
- (b) the trustee may act either personally or through a representative;
- (c) an opposition to discharge made by a creditor or the trustee, referred to in subsection 170.1(1) of the Act, is deemed to be a request by the creditor or the trustee, as the case may be, for mediation; and
- (d) a creditor who requests mediation is a party to the mediation.

(3) For the purpose of conducting a particular mediation, the Superintendent shall designate as mediator
- (a) an employee of a Division Office, including Division Offices other than the one for the bankruptcy division in which the proceedings were commenced; or
- (b) any other person with training or experience in mediation and whom the Superintendent considers qualified.

(4) On receipt of a request for mediation from a trustee under subsection 68(6) or (7) or 170.1(1) of the Act, accompanied by the most recent income and expense statement in prescribed form completed by the bankrupt, the official receiver shall refer the matter to the mediator, who shall set the time and place for the mediation. The time set for the mediation must be within 45 days after the official receiver received the request for mediation.

(5) The mediator shall conduct the mediation with all parties physically present, unless the mediator decides to conduct the mediation by telephone conference call or by means of any other communication facilities that permit all persons participating in the mediation to communicate with each other.

(6) The mediation must be held at the Division Office, at any other place that is designated by the mediator, or, if the mediation is conducted otherwise than with all parties physically present, at any combination of places necessary for that purpose.

(7) The mediator shall send a copy of the notice of the mediation, in prescribed form, to the bankrupt, to the trustee and to any creditor who requested mediation, at least 15 days, or any shorter period that may be agreed to by all the parties concerned, before the date set for the mediation.

(8) If, at any time before the mediation has started, the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the mediation cannot proceed at the time scheduled, the mediator shall reschedule it, setting a new time and place.

(9) Except when it would constitute a second adjournment, the mediator shall, subject to subsection (13), adjourn the mediation at any time during the mediation if

(a) a party requests an adjournment and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the mediation would benefit from further negotiations or the provision of additional information;

(b) the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that one of the parties, other than the trustee in the case of a mediation requested by a creditor under subsection 170.1(1) of the Act, cannot continue the mediation for a certain period of time;

(c) all the creditors who were informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fail to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds, with respect to at least one of those creditors, that the non-appearance is neither a delaying tactic nor intended to bring the mediation into disrepute;

(d) in the case of a mediation requested by a creditor under subsection 170.1(1) of the Act, a party, other than the trustee, who was informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fails to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the non-appearance is neither a delaying tactic nor intended to bring the mediation into disrepute; or

(e) in any case other than the one referred to in paragraph (d), a party, other than a creditor, who was informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fails to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the non-appearance is neither a delaying tactic nor intended to bring the mediation into disrepute.

(10) If a mediation is rescheduled or adjourned, the new date set must be within 10 days after the date on which the rescheduling or adjournment occurs.

(11) If a mediation is rescheduled or adjourned, the mediator shall inform the parties of the new time and place.

(12) At any time during the mediation, the mediator shall, subject to subsection (13), cancel the mediation if

(a) there is an outstanding opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt by a creditor or the trustee on a ground referred to in paragraphs 173(1)(a) to (l) or (o) of the Act;
(b) the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that a party is abusing the rescheduling procedures;
(c) there has already been an adjournment and
(i) there is a request for adjournment under paragraph (9)(a), or
(ii) one of the circumstances referred to in paragraphs (9)(b) to (e) occurs;
(d) the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that one of the parties, other than the trustee in the case of a mediation requested by a creditor under subsection 170.1(1) of the Act, cannot continue the mediation at all;
(e) all the creditors who were informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fail to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds, with respect to all of those creditors, that the non-appearance is a delaying tactic or is intended to bring the mediation into disrepute;
(f) in the case of a mediation requested by a creditor under subsection 170.1(1) of the Act, a party, other than the trustee, who was informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fails to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the non-appearance is a delaying tactic or is intended to bring the mediation into disrepute; or
(g) in any case other than the one referred to in paragraph (f), a party, other than a creditor, who was informed of the mediation in accordance with subsection (7) or (11) fails to appear at the mediation and the mediator believes on reasonable grounds that the non-appearance is a delaying tactic or is intended to bring the mediation into disrepute.

(13) Despite paragraphs (9)(b) and (d) and (12)(d) and (f), the absence of one or more creditors who requested mediation, or the inability of one or more creditors who requested mediation to continue the mediation, is not a ground for adjourning or cancelling the mediation if at least one creditor who requested mediation is present at the mediation, or is able to continue the mediation, as the case may be.

(14) In the case of a mediation under section 170.1 of the Act, if all of the creditors who requested the mediation cause the cancellation of the mediation under paragraph (12)(e),
(a) the opposition to discharge on the part of each of those creditors on a ground referred to in paragraph 173(1)(m) or (n) of the Act is deemed withdrawn; and
(b) the issues submitted to mediation are deemed to have been thereby resolved for the purposes of subsection 170.1(3) of the Act.

(15) For greater certainty, if
(a) a mediation under section 68 of the Act is cancelled under any of paragraphs (12)(a) to (g), or
(b) a mediation under section 170.1 of the Act is cancelled otherwise than under paragraph (12)(e), the issues submitted to mediation are deemed to have not been thereby resolved for the purposes of subsection 68(10) or 170.1(3), as the case may be, of the Act.

(16) If a mediation is cancelled, the mediator shall send to the Division Office and the parties a notice of the cancellation, in prescribed form, setting out the grounds for the cancellation.

(17) No mediator or party to a mediation shall disclose to the public any confidential information concerning an issue submitted to mediation, unless the disclosure is
(a) required by law; or
(b) authorized by the person to whom the confidential information relates.

(18) If agreement is reached by all parties at the mediation, a mediation settlement agreement, in prescribed form and including all terms and conditions of the settlement reached, must be signed by the parties, and the mediator shall send copies of the agreement to the Division Office and the parties. The agreement is binding on the parties, subject to any subsequent court order.

(19) All payments made by a bankrupt under a mediation settlement agreement must be made to the trustee and deposited into the estate account.

(20) If the parties fail to reach agreement at the mediation, the mediator shall issue a notice in prescribed form to the effect that the issues submitted to mediation under subsection 68(6) or (7) or 170.1(1), as the case may be, of the Act were not resolved, and shall send that notice to the Division Office and the parties.

Date: 1934-06-06.

1934: March 27, 28, 29; 1934: June 6.

Present: Duff C.J. and Rinfret, Lamont, Cannon, Crocket and Hughes JJ.

Constitutional law—The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933, 23-24 Geo. V, c. 36 (Dom.)—Constitutional validity—"Bankruptcy and Insolvency" (B.N.A. Act, s. 91 (21)).

The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933, 23-24 Geo. V, c. 36, is intra vires of the Parliament of Canada. The matters dealt with come within the domain of "bankruptcy and insolvency" within the intendment of s. 91 (21) of the B.N.A. Act.

The Act discussed with regard to its aim, its features, its comparison with existing bankruptcy or insolvency legislation, and the history of bankruptcy and insolvency law.

REFERENCE to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration pursuant to the authority of s. 55 of the Supreme Court Act (R.S.C., 1927, c. 35) of the following question:

Is The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933, 23-24 Geo. V, chapter 36, ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, either in whole or in part, and, if so, in what particular or particulars, or to what extent?

L. E. Beaulieu K.C. and F. P. Varcoe K.C. for the Attorney-General for Canada.

C. Lanctôt K.C. and L. St. Laurent K.C. for the Attorney-General for Quebec.

I. A. Humphries K.C. for the Attorney-General for Ontario.

The judgment of Duff C.J. and Rinfret, Crocket and Hughes JJ. was delivered by DUFF C.J.—The history of the law seems to show clearly enough that legislation in respect of compositions and arrangements is a natural and ordinary component of a system of bankruptcy and insolvency law.

Under the Bankruptcy Act, as it now exists, proposals for compositions and arrangements cannot be dealt with before a receiving order or assignment has been made. This, however, was not always the case. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1919, a proposal for composition or arrangement could be made prior to an assignment or receiving order.

The Winding-up Act contains brief provisions, in sections 65 and 66, which, in substance, differ very little indeed from the legislation now before us; although this, no doubt, is subject to the important qualification, that the provisions of the Winding-up Act apply only in the case of a company which is in course of being wound up. Similar provisions affecting the subject matter of this legislation are to be found in Canadian legislation before and after Confederation.

The powers conferred upon the court under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933, come into operation when a compromise or arrangement is proposed between a "company which is bankrupt or insolvent or which has committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act or which is deemed insolvent within the meaning of the Winding-up Act," and its "unsecured creditors or any class of them." The important difference, as already observed, between the provisions of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and those of the Bankruptcy Act itself in relation to compromises and arrangements is that the powers of the first named Act may be exercised notwithstanding the fact that no proceedings have been taken under the Bankruptcy Act or the Winding-up Act. The Act, however, creates powers, which can be exercised in case, and only in case, of insolvency.

Furthermore, the aim of the Act is to deal with the existing condition of insolvency, in itself, to enable arrangements to be made, in view of the insolvent condition of the company, under judicial authority which, otherwise, might not be valid prior to the initiation of proceedings in bankruptcy. Ex facie it would appear that such a scheme in principle does not radically depart from the normal character of bankruptcy legislation. As Lord Cave impliedly states in Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue[1], "the exclusive legislative authority to deal with all matters within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency is vested in Parliament."

Matters normally constituting part of a bankruptcy scheme, but not in their essence matters of bankruptcy and insolvency may, of course, from another point of view and in another aspect be dealt with by a provincial legislature; but, when treated as matters pertaining to bankruptcy and insolvency, they clearly fall within the legislative authority of the Dominion.

The argument mainly pressed upon us in opposition to the validity of the legislation was that

> It does not endeavour to treat equally all contracts of debts between the debtor and his creditors but allows the interest of some of them to be sacrificed in the interest of the company and of other classes of creditors.

We think an adequate answer to this objection is put forward in the argument on behalf of the Attorney-General for the Dominion. Apart altogether from the judicial control over the proceedings, there is the circumstance that the legislation applies to insolvent companies only; and, consequently, that it is within the power of any creditor to apply for a winding-up order or a receiving order. It seems difficult, therefore, to suppose that the purpose of the legislation is to give sanction to arrangements in the exclusive interests of a single creditor or of a single class of creditors and having no relation to the benefit of the creditors as a whole. The ultimate purpose would appear to be to enable the court to sanction a compromise which, although binding upon a class of creditors only, would be beneficial to the general body of creditors as well as to the shareholders. We think it is not unimportant to note the circumstance to which our attention was called by counsel for the Attorney-General for the Dominion that the court may order shareholders to be summoned although they are not authorized to vote.

CANNON J.—This is a reference by the Governor General in Council submitting for hearing and consideration of this Court the following question:

> Is The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1933, 23-24 Geo. V, chapter 36, ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, either in whole or in part, and, if so, in what particular or particulars, or to what extent?

This Act is designed to apply to insolvent or bankrupt companies; and it is contended on behalf of the Dominion that Parliament could pass this legislation under section 91, par. 21, which gives it paramount jurisdiction to make laws concerning bankruptcy and insolvency. The provinces represent that in enacting it Parliament disregarded their exclusive jurisdiction under section 92, par. 13, in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

The whole argument before us was finally directed to one point: Are the proceedings contemplated by the Act, in pith and substance, bankruptcy or insolvency enactments within the fair and ordinary meaning of these words? One of the features which distinguishes this Act from the Bankruptcy Act now in force is that, under the latter, a composition or arrangement cannot be proceeded with before a receiving order or assignment has been made. Another difference is that under the Bankruptcy Act the secured creditor is dealt with on the footing that he may realize his security or value or surrender the same; it is only in respect of what he claims apart from the security that he is affected by the composition or arrangement. It was pointed out also that similar provisions giving binding effect to this approval by a certain majority of creditors are found in our legislation before and after Confederation.

As far as Lower Canada is concerned, it may be of interest to note that chapter 87 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, 1859, allowed the issue of a capias if the debtor "had refused to compromise or arrange with his creditors, or to make a cession de biens," and provides that the debtor may be discharged if, when the affidavit for capias was made, he had "not refused to compromise or arrange with his creditors."

Moreover, I find that, before and since Confederation, arrangements with the creditors have always been of the very essence of any system of bankruptcy or insolvency legislation. Civil rights and the sanctity of contracts are certainly affected by clause 5 under which a minority of creditors would be bound by the vote of a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of creditors present and voting, either in person or by proxy, if the agreement or compromise to which they agreed be sanctioned by the court. I find that this feature existed long before Confederation and was at that time generally accepted.

Pardessus, Droit Commercial, vol. 3, éd. 1843, p. 92, no. 1232, says:

> Cette minorité, ces absents, doivent au moins avoir l'assurance que de mûres réflexions ont dirigé ceux dont le voeu doit devenir une loi pour eux. Tel est l'objet des règles prescrites pour la validité du concordat.

Under number 1236, classes or categories having different interests are already recognized by this author, and he adds (No. 1237):

> Le concordat est valablement consenti par la majorité des créanciers présents, pourvu que les sommes dues aux personnes qui forment cette majorité égalent les trois quarts de la totalité des créances vérifiées et affirmées, ou admises par provision, dues à des créanciers ayant droit de prendre part à la délibération du concordat.

Therefore, the very clause objected to in our Act of 1933 seems to be copied from the law of bankruptcy as it existed in France in 1843, when this work was published.

Under our system and the English Bankruptcy Act of 1914, bankruptcy legislation deals with the proceedings necessary for the distribution, under judicial authority, of the property of an insolvent person among his creditors. It assumes the commission of an "act of bankruptcy" followed by a petition to the court for a receiving order for the protection of the estate. The property of the debtor then vests in an official receiver. The debtor must submit a statement of affairs to the official receiver who calls a meeting of the creditors. The debtor is examined; and if no composition or scheme of arrangement is approved, he is adjudged bankrupt; and his property becomes divisible among his creditors and vests in a trustee.

Therefore, if the proceedings under this new Act of 1933 are not, strictly speaking, "bankruptcy" proceedings, because they had not for object the sale and division of the assets of the debtor, they may, however, be considered as "insolvency proceedings" with the object of preventing a declaration of bankruptcy and the sale of these assets, if the creditors directly interested for the time being reach the conclusion that an opportune arrangement to avoid such sale would better protect their interest, as a whole or in part. Provisions for the settlement of the liabilities of the insolvent are an essential element of any insolvency legislation and were incorporated in our Insolvent Act of 1864; and such a deed of composition and discharge could be validly made either before, pending or after proceedings upon an assignment, or for the compulsory liquidation of the estate of the insolvent. What was considered as being within the scope of the word "insolvency" when it was used in section 91 of the B.N.A. Act is to be found in the preamble of the 1864 Insolvency Act, which reads:

> Whereas it is expedient that provision be made for the settlement of the estates of insolvent debtors, for giving effect to arrangements between them and their creditors, and for the punishment of fraud.

See also: Cushing v. Dupuy (1); Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue (2).

I therefore reach the conclusion that arrangements as provided for by this Act are and have been, before and since Confederation, an essential component part of any system devised to protect the creditors of insolvents and, at the same time, help the honest debtor to rehabilitate himself and obtain a discharge.

I would, therefore, answer the question submitted to us in the negative.

The question submitted is answered in the negative.

Pensions — Bankruptcy and Insolvency — Priorities — Company who was both employer and administrator of pension plans seeking protection from creditors under Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA") — Pension funds not having sufficient assets to fulfill pension promises made to plan members — Company entering into debtor in possession ("DIP") financing allowing it to continue to operate — CCAA court granting priority to DIP lenders — Proceeds of sale of business insufficient to pay back DIP lenders — Whether pension wind-up deficiencies subject to deemed trust — If so, whether deemed trust superseded by CCAA priority by virtue of doctrine of federal paramountcy — Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8, ss. 57(3), 57(4), 75(1)(a), 75(1)(b) — Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36.

Pensions — Trusts — Company who was both employer and administrator of pension plans seeking protection from creditors under CCAA — Pension funds not having sufficient assets to fulfill pension promises made to plan members — Whether pension wind-up deficiencies subject to deemed trust — Whether company as plan administrator breached fiduciary duties — Whether pension plan members are entitled to constructive trust.

Civil Procedure — Costs — Appeals — Standard of review — Whether Court of Appeal erred in costs endorsement concerning one party.

Indalex Limited ("Indalex"), the sponsor and administrator of two employee pension plans, one for salaried employees and the other for executive employees, became insolvent. Indalex sought protection from its creditors under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). The salaried plan was being wound up when the CCAA proceedings began. The executive plan had been closed but not wound up. Both plans had wind-up deficiencies.

In a series of court-sanctioned steps, the company was authorized to enter into debtor in possession ("DIP") financing in order to allow it to continue to operate. The CCAA court granted the DIP lenders, a syndicate of pre-filing senior secured creditors, priority over the claims of all other creditors. Repayment of these amounts was guaranteed by Indalex U.S.

Ultimately, with the approval of the CCAA court, Indalex sold its business but the purchaser did not assume pension liabilities. The proceeds of the sale were not sufficient to pay back the DIP lenders and so Indalex U.S., as guarantor, paid the shortfall and stepped into the shoes of the DIP lenders in terms of priority. The CCAA court authorized a payment in accordance with the priority but ordered an amount be held in reserve, leaving the plan members' arguments on their rights to the proceeds of the sale open for determination later.

The plan members challenged the priority granted in the CCAA proceedings. They claimed that they had priority in the amount of the wind-up deficiency by virtue of a statutory deemed trust under s. 57(4) of the Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8 ("PBA") and a constructive trust arising from Indalex's alleged breaches of fiduciary duty as administrator of the pension funds. The judge at first instance dismissed the plan members' motions concluding that the deemed trust did not apply to wind up deficiencies. He held that, with respect to the wind-up deficiency, the plan members were unsecured creditors. The Court of Appeal reversed this ruling and held that the pension plan wind-up deficiencies were subject to deemed and constructive trusts which had priority over the DIP financing priority and over other secured creditors. In addition, the Court of Appeal rejected a claim brought by the United Steelworkers, which represented some members of the salaried plan, seeking payment of its costs from the latter's pension fund.

Held (LeBel and Abella JJ. dissenting): The Sun Indalex Finance, George L. Miller and FTI Consulting appeals should be allowed.

Held: The United Steelworkers appeal should be dismissed.

(1) Statutory Deemed Trust

Per Deschamps and Moldaver JJ.: It is common ground that the contributions provided for in s. 75(1)(a) of the PBA are covered by the deemed trust contemplated by s. 57(4) of the PBA. The only question is whether this statutory deemed trust also applies to the wind-up deficiency payments required by s. 75(1)(b). The response to this question as it relates to the salaried employees is affirmative in view of the provision's wording, context and purpose. The situation is different with respect to the executive plan as s. 57(4) provides that the wind-up deemed trust comes into existence only when the plan is wound up.

The wind-up deemed trust provision (s. 57(4) PBA) does not place an express limit on the "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due". Section 75(1)(a) explicitly refers to "an amount equal to the total of all payments" that have accrued, even those that were not yet due as of the date of the wind-up, whereas s. 75(1)(b) contemplates an "amount" that is calculated on the basis of the value of assets and of liabilities that have accrued when the plan is wound up. Since both the amount with respect to payments (s. 75(1)(a)) and the one ascertained by subtracting the assets from the liabilities accrued as of the date of the wind-up (s. 75(1)(b)) are to be paid upon wind up as employer contributions, they are both included in the ordinary meaning of the words of s. 57(4) of the

PBA: "amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind-up but not yet due under the plan or regulations".

The time when the calculation is actually made is not relevant as long as the liabilities are assessed as of the date of the wind-up. The fact that the precise amount of the contribution is not determined as of the time of the wind up does not make it a contingent contribution that cannot have accrued for accounting purposes. As a result, the words "contributions accrued" can encompass the contributions mandated by s. 75(1)(b) of the PBA.

It can be seen from the legislative history that the protection has expanded from (1) only the service contributions that were due, to (2) amounts payable calculated as if the plan had been wound up, to (3) amounts that were due and had accrued upon wind-up but excluding the wind-up deficiency payments, to (4) all amounts due and accrued upon wind-up. Therefore, the legislative history leads to the conclusion that adopting a narrow interpretation that would dissociate the employer's payment provided for in s. 75(1)(b) of the PBA from the one provided for in s. 75(1)(a) would be contrary to the Ontario legislature's trend toward broadening the protection.

The deemed trust provision is a remedial one. Its purpose is to protect the interests of plan members. The remedial purpose favours an approach that includes all wind-up payments in the value of the deemed trust. In this case, the Court of Appeal correctly held with respect to the salaried plan, that Indalex was deemed to hold in trust the amount necessary to satisfy the wind-up deficiency.

Per LeBel and Abella JJ.: There is agreement with the reasons of Deschamps J. on the statutory deemed trust issue.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: Given that there can be no deemed trust for the executive plan because that plan had not been wound up at the relevant date, the main issue in connection with the salaried plan boils down to the narrow statutory interpretative question of whether the wind-up deficiency provided for in s. 75(1)(b) is "accrued to the date of the wind-up" as required by s. 57(4) of the PBA.

When the term "accrued" is used in relation to a sum of money, it will generally refer to an amount that is at the present time either quantified or exactly quantifiable but which may or may not be due. In the present case, s. 57(4) uses the word "accrued" in contrast to the word "due". Given the ordinary meaning of the word "accrued", the wind-up deficiency cannot be said to have "accrued" to the date of wind-up. The extent of the wind-up deficiency depends on employee rights that arise only upon wind-up and with respect to which employees make elections only after wind-up. The wind-up deficiency therefore is neither ascertained nor ascertainable on the date fixed for wind-up.

The broader statutory context reinforces the view according to which the most plausible grammatical and ordinary sense of the words "accrued to the date of wind up" is that the amounts referred to are precisely ascertained immediately before the effective date of the plan's wind-up. Moreover, the legislative evolution and history of the provisions at issue show that the legislature never intended to include the wind-up deficiency in a statutory deemed trust. Rather, they reinforce the legislative intent to exclude from the deemed trust liabilities that arise only on the date of wind-up.

The legislation differentiates between two types of employer liability relevant to this case. The first is the contributions required to cover current service costs and any other payments that are either due or have accrued on a daily basis up to the relevant time. These are the payments referred to in the current s. 75(1)(a), that is, payments due or accrued but not paid. The second relates to additional contributions required when a plan is wound up which I have referred to as the wind-up deficiency. These payments are addressed in s. 75(1)(b). The legislative history and evolution show that the deemed trusts under s. 57(3) and (4) were intended to apply only to the former amounts and that it was never the intention that there should be a deemed trust or a lien with respect to an employer's potential future liabilities that arise once the plan is wound up.

In this case, the s. 57(4) deemed trust does not apply to the wind-up deficiency. This conclusion to exclude the wind-up deficiency from the deemed trust is consistent with the broader purposes of the legislation. The legislature has created trusts over contributions that were due or accrued to the date of the wind-up in order to protect, to some degree, the rights of pension plan beneficiaries and employees from the claims of the employer's other creditors. However, there is also good reason to think that the legislature had in mind other competing objectives in not extending the deemed trust to the wind-up deficiency. While the protection of pension plans is an important objective, it is not for this Court to decide the extent to which that objective will be pursued and at what cost to other interests. The decision as to the level of protection that should be provided to pension beneficiaries under the PBA is one to be left to the Ontario legislature.

(2) Priority Ranking

Per Deschamps and Moldaver JJ.: A statutory deemed trust under provincial legislation such as the PBA continues to apply in federally-regulated CCAA proceedings, subject to the doctrine of federal paramountcy. In this case, granting priority to the DIP lenders subordinates the claims of other stakeholders, including the plan members. This court-ordered priority based on the CCAA has the same effect as a statutory priority. The federal and provincial laws are inconsistent, as they give rise to different, and conflicting, orders of priority. As a result of the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy, the DIP charge supersedes the deemed trust.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: Although there is disagreement with Deschamps J. in connection with the scope of the s. 57(4) deemed trust, it is agreed that if there was a deemed trust in this case, it would be superseded by the DIP loan because of the operation of the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

Per LeBel and Abella JJ.: There is agreement with the reasons of Deschamps J. on the priority ranking issue as determined by operation of the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

(3) Constructive Trust As A Remedy for Breach of Fiduciary Duties

Per McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: It cannot be the case that a conflict of interests arises simply because an employer, exercising its management powers in the best interests of the corporation, does something that has the potential to affect the beneficiaries of the corporation's pension plan. This conclusion flows inevitably from the statutory context. The existence of apparent conflicts that are inherent in the two roles of employer and pension plan administrator being performed by the same party cannot be a breach of fiduciary duty because those conflicts are specifically authorized by the statute which permits one party to play both roles. Rather, a situation of conflict of interest occurs when there is a substantial risk that the employer-administrator's representation of the plan beneficiaries would be materially and adversely affected by the employer-administrator's duties to the corporation.

Seeking an initial order protecting the corporation from actions by its creditors did not, on its own, give rise to any conflict of interest or duty on the part of Indalex. Likewise, failure to give notice of the initial CCAA proceedings was not a breach of fiduciary duty to avoid conflicts of interest in this case. Indalex's decision to act as an employer-administrator cannot give the plan members any greater benefit than they would have if their plan was managed by a third party administrator.

It was at the point of seeking and obtaining the DIP orders without notice to the plan beneficiaries and seeking and obtaining the sale approval order that Indalex's interests as a corporation came into conflict with its duties as a pension plan administrator. However, the difficulty that arose here was not the existence of the conflict itself, but Indalex's failure to take steps so that the plans' beneficiaries would have the opportunity to have their interests protected in the CCAA proceedings as if the plans were administered by an independent administrator. In short, the difficulty was not the existence of the conflict, but the failure to address it.

An employer-administrator who finds itself in a conflict must bring the conflict to the attention of the CCAA judge. It is not enough to include the beneficiaries in the list of creditors; the judge must be made aware that the debtor, as an administrator of the plan is, or may be, in a conflict of interest. Accordingly, Indalex breached its fiduciary duty by failing to take steps to ensure that the pension plans had the opportunity to be as fully represented in those proceedings as if there had been an independent plan administrator, particularly when it sought the DIP financing approval, the sale approval and a motion to voluntarily enter into bankruptcy.

Regardless of this breach, a remedial constructive trust is only appropriate if the wrongdoer's acts give rise to an identifiable asset which it would be unjust for the wrongdoer (or sometimes a third party) to retain. There is no evidence to support the contention that Indalex's failure to meaningfully address conflicts of interest that arose during the CCAA proceedings resulted in any such asset. Furthermore, to impose a constructive trust in response to a breach of fiduciary duty to ensure for the pension plans some procedural protections that they in fact took advantage of in any case is an unjust response in all of the circumstances.

Per Deschamps and Moldaver JJ.: A corporate employer that chooses to act as plan administrator accepts the fiduciary obligations attached to that function. Since the directors of a corporation also have a fiduciary duty to the corporation, the corporate employer must be prepared to resolve conflicts where they arise. An employer acting as a plan administrator is not permitted to disregard its fiduciary obligations to plan members and favour the competing interests of the corporation on the basis that it is wearing a "corporate hat". What is important is to consider the consequences of the decision, not its nature.

In the instant case, Indalex's fiduciary obligations as plan administrator did in fact conflict with management decisions that needed to be taken in the best interests of the corporation. Specifically, in seeking to have a court approve a form of financing by which one creditor was granted priority over all other creditors, Indalex was asking the CCAA court to override the plan members' priority. The corporation's interest was to seek the best possible avenue to survive in an insolvency context. The pursuit of this interest was not compatible with the plan administrator's duty to the plan members to ensure that all contributions were paid into the funds. In the context of this case, the plan administrator's duty to the plan members meant, in particular, that it should at least have given them the opportunity to present their arguments. This duty meant, at the very least, that they were entitled to reasonable notice of the DIP financing motion. The terms of that motion, presented without appropriate notice, conflicted with the interests of the plan members.

As for the constructive trust remedy, it is settled law that proprietary remedies are generally awarded only with respect to property that is directly related to a wrong or that can be traced to such property. There is agreement with Cromwell J. that this condition was not met in the case at bar and his reasoning on this issue is adopted. Moreover, it was unreasonable for the Court of Appeal to reorder the priorities in this case.

Per LeBel and Abella JJ. (dissenting): A fiduciary relationship is a relationship, grounded in fact and law, between a vulnerable beneficiary and a fiduciary who holds and may exercise power over the beneficiary in situations recognized by law. It follows that before entering into an analysis of the fiduciary duties of an employer as administrator of a pension plan under the PBA, it is necessary to consider the position and characteristics of the pension beneficiaries. In the present case, the beneficiaries were in a very vulnerable position relative to Indalex.

Nothing in the PBA allows that the employer qua administrator will be held to a lower standard or will be subject to duties and obligations that are less stringent than those of an independent administrator. The employer is under no obligation to assume the burdens of administering the pension plans that it has agreed to set up or that are the legacy of previous decisions. However, if it decides to do so, a fiduciary relationship is created with the expectation that the employer will be able to avoid or resolve the conflicts of interest that might arise.

Indalex was in a conflict of interest from the moment it started to contemplate putting itself under the protection of the CCAA and proposing an arrangement to its creditors. From the corporate perspective, one could hardly find fault with such a decision. It was a business decision. But the trouble is that at the same time, Indalex was a fiduciary in relation to the members and retirees of its pension plans. The solution was not to place its function as administrator and its associated fiduciary duties in abeyance. Rather, it had to abandon this role and diligently transfer its function as manager to an independent administrator.

In the present case, the employer not only neglected its obligations towards the beneficiaries, but actually took a course of action that was actively inimical to their interests. The seriousness of these breaches amply justified the decision of the Court of Appeal to impose a constructive trust.

(4) Costs in United Steelworkers Appeal

Per McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.: There is no basis to interfere with the Court of Appeal's costs endorsement as it relates to United Steelworkers in this case. The litigation undertaken here raised novel points of law with all of the uncertainty and risk inherent in such an undertaking. The Court of Appeal in essence decided that the United Steelworkers, representing only 7 of 169 members of the salaried plan, should not without consultation be able to in effect impose the risks of that litigation on all of the plan members, the vast majority of whom were not union members. There is no error in principle in the Court of Appeal's refusal to order the United Steelworkers costs to be paid out of the pension fund, particularly in light of the disposition of the appeal to this Court.

Per Deschamps and Moldaver JJ.: There is agreement with the reasons of Cromwell J. on the issue of costs in the United Steelworkers appeal.

Per LeBel and Abella JJ.: There is agreement with the reasons of Cromwell J. on the issue of costs in the United Steelworkers appeal.

DESCHAMPS J. —

[1] Insolvency can trigger catastrophic consequences. Often, large claims of ordinary creditors are left unpaid. In insolvency situations, the promise of defined benefits made to employees during their employment is put at risk. These appeals illustrate the materialization of such a risk. Although the employer in this case breached a fiduciary duty, the harm suffered by the pension plans' beneficiaries results not from that breach, but from the employer's insolvency. For the following reasons, I would allow the appeals of the appellants Sun Indalex Finance, LLC; George L. Miller, Indalex U.S.'s trustee in bankruptcy and FTI Consulting Canada ULC.

[2] To improve the prospect of pensioners receiving their full benefits after a pension plan is wound up, the Ontario legislature has protected contributions to the pension fund that have accrued but are not yet due at the time of the wind up by providing for a deemed trust that supersedes all other provincial priorities over certain assets of the plan sponsor (s. 57(4) of the Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8 ("PBA"), and s. 30(7) of the Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10 ("PPSA")). The parties disagree on the scope of the deemed trust. In my view, the relevant provisions and the context lead to the conclusion that it extends to contributions the employer must make to ensure that the pension fund is sufficient to cover liabilities upon wind up. In the instant case, however, the deemed trust is superseded by the security granted to the creditor that loaned money to the employer, Indalex Limited ("Indalex"), during the insolvency proceedings. In addition, although the employer, as plan administrator, may have put itself in a position of conflict of interest by failing to give the plan's members proper notice of a motion requesting financing of its operations during a restructuring process, there was no realistic possibility that, had the members received notice and had the CCAA court found that they were secured creditors, it would have ordered the priorities differently. Consequently, it would not be appropriate to order an equitable remedy such as the constructive trust ordered by the Court of Appeal.

I. Facts

[3] Indalex is a wholly owned Canadian subsidiary of a U.S. company, Indalex Holding Corp. ("Indalex U.S."). Indalex and its related companies formed a corporate group (the "Indalex Group") that manufactured aluminum extrusions. The U.S. and Canadian operations were closely linked.

[4] In 2009, a combination of high commodity prices and the economic recession's impact on the end-user market for aluminum extrusions plunged the Indalex Group into insolvency. On March 20, 2009, Indalex U.S. filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in Delaware. On April 3, 2009, Indalex applied for a stay under the Companies'

Digitized by Google

Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"), and Morawetz J. granted the stay in an initial order. He also appointed FTI Consulting Canada ULC (the "Monitor") to act as monitor.

[5] At that time, Indalex was the administrator of two registered pension plans. One was for its salaried employees (the "Salaried Plan"), the other for its executives (the "Executive Plan"). Members of the Salaried Plan included seven employees for whom the United Steelworkers ("USW") acted as bargaining agent. The Salaried Plan was in the process of being wound up when the CCAA proceedings began. The effective date of the wind up was December 31, 2006. The Executive Plan had been closed but not wound up. Overall, the deficiencies of the pension plans' funds concern 49 persons (members of the Salaried Plan and the Executive Plan are referred to collectively as the "Plan Members").

[6] Pursuant to the initial order made by Morawetz J. on April 3, 2009, Indalex obtained protection under the CCAA. Both plans faced funding deficiencies when Indalex filed for the CCAA stay. The wind-up deficiency of the Salaried Plan was estimated at $1.8 million as of December 31, 2008. The funding deficiency of the Executive Plan was estimated at $3.0 million on a wind-up basis as of January 1, 2008.

[7] From the beginning of the insolvency proceedings, the Indalex Group's reorganization strategy was to sell both Indalex and Indalex U.S. as a going concern while they were under CCAA and Chapter 11 protection. To this end, Indalex and Indalex U.S. sought to enter into a common agreement for debtor-in-possession ("DIP") financing under which the two companies could draw from joint credit facilities and would guarantee each other's liabilities.

[8] Indalex's financial distress threatened the interests of all the Plan Members. If the reorganization failed and Indalex were liquidated under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), they would not have recovered any of their claims against Indalex for the underfunded pension liabilities, because the priority created by the provincial statute would not be recognized under the federal legislation: Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453. Although the priority was not rendered ineffective by the CCAA, the Plan Members' position was uncertain.

[9] The Indalex Group solicited terms from a variety of possible DIP lenders. In the end, it negotiated an agreement with a syndicate consisting of the pre-filing senior secured creditors. On April 8, 2009, the CCAA court issued an Amended and Restated Initial Order ("Amended Initial Order") authorizing Indalex to borrow US$24.4 million from the DIP lenders and grant them priority over all other creditors ("DIP charge") in that amount. In his endorsement of the order, Morawetz J. made a finding that Indalex would be unable to achieve a going-concern solution without DIP financing. Such financing was necessary to support Indalex's business until the sale could be completed.

[10] The Plan Members did not participate in the initial proceedings. The initial stay had been granted ex parte. The CCAA judge ordered Indalex to serve a copy of the stay order on every creditor owed $5,000 or more within 10 days of the initial order of April 3. As of April 8, when the motion to amend the initial order was heard, none of the Executive Plan's members had been served with that order; nor did any of them receive notice of the motion to amend it. The USW did receive short notice, but chose not to attend. Morawetz J. authorized Indalex to proceed on the basis of an abridged time for service. The Plan Members were given notice of all subsequent proceedings. None of the Plan Members appealed the Amended Initial Order to contest the DIP charge.

[11] On June 12, 2009, Indalex applied for authorization to increase the DIP loan amount to US$29.5 million. At the hearing, the Executive Plan's members initially opposed the motion, seeking to reserve their rights. After it was confirmed that the motion was merely to increase the amount of the DIP charge (without changing the terms of the loan), they withdrew their opposition and the court granted the motion.

[12] On April 22, 2009, the court extended the stay of proceedings and approved a marketing process for the sale of Indalex's assets. The Plan Members did not oppose the application to approve the marketing process. Under the approved bidding procedure, the Indalex Group solicited a wide variety of potential buyers.

[13] Indalex received a bid from SAPA Holding AB ("SAPA"). It was for approximately US$30 million, and SAPA did not assume responsibility for the pension plans' wind-up deficiencies. According to the Monitor's estimate, the liquidation value of Indalex's assets was US$44.7 million. Indalex brought an application for an order approving a bidding procedure for a competitive auction and deeming SAPA's bid to be a qualifying bid. The Executive Plan's members opposed the application, expressing concern that the pension liabilities would not be assumed. Morawetz J. nevertheless issued the order on July 2, 2009; in it, he approved the bidding procedure for sale, noting that the Executive Plan's members could raise their objections at the time of approval of the final bid.

[14] The bidding procedure did not trigger any competing bids. On July 20, 2009, Indalex and Indalex U.S. brought motions before their respective courts to approve the sale of substantially all their assets under the terms of SAPA's bid. Indalex also moved for approval of an interim distribution of the sale proceeds to the DIP lenders. The Plan Members opposed Indalex's motion. First, they argued that it was estimated that a forced liquidation would produce greater proceeds than SAPA's bid. Second, they contended that their claims had priority over that of the DIP lenders because the unfunded pension liabilities were subject to a statutory deemed trust under the PBA. They also contended that Indalex had breached its fiduciary obligations by failing to meet its obligations as a plan administrator throughout the insolvency proceedings.

[15] The court dismissed the Plan Members' first objection, holding that there was no evidence supporting the argument that a forced liquidation would be more beneficial to suppliers, customers and the 950 employees. It approved the sale on July 20, 2009. The order in which it did so directed the Monitor to make a distribution to the DIP lenders. With respect to the second objection, however, Campbell J. ordered the Monitor to hold a reserve in an amount to be determined by the Monitor, leaving the Plan Members' arguments based on their right to the proceeds of the sale open for determination at a later date.

[16] The sale to SAPA closed on July 31, 2009. The Monitor collected $30.9 million in proceeds. It distributed US$17 million to the DIP lenders, paid certain fees, withheld a portion to cover various costs and retained $6.75 million in reserve pending determination of the Plan Members' rights. At the closing, Indalex owed US$27 million to the DIP lenders. The payment of US$17 million left a US$10 million shortfall in the amount owed to these lenders. The DIP lenders called on Indalex U.S. to cover this shortfall under the guarantee contained in the DIP lending agreement. Indalex U.S. paid the amount of the shortfall. Since Indalex U.S. was, as a term of the guarantee, subrogated to the DIP lenders' priority, it became the highest ranking creditor of Indalex, with a claim for US$10 million.

[17] Following the sale of Indalex's assets, its directors resigned. Indalex U.S., a part of Indalex Group, took over the management of Indalex, whose assets were limited to the sale proceeds held by the Monitor. A Unanimous Shareholder Declaration was executed on August 12, 2009; in it, Mr. Keith Cooper was appointed to manage Indalex's affairs. Mr. Cooper was an employee of FTI Consulting Inc.

[18] In accordance with the right reserved by the court on July 20, 2009, the Plan Members brought motions on August 28, 2009 for a declaration that a deemed trust equal in amount to the unfunded pension liability was enforceable against the proceeds of the sale. They contended that they had priority over the secured creditors pursuant to s. 57(4) of the PBA and s. 30(7) of the PPSA. Indalex, in turn, brought a motion for an assignment in bankruptcy to secure the priority regime it argued for in opposing the Plan Members' motions.

[19] On October 14, 2009, while judgment was pending, Indalex U.S. converted the Chapter 11 restructuring proceeding in the U.S. into a Chapter 7 liquidation proceeding. On November 5, 2009, the Superintendent of Financial Services ("Superintendent") appointed the actuarial firm of Morneau Sobeco Limited Partnership ("Morneau") to replace Indalex as administrator of the plans.

[20] On February 18, 2010, Campbell J. dismissed the Plan Members' motions, concluding that the deemed trust did not apply to the wind-up deficiencies, because the associated payments were not "due" or "accruing due" as of the date of the wind up. He found that the Executive Plan did not have a wind-up deficiency, since it had not yet been wound up. He thus found it unnecessary to rule on Indalex's motion for an assignment in bankruptcy (2010 ONSC 1114, 79 C.C.P.B. 301). The Plan Members appealed the dismissal of their motions.

[21] The Ontario Court of Appeal allowed the Plan Members' appeals. It found that the deemed trust created by s. 57(4) of the PBA applies to all amounts due with respect to plan wind-up deficiencies. Although the court noted that it was likely that no deemed trust existed for the Executive Plan on the plain meaning of the provision, it declined to address this question, because it found that the Executive Plan's members had a claim arising from Indalex's breach of its fiduciary obligations in failing to adequately protect the Plan Members' interests (2011 ONCA 265, 104 O.R. (3d) 641).

[22] The Court of Appeal concluded that a constructive trust was an appropriate remedy for Indalex's breach of its fiduciary obligations. The court was of the view that this remedy did not harm the DIP lenders, but affected only Indalex U.S. It imposed a constructive trust over the reserved fund in favour of the Plan Members. Turning to the question of distribution, it also found that the deemed trust had priority over the DIP charge because the issue of federal paramountcy had not been raised when the Amended Initial Order was issued, and that Indalex had stated that it intended to comply with any deemed trust requirements. The Court of Appeal found that there was nothing in the record to suggest that not applying the paramountcy doctrine would frustrate Indalex's ability to restructure.

[23] The Court of Appeal ordered the Monitor to make a distribution from the reserve fund in order to pay the amount of each plan's deficiency. It also issued a costs endorsement that approved payment of the costs of the Executive Plan's members from that plan's fund, but declined to order the payment of costs to the USW from the fund of the Salaried Plan (2011 ONCA 578, 81 C.B.R. (5th) 165).

[24] The Monitor, together with Sun Indalex, a secured creditor of Indalex U.S., and George L. Miller, Indalex U.S.'s trustee in bankruptcy, appeals the Court of Appeal's order. Both the Superintendent and Morneau support the Plan Members' position as respondents. A number of stakeholders are also participating in the appeals to this Court.

In addition, USW appeals the costs endorsement. As I agree with my colleague Cromwell J. on the appeal from the costs endorsement, I will not deal with it in these reasons.

II. Issues

[25] The appeals raise four issues:

1. Does the deemed trust provided for in s. 57(4) of the PBA apply to wind-up deficiencies?
2. If so, does the deemed trust supersede the DIP charge?
3. Did Indalex have any fiduciary obligations to the Plan Members when making decisions in the context of the insolvency proceedings?
4. Did the Court of Appeal properly exercise its discretion in imposing a constructive trust to remedy the breaches of fiduciary duties?

III. Analysis

A. Does the Deemed Trust Provided for in Section 57(4) of the PBA Apply to Wind-up Deficiencies?

[26] The first issue is whether the statutory deemed trust provided for in s. 57(4) of the PBA extends to wind-up deficiencies. This question is one of statutory interpretation, which requires examination of both the wording and context of the relevant provisions of the PBA. Section 57(4) of the PBA affords protection to members of a pension plan with respect to their employer's contributions upon wind up of the plan. The provision reads:

> (4) Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, an employer who is required to pay contributions to the pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations.

[27] The most obvious interpretation is that where a plan is wound up, this provision protects all contributions that have accrued but are not yet due. The words used appear to include the contribution the employer is to make where a plan being wound up is in a deficit position. This quite straightforward interpretation, which is consistent with both the historical broadening of the protection and the remedial purpose of the provision, is being challenged on the basis of a narrow definition of the word "accrued". I do not find that this argument justifies limiting the protection afforded to plan members by the Ontario legislature.

[28] The PBA sets out the rules for the operation of funded contributory defined benefit pension plans in Ontario. In an ongoing plan, an employer must pay into a fund all contributions it withholds from its employees' salaries. In addition, while the plan is ongoing, the employer must make two kinds of payments. One relates to current service contributions — the employer's own regular contributions to the pension fund as required by the plan. The other ensures that the fund is sufficient to meet the plan's liabilities. The employees' interest in having the contributions made while the plan is ongoing is protected by a deemed trust provided for in s. 57(3) of the PBA.

[29] The PBA also establishes a comprehensive scheme for winding up a pension plan. Section 75(1)(a) imposes on the employer the obligation to "pay" an amount equal to the total of all "payments" that are due or that have accrued and have not been paid into the fund. In addition, s. 75(1)(b) sets out a formula for calculating the amount that must be paid to ensure that the fund is sufficient to cover all liabilities upon wind up. Within six months after the effective date of the wind up, the plan administrator must file a wind-up report that lists the plan's assets and liabilities as of the date of the wind up. If the wind-up report shows an actuarial deficit, the employer must make wind-up deficiency payments. Consequently, s. 75(1)(a) and (b) jointly determine the amount of the contributions owed when a plan is wound up.

[30] It is common ground that the contributions provided for in s. 75(1)(a) are covered by the wind-up deemed trust. The only question is whether it also applies to the deficiency payments required by s. 75(1)(b). I would answer this question in the affirmative in view of the provision's wording, context and purpose.

[31] It is readily apparent that the wind-up deemed trust provision (s. 57(4) PBA) does not place an express limit on the "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due", and I find no reason to exclude contributions paid under s. 75(1)(b). Section 75(1)(a) explicitly refers to "an amount equal to the total of all payments" that have accrued, even those that were not yet due as of the date of the wind up, whereas s. 75(1)(b) contemplates an "amount" that is calculated on the basis of the value of assets and of liabilities that have accrued when the plan is wound up. Section 75(1) reads as follows:

> 75. (1) Where a pension plan is wound up, the employer shall pay into the pension fund,
> (a) an amount equal to the total of all payments that, under this Act, the regulations and the pension plan, are due or that have accrued and that have not been paid into the pension fund; and
> (b) an amount equal to the amount by which,

Digitized by Google

(i) the value of the pension benefits under the pension plan that would be guaranteed by the Guarantee Fund under this Act and the regulations if the Superintendent declares that the Guarantee Fund applies to the pension plan,

(ii) the value of the pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario vested under the pension plan, and

exceed the value of the assets of the pension fund allocated as prescribed for payment of pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario.

[32] Since both the amount with respect to payments (s. 75(1)(a)) and the one ascertained by subtracting the assets from the liabilities accrued as of the date of the wind up (s. 75(1)(b)) are to be paid upon wind up as employer contributions, they are both included in the ordinary meaning of the words of s. 57(4) of the PBA: "amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations". As I mentioned above, this reasoning is challenged in respect of s. 75(1)(b), not of s. 75(1)(a).

[33] The appellant Sun Indalex argues that since the deficiency is not finally quantified until well after the effective date of the wind up, the liability of the employer cannot be said to have accrued. The Monitor adds that the payments the employer must make to satisfy its wind-up obligations may change over the five-year period within which s. 31 of the PBA Regulations, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 909, requires that they be made. These parties illustrate their argument by referring to what occurred to the Salaried Plan's fund in the case at bar. In 2007-8, Indalex paid down the vast majority of the $1.6 million wind-up deficiency associated with the Salaried Plan as estimated in 2006. By the end of 2008, however, this deficiency had risen back up to $1.8 million as a result of a decline in the fund's asset value. According to this argument, the amount could not have accrued as of the date of the wind up, because it could not be calculated with certainty.

[34] Unlike my colleague Cromwell J., I find this argument unconvincing. I instead agree with the Court of Appeal on this point. The wind-up deemed trust concerns "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations". Since the employees cease to accumulate entitlements when the plan is wound up, the entitlements that are used to calculate the contributions have all been accumulated before the wind-up date. Thus the liabilities of the employer are complete — have accrued — before the wind up. The distinction between my approach and the one Cromwell J. takes is that he requires that it be possible to perform the calculation before the date of the wind up, whereas I am of the view that the time when the calculation is actually made is not relevant as long as the liabilities are assessed as of the date of the wind up. The date at which the liabilities are reported or the employer's option to spread its contributions as allowed by the regulations does not change the legal nature of the contributions.

> the word "accrued" according to well recognized usage has, as applied to rights or liabilities the meaning simply of completely constituted — and it may have this meaning although it appears from the context that the right completely constituted or the liability completely constituted is one which is only exercisable or enforceable in futuro — a debt for example which is debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro. [Emphasis added; pp. 312-13.]

[36] Thus, a contribution has "accrued" when the liabilities are completely constituted, even if the payment itself will not fall due until a later date. If this principle is applied to the facts of this case, the liabilities related to contributions to the fund allocated for payment of the pension benefits contemplated in s. 75(1)(b) are completely constituted at the time of the wind up, because no pension entitlements arise after that date. In other words, no new liabilities accrue at the time of or after the wind up. Even the portion of the contributions that is related to the elections plan members may make upon wind up has "accrued to the date of the wind up", because it is based on rights employees earned before the wind-up date.

[37] The fact that the precise amount of the contribution is not determined as of the time of the wind up does not make it a contingent contribution that cannot have accrued for accounting purposes (Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. M.N.R., (1998), 41 O.R. (3d) 606 (C.A.), at p. 621). The use of the word "accrued" does not limit liabilities to amounts that can be determined with precision. As a result, the words "contributions accrued" can encompass the contributions mandated by s. 75(1)(b) of the PBA.

[38] The legislative history supports my conclusion that wind-up deficiency contributions are protected by the deemed trust provision. The Ontario legislature has consistently expanded the protection afforded in respect of pension plan contributions. I cannot therefore accept an interpretation that would represent a drawback from the protection extended to employees. I will not reproduce the relevant provisions, since my colleague Cromwell J. quotes them.

[39] The original statute provided solely for the employer's obligation to pay all amounts required to be paid to meet the test for solvency (The Pension Benefits Act, 1965, S.O. 1965, c. 96, s. 22(2)), but the legislature subsequently afforded employees the protection of a deemed trust on the employer's assets in an amount equal to the sums withheld from employees as contributions and sums due from the employer as service contributions (s. 23*a*, added by The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1973, S.O. 1973, c. 113, s. 6). In a later version, it protected not only contributions that were due, but also those that had accrued, with the amounts being calculated as if the plan had been wound up (The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1980, S.O. 1980, c. 80).

[40] Whereas all employer contributions were originally covered by a single provision, the legislature crafted a separate provision in 1980 that specifically imposed on the employer the obligation to fund the wind-up deficiency. At the time, it was clear from the words used in the provision that the amount related to the wind-up deficiency was excluded from the deemed trust protection (The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1980). In 1983, the legislature made a distinction between the deemed trust for ongoing employer contributions and the one for certain payments to be made upon wind up (ss. 23(4)(a) and 23(4)(b), added by Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1983, S.O. 1983, c. 2, s. 3). In that version, the wind-up deficiency payments were still excluded from the deemed trust. However, the legislature once again made changes to the protection in 1987. The 1987 version is, in substance, the one that applies in the case at bar. In the Pension Benefits Act, 1987, S.O. 1987, c. 35, a specific wind-up deemed trust was maintained, but the wind up deficiency payments were no longer excluded from it, because the limitation that had been imposed until then with respect to payments that were due or had accrued while the plan was ongoing had been eliminated. My comments to the effect that the previous versions excluded the wind-up deficiency payments do not therefore apply to the 1987 statute, since it was materially different.

[41] Whereas it is clear from the 1983 amendments that the deemed trust provided for in s. 23(4)(b) was intended to include only current service costs and special payments, this is less clear from the subsequent versions of the PBA. To give meaning to the 1987 amendment, I have to conclude that the words refer to a deemed trust in respect of all "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations".

[42] The employer's liability upon wind up is now set out in a single section which elegantly parallels the wind-up deemed trust provision. It can be seen from the legislative history that the protection has expanded from (1) only the service contributions that were due, to (2) amounts payable calculated as if the plan had been wound up, to (3) amounts that were due and had accrued upon wind up but excluding the wind-up deficiency payments, to (4) all amounts due and accrued upon wind up.

[43] Therefore, in my view, the legislative history leads to the conclusion that adopting a narrow interpretation that would dissociate the employer's payment provided for in s. 75(1)(b) of the PBA from the one provided for in s. 75(1)(a) would be contrary to the Ontario legislature's trend toward broadening the protection. Since the provision respecting wind-up payments sets out the amounts that are owed upon wind up, I see no historical, legal or logical reason to conclude that the wind-up deemed trust provision does not encompass all of them.

[44] Thus, I am of the view that the words and context of s. 57(4) lend themselves easily to an interpretation that includes the wind-up deficiency payments, and I find additional support for this in the purpose of the provision. The deemed trust provision is a remedial one. Its purpose is to protect the interests of plan members. This purpose militates against adopting the limited scope proposed by Indalex and some of the interveners. In the case of competing priorities between creditors, the remedial purpose favours an approach that includes all wind-up payments in the value of the deemed trust in order to achieve a broad protection.

[45] In sum, the relevant provisions, the legislative history and the purpose are all consistent with inclusion of the wind-up deficiency in the protection afforded to members with respect to employer contributions upon the wind up of their pension plan. I therefore find that the Court of Appeal correctly held with respect to the Salaried Plan, which had been wound up as of December 31, 2006, that Indalex was deemed to hold in trust the amount necessary to satisfy the wind-up deficiency.

[46] The situation is different with respect to the Executive Plan. Unlike s. 57(3), which provides that the deemed trust protecting employer contributions exists while a plan is ongoing, s. 57(4) provides that the wind-up deemed trust comes into existence only when the plan is wound up. This is a choice made by the Ontario legislature. I would not interfere with it. Thus, the deemed trust entitlement arises only once the condition precedent of the plan being wound up has been fulfilled. This is true even if it is certain that the plan will be wound up in the future. At the time of the sale, the Executive Plan was in the process of being, but had not yet been, wound up. Consequently, the deemed trust provision does not apply to the employer's wind-up deficiency payments in respect of that plan.

[47] The Court of Appeal declined to decide whether a deemed trust arose in relation to the Executive Plan, stating that it was unnecessary to decide this issue. However, the court expressed concern that a reasoning that deprived the Executive Plan's members of the benefit of a deemed trust would mean that a company under CCAA protection could avoid the priority of the PBA deemed trust simply by not winding up an underfunded pension plan. The fear was that Indalex could have relied on its own inaction to avoid the consequences that flow from a wind up. I am not convinced that the Court of Appeal's concern has any impact on the question whether a deemed trust exists, and I doubt that an employer could avoid the consequences of such a security interest simply by refusing to wind up a pension plan. The Superintendent may take a number of steps, including ordering the wind up of a pension plan under s. 69(1) of the PBA in a variety of circumstances (see s. 69(1)(d), PBA). The Superintendent did not choose to order that the plan be wound up in this case.

B. Does the Deemed Trust Supersede the DIP Charge?

[48] The finding that the interests of the Salaried Plan's members in all the employer's wind-up contributions to the Salaried Plan are protected by a deemed trust does not mean that part of the money reserved by the Monitor from the sale proceeds must be remitted to the Salaried Plan's fund. This will be the case only if the provincial priorities provided for in s. 30(7) of the PPSA ensure that the claim of the Salaried Plan's members has priority over the DIP charge. Section 30(7) reads as follows:

> (7) A security interest in an account or inventory and its proceeds is subordinate to the interest of a person who is the beneficiary of a deemed trust arising under the Employment Standards Act or under the Pension Benefits Act.

The effect of s. 30(7) is to enable the Salaried Plan's members to recover from the reserve fund, insofar as it relates to an account or inventory and its proceeds in Ontario, ahead of all other secured creditors.

[49] The Appellants argue that any provincial deemed trust is subordinate to the DIP charge authorized by the CCAA order. They put forward two central arguments to support their contention. First, they submit that the PBA deemed trust does not apply in CCAA proceedings because the relevant priorities are those of the federal insolvency scheme, which do not include provincial deemed trusts. Second, they argue that by virtue of the doctrine of federal paramountcy the DIP charge supersedes the PBA deemed trust.

[50] The Appellants' first argument would expand the holding of Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, so as to apply federal bankruptcy priorities to CCAA proceedings, with the effect that claims would be treated similarly under the CCAA and the BIA. In Century Services, the Court noted that there are points at which the two schemes converge:

> Another point of convergence of the CCAA and the BIA relates to priorities. Because the CCAA is silent about what happens if reorganization fails, the BIA scheme of liquidation and distribution necessarily supplies the backdrop for what will happen if a CCAA reorganization is ultimately unsuccessful. [para. 23]

[51] In order to avoid a race to liquidation under the BIA, courts will favour an interpretation of the CCAA that affords creditors analogous entitlements. Yet this does not mean that courts may read bankruptcy priorities into the CCAA at will. Provincial legislation defines the priorities to which creditors are entitled until that legislation is ousted by Parliament. Parliament did not expressly apply all bankruptcy priorities either to CCAA proceedings or to proposals under the BIA. Although the creditors of a corporation that is attempting to reorganize may bargain in the shadow of their bankruptcy entitlements, those entitlements remain only shadows until bankruptcy occurs. At the outset of the insolvency proceedings, Indalex opted for a process governed by the CCAA, leaving no doubt that although it wanted to protect its employees' jobs, it would not survive as their employer. This was not a case in which a failed arrangement forced a company into liquidation under the BIA. Indalex achieved the goal it was pursuing. It chose to sell its assets under the CCAA, not the BIA.

[52] The provincial deemed trust under the PBA continues to apply in CCAA proceedings, subject to the doctrine of federal paramountcy (Crystalline Investments Ltd. v. Domgroup Ltd., 2004 SCC 3, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 60, at para. 43). The Court of Appeal therefore did not err in finding that at the end of a CCAA liquidation proceeding, priorities may be determined by the PPSA's scheme rather than the federal scheme set out in the BIA.

[53] The Appellants' second argument is that an order granting priority to the plan's members on the basis of the deemed trust provided for by the Ontario legislature would be unconstitutional in that it would conflict with the order granting priority to the DIP lenders that was made under the CCAA. They argue that the doctrine of paramountcy resolves this conflict, as it would render the provincial law inoperative to the extent that it is incompatible with the federal law.

[54] There is a preliminary question that must be addressed before determining whether the doctrine of paramountcy applies in this context. This question arises because the Court of Appeal found that although the CCAA court had the power to authorize a DIP charge that would supersede the deemed trust, the order in this case did not have such an effect because paramountcy had not been invoked. As a result, the priority of the deemed trust over secured creditors by virtue of s. 30(7) of the PPSA remained in effect, and the Plan Members' claim ranked in priority to the claim of the DIP lenders established in the CCAA order.

[55] With respect, I cannot accept this approach to the doctrine of federal paramountcy. This doctrine resolves conflicts in the application of overlapping valid provincial and federal legislation (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 32 and 69). Paramountcy is a question of law. As a result, subject to the application of the rules on the admissibility of new evidence, it can be raised even if it was not invoked in an initial proceeding.

[56] A party relying on paramountcy must "demonstrate that the federal and provincial laws are in fact incompatible by establishing either that it is impossible to comply with both laws or that to apply the provincial law would frustrate the purpose of the federal law" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 75). This Court has in fact applied the doctrine of paramountcy in the area of bankruptcy and insolvency to come to the conclusion that a provincial legislature cannot, through measures such as a deemed trust, affect priorities granted under federal legislation (Husky Oil).

[57] None of the parties question the validity of either the federal provision that enables a CCAA court to make an order authorizing a DIP charge or the provincial provision that establishes the priority of the deemed trust. However, in considering whether the CCAA court has, in exercising its discretion to assess a claim, validly affected a provincial priority, the reviewing court should remind itself of the rule of interpretation stated in Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 307 (at p. 356), and reproduced in Canadian Western Bank (at para. 75):

> When a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, such an interpretation is to be applied in preference to another applicable construction which would bring about a conflict between the two statutes.

[58] In the instant case, the CCAA judge, in authorizing the DIP charge, did not consider the fact that the Salaried Plan's members had a claim that was protected by a deemed trust, nor did he explicitly note that ordinary creditors, such as the Executive Plan's members, had not received notice of the DIP loan motion. However, he did consider factors that were relevant to the remedial objective of the CCAA and found that Indalex had in fact demonstrated that the CCAA's purpose would be frustrated without the DIP charge. It will be helpful to quote the reasons he gave on April 17, 2009 in authorizing the DIP charge ((2009), 52 C.B.R. (5th) 61):

> (a) the Applicants are in need of the additional financing in order to support operations during the period of a going concern restructuring;
> (b) there is a benefit to the breathing space that would be afforded by the DIP Financing that will permit the Applicants to identify a going concern solution;
> (c) there is no other alternative available to the Applicants for a going concern solution;
> (d) a stand-alone solution is impractical given the integrated nature of the business of Indalex Canada and Indalex U.S.;
> (e) given the collateral base of Indalex U.S., the Monitor is satisfied that it is unlikely that the Post-Filing Guarantee with respect to the U.S. Additional Advances will ever be called and the Monitor is also satisfied that the benefits to stakeholders far outweighs the risk associated with this aspect of the Post-Filing Guarantee;
> (f) the benefit to stakeholders and creditors of the DIP Financing outweighs any potential prejudice to unsecured creditors that may arise as a result of the granting of super-priority secured financing against the assets of the Applicants;
> (g) the Pre-Filing Security has been reviewed by counsel to the Monitor and it appears that the unsecured creditors of the Canadian debtors will be in no worse position as a result of the Post-Filing Guarantee than they were otherwise, prior to the CCAA filing, as a result of the limitation of the Canadian guarantee set forth in the draft Amended and Restated Initial Order . . . ; and
> (h) the balancing of the prejudice weighs in favour of the approval of the DIP Financing. [para. 9]

[59] Given that there was no alternative for a going-concern solution, it is difficult to accept the Court of Appeal's sweeping intimation that the DIP lenders would have accepted that their claim ranked below claims resulting from the deemed trust. There is no evidence in the record that gives credence to this suggestion. Not only is it contradicted by the CCAA judge's findings of fact, but case after case has shown that "the priming of the DIP facility is a key aspect of the debtor's ability to attempt a workout" (J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2007), at p. 97). The harsh reality is that lending is governed by the commercial imperatives of the lenders, not by the interests of the plan members or the policy considerations that lead provincial governments to legislate in favour of pension fund beneficiaries. The reasons given by Morawetz J. in response to the first attempt of the Executive Plan's members to reserve their rights on June 12, 2009 are instructive. He indicated that any uncertainty as to whether the lenders would withhold advances or whether they would have priority if advances were made did "not represent a positive development". He found that, in the absence of any alternative, the relief sought was "necessary and appropriate" (2009 CanLII 37906, at paras. 7 and 8).

[60] In this case, compliance with the provincial law necessarily entails defiance of the order made under federal law. On the one hand, s. 30(7) of the PPSA required a part of the proceeds from the sale related to assets described in the provincial statute to be paid to the plan's administrator before other secured creditors were paid. On the other hand, the Amended Initial Order provided that the DIP charge ranked in priority to "all other security interests, trusts, liens, charges and encumbrances, statutory or otherwise" (para. 45). Granting priority to the DIP lenders subordinates the claims of other stakeholders, including the Plan Members. This court-ordered priority based on the CCAA has the same effect as a statutory priority. The federal and provincial laws are inconsistent, as they give rise to different, and conflicting, orders of priority. As a result of the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy, the DIP charge supersedes the deemed trust.

C. Did Indalex Have Fiduciary Obligations to the Plan Members?

[61] The fact that the DIP financing charge supersedes the deemed trust or that the interests of the Executive Plan's members are not protected by the deemed trust does not mean that Plan Members have no right to receive money out of the reserve fund. What remains to be considered is whether an equitable remedy, which could override all priorities, can and should be granted for a breach by Indalex of a fiduciary duty.

[62] The first stage of a fiduciary duty analysis is to determine whether and when fiduciary obligations arise. The Court has recognized that there are circumstances in which a pension plan administrator has fiduciary obligations to plan members both at common law and under statute (Burke v. Hudson's Bay Co., 2010 SCC 34, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 273, at para. 41). It is clear that the indicia of a fiduciary relationship attach in this case between the Plan Members and Indalex as plan administrator. Sun Indalex and the Monitor do not dispute this proposition.

[63] However, Sun Indalex and the Monitor argue that the employer has a fiduciary duty only when it acts as plan administrator — when it is wearing its administrator's "hat". They contend that, outside the plan administration context, when directors make decisions in the best interests of the corporation, the employer is wearing solely its "corporate hat". On this view, decisions made by the employer in its corporate capacity are not burdened by the corporation's fiduciary obligations to its pension plan members and, consequently, cannot be found to conflict with plan members' interests. This is not the correct approach to take in determining the scope of the fiduciary obligations of an employer acting as plan administrator.

[64] Only persons or entities authorized by the PBA can act as plan administrators (ss. 1(1) and 8(1)(a)). The employer is one of them. A corporate employer that chooses to act as plan administrator accepts the fiduciary obligations attached to that function. Since the directors of a corporation also have a fiduciary duty to the corporation, the fact that the corporate employer can act as administrator of a pension plan means that s. 8(1)(a) of the PBA is based on the assumption that not all decisions taken by directors in managing a corporation will result in conflict with the corporation's duties to the plan's members. However, the corporate employer must be prepared to resolve conflicts where they arise. Reorganization proceedings place considerable burdens on any debtor, but these burdens do not release an employer that acts as plan administrator from its fiduciary obligations.

[65] Section 22(4) of the PBA explicitly provides that a plan administrator must not permit its own interest to conflict with its duties in respect of the pension fund. Thus, where an employer's own interests do not converge with those of the plan's members, it must ask itself whether there is a potential conflict and, if so, what can be done to resolve the conflict. Where interests do conflict, I do not find the two hats metaphor helpful. The solution is not to determine whether a given decision can be classified as being related to either the management of the corporation or the administration of the pension plan. The employer may well take a sound management decision, and yet do something that harms the interests of the plan's members. An employer acting as a plan administrator is not permitted to disregard its fiduciary obligations to plan members and favour the competing interests of the corporation on the basis that it is wearing a "corporate hat". What is important is to consider the consequences of the decision, not its nature.

[66] When the interests the employer seeks to advance on behalf of the corporation conflict with interests the employer has a duty to preserve as plan administrator, a solution must be found to ensure that the plan members' interests are taken care of. This may mean that the corporation puts the members on notice, or that it finds a replacement administrator, appoints representative counsel or finds some other means to resolve the conflict. The solution has to fit the problem, and the same solution may not be appropriate in every case.

[67] In the instant case, Indalex's fiduciary obligations as plan administrator did in fact conflict with management decisions that needed to be taken in the best interests of the corporation. Indalex had a number of responsibilities as plan administrator. For example, s. 56(1) of the PBA required it to ensure that contributions were paid when due. Section 56(2) required that it notify the Superintendent if contributions were not paid when due. It was also up to Indalex under s. 59 to commence proceedings to obtain payment of contributions that were due but not paid. Indalex, as an employer, paid all the contributions that were due. However, its insolvency put contributions that had accrued to the date of the wind up at risk. In an insolvency context, the administrator's claim for contributions that have accrued is a provable claim.

[68] In the context of this case, the fact that Indalex, as plan administrator, might have to claim accrued contributions from itself means that it would have to simultaneously adopt conflicting positions on whether contributions had accrued as of the date of liquidation and whether a deemed trust had arisen in respect of wind-up deficiencies. This is indicative of a clear conflict between Indalex's interests and those of the Plan Members. As soon as it saw, or ought to have seen, a potential for conflict, Indalex should have taken steps to ensure that the interests of the Plan Members were protected. It did not do so. On the contrary, it contested the position the Plan Members advanced. At the very least, Indalex breached its duty to avoid conflicts of interest (s. 22(4), PBA).

[69] Since the Plan Members seek an equitable remedy, it is important to identify the point at which Indalex should have moved to ensure that their interests were safeguarded. Before doing so, I would stress that factual contexts are needed to analyse conflicts between interests, and that it is neither necessary nor useful to attempt to map out all the situations in which conflicts may arise.

[70] As I mentioned above, insolvency puts the employer's contributions at risk. This does not mean that the decision to commence insolvency proceedings entails on its own a breach of a fiduciary obligation. The commencement of insolvency proceedings in this case on April 3, 2009 in an emergency situation was explained by Timothy R. J. Stubbs, the then-president of Indalex. The company was in default to its lender, it faced legal proceedings for unpaid bills, it had received a termination notice effective April 6 from its insurers, and suppliers had stopped supplying on credit. These circumstances called for urgent action by Indalex lest a creditor start bankruptcy proceedings and in so doing jeopardize ongoing operations and jobs. Several facts lead me to conclude that the stay sought in this case did not, in and of itself, put Indalex in a conflict of interest.

[71] First, a stay operates only to freeze the parties' rights. In most cases, stays are obtained ex parte. One of the reasons for refraining from giving notice of the initial stay motion is to avert a situation in which creditors race to court to secure benefits that they would not enjoy in insolvency. Subjecting as many creditors as possible to a single process is seen as a way to treat all of them more equitably. In this context, plan members are placed on the same footing as the other creditors and have no special entitlement to notice. Second, one of the conclusions of the order Indalex sought was that it was to be served on all creditors, with a few exceptions, within 10 days. The notice allowed any interested party to apply to vary the order. Third, Indalex was permitted to pay all pension benefits. Although the order excluded special solvency payments, no ruling was made at that point on the merits of the creditors' competing claims, and a stay gave the Plan Members the possibility of presenting their arguments on the deemed trust rather than losing it altogether as a result of a bankruptcy proceeding, which was the alternative.

[72] Whereas the stay itself did not put Indalex in a conflict of interest, the proceedings that followed had adverse consequences. On April 8, 2009, Indalex brought a motion to amend and restate the initial order in order to apply for DIP financing. This motion had been foreseen. Mr. Stubbs had mentioned in the affidavit he signed in support of the initial order that the lenders had agreed to extend their financing, but that Indalex would be in need of authorization in order to secure financing to continue its operations. However, the initial order had not yet been served on the Plan Members as of April 8. Short notice of the motion was given to the USW rather than to all the individual Plan Members, but the USW did not appear. The Plan Members were quite simply not represented on the motion to amend the initial stay order requesting authorization to grant the DIP charge.

[73] In seeking to have a court approve a form of financing by which one creditor was granted priority over all other creditors, Indalex was asking the CCAA court to override the Plan Members' priority. This was a case in which Indalex's directors permitted the corporation's best interests to be put ahead of those of the Plan Members. The directors may have fulfilled their fiduciary duty to Indalex, but they placed Indalex in the position of failing to fulfil its obligations as plan administrator. The corporation's interest was to seek the best possible avenue to survive in an insolvency context. The pursuit of this interest was not compatible with the plan administrator's duty to the Plan Members to ensure that all contributions were paid into the funds. In the context of this case, the plan administrator's duty to the Plan Members meant, in particular, that it should at least have given them the opportunity to present their arguments. This duty meant, at the very least, that they were entitled to reasonable notice of the DIP financing motion. The terms of that motion, presented without appropriate notice, conflicted with the interests of the Plan Members. Because Indalex supported the motion asking that a priority be granted to its lender, it could not at the same time argue for a priority based on the deemed trust.

[74] The Court of Appeal found a number of other breaches. I agree with Cromwell J. that none of the subsequent proceedings had a negative impact on the Plan Members' rights. The events that occurred, in particular the second DIP financing motion and the sale process, were predictable and, in a way, typical of reorganizations. Notice was given in all cases. The Plan Members were represented by able counsel. More importantly, the court ordered that funds be reserved and that a full hearing be held to argue the issues.

[75] The Monitor and George Miller, Indalex U.S.'s trustee in bankruptcy, argue that the Plan Members should have appealed the Amended Initial Order authorizing the DIP charge, and were precluded from subsequently arguing that their claim ranked in priority to that of the DIP lenders. They take the position that the collateral attack doctrine bars the Plan Members from challenging the DIP financing order. This argument is not convincing. The Plan Members did not receive notice of the motion to approve the DIP financing. Counsel for the Executive Plan's members presented the argument of that plan's members at the first opportunity and repeated it each time he had an occasion to do so. The only time he withdrew their opposition was at the hearing of the motion for authorization to increase the DIP loan amount after being told that the only purpose of the motion was to increase the amount of the authorized loan. The CCAA judge set a hearing date for the very purpose of presenting the arguments that Indalex, as plan administrator, could have presented when it requested the amendment to the initial order. It cannot now be argued, therefore, that the Plan Members are barred from defending their interests by the collateral attack doctrine.

D. Would an Equitable Remedy Be Appropriate in the Circumstances?

[76] The definition of "secured creditor" in s. 2 of the CCAA includes a trust in respect of the debtor's property. The Amended Initial Order (at para. 45) provided that the DIP lenders' claims ranked in priority to all trusts, "statutory or otherwise". Indalex U.S. was subrogated to the DIP lenders' claim by operation of the guarantee in the DIP lending agreement.

[77] Counsel for the Executive Plan's members argues that the doctrine of equitable subordination should apply to subordinate Indalex U.S.'s subrogated claim to those of the Plan Members. This Court discussed the doctrine of equitable subordination in Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558, but did not endorse it, leaving it for future determination (p. 609). I do not need to endorse it here either. Suffice to say that there is no evidence that the lenders committed a wrong or that they engaged in inequitable conduct, and no party has contested the validity of Indalex U.S.'s payment of the US$10 million shortfall.

[78] This leaves the constructive trust remedy ordered by the Court of Appeal. It is settled law that proprietary remedies are generally awarded only with respect to property that is directly related to a wrong or that can be traced to such property. I agree with my colleague Cromwell J. that this condition is not met in the case at bar. I adopt his reasoning on this issue.

[79] Moreover, I am of the view that it was unreasonable for the Court of Appeal to reorder the priorities in this case. The breach of fiduciary duty identified in this case is, in substance, the lack of notice. Since the Plan Members were allowed to fully argue their case at a hearing specifically held to adjudicate their rights, the CCAA court was in a position to fully appreciate the parties' positions.

[80] It is difficult to see what gains the Plan Members would have secured had they received notice of the motion that resulted in the Amended Initial Order. The CCAA judge made it clear, and his finding is supported by logic, that there was no alternative to the DIP loan that would allow for the sale of the assets on a going-concern basis. The Plan Members presented no evidence to the contrary. They rely on conjecture alone. The Plan Members invoke other cases in which notice was given to plan members and in which the members were able to fully argue their positions. However, in none of those cases were plan members able to secure any additional benefits. Furthermore, the Plan Members were allowed to fully argue their case. As a result, even though Indalex breached its fiduciary duty to notify the Plan Members of the motion that resulted in the Amended Initial Order, their claim remains subordinate to that of Indalex U.S.

IV. Conclusion

[81] There are good reasons for giving special protection to members of pension plans in insolvency proceedings. Parliament considered doing so before enacting the most recent amendments to the CCAA, but chose not to (An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Wage Earner Protection Program Act and chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 2005, S.C. 2007, c. 36, in force September 18, 2009, SI/2009-68; see also Bill C-501, An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and other Acts (pension protection), 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., March 24, 2010 (subsequently amended by the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, March 1, 2011)). A report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce gave the following reasons for this choice:

> Although the Committee recognizes the vulnerability of current pensioners, we do not believe that changes to the BIA regarding pension claims should be made at this time. Current pensioners can also access retirement benefits from the Canada/Quebec Pension Plan, and the Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement programs, and may have private savings and Registered Retirement

> Savings Plans that can provide income for them in retirement. The desire expressed by some of our witnesses for greater protection for pensioners and for employees currently participating in an occupational pension plan must be balanced against the interests of others. As we noted earlier, insolvency – at its essence – is characterized by insufficient assets to satisfy everyone, and choices must be made.
> The Committee believes that granting the pension protection sought by some of the witnesses would be sufficiently unfair to other stakeholders that we cannot recommend the changes requested. For example, we feel that super priority status could unnecessarily reduce the moneys available for distribution to creditors. In turn, credit availability and the cost of credit could be negatively affected, and all those seeking credit in Canada would be disadvantaged.
> Debtors and Creditors Sharing the Burden: A Review of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2003), at p. 98; see also p. 88.)

[82] In an insolvency process, a CCAA court must consider the employer's fiduciary obligations to plan members as their plan administrator. It must grant a remedy where appropriate. However, courts should not use equity to do what they wish Parliament had done through legislation.

[83] In view of the fact that the Plan Members were successful on the deemed trust and fiduciary duty issues, I would not order costs against them either in the Court of Appeal or in this Court.

[84] I would therefore allow the main appeals without costs in this Court, set aside the orders made by the Court of Appeal, except with respect to orders contained in paras. 9 and 10 of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the former executive members' appeal and restore the orders of Campbell J. dated February 18, 2010. I would dismiss USW's costs appeal without costs.

CROMWELL J. —

I. Introduction

[85] When a business becomes insolvent, many interests are at risk. Creditors may not be able to recover their debts, investors may lose their investments and employees may lose their jobs. If the business is the sponsor of an employee pension plan, the benefits promised by the plan are not immune from that risk. The circumstances leading to these appeals show how that risk can materialize. Pension plans and creditors find themselves in a zero-sum game with not enough money to go around. At a very general level, this case raises the issue of how the law balances the interests of pension plan beneficiaries with those of other creditors.

[86] Indalex Limited, the sponsor and administrator of employee pension plans, became insolvent and sought protection from its creditors under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). Although all current contributions were up to date, the company's pension plans did not have sufficient assets to fulfill the pension promises made to their members. In a series of court-sanctioned steps, which were judged to be in the best interests of all stakeholders, the company borrowed a great deal of money to allow it to continue to operate. The parties injecting the operating money were given a super priority over the claims by other creditors. When the business was sold, thereby preserving hundreds of jobs, there was a shortfall between the sale proceeds and the debt. The pension plan beneficiaries thus found themselves in a dispute about the priority of their claims. The appellant, Sun Indalex Finance LLC, claimed it had priority by virtue of the super priority granted in the CCAA proceedings. The trustee in bankruptcy of the U.S. Debtors (George Miller) and the Monitor (FTI Consulting) joined in the appeal. The plan beneficiaries claimed that they had priority by virtue of a statutory deemed trust under the Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8 ("PBA"), and a constructive trust arising from the company's alleged breaches of fiduciary duty.

[87] The Ontario Court of Appeal sided with the plan beneficiaries and Sun Indalex, the trustee in bankruptcy and the Monitor all appeal. The specific legal points in issue are:

A. Did the Court of Appeal err in finding that the statutory deemed trust provided for in s. 57(4) of the PBA applied to the salaried plan's wind-up deficiency?

B. Did the Court of Appeal err in finding that Indalex breached the fiduciary duties it owed to the pension plan beneficiaries as the plans' administrator and in imposing a constructive trust as a remedy?

C. Did the Court of Appeal err in concluding that the super priority granted in the CCAA proceedings did not have priority by virtue of the doctrine of federal paramountcy?

D. Did the Court of Appeal err in its cost endorsement respecting the United Steelworkers ("USW")?

[88] My view is that the deemed trust does not apply to the disputed funds, and even if it did, the super priority would override it. I conclude that the corporation failed in its duty to the plan beneficiaries as their administrator and that the beneficiaries ought to have been afforded more procedural protections in the CCAA proceedings. However, I also conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in using the equitable remedy of a constructive trust to defeat the super priority ordered by the CCAA judge. I would therefore allow the main appeals.

II. Facts and Proceedings Below

A. Overview

[89] These appeals concern claims by pension fund members for amounts owed to them by the plans' sponsor and administrator which became insolvent.

[90] Indalex Limited is the parent company of three non-operating Canadian companies. I will refer to both Indalex Limited individually and to the group of companies collectively as "Indalex", unless the context requires further clarity. Indalex Limited is the wholly owned subsidiary of its U.S. parent, Indalex Holding Corp. which owned and conducted related operations in the U.S. through its U.S. subsidiaries which I will refer to as the "U.S. debtors".

[91] In late March and early April of 2009, Indalex and the U.S. debtors were insolvent and sought protection from their creditors, the former under the Canadian CCAA, and the latter under the United States Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C., Chapter 11. The dispute giving rise to these appeals concern the priority granted to lenders in the CCAA process for funds advanced to Indalex and whether that priority overrides the claims of two of Indalex's pension plans for funds owed to them.

[92] Indalex was the sponsor and administrator of two registered pension plans relevant to these proceedings, one for salaried employees and the other for executive employees. At the time of seeking CCAA protection, the salaried plan was being wound up (with a wind-up date of December 31, 2006) and was estimated to have a wind-up deficiency (as of the end of 2007) of roughly $2.252 million. The executive plan, while it was not being wound up, had been closed to new members since 2005. It was estimated to have a deficiency of roughly $2.996 million on wind up. At the time the CCAA proceedings were started, all regular current service contributions had been made to both plans.

[93] Shortly after Indalex received CCAA protection, the CCAA judge authorized the company to enter into debtor in possession ("DIP") financing in order to allow it to continue to operate. The court granted the DIP lenders, a syndicate of banks, a "super priority" over "all other security interests, trusts, liens, charges and encumbrances, statutory or otherwise": initial order, at para. 35 (joint A.R., vol. I, at pp. 123-24). Repayment of these amounts was guaranteed by the U.S. debtors.

[94] Ultimately, with the approval of the CCAA court, Indalex sold its business; the purchaser did not assume pension liabilities. A reserve fund was established by the CCAA Monitor to answer any outstanding claims. The proceeds of the sale were not sufficient to pay back the DIP lenders and so the U.S. debtors, as guarantors, paid the shortfall and stepped into the shoes of the DIP lenders in terms of priority.

[95] The appellant Sun Indalex is a pre-CCAA secured creditor of both Indalex and the U.S. debtors. It claims the reserve fund on the basis that the US$10.75 million paid by the guarantors would otherwise have been available to Sun Indalex as a secured creditor of the U.S. debtors in the U.S. bankruptcy proceedings. The respondent plan beneficiaries claim the reserve fund on the basis that they have a wind-up deficiency which is covered by a deemed trust created by s. 57(4) of the PBA. This deemed trust includes "an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations" (s. 57(4)). They also claim the reserve fund on the basis of a constructive trust arising from Indalex's failure to live up to its fiduciary duties as plan administrator.

[96] The reserve fund is not sufficient to pay back both Sun Indalex and the pension plans and so the main question on the main appeals is which of the creditors is entitled to priority for their respective claims.

[97] The judge at first instance rejected the plan beneficiaries' deemed trust arguments and held that, with respect to the wind-up deficiency, the plan beneficiaries were unsecured creditors, ranking behind those benefitting from the "super priority" and secured creditors (2010 ONSC 1114, 79 C.C.P.B. 301). The Court of Appeal reversed this ruling and held that pension plan deficiencies were subject to deemed and constructive trusts which had priority over the DIP financing and over other secured creditors (2011 ONCA 265, 104 O.R. (3d) 641). Sun Indalex, the trustee in bankruptcy and the Monitor appeal.

B. Indalex's CCAA Proceedings

(1) The Initial Order (Joint A.R., vol. I, at p. 112)

[98] As noted earlier, Indalex was in financial trouble and, on April 3, 2009, sought and obtained protection from its creditors under the CCAA. The order (which I will refer to as the initial order) also contained directions for service on creditors and others: paras. 39-41. The order also contained a so-called "comeback clause" allowing any interested party to apply for a variation of the order, provided that that party served notice on any other party likely to be affected by any such variation: para. 46. It is common ground that the plan beneficiaries did not receive notice of the application for the initial order but the CCAA court nevertheless approved the method of and time for service. Full particulars of the deficiencies in the pension plans were before the court in the motion material and the initial order addressed payment of the employer's current service pension contributions.

(2) The DIP Order (Joint A.R., vol. I, at p. 129)

Digitized by Google

[99] On April 8, 2009, in what I will refer to as the DIP order, the CCAA judge, Morawetz J., authorized Indalex to borrow funds pursuant to a DIP credit agreement. The judge ordered among many other things, the following:

- He approved abridged notice: para. 1;
- He allowed Indalex to continue making current service contributions to the pension plans, but not special payments: paras. 7(a) and 9(b);
- He barred all proceedings against Indalex, except by consent of Indalex and the Monitor or leave of the court, until May 1, 2009: para. 15;
- He granted the DIP lenders a so-called super priority:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that each of the Administration Charge, the Directors' Charge and the DIP Lenders Charge (all as constituted and defined herein) shall constitute a charge on the Property and such Charges shall rank in priority to all other security interests, trust, liens, charges and encumbrances, statutory or otherwise (collectively, "Encumbrances") in favour of any Person. [Emphasis added; para. 45.]

- He required Indalex to send notice of the order to all known creditors, other than employees and creditors to which Indalex owed less than $5,000 and stated that Indalex and the Monitor were "at liberty" to serve the Initial Order to interested parties: paras. 49-50.

[100] In his endorsement for the DIP order, Morawetz J. found that "there is no other alternative available to the Applicants [Indalex] for a going concern solution" and that DIP financing was necessary: (2009), 52 C.B.R. (5th) 61 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 9(c). He noted that the Monitor in its report was of the view that approval of the DIP agreement was both necessary and in the best interests of Indalex and its stakeholders, including its creditors, employees, suppliers and customers: paras. 14-16.

[101] The USW, which represented some of the members of the salaried plan, was served with notice of the motion that led to the DIP order, but did not appear. Morawetz J. specifically ordered as follows with regard to service:

> THIS COURT ORDERS that the time for service of the Notice of Application and the Application Record is hereby abridged so that this Application is properly returnable today and hereby dispenses with further service thereof. [DIP order, at para. 1]

(3) The DIP Extension Order (Joint A.R., vol. I, at p. 156)

[102] On June 12, 2009, Morawetz J. heard and granted an application by Indalex to allow them to borrow approximately $5 million more from the DIP lenders, thus raising the allowed total to US$29.5 million.

[103] Counsel for the former executives received the motion material the night before. Counsel for USW was also served with notice. At the motion, the former executives (along with second priority secured noteholders) sought to "reserve their rights with respect to the relief sought": 2009 CanLII 37906 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 4. Morawetz J. wrote that any "reservation of rights" would create uncertainty for the DIP lenders with regard to priority, and may prevent them from extending further advances. Moreover, the parties had presented no alternative to increased DIP financing, which was both "necessary and appropriate" and would, it was to be hoped, "improve the position of the stakeholders": paras. 5-9.

(4) The Bidding Order ((2009), 79 C.C.P.B. 101 (Ont. S.C.J.))

[104] On July 2, 2009, Indalex brought a motion for approval of proposed bidding procedures for Indalex's assets. Morawetz J. decided that a stalking horse bid by SAPA Holding AB ("SAPA") for Indalex's assets could count as a qualifying bid. Counsel on behalf of the members of the executive plan appeared, with the concern that "their position and views have not been considered in this process": para. 8. In his decision, Morawetz J. decided that these arguments could be dealt with later, at a sale approval motion: para. 10. The judge said:

> The position facing the retirees is unfortunate. The retirees are currently not receiving what they bargained for. However, reality cannot be ignored and the nature of the Applicants' insolvency is such that there are insufficient assets to meet its liabilities. The retirees are not alone in this respect. The objective of these proceedings is to achieve the best possible outcome for the stakeholders. [Emphasis added; para. 9.]

[106] The first motion sought approval for the sale of Indalex's assets as a going concern to SAPA. SAPA was not to assume any pension liabilities. Campbell J. granted an order approving this sale.

[107] The second motion sought approval for an interim distribution of the sale proceeds to the DIP lenders. Counsel on behalf of the executive plan members and the USW, representing some of the salaried employees, objected to the planned distribution of the sale proceeds on grounds that a statutory deemed trust applied to the deficiencies in their plans and that Indalex had breached fiduciary duties that it owed to them. Campbell J. ordered the Monitor to pay the DIP agent from the sale proceeds, but also ordered the Monitor to set up a reserve fund in an amount sufficient to answer, among other things, the claims of the plan beneficiaries pending resolution of those matters. Campbell J. ordered that the U.S. debtors be subrogated to the DIP lenders to the extent that the U.S. debtors were required under the guarantee to satisfy the DIP lenders' claims: para. 14.

(6) The Sale and Distribution of Funds

[108] SAPA bought Indalex's assets on July 31, 2009. Taking the reserve fund into account, the sale did not produce sufficient funds to repay the DIP lenders in full and so the U.S. debtors paid US$10,751,247 as guarantor to the DIP lenders: C.A. reasons, at para. 65.

(7) The Order Under Appeal

[109] On August 28, 2009, Campbell J. heard claims by the USW (appearing on behalf of some members of the salaried plan) and counsel appearing on behalf of the executive plan members that the wind-up deficiency was subject to a deemed trust. He rejected these claims in a written decision on February 18, 2010. He decided that the s. 57(4) PBA deemed trust did not apply to wind-up deficiencies. The executive plan had not been wound up, and therefore there was no wind-up deficiency to be the subject of the deemed trust. As for the salaried plan, Campbell J. held that the wind-up deficiency was not an obligation that had "accrued to the date of the wind up" and as a result did not fall within the terms of the s. 57(4) deemed trust.

[110] Indalex had asked for the stay granted under the initial order to be lifted so that it could assign itself into bankruptcy. Because he did not find a deemed trust, Campbell J. did not feel that he needed to decide on the motion to lift the stay.

(8) The Decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal

[111] The Ontario Court of Appeal allowed an appeal from the decision of Campbell J.

[112] Writing for a unanimous panel, Gillese J.A. decided that the s. 57(4) deemed trust is applicable to wind-up deficiencies. She took the view that s. 57(4)'s reference to "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due" included all amounts that the employer owed on the wind-up of its pension plan: para. 101. In particular, she concluded that the deemed trust applied to the wind-up deficiency in the salaried plan. Gillese J.A. declined, however, to decide whether the deemed trust also applied to deficiencies in the executive plan, which had not been wound up by the relevant date: paras. 110-12. A decision on this latter point was unnecessary given her finding on the applicability of a constructive trust in this case.

[113] Gillese J.A. found that the super priority provided for in the DIP order did not trump the deemed trust over the salaried plan's wind-up deficiency. Morawetz J. had not "invoked" the issue of paramountcy or made an explicit finding that the requirements of federal law required that the provincially created deemed trust must be overridden: paras. 178-79. Gillese J.A. also took the view that this Court's decision in Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, did not mean that provincially created priorities that would be ineffective under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), were also ineffective under the CCAA: paras. 185-96. The deemed trust therefore ranked ahead of the DIP security.

[114] In addition to her findings regarding deemed trusts, Gillese J.A. granted the plan beneficiaries a constructive trust over the amount of the reserve fund on the ground that Indalex, as pension plan administrator, had breached fiduciary duties that it owed to the plan beneficiaries during the CCAA proceedings.

[115] She held that as a plan administrator who was also an employer, Indalex had fiduciary duties both to the plan beneficiaries and to the corporation: para. 129. In her view, Indalex was subject to both sets of duties throughout the CCAA proceedings and it had breached its duties to the plan beneficiaries in several ways. While Indalex had the right to initiate CCAA proceedings, this action made the plan beneficiaries vulnerable and therefore triggered its fiduciary obligations as plan administrator: paras. 132-33. Gillese J.A. enumerated the many ways in which she thought Indalex subsequently failed as plan administrator: it did nothing in the CCAA proceedings to fund the deficit in the underfunded plans; it applied for CCAA protection without notice to the beneficiaries; it obtained DIP financing on the condition that DIP lenders be granted a super priority over "statutory trusts"; it obtained this financing without notice to the plan beneficiaries; it sold its assets knowing the purchaser was not taking over the plans; and it attempted to enter into voluntary bankruptcy, which would defeat any deemed trust claims the beneficiaries might have asserted: para. 139. Gillese J.A. also noted that throughout the CCAA proceedings Indalex was in a conflict of interest because it was acting for both the corporation and the beneficiaries.

[116] Indalex's failure to live up to its fiduciary duties meant that the plan beneficiaries were entitled to a constructive trust over the amount of the reserve fund: para. 204. Since the beneficiaries had been wronged by Indalex, and the U.S. debtors were not, with respect to Indalex, an "arm's length innocent third party" the appropriate response was to grant the beneficiaries a constructive trust: para. 204. Her conclusion on this point applied equally to the salaried and executive plans.

III. Analysis

A. First Issue: Did the Court of Appeal Err in Finding That the Deemed Statutory Trust Provided for in Section 57(4) of the PBA Applied to the Salaried Plan's Wind-up Deficiency?

(1) Introduction

[117] The main issue addressed here concerns whether the statutory deemed trust provided for in s. 57(4) of the PBA applies to wind-up deficiencies, the payment of which is provided for in s. 75(1)(b).

[118] The deemed trust created by s. 57(4) applies to "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind-up but not yet due under the plan or regulations". Thus, to be subject to the deemed trust, the pension plan must be wound up and the amounts in question must meet three requirements. They must be (1) "employer contributions", (2) "accrued to the date of the wind-up" and (3) "not yet due". A wind-up deficiency arises "[w]here a pension plan is wound up": s. 75(1). I agree with my colleagues that there can be no deemed trust for the executive plan, because that plan had not been wound up at the relevant date. What follows, therefore, is relevant only to the salaried plan.

[119] The wind-up deficiency payments are "employer contributions" which are "not yet due" as of the date of wind-up within the meaning of the PBA. The main issue before us, therefore, boils down to the narrow interpretative question of whether the wind-up deficiency described in s. 75(1)(b) is "accrued to the date of the wind-up".

[120] Campbell J. at first instance found that it was not, while the Court of Appeal reached the opposite conclusion. In essence, the Court of Appeal reasoned that the deemed trust in s. 57(4) "applies to all employer contributions that are required to be made pursuant to s. 75", that is, to "all amounts owed by the employer on the wind-up of its pension plan": para. 101.

[121] I respectfully disagree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion for three main reasons. First, the most plausible grammatical and ordinary sense of the words "accrued to the date of the wind up" is that the amounts referred to are precisely ascertained immediately before the effective date of the plan's wind-up. The wind-up deficiency only arises upon wind-up and it is neither ascertained nor ascertainable on the date fixed for wind-up. Second, the broader statutory context reinforces this view: the language of the deemed trusts in s. 57(3) and (4) is virtually exactly repeated in s. 75(1)(a), suggesting that both deemed trusts refer to the liability on wind-up referred to in s. 75(1)(a) and not to the further and distinct wind-up deficiency liability created under s. 75(1)(b). Finally, the legislative evolution and history of these provisions show, in my view, that the legislature never intended to include the wind-up deficiency in a statutory deemed trust.

[122] Before turning to the precise interpretative issue, it will be helpful to provide some context about the employer's wind-up obligations and the deemed trust provisions that are the subject of this dispute.

(2) Employer Obligations on Wind Up

[123] A "wind up" means that the plan is terminated and the plan assets are distributed: see PBA, s. 1(1), definition of "wind up". The employer's liability on wind-up consists of two main components. The first is provided for in s. 75(1)(a) and includes "an amount equal to the total of all payments that, under this Act, the regulations and the pension plan, are due or that have accrued and that have not been paid into the pension fund". This liability applies to contributions that were due as at the wind-up date but does not include payments required by s. 75(1)(b) that arise as a result of the wind up: A. N. Kaplan, Pension Law (2006), at pp. 541-42. This second liability is known as the wind-up deficiency amount. The employer must pay all additional sums to the extent that the assets of the pension fund are insufficient to cover the value of all immediately vested and accelerated benefits and grow-in benefits: Kaplan, at p. 542. Without going into detail, there are certain statutory benefits that may arise only on wind-up, such as certain benefit enhancements and the potential for acceleration of pension entitlements. Thus, wind-up will usually result in additional employer liabilities over and above those arising from the obligation to pay all benefits provided for in the plan itself: see, e.g., ss. 73 and 74; Kaplan, at p. 542. As the Court of Appeal concluded, the payments provided for under s. 75(1)(a) are those which the employer had to make while the plan was ongoing, while s. 75(1)(b) refers to the employer's obligation to make up for any wind-up deficiency: paras. 90-91.

[124] For convenience, the provision as it then stood is set out here.

> 75. (1) Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, the employer shall pay into the pension fund,
> (a) an amount equal to the total of all payments that, under this Act, the regulations and the pension plan, are due or that have accrued and that have not been paid into the pension fund; and
> (b) an amount equal to the amount by which,
> (i) the value of the pension benefits under the pension plan that would be guaranteed by the Guarantee Fund under this Act and the regulations if the Superintendent declares that the Guarantee Fund applies to the pension plan,
> (ii) the value of the pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario vested under the pension plan, and

exceed the value of the assets of the pension fund allocated as prescribed for payment of pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario.

[125] While a wind up is effective as of a fixed date, a wind up is nonetheless best thought of not simply as a moment or a single event, but as a process. It begins by a triggering event and continues until all of the plan assets have been distributed. To oversimplify somewhat, the wind-up process involves the following components.

[126] The assets and liabilities of the plan as of the wind-up date must be determined. As noted earlier, the precise extent of the liability, while fixed as of that date, will not be ascertained or ascertainable on that date. The extent of the liability may depend on choices open to plan beneficiaries under the plan and on the exercise by them of certain statutory rights beyond the options that would otherwise have been available under the plan itself. The plan members must be notified of the wind-up and have their entitlements and options set out for them and given an opportunity to make their choices. The plan administrator must file a wind-up report which includes a statement of the plan's assets and liabilities, the benefits payable under the terms of the plan, and the method of allocating and distributing the assets including the priorities for the payment of benefits: PBA, s. 70(1), and R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 909, s. 29 (the "PBA Regulations").

[127] Benefits to members may take the form of "cash refunds, immediate or deferred annuities, transfers to registered retirement saving plans, [etc.] . . . In principle, the value of these benefits is the present value of the benefits accrued to the date of plan termination": The Mercer Pension Manual (loose-leaf), vol. 1, at p. 10-41. That present value is an actuarial calculation performed on the basis of various assumptions including assumptions about investment return, mortality and so forth.

[128] If, when the assets and liabilities are calculated, the assets are insufficient to satisfy the liabilities, the employer (i.e. the plan sponsor) must make up for any wind-up deficiency: PBA, s. 75(1)(b). An employer can elect to space these payments out over the course of five years: PBA Regulations, s. 31(2). Because these payments are based on the extent to which there is a deficit between assets in the pension plan and the benefits owed to beneficiaries, their amount varies with the market and other assumed elements of the calculation over the course of the permitted five years.

[129] To take the salaried plan as an example, at the time of wind-up, all regular current service contributions had been made: C.A. reasons, at para. 33. The wind-up deficiency was initially estimated to be $1,655,200. Indalex made special wind-up payments of $709,013 in 2007 and $875,313 in 2008, but as of December 31, 2008, the wind-up deficiency was $1,795,600 — i.e. higher than it had been two years before, notwithstanding that payments of roughly $1.6 million had been made: C.A. reasons, at para. 32. Indalex made another payment of $601,000 in April 2009: C.A. reasons, at para. 32.

(3) The Deemed Trust Provisions

[130] The PBA contains provisions whose purpose is to exempt money owing to a pension plan, and which is held or owing by the employer, from being seized or attached by the employer's other creditors: Kaplan, at p. 395. This is accomplished by creating a "deemed trust" with respect to certain pension contributions such that these amounts are held by the employer in trust for the employees or pension beneficiaries.

[131] There are two deemed trusts that we must examine here, one relating to employer contributions that are due but have not been paid and another relating to employer contributions accrued but not due. This second deemed trust is the one in issue here, but it is important to understand how the two fit together.

[132] The deemed trust relating to employer contributions "due and not paid" is found in s. 57(3). The PBA and PBA regulations contain many provisions relating to contributions required by employers, the due dates for which are specified. Briefly, the required contributions are these.

[133] When a pension is ongoing, employers need to make regular current service cost contributions. These are made monthly, within 30 days after the month to which they relate: PBA Regulations, s. 4(4)3. There are also special payments, which relate to deficiencies between a pension plan's assets and liabilities. There are "going-concern" deficiencies and "solvency" deficiencies, the distinction between which is unimportant for the purposes of these appeals. A plan administrator must regularly file actuarial reports, which may disclose deficiencies: PBA Regulations, s. 14. Where there is a going-concern deficiency the employer must make equal monthly payments over a 15-year period to rectify it: PBA Regulations, s. 5(1)(b). Where there is a solvency deficiency, the employer must make equal monthly payments over a five-year period to rectify it: PBA Regulations, s. 5(1)(e). Once these regular or special payments become due but have not been paid, they are subject to the s. 57(3) deemed trust.

[134] I turn next to the s. 57(4) deemed trust, which gives rise to the question before us. The subsection provides that "[w]here a pension plan is wound up . . . an employer who is required to pay contributions to the pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations."

[135] When a pension plan is wound up there will be an interrupted monthly payment period, which is sometimes referred to as the stub period. During this stub period regular and special liabilities will have accrued but not yet become due. Section 58(1) provides that money that an employer is required to pay "accrues on a daily basis". Because the amounts referred to in s. 57(4) are not yet due, they are not covered by the s. 57(3) deemed trust, which applies only to payments that are due. The two provisions, then, operate in tandem to create a trust over an employer's unfulfilled obligations, which are "due and not paid" as well as those which have "accrued to the date of the wind up but [are] not yet due".

(4) The Interpretative Approach

[136] The issue we confront is one of statutory interpretation and the well-settled approach is that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559, at para. 26. Taking this approach it is clear to me that the sponsor's obligation to pay a wind-up deficiency is not covered by the statutory deemed trust provided for in s. 57(4) of the PBA. In my view, the deficiency neither "accrued", nor did it arise within the period referred to by the words "to the date of the wind up".

(a) Grammatical and Ordinary Sense of the Words "Accrued" and "to the Date of the Wind Up"

[137] The Court of Appeal failed to take sufficient account of the ordinary and grammatical meaning of the text of the provisions. It held that "the deemed trust in s. 57(4) applies to all employer contributions that are required to be made pursuant to s. 75": para. 101 (emphasis added). However, the plain words of the section show that this conclusion is erroneous. Section 75(1)(a) refers to liability for employer contributions that "are due . . . and that have not been paid". These amounts are thus not included in the s. 57(4) deemed trust, because it addresses only amounts that have "accrued to the date of the wind up but [are] not yet due". Amounts "due" are covered by the s. 57(3) deemed trust and not, as the Court of Appeal concluded by the deemed trust created by s. 57(4). The Court of Appeal therefore erred in finding, in effect, that amounts which "are due" could be included in a deemed trust covering amounts "not yet due".

[139] In the context of s. 57(4), the grammatical and ordinary sense of the term "accrued" is that the amount of the obligation is "fully constituted" and "ascertained" although it may not yet be payable. The amount of the wind-up deficiency is not fully constituted or ascertained (or even ascertainable) before or even on the date fixed for wind up and therefore cannot fall under s. 57(4).

[140] Of course, the meaning of the word "accrued" may vary with context. In general, when the term "accrued" is used in relation to legal rights, its common meaning is that the right has become fully constituted even though the monetary implications of its enforcement are not yet known or knowable. Thus, we speak of the "accrual" of a cause of action in tort when all of the elements of the cause of action come into existence, even though the extent of the damage may well not be known or knowable at that time: see, e.g., Ryan v. Moore, 2005 SCC 38, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 53. However, when the term is used in relation to a sum of money, it will generally refer to an amount that is at the present time either quantified or exactly quantifiable but which may or may not be due.

[141] In some contexts, a liability is said to accrue when it becomes due. An accrued liability is said to be "properly chargeable" or "owing on a given day" or "completely constituted": see, e.g., Black's Law Dictionary (9th ed. 2009), at p. 997, "accrued liability"; D.A. Dukelow, The Dictionary of Canadian Law (4th ed. 2011), at p. 13, "accrued liability"; Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario v. Albright (1922), 64 S.C.R. 306.

[142] In other contexts, an amount which has accrued may not yet be due. For example, we speak of "accrued interest" meaning a precise, quantified amount of interest that has been earned but may not yet be payable. The term "accrual" is used in the same way in "accrual accounting". In accrual method accounting, "transactions that give rise to revenue or costs are recognized in the accounts when they are earned and incurred respectively": B. J. Arnold, Timing and Income Taxation: The Principles of Income Measurement for Tax Purposes (1983), at p. 44. Revenue is earned when the recipient "substantially completes performance of everything he or she is required to do as long as the amount due is ascertainable and there is no uncertainty about its collection": P. W. Hogg, J. E. Magee and J. Li, Principles of Canadian Income Tax Law (7th ed., 2010), at s. 6.5(b); see also Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, CICA Handbook – Accounting, Part II, s. 1000, at paras. 41-44. In this context, the amount must be ascertained at the time of accrual.

[143] The Hydro-Electric Power Commission case offers a helpful definition of the word "accrued" in this sense. On a sale of shares, the vendor undertook to provide on completion "a sum estimated by him to be equal to sinking fund payments [on the bonds and debentures] which shall have accrued but shall not be due at the time for completion": p. 344 (emphasis added). The bonds and debentures required the company to pay on July 1 of each year a fixed sum for each electrical horsepower sold and paid for during the preceding calendar year. A dispute arose as to what amounts were payable in this respect on completion. Duff J. held that in this context accrued meant "completely constituted", referring to this as a "well recognized usage": p. 312. He went on:

> Where . . . a lump sum is made payable on a specified date and where, having regard to the purposes of the payment or to the terms of the instrument, this sum must be considered to be made up of an accumulation of sums in respect of which the right to receive payment is completely constituted before the date fixed for payment, then it is quite within the settled usage of lawyers to describe each of such accumulated parts as a sum accrued or accrued due before the date of payment: p. 316.

Thus, at every point at which a liability to pay a fixed sum arose under the terms of the contract, that liability accrued. It was fully constituted even though not yet due because the obligation to make the payment was in the future. In reaching this conclusion, Duff J. noted that the bonds and debentures used the word "accrued" in contrast to "due" and that this strengthened the interpretation of "accrued" as an obligation fully constituted but not yet payable. Similarly in s. 57(4), the word "accrued" is used in contrast to the word "due".

[144] Given my understanding of the ordinary meaning of the word "accrued", I must respectfully disagree with my colleague, Justice Deschamps' position that the wind-up deficiency can be said to have "accrued" to the date of wind up. In her view, "[s]ince the employees cease to accumulate entitlements when the plan is wound up, the entitlements that are used to calculate the contributions have all been accumulated before the wind-up date" (para. 34) and "no new liabilities accrue at the time of or after the wind up" (para. 36). My colleague maintains that "[t]he fact that the precise amount of the contribution is not determined as of the time of the wind up does not make it a contingent contribution that cannot have accrued for accounting purposes" (para. 37 referring to Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. M.N.R. (1998), 41 O.R. (3d) 606 (C.A.)).

[145] I cannot agree that no new liability accrues on or after the wind up. As discussed in more detail earlier, the wind-up deficiency in s. 75(1)(b) is made up of the difference between the plan's assets and liabilities calculated as of the date of wind up. On wind up, the PBA accords statutory entitlements and protections to employees that would not otherwise be available: Kaplan, at p. 532. Wind up therefore gives rise to new liabilities. In particular, on wind up, and only on wind up, plan beneficiaries are entitled, under s. 74, to make elections regarding the payment of their benefits. The plan's liabilities cannot be determined until those elections are made. Contrary to what my colleague Justice Deschamps suggests, the extent of the wind-up deficiency depends on employee rights that arise only upon wind up and with respect to which employees make elections only after wind up.

[146] Moreover, the wind-up deficiency will vary after wind up because the amount of money necessary to provide for the payment of the plan sponsor's liabilities will vary with the market. Section 31 of the PBA Regulations allows s. 75 payments to be spaced out over the course of five years. As we have seen, the amount of the wind-up deficiency will fluctuate over this period (I set out earlier how this amount in fact fluctuated markedly in the case of the salaried plan in issue here). Thus, while estimates are periodically made and reported after the wind up to determine how much the employer needs to pay, the precise amount of the wind-up deficiency is not ascertained or ascertainable on the date of the wind up.

[147] I turn next to the ordinary and grammatical sense of the words "to the date of the wind up" in s. 57(4). In my view, these words indicate that only those contributions that accrue before the date of wind up, and not those amounts the liability for which arises only on the day of wind up — that is, the wind-up deficiency — are included.

[148] Where the legislature intends to include the date of wind up, it has used suitable language to effect that purpose. For example, the English version of a provision amending the PBA in 2010 (c. 24, s. 21(2)), s. 68(2)(c), indicates which trade unions are entitled to notice of the wind up:

> (2) If the employer or the administrator, as the case may be, intends to wind up the pension plan, the administrator shall give written notice of the intended wind up to,
> . . .
> (c) each trade union that represents members of the pension plan or that, on the date of the wind up, represented the members, former members or retired members of the pension plan;

In contrast to the phrase "to the date of wind up", "on the date of wind up" clearly includes the date of wind up. (The French version does not indicate a different intention.) Similarly, s. 70(6), which formed part of the PBA until 2012 (rep. S.O. 2010, c. 9, s. 52(5)), read as follows:

> (6) On the partial wind up of a pension plan, members, former members and other persons entitled to benefits under the pension plan shall have rights and benefits that are not less than the rights and benefits they would have on a full wind up of the pension plan on the effective date of the partial wind up.

The words "on the effective date of the partial wind up" indicate that the members are entitled to those benefits from the date of the partial wind up, in the sense that members can claim their benefits beginning on the date of the wind up itself. This is how the legislature expresses itself when it wants to speak of a period of time including a specific date. By comparison, "to the date of the wind up" is devoid of language that would include the actual date of wind up. This conclusion is further supported by the structure of the PBA and its legislative history and evolution, to which I will turn shortly.

[149] To sum up with respect to the ordinary and grammatical meaning of the phrase "accrued to the date of the wind up", the most plausible ordinary and grammatical meaning is that such amounts are fully constituted and precisely ascertained immediately before the date fixed as the date of wind up. Thus, according to the ordinary and grammatical meaning of the words, the wind-up deficiency obligation set out in s. 75(1)(b) has not "accrued to the date of the wind up" as required by s. 57(4). Moreover, the liability for the wind-up deficiency arises where a pension plan is wound up (s. 75(1)(b)) and so it cannot be a liability that "accrued to the date of the wind up" (s. 57(4)).

(b) The Scheme of the Act

[150] As discussed earlier, s. 57 establishes deemed trusts over funds which must be contributed to a pension plan, including the one in s. 57(4), which is at issue here. It is helpful to consider these deemed trusts in the context of the obligations to pay funds which give rise to them. Specifically, the relationship between the deemed trust provisions in s. 57(3) and (4), on one hand, and s. 75(1), which sets out liabilities on wind up on the other. According to my colleague Justice Deschamps, s. 75(1) "elegantly parallels the wind-up deemed trust provision" (para. 42) such that the deemed trusts must include the wind-up deficiency. I disagree. In my view, the deemed trusts parallel only s. 75(1)(a), which does not relate to the wind-up deficiency. The correspondence between the deemed trusts and s. 75(1)(a), and the absence of any such correspondence with s. 75(1)(b), makes it clear that the wind-up deficiency is not covered by the deemed trust provisions.

[151] I would recall here the difference between the deemed trusts created by s. 57(3) and (4). While a plan is ongoing, there may be payments which the employer is required to, but has failed to make. The s. 57(3) trust applies to these payments because they are "due and not paid". When a plan is wound up, however, there will be payments that are outstanding in the sense that they are fully constituted, but not yet due. This occurs with respect to the so-called stub period referred to earlier. During this stub period, regular and special liabilities will accrue on a daily basis, as provided for in s. 58(1), but may not be due at the time of wind up. While s. 57(3) cannot apply to these payments because they are not yet due, the deemed trust under s. 57(4) applies to these payments because liability for them has "accrued to the date of the wind up" and they are "not yet due".

[152] The important point is how these two deemed trust provisions relate to the wind-up liabilities as described in ss. 75(1)(a) and 75(1)(b). The two paragraphs refer to sums of money that are different in kind: while s. 75(1)(a) refers to liabilities that accrue before wind up and that are created elsewhere in the Act, s. 75(1)(b) creates a completely new liability that comes into existence only once the plan is wound up. There is no dispute, as I understand it, that these two paragraphs refer to different liabilities and that it is the liability described in s. 75(1)(b) that is the wind-up deficiency in issue here. The parties do not dispute that s. 75(1)(a) does not include wind-up deficiency payments.

[153] It is striking how closely the text of s. 75(1)(a) — which does not relate to the wind-up deficiency — tracks the language of the deemed trust provisions in s. 57(3) and (4). As noted, s. 57(3) deals with "employer contributions due and not paid", while s. 57(4) deals with "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due." Section 75(1)(a) includes both of these types of employer contributions. It refers to "payments that . . . are due . . . and that have not been paid" (i.e. subject to the deemed trust under s. 57(3)) or that have "accrued and that have not been paid" (i.e. subject to the deemed trust under s. 57(4) to the extent that these payments accrued to the date of wind up). This very close tracking of the language between s. 57(3) and (4) on the one hand and s. 75(1)(a) on the other, and the absence of any correspondence between the language of these deemed trust provisions with s. 75(1)(b), suggests that the s. 57(3) and (4) deemed trusts refer to the liability described in s. 75(1)(a) and not to the wind-up deficiency created by s. 75(1)(b). It is difficult to understand why, if the intention had been for s. 57(4) to capture the wind-up deficiency liability under s. 75(1)(b), the legislature would have so closely tracked the language of s. 75(1)(a) alone in creating the deemed trusts. Thus, in my respectful view, the elegant parallel to which my colleague, Justice Deschamps refers exists only between the deemed trust and s. 75(1)(a), and not between the deemed trust and the wind-up deficiency.

[154] I conclude that the scheme of the PBA reinforces my conclusion that the ordinary grammatical sense of the words in s. 57(4) does not extend to the wind-up deficiency provided for in s. 75(1)(b).

(c) Legislative History and Evolution

[155] Legislative history and evolution may form an important part of the overall context within which a provision should be interpreted. Legislative evolution refers to the various formulations of the provision while legislative history refers to evidence about the provision's conception, preparation and enactment: see, e.g., Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 471, at para. 43.

[156] Both the legislative evolution and history of the PBA show that it was never the legislature's intention to include the wind-up deficiency in the deemed trust. The evolution and history of the PBA are rather intricate and sometimes difficult to follow so I will review them briefly here before delving into a more detailed analysis.

[157] The deemed trust was first introduced into the PBA in 1973. At that time, it covered employee contributions held by the employer and employer contributions that were due but not paid. In 1980, the PBA was amended so that the deemed trust was expanded to include employer contributions whether they were due or not. Also, new provisions were added allowing for employee elections and requiring additional payments by the employer where a plan was wound up. The 1980 amendments gave rise to confusion on two fronts: first, it was unclear whether the payments that were required on wind up were subject to the deemed trust; second, it was unclear whether a lien over some employer contributions covered the same amount as the deemed trust. In 1983, both these points were clarified. The sections were reworded and rearranged to make it clear that the wind-up deficiency was distinct from the amounts covered by the deemed trust, and that the lien and the deemed trust covered the same amount. A statement by the responsible Minister in 1982 confirms that the deemed trusts were never intended to cover the wind-up deficiency.

[158] My colleague, Justice Deschamps maintains that this history suggests an evolution in the intention of the legislature from protecting "only the service contributions that were due . . . to all amounts due and accrued upon wind up" (para. 42). I respectfully disagree. In my view, the history and evolution of the PBA leading up to and including 1983 show that the legislature never intended to include the wind-up deficiency in the deemed trust. Moreover, legislative evolution after 1983 confirms that this intention did not change.

[159] So far as I can determine, statutory deemed trusts were first introduced into the PBA by The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1973, S.O. 1973, c. 113, s. 6. Those amendments created deemed trusts over two amounts: employee pension contributions received by employers (s. 23*a*(1), similar to the deemed trust in the current s. 57(1)) and employer contributions that had fallen due under the plan (s. 23*a*(3), similar to the current s. 57(3) deemed trust for employer contributions "due and not paid"). The full text of these provisions and those referred to below, up to the current version of the 1990 Act, are found in the Appendix.

(ii) The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1980, S.O. 1980, c. 80

[160] Ontario undertook significant pension reform leading to The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1980, S.O. 1980, c. 80; see Kaplan at pp. 54-56. I will concentrate on the deemed trust provisions and how they related to the liabilities on wind up and, for ease of reference, I will refer to the sections as they were renumbered in the 1980 consolidation: R.S.O. 1980, c. 373. The 1980 legislation expanded the deemed trust relating to employer contributions. Although far from clear, the new provisions appear to have created a deemed trust and lien over the employer contributions whether otherwise payable or not and calculated as if the plan had been wound up on the relevant date.

[161] It was unclear after the reforms of 1980 whether the deemed trust applied to all employer contributions that arose on wind up. According to s. 23(4), on any given date, the trust extended to an amount to be determined "as if the plan had been wound up on that date". However, the provisions of the 1980 version of the Act did not explicitly state what such a calculation would include. Under s. 21(2) of the 1980 statute, the employer was obligated to pay on wind up "all amounts that would otherwise have been required to be paid to meet the tests for solvency . . . , up to the date of such termination or winding up". Under s. 32, however, the employer had to make a payment on wind up that was to be "[i]n addition" to that due under s. 21(2). Whether the legislature intended that the trust should cover this latter payment was left unclear.

[162] It was also unclear whether the lien applied to a different amount than was subject to the deemed trust. According to s. 23(3), "the members have a lien upon the assets of the employer in such amount that in the ordinary course of business would be entered into the books of account whether so entered or not". This comes in the middle of two portions of the provision which explicitly refer to the deemed trust, but it is not clear whether the legislature intended to refer to the same amount throughout the provision.

(iii) The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1983, S.O. 1983, c. 2

[163] The 1983 amendments substantially clarified the scope of the deemed trust and lien for employer contributions. They make clear that neither the deemed trust nor the lien applied to the wind-up deficiency; the responsible Minister confirmed that this was the intention of the amendments.

[164] The new provision was amended by s. 3 of the 1983 amendments and is found in s. 23(4) which provided:

> (4) An employer who is required by a pension plan to contribute to the pension plan shall be deemed to hold in trust for the members of the pension plan an amount of money equal to the total of,

Digitized by Google

(a) all moneys that the employer is required to pay into the pension plan to meet,
(i) the current service cost, and
(ii) the special payments prescribed by the regulations, that are due under the pension plan or the regulations and have not been paid into the pension plan; and
(b) where the pension plan is terminated or wound up, any other money that the employer is liable to pay under clause 21 (2) (a).

Section 21(2)(a) provides that on wind up, the employers must pay an amount equal to the current service cost and the special payments that "have accrued to and including the date of the termination winding up but, under the terms of the pension plan or the regulations, are not due on that date"; the provision adds that these amounts shall be deemed to accrue on a daily basis. These provisions make it clear that the s. 23(4) deemed trust applies only to the special payments and current service costs that have accrued, on a daily basis, up to and including the date of wind up. The deemed trust clearly does not extend to the wind-up deficiency.

[165] The provision referring to the additional payments required on wind up also makes clear that those payments are not within the scope of the deemed trust. These additional liabilities were described by s. 32, a provision very similar to s. 75(1)(b). These amounts are first, the amount guaranteed by the Guarantee Fund and, second, the value of pension benefits vested under the plan that exceed the value of the assets of the plan. Section 32(2) specifies that these amounts are "in addition to the amounts that the employer is liable to pay under subsection 21(2)" (which are the payments comparable to the current s. 75(1)(a) payments) and that only the latter fall within the deemed trust. The inevitable conclusion is that, in 1983, the wind-up deficiency was not included in the scope of the deemed trust.

[166] The 1983 amendments also clarified the scope of the lien. They indicated that the scope of the lien was identical to the scope of the deemed trust. Section 23(5) specified that the lien extended only to the amounts that were deemed to be held in trust under s. 23(4) (i.e. the current service costs and special payments that had accrued to and including the date of the wind up but are not yet due).

[167] This makes two things clear: that the lien covers the same amounts as the deemed trust, and that neither covers the wind-up deficiency.

[168] A brief, but significant piece of legislative history seems to me to dispel any possible doubt. In speaking at first reading of the 1983 amendments, the Minister responsible, the Honourable Robert Elgie said this:

> The first group of today's amendments makes up the housekeeping changes needed for us to do what we set out to do in late 1980; that is, to guarantee pension benefits following the windup of a defined pension benefit plan. These amendments will clarify the ways in which we can attain that goal.
> In Bill 214 [i.e. the 1980 amendments] the employees were given a lien on the employer's assets for employee contributions to a pension plan collected by the employer, as well as accrued employer contributions. . . .
> Unfortunately, this protection has resulted in different legal interpretations on the extent of the lien. An argument has been advanced that the amount of the lien includes an employer's potential future liability on the windup of a pension plan. This was never intended and is not necessary to provide the required protection. The amendment to section 23 clarified the intent of Bill 214. [Emphasis added.]
> (Legislature of Ontario Debates: Official Report (Hansard), No. 99, 2nd Sess., 32nd Parl., July 7, 1982, p. 3568)

The 1983 amendments made the scope of the lien correspond precisely to the scope of the deemed trust over the employer's accrued contributions. It is thus clear from this statement that it was never the legislative intention that either should apply to "an employer's potential future liability" on wind up (i.e. the wind-up deficiency). In 1983, there is therefore, in my view, virtually irrefutable evidence of legislative intent to do exactly the opposite of what the Court of Appeal held in this case had been done.

[169] Subsequent legislative evolution shows no change in this legislative intent. In fact, subsequent amendments demonstrate a clear legislative intent to exclude from the deemed trust employer liabilities that arise only upon wind up of the plan.

(iv) Pension Benefits Act, 1987, S.O. 1987, c. 35

[170] Amendments to the PBA in 1987 resulted in it being substantially in its current form. With those amendments, the extent of the deemed trusts was further clarified. The provision in the 1983 version of the Act combined within a single subsection a deemed trust for employer contributions that were due and not paid (s. 23(4)(a)) and employer contributions that had accrued to and including the date of wind up but which were not yet due (s. 23(4)(b), referring to s. 21(2)(a)). In the 1987 amendments, these two trusts were each given their own subsection and their scope was further clarified. Moreover, after the 1987 revision, one no longer had to refer to a separate provision (formerly s.

21(2)(a)) to determine the scope of the trust covering payments that were accrued but not yet due. Thus, while the substance of the provisions did not change in 1987, their form was simplified.

[171] The new s. 58(3) (which is exactly the same as the current s. 57(3)) replaced the former s. 23(4)(a). This created a trust for employer contributions due and not paid. Section 58(4) (which is exactly the same as s. 57(4) stood at the time) replaced the former s. 23(4)(b) and part of s. 21(2)(a) and created a trust that arises on wind up and covers "employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due".

[172] The 1987 amendment also shows that the legislature adverted to the difference between "to the date of the wind up" and "to and including" the date of wind up and chose the former. This is reflected in a small but significant change in the wording of the relevant provisions. The former provision, s. 23(4)(b), by referring to s. 21(2)(a) captured current service costs and special payments that "have accrued to and including the date of the termination or winding up." The new version in s. 58(4) deletes the words "and including", putting the section in its present form. This deletion, to my way of thinking, reinforces the legislative intent to exclude from the deemed trust liabilities that arise only on the date of wind up. Respectfully, the legislative record does not support Deschamps J.'s view that there was a legislative evolution towards a more expanded deemed trust. Quite the opposite.

[173] To sum up, I draw the following conclusions from this review of the legislative evolution and history. The legislation differentiates between two types of employer liability relevant to this case. The first is the contributions required to cover current service costs and any other payments that are either due or have accrued on a daily basis up to the relevant time. These are the payments referred to in the current s. 75(1)(a), that is, payments due or accrued but not paid. The second relates to additional contributions required when a plan is wound up which I have referred to as the wind-up deficiency. These payments are addressed in s. 75(1)(b). The legislative history and evolution show that the deemed trusts under s. 57(3) and (4) were intended to apply only to the former amounts and that it was never the intention that there should be a deemed trust or a lien with respect to an employer's potential future liabilities that arise once the plan is wound up.

(d) The Purpose of the Legislation

[174] Excluding the wind-up deficiency from the deemed trust is consistent with the broader purposes of the legislation. Pension legislation aims at important protective purposes. These protective purposes, however, are not pursued at all costs and are clearly intended to be balanced with other important interests within the context of a carefully calibrated scheme: Monsanto Canada Inc. v. Ontario (Superintendent of Financial Services), 2004 SCC 54, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 152, at paras. 13-14.

[175] In this instance, the legislature has created trusts over contributions that were due or accrued to the date of the wind up in order to protect, to some degree, the rights of pension plan beneficiaries and employees from the claims of the employer's other creditors. However, there is also good reason to think that the legislature had in mind other competing objectives in not extending the deemed trust to the wind-up deficiency.

[176] First, if there were to be a deemed trust over all employer liabilities that arise when a plan is wound up, much simpler and clearer words could readily be found to achieve that objective.

[177] Second, extending the deemed trust protections to the wind-up deficiency might well be viewed as counter-productive in the greater scheme of things. A deemed trust of that nature might give rise to considerable uncertainty on the part of other creditors and potential lenders. This uncertainty might not only complicate creditors' rights, but it might also affect the availability of funds from lenders. The wind-up liability is potentially large and, while the business is ongoing, the extent of the liability is unknown and unknowable for up to five years. Its amount may, as the facts of this case disclose, fluctuate dramatically during this time. A liability of this nature could make it very difficult to assess the creditworthiness of a borrower and make an appropriate apportionment of payment among creditors extremely difficult.

[178] While I agree that the protection of pension plans is an important objective, it is not for this Court to decide the extent to which that objective will be pursued and at what cost to other interests. In her conclusion, Justice Deschamps notes that although the protection of pension plans is a worthy objective, courts should not use the law of equity to re-arrange the priorities that Parliament has established under the CCAA. This is a matter of policy where courts must defer to legislatures (reasons of Justice Deschamps, at para. 82). In my view, my colleague's comments on this point are equally applicable to the policy decisions reflected in the text of the PBA. The decision as to the level of protection that should be provided to pension beneficiaries is one to be left to the Ontario legislature. Faced with the language in the PBA, I would be slow to infer that the broader protective purpose, with all its potential disadvantages, was intended. In short, the interpretation I would adopt is consistent with a balanced approach to protection of benefits which the legislature intended.

[179] For these reasons, I am of the respectful view that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that the s. 57(4) deemed trust applied to the wind-up deficiency.

B. Second Issue: Did the Court of Appeal Err in Finding That Indalex Breached the Fiduciary Duties it Owed to the Pension Beneficiaries as the Plans' Administrator and in Imposing a Constructive Trust as a Remedy?

(1) Introduction

[180] The Court of Appeal found that during the CCAA proceedings Indalex breached its fiduciary obligations as administrator of the pension plans: para. 116. As a remedy, it imposed a remedial constructive trust over the reserve fund, effectively giving the plan beneficiaries recovery of 100 cents on the dollar in priority to all other creditors, including creditors entitled to the super priority ordered by the CCAA court.

[181] The breaches identified by the Court of Appeal fall into three categories. First, Indalex breached the prohibition against a fiduciary being in a position of conflict of interest because its interests in dealing with its insolvency conflicted with its duties as plan administrator to act in the best interests of the plans' members and beneficiaries: para. 142. According to the Court of Appeal, the simple fact that Indalex found itself in this position of conflict of interest was, of itself, a breach of its fiduciary duty as plan administrator. Second, Indalex breached its fiduciary duty by applying, without notice to the plans' beneficiaries, for CCAA protection: para. 139. Third, Indalex breached its fiduciary duty by seeking and/or obtaining various relief in the CCAA proceedings including the "super priority" in favour of the DIP lenders, approval of the sale of the business knowing that no payment would be made to the underfunded plans over the statutory deemed trusts and seeking to be put into bankruptcy with the intention of defeating the deemed trust claims: para. 139. As a remedy for these breaches of fiduciary duty the court imposed a constructive trust.

[182] In my view, the Court of Appeal took much too expansive a view of the fiduciary duties owed by Indalex as plan administrator and found breaches where there were none. As I see it, the only breach of fiduciary duty committed by Indalex occurred when, upon insolvency, Indalex's corporate interests were in obvious conflict with its fiduciary duty as plan administrator to ensure that all contributions were made to the plans when due. The breach was not in failing to avoid this conflict — the conflict itself was unavoidable. Its breach was in failing to address the conflict to ensure that the plan beneficiaries had the opportunity to have representation in the CCAA proceedings as if there were independent plan administrators. I also conclude that a remedial constructive trust is not available as a remedy for this breach.

[183] This part of the appeals requires us to answer two questions which I will address in turn:

(i) What fiduciary duties did Indalex have in its role as plan administrator and did it breach them?

(ii) If so, was imposition of a constructive trust an appropriate remedy?

(2) What Fiduciary Duties did Indalex Have in its Role as Plan Administrator and Did it Breach Those Duties?

(a) Legal Principles

[184] The appellants do not dispute that Indalex, in its role of administrator of the plans, had fiduciary duties to the members of the plan and that when it is acting in that role it can only act in the interests of the plans' beneficiaries. It is not necessary for present purposes to decide whether a pension plan administrator is a per se or ad hoc fiduciary, although it must surely be rare that a pension plan administrator would not have fiduciary duties in carrying out that role: Burke v. Hudson's Bay Co., 2010 SCC 34, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 273, at para. 41, aff'g 2008 ONCA 394, 67 C.C.P.B. 1, at para. 55.

[185] However, the conclusion that Indalex as plan administrator had fiduciary duties to the plan beneficiaries is the beginning, not the end of the inquiry. This is because fiduciary duties do not exist at large, but arise from and relate to the specific legal interests at stake: Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261, at para. 31. As La Forest J. put it in Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574:

> The obligation imposed [on a fiduciary] may vary in its specific substance depending on the relationship . . . [N]ot every legal claim arising out of a relationship with fiduciary incidents will give rise to a claim for breach of fiduciary duty. . . . It is only in relation to breaches of the specific obligations imposed because the relationship is one characterized as fiduciary that a claim for breach of fiduciary duty can be founded. [Emphasis added; pp. 646-47.]

[186] The nature and scope of the fiduciary duty must, therefore, be assessed in the legal framework governing the relationship out of which the fiduciary duty arises: see, e.g., Sharbern Holding Inc. v. Vancouver Airport Centre Ltd., 2011 SCC 23, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 175, at para. 141; Galambos v. Perez, 2009 SCC 48, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 247, at paras. 36-37; K.L.B. v. British Columbia, 2003 SCC 51, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 403, at para. 41. So, for example, as a general rule, a fiduciary has a duty of loyalty including the duty to avoid conflicts of interest: see, e.g., Strother v. 3464920 Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 24, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 177, at para. 35; Lac Minerals, at pp. 646-47. However, this general rule may have to be modified in light of the legal framework within which a particular fiduciary duty must be exercised. In my respectful view, this is such a case.

(b) The Legal Framework of Indalex's Dual Role as a Plan Administrator and Employer

[187] In order to define the nature and scope of Indalex's role and fiduciary obligations as a plan administrator, we must examine the legal framework within which the administrator functions. This framework is established primarily by the plan documents and the relevant provisions of the PBA. It is to these sources, first and foremost, that we look in order to shape the specific fiduciary duties owed in this context.

[188] Turning first to the plan documents, I take the salaried plan as an example. Under it, the company is appointed the plan administrator: art. 13.01. The term "Company" is defined to mean Indalex Limited and any reference in the plan to actions taken or discretion to be exercised by the Company means Indalex acting through the board of directors or any person authorized by the board for the purposes of the plan: art. 2.09. Article 13.01 provides that the "Management Committee of the Board of Directors of the Company will appoint a Pension and Benefits Committee to act on behalf of the Company in its capacity as administrator of the Plan. The Pension and Benefits Committee will decide conclusively all matters relating to the operation, interpretation and application of the Plan." Thus, the Pension and Benefits Committee is to act on behalf of the company and by virtue of art. 2.09 its acts are considered those of the company. Article 13.02 sets out the duties of the Pension and Benefits Committee which include the "performance of all administrative functions not performed by the Funding Agent, the Actuary or any group annuity contract issuer": art. 13.02(1).

[189] The plan administrator also has statutory powers and duties by virtue of the PBA. Section 22 lists the general duties of plan administrators, three of which are particularly relevant to these appeals:

> 22. (1) [Care, diligence and skill] The administrator of a pension plan shall exercise the care, diligence and skill in the administration and investment of the pension fund that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise in dealing with the property of another person.
> (2) [Special knowledge and skill] The administrator of a pension plan shall use in the administration of the pension plan and in the administration and investment of the pension fund all relevant knowledge and skill that the administrator possesses or, by reason of the administrator's profession, business or calling, ought to possess.
> (4) [Conflict of interest] An administrator or, if the administrator is a pension committee or a board of trustees, a member of the committee or board that is the administrator of a pension plan shall not knowingly permit the administrator's interest to conflict with the administrator's duties and powers in respect of the pension fund.

[190] Not surprisingly, the powers and duties conferred on the administrator by the legislation are administrative in nature. For the most part they pertain to the internal management of the pension fund and to the relationship among the pension administrator, the beneficiaries, and the Superintendent of Financial Services ("Superintendent"). The list includes: applying to the Superintendent for registration of the plan and any amendments to it as well as filing annual information returns: ss. 9, 12 and 20 of the PBA; providing beneficiaries and eligible potential beneficiaries with information and documents: ss. 10(1)12 and 25; ensuring that the plan is administered in accordance with the PBA and its regulations and plan documents: s. 19; notifying beneficiaries of proposed amendments to the plan that would reduce benefits: s. 26; paying commuted value for pensions: s. 42; and filing wind-up reports if the plan is terminated: s. 70.

[191] Of special relevance for this case are two additional provisions. Under s. 56, the administrator has a duty to ensure that pension payments are made when due and to notify the Superintendent if they are not and, under s. 59, the administrator has the authority to commence court proceedings when pension payments are not made.

[193] Another important aspect of the legal context for Indalex's fiduciary duties as a plan administrator is that it was acting in the dual role of an employer-administrator. This dual role is expressly permitted under s. 8(1)(a) of the PBA, but this provision creates a situation where a single entity potentially owes two sets of fiduciary duties (one to the corporation and the other to the plan members).

[194] This was the case for Indalex. As an employer-administrator, Indalex acted through its board of directors and so it was that body which owed fiduciary duties to the plan members. The board of directors also owed a fiduciary duty to the company to act in its best interests: Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44, s. 122(1)(a); BCE Inc. v. 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 560, at para. 36. In deciding what is in the best interests of the corporation, a board may look to the interests of shareholders, employees, creditors and others. But where those interests are not aligned or may conflict, it is for the directors, acting lawfully and through the exercise of business judgment, to decide what is in the overall best interests of the corporation. Thus, the board of Indalex, as an employer-administrator, could not always act exclusively in the interests of the plan beneficiaries; it also owed duties to Indalex as a corporation.

(c) Breaches of Fiduciary Duty

[195] Against the background of these legal principles, I turn to consider the Court of Appeal's findings in relation to Indalex's breach of its fiduciary duties as administrator of the plans. As noted, they fall into three categories: being in a conflict of interest position; taking steps to reduce pension obligations in the CCAA proceedings; and seeking bankruptcy status.

(i) Conflict of Interest

[196] The questions here are first what constitutes a conflict of interest or duty between Indalex as business decision-maker and Indalex as plan administrator and what must be done when a conflict arises?

[197] The Court of Appeal in effect concluded that a conflict of interest arises whenever Indalex makes business decisions that have "the potential to affect the Plans beneficiaries' rights" (para. 132) and that whenever such a conflict of interest arose, the employer-administrator was immediately in breach of its fiduciary duties to the plan members. Respectfully, this position puts the matter far too broadly. It cannot be the case that a conflict arises simply because the employer, exercising its management powers in the best interests of the corporation, does something that has the potential to affect the plan beneficiaries.

[198] This conclusion flows inevitably from the statutory context. The existence of apparent conflicts that are inherent in the two roles being performed by the same party cannot be a breach of fiduciary duty because those conflicts are specifically authorized by the statute which permits one party to play both roles. As noted earlier, the PBA specifically permits employers to act as plan administrators (s. 8(1)(a)). Moreover, the broader business interests of the employer corporation and the interests of pension beneficiaries in getting the promised benefits are almost always at least potentially in conflict. Every important business decision has the potential to put at risk the solvency of the corporation and therefore its ability to live up to its pension obligations. The employer, within the limits set out in the plan documents and the legislation generally, has the authority to amend the plan unilaterally and even to terminate it. These steps may well not serve the best interests of plan beneficiaries.

[199] Similarly, the simple existence of the sort of conflicts of interest identified by the Court of Appeal — those inherent in the employer's exercise of business judgment — cannot of themselves be a breach of the administrator's fiduciary duty. Once again, that conclusion is inconsistent with the statutory scheme that expressly permits an employer to act as plan administrator.

[200] How, then, should we identify conflicts of interest in this context?

[201] In R. v. Neil, 2002 SCC 70, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 631, Binnie J. referred to the Restatement Third, The Law Governing Lawyers (2000), at § 121, to explain when a conflict of interest occurs in the context of the lawyer-client relationship: para. 31. In my view, the same general principle, adapted to the circumstances, applies with respect to employer-administrators. Thus, a situation of conflict of interest occurs when there is a substantial risk that the employer-administrator's representation of the plan beneficiaries would be materially and adversely affected by the employer-administrator's duties to the corporation. I would recall here, however, that the employer-administrator's obligation to represent the plan beneficiaries extends only to those tasks and duties that I have described above.

[202] In light of the foregoing, I am of the view that the Court of Appeal erred when it found, in effect that a conflict of interest arose whenever Indalex was making decisions that "had the potential to affect the Plans beneficiaries' rights": para. 132. The Court of Appeal expressed both the potential for conflict of interest or duty and the fiduciary duty of the plan administrator much too broadly.

(ii) Steps in the CCAA Proceedings to Reduce Pension Obligations and Notice of Them

[203] The Court of Appeal found that Indalex breached its fiduciary duty simply by commencing CCAA proceedings knowing that the plans were underfunded and by failing to give the plan beneficiaries notice of the proceedings: para. 139. As I understand the court's reasons, the decision to commence CCAA proceedings was solely the responsibility of the corporation and not part of the administration of the pension plan: para. 131. The difficulty which the Court of Appeal saw arose from the potential of the CCAA proceedings to result in a reduction of the corporation's pension obligations to the prejudice of the beneficiaries: paras. 131–32.

[204] I respectfully disagree. Like Justice Deschamps, I find that seeking an initial order protecting the corporation from actions by its creditors did not, on its own, give rise to any conflict of interest or duty on the part of Indalex (reasons of Justice Deschamps, at para. 72).

[205] First, it is important to remember that the purpose of CCAA proceedings is not to disadvantage creditors but rather to try to provide a constructive solution for all stakeholders when a company has become insolvent. As my colleague, Deschamps J. observed in Century Services, at para. 15:

Digitized by Google

> . . . the purpose of the CCAA . . . is to permit the debtor to continue to carry on business and, where possible, avoid the social and economic costs of liquidating its assets.

In the same decision, at para. 59, Deschamps J. also quoted with approval the following passage from the reasons of Doherty J.A. in Elan Corp. v. Comiskey (1990), 41 O.A.C. 282, at para. 57 (dissenting):

> The legislation is remedial in the purest sense in that it provides a means whereby the devastating social and economic effects of bankruptcy or creditor initiated termination of ongoing business operations can be avoided while a court-supervised attempt to reorganize the financial affairs of the debtor company is made.

For this reason, I would be very reluctant to find that, simply by virtue of embarking on CCAA proceedings, an employer-administrator breaches its duties to plan members.

[206] Second, the facts of this case do not support the contention that the interests of the plan beneficiaries and the employer were in conflict with respect to the decision to seek CCAA protection. It cannot seriously be suggested that some other course would have protected more fully the rights of the plan beneficiaries. The Court of Appeal did not suggest an alternative to seeking CCAA protection from creditors, nor did any of the parties. Indalex was in serious financial difficulty and its options were limited: either make a proposal to its creditors (under the CCAA or under the BIA), or go bankrupt. Moreover, the plan administrator's duty and authority do not extend to ensuring the solvency of the corporation and an independent administrator could not reasonably expect to be consulted about the plan sponsor's decision to seek CCAA protection. Finally, the application for CCAA proceedings did not reduce pension obligations other than to temporarily relieve the corporation of making special payments and it was the only step with any prospect of the pension funds obtaining from the insolvent corporation the money that would become due. There was thus no conflict of duty or interest between the administrator and the employer when protective action was taken for the purpose of preserving the status quo for the benefit of all stakeholders.

[207] The Court of Appeal also found that it was a breach of fiduciary duty not to give the plan beneficiaries notice of the initial application for CCAA protection. Again, here, I must join Deschamps J. in disagreeing with the Court of Appeal's conclusion. Section 11(1) of the CCAA as it stood at the time of the proceedings, provided that parties could commence CCAA proceedings without giving notice to interested persons:

> 11. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Winding-up Act, where an application is made under this Act in respect of a company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, subject to this Act, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit, make an order under this section.

[208] This provision was renumbered but not substantially changed when the Act was amended in September of 2009 (S.C. 2005, c. 47, s. 128, in force Sept. 18, 2009, SI/2009-68). Although it is not appropriate in every case, CCAA courts have discretion to make initial orders on an ex parte basis. This may be an appropriate — even necessary — step in order to prevent "creditors from moving to realize on their claims, essentially a 'stampede to the assets' once creditors learn of the debtor's financial distress": J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2007), at p. 55 ("Rescue!"); see also Algoma Steel Inc., Re (2001), 25 C.B.R. (4th) 194, at para. 7. The respondents did not challenge Morawetz J.'s decision to exercise his discretion to make an ex parte order in this case.

[209] This is not to say, however, that ex parte initial orders will always be required or acceptable. Without attempting to be exhaustive or to express any final view on these issues, I simply note that there have been at least three ways in which courts have mitigated the possible negative effect on creditors of making orders without notice to potentially affected parties. First, courts have been reluctant to grant ex parte orders where the situation of the debtor company is not urgent. In Rescue!, Janis Sarra explains that courts are increasingly expecting applicants to have given notice before applying for a stay under the CCAA: p. 55. An example is Marine Drive Properties Ltd,.Re, 2009 BCSC 145, 52 C.B.R. (5th) 47, a case in which Butler J. held that "[i]nitial applications in CCAA proceedings should not be brought without notice merely because it is an application under that Act. The material before the court must be sufficient to indicate an emergent situation": para. 27. Second, courts have included "come-back" clauses in their initial orders so that parties could return to court at a later date to seek to set aside some or all of the order: Rescue!, at p. 55. Note that such a clause was included in the initial order by Morawetz J.: para. 46. Finally, courts have limited their initial orders to the issues that need to be resolved immediately and have left other issues to be resolved after all interested parties have been given notice. Thus, in Timminco Ltd., Re, 2012 ONSC 506, 85 C.B.R. (5th) 169, Morawetz J. limited the initial CCAA order so that priorities were only granted over the party that had been given notice. The discussion of suspending special payments or granting creditors priority over pension beneficiaries was left to a later date, after the parties that would be affected had been given notice. A similar approach was taken in the case of AbitibiBowater inc.(Arrangement relatif à), 2009 QCCS 6459 (CanLII). In his initial CCAA order, Gascon J. put off the decision regarding the suspension of past service contributions or special payments to the pension plans in question until the parties likely to be affected could be advised of the applicant's request: para. 7.

[210] Failure to give notice of the initial CCAA proceedings was not a breach of fiduciary duty in this case. Indalex's decision to act as an employer-administrator cannot give the plan beneficiaries any greater benefit than they would have if their plan was managed by a third party administrator. Had there been a third party administrator in this case, Indalex would not have been under an obligation to tell the administrator that it was planning to enter CCAA proceedings. The respondents are asking this Court to give the advantage of Indalex's knowledge as employer to Indalex as the plan administrator in circumstances where the employer would have been unlikely to disclose the information itself. I am not prepared to blur the line between employers and administrators in this way.

[211] I conclude that Indalex did not breach its fiduciary duty by commencing CCAA proceedings or by not giving notice to the plan beneficiaries of its intention to seek the initial CCAA order.

[212] I turn next to the Court of Appeal's conclusion that seeking and obtaining the DIP orders without notice to the plan beneficiaries and seeking and obtaining the sale approval order constituted breaches of fiduciary duty.

[213] To begin, I agree with the Court of Appeal that "just because the initial decision to commence CCAA proceedings is solely a corporate one . . . does not mean that all subsequent decisions made during the proceedings are also solely corporate ones": para. 132. It was at this point that Indalex's interests as a corporation came into conflict with its duties as a pension plan administrator.

[214] The DIP orders could easily have the effect of making it impossible for Indalex to satisfy its funding obligations to the plan beneficiaries. When Indalex, through the exercise of business judgment, sought CCAA orders that would or might have this effect, it was in conflict with its duty as plan administrator to ensure that all contributions were paid when due.

[215] I do not think, however, that the simple existence of this conflict of interest and duty, on its own, was a breach of fiduciary duty in these circumstances. As discussed earlier, the PBA expressly permits an employer to be a pension administrator and the statutory provisions about conflict of interest must be understood and applied in light of that fact. Moreover, an independent plan administrator would have no decision-making role with respect to the conduct of CCAA proceedings. So in my view, the difficulty that arose here was not the existence of the conflict itself, but Indalex's failure to take steps so that the plan beneficiaries would have the opportunity to have their interests protected in the CCAA proceedings as if the plans were administered by an independent administrator. In short, the difficulty was not the existence of the conflict, but the failure to address it.

[216] Despite Indalex's failure to address its conflict of interest, the plan beneficiaries, through their own efforts, were represented at subsequent steps in the CCAA proceedings. The effect of Indalex's breach was therefore mitigated, a point which I will discuss in greater detail when I turn to the issue of the constructive trust.

[217] Nevertheless, for the purposes of providing some guidance for future CCAA proceedings, I take this opportunity to briefly address what an employer-administrator can do to respond to these sorts of conflicts. First and foremost, an employer-administrator who finds itself in a conflict must bring the conflict to the attention of the CCAA judge. It is not enough to include the beneficiaries in the list of creditors; the judge must be made aware that the debtor, as an administrator of the plan is, or may be, in a conflict of interest.

[218] Given their expertise and their knowledge of particular cases, CCAA judges are well placed to decide how best to ensure that the interests of the plan beneficiaries are fully represented in the context of "real-time" litigation under the CCAA. Knowing of the conflict, a CCAA judge might consider it appropriate to appoint an independent administrator or independent counsel as amicus curiae on terms appropriate to the particular case. Indeed, there have been cases in which representative counsel have been appointed to represent tort claimants, clients, pensioners and non-unionized employees in CCAA proceedings on terms determined by the judge: Rescue!, at p. 278; see, e.g., First Leaside Wealth Management Inc. (Re), 2012 ONSC 1299 (CanLII); Nortel Networks Corp., Re, (2009), 75 C.C.P.B. 206 (Ont. S.C.J.). In other circumstances, a CCAA judge might find that it is feasible to give notice directly to the pension beneficiaries. In my view, notice, though desirable, may not always be feasible and decisions on such matters should be left to the judicial discretion of the CCAA judge. Alternatively, the judge might consider limiting draws on the DIP facility until notice can be given to the beneficiaries: Royal Oak Mines Inc., Re (1999), 6 C.B.R. (4th) 314 (Ont. Ct. J. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 24. Ultimately, the appropriate response or combination of responses should be left to the discretion of the CCAA judge in a particular case. The point, as well expressed by the Court of Appeal, is that the insolvent corporation which is also a pension plan administrator cannot "simply ignore its obligations as the Plans' administrator once it decided to seek CCAA protection": para. 132.

[219] I conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that Indalex breached its fiduciary duties as plan administrator by taking the various steps it did in the CCAA proceedings. However, I agree with the Court of Appeal that it breached its fiduciary duty by failing to take steps to ensure that the plan beneficiaries had the opportunity to be as fully represented in those proceedings as if there had been an independent plan administrator.

(iii) The Bankruptcy Motion

[220] Indalex also applied to lift the CCAA stay so that it could file an assignment into bankruptcy. As Campbell J. put it, this was done "to ensure the priority regime [it] urged as the basis for resisting the deemed trust": para. 52. The Court of Appeal concluded that this was a breach of Indalex's fiduciary duties because the motion was brought "with the intention of defeating the deemed trust claims and ensuring that the Reserve Fund was transferred to [the U.S. debtors]": para. 139. I respectfully disagree.

[221] It was certainly open to Indalex as an employer to bring a motion to voluntarily enter into bankruptcy. A pension plan administrator has no responsibility or authority in relation to that step. The problem here is not that the motion was brought, but that Indalex failed to meaningfully address the conflict between its corporate interests and its duties as plan administrator.

[222] To sum up, I conclude that Indalex did not breach any fiduciary duty by undertaking CCAA proceedings or seeking the relief that it did. The breach arose from Indalex's failure to ensure that its pension plan beneficiaries had the opportunity to have their interests effectively represented in the insolvency proceedings, particularly when Indalex sought the DIP financing approval, the sale approval and the motion for bankruptcy.

(3) Was Imposing a Constructive Trust Appropriate in This Case?

[223] The next issue is whether a remedial constructive trust is, as the Court of Appeal concluded, an appropriate remedy in response to the breach of fiduciary duty.

[224] The Court of Appeal exercised its discretion to impose a constructive trust and its exercise of this discretion is entitled to deference. Only if the discretion has been exercised on the basis of an erroneous principle should the order be overturned on appeal: Donkin v. Bugoy, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 85, cited in Soulos v. Korkontzilas, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 54, by Sopinka J. (dissenting, but not on this point). In my respectful view, the Court of Appeal's erroneous conclusions about the scope of a plan administrator's fiduciary duties require us to examine the constructive trust issue anew. Moreover, the Court of Appeal, in my respectful opinion, erred in principle in finding that the asset in this case resulted from the breach of fiduciary duty such that it would be unjust for the party in breach to retain it.

[225] As noted earlier, the Court of Appeal imposed a constructive trust in favour of the plan beneficiaries with respect to funds retained in the reserve fund equal to the total amount of the wind-up deficiency for both plans. In other words, upon insolvency of Indalex, the plan beneficiaries received 100 cents on the dollar as a result of a judicially imposed trust taking priority over secured creditors, and indeed over other unsecured creditors, assuming there was no deemed trust for the executive plan.

[226] I have explained earlier why I take a different view than did the Court of Appeal of Indalex's breach of fiduciary duty. In light of what I conclude was the breach which could give rise to a remedy, my view is that the constructive trust cannot properly be imposed in this case and the Court of Appeal erred in principle in exercising its discretion to impose this remedy.

[227] I part company with the Court of Appeal with respect to several aspects of its constructive trust analysis; it is far from clear to me that any of the conditions for imposing a constructive trust were present here. However, I will only address one of them in detail. As I will explain, a remedial constructive trust for a breach of fiduciary duty is only appropriate if the wrongdoer's acts give rise to an identifiable asset which it would be unjust for the wrongdoer (or sometimes a third party) to retain. In my view, Indalex's failure to meaningfully address conflicts of interest that arose during the CCAA proceedings did not result in any such asset.

[228] As the Court of Appeal recognized, the governing authority concerning the remedial constructive trust outside the domain of unjust enrichment is Soulos. In Soulos, McLachlin J. (as she then was) wrote that a constructive trust may be an appropriate remedy for breach of fiduciary duty: paras. 19-45. She laid out four requirements that should generally be satisfied before a constructive trust will be imposed: para. 45. Although, in Soulos, McLachlin J. was careful to indicate that these are conditions that "generally" must be present, all parties in this case accept that these four conditions must be present before a remedial constructive trust may be ordered for breach of fiduciary duty. The four conditions are these:

(1) The defendant must have been under an equitable obligation, that is, an obligation of the type that courts of equity have enforced, in relation to the activities giving rise to the assets in his hands;

(2) The assets in the hands of the defendant must be shown to have resulted from deemed or actual agency activities of the defendant in breach of his equitable obligation to the plaintiff;

(3) The plaintiff must show a legitimate reason for seeking a proprietary remedy, either personal or related to the need to ensure that others like the defendant remain faithful to their duties and;

(4) There must be no factors which would render imposition of a constructive trust unjust in all the circumstances of the case; e.g., the interests of intervening creditors must be protected. [para. 45]

[229] My concern is with respect to the second requirement, that is, whether the breach resulted in an asset in the hands of Indalex. A constructive trust arises when the law imposes upon a party an obligation to hold specific property for another: D. W. M. Waters, M. R. Gillen and L. D. Smith, Waters' Law of Trusts in Canada (3rd ed. 2005), at p. 454 ("Waters"). The purpose of imposing a constructive trust as a remedy for a breach of duty or unjust enrichment is to prevent parties "from retaining property which in 'good conscience' they should not be permitted to retain": Soulos, at para. 17. It follows, therefore, that while the remedial constructive trust may be appropriate in a variety of situations, the wrongdoer's conduct toward the plaintiff must generally have given rise to assets in the hands of the wrongdoer (or of a third party in some situations) which cannot in justice and good conscience be retained. That cannot be said here.

[230] The Court of Appeal held that this second condition was present because "[t]he assets [i.e. the reserve fund monies] are directly connected to the process in which Indalex committed its breaches of fiduciary obligation": para. 204. Respectfully, this conclusion is based on incorrect legal principles. To satisfy this second condition, it must be shown that the breach resulted in the assets being in Indalex's hands, not simply, as the Court of Appeal thought, that there was a "connection" between the assets and "the process" in which Indalex breached its fiduciary duty. Recall that in Soulos itself, the defendant's acquisition of the disputed property was a direct result of his breach of his duty of loyalty to the plaintiff: para. 48. This is not our case. As the Court observed, in the context of an unjust enrichment claim in Peter v. Beblow, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 980, at p. 995;

> . . . for a constructive trust to arise, the plaintiff must establish a direct link to the property which is the subject of the trust by reason of the plaintiff's contribution.

[231] While cases of breach of fiduciary duty are different in important ways from cases of unjust enrichment, La Forest J. (with Lamer J. concurring on this point) applied a similar standard for proprietary relief in Lac Minerals, a case in which wrongdoing was the basis for the constructive trust: p. 678, quoted in Waters', at p. 471. His comments demonstrate the high standard to be met in order for a constructive trust to be awarded:

> The constructive trust awards a right in property, but that right can only arise once a right to relief has been established. In the vast majority of cases a constructive trust will not be the appropriate remedy. . . . [A] constructive trust should only be awarded if there is reason to grant to the plaintiff the additional rights that flow from recognition of a right of property. [p. 678]

[232] The relevant breach in this case was the failure of Indalex to meaningfully address the conflicts of interest that arose in the course of the CCAA proceedings. (The breach that arose with respect to the bankruptcy motion is irrelevant because that motion was not addressed and therefore could not have given rise to the assets.) The "assets" in issue here are the funds in the reserve fund which were retained from the proceeds of the sale of Indalex as a going concern. Indalex's breach in this case did not give rise to the funds which were retained by the Monitor in the reserve fund.

[233] Where does the respondents' claim of a procedural breach take them? Taking their position at its highest, it would be that the DIP approval proceedings and the sale would not have been approved. This position, however, is fatally flawed. Turning first to the DIP approval, there is no evidence to support the view that, had Indalex addressed its conflict in the DIP approval process, the DIP financing would have been rejected or granted on different terms. The CCAA judge, being fully aware of the pension situation, ruled that the DIP financing was "required", that there was "no other alternative available to the Applicants for a going concern solution", and that "the benefit to stakeholders and creditors of the DIP Financing outweighs any potential prejudice to unsecured creditors that may arise as a result of the granting of super-priority secured financing": endorsement of Morawetz J., April 8, 2009, at paras. 6 and 9. In effect, the respondents are claiming funds which arose only because of the process to which they now object. Taking into account that there was an absence of any evidence that more favourable financing terms were available, that the judge's decision was made with full knowledge of the plan beneficiaries' claims, and that he found that the DIP financing was necessary, the respondents' contention is not only speculative, it also directly contradicts the conclusions of the CCAA judge.

[234] Turning next to the sale approval and the approval of the distribution of the assets, it is clear that the plan beneficiaries had independent representation but that this did not change the result. Although, perhaps with little thanks to Indalex, the interests of both plans were fully and ably represented before Campbell J. at the sale approval and interim distribution motions in July of 2009.

[235] The executive plan retirees, through able counsel, objected to the sale on the basis that the liquidation values set out in the Monitor's seventh report would provide greater return for unsecured creditors. The motions judge dismissed this objection "on the basis that there was no clear evidence to support the proposition and in any event the transaction as approved did preserve value for suppliers, customers and preserve approximately 950 jobs": trial reasons of Campbell J., at para. 13 (emphasis added). Both the executive plan retirees and the USW, which represented some members of the salaried plan, objected to the proposed distribution of the sale proceeds. In response to this objection, it was agreed that those objections would be heard promptly and that the Monitor would retain sufficient funds to satisfy the pensioners' claims if they were upheld: trial reasons of Campbell J., at paras. 14-16.

[236] There is no evidence to support the contention that Indalex's breach of its fiduciary duty as pension administrator resulted in the assets retained in the reserve fund. I therefore conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in law in finding that the second condition for imposing a constructive trust — i.e. that the assets in the defendant's hands must be shown to have resulted from the defendant's breaches of duty to the plaintiff — had been established.

[237] I would add only two further comments with respect to the constructive trust. A major concern of the Court of Appeal was that unless a constructive trust were imposed, the reserve funds would end up in the hands of other Indalex entities which were not operating at arm's length from Indalex. The U.S. debtors claimed the reserve fund because it had paid on its guarantee of the DIP loans and thereby stepped into the shoes of the DIP lender with respect to priority. Sun Indalex claims in the U.S. bankruptcy proceedings as a secured creditor of the U.S. debtors. The Court of Appeal put its concern this way: "To permit Sun Indalex to recover on behalf of [the U.S. debtors] would be to effectively permit the party who breached its fiduciary obligations to take the benefit of those breaches, to the detriment of those to whom the fiduciary obligations were owed": para. 199.

[238] There are two difficulties with this approach, in my respectful view. The U.S. debtors paid real money to honour their guarantees. Moreover, unless there is a legal basis for ignoring the separate corporate personality of separate corporate entities, those separate corporate existences must be respected. Neither the parties nor the Court of Appeal advanced such a reason.

[239] Finally, I would note that imposing a constructive trust was wholly disproportionate to Indalex's breach of fiduciary duty. Its breach — the failure to meaningfully address the conflicts of interest that arose during the CCAA process — had no adverse impact on the plan beneficiaries in the sale approval process which gave rise to the "asset" in issue. Their interests were fully represented and carefully considered before the sale was approved and the funds distributed. The sale was nonetheless judged to be in the best interests of the corporation, all things considered. In my respectful view, imposing a $6.75 million penalty on the other creditors as a remedial response to this breach is so grossly disproportionate to the breach as to be unreasonable.

[240] A judicially ordered constructive trust, imposed long after the fact, is a remedy that tends to destabilize the certainty which is essential for commercial affairs and which is particularly important in financing a workout for an insolvent corporation. To impose a constructive trust in response to a breach of fiduciary duty to ensure for the plan beneficiaries some procedural protections that they in fact took advantage of in any case is an unjust response in all of the circumstances.

[241] I conclude that a constructive trust is not an appropriate remedy in this case and that the Court of Appeal erred in principle by imposing it.

C. Third Issue: Did the Court of Appeal Err in Concluding That the Super Priority Granted in the CCAA Proceedings Did Not Have Priority by Virtue of the Doctrine of Federal Paramountcy?

[242] Although I disagree with my colleague Justice Deschamps with respect to the scope of the s. 57(4) deemed trust, I agree that if there was a deemed trust in this case, it would be superseded by the DIP loan because of the operation of the doctrine of federal paramountcy: paras. 48-60.

D. Fourth Issue: Did the Court of Appeal Err in its Cost Endorsement Respecting the USW?

(1) Introduction

[243] The disposition of costs in the Court of Appeal was somewhat complex. Although the costs appeal relates only to the costs of the USW, it is necessary in order to understand their position to set out the costs order below in full.

[244] With respect to the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal, no order was made for or against the Monitor due to its prior agreement with the former executives and the USW. However, the court ordered that the former executives and the USW, as successful parties, were each entitled to costs on a partial indemnity basis fixed at $40,000 inclusive of taxes and disbursements from Sun Indalex and the U.S. Trustee, payable jointly and severally: costs endorsement, 2011 ONCA 578, 81 C.B.R. (5th) 165, at para. 7.

[245] Morneau Shepell Ltd., the Superintendent, and the former executives reached an agreement with respect to legal fees and disbursements and the Court of Appeal approved that agreement. The former executives received full indemnity legal fees and disbursements in the amount of $269,913.78 to be paid from the executive plan attributable to each of the 14 former executives' accrued pension benefits, allocated among the 14 former executives in relation to their pension entitlement from the executive plan. In other words, the costs would not be borne by the other three members of the executive plan who did not participate in the proceedings: C.A. costs endorsement, at para. 2. The costs of the appeal payable by Sun Indalex and the U.S. Trustee were to be paid into the fund of the executive plan and allocated among the 14 former executives in relation to their pension entitlement from the executive plan.

[246] USW sought an order for payment of its costs from the fund of the salaried plan. However, the Court of Appeal declined to make such an order because the USW was in a "materially different position" than that of the former executives: costs endorsement, at para. 3. The latter were beneficiaries to the pension fund (14 of the 17 members of the plan), and they consented to the payment of costs from their individual benefit entitlements. Those who had not consented would not be affected by the payment. In contrast, the USW was the bargaining agent (not the beneficiary) for only 7 of the 169 beneficiaries of the salaried plan, none of whom was given notice of, or consented to, the payment of legal costs from the salaried plan. Moreover, the USW sought and seeks an order that its costs be paid out of the fund. This request is significantly different than the order made in favour of the former executives. The former executives explicitly ensured that their choice to pursue the litigation would not put at risk the pension benefits of those members who did not retain counsel even though of course those members would benefit in the event the litigation was successful. The USW is not proposing to insulate the 162 members whom it does not represent from the risk of litigation; it seeks an order requiring all members to share the risk of the litigation even though it represents only 7 of the 169. The proposition advanced by the USW was thus materially different from that advanced on behalf of the executive plan and approved by the court.

(2) Standard of Review

[247] In Nolan v. Kerry (Canada) Inc., 2009 SCC 39, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 678, Rothstein J. held that "costs awards are quintessentially discretionary": para. 126. Discretionary costs decisions should only be set aside on appeal if the court below "has made an error in principle or if the costs award is plainly wrong": Hamilton v. Open Window Bakery Ltd., 2004 SCC 9, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 303, at para. 27.

(3) Analysis

[248] I do not see any basis to interfere with the Court of Appeal's costs endorsement in this case. In my view, the USW's submissions are largely based on an inaccurate reading of the Court of Appeal's costs endorsement. Contrary to what the USW submits, the Court of Appeal did not require the consent of plan beneficiaries as a prerequisite to ordering payment of costs from the fund. Nor is it correct to suggest that the costs endorsement would "restrict recovery of beneficiary costs to instances when there is a surplus in the pension trust fund" or "preclude financing of beneficiary action when a fund is in deficit": USW factum, at paras. 71 and 76. Nor would I read the Court of Appeal's brief costs endorsement as laying down a rule that a union representing pension beneficiaries cannot recover costs from the fund because the union itself is not a beneficiary.

[249] The premise of the USW's appeal appears to be that it was entitled to costs because it met what it refers to in its submissions as the Costs Payment Test and that if the executive plan members got their costs out of their pension fund, the union should get its costs out of the salaried employees' pension fund. Respectfully, I do not accept the validity of either premise.

[250] The decision whether to award costs from the pension fund remains a discretionary matter. In Nolan, Rothstein J. surveyed the various factors that courts have taken into account when deciding whether to award a litigant its costs out of a pension trust. The first broad inquiry considered in Nolan was into whether the litigation concerned the due administration of the trust. In connection with this inquiry, courts have considered the following factors: (1) whether the litigation was primarily about the construction of the plan documents; (2) whether it clarified a problematic area of the law; (3) whether it was the only means of clarifying the parties' rights; (4) whether the claim alleged maladministration; and (5) whether the litigation had no effect on other beneficiaries of the trust fund: Nolan, at para. 126.

[251] The second broad inquiry discussed in Nolan was whether the litigation was ultimately adversarial: para. 127. The following factors have been considered: (1) whether the litigation included allegations by an unsuccessful party of a breach of fiduciary duty; (2) whether the litigation only benefited a class of members and would impose costs on other members if successful; and (3) whether the litigation had any merit.

[252] I do not think that it is correct to elevate these two inquiries (which constitute the Costs Payment Test articulated by the USW) to a test for entitlement to costs in the pension context. The factors set out in Nolan and other cases cited therein are best understood as highly relevant considerations guiding the exercise of judicial discretion with respect to costs.

[253] The litigation undertaken here raised novel points of law with all of the uncertainty and risk inherent in such an undertaking. The Court of Appeal in essence decided that the USW, representing only 7 of 169 members of the plan, should not without consultation be able to in effect impose the risks of that litigation on all of the plan members, the vast majority of whom were not union members. Whatever arguments might be raised against the Court of Appeal's decision in light of the success of the litigation and the sharing by all plan members of the benefits, the failure of the litigation seems to me to leave no basis to impose the cost consequences of taking that risk on all of the plan members of an already underfunded plan.

[254] The second premise of the USW appeal appears to be that if the executive plan members have their costs paid out of the fund, so too should the salaried plan members. Respectfully, however, this is not an accurate statement of the order made with respect to the executive plan.

[255] The Court of Appeal's order with respect to the executive plan meant that only the pension fund attributable to those members of the plan who actually supported the litigation — the vast majority I would add — would contribute to the costs of the litigation even though all members of the plan would benefit in the case of success. As the Court of Appeal noted:

> The individual represented Retirees, who comprise 14 of 17 members of the Executive Plan, have consented to the payment of costs from their individual benefit entitlements. Those who have not consented will not be affected by the payment. [Costs endorsement, at para. 3]

[256] The Court of Appeal therefore approved an agreement as to costs which did not put at further risk the pension funds available to satisfy the pension entitlements of those who did not support the litigation. Thus, the Court of Appeal did not apply what the USW refers to as the Costs Payment Test to the executive plan because the costs order was the product of agreement and did not order payment of costs out of the fund as a whole.

[257] In the case of the USW request, there was no such agreement and no such limitation of risk to the supporters of the litigation.

[258] I see no error in principle in the Court of Appeal's refusal to order the USW costs to be paid out of the pension fund, particularly in light of the disposition of the appeal to this Court. I would dismiss the USW costs appeal but without costs.

IV. Disposition

[259] I would allow the Sun Indalex, FTI Consulting and George L. Miller appeals and, except as noted below, I would set aside the orders of the Ontario Court of Appeal and restore the February 18, 2010 orders of Campbell J.

[260] With respect to costs, I would set aside the Court of Appeal's orders with respect to the costs of the appeals before that court and order that all parties bear their own costs in the Court of Appeal and in this Court.

[261] I would not disturb paras. 9 and 10 of the order of the Court of Appeal in the former executives' appeal so that the full indemnity legal fees and disbursements of the former executives in the amount of $269,913.78 shall be paid from the fund of the executive plan attributable to each of the 14 former executives' accrued pension benefits, and specifically such amounts shall be allocated among the 14 former executives in relation to their pension entitlement from the executive plan and will not be borne by the other three members of the executive plan.

[262] I would dismiss the USW costs appeal, but without costs.

The reasons of LeBel and Abella JJ. were delivered by

LEBEL J. —

I. Introduction

[263] The members of two pension plans set up by Indalex Limited ("Indalex") stand to lose half or more of their pension benefits as a consequence of the insolvency of their employer and of the arrangement approved by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). The Court of Appeal for Ontario found that the members were entitled to a remedy. For different and partly conflicting reasons, my colleagues Justices Deschamps and Cromwell would hold that no remedy is available to them. With all due respect for their opinions, I would conclude, like the Court of Appeal, that the remedy of a constructive trust is open to them and should be imposed in the circumstances of this case, for the following reasons.

[264] I do not intend to summarize the facts of this case, which were outlined by my colleagues. I will address these facts as needed in the course of my reasons. Before moving to my areas of disagreement with my colleagues, I will briefly indicate where and to what extent I agree with them on the relevant legal issues.

[265] Like my colleagues, I conclude that no deemed trust could arise under s. 57(4) of the Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8 ("PBA"), in the case of the Executive Plan because this plan had not been wound up when the CCAA proceedings were initiated. In the case of the Salaried Employees Plan, I agree with Deschamps J. that a deemed trust arises in respect of the wind-up deficiency. But, like her, I accept that the debtor-in-possession ("DIP") super priority prevails by reason of the application of the federal paramountcy doctrine. I also agree that the costs appeal of the United Steelworkers should be dismissed.

[266] But, with respect for the opinions of my colleagues, I take a different view of the nature and extent of the fiduciary duties of an employer who elects to act as administrator of a pension plan governed by the PBA. This dual status does not entitle the employer to greater leniency in the determination and exercise of its fiduciary duties or excuse wrongful actions. On the contrary, as we shall see below, I conclude that Indalex not only neglected its obligations towards the beneficiaries, but actually took a course of action that was actively inimical to their interests. The seriousness of these breaches amply justified the decision of the Court of Appeal to impose a constructive trust. To that extent, I propose to uphold the opinion of Gillese J.A. and the judgment of the Court of Appeal (2011 ONCA 265, 104 O.R. (3d) 641).

II. The Employer as Administrator of a Pension Plan: Its Fiduciary Duties

[267] Before entering into an analysis of the obligations of an employer as administrator of a pension plan under the PBA, it is necessary to consider the position of the beneficiaries. Who are they? At what stage are they in their lives? What are their vulnerabilities? A fiduciary relationship is a relationship, grounded in fact and law, between a vulnerable beneficiary and a fiduciary who holds and may exercise power over the beneficiary in situations recognized by law. Any analysis of such a relationship requires careful consideration of the characteristics of the beneficiary. It ought not stop at the level of a theoretical and detached approach that fails to address how, very concretely, this relationship works or can be twisted, perverted or abused, as was the situation in this case.

[268] The beneficiaries were in a very vulnerable position relative to Indalex. They did not enjoy the protection that the existence of an independent administrator might have given them. They had no say and no input in the management of the plans. The information about the plans and their situation came from Indalex in its dual role as employer and manager of the plans. Their particular vulnerability arose from their relationship with Indalex, acting both as their employer and as the administrator of their retirement plans. Their vulnerability was substantially a consequence of that specific relationship (Galambos v. Perez, 2009 SCC 48, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 247, at para. 68, per Cromwell J.). The nature of this relationship had very practical consequences on their interests. For example, as Gillese J.A. noted in her reasons (at para. 40) the consequences of the decisions made in the course of management of the plan and during the CCAA proceedings signify that the members of the Executive Plan stand to lose one-half to two-thirds of their retirement benefits, unless additional money is somehow paid into the plan. These losses of benefits are, in all probability, permanent in the case of the beneficiaries who have already retired or who are close to retirement. They deeply affect their lives and expectations. For most of them, what is lost is lost for good. No arrangement will allow them to get a start on a new life. We should not view the situation of the beneficiaries as regrettable but unavoidable collateral damage arising out of the ebbs and tides of the economy. In my view, the law should give the members some protection, as the Court of Appeal intended when it imposed a constructive trust.

[269] Indalex was in a conflict of interest from the moment it started to contemplate putting itself under the protection of the CCAA and proposing an arrangement to its creditors. From the corporate perspective, one could hardly find fault with such a decision. It was a business decision. But the trouble is that at the same time, Indalex was a fiduciary in relation to the members and retirees of its pension plans. The "two hats" analogy offers no defence to Indalex. It could not switch off the fiduciary relationship at will when it conflicted with its business obligations or decisions. Throughout the arrangement process and until it was replaced by an independent administrator (Morneau Shepell Ltd.) it remained a fiduciary.

[270] It is true that the PBA allows an employer to act as an administrator of a pension plan in Ontario. In such cases, the legislature accepts that conflicts of interest may arise. But, in my opinion, nothing in the PBA allows that the employer qua administrator will be held to a lower standard or will be subject to duties and obligations that are less stringent than those of an independent administrator. The employer remains a fiduciary under the statute and at common law (PBA, s. 22(4)). The employer is under no obligation to assume the burdens of administering the pension plans that it has agreed to set up or that are the legacy of previous decisions. However, if it decides to do so, a fiduciary relationship is created with the expectation that the employer will be able to avoid or resolve the conflicts of interest that might arise. If this proves to be impossible, the employer is still "seized" with fiduciary duties, and cannot ignore them out of hand.

[271] Once Indalex had considered the CCAA process and decided to proceed in that manner, it should have been obvious that such a move would trigger conflicts of interest with the beneficiaries of the pension plans and that these conflicts would become untenable, as per the terms of s. 22(4) of the PBA. Given the nature of its obligations as administrator and fiduciary, it was impossible to wear the "two hats". Indalex had to discharge its corporate duties, but at the same time it had to address its fiduciary obligations to the members and beneficiaries of the plans. I do not fault it for applying under the CCAA, but rather for not relinquishing its position as administrator of the plans at the time of the application. It even retained this position once it engaged in the arrangement process. Other conflicts and breaches of fiduciary duties and of fundamental rules of procedural equity in the Superior Court flowed from this first decision. Moreover, Indalex maintained a strongly adversarial attitude towards the interest of the beneficiaries throughout the arrangement process, while it was still, at least in form, the administrator of the plans.

[272] The option given to employers to act as administrators of pension plans under the PBA does not constitute a licence to breach the fiduciary duties that flow from this function. It should not be viewed as an invitation for the courts to whitewash the consequences of such breaches. The option is predicated on the ability of the employer-administrator to avoid the conflicts of interests that cause these breaches. An employer deciding to assume the position of administrator cannot claim to be in the same situation as the Crown when it discharges fiduciary obligations towards certain groups in society under the Constitution or the law. For those cases, the Crown assumes those duties because it is obligated to do so by virtue of its role, not because it chooses to do so. In such circumstances, the Crown must often balance conflicting interests and obligations to the broader society in the discharge of those fiduciary duties (Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261, at paras. 37-38). If Indalex found itself in a situation where it had to balance conflicting interests and obligations, as it essentially argues, it could not retain the position of administrator that it had willingly assumed. The solution was not to place its function as administrator and its associated fiduciary duties in abeyance. Rather, it had to abandon this role and diligently transfer its function as manager to an independent administrator.

[273] Indalex could apply for protection under the CCAA. But, in so doing, it needed to make arrangements to avoid conflicts of interests. As nothing was done, the members of the plans were left to play catch up as best they could when the process that put in place the DIP financing and its super priority was initiated. The process had been launched in such a way that it took significant time before the beneficiaries could effectively participate in the process. In practice, the United Steelworkers union, which represented only a small group of the members of the Salaried Employees Plan, acted for them after the start of the procedures. The members of the Executive Plan hired counsel who appeared for them. But, throughout, there were problems with notices, delays and the ability to participate in the process. Indeed, during the CCAA proceedings, the Monitor and Indalex seemed to have been more concerned about keeping the members of the plans out of the process rather than ensuring that their voices could be heard. Two paragraphs of the submissions to this Court by Morneau Shepell Ltd., the subsequently appointed administrator of the plan, aptly sums up the behaviour of Indalex and the Monitor towards the beneficiaries, whose representations were always deemed to be either premature or late:

> When counsel for the Retirees again appeared at a motion to approve the bidding procedure, his objections were considered premature:
> > In my view, the issues raised by the retirees do not have any impact on the Bidding Procedures. The issues can be raised by the retirees on any application to approve a transaction — but that is for another day. [(2009), 79 C.C.P.B. 101 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 10, per Morawetz J.]
> Only when counsel appeared at the sale approval motion, as directed by the motions judge, were the concerns of the pension plan beneficiaries heard. At that time, the Appellants complain, the beneficiaries were too late and their motion constituted a collateral attack on the original DIP Order. However, it cannot be the case that stakeholder groups are too early, until they are too late. [Factum, at paras. 54-55]

[274] I must also mention the failed attempt to assign Indalex in bankruptcy once the sale of its business had been approved. One of the purposes of this action was essentially to harm the interests of the members of the plans. At the time, Indalex was still wearing its two hats, at least from a legal perspective. But its duties as a fiduciary were clearly not at the forefront of its concerns. There were constant conflicts of interest throughout the process. Indalex did not attempt to resolve them; it brushed them aside. In so acting, it breached its duties as a fiduciary and its statutory obligations under s. 22(4) PBA.

III. Procedural Fairness in CCAA Proceedings

[275] The manner in which this matter was conducted in the Superior Court was, at least partially, the result of Indalex disregarding its fiduciary duties. The procedural issues that arose in that court did not assist in mitigating the consequences of these breaches. It is true that, in the end, the beneficiaries obtained, or were given, some information pertaining to the proceedings and that counsel appeared on their behalf at various stages of the proceedings. However, the basic problem is that the proceedings were not conducted according to the spirit and principles of the Canadian system of civil justice.

[276] I accept that those procedures are often urgent. The situation of a debtor requires quick and efficient action. The turtle-like pace of some civil litigation would not meet the needs of the application of the CCAA. However, the conduct of proceedings under this statute is not solely an administrative process. It is also a judicial process conducted according to the tenets of the adversarial system. The fundamentals of such a system must not be ignored. All interested parties are entitled to a fair procedure that allows their voices to be raised and heard. It is not an answer to these concerns to say that nothing else could be done, that no other solution would have been better, that, in substance, hearing the members would have been a waste of time. In all branches of procedure whether in administrative law, criminal law or civil action, the rights to be informed and to be heard in some way remain fundamental principles of justice. Those principles retain their place in the CCAA, as some authors and judges have emphasized (J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2007), at pp. 55-56; Royal Oak Mines Inc., Re (1999), 7 C.B.R. (4th) 293 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 5, per Farley J.). This was not done in this case, as my colleagues admit, while they downplay the consequences of these procedural flaws and breaches.

IV. Imposing a Constructive Trust

[277] In this context, I see no error in the decision of the Court of Appeal to impose a constructive trust (paras. 200-207). It was a fair decision that met the requirements of justice, under the principles set out by our Court in

Canson Enterprises Ltd. v. Boughton & Co., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 534, and in Soulos v. Korkontzilas, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 217. The remedy of a constructive trust was justified in order to correct the wrong caused by Indalex (Soulos, at para. 36, per McLachlin J. (as she then was)). The facts of the situation met the four conditions that generally justify the imposition of a constructive trust (Soulos, at para. 45), as determined by Justice Gillese in her reasons, at paras. 203 and 204: (1) the defendant was under an equitable obligation in relation to the activities giving rise to the assets in his or her hands; (2) the assets in the hands of the defendant were shown to have resulted from deemed or actual agency activities of the defendant in breach of his or her equitable obligation to the plaintiff; (3) the plaintiff has shown a legitimate reason for seeking a proprietary remedy, either personal or related to the need to ensure that others like the defendants remain faithful to their duties; and (4) there are no factors which would render imposition of a constructive trust unjust in all the circumstances of the case, such as the protection of the interests of intervening creditors.

[278] In crafting such a remedy, the Court of Appeal was relying on the inherent powers of the courts to craft equitable remedies, not only in respect of procedural issues, but also of substantive questions. Section 9 of the CCAA is broadly drafted and does not deprive courts of their power to fill in gaps in the law when this is necessary in order to grant justice to the parties (G. R. Jackson and J. Sarra, "Selecting the Judicial Tool to get the Job Done: An Examination of Statutory Interpretation, Discretionary Power and Inherent Jurisdiction in Insolvency Matters", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law, 2007 (2008), 41, at pp. 78-79).

[279] The imposition of the trust did not disregard the different corporate personalities of Indalex and Indalex U.S. It properly acknowledged the close relationship between the two companies, the second in effect controlling the first. This relationship could and needed to be taken into consideration in order to determine whether a constructive trust was a proper remedy.

APPENDIX

The Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1973, S.O. 1973, c. 113

6. The said Act is amended by adding thereto the following sections:

23*a*.—(1) Any sum received by an employer from an employee pursuant to an arrangement for the payment of such sum by the employer into a pension plan as the employee's contribution thereto shall be deemed to be held by the employer in trust for payment of the same after his receipt thereof into the pension plan as the employee's contribution thereto and the employer shall not appropriate or convert any part thereof to his own use or to any use not authorized by the trust.

(2) For the purposes of subsection 1, any sum withheld by an employer, whether by payroll deduction or otherwise, from moneys payable to an employee shall be deemed to be a sum received by the employer from the employee.

(3) Any sum required to be paid into a pension plan by an employer as the employer's contribution to the plan shall, when due under the plan, be deemed to be held by the employer in trust for payment of the same into the plan in accordance with the plan and this Act and the regulations as the employer's contribution and the employer shall not appropriate or convert any part of the amount required to be paid to the fund to his own use or to any use not authorized by the terms of the pension plan.

(2) Upon the termination or winding up of a pension plan filed for registration as required by section 17, the employer is liable to pay all amounts that would otherwise have been required to be paid to meet the tests for solvency prescribed by the regulations, up to the date of such termination or winding up, to the insurer, administrator or trustee of the pension plan.

23.—(1) Where a sum is received by an employer from an employee under an arrangement for the payment of the sum by the employer into a pension plan as the employee's contribution thereto, the employer shall be deemed to hold the sum in trust for the employee until the sum is paid into the pension plan whether or not the sum has in fact been kept separate and apart by the employer and the employee has a lien upon the assets of the employer for such amount that in the ordinary course of business would be entered in books of account whether so entered or not.

(3) Where an employer is required to make contributions to a pension plan, he shall be deemed to hold in trust for the members of the plan an amount calculated in accordance with subsection (4), whether or not,

(a) the employer contributions are payable into the plan under the terms of the plan or this Act; or

(b) the amount has been kept separate and apart by the employer, and the members have a lien upon the assets of the employer in such amount that in the ordinary course of business would be entered into the books of account whether so entered or not.

(4) For the purpose of determining the amount deemed to be held in trust under subsection (3) on a specific date, the calculation shall be made as if the plan had been wound up on that date.

32. In addition to any amounts the employer is liable to pay under subsection 21 (2), where a defined benefit pension plan is terminated or wound up or the plan is amended so that it is no longer a defined benefit pension plan, the employer is liable to the plan for the difference between,

(a) the value of the assets of the plan; and

(b) the value of pension benefits guaranteed under subsection 31 (1) and any other pension benefit vested under the terms of the plan, and the employer shall make payments to the insurer, trustee or administrator of the pension plan to fund the amount owing in such manner as is prescribed by regulation.

Pension Benefits Amendment Act, 1983, S.O. 1983, c. 2

2. Subsection 21 (2) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(2) Upon the termination or winding up of a registered pension plan, the employer of employees covered by the pension plan shall pay to the administrator, insurer or trustee of the pension plan,

(a) an amount equal to,

(i) the current service cost, and

(ii) the special payments prescribed by the regulations,

that have accrued to and including the date of the termination or winding up but, under the terms of the pension plan or the regulations, are not due on that date; and

(b) all other payments that, by the terms of the pension plan or the regulations, are due from the employer to the pension plan but have not been paid at the date of the termination or winding up.

(2a) For the purposes of clause (2) (a), the current service cost and special payments shall be deemed to accrue on a daily basis.

3. Section 23 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

23.—(1) Where an employer receives money from an employee under an arrangement that the employer will pay the money into a pension plan as the employee's contribution to the pension plan, the employer shall be deemed to hold the money in trust for the employee until the employer pays the money into the pension plan.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), money withheld by an employer, whether by payroll deduction or otherwise, from moneys payable to an employee shall be deemed to be money received by the employer from the employee.

(3) The administrator or trustee of the pension plan has a lien and charge upon the assets of the employer in an amount equal to the amount that is deemed to be held in trust under subsection (1).

(4) An employer who is required by a pension plan to contribute to the pension plan shall be deemed to hold in trust for the members of the pension plan an amount of money equal to the total of,

(a) all moneys that the employer is required to pay into the pension plan to meet,

(i) the current service cost, and

(ii) the special payments prescribed by the regulations,

that are due under the pension plan or the regulations and have not been paid into the pension plan; and

(b) where the pension plan is terminated or wound up, any other money that the employer is liable to pay under clause 21 (2) (a).

(5) The administrator or trustee of the pension plan has a lien and charge upon the assets of the employer in an amount equal to the amount that is deemed to be held in trust under subsection (4).

(6) Subsections (1) and (4) apply whether or not the moneys mentioned in those subsections are kept separate and apart from other money.

8. Sections 32 and 33 of the said Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

32.—(1) The employer of employees who are members of a defined benefit pension plan that the employer is bound by or to which the employer is a party and that is partly or wholly wound up shall pay to the administrator, insurer or trustee of the plan an amount of money equal to the amount by which the value of the pension benefits guaranteed by section 31 plus the value of the pension benefits vested under the defined benefit pension plan exceeds the value of the assets of the plan allocated in accordance with the regulations for payment of pension benefits accrued with respect to service in Ontario.

(2) The amount that the employer is required to pay under subsection (1) is in addition to the amounts that the employer is liable to pay under subsection 21 (2).

(3) The employer shall pay the amount required under subsection (1) to the administrator, insurer or trustee of the defined benefit pension plan in the manner prescribed by the regulations.

Pension Benefits Act, 1987, S.O. 1987, c. 35

58.—(1) Where an employer receives money from an employee under an arrangement that the employer will pay the money into a pension fund as the employee's contribution under the pension plan, the employer shall be deemed to hold the money in trust for the employee until the employer pays the money into the pension fund.

(3) An employer who is required to pay contributions to a pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to the employer contributions due and not paid into the pension fund.

(4) Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, an employer who is required to pay contributions to the pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations.

59.—(1) Money that an employer is required to pay into a pension fund accrues on a daily basis.

(2) Interest on contributions shall be calculated and credited at a rate not less than the prescribed rates and in accordance with prescribed requirements.

75.—(1) A member in Ontario of a pension plan whose combination of age plus years of continuous employment or membership in the pension plan equals at least fifty-five, at the effective date of the wind up of the pension plan in whole or in part, has the right to receive,

(a) a pension in accordance with the terms of the pension plan, if, under the pension plan, the member is eligible for immediate payment of the pension benefit;

(b) a pension in accordance with the terms of the pension plan, beginning at the earlier of,

(i) the normal retirement date under the pension plan, or

(ii) the date on which the member would be entitled to an unreduced pension under the pension plan if the pension plan were not wound up and if the member's membership continued to that date; or

(c) a reduced pension in the amount payable under the terms of the pension plan beginning on the date on which the member would be entitled to the reduced pension under the pension plan if the pension plan were not wound up and if the member's membership continued to that date.

76.—(1) Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, the employer shall pay into the pension fund,

(a) an amount equal to the total of all payments that, under this Act, the regulations and the pension plan, are due or that have accrued and that have not been paid into the pension fund; and

(b) an amount equal to the amount by which,

(i) the value of the pension benefits under the pension plan that would be guaranteed by the Guarantee Fund under this Act and the regulations if the Commission declares that the Guarantee Fund applies to the pension plan,

(ii) the value of the pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario vested under the pension plan, and

(iii) the value of benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario resulting from the application of subsection 40 (3) (50 per cent rule) and section 75, exceed the value of the assets of the pension fund allocated as prescribed for payment of pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario.

Pension Benefits Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.8

57. (1) [Trust property] Where an employer receives money from an employee under an arrangement that the employer will pay the money into a pension fund as the employee's contribution under the pension plan, the employer shall be deemed to hold the money in trust for the employee until the employer pays the money into the pension fund.

(2) [Money withheld] For the purposes of subsection (1), money withheld by an employer, whether by payroll deduction or otherwise, from money payable to an employee shall be deemed to be money received by the employer from the employee.

(3) [Accrued contributions] An employer who is required to pay contributions to a pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to the employer contributions due and not paid into the pension fund.

(4) [Wind up] Where a pension plan is wound up in whole or in part, an employer who is required to pay contributions to the pension fund shall be deemed to hold in trust for the beneficiaries of the pension plan an amount of money equal to employer contributions accrued to the date of the wind up but not yet due under the plan or regulations.

58. (1) [Accrual] Money that an employer is required to pay into a pension fund accrues on a daily basis.

(2) [Interest] Interest on contributions shall be calculated and credited at a rate not less than the prescribed rates and in accordance with prescribed requirements.

74. (1) [Activating events] This section applies if a person ceases to be a member of a pension plan on the effective date of one of the following activating events:

1. The wind up of a pension plan, if the effective date of the wind up is on or after April 1, 1987.
2. The employer's termination of the member's employment, if the effective date of the termination is on or after July 1, 2012. However, this paragraph does not apply if the termination occurs in any of the circumstances described in subsection (1.1).
3. The occurrence of such other events as may be prescribed in such circumstances as may be specified by regulation.

(1.1) [Same, termination of employment] Termination of employment is not an activating event if the termination is a result of wilful misconduct, disobedience or wilful neglect of duty by the member that is not trivial and has not been condoned by the employer or if the termination occurs in such other circumstances as may be prescribed.

Digitized by Google

(1.2) [Exceptions, election by certain pension plans] This section does not apply with respect to a jointly sponsored pension plan or a multi-employer pension plan while an election made under section 74.1 for the plan and its members is in effect.

(1.3) [Benefit] A member in Ontario of a pension plan whose combination of age plus years of continuous employment or membership in the pension plan equals at least 55 on the effective date of the activating event has the right to receive,

(a) a pension in accordance with the terms of the pension plan, if, under the pension plan, the member is eligible for immediate payment of the pension benefit;

(b) a pension in accordance with the terms of the pension plan, beginning at the earlier of,

(i) the normal retirement date under the pension plan, or

(ii) the date on which the member would be entitled to an unreduced pension under the pension plan if the activating event had not occurred and if the member's membership continued to that date; or

(c) a reduced pension in the amount payable under the terms of the pension plan beginning on the date on which the member would be entitled to the reduced pension under the pension plan if the activating event had not occurred and if the member's membership continued to that date.

(2) [Part year] In determining the combination of age plus employment or membership, one-twelfth credit shall be given for each month of age and for each month of continuous employment or membership on the effective date of the activating event.

(3) [Member for 10 years] Bridging benefits offered under the pension plan to which a member would be entitled if the activating event had not occurred and if his or her membership were continued shall be included in calculating the pension benefit under subsection (1.3) of a person who has at least 10 years of continuous employment with the employer or has been a member of the pension plan for at least 10 years.

(4) [Prorated bridging benefit] For the purposes of subsection (3), if the bridging benefit offered under the pension plan is not related to periods of employment or membership in the pension plan, the bridging benefit shall be prorated by the ratio that the member's actual period of employment bears to the period of employment that the member would have to the earliest date on which the member would be entitled to payment of pension benefits and a full bridging benefit under the pension plan if the activating event had not occurred.

(5) [Notice of termination of employment] Membership in a pension plan that is wound up includes the period of notice of termination of employment required under Part XV of the Employment Standards Act, 2000.

(6) [Application of subs. (5)] Subsection (5) does not apply for the purpose of calculating the amount of a pension benefit of a member who is required to make contributions to the pension fund unless the member makes the contributions in respect of the period of notice of termination of employment.

(7) [Consent of employer] For the purposes of this section, where the consent of an employer is an eligibility requirement for entitlement to receive an ancillary benefit, the employer shall be deemed to have given the consent.

(7.1) [Consent of administrator, jointly sponsored pension plans] For the purposes of this section, where the consent of the administrator of a jointly sponsored pension plan is an eligibility requirement for entitlement to receive an ancillary benefit, the administrator shall be deemed to have given the consent.

(8) [Use in calculating pension benefit] A benefit described in clause (1.3) (a), (b) or (c) for which a member has met all eligibility requirements under this section shall be included in calculating the member's pension benefit or the commuted value of the pension benefit.

75. (1) [Liability of employer on wind up] Where a pension plan is wound up, the employer shall pay into the pension fund,

(a) an amount equal to the total of all payments that, under this Act, the regulations and the pension plan, are due or that have accrued and that have not been paid into the pension fund; and

(b) an amount equal to the amount by which,

(i) the value of the pension benefits under the pension plan that would be guaranteed by the Guarantee Fund under this Act and the regulations if the Superintendent declares that the Guarantee Fund applies to the pension plan,

(ii) the value of the pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario vested under the pension plan, and exceed the value of the assets of the pension fund allocated as prescribed for payment of pension benefits accrued with respect to employment in Ontario.

PART I
COMPROMISES AND ARRANGEMENTS

Summary: Compromises and Arrangements - The Main Objective of the Act - Sections 4 to 8

Sections 4 through 5 of the CCAA detail the compromise or arrangement objective of the Act, in respect of unsecured and also secured creditors and call for a meeting of the creditors.

Section 6 then goes on to state the quorum of decision on whether the proposal by the debtor is accepted and if it is, at the discretion of the court, it is binding on them all. Note that the decision of the court to cause the outcome of acceptance on the voting is only discretionary - i.e.; if the proposal is accepted the court may still not grant its sanction.

Pursuant to s. 6(3), unless her Majesty agrees, the court will not sanction a compromise that affects the income tax, employment insurance or Canada Pension Plan obligations, or similar amounts in respect of provincial law that the debtor may have.

Subsection 6(5) allows the court to withhold sanction of the compromise unless the plan makes provision for various categories of employee costs including the $2 k as if the debtor declared bankruptcy at that time.

Subsection 6(6) deals with sanction being withheld if the company has a prescribed pension plan and has not made adequate provision for payments thereto, unless, pursuant to S. 6(7), the pension regulator has agreed to the compromise/arrangement.

Pursuant to s. 6(8) no compromise that puts payments of equity claims ahead of any non-equity claims on the debtor will allow the compromise to be sanctioned.

Section 8 effectively provides that any terms of an instrument causing the rights of any creditors to supersede the CCAA will still be subject to the CCAA.

Compromise with unsecured creditors - Sec 4
4. Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its unsecured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company, of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.

FARLEY J.

Re: Perpetual Subordinated Debt

[1] Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Greater Toronto Airports Authority, Airbus, Cara Operations Limited and IBM Canada Limited (collectively "Trade Creditors") moved:

(A) for a declaration that the holders of Subordinated Perpetual Debt

(a) $5^{3/4}$% Subordinated Bonds 1986ff (Swiss fr 200,000,000);
(b) $6^{1/4}$% Subordinated Bonds 1986ff (Swiss fr 300,000,000);
(c) $6^{3/8}$% Interest-Adjustable Subordinated Bonds 1987ff (DM 200,000,000);
(d) Subordinated Loan Agreement (Yen 20,000,000,000); and
(e) Subordinated Loan Agreement (Yen 40,000,000,000)

(collectively "SP Debt") are not entitled to vote or receive any dividend or other distribution from Air Canada unless and until the claims of all unsecured creditors, including those whose claims are in respect of borrowed money, have been paid in full;

(B) a declaration that any entitlement of holders of [SP Debt] must be distributed not to such holders but to all unsecured creditors pro rata in relation to their proven claim; and

(C) such further and other relief as this Honourable Court deems just.

[2] Air Canada ("AC") moved for an order authorizing it and its subsidiary Applicants under these CCAA proceedings "to incorporate the terms of the settlement reached between certain holders of [AC's] Senior Debt and certain holders of [AC's SP Debt] in the Applicants' plan of compromise or arrangement, to be filed (the "Plan")". This settlement was described by AC as follows at item 5 of the grounds:

5. Negotiations subsequently took place and an agreement has been executed between certain holders of Senior Debt and certain holders of [SP Debt] pursuant to which:

(a) Holders of [SP Debt] shall not be included in a separate class, but rather shall be included in a general class of unsecured creditors;
(b) Notwithstanding the treatment of holders of [SP Debt] as herein proposed, each creditor holding [SP Debt] shall be entitled to vote the face value of its claim in the same manner as all other unsecured creditors;
(c) The holders of [SP Debt] shall be entitled to a distribution under the Plan which provides to them, in the aggregate, on a pro rata basis, twenty-six percent (26%) of the aggregate distribution which would otherwise be made to them if they were not subordinated to Senior Debt;
(d) Seventy-four percent (74%) of the aggregate distribution which would otherwise be made to the holders of [SP Debt] if they were not subordinated to Senior Debt, shall be distributed, on a pro rata basis, to the holders of Senior Debt, in addition to all other distributions to which they are entitled as unsecured creditors under the Plan;
(e) For certainty, a party entitled to a distribution in accordance with the foregoing shall be entitled to receive a corresponding portion of all direct or indirect benefits which may accrue to or be enjoyed by unsecured creditors pursuant to any rights offering, over-subscription mechanism or otherwise; and
(f) The mechanism described above shall allow for the distributions set forth above to occur without the necessity of the holders of Senior Debt or Air Canada enforcing the subordination covenants directly against the holders of [SP Debt].

[3] Certain investors ("DM Bondholders") who hold or represent the beneficial holders of approximately 26 million DM of the Deutsche Mark Bonds ("DM Bonds") asserted that since there was no winding-up, liquidation or dissolution of AC, then the subordination of the DM Bonds was not triggered. They relied on the fact that s. 8(2) of the terms of the DM Bonds reads as follows:

Digitized by Google

> S. 8(2) Upon any winding-up, liquidation or dissolution of the Borrower, whether in bankruptcy, insolvency, receivership or other proceedings including special Act of Parliament or upon an assignment for the benefit of creditors or any other sequestering of the assets and liabilities of the Borrower or otherwise.

There is no reference to "reorganization" in addition to "winding-up, liquidation or dissolution" as is the case of the SF Bonds or the Yen Loan Agreements:

SF Bonds s. 7

> Upon any distribution of assets of the Company (other than such as is referred to in Section 8(2) and in respect of which the Principal Paying Agent has not exercised its rights contained in Section 8(22) or upon any dissolution, winding up, liquidation or reorganization of the Company, whether in bankruptcy, insolvency, reorganization, receivership or other proceedings or upon any assignment for the benefit of creditors of any other sequestering of the assets and liabilities of the Company or otherwise,

Yen Loan Agreements para. 6.4.2

> Upon any distribution of assets of the Borrower (other than such as is referred to in Clause 10(h) where the surviving company assumes all the obligations of the Borrower) upon any dissolution, winding up, liquidation or reorganization of the Borrower, whether in bankruptcy, insolvency, reorganization or receivership proceedings or upon an assignment for the benefit of creditors or any other sequestering of the assets and liabilities of the Borrower or otherwise in or upon any similar or analogous proceedings or event: -

No explanation was given for the difference in language so we are left in the dark as to whether it was intentional on a negotiated basis or simply inadvertent drafting.

[4] Each of the SP Debt instruments contains subordination provisions. While all the provisions are not identical, they are substantially similar. The following are definitions from the November 14, 1989 Yen Loan Agreement:

> "Indebtedness" – the principal, premium, if any, and unpaid interest (including interest accrued after the commencement of any reorganization or bankruptcy proceedings) or any indebtedness of the Borrower for borrowed money, whether by way of loan or evidenced by a bond, debenture, note or other evidence of indebtedness and whether secured or unsecured, including indebtedness for borrowed money of others guaranteed by the Borrower;
> "Senior Indebtedness" – means all Indebtedness, present or future, which is not expressly subordinated to or ranking pari passu with the Loan whether by operation of law or otherwise, in the event of a winding-up, liquidation or dissolution, whether voluntary or involuntary, whether by operation of Law or by reason of insolvency legislation;

[5] The end result is that upon the happening of the relevant triggering event, the holders of the SP Debt have contractually agreed that they will be subordinated to Senior Indebtedness. The Trade Creditors assert that there will be untold difficulty in determining what is "borrowed money" as this is an undefined term. With respect, I disagree as not every term has to be defined in an agreement in order to determine its meaning and it would not appear to me to be all that difficult to draw the line if, as and when that becomes necessary.

[6] The Trade Creditors also submit that as among the unsecured debt, as the unsecured SP Debt is subordinated to Senior Indebtedness (also unsecured), then the doctrine of subordination requires that the SP Debt be subordinated to all unsecured debt – (that is, not only the Senior Indebtedness but also all unsecured debt). They rely upon what they say is "a fundamental principle of Canadian insolvency law that, excepting only specifically enumerated preferred creditors, all unsecured creditors are entitled to pro rata distribution" and that this principle is reflected in s. 141 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"):

> S.141 Subject to this Act, all claims proved in a bankruptcy shall be paid rateably.

However, this is a CCAA insolvency proceeding not a BIA one. The jurisprudence in CCAA proceedings is that any plans of arrangement are treated as contracts amongst the parties (including the minority voting against) and that the court in a sanction hearing will review the creditor approved plan to see if it is fair, reasonable and equitable, wherein equitable does not necessarily mean equal. See Alternative Fuel Systems Inc. v. Remington Development Corp. 2004 ABCA 31 (CanLII), 2004 ABCA 31; Re Sammi Atlas Inc. 1998 CanLII 14900 (ON SC), (1998), 3 CBR (4th) 171 (Ont Gen Div).

[7] The Trade Creditors rely upon Re Maxwell Communications Corporation PLC (No. 2), [1993] 1 WLR 1402 (Ch Div) where at pp. 1411-2 in approving the proposed distribution, Vinelott J. concluded that a bilateral subordination between a debtor and a creditor can be effective:

> The question is whether this underlying consideration of public policy should similarly invalidate an agreement between a debtor and a creditor postponing or subordinating the claim of the creditor to the claims of other unsecured creditors and preclude the waiver or subordination of the creditor's claim after the commencement of a bankruptcy or winding up. I do not think that it does. It seems to me plain that after the commencement of a bankruptcy or a winding up a creditor must be entitled to waive his debt just as he is entitled to decline to submit a proof.
> If the creditor can waive his right altogether I can see no reason why he should not waive his right to prove, save to the extent of any assets remaining after the debts of other unsecured creditors have been paid in full; ...
> So also, if the creditor can waive his right to prove or agree the postponement of his debt after the commencement of the bankruptcy or winding up, I can see no reason why he should not agree with the debtor that his debt will not be payable or will be postponed or subordinated in the event of a bankruptcy or winding up.

However, I would caution that this quote must be taken in context; similarly for the second Vinelott J. quote. Then in reliance upon Vinelott J.'s views at p. 1416, the Trade Creditors submitted in their factum:

> 20. Accordingly, the Court gave effect to the bilateral subordination provisions as a waiver of the credit to its entitlement to receive any distribution until all unsecured creditor claims have been paid in full.

Digitized by Google

> 21. In giving effect to the subordination, the Court distinguished on the facts previous decisions of the English courts that had addressed arrangements that disturbed rateable distribution among unsecured creditors. The Court, however endorsed the fundamental principle that a debtor cannot validly contract with one unsecured creditor for any advantage denied to other unsecured creditors.

Vinelott J. stated at p. 1416:

> [If] the clearance arrangements had had the effect contended for by Air France they would clearly have put a member of the clearance arrangements in a position which would have been better than the position of other unsecured creditors. The arrangements would therefore unquestionably have infringed a fundamental principle of bankruptcy law, which is reflected in but not derived from section 302 or its predecessor, that a creditor cannot validly contract with his debtor that he will enjoy some advantage in a bankruptcy or winding-up which is denied to other creditors.
> In my judgment I am not compelled by the decisions of the House of Lords in the Halesowen and British Eagle cases, or by the decisions of the Court of Appeal in those cases or in Rolls Razor Ltd. v. Cox, [1967] 1 Q.B. 552, to conclude that a contract between a company and a creditor, providing for the debt due to the creditor to be subordinated in the insolvent winding up of the company to other unsecured debt, is rendered void by the insolvency legislation.

[8] The Trade Creditors went on at paras. 23-24 of their factum:

> 23. However, also consistent with the decision of the English Court in Maxwell and cases enforcing the policy of rateable distribution among unsecured creditors which were accepted in Maxwell, such agreement cannot be enforced to provide an unsecured creditor (or any subset of unsecured creditors) an advantage in an insolvency proceeding which is denied to other unsecured creditors. Put simply, the [SP Debt] holders are free to waive claims if they choose, but neither they nor the debtor can direct that the resulting benefit shall be distributed preferentially to some unsecured creditors and not others.
> 24. Treating the holders of [SP Debt] as being subordinated to all unsecured creditors is consistent with key principles of Canadian insolvency law and with the terms of the subordination itself. Such holders should not be entitled to receive any dividend until creditors with "borrowed money" claims are paid in full. As claims arising from "borrowed money"; in the case, are unsecured claims, they are entitled to receive pro rata distributions under Air Canada's plan of arrangement with all other unsecured creditors and will be paid in full only when all other unsecured claims are paid in full.

[9] With respect, I disagree. The Trade Creditors did not bargain or pay for any benefit or advantage in respect of the SP Debt nor are they parties to any agreements in respect thereto and it is important to observe that they have not been designated as third party beneficiaries (nor have they asserted that they were). The cases cited by the Trade Creditors would not appear to me to have much if any relevance to the situation in this case. Ex parte MacKay (1873) 8 Ch App 643 dealt with a situation where a creditor had bargained with the debtor for additional rights upon the bankruptcy of that debtor. British Eagle International Airlines Ltd. v. Compagnie Nationale Air France, [1975] 1 WLR 780 (HL) involved the applicability of the laws of bankruptcy to the existence of mutual debts existing as of the date of bankruptcy. Re Gingras Automobile Ltée, 1962 CanLII 79 (SCC), [1962] SCR 676 deals with the legal question of paramountcy. Hamilton and others v. Law Debenture Trustee Ltd. and others, [2001] 2 BCLC 159 (Ch Div); Maxwell supra; Re British & Commonwealth Holdings PLC (No. 3), [1992] 1 WLR 672 (Ch Div) each dealt with instruments that had rights on their face that were subordinated to the rights of all other creditors.

> ...If one creditor subordinates its claim to the claim of another party without subordinating to other claims ranking in priority to the claim of the other party, it is my view that a distribution of the assets of the bankrupt debtor should be made as if there was no subordination except to the extent that the share of the distribution to which the subordinating creditor would otherwise be entitled should be paid to the party in whose favour the subordination was granted.
> It is not appropriate to simply take the subordinating creditor out of the class to which it belongs and put it in the class ranking immediately behind the holder of the subordination right. I say this for two reasons. First, the creditors in the same class as the subordinating creditor should not receive the benefit of a subordination agreement to which they are not a party and on which they are not entitled to rely. They would receive a windfall benefit by the removal of the subordinating creditor from their class in the event that there were insufficient monies to fully pay their class because the total indebtedness of the class would be reduced and the pro rata distribution would be increased. Second, if the parties to the subordination agreement turned their minds to it, they would inevitably agree that the subordinating creditor should receive its normal share of the distribution and give it to the party in whose favour the subordination was > granted. The party receiving the subordination would agree because it would be paid a portion of a distribution to a higher class of creditor that it would not otherwise receive and the subordinating creditor would agree because it would not receive the money in either event.

Dynex Petroleum Ltd.* 1997 CanLII 14795 (AB QB), (1997), 145 DLR (4th) 499 (Alta QB) at p. 529 (reversed on appeal on other grounds); Roy Goode, Legal Problems of Credit and Security, 3rd ed. (Sweet & Maxwell: London, 2003) at p. 55. It would seem to me that a guide-lining principle should be that as discussed in A.R. Keay, MacPherson's Law of Company Liquidation (London; Sweet & Maxwell, 2001) at p. 717:

> However, they [the courts] would permit a liquidator to distribute according to an agreement made along the lines of the latter situation providing that to do so would not adversely affect any creditor not a party to the agreement, i.e., creditors not involved in the subordination agreement would not receive less under that agreement than would have been received if distributions had been made on a pari passu basis.

See also J.L. Lopes, "Contractual Subordinations and Bankruptcy" (1980), 97 No. 3 Banking Law Journal, 204 at p. 206.

> At the conclusion of the bankruptcy proceedings, a dividend is allocated to all unsecured creditors, including the subordinated creditor, on a pro rata basis. The dividend allocated to the subordinated creditor is paid over to the senior creditor, to the extent of its claim, with the subordinated creditor retaining the remainder of the dividend if the senior creditor is paid in full.* This process neither affects the amount of claims against the debtor nor the dividend paid to unsecured creditors. (*See, e.g., In re Associated Gas & Elec. Co., 53 F. Supp. 107, 114 (S.D.N.Y. 1943).)

[11] It seems to me that what should be looked at with respect to the settlement is the substance and not the form, although it does seem to me that it would be better for form to follow substance. In essence, what the settlement provides for (the settlement to provide some certainty of the result and therefore avoid the uncertainty of the claim by that the SP Debt subordination provision may not be effective vis-à-vis the Senior Indebtedness and the issue of whether the SP Debt would be entitled to a separate class with the possibility of a veto being exercised by this class against a plan of reorganization, otherwise acceptable to the other creditors) is that the SP Debt would receive its rateable share of "proceeds" under the proposed plan but as a result of the agreement between the adherents to the settlement, then the SP Debt adherents would transfer 74% of their proceeds to the benefit of the Senior Indebtedness and retain 26%. It would also appear that the same result could obtain with a partial assignment of SP Debt claims or a declaration of trust in favour of the Senior Indebtedness, with the quid pro quo being that there be no subordination as to the remaining 26% beneficially owned by the holders of the SP Debt.

[12] There was no problem with this type of subordination arrangement in Horne v. Chester & Fein Property Developments Pty Ltd. and Ors (1986), 11 ACLR 485 (Vic SC) at pp. 489-90 where Southwell J. stated:

> In the speech of Viscount Dilhorne, there is a discussion of a number of authorities, of which "the weight of opinion expressed ... appears to me to be in favour of the conclusion that it is not possible to contract out of s 31". However, there, and, so far as I have seen in most other relevant cases, the term "contract out" is used in circumstances where the contract relied upon is one, the performance of which, upon later insolvency, would adversely affect other creditors who were not parties to the contract. Viscount Dilhorne referred with approval at 805 to dicta of Hallett J. in Victoria Products Ltd. v. Tosh & Co. Ltd. (1940), 165 LT 78 where His Honour said that "... an attempt to leave outside that process some particular item is one which should be regarded as against the policy of the insolvency laws ..."
> Repeatedly, over the years, "the policy of the insolvency laws" has formed the basis of decision. That policy, as it appears to me, was never intended to alter the rights and obligations of parties freely entering into a contract, unless the performance of the contract would, upon insolvency, adversely affect the right of strangers to the contract. Authority for that proposition is to be found in Ex parte Holthausen; Re Scheibler (1874) LR 9 Ch App 722 at 726-7 (referred to by Lord Morris in his dissenting speech in British Eagle at 770-1).

[13] In Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Commercial Bank (unreported decision of Wachowich J. CQBA released December 15, 1993), the governments of Canada and Alberta waived their Crown priority on insolvency in favour of all other unsecured creditors, reducing themselves to pari passu ranking. But the CDIC also waived any Crown priority that it may have arising from its status as an agent of the government of Canada and it also subordinated its claim in favour of some but not all of the other unsecured creditors (including trade creditors). As put by the Bayerische Landesbank group in their factum at para. 65:

> 65. Justice Wachowich correctly dismissed the objection made to him that the selective nature of the subordination offended the pari passu principle. He approved a distribution in which it was first determined what the ordinary shares of all unsecured creditors were and then the pari passu recovery by CDIC attributable to its claim was redirected to those creditors to whom CDIC (here, the [SP Debt] holders), the corresponding enhanced recovery went to those unsecured creditors who were intended to enjoy the benefit of the subordination covenant (here, holders of the Senior Indebtedness) and the effect on the other unsecured creditors (here, the trades) was neutral.

[14] In the end result I do not see that there is any problem with the SP Debt being selectively subordinated to the Senior Indebtedness. This subordination to that "borrowed money" does not result in the SP Debt being subordinated to all the unsecured debt, Senior Indebtedness and non-Senior Indebtedness alike.

[15] With respect to the right to vote, I do not see that the fact that there is a subordination takes away or detracts from the right to vote by holders of the SP Debt. See Menegon v. Philip Services Inc., [1999] OJ No. 4080 (SCJ) at paras. 38, 53. At para. 21 of Uniforêt Inc. (In the Matter or the Arrangement of), [2003] QJ No. 9328 (SCJ), Tingley J. stated:

> 21. For a plan of arrangement to succeed, an insolvent company must secure the approval of all classes of its creditors, even those who have subordinated their claims to all other creditors, as is the case with the debenture holders.

[17] The issue of whether the AC Applicants can incorporate the terms of the subject settlement or some equivalent thereof in a Plan to be proposed is in my view a matter for them to decide, but in general, I see no impediment to their doing so provided that they take into account all relevant factors.

[18] That leaves the issue of the position of the DM Bonds in light of the fact that s. 8(2) of their Indenture does not refer to "reorganization" in the same way as the other issues of the SP Debt does. Again, one must look at this provision in context. Allow me to set out the provisions of s. 8(1)(2)(5) and (7):

> 8. Subordination and Status; Listing
> (1) The payment of principal and interest on the Bonds and Coupons is hereby expressly subordinated, to the extent and in the manner hereinafter set forth, in right of payment to the prior payments in full of all Senior Indebtedness of the Borrower. The term "Senior Indebtedness" shall mean all indebtedness, present or future, which is not expressly subordinated to or ranking pari passu with the Bonds, whether by operation of law or otherwise, in the event of a winding-up, liquidation or dissolution, whether voluntary or involuntary, whether by operation of law or by reason of insolvency legislation. The term "Indebtedness" shall mean the principal, premium, if any, and unpaid interest (including interest accrued after the commencement of any reorganization or bankruptcy proceeding) on any indebtedness of the Borrower for borrowed money, whether evidence by a bond, debenture, note or other evidence of indebtedness whether secured or unsecured, including indebtedness for borrowed money of others guaranteed by the Borrower and including the Bonds and Coupons contemplated hereby.

(2) Upon any winding-up, liquidation or dissolution of the Borrower, whether in bankruptcy, insolvency, receivership or other proceedings including special Act of Parliament or upon an assignment for the benefit of creditors or any other sequestering of the assets and liabilities of the Borrower or otherwise,

(a) the holders of all Senior Indebtedness shall be entitled to receive payment in full of all sums on account of Senior Indebtedness (including payment of or provision for any unmatured, contingent or unliquidated Senior Indebtedness) before the holders of Bonds or Coupons are entitled to receive any payment of interest or principal; and

(b) any payment or distribution of assets of the Borrower of any kind or character, whether in cash, property or securities, to which the holder of Bonds or Coupons would be entitled except for the provisions of this § 8 shall be paid by the liquidation trustee or agent or other person making such payment or distribution, whether a trustee in bankruptcy, a receiver or liquidating trustee or otherwise, directly to the holders of Senior Indebtedness or their representative or representatives or to the trustee or trustees under any indenture under which any instrument evidencing any of such Senior Indebtedness may have been issued, rateably according to the aggregate amounts remaining unpaid on account of the principal of, premium, if any, and interest on the Senior Indebtedness, held or represented by each, to the extent necessary to make payment in full of all Senior Indebtedness remaining unpaid, after giving effect to any concurrent payment or distribution to the holders of such Senior Indebtedness; and

(c) subject to the payment in full of all due Senior Indebtedness holders of Bonds or Coupons shall be subrogated pro rata (based on respective amounts paid for the benefit of the holders of Senior Indebtedness) with the holder of other Indebtedness to the rights of the holders of Senior Indebtedness to receive payments or distributions of cash, property or securities of the Borrower applicable to Senior Indebtedness until the Bonds and Coupons shall be paid in full and no such payments or distributions to the holders of Bonds or Coupons of cash, property or securities otherwise distributable to the holders of Senior Indebtedness shall, as between the Borrower, its creditors other than the holders of Senior Indebtedness, and the holders of Bonds or Coupons be deemed to be a payment by the Borrower to the holders of Bonds or Coupons, or for their account. It is understood that the provisions of this § 8 are and are intended solely for the purpose of defining the relative rights of the holders of Bonds or Coupons and the holders of other pari passu Indebtedness, on the one hand, and the holders of Senior Indebtedness, on the other hand.

(5) No payment by the Borrower on the Bonds or Coupons (whether upon redemption or repurchase, or otherwise) shall be made if, at the due time o f such payment or immediately after giving effect thereto, (a) there shall exist a default in the payment of principal, premium, if any, sinking fund or interest with respect to any Senior Indebtedness, or (b) there shall have occurred an event of default (other than a default in the payment of principal, premium, if any, sinking fund or interest) with respect to any Senior Indebtedness, as defined therein or in the instrument under which the same is outstanding, permitting the holders thereof or any trustee under any such instrument to accelerate the maturity thereof, and such event of default shall not have been cured or waived or shall not have ceased to exist (except payments made if the Bonds are redeemed or acquired prior to the happening of such default or event of default).

(7) The Borrower undertakes vis-à-vis the Trustee for the benefit of the holders of Bonds and Coupons that until such time as the Bonds or Coupons have been completely repaid the Borrower will ensure that the Bonds rank and will rank pari passu with all unsecured and subordinated Indebtedness of the Borrower other than Indebtedness preferred by law.

[19] It is not instantly obvious as to which provision "hereafter" refers to as there is no specific section reference in the same way as is specified in sections 1(2), 2(1), 3(1), 3(2), 9(3) and 10(3) of the DM Bond terms. It was posited by the Bayerische Landesbank group that "hereafter" may refer to (i) the remainder of s. 8(1); (ii) s. 8(2); (iii) the entire subsequent balance of s. 8; or (iv) the entire balance of the DM Bond terms. As the balance of s. 8(1) consists of definitions of "Senior Indebtedness" and "Indebtedness", this would speak to the "extent" of the subordination of the DM Bonds but would not address the manner in which they are subordinated.

[20] Section 8 does contain a description of how distributions are to be applied as between holders of Senior Indebtedness and holders of the DM Bonds in the event of AC being wound-up, liquidated or dissolved and there is a distribution of its assets. Thus s. 8(2) can be read as addressing the "manner" of the subordination in those particular circumstances of such a winding-up, liquidation or dissolution. However is s. 8(2) the exclusive trigger in respect of subordination? It should be kept in mind that there is no "magic words or formula" to invoke a subordination. As well, as indicated above, there are other references to specific provisions of the terms so as to direct the reader to a specific spot. It should be observed that s. 8(2) is not the only provision in the balance of s. 8 which deals with the subject of subordination as s. 8(3), (4), (5), (6) and (7) contain additional procedural or other provisions addressing in some sense the "manner" of subordination. Is there a conflict with s. 8(5) or (7) if "hereafter" refers only to s. 8(1) and (2)?

[21] Section 8(5) provides that the subordination of the DM Bonds is effective if AC fails to make any payment to any holder of the Senior Indebtedness, when due, without any reference to whether or not this default in timely payment gives rise to, or occurs in the course of, any form of insolvency proceedings. There has been a default in the payment of interest due on the Senior Indebtedness since some time prior to the CCAA filing in April, 2003. The DM Bondholders assert that this default will be cured as it is expected that the amounts due on the Senior Indebtedness will be satisfied upon implementation of a Sanctioned Plan (and in this respect I note that there is no time limit for cure to take place contained in s. 8(5)). However this presupposes that the Plan mechanism would indeed cure the default. However in the context of s. 8(5), I do not see that such compromise of the right of holders of Senior Indebtedness to be paid acts as a cure which would otherwise inactivate the form of subordination which s. 8(5) provides. Thus it would seem to me that at the present time, the failure to pay amounts due on the Senior Indebtedness has caused a default which has triggered the subordination provisions of s. 8(5). This trigger aspect is not dependent upon there being a "reorganization".

[22] Section 8(7) provides that the DM Bonds are to rank pari passu with all unsecured subordination Indebtedness of AC which would include the other issues of SP Debt. If the DM Bonds were not to rank equally with the rest of the SP Debt, then s. 8(7) would be rendered meaningless.

[23] It therefore seems to me that the DM Bonds are to be treated at this time as SP Debt which is to be treated in the same way as the other issues of SP Debt which are all presently subordinated to the Senior Indebtedness.

[24] Orders to issue accordingly.

On appeal from orders of Justice James Farley dated March 29, 2001 and May 7, 2001.

BY THE COURT:

[1] Cumberland Asset Management, and others, appeal from orders made by Farley J. dated March 29, 2001 and May 7, 2001. In the March 29, 2001 order Farley J. sanctioned a plan of arrangement under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended (C.C.A.A.) proposed by Deloitte & Touche Inc., the Interim Receiver of Anvil Range Mining Range Mining Corporation and Anvil Range Properties Inc. In his May 7, 2001 order, Farley J. ordered that the appellants pay costs relating to the sanction motion in the total amount of $28,500.

[2] The facts respecting the sanctioning of the plan are set forth in Farley J.'s reasons which are reported at 25 C.B.R. (4th) 1 and need not be repeated in detail. The following is an outline, which contains some history of this proceeding which is not included in Farley J.'s reasons.

[3] Anvil Range Mining Corporation is the owner of a lead and zinc mine, known as the Faro Mine, in the Yukon Territory. It bought this mine for about $27,000,000 in 1994 from KPMG Inc., in its capacity as Interim Receiver of the then owner, Curragh Inc.

[4] Anvil Range began production in August 1995 after conducting a nine-month $75,000,000 pre-stripping and mill refurbishment program. It suspended mining operations in December 1996 and milling operations in the spring of 1997 because of falling metal prices. It recommenced operations in the fall of 1997 but ceased mining and milling early in 1998.

[5] In January 1998, Anvil Range applied for and received protection from its creditors under the C.C.A.A. This was the beginning of the proceeding in which the orders under appeal were, eventually, made. In March 1998, Cominco Ltd., a secured creditor of Anvil Range, moved for the appointment of an interim receiver and termination of the stay provided for in the C.C.A.A. proceeding. Deloitte & Touche Inc. was appointed Interim Receiver and the court directed it to report to the court on certain matters, including seeking advice and directions respecting a marketing plan for the mine.

[6] In response to this, the Interim Receiver filed its second report dated June 17, 1998 in which it recommended that "no funds be spent on marketing the mine for the present". This was based on several different facts, one of them being "the fact that no prospective purchasers had emerged to that date .... to express even minimal interest in the mine site despite the well publicized facts in the industry press".

[7] As part of the ongoing dispute among the parties, the Interim Receiver brought a motion before Blair J., which was heard on August 20, 1998, seeking approval to sell certain assets at the mine. Blair J. noted that the Interim Receiver had expressed the opinion on the basis of its market analysis that it was "unlikely that the Faro Mine can be reopened within the next 2-3 years and possibly as long as 5 years." He then said:

I agree that it is difficult to be very optimistic about the future prospects of the Faro Mine, including the chance of its re-opening. On the other hand, Strathcona (acknowledged by all to be expert in the field) seems to feel strongly that the best chance of recovery is if the Grum Pit at least is kept on a "standby-mode" ready to be made operative quickly when a period of good metal prices arrives. To do this the equipment in question will be necessary. To replace it would be costly and it may well be a non-starter if what is being considered is only a 3 year operation or so.

[8] Blair J. did not dismiss the request for approval to sell the equipment but adjourned it to October 29, 1998 to enable the Yukon Territorial Government to do further analysis. This was because of the importance of the mine to the fabric of the Yukon Territory.

[9] After extensive negotiations and a filing of the Yukon Territorial Government report, a funding formula was established in December 1998 whereby the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development ("DIAND") assumed most of the funding obligations of going forward. This funding was secured by a charge against the real property.

[10] In December 1999, the court granted leave to the Interim Receiver or the secured creditors to file a plan of arrangement. About a year of negotiations among the secured creditors followed, eventually leading to an extensive settlement conference held in Vancouver under the direction of Justice Kierans, sitting as a justice of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory. The conference resulted in a settlement among three groups of secured creditors: (1) the Mining Lien Act Claimants; (2) Cominco Ltd.; and (3) DIAND, the Yukon Territorial Government and the Yukon Workers' Compensation, Health and Safety Board. The settlement was to be implemented by a plan under the C.C.A.A.

[11] As will be set forth in more detail later in these reasons, the three groups of secured creditors were the only parties with a legal and economic interest in the assets of Anvil Range. The plan settled a series of complex priority disputes both within creditor classes and among creditor classes and also dealt with allocating funds in the Interim Receiver's possession.

1. The Mining Lien Act Claimants.

2. Cominco Ltd.

3. The government creditors, DIAND, the Yukon Territorial Government, and the Yukon Workers' Compensation, Health and Safety Board.

[13] The plan provides for the class 3 creditors to acquire the mine and the mill located on it and certain other assets (the "Excluded Assets") and to assume responsibility for funding the ongoing necessary environmental, maintenance and security programs. The other two classes of Affected Creditors are to share in the proceeds of the sale of the remaining assets (the "Realization Assets").

[14] The Interim Receiver recommended approval of the plan as the best alternative for settling the outstanding priority issues in dispute and because there was no recovery possible other than to the Affected Creditors.

[15] The class 1 creditors' secured claims against Anvil Range property, as judicially declared by judgments of the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory, total $18,312,169. The claim of the class 2 creditor, Cominco Ltd., was judicially determined by the Superior Court of Justice (Ontario) on January 27, 1999 to be $24,353,657 with post-judgment interest accruing on this amount at 8.5% per annum.

[16] With respect to the class 3 creditors, the Yukon Territorial Government and the Yukon Workers' Compensation and Health and Safety Board claim is about $1,000,000. The claim advanced on behalf of DIAND is said to total over $60,000,000 for funding the Interim Receiver's expenses and, also, the environmental remediation costs. We shall deal with the salient details of it shortly.

[17] The Affected Creditors unanimously approved the plan which was then sanctioned by the order of Farley J. dated March 29, 2001.

[18] The appellants' appeal is substantially based on the following submissions:

1. The plan is not "fair and reasonable" in all of its circumstances as it effectively eliminates the opportunity for unsecured creditors to realize anything.

2. The plan is contrary to the purposes underlying the C.C.A.A.

3. DIAND's reclamation claim is inconsistent with the "fair and reasonable principles" of the C.C.A.A. and environmental remediation legislation.

[19] Underlying these submissions is the submission that Farley J. erred in not requiring a more complete and in-depth valuation of Anvil Range's assets be obtained by the Interim Receiver.

[20] This last submission should be dealt with first because it is fundamental to the success of the appeal. Farley J.'s findings were based on two reports, one by Strathcona Mineral Services Ltd. dated March 12, 2001 and the other by Deloitte & Touche Corporate Finance Canada, Inc. dated March 13, 2001. In preparing its report, Deloitte & Touche reviewed the Strathcona report, among other materials.

[21] In its report Strathcona noted that in the Interim Receiver's 22nd report there was an estimate of the capital expenditures that would be required to resume mining activity at the Grum deposit (which was the only accessible resource base on the Anvil property) including the purchase of mining equipment, rehabilitation of the pit walls, and modifications and repairs to the process facilities. Strathcona said:

The total is estimated at $80 to $100 million before working capital requirements and we consider this estimate to be reasonable and in the general range of what could be expected. It is clear that the capital expenditures to restart mining operations are going to exceed, perhaps by a factor of two, the cumulative gross operating margins for three years of operation that are indicated.

The total amount realized from the sale or disposition of the foregoing assets on a salvage basis would appear to be in the order of $10-$15 million without making any contribution towards the ongoing care and maintenance costs for the property or the reclamation requirements which we understand have become the responsibility of DIAND. There may also be some value ascribed to tax pools that remain from operating losses, capital expenditures and exploration expenditures by Anvil Range. However, presumably most of the value, if any, of those tax pools would only be applicable upon the resumption of mining operations on the property, and the Interim Receiver would be best positioned to comment on this item.

[23] Deloitte & Touche Corporate Finance Canada, Inc. concluded that the established market value of all the assets to be "in the range of $11.1 to $19.9 million (Schedule 1), as at January 31, 2001" and that, if it were asked to be more specific, "[it] would suggest the mid-point of the foregoing range, being $15.5 million." It concluded: "Based on the above, there is no value remaining for the unsecured creditors, as the amount owed to secured creditors of over $90.0 million exceeds the value of the assets of Anvil Range."

[24] The appellants submitted a letter from Watts, Griffis & McOuat, Consulting Geologists and Engineers, dated March 21, 2001 which reviewed several documents, "in particular" the Strathcona report dated March 12, 2001. In this letter, Watts, Griffis & McOuat stated "a number of questions about the methodology and logic that Strathcona is using". It did not state an opinion on the value of the Anvil Range property.

[25] On these materials, Farley J. concluded that "the secured claims are far in excess of the value of the assets" and that the value had to be determined "on a current basis" and not "on a speculative or (remote) possibility basis." He dealt with the evidence submitted by the appellant as follows:

The Watts, Griffis & McOuat letter of March 21, 2001 has been hastily prepared in an attempt to throw doubt on some of the Strathcona observations and conclusions – but not to discredit them. In fact in numerous instances [the] letter concurs with the Strathcona report. Rather the author of the letter has some questions. It must be appreciated that Strathcona/Farquharson has had significant involvement with the Anvil mining facilities over the past several years, whereas Watts, Griffis & McOuat has only had this rather peripheral engagement. I do not find it unusual that two experienced consultants in this mining field may have different views or approaches, nor that one may feel the need for more information than it was able to glean from reviewing the listed documents before reaching a conclusion. In the result, I think it reasonable to accept the views of Farquharson, an established and recognized expert in this field, who has had, as indicated, considerable experience with this matter over the past several years. Further, I think it inappropriate and unnecessary to further delay and incur additional costs to engage upon a further study.

> [26] In our view, Farley J. did not err in accepting the respondent's evidence as affording a reasonable basis for his findings and, further, he did not make any error in his assessment of this evidence that would justify our interfering with his conclusions: Equity Waste Management of Canada v. Halton Hills (Town) 1997 CanLII 2742 (ON CA), (1997), 35 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.) at 333-336.
> [27] It may be that the Strathcona report, as a free standing document, could have been more detailed but this is far from saying that it was not capable, particularly in the context of this proceeding, which began in 1998, of forming a reasonable basis for Farley J.'s findings. This context includes the evidence that Anvil Range bought the property in 1994 for $27,000,000, that its resources underwent depletion since then, that the cost of putting the property in a state where it could recommence operations was some $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 and, although it had been known for sometime in the industry that the property was "available", no one had expressed any interest in it.
> [28] We turn now to the three basic submissions of the appellant set forth in paragraph 18 of these reasons.
> [29] It will be helpful to deal with the third submission first, that relating to the DIAND claim. The total DIAND claim is for something over $60,000,000. The appellants submit that by reason of the "polluter pays" principle, it is wrong that DIAND should have a secured claim against the assets of Anvil Range for environmental remediation at the expense of the unsecured creditors. There are several facets to this submission but, because of the particular facts of this case, we need not explore them. Of the total DIAND claim, some $16,000,000 relates to funds expended under court orders for the Interim Receiver and this is, undeniably, a valid secured claim. As will be apparent, it is sufficient to resolve this appeal if only this part of DIAND's claim is taken into account – and it may well not be necessary to take any part of the claim into account.
> [30] We turn now to the first two of the appellant's specific submissions. The first is that the plan is not fair and reasonable because it effectively eliminates the opportunity for unsecured creditors to realize anything.
> [31] From the accepted valuation the maximum possible total value of Anvil Range's assets is $19,900,000. After eliminating the portion of DIAND's claim for remediation costs, the secured claims total at least $60,000.000. Accordingly, even after allowing for a fair margin of error on each side of the equation (the assets side and the claims side) it can be seen that the unsecured creditors have no legal or economic interest in the assets in question.
> [32] The second submission is that the plan is contrary to the purposes of the C.C.A.A. Courts have recognized that the purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to enable compromises to be made for the common benefit of the creditors and the company and to keep the company alive and out of the hands of liquidators. See, for example, Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Ins. Co. of Can. (1989), 73 C.B.R. (NS) 195 (B.C.C.A.) at 201. Farley J. recognized this but also expressed the view in paragraph 11 of his reasons that:

The CCAA may be utilized to effect a sale, winding up or a liquidation of a company and its assets in appropriate circumstances. See Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) at p. 32; Re Olympia & York Developments Ltd. 1995 CanLII 7380 (ON SC), (1995), 34 C.B.R. (3d) 93 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List] at p. 104. Integral to those circumstances would be where a Plan under the CCAA would maximize the value of the stakeholders' pie.

> [33] Further to this it may be noted that the plan in this case reflected a compromise of difficult priority issues among the secured creditors and, as stated later in Farley J.'s reasons, "the approval of this Plan will allow the creditors (both secured and unsecured) and the shareholders of Anvil to move on with their lives and activities while the mining properties including the mine will be under proper stewardship."
> [34] It may also be noted that s. 5 of the C.C.A.A. contemplates a plan which is a compromise between a debtor company and its secured creditors and that by the terms of s. 6 of the Act, applied to the facts of this case, the plan is binding only on the secured creditors and the company and not on the unsecured creditors.
> [35] Relevant to this issue is the fact that the appellants put forward an alternative plan, which involved their receiving the corporate shell of Anvil Range together with $500,000, and other terms. This plan, however, had no viability. As Farley J. noted in his reasons for the costs disposition it was "doomed to failure given the stated opposition to same [the alternate plan] of the secureds-Cominco Lien and Claimants and DIAND".

[36] It is not necessary to resolve this issue to decide the appeal. If the order under appeal was not properly made under the C.C.A.A., there is no doubt that it could have been made by Farley J. in response to the alternative relief sought, which was that of approving a sale of Anvil Range's assets by the Interim Receiver on terms substantially similar to those provided for in the plan. Taking into account that the assets are insufficient to pay even half of the secured creditors claims, it is clear that the order under appeal occasioned no prejudice whatsoever to the appellants. Accordingly we do not give effect to this submission.

[37] In the complex circumstances of the operation of the mine and given that there is no hope of the sale generating sufficient funds to satisfy the secured creditors, it cannot be said that Farley J. erred in approving the plan as being fair and reasonable.

COSTS

[38] The other appeal is from Farley J.'s order requiring the appellants to pay costs relating to the motion which he fixed in the total amount of $28,500 and allocated as follows:

$15,000 to the Interim Receiver;
$ 7,000 to Cominco;
$ 5,000 to DIAND;
$ 1,500 to Yukon Energy Corporation

[39] The appellants submit that Farley J. erred in this costs disposition because parties with an interest in a company governed by the C.C.A.A. should be free to appear in court and oppose the sanctioning of a plan on legitimate grounds without the threat of the penalty of the costs being imposed against them.

[40] The award of costs, of course, was a matter within the discretion of the judge and we are not entitled to interfere with the exercise of the discretion just because we may have exercised it differently. To succeed the appellants must show that the exercise of discretion was affected by some error in principle or by misapprehension of the facts. In this case, while we might have been inclined simply to deprive the appellant of costs relating to the motion, we cannot say that there was no principled basis for the disposition which Farley J. made. He was entitled to conclude, as he did, that there was no realistic basis supporting the appellants' opposition to the plan.

DISPOSITION

[41] In the result, the appeal is dismissed with costs payable by the appellants to the respondents who delivered factums and appeared on the hearing of the appeal. These respondents should deliver their submissions respecting the costs of the appeal, in writing, within seven days of the release of these reasons and the appellants should deliver their submissions within fourteen days of the release of the reasons.

On appeal from the sanction order of Justice Colin L. Campbell of the Superior Court of Justice, dated June 5, 2008, with reasons reported at [2008] O.J. No. 2265.
BLAIR J.A.:

A. INTRODUCTION

[1] In August 2007 a liquidity crisis suddenly threatened the Canadian market in Asset Backed Commercial Paper ("ABCP"). The crisis was triggered by a loss of confidence amongst investors stemming from the news of widespread defaults on U.S. sub-prime mortgages. The loss of confidence placed the Canadian financial market at risk generally and was reflective of an economic volatility worldwide.

[2] By agreement amongst the major Canadian participants, the $32 billion Canadian market in third-party ABCP was frozen on August 13, 2007 pending an attempt to resolve the crisis through a restructuring of that market. The Pan-Canadian Investors Committee, chaired by Purdy Crawford, C.C., Q.C., was formed and ultimately put forward the creditor-initiated Plan of Compromise and Arrangement that forms the subject-matter of these proceedings. The Plan was sanctioned by Colin L. Campbell J. on June 5, 2008.

Digitized by Google

[3] Certain creditors who opposed the Plan seek leave to appeal and, if leave is granted, appeal from that decision. They raise an important point regarding the permissible scope of a restructuring under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 as amended ("CCAA"): can the court sanction a Plan that calls for creditors to provide releases to third parties who are themselves solvent and not creditors of the debtor company? They also argue that, if the answer to this question is yes, the application judge erred in holding that this Plan, with its particular releases (which bar some claims even in fraud), was fair and reasonable and therefore in sanctioning it under the CCAA.

Leave to Appeal

[4] Because of the particular circumstances and urgency of these proceedings, the court agreed to collapse an oral hearing for leave to appeal with the hearing of the appeal itself. At the outset of argument we encouraged counsel to combine their submissions on both matters.

[5] The proposed appeal raises issues of considerable importance to restructuring proceedings under the CCAA Canada-wide. There are serious and arguable grounds of appeal and – given the expedited time-table – the appeal will not unduly delay the progress of the proceedings. I am satisfied that the criteria for granting leave to appeal in CCAA proceedings, set out in such cases as Re Cineplex Odeon Corp. 2001 CanLII 32746 (ON CA), (2001), 24 C.B.R. (4th) 201 (Ont. C.A.), and Re Country Style Food Services 2002 CanLII 41751 (ON CA), (2002), 158 O.A.C. 30, are met. I would grant leave to appeal.

Appeal

[6] For the reasons that follow, however, I would dismiss the appeal.

B. FACTS

The Parties

[7] The appellants are holders of ABCP Notes who oppose the Plan. They do so principally on the basis that it requires them to grant releases to third party financial institutions against whom they say they have claims for relief arising out of their purchase of ABCP Notes. Amongst them are an airline, a tour operator, a mining company, a wireless provider, a pharmaceuticals retailer, and several holding companies and energy companies.

[8] Each of the appellants has large sums invested in ABCP – in some cases, hundreds of millions of dollars. Nonetheless, the collective holdings of the appellants – slightly over $1 billion – represent only a small fraction of the more than $32 billion of ABCP involved in the restructuring.

[9] The lead respondent is the Pan-Canadian Investors Committee which was responsible for the creation and negotiation of the Plan on behalf of the creditors. Other respondents include various major international financial institutions, the five largest Canadian banks, several trust companies, and some smaller holders of ABCP product. They participated in the market in a number of different ways.

The ABCP Market

[10] Asset Backed Commercial Paper is a sophisticated and hitherto well-accepted financial instrument. It is primarily a form of short-term investment – usually 30 to 90 days – typically with a low interest yield only slightly better than that available through other short-term paper from a government or bank. It is said to be "asset backed" because the cash that is used to purchase an ABCP Note is converted into a portfolio of financial assets or other asset interests that in turn provide security for the repayment of the notes.

[11] ABCP was often presented by those selling it as a safe investment, somewhat like a guaranteed investment certificate.

[12] The Canadian market for ABCP is significant and administratively complex. As of August 2007, investors had placed over $116 billion in Canadian ABCP. Investors range from individual pensioners to large institutional bodies. On the selling and distribution end, numerous players are involved, including chartered banks, investment houses and other financial institutions. Some of these players participated in multiple ways. The Plan in this proceeding relates to approximately $32 billion of non-bank sponsored ABCP the restructuring of which is considered essential to the preservation of the Canadian ABCP market.

[14] Various corporations (the "Sponsors") would arrange for entities they control ("Conduits") to make ABCP Notes available to be sold to investors through "Dealers" (banks and other investment dealers). Typically, ABCP was issued by series and sometimes by classes within a series.

[15] The cash from the purchase of the ABCP Notes was used to purchase assets which were held by trustees of the Conduits ("Issuer Trustees") and which stood as security for repayment of the notes. Financial institutions that sold or provided the Conduits with the assets that secured the ABCP are known as "Asset Providers". To help ensure that investors would be able to redeem their notes, "Liquidity Providers" agreed to provide funds that could be drawn upon to meet the demands of maturing ABCP Notes in certain circumstances. Most Asset Providers were also Liquidity Providers. Many of these banks and financial institutions were also holders of ABCP Notes ("Noteholders"). The Asset and Liquidity Providers held first charges on the assets.

[16] When the market was working well, cash from the purchase of new ABCP Notes was also used to pay off maturing ABCP Notes; alternatively, Noteholders simply rolled their maturing notes over into new ones. As I will explain, however, there was a potential underlying predicament with this scheme.

The Liquidity Crisis

[17] The types of assets and asset interests acquired to "back" the ABCP Notes are varied and complex. They were generally long-term assets such as residential mortgages, credit card receivables, auto loans, cash collateralized debt obligations and derivative investments such as credit default swaps. Their particular characteristics do not matter for the purpose of this appeal, but they shared a common feature that proved to be the Achilles heel of the ABCP market: because of their long-term nature there was an inherent timing mismatch between the cash they generated and the cash needed to repay maturing ABCP Notes.

[18] When uncertainty began to spread through the ABCP marketplace in the summer of 2007, investors stopped buying the ABCP product and existing Noteholders ceased to roll over their maturing notes. There was no cash to redeem those notes. Although calls were made on the Liquidity Providers for payment, most of the Liquidity Providers declined to fund the redemption of the notes, arguing that the conditions for liquidity funding had not been met in the circumstances. Hence the "liquidity crisis" in the ABCP market.

[19] The crisis was fuelled largely by a lack of transparency in the ABCP scheme. Investors could not tell what assets were backing their notes – partly because the ABCP Notes were often sold before or at the same time as the assets backing them were acquired; partly because of the sheer complexity of certain of the underlying assets; and partly because of assertions of confidentiality by those involved with the assets. As fears arising from the spreading U.S. sub-prime mortgage crisis mushroomed, investors became increasingly concerned that their ABCP Notes may be supported by those crumbling assets. For the reasons outlined above, however, they were unable to redeem their maturing ABCP Notes.

The Montreal Protocol

[20] The liquidity crisis could have triggered a wholesale liquidation of the assets, at depressed prices. But it did not. During the week of August 13, 2007, the ABCP market in Canada froze – the result of a standstill arrangement orchestrated on the heels of the crisis by numerous market participants, including Asset Providers, Liquidity Providers, Noteholders and other financial industry representatives. Under the standstill agreement – known as the Montréal Protocol – the parties committed to restructuring the ABCP market with a view, as much as possible, to preserving the value of the assets and of the notes.

[21] The work of implementing the restructuring fell to the Pan-Canadian Investors Committee, an applicant in the proceeding and respondent in the appeal. The Committee is composed of 17 financial and investment institutions, including chartered banks, credit unions, a pension board, a Crown corporation, and a university board of governors. All 17 members are themselves Noteholders; three of them also participated in the ABCP market in other capacities as well. Between them, they hold about two thirds of the $32 billion of ABCP sought to be restructured in these proceedings.

[22] Mr. Crawford was named the Committee's chair. He thus had a unique vantage point on the work of the Committee and the restructuring process as a whole. His lengthy affidavit strongly informed the application judge's understanding of the factual context, and our own. He was not cross-examined and his evidence is unchallenged.

[23] Beginning in September 2007, the Committee worked to craft a plan that would preserve the value of the notes and assets, satisfy the various stakeholders to the extent possible, and restore confidence in an important segment of the Canadian financial marketplace. In March 2008, it and the other applicants sought CCAA protection for the ABCP debtors and the approval of a Plan that had been pre-negotiated with some, but not all, of those affected by the misfortunes in the Canadian ABCP market.

The Plan

a) Plan Overview

[24] Although the ABCP market involves many different players and kinds of assets, each with their own challenges, the committee opted for a single plan. In Mr. Crawford's words, "all of the ABCP suffers from common problems that are best addressed by a common solution." The Plan the Committee developed is highly complex and involves many parties. In its essence, the Plan would convert the Noteholders' paper – which has been frozen and therefore effectively worthless for many months – into new, long-term notes that would trade freely, but with a discounted face value. The hope is that a strong secondary market for the notes will emerge in the long run.

[25] The Plan aims to improve transparency by providing investors with detailed information about the assets supporting their ABCP Notes. It also addresses the timing mismatch between the notes and the assets by adjusting the maturity provisions and interest rates on the new notes. Further, the Plan adjusts some of the underlying credit default swap contracts by increasing the thresholds for default triggering events; in this way, the likelihood of a forced liquidation flowing from the credit default swap holder's prior security is reduced and, in turn, the risk for ABCP investors is decreased.

[26] Under the Plan, the vast majority of the assets underlying ABCP would be pooled into two master asset vehicles (MAV1 and MAV2). The pooling is designed to increase the collateral available and thus make the notes more secure.

[27] The Plan does not apply to investors holding less than $1 million of notes. However, certain Dealers have agreed to buy the ABCP of those of their customers holding less than the $1-million threshold, and to extend financial assistance to these customers. Principal among these Dealers are National Bank and Canaccord, two of the respondent financial institutions the appellants most object to releasing. The application judge found that these developments appeared to be designed to secure votes in favour of the Plan by various Noteholders, and were apparently successful in doing so. If the Plan is approved, they also provide considerable relief to the many small investors who find themselves unwittingly caught in the ABDP collapse.

b) The Releases

[28] This appeal focuses on one specific aspect of the Plan: the comprehensive series of releases of third parties provided for in Article 10.

[29] The Plan calls for the release of Canadian banks, Dealers, Noteholders, Asset Providers, Issuer Trustees, Liquidity Providers, and other market participants – in Mr. Crawford's words, "virtually all participants in the Canadian ABCP market" – from any liability associated with ABCP, with the exception of certain narrow claims relating to fraud. For instance, under the Plan as approved, creditors will have to give up their claims against the Dealers who sold them their ABCP Notes, including challenges to the way the Dealers characterized the ABCP and provided (or did not provide) information about the ABCP. The claims against the proposed defendants are mainly in tort: negligence, misrepresentation, negligent misrepresentation, failure to act prudently as a dealer/advisor, acting in conflict of interest, and in a few cases fraud or potential fraud. There are also allegations of breach of fiduciary duty and claims for other equitable relief.

[30] The application judge found that, in general, the claims for damages include the face value of the Notes, plus interest and additional penalties and damages.

[31] The releases, in effect, are part of a quid pro quo. Generally speaking, they are designed to compensate various participants in the market for the contributions they would make to the restructuring. Those contributions under the Plan include the requirements that:

a) Asset Providers assume an increased risk in their credit default swap contracts, disclose certain proprietary information in relation to the assets, and provide below-cost financing for margin funding facilities that are designed to make the notes more secure;

b) Sponsors – who in addition have cooperated with the Investors' Committee throughout the process, including by sharing certain proprietary information – give up their existing contracts;

c) The Canadian banks provide below-cost financing for the margin funding facility and,

d) Other parties make other contributions under the Plan.

[32] According to Mr. Crawford's affidavit, the releases are part of the Plan "because certain key participants, whose participation is vital to the restructuring, have made comprehensive releases a condition for their participation."

The CCAA Proceedings to Date

[33] On March 17, 2008 the applicants sought and obtained an Initial Order under the CCAA staying any proceedings relating to the ABCP crisis and providing for a meeting of the Noteholders to vote on the proposed Plan. The meeting was held on April 25th. The vote was overwhelmingly in support of the Plan – 96% of the Noteholders voted in favour. At the instance of certain Noteholders, and as requested by the application judge (who has supervised the proceedings from the outset), the Monitor broke down the voting results according to those Noteholders who had worked on or with the Investors' Committee to develop the Plan and those Noteholders who had not. Re-calculated on this basis the results remained firmly in favour of the proposed Plan – 99% of those connected with the development of the Plan voted positively, as did 80% of those Noteholders who had not been involved in its formulation.

[34] The vote thus provided the Plan with the "double majority" approval – a majority of creditors representing two-thirds in value of the claims – required under s. 6 of the CCAA.

[35] Following the successful vote, the applicants sought court approval of the Plan under s. 6. Hearings were held on May 12 and 13. On May 16, the application judge issued a brief endorsement in which he concluded that he did not have sufficient facts to decide whether all the releases proposed in the Plan were authorized by the CCAA. While the application judge was prepared to approve the releases of negligence claims, he was not prepared at that point to sanction the release of fraud claims. Noting the urgency of the situation and the serious consequences that would result from the Plan's failure, the application judge nevertheless directed the parties back to the bargaining table to try to work out a claims process for addressing legitimate claims of fraud.

[36] The result of this renegotiation was a "fraud carve-out" – an amendment to the Plan excluding certain fraud claims from the Plan's releases. The carve-out did not encompass all possible claims of fraud, however. It was limited in three key respects. First, it applied only to claims against ABCP Dealers. Secondly, it applied only to cases involving an express fraudulent misrepresentation made with the intention to induce purchase and in circumstances where the person making the representation knew it to be false. Thirdly, the carve-out limited available damages to the value of the notes, minus any funds distributed as part of the Plan. The appellants argue vigorously that such a limited release respecting fraud claims is unacceptable and should not have been sanctioned by the application judge.

[37] A second sanction hearing – this time involving the amended Plan (with the fraud carve-out) – was held on June 3, 2008. Two days later, Campbell J. released his reasons for decision, approving and sanctioning the Plan on the basis both that he had jurisdiction to sanction a Plan calling for third-party releases and that the Plan including the third-party releases in question here was fair and reasonable.

[38] The appellants attack both of these determinations.

C. LAW AND ANALYSIS

[39] There are two principal questions for determination on this appeal:

1) As a matter of law, may a CCAA plan contain a release of claims against anyone other than the debtor company or its directors?
2) If the answer to that question is yes, did the application judge err in the exercise of his discretion to sanction the Plan as fair and reasonable given the nature of the releases called for under it?

(1) Legal Authority for the Releases

[40] The standard of review on this first issue – whether, as a matter of law, a CCAA plan may contain third-party releases – is correctness.

[41] The appellants submit that a court has no jurisdiction or legal authority under the CCAA to sanction a plan that imposes an obligation on creditors to give releases to third parties other than the directors of the debtor company.[1] The requirement that objecting creditors release claims against third parties is illegal, they contend, because:

a) on a proper interpretation, the CCAA does not permit such releases;
b) the court is not entitled to "fill in the gaps" in the CCAA or rely upon its inherent jurisdiction to create such authority because to do so would be contrary to the principle that Parliament did not intend to interfere with private property rights or rights of action in the absence of clear statutory language to that effect;
c) the releases constitute an unconstitutional confiscation of private property that is within the exclusive domain of the provinces under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867;
d) the releases are invalid under Quebec rules of public order; and because
e) the prevailing jurisprudence supports these conclusions.

[42] I would not give effect to any of these submissions.

Interpretation, "Gap Filling" and Inherent Jurisdiction

[43] On a proper interpretation, in my view, the CCAA permits the inclusion of third party releases in a plan of compromise or arrangement to be sanctioned by the court where those releases are reasonably connected to the proposed restructuring. I am led to this conclusion by a combination of (a) the open-ended, flexible character of the CCAA itself, (b) the broad nature of the term "compromise or arrangement" as used in the Act, and (c) the express statutory effect of the "double-majority" vote and court sanction which render the plan binding on all creditors, including those unwilling to accept certain portions of it. The first of these signals a flexible approach to the application of the Act in new and evolving situations, an active judicial role in its application and interpretation, and a liberal approach to that interpretation. The second provides the entrée to negotiations between the parties affected in the restructuring and furnishes them with the ability to apply the broad scope of their ingenuity in fashioning the proposal. The latter afford necessary protection to unwilling creditors who may be deprived of certain of their civil and property rights as a result of the process.

[44] The CCAA is skeletal in nature. It does not contain a comprehensive code that lays out all that is permitted or barred. Judges must therefore play a role in fleshing out the details of the statutory scheme. The scope of the Act and the powers of the court under it are not limitless. It is beyond controversy, however, that the CCAA is remedial legislation to be liberally construed in accordance with the modern purposive approach to statutory interpretation. It is designed to be a flexible instrument and it is that very flexibility which gives the Act its efficacy: Canadian Red Cross Society (Re) 1998 CanLII 14907 (ON SC), (1998), 5 C.B.R. (4th) 299 (Ont. Gen. Div.). As Farley J. noted in Re Dylex Ltd. 1995 CanLII

7370 (ON SC), (1995), 31 C.B.R. (3d) 106 at 111 (Ont. Gen. Div.), "[t]he history of CCAA law has been an evolution of judicial interpretation."

[45] Much has been said, however, about the "evolution of judicial interpretation" and there is some controversy over both the source and scope of that authority. Is the source of the court's authority statutory, discerned solely through application of the principles of statutory interpretation, for example? Or does it rest in the court's ability to "fill in the gaps" in legislation? Or in the court's inherent jurisdiction?

[46] These issues have recently been canvassed by the Honourable Georgina R. Jackson and Dr. Janis Sarra in their publication "Selecting the Judicial Tool to get the Job Done: An Examination of Statutory Interpretation, Discretionary Power and Inherent Jurisdiction in Insolvency Matters,"[2] and there was considerable argument on these issues before the application judge and before us. While I generally agree with the authors' suggestion that the courts should adopt a hierarchical approach in their resort to these interpretive tools – statutory interpretation, gap-filling, discretion and inherent jurisdiction – it is not necessary in my view to go beyond the general principles of statutory interpretation to resolve the issues on this appeal. Because I am satisfied that it is implicit in the language of the CCAA itself that the court has authority to sanction plans incorporating third-party releases that are reasonably related to the proposed restructuring, there is no "gap-filling" to be done and no need to fall back on inherent jurisdiction. In this respect, I take a somewhat different approach than the application judge did.

[47] The Supreme Court of Canada has affirmed generally – and in the insolvency context particularly – that remedial statutes are to be interpreted liberally and in accordance with Professor Driedger's modern principle of statutory interpretation. Driedger advocated that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": Re Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd., 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27 at para. 21, quoting E.A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983); Bell Expressvu Ltd. Partnership v. R., 2002 SCC 42 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 559 at para. 26.

[48] More broadly, I believe that the proper approach to the judicial interpretation and application of statutes – particularly those like the CCAA that are skeletal in nature – is succinctly and accurately summarized by Jackson and Sarra in their recent article, supra, at p. 56:

> The exercise of a statutory authority requires the statute to be construed. The plain meaning or textualist approach has given way to a search for the object and goals of the statute and the intentionalist approach. This latter approach makes use of the purposive approach and the mischief rule, including its codification under interpretation statutes that every enactment is deemed remedial, and is to be given such fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation as best ensures the attainment of its objects. This latter approach advocates reading the statute as a whole and being mindful of Driedger's "one principle", that the words of the Act are to be read in their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament. It is important that courts first interpret the statute before them and exercise their authority pursuant to the statute, before reaching for other tools in the judicial toolbox. Statutory interpretation using the principles articulated above leaves room for gap-filling in the common law provinces and a consideration of purpose in Québec as a manifestation of the judge's overall task of statutory interpretation. Finally, the jurisprudence in relation to statutory interpretation demonstrates the fluidity inherent in the judge's task in seeking the objects of the statute and the intention of the legislature.

[50] The remedial purpose of the CCAA – as its title affirms – is to facilitate compromises or arrangements between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors. In Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Canada 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 at 318 (B.C.C.A.), Gibbs J.A. summarized very concisely the purpose, object and scheme of the Act :

> Almost inevitably, liquidation destroyed the shareholders' investment, yielded little by way of recovery to the creditors, and exacerbated the social evil of devastating levels of unemployment. The government of the day sought, through the C.C.A.A., to create a regime whereby the principals of the company and the creditors could be brought together under the supervision of the court to attempt a reorganization or compromise or arrangement under which the company could continue in business.

[51] The CCAA was enacted in 1933 and was necessary – as the then Secretary of State noted in introducing the Bill on First Reading—"because of the prevailing commercial and industrial depression" and the need to alleviate the effects of business bankruptcies in that context: see the statement of the Hon. C.H. Cahan, Secretary of State, House of Commons Debates (Hansard) (April 20, 1933) at 4091. One of the greatest effects of that Depression was what Gibbs J.A. described as "the social evil of devastating levels of unemployment". Since then, courts have recognized that the Act has a broader dimension than simply the direct relations between the debtor company and its creditors and that this broader public dimension must be weighed in the balance together with the interests of those most directly affected: see, for example, Elan Corp. v. Comiskey (Trustee of) reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289 (C.A.), per Doherty J.A. in dissent; Re Skydome Corp. reflex, (1998), 16 C.B.R. (4th) 125 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Re Anvil Range Mining Corp. reflex, (1998), 7 C.B.R. (4th) 51 (Ont. Gen. Div.).

> . . . [T]he Act was designed to serve a "broad constituency of investors, creditors and employees".[3] Because of that "broad constituency" the court must, when considering applications brought under the Act, have regard not only to the individuals and organizations directly affected by the application, but also to the wider public interest. [Emphasis added.]

Application of the Principles of Interpretation

[53] An interpretation of the CCAA that recognizes its broader socio-economic purposes and objects is apt in this case. As the application judge pointed out, the restructuring underpins the financial viability of the Canadian ABCP market itself.

[54] The appellants argue that the application judge erred in taking this approach and in treating the Plan and the proceedings as an attempt to restructure a financial market (the ABCP market) rather than simply the affairs between the debtor corporations who caused the ABCP Notes to be issued and their creditors. The Act is designed, they say, only to effect reorganizations between a corporate debtor and its creditors and not to attempt to restructure entire marketplaces.

[55] This perspective is flawed in at least two respects, however, in my opinion. First, it reflects a view of the purpose and objects of the CCAA that is too narrow. Secondly, it overlooks the reality of the ABCP marketplace and the context of the restructuring in question here. It may be true that, in their capacity as ABCP Dealers, the releasee financial institutions are "third-parties" to the restructuring in the sense that they are not creditors of the debtor corporations. However, in their capacities as Asset Providers and Liquidity Providers, they are not only creditors but they are prior secured creditors to the Noteholders. Furthermore – as the application judge found – in these latter capacities they are making significant contributions to the restructuring by "foregoing immediate rights to assets and ... providing real and tangible input for the preservation and enhancement of the Notes" (para. 76). In this context, therefore, the application judge's remark at para. 50 that the restructuring "involves the commitment and participation of all parties" in the ABCP market makes sense, as do his earlier comments at paras. 48-49:

> Given the nature of the ABCP market and all of its participants, it is more appropriate to consider all Noteholders as claimants and the object of the Plan to restore liquidity to the assets being the Notes themselves. The restoration of the liquidity of the market necessitates the participation (including more tangible contribution by many) of all Noteholders.
> In these circumstances, it is unduly technical to classify the Issuer Trustees as debtors and the claims of the Noteholders as between themselves and others as being those of third party creditors, although I recognize that the restructuring structure of the CCAA requires the corporations as the vehicles for restructuring. [Emphasis added.]

[56] The application judge did observe that "[t]he insolvency is of the ABCP market itself, the restructuring is that of the market for such paper ..." (para. 50). He did so, however, to point out the uniqueness of the Plan before him and its industry-wide significance and not to suggest that he need have no regard to the provisions of the CCAA permitting a restructuring as between debtor and creditors. His focus was on the effect of the restructuring, a perfectly permissible perspective, given the broad purpose and objects of the Act. This is apparent from his later references. For example, in balancing the arguments against approving releases that might include aspects of fraud, he responded that "what is at issue is a liquidity crisis that affects the ABCP market in Canada" (para. 125). In addition, in his reasoning on the fair-and-reasonable issue, he stated at para. 142: "Apart from the Plan itself, there is a need to restore confidence in the financial system in Canada and this Plan is a legitimate use of the CCAA to accomplish that goal."

[57] I agree. I see no error on the part of the application judge in approaching the fairness assessment or the interpretation issue with these considerations in mind. They provide the context in which the purpose, objects and scheme of the CCAA are to be considered.

The Statutory Wording

[58] Keeping in mind the interpretive principles outlined above, I turn now to a consideration of the provisions of the CCAA. Where in the words of the statute is the court clothed with authority to approve a plan incorporating a requirement for third-party releases? As summarized earlier, the answer to that question, in my view, is to be found in:

a) the skeletal nature of the CCAA;

b) Parliament's reliance upon the broad notions of "compromise" and "arrangement" to establish the framework within which the parties may work to put forward a restructuring plan; and in

c) the creation of the statutory mechanism binding all creditors in classes to the compromise or arrangement once it has surpassed the high "double majority" voting threshold and obtained court sanction as "fair and reasonable".

Therein lies the expression of Parliament's intention to permit the parties to negotiate and vote on, and the court to sanction, third-party releases relating to a restructuring.

[59] Sections 4 and 6 of the CCAA state:

> 4. Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its unsecured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company, of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.
> 6. Where a majority in number representing two-thirds in value of the creditors, or class of creditors, as the case may be, present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting or meetings thereof respectively held pursuant to sections 4 and 5, or either of those sections, agree to any compromise or arrangement either as proposed or as altered or modified at the meeting or meetings, the compromise or arrangement may be sanctioned by the court, and if so sanctioned is binding
> (a) on all the creditors or the class of creditors, as the case may be, and on any trustee for any such class of creditors, whether secured or unsecured, as the case may be, and on the company; and
> (b) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a bankruptcy order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or is in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, on the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator and contributories of the company.

Compromise or Arrangement

[60] While there may be little practical distinction between "compromise" and "arrangement" in many respects, the two are not necessarily the same. "Arrangement" is broader than "compromise" and would appear to include any scheme for reorganizing the affairs of the debtor: Houlden & Morawetz, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, loose-leaf, 3rd ed., vol. 4 (Toronto: Thomson Carswell) at 10A-12.2, N§10. It has been said to be "a very wide and indefinite [word]": Re Refund of Dues under Timber Regulations, [1935] A.C. 184 at 197 (P.C.), affirming S.C.C. [1933] S.C.R. 616. See also, Re Guardian Assur. Co., [1917] 1 Ch. 431 at 448, 450; Re T&N Ltd. and Others (No. 3), [2007] 1 All E.R. 851 (Ch.).

[62] A proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S., 1985, c. B-3 (the "BIA") is a contract: Employers' Liability Assurance Corp. Ltd. v. Ideal Petroleum (1959) Ltd. 1976 CanLII 142 (SCC), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 230 at 239; Society of Composers, Authors & Music Publishers of Canada v. Armitage 2000 CanLII 16921 (ON CA), (2000), 50 O.R. (3d) 688 at para. 11 (C.A.). In my view, a compromise or arrangement under the CCAA is directly analogous to a proposal for these purposes, and therefore is to be treated as a contract between the debtor and its creditors. Consequently, parties are entitled to put anything into such a plan that could lawfully be incorporated into any contract. See Re Air Canada 2004 CanLII 34416 (ON SC), (2004), 2 C.B.R. (5th) 4 at para. 6 (Ont. S.C.J.); Olympia & York Developments Ltd. v. Royal Trust Co. reflex, (1993), 12 O.R. (3d) 500 at 518 (Gen. Div.).

[63] There is nothing to prevent a debtor and a creditor from including in a contract between them a term providing that the creditor release a third party. The term is binding as between the debtor and creditor. In the CCAA context, therefore, a plan of compromise or arrangement may propose that creditors agree to compromise claims against the debtor and to release third parties, just as any debtor and creditor might agree to such a term in a contract between them. Once the statutory mechanism regarding voter approval and court sanctioning has been complied with, the plan – including the provision for releases – becomes binding on all creditors (including the dissenting minority).

[64] Re T&N Ltd. and Others, supra, is instructive in this regard. It is a rare example of a court focussing on and examining the meaning and breadth of the term "arrangement". T&N and its associated companies were engaged in the manufacture, distribution and sale of asbestos-containing products. They became the subject of many claims by former employees, who had been exposed to asbestos dust in the course of their employment, and their dependents. The T&N companies applied for protection under s. 425 of the U.K. Companies Act 1985, a provision virtually identical to the scheme of the CCAA – including the concepts of compromise or arrangement.[4]

[65] T&N carried employers' liability insurance. However, the employers' liability insurers (the "EL insurers") denied coverage. This issue was litigated and ultimately resolved through the establishment of a multi-million pound fund against which the employees and their dependants (the "EL claimants") would assert their claims. In return, T&N's former employees and dependants (the "EL claimants") agreed to forego any further claims against the EL insurers. This settlement was incorporated into the plan of compromise and arrangement between the T&N companies and the EL claimants that was voted on and put forward for court sanction.

[66] Certain creditors argued that the court could not sanction the plan because it did not constitute a "compromise or arrangement" between T&N and the EL claimants since it did not purport to affect rights as between them but only the EL claimants' rights against the EL insurers. The Court rejected this argument. Richards J. adopted previous jurisprudence – cited earlier in these reasons – to the effect that the word "arrangement" has a very broad meaning and that, while both a compromise and an arrangement involve some "give and take", an arrangement need not involve a compromise or be confined to a case of dispute or difficulty (paras. 46-51). He referred to what would be the equivalent of a solvent arrangement under Canadian corporate legislation as an example.[5] Finally, he pointed out that the compromised rights of the EL claimants against the EL insurers were not unconnected with the EL claimants' rights against the T&N companies; the scheme of arrangement involving the EL insurers was "an integral part of a single proposal affecting all the parties" (para. 52). He concluded his reasoning with these observations (para. 53):

> In my judgment it is not a necessary element of an arrangement for the purposes of s 425 of the 1985 Act that it should alter the rights existing between the company and the creditors or members with whom it is made. No doubt in most cases it will alter those rights. But, provided that the context and content of the scheme are such as properly to constitute an arrangement between the company and the members or creditors concerned, it will fall within s 425. It is ... neither necessary nor desirable to attempt a definition of arrangement. The legislature has not done so. To insist on an alteration of rights, or a termination of rights as in the case of schemes to effect takeovers or mergers, is to impose a restriction which is neither warranted by the statutory language nor justified by the courts' approach over many years to give the term its widest meaning. Nor is an arrangement necessarily outside the section, because its effect is to alter the rights of creditors against another party or because such alteration could be achieved by a scheme of arrangement with that party. [Emphasis added.]

[67] I find Richard J.'s analysis helpful and persuasive. In effect, the claimants in T&N were being asked to release their claims against the EL insurers in exchange for a call on the fund. Here, the appellants are being required to release their claims against certain financial third parties in exchange for what is anticipated to be an improved position for all ABCP Noteholders, stemming from the contributions the financial third parties are making to the ABCP restructuring. The situations are quite comparable.

The Binding Mechanism

[68] Parliament's reliance on the expansive terms "compromise" or "arrangement" does not stand alone, however. Effective insolvency restructurings would not be possible without a statutory mechanism to bind an unwilling minority of creditors. Unanimity is frequently impossible in such situations. But the minority must be protected too. Parliament's solution to this quandary was to permit a wide range of proposals to be negotiated and put forward (the compromise or arrangement) and to bind all creditors by class to the terms of the plan, but to do so only where the proposal can gain the support of the requisite "double majority" of votes[6] and obtain the sanction of the court on the basis that it is fair and reasonable. In this way, the scheme of the CCAA supports the intention of Parliament to encourage a wide variety of solutions to corporate insolvencies without unjustifiably overriding the rights of dissenting creditors.

The Required Nexus

[69] In keeping with this scheme and purpose, I do not suggest that any and all releases between creditors of the debtor company seeking to restructure and third parties may be made the subject of a compromise or arrangement between the debtor and its creditors. Nor do I think the fact that the releases may be "necessary" in the sense that the third parties or the debtor may refuse to proceed without them, of itself, advances the argument in favour of finding jurisdiction (although it may well be relevant in terms of the fairness and reasonableness analysis).

[70] The release of the claim in question must be justified as part of the compromise or arrangement between the debtor and its creditors. In short, there must be a reasonable connection between the third party claim being compromised in the plan and the restructuring achieved by the plan to warrant inclusion of the third party release in the plan. This nexus exists here, in my view.

[71] In the course of his reasons, the application judge made the following findings, all of which are amply supported on the record:

a) The parties to be released are necessary and essential to the restructuring of the debtor;
b) The claims to be released are rationally related to the purpose of the Plan and necessary for it;
c) The Plan cannot succeed without the releases;
d) The parties who are to have claims against them released are contributing in a tangible and realistic way to the Plan; and
e) The Plan will benefit not only the debtor companies but creditor Noteholders generally.

[72] Here, then – as was the case in T&N – there is a close connection between the claims being released and the restructuring proposal. The tort claims arise out of the sale and distribution of the ABCP Notes and their collapse in value, just as do the contractual claims of the creditors against the debtor companies. The purpose of the restructuring is to stabilize and shore up the value of those notes in the long run. The third parties being released are making separate contributions to enable those results to materialize. Those contributions are identified earlier, at para. 31 of these reasons. The application judge found that the claims being released are not independent of or unrelated to the claims that the Noteholders have against the debtor companies; they are closely connected to the value of the ABCP Notes and are required for the Plan to succeed. At paras. 76-77 he said:

> [76] I do not consider that the Plan in this case involves a change in relationship among creditors "that does not directly involve the Company." Those who support the Plan and are to be released are "directly involved in the Company" in the sense that many are foregoing immediate rights to assets and are providing real and tangible input for the preservation and enhancement of the Notes. It would be unduly restrictive to suggest that the moving parties' claims against released parties do not involve the Company, since the claims are directly related to the value of the Notes. The value of the Notes is in this case the value of the Company.
> [77] This Plan, as it deals with releases, doesn't change the relationship of the creditors apart from involving the Company and its Notes.

[73] I am satisfied that the wording of the CCAA – construed in light of the purpose, objects and scheme of the Act and in accordance with the modern principles of statutory interpretation – supports the court's jurisdiction and authority to sanction the Plan proposed here, including the contested third-party releases contained in it.

The Jurisprudence

[74] Third party releases have become a frequent feature in Canadian restructurings since the decision of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench in Re Canadian Airlines Corp. 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), (2000), 265 A.R. 201, leave to appeal refused by Resurgence Asset Management LLC v. Canadian Airlines Corp. 2000 ABCA 238 (CanLII), (2000), 266 A.R. 131 (C.A.), and reflex, [2001] 293 A.R. 351 (S.C.C.). In Re Muscle Tech Research and Development Inc. 2006 CanLII 34344 (ON SC), (2006), 25 C.B.R (5th) 231 (Ont. S.C.J.) Justice Ground remarked (para. 8):

> [It] is not uncommon in CCAA proceedings, in the context of a plan of compromise and arrangement, to compromise claims against the Applicants and other parties against whom such claims or related claims are made.

[75] We were referred to at least a dozen court-approved CCAA plans from across the country that included broad third-party releases. With the exception of Re Canadian Airlines, however, the releases in those restructurings – including Muscle Tech – were not opposed. The appellants argue that those cases are wrongly decided, because the court simply does not have the authority to approve such releases.

[76] In Re Canadian Airlines the releases in question were opposed, however. Paperny J. (as she then was) concluded the court had jurisdiction to approve them and her decision is said to be the well-spring of the trend towards third-party releases referred to above. Based on the foregoing analysis, I agree with her conclusion although for reasons that differ from those cited by her.

[77] Justice Paperny began her analysis of the release issue with the observation at para. 87 that "[p]rior to 1997, the CCAA did not provide for compromises of claims against anyone other than the petitioning company." It will be apparent from the analysis in these reasons that I do not accept that premise, notwithstanding the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Michaud v. Steinberg,[7] of which her comment may have been reflective. Paperny J.'s reference to 1997 was a reference to the amendments of that year adding s. 5.1 to the CCAA, which provides for limited releases in favour of directors. Given the limited scope of s. 5.1, Justice Paperny was thus faced with the argument – dealt with later in these reasons – that Parliament must not have intended to extend the authority to approve third-party releases beyond the scope of this section. She chose to address this contention by concluding that, although the amendments "[did] not authorize a release of claims against third parties other than directors, [they did] not prohibit such releases either" (para. 92).

[78] Respectfully, I would not adopt the interpretive principle that the CCAA permits releases because it does not expressly prohibit them. Rather, as I explain in these reasons, I believe the open-ended CCAA permits third-party releases that are reasonably related to the restructuring at issue because they are encompassed in the comprehensive terms "compromise" and "arrangement" and because of the double-voting majority and court sanctioning statutory mechanism that makes them binding on unwilling creditors.

[79] The appellants rely on a number of authorities, which they submit support the proposition that the CCAA may not be used to compromise claims as between anyone other than the debtor company and its creditors. Principal amongst these are Michaud v. Steinberg, supra; NBD Bank, Canada v. Dofasco Inc., 1999 CanLII 3826 (ON CA), (1999), 46 O.R. (3d) 514 (C.A.); Pacific Coastal Airlines Ltd. v. Air Canada 2001 BCSC 1721 (CanLII), (2001), 19 B.L.R. (3d) 286 (B.C.S.C.); and Re Stelco Inc. 2005 CanLII 42247 (ON CA), (2005), 78 O.R. (3d) 241 (C.A.) ("Stelco I"). I do not think these cases assist the appellants, however. With the exception of Steinberg, they do not involve third party claims that were reasonably connected to the restructuring. As I shall explain, it is my opinion that Steinberg does not express a correct view of the law, and I decline to follow it.

> [The purpose of the CCAA proceeding] is not to deal with disputes between a creditor of a company and a third party, even if the company was also involved in the subject matter of the dispute. While issues between the debtor company and non-creditors are sometimes dealt with in CCAA proceedings, it is not a proper use of a CCAA proceeding to determine disputes between parties other than the debtor company.

[81] This statement must be understood in its context, however. Pacific Coastal Airlines had been a regional carrier for Canadian Airlines prior to the CCAA reorganization of the latter in 2000. In the action in question it was seeking to assert separate tort claims against Air Canada for contractual interference and inducing breach of contract in relation to certain rights it had to the use of Canadian's flight designator code prior to the CCAA proceeding. Air Canada sought to have the action dismissed on grounds of res judicata or issue estoppel because of the CCAA proceeding. Tysoe J. rejected the argument.

[82] The facts in Pacific Coastal are not analogous to the circumstances of this case, however. There is no suggestion that a resolution of Pacific Coastal's separate tort claim against Air Canada was in any way connected to the Canadian Airlines restructuring, even though Canadian – at a contractual level – may have had some involvement with the particular dispute. Here, however, the disputes that are the subject-matter of the impugned releases are not simply "disputes between parties other than the debtor company". They are closely connected to the disputes being resolved between the debtor companies and their creditors and to the restructuring itself.

[83] Nor is the decision of this Court in the NBD Bank case dispositive. It arose out of the financial collapse of Algoma Steel, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Dofasco. The Bank had advanced funds to Algoma allegedly on the strength of misrepresentations by Algoma's Vice-President, James Melville. The plan of compromise and arrangement that was sanctioned by Farley J. in the Algoma CCAA restructuring contained a clause releasing Algoma from all claims creditors "may have had against Algoma or its directors, officers, employees and advisors." Mr. Melville was found liable for negligent misrepresentation in a subsequent action by the Bank. On appeal, he argued that since the Bank was barred from suing Algoma for misrepresentation by its officers, permitting it to pursue the same cause of action against him personally would subvert the CCAA process – in short, he was personally protected by the CCAA release.

[84] Rosenberg J.A., writing for this Court, rejected this argument. The appellants here rely particularly upon his following observations at paras. 53-54:

> 53 In my view, the appellant has not demonstrated that allowing the respondent to pursue its claim against him would undermine or subvert the purposes of the Act. As this court noted in Elan Corp. v. Comiskey reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289 at 297, the CCAA is remedial legislation "intended to provide a structured environment for the negotiation of > compromises between a debtor company and its creditors for the benefit of both". It is a means of avoiding a liquidation that may yield little for the creditors, especially unsecured creditors like the respondent, and the debtor company shareholders. However, the appellant has not shown that allowing a creditor to continue an action against an officer for negligent misrepresentation would erode the effectiveness of the Act.

> 54 In fact, to refuse on policy grounds to impose liability on an officer of the corporation for negligent misrepresentation would contradict the policy of Parliament as demonstrated in recent amendments to the CCAA and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. Those Acts now contemplate that an arrangement or proposal may include a term for compromise of certain types of claims against directors of the company except claims that "are based on allegations of misrepresentations made by directors". L.W. Houlden and C.H. Morawetz, the editors of The 2000 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 1999) at p. 192 are of the view that the policy behind the provision is to encourage directors of an insolvent corporation to remain in office so that the affairs of the corporation can be reorganized. I can see no similar policy interest in barring an action against an officer of the company who, prior to the insolvency, has misrepresented the financial affairs of the corporation to its creditors. It may be necessary to permit the compromise of claims against the debtor corporation, otherwise it may not be possible to successfully reorganize the corporation. The same considerations do not apply to individual officers. Rather, it would seem to me that it would be contrary to good policy to immunize officers from the consequences of their negligent statements which might otherwise be made in anticipation of being forgiven under a subsequent corporate proposal or arrangement. [Footnote omitted.]

[85] Once again, this statement must be assessed in context. Whether Justice Farley had the authority in the earlier Algoma CCAA proceedings to sanction a plan that included third party releases was not under consideration at all. What the Court was determining in NBD Bank was whether the release extended by its terms to protect a third party. In fact, on its face, it does not appear to do so. Justice Rosenberg concluded only that not allowing Mr. Melville to rely upon the release did not subvert the purpose of the CCAA. As the application judge here observed, "there is little factual similarity in NBD to the facts now before the Court" (para. 71). Contrary to the facts of this case, in NBD Bank the creditors had not agreed to grant a release to officers; they had not voted on such a release and the court had not assessed the fairness and reasonableness of such a release as a term of a complex arrangement involving significant contributions by the beneficiaries of the release – as is the situation here. Thus, NBD Bank is of little assistance in determining whether the court has authority to sanction a plan that calls for third party releases.

[86] The appellants also rely upon the decision of this Court in Stelco I. There, the Court was dealing with the scope of the CCAA in connection with a dispute over what were called the "Turnover Payments". Under an inter-creditor agreement one group of creditors had subordinated their rights to another group and agreed to hold in trust and "turn over" any proceeds received from Stelco until the senior group was paid in full. On a disputed classification motion, the Subordinated Debt Holders argued that they should be in a separate class from the Senior Debt Holders. Farley J. refused to make such an order in the court below, stating:

> [Sections] 4, 5 and 6 [of the CCAA] talk of compromises or arrangements between a company and its creditors. There is no mention of this extending by statute to encompass a change of relationship among the creditors vis-à-vis the creditors themselves and not directly involving the company. [Citations omitted; emphasis added.]

See Re Stelco Inc. 2005 CanLII 41379 (ON SC), (2005), 15 C.B.R. (5th) 297 (Ont. S.C.J.) at para. 7.

[87] This Court upheld that decision. The legal relationship between each group of creditors and Stelco was the same, albeit there were inter-creditor differences, and creditors were to be classified in accordance with their legal rights. In addition, the need for timely classification and voting decisions in the CCAA process militated against enmeshing the classification process in the vagaries of inter-corporate disputes. In short, the issues before the Court were quite different from those raised on this appeal.

[88] Indeed, the Stelco plan, as sanctioned, included third party releases (albeit uncontested ones). This Court subsequently dealt with the same inter-creditor agreement on an appeal where the Subordinated Debt Holders argued that the inter-creditor subordination provisions were beyond the reach of the CCAA and therefore that they were entitled to a separate civil action to determine their rights under the agreement: Re Stelco Inc., 2006 CanLII 16526 (ON CA), (2006), 21 C.B.R. (5th) 157 (Ont. C.A.) ("Stelco II"). The Court rejected that argument and held that where the creditors' rights amongst themselves were sufficiently related to the debtor and its plan, they were properly brought within the scope of the CCAA plan. The Court said (para. 11):

> In [Stelco I] – the classification case – the court observed that it is not a proper use of a CCAA proceeding to determine disputes between parties other than the debtor company ... [H]owever, the present case is not simply an inter-creditor dispute that does not involve the debtor company; it is a dispute that is inextricably connected to the restructuring process. [Emphasis added.]

[89] The approach I would take to the disposition of this appeal is consistent with that view. As I have noted, the third party releases here are very closely connected to the ABCP restructuring process.

[90] Some of the appellants – particularly those represented by Mr. Woods – rely heavily upon the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Michaud v. Steinberg, supra. They say that it is determinative of the release issue. In Steinberg, the Court held that the CCAA, as worded at the time, did not permit the release of directors of the debtor corporation and that third-party releases were not within the purview of the Act. Deschamps J.A. (as she then was) said (paras. 42, 54 and 58 – English translation):

> [42] Even if one can understand the extreme pressure weighing on the creditors and the respondent at the time of the sanctioning, a plan of arrangement is not the appropriate forum to settle disputes other than the claims that are the subject of the arrangement. In other words, one cannot, under the pretext of an absence of formal directives in the Act, transform an arrangement into a potpourri.
> [54] The Act offers the respondent a way to arrive at a compromise with is creditors. It does not go so far as to offer an umbrella to all the persons within its orbit by permitting them to shelter themselves from any recourse.
> [58] The [CCAA] and the case law clearly do not permit extending the application of an arrangement to persons other than the respondent and its creditors and, consequently, the plan should not have been sanctioned as is [that is, including the releases of the directors].

[91] Justices Vallerand and Delisle, in separate judgments, agreed. Justice Vallerand summarized his view of the consequences of extending the scope of the CCAA to third party releases in this fashion (para. 7):

> In short, the Act will have become the Companies' and Their Officers and Employees Creditors Arrangement Act – an awful mess – and likely not attain its purpose, which is to enable the company to survive in the face of its creditors and through their will, and not in the face of the creditors of its officers. This is why I feel, just like my colleague, that such a clause is contrary to the Act's mode of operation, contrary to its purposes and, for this reason, is to be banned.

[92] Justice Delisle, on the other hand, appears to have rejected the releases because of their broad nature – they released directors from all claims, including those that were altogether unrelated to their corporate duties with the debtor company – rather than because of a lack of authority to sanction under the Act. Indeed, he seems to have recognized the wide range of circumstances that could be included within the term "compromise or arrangement". He is the only one who addressed that term. At para. 90 he said:

> The CCAA is drafted in general terms. It does not specify, among other things, what must be understood by "compromise or arrangement". However, it may be inferred from the purpose of this [A]ct that these terms encompass all that should enable the person who has recourse to it to fully dispose of his debts, both those that exist on the date when he has recourse to the statute and those contingent on the insolvency in which he finds himself ... [Emphasis added.]

[93] The decision of the Court did not reflect a view that the terms of a compromise or arrangement should "encompass all that should enable the person who has recourse to [the Act] to dispose of his debts ... and those contingent on the insolvency in which he finds himself," however. On occasion such an outlook might embrace third parties other than the debtor and its creditors in order to make the arrangement work. Nor would it be surprising that, in such circumstances, the third parties might seek the protection of releases, or that the debtor might do so on their behalf. Thus, the perspective adopted by the majority in Steinberg, in my view, is too narrow, having regard to the language, purpose and objects of the CCAA and the intention of Parliament. They made no attempt to consider and explain why a compromise or arrangement could not include third-party releases. In addition, the decision appears to have been based, at least partly, on a rejection of the use of contract-law concepts in analysing the Act – an approach inconsistent with the jurisprudence referred to above.

[94] Finally, the majority in Steinberg seems to have proceeded on the basis that the CCAA cannot interfere with civil or property rights under Quebec law. Mr. Woods advanced this argument before this Court in his factum, but did not press it in oral argument. Indeed, he conceded that if the Act encompasses the authority to sanction a plan containing third-party releases – as I have concluded it does – the provisions of the CCAA, as valid federal insolvency legislation, are paramount over provincial legislation. I shall return to the constitutional issues raised by the appellants later in these reasons.

[95] Accordingly, to the extent Steinberg stands for the proposition that the court does not have authority under the CCAA to sanction a plan that incorporates third-party releases, I do not believe it to be a correct statement of the law and I respectfully decline to follow it. The modern approach to interpretation of the Act in accordance with its nature and purpose militates against a narrow interpretation and towards one that facilitates and encourages compromises and arrangements. Had the majority in Steinberg considered the broad nature of the terms "compromise" and "arrangement" and the jurisprudence I have referred to above, they might well have come to a different conclusion.

The 1997 Amendments

[96] Steinberg led to amendments to the CCAA, however. In 1997, s. 5.1 was added, dealing specifically with releases pertaining to directors of the debtor company. It states:

> 5.1 (1) A compromise or arrangement made in respect of a debtor company may include in its terms provision for the compromise of claims against directors of the company that arose before the commencement of proceedings under this Act and that relate to the obligations of the company where the directors are by law liable in their capacity as directors for the payment of such obligations.
> Exception
> (2) A provision for the compromise of claims against directors may not include claims that
> (a) relate to contractual rights of one or more creditors; or
> (b) are based on allegations of misrepresentations made by directors to creditors or of wrongful or oppressive conduct by directors.
> Powers of court
> (3) The court may declare that a claim against directors shall not be compromised if it is satisfied that the compromise would not be fair and reasonable in the circumstances.
> Resignation or removal of directors
> (4) Where all of the directors have resigned or have been removed by the shareholders without replacement, any person who manages or supervises the management of the business and affairs of the debtor company shall be deemed to be a director for the purposes of this section.

[97] Perhaps the appellants' strongest argument is that these amendments confirm a prior lack of authority in the court to sanction a plan including third party releases. If the power existed, why would Parliament feel it necessary to add an amendment specifically permitting such releases (subject to the exceptions indicated) in favour of directors? Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, is the Latin maxim sometimes relied on to articulate the principle of interpretation implied in that question: to express or include one thing implies the exclusion of the other.

[98] The maxim is not helpful in these circumstances, however. The reality is that there may be another explanation why Parliament acted as it did. As one commentator has noted:[8]

> Far from being a rule, [the maxim expressio unius] is not even lexicographically accurate, because it is simply not true, generally, that the mere express conferral of a right or privilege in one kind of situation implies the denial of the equivalent right or privilege in other kinds. Sometimes it does and sometimes its does not, and whether it does or does not depends on the particular circumstances of context. Without contextual support, therefore there is not even a mild presumption here. Accordingly, the maxim is at best a description, after the fact, of what the court has discovered from context.

[99] As I have said, the 1997 amendments to the CCAA providing for releases in favour of directors of debtor companies in limited circumstances were a response to the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Steinberg. A similar amendment was made with respect to proposals in the BIA at the same time. The rationale behind these amendments was to encourage directors of an insolvent company to remain in office during a restructuring, rather than resign. The assumption was that by remaining in office the directors would provide some stability while the affairs of the company were being reorganized: see Houlden & Morawetz, vol.1, supra, at 2-144, E§11A; Le Royal Penfield Inc. (Syndic de), 2003 CanLII 33980 (QC CS), [2003] R.J.Q. 2157 at paras. 44-46 (C.S.).

[100] Parliament thus had a particular focus and a particular purpose in enacting the 1997 amendments to the CCAA and the BIA. While there is some merit in the appellants' argument on this point, at the end of the day I do not accept that Parliament intended to signal by its enactment of s. 5.1 that it was depriving the court of authority to sanction plans of compromise or arrangement in all circumstances where they incorporate third party releases in favour of anyone other than the debtor's directors. For the reasons articulated above, I am satisfied that the court does have the authority to do so. Whether it sanctions the plan is a matter for the fairness hearing.

The Deprivation of Proprietary Rights

[101] Mr. Shapray very effectively led the appellants' argument that legislation must not be construed so as to interfere with or prejudice established contractual or proprietary rights – including the right to bring an action – in the absence of a clear indication of legislative intention to that effect: Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed. reissue, vol. 44 (1) (London: Butterworths, 1995) at paras. 1438, 1464 and 1467; Driedger, 2nd ed., supra, at 183; Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan and Driedger on the Construction of Statutes, 4th ed., (Markham: Butterworths, 2002) at 399. I accept the importance of this principle. For the reasons I have explained, however, I am satisfied that Parliament's intention to clothe the court with authority to consider and sanction a plan that contains third party releases is expressed with sufficient clarity in the "compromise or arrangement" language of the CCAA coupled with the statutory voting and sanctioning mechanism making the provisions of the plan binding on all creditors. This is not a situation of impermissible "gap-filling" in the case of legislation severely affecting property rights; it is a question of finding meaning in the language of the Act itself. I would therefore not give effect to the appellants' submissions in this regard.

The Division of Powers and Paramountcy

[102] Mr. Woods and Mr. Sternberg submit that extending the reach of the CCAA process to the compromise of claims as between solvent creditors of the debtor company and solvent third parties to the proceeding is constitutionally impermissible. They say that under the guise of the federal insolvency power pursuant to s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867, this approach would improperly affect the rights of civil claimants to assert their causes of action, a provincial matter falling within s. 92(13), and contravene the rules of public order pursuant to the Civil Code of Quebec.

[103] I do not accept these submissions. It has long been established that the CCAA is valid federal legislation under the federal insolvency power: Reference re: Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (Canada), 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 659. As the Supreme Court confirmed in that case (p. 661), citing Viscount Cave L.C. in Royal Bank of Canada v. Larue [1928] A.C. 187, "the exclusive legislative authority to deal with all matters within the domain of bankruptcy and insolvency is vested in Parliament." Chief Justice Duff elaborated:

> Matters normally constituting part of a bankruptcy scheme but not in their essence matters of bankruptcy and insolvency may, of course, from another point of view and in another aspect be dealt with by a provincial legislature; but, when treated as matters pertaining to bankruptcy and insolvency, they clearly fall within the legislative authority of the Dominion.

[104] That is exactly the case here. The power to sanction a plan of compromise or arrangement that contains third-party releases of the type opposed by the appellants is embedded in the wording of the CCAA. The fact that this may interfere with a claimant's right to pursue a civil action – normally a matter of provincial concern – or trump Quebec rules of public order is constitutionally immaterial. The CCAA is a valid exercise of federal power. Provided the matter in question falls within the legislation directly or as necessarily incidental to the exercise of that power, the CCAA governs. To the extent that its provisions are inconsistent with provincial legislation, the federal legislation is paramount. Mr. Woods properly conceded this during argument.

Conclusion With Respect to Legal Authority

[105] For all of the foregoing reasons, then, I conclude that the application judge had the jurisdiction and legal authority to sanction the Plan as put forward.

(2) The Plan is "Fair and Reasonable"

[106] The second major attack on the application judge's decision is that he erred in finding that the Plan is "fair and reasonable" and in sanctioning it on that basis. This attack is centred on the nature of the third-party releases contemplated and, in particular, on the fact that they will permit the release of some claims based in fraud.

[107] Whether a plan of compromise or arrangement is fair and reasonable is a matter of mixed fact and law, and one on which the application judge exercises a large measure of discretion. The standard of review on this issue is therefore one of deference. In the absence of a demonstrable error an appellate court will not interfere: see Re Ravelston Corp. Ltd. 2007 ONCA 268 (CanLII), (2007), 31 C.B.R. (5th) 233 (Ont. C.A.).

[108] I would not interfere with the application judge's decision in this regard. While the notion of releases in favour of third parties – including leading Canadian financial institutions – that extend to claims of fraud is distasteful, there is no legal impediment to the inclusion of a release for claims based in fraud in a plan of compromise or arrangement. The application judge had been living with and supervising the ABCP restructuring from its outset. He was intimately attuned to its dynamics. In the end he concluded that the benefits of the Plan to the creditors as a whole, and to the debtor companies, outweighed the negative aspects of compelling the unwilling appellants to execute the releases as finally put forward.

[109] The application judge was concerned about the inclusion of fraud in the contemplated releases and at the May hearing adjourned the final disposition of the sanctioning hearing in an effort to encourage the parties to negotiate a resolution. The result was the "fraud carve-out" referred to earlier in these reasons.

[110] The appellants argue that the fraud carve-out is inadequate because of its narrow scope. It (i) applies only to ABCP Dealers, (ii) limits the type of damages that may be claimed (no punitive damages, for example), (iii) defines "fraud" narrowly, excluding many rights that would be protected by common law, equity and the Quebec concept of public order, and (iv) limits claims to representations made directly to Noteholders. The appellants submit it is contrary to public policy to sanction a plan containing such a limited restriction on the type of fraud claims that may be pursued against the third parties.

[111] The law does not condone fraud. It is the most serious kind of civil claim. There is therefore some force to the appellants' submission. On the other hand, as noted, there is no legal impediment to granting the release of an antecedent claim in fraud, provided the claim is in the contemplation of the parties to the release at the time it is given: Fotinis Restaurant Corp. v. White Spot Ltd. 1998 CanLII 3836 (BC SC), (1998), 38 B.L.R. (2d) 251 at paras. 9 and 18 (B.C.S.C.). There may be disputes about the scope or extent of what is released, but parties are entitled to settle allegations of fraud in civil proceedings – the claims here all being untested allegations of fraud – and to include releases of such claims as part of that settlement.

[112] The application judge was alive to the merits of the appellants' submissions. He was satisfied in the end, however, that the need "to avoid the potential cascade of litigation that ... would result if a broader 'carve out' were to be allowed" (para. 113) outweighed the negative aspects of approving releases with the narrower carve-out provision. Implementation of the Plan, in his view, would work to the overall greater benefit of the Noteholders as a whole. I can find no error in principle in the exercise of his discretion in arriving at this decision. It was his call to make.

[113] At para. 71 above I recited a number of factual findings the application judge made in concluding that approval of the Plan was within his jurisdiction under the CCAA and that it was fair and reasonable. For convenience, I reiterate them here – with two additional findings – because they provide an important foundation for his analysis concerning the fairness and reasonableness of the Plan. The application judge found that:

a) The parties to be released are necessary and essential to the restructuring of the debtor;
b) The claims to be released are rationally related to the purpose of the Plan and necessary for it;
c) The Plan cannot succeed without the releases;
d) The parties who are to have claims against them released are contributing in a tangible and realistic way to the Plan;
e) The Plan will benefit not only the debtor companies but creditor Noteholders generally;
f) The voting creditors who have approved the Plan did so with knowledge of the nature and effect of the releases; and that,
g) The releases are fair and reasonable and not overly broad or offensive to public policy.

[114] These findings are all supported on the record. Contrary to the submission of some of the appellants, they do not constitute a new and hitherto untried "test" for the sanctioning of a plan under the CCAA. They simply represent findings of fact and inferences on the part of the application judge that underpin his conclusions on jurisdiction and fairness.

[115] The appellants all contend that the obligation to release the third parties from claims in fraud, tort, breach of fiduciary duty, etc. is confiscatory and amounts to a requirement that they – as individual creditors – make the equivalent of a greater financial contribution to the Plan. In his usual lively fashion, Mr. Sternberg asked us the same rhetorical question he posed to the application judge. As he put it, how could the court countenance the compromise of what in the future might turn out to be fraud perpetrated at the highest levels of Canadian and foreign banks? Several appellants complain that the proposed Plan is unfair to them because they will make very little additional recovery if the Plan goes forward, but will be required to forfeit a cause of action against third-party financial institutions that may yield them significant recovery. Others protest that they are being treated unequally because they are ineligible for relief programs that Liquidity Providers such as Canaccord have made available to other smaller investors.

[116] All of these arguments are persuasive to varying degrees when considered in isolation. The application judge did not have that luxury, however. He was required to consider the circumstances of the restructuring as a whole, including the reality that many of the financial institutions were not only acting as Dealers or brokers of the ABCP Notes (with the impugned releases relating to the financial institutions in these capacities, for the most part) but also as Asset and Liquidity Providers (with the financial institutions making significant contributions to the restructuring in these capacities).

[117] In insolvency restructuring proceedings almost everyone loses something. To the extent that creditors are required to compromise their claims, it can always be proclaimed that their rights are being unfairly confiscated and that they are being called upon to make the equivalent of a further financial contribution to the compromise or arrangement. Judges have observed on a number of occasions that CCAA proceedings involve "a balancing of prejudices," inasmuch as everyone is adversely affected in some fashion.

[118] Here, the debtor corporations being restructured represent the issuers of the more than $32 billion in non-bank sponsored ABCP Notes. The proposed compromise and arrangement affects that entire segment of the ABCP market and the financial markets as a whole. In that respect, the application judge was correct in adverting to the importance of the restructuring to the resolution of the ABCP liquidity crisis and to the need to restore confidence in the financial system in Canada. He was required to consider and balance the interests of all Noteholders, not just the interests of the appellants, whose notes represent only about 3% of that total. That is what he did.

[119] The application judge noted at para. 126 that the Plan represented "a reasonable balance between benefit to all Noteholders and enhanced recovery for those who can make out specific claims in fraud" within the fraud carve-out provisions of the releases. He also recognized at para. 134 that:

> No Plan of this size and complexity could be expected to satisfy all affected by it. The size of the majority who have approved it is testament to its overall fairness. No plan to address a crisis of this magnitude can work perfect equity among all stakeholders.

[120] In my view we ought not to interfere with his decision that the Plan is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances.

D. DISPOSITION

[121] For the foregoing reasons, I would grant leave to appeal from the decision of Justice Campbell, but dismiss the appeal.

Endorsement. Farley J.:
[1] The National Retail Credit Services Company ("N") moved for a direction of specific performance by the T. Eaton Company Limited ("E") and Sears Canada Inc. ("S") of the Card Licence and Services Agreement dated February 13, 1998 ("Card Deal") and the Trademark Licence Agreement dated April 17, 1998 ("Trademark Licence"). E and S have entered into a Share Purchase Agreement which will form part of the foundation of E's plan of arrangement under the CCAA.
[2] N submitted that, notwithstanding E's repudiation of the Trademark Licence (as well as the Card Deal; in Amended and Restated Purchase Agreement dated February 16, 1998 and the Transition Agreement dated April 4, 1998), N be entitled to use E's trademarks and related intellectual property to collect all outstanding receivables of N owed by customers of E and generated by the customers using the E credit card. During the hearing I confirmed with counsel for E and S that there would be no impediment to N referring in any collection procedure to the name "The T. Eaton's Company Limited". It is unfortunate that this aspect had not been clarified before. With this confirmation it seems to me that N may suffer some modest inconvenience in its collection operations but no material difficulty which requires any remedy outside of a claim for damages.
[3] What then of E's repudiation of the agreements with N whereby N was to be the E private label credit card program provider. Pursuant to the Card Deal, E granted N for a 10 year term "the exclusive licence to provide all of the requirements of Cards Services of (i) [E] and its affiliates..." N paid E a significant amount of money for this grant. "Card Services" are defined as follows in s.1.1 of the Card Deal:

> "Card Services" means the services provided by Supplier to administer, operate, manage and regulate the credit granting, payment processing, and transaction authorization facilities provided under this Agreement; such services include but are not limited to the production and issuance of Cards, the distribution and receipt of applications for Cards, the review and approval or denial of applications for Cards, the granting of credit to Cardholders, the preparation and mailing of statements, the receipt and collection of payments from Cardholders, the adjudication of > claims, the provision of balance protection insurance, the collection, management and communication of Customer information, the maintenance and timely provision of non cash transaction records, the payment of Net Settlements to TECO, the maintenance of the Database and all cardholder related records, the authentication of Bank Card transactions by electronic or other means, the operation of the Authorization System including the authorization of Transactions, the operation and monitoring of systems and related facilities and resources for carrying out the above referenced activities, and the operation and > administration of Cardholder Credit Balances together with such other services as may be agreed to from time to time by TECO and Supplier.

Thus N has the right to and is providing a credit type of service for the benefit of E.

[4] I note that s.7.4 of the Card Deal provides for the dispute mechanism for disputes or claims "between the parties arising out of or in relation to this Agreement". Essentially the parties N and E are to negotiate and if resolution is not forthcoming to refer the matter to a single arbitrator with the Arbitration Act being invoked. It seems to me that the Claims Procedure as to N's claim for damages as a result of E's repudiation essentially fulfils this provision. I note that s. 7.4(d)(vii) provides that "nothing herein will prevent a Party who gave notice under this Section 7.4(d) from applying for injunctive relief pending such arbitration proceeding." I shall deal with this motion in that light since in large respect it is a claim for a mandatory injunction.

[5] In Re Blue Range Resource Corp. 1999 ABQB 1038 (CanLII), (1999), 245 A.R. 154 (Alta. Q.B.); leave to appeal granted on other grounds 1999 ABCA 255 (CanLII), (1999), 12 C.B.R. (4th) 186 (Alta. C.A.), LoVecchio J. held that the debtor company could terminate (in the sense of repudiate, see infra) certain gas supply contracts under a stay order made pursuant to s.I1 of CCAA as long as that did not affect the purchaser's right to make a claim in damages against the debtor company. He stated at paras. 36-8:

> 36. The purpose of the CCAA proceedings generally and the stay in particular is to permit a company time to reorganize its affairs. This reorganization may take many forms and they need not be listed in this decision. A common denominator in all of them is frequently the variation of existing contractual relationships. Blue Range might, as any person might, breach a contract to which they are a party. They must however bear the consequences. This is essentially what has happened here.

When LoVecchio J. speaks of "the variation of existing contractual relationships", it is clear that he means that the "variation" is simply a breach of the contract and not that there is a sanctioned revision to the contract.

> 37. A unilateral termination, as in any case of breach, may or may not give rise to a legitimate claim in damages. Although the Order contemplates and to a certain extent permits unilateral termination, nothing in section 16.c or in any other part of the Order would suggest that Blue Range is to be relieved of this consequence; indeed Blue Range's liability for damages seems to have been assumed by Duke and Engage in their setoff argument. The application amounts to a request for an order of specific performance or an injunction which ought not to be available indirectly. In my view, an order authorizing the termination of contracts is appropriate in a restructuring, particularly given that its does not affect the creditors' right to claim for damages.
> 38. The Applicants are needless to say not happy about having to look to a frail and struggling company for a potentially significant damages claim. They will be relegated to the ranks of unsecured judgment creditors and may not, indeed likely will not, have their judgments satisfied in full. While I sympathize with the Applicants' positions, they ought not to, in the name of equity, the guide in CCAA proceedings, be able to elevate their claim for damages above the claims of all the other unsecured creditors through this route.

I agree with that analysis. See also Re Armbro Enterprises Inc. reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 80 (Ont. Bktcy.); Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corp. v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 621 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Grafton-Fraser Inc. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 161 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Re Dylex Ltd. 1995 CanLII 7370 (ON SC), (1995), 31 C.B.R. (3d) 106 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) and generally as to the purpose of the CCAA, Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) at p.31.

[6] The question of fairness is one that must await the sanction hearing, provided that the plan of arrangement survives the debtor vote. In Re Keddy Motor Inns Ltd. reflex, (1992), 13 C.B.R. (3d) 245 (N.S. C.A.), Freeman JA for the court stated at p. 258:

> The Act clearly contemplates rough-and-tumble negotiations between debtor companies desperately seeking a chance to service and creditors willing to keep them afloat, but on the best terms they can get. What the creditors and the company must live with is a plan of their own design, not the creation of the court. The court's role is to ensure that creditors who are bound unwillingly under the Act are not made victims of the majority and forced to accept terms that are unconscionable. No amount of disclosure could compensate for such deliberately unfair treatment. Neither disclosure, nor the votes of the majority, can be used to victimize a minority creditor. On the other hand negotiated inequalities of treatment which might be characterized as unfair in another context may well be ameliorated when made part of the plan by disclosure and voted upon by a majority (emphasis added).

In any CCAA (and its "affiliated" legislation) situation, one has to be cognizant of the function of a balancing of the prejudices. Positions must be realistically assessed and weighed, all in the light of what the alternative to a successful plan would be. Wishes are not a firm foundation on which to build a plan; nor are ransom demands. (I wish to make it clear that I am speaking generally about the approach to the CCAA and not specifically about this case as now is not the time to deal with the sanction questions).

[7] It is clear that under CCAA proceedings debtor companies are permitted to unilaterally terminate in the sense of repudiate leases and contracts without regard to the terms of those leases and contracts including any restrictions conferred therein that might ordinarily (i.e. outside CCAA proceedings) prevent the debtor company from so repudiating the agreement. To generally restrict debtor companies would constitute an insurmountable obstacle for most debtor companies attempting to effect compromises and reorganizations under the CCAA. Such a restriction would be contrary to the purposive approach to CCAA proceedings followed by the courts to this date.

[8] Is there something peculiar to the Card Deal and the other agreements which would dictate another result or amelioration in favour of N? Firstly N points to s.8.3 of the Card Deal which sets out the three provisions pursuant to which E could terminate the Card Deal (and E's obligations thereunder) before the expiration of the 10 year term. None of those provisions come into play. However, s.8.3 contemplates a termination by E as permitted under the Card Deal. That is not what E has done. E has repudiated the Card Deal and contrary to a permitted termination, E is to be subject to liability for such a repudiation.

[9] Secondly, N points out that pursuant to the terms of the Card Deal, E is not permitted to assign it without N's prior written consent. However, E's arrangement with S is not an assignment of the Card Deal.

[10] Thirdly, N submits that the Card Deal and other agreements grant it a licence which vests in N as licencee a right which constitutes personal property in the hands of N as licencee citing Re Foster reflex, (1992), 89 D.L.R. (4th) 555 (Ont. Bktcy.) at p.560 and Sugarman v. Duca Community Credit Union Ltd. 1998 CanLII 14665 (ON SC), (1998), 38 O.R. (3d) 429 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) at p.445-6. However, it should be noted that these cases are PPSA cases and under that legislation there is a very expanded view of "personal property" in which there may be a security interest. That definition does not come into play in a CCAA proceeding. See National Trust Co. v. Bouckhuyt reflex, (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 640 (Ont. C.A.) and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Hallahan reflex, (1990), 39 O.A.C. 24 (Ont. C.A.) for examples where similar licenses to those in Foster and Sugarman were found not to constitute "personal property" for the purposes of the PPSA or the Fraudulent Conveyances Act and the Assignments and Preferences Act.

[11] It seems to me that where the (exclusive) licence granted to N by E is analyzed in the context of the Card Deal overall, it is not, in the traditional property sense, a licence (sometimes expressed as a licence with a grant). The Card Deal in my view does not purport to transfer, or have the effect of transferring, any type of proprietary interest to N. Rather N is permitted to provide certain services to the customers of E while others are not. In the Card Deal, N and E have expressly and it would appear exhaustively provided for the aspects as to which each holds a proprietary interest in certain assets. There is no statement in the Card Deal that the "exclusive licence" granted by E to N is in itself proprietary in nature in that it creates directly or indirectly a proprietary interest for N's benefit. Examples of proprietary claims spelled out in the Card Deal in the sense that each side merely maintains what it had and not what it is granted are as follows:

> s.6.1(c) the Confidential Information (as defined in s.6.1(a)) of each of the parties is proprietary to that party;
> s.6.1(g) Confidential Information in the possession of either party is to be returned on request by the other party;
> s.6.2 the trademarks and other intellectual property of E remain E's property, although licensed (in the sense of being permitted by E to be used by N) to N in order to facilitate the performance by N of its obligations under the Card Deal; (s.5.1 of the trademarks licence also confirms that E is the exclusive owner of the trademarks and all goodwill associated thereunder);
> s.6.4 the cardholder lists are and remain the property of E; N may use the lists solely for the purposes of providing Card Services under the Card Deal and for certain other specified purposes, including the sale of defined financial products to those Cardholders.

Thus contrary to N's assertion that the assets used in the credit card operations are "vested" in N, both the customer lists and trademarks (the property relevant for the provision of the credit card operations remain exclusively the property of E.

[12] Even if the grant to N of the right to provide the Card Services were construed as a traditional licence, it does not appear to me that N thereby acquires a property interest in such a right. The true nature of an (exclusive) licence is leave or permission to do such a thing, which would otherwise be unlawful (and a contract not to give leave or permission to anyone else to do the same thing. It confers no interest or property in the thing. See Heap v. Hartley (1899), 42 Ch. D. 461 (Eng. Ch. Div.) at pp. 468-9 per Cotton L.J.

[13] Can N insist on specific performance of the Card Deal and other agreements, assuming for the purpose of this analysis that we ignore the clear jurisprudence discussed above in Blue Range Resource Corp. and the other cases which is to the effect that a debtor company in CCAA proceedings may be permitted to repudiate contracts but of course it will be subject to the damages which may arise from such repudiation, and such damages will have to be accommodated within the plan of arrangement being proposed (as may be awarded) for the creditors to vote upon? In essence, specific performance is only available where the non-repudiating party cannot be adequately compensated in damages for the breach. Here N and E have expressly agreed that a breach of the confidentiality provisions of the Card Deal would not be compensable in damages (and through negotiation, N, E and S have reached a modus vivendi as to the confidentiality provisions.) While N and E were free to expressly deal with other breaches of the arrangements in the same way, they did not do so; this is a strong indication of the parties' view that other breaches of the arrangements would be susceptible to compensation by way of damage claims. In fact, N has retained KPMG to prepare such an identification of damages which it now asserts is what it is entitled to. Where, as in this case, the non-repudiating party (N) cannot carry out the contract without the co-operation of the party who has refused to perform (E) and such co-operation is withheld or rendered impossible, the only remedy is a suit for damages; it is not a question of electing to accept the repudiation. See G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Contract (3rd) ed., 1994; Toronto, Carswell) at p. 614 and p. 794; Shibamoto & Co. v. Western Fish Producers Inc. (Trustee of) reflex, (1991), 43 F.T.R. 1 (Fed. T.D.) at p. 24; affirmed (1992), 145 N.R. 91 (Fed. C.A.). See also the going dark anchor tenant in the mall cases which I have previously decided (e.g. Chatham Centre Mall Ltd. v. New Miracle Food Mart Inc. (1994), 40 R.P.R. (2d) 124 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List])) and Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd. v. Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd., [1997] 3 All E.R. 297 (U.K. H.L.); Centre City Capital Ltd. v. Bank of East Asia (Canada) (December 23, 1997), Doc. RE 7243/96 (Ont. Gen. Div.) and R.J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (2nd ed, Toronto, Canada Law Book) at s.7.450 for the inappropriateness of granting a mandatory injunction where the court would in effect be required to constantly supervise the activities mandated to be performed. Since there is no assignment of the Card Deal contemplated to S or any other contractual or other relationship between S and N established, it would not seem that N can seek specific performance as against S.

[14] I note that Eatons submits that N's request for specific performance is illogical:

> If this relief were to be granted, the inevitable result would be the bankruptcy of Eaton's because the success of the Plan depends on the Sears Agreement, and in order to satisfy the conditions of the Sears Agreement, Eaton's must terminate the Card Services Agreement with NRCS. Not only would a bankruptcy result in diminished recoveries for all creditors, there would be no ongoing business to which NRCS could provide services under the Card Services Agreement.

While there may be some business practicality to the foregoing, logically, vis-à-vis E, all the S Purchase Agreement provides is some "extra" recovery to put into the plan of arrangement. Conceivably, a plan might be approved even without that additional funding. Claimants however given a choice between "more" and "less", usually prefer more. How that all works out and the relative sharings will be the subject of rough-and-tumble negotiations discussed in Keddy Motor Inns Lid. supra. It should also be noted that the purpose of the CCAA is not that there be a reorganization of the debtor company so that it survives no matter what; the fairness of the plan must be determined.

[15] E will have to deal with the mechanics of how to accommodate N's damages as assessed in the plan of arrangement including the restructuring contemplated thereunder. It is understood that as per LoVecchio J.'s observations in Blue Range Resource Corp. it is extremely unlikely in any CCAA plan that claims generally will be paid off at 100 cents on the dollar. That N may be paid off (as other creditors) in a "devalued currency" if the plan is approved does not give N any higher right to relief in this motion.

[16] N's motion is therefore dismissed.

Motion dismissed.

Compromise with secured creditors - Sec 5

5. Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its secured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company or of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.
R.S., c. C-25, s. 5.

Claims against directors — compromise - Sec 5.1

Digitized by Google

5.1 (1) A compromise or arrangement made in respect of a debtor company may include in its terms provision for the compromise of claims against directors of the company that arose before the commencement of proceedings under this Act and that relate to the obligations of the company where the directors are by law liable in their capacity as directors for the payment of such obligations.

Exception - Sec 5.1(2)
(2) A provision for the compromise of claims against directors may not include claims that

(a) relate to contractual rights of one or more creditors; or

(b) are based on allegations of misrepresentations made by directors to creditors or of wrongful or oppressive conduct by directors.

Powers of court - Sec 5.1(3)
(3) The court may declare that a claim against directors shall not be compromised if it is satisfied that the compromise would not be fair and reasonable in the circumstances.

Resignation or removal of directors - Sec 5.1(4)
(4) Where all of the directors have resigned or have been removed by the shareholders without replacement, any person who manages or supervises the management of the business and affairs of the debtor company shall be deemed to be a director for the purposes of this section.
1997, c. 12, s. 122.

Compromises to be sanctioned by court - Sec 6
6. (1) If a majority in number representing two thirds in value of the creditors, or the class of creditors, as the case may be — other than, unless the court orders otherwise, a class of creditors having equity claims, — present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting or meetings of creditors respectively held under sections 4 and 5, or either of those sections, agree to any compromise or arrangement either as proposed or as altered or modified at the meeting or meetings, the compromise or arrangement may be sanctioned by the court and, if so sanctioned, is binding

(a) on all the creditors or the class of creditors, as the case may be, and on any trustee for that class of creditors, whether secured or unsecured, as the case may be, and on the company; and

(b) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a bankruptcy order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or is in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, on the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator and contributories of the company.

MEMORANDUM OF JUDGMENT DELIVERED FROM THE BENCH

CONRAD, J.A. (For the Court):

[1] The decision of the Court is unanimous and will be delivered by Madam Justice Fruman.

FRUMAN, J.A. (for the Court):

[2] Fracmaster Ltd., an oil and gas services company with world-wide operations, encountered serious financial difficulties. With liabilities that greatly exceeded its assets, its inevitable insolvency gave rise to hurried attempts to restructure the company. A series of court proceedings and a court-authorized tender process, all conducted at break neck speed, resulted in a court order approving the sale of Fracmaster's assets to BJ Services Company for $80 million. That order, and the events which led up to it, are the subject of four appeals by prospective purchasers whose bids for Fracmaster were unsuccessful.

[3] We make two preliminary observations. First, this is a court of review. It is not our task to reconsider the merits of the various offers and decide which proposal might be best. The decisions made by the chambers judge involve a good measure of discretion, and are owed considerable deference. Whether or not we agree, we will only interfere if we conclude that she acted unreasonably, erred in principle or made a manifest error.

[4] Our second observation is that events unfolded rapidly, with short time periods and offers arriving, literally, at the last minute. Parties did not always have time to prepare and file affidavits. On occasion representations of fact were mixed with submissions of law made by counsel to the chambers judge. As a result, our record is not as complete as we might have wished. We imply no criticism. We understand Fracmaster's serious financial jeopardy, the need for haste, and the accommodation by the parties and the court to conclude matters quickly. However, the frailties of the record require that we give considerable deference to fact findings made by the chambers judge and further illustrate why leave is and should be required to appeal proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (section 13). I will refer to that statute as the "CCAA".

FACTS

[5] Fracmaster is an Alberta company. Beginning in the fall of 1998, when its financial condition was precarious, it unsuccessfully attempted to restructure its financial affairs. With the indulgence of a lending syndicate to whom Fracmaster owed $96 million, and whose debt was registered as a first charge on its assets, it subsequently filed a petition under the CCAA. On March 18, 1999, Fracmaster was granted an order imposing a stay of proceedings and appointing Arthur Andersen Inc. as the monitor. Fracmaster then conducted another sale process, in order to restructure the company, inject equity or sell its assets. The sale process was neither supervised nor controlled by the monitor. Several companies submitted offers or proposals, including UTI Energy Corp., Calfrac Limited and The Janus Corporation together with its principal, Alfred H. Balm.

[6] When the matter returned to court in May of 1999 four applications were heard:

> First, Fracmaster applied for approval of the sale of its assets to UTI. The members of the lending syndicate supported that application, in accordance with a contractual commitment they had made to UTI.
> Second, that same lending syndicate, as an alternative to Fracmaster's application, applied to lift the stay, appoint Arthur Andersen as receiver, direct the receiver to approve the UTI sale and permit the lending syndicate to begin to realize on its security.
> Third, Balm/Janus applied to continue the stay, adjourn the other applications, appoint an interim receiver and have the court direct the calling of meetings of secured creditors, unsecured creditors and shareholders, to consider the Balm/Janus plan of arrangement.
> Fourth, Calfrac applied for approval and acceptance of its proposal to purchase Fracmaster's assets.

[7] In reasons dated May 17, 1999, the chambers judge dismissed the Fracmaster, Balm/Janus and Calfrac applications. She appointed Arthur Andersen as the receiver/manager on certain terms and conditions, including the power to sell the assets of Fracmaster subject to court approval. She denied the lending syndicate's application to direct the receiver to sell the assets to UTI. Alive to concerns about delay, she asked the receiver to quickly report its recommendations about a sale of assets or other immediate action that the receiver considered appropriate for the benefit of all claimants, including the secured creditors (CCAA A.B. 333). The May 17 order in the CCAA proceedings is the subject of appeals by Balm/Janus and UTI.

[8] The next day, May 18, the receiver returned to court with a notice of motion seeking directions for approval of a sale process by way of sealed bids. The process was designed to respond to the principles and objectives established by the chambers judge for a sale of assets. As there had been no independent valuations, the proposed tender process would test the market to determine whether offers were available in excess of the amount of the lending syndicate's secured debt. The process was also designed to maximize the value to the creditors; respond to concerns about delay and the need for finality; provide a process for the benefit of all creditors; and be fundamentally fair by establishing a level playing field for all participants.

[9] The proposal was not greeted with unanimous approval by the prospective purchasers, and its terms were the subject of heated debate in court. At the conclusion of the May 18 proceedings, the chambers judge ordered a tender process. The order set out the terms and conditions of offers that would be considered, with final offers to be submitted by 2:00 p.m. on May 20, 1999, by way of sealed bids. The receiver would advise the interested parties of its recommendation by 8:00 p.m. on May 20, and make its recommendation to the court at 10:00 a.m. on May 21. The tender process established in the May 18 order has not been appealed.

[10] Offers were submitted by UTI, Calfrac and BJ Services, a company which had previously shown interest in acquiring Fracmaster, but had not participated in the CCAA company-conducted sale process. Balm/Janus did not submit an offer. The lending syndicate continued to support the UTI offer, in accordance with a contractual commitment its members had made to UTI. The receiver recommended acceptance of the BJ Services offer, for a number of reasons, including the fact that it provided the highest cash purchase price, exceeding the Calfrac offer by $13 million and the UTI offer by $19.3 million. The chambers judge, in reasons dated May 21, 1999, approved the BJ Services offer recommended by the receiver. UTI and Calfrac appeal that decision.

THE CCAA APPEALS

[11] Balm/Janus appeal the chambers judge's decision in the CCAA proceedings, declining to order a meeting of creditors and shareholders of Fracmaster to consider and implement Balm/Janus' proposed plan of arrangement. The appeal is supported by certain shareholders of Fracmaster and by Banque Nationale de Paris, a subordinated lender.

[12] The chambers judge acknowledged that the restructuring proposed by Balm/Janus was a true plan which fit within the CCAA, leaving an after-life for Fracmaster and its shareholders. However, she noted the commercial reality that there was no equity left in Fracmaster, and that the lending syndicate had the only realistic remaining financial interest (CCAA A.B. 329-330). Under the terms of the CCAA and the Balm/Janus proposal, the plan would require the approval of the lending syndicate, which had indicated that it would not support the proposal. The chambers judge found as a fact that the lending syndicate had valid commercial reasons for its refusal (CCAA A.B. 331). She decided that it would be pointless to order meetings of creditors and shareholders and dismissed the Balm/Janus application.

[13] There is no requirement under the CCAA that all proposed plans of arrangement be put to meetings of creditors and shareholders for their consideration. Sections 4 and 5 specifically employ the word "may", giving the court discretion. In exercising its discretion, the court must consider whether the proposed plan of arrangement has a reasonable chance of success: Bargain Harold's Discount Ltd. v. Paribas Bank of Canada reflex, (1992), 10 C.B.R. (3d) 23 (Ont. Gen. Div.), or instead, is doomed to failure: Re Inducon Development Corp. reflex, (1991), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 306 (Ont. Gen. Div.). Here it was clear that the lending syndicate did not support the plan. They would be entitled to vote as a class at the meeting and defeat the plan. It was also clear that the Fracmaster situation was urgent, requiring rapid resolution, and that the delays that would be occasioned by calling the meetings would further jeopardize Fracmaster's financial condition and the value of its assets. The chambers judge did not err in concluding that the Balm/Janus plan was doomed to failure. We grant leave to appeal to Balm/Janus, but dismiss their appeal.

[14] We wish to make a further observation. Under the CCAA the court has no discretion to sanction a plan unless it has been approved by a vote of a 2/3 majority in value of each class of creditors (section 6). To that extent, each class of creditors has a veto. This procedure is quite different from a court-appointed receivership. In a receivership the desires of the creditors are a significant factor, but the approval by a specific majority of creditors is not a pre-condition to court sanction, and creditors do not have an absolute veto. The difference in the procedures gives rise to different tests and considerations to be applied in each type of proceeding. While in this case the lending syndicate's desires in the CCAA and receivership proceedings were consistent, the chambers judge was not required to give the same weight to their wishes in each proceeding.

[15] UTI also appeals the May 17, 1999 order denying Fracmaster's application to approve the sale of its assets to UTI under the CCAA. The chambers judge noted that the proposed sale of assets to UTI did not create any monetary return for the unsecured creditors or shareholders of Fracmaster, nor did it contemplate that they would receive any benefit. The transaction was effectively a sale of assets for the benefit of the lending syndicate, a transaction which she concluded could be accomplished in a manner that did not require the use of the CCAA (CCAA A.B. 331-332). Without deciding whether the UTI offer was commercially provident, she concluded that the sale should not be approved under the CCAA, and dismissed Fracmaster's application.

Digitized by Google

[16] Although there are infrequent situations in which a liquidation of a company's assets has been concluded under the CCAA, the proposed transaction must be in the best interest of the creditors generally: Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 CBR (3d) 24 at 31 (Ont. Gen. Div.). There must be an ongoing business entity that will survive the asset sale. See, for example, Re Canadian Red Cross Society, [1998] O.J. No. 3306 (Ont. Gen. Div.), online: QL (OJ); Re Solv-Ex Corporation and Solv-Ex Canada Limited, (19 November, 1997), (Calgary), 9701-10022 (Alta. Q.B.). A sale of all or substantially all the assets of a company to an entirely different entity, with no continued involvement by former creditors and shareholders, does not meet this requirement. While we do not intend to limit the flexibility of the CCAA, we are concerned about its use to liquidate assets of insolvent companies which are not part of a plan or compromise among creditors and shareholders, resulting in some continuation of a company as a going concern. Generally, such liquidations are inconsistent with the intent of the CCAA and should not be carried out under its protective umbrella. The chambers judge did not err in concluding that the sale of assets to UTI would be an inappropriate use of the CCAA. We grant leave to appeal to UTI, but dismiss its appeal.

RECEIVERSHIP APPEALS

[17] Calfrac appeals the May 21 order which approved the sale of Fracmaster's assets to BJ Services. Its primary complaint is that the receiver failed to administer the sale process in strict compliance with the May 18 court ordered procedure. Calfrac's complaints about the process were considered by the chambers judge, and dealt with in her May 21 reasons (Receivership A.B. 119 to 122). She concluded that the terms of the May 18 order had to be read in light of the commercial realities of the business world and the bidding process. She viewed the variations as minor and not problematic and decided that the BJ Services offer was in substantially the same form as the offer proposed by the receiver.

[18] A review of Calfrac's offer indicates that it too was not in strict complaince with the terms of the May 18 order. This is not entirely unexpected as the order, tender process and submission of offers came about quickly, without time to contemplate all the intricacies of fine legal drafting. Amendments to the form of agreement were contemplated in paragraph 4. c of the May 18 order. The other paragraphs of section 4, setting out other terms and conditions, did not specifically mention amendments.

[19] The tender process in this case was not a distinct and final process designed to provide a complete set of bid documents to the bidders, with no possibility of negotiation or variation, as might be the case in a construction bid. See, for example, M.J.B. Enterprises Ltd. v. Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., [1999] S.C.J. No. 17 (S.C.C.), online: QL (SCJ). Time did not permit the creation of such definitive conditions. Instead the process was designed to be court supervised. The amendment provisions contained in paragraph 4. c illustrate the intent to build flexibility into the process, rather than requiring strict compliance with the order. All parties were entitled to be present and make representations at the court proceedings to approve an offer, with the court to have ultimate discretion to determine whether the principles and objectives of the sale process had been met. The chambers judge did not act unreasonably in considering the commercial realities and the nature of the variations, and in accepting the form of BJ Services offer. This ground of appeal fails.

[20] A second ground of appeal advanced by both Calfrac and UTI, is that the receiver and the chambers judge failed to properly consider the closing risks associated with the BJ Services offer. The chambers judge considered the closing risks in her reasons (Receivership A.B. 112 to 113) and accepted the receiver's conclusion that the closing risks associated with the BJ Services offer were more than the Calfrac offer, no greater than the UTI offer, and more than offset by the BJ Services purchase price.

[21] Calfrac is critical of the summary manner in which the receiver communicated its risk assessment, and the lack of detail to back up its analysis. The receiver had 6 hours in which to analyze the offers and indicate its recommendation to the parties. The expedited procedure was set out in the May 18 order which has not been appealed. With the benefit of more time, the receiver undoubtedly would have proffered a more detailed analysis. But one cannot be overly critical of the receiver's work product, given the time constraints.

[22] Both UTI and Calfrac contend that the chambers judge erred in her assessment of the closing risks. UTI suggests that she erred in concluding that the closing risks of the BJ Services offer were no greater than the UTI offer. Even if that were so, the chambers judge also concluded that the BJ Services closing risks were more than offset by the greater purchase price. If that was the case for the Calfrac offer, which involved fewer closing risks and a higher purchase price than the UTI offer, it would certainly be the case for the UTI offer, which involved greater closing risks and the lowest purchase price. We are not satisfied that the chambers judge's conclusions on risks were unreasonable. We defer to her findings and dismiss this ground of appeal.

THE LENDING SYNDICATE'S WISHES

[23] UTI's principal ground of appeal is that the chambers judge erred in acting upon the receiver's recommendation and approving the sale of Fracmaster's assets to BJ Services. UTI submits that the prevailing consideration for the receiver should have been the wishes and business decision of the lending syndicate, which supported the UTI offer. UTI's appeal is supported by the lending syndicate and, if the Balm/Janus appeal does not succeed, by Banque Nationale de Paris, the subordinated lender.

[24] The facts in this case are unique. After the preliminary stay and CCAA order, Fracmaster conducted a company supervised sale process, which resulted in offers or proposals from several companies, including Balm/Janus, Calfrac and UTI. The lending syndicate considered the proposals, preferred the UTI offer and contractually agreed to support it. An acknowledgment to the April 26 UTI offer, signed by the lending syndicate, stated: "The above Offer is hereby acknowledged by each of the undersigned and each of them agree to support the Offer at the CCAA Proceedings."

[25] On April 27, 1999 the lending syndicate signed a side letter which contemplated that the sale of assets might not be completed under the CCAA, but under an alternate transaction, such as the appointment of a receiver and conveyance of assets by the receiver to UTI. The letter stated: "It is agreed that the Term Lenders and the Operating Lender will use their reasonable best efforts to conclude any such alternate transaction so long as they receive the same consideration as they would have received under the Offer."

[26] Fracmaster applied for an order approving the sale of its assets to UTI under the provisions of the CCAA. Although the lending syndicate supported that application, in the same proceeding the lending syndicate applied for an alternate order appointing a receiver and directing the receiver to sell the assets to UTI. The chambers judge dismissed Fracmaster's application under the CCAA. She appointed a receiver but refused to direct the receiver to transfer the assets to UTI, concluding that this would fetter the receiver's discretion and largely defeat the purposes of its appointment (CCAA A.B. 333). Although the chambers judge noted that the receiver could have recommended a sale to UTI if it felt comfortable doing so, the receiver instead recommended a new sale process, involving sealed tenders. Both UTI and Calfrac participated in the sealed tender process, repeating their earlier offers. BJ Services, which had not made an offer in the CCAA proceedings, put in a new bid. It offered cash consideration to the lending syndicate of $80 million for Fracmaster's assets, compared to $60.7 million plus warrants offered by UTI and $66 million plus warrants offered by Calfrac. The lending syndicate, which had agreed to support the UTI offer before the BJ Services offer was made, stuck by their commitment and continued to support the UTI offer.

[27] In accordance with the May 18 order, the receiver was required to make a recommendation to the court, bearing in mind the interests of all claimants, including the secured creditors. The bid process confirmed that the lending syndicate had the only remaining financial stake in the company. The amount of its secured debt was $96 million, which exceeded the bids. The receiver was aware that the lending syndicate supported UTI's offer, and was also aware of the letter agreement. Nevertheless, the receiver concluded that the BJ Services offer was the best offer, and recommended its acceptance.

[28] The chambers judge followed that recommendation and approved the BJ Services offer. There is no suggestion that the BJ Services offer was prejudicial to the lending syndicate. The chambers judge considered the case law and concluded that although the creditors' interests were an important consideration, they were not the only consideration (Receivership A.B. 117). Accepting the principle that the creditors' views should be very seriously considered, she indicated that if she were satisfied that the receiver acted properly and providently, she would be reluctant to withhold approval of a transaction recommended by the receiver. (Receivership A.B. 118)

[29] UTI concedes that had the bid process resulted in a bid which exceeded the lending syndicate's secured claim of $96 million, parties other than the lending syndicate would have had a financial interest in the outcome, and different considerations would apply. Because none of the bids exceeded $96 million, only the lending syndicate had a financial interest in the proceeds of sale of assets. UTI submits that the lending syndicate made a bargain with UTI, and that bargain should be the paramount consideration. The thrust of UTI's argument is that its offer should be accepted so long as no one else offered more than $96 million. In effect, it would have a reserve bid.

[30] The narrow issue raised in the appeal is the weight to be given to the lending syndicate's wishes to accept the UTI offer. But this appeal raises a competing issue, the integrity of the bid process.

[31] Lenders have the ability to appoint private receivers and deal with assets without court approval. In the circumstances of this case, where Fracmaster has many offshore assets, we are told that a private receivership without court involvement would not be expedient. Once a creditor embarks upon a court appointed receivership, the creditor loses an element of control, including the power to dictate the terms of the disposition of assets. Although the lending syndicate's preferences are an important factor to be considered by the court, its preferences do not fetter the court's discretion and are not necessarily determinative.

[32] The receiver's role in a liquidation of assets is clear and well defined. Its obligation is to make a sufficient effort to obtain the highest possible sale price for the assets: Salima Investments Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal 1985 ABCA 191 (CanLII), (1985), 21 D.L.R. (4th) 473 at 476 (Alta. C.A.). In Royal Bank of Canada v. Soundair Corp. 1991 CanLII 2727

(ON CA), (1991), 83 D.L.R. (4th) 76 at 93 (Ont. C.A.), Galligan J.A. set out the principles which govern the function of the court and the exercise of its discretion when considering an application by a receiver for court approval of a sale:

1. It should consider whether the receiver has made a sufficient effort to get the best price and has not acted improvidently.
2. It should consider the interests of all parties.
3. It should consider the efficacy and integrity of the process by which offers have been obtained.
4. It should consider whether there has been unfairness in the working out of the process.

The chambers judge considered each of these principles in turn, then accepted the receiver's recommendation.

[33] Only in rare cases will the receiver's recommendation diverge from the wishes of the only stakeholder, and those cases must be carefully scrutinized by a judge who is asked to approve that recommendation. But we cannot say that the chambers judge acted unreasonably by following the recommendation of the receiver in this case, because of the unique facts and manner in which events unfolded.

[34] After the court learned of the existence of the lending syndicate's contractual commitment to support the UTI offer in a receivership, it nevertheless ordered a sealed tender process. The receiver asked for the sale process in order to determine whether offers might be made which would exceed the amount of the lending syndicate's debt. The receiver also submitted that only a sale process would satisfy the court that it had fulfilled its mandate to maximize recovery and "give everyone a fair and reasonable attempt at bidding on the assets of the company" (Receivership A.B. 56). Once the sale process was engaged, it had to be fundamentally fair, with a level playing field for all participants.

[35] The receiver contacted all parties who had previously made an offer for Fracmaster's assets or expressed an interest in making an offer. The receiver also issued a press release outlining the terms of the sale. It was therefore clearly contemplated that the bidding process would not be confined to previous bidders.

[36] Some reference to a reserve bid could have been incorporated into the May 18 order indicating, for example, that UTI's offer was to be accepted unless a bid exceeded $96 million. The order was silent. Under the order, UTI was not required to repeat its earlier offer and could have changed the consideration. In fact, it could have made no offer at all. Anyone entering the bidding process might well know, as BJ Services did, that the lending syndicate supported UTI's offer and that this could create some impediments. But they could not know that UTI's offer would have the effect of a reserve bid up to $96 million. To default to the UTI bid without prior notice to the other bidders would undermine the integrity of the independent bidding process.

[37] UTI chose to resubmit its earlier offer, but must have been mindful of the risks. Clause 6. (b) of UTI's offer specifically stated that the offer was conditional on court approval.

[38] While neither the receiver nor the court had an obligation to sweeten the lending syndicate's negotiated deal, the fact that the effect of the recommended bid was to increase the lending syndicate's cash consideration was not itself a reason to dismiss the receiver's recommendation. Once the court embarked upon a sealed tender process other interests were engaged. The chambers judge considered the interests and desires of the lending syndicate. She also considered the other factors set out in Soundair, including fairness and the efficacy and integrity of the process. She balanced the competing interests, as she was required to do, and we cannot say that her conclusion was unreasonable or that she erred in principle. This ground of appeal fails.

SUMMARY

[39] We grant leave to appeal the CCAA orders to Balm/Janus and UTI. The Balm/Janus appeal, Calfrac appeal and two appeals by UTI are dismissed.

(DISCUSSION AS TO COSTS)

CONRAD, J.A. (For the Court):

[40] We have concluded that there is no reason to depart from the normal rule that costs follow the success of the appeal. Accordingly, we will order one set of costs to BJ Services to be payable in equal amounts by UTI, Calfrac and Balm/Janus. The costs are to be assessed on Column 5.

FARLEY J.:

[1] These reasons deal with three matters which the court was asked to approve Air Canada (AC) entering into various agreements; simply put they were as follows:

(1) the Merrill Lynch (ML) indemnity;
(2) the entering into the amendments to the Trinity Agreement; and
(3) the Global Restructuring Agreements (GRA).

ML Indemnity

[2] There was no opposition to this. The court was advised that such an indemnity was customarily given and that the terms of this particular one were such as is normally given. I therefore approve AC granting such an indemnity to ML.

Trinity Amendments

[3] As I understood the submissions this morning, Mizuho a member of the Unsecured Creditors Committee (UCC) was the only interested party which spoke out against the Trinity amendments. It continues to be dissatisfied with the process by which Trinity was selected as the equity plan sponsor. I merely point out, once again, that this process was not of the Court's choosing but rather one which AC commenced on notice to the service list and as to which there were no objections before Trinity was selected on November 8, 2003 (together with the "fiduciary out" provision contained in its proposal). Aside from the court approvals envisaged by that process, the court only became involved when it was appreciated that there were some difficulties with the practical implementation of the process.

[4] I further understand that the Ad Hoc Committee of Various Creditors (CVC) withdrew its opposition yesterday along with its cross motion. The UCC (one assumes on some majority basis) supported the Trinity Amendments but indicated that, as a sounding board, it wished to continue sounding that it still had concerns about aspects of corporate governance and management incentives.

[5] I have no doubt, if adjustments in any particular area make sense between the signatories (AC and Trinity) and to the extent that any beneficiaries are involved, that such adjustments will be made for everyone's overall benefit (everyone in the sense of AC including all of its stakeholders including creditors, labour, management, pensioners, etc.) not only for the short term interests but the long term interests of AC emerging from these CCAA proceedings as an ongoing viable enterprise on into the future, well able to serve the public (both Canadian and foreign). A harmonious relationship with trust and respect flowing in all directions amongst the stakeholders will be to everyone's long term advantage. With respect to corporate governance though, I am able to make a more direct observation. A director, no matter who nominates that person, owes duties and obligations to the corporation, not the nominator: see 820099 Ontario Ltd. v. Harold E. Ballard Ltd. reflex, (1991), 3 B.L.R. (2d) 113 at 123 (Ont. Gen. Div.), aff'd reflex, (1991), 3 B.L.R. (2d) 113 (Div. Ct.).

[6] There was no evidence to show that the Board of AC in exercising its fiduciary duties did not properly consider on a quantitative and qualitative basis the factors (on a pro and con basis) relating to whether Cerberus had provided a Superior Proposal (as that was defined in section 9 of the Trinity Agreement approved earlier by this Court). Indeed there was no complaint from

Cerberus in this respect. The Board's letter to me of December 22, 2003 carefully reviewed the considerations which the Board (with the assistance of Seabury and ML, together with the general oversight and views of the Monitor) gave in their deliberations with their ultimate decision that the Cerberus December 10, 2003 proposal was not a Superior Proposal with the result that the Board has selected Trinity to be the equity program sponsor in accordance with the Trinity amended deal. I approve AC executing the Trinity amended deal and implementing same, with the recognition and proviso that there may be further amendments/adjustments which may be entered into subject to the guidelines of my discussion above. I note in particular that the UCC helpfully pointed out that section 7.3 still needs to be modified, and that is being worked on. The Air Canada Pilots Association observed that there still needed to be some fine-tuning at para. 22 of its factum noting that: "These matters of the detailed implementation of the Amended Trinity Investment Agreement can all be resolved by good faith negotiations between Air Canada, Trinity and affected stakeholders, with the assistance and support of the Monitor"; I did not have the benefit of any submissions in this regard (para.22) nor was any expected to either be given or taken as the parties all appreciated that this was not to be an exercise in "nitpicking".

[7] At paragraph 71 of its 19th report, the Monitor stated:

> 71. The Monitor is of the continuing view that the Equity Solicitation Process must be completed as soon as possible. The restructuring process and many other restructuring initiatives have been delayed by approximately two months as a result of the continued uncertainty concerning the selection of the equity plan sponsor. The equity solicitation process must be concluded so that the balance of the restructuring process can be completed before the expiry on April 30, 2004 of the financing commitments from each of Trinity, GECC and DB pursuant to the Standby Agreement. The Monitor recommends that this Honourable Court approve the Company's motion seeking approval of the Amended Trinity Investment Agreement.

[8] I would therefore approve the Trinity amendments so that AC can proceed to enter into and implement the Amended Trinity Investment Agreement. I note that this approval is not intended to determine any rights which third parties may have.

GRA

[9] As with the previous approvals, I take the requirement under the CCAA is that approval of the Court may be given where there is consistency with the purpose and spirit of that legislation, a conclusion by the Court that as a primary consideration, the transaction is fair and reasonable and will be beneficial to the debtor and its stakeholders generally: see Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Ins. Co. of Canada (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 195 at 201 (B.C.C.A.). In Re Canadian Red Cross Society 1998 CanLII 14907 (ON SC), (1998), 5 C.B.R. (4th) 299 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Blair J. at p. 316 adopted the principles in Royal Bank of Canada v. Soundair Corp. 1991 CanLII 2727 (ON CA), (1991), 7 C.B.R. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.) as an appropriate guideline for determining when an agreement or transaction should be approved during a CCAA restructuring but prior to the actual plan of reorganization being in place. In Re Sammi Atlas Inc. 1998 CanLII 14900 (ON SC), (1998), 3 C.B.R. (4th) 171 (Ont. Gen. Div.), I observed at p. 173 that in considering what is fair and reasonable treatment, one must look at the creditors as a whole (i.e. generally) and to the objecting creditors (specifically) and see if rights are compromised in an attempt to balance interests (and have the pain of the compromise equitably shared) as opposed to the confiscation of rights. I think that philosophy should be applicable to the circumstances here involving the various stakeholders. As I noted immediately above in Sammi, equitable treatment is not necessarily equal treatment.

[10] The Monitor's 19th report at paragraphs 20-21 indicates that:

20. The GRA provides the following benefits for Air Canada:
    - The retention of a significant portion of its fleet of core aircraft, spare engines and flight simulators, which are critical to its ongoing operations;
    - The restructuring of obligations with respect to 106 of 107 Air Canada and Jazz air operating, parked and undelivered aircraft (effective immediately for 12 GECC-managed aircraft and upon exit from CCAA for the remaining 94 GECC-owned aircraft, except as indicated below), including lease rate reductions on 51 aircraft (of which 3 aircraft have been returned as of the current date), cash flow relief for 29 aircraft, termination of the Applicants' obligations with respect to 20 parked aircraft (effective immediately), the cancellation of 4 future aircraft lease commitments and the restructuring of the overall obligations with respect to 2 aircraft. Obligations with respect to the last remaining aircraft remain unaffected as it is management's view that this lease was already at market;
    - Exit financing of approximately US$585 million (the "Exit Facility") to be provided by GECC upon the Company's emergence from CCAA;
    - Aircraft financing up to a maximum of US$950 million (the "RJ Aircraft Financing") to be provided by GECC and to be used by Air Canada to finance the future purchase of approximately 43 regional jet aircraft; and
    - The surrender of any distribution on account of any deficiency claims under the CCAA Plan with respect to GECC-owned aircraft only, without in any way affecting GECC's right to vote on the Plan in respect of any deficiency claim.
21. In return for these restructuring and financing commitments, the GRA provides for the following:
    - Payment of all current aircraft rent by Air Canada to GECC, during the interim period until emergence from CCAA proceedings, at contractual lease rates for GECC-owned aircraft and at revised lease rates for GECC-managed aircraft;

Digitized by Google

- The delivery of notes refinancing existing obligations to GECC in connection with 2 B747-400 cross-collateralized leases (the "B747 Restructuring) including one note convertible into equity of the restructured Air Canada at GECC's option;
- The delivery of stock purchase warrants (the "Warrants") for the purchase of an additional 4% of the common stock of the Company at a strike price equal to the price paid by any equity plan sponsor; and
- The cross-collateralization of all GECC and affiliate obligations (the "Interfacility Collateralization Agreement") on Air Canada's emergence from CCAA proceedings for a certain period of time.

The Monitor concluded at paragraph 70:

> 70. The Monitor notes that, if considered on their own, the lease concessions provided to Air Canada by GECC pursuant to the GRA differ substantially from those being provided by other aircraft lessors. In addition, the Monitor notes that GECC has benefitted from the cross collateralization on 22 aircraft pursuant to the CCAA Credit Facility and Interfacility Collateralization Agreement, particularly as it relates to the settlement of Air Canada's obligations to GECC under the B747 Restructuring. However, the Monitor also notes that the substantial benefits provided to Air Canada under the GRA including the availability of US $585 million of exit financing and US$950 million of regional jet aircraft financing are significant and critical to the Company's emergence from CCAA proceedings in an expedited manner. In the Monitor's view the financial benefits provided to Air Canada under the GRA outweigh the costs to the Applicants' estate arising as a result of the cross collateralization benefit provided to GECC under the CCAA Credit Facility and Interfacility Collateralization Agreement. Accordingly, the Monitor recommends to this Honourable Court that the GRA be approved.

[11] The GRA was opposed by the UCC (again apparently on some majority basis as one of its members, Cara, was indicated as being in favour and I also understand that Lufthansa was also supportive); the UCC's position was supplemented by separate submissions by another of its members, CIBC. I agree with the position of the UCC that the concern of the court is not with respect to the past elements of the DIP financing by GE and the cross-collateralization of 22 aircraft that agreement provided for. I also note the position of the UCC that it recognizes that the GRA is a package deal which cannot be cherry picked by any stakeholder nor modified by the Court; the UCC accepts that the GRA must be either taken as a package deal or rejected. It suggested that GE, if the court rejects the GRA as advocated by the UCC, will not abandon the field but rather it will stay and negotiate terms which the UCC feels would be more appropriate. That may be true but I would observe that in my view the delay and uncertainty involved would likely be devastating for AC. Would AC be able to meet the April 30, 2004 deadline for the Trinity deal which requires that the GRA be in place? What would the effect be upon the booking public?

[12] I note that the UCC complains that other creditors are not being given equal treatment. However, counsel for another large group of aircraft lessors and financiers indicated that they had no difficulty with the GRA. Indeed, it seems to me that GE is in a somewhat significantly different position than the other creditors given the aforesaid commitment to provide an Exit Facility and an RJ facility. Trinity and Deutsche Bank (DB) with respect to their proposed inflow of $1 billion in equity would be subordinate to GE; this new money (as opposed to sunk old money of the UCC and as well as that of the other creditors) supports the GRA. I note as well although it is "past history" that GE has compromised a significant portion of its $2 billion claim for existing commitments down to $1.4 billion, while at the same time committing to funding of large amounts for future purposes, all at a time when the airline industry generally does not have ready access to such.

[13] With respect to the two 747 LILOs (lease in, lease out), there is the concession that AC will enjoy any upside potential in an after marketing while being shielded from any further downside. GE has also provided AC with some liquidity funding assistance by deferring some of its charges to a latter period post emergence. Further it has been calculated that as to post filing arrears, there will be a true up on emergence and assuming that would be March 31, 2004, it is expected that there would be a wash as between AC and GE, with a slight "advantage" to AC if emergence were later. I pause to note here that emergence sooner rather than later is in my view in everyone's best interests – and that everyone should focus on that and give every reasonable assistance and cooperation.

[14] With respect to the snapback rights, I note that AC would be able to eliminate same by repaying the LILO notes and the Tranche Loans and AC would be legally permitted to eliminate this concern 180 days post emergence. I recognize that AC would be in a much stronger functional and psychological bargaining position to obtain replacement funding post emergence than it is now able to do while in CCAA protection proceedings. I would assume that such a project would be a financial priority for AC post emergence and that timing should not prevent AC from starting to explore that possibility in the near future (even before emergence). I also note that GE anticipates that the snapback rights would not likely come into play, given, I take it, its analysis of the present and future condition of AC and its experience and expertise in the field. I take it as a side note that GE from this observation by it will not have a quick trigger finger notwithstanding the specific elements in the definition of Events of Default; that of course may only be commercial reality – and that could of course change, but one would think that GE would have to be concerned about its ongoing business reputation and thus have to justify such action. Snapback rights only come into existence upon emergence, not on the entry into the GRA.

[15] I conclude that on balance the GRA is beneficial to AC and its stakeholders; in my view it is fair and reasonable and in the best interests of AC. It will permit AC to get on with the remaining and significant steps its needs to accomplish before it can emerge. The same goes for the Trinity deal. I therefore approve AC's entering into and implementing the GRA, subject to the same considerations as to completing the documentation and making amendments/adjustments as I discussed above in Trinity Amendments.

REASONS: JUNE 26, 2012
ENDORSEMENT

[1] Cinram International Inc. ("CII"), Cinram International Income Fund ("Cinram Fund"), CII Trust and the Companies listed in Schedule "A" (collectively, the "Applicants") brought this application seeking an initial order (the "Initial Order") pursuant to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"). The Applicants also request that the court exercise its jurisdiction to extend a stay of proceedings and other benefits under the Initial Order to Cinram International Limited Partnership ("Cinram LP", collectively with the Applicants, the "CCAA Parties").
[2] Cinram Fund, together with its direct and indirect subsidiaries (collectively, "Cinram" or the "Cinram Group") is a replicator and distributor of CDs and DVDs. Cinram has a diversified operational footprint across North America and Europe that enables it to meet the replication and logistics demands of its customers.
[3] The evidentiary record establishes that Cinram has experienced significant declines in revenue and EBITDA, which, according to Cinram, are a result of the economic downturn in Cinram's primary markets of North America and Europe, which impacted consumers' discretionary spending and adversely affected the entire industry.
[4] Cinram advises that over the past several years it has continued to evaluate its strategic alternatives and rationalize its operating footprint in order to attempt to balance its ongoing operations and financial challenges with its existing debt levels. However, despite cost reductions and recapitalized initiatives and the implementation of a variety of restructuring alternatives, the Cinram Group has experienced a number of challenges that has led to it seeking protection under the CCAA.
[5] Counsel to Cinram outlined the principal objectives of these CCAA proceedings as:
(i) to ensure the ongoing operations of the Cinram Group;
(ii) to ensure the CCAA Parties have the necessary availability of working capital funds to maximize the ongoing business of the Cinram Group for the benefit of its stakeholders; and
(iii) to complete the sale and transfer of substantially all of the Cinram Group's business as a going concern (the "Proposed Transaction").
[6] Cinram contemplates that these CCAA proceedings will be the primary court supervised restructuring of the CCAA Parties. Cinram has operations in the United States and certain of the Applicants are incorporated under the laws of the United States. Cinram, however, takes the position that Canada is the nerve centre of the Cinram Group.
[7] The Applicants also seek authorization for Cinram International ULC ("Cinram ULC") to act as "foreign representative" in the within proceedings to seek a recognition order under Chapter 15 of the United States Bankruptcy Code ("Chapter 15"). Cinram advises that the proceedings under Chapter 15 are intended to ensure that the CCAA Parties are protected from creditor actions in the United States and to assist with the global implementation of the Proposed Transaction to be undertaken pursuant to these CCAA proceedings.
[8] Counsel to the Applicants submits that the CCAA Parties are part of a consolidated business in Canada, the United States and Europe that is headquartered in Canada and operationally and functionally integrated in many significant respects. Cinram is one of the world's largest providers of pre-recorded multi-media products and related logistics services. It has facilities in North America and Europe, and it:

Digitized by Google

(i) manufactures DVDs, blue ray disks and CDs, and provides distribution services for motion picture studios, music labels, video game publishers, computer software companies, telecommunication companies and retailers around the world;
(ii) provides various digital media services through One K Studios, LLC; and
(iii) provides retail inventory control and forecasting services through Cinram Retail Services LLC (collectively, the "Cinram Business").

[9] Cinram contemplates that the Proposed Transaction could allow it to restore itself as a market leader in the industry. Cinram takes the position that it requires CCAA protection to provide stability to its operations and to complete the Proposed Transaction.

[10] The Proposed Transaction has the support of the lenders forming the steering committee with respect to Cinram's First Lien Credit Facilities (the "Steering Committee"), the members of which have been subject to confidentiality agreements and represent 40% of the loans under Cinram's First Lien Credit Facilities (the "Initial Consenting Lenders"). Cinram also anticipates further support of the Proposed Transaction from additional lenders under its credit facilities following the public announcement of the Proposed Transaction.

[11] Cinram Fund is the direct or indirect parent and sole shareholder of all of the subsidiaries in Cinram's corporate structure. A simplified corporate structure of the Cinram Group showing all of the CCAA Parties, including the designation of the CCAA Parties' business segments and certain non-filing entities, is set out in the Pre-Filing Report of FTI Consulting Inc. (the "Monitor") at paragraph 13. A copy is attached as Schedule "B".

[12] Cinram Fund, CII, Cinram International General Partner Inc. ("Cinram GP"), CII Trust, Cinram ULC and 1362806 Ontario Limited are the Canadian entities in the Cinram Group that are Applicants in these proceedings (collectively, the "Canadian Applicants"). Cinram Fund and CII Trust are both open-ended limited purpose trusts, established under the laws of Ontario, and each of the remaining Canadian Applicants is incorporated pursuant to Federal or Provincial legislation.

[13] Cinram (US) Holdings Inc. ("CUSH"), Cinram Inc., IHC Corporation ("IHC"), Cinram Manufacturing, LLC ("Cinram Manufacturing"), Cinram Distribution, LLC ("Cinram Distribution"), Cinram Wireless, LLC ("Cinram Wireless"), Cinram Retail Services, LLC ("Cinram Retail") and One K Studios, LLC ("One K") are the U.S. entities in the Cinram Group that are Applicants in these proceedings (collectively, the "U.S. Applicants"). Each of the U.S. Applicants is incorporated under the laws of Delaware, with the exception of One K, which is incorporated under the laws of California. On May 25, 2012, each of the U.S. Applicants opened a new Canadian-based bank account with J.P. Morgan.

[14] Cinram LP is not an Applicant in these proceedings. However, the Applicants seek to have a stay of proceedings and other relief under the CCAA extended to Cinram LP as it forms part of Cinram's income trust structure with Cinram Fund, the ultimate parent of the Cinram Group.

[15] Cinram's European entities are not part of these proceedings and it is not intended that any insolvency proceedings will be commenced with respect to Cinram's European entities, except for Cinram Optical Discs SAC, which has commenced insolvency proceedings in France.

[16] The Cinram Group's principal source of long-term debt is the senior secured credit facilities provided under credit agreements known as the "First-Lien Credit Agreement" and the "Second-Lien Credit Agreement" (together with the First-Lien Credit Agreement, the "Credit Agreements").

[17] All of the CCAA Parties, with the exception of Cinram Fund, Cinram GP, CII Trust and Cinram LP (collectively, the "Fund Entities"), are borrowers and/or guarantors under the Credit Agreements. The obligations under the Credit Agreements are secured by substantially all of the assets of the Applicants and certain of their European subsidiaries.

[18] As at March 31, 2012, there was approximately $233 million outstanding under the First-Lien Term Loan Facility; $19 million outstanding under the First-Lien Revolving Credit Facilities; approximately $12 million of letter of credit exposure under the First-Lien Credit Agreement; and approximately $12 million outstanding under the Second-Lien Credit Agreement.

[19] Cinram advises that in light of the financial circumstances of the Cinram Group, it is not possible to obtain additional financing that could be used to repay the amounts owing under the Credit Agreements.

[20] Mr. John Bell, Chief Financial Officer of CII, stated in his affidavit that in connection with certain defaults under the Credit Agreements, a series of waivers was extended from December 2011 to June 30, 2012 and that upon expiry of the waivers, the lenders have the ability to demand immediate repayment of the outstanding amounts under the Credit Agreements and the borrowers and the other Applicants that are guarantors under the Credit Agreements would be unable to meet their debt obligations. Mr. Bell further stated that there is no reasonable expectation that Cinram would be able to service its debt load in the short to medium term given forecasted net revenues and EBITDA for the remainder of fiscal 2012, fiscal 2013, and fiscal 2014. The cash flow forecast attached to his affidavit indicates that, without additional funding, the Applicants will exhaust their available cash resources and will thus be unable to meet their obligations as they become due.

[21] The Applicants request a stay of proceedings. They take the position that in light of their financial circumstances, there could be a vast and significant erosion of value to the detriment of all stakeholders. In particular, the Applicants are concerned about the following risks, which, because of the integration of the Cinram business, also apply to the Applicants' subsidiaries, including Cinram LP:

(a) the lenders demanding payment in full for money owing under the Credit Agreements;
(b) potential termination of contracts by key suppliers; and
(c) potential termination of contracts by customers.

[22] As indicated in the cash flow forecast, the Applicants do not have sufficient funds available to meet their immediate cash requirements as a result of their current liquidity challenges. Mr. Bell states in his affidavit that the Applicants require access to Debtor-In-Possession ("DIP") Financing in the amount of $15 millions to continue operations while they implement their restructuring, including the Proposed Transaction. Cinram has negotiated a DIP Credit Agreement with the lenders forming the Steering Committee (the "DIP Lenders") through J.P. Morgan Chase Bank, NA as Administrative Agent (the "DIP Agent") whereby the DIP Lenders agree to provide the DIP Financing in the form of a term loan in the amount of $15 million.

[23] The Applicants also indicate that during the course of the CCAA proceedings, the CCAA Parties intend to generally make payments to ensure their ongoing business operations for the benefit of their stakeholders, including obligations incurred prior to, on, or after the commencement of these proceedings relating to:

(a) the active employment of employees in the ordinary course;
(b) suppliers and service providers the CCAA Parties and the Monitor have determined to be critical to the continued operation of the Cinram business;
(c) certain customer programs in place pursuant to existing contracts or arrangements with customers; and
(d) inter-company payments among the CCAA Parties in respect of, among other things, shared services.

[24] Mr. Bell states that the ability to make these payments relating to critical suppliers and customer programs is subject to a consultation and approval process agreed to among the Monitor, the DIP Agent and the CCAA Parties.

[25] The Applicants also request an Administration Charge for the benefit of the Monitor and Moelis and Company, LLC ("Moelis"), an investment bank engaged to assist Cinram in a comprehensive and thorough review of its strategic alternatives.

[26] In addition, the directors (and in the case of Cinram Fund and CII Trust, the Trustees, referred to collectively with the directors as the "Directors/Trustees") requested a Director's Charge to provide certainty with respect to potential personal liability if they continue in their current capacities. Mr. Bell states that in order to complete a successful restructuring, including the Proposed Transaction, the Applicants require the active and committed involvement of their Directors/Trustees and officers. Further, Cinram's insurers have advised that if Cinram was to file for CCAA protection, and the insurers agreed to renew the existing D&O policies, there would be a significant increase in the premium for that insurance.

[27] Cinram has also developed a key employee retention program (the "KERP") with the principal purpose of providing an incentive for eligible employees, including eligible officers, to remain with the Cinram Group despite its financial difficulties. The KERP has been reviewed and approved by the Board of Trustees of the Cinram Fund. The KERP includes retention payments (the "KERP Retention Payments") to certain existing employees, including certain officers employed at Canadian and U.S. Entities, who are critical to the preservation of Cinram's enterprise value.

[28] Cinram also advises that on June 22, 2012, Cinram Fund, the borrowers under the Credit Agreements, and the Initial Consenting Lenders entered into a support agreement pursuant to which the Initial Consenting Lenders agreed to support the Proposed Transaction to be pursued through these CCAA proceedings (the "Support Agreement").

[29] Pursuant to the Support Agreement, lenders under the First-Lien Credit Agreement who execute the Support Agreement or Consent Agreement prior to July 10, 2012 (the "Consent Date") are entitled to receive consent consideration (the "Early Consent Consideration") equal to 4% of the principal amount of loans under the First-Lien Credit Agreement held by such consenting lenders as of the Consent Date, payable in cash from the net sale proceeds of the Proposed Transaction upon distribution of such proceeds in the CCAA proceedings.

[30] Mr. Bell states that it is contemplated that the CCAA proceedings will be the primary court-supervised restructuring of the CCAA Parties. He states that the CCAA Parties are part of a consolidated business in Canada, the United States and Europe that is headquartered in Canada and operationally and functionally integrated in many significant respects. Mr. Bell further states that although Cinram has operations in the United States, and certain of the Applicants are incorporated under the laws of the United States, it is Ontario that is Cinram's home jurisdiction and the nerve centre of the CCAA Parties' management, business and operations.

[31] The CCAA Parties have advised that they will be seeking a recognition order under Chapter 15 to ensure that they are protected from creditor actions in the United States and to assist with the global implementation of the Proposed Transaction. Thus, the Applicants seek authorization in the Proposed Initial Order for:

Cinram ULC to seek recognition of these proceedings as "foreign main proceedings" and to seek such additional relief required in connection with the prosecution of any sale transaction, including the Proposed Transaction, as well as authorization for the Monitor, as a court-appointed officer, to assist the CCAA Parties with any matters relating to any of the CCAA Parties' subsidiaries and any foreign proceedings commenced in relation thereto.

[32] Mr. Bell further states that the Monitor will be actively involved in assisting Cinram ULC as the foreign representative of the Applicants in the Chapter 15 proceedings and will assist in keeping this court informed of developments in the Chapter 15 proceedings.

[33] The facts relating to the CCAA Parties, the Cinram business, and the requested relief are fully set out in Mr. Bell's affidavit.

[34] Counsel to the Applicants filed a comprehensive factum in support of the requested relief in the Initial Order. Part III of the factum sets out the issues and the law.

[35] The relief requested in the form of the Initial Order is extensive. It goes beyond what this court usually considers on an initial hearing. However, in the circumstances of this case, I have been persuaded that the requested relief is appropriate.

[36] In making this determination, I have taken into account that the Applicants have spent a considerable period of time reviewing their alternatives and have done so in a consultative manner with their senior secured lenders. The senior secured lenders support this application, notwithstanding that it is clear that they will suffer a significant shortfall on their positions. It is also noted that the Early Consent Consideration will be available to lenders under the First-Lien Credit Agreement who execute the Support Agreement prior to July 10, 2012. Thus, all of these lenders will have the opportunity to participate in this arrangement.

[37] As previously indicated, the Applicants' factum is comprehensive. The submissions on the law are extensive and cover all of the outstanding issues. It provides a fulsome review of the jurisprudence in the area, which for purposes of this application, I accept. For this reason, paragraphs 41-96 of the factum are attached as Schedule "C" for reference purposes.

[38] The Applicants have also requested that the confidential supplement – which contains the KERP summary listing the individual KERP Payments and certain DIP Schedules – be sealed. I am satisfied that the KERP summary contains individually identifiable information and compensation information, including sensitive salary information, about the individuals who are covered by the KERP and that the DIP schedules contain sensitive competitive information of the CCAA Parties which should also be treated as being confidential. Having considered the principals of Sierra Club of Canada v. Canada (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 41 (CanLII), (2002) 2 S.C.R. 522, I accept the Applicants' submission on this issue and grant the requested sealing order in respect of the confidential supplement.

[39] Finally, the Applicants have advised that they intend to proceed with a Chapter 15 application on June 26, 2012 before the United States Bankruptcy Court in the District of Delaware. I am given to understand that Cinram ULC, as proposed foreign representative, will be seeking recognition of the CCAA proceedings as "foreign main proceedings" on the basis that Ontario, Canada is the Centre of Main Interest or "COMI" of the CCAA Applicants.

[40] In his affidavit at paragraph 195, Mr. Bell states that the CCAA Parties are part of a consolidated business that is headquartered in Canada and operationally and functionally integrated in many significant respects and that, as a result of the following factors, the Applicants submit the COMI of the CCAA Parties is Ontario, Canada:

(a) the Cinram Group is managed on a consolidated basis out of the corporate headquarters in Toronto, Ontario, where corporate-level decision-making and corporate administrative functions are centralized;

(b) key contracts, including, among others, major customer service agreements, are negotiated at the corporate level and created in Canada;

(c) the Chief Executive Officer and Chief Financial Officer of CII, who are also directors, trustees and/or officers of other entities in the Cinram Group, are based in Canada;

(d) meetings of the board of trustees and board of directors typically take place in Canada;

(e) pricing decisions for entities in the Cinram Group are ultimately made by the Chief Executive Officer and Chief Financial Officer in Toronto, Ontario;

(f) cash management functions for Cinram's North American entities, including the administration of Cinram's accounts receivable and accounts payable, are managed from Cinram's head office in Toronto, Ontario;

(g) although certain bookkeeping, invoicing and accounting functions are performed locally, corporate accounting, treasury, financial reporting, financial planning, tax planning and compliance, insurance procurement services and internal audits are managed at a consolidated level in Toronto, Ontario;

Digitized by Google

(h) information technology, marketing, and real estate services are provided by CII at the head office in Toronto, Ontario;
(i) with the exception of routine maintenance expenditures, all capital expenditure decisions affecting the Cinram Group are managed in Toronto, Ontario;
(j) new business development initiatives are centralized and managed from Toronto, Ontario; and
(k) research and development functions for the Cinram Group are corporate-level activities centralized at Toronto, Ontario, including the Cinram Group's corporate-level research and development budget and strategy.

[41] Counsel submits that the CCAA Parties are highly dependent upon the critical business functions performed on their behalf from Cinram's head office in Toronto and would not be able to function independently without significant disruptions to their operations.

[42] The above comments with respect to the COMI are provided for informational purposes only. This court clearly recognizes that it is the function of the receiving court – in this case, the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Delaware – to make the determination on the location of the COMI and to determine whether this CCAA proceeding is a "foreign main proceeding" for the purposes of Chapter 15.

[43] In the result, I am satisfied that the Applicants meet all of the qualifications established for relief under the CCAA and I have signed the Initial Order in the form submitted, which includes approvals of the Charges referenced in the Initial Order.

SCHEDULE "C"

A. THE APPLICANTS ARE "DEBTOR COMPANIES" TO WHICH THE CCAA APPLIES

41. The CCAA applies in respect of a "debtor company" (including a foreign company having assets or doing business in Canada) or "affiliated debtor companies" where the total of claims against such company or companies exceeds $5 million.

CCAA, Section 3(1).

42. The Applicants are eligible for protection under the CCAA because each is a "debtor company" and the total of the claims against the Applicants exceeds $5 million.

(1) The Applicants are Debtor Companies

43. The terms "company" and "debtor company" are defined in Section 2 of the CCAA as follows:

"company" means any company, corporation or legal person incorporated by or under an Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province and any incorporated company having assets or doing business in Canada, wherever incorporated, and any income trust, but does not include banks, authorized foreign banks within the meaning of section 2 of the Bank Act, railway or telegraph companies, insurance companies and companies to which the Trust and Loan Companies Act applies.

"debtor company" means any company that:

(a) is bankrupt or insolvent;

(b) has committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or is deemed insolvent within the meaning of the Winding-Up and Restructuring Act, whether or not proceedings in respect of the company have been taken under either of those Acts;

(c) has made an authorized assignment or against which a receiving order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act; or

(d) is in the course of being wound up under the Winding-Up and Restructuring Act because the company is insolvent.

CCAA, Section 2 ("company" and "debtor company").

44. The Applicants are debtor companies within the meaning of these definitions.

(2) The Applicants are "companies"

45. The Applicants are "companies" because:

a. with respect to the Canadian Applicants, each is incorporated pursuant to federal or provincial legislation or, in the case of Cinram Fund and CII Trust, is an income trust; and

b. with respect to the U.S. Applicants, each is an incorporated company with certain funds in bank accounts in Canada opened in May 2012 and therefore each is a company having assets or doing business in Canada.

Bell Affidavit at paras. 4, 80, 84, 86, 91, 94, 98, 102, 105, 108, 111, 114, 117, 120, 123, 212; Application Record, Tab 2.

46. The test for "having assets or doing business in Canada" is disjunctive, such that either "having assets" in Canada or "doing business in Canada" is sufficient to qualify an incorporated company as a "company" within the meaning of the CCAA.

47. Having only nominal assets in Canada, such as funds on deposit in a Canadian bank account, brings a foreign corporation within the definition of "company". In order to meet the threshold statutory requirements of the CCAA, an applicant need only be in technical compliance with the plain words of the CCAA.

Re Canwest Global Communications Corp. (2009), 59 C.B.R. (5th) 72 (Ont. Sup. Ct. J. [Commercial List]) at para. 30 [Canwest Global]; Book of Authorities of the Applicants ("Book of Authorities"), Tab 1.

48. The Courts do not engage in a quantitative or qualitative analysis of the assets or the circumstances in which the assets were created. Accordingly, the use of "instant" transactions immediately preceding a CCAA application, such as the creation of "instant debts" or "instant assets" for the purposes of bringing an entity within the scope of the CCAA, has received judicial approval as a legitimate device to bring a debtor within technical requirements of the CCAA.

Elan Corporation v. Comiskey (Trustee of) reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.) at paras. 74, 83; Book of Authorities, Tab 4.

(3) The Applicants are insolvent

49. The Applicants are "debtor companies" as defined in the CCAA because they are companies (as set out above) and they are insolvent.

Digitized by Google

50. The insolvency of the debtor is assessed as of the time of filing the CCAA application. The CCAA does not define insolvency. Accordingly, in interpreting the meaning of "insolvent", courts have taken guidance from the definition of "insolvent person" in Section 2(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the "BIA"), which defines an "insolvent person" as a person (i) who is not bankrupt; and (ii) who resides, carries on business or has property in Canada; (iii) whose liabilities to creditors provable as claims under the BIA amount to one thousand dollars; and (iv) who is "insolvent" under one of the following tests:

a. is for any reason unable to meet his obligations as they generally become due;

b. has ceased paying his current obligations in the ordinary course of business as they generally become due; or

c. the aggregate of his property is not, at a fair valuation, sufficient, or if disposed of at a fairly conducted sale under legal process, would not be sufficient to enable payment of all his obligations, due and accruing due.

BIA, Section 2 ("insolvent person").

51. These tests for insolvency are disjunctive. A company satisfying any one of these tests is considered insolvent for the purposes of the CCAA.

Stelco, supra at paras. 26 and 28; Book of Authorities, Tab 5.

52. A company is also insolvent for the purposes of the CCAA if, at the time of filing, there is a reasonably foreseeable expectation that there is a looming liquidity condition or crisis that would result in the company being unable to pay its debts as they generally become due if a stay of proceedings and ancillary protection are not granted by the court.

Stelco, supra at para. 40; Book of Authorities, Tab 5.

53. The Applicants meet both the traditional test for insolvency under the BIA and the expanded test for insolvency based on a looming liquidity condition as a result of the following:

a. The Applicants are unable to comply with certain financial covenants under the Credit Agreements and have entered into a series of waivers with their lenders from December 2011 to June 30, 2012.

b. Were the Lenders to accelerate the amounts owing under the Credit Agreements, the Borrowers and the other Applicants that are Guarantors under the Credit Agreements would be unable to meet their debt obligations. Cinram Fund would be the ultimate parent of an insolvent business.

d. The Applicants have been unable to repay or refinance the amounts owing under the Credit Agreements or find an out-of-court transaction for the sale of the Cinram Business with proceeds that equal or exceed the amounts owing under the Credit Agreements.

e. Reduced revenues and EBITDA and increased borrowing costs have significantly impaired Cinram's ability to service its debt obligations. There is no reasonable expectation that Cinram will be able to service its debt load in the short to medium term given forecasted net revenues and EBITDA for the remainder of fiscal 2012 and for fiscal 2013 and 2014.

f. The decline in revenues and EBITDA generated by the Cinram Business has caused the value of the Cinram Business to decline. As a result, the aggregate value of the Property, taken at fair value, is not sufficient to allow for payment of all of the Applicants' obligations due and accruing due.

g. The Cash Flow Forecast indicates that without additional funding the Applicants will exhaust their available cash resources and will thus be unable to meet their obligations as they become due.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 23, 179-181, 183, 197-199; Application Record, Tab 2.

(4) The Applicants are affiliated companies with claims outstanding in excess of $5 million

54. The Applicants are affiliated debtor companies with total claims exceeding 5 million dollars. Therefore, the CCAA applies to the Applicants in accordance with Section 3(1).

55. Affiliated companies are defined in Section 3(2) of the CCAA as follows:

a. companies are affiliated companies if one of them is the subsidiary of the other or both are subsidiaries of the same company or each is controlled by the same person; and

b. two companies are affiliated with the same company at the same time are deemed to be affiliated with each other.

CCAA, Section 3(2).

56. CII, CII Trust and all of the entities listed in Schedule "A" hereto are indirect, wholly owned subsidiaries of Cinram Fund; thus, the Applicants are "affiliated companies" for the purpose of the CCAA.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 3, 71; Application Record, Tab 2.

57. All of the CCAA Parties (except for the Fund Entities) are each a Borrower and/or Guarantor under the Credit Agreements. As at March 31, 2012 there was approximately $252 million of aggregate principal amount outstanding under the First Lien Credit Agreement (plus approximately $12 million in letter of credit exposure) and approximately $12 million of aggregate principal amount outstanding under the Second Lien Credit Agreement. The total claims against the Applicants far exceed $5 million.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 75; Application Record, Tab 2.

B. THE RELIEF IS AVAILABLE UNDER THE CCAA AND CONSISTENT WITH THE PURPOSE AND POLICY OF THE CCAA

(1) The CCAA is Flexible, Remedial Legislation

58. The CCAA is remedial legislation, intended to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors as an alternative to bankruptcy. In particular during periods of financial hardship, debtors turn to the Court so that the Court may apply the CCAA in a flexible manner in order to accomplish the statute's goals. The Court should give the CCAA a broad and liberal interpretation so as to encourage and facilitate successful restructurings whenever possible.

59. On numerous occasions, courts have held that Section 11 of the CCAA provides the courts with a broad and liberal power, which is at their disposal in order to achieve the overall objective of the CCAA. Accordingly, an interpretation of the CCAA that facilitates restructurings accords with its purpose.

60. Given the nature and purpose of the CCAA, this Honourable Court has the authority and jurisdiction to depart from the Model Order as is reasonable and necessary in order to achieve a successful restructuring.

(2) The Stay of Proceedings Against Non-Applicants is Appropriate

61. The relief sought in this application includes a stay of proceedings in favour of Cinram LP and the Applicants' direct and indirect subsidiaries that are also party to an agreement with an Applicant (whether as surety, guarantor or otherwise) (each, a "Subsidiary Counterparty"), including any contract or credit agreement. It is just and reasonable to grant the requested stay of proceedings because:

a. the Cinram Business is integrated among the Applicants, Cinram LP and the Subsidiary Counterparties;

b. if any proceedings were commenced against Cinram LP, or if any of the third parties to such agreements were to commence proceedings or exercise rights and remedies against the Subsidiary Counterparties, this would have a detrimental effect on the Applicants' ability to restructure and implement the Proposed Transaction and would lead to an erosion of value of the Cinram Business; and

c. a stay of proceedings that extends to Cinram LP and the Subsidiary Counterparties is necessary in order to maintain stability with respect to the Cinram Business and maintain value for the benefit of the Applicants' stakeholders.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 185-186; Application Record, Tab 2.

62. The purpose of the CCAA is to preserve the status quo to enable a plan of compromise to be prepared, filed and considered by the creditors:

In the interim, a judge has great discretion under the CCAA to make order so as to effectively maintain the status quo in respect of an insolvent company while it attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for the proposed compromise or arrangement which will be to the benefit of both the company and its creditors.

CCAA, Section 11.

63. The Court has broad inherent jurisdiction to impose stays of proceedings that supplement the statutory provisions of Section 11 of the CCAA, providing the Court with the power to grant a stay of proceedings where it is just and reasonable to do so, including with respect to non-applicant parties.

a. where it is important to the reorganization process;

Digitized by Google

b. where the business operations of the Applicants and the third party non-applicants are intertwined and the third parties are not subject to the jurisdiction of the CCAA, such as partnerships that do not qualify as "companies" within the meaning of the CCAA;
c. against non-applicant subsidiaries of a debtor company where such subsidiaries were guarantors under the note indentures issued by the debtor company; and
d. against non-applicant subsidiaries relating to any guarantee, contribution or indemnity obligation, liability or claim in respect of obligations and claims against the debtor companies.

65. The Applicants submit the balance of convenience favours extending the relief in the proposed Initial Order to Cinram LP and the Subsidiary Counterparties. The business operations of the Applicants, Cinram LP and the Subsidiary Counterparties are intertwined and the stay of proceedings is necessary to maintain stability and value for the benefit of the Applicants' stakeholders, as well as allow an orderly, going-concern sale of the Cinram Business as an important component of its reorganization process.
(3) Entitlement to Make Pre-Filing Payments
66. To ensure the continued operation of the CCAA Parties' business and maximization of value in the interests of Cinram's stakeholders, the Applicants seek authorization (but not a requirement) for the CCAA Parties to make certain pre-filing payments, including: (a) payments to employees in respect of wages, benefits, and related amounts; (b) payments to suppliers and service providers critical to the ongoing operation of the business; (c) payments and the application of credits in connection with certain existing customer programs; and (d) intercompany payments among the Applicants related to intercompany loans and shared services. Payments will be made with the consent of the Monitor and, in certain circumstances, with the consent of the Agent.
67. There is ample authority supporting the Court's general jurisdiction to permit payment of pre-filing obligations to persons whose services are critical to the ongoing operations of the debtor companies. This jurisdiction of the Court is not ousted by Section 11.4 of the CCAA, which became effective as part of the 2009 amendments to the CCAA and codified the Court's practice of declaring a person to be a critical supplier and granting a charge on the debtor's property in favour of such critical supplier. As noted by Pepall J. in Re Canwest Global, the recent amendments, including Section 11.4, do not detract from the inherently flexible nature of the CCAA or the Court's broad and inherent jurisdiction to make such orders that will facilitate the debtor's restructuring of its business as a going concern.
Canwest Global supra, at paras. 41 and 43; Book of Authorities, Tab 1.
68. There are many cases since the 2009 amendments where the Courts have authorized the applicants to pay certain pre-filing amounts where the applicants were not seeking a charge in respect of critical suppliers. In granting this authority, the Courts considered a number of factors, including:
a. whether the goods and services were integral to the business of the applicants;
b. the applicants' dependency on the uninterrupted supply of the goods or services;
c. the fact that no payments would be made without the consent of the Monitor;
d. the Monitor's support and willingness to work with the applicants to ensure that payments to suppliers in respect of pre-filing liabilities are minimized;
e. whether the applicants had sufficient inventory of the goods on hand to meet their needs; and
f. the effect on the debtors' ongoing operations and ability to restructure if they were unable to make pre-filing payments to their critical suppliers.

69. The CCAA Parties rely on the efficient and expedited supply of products and services from their suppliers and service providers in order to ensure that their operations continue in an efficient manner so that they can satisfy customer requirements. The CCAA Parties operate in a highly competitive environment where the timely provision of their products and services is essential in order for the company to remain a successful player in the industry and to ensure the continuance of the Cinram Business. The CCAA Parties require flexibility to ensure adequate and timely supply of required products and to attempt to obtain and negotiate credit terms with its suppliers and service providers. In order to accomplish this, the CCAA Parties require the ability to pay certain pre-filing amounts and post-filing payables to those suppliers they consider essential to the Cinram Business, as approved by the Monitor. The Monitor, in determining whether to approve pre-filing payments as critical to the ongoing business operations, will consider various factors, including the above factors derived from the caselaw.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 226, 228, 230; Application Record, Tab 2.
70. In addition, the CCAA Parties' continued compliance with their existing customer programs, as described in the Bell Affidavit, including the payment of certain pre-filing amounts owing under certain customer programs and the application of certain credits granted to customers pre-filing to post-filing receivables, is essential in order for the CCAA Parties to maintain their customer relationships as part of the CCAA Parties' going concern business.
Bell Affidavit, paras. 234; Application Record, Tab 2.
71. Further, due to the operational integration of the businesses of the CCAA Parties, as described above, there is a significant volume of financial transactions between and among the Applicants, including, among others, charges by an Applicant providing shared services to another Applicant of intercompany accounts due from the recipients of those services, and charges by a Applicant that manufactures and furnishes products to another Applicant of inter-company accounts due from the receiving entity.
Bell Affidavit, paras. 225; Application Record, Tab 2.
72. Accordingly, the Applicants submit that it is appropriate in the present circumstances for this Honourable Court to exercise its jurisdiction and grant the CCAA Parties the authority to make the pre-filing payments described in the proposed Initial Order subject to the terms therein.
(4) The Charges Are Appropriate
73. The Applicants seek approval of certain Court-ordered charges over their assets relating to their DIP Financing (defined below), administrative costs, indemnification of their trustees, directors and officers, KERP and Support Agreement. The Lenders and the Administrative Agent under the Credit Agreements, the senior secured facilities that will be primed by the charges, have been provided with notice of the within Application. The proposed Initial Order does not purport to give the Court-ordered charges priority over any other validly perfected security interests.
(A) DIP Lenders' Charge
74. In the proposed Initial Order, the Applicants seek approval of the DIP Credit Agreement providing a debtor-in-possession term facility in the principal amount of $15 million (the "DIP Financing"), to be secured by a charge over all of the assets and property of the Applicants that are Borrowers and/or Guarantors under the Credit Agreements (the "Charged Property") ranking ahead of all other charges except the Administration Charge.
75. Section 11.2 of the CCAA expressly provides the Court the statutory jurisdiction to grant a debtor-in-possession ("DIP") financing charge:
11.2(1) Interim financing - On application by a debtor company and on notice to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the security or charge, a court may make an order declaring that all or part of the company's property is subject to a security or charge — in an amount that the court considers appropriate — in favour of a person specified in the order who agrees to lend to the company an amount approved by the court as being required by the company, having regard to its cash-flow statement. The security or charge may not secure an obligation that exists before the order is made.
11.2(2) Priority – secured creditors – The court may order that the security or charge rank in priority over the claim of any secured creditor of the company.
Re Timminco Ltd. (2012), 211 A.C.W.S. (3d) 881(Ont. Sup. Ct. J. [Commercial List]) at para. 31; Book of Authorities, Tab 15. CCAA, Section 11.2(1) and (2).
76. Section 11.2 of the CCAA sets out the following factors to be considered by the Court in deciding whether to grant a DIP financing charge:
11.2(4) Factors to be considered – In deciding whether to make an order, the court is to consider, among other things,
(a) the period during which the company is expected to be subject to proceedings under this Act;
(b) how the company's business and financial affairs are to be managed during the proceedings;
(c) whether the company's management has the confidence of its major creditors;
(d) whether the loan would enhance the prospects of a viable compromise or arrangement being made in respect of the company;
(e) the nature and value of the company's property;
(f) whether any creditor would be materially prejudiced as a result of the security or charge; and
(g) the monitor's report referred to in paragraph 23(1)(b), if any.
CCAA, Section 11.2(4).

Digitized by Google

77. The above list of factors is not exhaustive, and it may be appropriate for the Court to consider additional factors in determining whether to grant a DIP financing charge. For example, in circumstances where funds to be borrowed pursuant to a DIP facility were not expected to be immediately necessary, but applicants' cash flow statements projected the need for additional liquidity, the Court in granting the requested DIP charge considered the fact that the applicants' ability to borrows funds that would be secured by a charge would help retain the confidence of their trade creditors, employees and suppliers.

78. Courts in recent cross-border cases have exercised their broad power to grant charges to DIP lenders over the assets of foreign applicants. In many of these cases, the debtors have commenced recognition proceedings under Chapter 15.

79. As noted above, pursuant to Section 11.2(1) of the CCAA, a DIP financing charge may not secure an obligation that existed before the order was made. The requested DIP Lenders' Charge will not secure any pre-filing obligations.

80. The following factors support the granting of the DIP Lenders' Charge, many of which incorporate the considerations enumerated in Section 11.2(4) listed above:

a. the Cash Flow Forecast indicates the Applicants will need additional liquidity afforded by the DIP Financing in order to continue operations through the duration of these proposed CCAA Proceedings;

b. the Cinram Business is intended to continue to operate on a going concern basis during these CCAA Proceedings under the direction of the current management with the assistance of the Applicants' advisors and the Monitor;

c. the DIP Financing is expected to provide the Applicants with sufficient liquidity to implement the Proposed Transaction through these CCAA Proceedings and implement certain operational restructuring initiatives, which will materially enhance the likelihood of a going concern outcome for the Cinram Business;

d. the nature and the value of the Applicants' assets as set out in their consolidated financial statements can support the requested DIP Lenders' Charge;

e. members of the Steering Committee under the First Lien Credit Agreement, who are senior secured creditors of the Applicants, have agreed to provide the DIP Financing;

f. the proposed DIP Lenders have indicated that they will not provide the DIP Financing if the DIP Lenders' Charge is not approved;

g. the DIP Lenders' Charge will not secure any pre-filing obligations;

h. the senior secured lenders under the Credit Agreements affected by the charge have been provided with notice of these CCAA Proceedings; and

i. the proposed Monitor is supportive of the DIP Facility, including the DIP Lenders' Charge.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 199-202, 205-208; Application Record, Tab 2.

(B) Administration Charge

81. The Applicants seek a charge over the Charged Property in the amount of CAD$3.5 million to secure the fees of the Monitor and its counsel, the Applicants' Canadian and U.S. counsel, the Applicants' Investment Banker, the Canadian and U.S. Counsel to the DIP Agent, the DIP Lenders, the Administrative Agent and the Lenders under the Credit Agreements, and the financial advisor to the DIP Lenders and the Lenders under the Credit Agreements (the "Administration Charge"). This charge is to rank in priority to all of the other charges set out in the proposed Initial Order.

82. Prior to the 2009 amendments, administration charges were granted pursuant to the inherent jurisdiction of the Court. Section 11.52 of the CCAA now expressly provides the court with the jurisdiction to grant an administration charge:

11.52(1) Court may order security or charge to cover certain costs

On notice to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the security or charge, the court may make an order declaring that all or part of the property of a debtor company is subject to a security or charge -- in an amount that the court considers appropriate – in respect of the fees and expenses of

(a) the monitor, including the fees and expenses of any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the monitor in the performance of the monitor's duties;

(b) any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the company for the purpose of proceedings under this Act; and

(c) any financial, legal or other experts engaged by any other interested person if the court is satisfied that the security or charge is necessary for their effective participation in proceedings under this Act.

84. In Canwest Publishing, the Court noted Section 11.52 does not contain any specific criteria for a court to consider in granting an administration charge and provided a list of non-exhaustive factors to consider in making such an assessment. These factors were also considered by the Court in Timminco. The list of factors to consider in approving an administration charge include:

a. the size and complexity of the business being restructured;
b. the proposed role of the beneficiaries of the charge;
c. whether there is unwarranted duplication of roles;
d. whether the quantum of the proposed charge appears to be fair and reasonable;
e. the position of the secured creditors likely to be affected by the charge; and
f. the position of the Monitor.

Canwest Publishing supra, at para. 54; Book of Authorities, Tab 16.

85. The Applicants submit that the Administration Charge is warranted and necessary, and that it is appropriate in the present circumstances for this Honourable Court to exercise its jurisdiction and grant the Administration Charge, given:

a. the proposed restructuring of the Cinram Business is large and complex, spanning several jurisdictions across North America and Europe, and will require the extensive involvement of professional advisors;
b. the professionals that are to be beneficiaries of the Administration Charge have each played a critical role in the CCAA Parties' restructuring efforts to date and will continue to be pivotal to the CCAA Parties' ability to pursue a successful restructuring going forward, including the Investment Banker's involvement in the completion of the Proposed Transaction;
c. there is no unwarranted duplication of roles;
d. the senior secured creditors affected by the charge have been provided with notice of these CCAA Proceedings; and
e. the Monitor is in support of the proposed Administration Charge.

Bell Affidavit, paras. 188, 190; Application Record, Tab 2.

(C) Directors' Charge

86. The Applicants seek a Directors' Charge in an amount of CAD$13 over the Charged Property to secure their respective indemnification obligations for liabilities imposed on the Applicants' trustees, directors and officers (the "Directors and Officers"). The Directors' Charge is to be subordinate to the Administration Charge and the DIP Lenders' Charge but in priority to the KERP Charge and the Consent Consideration Charge.

87. Section 11.51 of the CCAA affords the Court the jurisdiction to grant a charge relating to directors' and officers' indemnification on a priority basis:

11.51(1) Security or charge relating to director's indemnification

On application by a debtor company and on notice to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the security or charge -- in an amount that the court considers appropriate -- in favour of any director or officer of the company to indemnify the director or officer against obligations and liabilities that they may incur as a director or officer of the company after the commencement of proceedings under this Act.

11.51(2) Priority

The court may order that the security or charge rank in priority over the claim of any secured creditors of the company

11.51(3) Restriction -- indemnification insurance

The court may not make the order if in its opinion the company could obtain adequate indemnification insurance for the director or officer at a reasonable cost.

11.51(4) Negligence, misconduct or fault

Digitized by Google

The court shall make an order declaring that the security or charge does not apply in respect of a specific obligation or liability incurred by a director or officer if in its opinion the obligation or liability was incurred as a result of the director's or officer's gross negligence or wilful misconduct or, in Quebec, the director's or officer's gross or intentional fault.
CCAA, Section 11.51.
88. The Court has granted director and officer charges pursuant to Section 11.51 in a number of cases. In Canwest Global, the Court outlined the test for granting such a charge:
I have already addressed the issue of notice to affected secured creditors. I must also be satisfied with the amount and that the charge is for obligations and liabilities the directors and officers may incur after the commencement of proceedings. It is not to extend to coverage of wilful misconduct or gross negligence and no order should be granted if adequate insurance at a reasonable cost could be obtained.

89. The Applicants submit that the D&O Charge is warranted and necessary, and that it is appropriate in the present circumstances for this Honourable Court to exercise its jurisdiction and grant the D&O Charge in the amount of CAD$13 million, given:
a. the Directors and Officers of the Applicants may be subject to potential liabilities in connection with these CCAA proceedings with respect to which the Directors and Officers have expressed their desire for certainty with respect to potential personal liability if they continue in their current capacities;
b. renewal of coverage to protect the Directors and Officers is at a significantly increased cost due to the imminent commencement of these CCAA proceedings;
c. the Directors' Charge would cover obligations and liabilities that the Directors and Officers, as applicable, may incur after the commencement of these CCAA Proceedings and is not intended to cover wilful misconduct or gross negligence;
d. the Applicants require the continued support and involvement of their Directors and Officers who have been instrumental in the restructuring efforts of the CCAA Parties to date;
e. the senior secured creditors affected by the charge have been provided with notice of these CCAA proceedings; and
f. the Monitor is in support of the proposed Directors' Charge.

(D) KERP Charge
90. The Applicants seek a KERP Charge in an amount of CAD$3 million over the Charged Property to secure the KERP Retention Payments, KERP Transaction Payments and Aurora KERP Payments payable to certain key employees of the CCAA Parties crucial for the CCAA Parties' successful restructuring.
91. The CCAA is silent with respect to the granting of KERP charges. Approval of a KERP and a KERP charge are matters within the discretion of the Court. The Court in Re Grant Forest Products Inc. considered a number of factors in determining whether to grant a KERP and a KERP charge, including:
a. whether the Monitor supports the KERP agreement and charge (to which great weight was attributed);
b. whether the employees to which the KERP applies would consider other employment options if the KERP agreement were not secured by the KERP charge;
c. whether the continued employment of the employees to which the KERP applies is important for the stability of the business and to enhance the effectiveness of the marketing process;
d. the employees' history with and knowledge of the debtor;
e. the difficulty in finding a replacement to fulfill the responsibilities of the employees to which the KERP applies;
f. whether the KERP agreement and charge were approved by the board of directors, including the independent directors, as the business judgment of the board should not be ignored;
g. whether the KERP agreement and charge are supported or consented to by secured creditors of the debtor; and
h. whether the payments under the KERP are payable upon the completion of the restructuring process.

92. The purpose of a KERP arrangement is to retain key personnel for the duration of the debtor's restructuring process and it is logical for compensation under a KERP arrangement to be deferred until after the restructuring process has been completed, with "staged bonuses" being acceptable. KERP arrangements that do not defer retention payments to completion of the restructuring may also be just and fair in the circumstances.

93. The Applicants submit that the KERP Charge is warranted and necessary, and that it is appropriate in the present circumstances for this Honourable Court to exercise its jurisdiction and grant the KERP Charge in the amount of CAD$3 million, given:
a. the KERP was developed by Cinram with the principal purpose of providing an incentive to the Eligible Employees, the Eligible Officers, and the Aurora Employees to remain with the Cinram Group while the company pursued its restructuring efforts;
b. the Eligible Employees and the Eligible Officers are essential for a restructuring of the Cinram Group and the preservation of Cinram's value during the restructuring process;
c. the Aurora Employees are essential for an orderly transition of Cinram Distribution's business operations from the Aurora facility to its Nashville facility;
d. it would be detrimental to the restructuring process if Cinram were required to find replacements for the Eligible Employees, the Eligible Officers and/or the Aurora Employees during this critical period;
e. the KERP, including the KERP Retention Payments, the KERP Transaction Payments and the Aurora KERP Payments payable thereunder, not only provides appropriate incentives for the Eligible Employees, the Eligible Officers and the Aurora Employees to remain in their current positions, but also ensures that they are properly compensated for their assistance in Cinram's restructuring process;
f. the senior secured creditors affected by the charge have been provided with notice of these CCAA proceedings; and
g. the KERP has been reviewed and approved by the board of trustees of Cinram Fund and is supported by the Monitor.
Bell Affidavit, paras. 236-239, 245-247; Application Record, Tab 2.
(E) Consent Consideration Charge
94. The Applicants request the Consent Consideration Charge over the Charged Property to secure the Early Consent Consideration. The Consent Consideration Charge is to be subordinate in priority to the Administration Charge, the DIP Lenders' Charge, the Directors' Charge and the KERP Charge.
95. The Courts have permitted the opportunity to receive consideration for early consent to a restructuring transaction in the context of CCAA proceedings payable upon implementation of such restructuring transaction. In Sino-Forest, the Court ordered that any noteholder wishing to become a consenting noteholder under the support agreement and entitled to early consent consideration was required to execute a joinder agreement to the support agreement prior to the applicable consent deadline. Similarly, in these proceedings, lenders under the First Lien Credit Agreement who execute the Support Agreement (or a joinder thereto) and thereby agree to support the Proposed Transaction on or before July 10, 2012, are entitled to Early Consent Consideration earned on consummation of the Proposed Transaction to be paid from the net sale proceeds.
Sino-Forest, supra, Initial Order granted on March 30, 2012, Court File No. CV-12-9667-00CL at para. 15; Book of Authorities, Tab 23. Bell Affidavit, para. 176; Application Record, Tab 2.
96. The Applicants submit it is appropriate in the present circumstances for this Honourable Court to exercise its jurisdiction and grant the Consent Consideration Charge, given:
a. the Proposed Transaction will enable the Cinram Business to continue as a going concern and return to a market leader in the industry;
b. Consenting Lenders are only entitled to the Early Consent Consideration if the Proposed Transaction is consummated; and
c. the Early Consent Consideration is to be paid from the net sale proceeds upon distribution of same in these proceedings.

Court of Appeal
Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Ins. Co. of Can.
Date: 1989-01-05

F.H. Herbert and N. Kambas, for appellant Excelsior Life Insurance Company of Canada and appellant National Life Assurance Company of Canada.
A.P. Czepil, for appellant Guardian.
H.C.R. Clark and R.D. Ellis, for respondent companies.
G.W. Ghikas and C.S. Bird, for respondent Bank of Montreal.
(Vancouver Nos. CA010238; CA010198; CA010271)
January 5, 1989. Excerpt from the transcript.

[1] MCEACHERN C.J.B.C.: We are giving an oral judgment this morning because of the commercial urgency of these appeals and because counsel's helpful arguments have narrowed the issues substantially. We are indebted to counsel for their useful submissions.

[2] The petitioners (respondents on these appeals) are a number of companies (which I shall call "the companies") who have outstanding issues of secured bonds and are all engaged in real estate investment and development in Western North America and who collectively own and operate a number of office buildings and the Sandman Inn chain of hotels and motels. The appellants, Excelsior Life and National Life and Guardian Trust, are creditors of the petitioners who hold mortgages over specific properties owned by certain of the companies. They, along with eleven other lenders, are called "priority mortgagees".

[3] The companies ran into financial problems starting in 1981 and by spring of 1988, the companies owed approximately $200 million against assets of $100 million. The major creditor, the Bank of Montreal (which I shall sometimes call "the bank"), was owed approximately $117 million by the companies and the bank authorized the commencement of a receivership action. The bank holds security in all of the assets of the companies by way of trust deeds and bonds ranking second in priority to the security held by the priority mortgagees. Before decision in the receivership proceedings, the companies petitioned under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-25 [now R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36] (which I shall sometimes refer to as "C.C.A.A.") for an order directing meetings of the secured and unsecured creditors to consider a proposed compromise or arrangement plan.

[4] Mr. Justice Trainor, on 7th April 1988, granted the petition authorizing the companies to file a reorganization plan with the court, and that in the meantime, the companies would continue to carry on business and remain in possession of their undertaking, property and assets. Further, all proceedings against the companies were stayed. The original reorganization plan was filed on 25th August 1988. It provided that each priority mortgagee holding security over the property of the individual petitioners would constitute a separate class.

[5] The petitioners obtained an order to hold a creditors' meeting on 31st October 1988 and 1st November 1988. The order provided that in addition to meetings of individual classes of creditors, there should be a later general meeting of all creditors to consider the plan. In addition, the petitioners obtained an order to file and serve the amended plan seven days before the creditors' meeting along with their information circular. Other applications were brought which dealt with notices, proxies, proof of claim forms, exchange rates and directions for the calling of meetings.

[6] The amended plan was based on the following classes of creditors (descriptions of which are contained in the reasons for judgment of Trainor J. at pp. 6-7) namely:

- shareholder creditors
- A bondholders
- PUT debt claimants and C bondholders

Digitized by Google

- priority mortgagees
- government creditors
- property tax creditors
- general creditors

[7] The amended plan also proposed consolidation of all the petitioner companies. The amended plan provided that all priority mortgagees would be grouped into one class for voting purposes. There were fifteen priority mortgagees in total, eleven of which were fully secured while the remaining four (including the appellants) faced deficiencies. The amended plan also authorized the companies to negotiate with creditors in order, if possible, to reach as much agreement as possible so that the plan would have a better chance of gaining the requisite majorities.

[8] The companies and the Bank of Montreal reached a settlement agreement on 20th October 1988, dealing with (a) the amounts owing to the bank by the companies; (b) claims by the companies and others against the bank in relation to a lender liability lawsuit; and (c) the terms of a compromise between the bank and the companies. The Bank of Montreal, according to the information circular, would only realize $32,859,005 upon liquidation. The settlement agreement between the Bank of Montreal and the companies, which is incorporated as part of the plan, provides that as of 17th January 1989, the bank is to receive the sum of $41,650,000 in either cash or in cash plus properties. A copy of this agreement was provided to creditors, along with such other documents including a notice of the meetings, the reorganization plan, and an extensive information circular.

[9] The class meetings and the general meetings of creditors were held in Vancouver on 31st October and 1st November 1988. All classes of creditors voted unanimously in favour of the plan except the priority mortgagee class. This class approved the plan by the requisite majority pursuant to the provisions of the C.C.A.A., that is, a simple majority of creditors in the class holding at least 75 per cent of the debt voting in favour of the plan. 73.3 per cent of the priority mortgagees holding 78.35 per cent of the debt voted in favour of the plan.

[10] Relax Development Corporation Ltd., a priority mortgagee facing a deficiency, voted in favour of the plan. If Relax had not voted in favour of the plan, the companies would not have obtained the requisite majority from the priority mortgagee class. Prior to the settlement with the bank, Relax struck an agreement with the companies on the value of its security amounting to about $900,000 over an appraisal value which was in dispute. Relax agreed in the settlement to vote in favour of the plan. More about that later.

[11] The appellants on these appeals voted against the plan, and raised objections that the plan improperly put all priority mortgagees into one class, and also that the plan preferred some creditors over others. They allege that the net effect of the plan on the fully secured priority mortgagees is different than that on the mortgagees facing deficiencies, in that the plan reduces the amount of debt owed to the mortgagees facing deficiencies to the market value of the subject property of their respective security, and required assignment of the deficiency for $1. They lose the right to obtain an order absolute of foreclosure pursuant to their security. On the other hand, the fully secured priority mortgagees recover the entire amount of their indebtedness.

[12] The appellants Excelsior and National are secured creditors of the petitioner, Northland Properties Ltd., one of the companies. They hold a first mortgage jointly over an office tower in Calgary adjacent to the Calgary Sandman Inn. Both buildings share common facilities. The principle amount of the debt owing to Excelsior and National as of 26th October 1988, is $15,874,533 plus interest of $311,901. The market value of the office tower as of 13th May 1988 was stated to be $11,675,000. They, therefore, face a potential deficiency of $4,512,434.

[13] Guardian Trust is a secured creditor of the petitioner, Unity Investment Company Limited, and holds a first mortgage over a small office building in Nelson, British Columbia. The amount owing to Guardian is $409,198.46 and the estimated deficiency is approximately $150,000 exclusive of transaction costs.

[14] Mr. Justice Trainor, on 12th December 1988, found that the companies had complied with the provisions of the C.C.A.A., and, therefore, the court could exercise its discretion and sanction the reorganization plan. Excelsior and National and Guardian appeal against that decision.

[15] Mr. Justice Trainor had the carriage of this matter almost from the beginning and he heard several preliminary applications. In a careful and thorough judgment, he set out the facts distinctly, reviewed the authorities and approved the plan. I do not propose to review the authorities again because they are extensively quoted in nearly every judgment on this subject. It will be sufficient to say that they include Re Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; A.G. of Can. v. A.G. Que., 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 659, [1934] 4 D.L.R. 75; *Meridian Dev. [16] The authorities do not permit any doubt about the principles to be applied in a case such as this. They are set out over and over again in many decided cases and may be summarized as follows:

(1) There must be strict compliance with all statutory requirements (it was not suggested in this case that the statutory requirements had not been satisfied);

(2) All material filed and procedures carried out must be examined to determine if anything has been done which is not authorized by the C.C.A.A.;

(3) The plan must be fair and reasonable.

[17] Similarly, there can be no doubt about the purpose of the C.C.A.A. It is to enable compromises to be made for the common benefit of the creditors and of the company, particularly to keep a company in financial difficulties alive and out of the hands of liquidators. To make the Act workable, it is often necessary to permit a requisite majority of each class to bind the minority to the terms of the plan, but the plan must be fair and reasonable.

[18] There were really four issues argued on this appeal but, as is so often the case, there is some overlapping. I shall attempt to deal with them individually.

[19] First it was alleged, principally by Mr. Czepil, that the Act does not authorize a plan whereby the creditors of other companies can vote on the question of whether the creditors of another company may compromise his claim. He called this the cross-company issue.

[20] This argument arises out of the particular facts that Mr. Czepil's client found itself in where it had a first mortgage, that is, Guardian had a first mortgage on a building owned by Unity which was the only asset of Unity, and he says the C.C.A.A. does not permit creditors of other companies to vote on the disposition of Guardian's security. I think there would be considerable merit in this submission except for the fact that the plan contemplates the consolidation of all the petitioner companies and the applications are made in this case not just under the C.C.A.A., but also under ss. 276-78 of the British Columbia Company Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 59. In this respect, it is necessary to mention s. 20 of the C.C.A.A. which provides:

> 20. The provisions of this Act may be applied conjointly with the provisions of any Act of Canada or of any province, authorizing or making provision for the sanction of compromises or arrangements between a company and its shareholders or any class of them.

[21] During the argument of these appeals, we were treated to a review of the history of this matter in the court below. In reasons for judgment dated 5th July 1988 [now reported Re Northland Properties Ltd. 1988 CanLII 2924 (BC SC), (1988), 29 B.C.L.R. (2d) 257, 69 C.B.R. (N.S.) 266], Mr. Justice Trainor recited that he had been asked by some of the parties to approve a consolidation plan, but he declined to do so as the plan was not then before him in final form. It is implicit that Trainor J. thought he had authority to approve a consolidation plan and he referred to American authorities particularly, Re Baker & Getty Fin. Services Inc., 78 B.R. 139 (U.S. Bankruptcy Ct., N.D. Ohio, 1987), and in Re Snider Bros., 18 B.R. 320 (U.S. Bankruptcy Ct., D. Mass., 1982), and he said that he accepted the analysis of Snider, which proposes the test between economic prejudice of continued debtor separateness versus the economic prejudice of consolidation, and holds that consolidation is preferable if its economic prejudice is less than separateness prejudice.

[22] I think Mr. Justice Trainor was right for the reasons described in the American authorities and because to hold otherwise would be to deny much meaning to s. 20 of the C.C.A.A. and would mean that when a group of companies operated conjointly, as these companies did (all were liable on the Bank of Montreal bonds), it would be necessary to propose separate plans for each company and those plans might become fragmented seriously.

[23] I am satisfied there is jurisdiction to entertain a consolidation proposal.

[24] Secondly, it was agreed that the composition of the class of priority creditors was unfair by reason of including all priority mortgagees without regard to the fact that some of them faced a deficiency and some did not. The appellants were each in the latter difficulty and they argue that they should have been placed in a different class because the other 11 priority mortgagees were going to get paid in full whether the plan was approved or not. This argument would have more merit if the plan were only for the benefit of the undersecured priority mortgagee. But the plan was also for the benefit of the company and the other creditors who, by their votes, indicted that they thought the plan was in their best interest. The learned chambers judge considered this question carefully. At p. 25 of his reasons he said this:

> An examination of the relationship between the companies and the priority mortgagees satisfies me that they are properly in the same class. The points of similarity are:
> 1. The nature of the debt is the same, that is, money advanced as a loan.
> 2. It is a corporate loan by a sophisticated lender who is in the business and aware of the gains and risks possible.

Digitized by Google

3. The nature of the security is that it is a first mortgage.
4. The remedies are the same - foreclosure proceedings, receivership.
5. The result of no reorganization plan would be that the lender would achieve no more than the value of the property, less the costs of carrying until disposal, plus the legal costs as well would come out of that. A possible exception would be if an order absolute left the creditor in the position of holding property for a hoped-for appreciation in value.
6. Treatment of creditors is the same. The term varied to five years, the interest rates 12 per cent or less, and the amount varied to what they would get on a receivership with no loss for costs; that is, it would be somewhat equivalent to the same treatment afforded to the Bank of Montreal under the settlement agreement.
The points of dissimilarity are that they are separate priorities and that there are deficiencies in value of security for the loan, which vary accordingly for particular priority mortgagees. Specifically with respect to Guardian and Excelsior, they are both in a deficiency position.
Now, either of the reasons for points of dissimilarity, if effect was given to them, could result in fragmentation to the extent that a plan would be a realistic impossibility. The distinction which is sought is based on property values, not on contractual rights or legal interests.

[25] I agree with that, but I wish to add that in any complicated plan under this Act, there will often be some secured creditors who appear to be oversecured, some who do not know if they are fully secured or not, and some who appear not to be fully secured. This is a variable cause arising not by any difference in legal interests, but rather as a consequence of bad lending, or market values, or both.

[27] Thirdly, I pause to mention that it was not suggested that the arrangement with the Bank of Montreal constituted a preference. It was argued, however, that the entire plan was tainted by the agreement made by the companies with Relax. Apparently, there was an appraisal showing a value of its security at $3.7 million while other evidence suggests a value of between $4.5 million to $4.6 million. The amount owing to Relax on its mortgage was $6 million.

[28] Early in the history of this matter before the plan was finalized, and before the companies struck their crucial arrangement with the Bank of Montreal, the companies and Relax agreed to a future cash payment of $500,000 and a valuation of $4 million for the Relax property which could, in total, amount to a preference of up to $900,000 to Relax and that company, in consideration of that compromise, agreed to vote for the plan.

[29] It should be mentioned that the plan, from its inception, ensured to the priority mortgagees the full market value of their security to be determined either by agreement, appraisal, or, if necessary, arbitration. Thus, the appellants do not stand to lose anything by the agreement made with Relax. It is the bank which carried the burden of that expense.

[30] There is no doubt that side deals are a dangerous game and any arrangement made with just one creditor endangers the appearance of the bona fides of a plan of this kind and any debtor who undertakes such a burden does so at considerable risk. In this case, however, it is apparent that this agreement was not made for the purpose of ensuring a favourable vote because at the time the deal was struck the companies had not reached an accommodation arrangement with the bank. I think the companies were negotiating, as businessmen do, on values for the purpose of putting a plan together.

[31] Further the arrangement with Relax was fully disclosed in the plan. This does not ensure its full absolution if it was improper, but at least it removes any coloration of an underhanded or secret deal. In fact, there were also negotiations between the companies and the appellants but nothing came of those discussions.

[32] After referring to the fact that the plan anticipated and permitted negotiations about values and other matters, the learned chambers judge said this at pp. 28 and 29 of his reasons:

> The negotiations might, on the surface, appear to have been in the nature of an excessive payment to Relax for the consideration in their agreement, which agreement, incidentally, included an undertaking to vote in favour of the plan. But the answer given by the companies is that what in effect was happening at that meeting was a negotiation as to the agreed price and that this negotiation took place earlier rather than later and that the parties in fact came to an accord with respect to the agreed price and that the settlement between them was on that basis.
> If that is so, it is something which took place in accordance with what is proposed by the reorganization plan. I have reviewed and reread a number of times the submissions by the companies and particularly by counsel on behalf of Guardian and Excelsior. I am satisfied that I should accept the explanation as to what took place, which has been advanced on behalf of the companies.

Digitized by Google

[33] In the circumstances of this case, I would not disagree with the learned chambers judge in that connection.

[34] Lastly, it remains to be considered whether the plan is fair and reasonable. I wish to refer to three matters.

[35] First, the authorities warn us against second-guessing businessmen (see Re Alabama, supra, at p. 244). In this case, the companies and their advisors, the bank and its advisors, and all the creditors except the two appellants, voted for the plan. As the authorities say, we should not be astute in finding technical arguments to overcome the decision of such a majority.

[36] Secondly, I wish to mention Mr. Czepil's argument that the plan was unfair, perhaps not conceptually. but operationally by authorizing negotiations. He says this put the parties in a difficult position when it came to vote because they risked retribution if they failed to reach agreement and then voted against the plan. He complains that some benefits offered in negotiations are no longer available to his clients.

[37] With respect, negotiations between businessmen are much to be desired and I would not wish to say anything that would impede that salutory process. If negotiations lead to unfairness, then other considerations, of course, arise. But that, in my view, is not this case.

[38] Thirdly, the plan assures all the priority mortgagees the full market value of their security without liquidation expenses. That is more than they could expect to receive if there had been no plan.

[39] What they gave up is the right to take the property by order absolute or to seek a judicial sale and pursue the borrower for the deficiency. Guardian was actually offered its security but declined to accept it. The difficulty about this whole matter is the uncollectability of the deficiency having regard to the overwhelming debt owed to the bank which would practically eliminate any real chance of recovery of the deficiency.

[40] In my view, the obvious benefits of settling rights and keeping the enterprise together as a going concern far outweigh the deprivation of the appellants' wholly illusory rights. In this connection, the learned chambers judge said at p. 29:

> I turn to the question of the right to hold the property after an order absolute and whether or not this is a denial of something of that significance that it should affect these proceedings. There is in the material before me some evidence of values. There are the principles to which I have referred, as well as to the rights of majorities and the rights of minorities.
> Certainly, those minority rights are there, but it would seem to me that in view of the overall plan, in view of the speculative nature of holding property in the light of appraisals which have been given as to value, that this right is something which should be subsumed to the benefit of the majority.

[41] I agree with that.

[42] I also agree with the learned chambers judge that the plan should have been approved and I would dismiss these appeals accordingly.

[43] ESSON J.A.: I agree.

[44] WALLACE J.A.: I agree.

[45] MCEACHERN J.A.: The appeals are dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT
(On a Motion to Sanction a Plan of Arrangement)

THE ISSUES

[1] Uniforêt asks the Court to sanction a Second Amended Plan of Arrangement (Plan) made after proof was completed on May 6, 2003 pursuant to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (Act).[1] An Amended Plan (First Plan) was approved by each of seven classes of creditors to the extent of at least 92% in number and 72% in value. Six secured creditors from a class (Class 2) of some 125 noteholders (or 4.79% of all noteholders), representing almost 28% in value of the class, oppose the sanction application, alleging amongst other things, manipulation and irregularities of the voting process,[2] oppression of the minority (the Opposing Creditors) of the Class 2 creditors by the majority (Jolina), unfair and confiscatory treatment of the class 2 claims and the existence of preferential payments made to so-called "unaffected creditors" prejudicial to the mass of creditors. They add that the Plan is unreasonable, unfair and confiscatory. They conclude in their written contestation that the Court should accordingly refuse to sanction it and should instead order the sale of the assets and undertakings subject to the security[3] of Class 2 claims "as a going concern" or, subsidiarily, that the Class 2 creditors be given a single class of new notes in the aggregate amount of $100 million and 90% of the equity of Uniforêt,[4] rather than the 55% that is offered as a conversion feature tied to $40 million of the new debt or B Notes.[5]

[2] Uniforêt denies any irregularities in the voting process or oppression of the Opposing Creditors by it or Jolina and relies on the Monitor's opinion that its Plan is both fair and reasonable. It adds that as all the classes of creditors have approved the Plan, in most cases overwhelmingly, the Court should sanction it. As to the request to sell the business as part of an orderly liquidation, Uniforêt stresses that such an alternative proposal (a) was considered and rejected by its management for lack of interest prior to the presentation of the First Plan, (b) comes far too late in the day and (c) poses a serious risk of prejudicing the implementation of the Plan and the expectations of the creditors who approved the First Plan in October, 2001.

THE FACTS

[3] Uniforêt first obtained protection under the Act on April 17, 2001. It filed an amended plan of arrangement (First Plan) with the Court on July 23, 2001 contemplating seven classes of creditors with potential claims aggregating in excess of $250,000,000. This Plan proposed the following arrangements:

Class	Description	Plan of Arrangement
1	The Municipalities of Port-Cartier and of l'Ascension (for Municipal taxes)	Pursuant to existing agreements
2	US Noteholders [which include the Opposing creditors and Jolina]	First US $25,000 cash with remaining balance, if any, exchanged for two new US Secured Notes: Note "A" 9% due on March 15, 2009; Note "B" convertible due on September 15, 2008; the whole for a total of $100,000,000 CDN
3	Holders of Capital Leases	Pursuant to existing agreements and contracts
4	Forestry Contractors	75% of proven claims
5	Unsecured Creditors	The lesser of $2,500 and the proven claim or a prorata share of a fund of $5,000,000
6	Canadian Debentureholders	Choice of receiving 8% of face value in cash or conversion into voting common shares of Uniforêt at a conversion rate of $6.00 per share
7	[Jolina]'s unsecured shareholder loan	Repayable on March 15, 2009 without interest

[4] The Opposing Creditors, members of Class 2 holding secured U.S. Notes in the face amount of $33.5 million U.S., applied to the Court on July 17, 2001 to modify the proposed Class 2. They asked amongst other things to be placed in a separate class from Jolina, a major shareholder of Uniforêt and the holder of more than two-thirds of the other U.S. Notes. A vote on the First Plan by Class 2 creditors was suspended pending the outcome of the Opposing Creditor's application. All of the other creditors approved the First Plan at meetings of creditors duly called and held on August 15, 2001. The Opposing Creditors' application was heard by Madame Justice Zerbisias over some 20 days. She rendered a lengthy judgment on October 23, 2002 dismissing the application and:

2) AUTHORIZED [Uniforêt] to call a meeting of creditors concerning Class 2 (U.S. Noteholders) to submit to them the amended plan (D-1) for voting purposes;

3) ORDERED [Uniforêt] and the Monitor to furnish to [the Opposing Creditors] whatever information they may possess as to the names, addresses, telephone and telecopier numbers of all beneficial owners of the U.S. notes within 5 days of this Judgment;

4) ORDERED provisional execution [...] notwithstanding appeal; [...]

[5] Leave to appeal from this judgment was sought and refused on November 21, 2002 by Mr. Justice Nuss of the Court of Appeal who observed:

[8] The issues of fairness and reasonableness of the plan can be fully canvassed and debated at the hearing before the [Superior] Court to consider the sanctioning of the plan once the vote of all the Classes of [creditors] has taken place. Indeed, [the Opposing Creditors] acknowledge, and urged during the hearing before me, that most of the issues raised in the Motion for leave to appeal deal with the fairness and reasonableness of the plan and that the proper time for considering them will be at the hearing before the Court for the sanctioning of the plan.

[6] Four days later, the Class 2 creditors voted on the Plan. The results were as follows:

Cat.	Montant total en capital des réclamations (US$)		% en nombre		% en valeur
	Oui	Non	Oui	Non	Oui	Non
2	87,918,000.00	33,505,000.00	95.21	4.79	72.41	27.59

[7] Uniforêt's Motion to Sanction the First Plan was first presented to the Court on December 11, 2002. The Opposing Creditors appeared to oppose its approval. Mr. Justice Lévesque was designated to manage the dossier and bring the matter on for hearing. He responded to requests for the production of additional documents and expertises and heard opposing counsel on a variety of pre-trial issues, including a request by Uniforêt to strike certain allegations of the amended, particularized contestation of the Opposing Creditors. As this request came shortly before the scheduled hearing, Mr. Justice Lévesque judiciously referred it, amongst other requests, to the trial judge.

[8] The Motion to Strike seems intended to prevent the reventilation of matters or issues already decided by Madame Justice Zerbisias in her judgment of October 23, 2002. The Court resisted the temptation to limit the debate to new issues. It informed counsel that objections to the introduction of "old" or repeat evidence would, for the most part, be taken under reserve and the legal issues arising from the Motion to Strike would if necessary be considered by this judgment. These issues were not addressed during oral argument and accordingly they will not be considered by this judgment.

ARTICLE 2
PURPOSE AND EFFECT OF PLAN

2.1 Purpose

The purpose of this Plan is to effect a reorganization of the liabilities, business and affairs of Uniforêt in order to enable its business to continue, in the expectation that all Persons with an interest in Uniforêt will derive a greater benefit from its continued operation than would result from the immediate forced liquidation of Uniforêt's assets and business.

2.2 Joint Plan

As explained in Uniforêt's Petition for the issuance of the Initial Order pursuant to the [Act], most of the financing of Uniforêt's business is with Uniforêt Inc., while the operations and fixed assets are with Uniforêt Scierie-Pâte Inc. and Foresterie Port-Cartier Inc. who, in many instances, guaranteed the debts and obligations of Uniforêt Inc. Therefore, the related operations of Petitioners justify [...] presenting a joint Plan, the whole as permitted by the CCAA and the Initial Order. None of Uniforêt's Creditors will be prejudiced by such a joint Plan.

2.3 Persons Affected

This Plan shall become effective on the Plan Implementation Date and shall, on and after the Plan Implementation Date, bind Uniforêt and all Uniforêt's Creditors affected by the Plan.

2.4 Obligations Not affected

This Plan shall not affect any Unaffected Obligations.[6]

ARTICLE 3
CLASSIFICATION OF CREDITORS, VALUATION OF CLAIMS AND PROCEDURAL MATTERS

3.1 Classification of Creditors

The Claims of the Creditors shall be grouped into the following Classes, and each Creditor in a designated Class shall, to the extent provided herein, be entitled to vote on the Plan as part of such Class:

Class 1 The Cities of Port-Cartier and l'Ascension (municipal taxes);
Class 2 US Noteholders;
Class 3 Holders of Capital Leases;
Class 4 Forestry Contractors;
Class 5 Unsecured Creditors;
Class 6 Canadian Debentureholders; and Class 7 Jolina Capital Inc.'s unsecured shareholder loan.

Digitized by Google

3.2 Creditors Meetings

Following the filing of the Plan with the Court, Uniforêt will hold the necessary Creditors Meetings to vote on the Plan, the whole in accordance with the Initial Order. [...]

3.3 Creditors Votes Required

In order that the Plan be binding on all the Creditors of Uniforêt affected by the Plan, it must first be accepted within each and every Class of Creditors as prescribed by the Plan by a majority in number of the Creditors in such Class who actually vote on the Plan (in person, by voting letter or by proxy) at the Creditors Meeting held in respect of such Class, representing two-thirds in value of the Accepted Claims for Voting Purposes of the Creditors in such Class who actually vote on the Plan (in person, by voting letter or by proxy) at such Creditors Meeting. [...]

3.4 Valuation of Claims for Voting and Distribution Purposes

Each Creditor having a Proven Claim in a Class shall be entitled to attend and to vote at the Creditors Meeting for such Class. Each Creditor of a Class who is entitled to vote shall be entitled to that number of votes at the Creditors Meeting for such Class as is equivalent to the dollar amount of its Proven Claim. In the event that the Proven Claim of a Creditor is not finally determined prior to the Creditors Meeting Date of the Creditors Meeting for any Class in accordance with this Plan and any Order of the Court, the Creditor shall be entitled to vote at the Creditors Meeting for such Class based on its Accepted Claim for Voting Purposes as determined by the Monitor, without prejudice to Uniforêt's right or the Creditor's right to require the final determination by the Court of the Creditor's Proven Claim, which Proven Claim shall apply for all purposes in connection with the Plan, including, without limitation, the Creditor's entitlement to participate in distributions under the Plan.

3.5 Participation in Different Capacities

Creditors whose Claims are affected by this Plan may be affected in more than one capacity. Each such Creditor shall be entitled to participate hereunder separately in each such capacity, unless otherwise specified. Any action taken by a Creditor in any one capacity shall not affect the Creditor in any other capacity unless the Creditor agrees to otherwise in writing.

3.6 Confirmation of Plan by the Final Order

In the event that the Plan is approved by the required majority of Creditors provided in Section 3.3, Uniforêt will seek the Final Order for the sanction and approval of the Plan. Subject only to the Final Order being granted and the satisfaction of the conditions of the Plan described in Section 5.1, the Plan will be implemented by Uniforêt and will be binding on all Uniforêt's Creditors affected by the Plan.

ARTICLE 4

THE COMPROMISE AND ARRANGEMENT

4.1 Class 1 : Treatment of the Cities of Port-Cartier and l'Ascension (municipal taxes)

Uniforêt proposes to pay to the Cities of Port-Cartier and l'Ascension the full amounts which are due to them as municipal taxes pursuant to existing agreements, or as may be agreed between them.

4.2 Class 2 : Treatment of US Noteholders

Uniforêt proposes to all US Noteholders, holding US Secured Notes totalling approximately CDN$190,000,000, as final compromise and arrangement, the following:

4.2.1 Uniforêt will pay, on the Plan Implementation Date,[7] to each US Noteholder the lesser of US$25,000 or the amount of the US Secured Note held by such US Noteholder; and

4.2.2 Uniforêt will exchange, on the Plan Implementation Date, all outstanding US Secured Notes, after payment of the amounts provided in Section 4.2.1 for two (2) new secured notes for each outstanding US Secured Note, namely (1) 9% Note "A" due March 15, 2009 and one (1) Convertible Note "B" due September 15, 2008, to be issued under an indenture providing for the issuance of 9% Notes "A" due March 15, 2009, in an aggregate principal amount of CDN$60,000,000, and Convertible Notes "B" due September 15, 2008, in an aggregate principal amount of CDN$40,000,000, both Notes "A" and "B" totalling an aggregate principal amount of CDN$100,000,000, to be issued under commercially acceptable terms and having similar secured rights on Uniforêt's assets as those held by the US Noteholders under the US Indenture, the whole, on a pro rata pari passu basis. These Notes "A" and "B" will be subject to the following terms and conditions:

9% Notes "A":

from the Plan Implementation Date, 9% Notes "A" will bear an annual interest rate of 9%, payable in arrears on a semi-annual basis, on March 15 and September 15 of each year, with the first interest payment date being on March 15, 2002, and will provide for annual principal repayment on March 15 of each year, commencing on March 15, 2003, always on a pro rata pari passu basis, equal to 50% of Available Cash Flow for fiscal years 2002 and 2003, and 75% of Available Cash Flow for subsequent fiscal years until the earlier of the maturity date, namely March 15, 2009, at which time the balance thereof will be fully repaid, or refinancing thereof;

Digitized by Google

furthermore, at its sole discretion, Uniforêt can make, on any interest payment date, without penalty, additional principal repayments on the 9% Notes "A" and will bear no interest until September 15, 2004 and, thereafter, will bear an annual interest rate of 7.5%, payable in arrears on a semi-annual basis, on March 15 and September 15 of each year, with the first interest payment date being on March 15, 2005, and will provide for no annual principal repayment prior to September 15, 2008 and the full repayment of the principal thereof at maturity, namely on September 15, 2008;
furthermore, Convertible Notes "B" will, from the Plan Implementation Date until September 15, 2008, be convertible at any time into Class A Subordinate Voting Shares of Uniforêt Inc. (listed on The Toronto Stock Exchange under the trading symbol UNF.A) at a conversion price of $0.50 per share, such conversion right to expire at the close of business on September 15, 2008 and to be subject to a thirty (3) days prior written conversion notice to Uniforêt, which may then offer, prior to the expiry of such thirty (30) day period, to pay in cash to the noteholder, who will not be obliged to accept any such offer, an amount equal to the Market Value of the Class A Subordinate Voting Shares of Uniforêt Inc. issuable upon conversion instead of delivering shares to the noteholder;[8]
"Market Value" of the Class A Subordinate Voting Shares of Uniforêt Inc. shall mean the weighted average trading price of the Class A Subordinate Voting Shares of Uniforêt Inc. on the Toronto Stock Exchange during the twenty (20) consecutive trading days preceding the date on which the conversion notice is given to Uniforêt.
US Noteholders have no Claim for interest outstanding as of the Plan Implementation Date under US Secured Notes and are not entitled to participate in any other Class for Claims related, in any manner whatsoever, to US Secured Notes.
4.3 Class 3 : Treatment of Holders of Capital Leases
Uniforêt proposes to pay to holders of Capital Leases the full amount which is due to them pursuant to existing agreements and contracts, or as may be agreed between them.
4.4 Class 4 : Treatment of Forestry Contractors
Uniforêt proposes to pay, at the latest on the Plan Implementation Date, to each Forestry Contractor, as final compromise and arrangement of their respective Proven Claim, 75% thereof.
4.5 Class 5 : Treatment of Unsecured Creditors
Uniforêt proposes to pay to Unsecured Creditors, as final compromise and arrangement of their respective Proven Claim, on the Plan Implementation Date, in accordance with their respective election, the following 4.5.1 the lesser of $2,500 or the Unsecured Creditor's Proven Claim; or
4.5.2 a pro rata pari passu share in the Unsecured Creditors Fund for those Unsecured Creditors with Proven Claims as of the Plan Implementation Date who will not have elected to be paid in accordance with Section 4.5.1 of this Plan.
4.6 Class 6 : Treatment of Canadian Debentureholders
Uniforêt proposes to Canadian Debentureholders, as final compromise and arrangement, in accordance with their respective election, the following: On the Plan Implementation Date,
4.6.1 payment of an amount equal to 8% of the outstanding balance of the Canadian 8% Convertible Unsecured Subordinated Debentures held; or 4.6.2 conversion of Canadian 8% Convertible Unsecured Subordinated Debentures held by a Canadian Debentureholder into Class A Subordinate Voting Shares of Uniforêt Inc. (listed on The Toronto Stock Exchange under the trading symbol UNF.A) at a conversion price of $6.00 per share, being a rate of 16.667 Class A Subordinate Voting Shares per $100 principal amount of Canadian 8% Convertible Unsecured Subordinated Debentures held by a Canadian Debentureholder, for those Canadian Debentureholders who have not elected to be paid in accordance with Section 4.6.1 of this Plan.
Canadian Debentureholders have no Claim for interest outstanding as of the Plan Implementation Date under Canadian 8% Convertible Unsecured Subordinated Debentures and are not entitled to participate in any other Class for Claims related, in any manner whatsoever, to Canadian 8% Convertible Unsecured Subordinated Debentures.
4.7 Class 7 : Treatment of Jolina Capital Inc.'s unsecured shareholder loan
Uniforêt proposes to pay Jolina Capital Inc.'s unsecured shareholder loan in the amount of $5,405,000, as final compromise and arrangement thereof, by issuing, on the Plan Implementation Date, a promissory note for the same amount, bearing no interest and providing for the full repayment thereof on March 15, 2009.
[10] Between July 23, 2001 and February 27, 2003, the Monitor produced four reports, two addressed to the creditors prior to their voting on the First Plan and two addressed to the Court in connection with the Motion to Sanction. These latter reports express the following opinions:
E) Analyse de Plan

Digitized by Google

23. L'acceptation du Plan par toutes les catégories de créanciers permettra à Uniforêt de restructurer son endettement ainsi que de poursuivre ses activités.
24. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que les Débitrices ont agi et continuent d'agir de bonne foi, avec toute la diligence voulue dans les circonstances. Aussi, le Contrôleur n'a constaté aucun fait qui nous porterait à croire que la conduite des Débitrices est ou a été répréhensible.
25. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que le Plan proposé fut préparé de façon sérieuse et diligente par Uniforêt.
26. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que le Plan d'Uniforêt est juste et raisonnable envers les créanciers en général et envers chacune des catégories de créanciers.
27. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que le Plan tient compte de la capacité financière d'Uniforêt de respecter les termes dudit Plan advenant son homologation par la Cour et sa mise en œuvre.
28. Le Contrôleur, avec l'assistance d'autres conseillers professionnels et en se basant sur son expérience, a procédé à une analyse de la valeur probable des éléments d'actif d'Uniforêt dans un contexte de liquidation ordonnée.
29. Tel que déclaré dans le Premier Rapport du Contrôleur, le Contrôleur est d'avis que, dans un contexte de liquidation ordonnée, la valeur estimative des immobilisations d'Uniforêt pourrait se situer entre 60 000 000 $ et 80 000 000 $ après déduction des coûts de liquidation et des charges prioritaires (employés, droits de coupe impayés, etc.). Le montant ainsi réalisé ne serait suffisant pour assurer le remboursement intégral des sommes dues aux créanciers garantis qui totalisent 125 000 000 $ US (approximativement 200 000 000 $ CDN).
30. Tel que déclaré dans le Second Rapport du Contrôleur, le Contrôleur est d'avis que, dans un contexte de liquidation ordonnée, même en considérant la valeur aux livres en date du 30 septembre 2002, de l'encaisse, des comptes à recevoir, ainsi que des inventaires totalisant approximativement 43 000 000 $ la valeur des éléments d'actif d'Uniforêt ne s'est pas améliorée depuis juillet 2001. En fait, en tenant compte de l'état actuel du marché, des conditions de l'industrie ainsi que des facteurs externes qui sont hors du contrôle d'Uniforêt, nous sommes d'avis que les chances d'obtenir la valeur nette de réalisation estimative discutée au paragraphe 29 ont diminué.
31. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que, dans le cadre d'une liquidation forcée, la valeur estimative des immobilisations d'Unifôret serait réduite de 50%. Il semble que, dans le contexte actuel, une liquidation forcée serait plus vraisemblable.
32. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que l'acceptation du Plan est plus avantageuse pour les créanciers que la liquidation des éléments d'actif d'Uniforêt dont l'analyse se résume comme suit:

	Montant dû		Plan d'arrangement			Liquidation ordonnée (Valeur nette de réalisation estimée (a)			Liquidation ordonnée (Valeur nette de réalisation estimée (b)
1	298 971 $		298 271 $	100%		300 000 $	100%		300 000 $	100%
2	195 337 500	(c)	100 000 000	51%		65 000 000	33%		30 000 000	15%
					(e)	16 000 000	8%	(e)	16 700 000	9%

(a) Assumant une valeur de liquidation de 20 000 000 $ pour les comptes à recevoir et les stocks et une valeur nette de 70 000 000 $ pour les immobilisations.
(b) Assumant une valeur de liquidation de 20 000 000 $ pour l'encaisse, les comptes à recevoir et les stocks et une valeur nette de 35 000 000 $ pour les immobilisations.
(c) Excluant le montant du premier 38 500 $ (25 000 US) à être reçu par chaque Porteur de Billets Américains.
(d) En assumant que les créanciers de premier rang paient les soldes dus en vertu des Contrats de Location-Acquisition afin de libérer les actifs visés.
(e) Calculé en partageant la valeur estimée de liquidation des comptes clients et des stocks entre les créanciers des catégories 2 (perte excédentaire seulement), 4, 5 et 7, sur la base prorata et pari passu.
(f) 75% du montant dû.
(g) Incluant un estimé des créanciers qui choisiront de recevoir le paiement comptant de 2 500 $.
(h) Assumant que la totalité de la catégorie choisit de recevoir un paiement comptant.

Digitized by Google

(i) Valeur actualisée du montant dû à un taux d'escompte de 18%.

33. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que l'acceptation et l'homologation du Plan est plus avantageuse pour les créanciers que la liquidation des actifs d'Uniforêt.

34. Le Contrôleur est d'avis que la continuité des opérations d'Uniforêt permettra à la majorité des créanciers d'avoir l'opportunité de poursuivre des relations avec Uniforêt qui, entre autres, vont permettre également le maintien d'emplois et d'une activité économique importante pour les municipalités de Péribonka et de Port-Cartier. De plus, certaines catégories de créanciers (catégories 2 et 3) pourront bénéficier d'un rendement continu de leurs investissements nonobstant la réduction de la valeur nominale de leur créance prévue par le Plan.

35. Le Contrôleur est d'avis qu'il est dans l'intérêt de l'ensemble des créanciers d'Uniforêt que le Plan soit homologué et approuvé par cette Cour.

[11] The Monitor relied for some of its opinions upon the expertise of CIB World Markets Inc. prepared as of February 24, 2003. The key conclusions of this expertise are:

1. The current environment for selling assets in the pulp and lumber industry is poor. There are only a limited number of buyers, but numerous mills for sale.

2- With regard to the BCTMP mill, the lack of transactions at any meaningful price over the past several years is the best indicator of [...] poor market conditions – the market has spoken for itself.

3. With regard to the sawmills, even if a temporary resolution to the on-going trade dispute with the U.S. is negotiated, the economic fundamentals underlying the Canadian industry remain troubling. Once the uncertainty associated with the trade barriers is added to the oversupply situation, it is unlikely that reasonable bids could be expected for the sawmill over at least the next 12-18 months. This problem is compounded by the volume of sawmill capacity currently being offered for sale in Quebec (or deemed "non-core") by companies other than Uniforêt.

[12] The Opposing Creditors retained Houlihan, Lokey Award & Zukin Financial Advisors Inc. (Houlihan) of New York to review the First Plan and the Monitor's report of July 23, 2001 and comment on the fairness of that plan to the Opposing Creditors. Houlihan concluded that the First Plan was "not fair and reasonable to the creditors in general or in relation to each other for [...] the following reasons:

- The Plan preserves the existing common equity ownership of [Uniforêt], and thereby allows common shareholders to maintain control [...] and to benefit from a significant de-leveraging. [...] This is unfair to secured creditors who receive less than a 100% recovery.
- The Plan provides for substantial recoveries to unsecured creditors that have claims that rank junior in priority to the secured creditors. This is unfair to secured creditors who receive less than a 100% recovery.
- The Plan provides for 100% recoveries in cash for the Class 3 secured creditors, but the Class 2 secured creditors will receive new debt securities with a face value of $100.0 million that approximates 51.2% of the Class 2 secured creditors claims of $195.5 million. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan provides an inadequate amount of value to the Class 2 Claimholders because the debt securities that are being offered in satisfaction of the Class 2 Claims will trade at a significant discount to face value. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan provides less value to the Class 2 Claimholders than they would receive in a liquidation based on the liquidation values provided in the Monitor's Report. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan deprives the Class 2 Claimholders of the value of the unsecured portion of their claim. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan is being proposed under the assumption that the Port-Cartier pulp Mill [...] on which the Class 2 Claimholders have a first lien), will not be in operation. [This] mill is a significant asset of [Uniforêt] in which over $200. million of capital expenditures have been invested since 1988. The Plan inhibits the Class 2 Claimholders from benefiting in the value that might be created in the event that the pulp mill is restarted, converted, sold or liquidated and transfers a majority of such benefits to junior creditors and common equity holders. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan provides for a highly leveraged capital structure that is sub-optimal from a corporate finance perspective. As a result, it is likely that both the debt and equity securities of [Uniforêt] will trade with limited liquidity and at significant discounts to their intrinsic values. This is unfair to the Class 2 Claimholders.
- The Plan consolidates all U.S. Noteholders in Class 2 for voting purposes. The purported holder of approximately 66.9% of the Class 2 Claims (Jolina Capital) is also a holder of a majority of the Class 3 Claims, certain Class 5 Claims, 100%, 100% of the Class 7 Claims and is also the largest shareholder of [Uniforêt]. [Thus], Jolina will recover a portion of the value that the Plan transfers from the Class 2 Claimholders to holders of Class 3, Class 5 and Class 7 Claims as well as the equity. Accordingly, Jolina has a different recovery profile than other Class 2 Claimholders and an economic conflict of interest with respect to voting as a Class 2 Claimholder. This is unfair to the non-Jolina Class 2 Claimholders.

[13] This report, prepared on October 8, 2001, was filed at the hearing before Madam Justice Zerbisias together with a previous report Houlihan had submitted dated May 15, 2000. Mr. Slonecker, one of their authors, spoke to them. Madam Justice Zerbisias had this to say about those parts of the Houlihan reports that concerned her:

[72] Houlihan's first report, of May 15, 2000, assesses the value of the assets of Uniforêt at U.S. $123 to $134 million, excluding the assets of Tripap, but including the Port Cartier pulpmill whose assets are therein evaluated at U.S. $38 to 41 million. On that basis, the report and Mr. Slonecker concluded that the recovery rate relative to the face value of the notes is approximately 49 to 56%, compared to the current market trading price between 27 to 30%.

[73] Houlihan's second report, of October 8, 2001, was prepared by Houlihan at Petitioner's request as a reply to the Report of the Monitor on the Debtor's financial affairs and on the fairness of the plan. Mr. Slonecker and the report re-evaluate the assets of Uniforêt at CND $90 million. No value whatsoever is attributed to the assets of the Port Cartier pulpmill because it was not operating. Mr. Slonecker in his report, then evaluates the new securities, redeemable or convertible at a future date being provided to the Class 2 noteholders under the plan, at CDN $56.4 million, which implies a recovery rate of 51.2% of the total face value of the Class 2 claims. After discounting for the delay in payment, he concludes that this implies a real recovery rate of only 28.9%. He adds that the trading value of the Class A notes is 74% of face value, whereas the trading value of the class B notes is 31% of face value.

[74] Jolina, as a Class 2 creditor is affected by the same determinations as to its potential recovery on its U.S. notes. In addition, Houlihan and Mr. Slonecker evaluate the trading value of Jolina's new note under the plan in payment of its claim for its shareholder loan of CND $5.4 million at 18.8% of face value, i.e. worth approximately $1 million Canadian when discounted, for the delay in payment.

[75] Thus, Houlihan and Mr. Slonecker conclude on the basis of two completely different scenarios as set forth in the two reports, that the recovery rate on the U.S. notes is approximately the same: 49 to 56% on the first report and 51.2% on the second report, without attributing any value to the Port Cartier pulpmill, absent any discount for delays in payment. Similarly, the Monitor concludes that the recovery rate for Class 2 claimants is 51% under the plan, or 33% on a forced liquidation. Thus it appears that Petitioners will gain more under the plan and less on liquidation.

[14] The Opposing Creditors obtained Court permission to produce another expertise prepared by Price Waterhouse Coopers (PWC). Completed on February 7, 2003, this expertise concludes that:

141. In summary, in our view, the Plan:

(i) Does not treat secured creditors in accordance with their existing rights and priorities;

(ii) Provides significantly higher recoveries to certain unsecured creditors than is being offered to the secured US Noteholders, including the ultimate payment of 100¢ on the dollar in respect of Jolina's unsecured shareholder loan;

(iii) Requires Class 5 creditors to make an election in respect of their treatment under the Plan without being able to assess the economic impact of the alternatives available;

(iv) Provides for a recovery to Class 6 creditors, notwithstanding that such creditors have contractually subordinated themselves to all other creditors;

(v) Treats the claim of Bank of Montreal (BoM) as an Unaffected Obligation,[9] with no benefit or advantage to [Uniforêt or its] arms-length creditors, but with the significant disadvantage that $4 million that would otherwise be available for the purposes of making additional payments to Affected Creditors, funding operations or servicing debt will be paid to this unsecured creditor; and;

(vi) Contrary to established practice in CCAA restructurings, leaves substantially all of the post-restructuring equity in [Uniforêt] in the hands of the existing shareholders without any additional funding or support being provided by such shareholders, with the result that the consequences of [Uniforêt's involvency] are being suffered by the creditors, while the benefits of the compromises by creditors and a successful restructuring will accrue to the existing shareholders.

142. The Plan was approved by the Class 2 creditors only as a result of Jolina, the largest shareholder of Uniforêt, voting in favour of the Plan. Based on the Monitor's records, the Plan would not have been approved if 373[10] had been included in the CCAA filing and Jolina, as a result, had been prevented from exercising its hypothecary rights over the US Notes held by 373. Furthermore, based on our experience, we believe it is unlikely that an arm's length creditor holding the majority of the Class 2 claims would have voted in favour of the Plan.

143. The sale of the business as a going concern appears to be a commercially viable alternative to the Plan that could improve overall recoveries available to creditors by approximately $26.4 million to $42.4 million, representing an increase of approximately 31.7% to 50.6%.

144. The creditors most prejudiced by the Plan are the Class 2 creditors that would share in Notes A and Notes B, primarily Jolina and the minority US Noteholders. If the business were sold as a going concern and the proceeds distributed in the same manner as the cash payments that would be made to affected creditors under the plan, we estimate that such Class 2 creditors would recover $26.4 million to $42.4 million, more than they will recover under the Plan. These amounts would be reduced by any amount that would be needed to make a fair and reasonable distribution on account of the Class 7 Jolina shareholder loan. Under the Plan, Jolina retains its existing equity in Uniforêt while no equity is offered to the Minority US Noteholders. In these circumstances, the compromise being required of the Minority U.S. Noteholders is disproportionately large and cannot be considered reasonable.

145. As previously noted, the Monitor, in its July 23 Report, its October 28 Report and its December 11 Report, concluded that the Plan was fair and reasonable. Having given due consideration to the foregoing issues, the other matters discussed in this report, and all of the considerations outlined by Madam Justice Paperny in Re. Canadian Airlines,[11] we respectfully disagree with the conclusion of the Monitor and we have concluded that the Plan is not fair and reasonable.

[15] Following completion of most of the proof on May 2nd, 2003, the Court shared with the parties and their counsel its principal preoccupation concerning the fairness of the Plan in circumstances where, as here, secured creditors are asked to reduce the face amount of their notes by almost half and to accept, eventually, reduced interest on these reduced notes. The Court asked why the Plan failed to replace what was to be taken from them by equity,[12] unencumbered by a repurchase option.[13] Uniforêt responded to this enquiry on May 6, 2003 by further amending the Plan to effectively remove the repurchase option and to extend the delay during which a noteholder can exercise the conversion rights attaching to the B Notes from 2004 to 2008, coincidental with the maturity date of such notes. If exercised, the Class 2 creditors would hold 55% of the equity of Uniforêt.

[16] On the same morning, the Opposing Creditors submitted a "Re-Amended Particularized Contestation" to further amend their conclusions to ask for an "Alternate Plan" in the event a "going concern sale" cannot profitably be concluded. The Alternate Plan would differ from the Plan in that:

(a) Class 2 creditors would receive one class of New Notes in an aggregate amount of $100 million having the same repayment and interest terms as Notes A under the Plan and 90% of the equity of Uniforêt following a reorganization of its capital structure pursuant to S.191 of the Canada Business Corporations Act (CBCA),[14] and

(b) Jolina's claim as a Class 3 creditor would be disallowed and put into Class 5. The Bank of Montreal claim would also be added to Class 5 and disallowed as an "unaffected obligation".

LEGAL PRINCIPLES

[17] Counsel for the Opposing Creditors remind the Court that shareholders do not have an economic stake in an insolvent company seeking relief under the CCAA.[15] They add that a plan of arrangement should offer more to creditors than would be available to them under a liquidation.[16] In assessing fairness of a plan, the Court must consider alternatives to it that are commercially available,[17] in particular a sale of the enterprise as a going concern. Moreover, they point to the inherent jurisdiction of the Court either to amend the plan for compelling reasons[18] or to order a sale of assets before a plan is presented to the creditors.[19]

[18] Counsel for Uniforêt and the Monitor acknowledged that generally, a plan of arrangement is consensual and results from negotiations leading to agreement.[20] They remind the Court that its role on a sanction hearing "is to consider whether the plan fairly balances the interests of all the stakeholders"[21] including the public interest.[22] Perfection is not required.[23] They add that there is a heavy burden upon Opposing Creditors in their quest to upset the Plan[24] and conclude that the Court should be reluctant to interfere with the business decisions of a majority of creditors "reached as a body".[25]

DISCUSSION

A. The Plan is prejudicial to the Class 2 Creditors

1. Two Fundamental Reasons

[19] The Opposing Creditors and their experts criticize the First Plan on several fronts. On the one hand they assert that the First Plan treats some unsecured creditors more favourably than the Class 2 secured creditors. They point out that Jolina will receive the entire amount of both its $5.4 million shareholder loan (Class 7) and its $3.5 million advance towards the acquisition and installation of a planer in the Peribonka sawmill (Class 3) and that the forestry contractors will realize 75% of their claims (Class 4). On the other hand, they argue that the Plan is confiscatory in that the Class 2 creditors will only receive 51% of the face amount of their old U.S. notes two years later than promised at a lower interest rate while they wait to be paid and they will not receive any meaningful equity to replace what has been taken from them, nor are they entitled to recover unpaid interest accrued on the U.S. Notes.

2. Too fair to other creditors, especially Jolina

[20] There is no doubt Jolina has been relatively well treated under both the First Plan and the Plan. Jolina is Uniforêt's White Knight.[26] It has been a shareholder and involved in the affairs of Uniforêt since 1994. It financed a new planer for the Péribonka sawmill in late 1999. It ultimately provided the funding to acquire the majority of the U.S. Notes in Uniforêt's initial attempt to rationalize its debt through a public offering for all the U.S. Notes at 30% of their principal amount in early 2000. This initiative attracted about 50% of the U.S. Notes at a cost of $33 million, or 53¢. Jolina then acquired another 16% of the U.S. Notes in the market, enough to control the outcome of the vote by the Class

2 creditors. It helped to backstop an $11M short term or bridge loan from the Bank of Montreal to pay wages and other pressing payables. Uniforêt repaid over $6 million of this loan and shortly thereafter applied to the Court for relief under the C.C.A.A. The balance due on this loan is treated as an "unaffected obligation.[27] Accordingly, the White Knight's several claims have received generous treatment under the Plan, as well they should. After all, Jolina is Uniforêt's largest and most important creditor, quite apart from being a major shareholder. Plans of arrangement cannot hope to succeed without the approval of such a creditor. The Plan proposes, in effect, to make Jolina more or less whole, at least eventually.[28]

[21] For a plan of arrangement to succeed, an insolvent company must secure the approval of all classes of its creditors, even those who have subordinated their claims to all other creditors, as is the case with the debentureholders (Class 6). It does not necessarily follow that a plan generous to some creditors must therefore be unfair to others. A plan can be more generous to some creditors and still fair to all creditors.[29] A creditor like Jolina that has stepped into the breach on several occasions to keep Uniforêt afloat in the 4 years preceding the filing of the First Plan warrants special treatment.

[22] The Forresters' claims, although unsecured, are another special case. The Forresters had to be encouraged to bring their equipment back into the bush after the winter thaw. Without logs, the sawmills have nothing to cut. Similarly, if government permits (stumpage duties) are not paid in one year, they will not be issued in a subsequent year.[30] This explains why the cost of permits are quite properly treated in the Plan as "unaffected obligations".

3. Unfair to Class 2 Creditors

[23] The minority Class 2 creditors complain that Jolina wears too many hats in this dossier. They argue that if Jolina, like them,[31] was nothing more than a holder of U.S. Notes, it would not have voted in favour of the proposed treatment for Class 2 creditors. It did so, they add, only because of the generous treatment proposed for its unsecured claims under classes 3, 5 and 7 and the fact it was already a major shareholder. This is, of course, a purely hypothetical argument that nevertheless invites an analysis of the treatment actually accorded to the Class 2 creditors.

[24] The experts and Uniforêt agree that the "enterprise" or "going concern" values of the businesses of Uniforêt lie somewhere between $90 million (Houlihan in 2001) and $112 million (PWC in 2003).[32] There is also general agreement that Uniforêt cannot support debt in excess of $60 million from its current and projected cash flows.[33] This explains why the old U.S. Notes are to be exchanged for two classes of notes, $60 million of "A" notes and $40 million of "B" notes ($100 million in the aggregate) and why there is a conversion feature into shares attached to the "B" notes.

[25] Thus, Uniforêt proposes to give the Class 2 creditors its assessment of its entire enterprise value backed by the same security the U.S. noteholders enjoyed under their Trust Indenture.[34] If the workout over the next four to five years is successful, the holders of "B" notes will be able to share, to the extent of 55%, any future equity accruing to the shares of Uniforêt, in excess of $40 million. Mathematically, 55% of nothing is no different than 90% of nothing. However, a successful workout combined with improved economic conditions for the Canadian forestry industry – capital intensive, highly cyclical and beetle infested – may permit the "B" noteholders to recover something of what has been lost from the face amount of their old U.S. notes.

[26] The experts further agree that the orderly liquidation values of the assets of Uniforêt in a bankruptcy scenario will not realize more than $90.4 million at best.[35] Most estimates are well below this figure, including that of PWC. The one area where the experts differ is what they think might be realized, and when, if the enterprise were offered for sale "as a going concern" while under the protection of the CCAA. The Monitor and Mr. Roberts of CIB World Markets doubt such a sale would attract a price any more favourable than what is offered in the Plan anytime sooner than 18 months, if ever. Mr. Meakin of PWC thinks a carefully orchestrated sale culminating in an auction while under the umbrella of the CCAA could result in a return to the Class 2 creditors in the next 6 months of up to $42 million more than what they are to receive under the Plan. The Monitor views any such result as entirely "illusoire, irréaliste et utopique". His views are shared by Mr. Moreau, the president and chief executive officer of Uniforêt, expressed even more succinctly. Mr. Roberts observed that ever since Uniforêt applied for relief from the Court, competitors in the industry have considered it to be "for sale", yet no serious buyer has as yet surfaced. He suggests that competitors are waiting to acquire a bargain in an industry beset with overcapacity compounded by punishing countervailing duties imposed by our southern neighbours. Worse, one such competitor holds a right of first refusal affecting a key asset.

[27] Mr. Meakin's "utopian" views as to a possible outcome from a sale of the enterprise fails to account for some $19.5 million of payments due to the creditors of unaffected obligations, presupposes that (a) the payment of $6 million to the Bank of Montreal is an avoidable transaction, (b) the balance of $4 million due on its loan is a Class 5 claim and (c) omits contracts that would have to be assumed by a buyer of at least $2.3 million. This reduces a best case scenario from a sale of the business to less than a possible $10 million improvement for the Class 2 Creditors, before expenses. The Opposing Creditors' share of this theoretical sum would not exceed $2.8 million before expenses. Further, Mr. Meakin's proposal to sidestep the right of first refusal is unconvincing. This right, together with long term fiber procurement contracts, if not revoked, "would hamper significantly any kind of divestiture process" according to Mr. Meakin's partner, Mr. Leblanc.

[28] There are serious risks associated with any attempted sale of an insolvent enterprise over an unspecified period of time. Employees who are key to Uniforêt's business operations but not necessarily to a buyer's operations will almost certainly begin looking for safe havens. Customers will look to other sources for their wood products. Suppliers will tighten credit facilities and look for other customers. There will almost certainly be erosion on several fronts. Added to all this, it should not be forgotten that those creditors of Uniforêt who have voted in favour of the First Plan have implicitly agreed that current management and direction should remain unchanged.

[29] Given all of these factors, the Court concludes that it would be folly to attempt a sale of Uniforêt's businesses – even to test the market – almost 2 years after the First Plan was filed for so small a possible yet unlikely gain. Uniforêt has so far managed to survive under CCAA protection in weak and difficult market conditions all the while fighting this litigation. It deserves a chance to prove to its stakeholders that it can both survive and return to profitability. This is what the CCAA was designed to encourage and facilitate.

B. Who really gets hurt

[30] For those Opposing Creditors who acquired their notes for 28¢ in the dollar like Prospect, there will be no "haircut". Rather, the issue for them is the size of their gain and the yield on their investment to maturity. Only those U.S. noteholders who paid more in the after market for their U.S. Notes than they stand to receive from the Plan will suffer any loss under it. Jolina's average cost for the U.S. Notes it holds amounts to about 53¢ in the dollar. Its haircut will be modest. Accordingly it should come as no surprise to anyone that it does not insist on equity in circumstances where it will recover almost all it had to pay for its U.S. Notes. Add to this the fact it already holds 40% of the existing equity in Uniforêt. If it converts the "B" Notes it will receive under the Plan, it will increase its equity position in Uniforêt to about 63%, allowing for dilution.

[31] Highland acquired its U.S. Notes from Prospect, one of the funds it manages, at a cost of 80¢, after Uniforêt had applied for relief under the CCAA. The market at the time for the U.S. Notes was in the region of 28¢. Thus, Prospect has already realized a tidy gain on the sale of $3 million of the principal amount of the U.S. Notes it then held. It is left with $20 million of U.S. Notes. The explanation for this generous transaction – at a price more than twice the market price – leaves as many questions unanswered as were answered. Without any U.S. Notes, Highland would have no standing in these proceedings as a Class 2 creditor. The price Highland elected to pay for its U.S. Notes reflects what it hoped to achieve for all its clients in its forthcoming negotiations with Uniforêt. Highland believed that its group would control the claims of the U.S. noteholders in any Chapter 11 type proceedings and assumed that Jolina, being a shareholder of Uniforêt, would not be permitted to vote on any of its claims as Uniforêt's creditor. In this it was mistaken, as Highland's President, Mr. Dondero, readily conceded. Canadian rules do not prevent a shareholder of an insolvent company from voting on its claims as a creditor.

[32] Thus, only four of the six Opposing Creditors will sustain a real loss if the Plan is approved. Together they hold $12.5 million of U.S. Notes purchased at prices ranging from 96¢ to 66¢. Highland's loss is self inflicted. It is also Prospect's initial gain. In addition, Prospect will gain from the Plan itself, having purchased its $20 million U.S. Notes for only about 28¢. In the giant scheme of things, four holders of 10% of the $125 million U.S. Notes will sustain a legitimate loss if the Plan is approved. They will lose much more in a bankruptcy.

[33] Arguably, the question the Court might ask is whether a Plan thought by the Monitor to be both fair and reasonable – feasible and workable – and to have been approved by the required majority of all the creditors of Uniforêt should nevertheless be sacrificed to please four speculators.[36] Of course not. Their actual losses will not exceed 45¢ in the dollar[37] if the Plan succeeds, perhaps less if the conversion option is exercised. Absent bad faith, the CCAA should not be employed to permit a cranky minority creditor to frustrate a feasible and fair plan that has been blessed by an overwhelming majority of all the creditors of a debtor.[38]

C. The Equity Issue

[34] It became evident during the hearing that a serious bone of contention between the Opposing Creditors and Uniforêt centered on the unwillingness of the latter to give sufficient equity to the former. While the First Plan provided for a conversion option exercisable before September 15, 2004, it came with a very short fuse, or repurchase option.[39] By the amendments made to the Plan on May 6, 2003, the repurchase option has been dropped and the conversion of the "B" Notes may be exercised anytime before September 15, 2008. This puts a serious dent into the oppression argument advanced by the Opposing Creditors concerning the lack of an equity kicker for the Class 2 creditors.

[35] Arguably, the issue now becomes how much equity ought to have been made available to the Class 2 creditors. Jolina accepted its share of a potential 55% of the equity subject to the repurchase option. Uniforêt has removed that option and extended the conversion period by 4 years. The shareholders of Uniforêt, qua shareholders, are not involved in the Plan. Nothing was offered to them and one consequence of the Plan is that whatever interest they now have is going to be diluted. In all the circumstances of this case, the Court concludes that the offer of equity, while perhaps not overly generous when compared to some other recently sanctioned plans,[40] is nevertheless adequate and fair.

D. Bad Faith

[36] The good faith of the Opposing Creditors has been called into question by Madam Justice Zerbisias.[41] The Opposing Creditors assert that Uniforêt "and its allies [...] have shown bad faith of the kind which should convince any reasonable observer that the Plan is neither fair nor reasonable". They point to the treatment accorded the Bank of Montreal $11 million loan, the repayment of part of it,[42] a loan by Jolina of $1.1 million[43] repaid by Uniforêt on March 6, 2001 and Jolina's claim for the purchase of the planer (Class 3).[44]

[37] Suffice it to say that there has been aggressive behaviour displayed by all the parties in the course of this affair, at least some of the time. The Court has already commented on the transactions impugned by the Opposing Creditors.[45] Absent a bankruptcy, these claims will all be resolved eventually, just like the claims of the Opposing Creditors, either in accordance with their terms or subject to the Plan. Again, absent a bankruptcy, the impugned claims don't add any value to the Petitioners' enterprise. However, had the planer never been acquired, the Peribonka mill would not have been as profitable as it was in the 18 months preceding the CCAA filing.

[38] Aggressive behaviour is to be expected in proceedings of this kind.[46] The CCAA favours the survival of businesses and the jobs that go with them. Where, as here, it has been amply demonstrated that the creditors as a whole will fare much better under the Plan than in a liquidation, the solution is obvious. The issue in this case was to decide if a minority group of secured creditors has been materially oppressed by the behaviour of the majority. That case has not been made out. The U.S. noteholders are offered the entire enterprise value of Uniforêt in the form of reconstituted notes and they will receive annual yields on these notes for the next five years varying between some 10% and 17%.

E. The Alternate Plan

[39] While the Court may have the authority to adopt a Plan different from that sought to be sanctioned, it should only exercise that authority if it is satisfied that the proposed Plan is unfair. Moreover, the Alternate Plan proposed by the Opposing Creditors calls for a reorganization of the capital structure of Uniforêt Inc. requiring confiscation of the rights of existing shareholders without their approval being required. The Court has qualified the Plan as both fair and reasonable. The shareholders of Uniforêt have already offered control of their company to the U.S. noteholders. That is quite enough in the circumstances of this case.

[40] FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT:

[41] MAINTAINS Petitioners' Motion to Sanction a Plan of Arrangement;

[42] DISMISSES the Opposing Creditors Re-Amended Particularized Contestation;

[43] SANCTIONS and APPROVES the Second Amended Plan of Compromise and Arrangement (Plan);

[44] PERMITS Petitioners to replace the U.S. Secured Notes, as defined in paragraph 1.1 of the Plan, by two new secured notes for each unpaid U.S. Note, a Note "A" and a Note "B" as described in paragraph 4.2 of the Plan and in virtue of two Trust Agreements previously approved by the Securities and Exchange Commissions of the United States;

[45] DECLARES that the American Trust Indenture, as defined in paragraph 1.1 of the Plan, be amended and updated by the said two Trust Agreements;

[46] DECLARES that all of the Executory Contracts, as defined in paragraph 1.1 of the Plan, save those terminated or repudiated by Petitioners before the "Plan Implementation Date", are in full force and effect as at the Plan Implementation Date, notwithstanding:

a) that Petitioners have obtained relief under the CCAA;
b) the effect on Petitioners of the completion of any one of the transactions contemplated by the Plan;
c) any compromises or arrangements effected pursuant to the Plan;
d) any default with respect to such a contract by Petitioners prior to the Plan Implementation Date; or
e) any automatic termination of any such contract or any purported termination thereof by any Person other than Petitioners the whole in conformity with paragraph 6.7 of the Plan.

[47] DECLARES that no party to an Executory Contract, as defined in paragraph 1.1 of the Plan, shall be entitled to accelerate the obligations of Petitioners or terminate, rescind or repudiate such other party's obligations under an Executory Contract following the Plan Implementation Date on the sole ground:

a) of any event that occurred on or prior to the Plan Implementation Date which would have entitled such party to accelerate Petitioners' obligations under such Executory Contract;
b) that Petitioners have obtained relief under the CCAA;
c) of the effect on Petitioners of the completion of any of the transactions contemplated by the Plan; or
d) of any compromises or arrangements effected pursuant to the Plan.

the whole in conformity with paragraph 6.7 of the Plan.
[48] DECLARES that the date for the implementation of the Plan will be deemed to be the date specified in a Certificate to be filed in the Court record by Petitioners and the Monitor as soon as all the conditions specified in paragraph 5.1 of the Plan have been fulfilled or satisfied.
[49] EXEMPTS Petitioners from furnishing any security;
[50] ORDERS provisional execution of this judgment notwithstanding appeal;
[51] THE WHOLE with costs against the Opposing Creditors and in favour of Petitioners, the Monitor and Jolina Capital Inc.

[1] R.S.C., 1985, c.C-36, section 6 which provides that: 6. [Compromises to be sanctioned by court] Where a majority in number representing two-thirds in value of the creditors, or class of creditors, as the case may be, present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting or meetings thereof respectively held pursuant to sections 4 and 5, or either of those sections, agree to any compromise or arrangement either as proposed or as altered or modified at the meeting or meetings, the compromise or arrangement may be sanctioned by the court, and if so sanctioned is binding (a) on all the creditors or the class of creditors, as the case may be, and on any trustee for any such class of creditors, whether secured or unsecured, as the case may be, and on the company, and (b) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a receiving order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or is in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, on the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator and contributories of the company.
[2] Addressed in large part in the Court's judgment of October 23, 2002 rendered by Madame Justice Zerbisias dealing primarily with classification issues.
[3] Essentially all the assets and undertakings of Uniforêt's operating companies excluding receivables and inventory and specified equipment under capital leases.

Jolina stepped into the shoes of the bank syndicate and took the U.S. Notes acquired by 373 in lieu of payment of the syndicate loan.
[11] 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), (2000) 20 C.B.R. (4th) 1, at page 36: Where a company is insolvent, only the creditors maintain a meaningful stake in its assets. Through the mechanism of liquidation or insolvency legislation, the interests of shareholders are pushed to the bottom rung of the priority ladder. The expectations of creditors and shareholders must be viewed and measured against an altered financial and legal landscape. Shareholders cannot reasonably expect to maintain a financial interest in an insolvent company where creditors' claims are not being paid in full. It is through the lens of insolvency that the court must consider whether the acts of the company are in fact oppressive, unfairly prejudicial or unfairly disregarded. CCAA proceedings have recognized that shareholders may not have "a true interest to be protected" because there is no reasonable prospect of economic value to be realized by the shareholders given the existing financial misfortunes of the company: Royal Oak Mines Ltd., supra, para. 4., Re Cadillac Fairview Inc. (March 7, 1995), Doc. B28/95 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]), and T. Eaton Company, supra. To avail itself of the protection of the CCAA, a company must be insolvent. The CCAA considers the hierarchy of interests and assesses fairness and reasonableness in that context. The court's mandate not to sanction a plan in the absence of fairness necessitates the determination as to whether the complaints of dissenting creditors and shareholders are legitimate, bearing in mind the company's financial state. The articulated purpose of the Act and the jurisprudence interpreting it, "widens the lens" to balance a broader range of interests that includes creditors and shareholders and beyond the company, the employees and the public, and tests the fairness of the plan with reference to its impact on all of its constituents. It is through the lens of insolvency legislation that the rights and interests of both shareholders and creditors must be considered. The reduction or elimination of rights of both groups is a function of the insolvency and not of oppressive conduct in the operation of the CCAA. The antithesis of oppression is fairness, the guiding test for judicial sanction. If a plan unfairly disregards or is unfairly prejudicial it will not be approved. However, the court retains the power to compromise or prejudice rights to effect a broader purpose, the restructuring of an insolvent company, provided that the plan does so in a fair manner.

Further in these particular circumstances there are, in relation to the available tax losses (which is in itself a conditional asset), very substantial amounts of unsecured debt standing on the shareholders' shoulders. That is, the shareholders, even assuming an ongoing operation achieving a turnaround to profitability without restructuring, would have to wait a long while before their interests saw the light of day.

In the unique circumstances of this case, it is appropriate to consider a number of additional matters: a. The composition of the unsecured vote; b. What creditors would receive on liquidation or bankruptcy as compared to the Plan; c. Alternatives available to the Plan and bankruptcy; d. Oppression; e. Unfairness to Shareholders of CAC; and f. This on either basis is well beyond the specific majority requirement of CCAA. Clearly there is a very heavy burden on parties seeking to upset a plan that the required majority have found that they could vote for; given the overwhelming majority this burden is no lighter. FELDMAN J.A.:

[1] This is an application for leave to appeal the order of Spence J. made on March 7, 2002, whereby he sanctioned a Plan of Arrangement (the "Plan" under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-36 ("CCAA") for the respondent, Country Style Group of Corporations. The application is brought under s. 13 of the CCAA which provides:

s. 13 Except in the Yukon Territory, any person dissatisfied with an order or a decision made under this Act may appeal therefrom on obtaining leave of the judge appealed from or of the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies and on such terms as to security and in other respects as the judge or court directs.

[2] The application was originally brought before Spence J. but as he was unable to hear it before April 16, 2002, the date scheduled for the closing of the plan transaction, he suggested that the application be brought to this court.

[3] All three applicants are Country Style franchisees. Only one, Tozeng Limited, is also a creditor that filed a proof of claim and voted in the proceeding.

[4] The applicants concede that on the record before him, Spence J. did not make any error in approving the Plan which was approved by a substantial percentage of the unsecured creditors and by the secured creditor. In fact, no one opposed the approval of the plan at the sanction hearing. The basis for this application is that immediately after the hearing approving the Plan, the applicants became aware of facts which they say vitiate the approval process in three ways:

Digitized by Google

(1) Over a period of time, some franchisees had contributed to Country Style's national advertising fund while others had not. The applicants claim that to the extent that some franchisees thereby overcontributed, they were entitled to claim as creditors against the company for unjust enrichment in the Plan process. However, because they did not know about the overcontribution and unequal treatment until it was too late to claim in the plan process, they have been denied both the amount of their claim and the opportunity to vote for or against the Plan and to participate in the process.

(2) The company was offering improper incentives to creditors to vote for the Plan.

(3) The Monitor was in a conflict of interest.

5. The applicants rely on fresh evidence in order to assert these claims and rely on s. 134(4) of the Courts of Justice Act R.S.O. 1990, c.C-43, which allows a court in a proper case, to accept fresh evidence. In R. v. Palmer, 1979 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 759 at 775, the Supreme Court of Canada set out four criteria for the admission of fresh evidence on appeal, summarized as follows:

(1) by due diligence, the evidence could not have been adduced in the proceeding below;

(2) it is relevant to a decisive or potentially decisive issue;

(3) it is reasonably capable of belief;

(4) if believed, it may reasonably have affected the result.

[5] The respondents object to the admission of the fresh evidence on this application and rely heavily on the assertion that the first criterion, due diligence, has not been met in this case. They also suggest that the record discloses that Mr. English, the principal of Tozeng Limited, did know about the differential treatment of franchisees as long as one year ago.

[6] Mr. O'Kelly on behalf of Country Style, points to the fact that a creditor, Tarragon Mercantile Inc., did propose to oppose the sanction order until an out-of-court settlement was reached on the evening before the sanction motion. Tarragon filed a motion record with the court that contained affidavits outlining some of the allegations on which the applicants now rely (in particular, the alleged irregularities with the proxy solicitation process and the alleged conflict of interest of the Monitor) and raised other matters as well. I am told that Spence J. was advised on the return of the motion that Tarragon was withdrawing its opposition. The plan was thereupon sanctioned by the court. I am advised that no one opposed the order.

[7] Mr. O'Kelly's submission is that because Tarragon was in a position to find out the information necessary to bring forth some of the allegations now asserted by the applicants, the applicants could have done so as well had they exercised due diligence. In my view, on the face of it, there is merit in that submission.

[8] The one issue which is not fully detailed in the Tarragon material is the national advertising fund issue. However, the information relied on in respect of the fund is contained in an affidavit of Catherine Mauro dated March 25, 2002 and filed on this application. She is the former director of marketing and product development who was terminated by Country Style on February 4, 2002. Ms Mauro also provided one of the affidavits which is included in the Tarragon material. Again, therefore, it appears that the applicants could have discovered further information from Ms. Mauro prior to the March 7 hearing had they acted with due diligence in speaking with her.

[9] Even more significant, however, is the fact that in his affidavit filed in connection with the original material seeking court protection, Mr. Gibbons, the President of Country Style, disclosed as part of his description of the financial status of the debtor companies that one of the historical responses by management when a franchisee developed financial difficulties was "deferring or accepting reduced royalty, advertising and/or sign rental payments for a period of time" (affidavit para. 37). This information was also included in the Management proxy circular which was sent out to all creditors, of which Mr. English was one.

[10] The applicants' position is that until they talked to Catherine Mauro after the sanction hearing, they did not know that some franchisees were not paying the full 3.5% of monthly gross sales to the national advertising fund, and that the 13 corporate stores, taken over from failed franchisees, paid nothing into the fund. The applicants also take the position that the company and the monitor made it impossible for the franchisees to learn of this by failing to disclose it to the franchisees. Their evidence is that representations were made to franchisees by senior management that all franchisees paid the same percentage of their sales into the national advertising fund.

[11] However, it appears that there was disclosure of the differential treatment of franchisees in respect of the advertising fund in Mr. Gibbons' affidavit and the Management circular. Counsel also pointed out that franchisees could ask to be added to the service list for all of the documentation and that some were added, including Ms. Board's clients who have been represented by her here in support of the application.

[12] I conclude, based on the material currently before the court, that it cannot be said that there was non-disclosure of the differential treatment of franchisees in respect of the contribution to the national advertising fund, or that the applicants could not have discovered this evidence if they had exercised due diligence. Although it appears that the potential significance of the different contributions as a possible claim against Country Style based on unjust enrichment, may not have been considered by the applicants until after the sanction motion, a failure to appreciate the significance of information does not meet the due diligence test.

[13] Finally, the respondents point to the fact that Mr. English has deposed that in May 2000, he sought and obtained differential treatment in respect of the royalty fees he was paying and that he has been trying to retain the so-called "tiered store" status for his stores which allows them to pay lower fees. Therefore, Mr. English was aware of differentiation among franchisees in respect of some of the amounts payable to the franchiser and wanted to preserve that differentiation when it benefited him. The respondents say this shows that the new evidence should not be accepted and that furthermore, there is no merit to the suggestion that the franchisees have any claim against the debtor company based on alleged overpayments. As a result, they argue that the new evidence would not have affected the outcome of the sanction hearing had it been available at that hearing.

[14] I am satisfied that I need not deal with this part of the submission on this motion, as the due diligence criterion is not met.

[15] Even if the fresh evidence met the test for admission, which it does not on the due diligence criterion, the court must be satisfied that this is a case where leave to appeal ought to be granted. The jurisprudence in this area dictates that leave to appeal in CCAA proceedings should be granted sparingly: Re Consumers Packaging Inc. 2001 CanLII 6708 (ON CA), (2001), 27 C.B.R. (4th) 197 at 199 (Ont. C.A.); Re Blue Range Resources Corp. (1999), 12 C.B.R. 186 at 190 (Alta. C.A.). In order to grant leave the court must be satisfied that there are "serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties": Re Multitech Warehouse Direct Inc. reflex, (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 63 (C.A.). This is determined in accordance with a four-pronged test as follows:

(a) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;
(b) whether the point is of significance to the action;
(c) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or frivolous;
(d) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

[16] As I understand it, the main issue on appeal is the submission that the applicant franchisees and other franchisees, some of whom have filed affidavits in support, over-contributed to the national advertising fund in relation to other franchisees and the company in connection with its corporate stores. This overcontribution entitled them to make a claim against the company for unjust enrichment. However, because they did not know about this potential claim until after the sanction hearing, they did not file claims in the process; they therefore did not have the right to participate as unsecured creditors, and they did not have the right to vote for or against the Plan.

[17] Counsel for the applicants concedes that there is no evidence in the record to demonstrate that had the affected franchisees made claims and voted, the Plan would have been defeated or amended in any way.

[18] Counsel also concedes that no alternative plan has been proferred at any stage. He suggests, however, that because of the circumstances set out, the Plan cannot be considered fair and reasonable. The Monitor has made it clear in its reports that the only alternative to the Plan is bankruptcy or receivership, whereunder there would be nothing for the unsecured creditors. Counsel suggested in argument that his clients would be prepared to see the debtor company go bankrupt rather than proceed with the sanctioned Plan. There is no affidavit evidence to this effect, and I frankly find it hard to accept that franchisees with viable operations would prefer to see the corporate entity with which they are associated be liquidated in a bankruptcy or receivership.

[19] Based on the record, there is nothing to suggest that the Plan as sanctioned and approved by the court is not "fair and reasonable." If leave to appeal is granted, the progress of the action will clearly be hindered and the restructuring may not go ahead at all. If the appeal were to be successful and the process reopened, the applicants do not propose any alternative to the plan, so that the significance to the action appears to be procedural but not substantive.

[20] For all of these reasons, the applicants have not satisfied the test for the court to exercise its discretion to grant leave to appeal.

[21] During argument, counsel for the applicants suggested that one of the problems facing his clients is that they owe money to the debtor company, but are not able to make a claim against the company in respect of the overpayment into the advertising fund because of the orders made in the CCAA process. In response, counsel for Country Style took the position that s. 18.1 of the CCAA preserves the applicants' ability to assert a right of set-off against the company in respect of their claims against any monies which they may owe to the company. In other words, their claims against the company are not necessarily barred.

[22] As this was not an issue for resolution on this leave to appeal motion, I make no comment on (1) the effect of s. 18.1 of the CCAA on post- Plan claims by or against the debtor company; or (2) on the effect of the claims bar order in respect of claims by people who were not listed or served as creditors in the proceeding, or people who did not know that they had claims against the company.

[23] Finally, I note that the franchisees as a group were not considered to be people to be officially served with and included in the CCAA process. I was advised by a representative of the Monitor who was present in court for this appeal, that Mr. Gibbons did send a letter to all franchisees enclosing the original stay order and advising them of the Monitor's website where much of the CCAA material would be posted. Although the process under the Act contemplates the participation and protection of creditors, the debtor company, and possibly the shareholders, in cases where the debtor company is a franchisor, the franchisees may have an interest in the ultimate structure of the franchise operation as proposed by the Plan process. It may therefore be appropriate where a franchisor seeks CCAA protection, to consider whether the franchisees ought to be given notice of the proceedings and the opportunity to request the ability to participate on an appropriate basis.

CONCLUSION

[24] Leave to appeal is denied.

Written Reasons by:
The Honourable Mr. Justice Mackenzie Concurred in by:
The Honourable Madam Justice Rowles
The Honourable Madam Justice Prowse
Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Mackenzie:

[1] This appeal raises the issue of "super-priorities" under the Companies' Creditor Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA"). Can a court grant a priority for the fees and expenses of a court appointed monitor ahead of secured creditors without the consent of those creditors? A subsidiary issue is whether legal fees of the debtor in possession related to a proposed restructuring can be granted a similar priority. For the reasons that follow, I have concluded that equity underpins the court's CCAA jurisdiction and permits orders granting super-priority for the monitor's fees and expenses in appropriate circumstances as well as for the debtor's legal expenses related to a restructuring plan.

[2] Following the hearing of the appeal we advised counsel through the Registry that the appeal was dismissed and that reasons would follow. We have been advised by counsel that this is the first time the issues have come before an appellate court. We are indebted to counsel for their thorough and comprehensive submissions.

Background

[3] In brief, Mr. Justice Tysoe granted an ex parte order under the CCAA on 8 November 1999 staying all execution and enforcement proceedings against the debtor/petitioners. Ernst & Young Inc. was appointed monitor and its reasonable fees and disbursements were ordered to be paid in priority to secured charges. The court also ordered that the reasonable fees and disbursements of counsel for the debtors related to the plan of restructuring should be included with the monitor's fees and disbursements in the defined "administrative charge" and be granted the super-priority over the charges of the secured and other creditors. On 19 November 1999, Tysoe J. dismissed an application by the secured creditors to set aside the stay order and the priority granted for the administrative charge. Tysoe J. reduced the maximum amount of the administration charge from $500,000 to $200,000. The secured creditors have appealed the super-priority granted to the administration charge. They did not appeal the stay of proceedings.

The facts

[4] The debtor/petitioners have carried on an auto wrecking business in Surrey, British Columbia since 1963. They gradually acquired 32 parcels of land aggregating some 150 acres. The business operates on 40 acres employing about 75 people.

[5] The petitioners' financial difficulties started in 1989. Over the years since they have financed losses by mortgaging the real estate.

[6] Foreclosure actions were commenced in late 1998. The mortgagees obtained orders nisi and the redemption periods expired. On 28 July 1999 two of the mortgagees were granted conduct of sale. The 32 parcels have been listed at individual prices aggregating $49.6 million or an en bloc price of $32 million. Appraisals of the property range from $23 million to $48.5 million. The higher estimates are for lot-by-lot sales with no allowance for carrying costs, selling expenses, or developers' profit.

[7] The aggregate debt is $24 million.

[8] The stay order granted by Tysoe J. allowed the conduct of sale to continue but directed that the listing agents were to deal with the petitioners and the monitor rather than with the two mortgagees earlier granted conduct of sale. Tysoe J. summarized the reasons for granting a stay under the CCAA in these terms at para. 17:

> In the present case, the Petitioners have substantial land holdings and an operating business. It is their intention to reorganize their affairs in order to save the auto wrecking business. They have a legitimate concern that an en bloc sale of the lands in the foreclosure proceedings could bring an end to the operating business. In my view, it is not an act of bad faith to seek the protection of the CCAA in order to attempt to save the operating business. The arguments of the secured lenders in this regard would have been more persuasive if the only business of the Petitioners was land holdings, but the Petitioners do have an active business which must be considered.

[9] The petitioners asked for Debtor in Possession ("DIP") financing in the amount of $1.1 million. Tysoe J. refused that request but he did allow a super-priority for legal expenses reasonably incurred in connection with the effort to successfully restructure the petitioners' affairs. He concluded that the cash flow from the business would be insufficient to pay those expenses in the absence of DIP financing. In the result, the allowance for the petitioners' restructuring legal expenses was a limited substitute for DIP financing. The petitioners' counsel's reasonable restructuring legal fees and disbursements for the restructuring were included within the administration charge as defined in the order and subject to the cap on the amount of the administration charge.

The Companies' Creditor Arrangement Act

[10] The CCAA has been controversial since it was first enacted in 1933, in the depths of the Great Depression. It was upheld as constitutional in A.G. Can. v. A.G. Que., 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 659, 16 C.B.R. 1 at 2, [1934] 4 D.L.R. 75. In an often quoted passage Duff C.J.C. summarized the purpose of the statute:

> . . . the aim of the Act is to deal with the existing condition of insolvency in itself to enable arrangements to be made in view of the insolvent condition of the company under judicial authority which, otherwise, might not be valid prior to the initiation of proceedings in bankruptcy. Ex facie it would appear that such a scheme in principle does not radically depart from the normal character of bankruptcy legislation."
> The legislation is intended to have wide scope and allow a judge to make orders which will effectively maintain the status quo for a period while the insolvent company attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for a proposed arrangement which will enable the company to remain in operation for what is, hopefully, the future benefit of both the company and its creditors.

[11] Those observations were reinforced by Gibbs J.A. in Hongkong Bank v. Chef Ready Foods 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (B.C.C.A.) at 315-16:

> The purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business. It is available to any company incorporated in Canada with assets or business activities in Canada that is not a bank, a railway company, a telegraph company, an insurance company, a trust company, or a loan company. When a company has recourse to the C.C.A.A., the Court is called upon to play a kind of supervisory role to preserve the status quo and to move the process along to the point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure. Obviously time is critical. Equally obviously, if the attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success, there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay, hence the powers vested in the Court under s. ll.
> There is nothing in the C.C.A.A. which exempts any creditors of a debtor company from its provisions. The all-encompassing scope of the Act qua creditors is even underscored by s. 8 which negates any contracting out provisions in a security instrument.

Gibbs J.A. concluded (at 320):

> In the exercise of their functions under the C.C.A.A. Canadian courts have shown themselves partial to a standard of liberal construction which will further the policy objectives. See such cases as Meridian Developments Inc. v. Nu-West Ltd., 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 109, 1984 CanLII 1176 (AB QB), [1984] 5 W.W.R. 215, 32 Alta. L.R. (2d) 150, 53 A.R. 39 (Q.B.); Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Insurance Co. of Canada, 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 195, 34 B.C.L.R. (2d) 122, [1989] 3 W.W.R. 363 (C.A.); Re Feifer and Frame Manufacturing Corp., [1947] Que. K.B. 348, 28 C.B.R. 124 (C.A.); Wynden Canada Inc. v. Gaz Métropolitain Inc. (1982), 44 C.B.R. (N.S.) 285 (Que. S.C.); and Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. v. Oakwood Petroleums Ltd., 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 20, 1988 CanLII 3570 (AB QB), [1989] 2 W.W.R. 566, 64 Alta. L.R. (2d) 149 (Q.B.). The trend demonstrated by these cases is entirely consistent with the object and purpose of the C.C.A.A.

[12] These comments emphasize that the CCAA's effectiveness in achieving its objectives is dependent on a broad and flexible exercise of jurisdiction to facilitate a restructuring and continue the debtor as a going concern in the interim.

The Monitor

[13] The CCAA originally contained no reference to a monitor. The term "monitor" appears to have originated in a passage from the judgment of Trainor J. in Re Northland Properties Ltd. (1988), 69 C.B.R. 266 (B.C.S.C.),as follows (at 277):

> I am satisfied that I have jurisdiction to appoint an interim receiver and spell out the responsibilities of that office such that his true role would be that of a monitor or watchdog during the interim period. The cost would be significant, but is not a factor of great weight considering the total indebtedness of the companies.

The jurisdiction relating to interim receivers is a jurisdiction in equity and Trainor J. implicitly relied upon that equitable jurisdiction to support the order.

Digitized by Google

[14] The term "monitor" was picked up by Parliament in a 1997 amendment to the CCAA [S.C. 1997, c. 12, s. 124] and for the first time given statutory recognition. The amendment made appointment of a monitor mandatory. The material portion of the 1997 amendment is as follows:

> Court to appoint monitor
> 11.7(1) When an order is made in respect of a company by the court under section 11, the court shall at the same time appoint a person, in this section and in section 11.8 referred to as "the monitor", to monitor the business and financial affairs of the company while the order remains in effect.
> Auditor may be monitor
> (2) Except as may be otherwise directed by the court, the auditor of the company may be appointed as the monitor.
> Functions of monitor
> (3) The monitor shall
> (a) for the purposes of monitoring the company's business and financial affairs, have access to and examine the company's property, including the premises, books, records, data, including data in electronic form, and other financial documents of the company to the extent necessary to adequately assess the company's business and financial affairs;
> (b) file a report with the court on the state of the company's business and financial affairs, containing prescribed information,
> (i) forthwith after ascertaining any material adverse change in the company's projected cash-flow or financial circumstances,
> (ii) at least seven days before any meeting of creditors under section 4 or 5, or
> (iii) at such other times as the court may order;
> (c) advise the creditors of the filing of the report referred to in paragraph (b) in any notice of a meeting of creditors referred to in section 4 or 5; and
> (d) carry out such other functions in relation to the company as the court may direct.
> Monitor not liable
> (4) Where the monitor acts in good faith and takes reasonable care in preparing the report referred to in paragraph (3)(b), the monitor is not liable for loss or damage to any person resulting from that person's reliance on the report.
> Assistance to be provided
> (5) The debtor company shall
> (a) provide such assistance to the monitor as is necessary to enable the monitor to adequately carry out the monitor's functions; and
> (b) perform such duties set out in section 158 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act as are appropriate and applicable in the circumstances.
> 1997, c. 12, s. 124.
> Non-liability in respect of certain matters
> 11.8(1) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law, where a monitor carries on in that position the business of a debtor company or continues the employment of the company's employees, the monitor is not by reason of that fact personally liable in respect of any claim against the company or related to a requirement imposed on the company to pay an amount where the claim arose before or upon the monitor's appointment.
> Status of claim ranking
> (2) A claim referred to in subsection (1) shall not rank as costs of administration. . . .

The balance of s. 11.8 deals with liability for environmental matters that are not pertinent to this appeal.

[15] The function of the monitor is set out in some detail but the only reference to the cost of carrying out the monitor's function is the oblique reference in s. 11.8(2) that costs of statutory claims on the debtor arising before the monitor's appointment will not rank as a cost of administration. I do not think that it can be inferred that the monitor's costs of administration were otherwise overlooked by Parliament or that Parliament intended that the court have no authority to provide for those costs. The only reasonable conclusion in my opinion is that Parliament was aware of the court's general jurisdiction in equity and assumed that jurisdiction remained available except as inconsistent with the Act. Indeed, by requiring the appointment of a monitor Parliament made a jurisdiction to provide for the monitor's costs of administration even more necessary.

Cases

[16] The first attack on the jurisdiction of the court to grant a super-priority to the monitor's costs of administration came in Re Fairview Industries Ltd. reflex, (1991), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 71 (N.S.T.D.). There Glube C.J. concluded with some reluctance that the court had no authority under the CCAA to grant the monitor a super-priority in payment without the secured creditors' consent. While Glube C.J. referred to Northland Properties, supra, in another context in the judgment, there is no reference to Trainor J.'s analogy of that between a monitor and an interim receiver and the common authority to assign a priority flowing from the court's equitable jurisdiction over interim receivers. Glube C.J. appears to have treated the issue solely as one of statutory construction without reference to any broader equitable jurisdiction.

[17] Later decisions in Ontario and British Columbia have declined to follow Fairview Industries. They have held consistently that the court does have jurisdiction to grant a super-priority for the fees and expenses of the monitor; see Canadian Asbestos Services Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1992), 16 C.B.R. (3d) 114 (Ont. Gen. Div.) Re Starcom International Optics Corp. 1998 CanLII 3832 (BC SC), (1998), 3 C.B.R. (4th) 177 (B.C.S.C.). In Canadian Asbestos Chadwick J. stated (at 123):

> The fruits of the monitors' efforts is for the benefit of all creditors and therefore the monitor and their legal counsel should be paid in advance and before distribution to the creditors.

[18] In Starcom, supra, Saunders J. advanced a similar rationale at 189:

> [I]n my view the order sought is appropriate. The monitor acts on behalf of the court to provide information and monitoring for the benefit of all parties.

Neither Canadian Asbestos nor Starcom specifically referred to the source of the jurisdiction. Macdonald J. in Re Westar Mining Ltd.1992 CanLII 1863 (BC SC), (1992), 14 C.B.R.(3d) 88, relied on in Starcom, referred to the jurisdiction simply as inherent jurisdiction (at 93). Macdonald J. noted that Dickson J., speaking for the Supreme Court of Canada in Baxter Student Housing Ltd. v. College Housing Co-operative Ltd., 1975 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 475, held that inherent jurisdiction with respect to receiver-managers could not be exercised in conflict with a statute. The origins of the receivers' jurisdiction are located in the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and while that jurisdiction cannot be exercised contrary to a statute nothing precludes its exercise to supplement a statute and effect a statutory object.

The receivers' jurisdiction

[19] The Canadian jurisprudence on priorities for receivers' fees and expenses begins with Braid Builders Supply & Fuel Ltd. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp. Ltd. (1972), 17 C.B.R. 305 (Man. C.A.). There Dickson J.A. for the court rejected an argument that a receiver could only be paid from the debtor's remaining equity in the property. He concluded that such a restriction would frustrate the receiver's function (at 307-8):

> . . . The argument is that a receiver can only receive his remuneration and costs from property in which an equity remains. No authority was quoted in support of this proposition. There are cases to the contrary: Strapp v. Bull, Sons & Co.; Shaw v. London School Board, [1895] 2 Ch. 1: Re Glasdir Copper Mines Ltd.; English Electro-Metallurgical Co. v. Glassier Copper Mines Ltd., [1906] 1 Ch. 365. It would seem to us that if appellant's argument is sound, one would be hard put to find anyone willing to be a receiver; he would be denied recovery of his fees and disbursements out of property under his administration if the mortgage load borne by that property exceeded the value of the property. The true worth of property under administration can rarely be determined at the time of appointment. The Court itself has no funds from which to pay a receiver. If his fees cannot be paid from assets under administration of the Court the receiver would be in the untenable position of having to seek recovery from the creditor who, on behalf of all creditors, asked for the appointment. This could work a grave injustice on the receiver and on the petitioning creditor. Why should the latter bear all of the costs in respect of an appointment made for the benefit of all creditors, including secured creditors, for the purpose of preserving the property? The argument also appears to proceed on the assumption that when property subject to a mortgage becomes of a value less than the mortgage debt against it, it ceases to belong to the debtor. Property of a debtor, whatever the amount of the mortgage debt against it, remains the property of the debtor until all steps have been taken in law to foreclose the interest of the debtor. All of the debtor's property under administration of the court, and not merely the equity of the debtor in that property is available by order of the court to meet the fees and disbursements of a receiver.

[20] The issue of the receiver's priority was next visited by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Robert F. Kowal Investment Ltd. v. Deeder Electric Ltd. (1975), 21 C.B.R. (N.S.) 201 (Ont. C.A.). Houlden J.A. for the court relied on Clark on Receivers, 3rd ed., for the proposition that the receiver of a partnership has no power to subject the security of secured creditors of the partnership to liability for the receiver's disbursements. There were, however, exceptions:

1) if a receiver has been appointed with the approval of the holders of security;

Digitized by Google

2) if a receiver has been appointed to preserve and realize assets for the benefit of all interested parties, including secured creditors; or

3) if a receiver has expended money for the necessary preservation or improvement of the property.

[21] Houlden J.A. stated that these three exceptions were not exhaustive. Nonetheless the Kowal statement of exceptions has been influential in subsequent cases and they were applied by this Court in Lochson Holdings Ltd. v. Eaton Mechanical Inc. (1984), 55 B.C.L.R. 54 (C.A.). But as Macdonald J. observed in Westar Mining, supra at 93-94, different considerations apply under the CCAA. The court is concerned with the survival of the debtor company long enough to present a plan of reorganization. That is a broader interest than that of creditors alone. The jurisdiction must expand from the Kowal exceptions to serve that broader interest.

[22] Thus the receivers' jurisdiction and the monitors' jurisdiction are analogous to the extent that they are both rooted in equity but they diverge to the extent that the monitors' jurisdiction serves a broader statutory objective under the CCAA. In my opinion the jurisdiction under the CCAA cannot be restricted to the Kowal exceptions.

Priority for reasonable restructuring legal fees and disbursements of the debtors' counsel

[23] The legal expenses of the debtor in connection with the restructuring were wrapped up with the monitor's fees and expenses in the administration charge for the purposes of the stay order. However, I think they should be examined separately for questions of jurisdiction. As indicated above, Tysoe J. ordered the priority for the debtors' legal expenses as part of the administration charge only after he had refused to order more debtor in possession priority financing. The super-priority for the debtors' legal fees was a substitute for DIP financing and in my opinion, the jurisdictional issue turns on the power of the court to allow a super-priority for DIP financing.

[24] The subject of DIP financing has recently been examined in a trenchant paper by H.A. Zimmerman, Financing the Debtor in Possession, (Insolvency Institute of Canada, 19 November 1999). According to Mr. Zimmerman, the first case authorizing super-priority DIP financing under the CCAA was Willann Investments Ltd. v. Bank of America Canada, [1991] O.J. No. 721 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (Q.L.). In Re Dylex Ltd. and Other Companies (23 January 1995), No. B-4/95, (Ont. Gen. Div.) super-priority DIP financing was granted for the first time over the objection of a secured creditor. According to Mr. Zimmerman the scope of super-priority DIP financing has been extended in recent, as yet unreported, cases including Re Skydome Corporation, Skydome Food Services and SAI Subco Inc. (27 November 1998), No. 98-CL-3179 (Ont. Gen. Div.) and Royal Oak Mines (14 March 1999), No. 99-CL-3278 (Ont. Gen. Div.).

[25] In Canadian Asbestos Services Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal, supra, Chadwick J. granted super-priority for the advancement of additional funds to complete certain specific construction projects, holding that it was for the benefit of all creditors, both secure and non-secure. In Dylex, supra, Houlden J.A. recognized a broader interest, including that of 12,000 employees, as justification for super-priority bridge financing over a secured creditor's objections. The jurisdiction to grant a super-priority for the debtors' restructuring legal expenses, whether separately or as a part of DIP financing rests on the same equitable foundation as the monitor's fees and disbursements and stands or falls on the same considerations.

Conclusions

[26] The petitioners left it very late in the day to apply for CCAA relief. The secured creditors opposed a stay of proceedings and failed. No appeal was taken from that part of the order which involved discretion of the chambers judge. Once the decision to grant relief was made, the monitor is required and I conclude that adequate security for the monitor's reasonable costs of administration necessarily follows. The question then becomes simply whether a super-priority ahead of secured creditors is necessary to provide that security in the circumstances of any particular case.

[27] The secured creditors contend that the super-priority for the monitor can only be supported if the case falls within the second Kowal exception, circumstances where the appointment is "to preserve and realize assets for the benefit of all interested parties, including secured creditors". Here it is contended that the objective is to effect a partial sale of the real estate assets for a price sufficient to pay the creditors and still leave sufficient land to permit the active business to continue. That would benefit other parties but not the secured creditors who could be paid out from an en bloc sale. The secured creditors have no interest in preserving the active business.

[28] The object of the CCAA is more than the preservation and realization of assets for the benefit of creditors, as several courts have underlined. In Chef Ready, supra, Gibbs J.A. said that the primary purpose is to facilitate an arrangement to permit the debtor company to continue in business and to hold off the creditors long enough for a restructuring plan to be prepared and submitted for approval. The court has a supervisory role and the monitor is appointed "to monitor the business and financial affairs of the company" for the court. The appointment of a monitor is mandatory when the court grants CCAA relief.

[29] Dickson J.A. pointed out in Braid Builders, supra, that receivers will not accept an appointment without reasonable assurance that they will be paid. That is equally true for monitors. When, as here, the cash flow from operations is insufficient to assure payment and asset values exceeding secured charges are in doubt, granting a super-priority is the only practical means of securing payment. In such circumstances, if a super-priority cannot be granted without the consent of secured creditors, then those creditors would have an effective veto over CCAA relief. I do not think that Parliament intended that the objects of the Act could be indirectly frustrated by secured creditors.

[30] In my opinion, an equitable jurisdiction is available to support the monitor which is sufficiently flexible to be adapted to the monitor's role under the CCAA. It is a time honoured function of equity to adapt to new exigencies. At the same time it should not be overlooked that costs of administration and DIP financing can erode the security of creditors and CCAA orders should only be made if there is a reasonable prospect of a successful restructuring. That determination is largely a matter of judgment for the judge at first instance and appellate courts normally will be slow to interfere with an exercise of discretion.

[31] In my opinion, super-priority for DIP financing rests on the same jurisdictional foundation in equity. Priority for the reasonable restructuring fees and disbursements could have been allowed as part of DIP financing. It is immaterial that they have been allowed here as part of the administration charge.

[32] I would dismiss the appeal for these reasons.

Restriction — certain Crown claims - Sec 6(3)

(3) Unless Her Majesty agrees otherwise, the court may sanction a compromise or arrangement only if the compromise or arrangement provides for the payment in full to Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, within six months after court sanction of the compromise or arrangement, of all amounts that were outstanding at the time of the application for an order under section 11 or 11.02 and that are of a kind that could be subject to a demand under

(a) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act;

(b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, or a premium under Part VII.1 of that Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts; or

(c) any provision of provincial legislation that has a purpose similar to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act, or that refers to that subsection, to the extent that it provides for the collection of a sum, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts, and the sum

(i) has been withheld or deducted by a person from a payment to another person and is in respect of a tax similar in nature to the income tax imposed on individuals under the Income Tax Act, or

(ii) is of the same nature as a contribution under the Canada Pension Plan if the province is a "province providing a comprehensive pension plan" as defined in subsection 3(1) of the Canada Pension Plan and the provincial legislation establishes a "provincial pension plan" as defined in that subsection.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice James B. Chadwick of the Superior Court of Justice dated December 19, 2003.

MACPHERSON J.A.:

A. OVERVIEW

[1] This appeal arises out of a recent financial crisis experienced by the Ottawa Senators, a National Hockey League franchise. The dispute which gave rise to the litigation involves the Minister of National Revenue on one side and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce ("CIBC") and Fleet National Bank ("Fleet") on the other side.

[2] Specifically, the appellant, the Attorney General of Canada representing the Minister of National Revenue ("the Crown"), appeals a decision of Justice James Chadwick dated December 19, 2003, in which he held, inter alia, that:

(1) the Crown does not have priority over the respondent banks with respect to penalties and interest on deemed trust amounts required to be deducted from employees' wages; and

(2) the Crown does not have priority over the respondent banks with respect to the Goods and Services Tax ("GST") collected by the hockey team on behalf of the Crown but not remitted to the Receiver General.

B. FACTS

(1) The parties and the events

[3] On the ice, with players like Daniel Alfredsson, Zdeno Chara and Wade Redden, the Ottawa Senators are a skilled and successful National Hockey League team.

[4] Off the ice, the story is different. For many years, the Ottawa Senators have been mired in serious financial difficulties, which reached crisis proportions in late 2002. Two of its major secured creditors were CIBC and Fleet, which were owed $40 million and $20 million respectively.

[5] On January 9, 2003, Chadwick J. made an order declaring the Ottawa Senators Hockey Club Corporation and several related companies (collectively, the "Senators") to be debtor companies to which the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA") applied.

[6] Chadwick J. appointed PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. (the "Monitor") as monitor and ordered the Senators to prepare and file a plan of arrangement or compromise under the CCAA. He also imposed a stay of proceedings, including enforcement proceedings by any government against the Senators.

Digitized by Google

[7] Initially, the Monitor explored a restructuring proposal advanced by the Bryden Group. When these negotiations foundered, the Monitor embarked on a process of selling the Senators' assets, which was authorized by paragraph 39 of the court order.

[8] On May 7, 2003, the Monitor filed its Fourth Report to Court (the "Report"), in which it recommended the sale of the Senators to Capital Sports& Entertainment Inc. for $100 million. Attached as Appendix A of this report was a proposed Schedule of Interim Distribution as of Closing, including $25.7 million to CIBC and $12.8 million to Fleet, which was about two-thirds of the amounts they were owed by the Senators.

[9] In addition, the Monitor recommended that $2 million be set aside for distribution on the "CCRA Claim", which was the potential claim of the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency on account of unremitted payroll source deductions and GST, as well as interest and penalties, all for the month of December 2002. The Monitor described this component of its proposed distribution in the Report in this fashion:

> In addition to the secured debt, the balance sheet prepared by Management as of February 28, 2003 indicates there is approximately $1.9 million owed to CCRA for amounts which may have priority to all of [the Senators'] secured and unsecured creditors.

[10] On May 9, 2003, Chadwick J. made an order under the CCAA and "In the Matter of a Proposed Plan of Arrangement" approving the sale of the Senators. The order provided:

> 2. THIS COURT ORDERS that the Fourth Report of the Monitor and the activities of the Monitor as set out in the Fourth Report, including the Schedule of Interim Distribution set forth in Appendix "A" to the Fourth Report, be and are hereby ratified and approved.

(2) The litigation

[11] The Crown and the banks qua secured creditors agreed that the Crown was entitled to receive $1,718,567.80 from the sale proceeds. This amount represented collected but unremitted payroll source deductions to which the Crown was entitled under various deemed trust provisions in the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.) (the "ITA"), the Canada Pension Plan, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-8 (the "CPP"), and the Employment Insurance Act, S.C. 1996, c. 23 (the "EIA").

[12] Unfortunately, the parties disagreed about whether the Crown's claim for interest and penalties on account of unremitted payroll source deductions under the above-noted statutes takes priority over the claims of secured creditors. The amount in dispute in this category is $196,709.14.

[13] The parties also disagreed about whether the Crown's claim for unremitted GST, interest and penalties, collected under the Excise Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-15 (the "ETA"), takes priority over the claims of secured creditors. The amount in dispute in this category is $187,470.25.

[14] The Crown brought the matter before Chadwick J. by way of a motion. The motion judge reviewed the many statutory provisions in issue and the leading case authorities and reached these conclusions:

(1) The Crown does not have priority over the banks with respect to penalties and interest on deemed trust amounts required to be deducted from employees' wages; and

(2) The Crown does not have priority over the banks with respect to unremitted GST, penalties and interest.

[15] The Crown appeals the motion judge's decision in (1) and his decision in (2) relating to unremitted GST. The Crown does not appeal the motion judge's decision in (2) relating to penalties and interest on unremitted GST.

[16] For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal with respect to (1) and allow the appeal with respect to (2).

C. Issues

[17] The issues are:

(1) Did the motion judge err in holding that the Crown does not have priority over secured creditors in CCAA proceedings with respect to penalties and interest on deemed trust amounts required to be deducted from employees' wages by the ITA, CPP and ETA?

(2) Did the motion judge err in holding that the Crown does not have priority over secured creditors in CCAA proceedings with respect to unremitted GST collected under the ETA?

D. Analysis

(1) Penalties and interest on unremitted deductions from employees' wages

[18] The motion judge delivered careful and comprehensive reasons for judgment. On this first issue, he considered the relationship between s. 227 of the ITA and ss. 18.3 and 18.4 of the CCAA. He concluded:

> In my view, section 18.3 does not provide any special priority to the Crown for interest and penalties and therefore the provisions of section 18.3(4) [sic, s. 18.4] would apply.

Digitized by Google

> There does not appear to be any provisions in section 18.4 which would exempt the Crown or change their priority as such they would rank as unsecured creditors regarding the penalty and interest. The Crown may have other remedies pursuant to section 227.1(1) of the Income Tax Act.

[19] The Crown does not contest this analysis and conclusion. However, the Crown contends that the motion judge erred by not considering s. 18.2(1) of the CCAA, which provides:

> 18.2(1) If an order contains a provision authorized by subsection 11.4(1), unless Her Majesty consents, no compromise or arrangement shall be sanctioned by the court that does not provide for the payment in full to Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province, within six months after court sanction of the compromise or arrangement, of all amounts that were outstanding at the time of the application for an order under section 11 and that are of a kind that could be subject to a demand under
> (a) subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act;
> (b) any provision of the Canada Pension Plan or of the Employment Insurance Act that refers to subsection 224(1.2) of the Income Tax Act and provides for the collection of a contribution, as defined in the Canada Pension Plan, or an employee's premium, or employer's premium, as defined in the Employment Insurance Act, and of any related interest, penalties or other amounts;

[20] The Crown contends that the sale of the Senators, approved by the court on May 9, 2003, was a compromise or arrangement within the meaning of s. 18.2(1) of the CCAA and that penalties and interest were payments that "could be subject to a demand" under s. 224(1.2) of the ITA and companion provisions in the CPP and EIA. Accordingly, the court could not sanction the sale without providing for payment in full of penalties and interest, in addition to the amounts actually collected from employees' wages.

[21] I do not believe that this appeal provides a proper forum to address this issue on the merits. I say this for three reasons.

[22] First, there is a real possibility that this issue was not argued before the motion judge. Two of three appeal counsel were also counsel on the motion; one thinks the argument was advanced, the other does not. I accept, absolutely, the honesty of both counsel. However, I note that the motion record filed by the Crown listed several statutory provisions on which the Crown would rely; s. 18.2 of the CCAA was not one of them. Moreover, the Crown factum was written almost entirely in terms of an argument grounded in s. 18.3 of the CCAA; there is but a single reference, in a 20 page factum, to s. 18.2. Not surprisingly, the bank's responding factum dealt exclusively with the Crown's extended argument relating to s. 18.3 of the CCAA.

[23] In addition, I observe that the motion judge engaged in an extensive analysis of s. 18.3 of the CCAA and a particularly full consideration of the GST issue. It is difficult for me to accept that he would completely ignore the argument grounded in s. 18.2 of the CCAA if it was squarely advanced before him.

[24] Second, we are hampered on this issue by an inadequate motion record which makes it difficult to properly consider the Crown's argument relating to s. 18.2 of the CCAA.

[25] The core of the Crown's argument is that a sale of the assets of a company is a compromise or arrangement that triggers the application of s. 18.2 of the CCAA. The words "compromise" and "arrangement" first appear in ss. 4 and 5 of the CCAA (they are not defined in the act). Section 5 relates to secured creditors, such as the banks in this case, and provides:

> Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its secured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company or of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.

[26] It can be seen that this provision ties together a compromise or an arrangement with a formal meeting of creditors. Section 6 of the CCAA then mandates an additional step, namely a sanctioning by the court of a compromise or arrangement if it is approved by a majority vote, representing two-thirds in value, of the creditors or class of creditors.

[27] In this appeal, the Crown asserts that a sale can be a compromise or an arrangement, and that a formal meeting of creditors to vote on it is irrelevant. The banks take the opposite position; they submit that the motion judge was not asked to approve a compromise or arrangement and therefore could ignore s. 18.2 of the CCAA.

Digitized by Google

[28] I think that the record that was before the motion judge provides an inadequate foundation on which to resolve these rather bald and opposing assertions. The Crown motion record consisted of a brief seven paragraph affidavit from Brian Murphy, a research officer with the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. There is nothing in this affidavit indicating whether the formal process for approval of a compromise or arrangement, as set out in ss. 4, 5 and 6 of the CCAA, was followed in this case. Without knowing whether the formal process was followed, I do not think that the motion judge, or this court, could engage in a proper analysis grounded in s. 18.2 of the CCAA.

[29] Third, and less significantly, I note that the Crown's claim on this issue is for $196,709.14. I observe that the court's order dated May 9, 2003 confirmed a proposed distribution to the Crown for "CCRA Claims" of $2 million. This component of the order was not appealed.

[30] On consent, the Crown has already received $1,718,567.80 pursuant to various statutory deemed trusts. In addition, my proposed disposition of the GST issue on this appeal would result in the Crown receiving an additional $187,470.25. These two amounts total $1,906,038.05. This means that there is, at most, $93,961.95 to potentially respond to the Crown's claim for $196,709.14. I confess that this is not a large factor in my mind, however, I am comforted in the knowledge that my unease about deciding a difficult legal issue without the benefit of a full record, and probably where the issue was not raised before the motion judge, appears to implicate much less money than the Crown asserts.

(2) Unremitted GST payments

[31] The second issue in this appeal arises out of a clear conflict between provisions in two federal statutes, s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA and s. 222(3) of the ETA.

[32] Section 18.3(1) of the CCAA provides:

> 18.3(1) [N]otwithstanding any provision in federal or provincial legislation that has the effect of deeming property to be held in trust for Her Majesty, property of a debtor company shall not be regarded as held in trust for Her Majesty unless it would be so regarded in the absence of that statutory provision [emphasis added].

[33] Section 222(1) of the ETA provides that every person who collects GST is deemed for all purposes to hold the amount in trust for the Crown, despite any security interest held by others. Section 222(3) provides:

> 222(3) Despite any other provision of this Act (except subsection (4)), any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act), any enactment of a province or any other law, if at any time an amount deemed by subsection (1) to be held by a person in trust for Her Majesty is not remitted to the Receiver General or withdrawn in the manner and at the time provided under this Part, property of the person and property held by any secured creditor of the person that, but for a security interest, would be property of the person, equal in value to the amount so deemed to be held in trust, is deemed
> (a) to be held, from the time the amount was collected by the person, in trust for Her Majesty, separate and apart from the property of the person, whether or not the property is subject to a security interest, and
> (b) to form no part of the estate or property of the person from the time the amount was collected, whether or not the property has in fact been kept separate and apart from the estate or property of the person and whether or not the property is subject to a security interest > and is property beneficially owned by Her Majesty in right of Canada despite any security interest in the property or in the proceeds thereof and the proceeds of the property shall be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all security interests [emphasis added].

[34] The effect of s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA is that GST amounts that are deemed to be a trust under the ETA would, under the terms of the CCAA, only be considered as trust property if they constituted a trust at common law or in equity. The banks submit that GST amounts do not constitute trust property at common law or in equity. The Crown does not contend otherwise.

[35] Section 222(3) of the ETA states the opposite. It provides that if an amount is deemed under s. 222(1) to be held in trust for the Crown and is not remitted according to the ETA, property of the debtor in an amount of equal value is deemed to be held in trust for the Crown and does not form a part of the property of the debtor. Such property is considered to be beneficially owned by the Crown and the proceeds of the property are to be paid to the Receiver General in priority to all other security interests.

Digitized by Google

[36] Two other features of the ETA and CCAA provisions should be noted because they relate to well-known aids for the interpretation of statutes. The ETA is a statute of general application; the CCAA is a much more specialized statute. Section 18.3 of the CCAA was enacted on September 30, 1997; ss. 222(1) and (3) of the ETA were enacted on October 20, 2000.

[37] The conflict cannot be resolved by the trumping words that are often found in statutes because both statutes contain such words: "notwithstanding any provision in federal or provisional legislation" in s. 18.3(1) of the CCAA, and "Despite...any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act)" in s. 222(3) of the ETA.

[38] The motion judge resolved the conflict in favour of the CCAA. In so doing, he declined to follow two decisions of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench that gave precedence to the ETA: Re Solid Resources Ltd., [2002] A. J. No. 1651, and Re Gauntlet Energy Corporation (Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act) 2003 ABQB 894 (CanLII), (2003), 352 A. R. 28.

[39] The motion judge carefully reviewed the words in the two provisions, various maxims of statutory construction, the policy underlying the CCAA, the two decisions of superior court judges in Alberta and, especially, a highly relevant decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in City of Verdun v. Doré, 1997 CanLII 315 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 862.

[40] The two maxims of statutory construction considered by the motion judge were implied repeal (potential result – the later ETA provision impliedly repealed the earlier CCAA provision), and implied exception (potential result – the more specific CCAA provision should be removed from the ambit of the more general ETA provision). In the end, he opted for the latter interpretation. He concluded:

> The doctrine of implied exception has been used in the past to interpret provisions of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and notwithstanding a decision of the Alberta Queen's Bench, I would apply the doctrine to the interpretation here. As such, the Crown will not be entitled to a super priority in relation to G.S.T. but would rank as an unsecured creditor in accordance with the provisions of section 18(4) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

[41] With respect, I do not agree with the motion judge's conclusion on this issue, essentially for two reasons.

[42] First, the overarching rule of statutory interpretation is that statutory provisions should be interpreted to give effect to the intention of the legislature in enacting the law. This primary rule takes precedence over all maxims or canons or aids relating to statutory interpretation, including the maxim that the specific prevails over the general (generalia specialibus non derogant). As expressed by Hudson J. in Canada v. Williams, 1944 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1944] S.C.R. 226 at 239:

> The maxim generalia specialibus non derogant is relied on as a rule which should dispose of the question, but the maxim is not a rule of law but a rule of construction and bows to the intention of the legislature, if such intention can reasonably be gathered from all of the relevant legislation.

See also: Pierre-André Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, 3rd ed. (Scarborough: Carswell, 2000) at 361.

[43] The legislative intent of s. 222(3) of the ETA is clear. If there is a conflict with "any other enactment of Canada (except the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act)", s. 222(3) prevails. In these words Parliament did two things: it decided that s. 222(3) should trump all other federal laws and, importantly, it addressed the topic of exceptions to its trumping decision and identified a single exception, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (the "BIA"). The BIA and the CCAA are closely related federal statutes. I cannot conceive that Parliament would specifically identify the BIA as an exception, but accidentally fail to consider the CCAA as a possible second exception. In my view, the omission of the CCAA from s. 222(3) of the ETA was almost certainly a considered omission.

[44] Second, and again with respect, I think that the motion judge erred in his treatment of Doré. Doré, like this appeal, involved two statutes, both of which contained 'notwithstanding any other enactment' provisions. The provision in the Cities and Towns Act, R.S.Q., c. C-19 (the "CTA"), relating to the time (15 days) within which a person seeking damages for bodily injury caused by an accident had to serve notice on a defendant municipality was both earlier and more specific than the provision in the Civil Code of Quebec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 (the "Civil Code"), which set out a three-year notice period for actions relating to bodily injuries.

[45] After an extensive review of both statutes and the relevant principles of statutory interpretation, Gonthier J., writing for a unanimous court, concluded that the later, but more general, provision in the Civil Code prevailed. He stated at p. 887:

> The appellant argued in this Court that s. 585 C.T.A., which states that the prior notice requirement is applicable, "any provision of law to the contrary notwithstanding", must take precedence over art. 2930 C.C.Q., which is a general provision of the Civil Code. It based this argument on the rule of interpretation that subsequent general legislation is deemed not to derogate from a prior special Act ("generalia specialibus non derogant"). This argument cannot be accepted. The legislature has expressly given art. 2930 C.C.Q. precedence: "Notwithstanding any stipulation to the contrary". It has therefore specified that the subsequent general legislation derogates from the prior special Act. Accordingly, it is not necessary to rely on the "generalia specialibus non derogant" rule of interpretation in this case. In The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, supra, Professor Côté stated the following on this point at pp. 299-300:

> A variety of well-known terms is used. The statute will declare that it applies "notwithstanding" provisions to the contrary.
> . . .
> Ordinary rules of interpretation hold that general statutes are set aside by subsequent general legislation, even without a "notwithstanding clause". Therefore, the only possible interpretation of "notwithstanding any inconsistent provision" is that it applies to prior special legislation, which would otherwise have precedence. By virtue of the rule of effectivity such a clause must be construed as applying to prior special legislation. [Citation omitted.]

Thus, although both provisions in issue here provide that they take precedence, the more recent, art. 2930 C.C.Q., must prevail.

[46] In my view, the situation in the present appeal is identical to the one in Doré. Section 18.3(1) of the CCAA is earlier and more specific than s. 222(3) of the ETA. Both provisions contain 'notwithstanding any other enactment' language. Accordingly, the analysis in the passage set out above compels a decision giving precedence to s. 222(3) of the ETA.

[47] The motion judge chose to distinguish Doré on the basis that there are special features of the Civil Code that contributed to the analysis in Doré. For example, at p. 874 Gonthier J. stated that "unlike statute law in the common law, the Civil Code is not a law of exception, and this must be taken into account in interpreting it." This observation, and other passages in Gonthier J.'s reasoning, led the motion judge to conclude:

> One can conclude from these remarks, the court does not have to apply this method of interpretation in each case and must examine the legislation in question to determine the proper interpretation.

[48] With respect, I do not agree with this conclusion. There were two issues in Doré. The first related to the substantive meaning or content of the Civil Code provision. On this issue, Gonthier J. discussed in some detail the special nature of the Civil Code, including how it differed from statute law in the common law system.

[49] However, having determined the first issue, Gonthier J. turned to the second issue, resolving the conflict between the CTA and the Civil Code. On this issue, his analysis and conclusion, especially in the passage at p. 887 set out above, are succinct and clear. The 'notwithstanding any other enactment' language in a later and general statute prevails over the same language in an earlier and more specific statute. Accordingly, I agree with LoVecchio J. who said in Gauntlet Energy at para. 17:

> The decision in Doré is binding on me and the reasoning in the case dictates that the deemed trust provision of the ETA apply in CCAA proceedings, notwithstanding ss. 18(3) of the CCAA.

E. Disposition

[50] I would dismiss the appeal on the issue of penalties and interest relating to deductions from employees' wages under the ITA, CPP and EIA. I would allow the appeal on the issue of unremitted GST payments under the ETA.

[51] I would award costs to the appellant fixed at $5,000, inclusive of disbursements and GST.

an amount referred to in subsection (3) that became due after the time of the application for an order under section 11.02.

Restriction — employees, etc. - Sec 6(5)

(5) The court may sanction a compromise or an arrangement only if

(a) the compromise or arrangement provides for payment to the employees and former employees of the company, immediately after the court's sanction, of

(i) amounts at least equal to the amounts that they would have been qualified to receive under paragraph 136(1)(d) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act if the company had become bankrupt on the day on which proceedings commenced under this Act, and

(ii) wages, salaries, commissions or compensation for services rendered after proceedings commence under this Act and before the court sanctions the compromise or arrangement, together with, in the case of travelling salespersons, disbursements properly incurred by them in and about the company's business during the same period; and

(b) the court is satisfied that the company can and will make the payments as required under paragraph (a).

ENDORSEMENT
(CUPE Appeal)

[1] CUPE appealed the decision of July 30, 2004, rendered by Geoffrey Morawetz as Claims Officer ("CO") with respect to CUPE's pay equity claim. At the end of the hearing today I dismissed the appeal and promised written reasons. These are those written reasons.

[2] At paragraphs 36 and 37 of his reasons, the CO stated:

> (36) CUPE's pay equity claim is a contingent claim in that it has not been successful on its merits as of the date of the commencement of Air Canada's CCAA proceedings. The contingency in question is the resolution of the pay equity complaint process underway before the Tribunal (and possibly the courts via appeals of the Tribunal's decision). As with any contingent claim, there are two fundamental aspects to the determination of the claim; namely, (i) as assessment of the happening of the contingency in question; and (ii) the quantification of the claim. If CUPE successfully discharges its onus of establishing that there is some basis to presuppose the happening of the contingency, a reasonable value must then be established for the claim (and it is common in practice to discount the aggregate value of the claim in a "best case" scenario by some reasonable percentage that reflects the risk that a less optimistic scenario may in fact result). For the reasons that follow, I find that CUPE has failed to provide any evidence to substantiate the happening of the contingency in question and that the quantification of CUPE's contingent claim would in any event be negligible.
> (37) There is, in these proceedings, a Claims Procedure Order of Farley J. dated September 18, 2003, as amended by Order of Farley J. dated July 9, 2004, which provides that all creditors (including CUPE with respect to its pay equity claim for the Relevant Period) must prove their claims in accordance with the procedures set out therein. In short, CUPE has to prove its claim now, and not at some future date, and the failure to do so results in CUPE being barred from asserting such a claim at a future date. If CUPE fails to adduce sufficient evidence to substantiate its contingent pay equity claim at the present time, it is not open to CUPE to assert that some weight ought to be given to the likelihood or possibility that it may, in the future, be able to adduce sufficient evidence so as to prove its claim in respect of the Relevant Period. That is to say, I cannot conclude that there is a 50% chance (or 40%, or 30%, etc.) that CUPE will be able to substantiate its claim in the future if it has not already done so in these proceedings and that some percentage of the value of its pay equity claim ought to be allowed at this time. CUPE cannot on the one hand admit that it has no evidence to substantiate its claim at the present time and on the other hand seek to have a claim admitted by the Monitor nonetheless on the basis that it might at some date find evidence to substantiate its claim. The merits of CUPE's contingent pay equity claim must be established in these proceedings.

He went on to observe at paragraph 39:

> (39) To be clear, this is not a situation in which CUPE has a valid claim, the value of which is simply uncertain or difficult to compute; rather, I find that CUPE has not proved that it has any claim at all.

Further at paragraph 40, the CO stated:

> (40) ... As noted by counsel to Air Canada, there are three pre-requisite elements of a human rights complaint, without which there is no claim: (i) difference in wages; (ii) within the same establishment; and (iii) the performance of work of equal value as between the groups in question. ... But, with respect to the third criterion, I agree with Air Canada that there is no evidence before me to indicate that the work performed by Flight Attendants is of equal value to the work performed by the Comparative Groups, which is the very basis of CUPE's claim. It is entirely unclear that there is any principled basis of comparison between Flight Attendants and the Comparative Groups and, in any event, no evidence before me > that the outcome of such comparison establishes that there is work of equal value being performed.

[3] CUPE submitted that notwithstanding my views in Re Olympia & York Developments Ltd., [1994] O.J. No. 1335 (Gen. Div.), that I should follow the Alberta practice as set out by Paperny, J. in Re Canadian Airlines Corp., [2001] A.J. No. 226 (Q.B.) of hearing this matter on a de novo basis as opposed to a true appeal. Even if I were to agree with that notwithstanding the difference in practice related to Alberta Masters, I would observe that on the basis of the record before me, I would have come up with the same conclusions as the CO save and except as to what I might describe as wholehearted acceptance of his views at paragraph 46 when he describes "the intuitive appeal of Air Canada's argument with respect to the manner in which wages are determined". It is clear from his reference later in that paragraph to "yet another reason" that this argument of Air Canada was not a determinative feature. Indeed it may well be that the CO merely intended paragraph 46 to be simply a point which could be characterized as a buttressing observation on a check of reasonability, not that there is an obligation to do so to provide a foundation for a pay equity claim. Collective bargaining is a process of give and take. Secondly I would not be of the view that as per his observation in paragraph 47 that CUPE had an obligation to lead evidence as to:

> (b) more importantly, that the wage gap cannot be explained, in full or in part, by factors other than system gender discrimination (such as consideration of the factors set out in section 11(2) of the CHRA).

While it would seem to me that CUPE was not under any positive obligation to provide such evidence (that seemingly being Air Canada's role if it wished to do so), again that observation by the CO is not in my view determinative of the wage gap question.

[4] See also my views in Re Air Canada (Corporate Travel Management CTM Inc.) and Re Air Canada (Always Travel Inc.) matters released August 3 and 5, 2004 respectively relying on the Court of Appeal decision in Shelson v. Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP, [2004] O.J. No. 850 (C.A.) released March 9, 2004 at paragraph 20 relating to deference notwithstanding that a matter may be decided originally on a paper record.

[5] The onus is on a claimant to prove its claim. As discussed in paragraph 38 of his reasons, the CO required that "CUPE must demonstrate that its claim is not too speculative or remote, but it need not establish that success is probable". He went on to say at paragraph 39:

> (39) In the present case, I am satisfied for the reasons set out below that CUPE's claim has not been proven. The claim is remote and speculative as there is no evidence to substantiate that the claim has any merit. To be clear, this is not a situation in which CUPE has a valid claim, the value of which is simply uncertain or difficult to compute; rather, I find that CUPE has not proved that it has any claim at all.

It seems to me to be an unreasonable analysis of his reasoning that would allow CUPE to advance at paragraph 46 of its factum:

> (46) To require scientific certainty is to set up inappropriate roadblocks to the goal of the CHRA, namely to remedy discrimination…

The fact of the matter is that CUPE provided no evidence as to the particular case involving Air Canada (and the "merged Canadian Airlines" question) as to the third criterion.

[6] It is indeed troubling that a Canadian Human Rights Act / pay equity case could rattle around the Commission, the Tribunal and the courts for 14 years and for this Court to be advised that it is likely to take another decade before this matter can be adjudicated to the end under that legislation. However, that process is not the one which is required to be followed in the determination of a claim under the CCAA. Contingent unliquidated claims are determined under the CCAA claims process even in the most complicated of litigation and even though a claim may not have been actually initiated in a court or otherwise. I do not wish or intend to minimize the hurdles and hoops which may be involved in the payment equity litigation in the established "ordinary course", but I would observe that if CUPE had provided an acceptable expert report on job evaluation, even if in "simplified form" (as opposed to no evidence), then Air Canada would have had to respond to that evidence. Would that report have had to be precise (apparently to the degree envisaged by parties in pay equity disputes)? The simple answer to that is that is not necessary in a CCAA claims process.

[7] The appeal is dismissed. While that claim as agreed between Air Canada and CUPE only deals with the monetary aspect of the claim up to September 30, 2004, I would trust that with respect to the process otherwise continuing, that with respect to the determination of this as with any other human rights issue (which the Supreme Court of Canada has determined should be regarded as a quasi-constitutional right) such determination can be accomplished with cooperation in very significantly less time than a further decade. The resolution of such an important question demands nothing less.

Restriction — pension plan - Sec 6(6)

(6) If the company participates in a prescribed pension plan for the benefit of its employees, the court may sanction a compromise or an arrangement in respect of the company only if

(a) the compromise or arrangement provides for payment of the following amounts that are unpaid to the fund established for the purpose of the pension plan:

(i) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were deducted from the employees' remuneration for payment to the fund,

(ii) if the prescribed pension plan is regulated by an Act of Parliament,

(A) an amount equal to the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that was required to be paid by the employer to the fund, and

(B) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985,

(C) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that were required to be paid by the employer to the administrator of a pooled registered pension plan, as defined in subsection 2(1) of the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act, and

(iii) in the case of any other prescribed pension plan,

(A) an amount equal to the amount that would be the normal cost, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Regulations, 1985, that the employer would be required to pay to the fund if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament, and

(B) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that would have been required to be paid by the employer to the fund under a defined contribution provision, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, if the prescribed plan were regulated by an Act of Parliament,

(C) an amount equal to the sum of all amounts that would have been required to be paid by the employer in respect of a prescribed plan, if it were regulated by the Pooled Registered Pension Plans Act; and

(b) the court is satisfied that the company can and will make the payments as required under paragraph (a).

Non-application of subsection (6) - Sec 6(7)

(7) Despite subsection (6), the court may sanction a compromise or arrangement that does not allow for the payment of the amounts referred to in that subsection if it is satisfied that the relevant parties have entered into an agreement, approved by the relevant pension regulator, respecting the payment of those amounts.

Payment — equity claims - Sec 6(8)

(8) No compromise or arrangement that provides for the payment of an equity claim is to be sanctioned by the court unless it provides that all claims that are not equity claims are to be paid in full before the equity claim is to be paid.

PART II

JURISDICTION OF COURTS

Summary: Jurisdiction of Courts and Powers in Tailoring Compromises and Arrangements - Sections 9 to 18

Section 9 sets the venue for CCAA applications to be the provincial court where the debtor has his head office or chief place of business. Failing that, if the debtor resides outside of Canada, it's where any of the debtor's assets are situated.

Subsection 9(2) vests the proceedings of the CCAA petition to be with one judge, subject to appeal.

Section 10 states that the application for CCAA protection shall be commenced with a petition or originating motion in practice of that court.

Subsection 10(2) details the documents that must be presented in accompany with the application, that being:

> (a) a statement indicating, on a weekly basis, the projected cash flow of the debtor company;
> (b) a report containing the prescribed representations of the debtor company regarding the preparation of the cash-flow statement; > and

Digitized by Google

(c) copies of all financial statements, audited or unaudited, prepared during the year before the application or, if no such statements were prepared in that year, a copy of the most recent such statement.

Subsection 10(3) allows the court to order a publication ban on only the cash-flow statement of the applicant, though per its discretion may cause it to be revealed to interested parties.

Section 11 allows the court to make any order, on request of an interested party, it considers fit, unless restricted by something within the CCAA itself, but over-riding the BIA and WURA. This is the provision that gives the Act its teeth since the court's objective is to allow the debtor enough restructuring of debt and time to attend to it to survive, rather than enter into bankruptcy.

Section 11.01 states that the CCAA cannot be used to restrict demands for payment of leased or licensed assets or for demanding further money or credit.

Section 11.02 allows the judge to clamp down on any actions against the debtor that may be in the air as well as prevent any actions to put the debtor into bankruptcy through petition, however, pursuant to s. 11.02(2) said power to impose a stay may be overrode by the applicant filing against the debtor has acted in good faith with due diligence and the override would be appropriate.

Section 11.03 deals with actions against the debtor's directors and again, allows imposing a stay on actions against them but only up to until the compromise is sanctioned or fails creditor acceptance. However, this does not apply to guarantees extended by the directors. Subsection 11.03(3) deems anyone with supervisory roles to be directors if the legal directors have resigned.

Section 11.04 does not allow any order in respect of any party who has provided a guarantee in respect of the debtor or in respect of a letter of credit.

Section 11.09 allows the court to stay actions by Her Majesty in respect of income taxes, CPP or EI, or any provincial equivalent until:

- the expiry of the order,
- the refusal of a proposed compromise by the creditors or the court,
- six months following the court sanction of a compromise or an arrangement,
- the default by the company on any term of a compromise or an arrangement, or
- the performance of a compromise or an arrangement in respect of the company,

Basically. Subsection 11.09(2) prompts for the cessation of the stay imposed on Her Majesty if there is a default of these obligations for the period after the stay, while, subsection 11.09(3) provides that nothing can prevent the creation of these liabilities through the normal operation of the statutes specified (income tax, CPP, EI, or provincial equivalent).

Section 11.1(2) details that nothing can affect the actions of any regulatory body in respect of investigations of the debtor, except payments, while subs. 11.1(1) details who any such "regulatory body" can be. Subsection 11.1(3) details that the court may order that said enforcement of an action by a regulatory body may be stayed if it is against the public interest or if it would, effectively, cause the compromise to fail.

Section 11.2 allows the court to order to change the ranking of secured creditors to allow new financing through new credit with regard to, exclusively, its cash-flow while the order cannot be used to refinance an existing charge or obligation. Pursuant to subs. 11.2(2) the court may order that this new charge rank ahead of the secured creditors. Pursuant to subs. 11.2(4) the court will consider the following issues in determining whether the order is appropriate:

- the period during which the company is expected to be subject to proceedings under this Act;
- how the company's business and financial affairs are to be managed during the proceedings;
- whether the company's management has the confidence of its major creditors;
- whether the loan would enhance the prospects of a viable compromise or arrangement being made in respect of the company;
- the nature and value of the company's property;
- whether any creditor would be materially prejudiced as a result of the security or charge; and
- the monitor's report referred to in paragraph 23(1)(b), if any.

Section 11.3 allows the court, through parties' approval, to assign rights and obligations of the debtor to anyone the parties specify, however such does not apply to actions that commenced after the CCAA petition, an eligible financial contract, or a collective agreement. Pursuant to subs. 11.3(3) the court will consider, when assigning said rights and obligations:

- whether the monitor approved the proposed assignment;
- whether the person to whom the rights and obligations are to be assigned would be able to perform the obligations; and
- whether it would be appropriate to assign the rights and obligations to that person.

Section 11.4 deals with orders affecting secured creditors and the provision of critical supplies for the debtor's continued operations. Subsection 2 thereof allows the court order continued supply from that supplier with regard to the existing arrangement, or, whatever is appropriate in the opinion of the court. Subsections 11.4(3)-(4) allow the court to impose a rank in respect of the critical supplier's credit on any and all of the debtor's property as well as ahead of any secured creditor's rank.

Section 11.5 allows the court, on application of an interested person, to remove a director who is unreasonably impairing or is likely to unreasonably impair the possibility of a viable compromise or arrangement or who is acting or is likely to act inappropriately as a director in the circumstances.

Section 11.51 allows the court to order an indemnification of any director for responsibilities in the reorganization as a charge on the assets of the debtor. This facilitiates the compromise environment whereunder a director may have onerous legal responsibilities. Subs. (2) allows the ranking to be adjusted in respect of others on the debtor's assets while subs. (3) disallows the indemnification to bbe created in the director can obtain insurance for such to begin with. Subs. (4) takes away that discretion from the court if the obligation imposed on the director comes from her own gross negligence or wilful misconduct or, in Quebec, the director's or officer's gross or intentional fault.

Section 11.52 allows the court to create charges on the assets of the debtor in respect of:

- the monitor, including the fees and expenses of any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the monitor in the performance of the monitor's duties;

Digitized by Google

- any financial, legal or other experts engaged by the company for the purpose of proceedings under this Act; and
- any financial, legal or other experts engaged by any other interested person if the court is satisfied that the security or charge is necessary for their effective participation in proceedings under this Act.

Pursuant to subs. (2) the court can order this security to rank that of secured creditors.

Section 11.6 allows the CCAA to carry-on for a proposal that was made pursuant to the Proposal provisions of the BIA but only if the proposal has not met the bankruptcy court while such application can only be made with the permission of the inspectors, however such cannot occur when the bankruptcy proposal mechanics are not attended to as described in s 50.4(6) of the BIA or the debtor has not properly acted on them.

Section 11.7 causes the court to appoint a "monitor" of the debtor's affairs, who must be a trustee within the meaning of the BIA while subs. (2) disallows the appointment of a monitor who has substantial interested connection to the debtor. Subs. (3) allows a petitioning creditor to have the court replace the monitor.

Section 11.8 allows the monitor not to have any personal liability of the debtor's affairs as a monitor when appointed. The rest of that section then details the specific conditions of exposure the monitor may or may not be exposed to in respect of her debtor.

Section 12 allows the court to fix dates for the timely mechanics of the Act, for voting and for any distributions that are made.

Section 13 allows any objecting party of a decision under the CCAA to appeal, on leave of the judge or an appeal judge.

Section 14 provides that the appeal shall be to the highest court of the province in which the judgment took place while subs. (2) effectively states that said appeal shall be commenced within 21 days of the decision appealed, with provision of security posted to court for costs of a later date of appeal.

Section 15 provides that the appeal from the highest provincial court shall be to the Supreme Ct. of Canada.

Section 16 provides that any provincial court order under the CCAA shall be recognized intra-provincially as if made in any other province.

Section 17 provides that provincial courts shall aid each other.

Jurisdiction of court to receive applications - Sec 9
9. (1) Any application under this Act may be made to the court that has jurisdiction in the province within which the head office or chief place of business of the company in Canada is situated, or, if the company has no place of business in Canada, in any province within which any assets of the company are situated.

Single judge may exercise powers, subject to appeal - Sec 9(2)
(2) The powers conferred by this Act on a court may, subject to appeal as provided for in this Act, be exercised by a single judge thereof, and those powers may be exercised in chambers during term or in vacation.

November 17, 1988.

[1] FORSYTH J.:–

I. THE FACTS

[2] On 7th and 8th November 1988 I heard an application by Norcen Energy Resources Limited ("Norcen") regarding an order that I made on 22nd September 1988, under s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-25 ("C.C.A.A."). It is necessary that I set out the background and the terms of that order in some detail.

[3] The order of 22nd September 1988 was granted declaring that Oakwood Petroleums Ltd. ("Oakwood") is a company to which the C.C.A.A. applies. As might be expected, Oakwood asked that a term of the order be a provision that stays proceedings by parties against it until it has had time to formulate a plan of compromise under the C.C.A.A. The exact term at issue in the order is:

> 4. AND THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS that save and except for the matters referred to in paragraph 11 herein:
> (a) all proceedings taken or that might be taken by any of Oakwood's creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3 and the Winding-Up Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. W-10, or either of them shall be stayed until further Order of this Court,
> (b) that all further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against Oakwood, its assets, property, and undertaking shall be restrained until further Order of this Court,
> (c) that no proceedings shall be proceeded with or commenced against Oakwood, its assets, property and undertaking except with leave of this Court with notice to Oakwood and subject to such terms as this Court may impose, and without limitation to any of the foregoing, > i) all persons are enjoined and restrained from realizing upon or otherwise dealing with any security held by that person on the property, assets and undertaking of Oakwood until further Order of this Court, and > ii) all persons, having rights under the terms of any operating agreements with Oakwood are enjoined and restrained from taking proceedings to remove Oakwood as operator of such petroleum and natural gas properties and facilities, notwithstanding any provision contained in the said Agreements to the contrary, until further Order of this Court, [emphasis added]

[4] Paragraph 11, which is referred to in para. 4, is irrelevant with respect to this application. It should be noted that Norcen was not present or represented at the C.C.A.A. application by Oakwood.

[5] The crux of the present dispute before me focuses on cl. 4(c)(ii) of the previous passage. Norcen is involved in 20 oil and gas producing properties in the Hays area of Alberta in which Oakwood also has a working interest and is the operator. The terms under which Oakwood performs as operator are contained in the standard Canadian Association of Petroleum Landmen Operating Agreement ("CAPL Agreement"). Some of the properties are covered by agreements under the 1974 CAPL Agreement form while others are dealt with under the 1981 form of the CAPL Agreement. For the purposes of this application, nothing turns on that distinction.

[6] Clause 202 of both forms of the CAPL Agreement deals with the replacement of the operator in certain situations. The two versions are substantially similar and it will suffice to set out a portion of the 1981 wording of cl. 202:

> 202 REPLACEMENT OF OPERATOR –
> (a) The Operator shall be replaced immediately and another Operator appointed pursuant to Clause 206, in any one of the following circumstances:

Digitized by Google

(i) If the Operator becomes bankrupt or insolvent or commits or suffers any act of bankruptcy or insolvency, or makes any assignment for the benefit of creditors, or causes any judgement to be registered against its participating interest.

(ii) If the Operator assigns or purports or attempts to assign its general powers and responsibilities of supervision and management as Operator hereunder. emphasis added]

[7] Norcen's application in the present matter is an attempt to enforce cl. 202 of the CAPL Agreement and have itself appointed as operator of the 20 wells in the Hays area. A notice of motion dated 4th October 1988 was filed by Norcen, in which the following relief was sought:

(a) varying subparagraph 4(c)(ii) of the Order granted and entered in these proceedings the 22nd day of September, 1988 in order to permit the removal of Oakwood Petroleums Ltd. as operator of certain oil and gas properties as described in the Affidavit of Wayne Newhouse, filed herein;

(b) granting the Applicants leave to file an Originating Notice of Motion in the form attached as Exhibit "D" to the Affidavit of Wayne Newhouse, filed herein;

(c) abridging the time for service of the said Originating Notice of Motion and granting the Applicants leave to proceed with the applications set out therein before the Honourable Mr. Justice G.R. Forsyth immediately after the within applications have been heard and determined; and

(d) granting the Applicants costs of the within application.

[8] The basic effect is that leave to take appropriate steps to remove Oakwood as operator is sought and the originating notice of motion referred to above is designed to secure a declaratory order that Oakwood is not entitled to remain as operator.

[9] Oakwood is not in default on any payments due to Norcen under the operating agreement as a result of carrying on operations for approximately two years under a mixed trust fund account, nor is Oakwood indebted to its trade creditors with respect to its operatorships. I would note that there is an ongoing action between the two parties regarding Norcen's entitlement to the benefits of a settlement wherein Oakwood succeeded in arriving at a compromise of some of its debts with its trade creditors. However, the act of default relied on by Norcen for the purpose of this application is Oakwood's alleged insolvency resulting in the bringing into play of cl. 202(a)(i) of the CAPL Agreement.

II. THE ARGUMENTS

[10] The starting point of Norcen's argument is that it is urged that the mere fact that Oakwood has been found to be a company to which the C.C.A.A. applies means that it is insolvent within the meaning of the CAPL Agreement. As a result, it is argued that cl. 202 is triggered and that Oakwood either has automatically been removed as operator of the Hays properties, or in the alternative, it is now liable to be removed.

[11] From that premise, Norcen argues that, firstly, if removal has already occurred, then a "proceeding" is not required to remove Oakwood as operator and, consequently, it merely seeks declaratory relief to that effect. If the removal has not occurred automatically, Norcen further submits that the current stay in place is not of a type that falls within the ambit of the provisions of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. Accordingly, the argument follows that I did not have the jurisdiction to include cl. 4(c)(ii) in my order of 22nd September 1988. In the further alternative, it is argued that if the C.C.A.A. purports to confer on me the jurisdiction to stay Norcen's attempts to remove Oakwood as operator, then s. 11 is unconstitutional in a division of powers sense as a federal intrusion into the provincial legislative field of property and civil rights under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Of course, the arguments and their ramifications were flushed out in much greater detail than this, as will become apparent in my resolution of the issues, but I believe that I have fairly set out their basic propositions.

[12] In opposition to Norcen's application Oakwood is supported by certain of its lenders and creditors that would be involved in any proposed reorganization plan under the C.C.A.A. Submissions were made by Oakwood, the Bank of Montreal and the Royal Bank of Canada and many of Oakwood's other lenders went on the record as opposing Norcen's application. Varied attacks on the merits of the application were made.

[13] Oakwood's submissions, as well as those of the lenders supporting its position, focused on an argument suggesting that the purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to allow debtor companies to continue to carry on their business and that necessarily incidental to that purpose is the power to interfere with contractual relations, including those involving non-creditor third parties. It is argued that the federal insolvency legislative power under s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867, includes the power to interfere with contractual relations and consequently, it is submitted, no constitutional issue arises.

[14] Supporting lenders also focused on the meaning of insolvency under the CAPL Agreement, arguing that Oakwood is commercially solvent with respect to day-to-day matters and that it is only commercial insolvency which is contemplated by the agreement.

Digitized by Google

[15] Finally, helpful submissions were made by both the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of Alberta. These submissions were of assistance in delineating the constitutional issue before the court. The provincial position supported a narrow reading of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. and, as a result, the Attorney General of Alberta supported Norcen's interpretation while federal submissions were supportive of Oakwood's construction of s. 11.

III. THE ISSUES

[16] It is necessary that I begin by dealing with preliminary issues under the CAPL Agreement to determine whether the circumstances surrounding this application are such that cl. 202 is applicable. In effect I must deal with the question of whether Oakwood is insolvent in the context of this particular application. If I arrive at the conclusion that Oakwood is insolvent, I must then consider the parties' statutory construction and constitutional arguments.

[17] In that regard, this application raises a most interesting problem that is analogous to the traditional "chicken or the egg" scenario. It must be decided whether one should approach the constitutional issue or the statutory construction issue first. In my opinion, the constitutional issue cannot be approached in a vacuum. It can be helpful to use the constitutional issue as an aid to statutory construction in borderline cases, but it must first be decided whether we are dealing with such a case. If the meaning of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. can be determined without resort to constitutional aids to construction, that meaning must then be scrutinized for its constitutional validity. Embarking on a constitutional inquiry too early in the analysis clouds the issues and detracts from the proper construction of the statute.

> 11. Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy Act or in the Winding-up Act, whenever an application has been made under this Act in respect of any company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, on such notice to any other person, or without notice as it may see fit, make an order staying until such time as the court may prescribe or until further order all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of such company under the Bankruptcy Act and the Winding-up Act or either of them, and the court may restrain further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company upon such terms as the court sees fit, and the court may also make an order that no suit, action or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court imposes.

[19] I accordingly must embark on a two-step analysis in considering the section. The first step involves a rigorous construction of s. 11. If the section has a narrow meaning as contended by Norcen, it follows that I did not have the jurisdiction to include cl. 4(c)(ii) in my order of 22nd September 1988 because s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. would then entitle me only to interfere with debtor and creditor relationships in the terms of my stay order. Norcen, as a non-creditor, would then be free to take whatever steps it feels are necessary to have Oakwood removed as operator if Oakwood is insolvent within the terms of the CAPL Agreement. Of course, it is possible that equitable relief of some sort might be available to Oak-wood in such circumstances but that issue was not argued directly before me in this application. If the section, properly construed, is to be given a wider meaning, then Norcen would be stayed in its attempts to have Oakwood removed as operator as a result of my order of 22nd September 1988. This interpretation would involve my finding that s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. is broad enough in its terms to affect the contractual rights of non-creditors. In that case, it would then be necessary to carefully consider the constitutional validity of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. in that it would purport to affect the contractual rights of parties that are not creditors of Oakwood. That analysis constitutes the second step in the inquiry.

[20] Only if I cannot arrive at a clear meaning for s. 11 will the presumption of constitutionality enter into the picture. If that is the case, I may then turn to the so-called "presumption of constitutionality" to assist me in my interpretive task: see Duplain v. Cameron, 1961 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1961] S.C.R. 693 at 709, 36 W.W.R. 490, 30 D.L.R. (2d) 348 [Sask.]. I hesitate, however, to rely on that assistance too early in my interpretation of s. 11 lest it taint the proper meaning of the words of the section on their face.

[21] With that approach in mind, I now turn to consider the issues before me.

IV. Resolution Of The Issues

A. Preliminary issues under the CAPL agreement

[22] I begin with the broad issue of whether a default has occurred under the terms of the CAPL Agreement which might entitle Norcen to relief.

[23] In that regard, the first issue is whether Oakwood is "insolvent" within the meaning of the CAPL Agreement. I am of the opinion that it is. In Tri-Star Resources Ltd. v. J.C. Int. Petroleum Ltd., 48 Alta. L.R. (2d) 355, [1987] 2 W.W.R. 141 (Q.B.), Chief Justice Moore held at p. 146:

> In my view there is no issue to be tried on the question of "insolvency". The company, by Mr. Cole's own admission as stated in his affidavit of 22nd July, was unable to meet its obligations and was insolvent. Black's Law Dictionary defines "insolvency" as an "inability to pay one's debts". Surely when the president of the company under oath states the company is unable to pay its debts there can be no further argument on the question.

Digitized by Google

[24] In the present case, the affidavit of Douglas Nolan Blades, executive vice-president of Oakwood, dated 21st September 1988, contains numerous admissions that Oakwood is unable to pay its debts. In addition, the C.C.A.A. applies only to a "debtor company" and that term as defined in the Act amounts essentially to insolvency. It reads in part as follows:

> "debtor company" means any company that is bankrupt or insolvent or has committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act or is deemed insolvent within the meaning of the Winding-up Act ...

[25] It seems difficult to me to argue on one date that you are insolvent and that you deserve the protection of the C.C.A.A. for one purpose yet argue on another day, for another purpose, that you are not insolvent within the meaning of the CAPL agreement.

[26] The Royal Bank in its submissions argues that Oakwood is commercially solvent even though it may be legally insolvent and it further asserts that the CAPL Agreement contemplates commercial solvency in cl. 202. In my opinion, the CAPL Agreement requires that insolvency be given its normal meaning. It cannot be interpreted as relating only to the meeting of day-to-day expenses and paying the joint operators as contended by the Royal Bank. Under cl. 306 of the CAPL Agreement, one of the duties of the operator is to pay all trade debts. Under cl. 605 there is an obligation placed on the operator to distribute income from the well to parties entitled to it. Both requirements are functions and duties of the operator. Under cl. 202(b)(ii) the operator is liable to be removed for default on any of its duties or obligations under the CAPL Agreement. The particular situations cited and relied upon by the Royal Bank as indicia of "commercial insolvency" are specifically dealt with under these other provisions in the CAPL Agreement. The state of insolvency stands alone as a reason for removal. For that reason, I am accordingly of the view that "insolvency" in the context of the CAPL Agreement should be given its normal meaning and not the more restricted meaning urged by counsel for the Royal Bank. It follows on the facts of this case that by the bringing of its C.C.A.A. application, Oakwood has declared itself insolvent and thus cl. 202 of its operating agreement comes into play.

[27] This brings me to the second preliminary issue. That issue is whether insolvency creates an automatic ejection of Oakwood from its operatorship or whether some further action is required on Norcen's part.

[28] Norcen argues that the terms of the CAPL Agreement provide a formula for the automatic ejection of Oakwood and that they select Norcen as the operator by default and, in that regard, it relies upon cl. 206. The clause is a lengthy one but, since the issue is critical to the disposition of this application, it is essential that I set it out in full:

> 206. APPOINTMENT OF NEW OPERATOR –
> (a) If an Operator resigns or is to be replaced, an Operator shall be appointed by the affirmative vote of two (2) or more parties representing a majority of the participating interests, provided if there are only two (2) Joint-Operators to this Operating Procedure and the Operator that resigned or is to be replaced is one (1) of the Joint-Operators, then, notwithstanding the foregoing, the other Joint-Operator shall have the right to become the Operator.
> (b) No party shall be appointed Operator hereunder unless it has given its written consent to the appointment; provided that if the parties fail to appoint a replacing Operator or if any appointed Operator fails to carry out its duties hereunder, the party having the greatest participating interest shall act as Operator pro tern, with the right, should a similar situation re-occur after a new Operator has been appointed, to require the party having the next greatest participating interest to act as Operator pro tern and so on as occasion demands.
> (c) No provision of this Article shall be construed to re-appoint as next-succeeding Operator an Operator who has been replaced under Clause 202, except with the unanimous consent of the parties.
> (d) Except as provided in Subclause (a) of Clause 202 (in which case the Operator shall be replaced immediately), every replacement of Operator shall take effect at eight (8:00) o'clock a.m. on the first (1st) day of the calendar month following the expiration of any period of notice effecting a change of Operator, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained. [emphasis added]

[29] Norcen relies on the italicized portion of cl. 206(d) in its argument that Oakwood has already been removed as operator. In my opinion, however, that portion of the clause simply provides for a situation where a party is not forced to wait a period of time, which could be up to a month less a day, for replacement in circumstances of insolvency.

[30] I have chosen to emphasize the words in italics. In particular, I note that cl. 206(a) reads in part "shall have the right to become the Operator". It appears to be worded in the future tense suggesting that at some point following insolvency another party may become the operator if appropriate measures are taken. There is some positive election required on Norcen's part indicating that it wants to exercise its right to become the operator.

[31] Oakwood has functioned as operator for approximately two years since its difficult financial situation began. It has performed its duties and responsibilities over that entire period of time. It seems to me to be difficult to now assert that Norcen has been the operator for the last two years. It may have had a right to become the operator, but until that right is exercised, Oakwood remains in control.

Digitized by Google

[32] In summary, Oakwood is an insolvent operator as that term is used in the CAPL Agreement. The present set of circumstances is one in which cl. 202 is applicable.

[33] The final preliminary point that I must deal with is the argument made by Norcen that their action should be permitted because insolvency under the CAPL Agreement is not curable and consequently an action to remove Oakwood as operator under the Hays agreements is inevitable in any event. In the alternative, it is suggested that if insolvency is curable, a current stay may be permanently affecting Norcen's future right to become operator in that if Oakwood becomes solvent, Norcen's right to remove it as operator will have been defeated as a result of my order.

[34] The point of whether or not insolvency is a curable state under the CAPL Agreement is not directly before me on the facts of this case at this time. I do recognize the possibility that Norcen's rights may be permanently affected by the current stay. However, the issue of curability is one that is better decided when a fact situation comes before the court in which insolvency has actually been cured. I emphasize that although I do not decide the issue here, I am cognizant of the potential for future prejudice to Norcen's rights and, accordingly, I must interpret the situation as something more than a mere suspension of its rights as contended by the Bank of Montreal.

[35] With these conclusions regarding the effect of the relevant provisions of the CAPL Agreement in mind, I now consider the statutory construction and constitutional arguments raised by the parties.

B. The proper construction of s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act [36] The wording of s. 11 is extraordinarily broad. It is quite capable of sustaining both meanings argued by the parties to this application. For example, the long title of the C.C.A.A. can be used to support either meaning. One can argue that "An Act to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors" suggests that the C.C.A.A. is only designed to affect creditors. One can equally argue that the use of the word "facilitates" means that the Act encompasses a broader scope that includes potentially affecting all parties that may threaten a compromise arrangement.

[37] I note that the debtor and creditor theme is recurrent throughout the C.C.A.A. In fact the only place that the theme is conspicuously absent is in the wording of s. 11 itself. I do not, however, regard this absence of the C.C.A.A. 's general theme from s. 11 as conclusive in any way as to the types of relations that may be interfered with in a stay under the section. The conclusion that I do draw, however, is that at least the wording of s. 11 itself is capable of sustaining the broad meaning that is argued by Oakwood and its supporters.

[38] Norcen argues that its rights are affected without it being given the same vote concerning a plan of compromise that is granted to creditors. Surely, however, third parties whose rights are affected by the compromise agreement are entitled to make submissions when the time comes for the debtor company to seek the approval of the court for its plan. In addition, it should be emphasized that the stay power under s. 11 is a discretionary one. There is much room in the terms of s. 11 to refuse a stay when third party rights will be seriously prejudiced by its terms.

[39] In construing a statute, one must always keep in mind the objects that the piece of legislation is designed to achieve. This principle is emphasized in Driedger, Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (1983), at p. 74:

> The comprehension of legislation is, in a sense, the reverse of the drafting process. The reader begins with the words of the Act as a whole and from a reading of these words in their setting, deduces the intention of Parliament as a whole, the legislative scheme, and the object of the Act, and then makes construction of the particular enactment harmoniously with the words, framework and object of the Act.

[40] The authorities are of some assistance in arriving at a determination of the purpose of the C.C.A.A. Illustrative are the words of Wachowich J. in Meridian Dev. Inc. v. T.D. Bank; Meridian Dev. Inc. v. Nu-West Ltd., 32 Alta. L.R. (2d) 150, [1984] 5 W.W.R. 215, 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 109 at 114, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 576,53 A.R. 39 (Q.B.):

> The legislation is intended to have wide scope and allows a judge to make orders which will effectively maintain the status quo for a period while the insolvent company attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for a proposed arrangement which will enable the company to remain in operation for what is, hopefully, the future benefit of both the company and its creditors.

[41] Re Feifer and Frame Mfg. Corp., 28 C.B.R. 124, [1947] Que. K.B. 348 (C.A.), must also be considered because it involves a fact situation that can at least be analogized to the present one. The facts were that a lease of premises contained a clause permitting eviction on insolvency. The debtor tenant availed itself of the protections offered by the C.C.A.A. After the compromise proposed by the company was approved by the court, the landlord sought to rely on its eviction clause. As was illustrated during arguments on this case, that case is a difficult one from which to extract a ratio. The difficulty arises in part from the fact that four different judgments were rendered. The general holding was that the landlord was not permitted to rely on the eviction clause.

[42] I must rely on an English translation of the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal that was included in the briefs of several of the parties that made submissions. At p. 11 of the translation, St-Germain J., in his judgment, held:

Digitized by Google

> In effect, if, on the one hand, one must admit that recourse by a debtor to this law of arrangement constitutes in itself an act of bankruptcy, and if, on the other hand, a termination clause like that which is the subject of the present action permits a lessor to terminate his lease with a lessee, what good is it to the lessee to have recourse to this Act to make an arrangement with its non-secured creditors, if he must by that very act expose himself to the chance of his lease being terminated?

[43] It seems to me that that line of thinking is particularly relevant in the case at bar. The affidavit of Douglas Nolan Blades, dated 4th November 1988, deposes that the effect of the removal of Oakwood as operator would likely be fatal to attempts to restructure the company. A temporary stay of proceedings must apply to working partners in addition to creditors if the C.C.A.A. is to be of any protection at all.

[44] This particular application may relate to only 20 wells but the evidence is that Oakwood is the operator in approximately 800 wells when its entire undertaking is considered. It would be difficult to grant Norcen's application without granting similar orders in the future to other holders of working interests of which Oakwood is the operator with the result being a marked reduction in the probability of success for Oakwood in its efforts to negotiate an acceptable plan of compromise with its lenders.

[45] Attempts to distinguish the Feifer case were made on several grounds. The first is that there was a wartime ordinance in effect at the time of Feifer which made eviction clauses of the type considered in Feifer illegal. Clearly that fact materially affects the ratio of the case, but even if the passages regarding the scope of the C.C.A.A. are obiter, they are nevertheless supportive of a broad interpretation of s. 11. The second ground on which Norcen seeks to distinguish the case is on the basis that there are references in Feifer to the landlord as a creditor and in the present case Norcen is clearly not claiming in a capacity as a creditor. The difficulty, however, is that the purported eviction in Feifer took place after a binding compromise had been made. My reading of the decision is that the reference to the landlord as a "creditor" was perhaps merely a recognition of its former status. The fact is that both Feifer and the case at bar deal with situations under a federal statute where the company availing itself of the protections of the C.C.A.A. does not owe the party claiming contractual rights money at the time of the court hearing. It is irrelevant whether the claiming party is given the name "creditor" or some other label. The critical point is that the applicant is not owed money in either case.

[46] Norcen also relies on the decision of Chief Justice Moore in Tri-Star Resources Ltd. v. J.C. Int. Petroleum, supra. While that case is very helpful on the issue of insolvency, it is readily distinguishable on the stay issue. In Tri-Star, the operator of certain oil and gas properties filed a proposal under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-3. Another party having a working interest successfully brought an application to have the operator removed summarily notwithstanding the stay provision in s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act. The Tri-Star case is clearly distinguishable because of the fact that it was concerned with a proposal under the Bankruptcy Act. The stay power under s. 49 refers only to a stay against claims provable in bankruptcy while the C.C.A.A. provision, as already noted, is worded in a much broader fashion.

[47] For these reasons, I am drawn to the conclusion that s. 11 must be interpreted in the fashion suggested by Oakwood and its supporting creditors in order that the C.C.A.A. be permitted to accomplish its legislative purpose. The section grants the jurisdiction to a court to stay proceedings such as those contemplated here by Norcen. This type of action is a proceeding within the terms of s. 11.

C. The constitutionality of a broad interpretation of s. 11

[48] Given that I am of the opinion that the proper statutory construction of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. is a broad one, it becomes necessary to consider whether such an interpretation is constitutionally valid under the division of powers set out in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[49] Section 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867, grants to the Parliament of Canada legislative jurisdiction in the fields of "bankruptcy and insolvency" while s. 92(13) assigns exclusive legislative jurisdiction to the provinces in the fields of "property and civil rights". Clearly, we may be treading on marginal constitutional ground in the case at bar. If we are doing so, there is the possibility of reading the C.C.A.A. in a less offensive fashion by reading the statute down as argued by the province of Alberta and Norcen. I begin my analysis, however, on the footing that the proper statutory construction of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. is a wide one.

[50] Given that fact, it must be asked whether interference with contractual rights such as Norcen's is constitutionally valid. Although there is no argument made that the C.C.A.A. itself is constitutionally invalid, the basic starting point must be the decision in Re Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act; A.G. Can. v. A.G. Que., 1934 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1934] S.C.R. 659, 16 C.B.R. 1, [1934] 4 D.L.R. 75. It was held in that case that the Act was valid as relating to bankruptcy and insolvency rather than property and civil rights. At p. 664, Cannon J. held:

> Therefore, if the proceedings under this new Act of 1933 are not, strictly speaking, "bankruptcy" proceedings, because they had not for object the sale and division of the assets of the debtor, they may, however, be considered as "insolvency proceedings" with the object of preventing a declaration of bankruptcy and the sale of these assets,

> if the creditors directly interested for the time being reach the conclusion that an opportune arrangement to avoid such sale would better protect their interest, as a whole or in part. Provisions for the settlement of the liabilities of the insolvent are an essential element of any insolvency legislation ...

[51] The C.C.A.A. is an Act designed to continue, rather than liquidate, companies. In upholding the C.C.A.A., the Supreme Court of Canada must be taken as having extended the meaning of the term "insolvency" to include dealing with insolvent companies outside of a liquidation setting. The critical part of the decision is that federal legislation pertaining to assisting in the continuing operation of companies is constitutionally valid. In effect the Supreme Court of Canada has given the term "insolvency" a broad meaning in the constitutional sense by bringing within that term an Act designed to promote the continuation of an insolvent company.

[52] Accordingly, if promoting the continuance of insolvent companies is constitutionally valid as insolvency legislation, it follows that a stay which happens to affect some non-creditors in pursuit of that end is valid. Surely a necessary part of promoting the continuance of a company is to give that company some time to stop and gather its faculties without interference from affected parties for a brief period of time. In my opinion, the distinction between creditors' contractual rights and the contractual rights of non-creditor third parties that Norcen asks me to draw is not a helpful one in these circumstances. Continuance of a company involves more than consideration of creditor claims. For that reason, I am of the opinion that s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. can validly be used to interfere with some other contractual relationships in circumstances which threaten a company's existence. I add, however, that in my judgment, such interference in the interest of fairness to all parties should be effective only for a relatively short period of time.

[53] If I am wrong in my conclusion that a wide reading of the C.C. A.A. is permissible as a valid exercise of Parliament's powers in the field of insolvency law, the wide reading can also be supported on the basis of another constitutional argument. The "necessarily incidental" or "ancillary" constitutional doctrine can be used to arrive at the same conclusion: see Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 2nd ed. (1985), pp. 334-37.

[54] On either of the two tests cited by Professor Hogg for use of the ancillary doctrine, it seems that the constitutional validity of a wide reading of s. 11 of the C.C.A.A. can be upheld. Under the "rational, functional connection" test that was approved in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, 18 B.L.R. 138, 138 D.L.R. (3d) 1, 44 N.R. 181 [Ont.], there is obviously a clear connection between permitting Oakwood to remain as operator for the time being and continuance of the insolvent company. Under the more restrictive "limited to what is truly necessary for the effective exercise of Parliament's legislative authority" test as set out in R. v. Thomas Fuller Const. Co. (1958) Ltd., 1979 CanLII 187 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.CR. 695 at 713, 12 C.P.C. 248, 106 D.L.R. (3d) 193, 30 N.R. 249 (sub nom. Foundation Co. of Can. v. Can.) [Fed.], a strong argument can be made that it is necessary to occasionally interfere with contractual relations in order to pursue the legislative objective of assisting companies in struggling through difficult times.

V. CONCLUSIONS

[55] I emphasize my conclusions here. I have found that a default under cl. 202 of the CAPL Agreement has taken place and as a result Norcen would normally be entitled to pursue the remedies that it is entitled to under its operating agreement. A proper interpretation of s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, however, permits that a temporary stay be imposed restraining Norcen from proceeding. I have also concluded that a wide reading of the provisions of the C.C.A.A. is constitutionally valid.

[56] I am mindful that my interpretation of s. 11 is that I still retain a discretion to not grant a stay in circumstances where it would be unfair to stop a party from pursuing its contractual rights. I am unable to grant such relief on these facts. The stay remains in force until only 30th November. During that short period of time, perhaps Oakwood can restructure itself. If it is successful in its restructuring efforts, Norcen still has its incurability argument as well as other CAPL Agreement provisions available to it should it wish to see Oakwood removed as operator. If it is unsuccessful, removal of Oakwood by Norcen may well result in any event. For the time being it is essential that the status quo be maintained in order to give effect to the purpose of the C.C.A.A. Accordingly, my order of 22nd September 1988 shall stand unamended to its present termination date of 30th November 1988, or until further order of this court.

C. CAMPBELL J.:
REASONS FOR DECISION

[1] Tiger Brand Knitting Company Limited ("the Applicant") and RSM Richter Inc. ("the Monitor") seek an extension of the time within which to present an offer to the Court for the sale of the business and assets of the Applicant.

[2] The extension of up to 15 days is not opposed. Counsel on behalf of the United Steel Workers of America ("USWA") urges the Court to add a condition to the granting of any extension, namely, that the Monitor be directed not to accept a bid offer that it has received and to negotiate with another party that may make an offer.

[3] USWA seeks to add the condition with the prospect that a new offer, if it comes forward, would provide the opportunity of some or all of the 200 jobs now occupied by its members at the Applicant's facility in Cambridge.

[4] Very simply, it is urged that the broad considerations available to the Court to provide remedy under The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA") permit the Court to take into account and balance the interests of all stakeholders, not just those of a purchaser who would provide the greatest immediate monetary recovery to a secured creditor.

Background Facts

[5] On August 30, 2004, the Applicant filed for, and obtained, protection from its creditors under the CCAA pursuant to the "Initial Order." The stay of proceedings was initially for a period of 30 days and since September 29, 2004, has been extended on a number of occasions, the last being March 15, 2005.

[6] Tiger Brand, which is in the business of design and manufacture of casual clothing, has been subject to the impact of globalization, which has seen cheaper goods manufactured abroad displace domestic production. This, together with the rise of the Canadian dollar relative to the United States dollar, has resulted in a deterioration of financial performance.

[7] The impact will particularly felt by the employees in head office and manufacturing facilities in Cambridge, Ontario, but as well by the Company's three retail outlets.

[8] From the commencement of its involvement, the Monitor has recognized that a so-called multi-track process provided the only realistic opportunity to maximize stakeholder returns. As set out in the Monitor's First Report, these included (a) soliciting offers for the business and assets; (b) considering shareholders' restructuring plans; (c) the liquidation value of assets; and (d) assisting in identification of potential investors.

[9] Subject to comments below, none of the interested parties has taken the position that the Monitor has not reasonably or appropriately carried out its duties in accordance with Court Orders.

[10] By this Court's Order of September 13, 2004, a Sale Process was approved, as it was recognized that a sale of assets rather than a restructuring of the Company was the more likely result of the ongoing effort.

[11] The marketing process was extended and by Order of November 3, 2004, amended as set out in that Order with the explanation and rationale for it contained in the Monitor's Fifth Report to the Court dated January 11, 2005:

- The Monitor originally identified a sale transaction with Geetex which, at the time, provided the highest value to the stakeholders and had the greatest probability of closing. Importantly, the Geetex offer was premised on an asset acquisition which would likely result in Geetex carrying on an importing operation; and, as such, an orderly wind-down and termination of the Company's manufacturing and possibly other operations in Cambridge, Ontario;
- Geetex agreed that its offer would be a "stalking horse" in the amended sale process. Parties interested in purchasing the Assets for an amount greater than the Geetex stalking horse bid had to submit offers by a November 12, 2004 deadline;

[12] A deadline of November 12, 2004 was set for the receipt of offers pursuant to the Amended Sale Process, the short time period being considered necessary due to a belief by, among others, Geetex that, "if a transaction was not consummated in short order, the assets and the business of Tiger Brand generally would deteriorate significantly and rapidly in value."

[13] Apparently, both the major secured creditor GMAC and the Union were of the view that superior offers were available, the process was extended and in early January 2005, a "stay fee" was negotiated between the Monitor and Geetex, whereby Geetex kept its offer open to February 15, 2005.

[14] Geetex takes the position that there has not been until most recently an offer superior to its and that either the new offer from a new purchaser of assets should be accepted and closed, or Geetex's offer accepted and completed, or it be paid the break fee plus costs.

[15] As of the time of its Sixth Report, the Monitor had executed non-binding non-exclusive memoranda of understanding with two prospective purchasers and looked forward to one or both of the parties presenting a final form of asset purchase agreement for consideration.

[16] Since that time, the Monitor has been negotiating an agreement with one prospective purchaser, which is expected to be finalized and executed shortly. Hence the request for an extension to April 15, 2005.

[17] The affidavit material filed on behalf of USWA identifies a potential bidder, which, if successful, would provide the opportunity for preservation of some employment in Cambridge.

[18] In effect, USWA complains that the Monitor will not now consider and negotiate an offer from this bidder, which effectively eliminates the possibility of saving employment in Cambridge.

[19] The Monitor reports in its Seventh Report that efforts to identify going-concern purchasers that would preserve employment at Cambridge have been unsuccessful.

[20] The position of the Monitor, supported by the major secured creditor, Geetex and the prospective purchaser, is that to add a condition to the grant of extension would undermine and violate the process that has been followed to date.

Analysis & Law

[21] Two principles involving the Court's jurisdiction and discretion are urged, one by USWA and another by those who oppose an extension of the time to complete a plan on terms.

[22] USWA submits that the broad discretion given to the Court to take into account the interests of all stakeholders not just secured creditors, directs that in these circumstances, every reasonable consideration be given to the saving of jobs and of the Company to operate as an entity.

Digitized by Google

[23] Mr. Dewart submits that the broad and flexible discretion given to the Court under the CCAA favours any reasonable effort to preserve the business under a restructuring as opposed to a liquidation, which is more properly achieved under the BIA.

[24] The balancing effort, it is suggested, should allow those stakeholders who wish to achieve continuance of the enterprise every reasonable opportunity to do so and in this case, the only way to do so is to require the Monitor to not accept an offer to purchase assets until it at least considers a bid from an entity that might allow continuance of at least some of the business.

[25] The Court of Appeal for Ontario rendered a decision on March 31, 2005 dealing with the issue of removal of directors in the context of a CCAA proceeding.

[26] In Re Stelco Inc and others, the reasons of Blair J. for the Court considered the extent to which the Court's "inherent jurisdiction" and "discretion" under the CCAA might be involved to provide the remedy sought.

[27] After adopting the observation from I.H. Jacob's "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1970), 23 Current Legal Problems at p. 2, that there is a vital distinction between jurisdiction and discretion that must be observed, he went on to say at paragraph 38:

> [38] I do not mean to suggest that inherent jurisdiction can never apply in a CCAA context. The court retains the ability to control its own process, should the need arise. There is a distinction, however – difficult as it may be to draw – between the court's process with respect to the restructuring, on the one hand, and the course of action involving the negotiations and corporate actions accompanying them, which are the company's process, on the other hand. The court simply supervises the latter process through its ability to stay, restrain or prohibit proceedings against the company during the plan negotiation period "on such terms as it may impose." Hence the better view is that a judge is generally exercising the court's statutory discretion under s. 11 of the Act when supervising a CCAA proceeding. [Footnote omitted]

[28] At paragraph 39, in commenting on the discretion of a judge under s. 11 of the CCAA to, among other things, stay, restrain further proceedings or prohibit actions against the Company acting in good faith and with due diligence, Blair J.A. went on to say:

> In my view, the s. 11 discretion – in spite of its considerable breadth and flexibility – does not permit the exercise of such a power in and of itself.

[29] Paragraph 44 reads:

> [44] What the court does under s. 11 is to establish the boundaries of the playing field and act as a referee in the process. The company's role in the restructuring, and that of its stakeholders, is to work out a plan or compromise that a sufficient percentage of creditors will accept and the court will approve and sanction. The corporate activities that take place in the course of the workout are governed by the legislation and legal principles that normally apply to such activities. In the course of acting as referee, the court has great leeway, as Farley J. observed in Lehndorff, supra, at para 5, "to make order[s] so as to effectively maintain the status quo in respect of an insolvent company while it attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for the proposed compromise or arrangement which will be to the benefit of both the company and its creditors". But the s. 11 discretion is not open-ended and unfettered. Its exercise must be guided by the scheme and object of the Act and by the legal principles that govern corporate law issues. ...

[30] This leads to the principle relied on by those who oppose the extension on conditions that would favour a new offer.

[31] The principle is that process that has been put in place for receiving offers in respect of either the business as a going concern or of its assets, should be honoured. The process is integral to the administration of statutes such as the BIA and the CCAA.

[32] Royal Bank v. Soundair Corp 1991 CanLII 2727 (ON CA), (1991), 7 C.B.R. (3d) 1 is a decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario. At issue was the power of the Court to review a decision of a receiver to approve one offer over another for the sale of an airline as a going concern.

[33] At paragraph 42, Galligan J.A. for the majority (himself and McKinlay J.A.) said:

> While it is accepted that the primary concern of a receiver is the protecting of the interests of the creditors, there is a secondary but very important consideration, and that is the integrity of the process by which the sale is effected.

[34] At paragraph 16, the statement made by Anderson J. in Crown Trust Co. v. Rosenberg reflex, (1986), 60 O.R. (2d) 87 at p. 92 was adopted and the duties of the Court summarized as follows:

1. It should consider whether the receiver has made a sufficient effort to get the best price and has not acted improvidently.
2. It should consider the interests of all parties.
3. It should consider the efficacy and integrity of the process by which offers are obtained.

Digitized by Google

4. It should consider whether there has been unfairness in the working out of the process.

[35] To my mind, those same duties of the Court are implicit in a marketing and sale process pursuant to Court Order under the CCAA.

[36] There is nothing in the material before me or in the submissions of Mr. Dewart that suggest that any of those duties have to date been breached by the Monitor in the negotiation or offer process.

[37] At this point in time, I am of the view that to allow the offering process to in effect be re-opened by enjoining the Monitor from completing a proposed transaction would amount to an unfairness in the working out of the process to the prospective purchaser, to Geetex and to GMAC the secured creditor. As well, it would interfere with the efficacy and integrity of the process and prefer the interests of one party (the USWA, albeit an important one) over others. As noted at paragraph 46 of Soundair

> [46] It is my opinion that the court must exercise extreme caution before it interferes with the process adopted by a receiver to sell an unusual asset. It is important that prospective purchasers know that, if they are acting in good faith, bargain seriously with a receiver and enter into an agreement with it, a court will not lightly interfere with the commercial judgment of the receiver to sell the asset to them.

[38] This is not to suggest that the interests urged by the USWA would be without remedy in appropriate circumstances.

[39] The dissent of Goodman J.A. in Soundair was really on the factual side, as he concluded that in his view, the conditional offer accepted by the Receiver in that case was "…an improvident one…" [at paragraph 118.]

[40] In this case, there is no accepted offer before the Court for approval. When there is, should there be another offer that would meet the test of rendering the accepted offer improvident, the Court can and perhaps should intervene.

[41] Until that occurs, I do not conclude on the facts before me, that the Monitor has acted improvidently in failing to negotiate with a party who did not bring forward an offer capable of acceptance within the process set out in the previous Order of the Court. The actions of the Monitor appear entirely appropriate.

[42] For the above reasons, the motion to extend the time within which to present an offer for sale of the business and assets of the Applicant is extended to April 15, 2005 or such earlier date as may be appropriate without the condition as sought by the USWA.

[43] If it is necessary to deal with any issue of costs, they may be spoken to at a 9:30 appointment.

Place and Date of Hearing: Vancouver, B.C. February 27 and March 3, 1998

[1] On January 30, 1998 I granted an ex parte interim order, pursuant to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-36, protecting the petitioners from their creditors, permitting them to file a reorganization plan on or before July 31, 1998, and appointing a monitor. The interim order required a hearing of the petition on February 27, 1998. The February 27, 1998 hearing dealt with extension of the original order granted ex parte as well as applications by AT&T Capital Corporation and Lucent Technologies of Canada Inc.
[2] I will be referring to the petitioners as Starcom International, Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington.
[3] The issues that have emerged from these several applications are:

1.should the interim order protecting the petitioners be extended and confirmed?
2.should the order be amended to delete Starcom International from protection of the Act?
3.should the stay as it relates to Starcom International be modified and a receiver-manager appointed of its shares in Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington with the object of replacing the current management team of Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington?
4.in the event the stay as it relates to the shares, is not lifted, should the interim order be amended to require a reorganization plan to be presented to the court prior to July 31, 1998?
5.should the monitor's fees be paid in priority to the claims of creditors?
6.should the fees of other professional advisors be paid in priority to the claims of creditors?
7.should the petitioners be required to provide financial statements, prepare cash flow projections and keep accounts in a segregated way?
8.should the petitioners be required to disclose to AT&T all negotiations and discussions conducted in preparing their reorganization plan, and be required to permit AT&T to be present during such negotiations or discussions?
9.should the order be amended to permit a challenge to be brought to a security granted by the petitioners to Devlin Jensen, lawyers?

HISTORY
[4] The original order was made January 30, 1998. On February 13, 1998 AT&T applied to lift the stay as it affected the shares of Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington and to appoint a receiver-manager, with the intention of replacing the petitioners' management team. The application was denied, with liberty to reapply, which AT&T has done.
[5] The general circumstances and position of the parties before me was described in my oral reasons of February 17, 1998. For completeness, I describe them again.
[6] Starcom International, a British Columbia incorporated company, is owned by shareholders who, on the information before me, invested about $4.5 million in the fibre optics enterprise. Starcom International owns 100 percent of the voting shares of Starcom B.C., a British Columbia incorporated company, and Starcom Washington, a Washington incorporated company registered extra-provincially in British Columbia. Starcom International also owns 45 percent of their non-voting shares. Another company, Intelcom Group (U.S.A.), Inc. ("ICG"), owns the other 55 percent of the non-voting shares of Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington. ICG acquired these shares when it converted about $5.6 million debt of the petitioners to shares, as part of a refinancing that saw AT&T become the petitioners' principal creditor.
[7] Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington, between them, own and operate a fibre optics network between Vancouver, B.C. and Seattle, Washington. The line is located on the Burlington Northern right of way. For regulatory reasons, the portion of the line in British Columbia is an asset of Starcom B.C. and that portion in the State of Washington is an asset of Starcom Washington. On the material before me, Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington appear to be integrated in their operations and accounting functions. Concurrent creditor protection proceedings are ongoing in Washington State concerning Starcom Washington, I am instructed.
[8] Starcom B.C. and Starcom Washington have borrowed more than $40 million from AT&T. Starcom International, which has no direct debt to AT&T, has pledged its shares in the two operating companies to AT&T as part of the security package which AT&T took in exchange for the funds advanced. AT&T appeared on the application as the dominant secured creditor of the two operating companies and as holding the Starcom International pledge of the shares of the operating companies.
[9] On the information before me, the petitioners owe approximately $4.3 million to creditors other than AT&T. Of these, the largest creditor is Lucent Technologies of Canada, which appeared at the hearing. It has rendered accounts of more than $2.5 million, which are unpaid. The next largest creditor is Burlington Northern Railroad, which on the material, is owed more than $450,000. Another creditor is Devlin Jensen, the law firm acting for the petitioners, which is a secured creditor owed more than $240,000. In these reasons, I have, in a rough calculation, converted any sums in American dollars into Canadian dollars.

[10] The loan from AT&T has been in payment default since January 31, 1997. In the spring of 1997, AT&T and the petitioners entered into a forbearance agreement in which AT&T agreed to forebear for some time to permit the petitioners time to refinance. In late December 1997, they entered into another agreement whereby AT&T agreed to forebear collection until January 31, 1998. The petitioners have not paid AT&T and have not presented a plan acceptable to AT&T for repayment of the AT&T loan.

[11] On the ex parte application, the materials filed included consolidated financial statements and consolidated cash flow projections.

[12] On February 17, 1998 I asked the monitor to advise on the degree of difficulty, if any, in presenting cash-flow projections and financial statements for Starcom International on one hand and the two operating companies on the other. Since that request the financial information has been presented to the court segregated on that basis. Further, the original cash flow projections have been amended to now include enhanced revenue, which is explained by the petitioners as increases from new sales, and to include required expenditures such as Lucent Technologies' fees calculated on a monthly basis for future maintenance. Although the cash flow projections do not yet reflect charges of Burlington Northern for use of its right of way as Burlington Northern had not advised that monthly payments were required, there are sufficient revenues projected to be received to pay these additional expenses, provided the projections are accurate.

[13] The monitor has stated that in his view the assumptions on which the most recent cash flow projections are made are reasonable.

[14] In recent affidavits the petitioners have described their general plan to re-finance the company, with the objective of paying out AT&T in full. The current plan includes a combination of selling one or more indivisible rights of use ("IRU's"), attraction of fresh equity capital and completion of a new debt arrangement with a new lender.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

[15] In deciding the many issues raised, it is useful to consider the overall purpose of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. The purpose has been frequently described by the courts.

[16] Re: Alberta-Pacific Terminals Ltd. (8 May 1991) Vancouver A903661 (S.C.), Madam Justice Huddart described the purpose at p.7 as being:

> ... to facilitate a compromise between an insolvent corporate debtor and its creditors so that the company is able to continue to do business ...

[17] She discussed the need to maintain the status quo, saying at p.10-11:

> ... The preservation of the status quo cannot mean merely the preservation of the relative pre-stay debt status of each creditor. Other interests are served by the CCAA. Those of investors, employees, and landlords among them, and in the case of the Fraser Surrey terminal, the public too, not only of British Columbia, but also of the Prairie Provinces. The status quo is to be preserved in the sense that manoeuvres by creditors that would impair the financial position of the company while it attempts to reorganize are to be prevented, not in the sense that all creditors are to be treated equally or to be maintained at the same relative level. It is the company and all the interests its demise would affect that must be considered.

[18] In Hongkong Bank of Canada v. Chef Ready Foods 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (C.A.) at 315, Mr. Justice Gibbs described the legislation in these terms:

> The purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business. It is available to any company incorporated in Canada with assets or business activities in Canada that is not a bank, a railway company, a telegraph company, an insurance company, a trust company, or a loan company. When a company has recourse to the C.C.A.A., the Court is called upon to play a kind of supervisory role to preserve the status quo and to move the process along to the point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure. Obviously time is critical. Equally obviously, if the attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success, there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay, hence the powers vested in the Court under s.11.

[19] Mr. Justice Brenner in Pacific National Lease Holding Corp., Re, (17 August 1992) Vancouver A922870 (S.C.), summed up the principles to consider in applications under the Act, at p.10:

Digitized by Google

(1)The purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to allow an insolvent company a reasonable period of time to reorganize its affairs and prepare and file a plan for its continued operation subject to the requisite approval of the creditors and the Court.

(2)The C.C.A.A. is intended to serve not only the company's creditors but also a broad constituency which includes the shareholders and the employees.

(3)During the stay period the Act is intended to prevent maneuvers for positioning amongst the creditors of the company.

(4)The function of the Court during the stay period is to play a supervisory role to preserve the status quo and to move the process along to the point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure.

(5)The status quo does not mean preservation of the relative pre-debt status of each creditor. Since the companies under C.C.A.A. orders continue to operate and having regard to the broad constituency of interests the Act is intended to serve, preservation of the status quo is not intended to create a rigid freeze of relative pre-stay positions.

(6)The Court has a broad discretion to apply these principles to the facts of a particular case.

1. Should the Protection of the Act Continue?

[20] As this hearing follows the ex parte order made on the initial application, any order made to continue protection will be made under s.11(4) of the Act. On any orders made under s.11(4), 11(6) of the Act places the burden of proof upon the applicants:

11.6Notwithstanding the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act,

(a)proceedings commenced under Part III of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act may be taken up and continued under this Act only if a proposal within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act has not been filed under that Part; and

(b)an application under this Act by a bankruptcy may only be made with the consent of inspectors referred to in section 116 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act but no application may be made under this Act by a bankrupt whose bankruptcy has resulted from

(i)the operation of subsection 50.4(8) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, or

(ii)the refusal or deemed refusal by the creditors or the court, or the annulment, of a proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[21] Section 11(6), new to the Act in 1997, establishes three pre-conditions to an order under s.11(4):

(a)that circumstances exist that make the order appropriate;

(b)that the applicants have acted and continue to act in good faith; and,

(c)that the applicants have acted and continue to act with due diligence.

[22] Before enactment of s.11(6), the test in British Columbia for continued protection derived from Chef Ready Foods, supra, in which Mr. Justice Gibbs spoke at p.315 of "moving the process along to a point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure". In the context of s.11(6), the question of whether the attempt is doomed to failure is one consideration in determining whether the order is appropriate. In making an assessment of appropriateness, the court must also consider whether the conditions necessary for the initial order are met.

[23] Here the conditions required for an initial order are present. The issues are whether the reorganization attempt is doomed to failure, whether there has been and is good faith and whether there has been and is due diligence.

[24] AT&T, Lucent, and to some extent Burlington Northern question the propriety of continued protection. They say, given the history and AT&T's lack of confidence, the exercise is doomed to failure, and that the petitioners have not displayed the degree of good faith and diligence required. However, even in arguing against continuation of the stay as presently framed they did not seek, as their first choice, total discontinuance of the Act's protection. Rather they couched their submissions in terms of lack of confidence in the present management team and their desire to see the team replaced by, as yet, unidentified persons.

[25] Without dealing, at this point, with the application to lift the stay from Starcom International completely or in part, which I address below, I am satisfied that the petitioners have shown the court that the reorganization attempt, at this stage, is not doomed to failure. Although AT&T, the predominant creditor, has expressed its present lack of confidence in the management team, I cannot conclude that it would turn down a plan of refinancing whereby it would be paid in full. The evidence before the court explains the current efforts being made by the petitioners to refinance their debt through sale of one or more IRU's, sale of shares and fresh agreement with a new lender. On all the material before the court, I am not satisfied that this initiative is doomed to failure. Continuation of protection of the Starcom Group is appropriate, given the objectives of the Act, the current cash flow position of the company and the indications before the court that reorganization and refinancing is a realistic ambition.

[26] Questions have been raised about the good faith and diligence of the petitioners. AT&T and Lucent correctly point to deficiencies in the cash flow projections which were first presented to the court, and the adjustments to them to project increased revenue and expenditures. AT&T complains that the petitioners were not as cooperative with its agent, Ernst & Young, as it considered they should be and wonders why he was not provided a copy of the new cash flow projections before they were submitted in the monitor's report.

[27] Some of the criticisms of the cash flow projections are justified. However, on the issue of lack of cooperation, the evidence conflicts. What is clear is that the petitioners have provided the basic information requested by Ernst & Young, and with a limited staff, spent considerable time with Ernst & Young representatives. On balance, I am satisfied that the petitioners have met the onus under s.11(6)(b). The monitor has expressed his view that the assumption reflected in the latest projections are reasonable, and the projections are more positive than those originally presented. The new projections are responsive to criticisms from Ernst & Young and the monitor, and reflect and address the criticisms received. I cannot conclude that the first cash flow projections were prepared with a lack of good faith, and in my view the manner in which the criticisms have been dealt with in the ones now before the court indicate both good faith and diligence.

[28] I consider that the interim order, in general, should be extended to the date by which the reorganization plan must be presented.

2.Should the Stay be Lifted from Starcom International?

[29] AT&T has applied for an order lifting the stay from Starcom International, contending that the court should exercise its discretion to take Starcom International out of court protection because it has no active business, its only asset being shares in the operating companies.

[30] It is clear that the companies are managed as a group. The management team of the operating companies is controlled by Starcom International, which owns all the voting shares in the two operating companies. While there may be merit at some point in seeking separation of any obligations which are singular to Starcom International, to protect only the two subsidiary companies and not the parent company will fracture the status quo without apparent benefit to the reorganization effort. This application is dismissed.

3.Should the Stay Concerning Starcom International be Lifted as it Concerns the Shares?

[31] AT&T, supported by Lucent and Burlington Northern, has applied for a stay of the order concerning Starcom International to permit the shares of the operating companies to be handled by a receiver-manager, and the management team to be replaced.

[32] On February 17, 1998 I denied this application with leave to re-apply. That decision was made, in part, in recognition that many of those interested in the order were not then before the court but would be in attendance at the comeback hearing.

[33] There is little doubt that the range of creditor profiles is extreme, and that AT&T, over the past year, has displayed forbearance towards the petitioners. While this forbearance may have been prompted in part by considerations of business advantage and the possibility of success, a likely result has been that the failure of the petitioners to advance their revenues more swiftly, and to locate further investors more promptly, has diminished AT&T's confidence in the group.

[34] While the AT&T perspective and experience must be considered, the court must also consider the broader constituency protected by the Act, referred to in the cases referred to earlier. On balance I am satisfied that the purpose of the Act is best advanced by leaving the present management team in place, subject to such changes as may naturally develop. I say this for the following reasons.

1. the Act is designed to preserve the status quo and to prevent manoeuvring of creditors: see, for example, Re Alberta-Pacific Terminals; Chef Ready Foods and Re Pacific National Lease Holding, supra. To permit the proposed change in management is to significantly alter the status quo and place the predominant creditor in control of the petitioners, while still receiving the protection of the Act;
2. the present management team has embarked on discussions with potential investors and customers. A change of team at this time may waste that effort and lose the reputation and client goodwill referred to in the affidavits as accruing to the benefit of the petitioners;
3. the new, proposed team, is not described to the court. Whether any of the contemplated persons have experience in this industry, or this geographic area or with these customers, is a matter of speculation, not evidence;
4. although representing investors with amounts at stake smaller than the secured debt owing to AT&T, significant confidence in the present management team has been expressed to the court by shareholders in Starcom International and by ICG, as well as certain smaller creditors. These expressions of confidence > confirm the goodwill referred to in the First Marathon correspondence which is in evidence, and indicate a certain degree of competence in the operations of the company, which should not be ignored.

[35] In my view, the objects of the Act would not be advanced by the order sought. The Act intends time to be given to corporations that require reorganization, where there is a realistic prospect of success. This time is given not just to facilitate repayment of debt, which naturally is key to continued survival, but also to make use of experienced pools of knowledge and expertise within the organization, and to protect the investment in the enterprise, all this for the better good of those touched by the protected corporations. Drawn from the deep woes of the depression, protection of the Act is available to protect modern corporations, such as these, on the front edge of technology where the investment is high, the capacity is great and the need for time to attract business and investors is acute.

[36] For these reasons, I consider the petitioners, directed by the present management team, should have the opportunity to reorganize their finances. The application to lift the stay as it relates to the shares, is dismissed.

4. Should the Term of the Stay be Abridged?

[37] AT&T, Lucent and Burlington Northern all seek an order shortening the time within which a reorganization plan must be produced. They refer to the decision of Chief Justice Glubé in Fairview Industries Ltd., Re reflex, (1991), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 43 in which she stated, at p.56:

> A serious general concern which I have is the length of time which the courts in Nova Scotia have been giving to a company to present a plan. There is no question that 120 days is a long period of time. Until the plan is presented, the initial order may place the bank which finances a company's operating loan in a precarious position. If the position of the operating company deteriorates dramatically during that period, this could seriously affect the bank's position. Although in most cases a monitor is in place, that will not necessarily prevent serious deterioration occurring. In my opinion, shorter time periods should be considered by the courts both for the application to approve the appropriate classes of creditors and for the presentation of the formal plan of compromise or arrangement. The court should be given reasons why longer periods are necessary and I suggest that on any new applications by companies under the C.C.A.A. that the length of time granted for any of the steps be given very careful consideration. Although several recent applications in Nova Scotia contain the same times as in the present case, there are a number of cases in other provinces which have much shorter time frames, which may be more appropriate.

[38] The decision of Chief Justice Glubé was issued before the amendments to the Act which establish a threshold of $5 million in indebtedness, require cash flow projections and require a second hearing within 30 days.

[39] In British Columbia the standard order is for something considerably longer than the thirty or sixty days proposed to the court. In my view the concerns of Chief Justice Glubé may be met by vigilant reporting by the monitor, so that any significant deterioration in the companies' position will soon be detected and can be dealt with by fresh application. While each business will have its own financing possibilities, I consider it safe to say that generally large loans, significant equity injections, or large sales, as is required to rescue a corporation in debt for more than $5 million, will take time to develop to the point of agreement. Further, the more frequently those managing a corporation are required to return to court, the greater the distraction from their primary task of salvage. This is particularly so where the employee complement is, as here, small.

[40] In my view the original time frame of a stay until July 31, 1998, by which time a plan shall have been presented, is at least a better estimate of the time which should be provided than is any other suggestion, and is consistent with the evidence of Mr. Maasen of ICG itself in the telecommunications business, to the effect that given the industry, more time, rather than less, will be required to develop a reorganization plan.

[41] This issue of time, is, of course, a matter of the court's discretion to be exercised after peering into a foggy crystal ball.

[42] The concerns of AT&T, Lucent and Burlington Northern, however, should not be overlooked, particularly given the incomplete cash flow projections initially presented to the court. I ask the monitor to report the petitioners updated cash flow projections to the court on a bi-weekly basis, thereby to alert parties to any significant deterioration in the picture now presented.

[43] Lastly, on this issue, I note that AT&T premised its request for a short order on its concern that interest was continuing to accrue at the rate of $17,000 per day. It submitted that AT&T would experience serious prejudice by passage of time during which interest continued to accrue. Lucent referred to the deterioration of the position of unsecured creditors, as the interest was added to the amount of debt secured by AT&T's security agreement. No doubt interest will mount. However, the interest issue will not be resolved in the sense of creation of greater revenue or payment of the debt, simply by shortening the length of the stay or even by changing the management team. The best solution is development of a successful reorganization plan.

Digitized by Google

[44] For these reasons, the original date of July 31, 1998, less than five months hence, shall remain as the end date of the order.

5. Should the Monitor's Fees be Paid in Priority?

[45] In the ex parte order I granted an order that the monitor's fees be paid in priority to other creditors.

[46] AT&T submitted that the court lacks jurisdiction to make this order, and in any event should decline to do so. It relies upon Re Fairview Industries Ltd., supra.

[47] The notion of a monitor, now found in the Act, was created in Re Northland Properties Ltd. (5 July 1988) Vancouver A880966 (B.C.S.C.). In that case Mr. Justice Trainor held that he had jurisdiction to appoint an interim receiver and to spell out the responsibilities such that the true role was one of monitor or watchdog. Thus, the primary purpose of the monitor is to watch from a neutral perspective, and to report to the court and the parties.

[48] This court, in previous cases which postdate Re Fairview Industries Ltd., has acted to give priority for payment of accounts. For example, in Westar Mining Ltd., Re (1992), 20 B.C.L.R. (2d) (S.C.) Mr. Justice Macdonald exercised his discretion to create a "first charge" to secure monies advanced to permit operations to continue. Considering this authority, and the genesis of the office of monitor, I conclude that this court does have jurisdiction to create a priority for fees charged by the monitor.

[49] Further, in my view the order sought is appropriate. The monitor acts on behalf of the court to provide information and monitoring for the benefit of all parties. An order protecting the fees, as first granted in the ex parte order, shall continue. To ensure that the true position of the petitioners is known, I request the monitor to submit accounts on at least a monthly basis, so that they may be reflected in the financial information received from time to time by the parties.

6. Should the Fees of Other Professional Advisors be Granted Priority?

[50] AT&T supported by Lucent, likewise challenged the priority initially given by the ex parte order to accounts of other professional advisors.

[51] In my view, for the same reasons, I am satisfied I may make the order. The question is whether I should do so.

[52] There is no material before me, as apparently there was in Westar, to the effect that the priority is required to enable operations to continue. In any case, the cash flow projections provide for monthly payment of professional fees in sizeable sums, and s.11.3 of the Act permits a person providing services to require immediate payment for the services.

[53] At this time, in my view, the protection of s.11.3 of the Act and the revenue flow shall suffice as protection for payment of these services.

[54] The terms of the order shall be amended to provide for priority only of the monitor's fees and disbursements.

7. Should Separate Financial Information be Provided for Each Petitioner

[55] AT&T, Lucent and Burlington Northern seek an order that financial information be provided for each company. Segregated information has been provided for Starcom International following the oral decision of February 17, 1998. The issue is subdivision of the accounts of the two operating companies.

[56] There may come a time when the relative assets and liabilities, and cash flow, of the two companies is significant. I do not think that time has arrived.

[57] Before such an order is made, the court should have information of the relative ease or difficulty of the task. I ask the monitor, as I did concerning Starcom International, to provide advice to the court on this matter.

8.Should the Petitioners Advise AT&T of all Negotiations and Discussions and Permit its Participation?

[58] AT&T has applied for an order that the petitioners advise it of all negotiations and discussions towards a reorganization plan, and ask to be allowed to participate. Lucent supported this application.

[59] In my view, the court should not exercise its discretion to make this order. There is little or no confidence now expressed by AT&T in the management team. While these proceedings and any progress which may be made by the petitioners may ameliorate AT&T's present sentiments, the management team has an onerous task ahead of them, and such a formalized requirement may clog the process further. I do not consider that the court should place a formal requirement on the petitioners which may have the affect of stretching their personnel even thinner, which may itself create difficulties requiring delicate handling of confidences between the petitioners and those with whom they negotiate, and which would impose an obligation on the petitioners to join in their discussions a party that has expressed its lack of confidence in them and in the plan they hope to present.

[60] Although the court encourages full communication between the parties to the extent this is practicable, this encouragement does not extend to the order sought.

[61] The application is denied.

9. May Lucent Challenge the Security Given to Devlin Jensen?

[62] It is agreed that the stay on all proceedings involving the petitioners shall be lifted to permit a court challenge to be brought to the security given to Devlin Jensen. It is so ordered.

Digitized by Google

[63] This lifting of the stay extends only to commencement of proceedings. Any further step will await further submissions of counsel and decision of the court.

Heard at Vancouver: February l0, April l3, June 22, and September 7, l994

T. Barrie Lindsay asks leave to commence an action on a guarantee of his supplementary pension benefits against Alberta-Pacific Terminals Ltd ("Alberta-Pacific"). The court's permission is required because Alberta-Pacific and four related companies ("the Alberta-Pacific Group") obtained the protection of this court under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (the "CCAA") in 1990. Those proceedings began with an order on November 22, 1990, staying all proceedings against the Alberta-Pacific Group, and culminated in an order on November 14, 1991, sanctioning an arrangement between those debtor companies and their creditors and continuing the stay of proceedings (at 5) as follows:

> This Court further orders that except as provided herein, the stay of proceedings in the Order of The Honourable Mr. Justice Skipp pronounced herein November 22, l990 and this Order be and is hereby confirmed and continued in accordance with the terms of the Plan as at the Closing Date;

Unfortunately, Alberta-Pacific did not invite Mr. Lindsay to participate in the meetings leading to the arrangement, although he was an ordinary creditor under the CCAA.

The Facts

When Mr. Lindsay retired from Transtec Canada Limited ("Transtec") as its Senior Vice-President on December 15, 1988, he reached an agreement with it ("the Retirement Agreement"), under which he was to receive a monthly supplemental pension in the amount of $2,100 from June 15, 1990 until his death. The pension was indexed at 4% annually commencing June 15, 1991, and it contained an acceleration provision on default. All of this Alberta-Pacific guaranteed, as did other companies formerly in what counsel called "the Johnston Group."

Transtec defaulted on its agreement when it failed to make the payment due January 15, 1993. On that day Mr. Lindsay valued the obligation at $415,601.58, the cost of providing an annuity in the amount agreed. He has demanded payment from Transtec and all other guarantors. None of them have paid. Thus, Mr. Lindsay seeks to commence an action against Alberta-Pacific.

Alberta-Pacific cannot explain why it failed to include Mr. Lindsay among those invited to attend the meetings authorized by an order made June 24, 1991. Alberta-Pacific is a holding company whose only asset is shares in Fraser-Surrey Docks Ltd. ("FSD"). FSD operates the Fraser Surrey Terminal under a licensing agreement with the Fraser River Harbour Commission. Terrence Johnston, the chief operating officer of FSD who swore in the CCAA proceedings that all creditors and claimants of all the petitioners had been given notice, says that he believed that all of the creditors of all of the petitioners were disclosed. The obligation to Mr. Lindsay appears not to have been noted in the auditor's report on the financial statements of Alberta Pacific.

The evidence persuades me that the failure to notify Mr. Lindsay was due to oversight on the part of Mr. Johnston, those advising him, and those keeping and reviewing the records of Alberta-Pacific. The oversight may be one of the results of the financial difficulties of the Alberta-Pacific Group and the demands being made on their limited staff during the re-organization process. The evidence does not support the view that Alberta-Pacific made a deliberate decision, either that contingent creditors could not be caught by the CCAA, or if they could, that they should not be included in the re-organization process. The reasons in Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corp. 1991 CanLII 303 (BC SC), (1991), 56 B.C.L.R. (2d) 80 (S.C.) affirming that contingent creditors were subject to the CCAA were released on April l2th and reported on July 29th.

It is absolutely clear that had Mr. Johnston become aware of Mr. Lindsay's claim before November 14, 1991, Mr. Lindsay would have been asked to participate in the reorganization process. His claim would have been valued for voting and participation purposes. He would have been invited to participate in the meeting of the General Creditors whose approximately 190 members were owed about $900,000. Under the arrangement members of that group received about 27% of the value of their debt. Without any discount for the contingency of payment by others, Mr. Lindsay's claim would have represented about one-third of the class. For the purposes of these reasons I will assume that Mr. Lindsay lost the opportunity to settle his claim for $80,000, and certainly no more than $100,000.

Mr. Lindsay, although aware of the CCAA proceedings and of the possibility they would affect him, took only one step before November 14 to ensure that Alberta-Pacific was aware of his claim as a creditor. After receiving legal advice, he sent a double registered letter to the Corporate Secretary of Alberta Pacific which it received on May 24, 1991. It was brief:

> Guarantee Agreement, Dated December 15, 1988, Pursuant to Retirement Agreement Between Transtec Canada Limited and T. Barrie Lindsay, Dated December 15, 1988.
> I understand that this company has made an application under the Company Creditors Arrangement Act and that a court order has been issued.

As a beneficiary of this guarantee I am a creditor of this company and entitled to copies of the application, any court orders issued, and any proposals submitted pursuant to court orders.

Please arrange to forward copies of such application and court orders to me forthwith and to forward any proposals as they are submitted.

Thank you for your immediate response.

When he did not receive a reply he concluded "that my possible future claim under the Guarantee would not be included in or affected by the CCAA application." He did not contact Alberta- Pacific or anyone on its behalf during the next 6 months, although he knew all of the senior executives of the Alberta-Pacific Group because FSD had operated as a division of Transtec during his tenure as senior vice-president of that company.

Nor did he contact Alberta-Pacific or anyone on its behalf after he read a newspaper article on October 31 saying that meetings of creditors had been adjourned because a Hong Kong investor was interested in purchasing the company. He did seek the advice of his lawyers, who obtained a copy of the Plan and advised him that he was probably not included. On the same day I made an order approving the Plan he instructed his solicitors to advise Alberta-Pacific about his claim. He wanted to take advantage of the moment to negotiate a settlement with the Hong Kong purchasers. His solicitors' delay until December 20 before contacting Alberta- Pacific is unexplained. On December 17 8808 Investments Ltd ("8808") acquired the shares of Alberta-Pacific. His solicitors would have known of this closing because they acted for 8807 Investments Ltd., the unrelated company which acquired the Alberta-Pacific debt.

8808 came along as a white knight in August 1991 to make the reorganization arrangement possible. Without the investment of 8808, unsecured creditors of Alberta-Pacific would have received nothing. Coopers & Lybrand valued the assets on a liquidation basis at about $1.8 million. The secured creditors were owed over $13 million. The Fraser River Harbour Commission had reason to terminate the licence. Claims in negligence were outstanding for many more millions, although partially insured. 8808 provided $250,000 to satisfy the claims of all creditors in the category of General Creditors. Those funds were disbursed after January 4, 1992, in accordance with the terms of the arrangement on a pro rata basis to those General Creditors who filed Proofs of Claim.

Mr. Lindsay did not file a Proof of Claim although Russell and DuMoulin sent a copy of the Plan to his solicitors on December 31 as a result of John Fraser's conversation about Mr. Lindsay's claim with Mr. Wesik of that firm on December 20. The letter was terse. It read in its entirety:

As you are aware we are solicitors for Alberta-Pacific. Your Mr. Fraser inquired of our Mr. Wesik as to the intentions of Alberta-Pacific with respect to the guarantee granted in favour of Barrie Lindsay. We advise that we have no instructions at this time as to the position of Alberta-Pacific.

Enclosed is a copy of the Order of the Honourable Madam Justice Huddart made November 14, 1991 which Order attaches the Reorganization Plan of Alberta-Pacific as approved by the Court.

A Proof of Claim form was not enclosed.

Because Alberta-Pacific did not invite Mr. Lindsay to participate in the CCAA process and because Mr. Lindsay did not pursue his unanswered request for information before November 14, 1991, Mr. Lindsay lost the opportunity to oppose the arrangement. Because he did nothing between November 14 and December 5, the effective date of the Plan, he gave up the opportunity to re-open the arrangement. Because he did not file a Proof of Claim he gave up the opportunity to share in the fund for General Creditors. Now he wants leave to commence an action on a guarantee that may result in a judgment for twice the amount other general creditors received. This seems a high price for Alberta-Pacific to pay for a simple management error and unfair to others in Mr. Lindsay's class of creditors.

Indeed, Alberta-Pacific argues that it is unjust and inequitable that it should be burdened with the defence of such a claim and, if judgment is granted, with execution proceedings. FSD is its only source of income. Its spokesperson, Vincent Cheung, says that, although FSD has become profitable because of the arrangement and a new licensing agreement with the Fraser River Harbour Commission, the secured creditors of Alberta-Pacific still hold security well in excess of the value of the FSD shares, which are the only asset of Alberta-Pacific. He fears the action and subsequent execution proceedings would affect the security and licensing agreements.

It is difficult for Mr. Cheung and for this court to understand how Mr. Lindsay could have failed to pursue a response to his letter of May 24. He was aware of the financial and business difficulties of the Alberta-Pacific Group. He understood the importance of the CCAA proceedings and that he might be affected by them.

He explains that he formed his belief that Alberta-Pacific did not intend to include him in the Plan on the basis of the legal advice he received. In April he learned from his solicitors that it was unlikely that the CCAA included contingent creditors. However, by October 31, the decision in Quintette, supra, would have been known to the Bar and I had considered it in a decision in this matter. His solicitors had a copy of the Plan before November 13, perhaps before the November 5th meeting of creditors. They advised him that the Plan probably did not include him. His own reading of the Plan then and later confirmed that advice because it did not include the word "contingent" with regard to creditors.

While he may have concluded that the Plan would not affect his contingent claim, his letter and note of November 14 to his solicitor demonstrate his understanding that they had the potential to do so and his understanding that he was a creditor under the CCAA.

It would have been a simple matter for Mr. Lindsay to enquire from any one of the senior executives of Alberta-Pacific if he was included, and equally simple for his solicitors to enquire of Fraser Beatty or Russell & DuMoulin if they were aware of Mr. Lindsay's claim. He could have gone to the meeting of General Creditors. But he did nothing until he instructed his solicitors on November 14 to advise Alberta-Pacific of his claim. Then they did nothing until December 20, 3 days after they knew the closing had taken place. The post-script to his note to his solicitors shows his thinking precisely:

> On reflection after our telcon, I assume that the possible likely defence of Alta Pacific et al to the guarantee which is brought to their attention is to go back to Court and attempt to get an order specifically wiping out the Guarantee -- and that would be our time to defend our position? On balance, seems much better to possibly defend our position now if necessary rather than "X" months or years out - at least we know where we stand.

I must conclude that Mr. Lindsay (or his solicitors on his behalf) made considered deliberate decisions not to again notify Alberta-Pacific of his claim until after the approval order and then not until after the closing of the share purchase agreement on December 17.

The only sensible conclusion I can reach on the basis of the evidence before me is that Mr. Lindsay preferred not to participate in the CCAA proceedings and to take his chances later based on his understanding of the CCAA and the Plan. I also accept that he would have pursued his claim more diligently if he had understood that contingent claims were included in the CCAA and that his claim was included in the Plan.

That conclusion is reinforced by the contents of a letter Mr. Mair wrote to Mr. Lindsay on January 7, 1992, after receiving the response of Russell & DuMoulin to the verbal notice given December 20. The second paragraph reads:

> I believe we agree that the Russell & DuMoulin letter accomplishes part of our purpose in having what we suspect to be the new owners of Alberta-Pacific be made aware of the existence of the guarantee. Some time in the future we may have to face the issue of whether or not the court order affects Alberta-Pacific's obligation. I will have some preliminary work done on this.

Mr. Lindsay accepts that his understanding of the CCAA was wrong. But he continues to take the position that he is not bound by the CCAA arrangement because he is not a "creditor" of Alberta-Pacific within the meaning of the Plan. If he is bound, then he seeks to be exempted from the continuing stay of proceedings because he did not receive notice of the meetings of the General Creditors and did not receive a Proof of Claim with the letter of December 31, 1991.

Is Mr. Lindsay a creditor under the plan?

His counsel concedes that the beneficiary of a guarantee by a debtor company may be subject to a plan as a creditor with a "claim" as defined in section 12 of the CCAA, or, as she put it, that a plan can capture contingent liabilities. That concession is consistent with the view Thackray J. expressed in Quintette Coal Ltd., supra, when he said (at 88) "'Claim' is visualized with a future prospect, i.e, 'would be a debt' and in my opinion clearly envisages giving potential creditors a role in the CCAA proceedings." However, she argues, the Alberta-Pacific plan does not do so.

I disagree. Alberta-Pacific told the court at the confirmation hearing that it intended all creditors and potential creditors to be included in the arrangements. I thought then and think now that the Plan captures creditors with contingent claims.

The relevant definitions from Article 2.01 of the plan are these:

> "Claim" means a claim for an amount alleged by a person to be owed to it by, or any obligation or cause of action against, the Companies, or any of them, as at May 30, 1991, either:
> (a)as set forth in a Proof of Claim which has either:
> (i)been admitted by the Companies for all purposes, or
> (ii)been determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction to be a proper obligation of the Companies, or any of them;
> (b)which has been determined by the Companies to be a proper obligation of the Companies, or any of them;
> (c)for which a valid Proof of Claim could have been filed with the Companies, but which Proof of Claim was not so filed; > together with all accrued and accruing interest which is expressly declared to be payable under this Plan.
> "Class" means that group of persons constituting any of the following: Alberta Creditors, General Creditors, Spill Claimants, Fire Claimants, Bondholders and Related Creditors.

Digitized by Google

"Creditor" means a person having a Claim.

"General Creditor" means a Creditor not falling within any other Class, except the Commission, a Cargo Claimant and a Related Creditor, and includes a person who is Related to the Companies and who provided goods and services to the Companies, for the fair value of those goods and services supplied.

"Proof of Claim" means a proof of claim form as distributed by the Companies, properly completed and executed by a Creditor and delivered to the Companies within the time limits set out in this Plan or the Information Circular.

Article 3.03 dealt with the General Creditors. It included these provisions:

f) In the event that a General Creditor does not file a Proof of Claim with the Companies within the time provided for above, it shall have no further claim, cause or right of action against the Companies or any of them;

g) The stay of proceedings as set out in the November 22, 1990 order in the Proceeding shall remain in full force and effect as against General Creditors after the Final Order, subject only to Article IV hereof.

Mr. Lindsay is a person who could have filed a Proof of Claim within 30 days of the acceptance by the Registrar of companies of the order sanctioning the plan for filing. I understand that the Registrar accepted the order on or about December 5.

I cannot accept that the receipt of a Proof of Claim form as approved by the court on June 24, 1991, was a pre-condition to Mr. Lindsay having a "claim" under the plan. The suggestion that the failure to deliver a Proof of Claim form to Mr. Lindsay precluded him from being included as a "creditor" under the plan and thus from sharing as a "General Creditor" requires an unduly technical interpretation of the provisions of the plan. In my view anyone reading the plan would consider that it included among those entitled to share as a General Creditor someone with a contingent claim capable of being valued as it would be on a bankruptcy.

The real issue in this application is what effect, if any, a plan can have on an unsecured creditor who is not invited to participate in the process of arriving at a compromise because of inadvertence, yet appears to fall within a class for whom provision is made in the plan. That question does not appear to have been considered by any court.

How does the plan affect Mr. Lindsay?

The final order sanctioning the Alberta-Pacific plan provided that it was "binding upon the Petitioners, the Creditors, Claimants of the Petitioners and any person having a Claim in accordance with its terms." That order also included a declaration that "all requisite notices have been given and Meetings held for the purpose of consideration of the Plan by the Creditors and Claimants of the Petitioners." The requisite notices were those authorized by the order of June 24, 1991, in the exercise of discretion given this court by section 4 of the CCAA.

The failure to adhere rigidly to such an authorizing order was considered fatal to a claim to bind an unsecured creditor in Quebec Steel Products (Industries) Ltd. v. James United Steel Ltd. (1969), 5 D.L.R. (3d) 374 (Ont. H.C.). In obiter (at 382) Parker J. held that "even if the plaintiff were an unsecured creditor, he would not be bound by the compromise because of the failure to give the notice required by statute." He appears to have read the requirements of the order made under section 3 (now section 4) of the CCAA as a "statutory requirement" requiring rigid adherence because there was no provision comparable to section 71(5) of the Bankruptcy Act, that creditors without notice should be bound. He did not consider the purpose of the Act to be sufficient to import such a provision. Nor did he find sufficient protection for those inadvertently excluded from the process in the right under section 13 (then section 12), of "any person dissatisfied with an order or decision made under this Act" to seek leave to appeal. There is no reference to the provisions of section 11 of the CCAA which permit the court a continuing role in the supervision of the plan under which a debtor company, which has obtained the court's protection, is allowed to continue to operate although insolvent.

Section 11 provides:

Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy Act or the Winding-up Act, whenever an application has been made under this Act in respect of any company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit,

(a) make an order staying, until such time as the court may prescribe or until any further order, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under the Bankruptcy Act and the Winding-up Act or either of them;

(b) restrain further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company on such terms as the court sees fit; and

Digitized by Google

(c) make an order that no suit, action or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court imposes.

Section 4 provides:

Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its unsecured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company, of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the court directs.

I have difficulty reading that provision as a "statutory requirement". A plain reading suggests simply the conferring on the court of a discretion to direct the manner in which a meeting may be called. Presumably a court is to exercise that discretion judicially, to take account of the purpose of the CCAA, to consider the variety of interests being served by the CCAA, and to arrive at a fair direction - one that will permit the debtor company and, inter alia, its unsecured creditors to meet to discuss its continuation, although insolvent, in their mutual best interests, but also in the interest of the broader community the CCAA was designed to serve. It cannot be fair to those who meet and reach a compromise that those who are inadvertently omitted from the process, but whose interests bring them within a class for which provision is made in the plan, can be allowed to make a claim that could endanger the continuing existence of the debtor company. It would be even more unfair if a creditor of whose existence the company might not be aware could make such a claim.

In Quebec Steel the applicant was seeking to sue on a contract which the receiver of the debtor company had repudiated (wrongfully in the opinion of Parker J.) on March 25, 1965, before the court ordered the debtor company to give notice to all unsecured creditors as of January 17, 1965. The debtor company had not given notice of the meeting of creditors to any person having a contract with it, who might have a claim for damages for breach of contract.

It may be that the failure to give notice to an entire class of unsecured creditors merits the result Parker J. reached. However, I cannot accept that the inadvertent failure to give notice of a meeting of creditors to one unsecured creditor should be allowed to endanger the continuing existence of a debtor company when the CCAA allows fairer solutions.

It is unfortunate that the process proposed by the Alberta-Pacific Group did not provide for notice to all unknown creditors by advertisement. Such a direction is commonly given, supplementary to an order providing for notice by prepaid mail to the known creditors. The process did provide for such substitutional notice to those who were claiming in negligence. A creditor who failed to see such an advertisement would likely be considered bound by the plan as would someone who did not receive a notice mailed to it. But could not such a creditor look to sections 11 and 13 to provide a vehicle for obtaining relief if the result was inequitable in all the circumstances? If such a creditor, why not an inadvertently uninvited creditor with knowledge of the proceedings?

As Mr. Justice Thackray reminded us in Quintette, the Western Canadian approach to interpretation of the CCAA is designed to arrive at an economically sensible result. In my view a strict application of the approach of Parker J. could lead to economically foolish results. The facts on this application provide an excellent example of how foolish.

The Ontario Court of Appeal is of the view that the supervising court has a broad discretion to make such exceptions to the order restraining proceedings against the debtor company as fairness demands, before and after an arrangement is sanctioned, although it also recognizes that a consensual agreement must be respected and not interfered with lightly. In Algoma Steel Corporation, Limited v. Royal Bank, reflex, (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 11; 8 O.R. (3d) 449; 93 D.L.R. (4th) 98, that court permitted a creditor with notice of the creditors' meetings, whose claim had been valued at $1.00, to commence proceedings against the debtor company, when its section 12 (now section l3) appeal of the valuation placed on its contingent claim failed. The court recognized that its order would affect a consensual plan that had been sanctioned by the court. It found in section 11(c) the authority to do so when the reasons were compelling and an order could be structured that would not prejudice the interests of the company or the creditors. The effect of its order was to permit a tort claimant to access the debtor company's product liability insurance policy.

In reaching that conclusion, the court (C.B.R. at l8) considered a hypothetical situation suggested to it in argument and concluded:

Suppose a visitor had become quadriplegic as a result of an injury on the premises of Algoma under circumstances in which Algoma as occupier might be liable and suppose Algoma's potential liability was insured against by an appropriate insurance policy. To restrict the injured person, a known designated unsecured creditor under the terms of the plan of arrangement, to his or her compromised claim valued, without a trial, in a summary proceeding, would, in our view, be unacceptable. The actual situation before the court is analogous.

(emphasis added)

I suggest a similar result would have been reached had the hypothetical case concerned an unknown and unascertainable tort claimant.

The logical conclusion of the argument made for Mr. Lindsay is that any unknown or unascertainable creditor is not bound by any arrangement for the simple reason that such creditor did not receive notice. He considers that conclusion follows from the view taken of notice by Benoit J. in Sous-Ministre du Revenu du Québec v. Wynden Canada Inc. (1982), 47 C.B.R. 76 (Que. Sup.Ct.).

There, the provincial Crown, a preferred creditor whom Benoit J. found to be a secured creditor under the CCAA, was given leave to execute on a judgment it had obtained for unpaid deductions at source, and to initiate proceedings with respect to additional deductions at source which had come due subsequent to that judgment. The judgment was obtained on March 15, 1982; an order staying proceedings until May 18 was made on March 30; and an order approving an arrangement with the hypothecary creditors was approved on July 15. On that same day the judge ordered a further stay of proceedings and ordered the calling of a meeting of ordinary creditors. On July 27 the court approved an amended arrangement among the secured creditors and an arrangement among unsecured creditors and continued the stay of proceedings.

Wynden invited only the class of secured creditors constituted by its hypothecary creditors to a meeting. It sent a notice of the meeting of ordinary creditors to be held on July 23, 1982 to the Deputy Minister, who received it on July 29. Benoit J. concluded that Wynden's failure to invite the Deputy Minister to the meeting of secured creditors implied that the amounts due him would be paid when due. He held that a debtor company which wants to re-organize under the CCAA is responsible for analyzing its situation, preparing a proposal, and submitting it to those classes of creditors who have the capacity to prevent its continuing in business. Thus, when it fails to submit its proposal to a class of creditors, it is saying that it intends to meet its obligations to the members of that class. In his view, the order sanctioning the arrangement with the hypothecary creditors did not apply to the Deputy Minister because he was not such a creditor. Because he was not an ordinary creditor, the order sanctioning the arrangement among ordinary creditors did not apply to him.

In these circumstances Benoit J. said that he did not need to consider whether the Deputy Minister's vote would have prevented the approval of the proposal submitted to the ordinary creditors in deciding whether or not to grant leave to execute the judgment and commence proceedings for the additional amounts owing. He authorized the Deputy Minister to make claims for specific amounts against Wynden because neither plan applied to the Deputy Minister as a non-hypothecary secured creditor.

The Wynden case does not stand for the proposition that unknown and unascertainable creditors cannot be bound by an arrangement if they come within a class of creditors to which the plan applies. Rather, it says that the failure to make a proposal to a class of secured creditors, whether deliberate or inadvertent, necessarily implies that the arrangement does not apply to members of that class. The judge's comment, that he need not consider whether the Deputy Minister's vote could have changed the result at the meeting of ordinary creditors, undoubtedly refers to a question he might have considered had he agreed with Wynden that the Deputy Minister was an ordinary creditor who had received late notice.

Thus, he did not need to consider the issue before me: whether a creditor, a member of a class clearly contemplated by the plan, inadvertently not invited to a meeting of that class, is bound by the provision in the plan that is intended to extinguish his claim. Alberta-Pacific relies on articles 3.03(f) and (g) of the Plan, supra.

If Mr. Lindsay had been given proper notice of the meeting of ordinary creditors he would have been bound by the Plan and the consequence of his failure to file a Proof of Claim would have been the extinguishment of his debt. That appears to be the result of section 6 of the CCAA and the terms of the Plan. That result fits the rule by majority consensus which is the essence of the CCAA.

Section 6 of the CCAA provides that an arrangement, once sanctioned by the court, is binding on "all the creditors or the class of creditors, as the case may be" and on the company:

> Where a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors, or class of creditors, as the case may be, present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting or meetings thereof respectively held pursuant to sections 4 and 5, or either of those sections, agree to any compromise or arrangement either as proposed or as altered or modified at the meeting or meetings . . .

The section does not require that those not present be taken into account in determining either the majority in number or the three-fourths in value. It does not prevent those who fall within a "class of creditors" contemplated by the Plan, but who do not attend the meeting of that class from sharing in any benefit members of that class may obtain from the Plan. This result is not unreasonable. The known claimants will have considered the possibility of such unknown claims in deciding whether to vote to approve the Plan. The unknown claimant will be accepting a benefit under the Plan in full satisfaction of its claim. However, it is not reasonable that a plan approved at a meeting of which such an unknown claimant has not been given notice can extinguish that claimant's debt.

There is nothing in the CCAA to suggest that result. Such a result cannot be implicit in a statute that relies on consensus among creditors.

Mr. Lindsay is bound by the stay of proceedings which protects the Plan but his claim is not extinguished by the Plan. That stay of proceedings was included in the order of November 14, 1991, in these words:

> ... No person who is a member of any class shall have any claim, right or cause of action against the companies or any of them for any claim, act or omission occurring on or before May 30, 1991 other than as provided for in the plan and any such claim, right or cause of action shall be permanently stayed, save and except as otherwise provided in the plan ....

It is evident from my earlier comments that I am of the view that the court may give Mr. Lindsay leave to commence an action even where such an action will have the effect of varying the Plan. The question is whether or not the stay should be lifted for Mr. Lindsay. It is also evident from my earlier comments that I do not think it is necessarily inequitable for a company seeking to reorganize itself under the CCAA to try to protect itself from unknown and unascertainable claims, or that every inadvertence should be allowed to defeat an arrangement which permits a company to continue to operate, while insolvent.

The question is whether the facts of this case are such that Mr. Lindsay should be exempted from the stay of proceedings that allows that continued operation, and if so, on what terms.

Should leave be granted under section 11?

The interests of Alberta-Pacific, and therefore 8808, continue to be protected by the Plan and the order staying proceedings included in the sanction order. The authority for a court to stay the commencement of proceedings "on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit" comes with this proviso: "except with the leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court imposes." Thus, a creditor will always be at liberty to seek leave of the court to commence an action against a debtor company in the face of a general stay of proceedings unless the debt has been satisfied by the Plan. Mr. Lindsay's debt has not been satisfied by the Plan.

Alberta-Pacific argues that any derogation from the stay of proceedings that affects the Plan must be governed by equitable principles, and that the equities that should be considered are those between the two innocent parties: 8808 and Mr. Lindsay. Mr. Lindsay says that only the position of Alberta-Pacific should be considered. In his view, the mistake of Alberta-Pacific should not be visited on him.

Counsel could not direct me to any authorities setting down the factors that should structure the exercise of my discretion. However, some can be discerned from those to which I have been directed for other purposes: the extent of the creditor's actual knowledge and understanding of the proceedings; the economic effect on the creditor and the debtor company; fairness to other creditors; the scheme and purpose of the CCAA; the terms of the Plan.

The first factor to be considered in this case is the actual knowledge and understanding Mr. Lindsay had of the proceedings under the CCAA. It is repugnant to the spirit of the CCAA that persons with knowledge and understanding of the proceedings can avoid the effect of an arrangement by seizing upon a lack of delivery of the notice authorized for whatever advantage they may gain over other creditors.

In Quebec Steel the decision not to notify persons who might have breach of contract claims was deliberate. The uninvited creditors had no knowledge of the CCAA proceedings. In Sous-Ministre the court was satisfied that the plan was not directed at the class of creditors to which the plaintiff belonged.

Alberta-Pacific agrees that the court may infer from a debtor company's deliberate decision not to give notice of a meeting to a creditor that such a creditor is not bound by the plan, but says that inadvertence does not permit that inference to the court or to a creditor. That may be. But a creditor cannot know the reason he was not invited to participate in an arrangement unless he has reason to believe that he is included in the Plan.

Alberta-Pacific considers that Mr. Lindsay had sufficient knowledge and understanding of the proceedings to permit him to participate in them, that he made a deliberate choice not to do so after receiving legal advice from solicitors who had considered the Plan, and that there is no unfairness in requiring him to take the consequences of that choice.

It reminds the court that neither the CCAA nor the order of June 24, 1991, says anything about the effect of a failure to give or receive notice of meetings, but that there are strong reasons for favouring the policy made explicit in the Bankruptcy Act, that those without notice are bound. Counsel for Mr. Lindsay replies that the Bankruptcy Act requires that notice of the bankruptcy be advertised and that a debtor company seeking the protection of the CCAA has the option of giving notice by advertising, if the court approves. Alberta-Pacific did not ask for such an order with regard to General Creditors.

At the root of the problem in this case is Mr. Lindsay's subjective belief that the failure to reply to his May 24 letter was deliberate, a subjective belief I consider to have been unreasonable in the circumstances I described earlier, and a belief upon which most experienced business people are unlikely to have risked reliance when information could have been obtained and he could have participated so easily. This is particularly so because Mr. Lindsay was not an ordinary trade creditor. His evidence about his relationship with the senior officers and directors of Alberta-Pacific is inconsistent, but it is clear that he knew them well.

But his knowledge and understanding of the proceedings is only one fact among all the facts relevant to the equities that must be balanced in reaching a decision as to how to exercise the discretion given by section 11. The economic effect on the creditor and the company must also be considered.

It was seen as fair in Algoma Steel to permit a person who had participated in the CCAA proceedings to make a further claim that would not affect the company or its creditors, but the Ontario Court of Appeal was firm that such claims would be permitted only for "compelling reasons" and only when the effect on the arrangement is "minor".

Mr. Lindsay's claim as now put forward will have a major effect on Alberta-Pacific. If his claim were restricted to the amount he would have recovered if he had filed a Proof of Claim, Alberta-Pacific would be required to pay between $80,000 and $100,000 more for the benefit it perceived in purchasing a continuing re-organized business. His claim would be subordinate to that of the secured creditors (8807) and might trigger the assertion of their rights. Unlike the situation before the court in Algoma Steel, Mr. Lindsay did not participate in the proceedings and have his claim valued at $1.00; nor is there insurance available to indemnify Alberta-Pacific for whatever may be found owing to him.

Alberta-Pacific argues that modern CCAA re-organization plans contemplate the acquisition by third parties of the re-organized debtor company, frequently to the benefit of general creditors, employees, and the general community. I accept that courts should recognize this development. Tax losses are purchased. Liabilities are assumed. There is a need for certainty that all claims have been compromised.

This is an important factor in this case because it is absolutely clear that no general creditor would have received anything on a bankruptcy or liquidation by a receiver. 8808's offer, founded on the proposition that all creditors were included in the Plan, came just in time to avert such a result. An extension of the stay of proceedings had been granted only to protect those claiming in tort. All parties were aware that another extension of the stay was unlikely. In a sense 8808's offer gave value to Mr. Lindsay's contingent claim it would not otherwise have had, even as it gave value to the claims of other unsecured creditors.

In most situations this policy reason will not be as persuasive as considerations of fairness to creditors. Under the CCAA those who seek its protection have the responsibility of developing a process that gives their unknown creditors or those whom they have by inadvertence missed, an opportunity to consider a proposal that is directed at them. Notice by advertisement has been known to the insolvency bar for many years. It was used in this case with regard to the Spill Claimants.

In the circumstances of this case however this objective is of less importance. Had Mr. Lindsay been invited to participate in the process by advertisement he would have had no more information than that already in his possession. The only real difference is that he would not have been able to defend his position that he was not included in the Plan. Even Mr. Lindsay recognized on November 14 that the proposed purchasers would attempt to include him in the Plan if they became aware of his claim. Indeed, he seems to have weighed the possible consequences and opted to have his solicitors give that notice when his bargaining power was at its best, before the closing. However, what may have been in his mind at that time cannot be weighed with what happened. His solicitors waited until after the closing to tell the purchasers about this contingent claim.

Similarly, 8808 must accept the consequences and manner of its solicitors' delay in responding to the verbal information. Its solicitors could have responded that Mr. Lindsay's claim was included and enclosed a Proof of Claim. The letter of December 31 says that they have no instructions. It is somewhat surprising that instructions could not be obtained between December 20 and December 31 about a claim of such obvious importance to the Plan. At the very least one would have thought that a Proof of Claim form could have been enclosed. After all, the author of the letter was the very person who had appeared at the sanction hearing to ensure that the court understood that all unascertained claims were meant to be included. However, the letter was directed to lawyers, not to Mr. Lindsay. They would be aware that a Proof of Claim form could be obtained by simple request and they were in a position to form their own opinion as to the rights of Mr. Lindsay. Moreover, Mr. Mair's letter of January 7 is consistent with his not having drawn any conclusions from the December 31 letter.

In this case there will be no effect on other creditors who settled their claims. If Mr. Lindsay is granted leave to sue, the effect of the order will be to require Alberta-Pacific to pay from its post-arrangement revenue or to otherwise obtain additional money to satisfy Mr. Lindsay's claim and to deal with any problem that may arise with its secured creditors. This effect will be felt by the shareholders of Alberta-Pacific, the very persons who are responsible for any value Mr. Lindsay's claim may have.

The final factor to be considered is the amount of that claim. In the circumstances of this case, there is no justification for seeking the full amount of the claim. Had Mr. Lindsay's claim not been included in the Plan then leave might have been given to sue for the full amount. While I have found that Mr. Lindsay was included in the Plan, I have also concluded that he was not invited to participate in the proceedings by inadvertence, that he had full knowledge of the proceedings at the critical times, and that he made a deliberate decision to rely on his interpretation of the Plan at all material times. These facts indicate that I need consider only the amount he lost by failing to participate in arriving at my conclusion as to whether or not to grant leave. While that amount remains to be determined, it is unlikely to exceed $80,000 plus whatever interest may seem appropriate in all the circumstances.

The conclusion I have reached after weighing these factors is that the fair and just result in this case must be the refusal to grant leave.

Those who participate in CCAA proceedings must be assured that there are not others waiting outside them for a mistake to be made of which they can take advantage. Those who purchase the reorganized companies must be assured of whatever certainty a court can ensure in its supervision of these voluntary proceedings.

While Alberta-Pacific can be criticized in some aspects of its behaviour in these proceedings, Mr. Lindsay had every bit of knowledge he needed to make a decision about whether or not to participate in them. He chose to remain outside the proceedings until December 20, 1991, and thereafter, until it was too late. I do not think it would be fair to Alberta-Pacific or to 8808 for him to be now allowed to participate beyond this application where he had the opportunity to defend the interpretation of the Plan on which he chose to rely in making his decisions. A CCAA proceeding is not a stage for an individual creditor to try to ensure the best possible position for himself. Whatever it may have been in past years, it is now a stage where creditors are to participate in the collective enterprise of keeping a company going for the benefit of employees, customers, and the general community, as well as the creditors. As in bankruptcy proceedings, it is not unfair that a creditor who attempts to gain an advantage for himself should find himself disentitled to recover anything.

Counsel may address the issue of costs at a mutually appropriate time.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE CUMMING:

1 This is an appeal pursuant to leave granted by a justice of this Court against an order made by Brenner J. on 4 October 1993 and confirmed the next day. The order, which was made under the Companies Creditors' Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("C.C.A.A.") as part of an ongoing C.C.A.A. proceeding, reads:

THIS COURT ORDERS AND DECLARES that the actual costs, including time costs, experts fees and disbursements of Ferguson Gifford in any way connected to, related to, incurred as a result of or as part of, the taxation (the "Taxation") ordered in these proceedings and set out in paragraph 16(h) of the Order of July 31, 1992 (the "Stay Order") made in this proceeding and paragraph 8 of the Order of December 17, 1992 (the "Transition Order") made in this proceeding, be and are "Restructuring Costs";

2 The principal ground of appeal advanced is that the learned judge below did not have jurisdiction to make the order he did.

FACTS

3 The PNL Group consisted of six interrelated companies that operated a leasing financing business under the financial and corporate administration of Pacific National Financial Corporation ("PNFC"), the parent company. The employees of the PNL Group, 230 as of 31 July 1992, were hired and paid by PNFC. PNFC was listed on the Toronto and Alberta Stock Exchanges. Its shares were held by a principal of the PNL Group, Arnold Jeffrey, and his family through a holding company, Southborough Holdings Ltd., and by other shareholders. As of July 1992, the PNL Group had fifteen offices across Canada and, in addition, through subsidiary companies held holdings in the United States, including the U.S. Foothill Bank.

4 Pacific National Equity Corporation ("PacNat") was a holding company, and its shares were held 90% by PNFC and 10% by the Jeffrey family. PacNat held non-financial assets of the group, such as Zippy Print Enterprises Ltd. and real estate in Vancouver and Whistler, British Columbia.

5 PNFC's financial or lease assets in Canada were held by three wholly owned subsidiaries, Pacific National Leasing Corporation ("PNLC"), Pacific National Lease Holding Corporation ("PNLHC"), and Pacific National Vehicle Leasing Corporation ("PNVLC"). Historically, PNLC was the primary generator of lease business for the group. In the normal course, PNLC purchased equipment and then entered into leases with third party lessees for such office and computer equipment. These leases were then packaged into portfolios and "sold" to third party financial institutions called "Funders", with ongoing administration of the leases, including collection of monthly lease payments remaining with PNLC.

6 Profit from the transactions was generated by the increase in the sale price PNLC charged to Funders, over and above the amount paid to the equipment vendors and by residual revenues ("residuals") paid to PNLC as a result of customers buying or releasing the equipment after the initial term. Historically, the value of residuals had been roughly 17% of the gross value of the original equipment purchase price. As of July 1992, the gross value of PNL Group's total lease portfolio was $362,000,000, yielding estimated residuals of $61,000,000. This $61,000,000 "asset" of the PNL Group was a critical component of the PNL Group's reorganization plan and the C.C.A.A. proceedings.

7 A key issue in the C.C.A.A. proceedings therefore became who had ownership of the residuals, the PNL group or the particular Funders? This tied into the general question of the nature of the relationship between the PNL Group and the Funders. Each Funder had one or more written arrangements with the PNL Group. Several Funders asserted that they owned the equipment and leases in question and that when lease revenue flowed into the PNL Group such revenue was held in trust for the benefit of the Funders. The Funders argued that they were not creditors and neither they nor their leases should be subject to the C.C.A.A. On the other hand, the PNL Group maintained that ownership of the equipment and lease stream revenues remained with the PNL Group (as did the rights to any residuals) and although the PNL Group was obligated as matter of contract to pay certain monies to the various Funders, a trust relationship did not exist. The PNL Group's position was that the relationship was one of debtor-creditor.

8 This "trust issue" wove its way through the C.C.A.A. proceedings. It was on the basis of the trust argument that the Funders asserted that the funds used by the PNL Group to carry on its business, including payment of Ferguson Gifford's accounts, belonged to the Funders.

9 Difficulties were experienced in the operation of the petitioners' business and insolvency loomed. Protracted efforts were made to resolve matters by way of a new investor and, when that failed, by way of a standstill agreement. When it became apparent that a standstill agreement could not be reached, PNL Group sought and obtained the ex parte stay order of 23 July 1992.

10 Ferguson Gifford were solicitors for the petitioners (the "PNL Group") in the C.C.A.A. action.

11 The original stay order did not include a concept of "restructuring costs". "Restructuring costs" first appeared in the Stay Order of 31 July 1992. It was the concept of restructuring costs which led to the provision in the Stay Order which gave "any interested party" the right to tax Ferguson Gifford's fees. This provision reflected a balancing of the competing interests of the "Funders" (of whom the appellants are two) on the one hand and the PNL Group on the other, in light of the unresolved trust issue. The provisions in the Stay Order were then carried forward, with some modification, into the Transition Order.

12 Paragraph 16(h) of the Stay Order of 31 July 1992 reads:

16.THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS THAT:

(h) the normal costs of the Petitioners incurred in carrying on the business of the Petitioners in the ordinary course of business, to carry out and fulfill the terms of this Order (the "Restructuring Costs") including, without restriction, rent, utilities, and current wages, and the fees and disbursements of Deloitte and Touche Inc. as Monitor and Deloitte and Touche in respect of its forensic investigations, and the fees and disbursements of the solicitors acting for the Petitioners incurred in connection with the drafting, preparation and presentation of the plan of arrangement, (which said solicitor's fees and disbursements shall be paid firstly from any monies previously provided to the solicitors by the Petitioners and, which said fees and disbursements shall be subject to the taxation thereof by any interested party, but the payment of which may be made by the Petitioners prior to the taxation thereof)..." (Emphasis added.)

13 By a later order of Brenner J., pronounced 17 December 1992 in the C.C.A.A. action ("the Transition Order"), Price Waterhouse Limited was appointed receiver and manager of the PNL Group and its assets, properties and undertakings. Ferguson Gifford was ordered to "tax their accounts incurred as Restructuring Costs pursuant to the Stay Order before the Registrar of this Honourable Court" and the Funders, including the respondents, were given the right to notice of the taxation and the right to participate in it.

14 The Transition Order defined restructuring costs as follows:

"Restructuring Costs" means the normal costs of the Petitioners incurred in carrying on the business of the Petitioners in the ordinary course of business, to carry out and fulfill the terms of the Stay Order including, without restriction, rent, utilities, and current wages, and the fees and disbursements of Deloitte and Touche Inc. as Monitor and Deloitte and Touche in respect of its forensic investigations, and the fees and disbursements of the solicitors acting for the Petitioners incurred in connection with the drafting, preparation and presentation of the Plan. (Emphasis added)

15 On 11 March 1993, Ferguson Gifford obtained the first of a series of appointments for the taxation of some or some parts of various of its accounts rendered to the petitioners for professional legal services performed in connection with the drafting, preparation and presentation of the plan of arrangement. By the first appointment, headed "Pursuant to the Legal Profession Act, Section 70", 9 days beginning 1 November 1993 were scheduled for the hearing of the taxation. The taxation began as scheduled on 1 November 1993, continued for 8 more days and has not been completed. Master Barber, who is presiding over the taxation, has directed that fifteen further days of hearing should be booked.

16 On 16 September 1993, Ferguson Gifford filed a notice of motion returnable 4 October 1994, before Brenner J., "... for directions with respect to the taxation of [its] accounts ... ordered by Mr. Justice Brenner in the Stay Order ... ."

17 By letter dated and delivered to counsel for the appellant on 1 October 1993, Ferguson Gifford stated its position that its costs of the taxation might be restructuring costs. In the letter Ferguson Gifford said that it intended, on the hearing of its application, "... to seek clarification of the phrase 'restructuring costs' used by [Mr. Justice Brenner in the Stay Order and Transition Order] ... including whether the costs of Ferguson Gifford incurred with respect to the taxation of its accounts can be considered 'restructuring costs'."

18 In his reasons for judgment for the order made 4 October 1993, Brenner J. said:

Digitized by Google

Counsel for the petitioners comes before the court today seeking directions as to whether or not its costs in attending the costs taxation requested by the funders are Restructuring Costs under the terms of the Orders. The taxation is currently set for some 9 to 10 days and counsel for the petitioner advises that they are facing an estimated cost of some $60,000.00 to attend this taxation when counsel fees, together with expert witness fees, are taken into account.

In reply, Mr. Turriff for the funders, Sun Life and Mutual Life, takes the position that this taxation is like any other taxation and that counsel for the petitioners should be obliged to attend and defend its accounts on the taxation and that the normal costs procedure followed by the registrar ought to apply.

In my view, this case has to be determined in the context of the orders that were made in respect of the provision that the petitioners' normal costs incurred in carrying on its business, and the cost of carrying out and fulfilling the terms of the July 31 order, and the fees and disbursements of the solicitors acting for the petitioners incurred in connection with the drafting, preparation and presentation of the plan of arrangement, have to be considered.

All parties to this litigation participated in the drafting of the July 31, 1992 order and hence all participated in the language that was used and, in particular, the concepts which were embodied in the order. In my view, that distinguishes it from what might be termed a taxation in the more ordinary course.

Accordingly, I am of the view that it is appropriate that the costs to be incurred by the petitioners' counsel, Ferguson Gifford, be treated as restructuring costs under the terms of the order. (Emphasis added)

19 On the following day, Brenner J., in dismissing the applications of Sun Life to set aside the order and re-open the hearing, said:

The application to reconsider is dismissed. Yesterday, on motion, I was asked to interpret earlier orders made and I believe that is what I did.

20 In his reasons of 5 November 1993, granting an extension of time to Sun Life and Mutual to appeal, Brenner J. stated at 1-2:

On October 4, 1993, Ferguson Gifford, Counsel for Pacific National Leasing, applied for directions with respect to the taxation of its accounts for which provisions were made in the orders I made in this action on July 31, 1992 and December 17, 1992 (the "orders"). Following argument, I interpreted my earlier orders in the context of this case and ruled that the expenses incurred by Ferguson Gifford with respect to the taxation of the accounts were to be treated as restructuring costs as defined in those orders. (Emphasis added)

21 On 23 November 1993, counsel for the appellant Sun Life and counsel for Ferguson Gifford appeared before Brenner J. to settle the terms of the 4 October 1993 order. Brenner J. explained that his intention on 4 October 1993 "... was that Ferguson Gifford recover its actual legal fees and disbursements incurred in connection with the taxation".

22 In his reasons for judgment delivered that day, Brenner J. said:

... on motion by Messrs. Ferguson Gifford for directions with respect to the costs to be incurred by Messrs. Ferguson Gifford in connection with a taxation in this matter, I ordered that the costs of Ferguson Gifford in attending the taxation are to be restructuring costs within the definition of the July 31, 1992 order in this matter.

The issue that has arisen is whether the phrase, "costs", is to be taken as meaning costs in the legal sense or actual costs or indemnity. Subsequent to the motion on the 4th of October, counsel for the parties attended before me at which time counsel for Sun Life sought an extension of the time in which to appeal that order. After hearing Sun Life's application, I extended the time for such an appeal. On that hearing, there was a discussion between counsel and the court in which the concept embodied in my order of the 4th of October of indemnity for Ferguson Gifford was discussed.

Counsel for Sun Life on the motion today takes the position that costs is a term with a legal meaning in that it would be inappropriate for me to vary what I said on the 4th of October in the face of a matter which is currently under appeal. If I were to attempt to do that, I would concur completely with that view. However, I think it is important that I make clear what I intended on the 4th of October and my intention at that time was that Ferguson Gifford recover its actual legal fees and disbursements incurred in connection with the taxation. In those reasons I hope I explained by rationale for this deviation from what might be viewed as the normal course of events in this particular action. With the matter going to the Court of Appeal, that court will have an opportunity to consider my decision and reasons in this case and make an appropriate disposition.

However, I think it is important that I make my order clear and accordingly, would settle the order in the terms proposed by Ferguson Gifford, that is to say its actual costs that are incurred in connection with the taxation are to be considered restructuring costs and, as I say, that matter can be dealt with by the Court of Appeal.

23 On 7 March 1994, at a further hearing arranged to settle the terms of the 4 and 5 October 1993 orders, Brenner J. decided that the order to be entered should provide that the "actual costs" of Ferguson Gifford that were restructuring costs include its "time costs, experts fees and disbursements".

24 Ferguson Gifford has been paid in full for all the work described in all the accounts that are the subject of the ordered taxation.

DISCUSSION

25 I turn now to the principal issue on this appeal, namely, whether Brenner J. had jurisdiction to make the order.

26 The jurisprudence which deals with the C.C.A.A. establishes two propositions: (a) first, this legislation is to be broadly interpreted so as to give a Supreme Court justice exercising jurisdiction a good deal of power and flexibility; and, (b) the C.C.A.A. will prevail should a conflict arise between this statute and another federal or provincial statute.

27 In Hongkong Bank of Canada v. Chef Ready Foods Ltd. 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (B.C.C.A), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 84, the court, in deciding upon the scope of the power to stay proceedings brought by creditors pursuant to the C.C.A.A., stated at 320 [C.B.R.]:

In the exercise of their functions under the C.C.A.A. Canadian courts have shown themselves partial to a standard of liberal construction which will further the policy objectives ... The trend demonstrated by these cases is entirely consistent with the object and purpose of the C.C.A.A.

The trend which emerges from this sampling will be given effect here by holding that where the word "security" occurs in the C.C.A.A., it includes s.178 security and, where the word creditor occurs, it includes a bank holding s.178 security. To the extent that there may be conflict between the two statutes, therefore, the broad scope of the C.C.A.A. prevails. (Emphasis added.)

28 In Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992), 72 B.C.L.R. (2d) 368, this Court did not grant leave to the PNL Group to appeal a decision of Brenner J. dismissing an application to allow statutory severance payments to be made to terminated employees. It was argued that Brenner J. used the jurisdiction under the C.C.A.A. to order the appellants to breach the Employment Standards Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c.10. Macfarlane J.A. stated at 374:

This case is not so much about the rights of employees as creditors, but the right of the court under the C.C.A.A. to serve not the special interests of the directors and officers of the company but the broader constituency referred to in the Chef Ready Foods Ltd., supra. Such a decision may inevitably conflict with provincial legislation, but the broad purposes of the C.C.A.A. must be served.

29 In addition to the provisions of the C.C.A.A. itself, courts have exercised power based on ancillary inherent jurisdiction to supplement this statute. In Re Westar Mining Ltd. 1992 CanLII 1863 (BC SC), (1992), 70 B.C.L.R. (2d) 6 (S.C.), the court created a charge over the assets of the petitioner in favour of certain suppliers. Macdonald J. stated at 12:

The issue is whether or not those suppliers who are prepared (or have been compelled, between May 14 and June 10) to extend the credit, which will hopefully keep the company operating during the period of the stay, should be secured. I have concluded that "justice dictates" they should, and that the circumstances call for the exercise of this court's inherent jurisdiction to achieve that end: see Winnipeg Supply & Fuel Co. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp., reflex, [1972] 1 W.W.R. 651, 23 D.L.R. (3d) 160 (Man. C.A.), at p.657 [W.W.R.].

The circumstances in which this court will exercise its inherent jurisdiction are not the subject of an exhaustive list. The power is defined by Halsbury's (4th ed., vol. 37, para. 14) as:

...the reserve or fund of powers, a residual source of powers, which the court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just or equitable to do so...

Proceedings under the C.C.A.A. are a prime example of the kind of situations where the court must draw upon such powers to "flesh out" the bare bones of an inadequate and incomplete statutory provision in order to give effect to its objects.

30 Sun Life's submission with respect to jurisdiction is based primarily on the proposition that Part 10 of the Legal Professions Act, S.B.C. 1987, c.25 is a "complete code" on solicitor/client accounts such that there is no jurisdiction or court to deal with the taxation of solicitor's accounts outside of Part 10.

31 Mr. Turriff relied on the provisions of s.71 of the Legal Professions Act and particularly, s.71(11), which provides:

(11) Unless the registrar, due to special circumstances, otherwise orders,

(a)a member whose bill is reviewed shall pay the costs of the review if 1/6 or more of the total amount of the bill is subtracted from it, and

(b)the person by whom payment is to be made shall pay the costs of the review if less than 1/6 of the total amount of the bill is subtracted from it.

32 In response, Mr. Clark pointed out that it was Sun Life who sought and obtained provisions in the Stay Order and Transition Order calling for the taxation of Ferguson Gifford's accounts. Having been granted this extraordinary right, Sun Life now takes the position that Brenner J. can have no jurisdiction with respect to such matters because of the

Legal Professions Act. It suited Sun Life's purposes to regard Brenner J.'s jurisdiction as broad enough to enable him to order a taxation of Ferguson Gifford's accounts, but now, when further directions are sought with respect to such taxation, Sun Life firmly takes the opposite view of the C.C.A.A.

33 Having ordered a review of Ferguson Gifford's accounts, Mr. Clark submitted that Brenner J. must have continuing jurisdiction over this matter.

34 Mr. Clark agreed that Master Barber, who is reviewing Ferguson Gifford's accounts, remains free to make an order as to costs. If 1/6th or more of Ferguson Gifford's accounts are taxed off, Ferguson Gifford may have to pay Sun Life the costs of the review. If less than 1/6th of the total accounts are subtracted, there may be an order that Sun Life pay Ferguson Gifford's costs. If those costs are recovered by Ferguson Gifford pursuant to the order of 4 October 1993, Ferguson Gifford will not be entitled to double recovery.

35 Mr. Turriff contends that what has been described as the inherent jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of British Columbia over lawyers' accounts no longer exists because of Part 10 of the Legal Professions Act. With respect, I think this submission is beside the mark in this case.

36 Brenner J.'s jurisdiction was found pursuant to the C.C.A.A., not in the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court over lawyers' accounts. In the case at bar the "relationship" at issue was not one of lawyer/client, but rather one of an insolvent company's lawyer and the creditors of that company. Such a matter is not be dealt with by any inherent jurisdiction over the lawyer/client relationship or under the Legal Profession Act but, rather, by insolvency legislation.

37 The order under review in the case at bar does not call for one party to pay the costs of an opponent. The order deals not only with Ferguson Gifford's expenses and disbursements in carrying out the taxation, but also with Ferguson Gifford's time costs: not only the value of the time required of Ferguson Gifford personnel, including counsel, by the taxation, but also witness preparation and appearance time. As well, the order does not order Sun Life to pay such amounts, but rather declares such amounts to be restructuring costs to be dealt with as per the terms of the Stay Order and Transition Order.

38 Mr. Turriff stated that the order confirmed what he said was the pre-existing right of the Funders to "tax the petitioners' solicitors' charges" under the Legal Profession Act. I am unable to accept this submission. This may have been so but was not necessarily so. This is because we were advised by counsel for Ferguson Gifford at the hearing that the Funders may not be the ones bearing the burden of these costs but rather they could fall on the ordinary creditors. Ferguson Gifford as solicitors for the petitioners, made fee arrangements with PNL Group, rendered accounts and was paid by its client. The Funders did not necessarily have a pre-existing right to tax Ferguson Gifford's accounts and, as they have been paid long since, may not, but for the provisions of the Stay Order and the Transition Order, which gave them as a third party the right to tax, have any such right. See Legal Profession Act, s.71(5).

39 In addition to the above submission, the appellants asserted that inasmuch as the companies had gone into bankruptcy before Brenner J. made his final order with respect to these costs his jurisdiction under the C.C.A.A. was spent. With respect, I cannot agree. Brenner J. in making the order he did was dealing with a matter that was before him prior to the bankruptcy and I think his ongoing supervisory role left him with jurisdiction to make the order now challenged.

40 Then the appellants submit that as there is no mention of costs in the C.C.A.A. this is a matter that must be dealt with under the Legal Profession Act. Again, with respect I cannot agree. I think the costs attendant on a reorganization, be they solicitor and client costs or whatever, are properly within the jurisdiction of the judge under the C.C.A.A. As I see it, these costs are part and parcel of the costs attendant on the reorganization sought under the Act and, that being so, are within the jurisdiction of the C.C.A.A. judge.

41 In my opinion, the learned judge below had jurisdiction to make the order he did and I would, accordingly, reject the main ground of appeal.

42 This Court has said that it should exercise its appeal power sparingly when asked to intervene with the exercise of discretion pursuant to the C.C.A.A. In Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corporation, supra, Macfarlane J.A. at 375 stated:

Despite what I have said, there may be an arguable case for the petitioners to present to a panel of this court on discreet questions of law. But I am of the view that this court should exercise its power sparingly when it is asked to intervene with respect to questions which arise under the C.C.A.A.. The process of management which the Act has assigned to the trial court is an ongoing one. In this case a number of orders have been made. Some, including the one under appeal, have not been settled or entered. Other applications are pending. The process contemplated by the Act is continuing.

In supervising a proceeding under the C.C.A.A. orders are made, and orders are varied as changing circumstances require. Orders depend upon a careful and delicate balancing of a variety of interests and of problems. In that context appellate proceedings may well upset the balance, and delay or frustrate the process under the C.C.A.A..

43 In my opinion, the order of 4 October 1993 is supportable pursuant to Brenner J.'s continuing jurisdiction over C.C.A.A. matters and his jurisdiction to interpret or to supplement his earlier orders.

44 Having reached this conclusion, I do not find it necessary to deal further with the other grounds of appeal.

45 I would dismiss the appeal.

Gregory Batchellor Counsel for Finning Ltd.
Date and place of hearing: June 15, 1992
Vancouver, B.C.

On May 14, 1992, I granted an interim stay order under the CCAA in respect of Westar Mining (the Company) and fixed June 3, 1992 as the date on which submissions would commence regarding modifications thereto during the period of the stay. In response to those submissions, I made (inter alia) the following orders:

1. That the stay did not bind either the federal or the provincial Crown, or B.C. Hydro as an agent of the latter (June 4, 1992).
2. That despite a clause in the interim order to that effect, the court had no power to oblige the Company's suppliers of good and services to extend further credit after May 14, 1992 (June 10, 1992).
3. That as security for credit which had been extended under the interim order between May 14 and June 10, and to secure (up to a limit of $17 million) any further credit which suppliers were willing to extend (and certain other specific obligations of the Company), a charge was created upon the Company's interest in the Greenhills mine, save for "current assets" (June 10, 1992).

While that charge was described as a "first charge", the rights of the Crown in its several manifestations and of Pohang Steel Canada Limited and its parent company (Pohang) were expressly reserved for further argument. It is those rights which were the subject matter of submissions on June 15.

The charge has already been created. In doing so, I purported to exercise the inherent jurisdiction of this court. The Company would have no chance of completing a successful reorganization without the ability to continue operations through the period of the stay. It must be able to arrange for further limited credit from its suppliers if it is to continue operations. Thus, security which is sufficient, in the eyes of its suppliers, to justify the extension of some further credit is a condition precedent to any acceptable plan of reorganization.

The provincial Crown has gone a considerable way toward meeting that need. A few weeks before the Company applied for CCAA protection, the Inspector of Mines ordered reclamation security in the amount of $20.9 million in respect of the Company's other mine (Balmer) and $8 million in respect of the Greenhills mine. The province is prepared to allow those claims for reclamation security to rank in priority after the charge created by my order of June 10, 1992 in favour of the suppliers of goods and services to the Company.

POHANG

Unfortunately, the matter cannot rest there because of the position taken by Pohang. There is a joint venture agreement between Pohang and the Company in respect of the development and operation of the Greenhills mine. The terms of that agreement are the primary reason why the assets of that mine (except for "current assets" such as receivables and inventories) remain free of any mortgage.

Pohang characterizes those terms as a "negative charge" designed to ensure that the Company's 80% interest will remain available to it as security for the Company's covenant to bear 80% of the costs associated with the development and operation of the Greenhills mine, including reclamation costs. I endeavoured to protect Pohang's rights under the joint venture agreement in my order of June 10, 1992 creating the charge, by requiring any receiver-manager appointed thereunder to honour the Company's obligations in respect of operating the mine, and by guarding against the Company's majority interest being sold to a purchaser not acceptable to Pohang.

While it accepts the right of this court to create the charge, Pohang seeks a condition thereto which would protect it in the event that the 80% interest of the Company in the Greenhills mine is insufficient to cover both the $17 million charge and its share of the reclamation costs (as well as other preferred Crown claims on a bankruptcy). That event might expose Pohang to more than its proportionate share of such costs under s. 17 of the Mines Act S.B.C. 1989, c. 56. Pohang suggests a proviso to this effect:

> The charge [created by my order of June 10, 1992] is a first charge subject to Pohang's prior right to indemnity against the assets charged for the Company's portion of any joint liabilities to the Crown which may be claimed against Pohang.

That proviso would put the suppliers (and the charge in their favour for credit extended, voluntarily or otherwise, after May 14) some $28.9 million further back in line unless Pohang is able to negotiate a commitment from the province to limit Pohang's exposure. Time does not permit the luxury of awaiting the outcome of those negotiations. While it occurs to me that the province may have opened the door to valid arguments from Pohang (both legal and otherwise) that the province's generosity to suppliers, post-May 14, should not prejudice Pohang's position, I agree with the province that now is not the time to deal with those issues.

Whatever violence may be done to Pohang, a non-creditor, by my conclusion, it is that Pohang's rights under the joint venture agreement do not extend to prohibiting the court from accepting the province's offer. To remove almost $30 million in potential prior claims from ahead of the charge created on June 10, 1992 should go a long way toward comforting the Company's suppliers.

There are two further factors which support that conclusion:

(a) The interim order of May 14 obliged suppliers (in error) to extend further credit on the terms in place on April 30, 1992. Between May 14 and June 10, credit equal to more than half the value of the charge in question was extended to the Company as a consequence of that order. The court should not lightly abandon those suppliers.

(b) To the extent that a further $17 million in credit is extended to the Company, it will be represented by an approximately equal value in product. While I recognize that the benefit of that production will not be spread evenly over the May 14 pre-stay creditors, nor Pohang for that matter, the fact is that it will not be money thrown away.

PROPERTY TAXES

I accept the argument of the provincial Crown that property taxes under the Municipal Act and the Taxation (Rural Area) Act have "...priority over any claim...or encumbrance of any person except the Crown", and that it is not open to this court to grant its own charge priority over property taxes, at least in the context of CCAA proceedings. That conclusion is reinforced by s. 23(1)(b) and (c) of the Land Title Act R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 219 which provide that even an indefeasible title is subject to "...taxes imposed...on the land...". Thus, the suppliers must take a back seat to some $8 million in school and rural area property taxes, as well as general municipal taxes.

MINERAL TAX & MINERAL LAND TAX

I have concluded that the same priority, except with respect to mineral and mineral land taxes accruing, must be afforded to the provincial Crown's existing lien under these two acts. (See, Roadberg v. R. 1980 CanLII 407 (BC CA), (1981) 21 B.C.L.R. 114 (C.A.) at p. 130). The provincial Crown lien for those taxes ranks behind prior charges. Thus, the charge which I created on June 10 will rank prior to Crown liens which arise and attach thereafter under those statutes. I am advised that the liens which existed prior to June 10, 1992 total slightly in excess of $13 million.

OTHER CROWN CLAIMS

I can conveniently deal with the remaining provincial claims (for motor fuel tax - some $1.1 million, and for social service tax on purchases - some $7 thousand) at the same time as B.C. Hydro's claim as an agent of the provincial Crown for electric power supplied and the claims of the federal Crown (some $13 million, to the best of my recollection) which arise from income tax obligations of the company and employee deductions.

I note at the outset that, in light of my decision on June 4 that the CCAA stay order did not bind the Crown, it will be open to all three of those parties to sue the Company or petition it into bankruptcy (or cut off its supply of electric power) after June 19, unless the Company obtains a further stay of my order of June 4 in the context of seeking leave to appeal therefrom.

The essential argument of the Crown, in respect of those claims not supported by a statutory lien, is that this court cannot alter the priorities which will prevail when and if the Company is put into bankruptcy. Under s. 136(1)(j) of the Bankruptcy Act, any Crown claim is preferred.

The argument is based on this statement in Baxter Student Housing v. College Housing Co-operative 1975 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 475 at p. 480:

> Inherent jurisdiction cannot, of course, be exercised so as to conflict with a Statute or Rule. Moreover, because it is a special and extraordinary power, it should be exercised only sparingly and in a clear case.

But, the Company was not in bankruptcy on June 10 when the charge was created. The Crown claims which are not afforded the protection of a statutory lien are not yet preferred. The June 10 order creating the charge does not purport to alter the priorities which will apply between the claims of the Crown and the unsecured trade creditors as at May 14.

The issue is whether or not those suppliers who are prepared (or have been compelled, between May 14 and June 10) to extend the credit which will hopefully keep the Company operating during the period of the stay, should be secured. I have concluded that "justice dictates" they should, and that the circumstances call for the exercise of this court's inherent jurisdiction to achieve that end. (See, Winnipeg Supply & Fuel v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp. reflex, [1972] 1 W.W.R. 651 (Man. C.A. at p. 657).

The circumstances in which this court will exercise its inherent jurisdiction are not the subject of an exhaustive list. The power is defined by Halsbury's (4th ed., volume 23, para. 14) as:

> ...the reserve or fund of powers, a residual source of powers, which the Court may draw upon as necessary whenever it is just or equitable to do so...

Proceedings under the CCAA are a prime example of the kind of situations where the court must draw upon such powers to "flesh out" the bare bones of an inadequate and incomplete statutory provision in order to give effect to its objects.

The analogy to the powers and priority which may be granted by the court to a receiver-manager is not necessary to support the exercise of this court's inherent jurisdiction to create the charge in question here. (See, Lochson Holdings. v. Eaton Mechanical (1984) 55 B.C.L.R. 54 (B.C.C.A.) at pp. 57/8). Indeed, different considerations apply. In the receivermanager cases it is the property which is being safeguarded by the court. Under the CCAA it is the survival of the company which owns the property, for long enough to present a plan of reorganization, that is the court's concern. In my view, the three exceptions to the "general rule" discussed in Lochson Holdings do not exhaust the circumstances, under the CCAA, in which the court may "authorize expenses for the carrying on of the business".

Here, the view that the second exception in Lochson Holdings applies is open. So perhaps is the third exception, if the court were prepared to take a much broader view of "property" in the context of the CCAA. I prefer to disassociate myself with the analogy to a court appointed receiver-manager entirely and revert to what is fair and just in the particular circumstances of this case.

The essential problem here is how to enable the Company to continue operating until September 30, 1992. The court cannot compel a supplier to extend credit during that period. There is an ability under Chapter 11 proceedings in the United States to create "workout financing" but that is a concept not recognized as yet in Canada under the CCAA. The existence of unencumbered assets (except for taxes) in this situation is almost unique.

I accept the argument that the most equitable compromise is to make security over those assets, with the highest possible priority, available to those who will finance the Company's continuing operation (or who have done so against their will under the May 14, 1992 interim order). No mortgage, charge or lien need be postponed for that purpose. Admittedly, Crown claims which will be preferred if the reorganization plan fails or collapses, or if the Crown in any of its guises is free to and decides to seek a receiving order after June 19, and bankruptcy results, will be postponed to the extent of the June 10, 1992 charge. I consider that to be fair and proper in the context of this CCAA proceeding.

This court "has inherent powers in respect to any matter within its jurisdiction...and may draw [thereon] to give effect to the provisions of [a] statute". (See, In re Loxtave Buildings of Canada (1943) 25 C.B.R. 22 (Sask. K.B.) at p. 25).

I expressly reject the argument of the provincial Crown that the creation of the charge in question changes the status quo among creditors which existed at May 14, 1992. That charge, in my view, is the equivalent of the cash fund set aside for suppliers in Quintette. Here, the company does not have the cash, but it does have assets which can be substituted for such a fund against the possibility of non-payment and an unsuccessful reorganization (or a refusal of one branch of the Crown or another to allow the stay an opportunity to succeed).

Whether a reorganization plan for the Company can be successful remains to be seen. In the meantime, this court should do whatever can be done to provide such an opportunity. The importance of the Company's operations to the south-east corner of the province in particular, and to the economy of the province as a whole, justifies that approach.

I INTRODUCTION

[1] Ford Credit Canada Ltd. ("Ford Credit") brings this application in the context of proceedings commenced by the petitioners (collectively "Smith Brothers") under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA").

[2] Ford Credit seeks leave of the court to terminate one conditional sales contract and eight "leases" held by Smith Brothers in respect of nine Ford trucks. I put "leases" in quotation marks because the characterization of these documents is at the heart of the controversy before me.

[3] The central issue involves the proper interpretation of s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA. This subsection was added to the Act as part of amendments proclaimed in force on 30 September 1997. It creates a specific exception to a s. 11 stay order. It reads:

11.3No order made under s. 11 shall have the effect of

(a)prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for goods, services, use of leased or licenced property or other valuable consideration provided after the order is made;

[4] By the date of hearing, Smith Brothers had voluntarily returned four of the leased vehicles to Ford Credit.

II RELIEF SOUGHT

[5] On 19 December 1997, Mr. Justice Meiklem made the initial stay order under s. 11 of the CCAA (the "Stay Order"). It was effective until 18 January 1998. It was extended to 26 January 1998 by the order of Mr. Justice R. D. Wilson on 12 January 1998. It was further extended until dismissal of the petition or further order of the court by the order of Mr. Justice Williamson made 26 January 1998.

[6] Two clauses in the Stay Order are potentially relevant on the facts before me.

[7] The first is at page 4, paragraph (i) of the Stay Order. In its essential terms this paragraph reads:

(i)All persons having agreements with the petitioner (sic) whether written or oral for the supply of goods or services to the petitioner (sic) (including, without limitation, leases of goods, . . . equipment leases, . . .) are enjoined from accelerating, terminating, determining or cancelling such agreements and that such person shall continue to supply the goods or services pursuant to the provisions of such agreements so long as the petitioner pays the prices or charges under the agreements for such goods or services incurred . . . after the Filing Date concurrently with such supply . . .

[8] I conclude that the payment proviso in this paragraph, to the extent that it covers leased property, is simply a reflection of the limitation on any stay order found in s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA.

[9] The second relevant clause is paragraph (j) on page 5 of the Stay Order. It reads in part:

(j)All persons having other agreements or other contracts with the Petitioner are restrained and enjoined from accelerating, terminating, determining or cancelling such agreements or acting upon any right or forfeiture (sic) (statutory, contractual or otherwise) without the consent of the petitioner, or leave of this court and that all such persons shall continue to perform and observe the terms, conditions and provisions contained in such agreements on their part to be performed or observed. . .

[10] The interplay between these clauses and s. 11.3(a), on the facts at bar, raises a number of possibilities. If Ford Credit can bring its agreements under s. 11.3(a), it may demand payment for the use of the vehicles after the Filing Date without leave of the court. This is so under s. 11.3(a) and it is buttressed (perhaps unnecessarily) by the payment proviso in clause (i) of the Stay Order.

[11] If, on the other hand, s. 11.3(a) is not engaged, in order to demand payment and thereafter seize the vehicles, Ford Credit would require the written consent of the petitioners or leave of the court under clause (j) of the Stay Order.

[12] I say immediately that if Ford Credit is before the court under clause (j), I am not inclined to grant leave because that would tend to undermine Smith Brothers' efforts to rearrange its affairs under the CCAA before the merits of that arrangement have been considered. It would, as well, do so in a manner tending to favour Ford Credit -- only one of many creditors.

[13] I turn to Ford Credit's Notice of Motion.

[14] It seeks leave of the court permitting it to terminate "all contracts and vehicle leases with Smith Brothers Contracting Ltd." and to seize the vehicles. It seeks this relief "pursuant to the order of Mr. Justice Meiklem granted December 19, 1997 herein".

[15] This leads to a number of observations. First, if Ford Credit can bring itself within clause (i) of the Stay Order, leave of the court to do that which it proposes is not necessary in light of the payment proviso. Further, or perhaps more properly of initial importance, s. 11.3(a) precludes anything in the Stay Order from preventing Ford Credit, if it can bring itself within the terms of the section, from demanding payment for the use of the vehicles after the Filing Date. I interject to say that I construe s. 11.3(a) to mean that if one can require immediate payment for the use of leased property after the Stay Order is made, impliedly one is then entitled, in the absence of payment, to retake the goods (if, of course, that remedy is reserved to the lessor).

[16] Third, it follows that by seeking leave, Ford Credit must be doing so under clause (j) of the Stay Order. This is obviously not the basis upon which Ford Credit has put its case and accordingly I will consider its application as one seeking the direction of the court on the applicability of s. 11.3(a) (and clause (i) of the Stay Order) to the arrangements covering the vehicles. To the extent that Ford Credit is unable to bring itself within s. 11.3(a), I have considered the possibility of granting leave under clause (j) but choose not to for the reasons set out above.

III THE MERITS

[17] I can deal quickly with the conditional sales agreement covering the 1993 Ford F 350 Crewcab. It is neither in form nor substance a lease of property and accordingly it comes within clause (j) of the Stay Order. Leave is not granted in respect of this vehicle.

[18] The "leases" present an issue of considerable difficulty and require a consideration of the breadth of s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA, which, I am told by counsel, is a matter of first impression. My research has suggested this as well.

[19] I will first deal with what is in the nature of a threshold issue, that is, whether s. 11.3(a) extends to a lease of property made before the stay order. I conclude that it does, in respect of payment for use of that property after the date of the stay order. If s. 11.3(a) was intended to apply only to leases entered into after the stay order, one would expect the section to read to the effect:

11.3 No order made under section 11 shall have the effect of

(a)prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for goods, services, leased or licensed property or other valuable consideration provided after the order is made. (underlining added)

By instead wording the section as it has, Parliament, to my mind, is saying that it is the provision of the use of leased property, not the making of the lease itself, after the stay order, which is within the purview of s. 11.3(a).

[20] This view is supported by what scant academic writing on the section there is at this time. In L.W. Houlden and G.B. Morawetz Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada, 3rd Ed. (Toronto: Carswell), the learned authors note in their commentary on s. 11.3:

(13) Suppliers of Goods and Services or Rental of Property to the Debtor after the Filing of a Plan.

If a person supplies goods and services or the debtor continues to occupy or use leased or licensed property, no stay order can be made in respect of such goods and services or leased or licensed property: s. 11.3.

[21] It is the essential submission of Smith Brothers that a "lease" for the purposes of s. 11.3(a) should be narrowly construed. It is argued that an arrangement which may partake in part of a "lease" at law should not be so construed for the purpose of s. 11.3(a) if, upon close analysis, it is more than a true lease or rental agreement. This would be the case if, for example, it is essentially a financing arrangement facilitating the eventual acquisition of the vehicle.

[22] In pursuing this submission Smith Brothers cites cases considering the lease/conditional sales contract dichotomy in the context of personal property security legislation across Canada.

[23] For the purposes of this discussion I will use Professor R.C.C. Cuming's definition of a "true lease":

. . . the term "lease" is used to refer to any transaction denominated a lease by the parties. A lease which is in substance a bailment contract is referred to as a true lease. A lease which is not a bailment, but a disguised security agreement is referred to as a security lease or security agreement. "True Leases and Security Leases Under Canadian Personal Property Security Acts" (1983) 7 Can. Bus. L.J. 251 at 256.

[24] Ford Credit responds by submitting that nothing in s. 11.3(a) requires the court to invoke a PPSA analysis in construing the phrase "leased property". There is nothing ambiguous, it is urged, about that term or about the concept of a "lease" at law. In particular, Ford Credit says that there is no reason to read down "lease" for the purposes of s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA, which, it is said, is effectively the submission of the petitioners.

[25] Obviously the phrase "leased property" requires some construction and any arrangement which purports to be a lease of property must be analyzed to ensure that it is one within the meaning of s. 11.3(a). To hold otherwise would permit creditors to so arrange the form of their contracts to avoid one of the major objectives of the CCAA, that is:

. . . to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business [per Gibbs J.A. in Hongkong Bank of Canada v. Chef Ready Foods Ltd. 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (B.C.C.A.) at 315].

[26] In my view, one must have regard to the substance rather than simply the form of the arrangement in considering the application of s. 11.3(a).

[27] Having said what may be obvious, it is still necessary to consider whether s. 11.3(a) covers all leases or only those which might be characterized as true leases. Is a lease which is more than that -- what I will call a "Lease Plus" -- excluded from the effect of s. 11.3(a) on a proper construction thereof?

[28] The most common form of Lease Plus, and the one which is at bar, is a lease with an option to purchase.

Digitized by Google

[29] Smith Brothers says that it has historically acquired vehicles and equipment for its logging concern through a variety of methods. These include conditional sales agreements, term loans with chattel mortgages, and lease/option agreements. Each arrangement is essentially an alternative method of acquiring vehicles and equipment, although Smith Brothers admits that it has not always exercised its options to purchase leased property.
[30] If s. 11.3(a), properly construed, elevates form over substance, then anomalies arise under the CCAA. As in the case at bar, property acquired by way of lease/option can be lost to the debtor while that acquired by term loan or conditional sales agreement would not (at least not without the leave of the court).
[31] The critical issues, then, are whether s. 11.3(a) is to be construed as covering all leases, including all forms of Lease Plus, or whether it is to be confined to "true leases" and if so, what are the criteria upon which certain forms of Lease Plus are to be excluded?
[32] Much PPSA litigation has of course concerned itself with whether a document in the form of a lease is nevertheless to be considered a financing agreement.
[33] However, it will be observed that the need and basis for segregating various types of leases is expressly dictated by the PPSA. That is, the legislation distinguishes between a true lease and one which creates a security interest, that is one which in reality secures payment or performance of an obligation.
[34] There is no express need to distinguish between forms of leases under s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA. Does a proper construction of the section imply that need?
[35] I approach the construction of s. 11.3(a) by considering the intention of Parliament and the object and scheme of the CCAA.
[36] The Court of Appeal considered the purposes of the CCAA in Chef Ready Foods Ltd., supra.
[37] Mr. Justice Gibbs made reference to S. E. Edwards, "Reorganization Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act" (1947), 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587 as explaining "very well the historic and continuing purposes of the Act" (at 318):
It is important in applying the C.C.A.A. to keep in mind its purpose and several fundamental principles which may serve to accomplish that purpose. Its object, as one Ontario judge has stated in a number of cases, is to keep a company going despite insolvency. Hon. C. H. Cahan when he introduced the bill into the House of Commons indicated that it was designed to permit a corporation, through reorganization, to continue its business, and thereby to prevent its organization being disrupted and its goodwill lost. It may be that the main value of the assets of a company is derived from their being fitted together into one system and that individually they are worth little. The trade connections associated with the system and held by the management may also be valuable. In the case of a large company it is probable that no buyer can be found who would be able and willing to buy the enterprise as a whole and pay its going concern value. The alternative to reorganization then is often a sale of the property piecemeal for an amount which would yield little satisfaction to the creditors and none at all to the shareholders.
(Gibbs J.A. quoting Edwards)
[38] Mr. Justice Gibbs was considering whether the CCAA could operate to stay a bank's realization under a s. 178 Bank Act security. In holding that it could, Mr. Justice Gibbs noted that Canadian courts "have shown themselves partial to a standard of liberal construction which will further the policy objectives" of the CCAA (at 320). [On the purpose and object of the CCAA see also Re Repap British Columbia Inc. (9 January 1998), Vancouver A970588 (B.C.S.C.) and Re Starcom International Optics Corporation (6 March 1998), Vancouver A980298 (B.C.S.C).]
[39] Chef Ready Foods Ltd., supra was considered by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Nova Metal Products Inc. v. Comiskey (Trustee of) reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289, 1 C.B.R. (3d) 101.
[40] Finlayson J.A. (Krever J.A. concurring) said this of the purpose of the CCAA (at O.R. 297):
It is well established that the CCAA is intended to provide a structured environment for the negotiation of compromises between the debtor company and its creditors for the benefit of both. Such a resolution can have significant benefits for the company, its shareholders and employees. For this reason the debtor companies, Elan and Nova, are entitled to a broad and liberal interpretation of the jurisdiction of the court under the CCAA.
Doherty J.A. dissented, but his views on the purpose and objects of the CCAA reflect those of Gibbs J.A. in Chef Ready Foods Ltd., supra Mr. Justice Doherty writes (at O.R. 306-307):
The legislation is remedial in the purest sense in that it provides a means whereby the devastating social and economic effects of bankruptcy or creditor initiated termination of ongoing business operations can be avoided while a court supervised attempt to reorganize the financial affairs of the debtor company is made. . . . The Act must be given a wide and liberal construction so as to enable it to effectively serve this remedial purpose, Interpretation Act R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 12; Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. HongKong Bank of Canada, supra (sic), at p. 14 of the reasons.
[41] I approach s. 11.3(a) with that spirit, that is, with the perspective that a liberal construction which furthers the policy objectives of the Act will dictate a narrow construction of the types of arrangement which are excepted from a stay order under s. 11.3(a). I underline, however, that any such construction must be intellectually defensible on the basis of the words which Parliament has used in the section -- I am not to redraft the section in the guise of construing it.

[42] The decision of the Court of Appeal in Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corp. 1990 CanLII 430 (BC CA), (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105 is also of assistance.

[43] There, certain Japanese corporate debtors of Quintette Coal Ltd. ("Quintette") sought to set off monies owing to them by Quintette against payments due Quintette for deliveries of coal. Quintette was then under CCAA protection and the issue centered on the scope of s. 11 and the jurisdiction to restrain the proposed setoff.

[44] Gibbs J.A. cited numerous decisions on s. 11 and concluded (at 113):

To the extent that a general principle can be extracted from the few cases directly on point, and the others in which there is persuasive obiter, it would appear to be that the courts have concluded that under s. 11 there is a discretionary power to restrain judicial or extra judicial conduct against the debtor company the effect of which is, or would be, seriously to impair the ability of the debtor company to continue in business during the compromise or arrangement negotiating period. The power is discretionary and therefore to be exercised judicially. It would be a reasonable expectation that it would be extremely unlikely that the power would be exercised where the result would be to enforce the continued supply of goods and services to the debtor company without payment for current deliveries, whereas it would not be unlikely when the result would be to enforce payment for goods thereafter taken from or services thereafter received from the debtor company, as is the case here. In cases not involving the supply or receipt of goods or services, no doubt judicial exercise of the discretion would produce a result appropriate to the circumstances.

The order made by Mr. Justice Thackray was in accord with his understanding of the "overall intention of the Act" and consistent with the reported cases. It falls well within the "general principle" distilled from those cases. At p. 199, after considering the submissions of counsel for the Japanese companies, he said:

I must look to the overall intention of the Act, and, as has been put before me by Quintette, what is required within an order to allow Quintette the time to reorganize and make a proposal. Unless there is a sound legal principle for doing so, I must not carve out one portion of the order and give an advantage to one creditor over another. I have not acceded to the arguments of counsel for J.S.I. and consequently I cannot find the legal basis for compromising the effect of the ex parte order.

[45] It is interesting that Gibbs J.A. suggested that it would be unlikely that a court would exercise its s. 11 jurisdiction:

. . . where the result would be to enforce the continued supply of goods and services to the debtor company without payment for current deliveries . . .

[46] Parliament has now precluded that by adding s. 11.3(a) to the CCAA. It is instructive to note, however, that the subsection has been added against the backdrop of jurisprudence which has underlined the very broad scope of the court's jurisdiction to stay proceedings under s. 11.

[47] To repeat the relevant portion of the section:

11.3No order made under s. 11 shall have the effect of

(a)prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for . . . use of leased or licenced property. . . provided after the order is made;

It is noted that the remedy which is preserved for creditors is a relatively narrow one; it is the right to require immediate payment for the use of the leased property.

[48] "Payment for use" is the essential basis of a true lease covering personal property. As Professor Cuming notes (in "True Leases", supra, at 263):

Under a true lease, the lessor surrenders his possessory right in chattels to the lessee in return for an undertaking by the lessee to perform certain acts which usually involve the payment of money to the lessor. The lessee has obligations, but the transaction cannot be characterized as a security agreement because the interest of the lessor is not related to those obligations. In other words, the lessor does not remain owner merely to ensure or to induce performance of the lessee's obligations. He remains owner because a bailment contract does not involve the transfer of ownership to the bailee.

[49] In the lease/option agreements at bar, the remedy which Ford Credit invokes is found in clause 21 of the Agreements. That clause reads:

Default: If You Fail to make any payment under this Lease when it is due, or if You fail to keep any other agreement in this Lease, Dealer may terminate this Lease and take back the Vehicle. Dealer may go on your property to retake the Vehicle. Even if Dealer retakes the Vehicle, You must still pay at once the monthly payments for the rest of the lease term and any other amounts that You owe under this Lease. Dealer will subtract from the amount owed sums received from the sale of the Vehicle in excess of what Dealer would have had invested in the Vehicle at the end of the lease term. You must also pay all expenses paid by Dealer to enforce Dealer's rights under this Lease, including reasonable solicitors' fees as permitted by law, and any damages caused to Dealer because of your default. Dealer may sell the Vehicle at public or private sale with or without notice to You.

[50] Now I should say that Ford Credit does not indicate in its Notice of Motion that it expressly invokes clause 21, but I conclude that I must analyze the case on the basis that it seeks to pursue its contractual remedies. What else can it pursue but the remedies for which it has bargained?
[51] Ford Credit may say that it is prepared, at this time, to forego the benefit of the acceleration provision in clause 21. But this overlooks the fact that clause 21, regardless of whether it is fully invoked, nevertheless assists us in characterizing what the document is as a matter of law. Further, the invocation of clause 21 is not the unilateral decision of Ford Credit. The lessee is entitled to insist on the sale of the vehicle and the benefit of any credit in his or her favour as set out in the clause.
[52] Returning to the analysis, s. 11.3(a), by referring to "payment for use", evokes, as I have said, the notion of a true lease arrangement.
[53] Clause 21 of the lease/option agreements is hardly that. Not only is the lessee dispossessed of the vehicle on default, he or she is still liable for the monthly payments for the unexpired term. The lessee in that situation is of course credited with the amount, if any, which the dealer receives on a resale of the vehicle "in excess of what Dealer would have had invested in the Vehicle at the end of the lease term".
[54] Clause 21 is not limited to "payment for use". It goes far beyond that and secures the entire term of lease payments.
[55] The presence of the acceleration provision is itself telling. Once again, I refer to Professor Cuming's article (supra, at 279):
Some American courts have recognized as an indicium of a security agreement a provision in a lease under which failure by the lessee to make one or more lease payments or to otherwise to perform his obligations under the contract permits the lessor to accelerate a payment date for all unpaid lease payments. An acceleration clause is important in an instalment debt transaction between a debtor and a creditor because it enables the creditor on default by his debtor to seek the payment of the entire debt rather than having to wait until each instalment comes due. However, while the relationship between a lessor and a defaulting lessee may be one of creditor and debtor, an acceleration clause should, at least, in some cases, be viewed as foreign to the lessor -- lessee relationship. Unlike a defaulting buyer or borrower, a lessee is generally not obligated under the rules of damages to pay a specific predetermined sum to the lessor. The lessor may well be entitled to damages for breach of contract, but there is no certainty that those damages will be assessed as the equivalent of all rental payments owing under the lease with or without deduction of an amount realized from the sale of the leased chattels by the lessor. (footnotes omitted)
[56] What I take from all of this is that by preserving a limited remedy for lessors, that is, "payment for use", in a field of commercial transactions which, as I have shown with these leases, encompasses a variety of arrangements with much broader remedies on default, s. 11.3(a) can be interpreted as restricting itself to the type of arrangement which is characterized by the narrower bargain. More simply: this analysis suggests that s. 11.3(a) does not cover all leases. Rather, it covers traditional true leases where the essential bargain is payment for use.
[57] To put the matter in a slightly different way: Ford Credit's lease does not simply require "payment for . . . use of leased or licenced property", clause 21 secures payments when the property will clearly not be used by the lessee after a default and a retaking by the lessor.
[58] Further, can one say that the leases here contemplate payments by the lessee only for the use of the vehicles? That after all is the epitome of a true lease -- that is, a contract of bailment. Once again, clause 21 assists. On a default, the lessee is liable for the lease payments for the unexpired term. However, it is contemplated that the dealer will sell the vehicle and:
. . . will subtract from the amount owed sums received from the sale of the Vehicle in excess of what Dealer would have had invested in the Vehicle at the end of the lease term.
[59] I can only conclude that by crediting the lessee in these circumstances with the excess sum defined in clause 21, the document is implicitly (and fairly) ensuring that even a defaulting lessee will enjoy whatever equity he or she has effectively built up in the vehicle.
[60] From this perspective one can say that the lessee under these leases is not simply paying for use of the vehicle. He or she is potentially acquiring, as well, equity therein.
[61] It is only payments for the use of leased property that are excepted from a s. 11 stay order under s. 11.3(a). Payments for use and equity are not. Similarly payments for use and equity and an option to purchase are not. This is another reason to conclude the s. 11.3(a) is not inclusive of all forms of lease.
[62] Having reached this conclusion, what are the criteria for exclusion of arrangements from the scope of s. 11.3(a)? It is here that the PPSA jurisprudence offers some useful guideposts.
[63] Re Bronson reflex, (1995), 34 C.B.R. (3d) 255 is a decision of Master Powers sitting as a Registrar in Bankruptcy. His decision was affirmed on appeal by Mr. Justice Lamperson, 1996 CanLII 2713 (BC SC), (1996), 39 C.B.R. (3d) 33 (B.C.S.C.).

[64] Master Powers' decision offers a thorough review of the law on when a lease/option agreement will be construed as a security agreement for the purposes of the seize or sue provision in s. 67 of the PPSA S.B.C. 1989, c. 36.
[65] Master Powers quotes this extract from R.C.C. Cuming and R.J. Wood, British Columbia Personal Property Act Handbook (Toronto: Carswell, 1990):
If a transaction is one under which a party gives or recognizes that someone else has an interest in his or her property in order to secure payment or performance of an obligation, it is a security agreement. (p.31)
If the commercial realities, i.e., the substance of the transaction, point to a secured financing arrangement rather than to a bailment in the case of a lease, or an agency relationship in the case of a consignment, then the transaction is a security agreement even though it takes the form of a lease or consignment, and even though there is no provision vesting title in the lessee or consignee. Likewise the fact that a lease provides for a purchase option exercisable by the lessee does not by itself dictate (as it did under the sale of goods on conditions act) that transaction is to be regarded as a security lease. (p. 31)
The general approach is to examine carefully the relationship between the lessor and lessee in order to determine whether or not in that relationship the standard indicia of a secured credit arrangement are to be found. If the lessee is required to pay what is the equivalent of the lessor's capital investment plus a credit charge at the rate existing at the date of the agreement, there is strong evidence of a secured sale. A clause in a lease giving to the lessee the option to purchase the goods at less than their expected market value (as determined at the date of execution) indicates that the lessee has acquired an equity in the goods not unlike that which would have been acquired under an instalment purchase contract. However, the fact that at the end of a lease term roughly equivalent to the useful life of the goods the lessee can purchase the goods at their then market value does not prevent characterization of the transaction as a security agreement. Evidence that the lessee bears some of the obligations of ownership such as the requirement to repair and insure the goods provide some persuasive but not determinative indication of a security agreement. In one case, the court was prepared to look at the business activities of the lessor to determine whether or not it had a lessor's facilities and methods of operation and to take this into consideration in making the determination. (p.32-33)
[66] The learned Master also referred to a checklist prepared by Professor Cuming in September, 1991 wherein he summarized the considerations taken into account by American courts in determining whether a document is a true lease or a security agreement.
[67] These criteria are as follows:
1.Whether there was an option to purchase for a nominal sum;
2.Whether there was a provision in the lease granting the lessee an equity or property interest in the equipment;
3.Whether the nature of the lessor's business was to act as a financing agency;
4.Whether the lessee paid a sales tax incident to acquisition of the equipment;
5.Whether the lessee paid all other taxes incident to ownership of the equipment;
6.Whether the lessee was responsible for comprehensive insurance on the equipment;
7.Whether the lessee was required to pay any and all licence fees for operation of the equipment and to maintain the equipment at his expense;
8.Whether the agreement placed the entire risk of loss upon the lessee;
9.Whether the agreement included a clause permitting the lessor to accelerate the payment of rent upon default of the lessee and granted remedies similar to those of a mortgagee;
10.Whether the equipment subject to the agreement was selected by the lessee and purchased by the lessor for this specific lease;
11.Whether the lessee was required to pay a substantial security deposit in order to obtain the equipment;
12.Whether the agreement required the lessee to join the lessor or permit the lessor by himself to execute a U.C.C. financing statement (this would not apply in Canada);
13.Whether there was a default provision in the lease inordinately favourable to the lessor;
14.Whether there was a provision in the lease for liquidated damages;
15.Whether there was a provision disclaiming warranties of fitness and/or merchantability on the part of the lessor;
16.Whether the aggregate rental approximated the value of purchase price of the equipment.
[68] In my opinion s. 11.3(a) does not, at a minimum, include arrangements which are closer to financing agreements than true leases as discussed in the cases on the PPSA legislation.
[69] I turn to review these lease/option agreements before me:
•they disclose a "Retail Selling Price/Lease Price of Vehicle";
•they contemplate a cash "down payment" or trade-in;
•they include an annualized lease rate, that is, I take it, something akin to a financing charge;
•they include an option to purchase exercisable by the lessee at the end of the term;

Digitized by Google

•they require that the lessee insure the vehicle;
•they exclude warranties by Ford Credit;
•they include the default clause to which I have earlier referred;
•they require the lessee to pay all sales, use and other taxes;
•they require the lessee to pay all maintenance and operating costs.

[70] Counsel for Smith Brothers stresses the absence of warranties flowing from Ford Credit and submits that the essential function and responsibility of Ford Credit under the agreements is to provide financing.

[71] In earlier PPSA litigation, the fact that the option price reflected the approximate residual value of the vehicle at the conclusion of the term, was thought to weigh heavily against a finding that the arrangement was in essence a financing agreement.

[72] Here Ford Credit's Customer Service Representative deposes that by her estimate, Smith Brothers does not have equity in any of the leased vehicles and that each is worth significantly less than the current net payout figures.

[73] The president of the petitioner deposes that in his discussions with the manager of the initial vehicle supplier, she indicated that she was confident that they could, if permitted, sell the returned vehicles for a sum in excess of the outstanding amounts under the agreements.

[74] In an early leading case, Henry J. considered the question of the option price in Re Ontario Equipment (1976) Ltd. (1981), 33 O.R. (2d) 648 (Ont. H.C.J.), affirmed (1982), 35 O.R. (2d) 194 (Ont. C.A.).

[75] Henry J. adopted this practical distinction between a true lease and a lease by way of security (at 651):

The test in determining whether an agreement is a true lease or a conditional sale is whether the option to purchase at the end of the lease term is for a substantial sum or nominal amount . . . if the purchase price bears a resemblance to the fair market price of the property, then the rental payments were in fact designated to be in compensation for the use of the property and the option is recognized as a real one. On the other hand, where the price of the option to purchase is substantially less than the fair market value of the leased equipment, the lease will be construed as a mere cover for an agreement of conditional sale (per Croake D. J. in Re Crown Cartridge Corp., Debtor (1962) 220 F. Supp. 914).

[76] Later commentators have noted, however, that the fact that at the end of a lease term roughly equivalent to the useful life of the goods, the lessee can purchase the goods at their market value, does not prevent characterization of the transaction as a security agreement (per Cuming and Wood, quoted in Re Bronson, supra).

[77] In any event, I should stress that it is not necessary for me to reach a conclusion on whether the lease/option agreements before me on this application are security agreements for the purposes of the PPSA. It is enough that I have concluded that s. 11.3(a) does not cover all types of lease arrangement and that, in particular, those at bar are within the class of arrangement not included within the ambit of the section.

[78] Smith Brothers submitted in the alternative that if s. 11.3(a) does apply, nevertheless, if these arrangements are to be properly construed as financing agreements for the purposes of the PPSA, the court enjoys the jurisdiction under s. 63 of that Act to stay the enforcement of Ford Credit's rights on default.

[79] Counsel for Ford Credit vigorously opposes any such conclusion and submits that on a division of powers analysis, the CCAA has constitutionally occupied the field to the exclusion of the provincial legislation in these circumstances.

[80] Because of the conclusion that I have reached, it is not necessary for me to deal with this submission.

[81] In the result, the motion is dismissed. The petitioners shall have their costs against Ford Credit on Scale 3.

Heard: October 1, 2009
On appeal from the order of Justice Geoffrey B. Morawetz of the Superior Court of Justice, dated June 18, 2009, with reasons reported at 2009 CanLII 31600 (ON SC), (2009), 55 C.B.R. (5th) 68.
Goudge and Feldman JJ.A.:

[1] On January 14, 2009, the Nortel group of companies (referred to in these reasons as "Nortel") applied for and was granted protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. C-36, ("CCAA").
[2] In order to provide Nortel with breathing space to permit it to file a plan of compromise or arrangement with the court, that order provided, inter alia, a stay of all proceedings against Nortel, a suspension of all rights and remedies against Nortel, and an order that during the stay period, no person shall discontinue, repudiate, or cease to perform any contract or agreement with Nortel.
[3] The CAW-Canada ("Union") represents employees of Nortel at two sites in Ontario. The Union and Nortel are parties to a collective agreement covering both sites. On April 21, 2009, the Union and a group of former employees of Nortel ("Former Employees") each brought a motion for directions seeking certain relief from the order granted to Nortel on January 14, 2009. On June 18, 2009, Morawetz J. denied both motions.
[4] The Union and the Former Employees both appealed from that decision. Their appeals were heard one after the other on October 1, 2009. The appeal of the Former Employees was supported by a group of Canadian non-unionized employees, whose employment with Nortel continues. Nortel was supported in opposing the appeals by the board of directors of two of the Nortel companies, an informal Nortel noteholders group, and the Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of Nortel.
[5] We will address each of the two appeals in turn.
THE UNION APPEAL
Background
[6] The collective agreement between the Union and Nortel sets out the terms and conditions of employment of the 45 employees that have continued to work for Nortel since January 14, 2009. The collective agreement also obliges Nortel to make certain periodic payments to unionized former employees who have retired or been terminated from Nortel. The three kinds of periodic payments at issue in this proceeding are monthly payments under the Retirement Allowance Plan ("RAP"), payments under the Voluntary Retirement Option ("VRO"), and termination and severance payments to unionized employees who have been terminated or who have severed their employment at Nortel.
[7] Since the January 14, 2009 order, Nortel has continued to pay the continuing employees their compensation and benefits as required by the collective agreement. However, as of that date, it ceased to make the periodic payments at issue in this case.
[8] The Union's motion requested an order directing Nortel to resume those periodic payments as required by the collective agreement. The Union's argument hinges on s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA. At the time this appeal was argued, it read as follows:[1]
11.3 No order made under section 11 shall have the effect of
(a) prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for goods, services, use of leased or licensed property or other valuable consideration provided after the order is made.
[9] The Union's argument before the motion judge was that the collective agreement is a bargain between it and Nortel that ought not to be divided into separate obligations and therefore the "compensation" for services performed under it must include all of Nortel's monetary obligations, not just those owed specifically to those who remain actively employed. The Union argued that the contested periodic payments to Former Employees must be considered part of the compensation for services provided after January 14, 2009, and therefore exempted from the order of that date by s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA.
[10] The motion judge dismissed this argument. The essence of his reasons is as follows at para. 67:
The flaw in the argument of the Union is that it equates the crystallization of a payment obligation under the Collective Agreement to a provision of a service within the meaning of s. 11.3. The triggering of the payment obligation may have arisen after the Initial Order but it does not follow that a service has been provided after the Initial Order. Section 11.3 contemplates, in my view, some current activity by a service provider post-filing that gives rise to a payment obligation post-filing. The distinction being that the claims of the Union for termination and severance pay are based, for the most part, on services that were provided pre-filing. Likewise, obligations for benefits arising from RAP and VRO are again based, for the most part, on services provided pre-filing. The exact time of when the payment obligation crystallized is not, in my view, the determining factor under section 11.3. Rather, the key factor is whether the employee performed services after the date of the Initial Order. If so, he or she is entitled to compensation benefits for such current service.

Digitized by Google

[11] The Union challenges this conclusion.

[12] In this court, neither the Union nor any other party argues that Nortel's obligation to make the contested periodic payments should be decided by arbitration under the collective agreement rather than by the court.

[13] Nor does the Union argue that any of the unionized former employees, who would receive these periodic payments, have themselves provided services to Nortel since the January 14, 2009 order.

[14] Rather, the Union reiterates the argument it made at first instance, namely that these periodic payments are protected by s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA as payment for service provided after the January 14, 2009 order was made by the Union members who have continued as employees of Nortel.

[15] In our opinion, this argument must fail.

Analysis

[16] Two preliminary points should be made. First, as the motion judge wrote at para. 47 of his reasons, the acknowledged purpose of the CCAA is to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors, to the end that the company is able to continue in business. The primary instrument provided by the CCAA to achieve its purpose is the power of the court to issue a broad stay of proceedings under s. 11. That power includes the power to stay the debt obligations of the company. The order of January 14, 2009 is an exercise of that power, and must be read in the context of the purpose of the legislation. Nonetheless, it is important to underline that, while that order stays those obligations, it does not eliminate them.

[17] Second, we also agree with the motion judge when he stated at para. 66:

In my view, section 11.3 is an exception to the general stay provision authorized by section 11 provided for in the Initial Order. As such, it seems to me that section 11.3 should be narrowly construed.

[18] Because of s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA, the January 14, 2009 order cannot stay Nortel's obligation to make immediate payment for the services provided to it after the date of the order.

[19] What then does the collective agreement require of Nortel as payment for the work done by its continuing employees? The straightforward answer is that the collective agreement sets out in detail the compensation that Nortel must pay and the benefits it must provide to its employees in return for their services. That bargain is at the heart of the collective agreement. Indeed, as counsel for the Union candidly acknowledged, the typical grievance, if services of employees went unremunerated, would be to seek as a remedy not what might be owed to former employees but only the payment of compensation and benefits owed under the collective agreement to those employees who provided the services. Indeed, that package of compensation and benefits represents the commercially reasonable contractual obligation resting on Nortel for the supply of services by those continuing employees. It is that which is protected by s. 11.3(a) from the reach of the January 14, 2009 order: see Re: Mirant Canada Energy Marketing Ltd. 2004 ABQB 218 (CanLII), (2004), 36 Alta. L.R. (4th) 87 (Q.B.).

[20] Can it be said that the payment required for the services provided by the continuing employees of Nortel also extends to encompass the periodic payments to the former employees in question in this case? In our opinion, for the following reasons the answer is clearly no.

[21] The periodic payments to former employees are payments under various retirement programs, and termination and severance payments. All are products of the ongoing collective bargaining process and the collective agreements it has produced over time. As Krever J.A. wrote regarding analogous benefits in Metropolitan Police Service Board v. Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement Board et al. 1999 CanLII 3763 (ON CA), (1999), 45 O.R. (3d) 622 (C.A.) at 629, it can be assumed that the cost of these benefits was considered in the overall compensation package negotiated when they were created by predecessor collective agreements. These benefits may therefore reasonably be thought of as deferred compensation under those predecessor agreements. In other words, they are compensation deferred from past agreements but provided currently as periodic payments owing to former employees for prior services. The services for which these payments constitute "payment" under the CCAA were those provided under predecessor agreements, not the services currently being performed for Nortel.

[22] Moreover, the rights of former employees to these periodic payments remain currently enforceable even though those rights were created under predecessor collective agreements. They become a form of "vested" right, although they may only be enforceable by the Union on behalf of the former employees: see Dayco (Canada) Ltd. v. CAW-Canada, 1993 CanLII 144 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 230 at 274. That is entirely inconsistent with the periodic payments constituting payment for current services. If current service was the source of the obligation to make these periodic payments then, if there were no current services being performed, the obligation would evaporate and the right of the former employees to receive the periodic payments would disappear. It would in no sense be a "vested" right.

[23] In summary, we can find no basis upon which the Union's position can be sustained. The periodic payments in issue cannot be characterized as part of the payment required of Nortel for the services provided to it by its continuing employees after January 14, 2009. Section 11.3(a) of the CCAA does not exclude these payments from the effect of the order of that date.

[24] The Union's appeal must be dismissed.

THE FORMER EMPLOYEES' APPEAL

Background

[25] The Former Employees' motion was brought by three men as representatives of former employees including pensioners and their survivors. On the motion their claim was for an order varying the Initial Order to require Nortel to pay termination pay, severance pay, vacation pay, an amount for continuation of the Nortel benefit plans during the notice period in accordance with the Employment Standards Act, 2000, S.O. 2000, c. 41 ("ESA") and any other provincial employment legislation. The representatives also sought an order varying the Initial Order to require Nortel to pay the Transitional Retirement Allowance ("TRA") and certain pension benefit payments to affected former employees. The motion judge described the motion by the former employees as "not dissimilar to the CAW motion, such that the motion of the former employees can almost be described as a "Me too motion."

[26] After he dismissed the union motion, the motion judge turned to the "me too" motion of the former employees. The former employees wanted to achieve the same result as the unionized employees. The motion judge described their argument as based on the position that Nortel could not contract out of the ESA of Ontario or another province. However, as he noted, rather than trying to contract out, it was acknowledged that the ESA applied, except that immediate payment of amounts owing as required by the ESA were stayed during the stay period under the Initial Order, so that the former employees could not enforce the acknowledged payment obligation during that time. The motion judge concluded that on the same basis as the union motion, the former employees' motion was also dismissed.

[27] For the purposes of the appeal, the former employees narrowed their claim only to statutory termination and severance claims under the ESA that were not being paid by Nortel pursuant to the Initial Order, and served a Notice of Constitutional Question. The appellant asks this court to find that judges cannot use their discretion to order a stay under the CCAA that has the effect of overriding valid provincial minimum standards legislation where there is no conflict between the statutes and the doctrine of paramountcy has not been triggered.

[28] Neither the provincial nor the federal governments responded to the notice on this appeal.

[29] Paragraphs 6 and 11 of the Initial Order (as amended) provide as follows:

6. THIS COURT ORDERS that each of the Applicants, either on its own or on behalf of another Applicant, shall be entitled but not required to pay the following expenses whether incurred prior to, on or after the date of this Order:

(a) all outstanding and future wages, salaries and employee benefits (including but not limited to, employee medical and similar benefit plans, relocation and tax equalization programs, the Incentive Plan (as defined in the Doolittle affidavit) and employee assistance programs), current service, special and similar pension benefit payments, vacation pay, commissions and employee and director expenses, in each case incurred in the ordinary course of business and consistent with existing compensation policies and arrangements;

11. THIS COURT ORDERS that each of the Applicants shall have the right to:

(b) terminate the employment of such of its employees or temporarily lay off such employees as it deems appropriate and to deal with the consequences thereof in the Plan or on further order of the Court.

...

all of the foregoing to permit the Applicants to proceed with an orderly restructuring of the Business. [Emphasis added.]

[30] Pursuant to these paragraphs, from the date of the Initial Order, Nortel stopped making payments to former employees as well as employees terminated following the Initial Order for certain retirement and pension allowances as well as for statutory severance and termination payments. The ESA sets out obligations to provide notice of termination of employment or payment in lieu of notice and severance pay in defined circumstances. By virtue of s. 11(5), those payments must be made on the later of seven days after the date employment ends or the employee's next pay date.

[31] As the motion judge stated, it is acknowledged by all parties on this motion that the ESA continues to apply while a company is subject to a CCAA restructuring. The issue is whether the company's provincial statutory obligations for virtually immediate payment of termination and severance can be stayed by an order made under the CCAA.

[32] Sections 11(3), dealing with the initial application, and (4), dealing with subsequent applications under the CCAA are the stay provisions of the Act. Section 11(3) provides:

11. (3) A court may, on an initial application in respect of a company, make an order on such terms as it may impose, effective for such period as the court deems necessary not exceeding thirty days,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under an Act referred to in subsection 1; [the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Winding Up Act]

Digitized by Google

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company;
(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of or proceeding with any other action, suit or proceeding against the company.
Analysis
[33] As earlier noted, the stay provisions of the CCAA are well recognized as the key to the successful operation of the CCAA restructuring process. As this court stated in Stelco Inc. (Re) 2005 CanLII 8671 (ON CA), (2005), 75 O.R. (3d) 5 at para. 36:
In the CCAA context, Parliament has provided a statutory framework to extend protection to a company while it holds its creditors at bay and attempts to negotiate a compromised plan of arrangement that will enable it to emerge and continue as a viable economic entity, thus benefiting society and the company in the long run, along with the company's creditors, shareholders, employees and other stakeholders. The s. 11 discretion is the engine that drives this broad and flexible statutory scheme...
[34] Parliament has carved out defined exceptions to the court's ability to impose a stay. For example, s. 11.3(a) prohibits a stay of payments for goods and services provided after the initial order, so that while the company is given the opportunity and privilege to carry on during the CCAA restructuring process without paying its existing creditors, it is on a pay-as-you-go basis only. In contrast, there is no exception for statutory termination and severance pay.[2] Furthermore, as the respondent Boards of Directors point out, the recent amendments to the CCAA that came into force on September 18, 2009 do not address this issue, although they do deal in other respects with employee-related matters.
[35] As there is no specific protection from the general stay provision for ESA termination and severance payments, the question to be determined is whether the court is entitled to extend the effect of its stay order to such payments based on the constitutional doctrine of paramountcy: Crystalline Investments Ltd. v. Domgroup Ltd., 2004 SCC 3 (CanLII), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 60 at para. 43.
[36] The scope, intent and effect of the operation of the doctrine of paramountcy was recently reviewed and summarized by Binnie and Lebel JJ. in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22 (CanLII), [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3 at paras. 69-75. They reaffirmed the "conflict" test stated by Dickson J. in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R.161:
In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other. [p. 191]

[37] However, they also explained an important proviso or gloss on the strict conflict rule that has developed in the case law since Multiple Access:
Nevertheless, there will be cases in which imposing an obligation to comply with provincial legislation would in effect frustrate the purpose of a federal law even though it did not entail a direct violation of the federal law's provisions. The Court recognized this in Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121, in noting that Parliament's "intent" must also be taken into account in the analysis of incompatibility. The Court thus acknowledged that the impossibility of complying with two enactments is not the sole sign of incompatibility. The fact that a provincial law is incompatible with the purpose of a federal law will also be sufficient to trigger the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. This point was recently reaffirmed in Mangat and in Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13 (CanLII), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 188, 2005 SCC 13. (para. 73)
[38] Therefore, the doctrine of paramountcy will apply either where a provincial and a federal statutory provision are in conflict and cannot both be complied with, or where complying with the provincial law will have the effect of frustrating the purpose of the federal law and therefore the intent of Parliament. Binnie and Lebel JJ. concluded by summarizing the operation of the doctrine in the following way:
To sum up, the onus is on the party relying on the doctrine of federal paramountcy to demonstrate that the federal and provincial laws are in fact incompatible by establishing either that it is impossible to comply with both laws or that to apply the provincial law would frustrate the purpose of the federal law. (para. 75)
[39] The CCAA stay provision is a clear example of a case where the intent of Parliament, to allow the court to freeze the debt obligations owing to all creditors for past services (and goods) in order to permit a company to restructure for the benefit of all stakeholders, would be frustrated if the court's stay order could not apply to statutory termination and severance payments owed to terminated employees in respect of past services.
[40] The record before the court indicates that the motion judge made the initial order and the amended order in the context of the insolvency of a complex, multinational conglomerate as part of co-ordinated proceedings in a number of countries including the U.S. In June 2009, an Interim Funding and Settlement Agreement was negotiated which, together with the proceeds of certain ongoing asset sales, is providing funds necessary in the view of the court appointed Monitor, for the ongoing operations of Nortel during the next few months of the CCAA oversight operation. This funding was achieved on the basis that the stay applied to the severance and termination payments. The Monitor advises that if these payments were not subject to the stay and had to be funded, further financing would have to be found to do that and also maintain operations.

[41] In that context, the motion judge exercised his discretion to impose a stay that could extend to the severance and termination payments. He considered the financial position of Nortel, that it was not carrying "business as usual" and that it was under financial pressure. He also considered that the CCAA proceeding is at an early stage, before the claims of creditor groups, including former employees and others have been considered or classified for ultimate treatment under a plan of arrangement. He noted that employees have no statutory priority and their claims are not secured claims.

[42] While reference was made to the paramountcy doctrine by the motion judge, it was not the main focus of the argument before him. Nevertheless, he effectively concluded that it would thwart the intent of Parliament for the successful conduct of the CCAA restructuring if the initial order and the amended order could not include a stay provision that allowed Nortel to suspend the payment of statutory obligations for termination and severance under the ESA.

[43] The respondents also argued that if the stay did not apply to statutory termination and severance obligations, then the employees who received these payments would in effect be receiving a "super-priority" over other unsecured or possibly even secured creditors on the assumption that in the end there will not be enough money to pay everyone in full. We agree that this may be the effect if the stay does not apply to these payments. However, that could also be the effect if Nortel chose to make such payments, as it is entitled to do under paragraph 6 (a) of the amended initial order. Of course, in that case, any such payments would be made in consultation with appropriate parties including the Monitor, resulting in the effective grant of a consensual rather than a mandatory priority. Even in this case, the motion judge provided a "hardship" alleviation program funded up to $750,000, to allow payments to former employees in clear need. This will have the effect of granting the "super-priority" to some. This is an acceptable result in appropriate circumstances.

[44] However, this result does not in any way undermine the paramountcy analysis. That analysis is driven by the need to preserve the ability of the CCAA court to ensure, through the scope of the stay order, that Parliament's intent for the operation of the CCAA regime is not thwarted by the operation of provincial legislation. The court issuing the stay order considers all of the circumstances and can impose an order that has the effect of overriding a provincial enactment where it is necessary to do so.

[45] Morawetz J. was satisfied that such a stay was necessary in the circumstances of this case. We see no error in that conclusion on the record before him and before this court.

[46] Another issue was raised based on the facts of this restructuring as it has developed. It appears that the company will not be restructured, but instead its assets will be sold. It is necessary to continue operations in order to maintain maximum value for this process to achieve the highest prices and therefore the best outcome for all stakeholders. It is true that the basis for the very broad stay power has traditionally been expressed as a necessary aspect of the restructuring process, leading to a plan of arrangement for the newly restructured entity. However, we see no reason in the present circumstances why the same analysis cannot apply during a sale process that requires the business to be carried on as a going concern. No party has taken the position that the CCAA process is no longer available because it is not proceeding as a restructuring, nor has any party taken steps to turn the proceeding into one under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3.

[47] The former employee appellants have raised the constitutional question whether the doctrine of paramountcy applies to give to the CCAA judge the authority, under s. 11 of the Act, to order a stay of proceedings that has the effect of overriding s. 11(5) of the ESA, which requires almost immediate payment of termination and severance obligations. The answer to this question is yes.

[48] We note again that the question before this court was limited to the effect of the stay on the timing of required statutory payments under the ESA and does not deal with the inter-relation of the ESA and the CCAA for the purposes of the plan of arrangement and the ultimate payment of these statutory obligations.

[49] The appeal by the former employees is also dismissed.

[1] The analogous section to the former s. 11.3(a) is now found in s. 11.01(a) of the recently amended CCAA.
[2] The issue of post-initial order employee terminations, and specifically whether any portion of the termination or severance that may be owed is attributable to post-initial order services, was not at issue in this motion. In Windsor Machine & Stamping Ltd. (Re) [2009] O.J. No. 3195, decided one month after this motion, the issue was discussed more fully and Morawetz J. determined that it could be decided as part of a post-filing claim. Leave to appeal has been filed.

Reasons for Decision of The Honourable Mr. Justice Keith Ritter

[1] The applicant seeks leave to appeal pursuant to s. 13, of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (CCAA) and a stay pending appeal.

[2] The applicant was a creditor of Cow Harbour Construction Ltd.'s ("CHC"), by virtue of a lease agreement ("Agreement"), which provided that CHC would rent certain equipment ("Equipment") for a term of 37 months. The Agreement did not contain a purchase option.

[3] In the spring of 2010, CHC obtained a stay of proceedings under the CCAA to restructure its affairs. Various court applications were heard by an assigned case management judge over the summer of 2010 and, eventually, the CCAA proceedings turned into a liquidation, whereby CHC would restructure by selling its assets. The sales process resulted in an offer from a purchaser, who offered to purchase a large number of CHC's assets, including the Equipment. The applicant objected to the sale of the Equipment, arguing that it could not be sold without its consent.

[4] The applicant sought a declaration that, for the purposes of s. 11.01, CCAA, the Agreement was a true lease, rather than a financing agreement. This characterization affects how approximately $900,000 in lease payments (currently held in trust by the Receiver's counsel) would be distributed. The applicant claims entitlement to the whole amount if the Agreement is a true lease.

[5] On August 25, 2010, the case management judge concluded that the Agreement was a security lease. He also appointed the respondent PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. as Receiver and granted an order approving the purchase and vesting CHC's assets, including the Equipment, to the purchaser.

[6] The applicant applied to the case management judge for a stay of the August 25, 2010 order as it related to the Equipment. The application was dismissed, as it was moot (the Equipment having already been sold) and as no appeal had been taken. The applicant made a further application before the case management judge seeking leave to appeal the August 25, 2010 order as it related to the Equipment and a stay pending the appeal. Both those applications were denied: Royal Bank of Canada v. Cow Harbour Construction Ltd., 2010 ABQB 637 (CanLII), 2010 ABQB 637.

[7] The applicant seeks leave to appeal pursuant to s. 13, CCAA. Section 13 provides:

> 13 Except in Yukon, any person dissatisfied with an order or a decision made under this Act may appeal from the order or decision on obtaining leave of the judge appealed from or of the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies and on such terms as to security and in other respects as the judge or court directs.

[8] The parties agree that the test for leave is whether there are serious and arguable grounds of real and significant interest to the parties. In order to obtain leave, the applicant must demonstrate that the following four criteria are met:

(a) the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;
(b) the point raised is of significance to the action itself;
(c) the appeal is prima facie meritorious or frivolous; and
(d) the appeal will not unduly hinder the progress of the action: Liberty Oil & Gas Ltd. (Re), 2003 ABCA 158 (CanLII), 2003 ABCA 158, 44 C.B.R. (4th) 96 at paras. 15-16; Resurgence Asset Management LLC v. Canadian Airlines Corp., 2000 ABCA 149 (CanLII), 2000 ABCA 149, 261 A.R. 120 at paras. 6-7. The parties disagree about whether the proposed appeal meets the test.

[9] The applicant agrees that the case management judge applied the correct test in determining that the Agreement was a financing lease rather than a true lease. However, it proposes to argue that the case management judge erred by giving equal weight to each factor within that test. It also proposes to argue that there is no case law in Alberta holding that a lease which did not include an option to purchase is anything but a true lease. In resisting the applicant's leave to appeal application, the respondents state that the four criteria have not been met. They also argue that the application was filed out of time, contrary to s. 14, CCAA.

[10] With respect to the argument that the application is out of time, the applicant argues that s. 14, CCAA only requires an appellant to apply to one of the concurrent courts as set out in s. 13, CCAA within the time specified. It states that if it does that and is refused, it can then make an application to the other court even though the subsequent application is outside the time limit in s. 14. I have some significant doubts about the viability of this argument as s. 14 includes a mechanism to extend time and the approach suggested by the applicant seems to render that mechanism meaningless. However, I prefer to deal with this application on the basis of whether leave should be granted, as this analysis leads to the conclusion urged by the respondents in any event.

[11] I conclude that factors (a) and (c) lead to my rejecting this leave application. With respect to the issue of importance to the practice, the applicant argues that this Court has never considered whether a lease agreement without a right of ultimate purchase to the lessee is a security lease. Accordingly, it says, this issue is significant to legal practice surrounding the CCAA. However, stating the issue in that way is re-stating it.

[12] It is clear that the parties argued before the case management judge that he should consider the factors in Smith Brothers Contracting Ltd. (Re) 1998 CanLII 3844 (BC SC), (1998), 53 B.C.L.R. (3d) 264 (S.C.), 1998 CarswellBC 678. One of the factors set out in that case is whether there is any right of acquisition. Therefore, the proposed issue is really about the weight given to a relevant factor in comparison to the weight given to other factors. This leads to the question of prospect of success on appeal.

[13] This court has stated, with respect to many contexts, that substantial deference is accorded to the weight given by trial, chambers, and case management judges, to the factors in legal tests. Any deference afforded is amplified when the judge is a case management judge whose decision is part of a series of decisions relating to an ongoing court process.

[14] That is the case here, where the applicant seeks to appeal the portion of the decision dealing with the rentals and not the direction that the Equipment be included in the sale of assets. Proceedings under CCAA often involve compromise. A case management judge is in the best position to assess whether a particular directive is fair in the context of the compromises made by everyone involved in the proceedings. The case management judge alluded to this in his reasons.

[15] The applicant points to a British Columbia decision which suggests in obiter that there should be a hierarchy in the factors used to determine if a lease is a true lease or a financing lease. In my view, this obiter runs contrary to current trends about how to weigh the factors in a legal test and about the deference afforded to courts of first instance in this respect. If one factor trumps the others, there is simply no point in including the others in the test.

[16] In sum, I conclude that the chances of success with respect to this appeal are minimal and that the proposed issue is not important to the practice surrounding the CCAA. Leave to appeal is denied.

JUDGMENT
ON MOTIONS TO LIFT THE STAY OF PROCEEDINGS OR, SUBSIDIARILY, TO ORDER THE DEPOSIT OF MONEYS IN TRUST

Digitized by Google

1) THE ISSUES

[1] This judgment deals with the right of unpaid suppliers to repossess their goods still in the hands of a debtor company that availed itself of the protection of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act [1] (CCAA).

[2] The facts giving rise to the dispute are simple and can be summarized as follows.

[3] On December 17, 2003, Les Boutiques San Francisco incorporées, Les Ailes de la Mode incorporées and Les Éditions San Francisco incorporée (BSF Group) sought and obtained some of the protections available under the CCAA. The Initial Order issued on that day provided notably for a stay of the proceedings against the BSF Group.

[4] A stay of proceedings is a standard conclusion in the initial orders made under the CCAA and section 11 (3) specifically provides for such a possibility:

(3) A court may, on an initial application in respect of a company, make an order on such terms as it may impose, effective for such period as the court deems necessary not exceeding thirty days,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under an Act referred to in subsection (1);

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company; and

(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of or proceeding with any other action, suit or proceeding against the company.

(Emphasis added)

[5] On the date of the Initial Order issued here, one supplier, L'Oréal Canada Inc., was owed $413,557.08 by the BSF Group, $360,395,32 of which represented goods delivered within the 30 days prior to December 17, 2003[2]. After the application of some credits for services rendered, the amount owed was reduced to $299,840.09 on the day of hearing of L'Oréal's motion[3].

[6] Similarly, another supplier, Make Up For Ever S.A., was also owed a sum of $67,420.97 on December 17, 2003, $30,015.58 of which represented goods delivered to the BSF Group within the 30 days preceding the date of the Initial Order[4].

[7] In early January 2004, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever each filed a motion by which they claimed that the stay of proceedings should be lifted and declared inapplicable inasmuch as they were concerned. The reason invoked: they each want to exercise their right to revendicate the goods sold and delivered still in the possession of the BSF Group, as any sale which took place is now resolved and resiliated automatically because of the BSF Group's failure to perform its obligations, namely to pay for the goods.

[8] They rely upon article 1605 C.C.Q. which states:

"1605. A contract may be resolved or resiliated without judicial proceedings where the debtor is in default by operation of law or where he has failed to perform his obligation within the time allowed in the writing putting him in default."

(Emphasis added)

[9] Subsidiarily, if the Court does not agree to lift the stay of proceedings against them, they ask that the proceeds of the sales of their goods be kept from now on in a separate trust account by the BSF Group, in order to protect their future rights and recourses.

[10] Finally, in its own motion, L'Oréal asks that the BSF Group be ordered to either pay for the continued use of the display units ("agencements") it recently provided to them or return those immediately to L'Oréal in the absence of payment.

[11] Not surprisingly, the BSF Group vigorously contests these requests. In that contestation, it also has the support of many: the Monitor, the Bank Syndicate and the Ad Hoc Committee of Unsecured Creditors.

[12] Their position is clear and unanimous. There is no reason to treat these two suppliers any different than the other creditors of the BSF Group. To lift the stay of proceedings for these two suppliers would go against the specific objectives of the CCAA and the principles of the status quo that it should protect. Furthermore, the demands of these suppliers are not supported by any of the relevant precedents, be it from the Quebec or the Common Law provinces courts. Finally, they say that not only are the requests unjustified under the circumstances as these two suppliers, in particular, do not suffer any serious prejudice, but granting those would create an impact of such a nature as to put seriously in jeopardy the proposed arrangement of the BSF Group.

[13] On the issue of the display units, they reply that nothing is owed at this stage since this debt preceded the Initial Order and should therefore be treated in the same manner as any others.

[14] For sake of clarity and as the issues are very distinct from one another, the Court will deal, firstly, with the requests of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever for the lift of the stay of proceedings and for the deposit of moneys in trust, and secondly, with the claim of L'Oréal pertaining to the display units.

2) The lift of the stay of proceedings and, subsidiarily, the deposit of moneys in trust

Digitized by Google

[15] On the basis of the applicable statutes, the relevant case law and the evidence adduced, the Court is of the view that neither the lift of the stay of proceedings nor the deposit of moneys in trust should be ordered here, be it for the benefit of L'Oréal or Make Up For Ever. In reaching this conclusion, the Court relies on the following considerations:

a) The purpose and objectives of the CCAA;
b) The precedents in Quebec and Canada; and
c) The absence of a serious and distinct prejudice to the two suppliers involved.

a) The purpose and objectives of the CCAA

[16] It has been said often, and rightly so, that the CCAA is a remedial legislation. Its purpose is to allow companies in financial difficulties to reorganize themselves. As one judgment of the Quebec Superior Court recently reminded, it should be interpreted and applied as a flexible tool to assist in the restructuring of companies in financial difficulties[5].

[17] One of the main goals of the CCAA is to allow the debtor company seeking its protection to stay in business as a going concern while attempting to solve its financial difficulties. The Courts indeed recognize that the Act should be given a large and generous interpretation to favour this objective[6].

[18] As the Quebec Court of Appeal stated lately, contrary for instance to recourses under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act[7] (BIA), the objective of the CCAA is not to end the operation of a business and distribute its assets to its creditors, but rather to reach an arrangement between the debtor company and its creditors to allow for its survival[8].

[19] One of the key elements to achieve these objectives is maintaining a status quo for the necessary time while the debtor company attempts to gain the approval of its creditors for a proposed arrangement[9]. Like the British Columbia Court of Appeal once said[10]:

"[...] Equally obviously, if the attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay, hence the powers vested in the court under s. 11."

(Emphasis added)

[20] In a judgment often cited on that subject, Mr. Justice Tysoe of the British Columbia Supreme Court summarized well what is meant by maintaining the status quo when a debtor company seeks the protection of the CCAA[11]:

"It is my view that the maintenance of the status quo is intended to attempt to accomplish the following three objectives:

1. To suspend or freeze the rights of all creditors as they existed as at the date of the stay Order (which, in British Columbia, is normally the day on which the CCAA proceedings are commenced). This objective is intended to allow the insolvent company an opportunity to reorganize itself without any creditor having an advantage over the company or any other creditor.

2. To postpone litigation in which the insolvent company is involved so that the human and monetary resources of the company can be devoted to the reorganization process. The litigation may be resolved by way of the reorganization.

3. To permit the insolvent company to take certain action that is beneficial to its continuation during the period of reorganization or its attempt to reorganize or, conversely, to restrain a non-creditor or a creditor with rights arising after the stay from exercising rights that are detrimental to the continuation of the company during the period of reorganization or its attempt to reorganize. This is the objective recognized by Quintette and Alberta-Pacific Terminals. [...]"

(Emphasis added)

[21] Therefore, as section 11 of the CCAA enacts and these precedents reiterate, in order to allow a debtor company to restructure itself and continue its operations, the stay of proceedings is a basic component of the maintenance of the status quo. Staying the proceedings means to suspend or freeze not only actual or potential litigation, but likewise any type of manoeuvres for positioning amongst creditors. This obviously includes the possibility of creditors seeking to repossess their goods in the hands of the debtor company who, to the contrary, should be allowed to continue operating as a going concern while protected under the CCAA.

[22] From that standpoint, the motions of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever are going directly against these objectives and the key element of maintaining the status quo during the course of the restructuring under the CCAA. The lift they are seeking is directly opposed to what the Act specifically provides for at section 11 and would place both of them in a preferred position compared to that of the other unsecured creditors.

[23] Surely, maintaining the status quo involves balancing the interests of all affected parties and avoiding advantages to some over the others. Under the CCAA, the restructuring process and the general interest of all the creditors should always be preferred over the particular interests of individual ones [12].

[24] The Court does not believe that it is appropriate to set aside these objectives and principles in this case.

[25] In its Initial Amended Order of January 15, 2004, the Court has already indicated that the contemplated arrangement of the BSF Group appeared practical, workable and realistic from an economic standpoint. At this stage, it has very strong support within the creditors of the BSF Group and no one has suggested that there exists a better solution to the problems now faced by the BSF Group.

[26] In a situation where there exists a contemplated arrangement which is not doomed to fail but rather appears reasonable, which has the support of a vast majority of the creditors, and which is still being pursued diligently, it is the Court's opinion that the pursuit of the objectives of the CCAA should strongly be favoured, not countered.

[27] As a result, with a contemplated arrangement such as the one involved here, the solutions should be pursued and the issues resolved within the context of this arrangement, not outside of it.

[28] To that end, one must remember that the contemplated arrangement described by the BSF Group already gives consideration to the situation of suppliers such as L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever. One of its guiding principles is indeed expressed as follows by the BSF Group [13]:

"The participation of claims in the baskets could be adjusted so that the first dollars of each claim and sums due for merchandise sold and delivered within 30 days of the Initial Order, could be entitled to a greater participation in the basket than the remaining claims;"

[29] Since the proposed arrangement is not yet finalized, it is certainly too soon to comment on this potential treatment of the particular situation of the "30 days goods" suppliers. At this stage, it is sufficient to note that proper attention is being given to the situation of these suppliers who may otherwise have had other rights save for the protection afforded by the CCAA. Presently, there is no reason to believe that the arrangement that will eventually be submitted to the creditors for approval, and thereafter to the Court for sanction if fair and reasonable, will not be governed by similar considerations.

[30] Still, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever argued that the stay of proceedings will potentially deprive them of some of their alleged rights under the Civil Code of Quebec or the BIA, particularly if the arrangement fails and a bankruptcy is declared. Even though this possibility exists, when a proposed arrangement is characterized by qualifiers such as "not doomed to failure", "apparently reasonable", "strongly supported" and "diligently pursued", the Court considers that it should assess the situation with an assumption of success, not of failure, of the process.

[31] Accordingly, even if these concerns of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever should the arrangement fails are legitimate, they should not be the guiding criteria of the Court under the circumstances. Especially so when a proper arrangement can eventually alleviate, partially or totally, the loss of the alleged rights that the suppliers may now be denied.

[32] To minimize the consequences of their requests, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever have also argued that their claims represent less than $370,000, while the total accounts payable of the unsecured creditors, including the suppliers, represent more than $31,000,000[14]. The impact, if any, of their motions upon the restructuring of the BSF Group would therefore be, so they say, minimal.

[33] Since no similar motions from other suppliers are presently pending, they are saying that the Court should not conclude that granting their requests will have the detrimental impact upon the restructuring process that the other parties are voicing.

[34] With respect, the Court cannot agree with this argument.

[35] Even though no other similar motions are now pending, the Court cannot simply close the eyes or look in the opposite direction and just pretend not to see the obvious. In a business such as that of the BSF Group, which is involved in the retail sale of men's, women's and children's apparels and accessories, it is clear that there are many other suppliers in a situation similar to that of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever.

[36] It is also clear that if the requests of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever are granted, there will be many others presented to the Court. Opening this door would create a chaotic situation that will strike at the very heart of the going concern and continued operations objectives that the CCAA aims at protecting.

[37] The Court does not need to have specific evidence from other suppliers confirming that they will proceed similarly to L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever should the motions be granted. This is self-evident and the Court cannot ignore it. This is exactly what Mr. Justice Lagacé from the Quebec Superior Court relied upon, amongst other things, in refusing to grant a similar request in the context of the restructuring of Steinberg Inc. under the CCAA[15]:

"[...] Or le tribunal ne peut ignorer que plusieurs autres créanciers pourraient réclamer le même droit que désire exercer la débitrice-requérante. [...]"

(Emphasis added)

[38] All in all, when one considers the purpose and objectives of the CCAA, there are simply no justifications for the conclusions sought by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever in their motions.

b) The precedents in Quebec and in Canada

Digitized by Google

[39] That said, the Court notes further that there are no precedents, be it in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada, that support the requests made here by L'Oréal and Make Up for Ever. Indeed, all the judgments that bare any kind of similarity to the situation at hand go against the granting of what is being asked.

i. The Quebec Cases

[40] To this date, the cases in Quebec have refused the claims of unpaid suppliers to repossess their goods in the context of a stay of proceedings pursuant to a reorganization or restructuring process, be it under the CCAA or the BIA.

[41] For instance, in the context of the Steinberg Inc. restructuring under the CCAA, Mr. Justice Lagacé twice refused motions to authorize an unpaid supplier to seize before judgment the merchandises sold and delivered within the 30 days prior to the Initial Order[16].

[42] In the two judgments he rendered, Mr. Justice Lagacé concluded that when faced with an arrangement that appeared serious, the individual interest of a creditor should not be preferred over the general interest of all the creditors. For Mr. Justice Lagacé, granting the requests would have most likely resulted in a number of similar motions by other suppliers and it would have basically led to the failure of the arrangement before it was even submitted to the creditors for approval. This would have been contrary to the objectives of the CCAA.

[43] It is worth noting that in these two decisions, the suppliers were relying upon article 1543 C.C.B.C. and their corresponding right to revendicate the goods sold and delivered within the prior 30 days. Since 1994, article 1741 C.C.Q. has replaced article 1543 C.C.B.C. It now states the following:

1741. Except in the case of a sale with a term, the seller of movable property may, within thirty days of delivery, consider the sale resolved and revendicate the property if the buyer, being in default, has failed to pay the price and if the property is still entire and in the same condition and has not passed into the hands of a third person who has paid the price thereof, or of a hypothecary creditor who has obtained surrender thereof.

Where the buyer is in default to pay the price and the property meets the conditions prescribed for resolution of the sale, the seizure of the property by a third person is no hindrance to the rights of the seller.

(Emphasis added)

[44] Here, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever are not relying upon this article which is specific to the situation of an unpaid vendor of movable property in the Quebec Civil Code. As their sales were with a term, they do not meet the conditions necessary for its application. Thus, to justify their requests, they are relying upon the general provisions of obligations applicable to all contracts found at article 1605 C.C.Q.

[45] It is difficult to see why the reasoning applicable for a claim made under article 1543 C.C.B.C. (now 1741 C.C.Q.) in cases like the two Steinberg decisions would be any different inasmuch as the general provisions of article 1605 C.C.Q. are concerned. At the very least, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever did not present any convincing argument to that end.

[46] Likewise, in the context of the BIA this time, Mr. Justice Denis has reached a conclusion similar to that of Mr. Justice Lagacé on a demand by suppliers for the repossession of goods after the filing of a notice of intention to make a proposal[17].

[47] In that matter, the suppliers were again invoking article 1543 C.C.B.C. Nonetheless, Mr. Justice Denis concluded that there was no reason not to apply the stay of proceedings to them. He emphasized that sections 81.1(4) and 50.4 of the BIA intended to temporarily deny certain rights to creditors in order to allow a company to make a proposal to solve its financial difficulties. The protection that the BIA afforded to suppliers of goods in section 81.1 was not applicable in a proposal context, hence the absence of any basis to provide them with a similar protection through article 1543 C.C.Q.

[48] The same conclusion was reached by Mr. Justice Halperin in Re Henry Birks & Sons Ltd.[18]. On a petition for an order pursuant to section 81.1(8) of the BIA, he denied the request of unpaid suppliers to exercise their remedies as unpaid vendors, as such could have well placed in jeopardy the whole reorganization process of the debtor company. He noted that section 81.1 was clear and only suspended the running of the 30 days period upon the commencement of a proposal proceeding, even though any rights as unpaid vendors in the future would often be illusory if the goods were no longer in the possession of the debtor company once a bankruptcy was finally declared[19].

[49] No Quebec courts decisions granting the requests sought by L'Oréal or Make Up For Ever could be found to support their position. The situation was no different in the Common Law provinces.

ii. The Common Law Provinces Cases

[50] In proceedings taken under the CCAA, the British Columbia Supreme Court has twice denied requests similar to those presented by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever.

[51] In Re Agro Pacific Industries Ltd.[20], Mr. Justice Thackray denied an application by suppliers to set aside a stay of proceedings granted under the CCAA. He stated notably that ordering that the supplies made to the debtor company within 30 days of the Initial Order be traced and identified and their proceeds put in a trust account would be an attempt to improperly introduce into the CCAA proceedings requirements similar to those contained in section 81.1 of the BIA. In his reasons, Mr. Justice Thackray had these comments which are worth citing:

"[52] An order establishing a trust fund in favour of the applicant suppliers would create a class of secured creditors after the fact. It would turn the Court into the author of a new class of creditor. Classes of creditors should be created by the parties on a contractual basis when entering into their business relationships.

[55] Mr. Justice Tysoe in Re Woodward's also alluded to the potential that the Court cannot lose sight of legislative intention. He pointed out that the CCAA is "silent as to the creation of a trust fund to be held for the benefit of the suppliers in the event that the reorganization is not successful." Many of the challenges by the suppliers in the case at bar are legislative.

[56] The CCAA must be accepted as Parliament's approval of the continued business activities of an insolvent company, to be carried out in as normal a manner as possible while reorganizing. The Court is not allowed to suggest that the legislative intent is one designed, per se, to disadvantage the suppliers. It must, rather, be taken as giving hope that reorganization, rather than bankruptcy, will eventually benefit all interested parties."

(Emphasis added)

[52] In this judgment, Mr. Justice Thackray found no basis to justify the requests made by the suppliers under the CCAA.

[53] In Re Woodward's[21], Mr. Justice Tysoe reached a similar conclusion. In that case, applications by suppliers of goods for relief under the CCAA were also denied. Applications for leave to appeal of that decision were furthermore dismissed[22].

[54] For Mr. Justice Tysoe, in addition to the fact that section 81.1 of the BIA could not be of any use to the suppliers as the CCAA did not contain any similar provision, the creation of any trust fund was not justified as it would not serve to maintain the status quo. He wrote this on the issue[23]:

"Apart from consideration of s. 81.1 of the B. & I. Act, there is no justification for the creation of the trust fund. It would not serve to maintain the status quo. To the contrary, it would give the suppliers an advantage over other creditors of Woodward's. It would not be beneficial to the continuation of Woodward's business during the reorganization period or Woodward's attempt to reorganize. Indeed, it was the position of Woodward's on these applications that the creation of a trust fund in the amount of $30 million would make any reorganization impossible."

(Emphasis added)

[55] Finally, and similarly to what the Quebec courts did conclude, in Bruce Agra Foods Inc., Mr. Justice Farley denied a motion made by unpaid suppliers this time within the context of a notice of intention to file a proposal under the BIA. In that case, Mr. Justice Farley concluded that in a reorganization scenario, unpaid suppliers could not avail themselves of a protection similar to that of section 81.1 of the BIA. He mentioned[24]:

"2. If Parliament had intended that unpaid suppliers have direct immediate rights in a reorganization scenario as envisaged by a Notice of Intention to File a Proposal, then it would seem to me that it would have provided for same to take place in s. 81.1(b) but rather Parliament addressed the Notice of Intention situation by having a suspension during the relevant time period: see s. 81.1(4). Unfortunately for those affected, in order to promote reorganizations (which is an underlying fundamental of the BIA including the 1992 amendments which puts some teeth or perhaps "life blood" into that part of the BIA), there will be some prejudice to creditors (who may be unpaid sellers). If the rights of unpaid suppliers were to override, then there would have to be an amendment to section 69.1 (a) to that effect. [...]

6. It would seem to me that unpaid supplier rights are truly intended to protect against the unfair consequences in liquidation as seen by Parliament and are not intended to affect or disrupt reorganizations proposed pursuant to Part IV of the BIA. [...]"

(Emphasis added)

[56] Again, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever could not refer the Court to any decision from the Common Law provinces which had granted a motion similar to theirs.

iii) L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever reply to the precedents

[57] Notwithstanding, to distinguish these decisions, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever first argued that in the Quebec decisions in Steinberg[25] or in Shirmax[26], no claims for the deposit of moneys in a trust account similar to what is requested here were apparently made.

[58] While it is true that this issue was not specifically dealt with in these three judgments, the Court fails to see on what basis their conclusions would have been any different with respect to the deposit of moneys in a trust account.

[59] The protection given to an unpaid supplier under article 1543 C.C.B.C. (now 1741 C.C.Q.) discussed in these decisions was limited to the right to repossess its goods. If the exercise of that right was considered by the Courts as inappropriate in the context of proceedings under the CCAA or the BIA, it follows that, logically, the exercise of the same right «by equivalent», namely by having the proceeds of the sale of the goods deposited in a trust account, would normally trigger the same answer.

[60] Second, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever further argued that the judgment in Shirmax[27] should be distinguished because in that case, the impact upon the restructuring would have been very significant considering the extent of the debt owed to the suppliers involved when compared to the whole debt of the company. This argument cannot be retained because it would require the Court to ignore the obvious consequences of a judgment granting the requests made, namely that it will in all likelihood trigger an avalanche of similar type of requests by the numerous suppliers of the BSF Group.

[61] Third, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever argued that the decisions of the Common Law provinces should be distinguished and ignored as there are no recourses similar to that of article 1605 C.C.Q. in those jurisdictions.

[62] While that is true, it remains that the decisions rendered in the Common Law provinces are quite relevant and useful to the issues to be decided here.

[63] On the one hand, these judgments have correctly emphasized that the CCAA, while providing for a stay of proceedings in the context of a restructuring, has made no exceptions for the rights of suppliers as, for instance, the BIA has done in some limited circumstances, albeit not for proposals.

[64] On the other hand, in denying the requests made, these judgments have also emphasized, again rightfully, that the issues raised by the suppliers were more legislative than judicial in nature, since Parliament had decided to protect specifically the unpaid suppliers rights only in limited circumstances in the BIA.

[65] These decisions have correctly noted that in situations of reorganizations or restructurings, neither the CCAA nor the BIA contain provisions addressing these rights, except for the suspension of the running of the 30 day delay of section 81.1 in the case of a proposal under the BIA. On that issue, and as it was decided for example in Re Woodwards, the terms of the Court's Initial Order already include a similar suspension for the benefit of the suppliers.

[66] In addition, and again similarly to what this Court did here, these judgments of the other provinces have considered and given weight to the detrimental impact the granting of the motions involved would have had upon the key objectives of the protections offered by the CCAA.

[67] On the whole, even though provisions similar to article 1605 C.C.Q. do not exist in these other jurisdictions, these decisions can be relied on since their conclusions are based upon reasons that do apply in this case.

[68] As a fourth and final point, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever argue that, notwithstanding all these precedents, in two cases decided in the context of restructurings conducted under the CCAA and the BIA, the Quebec courts have granted requests to put in a trust account the proceeds of merchandise sold pending the outcome of the reorganization process.

[69] In this respect, they refer to the Superior Court judgment of Mr. Justice Archambault in Century Industries inc. v. Les Entreprises Union Électrique ltée [28]and to the Court of Appeal decision in Gestion Max Boutin inc. v. Brasserie Molson O'Keefe[29].

[70] However, as it was indicated at the hearing, these decisions can be distinguished easily as the creditors involved had specifically retained by contract their rights of ownership in the goods at issue, which is not the case for L'Oréal or Make Up For Ever.

[71] In short, the review of these precedents in Quebec and in Canada confirms the absence of justification for the remedies sought here by these two suppliers.

c) The absence of a serious and distinct prejudice to the two suppliers involved

[72] But that is not all. In addition to the fact that the conclusions sought by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever would be contrary to the applicable case law as well as the purpose and objectives of the CCAA, the Court is satisfied that under the circumstances, neither L'Oréal nor Make Up For Ever would suffer a prejudice sufficiently serious as to justify lifting the stay of proceedings.

[73] In summary, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever are alleging that they are suffering a serious and distinct prejudice because the stay of proceedings will result in them losing a right to repossess goods that they have under article 1605 C.C.Q., hence their justification to lift the stay.

[74] To emphasize their prejudice, they are also asserting that an arrangement under the CCAA must give creditors something more than what they would otherwise receive in the context of a bankruptcy. Since they will end up, in all likelihood, receiving less in the context of an arrangement under the CCAA than in a bankruptcy process under the BIA, they consider that their motions should be granted.

[75] The Court disagrees with these arguments.

Digitized by Google

[76] On the first of these arguments, in Re Canadian Airlines Corp., it was stated that under the CCAA, there are simply no statutory tests to guide a court in lifting a stay against a certain creditor. In that case, to give some indications of what could be considered to that end, Madam Justice Paperny referred to the following [30]:

"20 At pages 342 and 343 of this text, Canadian Commercial Reorganization: Preventing Bankruptcy (Aurora: Canada Law Book, looseleaf), R.H. McLaren describes situations in which the court will lift a stay:

1. When the plan is likely to fail;
2. The applicant shows hardship (the hardship must be caused by the stay itself and be independent of any pre-existing condition of the applicant creditor);
3. The applicant shows necessity for payment (where the creditors financial problems are created by the order of where the failure to pay the creditor would cause it to close and thus jeopardize the debtor's company's existence);
4. The applicant would be severely prejudiced by refusal to lift the stay and there would be no resulting prejudice to the debtor company or the positions of creditors;
5. It is necessary to permit the applicant to take steps to protect a right which could be lost by the passage of time;
6. After the lapse of a significant time period, the insolvent is no closer to a proposal than at the commencement of the stay period."

(Emphasis added)

[77] When one considers these situations, none apply here, except potentially the fifth one. However, even in such a situation, the only alleged prejudice suffered by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever would be one directly caused by the mere application of the Act, namely by the stay of proceedings which the CCAA authorizes.

[78] On that specific issue, in the decision of St-Lawrence Chemical Inc. v. A.R.C. Resins Corp., Madam Justice Lemelin of the Quebec Superior Court concluded this[31]:

"Le préjudice de la requérante ne peut être que celui causé par l'application normale de la loi qui suspend les recours de tous les créanciers et fournisseurs. Le juge Trudeau qualifie même ce préjudice "de sérieux" dans l'affaire de faillite Goineau.

La requérante ne peut demander au Tribunal de mettre de côté l'application d'une loi qui dans le vœu du législateur doit favoriser la réorganisation d'entreprises en difficultés en les mettant à l'abri des procédures temporairement. Permettre aux fournisseurs de reprendre les marchandises vendues compromet les opérations de la personne insolvable. La requérante doit satisfaire le Tribunal de ce préjudice sérieux, ce qu'elle ne fait pas."

(Emphasis added)

[79] The Court agrees with these comments. Simply stated, the application of the CCAA cannot of itself constitute a sufficiently serious and distinct prejudice to justify the lift of a stay of proceedings.

[80] Consequently, even though much time was spent in argument by the attorneys for both sides on the right of an unpaid supplier to even invoke the application of article 1605 C.C.Q. in a situation similar to that of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever, the Court considers that it is not necessary to decide this question.

[81] There are sufficient reasons here to deny the motions of L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever without having to decide whether or not an unpaid supplier who does not meet the conditions of article 1741 C.C.Q. can nevertheless invoke the benefit of the general provision of article 1605 C.C.Q. This question appears to be far from settled in the civil law doctrine or in the case law[32].

[82] In any event, on that issue of the alleged right to repossess of these suppliers, the Court notes that the resolution or resiliation of a contract without judicial proceedings as invoked by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever only applies where the debtor, namely the BSF Group, is in default by writing or by operation of law.

[83] The BSF Group was apparently not put in default in writing by these suppliers and article 1597 C.C.Q. describes the situations where a debtor is in default by operation of law:

"1597. A debtor is in default by the sole operation of law where the performance of the obligation would have been useful only within a certain time which he allowed to expire or where he failed to perform the obligation immediately despite the urgency that he do so.

A debtor is also in default by operation of law where he has violated an obligation not to do, or where specific performance of the obligation has become impossible through his fault, and also where he has made clear to the creditor his intention not to perform the obligation or where, in the case of an obligation of successive performance, he has repeatedly refused or neglected to perform it."

(Emphasis added)

[84] Here, there is only one instance where the BSF Group would potentially be in default by operation of law towards these two suppliers: because it would have "made clear to (these) creditors (its) intention not to perform (its) obligations".

[85] However, it does not appear that this is the case yet.

Digitized by Google

[86] When a creditor avails itself of the protection that the law offers, and as result is afforded it with a corresponding stay of proceedings, one cannot conclude that this debtor then makes it clear to its creditors that it intends not to perform its obligations. As a matter of fact, under the CCAA, the objective of this debtor is rather to propose an arrangement to these creditors for the compromise of these obligations and this may include a partial and even a total performance of these obligations in some cases.

[87] Therefore, it is far from obvious that L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever even qualify here for the application of article 1605 C.C.Q. If this were so, then their position would be even less justified under the circumstances.

[88] Concerning now the second argument that in proceedings conducted under the CCAA, L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever should not be put in a situation worst than the one they would be in under the BIA, the Court considers that if anything, it is the situation of all the creditors collectively that must be looked at.

[89] While it is true that one of the objectives of the CCAA is to provide a better solution than what a bankruptcy would offer, this is so from the standpoint of the benefit to all the creditors, not to individual ones. L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever are looking at the situation only from their own viewpoint, while in the context of proceedings under the CCAA, the prejudice and interest of the parties must in every respect be looked at collectively.

[90] Indeed, under the circumstances, the prejudice alleged by L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever, even from an individual standpoint, is far from being serious in the overall picture of the restructuring of the BSF Group.

[91] Both companies are involved in the cosmetics and perfumes business and they supply mostly, if not exclusively, Les Ailes de la Mode. In the restructuring business plan submitted to the Court[33], one of the key elements of the repositioning of the BSF Group is to focus upon what it calls its core business, notably with its banner Les Ailes de la Mode. This core business includes for one thing the cosmetics and perfumes.

[92] Therefore, these two suppliers, perhaps much more so than many others, are well within the specific business and banner upon which the BSF Group intends to focus for its restructuring. As a result, they appear to be creditors who would definitely benefit, not suffer, from a successful restructuring of the BSF Group.

[93] It is in fact striking to note this from the admissions filed in the record[34]. The sales of L'Oréal to the BSF Group totalled $3,609,000 in 2002 and $3,155,000 in 2003, for an average of $281,833 per month over these 24 months. In comparison, the sales of L'Oréal to the BSF Group for the first month immediately following the Initial Order totalled more than $335,000, namely a higher monthly average, even in the context of the restructuring process.

[94] Finally, on this issue of the prejudice, it must be remembered that, in this case, there is no evidence of bad faith in the BSF Group's behaviour towards these two suppliers. Notwithstanding what is alleged in their motions, the Court is of the view that the circumstances surrounding the discussions and exchanges of cheques in December 2003 indicate that they were carried on in good faith, in the normal course of business of the BSF Group.

[95] To sum up, be it from the angles of the lack of serious and distinct prejudice to L'Oréal and Make Up For Ever, of the applicable precedents and their reasoning, or of the purpose and objectives of the CCAA, nothing warrants the Court to lift the stay of proceedings or to order the deposit of moneys in trust in the actual situation of these two suppliers.

3) THE CLAIM OF L'ORÉAL CONCERNING THE DISPLAY UNITS

[96] Turning now to the claim of L'Oréal concerning the display units it provided to the BSF Group in November 2003, this is what the evidence indicates.

[97] Even if the written contract presented by L'Oréal in that month was never signed by the BSF Group, the exchanges of e-mails[35] that were filed in the record nevertheless suggest that the parties had agreed as follows.

[98] L'Oréal accepted to provide to the BSF Group some display units that were to be used by the BSF Group to exhibit the products and facilitate their sales. The parties were to share equally in the cost of creating, constructing and installing these display units but at all times, L'Oréal was to remain the owner. For its share, it was agreed that a first amount of $28,000 would be paid by the BSF Group within 90 days of delivery and another amount of $28,000 would be spent by them as "coop-advertising" during 2003-2004.

[99] L'Oréal considers that this is covered by section 11.3 of the CCAA which indicates in part that:

"11.3 No order made under section 11 shall have the effect of

(a) prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for goods, services, use of leased or licensed property or other valuable consideration provided after the order is made; [...]"

(Emphasis added)

[100] The BSF Group replies that the agreement at issue is not per se a contract of lease but rather a sui generis agreement and that section 11.3 does not apply.

[101] Even though this agreement is not a traditional lease, it remains that it shares a lot of the characteristics that one would normally find in a contract of lease (article 1851 C.C.Q.). More specifically, we definitely have here a person, L'Oréal, who provides another, the BSF Group, with the use and enjoyment of display units for a certain period, in exchange for payments that are detailed in the e-mails filed. The display units are also not to be kept by the BSF Group but returned to L'Oréal after their use.

[102] This is certainly closer to a traditional lease for use than, for instance, to some sort of financing agreement[36].

[103] With respect to these display units, it is the Court's opinion that we have a situation which is quite analogous to the use of leased property provided after the initial order is made. The BSF Group continues to this day to make use of those display units for the purpose of selling the products of L'Oréal. Similarly to the use of leased premises, these are still being enjoyed and benefited from by the BSF Group in order to help the sale of the products of L'Oréal. It is a continuing benefit that the BSF Group still wants to make use of and the Court fails to see why it should be treated differently than the other situations covered by section 11.3 of the CCAA.

[104] As a result, with respect to these conclusions of the motion of L'Oréal, the Court considers that if it is indeed the intent of the BSF Group to continue to use these display units, it should abide by the terms of the obligations it agreed to. These include the payment of an amount of $28,000 within 90 days of delivery of the display units and an allowance of $28,000 as "coop-advertising" for the period 2003-2004.

[105] Since there has been no indication or evidence suggesting that the BSF Group has yet defaulted on these obligations, the Court will simply issue in this respect a declaration confirming this conclusion.

[106] FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT:

With respect to L'Oréal Canada inc.:

[107] DISMISSES the motion for the lift of the stay of proceedings and for the deposit of moneys in trust;

[108] DECLARES that with respect to the display units provided by L'Oréal Canada Inc. to Les Ailes de la Mode pursuant to the terms of the e-mails filed as Exhibit R-10, Les Ailes de la Mode must comply with the obligations agreed upon between the parties, namely to:

- Pay an amount of $28,000 to L'Oréal Canada Inc. within 90 days following the delivery of the display units; and
- Provide for an allowance of $28,000 as «coop-advertising» for the period 2003-2004;

[109] WITH COSTS.

With respect to Make Up For Ever S.A.:

[110] DISMISSES the motion for the lift of the stay of proceedings and for the deposit of moneys in trust;

[111] WITH COSTS.

Stays, etc. — initial application - Sec 11.02

11.02 (1) A court may, on an initial application in respect of a debtor company, make an order on any terms that it may impose, effective for the period that the court considers necessary, which period may not be more than 30 days,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or the Winding-up and Restructuring Act;

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company; and

(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of any action, suit or proceeding against the company.

Stays, etc. — other than initial application - Sec 11.02(2)

(2) A court may, on an application in respect of a debtor company other than an initial application, make an order, on any terms that it may impose,

(a) staying, until otherwise ordered by the court, for any period that the court considers necessary, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under an Act referred to in paragraph (1)(a);

(b) restraining, until otherwise ordered by the court, further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company; and

(c) prohibiting, until otherwise ordered by the court, the commencement of any action, suit or proceeding against the company.

This application is about the right of the Fraser River Harbour Commission to be paid monies pursuant to its agreement with Fraser Surrey Docks Ltd. ("FSDL") under which FSDL operates the deep sea common user terminal of the Fraser Port, while all proceedings against FSDL and its associated companies are stayed by orders made under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Under the terms of the Operating Agreement made January 1, 1989, FSDL is the Terminal Agent and Wharfinger for the Commission. The Commission administers the Fraser Port under the Harbour Commissions Act. The Johnston Group of companies has operated the terminal for more than 20 years, but since the 1989 agreement and related expansion, it has run into financial difficulties. The petitioners attribute these difficulties to a chemical spill in August, 1989, and consequential claims for damages; a very high debt/equity ratio and the refusal of the Alberta Treasury Branch and Government to convert their debt to equity; a fire on November 14, 1990; and finally, the Commission's threat on November 16, 1990, to terminate the Operating Agreement.

To assist FSDL with the earlier of these difficulties, the Commission had agreed on July 27, 1990, to defer payments due under the Operating Agreement for the months of June to September inclusive, the same to be paid on December 31, 1990. When FSDL defaulted on the regular payment for October due on November 15, 1990, the Commission refused a request for a further deferral, advising that it would consider termination of the Operating Agreement if payment was not made within the seven days of grace allowed under the contract.

FSDL considers that the Commission has the right to terminate the Operating Agreement only upon its insolvency. When FSDL and its related companies admitted they were insolvent and sought the protection available to them under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("the CCAA") on November 22, 1990, FSDL owed the Commission about $976,000.

Digitized by Google

The Commission claims that Johnston Marine Terminals Limited ("JMTL") then owed it $353,000. The total debt of the petitioners to the Alberta government and the Alberta Treasury Branches ("Alberta") was $13 million, some of it secured.

The Operating Agreement is the primary asset of FSDL. Without it and the operating line of credit from the Alberta Treasury Branches the petitioners would be unable to operate the terminal.

The ex parte order Mr. Justice Skipp made on November 22, 1990, stayed all proceedings against the petitioners until May 31, 1991, specifically enjoined the Commission from taking any steps to terminate the Operating Agreement and the option to lease in favour of Pacific Terminals Ltd. ("Pacific") without further order, and ordered that contracts that might give a benefit to any petitioner "be maintained in full force and effect pending further order of this Court".

In December, the petitioners paid $28,544 to the Commission, the amount attributable to the period in November following the CCAA order.

On December 18, Mr. Justice Spencer varied the order to provide for the continued provision by the Alberta Treasury Branches of the "existing $1.25 million operating credit facility" to the petitioners or any of them. Included in that order was a provision that "interest calculated on the daily outstanding principal amount under the Facility is to be paid monthly". The order was made with the consent of the petitioners, Alberta, and the Commission. No similar provision was made with regard to the monthly payments required by the Operating Agreement.

FSDL did not make the payment due on January 15 or any subsequent payments. The payments due exceed $200,000 per month. FSDL claimed that it could not afford to make the payments, that the payments were prohibited under the order, and that, in any event, to make any payment on account of the Operating Agreement would be to favour an equity participant over general creditors.

The Commission interpreted the order and its relationship with FSDL differently. It considered that the order required payments under the Operating Agreement to be continued. The matter came before Mr. Justice Arkell who concluded on March 28:

> The present orders of the court require the Commission to continue and maintain the operating agreement for the benefit of the Petitioners, pending the reorganization plan, or further order of the court. The present court orders neither prohibit nor do they require the continuation of the monthly payments due under the operating agreement.
> The Commission is at liberty to apply to the court to vary the present court orders for a right of preference over other creditors and to receive continuing payments under the terms of the operating agreement. Alternatively, the Commission may apply to the Court for leave to commence an action against the Petitioners and sue for damages or ultimately for termination of the operating agreement.

Because he had reached this conclusion accepting the position of the Commission that it was a "creditor" within the meaning of the CCAA, Mr. Justice Arkell did not find it necessary to resolve the dispute as to the nature of the relationship between the petitioners and the Commission.

This application is a sequel to the application before Mr. Justice Arkell. It revisits the issue as to the nature of the relationship between the petitioners and the Commission and it asks this court to direct the payment by the petitioners of the amounts that fall due monthly under the Operating Agreement.

I find that I need consider only the second issue. The authorities cited by both counsel persuade me that the categorization of any commercial relationship will vary with the issue before the court. If and when a determination of the rights and obligations of the parties to the Operating Agreement is required, the court may be called upon to determine the nature of their relationship. If and when the court is called upon to fix the classes of creditors for the purpose of voting on a reorganization plan, the court may be required to determine whether or not the Commission is a "creditor" within the meaning of the CCAA. Until some such occasion arises I can see no reason for saying anything about their relationship.

It may be that the Commission is anxious that the court determine the nature of its relationship with FSDL, JMTL, and Alberta-Pacific Terminals Ltd, before the fixing of the classes of creditors. If so, it did not say so.

There is no doubt that the Commission is concerned at the hint in the petitioners' argument that they may be seeking the court's and the creditors' approval of a reorganization plan that will restructure their "revenue sharing arrangements" with the Commission without the approval of the Commission. A question about the judicial nature of the relationship might arise if the petitioners successfully exclude the Commission from voting as a creditor, then seek to have it bound by any reorganization plan. From the information available to me on this application and from my understanding of the purpose and scheme of the CCAA, I consider such an idea so far-fetched as not to require further comment.

It may be that the Commission considers the nature of the relationship material to the issue as to whether or not it should be paid the monies that have fallen due since November 30 or that will fall due before May 31 or any later termination of the stay. I do not find it to be so because I have not had recourse to the arguments put forward by the petitioners based on joint venture, debt or equity contribution, or equitable subordination, in reaching the conclusion that I should not order the petitioners or any of them to pay monies pursuant to the Operating Agreement pending the termination of the stay orders.

I have come to that conclusion having regard to the purpose and scheme of the CCAA, the terms of the Operating Agreement, and the financial circumstances of the petitioners as revealed in the Monitor's Report.

The purpose of the CCAA is to facilitate a compromise between an insolvent corporate debtor and its creditors so that the company is able to continue in business, said Mr. Justice Gibbs in Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Canada (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. 84 at page 88. No creditor is exempted. But neither is anyone who is not a creditor included within its ambit.

At page 90 of the Chef Ready case, Mr. Justice Gibbs said of the effect of the CCAA on the property interest acquired by a bank under s. 178 security:

> But, it must be asked, in what respect does the preservation of the status quo qua creditors under the C.C.A.A. for a temporary period infringe upon the rights of the bank under ss. 178 and 179? It does not detract from the bank's title; it does not distort the mechanics of realization of the security in the sense of the steps to be taken; it does not breach the "complete code". All that it does is postpone the exercise of the right to seize and sell. And here the bank had already allowed at least five days to expire between the accrual of the right and the taking of a step to exercise.

From a similar perspective it can be said that all that the orders pursuant to the CCAA do with regard to the Commission's rights under the Operating Agreement is to postpone the exercise of the right to terminate the agreement on insolvency or to sue for payments not made as they fall due. The Commission had already allowed a four month postponement. So the petitioners argue. However, the Commission seeks neither to sue nor to terminate the agreement. It does not wish to prevent FSDL from carrying on business. It recognizes the purpose of the stay of proceedings.

Rather, it says that the orders requiring it to continue to provide its land and facilities without current recompense and without any guarantee of future recompense make it unique among the creditors of the petitioners, unlike the Alberta Treasury Branches, who are to continue the line of credit facility, but who are to receive current interest on the credit advanced under it, and unlike those creditors who are paid for current supply of goods and services. In effect, it says that the monthly payments should be made in the ordinary course of business for the continued use of the land and facilities because if they are not, the Commission's position is eroding relative to other creditors. Its debt is growing each month, not only by accrual of interest, but by an additional $200,000, on average. It is providing the land and facilities from the use of which income is being derived without any compensation from that income. Thus it seeks an order for payment of the monies as they accrue due to "preserve the status quo."

The petitioners say that to accede to the Commission's request to be paid would be to give it a preference over general creditors to which it is not entitled given the terms of the Operating Agreement and particularly the way in which the payments are structured. The Commission disagrees, saying that the Operating Agreement is valid, and enforceable, there being neither an agreement nor an order suspending or prohibiting payments under it and that to require current payments to be made would not be to prefer one creditor over another with regard to debt accumulated before the stay orders.

In Chef Ready, supra, Mr. Justice Gibbs described the court's function on applications such as these at pages 88 and 89 in these words:

> When a company has recourse to the C.C.A.A. the court is called upon to play a kind of supervisory role to preserve the status quo and to move the process along to the point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure. Obviously time is critical. Equally obviously, if the attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success, there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay, hence the powers vested in the court under s. 11.

The status quo is not always easy to find. It is difficult to freeze any on-going business at a moment in time long enough to make an accurate picture of its financial condition. Such a picture is at best an artist's view, more so if the real value of the business, including goodwill, is to be taken into account. Nor is the status quo easy to define. The preservation of the status quo cannot mean merely the preservation of the relative pre-stay debt status of each creditor. Other interests are served by the CCAA. Those of investors, employees, and landlords among them, and in the case of the Fraser Surrey terminal, the public too, not only of British Columbia, but also of the Prairie Provinces. The status quo is to be preserved in the sense that manoeuvres by creditors that would impair the financial position of the company while it attempts to reorganize are to be prevented, not in the sense that all creditors are to be treated equally or to be maintained at the same relative level. It is the company and all the interests its demise would affect that must be considered.

Obviously the Commission is one of the most important of those interests because it holds and administers the public's interest in the land and facilities.

When I have regard to all of the materials put before me by the Commission, I find no proof of hardship or even of need. For example, I see no suggestion that the Commission is incurring expenses related to the Fraser Surrey Dock that it must pay from other sources of revenue. Its only concern is that its position not be eroded relative to the position of other creditors. If the reorganization is successful it is unlikely the Commission will suffer any loss in the value of its position to which it has not agreed. If the reorganization turns out not to be possible, the Commission's loss because of the stay may be substantial. Or it may not be. The owner of land and facilities is not in the same position as a creditor owed a fixed sum of money, easily valued.

When I have regard to the Monitor's Cash Flow statements I do not find the money to make the payments sought. The original ex parte order and the subsequent consent order left to management of the petitioners a considerable area of discretion in the application of its current cash flow. Given the terms of the Operating Agreement, the history of the relationship between the Commission and the petitioners, the nature of the terminal operation, the nature of the line of credit facility, and those cash flow statements, I have decided that it is inappropriate for the court to intervene in management's exercise of that discretion without some reason, perhaps evidence of hardship to the Commission or of erosion of its property value.

I have reached that conclusion despite some considerable reservations about the way in which management has exercised that discretion as revealed in the Monitor's Reports. Those Reports suggest that payments have been made to other creditors from the petitioners' cash flows contrary to this court's orders. I do not consider that I should discuss this matter further in these reasons. I advised counsel at the hearing of this application that such matters should be considered on another occasion on notice to all interested parties. On this hearing only one unsecured creditor appeared. That creditor did not suggest that it had reason to remain after ascertaining the nature of the application and that its presentation would require the disclosure of information contained in the Monitor's Reports, sealed by order of Mr. Justice Spencer. It may be that unsecured creditors will wish to request further information if they receive notice of an application authorizing other payments.

of a province and includes a person or body that is prescribed to be a regulatory body for the purpose of this Act.

Regulatory bodies — order under section 11.02 - Sec 11.1(2)
(2) Subject to subsection (3), no order made under section 11.02 affects a regulatory body's investigation in respect of the debtor company or an action, suit or proceeding that is taken in respect of the company by or before the regulatory body, other than the enforcement of a payment ordered by the regulatory body or the court.

Exception- Sec 11.1(3)
(3) On application by the company and on notice to the regulatory body and to the persons who are likely to be affected by the order, the court may order that subsection (2) not apply in respect of one or more of the actions, suits or proceedings taken by or before the regulatory body if in the court's opinion

> (a) a viable compromise or arrangement could not be made in respect of the company if that subsection were to apply; and
> (b) it is not contrary to the public interest that the regulatory body be affected by the order made under section 11.02.

Declaration — enforcement of a payment - Sec 11.1(4)
(4) If there is a dispute as to whether a regulatory body is seeking to enforce its rights as a creditor, the court may, on application by the company and on notice to the regulatory body, make an order declaring both that the regulatory body is seeking to enforce its rights as a creditor and that the enforcement of those rights is stayed.

Interim financing - Sec 11.2
11.2 (1) On application by a debtor company and on notice to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the security or charge, a court may make an order declaring that all or part of the company's property is subject to a security or charge — in an amount that the court considers appropriate — in favour of a person specified in the order who agrees to lend to the company an amount approved by the court as being required by the company, having regard to its cash-flow statement. The security or charge may not secure an obligation that exists before the order is made.

(3) The court may order that the security or charge rank in priority over any security or charge arising from a previous order made under subsection (1) only with the consent of the person in whose favour the previous order was made.

Factors to be considered - Sec 11.2(4)
(4) In deciding whether to make an order, the court is to consider, among other things,

(a) the period during which the company is expected to be subject to proceedings under this Act;
(b) how the company's business and financial affairs are to be managed during the proceedings;
(c) whether the company's management has the confidence of its major creditors;
(d) whether the loan would enhance the prospects of a viable compromise or arrangement being made in respect of the company;
(e) the nature and value of the company's property;
(f) whether any creditor would be materially prejudiced as a result of the security or charge; and
(g) the monitor's report referred to in paragraph 23(1)(b), if any.

On appeal from the order of Justice James M. Farley dated April 23, 2001.

[1] The First Mortgage Noteholders ("the Noteholders") seek leave to appeal, pursuant to s. 13 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("the CCAA"), from the order of Farley J. dated April 23, 2001. The Noteholders are a consortium of about a dozen companies and groups which holds first mortgage notes totalling about $550 million issued by the respondent Algoma Steel Inc. ("Algoma").

[2] Farley J.'s order was an initial order made pursuant to s. 11(3) of the CCAA, on a motion by Algoma. It was made without notice to the Noteholders. The essence of Farley J.'s order was an authorization to Algoma to obtain additional financing ("the DIP Financing") from its existing bank lenders during the 30 day stay period permitted by s. 11(3) of the CCAA. The purpose of the order was to respond, on an urgent and interim basis, to a serious negative cash flow crisis at Algoma. Indeed, without short-term financial assistance designed to serve as a base for restructuring Algoma's current indebtedness, Algoma might well have had to cease operations. The order also gave priorities (which the parties call superpriorities) to the DIP Financing charge and to certain Administration and Directors Charges over the Noteholders' existing security.

[3] In his endorsement, Farley J. said, inter alia:

> Algoma qualifies as a corporation with the threshold debt re seeking relief under the CCAA.
> . . . . .
> The noteholders who are owed in excess of $1/2 billion were not represented today for the very simple reason that none of them were served. The reason for that as I understand it is that there is no set up at the present time of a Creditor's Committee or any equivalent. I note that there is a comeback clause and I would particularly emphasize that if it is felt appropriate and needed, this clause should be used on a timely basis.

Digitized by Google

> Order to issue as per my fiat.
> [Emphasis added.]

[4] The comeback clause in the underlined passage is reflected in paragraph 48 of Farley J.'s order:

> 48.THIS COURT ORDERS that any interested person may apply to this court to vary or rescind this order or seek other relief upon seven (7) days' notice to the Applicant, the Monitor and to any other party likely to be affected by the order sought or upon such other notice, if any, as this court may order.

[5] Once the Noteholders became aware of Farley J.'s order, they decided to challenge it. They did so in two ways: by seeking leave to appeal to this court and by initiating a motion to vary before Farley J. The former proceeded before this court, on a preliminary basis, on May 15 and, on the merits, on May 18. The latter was scheduled to be heard by Farley J. on May 23.

[6] The Noteholders seek leave to appeal Farley J.'s order on three bases, which they frame as Proposed Questions for this court:

> (1)Did the motions judge exceed his jurisdiction in making the initial order by altering existing priorities of and between secured creditors through the granting of superpriorities without the consent of the First Mortgage Noteholders?
> (2)Did the motions judge exceed his jurisdiction or otherwise err in law by granting these superpriorities without any notice to the First Mortgage Noteholders or to the trustee under the trust indenture?
> (3)Did the motions judge err in law by failing: (a) to treat the First Mortgage Noteholders in an equitable and even-handed manner relative to the Bank Lenders; and (b) to give due regard to the prejudice suffered by the First Mortgage Noteholders as a result of the initial order?

[7] In our view, the motion for leave to appeal is premature. Initial orders, made on a without notice basis, are specifically authorized by s. 11(1) of the CCAA. Proceedings under the CCAA are often urgent, complex and dynamic. The Algoma proceedings fit that description. Farley J. was faced with complex facts and a difficult decision potentially implicating the closure of one of the largest companies in Ontario. Moreover, he had to make his decision in a very timely fashion. In these circumstances, he recognized that his initial order might not be acceptable to all interested parties, including some of Algoma's creditors. That is why he included a comeback clause in his order and specifically invited parties to resort to it in his endorsement.

[8] The fact that the CCAA provides that an appeal of an initial order is only available with leave indicates that appeals in CCAA proceedings should be limited. An appeal court should be cautious about intervening in the CCAA process, especially at an early stage. On this point, we are attracted to the reasoning of MacFarlane J.A. (in chambers) in Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. (1992), 15 C.B.R. 265 at 272 (B.C.C.A.):

> [T]here may be an arguable case for the petitioners to present to a panel of this court on discrete questions of law. But I am of the view that this court should exercise its powers sparingly when it is asked to intervene with respect to questions which arise under the C.C.A.A. The process of management which the Act has assigned to the trial court is an ongoing one. . . .
> A colleague has suggested that a judge exercising a supervisory function under the C.C.A.A. is more like a judge hearing a trial, who makes orders in the course of that trial, than a chambers judge who makes interlocutory orders in proceedings for which he has no further responsibility.
> . . . In supervising a proceeding under the C.C.A.A. orders are made, and orders are varied as changing circumstances require. Orders depend upon a careful and delicate balancing of a variety of interests and of problems. In that context appellant proceedings may well upset the balance, and delay or frustrate the process under the C.C.A.A. I do not say that leave will never be granted in a C.C.A.A. proceeding. But the effect upon all parties concerned will be an important consideration in deciding whether leave ought to be granted.

[9] Like MacFarlane J.A., we do not say that leave to appeal should never be granted in the midst of CCAA proceedings. However, it is premature to grant such leave at this juncture in the Algoma proceedings. Farley J.'s order was only an initial order brought on an urgent basis to deal with seemingly desperate circumstances. Moreover, the order specifically opened the proceedings to all interested parties and invited dissatisfied parties to bring their concerns to the court on a timely basis. The Noteholders availed themselves of this opportunity by initiating a motion to vary which was scheduled to be heard on the very day the initial order expired. In our view, this is precisely how a dynamic CCAA proceedings should unfold. Accordingly, it would be unwise to interrupt this normal and desirable process by granting leave to appeal at this juncture. The issues that the Noteholders want to raise can be considered by Farley J., importantly in the context of the entire proceedings with which he is familiar. Moreover, if at a later point in time this court grants leave to appeal, it will then have the benefit of the considered reasons of the motions judge flowing from a complete record and from full argument by all interested parties.

[10] For these reasons, the motion for leave to appeal is dismissed, without prejudice to the right of the Noteholders, or any other interested party, to make a similar motion at a later juncture in the proceedings, and to do so on an expedited basis. Only the United Steelworkers of America requested their costs of the motion. They are entitled to their costs which we would fix at $1000.

Assignment of agreements - Sec 11.3
11.3 (1) On application by a debtor company and on notice to every party to an agreement and the monitor, the court may make an order assigning the rights and obligations of the company under the agreement to any person who is specified by the court and agrees to the assignment.

Exceptions - Sec 11.3(2)
(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in respect of rights and obligations that are not assignable by reason of their nature or that arise under

(a) an agreement entered into on or after the day on which proceedings commence under this Act;
(b) an eligible financial contract; or
(c) a collective agreement.

Factors to be considered - Sec 11.3(3)
(3) In deciding whether to make the order, the court is to consider, among other things,

(a) whether the monitor approved the proposed assignment;
(b) whether the person to whom the rights and obligations are to be assigned would be able to perform the obligations; and
(c) whether it would be appropriate to assign the rights and obligations to that person.

Restriction - Sec 11.3(4)
(4) The court may not make the order unless it is satisfied that all monetary defaults in relation to the agreement — other than those arising by reason only of the company's insolvency, the commencement of proceedings under this Act or the company's failure to perform a non-monetary obligation — will be remedied on or before the day fixed by the court.

Copy of order - Sec 11.3(5)
(5) The applicant is to send a copy of the order to every party to the agreement.

Critical supplier - Sec 11.4

11.4 (1) On application by a debtor company and on notice to the secured creditors who are likely to be affected by the security or charge, the court may make an order declaring a person to be a critical supplier to the company if the court is satisfied that the person is a supplier of goods or services to the company and that the goods or services that are supplied are critical to the company's continued operation.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT RESERVED

THE COURT:
[1] The central issue in this appeal is determining which creditors of Smoky River Coal Ltd. are entitled to participate in a post-petition trade creditors' charge.
FACTS
[2] The facts are set out in detail in the decision of LoVecchio, J.: Re Smoky River Coal Limited, [2000] A.J. No. 925 (Q.B.), online: Q.L. (A.J.). They are briefly recapped here.
[3] Until very recently, Smoky River operated a coal mine located in Grande Cache, Alberta. It had been experiencing financial difficulties since 1998. Effective July 31, 1998, Smoky River obtained the protection of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA") pursuant to an order of Cairns, J. dated August 10, 1998. This order stayed all proceedings against Smoky River and provided for the creation of charges.

Digitized by Google

[4] On August 17, 1998, Prowse, J. issued an order creating an express charge and priority over Smoky River's assets in favour of what were termed in the order "post-petition trade creditors" ("PPTC Charge"). Paragraphs 2(c) and (d) of the August 17, 1998 order state (AB 32):

> (c) obligations incurred by Smoky to trade creditors after the date of filing of the Petition ("Post-Petition Trade Creditors") shall be paid in accordance with their terms of credit;
> (d) Post-Petition Trade Creditors shall be entitled to the benefit of and are hereby granted a charge ("Post-Petition Trade Creditors' Charge") against, and security interest in, the Property, as security for indebtedness incurred to them [...].

[1] The purpose of the PPTC Charge was to encourage the regular trade creditors of Smoky River to continue to provide essential goods and services to Smoky River during its reorganization period. The order did not define the term "post-petition trade creditor", but called for a special hearing as soon as possible to delineate post-petition trade creditors' entitlement to, and priority in, the PPTC Charge. That hearing was never held.

[5] LoVecchio, J. was appointed the CCAA judge. On June 16, 1999, he capped the amount of the PPTC Charge at $7 million.

[6] On March 17, 2000, the CCAA judge lifted the CCAA stay of proceedings, allowing the Petitioners, the holders of $75 million of secured notes, to accelerate their claims, make a demand for payment, and deliver a notice to Smoky River pursuant to s. 244 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3. The order further stipulated that Smoky River should only operate and make expenditures as required in the ordinary course of business, or to preserve the status quo.

[7] On March 22, 2000, the Petitioners applied to issue a Statement of Claim, and appoint a Receiver/Manager over Smoky River and its subsidiary corporations. They also proposed a "wind-down" of the mining operations, given the large number of employees involved. A plan for the "ramping down" of activities was created to ensure a smooth transition into receivership.

[8] On March 25, 2000, Smoky submitted an "orderly Shutdown Plan" to the Monitor. On March 29, 2000, the CCAA judge limited the payments that could be made by Smoky River. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Employment Standards Code, S.A. 1996, c. E-10.3, Smoky River was ordered to pay only outstanding wage claims of employees. The order specified that "the rights of any employee shall not otherwise be prejudiced by this order, nor shall this order be used as a basis for an argument to alter the legal entitlement of employees" (AB 158).

[9] On March 31, 2000, the Petitioners were granted leave to commence proceedings under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the CCAA proceedings were stayed. By a second order on the same date, PricewaterhouseCoopers was appointed the interim receiver of Smoky River. The obligations established throughout the CCAA proceedings were preserved by the following provisions (AB 49):

> 7. The Receiver may without further order of the Court and on notice to the Noteholders make payments:
> (a) to employees of Smoky River Coal Limited up to the extent of their statutory priority; [...]
> (e) to creditors entitled to the benefit of the CCAA post-petition trade creditors' charge;
> provided that the priority of such payments is in accordance with the priorities set out in previous orders of the Court relating to The CCAA proceedings of the Defendant Smoky River Coal Limited, and shall make no other distribution to the Plaintiff or other creditors of any class without first having obtained the leave of this Court.
> 19. The Receiver shall be bound by all the charges, priorities and obligations created or approved by this Court in The CCAA proceedings, and the Receiver is directed to:
> (a) determine which creditors are entitled to the benefit of the post-petition trade creditors' charge; and
> (b) determine what other charges, priorities and obligations need to be maintained;
> and if necessary seek the direction of this Court within 45 days hereof. [...]

[10] On May 9, 2000, the Receiver was authorized to send out notices to all creditors claiming refuge under the PPTC Charge, informing them whether or not their claims had been accepted. Creditors were provided with a mechanism for court review of the Receiver's decisions.

[11] On July 4 and 5, 2000, the CCAA judge heard the applications of several creditors, including all the parties to this appeal, appealing the Receiver's determination of their entitlement, or lack of entitlement, to the PPTC Charge.

THE CCAA JUDGE'S DECISION

[12] In his decision of July 31, 2000, supra, the CCAA judge set out two requirements for eligibility for the PPTC Charge. The first criteria was that the debt in question was incurred by Smoky River during the CCAA period, between July 31, 1998 and March 31, 2000.

Digitized by Google

[13] The second criteria for eligibility was that the debt in question was incurred in connection with the daily operating activities of Smoky River, as opposed to debts that arose from the cessation or termination of services. As stated by the CCAA judge (supra, at para. 40):

> The main purpose of the Charge was to encourage the creditors who supply Smoky with goods and services to continue to deal with Smoky during the reorganization period. The critical characteristic of the service provided by the creditors must have been that it was essential to keeping 'the lights of the company on'. Thus, the costs or expenses incurred must be essential to the continued day to day operations of the mine. Penalties or obligations associated with a breach are not expenses associated with continued operations.

We are in substantial agreement with the two eligibility criteria delimited by the CCAA judge.

[14] After setting out these requirements, the CCAA judge applied them to the applications of the various creditors. His decisions are discussed below, in the analysis of the individual appeals.

CREATING CCAA CHARGES

[15] CCAA orders become the roadmap for the proceedings and the litigation which may follow. Orders must therefore be drafted with clarity and precision. The purpose of the CCAA must be kept at the forefront in both drafting and interpreting a CCAA order. The CCAA is remedial legislation. As was stated in Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1992), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div):

> The CCAA is intended to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors as an alternative to bankruptcy and, as such, is remedial legislation entitled to a liberal interpretation. It seems to me that the purpose of the statute is to enable insolvent companies to carry on business in the ordinary course or otherwise deal with their assets so as to enable plan [sic] of compromise or arrangement to be prepared, filed and considered by their creditors and the court.

[16] It is particularly important that the terms and scope of any charge created by an order be clearly defined. Creditors need to know from the outset whether or not they are entitled to benefit in any charge or other priority created by the order. Those extending credit, be it trade credit or otherwise, should not be forced to participate in litigation after the CCAA proceeding to discover whether or not they hold some form of security or are entitled to a super-priority. Similarly, secured creditors of a troubled company need to know from the outset the effect the CCAA process will have on their security. They should not be forced to wait until the end of the proceedings to discover that their security has been whittled away due to a broad judicial interpretation of qualification for super-priority status. A precise CCAA order will ensure commercial practicality by allowing all creditors of the debtor company to properly adjust the terms of their credit.

[17] Terms for which there is no common and easily discernable meaning, such as "post-petition trade creditor", should be defined with as much precision as possible. In this case, the term was not defined in the original order, but was to be delineated in a special hearing to be "scheduled as soon as counsel can secure a special chambers date" to determine "whether or not and on what terms, including priority, if any, Post-Petition Trade Creditors shall be entitled to the benefit of and granted a charge against, and security interest in, the Property, as security for indebtedness incurred to them from and after the date of the Special Hearing" (AB 33-34). The parties charged with scheduling that hearing were Smoky River, the monitor, the Petitioners, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and Canadian National Railway Company. Their failure to convene the hearing has led to costly litigation and the appeals before us.

[18] Parties in a CCAA proceeding, with the supervision of a CCAA judge, may define a post-petition trade creditors' charge as they see fit. Because they failed to do so in this case, the court must attempt to balance the interests of the parties. Most secured creditors are already protected, as they obtained an order capping the PPTC Charge at $7 million. Creditors who extended credit to Smoky River under the PPTC Charge have no similar protection. However, they are taken to understand the purpose of the CCAA and to expect that the PPTC Charge would be interpreted to accord with the commercial reality that the insolvent business would operate in its ordinary course. Therefore, while we accept the CCAA judge's requirement that to qualify, a debt must have been incurred in connection with the daily operating activities of Smoky River, in the circumstances of this case, we interpret that requirement on commercially reasonable terms.

THE APPEALS

[19] The appeals have been consolidated. The CCAA judge's decisions, grounds of appeal and our conclusions are as follows:

Appeal of Coneco Equipment Inc.

[20] Coneco Equipment Inc. leased heavy equipment to Smoky River during the CCAA period. The CCAA judge decided that Coneco was a post-petition trade creditor, entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge for the rental fee.

Digitized by Google

Coneco appeals, asking for a declaration that it is also entitled to participate in the PPTC Charge for the cost of repairs to the equipment.

[21] Coneco argues that the provisions of the August 17, 1998 order creating the PPTC Charge must be interpreted in a commercially reasonable manner -- in the manner that an unsecured creditor or business person being asked to provide credit would interpret them. It contends that it was commercially reasonable to assume that repair costs to the equipment leased to Smoky River were part of the terms of credit, and would be included in the PPTC Charge. Conoco bases its argument on the lease agreements, which provided that Smoky River would pay the repair costs.

[22] The application of commercially reasonable terms to Conoco's claim for repairs involves applying a legal test to a particular set of facts. We review on a standard of correctness.

[23] Coneco was clearly a post-petition trade creditor. The covenant to repair the equipment was just as much a term of the lease and a term of credit as Smoky River's obligation to pay rent. The repair costs were not a damage claim, but a clear contractual obligation that arose during the CCAA period. It is not commercially reasonable that Coneco would lease valuable equipment to Smoky River unless Smoky River maintained it in good operating condition. Had there been no obligation to maintain the equipment, the rental rate would have been considerably higher. This interpretation is consistent with commercial reasonableness.

[24] The order states that post-petition trade creditors will be paid in accordance with their terms of credit and will have the benefit of the PPTC Charge. The repair costs were part of Coneco's terms of credit and Coneco is entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge. Coneco's appeal is allowed.

Appeal of Finning (Canada)

[25] Finning (Canada) also leased heavy equipment to Smoky River during the CCAA period. The CCAA judge decided that Finning was a post-petition trade creditor, and was entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge for rental only. Finning appeals, asking for a declaration that it is also entitled to participate in the PPTC Charge for the costs of the maintenance, repairs, servicing and required change-outs of the leased equipment.

[26] Finning relies on the terms and conditions of its leases with Smoky River, which contained a clear obligation to maintain the equipment in good repair and operating condition. In addition, contemporaneous with the execution of the leases, Finning and Smoky River established a maintenance schedule for the equipment. The schedule outlined the number of operating hours the equipment could be used before maintenance, repairs and change-outs were required, and set out the fees Smoky River agreed to pay Finning for the change-outs.

[27] Finning's appeal is similar to Coneco's, and the same analysis and standard of review apply. The cost of maintenance, repairs, servicing and required change-outs to the equipment were part of Finning's terms of credit and it is entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge. Finning's appeal is allowed.

Appeal of the Municipal District of Greenview No. 16

[28] The CCAA judge ruled that property taxes owed to the Municipal District of Greenview No. 16 were not a "traded commodity" and were not entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge.

[29] Greenview appeals, asking for a declaration that it is a post-petition trade creditor entitled to participate in the PPTC Charge for all of its 1999 property tax claim and for the pro-rated portion of its 2000 tax claim for the time period in which Smoky River continued to operate under the protection of the CCAA.

[30] Greenview argues that it provided Smoky River with services which were a benefit to Smoky River. It submits that taxes were a necessary obligation incurred by Smoky River in connection with its daily operating activities during the CCAA period, and Greenview is therefore entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge.

[31] Trade is defined in Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed., as "the act or the business of buying and selling for money." In fact, Greenview was not selling its services to Smoky River for money. Counsel for Greenview conceded in oral argument that Greenview did not deny and could not have denied Smoky River the services it provided, although Smoky River did not pay its property taxes. Property taxes are not the purchase price for the services provided by Greenview; instead they are the means of generating the revenue to provide those services.

[32] Greenview was not engaged in the act of trading and cannot be a trade creditor. While nothing prevents a government that exchanges goods or services for money from being a trade creditor, in this case the nature of the property tax is determinative.

[33] Greenview was not entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge. Its appeal is dismissed.

Appeal of CNR re: Royalty Payments to the Alberta Department of Resource Development

[34] The CCAA judge decided that resource royalties on coal leases payable to the Alberta Department of Resource Development were entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge. CNR appeals this decision. It argues that ADRD is not a trade creditor, and that because the royalties in issue are in the nature of a tax, they are not properly considered trade debt.

Digitized by Google

[35] Smoky River was required to pay monthly royalties to the ADRD to keep its most fundamental asset, its coal leases, in good standing. Because Smoky River needed its coal leases to continue its coal mine operations, the ADRD provided goods to Smoky River that were essential to "keeping the lights on" during the CCAA period. The royalty payments were not a tax but an exchange of money for goods, which could properly be characterized as a trade debt. The CCAA judge did not err in deciding that the ADRD was entitled to participate in the PPTC Charge. CNR's appeal is dismissed.

Appeal of CNR re: Vacation Pay

[36] The CCAA judge made the receiving order retroactive to April 1, 2000. With the agreement of counsel, he also held that the employees were entitled to the benefit of the PPTC Charge for their vacation pay.

[37] CNR appeals these decisions. It argues that the employment relationship is not one which would give rise to a "trade debt". Employees, therefore are not "trade creditors", and as such cannot participate in the PPTC Charge.

[38] CNR also argues that because the time and date of bankruptcy is established by s. 2.1(a) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the CCAA judge did not have the discretion to make that date retroactive. As the date of the receiving order was July 31, 2000, this also was the date of bankruptcy. Accordingly, vacation pay would have been paid before the bankruptcy, would have been given super-priority status under s.109(3) of the Employment Standards Code, and should not have been included in the PPTC Charge. CNR argues that including vacation pay in the PPTC Charge diluted the payments to bona fide trade creditors.

[39] Because the decision to include vacation pay in the PPTC Charge was based on a concession by counsel for all the parties that Smoky River's employees were PPTC creditors for wages and vacation pay accrued during the CCAA period, we will not interfere. However, we offer no opinion whether employees should be characterized as trade creditors or whether wages and vacation pay should be characterized as trade debts. It is also unnecessary for us to decide and we express no opinion whether the CCAA judge erred in making the receiving order retroactive to April 1, 2000. CNR's appeal is dismissed.

Appeal of CNR re: Severance Pay

[40] Severance payments calculated under the Employment Standards Code were paid to all Smoky River employees whose employment was terminated before March 29, 2000. Severance payments were suspended under the March 29, 2000 order. However, the order indicated that employees' rights were not affected and that the order could not be used to alter their legal entitlement. The CCAA judge decided that severance obligations for employees terminated between March 29 and March 31, 2000 were entitled to benefit from the PPTC Charge.

[41] CNR appeals this decision. It argues that employees were not trade creditors and that severance pay was not an obligation that was incurred in connection with the daily operating activities of Smoky River, but rather arose from the cessation or termination of services.

[42] In a complex case such as this, a great deal of deference must be given to the CCAA judge. The CCAA judge dealt with more than 100 applications, attempting to balance the rights and equities of many parties. The lack of precision in the initial order of August 17, 1998, and the failure to hold the special hearing to define the scope of the PPTC Charge made this task even more complex.

[43] Alberta* v. *Bank of Canada 1991 ABCA 215 (CanLII), (1991), 84 D.L.R. (4th) 335 at 337 (C.A.) sets forth the proper standard of review to be taken by an appellate court in these circumstances:

> [The chambers judge] has heard numerous applications and has made many orders and directions with respect to these proceedings. He, better than anyone, has gained insight into the problems relating to this matter and how to attempt to resolve them. At times, no doubt, resolutions to these problems require some innovation. Suffice it to say that we will not lightly interfere with the enormous task undertaken by this chambers judge. We would do so only if clear error is shown.

[44] This court also commented on the appropriate standard in Luscar Ltd. et al.* v. *Smoky River Coal Ltd. 1999 ABCA 179 (CanLII), (1999), 175 D.L.R. (4th) 703 at 724 (Alta. C.A.):

> The fact that an appeal lies only with leave of an appellate court (s. 13, CCAA) suggests that Parliament, mindful that CCAA cases often require quick decision making, intended that most decisions be made by the supervising judge. This supports the view that those decisions should be interfered with only in clear cases.

[45] The CCAA judge, in permitting the severance pay to be included in the PPTC Charge, clarified his March 29, 2000 order which expressly stated that it was not meant to alter the legal entitlements of employees. The CCAA judge interpreted his earlier order to mean that employees were to be treated equally: those terminated after March 29 were not to be denied the severance pay that employees terminated before March 29 had received. By deciding that the March 29, 2000 order did not create two classes of employees, the CCAA judge attempted to balance the equities.

Digitized by Google

[46] Based on the unusual circumstances of this case and the standard of review, we dismiss CNR's appeal. In doing so we do not suggest that employees are properly considered trade creditors, or that severance pay is properly included in a PPTC Charge. We offer no opinion on either of these issues.

SUMMARY

[47] The appeals of Coneco and Finning are allowed. The appeals of the Municipal District of Greenview No. 16 and CNR are dismissed. The judgment of the CCAA judge will be varied in accordance with these reasons.

The sole issue on this appeal is whether a stay order made by a Chambers judge under s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, Chap. C-36 is a bar to realization by the Hongkong Bank of Canada (the "Bank") on security granted to it under s. 178 of the Bank Act, R.S.C. 1985, Chap. B-1.

The facts relevant to resolution of the issue are not in dispute. The respondent Chef Ready Foods Ltd. ("Chef Ready") is in the business of manufacturing and wholesaling fresh and frozen pizza products. The appellant Bank provided credit and other banking services to Chef Ready. As part of the security for its indebtedness Chef Ready executed the appropriate documentation and filed the appropriate notices under s. 178 of the Bank Act. Accordingly the Bank holds what is commonly referred to as "section 178 security".

Chef Ready encountered financial difficulties. On August 22, 1990, following upon some fruitless negotiations, the Bank, through its solicitors, demanded payment from Chef Ready. The debt then stood at $365,318.69 with interest accruing thereafter at $150.443 per day. Chef Ready did not pay.

On August 27, 1990 the Bank commenced proceedings upon debenture security which it held and upon guarantees by the principals of Chef Ready. Also on August 27, 1990, the Bank appointed an agent under a general assignment of book debts which it held, with instructions to the agent to realize upon the accounts. In the meantime, on August 23, 1990, so as to qualify under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (the "C.C.A.A."), Chef Ready had granted a trust deed to a trustee and issued an unsecured $50 bond. On August 28, 1990, the day after the Bank commenced its debenture and guarantee proceedings, Chef Ready filed a petition seeking various forms of relief under the C.C.A.A. On the same day Chef Ready filed an application, ex parte, as they were entitled to do under the C.C.A.A., for an order to be issued that day granting the relief claimed in the petition.

The application was heard in Chambers in the afternoon of August 28, 1990 and the following day. The Bank learned "on the grapevine" of the application and appeared on the hearing and was given standing to make submissions. It also filed affidavit evidence which appears to have been taken into account by the Chambers judge. The affidavit evidence had appended to it, inter alia, the s. 178 security documentation. On August 30, 1990 the Chambers judge granted the order and delivered oral reasons at the end of which he said:

"I therefore conclude that the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act is an overriding statute which gives the court power to stay all proceedings including the right of the bank to collect the accounts receivable."

The reasons refer specifically to the accounts receivable because the Bank was then poised ready to take possession of those accounts and collect the amounts owing. Its right to do so arose under the general assignment of book debts and under clause 4 of the s. 178 security instrument:

" 4. If the Customer shall sell the property or any part thereof, the proceeds of any such sale, including cash, bills, notes, evidence of title, and securities, and the indebtedness of any purchaser in connection with such sales shall be the property of the Bank to be forthwith paid or transferred to the Bank, and until so paid or transferred to be held by the Customer on behalf of and in trust for the Bank. Execution by the Customer and acceptance by the Bank of an assignment of book debts shall be deemed to be in furtherance of this declaration and not an acknowledgement by the Bank of any right or title on the part of the Customer to such book debts."

The formal order made by the Chambers judge contains a paragraph which stays realization upon or otherwise dealing with any securing on "the undertaking, property and assets" of Chef Ready:

" THIS COURT FURTHER ORDERS THAT all proceedings taken or that might be taken by any of the Petitioners' creditors or any other person, firm or corporation under the Bankruptcy Act (Canada) or the Winding-Up Act (Canada) shall be stayed until further Order of this Court upon 2 days notice to the Petitioners and that further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding commenced by any person, firm or corporation against any of the Petitioners be stayed until the further Order of this Court upon 2 days notice to the Petitioners, that no action, suit or other proceeding may be proceeded with or commenced against any of the Petitioners by any person, firm or corporation except with leave of this Court upon 2 days notice to the Petitioners and subject to such terms as this Court may impose and that the right of any person, firm or corporation to realize upon or otherwise deal with any property, right or security held by that person, firm or corporation on the undertaking, property and assets of the Petitioners be and the same is postponed;"

(Emphasis added.)

The jurisdiction in the court to make such a stay order is found in s. 11 of the C.C.A.A.:

" 11. Notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy Act or the Winding-Up Act, whenever an application has been made under this Act in respect of any company, the court, on the application of any person interested in the matter, may, on notice to any other person or without notice as it may see fit,

(a) make an order staying, until such time as the court may prescribe or until any further order, all proceedings taken or that might be taken in respect of the company under the Bankruptcy Act and the Winding-Up Act or either of them;

(b) restrain further proceedings in any action, suit or proceeding against the company on such terms as the court sees fit; and

(c) make an order that no suit, action or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court imposes."

The question of whether a step, not involving any court or litigation process, taken to realize upon the accounts receivable is a "suit, action or other proceeding...against the company" is not before the court on this appeal. The Bank does not put its case forward on that footing. Its contention is more general in nature. It is that s. 178 security is beyond the reach of the C.C.A.A.; put another way, that whatever the scope of the C.C.A.A. it does not go so far as to impede or qualify, or give jurisdiction to make orders which will impede or qualify, the rights of realization of a holder of s. 178 security. Consistent with that position, by way of relief on the appeal the Bank asks only that the stay order be varied to free up the s. 178 security:

"NATURE OF ORDER SOUGHT

An order that the appeal of the Appellant be allowed and an order be made the Order of the Judge in the Court below be set aside insofar as it restrains the Appellant from exercising its rights under its section 178 security..."

The purpose of the C.C.A.A. is to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business. It is available to any company incorporated in Canada with assets or business activities in Canada that is not a bank, a railway company, a telegraph company, an insurance company, a trust company, or a loan company. When a company has recourse to the C.C.A.A. the court is called upon to play a kind of supervisory role to preserve the status quo and to move the process along to the point where a compromise or arrangement is approved or it is evident that the attempt is doomed to failure. Obviously time is critical. Equally obviously, if the attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay, hence the powers vested in the court under s. ll.

There is nothing in the C.C.A.A. which exempts any creditors of a debtor company from its provisions. The all-encompassing scope of the Act qua creditors is even underscored by s. 8 which negates any contracting out provisions in a security instrument. And Chef Ready emphasizes the obvious, that if it had been intended that s. 178 security or the holders of s. 178 security be exempt from the C.C.A.A. it would have been a simple matter to say so. But that does not dispose of the issue. There is the Bank Act to consider.

There is nothing in the Loans and Security division of the Bank Act either, where s. 178 is found, which specifically excludes direct or indirect impact by the C.C.A.A. Nonetheless the Bank's position, in essence, is that there is a notional cordon sanitaire around s. 178 and other sections associated with it such that neither the C.C.A.A. or orders made under it can penetrate. In support of its position the Bank relies heavily upon the recent unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 121, and to a lesser degree upon an earlier unanimous Supreme Court of Canada judgment in Flintoft v. Royal Bank of Canada 1964 CanLII 89 (SCC), (1964), S.C.R. 631.

The principal issue in Hall was whether ss. 19 to 36 of the Saskatchewan Limitation of Civil Rights Act applied to a security taken under ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act. The court held that it was beyond the competence of the Saskatchewan Legislature "to superadd conditions governing realization over and above those found within the confines of the Bank Act" (p. 154). In the course of arriving at its decision the court considered the property interest acquired by a bank under s. 178 security, the legislative history leading up to the present ss. 178 and 179, the purposes intended to be achieved by the legislation, and the rights of a bank holding s. 178 security. All of those considerations have application to the issue here, and the judgment merits reading in full to appreciate the relevance of all of its parts. However , a few extracts will serve to illustrate the Bank's reliance:

"...a bank taking security under section 178 effectively acquires legal title to the borrower's interest in the present and after-acquired property assigned to it by the borrower" (p. 134)

"...the Parliament of Canada has enacted these sections not so much for the benefit of banks as for the benefit of manufacturers" (p.139)

"...These sections of the Bank Act have become an integral part of bank lending activities and are a means of providing support in many fields of endeavour to an extent which otherwise would not be practical from the standpoint of prudent banking" (p. 139)

"The bank obtains and may assert its right to the goods and their proceeds against the world, except as only Parliament itself may reduce or modify those rights" (p. 143)

"...the rights, duties and obligations of creditor and debtor are to be determined solely by reference to the Bank Act..." (p. 143)

"The essence of that regime [ss. 178 and 179], it hardly needs repeating, is to assign to the bank, on the taking out of the security, right and title to the goods in question, and to confer, on default of the debtor, and immediate right to seize and sell those goods..." (p. 152)

"...it was Parliament's manifest legislative purpose that the sole realization scheme applicable to the s. 178 security interest be that contained in the Bank Act itself" (p. 154)

"...Parliament, under its power to regulate banking, has enacted a complete code that at once defines and provides for the realization of a security interest" (p. 155).

It is the insular theme which runs through these propositions that the Bank seizes upon to support its claim for immunity. But, it must be asked, in what respect does the preservation of the status quo qua creditors under the C.C.A.A. for a temporary period infringe upon the rights of the Bank under ss. 178 and 179? It does not detract from the Bank's title; it does not distort the mechanics of realization of the security in the sense of the steps to be taken; it does not prevent immediate crystallization of the right to seize and sell; it does not breach the "complete code". All that it does is postpone the exercise of the right to seize and sell. And here the Bank had already allowed at least five days to expire between the accrual of the right and the taking of a step to exercise. It follows from this analysis that there is no apparent bar in the Bank Act to the application of the C.C.A.A. to s. 178 security and the Bank's rights in respect of it.

Having regard to the broad public policy objectives of the C.C.A.A. there is good reason why s. 178 security should not be excluded from its provisions. The C.C.A.A. was enacted by Parliament in 1933 when the nation and the world were in the grip of an economic depression. When a company became insolvent liquidation followed because that was the consequence of the only insolvency legislation which then existed - the Bankruptcy Act and the Winding-Up Act. Almost inevitably liquidation destroyed the shareholders' investment, yielded little by way of recovery to the creditors, and exacerbated the social evil of devastating levels of unemployment. The government of the day sought, through the C.C.A.A., to create a regime whereby the principals of the company and the creditors could be brought together under the supervision of the court to attempt a reorganization or compromise or arrangement under which the company could continue in business. These excerpts from an article by Stanley E. Edwards at p.587 of 1947 Vol. 25 of the Canadian Bar Review, entitled "Reorganizations Under The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act", explain very well the historic and continuing purposes of the Act:

" It is important in applying the C.C.A.A. to keep in mind its purpose and several fundamental principles which may serve to accomplish that purpose. Its object, as one Ontario judge has stated in a number of cases, is to keep a company going despite insolvency. Hon. C. H. Cahan when he introduced the bill into the House of Commons indicated that it was designed to permit a corporation, through reorganization, to continue its business, and thereby to prevent its organization being disrupted and its goodwill lost. It may be that the main value of the assets of a company is derived from their being fitted together into one system and that individually they are worth little The trade connections associated with the system and held by the management may also be valuable. In the case of a large company it is probable that no buyer can be found who would be able and willing to buy the enterprise as a whole and pay its going concern value. The alternative to reorganization then is often a sale of the property piecemeal for an amount which would yield little satisfaction to the creditors and none at all to the shareholders." (p. 592)

" There are a number of conditions and tendencies in this country which underline the importance of this statute. There has been over the last few years a rapid and continuous growth of industry, primarily manufacturing. The tendency here, as in other expanding private enterprise countries, is for the average size of corporations to increase faster than the number of them, and for much of the new wealth to be concentrated in the hands of existing companies or their successors. The results of permitting dissolutions of companies without giving the parties an adequate opportunity to reorganize them would therefore likely be more serious in the future than they have been in the past.

Because of the country's relatively small population, however, Canadian industry is and will probably continue to be very much dependent on world markets and consequently vulnerable to world depressions. If there should be such a depression it will become particularly important that an adequate reorganization procedure should be in existence, so that the Canadian economy will not be permanently injured by discontinuance of its industries, so that whatever going concern value the insolvent companies have will not be lost through dismemberment and sale of their assets, so that their employees will not be thrown out of work, and so that large numbers of investors will not be deprived of their claims and their opportunity to share in the fruits of the future activities of the corporations. While we hope that this dismal prospect will not materialize, it is nevertheless a possibility which must be recognized. But whether it does or not, the growing importance of large companies in Canada will make it important that adequate provision be made for reorganization of insolvent corporations." (p. 590)

It is apparent from these excerpts and from the wording of the statute that, in contrast with ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act which are preoccupied with the competing rights and duties of the borrower and the lender, the C.C.A.A. serves the interests of a broad constituency of investors, creditors and employees. If a bank's rights in respect of s. 178 security are accorded an unique status which renders those rights immune from the provisions of the C.C.A.A. the protection afforded that constituency for any company which has granted s. 178 security will be largely illusory. It will be illusory because almost inevitably the realization by the bank on its security will destroy the company as a going concern. Here, for example, if the Bank signifies and collects the accounts receivable Chef Ready will be deprived of working capital. Collapse and liquidation must necessarily follow. The lesson will be that where s. 178 security is present a single creditor can frustrate the public policy objectives of the C.C.A.A. There will be two classes of debtor companies: those for whom there are prospects for recovery under the C.C.A.A.; and those for whom the C.C.A.A. may be irrelevant dependant upon the whim of the s. 178 security holder. Given the economic circumstances which prevailed when the C.C.A.A. was enacted it is difficult to imagine that the legislators of the day intended that result to follow.

In the exercise of their functions under the C.C.A.A. Canadian courts have shown themselves partial to a standard of liberal construction which will further the policy objectives. See such cases as Meridian Developments Inc. v. T.D. Bank (1984), 52 C.B.R. 109 (Alta.Q.B.); Northland Properties Limited v. Excelsior Life Insurance Company 1989 CanLII 2672 (BC CA), (1989), 34 B.C.L.R. (2d) 122 (B.C.C.A.); Re Feifer and Frame Manufacturing Corporation (1947), 28 C.B.R. 124 (Que.C.A.); Wynden Canada Inc. v. Gaz Metropolitaine (1982), 44 C.B.R. 285 (Que.S.C.); and Norcen Energy Resources v. Oakwood Petroleums (1988) 72 C.B.R. 2 (Alta.Q.B.). The trend demonstrated by these cases is entirely consistent with the object and purpose of the C.C.A.A.

The trend which emerges from this sampling will be given effect here by holding that where the word security occurs in the C.A.A.A. it includes s. 178 security and where the word creditor occurs it includes a bank holding s. 178 security. To the extent that there may be conflict between the two statutes therefore, the broad scope of the C.C.A.A. prevails.

For these reasons the disposition by the Chambers judge of the application made by Chef Ready will be upheld. It follows that the appeal is dismissed.

[1] The process by which claims of employees, both unionized and non-unionized, have been addressed in restructurings initiated under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA") has been the subject of debate for a number of years. There is uncertainty and strong divergent views have been expressed. Notwithstanding that employee claims are ultimately addressed in many CCAA proceedings, there are few reported decisions which address a number of the issues being raised in these two motions. This lack of jurisprudence may reflect that the issues, for the most part, have been resolved through negotiation, as opposed to being determined by the court in the CCAA process – which includes motions for directions, the classification of creditors' claims, the holding and conduct of creditors' meetings and motions to sanction a plan of compromise or arrangement.

Digitized by Google

[2] In this case, both unionized and non-unionized employee groups have brought motions for directions. This endorsement addresses both motions.

Union Motion

[3] The first motion is brought by the National Automobile, Aerospace, Transportation and General Workers Union of Canada (CAW – Canada) and its Locals 27, 1525, 1530, 1535, 1837, 1839, 1905, and/or 1915 (the "Union") and by George Borosh on his own behalf and on behalf of all retirees of the Applicants who were formerly represented by the Union.

[4] The Union requests an order directing the Applicants (also referred to as "Nortel") to recommence certain periodic and lump sum payments which the Applicants, or any of them, are obligated to make pursuant to the CAW collective agreement (the "Collective Agreement"). The Union also seeks an order requiring the Applicants to pay to those entitled persons the payments which should have been made to them under the Collective Agreement since January 14, 2009, the date of the CCAA filing and the date of the Initial Order.

[5] The Union seeks continued payment of certain of these benefits including:

(a) retirement allowance payments ("RAP");
(b) voluntary retirement options ("VRO"); and
(c) termination and severance payments.

[6] The amounts claimed by the Union are contractual entitlements under the Collective Agreement, which the Union submits are payable only after an individual's employment with the Applicants has ceased.

[7] There are approximately 101 former Union members with claims to RAP. The current value of these RAP is approximately $2.3 million. There are approximately 180 former unionized retirees who claim similar benefits under other collective agreements.

[8] There are approximately 7 persons who may assert claims to VRO as of the date of the Initial Order. These claims amount to approximately $202,000.

[9] There are also approximately 600 persons who may claim termination and severance pay amounts. Five of those persons are former union members.

Former Employee Motion

[10] The second motion is brought by Mr. Donald Sproule, Mr. David Archibald and Mr. Michael Campbell (collectively, the "Representatives") on behalf of former employees, including pensioners, of the Applicants or any person claiming an interest under or on behalf of such former employees or pensioners and surviving spouses in receipt of a Nortel pension, or group or class of them (collectively, the "Former Employees"). The Representatives seek an order varying the Initial Order by requiring the Applicants to pay termination pay, severance pay, vacation pay and an amount equivalent to the continuation of the benefit plans during the notice period, which are required to be paid to affected Former Employees in accordance with the Employment Standards Act, 2000 S.O. 2000 c.41 ("ESA") or any other relevant provincial employment legislation. The Representatives also seek an order varying the Initial Order by requiring the Applicants to recommence certain periodic and lump sum payments and to make payment of all periodic and lump sum payments which should have been paid since the Initial Order, which the Applicants are obligated to pay Former Employees in accordance with the statutory and contractual obligations entered into by Nortel and affected Former Employees, including the Transitional Retirement Allowance ("TRA") and any pension benefit payments Former Employees are entitled to receive in excess of the Nortel Networks Limited Managerial and Non-negotiated Pension Plan (the "Pension Plan"). TRA is similar to RAP, but is for non-unionized retirees. There are approximately 442 individuals who may claim the TRA. The current value of TRA obligations is approximately $18 million.

[11] The TRA and the RAP are both unregistered benefits that run concurrently with other pension entitlements and operate as time-limited supplements.

[12] In many respects, the motion of the Former Employees is not dissimilar to the CAW motion, such that the motion of the Former Employees can almost be described as a "Me too motion".

Background

[13] On January 14, 2009, the Applicants were granted protection under the CCAA, pursuant to the Initial Order.

[14] Upon commencement of the CCAA proceedings, the Applicants ceased making payments of amounts that constituted or would constitute unsecured claims against the Applicants. Included were payments for termination and severance, as well as amounts under various retirement and retirement transitioning programs.

[15] The Initial Order provides:

(a) that Nortel is entitled but not required to pay, among other things, outstanding and future wages, salaries, vacation pay, employee benefits and pension plan payments;
(b) that Nortel is entitled to terminate the employment of or lay off any of its employees and deal with the consequences under a future plan of arrangement;

Digitized by Google

(c) that Nortel is entitled to vacate, abandon or quit the whole but not part of any lease agreement and repudiate agreements relating to leased properties (paragraph 11);
(d) for a stay of proceedings against Nortel;
(e) for a suspension of rights and remedies vis-à-vis Nortel;
(f) that during the stay period no person shall discontinue, repudiate, cease to perform any contract, agreement held by the company (paragraph 16);
(g) that those having agreements with Nortel for the supply of goods and/or services are restrained from, among other things, discontinuing, altering or terminating the supply of such goods or services. The proviso is that the goods or services supplied are to be paid for by Nortel in accordance with the normal payment practices.

Position of Union

[16] The position of the CAW is that the Applicants' obligations to make the payments is to the CAW pursuant to the Collective Agreement. The obligation is not to the individual beneficiaries.

[17] The Union also submits that the difference between the moving parties is that RAP, VRO and other payments are made pursuant to the Collective Agreement as between the Union and the Applicants and not as an outstanding debt payable to former employees.

[18] The Union further submits that the Applicants are obligated to maintain the full measure of compensation under the Collective Agreement in exchange for the provision of services provided by the Union's members subsequent to the issuance of the Initial Order. As such, the failure to abide by the terms of the Collective Agreement, the Union submits, runs directly contrary to Section 11.3 of the CCAA as compensation paid to employees under a collective agreement can reasonably be interpreted as being payment for services within the meaning of this section.

[19] Section 11.3 of the CCAA provides:

> No order made under section 11 shall have the effect of
> (a) prohibiting a person from requiring immediate payment for goods, services, use of leased or licensed property or other valuable consideration provided after the order is made; or > (b) requiring the further advance of money or credit.

[20] In order to fit within Section 11.3, services have to be provided after the date of the Initial Order.

[21] The Union submits that persons owed severance pay are post-petition trade creditors in a bankruptcy, albeit in relation to specific circumstances. Thus, by analogy, persons owed severance pay are post-petition trade creditors in a CCAA proceeding. The Union relies on Smokey River Coal Ltd. (Re) 2001 ABCA 209 (CanLII), 2001 ABCA 209 to support its proposition.

[22] The Union further submits that when interpreting "compensation" for services performed under the Collective Agreement, it must include all of the monetary aspects of the Collective Agreement and not those specifically made to those actively employed on any particular given day.

[23] The Union takes the position that Section 11.3 of the CCAA specifically contemplates that a supplier is entitled to payment for post-filing goods and services provided, and would undoubtedly refuse to continue supply in the event of receiving only partial payment. However, the Union contends that it does not have the ability to cease providing services due to the Labour Relations Act, 1995, S.O. 1995, c. 1. As such, the only alternative open to the Union is to seek an order to recommence the payments halted by the Initial Order.

[24] The Union contends that Section 11.3 of the CCAA precludes the court from authorizing the Applicants to make selective determinations as to which parts of the Collective Agreement it will abide by. By failing to abide by the terms of the Collective Agreement, the Union contends that the Applicants have acted as if the contract has been amended to the extent that it is no longer bound by all of its terms and need merely address any loss through the plan of arrangement.

[25] The Union submits that, with the exception of rectification to clarify the intent of the parties, the court has no jurisdiction at common law or in equity to alter the terms of the contract between parties and as the court cannot amend the terms of the Collective Agreement, the employer should not be allowed to act as though it had done so.

[26] The Union submits that no other supplier of services would countenance, and the court does not have the jurisdiction to authorize, the recipient party to a contract unilaterally determining which provisions of the agreement it will or will not abide by while the contract is in operation.

[27] The Union concludes that the Applicants must pay for the full measure of its bargain with the Union while the Collective Agreement remains in force and the court should direct the recommencement and repayment of those benefits that arise out of the Collective Agreement and which were suspended subsequently to the filing of the CCAA application on January 14, 2009.

Position of the Former Employees

Digitized by Google

[28] Counsel to the Former Employees submits that the court has the discretion pursuant to Section 11 of the CCAA to order Nortel to recommence periodic and lump-sum payments to Former Employees in accordance with Nortel's statutory and contractual obligations. Further, the RAP payments which the Union seeks to enforce are not meaningfully different from those RAP benefits payable to other unionized retirees who belong to other unions nor from the TRA payable to non-unionized former employees. Accordingly, counsel submits that it would be inequitable to restore payments to one group of retirees and not others. Hence, the reference to the "Me too motion".

[29] Counsel further submits that all employers and employees are bound by the minimum standards in the ESA and other applicable provincial employment legislation. Section 5 of the ESA expressly states that no employer can contract out or waive an employment standard in the ESA and that any such contracting out or waiver is void.

[30] Counsel submits that each province has minimum standards employment legislation and regulations which govern employment relationships at the provincial level and that provincial laws such as the ESA continue to apply during CCAA proceedings.

[31] Further, the Supreme Court of Canada has held that provincial laws in federally-regulated bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings continue to apply so long as the doctrine of paramountcy is not triggered: See Crystalline Investments Ltd. v. Domgroup Ltd., 2004 SCC 3 (CanLII), [2004] 1 S.C.R. 60.

[32] In this case, counsel further submits that there is no conflict between the provisions of the ESA and the CCAA and that paramountcy is not triggered and it follows that the ESA and other applicable employment legislation continues to apply during the Applicants' CCAA proceedings. As a result counsel submits that the Applicants are required to make payment to Former Employees for monies owing pursuant to the minimum employment standards as outlined in the ESA and other applicable provincial legislation.

Position of the Applicants

[33] Counsel to the Applicants sets out the central purpose of the CCAA as being: "to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business". (Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. (Re), (1992) B.C.J. No. 3070, aff'd by 1992, 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265), and that the stay is the primary procedural instrument used to achieve the purpose of the CCAA:

> ...if the attempt at a compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success, there must be a means of holding the creditors at bay. Hence the powers vested in the court under Section 11 (Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. (Re), supra).

[34] The Applicants go on to submit that the powers vested in the court under Section 11 to achieve these goals of the CCAA include:

(a) the ability to stay past debts; and

(b) the ability to require the continuance of present obligations to the debtor.

[35] The corresponding protection extended to persons doing business with the debtor is that such persons (including employees) are not required to extend credit to the debtor corporation in the course of the CCAA proceedings. The protection afforded by Section 11.3 extends only to services provided after the Initial Order. Post-filing payments are only made for the purpose of ensuring the continued supply of services and that obligations in connection with past services are stayed. (See Mirant Canada Energy Marketing Ltd. (Re) (2004), A.J. No. 331).

[36] Furthermore, counsel to the Applicants submits that contractual obligations respecting post employment are obligations in respect of past services and are accordingly stayed.

[37] Counsel to the Applicants also relies on the following statement from Mirant, supra, at paragraph 28:

> Thus, for me to find the decision of the Court of Appeal in Smokey River Coal analogous to Schaefer's situation, I would need to find that the obligation to pay severance pay to Schaefer was a clear contractual obligation that was necessary for Schaefer to continue his employment and not an obligation that arose from the cessation or termination of services. In my view, to find it to be the former would be to stretch the meaning of the obligation in the Letter Agreement to pay severance pay. It is an obligation that arises on the termination of services. It does not fall within a commercially reasonable contractual obligation essential for the continued supply of services. Only is his salary which he has been paid falls within that definition.

[38] Counsel to the Applicants states that post-employment benefits have been consistently stayed under the CCAA and that post-employment benefits are properly regarded as pre-filing debts, which receive the same treatment as other unsecured creditors. The Applicants rely on Syndicat nationale de l'amiante d'Asbestos inc. v. Jeffrey Mines Inc. (2003) Q.J. No. 264 (C.A.) ("Jeffrey Mine") for the proposition that "the fact that these benefits are provided for in the collective agreement changes nothing".

Digitized by Google

[39] Counsel to the Applicants submits that the Union seeks an order directing the Applicants to make payment of various post-employment benefits to former Nortel employees and that the Former Employees claim entitlement to similar treatment for all post-employment benefits, under the Collective Agreement or otherwise.

[40] The Applicants take the position the Union's continuing collective representation role does not clothe unpaid benefits with any higher status, relying on the following from Jeffrey Mine at paras. 57 – 58:

> Within the framework of the restructuring plan, arrangements can be made respecting the amounts owing in this regard.
> The same is true in the case of the loss of certain fringe benefits sustained by persons who have not provided services to the debtor since the initial order. These persons became creditors of the debtor for the monetary value of the benefits lost further to Jeffrey Mines Inc.'s having ceased to pay premiums. The fact that these benefits are provided for in the collective agreements changes nothing.

[41] In addition, the Applicants point to the following statement of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Syndicat des employées et employés de CFAP-TV (TQS-Quebec), section locale 3946 du Syndicat canadien de la function publique c. TQS inc., 2008 QCCA 1429 (CanLII), 2008 QCCA 1429 at paras. 26-27:

> [Unofficial translation] Employees' rights are defined by the collective agreement that governs them and by certain legislative provisions. However, the resulting claims are just as much [at] risk as those of other creditors, in this case suppliers whose livelihood is also threatened by the financial precariousness of their debtor.
> The arguments of counsel for the Applicants are based on the erroneous premise that the employees are entitled to a privileged status. That is not what the CCAA provides nor is it what this court decided in Syndicat national de l'amiante d'Asbestos inc. c. Mine Jeffrey inc.

[42] Collectively, RAP payment and TRA payments entail obligations of over $22 million. Counsel to the Applicants submits that there is no basis in principle to treat them differently. They are all stayed and there is no basis to treat any of these two unsecured obligations differently. The Applicants are attempting to restructure for the final benefit of all stakeholders and counsel submits that its collective resources must be used for such purposes.

Report of the Monitor

[43] In its Seventh Report, the Monitor notes that at the time of the Initial Order, the Applicants employed approximately 6,000 employees and had approximately 11,700 retirees or their survivors receiving pension and/or benefits from retirement plans sponsored by the Applicants.

[44] The Monitor goes on to report that the Applicants have continued to honour substantially all of the obligations to active employees. The Applicants have continued to make current service and special funding payments to their registered pension plans. All the health and welfare benefits for both active employees and retirees have been continued to be paid since the commencement of the CCAA proceedings.

[45] The Monitor further reports that at the filing date, payments to former employees for termination and severance as well as the provisions of the health and dental benefits ceased. In addition, non-registered and unfunded retirement plan payments ceased.

[46] More importantly, the Monitor reports that, as noted in previous Monitor's Reports, the Applicants' financial position is under pressure.

Discussion and Analysis

[47] The acknowledged purpose of the CCAA is to facilitate the making of a compromise or arrangement between an insolvent debtor company and its creditors to the end that the company is able to continue in business. (See Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. (Re), (1992) B.C.J. No. 3070, aff'd by 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992), 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265, at para. 18 citing Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Canada 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), (1990), 4 C.B.R. (3d) 311 (B.C.C.A.) at 315). The primary procedural instrument used to achieve that goal is the ability of the court to issue a broad stay of proceedings under Section 11 of the CCAA.

[48] The powers vested in the court under Section 11 of the CCAA to achieve these goals include the ability to stay past debts; and the ability to require the continuance of present obligations to the debtor. (Woodwards Limited (Re), reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 236 (S.C.).

[49] The Applicants acknowledged that they were insolvent in affidavit material filed on the Initial Hearing. This position was accepted and is referenced in my endorsement of January 14, 2009. The Applicants are in the process of restructuring but no plan of compromise or arrangement has yet to be put forward.

[50] The Monitor has reported that the Applicants are under financial pressure. Previous reports filed by the Monitor have provided considerable detail as to how the Applicants carry on operations and have provided specific information as to the interdependent relationship between Nortel entities in Canada, the United States, Europe, the Middle East and Asia.

Digitized by Google

[51] In my view, in considering the impact of these motions, it is both necessary and appropriate to take into account the overall financial position of the Applicants. There are several reasons for doing so:

(a) The Applicants are not in a position to honour their obligations to all creditors.

(b) The Applicants are in default of contractual obligations to a number of creditors, including with respect to significant bond issues. The obligations owed to bondholders are unsecured.

(c) The Applicants are in default of certain obligations under the Collective Agreements.

(d) The Applicants are in default of certain obligations owed to the Former Employees.

[52] It is also necessary to take into account that these motions have been brought prior to any determination of any creditor classifications. No claims procedure has been proposed. No meeting of creditors has been called and no plan of arrangement has been presented to the creditors for their consideration.

[53] There is no doubt that the views of the Union and the Former Employees differ from that of the Applicants. The Union insists that the Applicants honour the Collective Agreement. The Former Employees want treatment that is consistent with that being provided to the Union. The record also establishes that the financial predicament faced by retirees and Former Employees is, in many cases, serious. The record references examples where individuals are largely dependent upon the employee benefits that, until recently, they were receiving.

[54] However, the Applicants contend that since all of the employee obligations are unsecured it is improper to prefer retirees and the Former Employees over the other unsecured creditors of the Applicants and furthermore, the financial pressure facing the Applicants precludes them from paying all of these outstanding obligations.

[55] Counsel to the Union contends that the Applicants must pay for the full measure of its bargain with the Union while the Collective Agreement remains in force and further that the court does not have the jurisdiction to authorize a party, in this case the Applicants, to unilaterally determine which provisions of the Collective Agreement they will abide by while the contract is in operation. Counsel further contends that Section 11.3 of the CCAA precludes the court from authorizing the Applicants to make selective determinations as to which parts of the Collective Agreement they will abide by and that by failing to abide by the terms of the Collective Agreement, the Applicants acted as if the Collective Agreement between themselves and the Union has been amended to the extent that the Applicants are no longer bound by all of its terms and need merely address any loss through the plan of arrangement.

[56] The Union specifically contends that the court has no jurisdiction to alter the terms of the Collective Agreement.

[57] In addressing these points, it is necessary to keep in mind that these CCAA proceedings are at a relatively early stage. It also must be kept in mind that the economic circumstances at Nortel are such that it cannot be considered to be carrying on "business as usual". As a result of the Applicants' insolvency, difficult choices will have to be made. These choices have to be made by all stakeholders.

[58] The Applicants have breached the Collective Agreement and, as a consequence, the Union has certain claims.

[59] However, the Applicants have also breached contractual agreements they have with Former Employees and other parties. These parties will also have claims as against the Applicants.

[60] An overriding consideration is that the employee claims whether put forth by the Union or the Former Employees, are unsecured claims. These claims do not have any statutory priority.

[61] In addition, there is nothing on the record which addresses the issue of how the claims of various parties will be treated in any plan of arrangement, nor is there any indication as to how the creditors will be classified. These issues are not before the court at this time.

[62] What is before the court is whether the Applicants should be directed to recommence certain periodic and lump sum payments that they are obligated to make under the Collective Agreement as well as similar or equivalent payments to Former Employees.

[63] It is necessary to consider the meaning of Section 11.3 and, in particular, whether the Section should be interpreted in the manner suggested by the Union.

[64] Counsel to the Union submits that the ordinary meaning of "services" in section 11.3 includes work performed by employees subject to a collective agreement. Further, even if the ordinary meaning is plain, courts must consider the purpose and scheme of the legislation, and relevant legal norms. Counsel submits that the courts must consider the entire context. As a result, when interpreting "compensation" for services performed under a collective agreement, counsel to the Union submits it must include all of the monetary aspects of the agreement and not those made specifically to those actively employed on any particular given day.

[65] No cases were cited in support of this interpretation.

[66] I am unable to agree with the Union's argument. In my view, section 11.3 is an exception to the general stay provision authorized by section 11 provided for in the Initial Order. As such, it seems to me that section 11.3 should be narrowly construed. (See Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 5th ed. (Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis Canada Inc., 2008) at 483-485.) Section 11.3 applies to services provided after the date of the Initial Order. The ordinary meaning of "services" must be considered in the context of the phrase "services,...provided after the order is made". On a plain reading, it contemplates, in my view, some activity on behalf of the service provider which is performed after the date of the Initial Order. The CCAA contemplates that during the reorganization process, pre-filing debts are not paid, absent exceptional circumstances and services provided after the date of the Initial Order will be paid for the purpose of ensuring the continued supply of services.

[67] The flaw in the argument of the Union is that it equates the crystallization of a payment obligation under the Collective Agreement to a provision of a service within the meaning of s. 11.3. The triggering of the payment obligation may have arisen after the Initial Order but it does not follow that a service has been provided after the Initial Order. Section 11.3 contemplates, in my view, some current activity by a service provider post-filing that gives rise to a payment obligation post-filing. The distinction being that the claims of the Union for termination and severance pay are based, for the most part, on services that were provided pre-filing. Likewise, obligations for benefits arising from RAP and VRO are again based, for the most part, on services provided pre-filing. The exact time of when the payment obligation crystallized is not, in my view, the determining factor under section 11.3. Rather, the key factor is whether the employee performed services after the date of the Initial Order. If so, he or she is entitled to compensation benefits for such current service.

[68] The interpretation urged by counsel to the Union with respect to this section is not warranted. In my view, section 11.3 does not require the Applicants to make payment, at this time, of the outstanding obligations under the Collective Agreement.

[69] The Union also raised the issue as to whether the court has the jurisdiction to order a stay of the outstanding obligations under Section 11 of the CCAA.

[70] The Union takes the position that, with the exception of rectification to clarify the intent of the parties, the court has no jurisdiction at common law or in equity to alter the terms of a contract between parties. The Union relies on Bilodeau et al v. McLean, [1924] 3 D.L.R. 410 (Man. C.A.); Desener v. Myles, [1963] S. J. No. 31 (Q.B.); Hiesinger v. Bonice [1984] A. J. No. 281; Werchola v. KC5 Amusement Holdings Ltd. 2002 SKQB 339 (CanLII), 2002 SKQB 339 to support its position.

[71] The Union extends this argument and submits that as the court cannot amend the terms of a collective agreement, the employer should not be allowed to act as though it had been.

[72] As a general rule, counsel to the Union submits, there is in place a comprehensive regime for the regulation of labour relations with specialized labour-relations tribunals having exclusive jurisdiction to deal with legal and factual matters arising under labour legislation and no court should restrain any tribunal from proceeding to deal with such matters.

[73] However, as is clear from the context, these cases referenced at [70] are dealing with the ordinary situation in which there is no issue of insolvency. In this case, we are dealing with a group of companies which are insolvent and which have been accorded the protection of the CCAA. In my view, this insolvency context is an important distinguishing factor. The insolvency context requires that the stay provisions provided in the CCAA and the Initial Order must be given meaningful interpretation.

[74] There is authority for the proposition that, when exercising their authority under insolvency legislation, the courts may make, at the initial stage of a CCAA proceeding, orders regarding matters, but for the insolvent condition of the employer, would be dealt with pursuant to provincial labour legislation, and in most circumstances, by labour tribunals. In Re: Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992) 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265 (B.C.C.A.), the issue involved the question whether a CCAA debtor company had to make statutory severance payments as was mandatory under the provincial employment standards legislation. MacFarlane J.A. stated at pp. 271-2:

> It appears to me that an order which treats creditors alike is in accord with the purpose of the CCAA. Without the provisions of that statute the petitioner companies might soon be in bankruptcy, and the priority which the employees now have would be lost. The process provided by the CCAA is an interim one. Generally, it suspends but does not determine the ultimate rights of any creditor. In the end it may result in the rights of employees being protected, but in the meantime it preserves the status quo and protects all creditors while a reorganization is being attempted.
> This case is not so much about the rights of employees as creditors, but the right of the court under the CCAA to serve not only the special interests of the directors and officers of the company but the broader constituency referred to in Chef Ready Foods Ltd., supra. Such a decision may invariably conflict with provincial legislation, but the broad purpose of the CCAA must be served.

[75] The Jeffrey Mine decision is also relevant. In my view, the Jeffrey Mine case does not appear to support the argument that the Collective Agreement is to be treated as being completely unaffected by CCAA proceedings. It seems to me that it is contemplated that rights under a collective agreement may be suspended during the CCAA proceedings. At paragraphs 60 – 62, the court said under the heading Recapitulation (in translation):

> The collective agreements continue to apply like any contract of successive performance not modified by mutual agreement after the initial order or not disclaimed (assuming that to be possible in the case of collective agreements). Neither the monitor nor the court can amend them unilaterally. That said, distinctions need to be made with regard to the prospect of the resulting debts.
> Thus, unionized employees kept on or recalled are entitled to be paid immediately by the monitor for any service provided after the date of the order (s. 11.3), in accordance with the terms of the original version of the applicable collective agreement by the union concerned. However, the obligations not honoured by Jeffrey Mine Inc. with regard to services provided prior to the order constitute debts of Jeffrey Mine Inc. for which the monitor cannot be held liable (s. 11.8 CCAA) and which the employees cannot demand to be paid immediately (s. 11.3 CCAA).
> Obligations that have not been met with regard to employees who were laid off permanently on October 7, 2002, or with regard to persons who were former employees of Jeffrey Mine Inc. on that date and that stem from the collective agreements or other commitments constitute debts of the debtor to be disposed of in the restructuring plan or, failing that, upon the bankruptcy of Jeffrey Mine Inc.

[76] The issue of severance pay benefits was also referenced in Communications, Energy, Paperworks, Local 721G v. Printwest Communications Ltd. 2005 SKQB 331 (CanLII), 2005 SKQB 331 at paras. 11 and 15. The application of the Union was rejected:

> ...The claims for severance pay arise from the collective bargaining agreement. But severance pay does not fall into the category of essential services provided during the organization period in order to enable Printwest to function.
> If the Union's request should be accepted, with the result that the claims for severance pay be dealt with outside the plan of compromise – and thereby be paid in full – such a result could not possibly be viewed as fair and reasonable with respect to other unsecured creditors, who will possibly receive only a small fraction of the amounts owing to them for goods and services provided to Printwest in good faith. Thus, the application of the Union in this respect must be rejected.

Disposition

[77] At the commencement of an insolvency process, the situation is oftentimes fluid. An insolvent debtor is faced with many uncertainties. The statute is aimed at facilitating a plan of compromise or arrangement. This may require adjustments to the operations in a number of areas, one of which may be a downsizing of operations which may involve a reduction in the workforce. These adjustments may be painful but at the same time may be unavoidable. The alternative could very well be a bankruptcy which would leave former employees, both unionized and non-unionized, in the position of having unsecured claims against a bankrupt debtor. Depending on the status of secured claims, these unsecured claims may, subject to benefits arising from the recently enacted Wage Earner Protection Program Act, be worth next to nothing.

[78] In the days ahead, the Applicants, former employees, both unionized and non-unionized may very well have arguments to make on issues involving claims processes (including the ability of the Applicants to compromise claims), classification, meeting of creditors and plan sanction. Nothing in this endorsement is intended to restrict the rights of any party to raise these issues.

[79] The reorganization process under the CCAA can be both long and painful. Ultimately, however, for a plan to be sanctioned by the court, the application must meet the following three tests:

(i) there has to be strict compliance with all statutory requirements and adherence to previous orders of the court;

(ii) nothing has been done or purported to be done that is not authorized by the CCAA;

(iii) the plan is fair and reasonable. Re: Sammi Atlas Inc. 1998 CanLII 14900 (ON SC), (1998), 3 C.B.R. (4th) 171 (Ont. Gen. Div.)

[80] At this stage of the Applicants' CCAA process, I see no basis in principle to treat either unionized or non-unionized employees differently than other unsecured creditors of the Applicants. Their claims are all stayed. The Applicants are attempting to restructure for the benefit of all stakeholders and their resources should be used for such a purpose.

[81] It follows that the motion of the Union is dismissed.

[82] The Applicants also raised the issue that the Union consistently requested the right to bargain on behalf of retirees who were once part of the Union and that the concession had not been granted. Consequently, the retirees' substantive rights are not part of the bargain between the unionized employees and the employer. Counsel to the Applicants submitted that the union may collectively alter the existing rights of any employee but it cannot negatively do so with respect to retirees' rights.

[83] The Union countered that the rights gained by a member of the bargaining unit vest upon retirement, despite the fact that a collective agreement expires, and are enforceable through the grievance procedure.

[84] Both parties cited Dayco (Canada) Ltd. v. National Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers Union of Canada (CAW-Canada) 1993 CanLII 144 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 230 in support of their respective positions.

[85] In view of the fact that this motion has been dismissed for other reasons, it is not necessary for me to determine this specific issue arising out of the Dayco decision.

[86] The motion of the Former Employees was characterized, as noted above, as a "Me too motion". It was based on the premise that, if the Union's motion was successful, it would only be equitable if the Former Employees also received benefits. The Former Employees do not have the benefit of any enhanced argument based on the Collective Agreement. Rather, the argument of the Former Employees is based on the position that the Applicants cannot contract out of the ESA or any other provincial equivalent. In my view, this is not a case of contracting out of the ESA. Rather, it is a case of whether immediate payout resulting from a breach of the ESA is required to be made. In my view, the analysis is not dissimilar from the Collective Agreement scenario. There is an acknowledgment of the applicability of the ESA, but during the stay period, the Former Employees cannot enforce the payment obligation. In the result, it follows that the motion of the Former Employees is also dismissed.

[87] However, I am also mindful that the record, as I have previously noted, makes reference to a number of individuals that are severely impacted by the cessation of payments. There are no significant secured creditors of the Applicants, outside of certain charges provided for in the CCAA proceedings, and in view of the Applicants' declared assets, it is reasonable to expect that there will be a meaningful distribution to unsecured creditors, including retirees and Former Employees. The timing of such distribution may be extremely important to a number of retirees and Former Employees who have been severely impacted by the cessation of payments. In my view, it would be both helpful and equitable if a partial distribution could be made to affected employees on a timely basis.

[88] In recognition of the circumstances that face certain retirees and Former Employees, the Monitor is directed to review the current financial circumstances of the Applicants and report back as to whether it is feasible to establish a process by which certain creditors, upon demonstrating hardship, could qualify for an unspecified partial distribution in advance of a general distribution to creditors. I would ask that the Monitor consider and report back to this court on this issue within 30 days.

[89] This decision may very well have an incidental effect on the Collective Agreement and the provisions of the ESA, but it is one which arises from the stay. It does not, in my view, result from a repudiation of the Collective Agreement or a contracting out of the ESA. The stay which is being recognized is, in my view, necessary in the circumstances. To hold otherwise, would have the effect of frustrating the objectives of the CCAA to the detriment of all stakeholders.

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act matters - Sec 11.6
11.6 Notwithstanding the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act,

(a) proceedings commenced under Part III of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act may be taken up and continued under this Act only if a proposal within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act has not been filed under that Part; and

(b) an application under this Act by a bankrupt may only be made with the consent of inspectors referred to in section 116 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act but no application may be made under this Act by a bankrupt whose bankruptcy has resulted from

(i) the operation of subsection 50.4(8) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, or

(ii) the refusal or deemed refusal by the creditors or the court, or the annulment, of a proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

1997, c. 12, s. 124.

Court to appoint monitor - Sec 11.7
11.7 (1) When an order is made on the initial application in respect of a debtor company, the court shall at the same time appoint a person to monitor the business and financial affairs of the company. The person so appointed must be a trustee, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

Restrictions on who may be monitor - Sec 11.7(2)
(2) Except with the permission of the court and on any conditions that the court may impose, no trustee may be appointed as monitor in relation to a company

(a) if the trustee is or, at any time during the two preceding years, was

(i) a director, an officer or an employee of the company,

(ii) related to the company or to any director or officer of the company, or

(iii) the auditor, accountant or legal counsel, or a partner or an employee of the auditor, accountant or legal counsel, of the company; or

(b) if the trustee is

(i) the trustee under a trust indenture issued by the company or any person related to the company, or the holder of a power of attorney under an act constituting a hypothec within the meaning of the Civil Code of Quebec that is granted by the company or any person related to the company, or

(ii) related to the trustee, or the holder of a power of attorney, referred to in subparagraph (i).

Court may replace monitor - Sec 11.7(3)

Digitized by Google

(3) On application by a creditor of the company, the court may, if it considers it appropriate in the circumstances, replace the monitor by appointing another trustee, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, to monitor the business and financial affairs of the company.
1997, c. 12, s. 124;
2005, c. 47, s. 129.

No personal liability in respect of matters before appointment - Sec 11.8
11.8 (1) Despite anything in federal or provincial law, if a monitor, in that position, carries on the business of a debtor company or continues the employment of a debtor company's employees, the monitor is not by reason of that fact personally liable in respect of a liability, including one as a successor employer,

> (a) that is in respect of the employees or former employees of the company or a predecessor of the company or in respect of a pension plan for the benefit of those employees; and
> (b) that exists before the monitor is appointed or that is calculated by reference to a period before the appointment.

Status of liability - Sec 11.8(2)
(2) A liability referred to in subsection (1) shall not rank as costs of administration.

Liability of other successor employers - Sec 11.8(2.1)
(2.1) Subsection (1) does not affect the liability of a successor employer other than the monitor.

Liability in respect of environmental matters - Sec 11.8(3)
(3) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law, a monitor is not personally liable in that position for any environmental condition that arose or environmental damage that occurred

> (a) before the monitor's appointment; or
> (b) after the monitor's appointment unless it is established that the condition arose or the damage occurred as a result of the monitor's gross negligence or wilful misconduct.

Reports, etc., still required - Sec 11.8(4)
(4) Nothing in subsection (3) exempts a monitor from any duty to report or make disclosure imposed by a law referred to in that subsection.

Non-liability re certain orders - Sec 11.8(5)
(5) Notwithstanding anything in any federal or provincial law but subject to subsection (3), where an order is made which has the effect of requiring a monitor to remedy any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting property involved in a proceeding under this Act, the monitor is not personally liable for failure to comply with the order, and is not personally liable for any costs that are or would be incurred by any person in carrying out the terms of the order,

> (a) if, within such time as is specified in the order, within ten days after the order is made if no time is so specified, within ten days after the appointment of the monitor, if the order is in effect when the monitor is appointed or during the period of the stay referred to in paragraph (b), the monitor

(ii) on notice to the person who issued the order, abandons, disposes of or otherwise releases any interest in any real property affected by the condition or damage;

(b) during the period of a stay of the order granted, on application made within the time specified in the order referred to in paragraph (a) or within ten days after the order is made or within ten days after the appointment of the monitor, if the order is in effect when the monitor is appointed, by

(i) the court or body having jurisdiction under the law pursuant to which the order was made to enable the monitor to contest the order, or

(ii) the court having jurisdiction under this Act for the purposes of assessing the economic viability of complying with the order; or

(c) if the monitor had, before the order was made, abandoned or renounced any interest in any real property affected by the condition or damage.

Stay may be granted - Sec 11.8(6)

(6) The court may grant a stay of the order referred to in subsection (5) on such notice and for such period as the court deems necessary for the purpose of enabling the monitor to assess the economic viability of complying with the order.

Costs for remedying not costs of administration - Sec 11.8(7)

(7) Where the monitor has abandoned or renounced any interest in real property affected by the environmental condition or environmental damage, claims for costs of remedying the condition or damage shall not rank as costs of administration.

Priority of claims - Sec 11.8(8)

(8) Any claim by Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province against a debtor company in respect of which proceedings have been commenced under this Act for costs of remedying any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting real property of the company is secured by a charge on the real property and on any other real property of the company that is contiguous thereto and that is related to the activity that caused the environmental condition or environmental damage, and the charge

(a) is enforceable in accordance with the law of the jurisdiction in which the real property is located, in the same way as a mortgage, hypothec or other security on real property; and

(b) ranks above any other claim, right or charge against the property, notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or anything in any other federal or provincial law.

Claim for clean-up costs - Sec 11.8(9)

(9) A claim against a debtor company for costs of remedying any environmental condition or environmental damage affecting real property of the company shall be a claim under this Act, whether the condition arose or the damage occurred before or after the date on which proceedings under this Act were commenced.

1997, c. 12, s. 124;

2007, c. 36, s. 67.

Fixing deadlines - Sec 12

12. The court may fix deadlines for the purposes of voting and for the purposes of distributions under a compromise or arrangement.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION OF THE
HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE WITTMANN

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an application for leave to appeal the decision of Paperny, J. made on May 12, 2000, pursuant to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended (CCAA). The applicant, Resurgence Asset Management LLC (Resurgence), is an unsecured creditor by virtue of its holding 58.2 per cent of U.S. $100,000,000.00 unsecured notes issued by Canadian Airlines Corporation (CAC)

[2] CAC and Canadian Airlines International Ltd. (CAIL) (collectively Canadian) commenced proceedings under the CCAA on March 24, 2000.

[3] A proposed Plan of Compromise and Arrangement (the Plan) has been filed in this matter regarding CAC and CAIL, pursuant to the CCAA.

[4] The decision of Paperny, J. May 12, 2000 (the Decision) ordered, among other things, that the classification of creditors not be fragmented to exclude Air Canada as a separate class from Resurgence in terms of the unsecured creditors; that Air Canada should be entitled to vote on the Plan pursuant to s. 6 of the CCAA at the creditors' meeting to be held May 26, 2000; that there be no separation of unsecured creditors of CAC from unsecured creditors of CAIL for voting purposes; and that votes in respect of claims assigned to Air Canada, be recorded and tabulated separately, for the purpose of consideration in the application for court approval of the Plan (the Fairness Hearing).

LEAVE TO APPEAL UNDER THE CCAA

[5] The section of the CCAA governing appeals to this Court is as follows:

> 13. Except in the Yukon Territory, any person dissatisfied with an order or a decision made under this Act may appeal therefrom on obtaining leave of the judge appealed from or of the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies and on such terms as to security and in other respects as the judge or court directs.

[6] The criterion to be applied in an application for leave to appeal pursuant to the CCAA is not in dispute. The general criterion is embodied in the concept that there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties: Re Multitech Warehouse District reflex, (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 63 (C.A.); Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd., [1999] A.J. No. 185 at para. 22 (C.A.); Re Blue Range Resource Corporation, [1999] A.J. No. 975; Re Blue Range Resource Corporation, [2000] A.J. No. 4;Re Blue Range Resource Corporation, [2000] A.J. No. 31.

[7] Subsumed in the general criterion are four applicable elements which originated in Power Consolidated (China) Pulp Inc. v. British Columbia Resources Investment Corp. (1988), 19 C.P.C. (3d) at 396 (B.C.C.A.), and were adopted in Med Finance Company S.A. v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 279 (B.C.C.A.). McLachlin, J.A. (as she then was) set forth the elements in Power Consolidated as follows at p.397:

> (1) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;
> (2) whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself;

Digitized by Google

(3) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; and

(4) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

These elements have been considered and applied by this Court, and were not in dispute before me as proper elements of the applicable criterion.

FACTS

[8] On or about October 19, 1999, Air Canada announced its intention to make a bid for CAC and to proceed to complete a merger subject to a restructuring of Canadian's debt. On or about November 5, 1999, following a ruling by the Quebec Superior Court, a competing offer by Airline Industry Revitalization Co. Inc. was withdrawn and Air Canada indicated that it would proceed with its offer for CAC.

[9] On or about November 11, 1999, Air Canada caused the incorporation of 853350 Alberta Ltd. (853350), for the sole purpose of acquiring the majority of the shares of CAC. At the time of incorporation, Air Canada held 10 per cent of the shares of 853350. Paul Farrar, among others, holds the remaining 90 per cent of the shares of 853350.

[10] On or about November 11, 1999, Air Canada, through 853350, offered to purchase the outstanding shares of CAC at a price of $2.00 per share for a total of $92,000,000.00 for all of the issued and outstanding voting and non-voting shares of CAC.

[11] On or about January 4, 2000, Air Canada and 853350 acquired 82 per cent of CAC's outstanding common shares for approximately $75,000,000.00 plus the preferred shares of CAIL for a purchase price of $59,000,000.00. Air Canada then replaced the Board of Directors of CAC with its own nominees.

[12] Substantially all of the aircraft making up the fleet of Canadian are held by Air Canada through lease arrangements with various lessors or other aircraft financial agencies. These arrangements were the result of negotiations with lessors, jointly conducted by Air Canada and Canadian.

[13] In general, these arrangements include the following:

(i) the leases have been renegotiated to reflect contemporary fair market value (or below) based on two independent desk top valuations; and

(ii) the present value of the difference between the financial terms under the previous lease arrangements and the renegotiated fair market value terms was characterized as "unsecured deficiency," reflected in a Promissory Note payable to the lessor from Canadian and assigned by the lessor to Air Canada.

[14] In the result, Air Canada has acquired or is in the process of acquiring all but eight of the deficiency claims of aircraft lessors or financiers listed in Schedule "B" to the Plan in the total amount of $253,506.944.00. Air Canada intends to vote those claims as an unsecured creditor under the Plan.

[15] The executory contracts claims listed in Schedule "B" to the Plan total $110,677,000.00, of which $108,907,000.00 is the claim of Loyalty Management Group Canada Inc. (Loyalty), an entity with a long term contract with Canadian to purchase air miles. The claim is subject to an agreement of settlement between Loyalty, Canadian and Air Canada. Air Canada was assigned the Loyalty unsecured claim.

[16] In the Plan, all unsecured creditors of both CAC and CAI are grouped in the same class for voting purposes.

[17] Pursuant to the Plan, unsecured creditors will receive a payment of $0.12 on the dollar for each $1.00 of their claim unless the total amount of unsecured claims exceeds $800 million, in which case, they will receive less. Air Canada will fund this Pro Rata Cash Amount. As a result of the assignments of the deficiency amounts in favour of Air Canada, if the Plan is approved, Air Canada will notionally be paying a substantial proportion of the Pro Rata Cash Amount to itself.

[18] The Plan further contemplates Air Canada becoming the 100 per cent owner of Canadian through 853350.

[19] On April 7, 2000, an Order was granted by Paperny, J., directing that the Plan be filed by the Petitioners; establishing a claims dispute process; authorizing the calling of meetings for affected creditors to vote on the Plan to be held on May 26, 2000; authorizing the Petitioners to make application for an Order sanctioning the Plan on June 5, 2000; and providing other directions.

[20] The April 7, 2000 Order established three classes of creditors: (a) the holders of Canadian Airlines Corporation 10 per cent Senior Secured Notes due 2005 (the Secured Noteholders); (b) the secured creditors of the Petitioners affected by the Plan (the Affected Secured Creditors); and (c) the unsecured creditors affected by the Plan (the Affected Unsecured Creditors).

[21] On April 25, 2000, the Petitioners filed and served the Plan, in accordance with the Order of April 7, 2000. By Notice of Motion dated April 27, 2000, Resurgence brought an application, among other things, seeking "directions as to the classification and voting rights of the creditors . . . (and) the quantum of the 'deficiency claims' assigned to Air Canada." Resurgence sought to have Air Canada excluded from voting as an unsecured creditor unless segregated into a separate class. Resurgence also sought to have the holders of the unsecured notes vote as a separate class.

Digitized by Google

[22] The result of the April 27, 2000 motion by Resurgence is the Decision.

THE DECISION

[23] In the Decision, the supervising chambers judge referred to her order of April 14, 2000, wherein she approved transactions involving the re-negotiation of the aircraft leases. She referred to "about $200,000,000.00 worth of concessions for CAIL" as "concessions or deficiency claims" which were quantified and reflected in promissory notes which were assigned to Air Canada in exchange for its guarantee of the aircraft leases. The monitor approved of the method of quantifying the claims and Paperny, J. approved the transactions, reserving the issue of classification and voting to her May 12 Decision.

[24] The Plan provides for one class of unsecured creditor. The unsecured class is composed of a number of types of unsecured claims including executory contracts (e.g. Air Canada from Loyalty) unsecured notes (e.g. Resurgence), aircraft leases (e.g. Air Canada from lessors), litigation claims, real estate leases and the deficiencies, if any, of the senior secured noteholders.

[25] In seeking to have Air Canada vote the promissory notes in a separate class Resurgence argued several factors before Paperny, J., as set out at pp. 4-5 of the Decision as follows:

> 1. The Air Canada appointed board caused Canadian to enter into these CCAA proceedings under which Air Canada stands to gain substantial benefits in its own operations and in the merged operations and ownership contemplated after the compromise of debts under the plan.
> 2. Air Canada is providing the fund of money to be distributed to the Affected Unsecured Creditors and will, therefore, end up paying itself a portion of that money if it is included in the Affected Unsecured Creditors' class and permitted to vote.
> 3. Air Canada gave no real consideration in acquiring the deficiency claims and manufactured them only to secure a 'yes' vote.

[26] She then recited the argument made by Air Canada and Canadian to the effect that the legal rights associated with Air Canada's unsecured claims are the same as those associated with the other affected unsecured claimants, and that the matters raised by Resurgence relating to classification are really matters of fairness more appropriately dealt with in a Fairness Hearing scheduled to be held June 5, 2000.

[27] After observing that the CCAA offers no guidance with respect to the classification of claims, beyond identifying secured and unsecured categories and the possibility of classes within each category, and that the process has developed in case law, Paperny, J. embarked on a detailed analysis and consideration of the case law in this area including Norcen Energy Resources Ltd. v. Oakwood Petroleums Ltd. (1988), 72 C.B.R. (N.S.) 20 (Alta. Q.B.); Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd, [1892] 2 Q.B. 573 (C.A.); Re Fairview Industries Ltd. reflex, (1991), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 71 (N.S.S.C.T.D.); Re Northland Properties (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 195; Savage v. Amoco Acquisition Corp. (1988), 68 C.B.R. 154 (Alta. C.A.); Re Woodward's Ltd. 1993 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1993), 84 B.C.L.R. (2d) 206 (B.C.S.C.); Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corp. v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 621 at 626 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. (1990), 79 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (N.S.S.C.T.D.); Re Wellington Bldg. Corp., [1934] O.R. 653, 16 C.B.R. 48 (Ont. S.C.). Paperny, J. also referred to an oft-cited article "Reorganization under the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act" by S. E. Edwards (1947), 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587. She concluded her legal analysis at pp.12-13 by setting forth the principles she found to be applicable in assessing commonality of interest as an appropriate test for the classification of creditors:

> 1. Commonality of interest should be viewed on the basis of the non-fragmentation test, not on an identity of interest test;
> 2. The interests to be considered are the legal interests the creditor holds qua creditor in relationship to the debtor company, prior to and under the plan as well as on liquidation;
> 3. The commonality of these interests are to be viewed purposively, bearing in mind the object of the CCAA, namely to facilitate reorganizations if at all possible;
> 4. In placing a broad and purposive interpretation on the CCAA, the court should be careful to resist classification approaches which would potentially jeopardize potentially viable plans.
> 5. Absent bad faith, the motivations of the creditors to approve or disapprove are irrelevant.
> 6. The requirement of creditors being able to consult together means being able to assess their legal entitlement as creditors before or after the plan in a similar manner.

THE STANDARD OF REVIEW AND LEAVE APPLICATIONS

[28] The elements of the general criterion cannot be properly considered in a leave application without regard to the standard of review that this Court applies to appeals under the CCAA. If leave to appeal were to be granted, the applicable standard of review is succinctly set forth by Fruman, J.A. in UTI Energy Corp. v. Fracmaster Ltd. 1999 ABCA 178 (CanLII), (2000), 244 A.R. 93 where she stated for the Court at p.95:

Digitized by Google

> . . . . this is a court of review. It is not our task to reconsider the merits of the various offers and decide which proposal might be best. The decisions made by the Chambers judge involve a good measure of discretion, and are owed considerable deference. Whether or not we agree, we will only interfere if we conclude that she acted unreasonably, erred in principle or made a manifest error.

In another recent CCAA case from this Court, Re Smoky River Coal Ltd. (1999) 237 A.R. 326, Hunt, J.A., speaking for the unanimous Court, extensively reviewed the history and purpose of the CCAA, and observed at p.341:

> The fact that an appeal lies only with leave of an appellate court (s. 13 CCAA) suggests that Parliament, mindful that CCAA cases often require quick decision-making, intended that most decisions be made by the supervising judge. This supports the view that those decisions should be interfered with only in clear cases.

[29] The standard of review of this Court, in reviewing the CCAA decision of the supervising judge, is therefore one of correctness if there is an error of law. Otherwise, for an appellate court to interfere with the decision of the supervising judge, there must be a palpable and overriding error in the exercise of discretion or in findings of fact.

STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[30] The CCAA includes provisions defining secured creditor, unsecured creditor, refers to classes of them, and provides for court approval of a plan of compromise or arrangement in the following sections:

> 2. INTERPRETATION
> . . .
> "secured creditor" means a holder of a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against, or any assignment, cession or transfer of, all or any property of a debtor company as security for indebtedness of the debtor company, or a holder of any bond of a debtor company secured by a mortgage, hypothec, pledge, charge, lien or privilege on or against, or any assignment, cession or transfer of, or a trust in respect of, all or any property of the debtor company, whether the holder or beneficiary is resident or domiciled within or outside Canada, and a trustee under any trust deed or other instrument securing any of those bonds shall be deemed to be a secured creditor for all purposes of this Act except for the purpose of voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of any of those bonds;
> "Unsecured creditor" means any creditor of a company who is not a secured creditor, whether resident or domiciled within or outside Canada, and a trustee for the holders of any unsecured bonds issue under a trust deed or other instrument running in favour of the trustee shall be deemed to be an unsecured creditor for all purposes of this Act except for the purpose of voting at a creditors' meeting in respect of any of those bonds.
> 4. Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its unsecured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company, of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such a manner as the court directs.
> 5. Where a compromise or an arrangement is proposed between a debtor company and its secured creditors or any class of them, the court may, on the application in a summary way of the company or of any such creditor or of the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator of the company, order a meeting of the creditors or class of creditors, and, if the court so determines, of the shareholders of the company, to be summoned in such manner as the courts directs.
> 6. Where a majority in number representing two-thirds in value of the creditors, or class of creditors, as the case may be, present and voting either in person or by proxy at the meeting or meetings thereof respectively held pursuant to sections 4 and 5, or either of those sections, agree to any compromise or arrangement either as proposed or as altered or modified at the meeting or meetings, the compromise or arrangement may be sanctioned by the court, and if so sanctioned is binding
> > (a) on all the creditors or the class of creditors, as the case may be, and on any trustee for any such class of creditors, whether secured or unsecured, as the case may be, and on the company; and

> (b) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a receiving order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or is in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, on the trustee in bankruptcy or liquidator and contributories of the company.

CLASSES OF CREDITORS

[31] It is apparent from a review of the foregoing sections that division into classes of creditors within the unsecured and secured categories may, in any given case, materially affect the outcome of the vote referenced in section 6. Compliance with section 6 triggers the ability of the court to approve or sanction the Plan and to bind the parties referenced in s. 6(a) and 6(b) of the CCAA. In argument before me, it was conceded by the applicant that Resurgence would not have the ability to ensure approval of the Plan by casting its vote if Air Canada were to be excised from the unsecured creditor category into a separate class. Conversely, counsel for Resurgence candidly admitted that Resurgence would effectively have a veto of the Plan if Air Canada were segregated into a separate class of unsecured creditor.

APPLICATION OF THE CRITERIA FOR LEAVE TO APPEAL

[32] The four elements of the general criterion are set out in paragraph [7]. The first and second elements are satisfied in this case. The points raised on appeal are of significance to the action. If Resurgence succeeds, it obtains a veto. If it does not succeed, and it votes as a member of the unsecured creditors class with Air Canada, Air Canada can control the vote of the unsecured creditors.

[33] In terms of the points on appeal being of significance to the practice, it may be that an appellate court's views in this province on the classification of unsecured creditors issue is desirable, there being no appellate authority from this Court on this issue. Although I have doubt as to the significance of this element of the general criterion in the context of the facts of this case, I am prepared for the purposes of this application to treat this element as having being satisfied.

[34] The third element is whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous. In my view, the proper interpretation of this element is not a mutually exclusive application of an appeal being either meritorious or frivolous. Rather, the appeal must be prima facie meritorious; if it is not prima facie meritorious, this element is not satisfied.

[35] I find that the appeal on the points raised from the Decision is not prima facie meritorious. In the plain ordinary meaning of the words of this element, on first impression, there must appear to be an error in principle of law or a palpable and overriding error of fact. Exercise of discretion by a supervising judge, so long as it is exercised judicially, is not a matter for interference by an appellate court, even if the appellate court were inclined to decide the matter another way. It is precisely this kind of a factor which breathes life into the modifier "prima facie" meritorious.

[36] I have carefully reviewed all of the cases referred to by the supervising chambers judge and the principles she derived from them. In my view, she made no error in law.

[37] In the exercise of her discretion, she decided neither to allow the applicant's motion to excise Air Canada from the unsecured creditors class nor to prohibit Air Canada from voting. She also declined, on the facts established before her, to separate creditors of CAC from creditors of CAIL for voting purposes. She did, however, order that Air Canada's vote be recorded and tabulated and indicated that this will be considered at the Fairness Hearing.

[38] It was strenuously argued before me by the applicant, that deferring classification and voting issues to the Fairness Hearing was an error of law or principle in and of itself.

[39] The argument was put in terms that if, on a proper classification of unsecured creditors, Air Canada was removed from the unsecured class, and Resurgence vetoed the Plan, the matter of a Fairness Hearing would never arise. While that may be true, it does not follow that there is any error in law in what the supervising judge did. She concluded that the separate tabulation of the votes will allow the voice of the unsecured creditors to be heard, while, at the same time, permit, rather than rule out the possibility, that the Plan might proceed. This approach is consistent with the purpose of the CCAA as articulated in many of the authorities in this country.

[40] The supervising chambers judge also refused to exclude Air Canada from voting on the basis that the legal rights attached to the notes held by Air Canada were valid. Resurgence argued that because Air Canada had other interests in the outcome of the Plan, it should be excluded from voting as an unsegregated secured creditor. Paperny, J. held that this was an issue of fairness, as was the fact that Air Canada was really voting on its own reorganization. She did not err in principle. She expressly acknowledged the authorities that, on different facts, either allowed different classes or excluded a vote. See, for example, Re Woodward's Ltd. 1993 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1993), 84 B.C.L.R. (2d) 206 (B.C.S.C.); Re Northland Properties Ltd. (1988), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 166 (B.C.S.C.); Re NsC Diesel Power Inc. (1990), 79 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (N.S.S.C.T.D.).

[41] The fourth element of the general criterion is whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action. In other words, will the delay involved in prosecuting, hearing and deciding the appeal be of such length so as to unduly impede the ultimate resolution of the matter by a vote or court sanction? The approach of the supervising judge to the issues raised by the applicant is that its concerns will be seriously addressed at the Fairness Hearing scheduled for June 5, 2000, pursuant to s.6 of the CCAA, provided the creditors vote to adopt the Plan.

[42] This element has at its root the purpose of the CCAA; the role of the supervising judge; the need for a timely and orderly resolution of the matter; and the effect on the interests of all parties pending a decision on appeal. The comments of McFarlane, J.A. in Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992) 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265 (B.C.C.A.) are particularly apt where he stated as follows at p.272:

> Despite what I have said, there may be an arguable case for the petitioners to present to a panel of this Court on discreet questions of law. But I am of the view that this Court should exercise its powers sparingly when it is asked to intervene with respect to questions which arise under the C.C.A.A. The process of management which the Act has assigned to the trial Court is an ongoing one. In this case a number of orders have been made. Some, including the one under appeal, have not been settled or entered. Other applications are pending. The process contemplated by the Act is continuing.
> A colleague has suggested that a judge exercising a supervisory function under the C.C.A.A. is more like a judge hearing a trial, who makes orders in the course of that trial, than a chambers judge who makes interlocutory or proceedings for which he has no further responsibility.
> Also, we know that in a case where a judgment has not been entered, it may be open to a judge to reconsider his or her judgment, and alter its terms. In supervising a proceeding under the C.C.A.A. orders are made, and orders are varied as changing circumstances require. Orders depend upon a careful and delicate balancing of a variety of interests and of problems. In that context appellate proceedings may well upset the balance, and delay or frustrate the process under the C.C.A.A. I do not say that leave will never be granted in a C.C.A.A. proceeding. But the effect upon all parties concerned will be an important consideration in deciding whether leave ought to be granted.

[43] In that case, it appears that McFarlane, J.A. was satisfied that the first three elements of the criteria had been met, i.e. that there "may be an arguable case for the petitioners to present to a panel of this court on discrete [sic] questions of law".

[44] It was argued before me that an appeal would give rise to an uncertainly of process and a lack of confidence in it; that the creditors, or some of them, may be inclined to withdraw support for the Plan that would otherwise be forthcoming, but for the delay. None of the parties tendered affidavit evidence on this issue.

[45] Nowhere in any of the authorities has the issue of onus in meeting the elements the general criterion been prominent. I am of the view that the onus is on the applicant. That onus would include the applicant producing at least some evidence on the fourth element to shift the onus to the respondents, even though it involves proving a negative, i.e. that there will not be any material adverse impact as the result of the delay occasioned by an appeal. That evidence is lacking in this case. It is lacking on both sides but the respondents do not have an initial onus in this regard. Therefore, I find that the fourth element has not been established by the applicant.

[46] The last step in a proper analysis in the context of a leave application is to ascribe appropriate weight to each of the elements of the general criterion and decide over all whether the test has been met. In most cases, the last two elements will be more important, and ought to be ascribed more weight than the first two elements. The last two elements here have not been met while the first two arguably have. In the result, I am satisfied that the applicant has not met the threshold for leave to appeal on the basis of the authorities, and I am therefore denying the application.

CONCLUSION

[47] The application for leave to appeal the Decision is dismissed on the basis that there is no prima facie meritorious case and that the granting of leave would likely unduly hinder the progress of the action.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION OF THE
HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE WITTMANN

Introduction

[1] On March 2nd, 1999, Blue Range Resources Corporation (Blue Range) obtained an order from the Court staying proceedings against it, invoking the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act R.S.C. 1985 c.C-36 as amended (CCAA). With one exception made known on this application to the Court, the supervising judge throughout has been LoVecchio, J. and he has made numerous orders culminating in an order for interim distribution pronounced December 17, 1999 (the Decision). Big Bear Exploration Ltd. (Big Bear) applies for leave to appeal the Decision, and a stay of the Decision.

Background Facts

[2] On May 5, 1999, Big Bear filed a Notice of Claim in the amount of $151,317,298.00. Big Bear alleged that this is an unsecured claim (Big Bear claim).

[3] The Big Bear claim was disputed by the Monitor, Price Waterhouse Coopers Inc. and Big Bear was directed by the Monitor in a Notice of Dispute to file and serve a Notice of Motion for the determination of the Big Bear claim.

[4] Also on May 5, 1999, Big Bear filed a Notice of Motion and an affidavit in support for an order lifting the stay of proceedings under the March 2, 1999 order, and allowing Big Bear to file a statement of claim, a draft of which was attached to the affidavit, which application was dismissed by LoVecchio, J. on May 11, 1999. The statement of claim as drafted claimed, amongst other things, damages against Blue Range in the sum of $151,317,298.00 based on alleged false and misleading statements made by Blue Range which induced Big Bear to purchase the shares of Blue Range.

[5] On May 31, 1999, pursuant to the direction given in the Notice of Dispute by the Monitor, Big Bear filed a Notice of Motion for a declaration that the unsecured claim of Big Bear was a meritorious claim against Blue Range, and an order directing the expeditious trial and determination of the issues raised by Big Bear.

[6] At the direction of Chief Justice Moore, Romaine, J. was directed to hear and determine issues arising out of the disputed Big Bear claim. Romaine, J. made an order October 28, 1999 stating as follows:

> 1. At the preliminary applications to be heard on November 8 and 9, 1999 (the "Preliminary Applications"), one of the issues to be determined shall be:
> With respect to the alleged loss or damage of $147,687,298 allegedly suffered by Big Bear from the exchange of Big Bear and Blue Range Resource Corporation ("Blue Range") shares (the "Alleged Share Exchange Loss"), without considering the principle of equitable subordination, is Big Bear:
> (a) an unsecured creditor of Blue Range which ranks equally with the unsecured creditors of Blue Range, or
> (b) is it a shareholder of Blue Range which ranks after the unsecured creditors of Blue Range?
> 2. Another issue to be determined at the Preliminary Applications shall be:
> Assuming (without admitting) misrepresentations by Blue Range and reliance on it by Big Bear, is the Alleged Share Exchange Loss a loss or damage incurred by Big Bear and, accordingly, is Big Bear a proper party to advance the claim for such loss?
> 3. The following is the only other issue which shall be determined at the Preliminary Applications:
> Whether Big Bear is entitled to make or advance by way of argument in these proceedings the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft Statement of Claim set out at Exhibit "F" to the Affidavit of A. Jeffrey Tonken dated June 25, 1999?

[7] The preliminary applications were heard by Romaine, J. November 8 and 9, 1999 and judgment was and remains reserved.

[8] The sixth interim report of the Monitor dated December 14, 1999 had attached to it as Appendix D a schedule outlining a potential estimated second interim distribution to the Class B claimants as of December 9, 1999. Paragraph 26

of that report stated that the largest unresolved claim was Big Bear's unsecured Class B claim of approximately $151 Million and that the 25 cent estimated dividend assumed a value of $30 Million for this claim and the 50 cent estimated dividend assumed the claim would be disallowed or be subordinated in full to the claims of Class B claimants. It also stated that the Monitor sought the advice and direction of the Court regarding the amount which would be appropriate for an interim distribution.

[9] That issue came before LoVecchio, J. on December 17, 1999 together with a motion by Big Bear requesting that the Monitor withhold from distribution a reserve on account of the Big Bear unsecured claim until such time as a final determination of that claim had been made by the Court. Big Bear argued that s. 12(2) of the CCAA mandated that the claim of any unsecured creditor "shall be determined", and that the Big Bear claim had not yet been determined.

[10] The Decision of LoVecchio, J. pronounced December 17, 1999 ordered an interim distribution with a reserve for the Big Bear claim of $3,070,000.00.

[11] The motion for leave to appeal the Decision and for a stay of the Decision was filed December 20th, 1999 returnable December 21st, 1999, and requested that this Court abridge the time for notice of the motion. The abridgement of time was not objected to by any of the respondents and time was ordered abridged. Written briefs were filed by the Creditors' Committee and by Big Bear.

[12] No formal order of LoVecchio, J. dated December 17, 1999 was before this Court on the hearing of the application nor were the reasons for judgment made available on December 21st. The matter was adjourned until December 22nd, 1999 pending receipt of a transcript of the proceedings in chambers December 17th, 1999 which was provided to the Court on the afternoon of December 21st.

[13] This matter was argued December 22nd, 1999, and I ordered an interim stay of the Decision pending this decision.

Leave under the CCAA

[14] No one before me disputed the criteria for leave to appeal a decision of the supervising judge pursuant to s. 13 of the CCAA. The criteria that has been applied by this Court is found in Re Multitech Warehouse Direct reflex, (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 64 (C.A.); Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd. [1999] A.J. No. 185 at para. 22 (C.A.); Re Blue Range Resource Corp. [1999] A.J. No. 975 at para. 2, 3, 4 (C.A.).

[15] Madam Justice Fruman in deciding leave applications arising out of other orders granted by LoVecchio, J. in Re Blue Range Resources Corp, [supra] referred to Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992) 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265 at 272 (B.C.C.A.), as well as Med Finance Co. S.A. v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 279 at 282 (B.C.C.A.). The latter case sets forth factors to be considered in granting leave to appeal an issue under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, as amended. The factors are:

> (a) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;
> (b) whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself;
> (c) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; and
> (d) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

[16] The general test articulated in Multitech of "serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties" encompasses the four criteria set forth above.

The Argument

(a) Big Bear

[17] The essence of Big Bear's argument is that s. 12 of the CCAA mandates that its claim shall be determined by the Court, that it took steps to have it determined in May of 1999, and through no fault of its own, judgment is now reserved on issues pertaining to the Big Bear claim. Further, Big Bear submits that LoVecchio, J. has made a pre-determination of the value of the claim prior to any hearing or summary determination of it, and that this is a point of significance to the practice. Big Bear further argues that the point raised is of significance to the action of itself as LoVecchio, J. set aside an amount of $3,070,000.00 as a reserve for the Big Bear claim, and that Big Bear will forever be unable to share with other creditors on a pro-rated basis should it be determined by a court to have a claim of more than this sum. Big Bear further argues that the appeal will not hinder the progress of the action because a plan of arrangement is already in place.

[18] With respect to a stay of the Decision, Big Bear relies on Re Associated Investors of Canada Ltd.; Deloitte Haskins and Sells v. Coopers & Lybrand Inc. reflex, (1996) 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 64 (C.A.) for a three-part test that:

> (1) the Court must be satisfied on a preliminary assessment there is a serious issue to be tried;
> (2) that if the stay is not granted the applicant would suffer irreparable harm not capable of recompense in damages; and
> (3) that the balance of convenience favours a stay.

Big Bear submits that, at the very least, a stay should be granted pending the decision of Romaine, J.

Digitized by Google

(b) The Creditors' Committee

[19] The Creditors' Committee, supported by Enron Canada Corp. (the largest single creditor) argued strenuously that the Decision was based on the cross-examination on affidavit of James W. Surbey, the Senior Vice President Corporate Development of Big Bear, which occurred on the evening of Thursday December 16th, 1999 and on the Rule 266 examination of Kyle Kitigawa. Transcripts and exhibits relating to both examinations were before LoVecchio, J. for the purpose of reserving for the Big Bear claim on December 17, 1999. The gist of this argument is that the reserve in the amount of $3,070,000.00 for the Big Bear claim was correct, if not generous in light of the evidence that Big Bear entered into an Arrangement Agreement with Avid Oil and Gas Limited (Avid) dated November 26, 1999 and issued a press release to its shareholders that the Agreement provided that Avid would acquire all of the issued and outstanding common shares of Big Bear based on one common share of Avid for every 15 common shares of Big Bear, subject to some adjustments. Some of the evidence on the cross-examination and examination referred to above was in essence that Big Bear placed no value on its claim against Blue Range with respect to the valuation of the Big Bear assets which, in turn, impacted on the value of the Big Bear shares for the purpose of the Arrangement Agreement valuation. It is clear that LoVecchio, J. accepted that evidence for the purpose of the valuation and reserve for the Big Bear claim.

Issues

(1) Should leave to appeal the Decision be granted?

(2) Should a stay of the Decision be granted?

Leave to Appeal

[20] Should leave to appeal the Decision be granted? Returning to the criteria outlined above, there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties. Subsumed in this general criteria are the four elements in Med Finance Company S.A. v. Bank of Montreal [supra].

[21] Big Bear's counsel indicated in argument that Big Bear was simply not ready to have a hearing on the valuation of the Big Bear claim on December 17, 1999 and that there was no intention to proceed on that basis. This position is difficult to reconcile with the cross-examination and examination referred to above, the thrust of which was to demonstrate that Big Bear placed little or no value on its claim against Blue Range and, secondly, with the motion of Big Bear requesting a reserve amount be withheld from distribution on account of the Big Bear unsecured claim and, alternatively, providing directions for the valuation of the Big Bear unsecured claims. Presumably, in order for LoVecchio, J. to provide for a reserve amount, he at least had to consider the value of the claim. It is apparent from the transcript of the proceedings on December 17, 1999 that LoVecchio, J. accepted the proposition that Big Bear's officers and directors put little, if any, value on the Big Bear claim. Illustrative is the following excerpt (at pp.153-154):

> And I'm going to keep the designation of 6,930,000 in respect of the others, which means the differential, 3,070,000 is for the Big Bear, and I want to state on the record, I see that as several million dollars more than the directors and officers of Big Bear have valued it at for the purposes of the Anvil [sic] transaction under which they have a fiduciary responsibility.
> MS. HORNER: Okay, sir, again, just so that I follow you, in the conservative column across from the Big Bear claim, so at the second column on Appendix D, instead of 30 million, I'm to insert 3,070,000.
> As I say, I want it on the record that I have reviewed the financial information associated with the public statements of the company - - that is, Big Bear - - in relation to the share exchange ratio, the valuation of the company, and in my view, this values that claim at several million dollars higher than the directors and officers appear to have valued it for the purposes of the share exchange ratio, and the directors and officers, of course, are under a fiduciary responsibility to their shareholders to ensure a proper valuation of the company.

[22] In the context of setting a reserve for the Big Bear claim, the learned chambers judge was entitled to accept the evidence before him. The evidence before him which he chose to accept was that the Big Bear officers and directors valued the Big Bear claim against Blue Range for the purposes of the Avid share exchange at a negligible value. As was pointed out in argument before LoVecchio, J., Big Bear did not lead any convincing evidence to the contrary. Leave to appeal the decision of the LoVecchio, J., fixing the Big Bear reserve at $3,070,000.00, is therefore denied.

Stay of the Decision

[23] Should a stay of the Decision be granted? Although at first blush it might seem that the denial of leave to appeal renders the stay issue moot, I am of the contrary view. Big Bear argued before me that, even if leave to appeal was not granted, there should be stay of the Decision, until the decision of Romaine, J. is made.

Digitized by Google

[24] The learned chambers judge was asked to stay the Decision. He did not expressly decide the issue but rather stated: ". . . you should go and talk to the Court of Appeal about a stay." [Transcript of the December 17, 1999 proceedings at p.155].

[25] This case is unusual. Rule 508 of the Alberta Rules of Court states as follows:

> 508. An appeal does not operate as a stay of enforcement or of proceedings under the decision appealed from except so far as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench or the Court of Appeal may order and no intermediate act or proceeding is invalidated except so far as the court appealed from may direct.

[26] If leave to appeal is denied, one might question the authority of this Court to grant a stay of the learned chambers judge's decision pending the decision of Romaine, J.

[27] If authority need be cited for the proposition that this Court has such a power, I refer to the provisions of the Judicature Act, R.S.A. 1980 c. J-1 as amended, s.3, 4 and 5, and the inherent jurisdiction of this Court.

[28] This Court has the power to regulate process and proceedings. It may stay an action unless and until some condition or term which it has imposed has been complied with.

[29] The criteria for granting a stay in these circumstances are set forth in the judgment of Russell, J.A. in Deloitte Haskins and Sells v. Coopers & Lybrand Inc. reflex, (1996) 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 64 (C.A.). She said at p.67:

> In considering a stay application the court must be satisfied on a preliminary assessment that there is a serious issue to be tried, that if the stay is not granted the applicant would suffer harm irreparable in damages, and that the balance of convenience favours the stay.

[30] Applying these tests, it must be conceded that there is a serious issue to be tried in terms of those issues that are extant before Romaine, J. Those issues were not re-argued before me and, indeed, ought not to have been. In terms of regulation of the process of the Court, the Court of Queen's Bench has chosen to direct issues as to the entitlement and quantification of the Big Bear claim for a preliminary determination by Romaine, J. Presumably, her decision involves a serious issue. For example, it may be that she will rule that there is no entitlement in Big Bear which would permit it to rank as an unsecured creditor of Blue Range or that it is not a proper party to advance a claim against Blue Range. If Romaine, J.'s decision on the first two issues is in favour of Big Bear, the third issue becomes all the more prominent: that is, whether Big Bear is entitled to make or advance by way of argument the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft statement of claim it put forward including a claim for damages against Blue Range in the sum of $151,317,298.00.

[31] It is clear that LoVecchio, J. was aware of the issues before Romaine, J. and was aware she had reserved her decision involving those issues on November 8th, 1999. [Transcript of the proceedings December 17th, 1999, pp. 94 to 98].

[32] Therefore, I find in the context of the criteria for a stay application that there is a serious issue that has been heard and remains undecided.

[33] The remaining criteria, namely, whether the applicant will suffer irreparable harm if the stay is not granted or which of the parties would suffer the greater harm from the granting or refusal of the stay (i.e. balance of convenience or inconvenience) also resolve themselves in favour of the applicant.

[34] It is clear from the evidence presented and the argument before me that if the distribution were to be made on the basis of the $3,070,000.00 reserve for the Big Bear claim, that Big Bear would be irreparably prejudiced by the preliminary distribution proposed in the event the Big Bear claim was later to be determined as valid and larger. The last criteria, the balance of convenience or inconvenience also tends to favour the applicant. If no distribution is made pending a decision of Romaine, J., the unsecured creditors as a class have been prejudiced only to the extent that there is some delay in receiving their money. While that may be an inconvenience, it is not the kind of prejudice that leads to irretrievable loss as is the case if Big Bear should later obtain a favourable decision from Romaine, J., and in the meantime the distribution has been made.

[35] Therefore, exercising the inherent jurisdiction of this Court, I grant Big Bear's application for a stay of the Decision ordering an interim distribution, pending the decision of Romaine, J.

Summary and Conclusion

[36] The application for leave to appeal the Decision is refused;

[37] The application for a stay of the Decision pending the decision of Romaine, J. reserved November 8, 1999, is granted.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE FRUMAN

FRUMAN, J.A.:

[1] Blue Range Resource Corporation, a company which produces and sells natural gas, experienced serious financial problems. On March 2, 1999, it successfully petitioned the court for an order staying proceedings against it under s. 11 of The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended. A series of further applications were heard, resulting in numerous orders adversely affecting companies which had contractual arrangements with Blue Range, and its subsidiary, Humble Petroleum Marketing Ltd. Six of those orders are the subject of applications for leave to appeal under s. 13 of the CCAA.

Leave Under the CCAA

[2] Section 13 provides that any person dissatisfied with an order or decision made under the CCAA may appeal from it, with leave from either the judge appealed from, or the Court of Appeal. The section does not clarify the grounds upon which leave may be granted. The test that has been adopted in Alberta requires the applicant to show "serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties": Re Multitech Warehouse Direct reflex, (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 63 (C.A.); Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd., [1999] A.J. No. 185 at para. 22 (C.A.).

[3] An appellate court should exercise its power sparingly, when asked to intervene in issues which arise in CCAA proceedings. A judge exercising a supervisory function under the CCAA has an ongoing management process, much like a trial judge making orders in the course of a trial: Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992), 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265 at 272 (B.C.C.A.).

[4]* In Med Finance Co. S.A. v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 279 at 282 (B.C.C.A.), Hinds J. summarized the matters to be considered in granting leave to appeal an issue under the *Bankruptcy Act:

(a) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice*;*
(b) whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself;
(c) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; and
(d) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

[5] The parties agree, as do I, that these four elements are subsumed in the more general wording of the Multitech test. In particular, the importance to the practice or to the industry should be considered. While many matters involving competing claims on money will be significant to the parties, they may have little precedential value. This element is entirely consistent with the requirement that an appellate court exercise its powers sparingly.

[6] In this case, unlike Multitech and Smoky River, a plan of arrangement is already in place and an appeal would not unduly hinder the progress of restructuring Blue Range's affairs. It is therefore unnecessary to consider any potential delay caused by granting leave.

[7] The leave applications relate to orders granted by LoVecchio J. on June 18 and June 30, 1999, and by Wilkins J. on July 16, 1999.

June 18, 1999 Order - CA Appeal Nos. 18395 and 18397

Variation Order

[8] The original CCAA stay order permitted termination of various contracts. Engage Energy Canada, L.P. and Duke Energy Marketing Limited Partnership applied for a variation of the initial stay order to provide that Blue Range should only be permitted to terminate its gas marketing contracts with them if Blue Range was incapable of performing them, or termination was essential to the success of the restructuring. LoVecchio J. dismissed the application. Although he recognized that the applicants would potentially suffer substantial losses as a result of the termination of the contracts, he found that an order authorizing the termination was appropriate in the circumstances, especially since it did not affect the creditors' rights to claim for damages.

[9] Engage and Duke seek leave to appeal. No legal principles are in issue, nor is there any suggestion that the chambers judge lacked jurisdiction to make the initial order or to refuse a variation. A chambers judge has a broad discretion under the CCAA. It is clear from his reasons that LoVecchio J. was aware of the circumstances, understood the competing issues and attempted to balance the interests of all the parties. He is owed considerable deference. Engage and Duke allege no errors, other than their disagreement with the exercise of his discretion. They have not made out serious and arguable grounds, and their application for leave to appeal is denied.

Set-Off

Digitized by Google

[10] At the time of the CCAA stay order, Engage and Duke had received but not yet paid for natural gas deliveries made by Blue Range in February and March of 1999. As a result of the termination of their gas purchase contracts with Blue Range, they would have to buy natural gas at higher prices, resulting in damages. Engage and Duke sought orders permitting them to set-off anticipated damages they would incur, against the payments owed by them to Blue Range for natural gas deliveries. LoVecchio J. dismissed their application, based on his finding that the future damages were sufficiently independent from the obligation to pay for gas already delivered that equitable set-off was not appropriate.

[11] Engage and Duke seek leave to appeal. Section 18.1 of the CCAA provides that the law of set-off applies to all claims made against a debtor company. Although the section is a recent addition to the statute, at the hearing counsel relied upon the same authorities and did not disagree on the principles upon which determinations of set-off are made. They disagreed considerably on the application of those principles to the facts of this case, however. The point in issue has significance to the parties, as well as to the practice. It requires a determination whether amounts owing to a debtor company under a contract at the time of a CCAA stay, are sufficiently connected to damages suffered from the termination of that contract as a direct result of the CCAA proceedings, to warrant equitable set-off. The point must be considered in the context of the legislation which now specifically authorizes set-off in s. 18.1. The issue raises serious and arguable grounds. Leave to appeal is granted.

June 30, 1999 Order - CA Appeal Nos. 18410; 18411 and 18418

[12] Duke, Engage and Enron Capital & Trade Resources Canada Corp. have applied for leave to appeal the June 30, 1999 decision of LoVecchio J. Although their application is unopposed, I nevertheless have an obligation to ensure that the tests for granting leave are met.

[13] The chambers judge was asked to decide whether contracts providing for delivery of natural gas were "eligible financial contracts" as defined in s. 11.1(1) of the CCAA. He received the evidence of U.S. and Canadian experts, and heard extensive argument and submissions. He concluded, based on the sources cited by counsel, that almost any contract could fit within the definition, but went on to decide that the contracts being considered were "physical" rather than "financial" contracts, and not captured by the language of the section. The effect of his decision is to restrict "forward commodity contract" in subsection 11.1(1)(h) to derivative contracts.

[14] Section 11.1 of the CCAA was enacted in 1997. The June 30 decision is the first to deal with the interpretation of "eligible financial contract" and the first to consider financing vehicles that provide for delivery of product. Its meaning has a real and significant interest to the parties, as well as a significant impact upon the oil and gas industry generally, as it affects available financing instruments. The issue raises serious and arguable grounds. Leave to appeal is granted.

July 16, 1999 Order - CA Appeal No. 18424

[15] Big Bear Exploration Ltd. acquired control of Blue Range on December 12, 1998. The two companies were kept separate, with Big Bear assuming Blue Range's management obligations. On March 1, 1999 a management agreement was committed to writing. Big Bear also paid liabilities to third parties in respect of Blue Range's assets and operations. Meanwhile, on January 12, 1999 the two companies executed a loan agreement. Advances made by Big Bear to Blue Range under the loan were secured under a General Security Agreement signed at the same time.

[16] Enron and the Blue Range Creditors' Committee applied to the court for an order that amounts owed to Big Bear for management fees and third party liabilities, totalling more than $1.1 million, were not secured under the terms of the General Security Agreement. Wilkins J. granted the order, finding that the General Security Agreement had to be read with the Loan Agreement, whose terms were not broad enough to cover the management fees.

[17] Big Bear seeks leave to appeal. There were no facts in dispute before the chambers judge. Big Bear complains about the brevity of the reasons, alleges errors in contractual interpretation and disagrees with the chamber's judges conclusion, arguing that the General Security Agreement should be interpreted without reference to the Loan Agreement. In essence, the point raises an issue of priority among creditors resulting from the interpretation of a particular and unique financial instrument. It has no possible precedential value and does not raise serious and arguable grounds. Leave to appeal is dismissed.

Summary

[18] C.A. Appeal Nos. 18395 and 18397 -- Leave to appeal the portion of the June 18, 1999 order dealing with variation of contracts is dismissed. Leave to appeal the portion dealing with set-off is granted.

[19] C.A. Appeal Nos. 18410; 18411 and 18418 -- Leave to appeal the June 30, 1999 order is granted.

Memorandum of Decision of the Honourable Mr. Justice K.D. Yamauchi

I. Background

[1] On April 7, 2010, Cow Harbour Construction Ltd. ("Cow Harbour") applied for a stay of proceedings against it under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). This Court granted that order (the "Initial Order") in CCAA action 1003 05560 (the "CCAA Action"). This Court extended the stay of proceedings from time to time by a number of subsequent orders. It should be noted that this Court did not want to extend the stay for a lengthy period at any given time. Accordingly, this Court required the parties to this action, of which there are many, to appear before it often and regularly, so that Cow Harbour and the various professionals involved in this matter could provide this Court with regular updates on the status and progress of the restructuring.

[2] It became clear as this matter progressed that Cow Harbour was not going to be able to restructure it affairs through a refinancing, a compromise or an equity restructuring. Rather, this matter evolved into a liquidation. This Court approved a process that would permit Cow Harbour to restructure by way of a sale of its assets. The process involved inviting potential purchasers to present proposals to purchase Cow Harbour's assets and undertaking. The intent behind this process was to effect a sale of Cow Harbour as a going concern. This process resulted in this Court being presented with three proposals to purchase certain of Cow Harbour's assets.

[3] Aecon Group Inc. ("Aecon") presented a letter of intent to purchase a significant portion of Cow Harbour's assets (the "Original Aecon Proposal"). The Original Aecon Proposal was subject to a number of terms and conditions. This Court appointed PricewaterhouseCoopers Inc. ("PWC") to act as a transaction facilitator to assist the various parties' in their negotiations. As the transaction facilitator, PWC successfully negotiated a higher purchase price with Aecon. Aecon eventually presented a Letter of Intent to Purchase (the "LOI").

[4] On August 5, 2010, this Court endorsed PWC's acceptance of the LOI, with a view that the parties would return to this Court to seek this Court's approval of an asset purchase agreement and vesting order.

[5] One of Cow Harbour's assets that Aecon wanted to purchase was a Hitachi EX5500, serial number FF018NQ001008 (the "Equipment"). The Equipment was in Cow Harbour's possession as a result of an agreement dated April 1, 2009, between De Lage Landen Financial Services Canada Inc. ("DLL") and Cow Harbour (the "Agreement"). In the Agreement, DLL agreed to lease the Equipment to Cow Harbour for a 37-month term. The Agreement contained no option in which Cow Harbour could purchase the Equipment at the end of the term of the Agreement or otherwise.

[6] After this Court granted the Initial Order, on May 14, 2010, DLL filed a notice of motion, returnable May 21, 2010. In it, DLL sought a declaration that, for the purposes of CCAA s.11.01, the Agreement was a true lease, and not a financing lease.

[7] On May 21, 2010, this Court directed that Cow Harbour make certain payments to McLennan Ross LLP, counsel for the monitor this Court appointed pursuant to the Initial Order. Those payments represented all monthly payments from April 1, 2010, that Cow Harbour would have paid to lessors under leases for which there was a dispute as whether they were true leases or financing leases, or which the monitor's counsel had not been able to categorize as either (the "Disputed Lease Funds"). This Court directed McLennan Ross LLP to hold the Disputed Lease Funds, pending resolution of disputes pertaining to the categorization of the disputed leases.

[8] The Agreement was one of the disputed leases. Accordingly, included in the Disputed Lease Funds was approximately $900,000 representing payments that Cow Harbour should have been making to DLL under the Agreement.

[9] As part of the sale process, PWC prepared a proposed allocation of Aecon's purchase price, indicating the portion of the overall purchase price that Aecon allocated among Cow Harbour's assets. This Court received that allocation and placed it under seal. It was of the view that the creditors need not know how much of Aecon's purchase price was going to be allocated to the claims of other creditors.

[10] DLL did not agree that the Equipment could be sold to Aecon without DLL's consent. At no time did DLL provide its consent to a sale of the Equipment to Aecon or anyone else.

[11] The parties returned to court on August 25, 2010, at which time this Court heard a number of applications, including the following:

(a) DLL's application in the CCAA Action for an order declaring that DLL's interest in the Equipment is that of owner and lessor under a true lease. This application was made by way of a notice of motion in the CCAA Action only and was originally returnable May 21, 2010. It had previously been adjourned;

(b) DLL's application for an adjournment of the pending applications for an approval of the sale of Cow Harbour's assets to Aecon and a vesting order;

(c) RBC's application to appoint a PWC as receiver in action number 1003 11241 (the "Receivership Action"); and

(d) PWC's application for approval of the asset purchase agreement among Aecon, PWC, in its capacity as receiver of Cow Harbour and PWC, in its capacity as transaction facilitator (the "Asset Purchase Agreement") and a vesting order, vesting title of Cow Harbour's assets which formed the subject-matter of the Asset Purchase Agreement into Aecon's name (the "Vesting Order").

[12] Counsel made their submissions on the DLL application during the morning of August 25, 2010. This Court took a recess of about 3 hours to consider the positions of the respective parties. This Court rendered its judgment, with oral reasons, that the Agreement constituted a financing lease and not a true lease. This Court then granted RBC's application for a receivership order, and granted an order approving the Asset Purchase Agreement and the Vesting Order. The Vesting Order included the Equipment. This Court granted those orders sequentially, in the sense that:

(a) first, it dealt with DLL's applications in the CCAA Action;

(b) second, it dealt with the receivership application; and

(c) third, it dealt with the applications to approve the Asset Purchase Agreement and the Vesting Order.

The second and third orders were dependent on the Court's determination of the nature of the Agreement.

[13] Once this Court granted these orders, the transaction contemplated by the Asset Purchase Agreement closed on August 26, 2010.

Digitized by Google

[14] On August 31, 2010, DLL served all parties to these proceedings with a notice of motion returnable September 3, 2010, for an order staying the provisions of the August 25, 2010 orders, as they related to the Equipment, in the Receivership Action and the CCAA Action. On September 2, 2010, DLL filed a Civil Notice of Appeal relating to issues in the Receivership Action and (notwithstanding the absence of leave to appeal) in the CCAA Action. On September 3, 2010, the parties argued the stay application. This Court denied the application on the basis that the issue was moot and further, that DLL had not met the test for a stay pending its appeal. This Court said:

> There was no appeal, there was no seeking of stay of the effect of my orders and this matter has closed. The issue is now moot., Transcript of Proceedings, September 3, 2010, p. 24, ll. 3-6.

II. Nature of the Applications

[15] DLL brings two applications, being:

1. An application pursuant to CCAA s. 13, for leave to appeal this Court's August 25, 2010 order, which declared that the Agreement was a financing lease and not a true lease (the "Leave Application"); and
2. An application seeking an order in the nature of a stay pending appeal, holding back the Disputed Lease Funds insofar as they relate to funds payable under the Agreement and an order holding back from distribution a portion of the sale proceeds resulting from the Asset Purchase Agreement, equivalent to the net book value of the Equipment (the "Stay Application").

[16] The Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC") and PWC, the court-appointed receiver, oppose these applications.

III. Leave Application

[17] DLL seeks leave to appeal pursuant to CCAA s.13, which provides:

> 13. Except in Yukon, any person dissatisfied with an order or a decision made under this Act may appeal from the order or decision on obtaining leave of the judge appealed from or of the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies and on such terms as to security and in other respects as the judge or court directs.

[18] DLL has the right to seek leave from this Court or from the Court of Appeal or from a judge of the Court of Appeal. The legislation provides for this. If an applicant for leave is not successful at one level, does that preclude the applicant from making a further application to the "next level"? There can be no doubt that if a judge of the court of appeal refuses the applicant's leave to appeal, a judge of the lower court, even the judge who made the original order, could not overturn the court of appeal's decision. The converse, however, was not so clear. In Westar Mining Ltd. (Re), 1993 CarswellBC 529, 17 C.B.R. (3d) 202 at para. 7 (C.A.), the majority held that "an application for leave to appeal may be commenced in any one of three ways, and that once that choice is made a party does not have any further right to pursue an application for leave to appeal." McEachern C.J.B.C., at para. 45, dissented and analyzed the issue as follows:

> Section 13 of the C.C.A.A. provides for an appeal with leave, and further provides that leave may be obtained from the judge who made the order, from this court, or from a judge of this court. I do not find any support in the language of s. 13 for my colleagues' conclusion that these are exclusive alternatives, so that the refusal of leave at any level precludes an application at another level. Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 12th ed. (1969), pp. 232-233, suggests that in some cases "and" and "or" may be substituted for each other. While it is true that the C.C.A.A. must prevail, I see no conflict between it and the Court of Appeal Act, or with the practice which is followed in this province to obtain leave from the Court.

[19] The Supreme Court of Canada allowed the appeal "for the reasons given by McEachern C.J.B.C.", Westar Mining Ltd. (Re), 1993 CarswellBC 553, 1993 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 448. Thus, if DLL is unsuccessful in its application for leave before this Court, there is nothing preventing it from making a further leave application to "the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies."

[20] Is this matter properly before this Court? In General Publishing Co. (Re), 2002 CarswellOnt 2215, 34 C.B.R. (4th) 183 at para. 4 (Sup. Ct. Jus.), Justice Ground said, "the usual and preferred route to appeal an order under the CCAA is to bring the motion for leave before a judge of the Court of Appeal." In fact, in that case, Justice Ground was not prepared to hear the application, "as it would undoubtedly result in a non-productive, additional step in trying to resolve this issue." This Court agrees with the concern Justice Ground expressed for the reasons that follow.

[21] Before moving on to consider those reasons, it is worthwhile noting how the Alberta Court of Appeal has dealt with this "concurrent" jurisdiction in another context. In R. v. Harness, 2005 CarswellAlta 963, 200 C.C.C. (3d) 431 (C.A.), the court was considering the effect of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 678(2), which provides:

> 678(2) The court of appeal or a judge thereof may at any time extend the time within which notice of appeal or notice of an application for leave to appeal may be given.

[22] The Harness court at para. 23, explained how it would deal with this "concurrent jurisdiction" when it said:

Digitized by Google

> 23 Based on the rules of statutory interpretation and the case authorities, it is clear that s. 678(2) provides concurrent jurisdiction to hear applications to extend time, rather than a right of review or right to appeal the decision of a single judge to a full panel of the court. Both a single judge and the court have jurisdiction to grant a time extension, though often the rules of practice established by the court limit the applicant's right to choose which one will hear the application. Once a decision on an application to extend has been made, whether by a single judge or by a full panel of the court, there is no right of appeal within the court. However, a panel or a judge can consider the application afresh when the interests of justice so require, particularly when circumstances or conditions have changed since the last application. No such change is alleged here, nor does Harness suggest that there are new facts that might affect the outcome of his application. [emphasis added]

[23] The CCAA permits DLL to apply to this Court to seek leave to appeal this Court's earlier decisions. Accordingly, despite the approach that the General Publishing court took in similar circumstances, this Court will consider this application. Whether the Alberta Court of Appeal will apply reasonaing similar to that which it applied in Harness is not a question that this Court needs to answer.

[24] For DLL to obtain leave to appeal under the CCAA, it must meet the test set out by the Alberta Court of Appeal in Fairmont Resort Properties Ltd. (Re), 2009 ABCA 360 (CanLII), 2009 ABCA 360 at para. 10, where the court said:

> The test for leave involves a single criterion subsuming four factors. The single criterion is that there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties. The four factors used to assess whether this criterion is present are (1) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice; (2) whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself; (3) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; (4) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

[25] Before this Court considers the factors involved in the "test for leave," it is worthwhile to outline the applicable standard of review that the Court of Appeal will apply if leave were to be granted. In Canadian Airlines Corp. (Re), 2000 ABCA 149 (CanLII), 2000 ABCA 149 at paras. 28-29, the court held that:

> 28 The elements of the general criterion cannot be properly considered in a leave application without regard to the standard of review that this Court applies to appeals under the CCAA. If leave to appeal were to be granted, the applicable standard of review is succinctly set forth by Fruman, J.A. in Royal Bank v. Fracmaster Ltd. 1999 ABCA 178 (CanLII), (1999), 244 A.R. 93 (Alta. C.A.) where she stated for the Court at p. 95:
> > .... this is a court of review. It is not our task to reconsider the merits of the various offers and decide which proposal might be best. The decisions made by the Chambers judge involve a good measure of discretion, and are owed considerable deference. Whether or not we agree, we will only interfere if we conclude that she acted unreasonably, erred in principle or made a manifest error.

[26] In Smoky River Coal Ltd. (Re) (1999), 237 A.R. 326 (Alta. C.A.), Hunt, J.A., speaking for the unanimous Court, extensively reviewed the CCAA's history and purpose, and observed at p. 341:

> The fact that an appeal lies only with leave of an appellate court (s. 13 CCAA) suggests that Parliament, mindful that CCAA cases often require quick decision-making, intended that most decisions be made by the supervising judge. This supports the view that those decisions should be interfered with only in clear cases.
> The standard of review of this Court, in reviewing the CCAA decision of the supervising judge, is therefore one of correctness if there is an error of law. Otherwise, for an appellate court to interfere with the decision of the supervising judge, there must be a palpable and overriding error in the exercise of discretion or in findings of fact.

[27] It appears that this is the reason why the General Publishers court and this Court has difficulty in analyzing its own decisions. It is awkward, if not difficult, for a court to consider whether it has made a palpable and overriding error in its exercise of discretion or in findings of fact. These are the foundations on which it built its original decision and it undermines this Court's original decision if it were to second guess itself.

[28] Nonetheless, Parliament has given this task to the "judge appealed from" so this Court will undertake that task.

[29] Fairmont Resort provides us with the "test for leave." The test is but one test, in which "there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties." To determine whether DLL has met its onus, we must consider the four factors that Fairmont Resort outlines. The question then becomes whether DLL must satisfy all the factors. In other words, if it fails on one (or more), does fail to meet the test? The answer to this question lies in the decision of O'Brien J.A. in Ketch Resources Ltd. v. Gauntlet Energy Corp. (Monitor of), 2005 CarswellAlta 1527, 15 C.B.R. (5th) 235 (C.A.). In that case, Justice O'Brien went through and applied the four factors to the facts with which he was dealing. The applicant in that case had met some of the factors, but not others. Justice O'Brien at para. 15, made his decision not to grant leave after "weighing all the factors." In other words, success or failure to prove one or more of the factors does not guarantee that the applicant has met the "test for leave." The court must weigh all the factors.

Whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice

[30] DLL argues that the distinction between true leases and financing leases is one of significance to the practice. RBC argues, on the other hand, that the issue is of no significance to the practice. The finding that DLL's Equipment was the subject of a financing lease rather than a true lease is a factual finding that is specific only to that particular lease and does not have any impact on the practice in general.

[31] DLL argues that this Court erred in holding that an agreement without a purchase option or any other contractual mechanism of transferring ownership from the purported lessor to the purported lessee, can be characterized as a financing lease. RBC argues that there is no single overriding factor in determining whether a particular lease is a true lease or a financing lease.

[32] When characterizing leases pursuant to CCAA s.11.01, the court must have regard to the substance, rather than simply the form of the arrangement, Smith Brothers Contracting Ltd. (Re), 1998 CarswellBC 678, 53 B.C.L.R. (3d) 264 (S.C.). In fact, when making its decision, this Court considered the non-exhaustive list of criteria that the Smith Brothers court suggested that courts look to when determining whether a document is a true lease or a financing lease. This Court outlined those criteria in its oral reasons, Transcript of Proceedings, August 25, 2010, pp. 57-59, and concluded that:

> [T]here is not one factor that is the sine qua non for determining whether a document is a true lease or a financing lease. One must look at the whole document to get a flavour of the [parties'] intentions, Transcript of Proceedings, August 25, 2010, p. 59, ll. 11-13.

[33] This Court concluded that "When one examines the De Lage Landen Financial Services Canada document as a whole, it is clear that it is a security lease and not a true lease," Transcript of Proceedings, August 25, 2010, p. 59, ll. 23-24.

[34] DLL argues that the characterization of a lease without a purchase option or any other mechanism of transferring ownership from the purported lessor to the purported lessee is a novel proposition in law and is an unresolved issue that is of significance to the practice, Kenroc Building Materials Co. Ltd. v. Kerr Interior Systems Ltd., 2008 ABCA 291 (CanLII), 2008 ABCA 291 at para. 9 . If that were the sole basis on which this Court rendered its decision, it might indeed be novel. However, this Court was guided by the broader principle of examining the whole document, which is an approach that is already well-established in the case law. Thus, there is nothing novel about this approach and this Court's finding that the Agreement was a financing lease, rather than a true lease, has no broad significance to the practice.

[35] Furthermore, in Philip Services Corp. (Re), 1999 CarswellOnt 4495, 15 C.B.R. (4th) 107 at para. 4 (Sup. Ct. Jus.), Justice Farley determined that a lease which "does not specifically indicate that there is an option to buy the (hardware) assets at the end of the lease" could indeed be characterized as a capital or financing lease, having regard to the criteria set out in Smith Brothers. Notwithstanding the absence of an option to purchase in the agreement, Justice Farley undertook the same analysis set out in Smith Brothers to determine the nature of the lease. He said, at para. 3:

> That involves a functional analysis of the relationship based on substance as opposed to form. Unfortunately there are no tags or labels which may be read with ease and "certainty" ("certainty" in the same way that a laboratory is able to conduct a DNA test and give probabilities or odds). Rather the task involves the weighing of the various materials involved. It is not a simple analysis of determining between black and white but rather the shade of grey where all factors are weighed and the balance as to whether the scales would tip towards a true lease relationship or alternatively against being a true lease relationship.

[36] DLL pointed out that the parties in Philip Services had a course of conduct that resulted in the lessee purchasing leased assets from the lessor, although Justice Farley, at para. 1, described the course of conduct between the parties as "rather informal, flexible and sloppy." The fact that Justice Farley took care to point out that the leases themselves did not contain an option to buy assets at the end of the lease term indicates that this factor was in his mind when he balanced the various Smith Brothers factors. Depending on the circumstances of each case, the presence or absence of an option to purchase may or may not loom large in the court's analysis. In the case with which this Court was dealing, this "tag" or "label" was but one factor it considered.

Digitized by Google

[37] Thus, this Court finds that the issue is of no importance to the practise.

Whether the point on appeal is of significance to the action itself

[38] This Court acknowledges that the point on any potential appeal has significance to DLL. Otherwise why would this matter have come before this Court? That, however, is not the nature of this factor. This factor requires this Court to look at the action as a whole.

[39] RBC argues that the appeal is of no significance to the action because the appeal is moot and, as such, it would be impossible to "unscramble the egg" even if DLL were successful, Minister of National Revenue v. Temple City Housing Inc., 2008 ABCA 1 (CanLII), 2008 ABCA 1 at para. 14. Indeed, DLL acknowledges this fact. However, DLL goes on to argue that while the CCAA Action has been concluded, there still remains the issue of the Disputed Lease Funds. DLL claims entitlement to approximately $900,000, representing the monthly lease payments to which it would be entitled if classified as a true lessor under CCAA s.11.01. DLL's claim to these funds rests on it being categorized as a true lessor. Additionally, the allocation of restructuring costs against DLL in these proceedings is dependent on whether DLL is classified as a true lessor.

[40] It is important, at this stage, to explain the process that resulted in the Vesting Order. This Court appointed PWC to facilitate negotiations with the various parties and finalization of the transaction. From August 5, 2010, when this Court endorsed PWC's acceptance of the LOI, to August 25, 2010, when this Court approved the Agreement of Purchase and Sale and granted the Vesting Order, Aecon and PWC negotiated the allocation of the purchase price among the various creditors. At the beginning of the process, there was not overwhelming support from the general body of creditors for the Aecon transaction. However, through persistent and effective negotiations, PWC secured the support of holders of 92.8 percent of the debt that Cow Harbour owed to its creditors, representing a majority in number of 90.625 percent. As well, Aecon committed to running Cow Harbour's business and employing almost all of Cow Harbour's employees, except for certain management personnel.

[41] Because of the circumstances involving certain of Cow Harbour's management, Cow Harbour would not put Aecon's transaction before the creditors as a plan of arrangement. Besides, it would have been impossible to meet the time requirements set forth in the CCAA to allow a plan of arrangement to be considered and approved. Cow Harbour's financial situation was deteriorating with each day. It had to meet payroll and other expenses and it did not have the financial wherewithal to meet those expenses. Aecon advised this Court that for it to facilitate the survival of Cow Harbour's business, this Court had to approve the transaction and allow a closing before the end of August, 2010. Like the parties in General Publishing, the parties in this case had a sword of Damocles hanging over their heads, as the failure of this Court to approve this transaction would surely have resulted in Aecon withdrawing its offer or, if it did not, Cow Harbour's continued financial difficulties would have resulted in its demise, whether or not it was in the Aecon's hands.

[42] Given the support that the creditors showed, and the fact that Cow Harbour's business would continue to operate, this Court felt it was in the best interests of the stakeholders to approve the sale and grant the Vesting Order. To do otherwise might have resulted in a piecemeal liquidation of Cow Harbour's assets and a closing-down of its business. In other words, although this transaction was consummated under the Receivership Action, this Court considered the public policy reasons underlying CCAA proceedings, when it approved the Aecon transaction and granted the Vesting Order.

[43] The Aecon transaction was carefully negotiated and each of the creditors sacrificed part of their respective claims. No creditor obtained everything it was seeking. Aecon advised this Court on August 25, 2010, that it would not consummate the transaction if it did not receive an order vesting all of the assets it was purchasing into its name, free and clear of all charges, liens and encumbrances. If this Court were to give one creditor, even a creditor that was owed a trifling amount, preferential treatment, the other creditors would not have supported the Aecon transaction.

[44] An appeal of this matter might be of significance to DLL specifically. However, this Court's characterization of the Agreement is of no significance to this action generally.

Whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous [45] RBC argues that DLL has not demonstrated that it has a prima facie meritorious case. On September 3, 2010, DLL sought a stay of the various orders this Court granted on August 25, 2010. This Court held that because there was no appeal pending and that DLL did not seek a stay of the effect of the various orders this Court granted on that date after they were granted or at least before the Aecon transaction closed, this Court denied DLL's application on the ground of mootness. In other words, even if the Court of Appeal were to overturn this Court's August 25, 2010 decisions, DLL could not succeed in its claim to have the Equipment returned to it. The Equipment was part of a larger transaction.

[46] Does this, of itself, mean that the proposed appeal lacks merit or is otherwise frivolous? The simple answer is no. Allowing the appeal may not provide DLL with a remedy, but that does not make the proposed appeal frivolous or one that lacks merit. Rather, we must analyze the strength of the appeal on the basis of the standard of review that would govern the appeal, Liberty Oil & Gas Ltd. (Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act), 2003 ABCA 158 (CanLII), 2003 ABCA 158 at para. 20; Resurgence Asset Management LLC v. Canadian Airlines Corporation, 2000 ABCA149 at paras. 28-29 .

[47] As stated earlier in these reasons, it is difficult for this Court to find that it made an overriding and palpable error in its consideration of the issues the parties placed before it. Surely, this is the same awkwardness that Justice Ground faced in General Publishing. This Court gave its oral reasons for why it held the Agreement to be a financing lease rather than a true lease. Even taking an objective view of this with the benefit of hindsight, this Court would come to the same conclusion today.

[48] This Court acknowledges that it is not necessary for DLL to show that it is guaranteed to win an appeal. It only needs to show that it has an arguable case, Kenroc Building Materials Co. Ltd. v. Kerr Interior Systems Ltd., 2008 ABCA 291 (CanLII), 2008 ABCA 291 at para. 11. Given this Court's various findings, it is difficult to see that DLL has an arguable case, in these circumstances. On these bases, this Court finds that any proposed appeal is not on its face meritorious.

Whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action

[49] RBC and PWC argue that an appeal would unduly hinder the CCAA Action and the Receivership Action and create tremendous uncertainty concerning the various transition orders this Court granted in the CCAA Action. It should be noted at this stage that as part of the transition, this Court ordered that Disputed Lease Funds would be transferred from the monitor's counsel to the receiver's counsel, under the same terms as the May 21, 2010 order.

[50] DLL, on the other hand argues that an appeal would not unduly hinder the progress of this action. The CCAA Action has been completed. The assets have been sold to Aecon. The hearing at which the other parties with disputed leases will have their agreements categorized has not yet been scheduled. DLL's application for a stay against Aecon has been denied, so there is no issue as to uncertainty surrounding Aecon's use of the Equipment. Accordingly, DLL argues that the progress of neither action would be unduly hindered by an appeal.

[51] This Court finds that any appeal would unduly hinder the progress of the actions. Pursuant to the transition orders this Court granted on August 25, 2010, this Court must deal with many issues, including those concerning the remuneration of the chief restructuring advisor, the distribution of the Disputed Lease Funds, and who will be paying the administrative expenses. DLL is correct that Aecon's use of the Equipment is not an issue. However, the creditors seek a distribution of their respective share of the $180 million purchase price. This cannot happen if there is a pending appeal that could have an effect on the allocation. Thus, the progress of this action would be unduly hindered by the appeal to the prejudice of the creditors who supported the Aecon transaction.

[52] More importantly, the transaction that PWC and Aecon negotiated with all the creditors rests on a fine balance. The uncertainty surrounding the finality of these issues unduly hinders the progress of these actions. A more thorough discussion of this fine balance will be undertaken when this Court discusses the Stay Application.

[53] As a result of the foregoing, this Court dismisses DLL's application for leave to appeal. This result deals sufficiently with the Stay Application. However, as a courtesy to DLL, this Court will comment briefly on it.

IV. Stay Application

[54] Earlier, this Court referred to DLL's application for a stay of this Court's orders approving the Aecon Asset Purchase Agreement and the Vesting Order. On September 3, 2010, the parties argued the stay application. This Court denied the application on the basis that the issue was moot and further, that DLL had not met the test for a stay. DLL argues that the application now before this Court differs from the one it argued on September 3, 2010, as it is not challenging the sale and Vesting Order. Rather, it is seeking to have this Court hold back monies representing DLL's alleged share of the Disputed Lease Funds and the net book value of the Equipment.

[55] For DLL to obtain a stay of a stay of proceedings it must satisfy a tripartite test set out in RJR McDonald Inc. v. Canada (A.G.), 1994 CanLII 117 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311, being:

(a) Is there a serious question to be argued on appeal?
(b) Will DLL suffer irreparable harm if this Court does not grant a stay?
(c) Does the balance of convenience weigh in favour of a stay?

[56] Unlike the factors that make up the "test for leave," the tripartite test does not require or permit courts to weigh these factors. The applicant must satisfy all three elements before a court will grant the stay. In other words, if the applicant does not establish one of the elements, its application will fail. Because of this, this Court will focus on the third element of the tripartite test; the balance of convenience.

[57] On August 25, 2010, the Court heard Aecon's submissions that the Equipment is critical to the work that Aecon will be undertaking under contracts with Syncrude. For its negotiations to be successful, Aecon would have to satisfy Syncrude that it could fulfill the requirements under the Syncrude contracts. For this to occur, Aecon required the Equipment. Without the Equipment, Aecon would not have proceeded with the transaction.

[58] As well, this Court heard submissions that outlined many details regarding the negotiations and work of Aecon, PWC and numerous creditors which led to the Asset Purchase Agreement. The negotiations were undertaken by these parties in good faith, which required significant compromise by the creditors, including RBC, Cow Harbour's largest creditor. PWC struck a balance among numerous interests.

[59] Creditors representing 90.625 percent of all creditors negotiated in good faith and compromised their claims. Granting a stay in these circumstances would undermine the processes that Aecon, PWC, and the other creditors undertook in good faith. Holding back the net book value of the Equipment seriously upsets the fine balance that resulted from these negotiations. The creditors did not agree to compromise their claims so they could recover "something." They compromised their claims so they could receive a definite amount, as negotiated. Their receiving something less than that negotiated amount will result in this Court sanctioning an "unscrambling of the egg" and undermines the process that this Court approved and monitored. It should be noted also that DLL will be receiving an allocation of the purchase price representing a substantial portion of its claim.

[60] DLL argues that this Court's finding that it holds a financing lease prejudices its right to argue that it should obtain a portion of the Disputed Lease Funds. That may be so, but it chose to have this Court deal with the nature of the Agreement in a summary fashion. Given this Court's finding that the Agreement is a financing lease, in the end, this argument carries little weight. However, this Court has dealt with that issue and it is not now open to DLL to attempt to re-argue it.

[61] As a result, the balance of convenience favours this Court dening the stay.

V. Conclusion

[62] For the foregoing reasons this Court dismisses DLL's application pursuant to CCAA s. 13, for leave to appeal this Court's August 25, 2010 order, which declared that the Agreement was a financing lease and not a true lease. As well, it dismisses DLL's application seeking an order in the nature of a stay pending appeal, holding back the Disputed Lease Funds insofar as they relate to funds payable under the Agreement and an order holding back from distribution a portion of the sale proceeds resulting from the Asset Purchase Agreement, equivalent to the net book value of the Equipment.

Heard on the 22rd day of September, 2010.

Dated at Edmonton, Alberta this 5td day of October, 2010.

JUDGMENT — GABRIELSON J.
July 20, 2010

Digitized by Google

Introduction

[1] This is an appeal by Alberts Construction Ltd. ("Alberts") from a March 15, 2010, decision of Nicholas J. Stooshinoff (the "Claims Officer"), wherein the Claims Officer dismissed the claim of Alberts against Big Sky Farms Inc. ("Big Sky").

Background

[2] Alberts is a Saskatchewan construction company. Its principals are Mervin Alberts, as president, and Merlin Alberts as director. For several years, Alberts built pig barns and related facilities for Big Sky at various locations throughout Saskatchewan.

[3] Big Sky is a producer, feeder and marketer of hogs from multiple locations throughout Saskatchewan and Manitoba. In November 2009, Big Sky applied for court protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (Canada), R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"), in order to restructure its business and financial affairs. Drycast Systems Inc. ("Drycast") is a wholly owned subsidiary of Big Sky. Big Sky Management Consulting Corp. ("BSMCC") is an inactive company which was incorporated to facilitate management of third party hog production operations. Both Drycast and BSMCC are guarantors of the principal secured obligations owed by Big Sky to its senior secured lenders and, as a result, were parties to the CCAA application by Big Sky.

[4] In December 2009, Big Sky presented a plan of compromise and arrangement (the "Plan") under the CCAA to its creditors and the Court. As part of the plan, a claims process (the "Claims Process") was proposed. The Claims Process was approved by the Court pursuant to an order dated December 9, 2009 (the "Claims Process Order"). As part of the Claims Process, creditors of Big Sky submit a claim to a monitor (the "Monitor"), who could either accept or disallow the claim. If the claim was accepted by the Monitor, the claimant would be paid a portion of its claim as set out in the Plan. If the claim was not accepted by the Monitor and the claimant disagreed with this disposition, the claim would be referred to the Claims Officer, who would then determine the validity of the disputed claim. The Claims Process also provided for an appeal to the Court from the Claims Officer's determination.

[5] During the course of the Claims Process, a claim (the "Claim") was submitted to the Monitor by Alberts alleging that Big Sky was indebted to Alberts in the amount of $2,373,790.60 for work done for Big Sky relating to the construction of facilities and roadways at three separate sites, being the Pelly breeder barn ("Pelly One"), the Pelly nursery barn ("Pelly Two") and the Porcupine Plain facility ("Porcupine"). The Claim by Alberts was disallowed by the Monitor on the basis that the records of Big Sky indicated that Alberts had been paid in full for the work and, alternatively, that the Claim would be statute barred by the expiration of the limitation period.

[6] Alberts filed a dispute note from the denial of the Claim by the Monitor and sought to have the matter determined by the Claims Officer. A summary trial was held before the Claims Officer on February 12, 2010. Affidavit evidence was submitted by both Big Sky and Alberts. Counsel were allowed to cross-examine the opposing affiants at the hearing. In a decision dated March 15, 2010, the Claims Officer held that Alberts had failed to prove the Claim on a balance of probabilities and, further, that even if the allegations had been proven, the Claim would be statute barred except for the sum of $68,899.66.

Issues

[7] Although the notice of motion filed by Alberts in this appeal lists 20 grounds of appeal, the parties agree that this list could be reduced to four main issues to be determined by the Court:

1. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Alberts had failed to prove the Claim on a balance of probabilities?
2. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Exhibits "E" and "F" to the affidavit of Casey Smit were contracts by which the parties intended to govern their relationship?
3. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Alberts had sufficient information to prepare its invoices in a timely fashion?
4. Did the Claims Officer err in determining that the majority of the Claim was barred by the expiry of the limitation period?

Further issues to be addressed were the Court's jurisdiction and the standard of review that the Court should follow.

Analysis

1. Jurisdiction and standard of review.

[8] The parties agree that Alberts had a right to appeal the Claims Officer's decision by virtue of paragraph 12(c) of the Claims Process Order and paragraph 24 of the Claims Process set out in Schedule "A" to the Claims Process Order. The parties also agree that the standard of review to be followed by this court is that of an appellate court. The standard of review by an appellant court was outlined by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, 2002 SCC 33. In that case, the Court held that deference should be given to a decision of a trial judge with respect to factual findings unless those factual findings constitute a palpable and overriding error. The Court also held that the standard of review on a pure question of law is one of correctness, where the appellate court was free to replace the opinion of the trial judge with its own.

[9] This standard of appellate review has also been applied by courts in Ontario when hearing appeals from claims officers' decisions in CCAA proceedings. See Re 1587930 Ontario Inc. 2006 CanLII 34422 (ON SC), (2006), 25 C.B.R. (5th) 264 (Ont. S.C.J.); and Triton Tubular Components Corp. v. Steelcase Inc. 2005 CanLII 33299 (ON SC), (2005), 14 C.B.R. (5th) 264 (Ont. S.C.J.).

[10] In this case, the Claims Officer's decision was made after an adversarial proceeding in which each party tendered evidence by affidavit, which evidence was then subject to cross-examination of the affiant. Following written submissions by the parties, the Claims Officer wrote a detailed decision outlining his findings of fact and conclusions of law. These findings and conclusions should therefore be subjected to the standard of review as set out above: correctness as to questions of law and deference as to findings of fact, except where such findings of fact would amount to a palpable and overriding error.

2. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Alberts had failed to prove the Claim on a balance of probabilities?

[11] Alberts' position is that the evidence submitted by Big Sky through the affidavit of Casey Smit ("Mr. Smit"), wherein he deposed that Big Sky had paid for all the work done by Alberts and that, accordingly, no money was owing, was based upon hearsay and should not have been accepted by the Claims Officer. Further, Alberts position is that the Claims Officer should have drawn a negative inference against Big Sky when it failed to call a witness, Dean Possberg ("Mr. Possberg"), who Alberts says would have given direct evidence as to the issues involved in the Claim. Alberts also submits that the Claims Officer made a palpable and overriding error when he determined that Alberts had not proven the Claim on a balance of probabilities.

[12] Counsel for Big Sky submitted that the Claims Officer had ample support in the evidence to make the findings and inferences of fact, which he did, and that no palpable or overriding error was made.

[13] The Claims Officer made the following findings in reference to the inability of Alberts to prove the Claim on a balance of probabilities:

> 17. While it may be that Alberts did perform work and provided services to Big Sky for which it has not been paid, on the documentation and evidence produced by both sides I am unable to find on a balance of probabilities if that is the case and if so what that work was, when it was performed and when it was invoiced, and finally, if it was paid for in part or at all.
> 36. Whether or not Alberts has been overpaid or is still owed money cannot be determined on the evidence before me. Big Sky submits that its account ledger indicates that Alberts has been paid in full for all work requested and approved. It indicates that the last payment to Alberts was July 16, 2007 (paragraph 24 of the affidavit of Casey Smit). On the evidence before me I can only conclude that Alberts has failed to prove on a balance of probabilities that it is owed a debt in the amounts alleged or at all.

[14] In the case of F.H. v. McDougall, 2008 SCC 53 (CanLII), [2008] 3 S.C.R. 41, 2008 SCC 53, the Supreme Court of Canada referred to the standard of proof in a civil case. At paragraph 40, the Court stated:

> 40 Like the House of Lords, I think it is time to say, once and for all in Canada, that there is only one civil standard of proof at common law and that is proof on a balance of probabilities. Of course, context is all important and a judge should not be unmindful, where appropriate, of inherent probabilities or improbabilities or the seriousness of the allegations or consequences. However, these considerations do not change the standard of proof. ...
> 46 Similarly, evidence must always be sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to satisfy the balance of probabilities test. But again, there is no objective standard to measure sufficiency. In serious cases, like the present, judges may be faced with evidence of events that are alleged to have occurred many years before, where there is little other evidence than that of the plaintiff and defendant. As difficult as the task may be, the judge must make a decision. If a responsible judge finds for the plaintiff, it must be accepted that the evidence was sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to that judge that the plaintiff satisfied the balance of probabilities test.

[15] The Claims Officer was therefore correct in his finding that Alberts had to prove the Claim on a balance of probabilities and that if the evidence before him did not meet this standard of proof, he must dismiss the Claim.

[16] In respect to the issue of hearsay, while the affidavit of Mr. Smit, the CEO of Big Sky, does refer to discussions he had had with Mr. Possberg, the Claims Officer's decision was not based upon such evidence but, rather, the lack of evidence provided by Alberts in proof of the Claim. Big Sky's position was that all monies owing to Alberts for work performed had been paid. This position was not based solely on the information provided by Mr. Possberg to Mr.

Digitized by Google

Smit but also on the ledger which Big Sky kept regarding Alberts, which ledger was marked as Schedule "K" to the affidavit of Mr. Smit. This ledger showed a zero balance owing to Alberts. That ledger was the one referred to by the Claims Officer in paragraph 36 of his decision. Accordingly, it cannot be said that hearsay evidence led the Claims Officer to make a palpable and overriding error.

[17] In respect to Alberts' position that an adverse inference should have been drawn by virtue of the failure by Big Sky to call Mr. Possberg, an adverse inference should be drawn only after a prima facie case has been established by the party bearing the burden of proof. Dwyer v. Mark II Innovations Ltd. 2006 CanLII 9406 (ON CA), (2006), 208 O.A.C. 305 (Ont. C.A.).

[18] The classic Saskatchewan case concerning situations in which an adverse inference may be drawn from a party's failure to adduce relevant evidence is Murray v. Saskatoon, [1952] 2 D.L.R. 499 (Sask. C.A.). The Court in that case stated at paragraphs 20 and 21:

20 The subject is dealt with at length by the learned author in Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd ed., vol. II, pp. 162 et seq. On p. 162 it is stated in part:–"The failure to bring before the tribunal some circumstance, document, or witness, when either the party himself or his opponent claims that the facts would thereby be elucidated, serves to indicate, as the most natural inference, that the party fears to do so, and this fear is some evidence that the circumstance or document or witness, if brought, would have exposed facts unfavourable to the party. These inferences, to be sure, cannot fairly be made except upon certain conditions; and they are also open always to explanation by circumstances which make some other hypothesis a more natural one than the party's fear of exposure. But the propriety of such an inference in general is not doubted."

21 The party affected by the inference may, of course, explain it away by showing circumstances which prevent the production of the witness; but where the failure to produce the witness is not explained, the inference may be drawn that the unproduced evidence would be contrary to the party's case or at least would not support it. In the pages in Wigmore on Evidence following the above quotation many authorities are referred to which indicates that in the Courts of the United States the rule is of wide application.

[19] In the circumstances of this case, Big Sky provided evidence to explain why it did not call Mr. Possberg. At paragraph 13 of his affidavit, Mr. Smit deposes that Mr. Possberg is no longer employed by Big Sky. At Q. 567 of the cross-examination of Mr. Smit, he confirms that Mr. Possberg stopped working for Big Sky in August 2009. As such, Big Sky has provided an explanation as to why Mr. Smit is the affiant, as he is the CEO of Big Sky. There is no property in a witness: Harmony Shopping Co. S.A. v. Davis, [1979] 3 All E.R. 177 at 180-81, and S.M. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SKQB 351 (CanLII), 2005 SKQB 351, 271 Sask. R. 123. If Alberts felt that the evidence of Mr. Possberg could establish its claim, Alberts has the ability to subpoena Mr. Possberg to obtain his evidence.

[20] The finding by the Claims Officer in paragraphs 12 and 36 that Alberts has failed to prove on a balance of probabilities that it is owed a debt by Big Sky or the amount thereof are findings of fact for which deference should be given. I find that there is evidence to support the Claims Officer's findings of fact in this regard. While there may have been evidence as to inconsistencies in Big Sky's documentation as referred to by counsel for Alberts in this appeal that does not assist Alberts in proving its own claim. The finding of fact by the Claims Officer that Alberts did not prove its claim on a balance of probabilities cannot be said to amount to a palpable or overriding error.

3. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Exhibits "E" and "F" to the affidavit of Casey Smit were contracts which the parties intended to govern their relationship?

[21] Exhibits "E" and "F" to the affidavit of Casey Smit are documents "H" and "I" in the index of documents filed with the Court at the hearing of this appeal. Alberts submits that at paragraph 11 of his decision, the Claims Officer found that Exhibits "E" and "F" were contracts between the parties and that this finding of fact constituted a palpable and overriding error. Big Sky submits that the two documents reflect an understanding between the parties and that the Claims Officer properly made use of them in coming to the conclusions he did concerning the relationship. In any event, Big Sky submits that even if they were found by the Claims Officer to be contracts, such finding would not be a palpable and overriding error.

[22] In his decision, the Claims Officer recognized that Exhibits "E" and "F" were incomplete documents. His conclusion was that, although incomplete, they were contractual documents "intended by both parties to govern their relationship for the construction of Pelly Barn #1 and Pelly Barn #2". There is evidence to support such a finding found in paragraphs 11 to 13 of Mr. Smit's affidavit. The Claims Officer found that each side was equally at fault for failing to properly document their contractual relationship and, in my opinion, the evidence supports such a conclusion. The Claims Officer was entitled to use the said documents for the limited purpose that he did. Accordingly, I find the Claims Officer has not committed a palpable and overriding error in referring to these documents as contractual documents.

4. Did the Claims Officer err in finding that Alberts had sufficient information to prepare its invoices in a timely fashion?

Digitized by Google

[23] Alberts' position is that the Claims Officer made an error of fact in paragraph 30 of his decision when he made the following determination in the last sentence of that paragraph:

30. ... I find that Alberts did in fact have sufficient information to prepare its invoices and at the very least could have entered into an arrangement for determining any short fall [sic] it may have claimed.

[24] The Claims Officer concluded that the dirt quantity listing report dated December 7, 2006, and provided to Alberts on January 10, 2007, (document "E" in the index of documents) was sufficient to allow Alberts to submit its invoice at that time.

[25] Once again, it is clear from his decision that the Claims Officer was aware of the position of Alberts that it could not submit an accurate invoice without additional information from Big Sky in the form of final dirt work quantities. At paragraph 30, the Claims Officer dealt with this submission and made a finding of fact that this position was not accepted for the reasons given. Deference must be given to these findings of fact. The Claims Officer's findings of fact in this regard cannot be said to amount to a palpable or overriding error.

5. Did the Claims Officer err in determining that the majority of the Alberts claim was barred by the expiry of the limitation period?

[26] While the principle reason given by the Monitor for rejecting Alberts' proofs of claim in respect to monies owing by Big Sky was that Alberts had already been paid for any goods and services provided to Big Sky, the Monitor also gave an alternative reason for disallowing the claim. In the Monitor's notice of January 20, 2010, the Monitor stated:

... Furthermore, if any claim exists, it would be barred by the expiry of the limitation period for making such a claim.

[27] The Claims Officer dealt with this alternative reason and concluded that the Monitor had been correct in his decision that the vast majority of the claim was time barred. Although the Claims Officer found that invoices for work done in 2004 totalling $68,899.66 would not have been time barred when The Limitations Act, S.S. 2004, c. L-16.1, was amended in 2005, the Claims Officer found Alberts had failed to establish on a balance of probabilities that the claim for 2004 work had been proven. In this appeal, counsel for Alberts raised three submissions concerning the findings by the Claims Officer that the majority of Alberts' claims were time barred:

(a) there is no limitation period in respect to CCAA claims;
(b) the Alberts claim was not time barred because Alberts did not discover its claim until the spring of 2009; and
(c) the Alberts claim was not time barred because Big Sky had concealed information from Alberts necessary to submit a claim.

Each of these submissions will be dealt with separately.

(a) Does The Limitations Act apply to CCAA claims?

[28] Alberts' position is that the CCAA does not provide for any limitation period within that Act. Further, counsel for Alberts submitted that Alberts' claim is not subject to the limitation periods in The Limitations Act because Alberts' claim is not commenced by statement of claim or originating notice as referred to in s. 3(1) of that Act. Counsel for Alberts submits that the application before the Claims Officer is in the nature of an appeal from the disallowance of Alberts' claim by the Monitor and that s. 3(2)(a) of The Limitations Act clearly exempts appeals. Alberts refers to ss. 2 and 3 of The Limitations Act which provide:

Interpretation

2 In this Act:

(a) "claim" means a claim to remedy an injury, loss or damage that occurred as a result of an act or omission;

(b) "claimant" means a person who has a claim;

...

Application of Act

3(1) Subject to subsections (2) to (5), this Act applies to claims pursued in court proceedings that:

(a) are commenced by statement of claim; or

(b) are commenced by originating notice and are not proceedings in the nature of an application.

(2) This Act does not apply to court proceedings that are:

(a) proceedings in the nature of an appeal;

...

[29] It is the position of Big Sky that The Limitations Act does not specifically include or exclude CCAA proceedings. Counsel for Big Sky submits, however, that case law has established that a debt barred by a statute of limitations is not provable within the meaning of the CCAA and accordingly the Act applies to claims such as that brought by Alberts.

[30] Whether The Limitations Act applies to a notice of claim filed pursuant to the CCAA is a matter of statutory interpretation. Accordingly, the standard of review is one of correctness.

[31] When considering whether The Limitations Act applies to CCAA proceedings, the starting point is to consider the purpose of a statute of limitations. In the case of M.(K.) v. M.(H.), 1992 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6, La Forest J. dealt with the purposes of limitation statutes. He stated at pages 29-31:

... In order to determine the time of accrual of the cause of action in a manner consistent with the purposes of the Limitations Act, I believe it is helpful to first examine its underlying rationales. There are three, and they may be described as the certainty, evidentiary, and diligence rationales ....

Statutes of limitations have long been said to be statutes of repose; see Doe on the demise of Count Duroure v. Jones (1791), 4 T.R. 301, 100 E.R. 1031, and A'Court v. Cross (1825), 3 Bing. 329, 130 E.R. 540. The reasoning is straightforward enough. There comes a time, it is said, when a potential defendant should be secure in his reasonable expectation that he will not be held to account for ancient obligations. ...

The second rationale is evidentiary and concerns the desire to foreclose claims based on stale evidence. Once the limitation period has lapsed, the potential defendant should no longer be concerned about the preservation of evidence relevant to the claim; see Dundee Harbour Trustees v. Dougall (1852), 1 Macq. 317 (H.L.), and Deaville v. Boegeman reflex, (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 725 (C.A.). ...

Finally, plaintiffs are expected to act diligently and not "sleep on their rights"; statutes of limitation are an incentive for plaintiffs to bring suit in a timely fashion. ...

[32] The above noted rationales were referred to and adopted by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in the case of Josvanger v. Folk, 2005 SKCA 138 (CanLII), 2005 SKCA 138, 275 Sask. R. 101.

[33] Beginning at paragraph 45 of his decision, it is clear that the Claims Officer was aware of and considered the purposes of limitation periods as referred to above. The issue before me is whether he was correct in his determination that The Limitations Act applies in the circumstances of this case.

[34] Although the CCAA does not have an express purpose clause, it is titled "an Act to facilitate compromises and arrangements between companies and their creditors". This title can be taken to suggest that its purpose was to assist insolvent companies in achieving arrangements with creditors so that the company could find a way to continue operations and avoid bankruptcy. The connection between the CCAA and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), as amended, can also be seen throughout the CCAA.

[35] Some sections of the CCAA make specific reference to the BIA. Section 2 of the CCAA defines the term "claim" and provides:

> Definitions
> 2. (1) In this Act,
> ...
> "claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act;
> ...

[36] Section 2 of the BIA provides:

> Definitions
> 2. In this Act,
> ...
> "claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" or "claim provable" includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor;
> ...

[37] Section 121(1) of the BIA defines what is a "claim provable". It provides:

> Claims provable
> 121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

[38] Numerous cases have held that limitation periods apply to claims under the BIA. Most of these cases refer to the case of Reference re the Debt Adjustment Act, 1937 (Alb.), [1943] 2 D.L.R. 1 (P.C.), in which the Privy Council said at page 11:

... In England it has always been held that, subject to the statutory exception as to debts payable at some certain future time, the petitioning creditors' debt and the debts provable must be debts recoverable by legal process. For example, a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations is not a debt on which a bankruptcy petition can he presented, nor is it one provable in bankruptcy.... The Dominion Act is very similar to the English Bankruptcy Acts so far as those matters are concerned, and there appears to be no reason for thinking that a similar principle would not be applied in Canada to the words "debt due." ... [Emphasis added.]

[39] In the case of Re Hamar (1921), 63 D.L.R. 241 (Sask. K.B.), MacDonald J. stated at page 241:

A debt barred by the statutes of limitation [is] not provable. Ex parte Dewdney; Ex parte Seaman (1808), 15 Ves. Jun. 479, 33 E.R. 836; Ex parte Roffey (1815), 2 Rose 245; 2 Hals. P. 202, para. 325.

[40] Other cases have also held that a provable claim in bankruptcy proceedings must be one recoverable by legal process and therefore not one for which the limitation period has already run. Farm Credit Corp. v. Holowach (Trustee of) 1988 ABCA 216 (CanLII), (1988), 51 D.L.R. (4th) 501 (Alta. C.A.); and Re Morton (1922), 66 D.L.R. 378 (Sask. K.B.).

[41] As s. 2 of the CCAA requires that the claim be "provable" within the meaning of the BIA, following the above authorities, I am satisfied that the Claims Officer was correct in his determination that The Limitations Act would apply to claims brought under the CCAA. At paragraph 3 of his decision, the Claims Officer made a finding of fact that the invoices forming the Claim refer to work done prior to August 13, 2007, and that the limitation period had expired by August 13, 2009, prior to the CCAA application. My review of the invoices confirms this finding of fact and, accordingly, his conclusion that the Claim was time barred is not a palpable or overriding error.

(b) Was the Alberts claim not time barred because Alberts did not discover its claim until the spring of 2009?

[42] Sections 5, 6 and 18 of The Limitations Act are relevant to this issue. They provide:

> Basic limitation period
> 5 Unless otherwise provided in this Act, no proceedings shall be commenced with respect to a claim after two years from the day on which the claim is discovered.
> Discovery of claim
> 6(1) Unless otherwise provided in this Act and subject to subsection (2), a claim is discovered on the day on which the claimant first knew or in the circumstances ought to have known:
> (a) that the injury, loss or damage had occurred;
> (b) that the injury, loss or damage appeared to have been caused by or contributed to by an act or omission that is the subject of the claim;
> (c) that the act or omission that is the subject of the claim appeared to be that of the person against whom the claim is made; and
> (d) that, having regard to the nature of the injury, loss or damage, a proceeding would be an appropriate means to seek to remedy it.
> (2) A claimant is presumed to have known of the matters mentioned in clauses (1)(a) to (d) on the day on which the act or omission on which the claim is based took place, unless the contrary is proved.
> ...
> Burden of proof
> 18 If, in a proceeding, a limitation period is raised against a claimant, the claimant has the burden of proving that:
> (a) the limitation period has not expired; or
> (b) there is no limitation period that applies to the claim.

[43] It is the position of Alberts that it did not discover its claim until the spring of 2009 when Mr. Possberg, who was at that time employed by Big Sky, advised Alberts that Big Sky would not pay them any more money for work done by Alberts at the Pelly and Porcupine locations. Alberts also suggests that it did not receive the final dirt quantity numbers as prepared by the engineering technologists and submitted to Big Sky, and that, without these quantities, it has been unable to prepare and submit invoices to Big Sky. Alberts suggests that s. 6(1)(b), (c) and (d) are applicable in the circumstances of this case.

[44] The parties agree that s. 6 of The Limitations Act is merely a codification of the existing case law, which was set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in the cases of Kamloops (City) v. Nielsen, 1984 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2, and Central Trustco v. Rafuse, 1986 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147. In discussing this codification, in the case of Placzek v. Green, 2009 ONCA 83 (CanLII), 2009 ONCA 83, 307 D.L.R. (4th) 441, the Ontario Court of Appeal stated at paragraph 52:

> 52 Whether under the former limitations regime or under the new Act, in the context of limitations law, "discovered" refers to discovering the material facts on which a cause of > action or claim is based for the purpose of triggering the limitation period: see Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, 1984 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2; Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, 1986 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147, at p. 224; and see s. 5 of the new Act.

[45] The Claims Officer made findings of fact that Alberts was aware of the work it had done and could have pursued a claim but chose not to do so. At paragraphs 49-51 of his decision, the Claims Officer refers to evidence on which he based this determination. Alberts' position that the limitation period would not commence until they were told by Mr. Possberg in the spring of 2009 that they would not be paid any more money, even if accepted as factual, would not be the date for discovery of the claim as required by the Act but, rather, only discovery of the non-payment of its claim. To take the submission of counsel for Alberts to its logical conclusion, if Alberts had not heard from Big Sky for 20 years, it could still claim the limitation period did not start to run. To say that no money is owed is not an acknowledgment of a debt but, rather, an affirmation that there is no debt. I have reviewed the evidence referred to by the Claims Officer at paragraphs 49 to 51 of his decision and, in my opinion, the Claims Officer did not make a palpable and overriding error in this regard and deference must be given to his determination.

(c) Was the Alberts claim not time barred because Big Sky concealed information from Alberts necessary to submit a claim?

[46] Section 17 of The Limitations Act provides that the limitation periods established by the Act will not apply if there has been a wilful concealment by the party against whom the claim is made. Section 17 provides:

> Concealment
> 17 The limitation periods established by this Act or any other Act or regulation are suspended during any time in which the person against whom the claim is made:
> (a) wilfully conceals from the claimant the fact that injury, loss or damage has occurred, that it was caused by or contributed to by an act or omission or that the act or omission was that of the person against whom the claim is made; or
> (b) wilfully misleads the claimant as to the appropriateness of a proceeding as a means of remedying the injury, loss or damage.

[47] The position of Alberts is that Big Sky received a report from the engineering technologist as to the final dirt quantities moved by Alberts but failed to provide this report to Alberts such that Alberts was not in a position to invoice Big Sky for the work that had been done. This same submission was also made to the Claims Officer, who dealt with it in paragraphs 52-57 of his decision. The Claims Officer specifically found that Big Sky had faxed a copy of the report to Alberts in a fax dated January 10, 2007. The fax, which is Document "E" in the index of documents, states in part: "Attached are the final excavation quantities for Site 1 and Site 2 @ Pelly."

[48] While counsel for Alberts submitted that these were not the final dirt quantity reports regarding Pelly and that there were no dirt quantity reports for Porcupine Plain, there was no evidence tendered before the Claims Officer that there had been any "wilful concealment" of the dirt reports. The Claims Officer concluded that both sides bear responsibility for poor record-keeping, but also found that sloppy record-keeping is not wilful concealment. At question 892 of the cross-examination of Mr. Smit, Mr. Smit indicated on behalf of Big Sky that he could not locate any other final quantity report. There was no evidence before the Claims Officer that there is any other final dirt report other than that contained in the January 10, 2007, fax. The onus of proving that Big Sky wilfully concealed such information is upon Alberts, and I conclude, as did the Claims Officer, that Alberts has not met this onus.

[49] In any event, the limitation period found in s. 5 of The Limitations Act commences on the day on which the claim is discovered, not when the claimant discovered the precise amount of the claim. The concept of discoverability, which was initially applicable only to actions in tort, has now been codified and incorporated into ss. 5 and 6 of The Limitations Act. See Pusch v. Freshair Enterprises Ltd., 2007 SKCA 60 (CanLII), 2007 SKCA 60, [2007] 11 W.W.R. 1, and Stomp Pork Farm Ltd. v. Lombard General Insurance Co. of Canada, 2008 SKQB 405 (CanLII), 2008 SKQB 405, [2009] 4 W.W.R. 483 at paras. 34-35. The presumptions found in s. 6(2) are applicable in the circumstances of this case. The Claims Officer determined as a fact that Alberts knew it had a claim and could have pursued it but, as a result of the choice by Mervin Alberts, the president of the company, Alberts chose not to initiate proceedings. There was ample evidence on which the Claims Officer could have made such a determination and, accordingly, I find that he made no palpable or overriding error in his determination that s. 17 of the Act did not apply to this case.

Conclusion

[50] For the above noted reasons, the appeal is dismissed with costs to the respondent, Big Sky.

INTRODUCTION

[1] Lexxor Energy Inc. ("Lexxor") acquired Liberty Oil & Gas Ltd. ("Liberty") after Liberty's plan of arrangement ("the Plan") pursuant to the Companies Creditors' Arrangement Act ("CCAA") R.S.C. 1985 c. C-36 was accepted by its creditors. The transaction closed July 23, 2002.

[2] Hart, J. at all material times was the supervising judge pursuant to the CCAA and Richter, Allan & Taylor Inc. acted as the court-appointed Monitor. The business of Liberty included the production of oil and gas. As is customary in the industry, payment for the previous month's production was not received until the following month. In the case of Liberty, on or about the 25th of each month. A dispute arose between the unsecured creditors and Lexxor as to the amounts available attributable to the post-petition interval between February 25, 2002, the petition date, and July 23, 2002 ("the CCAA Period").

[3] At the core of the dispute was whether revenue accruing during the CCAA Period was available to pay excluded claims, a defined term under the Plan. Lexxor took the position before Hart, J. that the matching principle of accounting was inapplicable, that the Plan indicated that only cash received during the CCAA Period would be used to pay excluded claims and that therefore the cash proceeds ("the basket") were available to pay any unsecured creditor deficiency arising. The impact on the unsecured creditors if Lexxor's position were adopted is significant. It markedly decreases their recovery.

FACTS

[4] The relevant provisions of the Plan voted upon by the unsecured creditors and affirmed by court order dated June 29, 2002 are as follows:

> 2.1 Purpose
> . . . Liberty's Unsecured Creditors are to be paid their first $1,500.00 of Proven Claims in cash and receive their pro rata share of a pool of cash and Lexxor Shares estimated to enable them to recover $0.75 per dollar of Proven Claim. . . .
> 2.2 Claims Not affected - Excluded Claims
> This Plan does not compromise the following Claims and rights that arise in the following capacities (the "Excluded Claims"):
> . . .
> (b) All Claims arising or accruing for either or both of the provision of goods and performance of services to Liberty from and after the date of the Initial Order;
> . . .
> 4.1 Overview
> . . . it is expected that this Plan will enable Liberty to go forward as a viable business entity. It is expected that this Plan will result in:
> (a) repayment of 100% of all Excluded Claims from the Cash Proceeds with the exception of the National Bank Debt which will be dealt with . . .
> (b) a distribution to Unsecured Creditors of approximately $0.75 per dollar, consisting of the balance of Cash Proceeds and Lexxor Shares;
> . . .
> 4.2 Details of the Plan
> . . .
> (d) Payment of Excluded Claims and Distributions to Secured Creditors, and Unsecured Creditors:
> (i) Excluded Claims: If Excluded Claims which are to be repaid in accordance with the provisions of the Plan have not been paid by the Plan Implementation Date, then Liberty shall pay such Excluded Claims from the Cash Proceeds as soon as practicable following the Plan Implementation Date . . .
> (ii) Cash Distributions to Unsecured Creditors: The Monitor shall distribute the portion of Cash Proceeds due to Unsecured Creditors with Proven Claim after payment of or allowance for all Excluded Claims . . .
> "Cash Proceeds"means a cash payment of $6,811,425.00 which will be available to Liberty and the Monitor which will permit Liberty or the Monitor, as applicable, to make the payments to Creditors contemplated by this Plan.

THE MONITOR'S FIFTH REPORT TO THE COURT

[5] In that part of the Fifth Report of the Monitor to the Court dealing with "Lexxor's Interpretation of the Plan", the Monitor stated at p.2:

Digitized by Google

> At the closing date of July 23, 2002, the Liberty had $1,362,484 in liabilities relating to post-petition trade creditors that had not yet been paid by Liberty. These creditors are to be satisfied in full as the amounts owed to them arose subsequent to the Initial Order [FEB. 25, 2002]. Lexxor is of the view that the $1,362,484 is to be paid from the Cash Proceeds as Lexxor acquired no debt. Interpreting the Plan in this fashion has the effect of reducing the cash recovery to Liberty's unsecured creditors from 45 cents on the dollar to 27.5 cents on the dollar.

[6] He continued at pp.2-3:

> . . . The Plan, however, does not address revenues earned by Liberty during the post-petition period. Those revenues which Lexxor believes they are entitled to, are required to pay Liberty's post-petition creditors.
> When Liberty's Plan was advanced to creditors to vote upon, unsecured creditors expected a recovery of 75 cents on the dollar, 45 cents in cash, and 35 cents in Lexxor shares. Paying post-petition trade creditors from the Cash Proceeds advanced by Lexxor was not contemplated. It is the Monitor's view that if the Plan is interpreted in this way the resulting removal of $1,362,484 from funds available to unsecured creditors may have significantly affected their vote on the Plan. Moreover, there were alternatives available other than Lexxor's proposal which both Liberty and the unsecured creditors may have considered differently if those parties were aware that the cash component of their recovery would only be 27.5 cents not 45 cents as a result of post-petition trade creditors sharing in the cash proceeds.
> As well, given Lexxor's interpretation of the Plan, it appears that the quantum of post-petition trade creditors left in Liberty is arbitrary based on the closing date. If Lexxor had acquired Liberty on July 26, 2002, not July 23, 2002, the revenues for June 2002 production would have been received by Liberty and would have been used to pay a portion of Liberty's post-petition trade creditors. Consequently, the date of closing has a substantial impact on the recovery to Liberty's unsecured creditors. The gross revenues received by Liberty for June and July 2002 total approximately $1.55 million net of royalties. It seems consistent to the Monitor that these funds should be available to satisfy Liberty's post-petition trade creditor debt, not the Cash Proceeds.

[7] There were other issues put forward by Lexxor that are not subject to this leave application but which were dealt with by Hart, J. on January 24, 2003.

MONITOR'S SIXTH REPORT TO THE COURT

[8] This report was part of the material before Hart, J. on January 24, 2003. It is dated January 21, 2003. It is short. It repeats the issue as set out in the Monitor's Fifth Report in terms of the position of Lexxor and the payment of post-petition trade creditors. It also indicates that the Monitor had requested a summary of receipts and disbursements for the period February 25 to February 28, 2003 from Lexxor but that that information had not been provided. It goes on to reference Exhibit 1 which the Monitor at p.3 stated :

> . . . reflects Liberty's receipts for July and August, 2002 as well as the disbursements made by Liberty in July 2002, the majority of which were made after the July 23, 2002 closing date. Based on the information available to the Monitor, it appears that during the CCAA Period Liberty had positive cash flow. Consequently, if the revenues and expenses (receipts and disbursements) were matched, it appears that the post-petition trade creditors would have been paid in full and the unsecured creditors of Liberty would receive a greater percentage of the Cash Proceeds.
> Lexxor's interpretation of the Plan may be contrary to a fundamental accounting concept. The concept is known as matching whereby expenses that are linked to a revenue generating activity are matched with the revenues in the period the revenue is recognized. Liberty would have prepared its statements on an accrual basis and therefore would have recognized or recorded the revenue in the period it occurred as well as when the expenses were incurred. Lexxor's interpretation would only reflect Liberty's expenses and not its revenues. The treatment of revenues in Liberty's Plan is not addressed and it is the Monitor's view that in the absence of clear language fundamental accounting principles should be applied.

THE DECISION OF THE SUPERVISING CHAMBERS JUDGE - JANUARY 24, 2003

[9] The transcript of the reasons includes the following:

Digitized by Google

> . . . looking at the plan as a whole and considering the process as a whole and included in that, of course, are the monitor's ongoing reports reporting on positive cashflow, that data coming from the operating company, looking at the various clauses in the plan itself, I am satisfied that the matching principle, as set out by the monitor in its reports, most notable the sixth report, and as contained in the briefs of - at least as contended for - in the briefs of Mr. Davison and Mr. Jull, is the proper principle and that the plan should be and was intended to be interpreted accordingly.
> There is no clear language to rebut a proper application of generally accepted accounting principles and it is clear that the unsecured creditors, at least, were given very strong representations that they could expect, on the basis of ongoing operations between the petition date and the closing date, that they could expect something in the order of $.75 on the dollar. There were other expenses that were not contemplated at the time that drives that figure down. But implicit in that representation I am satisfied was the notion that the matching principle would be applied between those dates and that earnings would be taken into account.
> Now that is the advice and direction that I give to the monitor.

[10] The application for leave to appeal to this Court was filed February 10, 2003. During the period from January 24, 2003 to March 3, 2003, the parties could not agree on the form of order to be taken out pursuant to Hart, J. reasons. On March 3, 2003, another hearing before Hart, J. was held to settle the minutes of his January 24, 2003 order.

THE DECISION OF THE SUPERVISING JUDGE ON MARCH 3, 2003

[11] At this hearing, counsel for Lexxor and Liberty shifted gears, perhaps in an attempt to grasp too much of a good thing. Two alternate forms of order were put forward to Hart, J. on March 3, 2003. So far as this leave application is concerned, the relevant clauses are, as put forward by Lexxor:

> 2. The Court approves and adopts the matching principle as set out by the Monitor in its Reports, most notably the Sixth Report, and, in particular:
> (a) the application of the matching principle is to be applied in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles for the period between February 25, 2002 and July 23, 2002.

[12] The second form of order put forward by the remainder of the parties, including the Monitor and the unsecured creditors, stated:

> 2. The Court approves and adopts the concept of "matching" as applied in the Monitor's Sixth Report, and, in particular, Exhibit "1" to that Report.

[13] At the hearing before Hart, J., Lexxor's counsel repeatedly advocated that the words "generally accepted accounting principles" be used in the form of the order because Hart, J. had mentioned that terminology in his decision on January 24, 2003 and wanted to make sure it applied to the entire CCAA period. Extensive argument occurred before Hart, J. as to the difference in impact on the unsecured creditors if Lexxor's version of the order were adopted or if the remainder, i.e. the majority of the parties' version were adopted. Hart, J. stated at p.42-43 of his March 3, 2003 decision as follows:

> The purpose of this hearing today on - this aspect of the hearing at least is to fix the terms of the order that I granted on January 24th on the monitor's application.
> I have heard all counsel who have spoken on this settlement of terms hearing and I am satisfied that the version that - as between the two versions of the order, the one that accords with the actual order that I granted on the 24th is the order acceptable to the majority of the parties.
> I was at pains in January to make it clear that the matching principle that I wanted to see applied and which formed a basis for the rationale of the order I gave at that time was the matching principle as discussed by the monitor in his sixth report. And that was clear then, it remains clear and, in my belief, the order sponsored by the monitor and the majority of the parties reflects that position. I am not satisfied that the order proposed by Mr. Robinson on behalf of his client [Lexxor] does that.
> Indeed, in my view, his order distorts the matching principle and could well result in a clawback or a diversion of funds from the unsecured creditor or the estate back to Lexxor contrary to the spirit and intent of my order of January the 24th and, indeed, as I see it, contrary to the proper meaning of the plan of arrangement itself.
> So I order and direct that the form of order to be used in the circumstances is the form of order agreed to by the majority of the parties.

THE TEST FOR LEAVE TO APPEAL

[14] Leave to appeal is available under the CCAA by virtue of s. 13. Sections 13 and 14(1) state as follows:

> 13. Except in the Yukon Territory, any person dissatisfied with an order or a decision made under this Act may appeal therefrom on obtaining leave of the judge appealed from or of the court or a judge of the court to which the appeal lies and on such terms as to security and in other respects as the judge or court directs.
> 14. (1) An appeal under section 13 lies to the highest court of final resort in or for the province in which the proceeding originated.

[15] The test for granting leave, as articulated in this Court, involves a single criterion subsuming four factors. The single criterion is that there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties: Resurgence Asset Management LLC v. Canadian Airlines Corporation, 2000 ABCA 149 (CanLII), (2000), 261 A.R. 120, 2000 ABCA 149 ("Resurgence #1") at para 6; Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd., 1999 ABCA 62 (CanLII), 1999 ABCA 62 at para. 22; Resurgence Asset Management LLC v. Canadian Airlines Corporation 2000 ABCA 238 (CanLII), (2000) 266 A.R. 131, 2000 ABCA 238 ("Resurgence #2") at para. 19; Re Multitech Warehouse Direct (1995) A.J. No. 663 at para. 3; 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 63 (C.A.).

[16] The four factors subsumed in an assessment whether the criterion is present are:

(1) Whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;

(2) Whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself;

(3) Whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; and

(4) Whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action: Resurgence #1 at para. 7; Resurgence #2 at para. 19.

[17] The first factor may be influenced by whether there is appellate authority on the question proposed to be considered on appeal: Resurgence #1 at para. 33. It is also interpreted broadly to include not only in the insolvency practice but the industry involving the claimant: Re Blue Range Resource Corp. 2001 ABCA 86 (CanLII), (2001) 281 A.R. 172 at para. 1. It was argued by the unsecured creditors that the point on appeal had no significance to the insolvency practice because it involved an interpretation of the terms of a specific plan of arrangement. Therefore, it was not a point of significance in the sense used. Perhaps. But the timing of payment for oil and gas production in relation to the CCAA period may be of significance to the practice.

[18] The second factor - whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself - is conceded. In argument before me, Lexxor asserted that the proper application of the matching principle would result in a clawback of over a million dollars but Lexxor proposed to cap the clawback at a million dollars in any event of the result. The unsecured creditors indicated that the broader import of the matching principle as put forward by Lexxor would indeed have that result. So it is of significance to the parties.

[19] The third factor involves a consideration as to whether there appears to be an error in principle of law or a palpable and overriding error of fact or that the exercise of discretion by a supervising CCAA judge has been exercised improperly, such as by taking into consideration irrelevant factors or failing to consider relevant factors: Resurgence #1 at para. 41-42. Lexxor's counsel argued strenuously that the alleged misstatement of the matching principle was an error of law, subject to the standard of review of correctness. The other parties submitted that there was no error of law or principle, that the interpretation of the Plan and the adoption of the Monitor's proposal was at most an error of mixed law and fact or the exercise of discretion by the supervising judge. I agree.

[20] The standard of review that would govern the appeal is to be considered: Resurgence #2 at para. 42; Resurgence #1 at para. 28-29. Ancillary to these considerations are indications that a supervising chambers judge under the CCAA should be accorded considerable deference. Their decisions will be interfered with only in the event of unreasonable acts, errors in principle or manifest errors: UTI Energy Corp. v. Fracmaster Ltd. 1999 ABCA 178 (CanLII), (1999) 244 A.R. 93 at para. 3. It has also been stated that an appellate court scrutinizing leave applications under the CCAA should exercise its powers sparingly, that a supervising CCAA judge has an ongoing management process similar to that of a judge making orders during a trial: Duke Energy Marketing Limited Partnership v. Blue Range Resource Corporation, 1999 ABCA 255 (CanLII), 1999 ABCA 255 at para. 3; Luscar Ltd at para. 62. Finally, the four factors are to be assessed in the context of determining whether the criterion has been met by ascribing appropriate weight to each of the elements of the general criterion: Resurgence #1 at para. 46.

APPLICATION IN THIS CASE

Digitized by Google

[21] Central to the issue proposed for appeal is the impact of the application of the matching principle either as propounded by Lexxor or as propounded by the Monitor. The issue is not whether the matching principle is to be applied in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. It is whether Hart, J. erred in law in approving the Monitor's proposed application of the matching principle in his Sixth Report. In my view, he did not. No details were articulated as to what the error complained of was. Only that the words "generally accepted accounting principles" were absent from the formal order actually settled on when they were, in fact, included in the reasons. It is clear from the quotation from the Monitor's Sixth Report what Hart, J. had in mind. He said what he had in mind when he settled the minutes of the order. He, in effect, approved the Monitor's version of the matching principle, i.e. the recognition of revenue during the CCAA period and its availability to satisfy excluded claims. Neither the Monitor nor Hart, J. intended to extend "the matching principle" beyond revenue recognition. In other words, there was no intent to derive a new accounting from February 25 to July 23 on a full accrual basis according to the version put forward by Lexxor.

[22] Whether the appeal would unduly hinder the progress of the action was not strenuously argued. Apparently, an interim distribution can be made and there must be some delay because there is another contingent claim brought by one Martin which remains outstanding and which will delay a final distribution in any event. I am prepared to proceed on the basis that this factor would not and does not influence the decision to grant leave.

CONCLUSION

[23] What is fatal to the applicant's position here is the absence of any demonstrable or, with respect, arguable error in the decision of the supervising chambers judge. He did not pronounce on the matching principle as if he were writing a chapter of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants ("CICA") Handbook in setting out generally accepted accounting principles. What he did do was adopt the Monitor's interpretation of fundamental accounting concepts for the purposes of revenue recognition during the CCAA period. Recognition in terms of revenue is a specialized term pursuant to the CICA Handbook at 1000.41 where it is indicated that "recognition is the process of including an item in the financial statements of an entity". It has a particular application to revenue in terms of the timing of it: See s. 3400 revenue .06, .07 of the CICA Handbook.

[24] Generally accepted accounting principles are defined at paragraph 1000 .59, .60, .61 of the CICA Handbook including departure and applicability. That terminology would not be helpful in a general sense to the resolution of the dispute between the parties here. The particular application of a fundamental accounting concept in terms of revenue recognition and measurement, as recommended in detail by the Monitor, is what is relevant, and that is what Hart, J. ordered.

[25] The application for leave to appeal is denied.

provincial appellate court to grant leave to appeal to that court on a matter arising under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C., 1985, C-36 ("CCAA"). We are all of the view that this Court does have jurisdiction.

Section 15(1) CCAA provides that an appeal from a provincial court of highest resort lies to this Court upon leave being granted by this Court and s. 15(2) further states that this Court has "jurisdiction to hear and to decide according to its ordinary procedure any appeal under subsection (1)". In the absence of any restrictions placed by the CCAA upon the jurisdiction of this Court to grant leave to appeal, the reasoning in MacDonald v. City of Montreal, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 460, applies such that this Court has a discretion to grant leave to appeal from a decision of a provincial appellate court refusing leave to appeal to that court and to hear the appeal on the merits.

The motion to quash the applications for leave to appeal is dismissed and the applications for leave to appeal are granted.

SUCHE J.

[1] The issue before me today is the appropriate distribution of the DIP loan and administrative charges (collectively referred to as the "Court Ordered Charges") incurred since May 15, 2008, when I granted a stay of proceedings pursuant to s. 11 of the CCAA. The DIP loan represents working capital advanced to WME by Heller during the restructuring period; the administrative charges consist of the monitor's fees, its legal fees, WME's legal fees, and director's charges. The amount of these fees is not in issue and both have been paid by Heller out of receivables collected from WME's operations and sale of assets. Thus, the effect of this order will be to require other parties to reimburse Heller for some portion of the $1.8525 million in issue.

Digitized by Google

[2] The monitor, in its twelfth report dated February 12, 2009, recommends that the Court Ordered Charges be allocated among the secured creditors based on pro rata recovery, using actual or estimated recovery. Total recovery for any creditor includes its direct recovery plus allocated sale proceeds, plus any lease payments recovered, less direct costs, which includes expenditures for such things as repairs or reconditioning.

[3] In the result, certain secured creditors will be excluded, namely:

(i) Daimler Chrysler Financial Services, as I ruled its equipment was not subject to the stay, or the Court Ordered Charges;

(ii) three secured creditors, Richard Sobey, Frontier Capital Partners, and Shaw Satellite Services, whose security is subordinate to BDC, which itself only recovered a minimal amount of WME's outstanding indebtedness.

[4] In addition, several office or non-fleet equipment lessors have been excluded on the basis of administrative efficiency because of the very small amount of their respective recoveries.

[5] In making its recommendations, the monitor indicates it relied on the following principles:

(i) all secured creditors should contribute to the cost of restructuring;

(ii) a strict accounting on a cost benefit basis is impractical and not necessary or desirable for allocation purposes;

(iii) security arrangements and priorities should not be readjusted as part of this process;

(iv) the proportion each creditor should be allocated need not be equal; and

(v) the allocation should be equitable, rather than equal.

[6] The monitor also recommends that no DIP charge should be allocated to any equipment parked and available for pickup at the date of filing, or for units that have not yet been returned to a lessor/lender.

THE PARTIES AND THEIR POSITIONS

Heller

[7] Heller provided a demand operating loan to WME margined against 85% of eligible accounts receivable. At the time of the stay, this loan was at $5,643,297, which was secured by accounts receivable of $5,868,630. During the restructuring, Heller continued to allow the operating loan to revolve. It advanced approximately $8,750,000 (Cdn.) and $2,800,000 (U.S.) under the operating loan to pay WME's ongoing business expenses. The pay down of the loan was as a result of a combination of the sale of assets and collection of receivables. In the end, Heller is projected to suffer a loss of approximately $55,000. It makes the point that it would likely have avoided this had its collateral not been used to make lease payments of approximately $394,000 to financing lessors.

[8] Heller supports the monitor's recommendation.

GE

[9] GE leased 44 tractors and 204 trailers to WME under financing leases. Despite my order of July 3, 2008 requiring WME to pay equipment lessors as of August 1, 2008, GE did not seek payment under any of its leases. Ultimately, GE's equipment was included in the purchase by Newco, although as part of that transaction, GE wrote off approximately $250,000 in principal and unpaid interest and renegotiated its leases at an interest rate of 9.25%.

[10] In calculating GE's net recovery, the monitor used the average between the liquidation value of its equipment and the present value of the leases assumed, discounted at the rate of 9.25%. It was argued by several creditors that this discount is commercially unreasonable, and seriously understates the value of GE's recovery.

[11] GE supports the monitor's proposed allocation.

Paccar

[12] as at the date of filing, Paccar leased 83 tractors and 19 trailers to WME, pursuant to financing leases. As a result of my order of July 3, 2008, Paccar received $279,855 in lease payments between August 1 and the date on which its equipment was returned. Although Newco was amenable to including Paccar's equipment in its purchase, Paccar was not agreeable to this. Accordingly, all its equipment (save one or two units which could not be recovered) was returned.

[13] Paccar disputes the monitor's proposed allocation, arguing that GE and Heller have received the lion's share of the benefit from these proceedings and have suffered virtually no loss. It further maintains that it has been unduly prejudiced, as have all equipment lessors, by virtue of the fact that its security has been used to the benefit of WME (and the other secured creditors, particularly Heller) during the restructuring. In contrast, Paccar's security has suffered significant deterioration.

[14] Paccar maintains that the appropriate methodology would be to recognize the net losses suffered. It points out that its loss from its dealings with WME is approximately $2.7 million, compared to Heller's loss of $55,000, on virtually the same level of debt owed. It maintains that GE should be considered to have effected 100% recovery, given that Newco has assumed the leases for its equipment.

Digitized by Google

[15] It also maintains that the benefit of an orderly return by WME was not all that significant, given that Paccar is in the business of supplying transport equipment, and is experienced in recovering vehicles in such situations.

CIT Financial Ltd., Wells Fargo Equipment Finance Company, Capital Underwriters Inc. and Stoughton

[16] These four equipment lessors collectively had 115 trailers under lease to WME at the time of filing. Stoughton maintains that its lease is not a financing lease.

[17] Collectively they argue that the monitor's methodology is not appropriate as it does not adequately reflect the relative benefit derived from the proceedings by different secured creditors. They, too, argue that Heller and GE have essentially been paid in full, which stands in contrast to their situation, each of them having incurred substantial losses. They also did not have the opportunity to have their equipment included in the Newco purchase.

[18] These creditors ask that I allocate specific expenses to the secured creditors who they say benefitted from various expenses, which they did not.

[19] When considering the issue of recovery, they say the only benefit they received from the restructuring was the orderly return of equipment. However, they maintain that several of their units should not be included in the calculation as these were recovered through their efforts, with no help from WME. They also argue that they were well equipped to pick up all units and would have happily done so.

Ramwinn

[20] Ramwinn provided mechanical services to WME. At the time of the stay, it had some vehicles in its possession and, thus, possessory lienholder rights. It also had lien claims against a significant number of other vehicles. An arrangement was made among the various equipment lessors to whom equipment was to be returned, to pay Ramwinn for the work performed in order to secure release of the equipment. Ramwinn was also granted leave to commence certain actions where the limitation dates were approaching during the restructuring period. It also recovered $4,738.12 out of the proceeds of sale of WME's redundant assets.

[21] Ramwinn argues that the money it received from the equipment lessors should not be included in its net recovery, as it was recovered from third parties, not WME. It also points out that Ramwinn's garagekeeper security was of a different kind than the other secured creditors and gave it priority ahead of all other creditors. Thus, to include its recovery in the allocation, effectively amounts to altering the security arrangements between WME and its creditors, which is something that should not be done.

[22] Finally, Ramwinn has a claim against WME in the amount of $18,679 for an account incurred subsequent to the stay. The monitor disputes liability on the part of WME and asserts the account payable by Newco. This dispute has yet to be resolved. Ramwinn seeks payment of this account, or, at least an order requiring that this amount ought to be set aside by Heller pending the determination of the matter.

Maxim

[23] Maxim provided 15 trailers to WME under a lease which it maintains is an operating lease. It was paid its lease payments of $5,985 per month during the restructuring period, and its leases have been assumed by Newco. It says its registration in the Personal Property Registry is for purposes of giving notice that WME is in possession of its equipment, and is not a registration of a security interest.

BDC

[24] BDC was owed approximately $2.5 million plus interest as at the date of the stay. It holds security over all of WME's assets. In general terms, it was subordinate only to Heller on accounts receivable but had a first charge on all other assets. It recovered $78,998.79 plus interest from the redundant asset sale and will recover $260,000 plus interest from the proceeds of the sale to Newco. BDC supports the monitor's methodology and its recommendation, although it argues that the application was premature given that there may be statutory creditors such as Worker's Compensation who might be entitled to be paid their claims in priority to the secured creditors who are being asked to contribute to the Court Ordered Charges. Since the date of the hearing, I have made an order of bankruptcy against WME.

[25] I turn, then, to the legal issues raised on this motion.

TRUE VERSUS FINANCING LEASES

[26] Both Stoughton and Maxim claim to be "true" lessors. The significance of this issue is twofold; s. 11.3(a) of the CCAA provides that an owner of property is entitled to require payment for its use during the restructuring. In addition, of course, the recommendation of the monitor is that only the secured lenders be included in the allocation of the Court Ordered Charges.

[27] Section 11.3(a) was added to the CCAA in 1997, apparently to clarify, or address, the point made by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corp. 1990 CanLII 430 (BC CA), (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105, [1990] B.C.J. No. 2497 (QL), namely, that a stay under s. 11, presumably would never be used to enforce the continuous supply of goods or services without payment for current deliveries. The amendment, of course, makes good sense and also brings the CCAA into line with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended (the "BIA"), which has a similar provision concerning proposals.

[28] The leading authority on the proper interpretation of s. 11.3(a) is Smith Brothers Contracting Ltd., Re 1998 CanLII 3844 (BC SC), (1998), 53 B.C.L.R. (3d) 264, [1998] B.C.J. No. 728 (QL) (B.C.S.C.). There, Bauman J. relied on jurisprudence arising out of personal property security legislation as a starting point in the determination of the circumstances which would bring a party within s. 11.3(a). The distinction between a true lease – that is, a contract of bailment also known as an operating lease – and a financing, or capital lease, is critical, in a variety of situations. Where a supplier of equipment retains ownership solely for the purposes of enforcing the obligations of the debtor/lessee until payment in full has been made, a security interest is created, and ownership is lost.

[29] It is worth observing that the precise legal nature of an agreement in these situations has considerable commercial significance, and seems to have generated something of an ongoing legal struggle. Purveyors of equipment, ever concerned with the legitimate business goal of minimizing risk, try to appear as owners engaging in acts of bailment, thus minimizing the risk of the failure of a debtor/lessee's business, while at the same time passing off the risks of the equipment; that is, loss, damage and defects.

[30] At the same time, it is also true that the world of commercial arrangements is increasingly diverse, complex and focused on cost recovery, so it is very difficult to generalize about how any particular type of relationship will be structured.

[31] All of this is to say that, with the benefit of sophisticated legal advice and astute business judgment, the true nature of arrangements involving the supply of equipment can be very difficult to peg.

[32] In Smith Brothers, Bauman J. concluded that s. 11.3(a) should be narrowly construed, given that it is an exception to a s. 11 stay, which in turn is of a remedial nature, and to be interpreted broadly and in a manner which supports the objectives of the CCAA. He says:

> 56 What I take from all of this is that by preserving a limited remedy for lessors, that is, "payment for use", in a field of commercial transactions which, as I have shown with these leases, encompasses a variety of arrangements with much broader remedies on default, s. 11.3(a) can be interpreted as restricting itself to the type of arrangement which is characterized by the narrower bargain. More simply: this analysis suggests that s. 11.3(a) does not cover all leases. Rather, it covers traditional true leases where the essential bargain is payment for use.

[33] And further, at para. 61:

> 61 It is only payments for the use of leased property that are excepted from a s. 11 stay order under s. 11.3(a). Payments for use and equity are not. Similarly payments for use and equity and an option to purchase are not. This is another reason to conclude the s. 11.3(a) is not inclusive of all forms of lease.

[34] Smith Brothers has been widely accepted and applied by courts across the country. The exclusion of financing leases makes perfect sense, of course, based on the notion of ownership: if the financing lessor has given away ownership, it cannot seek the benefits of ownership. Similarly, the narrow construction of s. 11.3 limiting it to payments for use of equipment only, is consistent with the idea that a supplier could not be expected to continue to provide its product without payment. All this being so, the result has some unintended consequences, which I address later on in these reasons.

[35] I turn, then, to the two creditors in this case, Maxim and Stoughton. I have no hesitation in concluding that the agreement between Maxim and WME is a "true" lease. The essential bargain is payment for use of Maxim's property.

[36] I say this because a review of Maxim's obligations reveal that it undertakes all the risks associated with ownership of the equipment – it is responsible for providing all parts and supplies, carrying out maintenance and repairs, providing road service for vehicles which suffer mechanical breakdown, supplies substitute vehicles to WME if there has been mechanical failure, and provides and pays for all licencing and taxes. The option to purchase is truly an option, and the purchase price is determined by a formula, which seeks to determine the true market value of the vehicle at the time the option is exercised.

[37] It was argued that the "Elective Termination" provision, which allows Maxim to require WME to purchase the equipment in accordance with the Option if a default has not been cured within seven days, changes the nature of the arrangement. I disagree. While on its face it may be an unusual remedy and probably has more bark than bite, it seems that Maxim is letting WME know that it may take tardiness very seriously.

[38] The Maxim agreement does not, in my view, create a security interest. In this regard, I prefer the analysis on Western Express Air Lines Inc., Re, 2005 BCSC 53 (CanLII), 2005 BCSC 53, (2005), 10 C.B.R. (5th) 154, over that in Paccar of Canada Ltd. v. Peterbilt of Ontario Inc., 2005 CanLII 43684 (ON SC), (2005), 18 C.B.R. (5th) 125 (Ont. Superior Court of Justice).

[39] The agreement between Stoughton and WME is a different matter. When Stoughton's agreement is viewed as a whole, I conclude that it is either a financing lease or sufficiently akin to one to fall outside the scope of s. 11.3(a). In particular, the agreement provides that WME bears the entire risk of loss from any cause and is required to make payments to Stoughton regardless of loss, or any claim against the manufacturer of the equipment. The warranties by the manufacturers are excluded. All registration, licence fees and taxes are paid by WME, as is any and all maintenance and repair costs.

[40] The lease also requires that the vehicle be returned to Stoughton in a condition that would require significant expenditure. This, combined with an option to purchase the vehicle for a stated amount, which appears to be the difference between the initial value of the equipment less payments made over the term of the lease, suggest to me that the parties intended that WME purchase the vehicle, and ownership was retained solely for the purpose of enforcing WME's obligation.

THE LAW

[41] I turn, then, to the question of principles of allocation of Court Ordered Charges under the CCAA. This is a matter of discretion for the court. Each case must be judged on its facts, but fundamentally any allocation must be fair and equitable. This does not mean equal, however, as observed by the court in Hunters Trailer & Marine Ltd., Re, 2001 ABQB 1094 (CanLII), 2001 ABQB 1094, (2001), 305 A.R. 175. While it is unfair to ignore the degree of potential benefit that each creditor might derive, it is also accepted that any means of calculating a precise percentage will be arbitrary. The nature of proceedings under the CCAA make a strict accounting on a cost benefit basis impractical and ultimately defeating. It is also accepted that the concept of potential benefit versus direct benefit be utilized, otherwise the process would dissolve into a cost benefit analysis.

[42] In Re Hickman Equipment (1985) Ltd. (In Receivership), 2004 NLSCTD 164 (CanLII), 2004 NLSCTD 164, at para. 17, Hall J. set out the principles to be applied in allocating restructuring costs, as follows:

(1) The allocation of costs ought to be fair and evenhanded amongst all creditors upon an objective basis of allocation;

(2) The fairest basis of allocation would be a uniform percentage of the sale price received for the asset over which the paying creditor had a realizable security interest;

(3) There must be a recognition that the Cost Allocation Plan acknowledges that costs are not limited to the cost of realization alone but relates to all receivership costs whether direct sales cost or indirect cost;

(4) Exceptions to a uniform application of cost to creditors ought not to be lightly granted. Nonetheless it must be recognized that certain activities of the Receiver in managing the affairs of the receivership may have been less intensive or less advantageous with respect to certain groups of assets as opposed to other groups of assets and that the extent of this intensity or disadvantage may not be immediately or easily determinable. To require the Receiver to calculate and determine an absolutely fair value for its services for one group of assets vis-a-vis another would likely not be cost effective, would drive up the overall receivership cost and would likely be a fool's errand in any event;

(5) Exceptions to the rule of uniform cost allocation should only be made where the requirement for such variation is reasonably articulable.

[43] I also agree with the decision in Sulphur Corp. of Canada Ltd. (Re), 2002 ABQB 682 (CanLII), 2002 ABQB 682, (2002), 5 Alta. L.R. (4th) 251, where LoVecchio J. concluded that the court has jurisdiction to grant a charge for debtor in possession financing which ranks in priority to provincial statutory liens, in that case a builder's lien.

ANALYSIS AND DECISION

[44] I begin with the observation that the s. 11 stay in this case has accomplished exactly what the CCAA intends that it do – it allowed a company in desperate financial circumstances the opportunity to restructure so that part of its business which was viable could carry on.

[45] Having said that, good news under the CCAA is a relative thing. Substantial financial carnage occurred along the way, not just to the secured creditors, almost all of whom have recovered at least something, but more so to a long list of unsecured creditors as well as the investors. The overriding theme of the individual submissions before me was that each of the parties would have been in a much better position had they been able to simply realize on their security. That may or may not have been so, but of course the point of the CCAA is that the collective good and the benefit to all stakeholders governs.

[46] The starting point, then, on this motion is the recommendation of the monitor to allocate the Court Ordered Charges among the secured creditors on the basis of a pro rata share using total recovery. This method, in effect, amounts to requiring the secured creditors to pay a fee to collect its outstanding receivables. This certainly is not a novel concept in debt collection.

[47] In my view, the methodology proposed by the monitor on its face is fair. It has an objective basis and is being applied uniformly. Utilizing an "outstanding indebtedness approach", which has been applied in other cases, would not be better as it ends up favouring Heller substantially at the expense of most of the secured creditors.

[48] I agree with the view expressed in Hunjan International Inc., Re 2006 CanLII 63716 (ON SC), (2006), 21 C.B.R. (5th) 276 (Ont. Superior Court of Justice), that where the allocation is prima facie fair, the onus is on an objecting creditor to demonstrate that the proposal is unfair or prejudicial. The monitor, after all, is both court appointed and is intimately familiar with the details of the restructuring, including the particular costs incurred and what has transpired within the company's business operations during the restructuring period.

Digitized by Google

[49] So, then, is there a basis to deviate from the proposal? As noted earlier, while exceptions to a uniform application of costs should not be lightly granted, and the basis for any exception must be reasonably articulable, the court can take into account the different nature of the security held by various creditors, and the potential benefit to them when deciding if the allocation is fair and equitable. This was the focus of much of the argument raised by the secured creditors here.

[50] As I said, for the most part, each minimized the benefit or potential benefit to them of the restructuring process, and pointed to how certain expenditures or actions taken were detrimental to their interests.

[51] My conclusion is that all the secured creditors who the monitor suggests should participate in the allocation received real and meaningful benefit as a result of these proceedings. Heller's success in collecting receivables was increased and made less costly than had the company been placed in receivership. The equipment lessors' effort, cost, delay, and risk in recovering their equipment from various locations across North America was considerably reduced by virtue of WME's organized return of equipment to its yard or other agreed upon locations. Ramwinn's effort, cost and delay in having its accounts paid was substantially less than had it been required to engage in collecting from the equipment lessors, institute court proceedings, and potentially undergo the process of realizing on equipment in its possession. Those creditors, including Heller, BDC and Ramwinn, who shared in the proceeds from the sale of redundant assets or the purchase by Newco, also received real and meaningful benefit from the efforts of WME and the monitor in conducting the sale and the purchase by Newco would not have happened without the restructuring.

[52] Who benefitted more? If a meaningful answer could be given to that question, it would require a careful accounting and cost benefit analysis of each party's circumstance. This is exactly what courts repeatedly have said should not be done. It is economically self-defeating and the cost and the time involved in finding such an answer would only serve to benefit the professionals hired to assist in the process. It is antithetical to objectives of the CCAA.

[53] I am also of the view that the relative loss – the issue raised by Paccar – results more from the nature of the security and the specific business decisions made by the parties. Heller, and Ramwinn, for example, experienced very small relative losses; BDC's and Alterinvest's loss was considerable. The difference in their respective security is substantial. To make adjustments as Paccar requests would, in my view, amount to readjusting priorities among creditors.

[54] At the same time, I do not accept Ramwinn's argument that requiring it to pay the allocation recommended by the monitor is also a violation of this principle. The allocation proposed is not at all disproportionate, in my view, to the benefit accrued to Ramwinn.

[55] I also conclude that there is no basis on which I can or should direct that the funds be held to pay for the outstanding claim Ramwinn advances against WME.

[56] As to equipment obtained directly by lessors, I am of the view that regardless of how lessors recovered equipment, any equipment recovered post stay should be included in the allocation as suggested by the monitor. Self-help is not to be condoned, and a potential benefit not realized due to a creditor's actions, should not be discounted in this analysis, as to do so falls into a detailed cost benefit analysis.

[57] There is one adjustment, however, that I do feel is in order. A discount rate of 9.25% on the present value of GE's leases was used by the monitor. I am not persuaded that this is justifiable. I accept what I take to be the monitor's secondary position of 6% as being reasonable.

EQUIPMENT LEASES

[58] Much attention was paid during these proceedings to the situation of equipment lessors who hold financing leases. Paccar, in particular, but also others, advocated forcefully that they were unduly prejudiced by the stay. They maintain that not only are they not being paid while their assets are being used to the benefit of the other stakeholders, but their underlying security is being rapidly and substantially deteriorated in the process. This, they say, violates one of the fundamental objectives of preventing one creditor from obtaining an advantage over other creditors during the stay period.

[59] It strikes me that the fact that true lessors are entitled to be paid further aggravates this problem in circumstances such as WME's where it has a variety of arrangements with equipment suppliers, including some true leases. It is clearly in a debtor company's economic interests to use financed rather than leased equipment during restructuring. This is what seems to have occurred here (although I make no criticism of WME for doing so).

[60] It is difficult to know how this situation can be remedied, given that the whole point of the CCAA is to relieve a company of ongoing financial burden to allow it the opportunity to restructure. In this case, for example, WME would not have succeeded had been obliged to pay for its equipment during the entirety of the restructuring.

[61] On the particular facts of this case, this issue became somewhat easier to address given the nature of WME's business. Equipment to a transportation company is akin to raw goods to a manufacturer, and I was of the opinion that if WME was going to be viable, at a certain point it would have to demonstrate it could pay for the essential means of production. Otherwise, there would be no purpose to continue the stay. Accordingly, I ordered that financing leases would be paid as of August 1, 2008.

[62] I say all this not to justify or revisit the basis for my earlier decision, but to get to the point that in considering what is equitable, undue prejudice is a reason to adjust what would otherwise be a uniform approach. I am satisfied that equipment lessors in a business operation such as WME's do suffer undue prejudice. In this case, however, the equipment lessors were paid as of August 1. Being financing leases, those payments were not just for use, but included some amount on account of equity. I conclude, then, that the undue prejudice suffered has been recognized, albeit not totally, perfectly or precisely, but, in my view, in an amount sufficient amount to justify the uniform application of the methodology proposed by the monitor.

[63] The last issue is one that perhaps is more controversial. Maxim, the only true lessor, has, in my view, derived the same benefit as the financing lessors from these proceedings. Its trailers were part of WME's network which stretched across North America. As a result of WME's continued operations, its equipment was gathered in and ultimately it was able to assign its leases to Newco without any interruption. While s. 11.3(a) specifically allows for payments for use of equipment despite the stay, I do not see that there is any statutory prohibition against requiring a contribution to the Court Ordered Charges against such a party. Taking a broad and purposive approach to the CCAA, which I am obliged at law to do in determining an equitable distribution of the costs of the restructuring, I conclude that Maxim should share in these charges on some basis.

[64] I do this, recognizing that the only authority on point that was provided to me, Western Express Air Lines, came to a different conclusion. However, I note that there, Brenner C.J.S.C. specifically found that:

> 20 ... If costs are to be allocated in the basis of the benefit to be derived from a successful restructuring, then the lessors should arguably pay nothing. As ordinary creditors for the outstanding lease payments they will likely receive nothing. ...
> . . .
> 22 Accordingly under the general equitable principles of the CCAA I see no basis for requiring the aircraft lessors to bear a portion of the Existing Charges.

[65] Here, I have found the situation to be otherwise. There was a real and meaningful benefit to Maxim.

[66] However, just as GE's assumed lease was discounted for the risk of non-performance by Newco, so, too, should Maxim's. Subject to hearing further submissions on the matter, the amount of Maxim's total recovery should be discounted by the same discount rate, namely, 6%.

CONCLUSION

[67] At the outset of the hearing before me, several disputes remained which concerned the value of various creditors' total recovery.

[68] I understand that through a combination of information provided during the hearing and the findings I have made this afternoon, these have all been resolved.

[69] I trust that these reasons will allow the monitor to calculate the precise allocation among the parties. However, I recognize that it may be that some aspect of my reasons require either clarification or some addition. Should that be the case, I invite the parties to let me know.

Farley J.*:

[1] On Dec. 7, 2001, I heard the motion of The Loewen Group Inc. ("Loewen") and the other Companies listed in Schedule "A" requesting an order pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA") and s. 182 of the Ontario Business Corporations Act ("OBCA"). That relief, inter alia of recognizing the US plan of arrangement and granting a vesting order pursuant thereto, was granted that day. I noted that I was in agreement with the general thrust of the factum of the moving parties. It was observed that there did not seem to be any reported case to date dealing with the non-applicability of s. 126 of the British Columbia Company Act. RSBC 1996, c.62 ("BC Company Act") or its equivalence under the corporations legislation in the other jurisdictions in Canada, given that this subject case dealt with a reorganization pursuant to the insolvency law. Perhaps this analysis will be of some assistance in filling that vacuum.

[2] I agreed with the assertion of the moving parties that s. 126 of the BC Company Act was not applicable in these circumstances so as to require a special resolution of the shareholders (members). Loewen was incorporated under the BC Company Act. S. 126 provides as follows:

> 126(1) The directors must not sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the whole or substantially the whole of the undertaking of the company unless they have the approval of the members given by a special resolution.
> (2) If the approval required by subsection (1) has not been obtained, the court, subject to subsection (3), on application by any member, director or creditor of a company, may do one or more of the following:
> > (a) enjoin a proposed sale, lease or other disposition of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the undertaking of the company;
> > (b) set aside a sale, lease or other disposition;
> > (c) make any further order the court considers appropriate.
> (3) A sale, lease or other disposition of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the undertaking of a company to a person with whom the directors are dealing for valuable consideration and in good faith, is valid, despite the failure of the directors to comply with subsection (1).
> (4) Despite approval by the members of a sale, lease or other disposition of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the undertaking of the company, the directors may abandon the proposed transaction without further action by the members.
> (5) If a company proposes to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the whole, or substantially the whole, of its undertaking, any member of the company may, until 2 days before the meeting at which approval is sought, give a notice of dissent to the company in respect of the member's shares and, in that event, section 207 applies [i.e., appraisal rights].
> (6) This section does not apply to disposition of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the undertaking of the company by mortgage.

[3] In my view s. 126 contemplates a voluntary disposal of the assets and undertaking of a corporation by the directors and not a transfer of property pursuant to a vesting order issued pursuant to the CCAA (or other federal bankruptcy and insolvency legislation), in this case pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA. An arrangement between a bankrupt or insolvent corporation and its directors, including the disposal of the corporation's property to implement the arrangement, falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. Provincial legislation which would otherwise apply to the sale of the corporation's property has no application in such circumstances. See Montreal Trust Co. v. Abitibi Power & Paper Co., [1938] O.R. 589 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 601-2.

[4] I note that s. 126 is directed against conduct by the directors of the corporation, not the fundamental capacity of the provincial corporate entity. In this regard, see s. 126(3) which provides that despite the failure of the directors to comply with s. 126(1), the disposition is valid if effected for valuable consideration and in good faith. Given the nature of these insolvency proceedings, the conditions of s. 126(3) would be met, even if s. 126 were applicable.

[5] I further note that if concurrent bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings are not pending, then pursuant to s. 252 of the BC Company Act, a transfer of the corporation's property could be ordered by a court pursuant to that provincial creditor arrangement without resort to s. 126. See also s. 254 regarding a provincial shareholder arrangement.

[6] In receiverships the directors' powers of management are curtailed or eliminated. See Nova Metal Products Inc. v. Comiskey (Trustee of) reflex, (1990), 1 C.B.R. (3d) 101, 1 O.R. (3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.); Australian Industrial Development Corp. v. Co-operative Farmers & Graziers Direct Meat Supply Ltd. [[1978] V.R. 633 (Australia Vic. Sup. Ct.)] 1978 VIC

LEXIS 91 at p.32, citing Whinney v. Moss Steam Ship Co., [1912] A.C. 254 (U.K. H.L.) at p. 263. See also s. 98 of the BC Company Act which provides:

> 98. If a receiver manager is appointed, the powers of the directors and officers of the corporation cease with respect to that part of the undertaking of the company unless they have the approval of the members given by a special resolution.

It seems to me that the Court's power and authority to grant a vesting order under the CCAA is analogous to the inherent process of a court in a receivership. The court's inherent powers to make orders in a CCAA proceeding have been analogized to those in receiverships for the purpose of recognizing the court's jurisdiction to grant super priorities for certain debtor expenses and debtor in possession (DIP) financing. These quasi-receivership powers permit the court to override the usual ordering of priorities accorded to secured creditors under provincial legislation. See United Used Auto & Truck Pans Ltd., Re, [2000] B.C.J. No. 409 (B.C. C.A.) at para. 22 where the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that the court's inherent jurisdiction in a CCAA proceeding is even broader than its inherent jurisdiction in a receivership.

If a conflict arises between the CCAA and a provincial statute, then under the doctrine of paramountcy, the CCAA provision prevails and the conflicting provisions of the provincial statute are rendered inoperative. See Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. v. Sun Life Trust Co. 1995 CanLII 2575 (BC CA), (1995), 34 C.B.R. (3d) 4 (B.C. C.A.) at pp.11-2. Thus even if s. 126 of the BC Company Act were to be interpreted as applying (which I have found it does not), then in this case the Loewen shareholders would have an opportunity to veto a key component of the US Plan which is being recognized by this Court pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA. Thus there would be an irreconcilable conflict between those provisions of the provincial statute and the CCAA.

[8] Under U.S. bankruptcy law, shareholders having no economic interest to protect have no right to vote on a plan of reorganization. Consistent with that appropriate economic and legal principle, courts in Ontario and Alberta have held that where shareholders similarly have no economic interest to protect, it would defeat the policy objectives of the CCAA to give those shareholders a right to veto a plan of arrangement. In the subject case the shareholders of Loewen have no economic interest. Loewen has in fact to its credit consistently advised in press releases that it considered its shares to be valueless, notwithstanding that these shares continued to trade for somewhat more than nominal value during a considerable portion of the CCAA and U.S. Chapter 11 Bankruptcy Code proceedings.

[9] Most recently Paperny J. (then on the trial bench) stated in Canadian Airlines Corp., Re 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), (2000), 20 C.B.R. (4th) 1 (Alta. Q.B.) at p. 22:

> The rationale for allowing such a reorganization appears plain; the corporation is insolvent, which means that on liquidation the shareholders would get nothing. In those circumstances, as described further below under the heading "Fair and Reasonable", there is nothing unfair or unreasonable in the court effecting changes in such situations without shareholder approval. Indeed, it would be unfair to the creditors and other stakeholders to permit the shareholders (whose interest has the lowest priority) to have any ability to block a reorganization.
> The Petitioners were unable to provide any case law addressing the use of section 185 as proposed under the Plan. They relied upon the decision of Re Royal Oak Mines Inc. 1999 CanLII 15023 (ON SC), (1999), 14 C.B.R. (4th) 279 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) and T. Eaton Co. [(1999), 15 C.B.R. (4th) 311 (Ont. S.C.J.)], supra in which Farley J. of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice emphasized that shareholders are at the bottom of the hierarchy of interests in liquidation or liquidation related scenarios.
> Section 185 provides for amendment to articles by court order. I see no requirement in that section for a meeting or vote of shareholders of CAIL, quite apart from shareholders of CAC. Further, dissent and appraisal rights are expressly removed in subsection (7). To require a meeting and vote of shareholders and to grant dissent and appraisal rights in circumstances of insolvency would frustrate the object of section 185 as described in the Dickerson Report.
> In the circumstances of this case, where the majority shareholder holds 82% of the shares, the requirement of a special resolution is meaningless. To require a vote suggests the shares have value. They do not. The formalities of the ABCA serve no useful purpose other than to frustrate the reorganization to the detriment of all stakeholders, contrary to the CCAA.

[10] A single judge of the Alberta Court of Appeal denied leave to appeal from Paperny J.'s judgment and in doing so noted that her acceptance of the Monitor's report that the shares had no value was a proper exercise of her discretion and could not be said to be unreasonable; subsequently leave applications were denied by a full panel of the Alberta Court of Appeal and by the Supreme Court of Canada on procedural grounds: Canadian Airlines Corp., Re 2000 ABCA 238 (CanLII), (2000), 20 C.B.R. (4th) 46 (Alta. C.A. [In Chambers]) (single judge); Canadian Airlines Corp., Re, 2001 ABCA 9 (CanLII), 2001 ABCA 9 (Alta. C.A.) (full panel); Canadian Airlines Corp., Re, [2001] S.C.C.A. No. 60 (S.C.C.). See also my views in this regard in Cadillac Fairview Inc., Re, [1995] O.J. No. 707 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) at paras. 7-8 and in Royal Oak Mines Inc., Re, [1999] O.J. No. 4848 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) at paras. 2-4. In the latter case I observed:

> It is not proposed that the Royal Oak shareholders actually vote on the transaction set out in the Northgate term sheet—whereby the unsecured creditors and the shareholders would participate in the ongoing but restructured fortunes of Royal Oak but to a relatively quite limited small degree. Of course, if the transaction were to remain an approved asset sale, then neither the unsecured creditors nor the shareholders would receive anything. One might also observe that the shareholders would have to appreciate that, when viewed as to the hierarchy of interests to receive value in a liquidation or liquidation related transaction, they are at the bottom. Further in these particular circumstances there are, in relation to the available tax losses (which is in itself a conditional asset), very substantial amounts of unsecured debt standing on the shareholders' shoulders. That is, the shareholders, even assuming an ongoing operation achieving a turnaround to profitability without restructuring, would have to wait a long while before their interests saw the light of day.
> I see no reason then why the proposal would not utilize the provisions of s. 186 of the OBCA since this "reorganization" provision contemplates inter alia "an order made under the Bankruptcy Act (Canada) [now BIA] approving a proposal". It is curious to note that s. 186(1) OBCA does not incorporate as does s. 191 CBCA that the Court order could also include "(c) any other Act of Parliament that affects the rights among the corporation, its shareholders and creditors"—which language would appear to encompass the CCAA. The CBCA language was introduced by S.C. 1974-75. While this was subsequent to the introduction, of the OBCA in 1970, it was not until the overhaul of the OBCA by S.O. 1982 that what is now s. 186 (then s. 185) was introduced.
> In any event it is also desirable to keep in mind the question of whether the shareholders have a true interest to be protected (and voting)—i.e. an interest which given the existing financial fortunes of the corporation could be said to have some reasonable prospect of economic value. In that regard see > my views in [Cadillac Fairview].... In any event the shareholders will be notified by notice to their last known address that they may participate, if they wish, at the sanction hearing (assuming the structural plan is approved by the requisite majority of the creditors).

[11] The conflict between, on the one hand, the recognition of the U.S. Confirmation Order and the U.S. Plan pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA and, on the other hand, the shareholders voting rights mandated by s. 126 of the BC Company Act may be resolved by applying the constitutional doctrines of dual aspect and paramountcy. The disposition of all of Loewen's property in an insolvency restructuring has a dual aspect. Both s. 18.6 of the CCAA and s. 126 of the BC Company Act are constitutionally valid enactments: s. 18.6 of the CCAA falls within the scope of the federal legislative power over bankruptcy and insolvency and s. 126 of the BC Company Act falls under the scope of provincial legislative powers over the incorporation of provincial companies and property and civil rights. See Olympia & York Developments Ltd., Re reflex, (1993), 102 D.L.R. (4th) 149 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161 (S.C.C.).

[12] In Olympia & York Developments Ltd., Blair J. confirmed the dual aspect doctrine in the case of provincial shareholder arrangements in approving a shareholder arrangement with a solvent corporation (incorporated pursuant to the OBCA) which was part of a larger CCAA arrangement involving insolvent affiliates. The shareholder arrangement involved share transfers, reorganizations, corporate amalgamations, share cancellations and an exchange of shares; it was held that the shareholders would derive intrinsic benefit from such an arrangement. Blair J. held that while the CCAA authorizes creditor arrangements, there is no federal legislation authorizing arrangements between provincially incorporated corporations and their shareholders and the provincial shareholder arrangement provisions fill this gap while operating harmoniously under CCAA creditor arrangements. Olympia & York Developments Ltd. was an example of the practice which has developed of combining a plan of arrangement under the CCAA with a shareholder arrangement or other procedure under provincial corporate legislation. See Houlden & Morawetz, The 2002 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Carswell, Toronto) at para. N-24, p. 1206; Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Insurance Co. of Canada (1989), 73 C.B.R. (N.S.) 195 (B.C. C.A.); Associated Investors of Canada Ltd., Re (1987), 67 C.B.R. (N.S.) 237 (Alta. Q.B.), partially reversed on other point (1988), 71 C.B.R. (N.S.) 71 (Alta. C.A.).

[13] The doctrine of paramountcy has been applied where the exercise of a court's discretion under the CCAA conflicted with the mandatory provisions of provincial legislation. In Smoky River Coal Ltd., Re, [1999] A.J. No. 676 (Alta. C.A.), the Alberta Court of Appeal held as follows:

(a) The CCAA gave the Court discretion to establish a dispute resolution procedure, even though the parties had agreed to arbitrate their disputes.

(b) The Court acknowledged that in other cases, courts had sent specific issues to a provincial forum for resolution. However, in each of those cases the courts had determined that resolution in the other forum would promote the objectives of the CCAA. In this case, the CCAA judge had found that the objectives of the CCAA would be frustrated by a transfer of the dispute to provincial arbitration. The Court held that while a judge has the discretion under the CCAA to permit issues to be determined in another forum, he is under no obligation to do so.

(c) The Court confirmed that the CCAA authorized it to affect permanently the rights of third parties if their actions would potentially prejudice the success of the plan.
(d) Even if the provincial arbitration act required arbitration of the dispute in the circumstances, there would then be a conflict between the CCAA and the provincial act and the CCAA must prevail.
[14] It seems to me that the reasoning in Smoky River Coal Ltd., Re is applicable in the subject case before me since:
(a) The U.S. Plan is a U.S. bankruptcy reorganization which can be recognized and implemented in Canada pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA. It contains no proposal to restructure Loewen's share capital. Confirming the U.S. Plan falls squarely within the jurisdiction of the U.S. Court, and recognizing and effecting the U.S. Court proceedings in Canada falls squarely within the jurisdiction of this Court pursuant to s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA.
(b) In confirming the U.S. Plan under which shareholders received no value and on which they did not vote, the U.S. Court confirmed that Loewen's shareholders have no economic interest to protect. This determination is consistent with recent developments in Canadian law, discussed above, and so there are strong policy reasons for the Ontario Court to recognize and give effect to it.
(c) In such circumstances, a requirement for shareholder approval would defeat the purpose of Loewen's bankruptcy reorganization because it would give shareholders, who have no economic interest to protect, a right to veto and potentially extract an economic benefit. This would give rise to irreconcilable conflict between s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA and s. 126 of the BC Company Act. Under the constitutional doctrine of paramountcy, s. 18.6(2) of the CCAA prevails.
Motion granted.

PART III
GENERAL CLAIMS

Summary: General Provisions that Tailor the Application of the CCAA - Sections 19 to 43

Section 19 details that the CCAA can only apply to compromises or arrangements in respect of certain debts or liabilities that are basically present or future as owed by the debtor applicant. Subsection (2) details that the CCAA cannot be used to seek court sanction of a compromise in respect of certain other liabilities, unless the "creditor" agrees to the compromise, being:

- any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence;
- any award of damages by a court in civil proceedings in respect of
    - bodily harm intentionally inflicted, or sexual assault, or
    - wrongful death resulting from an act referred to in subparagraph (i);
- any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in Quebec, as a trustee or an administrator of the property of others;
- any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability of the company that arises from an equity claim; or
- any debt for interest owed in relation to an amount referred to in anything above.

Section 20 determines the amount of the claims that is used to calculate for voting purposes. It basically provides that the amount, for unsecured creditors, will be that that satisfies the proof of claim provisions in either the WURA or BIA or that amount proven in court. In the case of secured creditors said amount is basically that amount otherwise proven subject to the WURA or BIA or, in court. Subject to subs. (2) the debtor may allow a claim into a class for voting purposes subject to future litigation to have it assessed.

Digitized by Google

Section 21 prompts for the law of set-off to apply to all claims for purposes of the Act whereby anything owing to the debtor will be taken into account in establishing the amount of the claim for voting purposes.

Pursuant to section 22 the debtor may divide its creditors into classes after applying to the court for guidance on the issue. Subsection 22(2) provides that the classes shall be based on similarity of commonality of interest taking into account:

- the nature of the debts, liabilities or obligations giving rise to their claims;
- the nature and rank of any security in respect of their claims;
- the remedies available to the creditors in the absence of the compromise or arrangement
- being sanctioned, and the extent to which the creditors would recover their claims by exercising those remedies; and
- any further criteria, consistent with those set out in the paragraphs above, that are prescribed.

Subsection (3) provides that a creditor related to the debtor can vote against but not for a compromise.

Section 22.1 provides that creditors with equity claims cannot be amalgamated with other classes of creditors and cannot vote on a proposal.

Section 23 provides the duties and activities of the monitor once appointed. Basically they shall cause to be published in a court-approved newspaper a notice of compromise and advising to creditors with claims of $1,000 or more same, review the debtor's cash-flow statement and file an appraisal off it with the court, and make other appraisals and filings as the subsection provides. This is the actual activity that allows the court to have foundation that the various parties, including itself, interests are being attended to. The list of activity and duties is rather extensive so you should study it below. Subsection (2) provides that as long as the monitor has carried on these functions in good faith and with reasonable care he is immune from action if loss, to any party, results.

Section 24 allows the monitor open access to any financial records the debtor may have to allow her to assess the situation.

Section 25 requires the Monitor to act honestly within the Code of Ethics prescribed to trustees described in the BIA.

Section 26 requires the Superintendent of Bankruptcy (SB) to maintain appropriate information related to any proceedings under the CCAA and provide such to any that ask upon payment of appropriate fee.

Section 27 allows the SB to intervene as a party to have a monitor's activity or appointment regulated by the court.

Sections 28 through 31 deal with the powers of the SB in regulating the discipline of monitors by allowing investigation, delegation of investigation, and if need be, suspension on licence.

Sections 32 allows the debtor to disclaim or resiliate any agreement the debtor has with any party provided the monitor is in agreement while pursuant to subs. (2) the other party may apply to court to refuse the disclaimer/resiliation. Pursuant to subs. (3), if the monitor does not agree with the disclaimer the debtor company can apply for a court consideration of such and pursuant to subsection (4) the court will consider the following issues in granting it:

- whether the monitor approved the proposed disclaimer or resiliation;
- whether the disclaimer or resiliation would enhance the prospects of a viable compromise or arrangement being made in respect of the company; and
- whether the disclaimer or resiliation would likely cause significant financial hardship to a party to the agreement.

Section 33 deals with collective bargains that the debtor company has entered into and that per the statute they are to remain in force. Additional subsections in section 33 deal with whether the debtor can open a collective agreement to facilitate better recovery.

Section 34 attends to instances where the debtor may have agreements regarding security or suffer payments of forfeitures accelerated as a result of the petition under the CCAA. In such a case they are not allowed. Subs. (2) through the remaining section operate to disallow refusal to continue utilities and leases etc.

Section 35 provide that the debtor is to supply whatever assistance is necessary to the monitor to allow her to carry out her duties. Subs. (2) provides that, effectively, this includes, making reference to the BIA bankrupt duties:

- make discovery of and deliver all his property that is under his possession or control to the trustee or to any person authorized by the trustee to take possession of it or any part thereof;
- (a.1) in such circumstances as are specified in directives of the Superintendent, deliver to the trustee, for cancellation, all credit cards issued to and in the possession or control of the bankrupt;
- deliver to the trustee all books, records, documents, writings and papers including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, title papers, insurance policies and tax records and returns and copies thereof in any way relating to his property or affairs;
- at such time and place as may be fixed by the official receiver, attend before the official receiver or before any other official receiver delegated by the official receiver for examination under oath with respect to his conduct, the causes of his bankruptcy and the disposition of his property;
- within five days following the bankruptcy, unless the time is extended by the official receiver, prepare and submit to the trustee in quadruplicate a statement of the bankrupt's affairs in the prescribed form verified by affidavit and showing the particulars of the bankrupt's assets and liabilities, the names and addresses of the bankrupt's creditors, the securities held by them respectively, the dates when the securities were respectively given and such further or other information as may be required, but where the affairs of the bankrupt are so involved or complicated that the bankrupt alone cannot reasonably prepare a proper statement of affairs, the official receiver may, as an expense of the administration of the estate, authorize the employment of a qualified person to assist in the preparation of the statement;
- make or give all the assistance within his power to the trustee in making an inventory of his assets;
- make disclosure to the trustee of all property disposed of within the period beginning on the day that is one year before the date of the initial bankruptcy event or beginning on such other antecedent date as the court may direct, and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included, and how and to whom and for what consideration any part thereof was disposed of except such part as had been disposed of in the ordinary manner of trade or used for reasonable personal expenses;

- make disclosure to the trustee of all property disposed of by gift or settlement without adequate valuable consideration within the period beginning on the day that is five years before the date of the initial bankruptcy event and ending on the date of the bankruptcy, both dates included;
- attend the first meeting of his creditors unless prevented by sickness or other sufficient cause and submit thereat to examination;
- when required, attend other meetings of his creditors or of the inspectors, or attend on the trustee;
- submit to such other examinations under oath with respect to his property or affairs as required;
- aid to the utmost of his power in the realization of his property and the distribution of the proceeds among his creditors;
- execute any powers of attorney, transfers, deeds and instruments or acts that may be required;
- examine the correctness of all proofs of claims filed, if required by the trustee;
- in case any person has to his knowledge filed a false claim, disclose the fact immediately to the trustee;
- (n.1) inform the trustee of any material change in the bankrupt's financial situation;
- generally do all such acts and things in relation to his property and the distribution of the proceeds among his creditors as may be reasonably required by the trustee, or may be prescribed by the General Rules, or may be directed by the court by any special order made with reference to any particular case or
- made on the occasion of any special application by the trustee, or any creditor or person interested; and
- until his application for discharge has been disposed of and the administration of the estate completed, keep the trustee advised at all times of his place of residence or address.

Section 36 restrictions the debtor's ability to dispose of any property outside the normal business of the debtor while the section also allows the court to order any disposition even without approval of the shareholders. Subs. (2) provides that the debtor is required to advise any affected secured creditor of said disposition while subs. (3) allows the court to consider, among other things, in granting the authorization to dispose of a property:

- whether the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition was reasonable in the circumstances;
- whether the monitor approved the process leading to the proposed sale or disposition;
- whether the monitor filed with the court a report stating that in their opinion the sale or disposition would be more beneficial to the creditors than a sale or disposition under a bankruptcy;
- the extent to which the creditors were consulted;
- the effects of the proposed sale or disposition on the creditors and other interested parties; and
- whether the consideration to be received for the assets is reasonable and fair, taking into account their market value.

The rest of the subsections in the section deal with dispositions to related parties of debtor.

Section 36.1 attends to undervalue transfers or preferences exactly similar to the BIA. See the material on that Act's provisions for more information.

Pursuant to section 37 deemed trusts to Her Majesty or any province for income tax, Canada Pension Plan or Employment Insurance are continued, though not in respect of other deemed trusts not mentioned in the section.

Digitized by Google

Section 38 deals with workers compensation claims making them unsecured claims for purposes of the CCAA.

Section 39 requires that any right Her Majesty or a province has as a secured creditor must be registered as at the date that the CCAA proceedings commence to be recognized as secured while subs. (2) places limitations on those amounts.

Section 40 makes the CCAA binding on Her Majesty as well as any province.

Section 41 prompt for the inapplicability of the compromise provisions in the Winding Up and Restructuring Act contained in the latter's s. 65 and 66.

Section 42 allows for the amalgamation and combined application of the CCAA provisions with any provincial laws that may exist regarding similar objectives.

Section 43 converts all foreign currency claims to their value in Canadian as at the date of initial CCAA application, for purposes of voting and compromise, unless specified to the contrary in the proposed compromise.

Claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement - Sec 19
19. (1) Subject to subsection (2), the only claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company are

(a) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company is subject on the earlier of

(i) the day on which proceedings commenced under this Act, and

(ii) if the company filed a notice of intention under section 50.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or commenced proceedings under this Act with the consent of inspectors referred to in section 116 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the date of the initial bankruptcy event within the meaning of section 2 of that Act; and

(b) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred by the company before the earlier of the days referred to in subparagraphs (a)(i) and (ii).

Reasons for Judgment of The Honourable Madam Justice Paperny
Concurred in by The Honourable Madam Justice McFadyen
Concurred in by The Honourable Mr. Justice Clark

Introduction

[1] This appeal raises a pure question of law: Does the Landlord's Rights on Bankruptcy Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-5 (LRBA) apply to the determination of a landlord's claim when the debtor tenant has received protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (CCAA).

Facts

[2] The respondent, Remington Development Corporation (Remington) is agent for the landlord of the appellant, Alternative Fuel Systems Inc. (AFS). Remington had two agreements with AFS to lease commercial space in Calgary from August 1, 2000 to January 31, 2016. Finding itself in financial difficulty, AFS petitioned and on April 9, 2003 received the order that it was a company to which the CCAA applies and could file a plan of compromise or arrangement under the CCAA. As part of its restructuring, AFS surrendered the leased premises to Remington in May 2003.

[3] Both Remington and AFS sought a valuation of the landlord's claim and a determination whether, as an unsecured creditor, the claim should form part of the unsecured creditor class in the CCAA. Before the chambers judge, AFS calculated Remington's claim under the LRBA was approximately $96,000 without considering offsets for prepaid rent and other items. On a full accounting, the sum could be further reduced to $15,000. A non-discounted mitigated claim for the unexpired term of the leases would be about $4.2 million, although, as a result of mitigation the largest portion of Remington's claim has now been reduced to $1.1 million while the smaller portion currently remains at $400,000.

[4] The chambers judge held that the LRBA does not automatically apply to limit or quantify the landlord's claim in CCAA proceedings.

Appellant's position

[5] The thrust of the appellant's submission, broadly stated, is that under the CCAA the amount of a landlord's claim in Alberta is the same amount as would be calculated in a bankruptcy. More specifically, the appellant submits that an unbreakable thread connects the CCAA to the LRBA. The thread begins with the plain meaning of s. 12(1) of the CCAA which refers to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (BIA) to define claims under the CCAA. The thread continues to s. 12(2) of the CCAA which provides for a determination of the amount represented by a claim in three different ways. In this appeal, the applicable sub-clause, s. 12(2)(a)(iii) provides that amount is that which might be proven under the BIA. A third link is s. 136 of the BIA which sets a priority for payment to a bankrupt's creditors and specifically, s. 136(f), which includes a landlord for priority payment, but limits the amount which may be claimed by a landlord. The next connection, says the appellant, is s. 146 of the BIA which further provides that in addition to ss. 136 and 73(4) of the BIA, rights of landlords are determined according to the law of the province in which leased premises are situated. In Alberta, that law includes the LRBA which further limits a landlord's rights in bankruptcy. Through this series of statutory provisions, it submits Parliament has provided that the landlord's rights under the CCAA are identical to those under the BIA and thus, under the LRBA.

Relevant legislation

[6] The relevant provision in the CCAA is s. 12 which provides:

> 12. (1) For the purposes of this Act, "claim" means any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that, if unsecured, would be a debt provable in bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.
> Determination of amount of claim
> (2) For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor shall be determined as follows:
> (a) the amount of an unsecured claim shall be the amount
> (i) in the case of a company in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act,
> (ii) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a receiving order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act, or
> (iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor; and

(b) the amount of a secured claim shall be the amount, proof of which might be made in respect thereof under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act if the claim were unsecured, but the amount if not admitted by the company shall, in the case of a company subject to pending proceedings under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, be established by proof in the same manner as an unsecured claim under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, as the case may be, and in the case of any other company the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or the creditor.

Admission of claims

(3) Notwithstanding subsection (2), the company may admit the amount of a claim for voting purposes under reserve of the right to contest liability on the claim for other purposes, and nothing in this Act, the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act prevents a secured creditor from voting at a meeting of secured creditors or any class of them in respect of the total amount of a claim as admitted.

[7] The following provisions in the BIA are also relevant:

Scheme of Distribution

Priority of claims

136. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

...

(f) the landlord for arrears of rent for a period of three months immediately preceding the bankruptcy and accelerated rent for a period not exceeding three months following the bankruptcy if entitled thereto under the lease, but the total amount so payable shall not exceed the realization from the property on the premises under lease, and any payment made on account of accelerated rent shall be credited against the amount payable by the trustee for occupation rent;

...

Application of provincial law to landlords' rights

146. Subject to priority of ranking as provided by section 136 and subject to subsection 73(4), the rights of landlords shall be determined according to the laws of the province in which the leased premises are situated.

[8] The provisions in the LRBA which the appellant submits are relevant are:

Assignment of property

1 A lessee against or by whom a receiving order or assignment is made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) is deemed to have made an assignment of all the lessee's property for the general benefit of the lessee's creditors before the date of the receiving order or assignment.

Payment of rent after assignment

2 As soon as the receiving order or assignment is made

(a) the landlord of the lessee is not afterwards entitled to distrain or realize the rent by distress, and

(b) the trustee in whom the property of the lessee vests under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) shall pay to the landlord in priority to all other debts

(i) an amount not exceeding in value the distrainable assets of the lessee and not exceeding 3 months' rent accrued due before the date of the receiving order or assignment, and

(ii) the costs of distress, if any.

Surplus rent

3 The lessee is a debtor to the landlord

(a) for all surplus rent in excess of the 3 months' rent accrued due at the date of the receiving order or assignment, and

(b) for any accelerated rent to which the landlord may be entitled under the lease but not exceeding an amount equal to 3 months' rent.

When landlord unable to claim from lessee

4 Subject to section 3, the landlord has no right to claim as a debt any money due to the landlord from the lessee for any portion of the unexpired term of the lessee's lease.

Analysis

[9] As a pure question of law, the standard of review is correctness. I agree with the Chambers Judge that the LRBA does not apply to limit or quantify the landlord's claim in CCAA proceedings.

[10] I arrive at this conclusion on the basis, first, that the condition precedent set out in the LRBA for its application (and mirrored in its correlative, Part II of the BIA, which deals with Receiving Orders and Assignments) is not satisfied when the debtor is not the subject of a receiving order or an assignment, nor does the LRBA fit within the scheme and intent of the CCAA. Second, the interpretation of s. 12 of the CCAA does not direct the importation of all the provisions of the BIA into the CCAA when determining the amount of the claim. Third and most significantly, the objects of the BIA and CCAA are distinct and each must be interpreted with their respective purposes in mind.

The condition precedent for application of the LRBA

[11] That provincial legislation can deal with a landlord's rights upon the bankruptcy of a tenant if it does not conflict with the BIA (Principal Plaza Leasehold Ltd. v. Principal Group Ltd. (1996), 188 A.R. 187 (Q.B.)) is not in dispute. There is no question that the LRBA properly operates within a bankruptcy context, when the debtor is the subject of either a receiving order or an assignment.

[12] In such a case, s. 136(1)(f) of the BIA confers on the landlord a preferred claim for arrears of rent for a specified period and provincial legislation is called into operation pursuant to s. 146. Consequently the LRBA's provisions are invoked.

[13] The appellant seeks to invoke these provisions when a debtor is not the subject of a receiving order or an assignment, but rather, proposes a plan of arrangement under the CCAA. In my view, the LRBA's provisions are not invoked in such circumstances.

[14] The LRBA sets out the conditions under which the provisions of the Act operate. The triggering condition is that a receiving order or assignment under the BIA be made against or by the lessee. Section 1 describes the effect of a receiving order or assignment into bankruptcy. Section 2 operates "as soon as the receiving order or assignment is made", making it clear that the pre-condition is the receiving order or assignment.

[15] The entire LRBA should be read as relying upon the operation and effect of a receiving order or assignment under the BIA. Sections 3 and 4 of the LRBA, which limit the landlord's debt, must be interpreted as requiring the condition precedent of a receiving order or assignment. Nothing in the wording of the LRBA suggests it applies in the absence of a receiving order or assignment into bankruptcy, and no receiving order or assignment is made while a company attempts to restructure under the CCAA.

Section 12 of the CCAA

[16] The specific sub-clause at issue in this appeal is s. 12(2)(a)(iii), which appears under the heading "Determination of amount of claim". Omitting the irrelevant sub-clauses, it states:

> For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor shall be determined as follows: (a) the amount of an unsecured claim shall be the amount...(iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor.

[17] It is the appellant's position that this sub-clause must be interpreted as mandating the importation of the BIA and LRBA to expressly calculate the amount provable. I reject that interpretation for the three reasons set out below.

Use of the Word "Might" Conveying Discretion

[18] The first basis for my disagreement stems from Parliament's use of the words "might be made" (in sub-clause iii) which per se confers flexibility. This is underscored and reinforced when contrasted with the imperative "has been made" specified in the other two sub-clauses, (i) and (ii). In my view, "might" should be understood as meaning "could", i.e., the claim may be capable of being proven under the BIA.

[19] This interpretation is consistent with a long line of unassailable authorities. In Algoma Steel Corp. v. Royal Bank of Canada reflex, (1992), 11 C.B.R. (3d) 11 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Farley J. held that the word "shall" in s. 12(2) which then stated that "the amount represented by a claim...shall be defined as follows..." should be interpreted as "may" when one appreciates that the debtor companies and all affected stakeholders are entitled to a broad and liberal interpretation of the jurisdiction of the court under the CCAA.

[20] Ten years later, the following statement by Houlden and Morawetz in 2003 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Toronto: Carswell, 2002) at 1100 is analogous to the issue before us. Citing In re Parisian Cleaners and Laundry Ltd. v. Blondin (1938), 20 C.B.R. 452 (Que. C.A.), they stated: "The purpose of s. 12(2) [of the CCAA] is to provide a means of determining the amount of a claim, not to incorporate the provisions of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act as to what constitutes a preferred or unsecured claim.". (Emphasis added) The same proposition is also supported by Québec (Sous-ministre du revenu) v. Wynden Canada Inc. (1983), 47 C.B.R. (N.S.) 76 (Que. S.C.), and Quebec Steel Products (Industries) Ltd. v. James United Steel Ltd. (1969), 5 D.L.R. (3d) 374 (Ont. H.C.).

[21] In my view, the words "might be made under the BIA" should be understood to mean "could be made". In other words, the claim may be, but must not necessarily be, capable of being proven under the BIA.

Use of the Word "Determined" Conveying "Methodology"

[22] My second disagreement stems from my broader interpretation of the word "determined" as used in the opening sentence of s. 12(2). The interpretation urged upon us by the appellant is that "determined" should be interpreted as meaning "calculated". However, reference to the BIA indicates that use of the term has two meanings: it can mean either a "methodology" or a "calculation", i.e., a formula for calculating a specific amount.

[23] That "determination" is used to mean "methodology" is illustrated by the following example. Section s. 121(1) broadly defines "claims provable" and the subsequent sub-sections add more specificity. Section 121(2) states that the "determination" of whether contingent and unliquidated claims are provable claims and their valuation is in made accordance with s. 135. The term "determination" in s. 121(2) clearly refers to a methodology, since s. 135 does not provide a formula for calculation of the amount, but rather a methodology at s. 135(1.1):

> 121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.
> Contingent and unliquidated claims
> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.
> Determination of provable claims
> 135(1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[24] When Parliament directed that the claims of unsecured creditors are those that might be proven under the BIA, it did not refer to the quantification or calculation of the amount provable in bankruptcy. In my view, it was intended to define who is included in the scheme of the CCAA, so as to override conflicting common law definitions.

The Dilemma of Which Section of the BIA To Invoke to Calculate Quantum

[25] This interpretation is supported by my third area of disagreement with the appellant. Were one to adopt the appellant's interpretation of sub-clause (iii), i.e., that the amount of the claim must be calculated in accordance with the methodology for calculating such claims under the BIA/LRBA, the issue then raised is: should one apply the method set out in s. 65.2 or that in s. 136, both of which apply to landlords? Each method yields substantially different results.

[26] As a preface, and at the risk of stating the obvious, the BIA governs two types of debtors. Part III, titled "Proposals", is similar to the scheme and object of the CCAA, and is intended to govern those debtors who, with the support their creditors, have a reasonable hope of returning to financial viability. In contrast, Part II, titled "Receiving Orders and Assignments" and its companion section, Part V ("Administration of Estates") govern situations where the debtor has no hope of returning to financial viability, but rather, its assets are vested in a trustee for distribution among the debtors' creditors. These two discrete objects of the BIA are essential to the analysis that follows.

[27] For landlords, the direction in s. 12(1)(a)(iii) of the CCAA cannot be read as requiring the valuation of the amount of the claim as set out in the BIA because the BIA itself provides two different methods and amounts that may be applicable to landlords' claims.

[28] The first is s. 65.2 (in Part III, Proposals), which makes provisions for disclaiming commercial leases. If the disclaimer of the lease is in accordance with the requirements of the section, s. 65.2(4) sets out the amount the landlord may claim as follows:

> Effects of disclaimer
> (4) Where a lease is disclaimed under subsection (1),
> (a) the landlord has no claim for accelerated rent;
> (b) the proposal must indicate whether the landlord may file a proof of claim for the actual losses resulting from the disclaimer, or for an amount equal to the lesser of
> (i) the aggregate of
> (A) the rent provided for in the lease for the first year of the lease following the date on which the disclaimer becomes effective, and
> (B) fifteen percent of the rent for the remainder of the term of the lease after that year, and
> (ii) three year's rent; and
> (c) the landlord may file a proof of claim as indicated in the proposal.

[29] Section 65.2 limits a landlord's claim under a proposal and provides for a larger amount than when the debtor is the subject of a receiving order or assignment. This accords with authorities which suggest that proposals must offer creditors some better advantage than a bankruptcy: Re Pateman reflex, (1991), 5 C.B.R. (3d) 115 (Man. Q.B.), Re Sumner Co. (1984) Limited (1987), 64 C.B.R. 219, In Re Allen Theatres Ltd. (1922), 3 C.B.R. 145 (Ont. S.C.).

[30] Section 136 (in Part V) provides a scheme for the distribution of the assets of a bankrupt who is the subject of a receiving order or an assignment under Part II. Landlords are specifically provided for at s. 136(1)(f) as follows:

> Priority of claims
> 136. (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:
> (f) the landlord for arrears of rent for a period of three months immediately preceding the bankruptcy and accelerated rent for a period not exceeding three months following the bankruptcy if entitled thereto under the lease, but the total amount so payable shall not exceed the realization from the property on the premises under lease, and any payment made on account of accelerated rent shall be credited against the amount payable by the trustee for occupation rent;

[31] This is the section that the appellant urges upon us as being part of the unbreakable thread. In my view, nothing in the wording of s. 136 assists it's position. On the contrary, the limitation on the amount a landlord may claim in s. 136(f) appears under the heading "priority of claim". As appellant's counsel explained, there is a trade off, the amount which the landlord receives is reduced from the full amount which could be claimed under a lease and in return, the landlord receives a priority position when the proceeds of the bankrupt's property is paid out. Section 136 requires payment of the enumerated claims in full in the order specified before any other unsecured creditor receives payment.

[32] However, there is no scheme for priority payment of claims set out in the CCAA. Thus, the effect on the landlord, were this interpretation accepted, is to compromise the claim not once, but twice, without the benefit of any priority, as noted by the Chambers Judge.

[33] If s. 65.2 were to be applied, it assumes that the proposal provisions, Part III of the BIA, applies to CCAA and not Parts II and V, the bankruptcy provisions. Section 146 of the BIA which allows for the application of provincial law is also included in Part V and its provisions are in reference to s. 136 which sets out distribution in bankruptcy proceedings, not proposals.

[34] If s. 12(2)(a)(iii) of the CCAA requires calculation of an amount in accordance with the BIA, as submitted by the appellant, it would have to stipulate which of ss. 65.2 or 136 is applicable. It does not, providing further support that the BIA does not direct the calculation of the amount of a landlord's claim in a CCAA proceeding or that the CCAA requires s. 136 of the BIA be applied.

[35] During oral argument, the appellant sought to distinguish cases involving Ontario's provincial legislation which is not as restrictive as the Alberta LRBA. But the provincial legislation setting out the rights of landlords in bankruptcy proceedings is irrelevant if ss. 136 and 146 of the BIA do not apply to the CCAA.

[36] There are numerous cases dealing with landlords' claims that have treated the CCAA as an autonomous statute and did not look to s. 12 as directing the use of BIA provisions to determine the amount of the claim. Re Woodward's Limited 1993 CanLII 870 (BC SC), (1993), 20 C.B.R. (3d) 74 (B.C.S.C.), is an example of the purposive approach taken by courts under the CCAA in dealing with creditors.

[37] Decisions in Re Agnew Group Inc. unreported February 4, 1994 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation v. Bank of Nova Scotia reflex, (1991), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 621 (Ont. Gen. Div.), Grafton-Fraser Inc. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce reflex, (1992), 90 D.L.R. (4th) 285 (Ont. Gen. Div.), and Ambro Enterprises Inc. (Re) reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 80 (Ont. Gen. Div.), all treated landlord's claims very differently than the BIA and took a broad approach to the classification and quantification of landlords' claims to facilitate the object and purpose of the CCAA.

[38] The appellant was unable to cite any authority to compel us to a different conclusion. The appellant submits that the Court's decision in Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd. 1999 ABCA 179 (CanLII), (1999), 175 D.L.R. (4th) 703, determined that s. 12(2) provides that an amount of a claim must be that amount as provided for under the BIA. I disagree. The issue in Smoky River (supra) was whether a CCAA judge had the discretion to establish a procedure for resolving a dispute between parties who had agreed by contract to arbitrate their disputes. This required that the dispute fall within the jurisdiction of the CCAA. In other words, the plaintiffs in the dispute had to be considered "creditors" for the purpose of the CCAA. The court's focus was on s. 12(1) of the CCAA, not s. 12(2). This Court looked to the similar wording between the BIA and CCAA referring to "debt provable in bankruptcy" and "claim provable in bankruptcy" to conclude that the plaintiffs, who had a contingent and unliquidated claim, were creditors. Valuation of the amount was not an issue since the claim was contingent and unliquidated. The issue was solely one of the court's discretion to establish a process to resolve the amount of the claim.

[39] The wording in s. 12(2)(a)(iii) is intended to be and must be general. That sub-clause captures all the unsecured claims of a company not subject to a receiving order or assignment or winding up. These unsecured claims include landlords as creditors, but also capture a host of unliquidated and contingent claims, the latter of which would not be defined as creditors at common law. Thus, the phrase "proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act" directs that the various methods within the BIA to determine claims are to be employed to cover the wide range of potential claims. This clause is intended to define who is included in the scheme of the CCAA and override conflicting common law definitions.

[40] Moreover, amendments to both the BIA and CCAA in 1997 and 1998 were intended to harmonize the two pieces of legislation. Changes were made to the BIA to enhance the rights given to landlords, but no change in either legislation amended or introduced provisions to apply the BIA to landlords in CCAA proceedings.

[41] More recently, in November 2003, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce released "Debtors and Creditors Sharing the Burden: A Review of the BIA and the CCAA", a report calling for substantial reform of the federal insolvency statutes (the "Report"). Twenty-two of the Committee's recommendations apply specifically to commercial insolvencies.

[42] A very broad range of stakeholders provided input on virtually all elements of the two Acts. The Committee concluded that [p. 173]: "We believe that the need for flexibility is paramount with the CCAA....". As a consequence, they recommend that the BIA and the CCAA continue to operate as separate statutes.

[43] The Report also considered the existence of contracts, including leases, and how these should be dealt with under the legislation. The Joint Task Force on Business Insolvency Law Reform was of the view that the ability set out in the BIA to disclaim executory contracts including real property leases should apply to all bankruptcy and insolvency proceedings. The Committee's final recommendation was that:

> The BIA and the CCAA be amended to permit disclaimer of executory contracts in existence in the date of commencement of proceedings under the Acts. This disclaimer should apply to all contracts, provided that a number of conditions are met. In particular: the debtor should be obliged to establish inability or serious hardship in restructuring the enterprise without the disclaimer; the co-contracting party should be permitted to file a claim in damages in the restructuring [and other conditions specific to collective agreements].
> [Emphasis added]

[44] The Report recognized that the CCAA treats landlords differently than the BIA and harmonization in respect of this difference was recommended. Significantly, no such recommendations were made with respect to implementing a consistent approach for the valuation of a landlord's claim.

Purposes of the BIA and CCAA

[45] Assuming the words are capable of bearing the interpretation urged upon us by the appellant, statutory interpretation requires that s. 12 be read in the context of the scheme, the object, and the intention of Parliament in passing the CCAA and where the CCAA refers to the BIA, regard must also be given to the scheme, object and intention of that Act.

[46] The proper approach to statutory interpretation requires that words be read contextually to give effect to the purpose and intent of the legislation. As the Supreme Court of Canada recently stated in Harvard College v. Canada (Commissioner of Patents), 2002 SCC 76 (CanLII), [2002] 4 S.C.R. 45 at para. 154, "This Court has on many occasions expressed the view that statutory interpretation cannot be based on the wording of the legislation alone (Rizzo& Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27)". When interpreting specific provisions, a court must pay sufficient attention to the scheme of an act, its objects or the intention of the legislature.

[47] The BIA is a comprehensive legislative scheme largely designed to facilitate the orderly liquidation of the estate of a bankrupt. The purposes of the Act include conducting the liquidation in a manner that maximizes recovery for the general benefit of the creditors, treating similarly situated creditors fairly and in accordance with the Act. The Act sets out priorities and a detailed process, making the BIA a logical choice when the only possible outcome is dissolution. It provides a high degree of certainty for all creditors.

[48] The CCAA is a very brief piece of legislation with a purpose described in Elan Corp. v. Comiskey reflex, (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289 (C.A.) as follows:

> The legislation is remedial in the purest sense in that it provides a means whereby devastating, social and economic effects of bankruptcy or creditor–initiated detriments of ongoing business operations can be avoided while court-supervised attempt to reorganize the financial affairs of the debtor is made.

[49] The very brevity of the Act and the fact that it is silent on details permits a wide and liberal construction to enable the Act to serve its remedial purpose: Chef Ready Foods Ltd. v. Hongkong Bank of Canada, 1990 CanLII 529 (BC CA), [1991] 2 W.W.R. 136 (B.C.C.A.).

[50] The role of the CCAA is unique. It affords the debtor company an opportunity to restructure its affairs in a manner that will permit it to continue as a going concern without intervention by creditors which might hamper or prevent the restructuring process. Its ultimate goal is to avoid bankruptcy, thereby maximizing creditor compensation, reducing the inevitable loss of employment precipitated by bankruptcy and, if successful, offering the prospect of shareholder equity. The debtor remains in possession and control of the company under the supervision of a court appointed monitor. See for example, Re Canadian Airlines Corp., 2000 ABQB 442 (CanLII), [2000] 10 W.W.R. 269, 2000 ABQB 442, leave denied, 2000 ABCA 238 (CanLII), [2000] 10 W.W.R. 314, 2000 ABCA 238, leave denied [2001] S.C.C.A. No. 60; Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. reflex, (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Northland Properties Ltd. v. Excelsior Life Insurance Co. of Canada, 1989 CanLII 2672 (BC CA), [1989] 3 W.W.R. 363 (B.C.C.A.).

[51] The decision to seek protection under the CCAA is that of the debtor. There are numerous considerations in choosing the CCAA as opposed to utilizing the proposal provisions of the BIA, however, one significant factor is the high degree of flexibility the CCAA offers in terms of plan fundamentals and process. The BIA is highly rule driven with clearly defined standards and processes for developing a proposal. Thus, the debtor company under CCAA has far broader latitude within which to propose a plan capable of winning creditor support.

[52] A company which invokes the CCAA process retains a great deal of control over it. Under the CCAA claims process, the company, not the monitor, initially accepts or rejects claims. Section 12(2)(a)(iii) states, "if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount shall be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor".

[53] Section 12(2)(a)(iii) permits different treatment of different claims. The company can admit a claim, or refer it to a court to determine by summary application or trial. In recent cases, recognizing the need for expedited valuation of claims to facilitate the process, the courts have begun appointing a claims officer to make this determination.

[54] Rehabilitation of a company under the CCAA is furthered by a climate that allows for commercial realities and variables to be considered and negotiated among and by the affected parties. The debtor company, through the operation of the stay, is given the breathing room to explore alternatives and to structure a proposed plan that will find favour with creditors, sufficient to support the restructuring.

[55] To maximize flexibility, it is unwise and unnecessary to incorporate, by oblique reference, portions of the BIA or the LRBA that may not assist the process. What the CCAA requires is that the end result, the plan of arrangement, be fair and reasonable. Only when those conditions are met, will a plan of arrangement be approved by a court. What constitutes fairness is largely determined by the circumstances of each case. An important measure of fairness is the degree to which creditors approve it. Creditor support can create an inference that assenting creditors see the plan as viable and commercially reasonable given other available alternatives. The courts generally accept the view that the creditors are in a better position to determine whether the plan is in their own best interests.

The implications of incorporating all BIA provisions into the CCAA

[56] If the appellant's interpretation of s. 12 of the CCAA is accepted, such an interpretation would not be limited to claims by landlords but would include all other unsecured creditors who fall within the provisions of the BIA. At minimum, tax claimants, employees claims, and workers compensation indebtedness as provided in s. 136 of the BIA would apply to the CCAA, thereby increasing the rigidity and reducing the options for compromise.

[57] Under the BIA, the claims receiving priority after secured creditors are enumerated in s. 136 and have ten categories, each ranking behind the other. All must be paid in full before unsecured creditors recover anything. If the appellant is correct, arguably, those claims must be quantified under the BIA but without priority and subject to possible further compromise.

[58] Two other examples illustrate the uncertainty and difficulty that would arise if the appellant's submission was adopted. First, federal excise tax legislation gives Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) a deemed trust for amounts due to it for GST and prohibits any legislation other than the BIA from overriding the deemed trust. There is no deemed trust in a bankruptcy, but cases including this proceeding have held a deemed trust exists in a CCAA restructuring. If the appellant is correct, then excise tax claims must be treated the same in CCAA and a deemed trust would be overridden.

[59] A second example that would import complex and unsettled issues in bankruptcy law is a severance claim. These claims raise thorny issues such as whether the bankruptcy itself triggers termination of employment without cause and thereby gives rise to a provable claim, whether legislation which continues a collective agreement gives rise to a severance claim, and whether a bankruptcy triggered by a creditor and not the bankrupt is to be distinguished. Under the CCAA, employees' claims for severance avoid those issues by treating employees as claimants and capable of being compromised under the CCAA. In Re Woodward's Ltd., a British Columbia case, the court recognized the claims of employees who were terminated and included them in the class of general creditors maintaining that once the amount of the claim had been agreed upon or determined by a court, the employees had the same rights as any other unsecured creditor.

The inconsistency of the BIA and LRBA with the objectives of the CCAA

[60] Automatically applying the LRBA when protection is sought under the CCAA results in the immediate compromise of a landlord's claim prior to the formulation of a plan. Its effect could be to isolate the landlord's claim, treating it differently and potentially unfairly by automatically compromising it without consideration of the plan as a whole. There is no compelling reason for such an a priori blanket regime for landlords in a CCAA proceeding that is intended to preserve the status quo pending the approval of a plan.

[61] There is no reported decision of a court applying s. 136 of the BIA, the LRBA or other provincial legislation equivalent to the LRBA. Instead, case law shows those provisions are not applied and courts have agreed with Farley J., who stated in Re Lehndorff General Partner Ltd. at para. 11, "Amounts owing to landlords in respect of arrears of rent or unpaid rent for the unexpired portion of lease terms are properly dealt with in a plan of compromise or arrangement: see Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation reflex, (1992), 8 C.B.R. (3d) 312 (Ont. Gen. Div.) especially at p. 318."

[62] Landlords' claims have been a source of difficulty under the CCAA and have spawned considerable academic comment on the problems and potential ways to resolve them. The chambers judge and the respondent have noted many including the following: Moffat, "Treatment of Landlords in Commercial Re-organizations" (1997) 10 Comm. Insol. R. 14; Rotsztain and Kraft, "Landlords and Leases in Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act Reorganizations" [1994] ICR 2005; Marantz, "Retail Revival: The Eaton's Restructuring" (1998), 10 Comm. Insol. R. 37; Birkness, "Re Woodward's Limited – The Contextual Commonality of Interest Approach to Classification of Creditors" (1993) 20 C.B.R. (3d) 91; Kulidjian, Sheldon and Peck, "Potential Creditors Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act" (1996) 13 National I. [63] Much of the comment accords with those of Moffat, "Treatment of Landlords in Commercial Re-organizations", where the author states at 16:

> Unlike the proposal provisions of Part II of the BIA, the CCAA does not make any special provision for the valuation or classification of landlord claims under a plan. This does not give the debtor the power to > compromise a landlord's claim in any way it chooses; the courts have placed limits on the method by which landlord claims may be valued and classified under a plan. A landlord which objects to its treatment under a plan may pursue a number of remedies, including seeking amendment of the plan prior to the meeting of creditors held to vote upon the plan, voting against the plan at the creditors' meeting, and opposing court approval of the plan at the sanction hearing.

[64] Courts have approved a variety of solutions to quantifying landlord's claims without reliance on the BIA or provincial legislation. In Sklar-Peppler Furniture Corporation v. Bank of Nova Scotia, the court classified the landlords among the general class of unsecured creditors for both outstanding rent and any contingent claim for damages arising from repudiation of the lease. The court permitted the termination of certain leases upon the plan's approval and limited damages to three months arrears of rent, three months' rent after a protection order and share pro rata with other ordinary creditors for the balance of their claims. Borins J. stated at 318:

> [R]ecognition must be given to the legislative intent to facilitate corporate re-organization and that in the modern world of large and complex business enterprises the excessive fragmentation of classes could be counter-productive to the fulfilment of this intent....In my view, in placing a broad and purposive interpretation upon the provisions of the CCAA the court should take care to resist approaches which would potentially fragment creditors and thereby jeopardize potentially viable plans of arrangement, such as the plan advance in this application.

[65] In Grafton Fraser and in Re Agnew Group Inc., the landlords were granted claims based on the present value of the unexpired terms of the abandoned leases. In Agnew, with the exception of one landlord with a particularly long term lease, landlords received a maximum of six months' rent.

[66] Rotsztain and Kraft in "Landlords and Leases in BIA and CCAA Reorganizations" commenting on Agnew and Grafton-Fraser note at 5-31 that, "A claim based on the present value of the unexpired term of the lease is something which landlords generally look upon more favourably than a straight payment of a few months' rent." The authors explain that this is because this approach recognizes the significant long term impact termination can have on landlords and allows the factoring in of tenant inducements which are generally built into rental payments over the entire lease.

[67] On this appeal, the appellant suggests incorporating the LRBA serves a useful purpose because without the LRBA limitations, the landlord's claim is so potentially large that it makes a restructuring impossible, and requires too much time to mitigate and thus to quantify the landlord's claim.

[68] Speaking generally, I disagree that the magnitude or quantification issues arising from a landlord's claim make restructuring impossible. Treatment of a landlord's claim under a plan may produce the same result as that under the LRBA and such plan might be approved by both the landlord and the court. Similarly, treatment under the plan could be less than or more than the amount provided for under the LRBA. But these are issues for negotiation and ultimately, court approval.

[69] In the absence of legislation, the unique and distinct purpose of the CCAA has been and must remain the focus for judicial interpretation and discretion. Where there is neither statutory direction nor demonstrated need, it is undesirable to import statutory provisions that may have a negative affect on the flexibility afforded by the CCAA and thus become an impediment to its creative use. Adopting the LRBA as determinative of a landlord's claim under the CCAA is an example of narrowing the benefit of a broad statute in favour of a certainty. As a general proposition and without considering the merits of that position in a particular plan, such an approach is to be discouraged.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION OF THE
HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE WITTMANN

Introduction

[1] On March 2nd, 1999, Blue Range Resources Corporation (Blue Range) obtained an order from the Court staying proceedings against it, invoking the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act R.S.C. 1985 c.C-36 as amended (CCAA). With one exception made known on this application to the Court, the supervising judge throughout has been LoVecchio, J. and he has made numerous orders culminating in an order for interim distribution pronounced December 17, 1999 (the Decision). Big Bear Exploration Ltd. (Big Bear) applies for leave to appeal the Decision, and a stay of the Decision.

Background Facts

[2] On May 5, 1999, Big Bear filed a Notice of Claim in the amount of $151,317,298.00. Big Bear alleged that this is an unsecured claim (Big Bear claim).

[3] The Big Bear claim was disputed by the Monitor, Price Waterhouse Coopers Inc. and Big Bear was directed by the Monitor in a Notice of Dispute to file and serve a Notice of Motion for the determination of the Big Bear claim.

[4] Also on May 5, 1999, Big Bear filed a Notice of Motion and an affidavit in support for an order lifting the stay of proceedings under the March 2, 1999 order, and allowing Big Bear to file a statement of claim, a draft of which was attached to the affidavit, which application was dismissed by LoVecchio, J. on May 11, 1999. The statement of claim as drafted claimed, amongst other things, damages against Blue Range in the sum of $151,317,298.00 based on alleged false and misleading statements made by Blue Range which induced Big Bear to purchase the shares of Blue Range.

[5] On May 31, 1999, pursuant to the direction given in the Notice of Dispute by the Monitor, Big Bear filed a Notice of Motion for a declaration that the unsecured claim of Big Bear was a meritorious claim against Blue Range, and an order directing the expeditious trial and determination of the issues raised by Big Bear.

[6] At the direction of Chief Justice Moore, Romaine, J. was directed to hear and determine issues arising out of the disputed Big Bear claim. Romaine, J. made an order October 28, 1999 stating as follows:

> 1. At the preliminary applications to be heard on November 8 and 9, 1999 (the "Preliminary Applications"), one of the issues to be determined shall be:
> With respect to the alleged loss or damage of $147,687,298 allegedly suffered by Big Bear from the exchange of Big Bear and Blue Range Resource Corporation ("Blue Range") shares (the "Alleged Share Exchange Loss"), without considering the principle of equitable subordination, is Big Bear:
> (a) an unsecured creditor of Blue Range which ranks equally with the unsecured creditors of Blue Range, or
> (b) is it a shareholder of Blue Range which ranks after the unsecured creditors of Blue Range?
> 2. Another issue to be determined at the Preliminary Applications shall be:
> Assuming (without admitting) misrepresentations by Blue Range and reliance on it by Big Bear, is the Alleged Share Exchange Loss a loss or damage incurred by Big Bear and, accordingly, is Big Bear a proper party to advance the claim for such loss?
> 3. The following is the only other issue which shall be determined at the Preliminary Applications:
> Whether Big Bear is entitled to make or advance by way of argument in these proceedings the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft Statement of Claim set out at Exhibit "F" to the Affidavit of A. Jeffrey Tonken dated June 25, 1999?

[7] The preliminary applications were heard by Romaine, J. November 8 and 9, 1999 and judgment was and remains reserved.

[8] The sixth interim report of the Monitor dated December 14, 1999 had attached to it as Appendix D a schedule outlining a potential estimated second interim distribution to the Class B claimants as of December 9, 1999. Paragraph 26 of that report stated that the largest unresolved claim was Big Bear's unsecured Class B claim of approximately $151 Million and that the 25 cent estimated dividend assumed a value of $30 Million for this claim and the 50 cent estimated dividend assumed the claim would be disallowed or be subordinated in full to the claims of Class B claimants. It also stated that the Monitor sought the advice and direction of the Court regarding the amount which would be appropriate for an interim distribution.

[9] That issue came before LoVecchio, J. on December 17, 1999 together with a motion by Big Bear requesting that the Monitor withhold from distribution a reserve on account of the Big Bear unsecured claim until such time as a final determination of that claim had been made by the Court. Big Bear argued that s. 12(2) of the CCAA mandated that the claim of any unsecured creditor "shall be determined", and that the Big Bear claim had not yet been determined.

[10] The Decision of LoVecchio, J. pronounced December 17, 1999 ordered an interim distribution with a reserve for the Big Bear claim of $3,070,000.00.

[11] The motion for leave to appeal the Decision and for a stay of the Decision was filed December 20th, 1999 returnable December 21st, 1999, and requested that this Court abridge the time for notice of the motion. The abridgement of time was not objected to by any of the respondents and time was ordered abridged. Written briefs were filed by the Creditors' Committee and by Big Bear.

[12] No formal order of LoVecchio, J. dated December 17, 1999 was before this Court on the hearing of the application nor were the reasons for judgment made available on December 21st. The matter was adjourned until December 22nd, 1999 pending receipt of a transcript of the proceedings in chambers December 17th, 1999 which was provided to the Court on the afternoon of December 21st.

[13] This matter was argued December 22nd, 1999, and I ordered an interim stay of the Decision pending this decision.

Leave under the CCAA

[14] No one before me disputed the criteria for leave to appeal a decision of the supervising judge pursuant to s. 13 of the CCAA. The criteria that has been applied by this Court is found in Re Multitech Warehouse Direct reflex, (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 62 at 64 (C.A.); Luscar Ltd. v. Smoky River Coal Ltd. [1999] A.J. No. 185 at para. 22 (C.A.); Re Blue Range Resource Corp. [1999] A.J. No. 975 at para. 2, 3, 4 (C.A.).

[15] Madam Justice Fruman in deciding leave applications arising out of other orders granted by LoVecchio, J. in Re Blue Range Resources Corp, [supra] referred to Re Pacific National Lease Holding Corp. 1992 CanLII 427 (BC CA), (1992) 15 C.B.R. (3d) 265 at 272 (B.C.C.A.), as well as Med Finance Co. S.A. v. Bank of Montreal reflex, (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 279 at 282 (B.C.C.A.). The latter case sets forth factors to be considered in granting leave to appeal an issue under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, as amended. The factors are:

> (a) whether the point on appeal is of significance to the practice;
> (b) whether the point raised is of significance to the action itself;
> (c) whether the appeal is prima facie meritorious or, on the other hand, whether it is frivolous; and
> (d) whether the appeal will unduly hinder the progress of the action.

[16] The general test articulated in Multitech of "serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties" encompasses the four criteria set forth above.

The Argument

(a) Big Bear

[17] The essence of Big Bear's argument is that s. 12 of the CCAA mandates that its claim shall be determined by the Court, that it took steps to have it determined in May of 1999, and through no fault of its own, judgment is now reserved on issues pertaining to the Big Bear claim. Further, Big Bear submits that LoVecchio, J. has made a pre-determination of the value of the claim prior to any hearing or summary determination of it, and that this is a point of significance to the practice. Big Bear further argues that the point raised is of significance to the action of itself as LoVecchio, J. set aside an amount of $3,070,000.00 as a reserve for the Big Bear claim, and that Big Bear will forever be unable to share with other creditors on a pro-rated basis should it be determined by a court to have a claim of more than this sum. Big Bear further argues that the appeal will not hinder the progress of the action because a plan of arrangement is already in place.

[18] With respect to a stay of the Decision, Big Bear relies on Re Associated Investors of Canada Ltd.; Deloitte Haskins and Sells v. Coopers & Lybrand Inc. reflex, (1996) 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 64 (C.A.) for a three-part test that:

> (1) the Court must be satisfied on a preliminary assessment there is a serious issue to be tried;
> (2) that if the stay is not granted the applicant would suffer irreparable harm not capable of recompense in damages; and
> (3) that the balance of convenience favours a stay.

Big Bear submits that, at the very least, a stay should be granted pending the decision of Romaine, J.

Digitized by Google

(b) The Creditors' Committee

[19] The Creditors' Committee, supported by Enron Canada Corp. (the largest single creditor) argued strenuously that the Decision was based on the cross-examination on affidavit of James W. Surbey, the Senior Vice President Corporate Development of Big Bear, which occurred on the evening of Thursday December 16th, 1999 and on the Rule 266 examination of Kyle Kitigawa. Transcripts and exhibits relating to both examinations were before LoVecchio, J. for the purpose of reserving for the Big Bear claim on December 17, 1999. The gist of this argument is that the reserve in the amount of $3,070,000.00 for the Big Bear claim was correct, if not generous in light of the evidence that Big Bear entered into an Arrangement Agreement with Avid Oil and Gas Limited (Avid) dated November 26, 1999 and issued a press release to its shareholders that the Agreement provided that Avid would acquire all of the issued and outstanding common shares of Big Bear based on one common share of Avid for every 15 common shares of Big Bear, subject to some adjustments. Some of the evidence on the cross-examination and examination referred to above was in essence that Big Bear placed no value on its claim against Blue Range with respect to the valuation of the Big Bear assets which, in turn, impacted on the value of the Big Bear shares for the purpose of the Arrangement Agreement valuation. It is clear that LoVecchio, J. accepted that evidence for the purpose of the valuation and reserve for the Big Bear claim.

Issues

(1) Should leave to appeal the Decision be granted?

(2) Should a stay of the Decision be granted?

Leave to Appeal

[20] Should leave to appeal the Decision be granted? Returning to the criteria outlined above, there must be serious and arguable grounds that are of real and significant interest to the parties. Subsumed in this general criteria are the four elements in Med Finance Company S.A. v. Bank of Montreal [supra].

[21] Big Bear's counsel indicated in argument that Big Bear was simply not ready to have a hearing on the valuation of the Big Bear claim on December 17, 1999 and that there was no intention to proceed on that basis. This position is difficult to reconcile with the cross-examination and examination referred to above, the thrust of which was to demonstrate that Big Bear placed little or no value on its claim against Blue Range and, secondly, with the motion of Big Bear requesting a reserve amount be withheld from distribution on account of the Big Bear unsecured claim and, alternatively, providing directions for the valuation of the Big Bear unsecured claims. Presumably, in order for LoVecchio, J. to provide for a reserve amount, he at least had to consider the value of the claim. It is apparent from the transcript of the proceedings on December 17, 1999 that LoVecchio, J. accepted the proposition that Big Bear's officers and directors put little, if any, value on the Big Bear claim. Illustrative is the following excerpt (at pp.153-154):

> And I'm going to keep the designation of 6,930,000 in respect of the others, which means the differential, 3,070,000 is for the Big Bear, and I want to state on the record, I see that as several million dollars more than the directors and officers of Big Bear have valued it at for the purposes of the Anvil [sic] transaction under which they have a fiduciary responsibility.
> MS. HORNER: Okay, sir, again, just so that I follow you, in the conservative column across from the Big Bear claim, so at the second column on Appendix D, instead of 30 million, I'm to insert 3,070,000.
> As I say, I want it on the record that I have reviewed the financial information associated with the public statements of the company - - that is, Big Bear - - in relation to the share exchange ratio, the valuation of the company, and in my view, this values that claim at several million dollars higher than the directors and officers appear to have valued it for the purposes of the share exchange ratio, and the directors and officers, of course, are under a fiduciary responsibility to their shareholders to ensure a proper valuation of the company.

[22] In the context of setting a reserve for the Big Bear claim, the learned chambers judge was entitled to accept the evidence before him. The evidence before him which he chose to accept was that the Big Bear officers and directors valued the Big Bear claim against Blue Range for the purposes of the Avid share exchange at a negligible value. As was pointed out in argument before LoVecchio, J., Big Bear did not lead any convincing evidence to the contrary. Leave to appeal the decision of the LoVecchio, J., fixing the Big Bear reserve at $3,070,000.00, is therefore denied.

Stay of the Decision

[23] Should a stay of the Decision be granted? Although at first blush it might seem that the denial of leave to appeal renders the stay issue moot, I am of the contrary view. Big Bear argued before me that, even if leave to appeal was not granted, there should be stay of the Decision, until the decision of Romaine, J. is made.

Digitized by Google

[24] The learned chambers judge was asked to stay the Decision. He did not expressly decide the issue but rather stated: ". . . you should go and talk to the Court of Appeal about a stay." [Transcript of the December 17, 1999 proceedings at p.155].

[25] This case is unusual. Rule 508 of the Alberta Rules of Court states as follows:

> 508. An appeal does not operate as a stay of enforcement or of proceedings under the decision appealed from except so far as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench or the Court of Appeal may order and no intermediate act or proceeding is invalidated except so far as the court appealed from may direct.

[26] If leave to appeal is denied, one might question the authority of this Court to grant a stay of the learned chambers judge's decision pending the decision of Romaine, J.

[27] If authority need be cited for the proposition that this Court has such a power, I refer to the provisions of the Judicature Act, R.S.A. 1980 c. J-1 as amended, s.3, 4 and 5, and the inherent jurisdiction of this Court.

[28] This Court has the power to regulate process and proceedings. It may stay an action unless and until some condition or term which it has imposed has been complied with.

[29] The criteria for granting a stay in these circumstances are set forth in the judgment of Russell, J.A. in Deloitte Haskins and Sells v. Coopers & Lybrand Inc. reflex, (1996) 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 64 (C.A.). She said at p.67:

> In considering a stay application the court must be satisfied on a preliminary assessment that there is a serious issue to be tried, that if the stay is not granted the applicant would suffer harm irreparable in damages, and that the balance of convenience favours the stay.

[30] Applying these tests, it must be conceded that there is a serious issue to be tried in terms of those issues that are extant before Romaine, J. Those issues were not re-argued before me and, indeed, ought not to have been. In terms of regulation of the process of the Court, the Court of Queen's Bench has chosen to direct issues as to the entitlement and quantification of the Big Bear claim for a preliminary determination by Romaine, J. Presumably, her decision involves a serious issue. For example, it may be that she will rule that there is no entitlement in Big Bear which would permit it to rank as an unsecured creditor of Blue Range or that it is not a proper party to advance a claim against Blue Range. If Romaine, J.'s decision on the first two issues is in favour of Big Bear, the third issue becomes all the more prominent: that is, whether Big Bear is entitled to make or advance by way of argument the claims represented by the heads of damage specified in the draft statement of claim it put forward including a claim for damages against Blue Range in the sum of $151,317,298.00.

[31] It is clear that LoVecchio, J. was aware of the issues before Romaine, J. and was aware she had reserved her decision involving those issues on November 8th, 1999. [Transcript of the proceedings December 17th, 1999, pp. 94 to 98].

[32] Therefore, I find in the context of the criteria for a stay application that there is a serious issue that has been heard and remains undecided.

[33] The remaining criteria, namely, whether the applicant will suffer irreparable harm if the stay is not granted or which of the parties would suffer the greater harm from the granting or refusal of the stay (i.e. balance of convenience or inconvenience) also resolve themselves in favour of the applicant.

[34] It is clear from the evidence presented and the argument before me that if the distribution were to be made on the basis of the $3,070,000.00 reserve for the Big Bear claim, that Big Bear would be irreparably prejudiced by the preliminary distribution proposed in the event the Big Bear claim was later to be determined as valid and larger. The last criteria, the balance of convenience or inconvenience also tends to favour the applicant. If no distribution is made pending a decision of Romaine, J., the unsecured creditors as a class have been prejudiced only to the extent that there is some delay in receiving their money. While that may be an inconvenience, it is not the kind of prejudice that leads to irretrievable loss as is the case if Big Bear should later obtain a favourable decision from Romaine, J., and in the meantime the distribution has been made.

[35] Therefore, exercising the inherent jurisdiction of this Court, I grant Big Bear's application for a stay of the Decision ordering an interim distribution, pending the decision of Romaine, J.

Summary and Conclusion

[36] The application for leave to appeal the Decision is refused;

[37] The application for a stay of the Decision pending the decision of Romaine, J. reserved November 8, 1999, is granted.

FINLAYSON J.A. (dissenting):

The appellant James W. McCutcheon and Central Guarantee Trust Company as Trustee for the Registered Retirement Savings Plan of James W. McCutcheon (hereinafter sometimes referred to collectively as "McCutcheon") and the appellant Consolidated S.Y.H. Corporation ("SYH") appeal from the order of The Honourable Madam Justice Feldman of the Ontario Court (General Division) dated January 9, 1995 [reported as Central Capital Corp. 1995 CanLII 7415 (ON SC), (1995), 29 C.B.R. (3d) 33]. Feldman J. dismissed appeals from decisions dated January 20, 1993 and February 16, 1993 of the respondent Peat Marwick Thorne Inc., in its capacity as Interim Receiver, Manager and Administrator ("Administrator") of certain assets of Central Capital Corporation ("Central Capital"). The Administrator disallowed Proofs of Claim submitted by the appellants with respect to a Plan of Arrangement under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). Leave to appeal the order of Feldman J. was granted on March 17, 1995 by The Honourable Mr. Justice Houlden.

Overview of the proceedings

These appeals arise out of the insolvency of Central Capital which in and prior to December 1991 defaulted under its obligations to various unsecured lenders, note holders and subordinated debt holders. In early December of 1991, Central Capital advised its creditors that, pending implementation of new financial arrangements, it had decided to discontinue payment of all interest and principal due under outstanding loans, with the exception of indebtedness due under secured notes issued to The Royal Trust Company. In an Agreed Statement of Facts, which was prepared by the parties for the purposes of appeals from the disallowances of the Administrator, it was agreed that at all material times since in or prior to December 1991, Central Capital was insolvent. It had a total unsecured debt of $1,577,359,000 and, among other things:

(a) it was unable to pay its liabilities as they became due; and
(b) the realizable value of its assets was less than the aggregate of its liabilities.

By Notice of Application issued June 12, 1992, thirty-nine of the creditors commenced an application pursuant to the CCAA for an order declaring the following: that Central Capital was a debtor company to which the CCAA applied; that Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. be appointed Administrator of the property, assets and undertaking of Central Capital; that a stay of proceedings against Central Capital, except with leave of the court, be granted and; that the applicants be authorized and permitted to file a plan of compromise or arrangement under the CCAA.

By order of Houlden J. made June 15, 1992, Central Capital was declared to be a company to which the CCAA applied and all proceedings against Central Capital were stayed. By further order of Houlden J. made July 9, 1992, it was provided, among other things, that:

(a) Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. was appointed Administrator, Interim Receiver and Manager of such of the undertaking, property and assets of Central Capital as necessary for the purpose of effecting the transaction described in the order pursuant to which specified significant assets of Central Capital would be transferred to a newly incorporated company called Canadian Insurance Group Limited ("CIGL");
(b) the Administrator was authorized to enter into and carry out a Subscription and Escrow Agreement with creditors of Central Capital pursuant to which creditors of Central Capital would be entitled to elect to exchange a portion of the indebtedness owing to them by Central Capital for shares and debentures to be issued by CIGL;
(c) the Administrator was authorized and directed to supervise the calling for claims of creditors of Central Capital who elected to exchange a portion of the indebtedness from Central Capital for shares and debentures to be issued by CIGL as aforesaid; and
(d) Central Capital was authorized and permitted to file with the court a formal plan of compromise or arrangement with Central Capital's secured and unsecured creditors and shareholders in accordance with the CCAA and the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 (the "CBCA") which would provide for the restructuring and reorganization of the debt and equity of Central Capital in the manner set out in the said order.

According to the Agreed Statement of Facts, the order of Houlden J. was made without prejudice to the rights of the appellants to assert claims as creditors in the CIGL transaction. Pursuant to the terms of the July 9, 1992 order, all claims of creditors of Central Capital who wished to participate in CIGL were required to be submitted to the Administrator by September 8, 1992, or such other date fixed by the court. The Administrator received claims from various persons who wished to participate, including the claims submitted by the appellants herein.

The Administrator disallowed the claims of McCutcheon and SYH by Notices of Disallowance dated January 20, 1993 and February 16, 1993 in which various reasons were cited as to why the appellants did not qualify as creditors. The effect of this disallowance was that McCutcheon and SYH could participate only as shareholders in the plan of compromise and arrangement under the CCAA to be put forward by Central Capital. In dismissing the appeals from this disallowance, Feldman J. found that the appellants were not creditors because they did not have a claim provable under the Bankruptcy Act (Canada), R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("Bankruptcy Act").

Issue

The Agreed Statements of Facts sets out the issue in the appeal in the following language:

Do the appellants, or any of them, have claims provable against CCC [Central Capital] within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act (Canada), as amended as of the date of the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement? If the appellants, or any of them, have provable claims, then the proof of claim of any appellant that has a claim provable is to be allowed as filed and the appeal from the disallowance allowed, and the appellants, or any of them, whose claim is allowed, are to participate in the Plan of Arrangement of Central Capital as a senior creditor.

The determination of this issue was deferred by Houlden J.'s order of October 27th, 1992. He ordered therein that preferred shareholders who had filed claims against Central Capital as creditors were not permitted to vote at the meeting of creditors called to consider the Plan of Arrangement "...but such is without prejudice to the rights of those claimants to prosecute their claims as filed". The last paragraph in the order ended:

For greater certainty, the validity of any claim filed by a preferred shareholder shall not be affected by the terms of this paragraph.

Overview of the restructuring of Central Capital

The order of Houlden J. of July 9, 1992 directed the restructuring of Central Capital under the aegis of the court. The order, and others that would follow, contemplated that the restructuring would take place in two stages. The first stage involved the transfer to the Administrator of certain major assets of Central Capital to a company to be incorporated called Central Insurance Group Limited (CIGL). This company is frequently referred to in the documentation and the reasons of Feldman J. as "Newco". CIGL was then to be owned by those Central Capital creditors who chose to participate in the reorganization by accepting a reduction in their debts due from Central Capital and exchanging this reduced indebtedness for debentures in CIGL. Subscription for debentures by this means additionally entitled the creditors to subscribe for shares in CIGL. Our understanding from counsel is that the assets transferred to CIGL included the assets acquired by Central Capital from the appellants in purchase agreements described later in these reasons.

The court approved a Subscription and Escrow Agreement setting out this arrangement. In order to participate, the creditors were required to file with the Administrator a Proof of Claim in the prescribed form along with other documents confirming the creditor's intention to reduce its claim against Central Capital and to subscribe for debentures and shares of CIGL. Claims were to be based on Central Capital's indebtedness to creditors as of June 15, 1992, the date of the court-ordered stay of proceedings. This transaction was completed on October 1, 1992 and resulted in CIGL being owned by the creditors of Central Capital in exchange for a reduction in Central Capital's unsecured debt in the amount of $603,000,000.

The second stage of the restructuring involved a Plan of Arrangement under the CCAA. That plan as put forward by Central Capital recognized four classes of creditors, only one of which, namely that of "Senior Creditors", could apply to the appellants. The Plan of Arrangement, as amended, provided that Central Capital would issue to Senior Creditors pro rata on the basis of their senior claims a class of secured promissory notes in the aggregate principal amount of $20,000,000 of secured debt, which were to be known as first secured notes. A similar arrangement was made for the issuance of $1,000,000 of second secured promissory notes to subordinated creditors. Senior and subordinated creditors included any creditor whose claim had been allowed under the CIGL claims procedure in the first stage, to the extent of that creditor's reduced claim.

The Plan of Arrangement also called for the creation of a new class of shares in Central Capital to be called the Central New Common Shares. Central Capital would issue to the above Senior and Subordinated Creditors ninety percent of the new share capital of Central Capital in extinguishment of the balance of their debt. The Central Capital shareholders of all classes would have their existing shares converted into the remaining ten percent of the Central New Common Shares. All of the existing preferred and common shares would be cancelled upon implementation of the plan.

The amended Plan of Arrangement was ultimately voted on and approved by all four classes of creditors of Central Capital. On December 18, 1992, Houlden J. sanctioned this plan of arrangement under the CCAA. He authorized and directed Central Capital to apply for Articles of Reorganization pursuant to s.191 of the CBCA, so as to authorize the creation of the Central New Common Shares for implementation of the amended Plan of Arrangement. He also lifted the stays of proceedings affecting Central Capital and its ability to carry on business as of January 1, 1993.

The effect of the amended Plan of Arrangement after approval was that all remaining debts and obligations owed by Central Capital to its creditors on or before June 15, 1992 were extinguished and all outstanding and unissued shares of any kind in Central Capital were cancelled and replaced by Central New Common Shares. Central Capital was then free to carry on business. It was no longer insolvent.

Facts as they relate to the claim of McCutcheon

By a Share Purchase Agreement dated June 15, 1987 between Central Capital and Gormley Investments Limited ("Gormley") and Heathley Investments Limited ("Heathley"), Central Capital agreed to purchase all Class "B" Voting Shares of Canadian General Securities Limited ("CGS") that were owned by Gormley and Heathley. James W. McCutcheon and his brother, who were the sole shareholders of Gormley, represented to Central Capital that CGS owned substantially all of the shares of Canadian Insurance Sales Limited, which in turn owned substantially all of the shares in a number of operating insurance, credit and trust companies. The consideration for the purchase of the CGS shares was $575 per share. The vendors were to be paid $400 per share in cash on closing and were to receive seven Series B Senior Preferred Shares of Central Capital. These shares contained a retraction clause entitling the holder to retract each preferred share on July 1, 1992 for $25. Failing issuance of the shares by Central Capital, the vendors were to receive an additional $175 for each CGS share. The Share Purchase Agreement and later the Articles of Central Capital further provided that the holders of Series B Senior Preferred Shares were entitled to receive dividends as and when declared by the directors of Central Capital out of monies of the corporation properly applicable to the payment of dividends and in the amount of $1.90625 per share per annum (being 7 5/8% per annum on the stated capital of $25 per share) payable in equal quarterly payments. No dividends were in fact declared.

The Certificate of Amendment for Central Capital dated July 30, 1987, and the Articles of Amendment setting out the provisions attaching to the Series B Senior Preferred Shares contain all the terms and conditions governing the said shares. I am setting out below a description of those that are relevant to this appeal.

Pursuant to Article 4.1 of the Senior Series B Provisions, each holder of Series B Senior Preferred Shares was entitled, subject to and upon compliance with the provisions of Article 4, to require Central Capital to redeem all or any part of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares registered in the name of that holder on July 1, 1992 at a price equal to $25 per share, plus all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon, calculated to but excluding the Retraction Date.

Article 4.2 of the Senior Series B Provisions sets out the procedure for retraction of the shares. Article 4.3 of the Senior Series B Provisions provides that if the redemption by Central Capital of all of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares required to be redeemed on the Retraction Date would be contrary to applicable law or the rights, privileges, restrictions and conditions attaching to any shares of Central Capital ranking prior to Series B Senior Preferred Shares, then Central Capital shall redeem only the maximum number of Series B Senior Preferred Shares which it determined was permissible to redeem at that time. Article 4.3 provides the mechanism for a pro rata redemption from each holder of the tendered Series B Senior Preferred Shares and redemption of the tendered Series B Senior Preferred Shares by Central Capital at further dates.

Article 4.4(a) provides that subject to Section 4.4(b), the election of any holder to require Central Capital to redeem any Series B Senior Preferred Shares shall be irrevocable upon receipt by the transfer agent of the Certificates for the shares to be redeemed and the signification of election of the holder of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares.

Article 4.4(b) of the Senior Series B Provisions provides that if the retraction price is not paid by Central Capital, Central Capital shall forthwith notify each holder of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares who has not received payment for his deposited shares of the holder's right to require Central Capital to return all (but not less than all) of the holder's deposited Share Certificates and the holder's rights under Article 4.3 outlined above.

Article 4.5 of the Senior Series B Provisions provides that the inability of Central Capital to effect a redemption shall not affect or limit the obligation of Central Capital to pay any dividends accrued or accruing on the Series B Senior Preferred Shares from time to time not redeemed and remaining outstanding.

Article 7 of the Series Senior B Provisions provides that in the event of the liquidation, dissolution or winding-up of Central Capital, whether voluntary or involuntary, or any other distribution of assets of Central Capital among its shareholders for the purposes of winding up its affairs, the holders of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares shall be entitled to receive, from the assets of Cental Capital, $25 per Series B Senior Preferred Shares, plus all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon, to be paid prior to payment to junior ranking shareholders. Upon payment of such amounts, the holders of the Series B Senior Preferred Shares shall not be entitled to share in any further distribution of assets of Central Capital.

A Notice of Retraction Privilege was sent by Central Capital to the holders of Series B Senior Preferred Shares with a cover letter dated April 23, 1992. The letter stated, among other things, that Central Capital would not redeem any shares because the redemption of such shares would be contrary to applicable law in the context of Central Capital's then current financial situation. McCutcheon and Central Guaranty Trust deposited for redemption 406,800 and 26,000 Series B Senior Preferred Shares, respectively, in accordance with the Senior Series B Provisions and the Notice of Retraction Privilege. The shares were deposited on May 28, 1992, with Montreal Trust Company of Canada, pursuant to the Notice of Retraction Privilege. The shares were properly tendered for redemption in the manner and within the time required by Central Capital's Articles of Amendment.

Central Capital did not pay the redemption price on July 1, 1992 and on July 20, 1992 it notified each holder of Series B Senior Preferred Shares of its right to require Central Capital to return all of the holder's deposited Share Certificates as required by Article 4.4(b) of the Senior Series B Provisions. McCutcheon and Central Guaranty Trust did not exercise that right.

Pursuant to the terms of Houlden J.'s order of July 9, 1992 directing the restructuring of Central Capital, McCutcheon submitted to the Administrator, as a creditor of Central Capital, Proofs of Claim dated September 3, 1992 and September 4, 1992, respectively. McCutcheon claimed the amount of $10,913,593.69 in respect of his Series B Senior

Digitized by Google

Preferred Shares tendered for redemption. Central Guaranty Trust claimed the amount of $697,526.68 in respect of its tendered 26,000 Series B Senior Preferred Shares. McCutcheon also executed and submitted the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement and other documents electing to participate in CIGL. These claims were completed and submitted in the prescribed form and within the time required by Houlden J.'s order.

As was previously noted, these claims were disallowed by the Administrator. The substance of the Administrator's reasons for disallowance was that the ability of Central Capital to redeem these preference shares is restricted by the provisions of the CBCA and it would be contrary to applicable law to redeem the shares in the context of Central Capital's financial position. The relevant provision of the CBCA provides:

36.(1) Redemption of shares. Notwithstanding subsection 34(2) or 35(3), but subject to (2) and to its articles, a corporation may purchase or redeem any redeemable shares issued by it at prices not exceeding the redemption price thereof stated in the articles or calculated according to a formula stated in the articles.

(2) Limitation. A corporation shall not make any payment to purchase or redeem any redeemable shares issued by it if there are reasonable grounds for believing that

(a) the corporation is, or would after the payment be, unable to pay its liabilities as they become due; or

(b) the realizable value of the corporation's assets would after the payment be less than the aggregate of

(i) its liabilities, and

(ii) the amount that would be required to pay the holders of shares that have a right to be paid, on a redemption or in a liquidation, rateably with or prior to the holders of the shares to be purchased or redeemed.

Evidently, the Administrator equated redemption by the corporation with the right of retraction by the preferred shareholder. It agreed with Central Capital's position that once it became insolvent in December of 1991, Central Capital no longer had the ability to redeem the shares tendered for retraction and thus McCutcheon was restricted to exercising what rights it might have as a shareholder.

Facts as they relate to the claim of SYH

Pursuant to an Agreement of Purchase and Sale made as of June 30, 1989, as amended, Scottish & York Holdings Limited (the predecessor to SYH) sold to Central Capital the shares of Central Canada Insurance Services Limited, Eaton Insurance Company, Scottish & York Insurance Co. Limited and Victoria Insurance Company of Canada (collectively the "Insurance Companies"), except for certain preference shares held by the directors of those corporations. In consideration of this transfer, Central Capital issued to Scottish & York Holdings Limited 60,116,000 Series A Junior Preferred Shares and 9,618,560 Series B Junior Preferred Shares.

The Articles of Central Capital provided that it would pay on each dividend payment date prior to the fifth anniversary of this issue, as and when declared by the directors out of the assets of the corporation properly applicable to the payment of dividends, a dividend of $.08 for each outstanding Series A Junior Preferred Share. The dividend was payable quarterly by the issuance of .02 Series B Junior Preferred Shares for every outstanding Series A Junior Preferred Share. No dividends were in fact declared.

The Articles also provided that Central Capital was obligated to retract the Series A Junior Preferred Shares and Series B Junior Preferred Shares, at the option of the holders of those shares, on the fifth anniversary of their issuance. The retraction price was $1.00 per share plus all accrued and unpaid dividends. Payment of the retraction price of these shares by Central Capital was subject to the provisions of the CBCA, which governs the affairs of Central Capital. For the purposes of this appeal, I believe that we can treat the balance of the provisions relating to these preferred shares as being the same as those governing the McCutcheon Series B Senior Preferred Shares.

Given that the operative date for proving claims against Central Capital was June 15, 1992, the retraction date governing the preferred shares of SYH was some two years removed. Notwithstanding, on September 8, 1992 SYH executed and delivered to the Administrator a Proof of Claim, a Counterpart of the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement, an initial Share Subscription and an Instrument of Claims Reduction Form, all in the prescribed form and within the time required. The claim was that SYH was holding or entitled to hold the following shares of Central Capital:

(a) 60,116,000 Junior Preferred Series A shares;

(b) 9,618,560 Junior Preferred Series B shares;

(c) 4,611,095 Junior Preferred Series B shares accrued to June 15th, 1992 but not yet issued to SYH; for a total of 74,345,655 shares, each having a retraction value of $1.00. However, because of some adjustments in favour of Central Capital to the purchase price of the shares sold by SYH to Central Capital under the June 30, 1989 Agreement of Purchase and Sale, the net claim as of June 15, 1992 was reduced from $74,345,655 to $72,388,836.

Digitized by Google

By Notice of Disallowance dated January 20, 1993, the Administrator disallowed the claim by SYH to subscribe for debentures and common shares to be issued by CIGL. The reasons for the disallowance are similar to those provided for disallowing the claims of McCutcheon. The Administrator found that SYH's right to require Central Capital to retract the Series A and B Junior Preferred Shares only arose on the expiry of the fifth anniversary of their issuance and that Central Capital was precluded from retracting those shares by virtue of its insolvency and the provisions of the CBCA. Hence SYH, like McCutcheon, was limited to exercising what other rights it might have as a shareholder.

Analysis

Although the factual groundwork is necessary for putting in perspective the sole issue before the court, the final question confronting us is a narrow one. Did the retraction clauses in the appellants' shares create a debt owed by Central Canada as of June 15, 1992 within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act? I think that they did.

It is agreed that the operative section of the Bankruptcy Act is s.121(1). It reads as follows:

121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the bankruptcy or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

There was no bankruptcy in this case and thus the relevant date was agreed to be June 15, 1992. The obligations of Central Capital to the appellants were incurred before that date, and so the only question becomes whether the obligations created a debt between the appellants and Central Capital.

What then is a debt? All the parties turn to Black's Law Dictionary, quoting different editions. The following is from the Sixth Edition (1990), at p. 403:

Debt. A sum of money due by certain and express agreement. A specified sum of money owing to one person from another, including not only the obligation of debtor to pay but right of creditor to receive and enforce payment....

A fixed and certain obligation to pay money or some other valuable thing or things, either in the present or in the future.

The above is consistent with what is defined as a debt by Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law, 2nd ed. (1977), at p.562:

A debt exists when a certain sum of money is owing from one person (the debtor) to another (the creditor). Hence "debt" is properly opposed to unliquidated damages; to liability, when used in the sense of an inchoate or contingent debt; and to certain obligations not enforceable by ordinary process. "Debt" denotes not only the obligation of the debtor to pay, but also the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment.

And finally, The Shorter Oxford Dictionary, 3rd ed. (1973), at p. 497:

Debt 1. That which is owed or due; anything (as money, goods or service) which one person is under obligation to pay or render to another. 2. A liability to pay or render something; the being under such liability.

I have no difficulty in finding that the claims of the appellants in the case under appeal fall within all of the above definitions. As will be discussed herein, concern was expressed in this case over whether or not the appellants as creditors were entitled to "receive and enforce payment" on the "debt" because of the insolvency of Central Capital on June 15, 1992. I will deal with the specific arguments relating to the effect of insolvency on this particular indebtedness in due course, but for the moment I am content to observe that the above definitions contemplate only that the creditor's right to recover is the reciprocal of the debtor's obligation to pay. For every debtor there must be a creditor. There may be cases where it is difficult to identify the person who in law may receive and enforce payment, but this is not such a one.

With great respect to the judge of first instance and to the submissions of counsel for the unsecured creditors, I believe that the fundamental error that has been made in these proceedings arises from the conception that the preferred shares in question can either be debt instruments or equity participation instruments, but they cannot have the attributes of both.

Feldman J. had this to say at p. 48 of her judgment:

Although the right of retraction at the option of the preferred shareholder may be less common than the usual right of the company to redeem at its option, that right is one of the incidents or provisions attaching to the preferred shares, but does not change the nature of those shares from equity to debt. The parties have characterized the transaction as a share transaction. The court would require strong evidence that they did not intend that characterization in order to hold that they rather intended a loan.

In my view, this case turns on whether the right of retraction itself creates a debt on the date the company becomes obligated to redeem even if it cannot actually redeem by payment on that date, or a contingent future debt on the same analysis, not on whether the preferred shares themselves with the right of retraction are actually debt documents.

Because the preferred shares remain in place as shares until the actual redemption, the appellants are not creditors and have no claim provable under the Bankruptcy Act (Canada), and the appeals are therefore dismissed.

As I read these reasons, the learned judge is in effect stating that these instruments are preferred shares in the corporation because the parties have so described them. In the first place, I do not think that describing the documents as preferred shares is conclusive as to what instrument the parties thought they were creating. In the second place, it is not what the parties call the documents that is determinative of their identity, but rather it is what the facts require the court to call them. The character of the instrument is revealed by the language creating it and the circumstances of its creation. Although these instruments may "remain in place as shares" until they are actually redeemed, they also contain a specific promise to pay at a specified date. This is the language of debt. I cannot accept the proposition that a corporate share certificate cannot create a corporate debt in addition to the certificate holder's rights as a shareholder.

The rules relating to the competing rights of shareholders and creditors of an insolvent corporation have become so regulated by governmental action that one can readily lose sight of the common law basis for making a distinction. To understand the difference in treatment, we must re-examine what a share of a corporation represents. Initially, a share is issued by the corporation to raise share capital. The price of the share is money or the promise of money. Accordingly, an individual share is one of a number of separate but integral parts of the authorized capital of a corporation. Even though it is the shareholders who contribute to the capital of the corporation, the capital remains the property of the corporation. The shareholders, however, as owners of the shares of capital, effectively control the corporation. They have the responsibility of managing its affairs through their control over the board of directors and in popular terminology are considered to be the owners of the corporation. However, the corporation is a separate entity in law, and if in the course of carrying out its business it incurs debts to third parties, those debts are those of the corporation. A corporation is an intangible and its capital therefore represents its substance to third parties having business dealings with the corporation. A preferred share is simply a share of a class of issued shares which contains a preference over other classes of shares, whether preferred or common: see Sutherland, Fraser and Stewart on Company Law of Canada, 6th ed. (1993), at pp.157 and 195 for further discussion.
The rights of shareholders are conveniently summarized by R.M.Bryden in his chapter, "The Law of Dividends", contained in Ziegel ed., Studies in Canadian Company Law (1967), at p.270:

The purchaser of a share in a business corporation acquires three basic rights: he is entitled to vote at shareholders' meetings; he is entitled to share in the profits of the company when these are declared as dividends in respect of the shares of the class of which his share forms a part; and he is entitled, upon the winding-up of the corporation, to participate in the distribution of the assets of the company that remain after creditors are paid. A fourth right which should be noted is the right to transfer ownership in his share, whereby the owner for the time being may realize upon the increase in value of the company's assets, or its favourable prospects, by selling his share at a price reflecting the buyer's estimation of the value of the rights he will acquire. Unless the shareholder chooses to sell his share, he can realize a return upon his investment only through receipt of dividends or by the return of his capital upon an authorized reduction of capital or winding up.
Shareholders are variously characterized as entrepreneurs, investors or risk- takers and as such they have the opportunities of benefitting from the successes of the corporation and suffering from its failures. While the corporation is an operating entity, the shareholders receive their rewards, if there are any, through the payment of dividends declared from time to time by the board of directors. While the source of these dividends is not restricted to surplus funds, the result of the payment of the dividend must not result in a return of capital to the shareholders. The classic justification for this rule was stated by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls in Flitcroft's Case (1882), 21 Ch. D. 519 at 533-4:
The creditor has no debtor but that impalpable thing the corporation, which has no property except the assets of the business. The creditor . . . gives credit to that capital, gives credit to the company on the faith of the representation that the capital shall be applied only for the purposes of the business, and he has therefore a right to say that the corporation shall keep its capital and not return it to the shareholders....

Creditors, on the other hand, do not have an ownership or equity interest in the corporation. They are third parties who have loaned money or otherwise advanced credit to the corporation. They look to the company for payment in accordance with the terms of the contract creating the indebtedness. They are also restricted in their recovery to the amounts stipulated in the terms of indebtedness. They are entitled to payment regardless of the financial circumstances of the debtor corporation and accordingly are not restricted to receiving payment of the debt from surplus. They can be paid out of assets or through the creation of further indebtedness. It is immaterial how the corporation records this indebtedness in its internal books. In some circumstances the indebtedness could properly reflect the acquisition of property from a creditor as a capital asset. This does not, however, convert the creditor into an investor. The vendor of the property remains a creditor and retains priority over shareholders in the event of a bankruptcy or insolvency.

In my view, the reasons under appeal do not reflect a sensitivity to the circumstances which gave rise to the issuance of the preference shares. The shares were not issued by Central Capital to the general public in order to raise capital and do not represent an investment by the public in the capital of the corporation. They were issued to specific persons as payment for the acquisition of specified assets. While the corporation was authorized by its Articles of Incorporation to issue preferred shares generally, the shares issued to the appellants were structured to meet the requirements of the appellants as vendors of the controlling interest in the operating companies that Central Capital was acquiring. In my view, these preference shares are the equivalent of vendor shares in that the appellants received them in exchange for the transfer of assets to Central Capital.

In the case of McCutcheon, the retraction provision in the preferred shares represented only partial payment of an agreed value for the assets, but in the case of SYH, they represented the full value. In both cases, the agreed value as reflected in the retraction price was guaranteed by Central Capital to be retractable at a fixed price at a predetermined date. By postponing the obligation to pay the purchase price in this way, Central Capital was using the retraction provisions of the preference shares as a vehicle for the financing of its expanding asset base. The appellants, for their part, deferred the realization of the purchase price of their assets to the agreed dates and thereby extended credit to the corporation. In return for extending credit for some or all of the selling price, the appellants agreed to receive dividends calculated in advance but payable as and when declared by the board of directors.

Thus, in looking at the substance of the transaction that led to the issuance of the preference shares, it appears to me that the retraction clauses were promises by Central Capital to pay fixed amounts on definite dates to the appellants. They evidenced a debt to the appellants. The fact that the appellants as holders of the preference shares had rights as shareholders in the corporation up to the time when the retraction clauses were exercisable did not affect their right to enforce payment of the retraction price when it became due.

The validity of an analysis directed to the substance of the transaction is supported by Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Commercial Bank, 1992 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558, a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada delivered by Iacobucci J. The case involved a number of corporations constituting a support group which entered into an arrangement to provide emergency financial assistance to Canadian Commercial Bank ("CCB"). On the ultimate failure of the bank, the issue arose as to whether the monies advanced to CCB under this support arrangement were in the nature of a loan or in the nature of a capital investment. I find instructive to our situation Iacobucci J.'s observation at pp.590-1:

As I see it, the fact that the transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, pose an insurmountable obstacle to characterizing the advance of $255 million. Instead of trying to pigeonhole the entire agreement between the Participants and CCB in one of two categories, I see nothing wrong in recognizing the arrangement for what it is, namely, one of a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity but which, in substance, reflects a debtor-creditor relationship. Financial and capital markets have been most creative in the variety of investments and securities that have been fashioned to meet the needs and interests of those who participate in those markets. It is not because an agreement has certain equity features that a court must either ignore these features as if they did not exist or characterize the transaction on the whole as an investment. There is an alternative. It is permissible, and often required, or desirable, for debt and equity to co-exist in a given financial transaction without altering the substance of the agreement. Furthermore, it does not follow that each and every aspect of such an agreement must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue. Again, it is not because there are equity features that it is necessarily an investment in capital. This is particularly true when, as here, the equity features are nothing more than supplementary to and not definitive of the essence of the transaction. When a court is searching for the substance of a particular transaction, it should not too easily be distracted by aspects which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement. [Emphasis in original.]

I have no difficulty in finding that the appellants' preferred shares with their retraction clauses are of "a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity". As to the equity component, the appellants are shareholders prior to exercising their retraction rights in that they have the right to vote in certain circumstances and have a right to receive dividends when and if they are declared by the board of directors. The debt component is more significant however. The shares were not issued to investors, but to vendors of property. The vendors were entitled to receive a fixed sum at a specified time in payment therefor. Pending payment, the vendors were entitled to receive dividends which were the equivalent of interest on the unpaid balance.

I can think of no reason why the holders of these preferred shares should not be treated as both shareholders and creditors. It does not concern me that these appellants act as shareholders before their retraction rights are exercisable.

Nor do I see any hardship to other creditors of Central Capital arising from the ability of these appellants to claim as creditors in the restructuring of the company given that the appellants are unpaid with respect to substantial assets sold to the corporation and now transferred on the restructuring to GIGL.

Much was made in argument of the fact that the retraction amounts could not be paid on the retraction dates. In the case of McCutcheon, the corporation was insolvent and subject to court administration on the due date of July 1, 1992. In the case of SYH, the retraction date did not arrive before the reorganization was complete.

The narrow issue of the effect of insolvency on a debt has been dealt with by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re East Chilliwack Agricultural Co-Operative (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1. In this case, the appellants were one-time members of three co-operative associations. The rules of the co-operatives permitted a member to withdraw upon written notice to the board of directors to that effect. The member was entitled to elect to have his shares redeemed either in equal instalments over five years or in one payment with interest at the end of five years. In April of 1987, the superintendent of co-operatives, under the authority of the Cooperative Association Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c.66, suspended the co-operatives' right to redeem their shares until their financial situation was no longer impaired. The three co-operatives subsequently went bankrupt and a two-fold issue came before the bankruptcy court: (1) whether those members whose notices of withdrawal had been accepted by the board of directors but who had not yet received the value of the shares were entitled to rank as unsecured creditors, and (2) whether those who had delivered notices that had not been accepted were to be treated as unsecured creditors. The court of first instance found that the members were shareholders and answered both questions in the negative. That judge was reversed on appeal with the majority of the court deciding that the answer to both questions was yes. Hutcheon J.A. for the majority stated at p.13:
I shall use Mr. Neels [a co-operative member] as my example. According to R. 3.06 he ceased to be a shareholder in May 1983. In May 1984 the Agricultural Co-operative owed him the first of five payments, or $686.40. I know of no principle of law that would support the proposition that Neels could not sue for that amount if the Agricultural Co-operative failed to pay in May 1984. Of course, the superintendent of co-operatives has power under s.15(2) to suspend payments if, in his opinion, the financial position of the co-operative was impaired. Subject to that power, the position of Neels and the Agricultural Co-operative would be that of ordinary creditor and debtor. In my opinion, the order made by the judge cannot be sustained on the first ground.
From this case, I extract the proposition that the fact of an insolvency, whether declared or not, does not change the nature of the relationship between debtor and creditor. It continues notwithstanding the inability of the debtor to pay or the creditor to collect.

It appears to me, with deference, that the issue of the effect of Central Capital's insolvency on the character of the retraction payments is something of a red herring. The contest in this appeal is between those who are conceded to be unsecured creditors and those whose claim to such status is contested. In both cases, any right to payment was suspended by Central Capital's announcement in December of 1991 that it was insolvent and that it had suspended all payments of principal and interest to unsecured creditors. This course of action was not freely chosen but was required by law. Any payments to creditors after the date of insolvency would be voidable at the instance of creditors on the basis that they were fraudulent preferences. In addition to ss.95 and 96 of the Bankruptcy Act dealing with fraudulent preferences generally, there is provincial legislation in the form of the Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F-29 and the Assignments and Preferences Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. A-33 that would be applicable. Counsel for the unsecured creditors maintains that the right to redeem shares, including preference shares was postponed by s.36(2) of the CBCA, supra. I am not certain that s.36(2) applies to the retraction provisions of the appellants' preference shares as opposed to the redemption privileges of Central Capital, but in my opinion the point is irrelevant to this appeal. Once Cental Capital acknowledged its insolvency, it could neither redeem its shares nor honour its retraction obligations. The whole purpose for the creditors applying to the court for a stay of Central Capital's obligations, including those of the acknowledged unsecured creditors, was to arrange for a scheme of payments to all creditors that could not be subject to attack as preferences. There is no suggestion on the evidence before us that the claims of unsecured creditors accepted by the Administrator were claims that had crystallized prior to the insolvency of Central Capital. Nor is it suggested that any creditors were rejected because some or all of their claims were not payable until after the date of the insolvency. The fact of insolvency, by itself, does not provide a rational basis for distinguishing the claims of the appellants from those of other unsecured creditors.

Much also was made of the provision in the Articles authorizing the shares in question, which states that if the obligation to redeem "would be contrary to applicable law", then Central Capital "shall redeem only the maximum number of [shares] it is then permitted to redeem". Counsel for the unsecured creditors submits that the reference to "applicable law" is to s.36 of the CBCA. The reference certainly embraces the CBCA, but it is not restricted by its terms to that statute. For example, "applicable law" would also capture s.101 of the Bankruptcy Act, which provides for penalties against directors and shareholders where insolvent companies redeem shares or pay dividends.

There was no evidence led as to why this provision was placed in the Articles and the share certificates. It appears to be a standard clause in all the preference shares issued by the corporation and not just those that were adapted to the appellants' situations where specific retraction clauses were drafted to satisfy the particular asset acquisitions. For my part, I have difficulty in understanding how a consideration of this provision assists the process of determining the underlying character of the retraction obligations. The statement is so self-evident that it is almost banal. I can only assume that the statement was included in the share provisions of a corporation marketing its securities world-wide so as to inform purchasers that legal restrictions in this jurisdiction apply to the company's right to redeem shares.

In summary then regarding the insolvency argument, these various statutes prohibit payments of any kind to shareholders by an insolvent company. As I understand it, counsel does not question that when a dividend has been lawfully declared by a corporation, it is a debt of the corporation and each shareholder is entitled to sue the corporation for his proportion: see Fraser and Stewart, supra, at p.220 for a list of authorities. However, once a company is insolvent it cannot make payments to shareholders or creditors so long as it continues to be insolvent. On the other hand, nowhere in the CBCA or elsewhere will we find authority for the proposition that once a corporation is insolvent, it is no longer obliged to pay its debts. The obligation is postponed until the insolvency is corrected or the corporation makes an accommodation with its creditors and obtains a release with or without the assistance of the various statues dealing with insolvency.

The existence of provisions prohibiting payment to shareholders and creditors on insolvency does not in anyway assist the determination of whether the retraction obligations at issue in this appeal constitute a debt or a return of capital at the time they are payable. Speaking of the obligation to honour the retraction in terms of the corporation redeeming its shares also introduces the wrong emphasis. The corporation is not redeeming the shares at its option as contemplated by most redemptions. It is being forced to redeem them because of a prior contractual obligation for which the preferred shareholder gave good consideration. It is for this reason that I question whether s.36 of the CBCA is the appropriate reference point. This is not the type of payment which concerned Jessel M.R in Flitcroft's Case, supra.
At the risk of oversimplifying this case, it appears to me that many of the arguments made against the appellants' claims to be creditors of Central Capital are impermissible in the context of the Agreed Statement of Facts. The issue in appeal is frozen in time by the stipulation that the court is to determine if these retraction clauses created a debt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act on June 15, 1992. The arguments against the appellants' claims also ignore that debts under s.121(1) of the Bankruptcy Act need not be payable at the date of the bankruptcy (or June 15, 1992 in our scenario). They need only come beneath the broad umbrella of "debts and liabilities, present and future, to which [Central Capital] is subject" on June 15, 1992. The fact that the debts could not be paid after June 15, 1992, does not mean that they were not provable claims pursuant to s.121 of the Bankruptcy Act. Moreover, assuming the retraction clauses created a debt payable on a future date, neither the order of Houlden J. nor the restrictions in the Articles creating the shares themselves purported to extinguish that debt.

There is nothing in either the Articles of Central Capital or in the law that excuses the obligation to pay the retraction amounts. Rather, discharge of the obligation is simply postponed until the cessation of the disabling event of insolvency. Article 4.3 of the Senior Series B Provisions provides the mechanism for future redemption of tendered shares that are not redeemed because such redemption would be contrary to law. Article 4.5 provides that the inability to effect a redemption does not affect the obligation to pay dividends accrued or accruing on the unredeemed shares.
So far as SYH is concerned, the retraction price was not payable until the fifth anniversary of the June 1989 sale of assets. Therefore, no issue of the effect of insolvency arose in 1992. The orders of Houlden J. of June 15 and July 9, 1992 changed the rules of the game. If this appellant is a creditor, it does not have to wait until the retraction date. It can claim as a creditor now. It did and the claim was disallowed. However, if this court holds that the claim should have been allowed, then in accordance with the narrow issue put to us, SYH is entitled to be accepted as a full creditor in the entire reorganization of Central Capital.

An additional factor raised by counsel during argument was that Article 7, supra, provides that in the event of the liquidation, dissolution or winding-up of Central Capital, whether voluntary or involuntary, or any other distribution of assets among its shareholders for the purpose of winding up its affairs, the holders of these preferred shares are entitled to recover "from the assets of Central Capital" the retraction price plus all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon. Such amount is to be paid prior to payment to junior ranking shareholders. The Article further provides that "[u]pon payment of such amounts, the holders of [the preferred shares] shall not be entitled to share in any further distribution of assets of [Central Capital]". Because it is trite law that shareholders are entitled to recover from assets only after all ordinary creditors have been paid in full, counsel for the unsecured creditors submits that the fact that the clause contemplates priorities between shareholders on a winding up or a liquidation of assets is clear evidence that they were shareholders only.

I have two responses to this submission. The first is the obvious, that we are not dealing with this contemplated event. We are dealing with a reorganization in which the parties have put a single question to the court: are the appellants creditors? Consideration of issues of priority or the valuation of claims have been taken away by the narrow scope of the agreed question. If the answer to the question posed is yes, then in accordance with the Agreed Statement of Facts, the appellants are entitled to have their claims as creditors allowed under the Subscription and Escrow Agreement and to participate in the Amended Plan of Arrangement as Senior Creditors. If the answer is no, they are to be treated as the Administrator has treated them: they are not creditors at all and are restricted to receiving Central New Common Shares under the Amended Plan of Arrangement.

My second response is that counsel for the unsecured creditors misses the significance of the clause. He assumes that there will be a deficiency in all circumstances leading up to a liquidation, dissolution or winding up that will necessitate a pro rata distribution, first to creditors and then to shareholders of all classes. However, the clause does not say that those with retraction rights are not creditors. It says that the retraction amounts are to be paid out of assets, not suplus. Once the retraction amounts have been paid in full, the appellants are not entitled to share in any further distribution. This contemplates a surplus after all creditors, including the appellants, have been paid in full. Accordingly, far from classifying the appellants as shareholders, the clause provides that they are not entitled to be treated as shareholders under a winding up or liquidation but only as creditors.

Finally, with respect to SYH's claims, it was submitted that these claims were so contingent as to be virtually non-existent. The claims anticipate a retraction date that as of June 15, 1992 was some two years into the future. Upon approval of the Amended Plan of Arrangement on December 18, 1992, the shares of SYH were cancelled and replaced by a new issue of shares, the Central New Common Shares. Counsel relied upon the finding of Feldman J. that there was then no discernable basis upon which the retraction could occur. Once again, with respect, this conclusion misses the point. Following the final order of Houlden J. approving the Amended Plan of Arrangement, all the shares and all the debts of Central Capital disappeared. There was thereafter no discernable basis upon which any event contemplated by any debt or share instruments could occur. We are only concerned with the status of shareholders and creditors as of June 15, 1992.

Based on the reasons set out above, I have concluded that the retraction amounts do fall within the definition of debts and liabilities, present or future, to which Central Capital was subject on June 15, 1992. This does not apply to undeclared dividends however, because until a dividend is declared no action on behalf of a shareholder lies to enforce its payment: see Fairhall v. Butler, 1928 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1928] S.C.R. 369 at 374. If undeclared dividends have been claimed by any of the appellants they should be disallowed. In all other respects the claims should be allowed.

Accordingly, I would allow the appeals, set aside the order of Feldman J. and order that the appellants have provable claims that are to be allowed by the Administrator. The record does not disclose what order if any Feldman J. made as to costs. Certainly the appellants are entitled to their costs of this appeal. If the parties are unable to agree with respect to any other disposition of costs, I would suggest that they submit their positions to the court in writing.

LASKIN J.A. (CONCURRING):

I have read the reasons of my colleagues Justice Finlayson and Justice Weiler. Like Justice Weiler, I would affirm the decision of the motions judge, Feldman J., and dismiss these appeals. I prefer, however, to state my own reasons for upholding the position of the unsecured creditors of Central Capital Corporation.

The Issue

The application was argued before Madam Justice Feldman on an agreed statement of facts. My colleagues have summarized the relevant facts and important provisions of the documents. Each appellant holds preferred shares of Central Capital and each appellant's shares contain a right of retraction — a right to require Central Capital to redeem the shares on a fixed date and for a fixed price. The retraction date for the appellants James McCutcheon and Central Guarantee Trust Company (collectively McCutcheon) was July 1, 1992, and before that date McCutcheon exercised his right of retraction and tendered his shares for redemption. The retraction date for the appellant S.Y.H. Corporation was September 1994 and although it could not tender its shares for redemption, it did file a proof of claim with the

Digitized by Google

Administrator of Central Capital. The Administrator disallowed each appellant's claim and Feldman J. dismissed appeals from the Administrator's decisions.

The issue on these appeals is whether McCutcheon and S.Y.H. Corporation "have claims provable against Central Capital Corporation within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act (Canada) as amended as of the date of the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement." Under the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3, s.2, a claim provable "includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor" and a creditor "means a person having a claim, preferred, secured or unsecured, provable as a claim under this Act." Section 121(1) of the Bankruptcy Act further defines claims provable as follows:

121.(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the bankruptcy or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

The date of the Restated Subscription and Escrow Agreement is May 1992.[1] By then, and indeed since December 1991, Central Capital had been insolvent and therefore was prohibited by s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-44 from making any payment to redeem the appellants' shares.

On June 15, 1992, Houlden J. provided that Central Capital could be reorganized under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.C-36 and he stayed proceedings against it. Houlden J.'s order of July 9, 1992, which approved the restructuring of Central Capital, was made without prejudice to the right of the appellants to assert claims as creditors. Thus the question for this court is whether the appellants' retraction rights created debts of Central Capital in May, 1992. In other words were McCutcheon and S.Y.H. Corporation creditors of Central Capital in May, 1992? If they were creditors, then like the other unsecured creditors of Central Capital, they can elect to take shares in the newly incorporated company, Canadian Insurance Group Limited; if they were not creditors, then they remain shareholders of Central Capital under the restructuring plan.

This is a question of characterization. I will address the question first, by considering the "substance" of the relationship between each appellant and the company; and second by considering s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act, supra. In brief I conclude:

(1) Although the relationship between each appellant and the company has characteristics of debt and equity, in substance both McCutcheon and S.Y.H. Corporation are shareholders, not creditors of Central Capital. Neither the existence of their retraction rights nor the exercise of those rights converts them into creditors;

(2) Finding that the appellants were creditors of Central Capital would defeat the purpose of s.36(2) of the statute.

I The Relationship Between the Appellants and Central Capital

Preferred shares have been called "compromise securities" and even "financial mongrels": Grover and Ross, Materials and Corporate Finance (1975), at p.49. Invariably the conditions attaching to preferred shares contain attributes of equity and, at least in an economic sense, attributes of debt. Over the years financiers and corporate lawyers have blurred the distinction between equity and debt by endowing preferred shareholders with rights analogous to the rights of creditors. One example is the right of redemption — the right of the corporation to compel preferred shareholders to sell their shares back to the corporation. Another example, and it is the case before us, is the right of retraction — the right of shareholders to compel the corporation to buy back their shares on a specific date for a specific price.

I acknowledge, therefore, that redeemable or retractable preferred shares are somewhat different from conventional equity capital. What makes the appeals before us difficult is that although the appellants appear to hold equity, their right of retraction appears to be a basic characteristic of a debtor-creditor relationship. See Grover and Ross, supra, at pp.47-49; Buckley, Gillen and Yalden, Corporations: Principles and Policies, 3rd ed. (1995), at pp.938-940.

If the certificate or instrument contains features of both equity and debt — in other words if it is hybrid in character — then the Court must determine the "substance" of the relationship between the holder of the certificate and the company. This is the lesson of Justice Iacobucci's judgment in Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Commercial Bank, 1992 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558. In that case the Supreme Court of Canada had to determine whether the financial assistance given by several lending institutions to try to rescue the Canadian Commercial Bank was "in the nature of a loan" or "in the nature of a capital investment." Justice Iacobucci discussed his approach to the problem at pp.590-591 of his judgment:

As I see it, the fact that the transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, pose an insurmountable obstacle to characterizing the advance of $255 million. Instead of trying to pigeonhole the entire agreement between the

Participants and CCB in one of two categories, I see nothing wrong in recognizing the arrangement for what it is, namely, one of a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity but which, in substance, reflects a debtor-creditor relationship. Financial and capital markets have been most creative in the variety of investments and securities that have been fashioned to meet the needs and interests of those who participate in those markets. It is not because an agreement has certain equity features that a court must either ignore these features as if they did not exist or characterize the transaction on the whole as an investment. There is an alternative. It is permissible, and often required, or desirable, for debt and equity to co-exist in a given financial transaction without altering the substance of the agreement. Furthermore, it does not follow that each and every aspect of such an agreement must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue. Again, it is not because there are equity features that it is necessarily an investment in capital. This is particularly true when, as here, the equity features are nothing more than supplementary to and not definitive of the essence of the transaction. When a court is searching for the substance of a particular transaction, it should not too easily be distracted by aspects which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement.

In determining the substance of the relationship, as in any other case of contract interpretation, the court looks to what the parties intended. In CDIC v. CCB, supra, Iacobucci J. put this proposition as follows at p.588:

As in any case involving contractual interpretation, the characterization issue facing this Court must be decided by determining the intention of the parties to the support agreements. This task, perplexing as it sometimes proves to be, depends primarily on the meaning of the words chosen by the parties to reflect their intention. When the words alone are insufficient to reach a conclusion as to the true nature of the agreement, or when outside support for a particular characterization is required, a consideration of admissible surrounding circumstances may be appropriate.

In these appeals what the parties intended is reflected mainly in the share purchase agreements and the conditions attaching to the appellants' shares, but also in the articles of incorporation and in the way Central Capital recorded the appellants' shares in its financial statements. These documents indicate that in substance the appellants are shareholders of Central Capital, not creditors. I rely on the following considerations to support my conclusion:

(i) Both appellants agreed to take preferred shares instead of some other instrument — for example, a bond or debenture — that would obviously have made them creditors. The appellant McCutcheon sold shares of one corporation (Canadian General Securities Limited) for cash and for shares of another corporation (Central Capital). Neither the share purchase agreements nor the share conditions support McCutcheon's contention that in taking preferred shares he was extending credit to Central Capital by deferring payment of the purchase price. He made an investment in the capital of Central Capital, no doubt because of the attractive dividend rate, the income tax advantages of preferred shares and "sweeteners" such as conversion privileges. Unlike Finlayson J.A., I place little weight on what he termed "the unique nature of the transaction". McCutcheon transferred assets to acquire his preferred shares rather than acquiring them with cash. But he nonetheless decided to invest in Central Capital and to take the risk and the profits (through dividends) of his investment.

Similarly, S.Y.H. Corporation exchanged its equity investment in four insurance companies for an equity investment in Central Capital. It too chose equity not debt. None of the contractual documents indicates that the appellants' retraction rights were intended to trigger an obligation on the part of Central Capital to repay a loan. Moreover, as Weiler J.A. points out, neither the share purchase agreements nor the share conditions provides for interest if Central Capital fails to honour its retraction obligations.

(ii) The senior preferred shares and junior preferred shares that the appellants own were part of the authorized capital of Central Capital before the appellants acquired them.

(iii) The appellants' shares were recorded in the financial statements of Central Capital as "capital stock," along with the company's issued and outstanding common shares, class "A" shares and warrants. The amount Central Capital might be obligated to pay the appellants if they exercised their retraction rights was not recorded as debt (even contingent debt) in the company's financial statements.

(iv) Both appellants had the right to receive dividends on their shares and McCutcheon had the right to vote his shares for the election of directors of Central Capital if dividends remained unpaid for a specified time. These rights — to receive dividends and to vote — are well recognized rights of shareholders. And these rights continue, even after the retraction dates, until the appellants' shares are redeemed.

(v) The preferred share conditions provide that on a liquidation, dissolution or winding up, the holders rank with other shareholders and therefore, implicitly, behind creditors. The appellant McCutcheon, who holds senior preferred shares, would rank behind creditors but ahead of the holders of subordinate classes of shares; the appellant S.Y.H. Corporation, which holds junior preferred shares, would rank behind senior preferred shareholders but ahead of common shareholders.

These provisions in the preferred share conditions also state that on payment of the amount owing to them the appellants "shall not be entitled to share in any further distribution of assets of the corporation." Finlayson J.A. interprets this to mean that the appellants "are not entitled to be treated as shareholders under a winding up or liquidation but only as creditors." I disagree. These are typical preferred share provisions, which limit the recovery of the holders but do not treat them as creditors: Sutherland et al., Fraser & Stewart Company Law of Canada, 6th ed. (1993), at p.198. At least on a liquidation, dissolution or winding up, the preferred share conditions evidence that the appellants would be treated not as creditors but as shareholders. In CDIC v. CCB, supra, Iacobucci J. placed considerable weight on a provision in the Participation Agreement stating that each participant "shall rank pari passu with the rights of the depositors." No such provision exists in this case. Indeed the share conditions I have referred to state the opposite.
Of course, Central Capital was reorganized, not liquidated, dissolved or wound up and the preferred share conditions are silent about what occurs on a reorganization. Still these conditions shed light on what the parties intended on the reorganization. Section 12(1) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, supra, defines claim as "any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that, if unsecured would be a debt provable in bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act." The question the court has been asked to answer is the same question that would arise on a liquidation. It is illogical to conclude that the appellants could claim only as shareholders on a liquidation and yet can claim as creditors on the reorganization. Whether Central Capital's financial difficulties led to a liquidation or a reorganization, the issue is the same and the analysis and the result should also be the same.

The appellants argue, however, that they are shareholders only until they exercise their retraction rights but once they exercise these rights they become creditors. I do not agree with this argument. The share conditions provide that even after exercising their retraction rights, the appellants continue to be entitled to dividends and to vote until their shares are redeemed. In other words, they continue to enjoy the rights of shareholders. Moreover, if when the appellants exercised their retraction rights the company were insolvent and were to be subsequently liquidated (or dissolved or wound up), the appellants would rank as shareholders on the liquidation. And as I have indicated above the result should be no different on the reorganization.
It seems to me that these appellants must be either shareholders or creditors. Except for declared dividends, they cannot be both. Once they are characterized as shareholders, their rights of retraction do not create a debtor-creditor relationship. These rights enable them to call for the repayment of their capital on a specific date (and at an agreed upon price) provided the company is solvent. Ordinarily shareholders have to recoup their investment by selling their shares to third parties. If they have retraction rights, however, they can compel the company (if solvent) to repay their investment at a given time for a given price. But the right of retraction provides for the return of capital not for the repayment of a loan. Certainly the Canada Business Corporations Act treats a redemption of shares as a return of capital because s.39 of the statute requires a company on a redemption to deduct from its stated capital account an amount equal to the value of the shares redeemed. The shares redeemed are then either cancelled or returned to the status of authorized but unissued shares.

Putting it differently, a preferred shareholder exercising a right of retraction on the terms that exist here must rank behind the company's creditors. Grover and Ross make this point more generally in their Materials and Corporate Finance, supra, at pp.48-49:
On the other hand, the company cannot issue "secured" preferred shares in the sense that shares cannot have a right to a return of capital which is equal or superior to the rights of creditors. Preferred shareholders are risk-takers who are required to invest capital in the business and who can look only to what is left after creditors are fully provided for. Thus, in the absence of statutory authorization, the claims of shareholders cannot be secured by a lien on the corporate assets. They rank behind creditors but before common shareholders (if specified) on a voluntary or involuntary dissolution of the company.
Admittedly there is little authority in Canada on the issue confronting this court. Some of the cases that the respondent relies on — for example, Re Patricia Appliance Shops Ltd., [1923] 3 D.L.R. 1160 (Ont. S.C.), Laronge Realty Ltd. v. Golconda Investments Ltd. (1986), 63 C.B.R. 74 (B.C.C.A.) and even Re Meade, [1951] 2 All E.R. 168 — are of limited assistance because the shareholders in those cases did not have retraction rights.

Perhaps the closest case — and the appellants rely heavily on it — is the judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re East Chilliwack Agricultural Co-operative (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1. In that case a majority of the court

Digitized by Google

(Craig J.A. dissenting) held that a withdrawing member of a co-operative association who elected to have his shares redeemed in instalments over a five-year period should be treated on the subsequent bankruptcy of the association as an ordinary creditor rather than as a shareholder. I decline to apply East Chilliwack for three reasons. First, because the case was decided in 1989, the British Columbia Court of Appeal did not have the benefit of the Supreme Court of Canada's reasons in CDIC v. CCB, supra. In East Chilliwack Hutcheon J.A., writing for the majority did not focus on what the parties intended when the member contracted with the co-operative. Instead he only considered the relationship between the member and the co-operative after the member had withdrawn. I do not think his approach is consistent with Justice Iacobucci's judgment in CDIC v. CCB, supra.

Second, there are important factual differences between East Chilliwack and the appeals before us. Justice Weiler has referred to these factual differences in her reasons. The most important of these differences are the following: in East Chilliwack the rules of the association provided that a member had to withdraw from the association to trigger the right of redemption, whereas the appellants' share conditions provide that they continue to be shareholders of Central Capital until their shares are redeemed; in East Chilliwack the member elected to withdraw and redeem his shares when the association was solvent whereas when the appellant McCutcheon exercised his right of retraction Central Capital was insolvent; and in East Chilliwack Hutcheon J.A. expressly stated that he was not considering the effect of the superintendent's power to suspend payments if the financial position of the co-operative was impaired, whereas the effect of the statutory prohibition against Central Capital making payment, found in s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act, is in issue in these appeals.

Third, the decision in East Chilliwack is at odds with most of the American case law and I favour the American approach. When a company repurchases shares by instalment and bankruptcy intervenes, the prevailing American position is that the shareholder's claim is deferred to the claims of ordinary creditors. The decision of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Robinson v. Wangemann 75 F.2d 756 (1935) is frequently cited. The facts of that case are virtually identical to the facts in East Chilliwack. A company had agreed to repurchase a stockholder's stock by instalments. Although the company was solvent when the agreement was made it went bankrupt before the repurchase was completed. The stockholder sought to prove as an ordinary creditor for the unpaid purchase price. Foster, Circuit Judge, writing for a unanimous court rejected the stockholder's claim at p.757:

A transaction by which a corporation acquires its own stock from a stockholder for a sum of money is not really a sale. The corporation does not acquire anything of value equivalent to the depletion of its assets, if the stock is held in the treasury, as in this case. It is simply a method of distributing a proportion of the assets to the stockholder. The assets of a corporation are the common pledge of its creditors, and stockholders are not entitled to receive any part of them unless creditors are paid in full. When such a transaction is had, regardless of the good faith of the parties, it is essential to its validity that there be sufficient surplus to retire the stock, without prejudice to creditors, at the time payment is made out of assets.

At the heart of Robinson v. Wangemann is the finding that the selling stockholder is not a creditor in the sense of a person who loans money to a corporation, and therefore is not entitled to parity with the general creditors. The principle in Robinson v. Wangemann seeks to protect creditors by refusing to permit selling stockholders, who were risk investors, to withdraw their capital on the same terms as general creditors in the event of insolvency. Section 40(3) of the Canada Business Corporations Act — a section to which I shall return when considering s.36(2) of the same statute — codifies the principle in Robinson v. Wangemann for share repurchases, though not for share redemptions. See also Blumberg, The Law of Corporate Groups (1989), at pp.205-210 and see contra Wolff v. Heidritter Lumber Co. 163 A. 140 N.J.Ch. (1932).

Quite apart from the instalment purchase price cases, American courts have often grappled with the question whether preferred stockholders can claim as creditors of the corporation. Although there are cases going both ways, most appear to come to the same conclusion as I do. The American cases are collected in Bjor and Solheim, Fletcher Cyclopedia Of the Law of Private Corporations (1995), revised vol. 11 and in Bjor and Reinholtz, Fletcher Cyclopedia Of the Law of Private Corporations (1990), revised vol. 15A. In volume 11 the authors of the text indicate — as did the Supreme Court of Canada in CDIC v. CCB — that "[w]hether or not the holder of a particular instrument or certificate is to be regarded as a shareholder or a creditor is a question of interpretation, and depends on the terms of the contract as evidenced by the instrument, the articles of incorporation, and the statutes of the state. The nature of the transaction is to be determined by the real substance and effect of the contract rather than by the name given to the obligations or its form ..." (at p.566).

And in volume 15A the authors state at pp.290 and 292 that even the arrival of a fixed redemption date does not change a preferred stockholder into a creditor:

Digitized by Google

Holders of preferred stock of a corporation, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, are stockholders and not creditors of the corporation, except for dividends declared. They have no lien upon, and are not entitled to, any of the assets of the corporation when it becomes insolvent, until all debts are paid. Furthermore, there is authority that the status of a preferred stockholder is not changed to that of creditor, even though a dividend is guaranteed. Indeed it is beyond the power of a corporation to issue a class of stock, the holders of which are entitled to preference over general creditors.

Even where preferred stock has a fixed redemption date, arrival of that date does not change the status of a preferred stockholder to that of a creditor. (pp.290, 292)

I agree with these statements. I therefore conclude first that the appellants, in substance, were shareholders of Central Capital not creditors; and second that neither the existence nor the exercise of their retraction rights turned them into creditors.

II Provable Claims and Section 36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act

In May 1992 Central Capital was insolvent. It was unable to pay its liabilities as they became due and the realizable value of its assets was less than the aggregate of its liabilities. Because it was insolvent it was prohibited by s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act from redeeming the appellants' shares. Section 36(2) of the statute provides:

36. (2) A corporation shall not make any payment to purchase or redeem any redeemable shares issued by it if there are reasonable grounds for believing that

(a) the corporation is, or would after the payment be, unable to pay its liabilities as they become due; or

(b) the realizable value of the corporation's assets would after the payment be less than the aggregate of

(i) its liabilities, and

(ii) the amount that would be required to pay the holders of shares that have a right to be paid, on a redemption or in a liquidation, rateably with or prior to the holders of the shares to be purchased or redeemed.

As well, the appellants' share conditions provide that they are not permitted to redeem their shares if to do so would be "contrary to applicable law," in this case s.36(2) of the statute.

To hold that the appellants have provable claims would defeat the purpose of s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act. At common law a company could not repurchase its own shares on the open market or in the language of Trevor v. Whitworth (1887), 12 A.C. 409, a company could not "traffick in its own shares." The obvious reason was to prevent companies from using their assets to destroy the claims of their creditors. Modern corporate statutes, such as the Canada Business Corporations Act, modified the rule in Trevor v. Whitworth to permit repurchases provided the company's creditors would not be prejudiced. Thus the legislation insisted that the company could not repurchase its own shares unless it satisfied stated solvency tests. And so, s.34(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act provides:

34. (2) A corporation shall not make any payment to purchase or otherwise acquire shares issued by it if there are reasonable grounds for believing that

(a) the corporation is, or would after the payment be, unable to pay its liabilities as they become due; or

(b) the realizable value of the corporation's assets would after the payment be less than the aggregate of its liabilities and stated capital of all classes.

In Nelson v. Rentown Enterprises Inc. 1992 CanLII 6183 (AB QB), (1993), 96 D.L.R. (4th) 586 aff'd 1994 ABCA 47 (CanLII), (1994), 109 D.L.R. (4th) 608 (Alta. C.A.), Hunt J. of the Alberta Queen's Bench wrote at p.589:

The policy behind the s.34(2) limitation upon a corporation's power to purchase its own shares seems obvious. It is intended to ensure that one or more shareholders in a corporation do not recoup their investments to the detriment of creditors and other shareholders. It has been observed that:

Corporate power to purchase its own stock has been frequently abused. Done by corporations conducting faltering businesses, it has been employed to create preferences to the detriment of creditors and of the other stockholders.

(Mountain State Steel Foundries, Inc. v. C.I.R., supra, at p. 741 [284 F.2d 737 (1960)].)

Modern business statues permit these share purchases to take place provided that the position of creditors and other shareholders is protected, by virtue of the application of the s.34(2) tests.

Redemptions of preferred shares, unlike repurchases, were always permitted at common law as long as they were not made in contemplation of bankruptcy. But the solvency test in s.36(2) of the Canada Business Corporations Act has the same purpose as the solvency test in s.34(2): to prevent redemptions if they would allow the company to prejudice the claims of creditors. See Buckley et al., Corporations: Principles and Policies, supra, at pp.968-71. To hold that the appellants' retraction rights gave rise to provable claims in the face of s.36(2), thereby allowing the appellants to rank equally with the unsecured creditors, would undermine the purpose of the section. If a claim in a bankruptcy or reorganization proceeding is unenforceable under the statute, the claim is not entitled to recognition on a parity with the claims of unsecured creditors: See Blumberg, supra, at pp.205-6; and Farm Credit Corporation v. Holowach (Trustee of) (1988), 68 C.B.R. (N.S.) 255 (Alta. C.A.).

I draw comfort in this conclusion from s.40 of the Canada Business Corporations Act. Section 40(1) provides that a contract with a corporation for the purchase of its shares is specifically enforceable against the corporation "except to the extent that the corporation cannot perform the contract without thereby being in breach of s.34 ..." Section 40(3) then states:

40.(3) Until the corporation has fully performed a contract referred to in subsection (1), the other party retains the status of a claimant entitled to be paid as soon as the corporation is lawfully able to do so or, in a liquidation, to be ranked subordinate to the rights of creditors but in priority to the shareholders.

In other words, the section recognizes that if a company contracts to repurchase its shares but is prohibited from doing so because it is insolvent, the vendor of the shares is not a creditor and on a liquidation ranks subordinate to the rights of creditors. The shareholder cannot be repaid at the expense of the company's creditors. Although s.40 does not expressly apply to s.36, I think that the rationale for s.40(3) applies to redemptions as well as to repurchases. Whether a repurchase or a redemption, the shareholder is not a creditor and is subordinate to the rights of creditors. More simply the shareholder does not have a provable claim.

The appellants rely on The Custodian v. Blucher, [1927] 3 D.L.R. 40, (S.C.C.) but in my view this case does not assist them. In Blucher dividends were declared on stock but payment of the dividends was suspended during World War I. The Supreme Court of Canada held at p.43 that "[t]he right of recovery was in suspense during the war, but the debt nevertheless existed." In that case, however, the dividend was declared before the suspension of payment took place. Moreover, as Justice Finlayson points out in his reasons, courts have always accepted the proposition that when a dividend is declared it is a debt on which each shareholder can sue the corporation.

Holding that the appellants do not have provable claims accords with sound corporate policy. On the insolvency of a company the claims of creditors have always ranked ahead of the claims of shareholders for the return of their capital. Case law and statute law protect creditors by preventing companies from using their funds to prejudice creditors' chances of repayment. Creditors rely on these protections in making loans to companies. Permitting preferred shareholders to be turned into creditors by endowing their shares with retraction rights runs contrary to this policy of creditor protection.

I would dismiss these appeals. I would not make any cost order. I am grateful to all counsel for their assistance on this interesting and difficult problem.

WEILER J.A.:

I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of Finlayson J.A. and for the reasons which follow I respectfully disagree with his conclusion that the appellants are entitled to prove a claim pursuant to the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 (the "CCAA").

Section 12(1) of the CCAA requires that persons wishing to participate in a reorganization have claims which would be provable in bankruptcy. Section 121(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, states that "[a]ll debts and liabilities, present or future ... shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act."

In order to decide whether the obligation of Central Capital to redeem the preferred shares of the appellants is a claim provable in bankruptcy, it is necessary to characterize the true nature of the transaction. The court must look to the surrounding circumstances to determine whether the true nature of the relationship is that of a shareholder who has equity in the company or whether it is that of a creditor owed a debt or liability by the company: Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank, 1992 CanLII 49 (SCC), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 558. In this case, the decision is not an easy one. Where, as here, the agreements between the parties are reflected in the articles of the corporation, it is necessary to examine them carefully to characterize the true relationship. It is not disputed that if the true nature of the relationship is that of a shareholder-equity relationship after the retraction date and at the time of the reorganization, then the appellants do not have a claim provable in bankruptcy. Consequently, they will not have a claim under the CCAA.

As I see it, three main questions need to be addressed:

Digitized by Google

(1) Was Feldman J. correct in characterizing the relationship between Central Capital and the companies owned by James McCutcheon ("McCutcheon"), and between Central Capital and Scottish and York Holdings Limited (the predecessor to S.Y.H., hereinafter referred to as "SYH"), as a shareholder relationship?
(2) Did the nature of the relationship change after the retraction date for redeeming the shares of McCutcheon or, in the case of SYH, at the time of the reorganization?
(3) If the nature of the relationship is not a shareholder-equity relationship, are the appellants entitled to prove a claim under the CCAA.?
In addition, the appellants raise the question of whether they have a right to prove a claim for dividends, which have accrued but have not yet been declared payable. The price to be paid by Central Capital to McCutcheon on the retraction date, July 1, 1992, was $25 per share plus all accrued and unpaid dividends thereon. The dividends are therefore part of the retraction price. Similar provisions apply to SYH.

The reasons of Finlayson J.A. contain a comprehensive statement of the background to the litigation and I will therefore only refer to the facts in a summary fashion.
James McCutcheon and his brother sold their shares in Central Guarantee Trust Company to Central Capital Corporation ("Central Capital"), a trust company, for $575 a share. They received $400 per share in cash. The balance of $175 owing on each share was paid through the issue of seven preferred shares in Central Capital, with each share having a par value of $25. Following this transaction, McCutcheon purchased his brother's shares. These preferred shares, known as Senior Series B Preferred Shares, were to be listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange. These shares carried with them a retraction privilege. The shareholder had the right to have his shares redeemed by Central Capital on July 1, 1992, for $25 a share, provided that such redemption would not be "contrary to law in the context of the Corporation's current financial position." McCutcheon chose not to sell his shares.

Scottish & York Holdings Limited (the predecessor to SYH) sold its shares in certain insurance companies which it owned to Central Capital. Central Capital paid for these shares by the issue of Series A Junior Preferred Shares. These shares were not listed on a stock exchange. SYH had the right to have its shares redeemed by Central Capital on or after September 1994 at a price of $1 per share, subject to the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 (the "CBCA").
It should be noted that the right of retraction was not unique to these two classes of shareholders. Even common shareholders had the right to have their shares retracted under certain circumstances.

By December 1991, Central Capital was unable to pay its liabilities as they became due and its total liabilities greatly exceeded the value of its assets. As a result, the various banks and subordinated debtholders, collectively referred to as the lenders, had a choice to make. Inasmuch as the definition of a corporation in s. 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act precludes a creditor from bringing a petition against a trust company, they could either wind up Central Capital under the Winding Up Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11, or they could try to restructure Central Capital under the CCAA. In a winding up or liquidation, the trustee would sell the company's assets, either piecemeal or as a going concern, to third parties. The proceeds from the sale would then be distributed to those who proved a claim according to set priority rules. In a reorganization, existing fixed amounts owed to Central Capital's creditors would be traded for new claims and ownership interests in the reorganized corporation which would remain a going concern. The lenders chose to reorganize.
Two transactions were involved. In the Consolidated Insurance Group Limited transaction, or "CIGL transaction", Central Capital transferred some of its significant assets to a newly incorporated company, CIGL. Thirty-nine creditors of Central Capital then elected to exchange a portion of Central Capital's debt owing to them for equity in this newly incorporated company. In the second transaction, common shares were issued for the remaining assets of Central Capital. The creditors of Central Capital were given 90 per cent of the common shares of the reorganized company. The balance of 10 per cent was allocated to the shareholders of Central Capital. All of the preferred, common and subordinate voting shares in Central Capital were then converted into these "new" common shares. The reorganization was subsequently approved by the creditors and sanctioned by the Court as required by the Act, but this approval was given without prejudice to any claims that McCutcheon and SYH might have.

McCutcheon's position was that the right to have his shares retracted accrued before the reorganization, and that his exercise of this right of retraction in May 1992 constituted a present debt or liability entitling him to rank as a creditor in the CIGL transaction and in the reorganized Central Capital. SYH's position was that the right to have its shares retracted in 1994 created a future debt or liability and thus a provable claim. The administrator of Central Capital disallowed both claims. McCutcheon and SYH appealed the administrator's decision to Feldman J. In dismissing their appeals, she held that the appellants were shareholders and that the right of retraction attaching to the shares did not change the nature of the shares from equity into debt.

1. Was Feldman J. correct in characterizing the agreement between Central Capital and the companies owned by McCutcheon, and between Central Capital and SYH, as creating a shareholder relationship between the parties?

Feldman J. analyzed the transaction and came to the conclusion that it was an equity transaction.

Finlayson J.A. is of the opinion that the nature of this transaction is different and that Feldman J. erred in not showing sensitivity to the fact that she was dealing with the sale of a business by its owners. He is of the opinion that the shares issued by Central Capital are the equivalent to "vendor shares" in that the appellants received them in exchange for the transfer of assets to Central Capital. He does not see the transaction as being either a contribution to capital by McCutcheon and SYH or as a return of capital. Although the transaction has debt and equity features, Finlayson J.A. is of the opinion that the true nature of the transaction is that of a debt owing by Central Capital to McCutcheon and SYH for the shares in their companies.

My analysis of the transaction is that when McCutcheon sold his shares in Central Guaranty and took back preferred shares in Central Capital as part payment, he transferred part of his capital investment from a smaller entity to a larger entity. Similarly, SYH transferred its investment in the shares of the insurance companies for shares in the larger entity of Central Capital. Both appellants could look to a larger asset base than before to generate a return on their capital. Until the retraction date, McCutcheon chose to take the risk of continuing his investment in Central Capital, which offered the prospect of a stable, yet relatively high, annual return through the receipt of 7-5/8 per cent dividends. Because the shares traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange, he would have had the option of realizing upon his investment by selling his shares for what they would bring on the open market, but he did not do so. In the case of SYH, although these shares were not required to be publicly listed, the corporation's articles did not restrict their transfer. The corporation's articles indicate that these shares had some preference over other shares with respect to the right to receive dividends and in the distribution of assets after creditors are paid on a liquidation. As preferred shareholders, McCutcheon and SYH did not have a voice in company affairs unless the company failed to pay the dividends it had promised to pay. This is quite typical: see Welling, Corporate Law in Canada, 2nd ed. (1991) at p. 604; Ziegel et al, Cases and Materials on Partnership and Canadian Business Corporations, 2nd ed. (1989) at p. 1198. Risk taking, profit sharing, transferability of investment, and the right to participate in a share of the assets on a liquidation after the creditors have been paid are the hallmarks of a shareholder: see R.M. Bryden "The Law of Dividends" contained in Ziegel ed., Studies in Canadian Company Law (1967) at p. 270. In my opinion, Feldman J. was correct that the true nature of the relationship between the parties initially was that of an equity transaction.

2. Did the nature of the relationship change after the retraction date for McCutcheon's shares and did the reorganization trigger a right of redemption respecting SYH's shares?

Ordinarily, shareholders cannot realize on their investment in a company except by transferring their shares. The retraction privilege attaching to the shares gives the preferred shareholders the option of realizing on their investment other than by transferring their shares to a third party.

Feldman J. found that McCutcheon continued to be a shareholder after the retraction date and that he remained a shareholder at the time of the reorganization. She found SYH's claim to be too remote inasmuch as the retraction date had not yet arrived at the time of the reorganization.

The appellants argue that Feldman J. erred in this conclusion. They submit that although McCutcheon and SYH may have been shareholders initially, this relationship changed. Upon McCutcheon's exercise of his right to have the corporation pay him the retraction price of his shares, he ceased to be a shareholder. When Central Capital failed to pay him, he became a creditor of the corporation. In the case of SYH, it is submitted that when the lenders opted to reorganize the company, they, in effect, triggered the obligation to redeem SYH's shares.

a) Nature of the transaction's relationship to the Capital Structure of the Corporation

Section 25(3) of the CBCA states that shares shall not be issued until the consideration for the shares is fully paid either in cash or with property having a fair market value equivalent to the shares issued. Therefore, by issuing preferred shares with a fixed par value, Central Capital paid McCutcheon for his shares of Central Guaranty and paid SYH for the shares of the insurance companies that Central Capital received. Central Capital could not issue preferred shares except as full payment for the shares it received. The preferred shares were part of the capital of Central Capital and the preferred shares were always shown as shareholders' equity on Central Capital's books. The capital of the corporation is representative of the assets available to pay creditors. If, on the date for redemption of McCutcheon's shares, or on the date of reorganization in the case of SYH, the shares are redeemed, the amount paid must be deducted from the stated capital of the corporation: s. 39 CBCA. Consequently, the total assets that Central Capital will have available to pay the lenders and other creditors outside the corporation will be reduced. A reduction of capital by the redemption of redeemable shares is permitted under the CBCA but only where the requirements of s. 36 are met.

b) Section 36 of the CBCA
Section 36 of the CBCA makes the ability of a corporation to redeem its redeemable shares subject to (1) its articles and (2) a solvency requirement. For ease of reference s. 36 is reproduced below.

36. (1) Notwithstanding subsection 34(2) or 35(3) [both of which deal with a corporation's acquisition of its own shares in other circumstances], but subject to subsection (2) and to its articles, a corporation may purchase or redeem any redeemable shares issued by it at prices not exceeding the redemption price thereof stated in the articles or calculated according to a formula stated in the articles.
(2) A corporation shall not make any payment to purchase or redeem any redeemable shares issued by it if there are reasonable grounds for believing that
(a) the corporation is, or would after the payment be, unable to pay its liabilities as they become due; or
(b) the realizable value of the corporation's assets would after the payment be less than the aggregate of
(i) its liabilities, and
(ii) the amount that would be required to pay the holders of shares that have a right to be paid, on a redemption or in a liquidation, rateable with or prior to the holders of shares that have a right to be paid, on a redemption or in a liquidation, rateable with or prior to the holders of the shares to be purchased or redeemed.
[Emphasis added.]

There is no dispute that Central Capital was unable to redeem McCutcheon's shares on the retraction date. Nor could it redeem SYH's shares on the date of the reorganization. The appellants agree that the effect of s. 36 renders the agreement between themselves and Central Capital unenforceable. It is the position of the appellants, however, that s. 36 does not extinguish a debt or liability which they say has been created. The appellants rely on the decision in Re East Chilliwack Agricultural Co-operative (1989), 74 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (B.C.C.A.) in support of their position that a debt or liability is created notwithstanding the solvency requirements of s. 36 respecting payment. The appellants' submission does not take into consideration the major differences between the decision in East Chilliwack and the present situation relating to the timing, effect of the solvency requirements and the provisions in the articles governing the relationship of the parties.
1) In East Chilliwack, farmers who owned shares in an agricultural co-operative gave notice to the co-op of their intention to have their shares redeemed. After the notices had been given, the superintendent of co-operatives suspended the right of the co-op to redeem its shares. Here, the request to redeem the shares by McCutcheon and the retraction date occurred after Central Capital had sent out a notice that it would not be able to redeem the shares due to its financial position. SYH had no right to demand that its shares be retracted until the retraction date, which was some two years after the date of Central Capital's insolvency.

As in the instant case, the issue in East Chilliwack was whether the farmers were entitled to rank with the creditors of the co-op. Hutcheon J.A., with Toy J. A. concurring, held that they were entitled to be treated as creditors.
At the outset of his reasons, Hutcheon J.A. noted, at p. 11, that the effect of the superintendent's suspension on the farmers' rights was not argued on appeal and that the court had been asked to determine the status of the farmers without regard to the suspension.

Here, the effect of Central Capital's inability to redeem its shares due to insolvency is very much in issue and cannot be ignored. Although the articles provide for the redemption of all of the shares held by McCutcheon and SYH on or after the retraction date, the articles also state that Central Capital will only redeem so many of its shares as would not be "contrary to law." Pursuant to s. 36(1) of the CBCA, a corporation may purchase or redeem redeemable shares, but the corporation is prohibited from doing so if the corporation is unable to pay its liabilities as they become due or if the assets of the corporation are less than the total of its liabilities and the amount required for the redemption. Because Central Capital could not comply with the solvency requirements, redemption would be "contrary to law."

2) In East Chilliwack, supra, at p. 13, the rules of the co-op provided that upon the giving of a notice of redemption, the farmer giving it ceased to be a shareholder. Central Capital's articles do not state that a request for redemption of the holder's shares terminates his status as a shareholder. McCutcheon continued to have the right to receive dividends pursuant to Article 4.5 while his shares were not redeemed. In effect, so long as Central Capital was unable to redeem the shares but had profits, McCutcheon continued to be entitled to a share of the profits through the declaration of dividends. If the dividends remained unpaid for eight consecutive quarters then, pursuant to Article 8, McCutcheon had the right to receive notice of, and to attend, each meeting of shareholders at which directors were to be elected and was entitled to vote for the election of two directors. The articles relating to the preferred shares held by SYH contain a similar provision. The result of insolvency as envisaged by the articles was that McCutcheon and SYH would continue as shareholders.

3) In East Chilliwack, supra, Hutcheon J.A. held, at p. 13, that, subject to the power of the superintendent of co-operatives, the farmer's position would be that of an ordinary creditor.
